In his address of last week the Prime Minister had something to say about a reciprocity agreement with the United States, and in connection therewith quoted some prices. He threw the question to members on this side of the house whether or not we wanted the farmers of western Canada to sell their products in the higher priced markets of this country. I, for one, have always believed that one of the worst blows which has befallen our western country was the defeat of reciprocity in 1911. I can assure the Prime Minister that if he will bring in a reasonable measure providing for reciprocal trade with the United States there will not be very much opposition from this side of the house. In his remarks he mentioned the prices of a number of commodities. I have now before me the prices of agricultural products which were quoted about a year and a half ago in the cities of Chicago and Winnipeg. In connection with them I now ask him the same question he put to us: Why is it that he did not endeavour to let us, the people of Canada, ship our goods in the higher priced markets of United States a year and a half ago? As a matter of fact, right to-day, although, as the right hon. gentleman mentioned, the hog market in Canada is very good, it can be of no benefit to those people who have no feed for their hogs and cannot fatten them for the market. He did not mention wool. Last year in my constituency wool was selling for from seven to nine cents per pound. A few days ago in Chicago it was quoted at thirty-four cents a pound. Surely that price would be of some benefit to the wool growers in western Canada.

Then, at page 2293 of Hansard for 1933 the Prime Minister stated that his party did not oppose reciprocity in natural products. If they did not then, why should they now, despite the fact that hogs happen to be a little higher priced in Canada than they are in the United States? If he will negotiate a treaty I do not believe the people of Canada will offer very much opposition. The people in the constituency from which I come—and I believe this statement applies to the rest of Canada—are anxious to secure markets; they want to trade with any country which will trade with us on a fair basis. I have often asked myself why the people of Canada and, for that matter, also the people of the United States, persist in sending their goods and paying freight charges on products they are exporting to points four or five thousand miles away when each country has a market right at its door for a great deal of its natural products. Despite the high tariffs which have been placed against our goods by the United States and which we, in turn, have placed against their goods, the United States was still in the year 1933 our best customer. I have learned that in that year we did a business valued at $383,000,000 with the United States, and about $100,000,000 worth less—$272,000,000—with Great Britain.

In the Winnipeg Free Press of May 3, 1933, there appeared an editorial dealing with the question of reciprocity which, I believe, reflects the opinion in western Canada. It speaks of a readiness, amounting actually to eagerness, of the United States government to make an agreement with Canada which will have the effect of enlarging the volume of trade between the two countries. In part the editorial is as follows:

> The new democratic administration thoroughly realizes the havoc that has been made in the world by the competition between the nations in the raising of tariff walls and admits a measure of responsibility for this disastrous economic war. It will enter the world economic conference with a will to cooperate in an international movement looking to a substantial and progressive removal of trade restrictions. There is in evidence in Washington a disposition to be friendly and reasonable that, if met by Canada in the same spirit and with an equal readiness to act, might result in the United States and Canada going to the world economic conference in June not only with promises of cooperation but with an earnest of their good intentions in the form of an agreement between themselves for the substantial enlargement of trade between the two countries.

Then at another point the article continues:

> The situation is not unlike that of 1911. Then the United States government for domestic political purposes, was prepared to give Canada much the best of the bargain in order to ensure the making of an agreement; but the Canadian people rejected the opportunity in the belief that the American market for our natural products was of no real advantage to them. There is very good reason to believe that we now have a parallel situation. The United States administration, in order to make a good beginning in its program of tariff reductions, is in the mood to deal generously with a country which is its nearest neighbour and, on a per capita basis, its best customer.

I believe that editorial sets out exactly the views held by the people of western Canada and, largely, by the people in eastern Canada as well. On February 6, the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) speaking in this debate about my right hon. leader, had this to say:

> The right hon. gentleman, standing on the platform one day in the summer at Estevan, made certain statements to this effect in an area where the people had lost four crops and the fifth was then being consumed by grasshoppers—the very area with respect to which, for six weeks in this house, he refused to consent to relief being afforded the farmers until the house was compelled to pass the measure by closure. Yet he stood on the platform there and said, "Had I been Prime Minister of Canada in the last three years you people would not be in the condition in which you are to-day." The contention was made throughout western Canada that the prices which the farmers have to pay for the things they buy are higher to-day than they were when the present government came into office. Let hon. gentlemen make no mistake about it; the farmers of western Canada know better than that.

I happened to be at Estevan when the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) delivered the address to which the hon. member for Regina referred. He did not make the statement, "Had I been Prime Minister of Canada in the last three years you people would not be in the condition in which you are to-day." Moreover, he did not, and the opposition in this house did not, hold the farmers out of their seed for six weeks, as the hon. member for Regina says, in the spring of 1932. The fact of the matter is that the wheat had been purchased and the government of the province had it; all they had to do was to distribute it, and it was actually being distributed at the time that debate was going on in this house. We all know that an attempt was made to make a little capital out of the fact that that debate was being carried on here. The premier of Saskatchewan wired to me, as well as to other members of this house, I believe, asking us to press the legislation through as the farmers were waiting for their seed. I do not know what the others answered, but my answer was to the effect that if this government would bring down a proper measure there would be no delay in procuring the seed.

The hon. member for Regina also said that my right hon. leader tried to prove to the farmer that the prices which they have to pay for the things they have to buy are higher to-day than they were when the present government came into office. What we have contended, and rightly so, as to the prices of agricultural implements—and that is what he was referring to—is that the prices of implements are being held up by the high tariffs put on by this government in spite of the fact that the cost of the raw materials and the price of labour is down. I remember hearing my right hon. leader discussing these matters. He did mention sugar, and I remember the cheer which went up from the big crowd at that meeting because they knew, as everyone knew, that the price of sugar was increased by reason of the tax put on by this government.

Whether the hon. member for Regina likes it or not, the people of my constituency and of the rural parts of the whole province of Saskatchewan do appreciate the fact that the leader of the Liberal party went right out into the rural areas of that province to find out at first hand the conditions under which the people there were living. He made observations for himself, and I believe it did the people out there good to know that he was personally interested in their welfare. In the speech he made in the town of Estevan he did expound Liberal policies, but, Mr. Speaker, there is one thing that even the hon. member for Regina will appreciate, as the people of my constituency appreciated it, and that is the fact that my right hon. leader talked business. He did say that the policies of this government, by high tariffs, had aggravated the conditions, but I know that in comparison with what the leader of the Conservative party said in 1930, the people were quite satisfied that my leader was not there to play politics. He did not, for instance, call his political opponents a bunch of mercenaries. Nor did he say: Put us into power and unemployment will vanish practically overnight. No, Mr. Speaker; he spoke without any particular bias and the people appreciated his remarks.

So far as western Canada is concerned, I believe that the Liberal policy as regards that section of the country is stronger in the mind of the Liberal leader to-day because of what he saw of the conditions there. We have heard the remark made on more than one occasion that the Liberal party has no policy, but what the leader of our party did in his tour throughout western Canada was to announce to the people just what the Liberal policy was, and the people appreciated the fact that we did have such a policy.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, although I have put forward the suggestion for an undertaking in my constituency, I cannot help but say that I have some doubt as to the advisability of the government going further into debt even for a building program at this time. But if something can be done which will help to relieve the situation by the expenditure of money that will be devoted entirely to labour, then I would be in favour of it, and that is why I advance the proposal I have made here to-night of a dam over the Souris river at Estevan. We cannot afford to go further into debt in this country, because I believe that our debt is one of the main obstacles to the return of prosperity.

I have often wondered just what the historians of the future will say when they write the history of Canada during this period of depression. They can honestly say that in 1930 the whole world was in the midst of a very severe economic depression and that Canada, because of the fact that she was maintaining a comparatively low tariff as compared with other countries, was getting through the depression without feeling it to any great extent. Then a political party in this country went to the people promising that by the simple expedient of raising the tariff, as every other country was doing, they were going to lift Canada out of the depression, end unemployment, increase prices, put all our people to work, and change the economic situation entirely. By those promises they secured a mandate from the people, and immediately afterwards a session of parliament was called, at which money was voted freely for the construction of public works for the purposes of relief. That money was spent, and in spite of that fact the depression grew worse and unemployment increased by leaps and bounds. Later the government decided that it had been spending too much money for the benefits secured and inaugurated a program of direct relief. In the first year that relief was given quite freely, but it was found in the part of the country from which I come that the needy recipients received only a small part and the supervisors and those who did not particularly need it got a very large part of the relief. Relief is still being given to-day but it is being given in a most miserable fashion I know of families of four, five and six in my part of the country who are being forced to live on a very few dollars per month, hardly enough to eke out an existence. But still this same government remains in office, its high tariff policy remains in force and economic conditions become worse and worse. In 1930 the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) told us that he would do the things I have mentioned, or perish in the attempt. I believe Canada is ready to have him put on his perishing stunt. This is the feeling of the people I represent, and from the sentiments expressed here, I believe it is the feeling across the whole of Canada.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, in continuing the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, may I say that I do not want to be poetical although—

> I like to take part in a parliamentary debate,
> Particularly when it is not too late.

And it is not too late to take part in this debate. In taking part in it I should like to say something about the speech from the throne itself—that is the questions which grow out of it—and deal also with at least one grievance of the riding which I represent in this house.

Before going on to deal with some of the matters mentioned in the speech from the throne, may I refer in a historical way to the speech itself. The speech from the throne has its place and function in our parliamentary system of government and anything that has a place and function in our parliamentary system of government is worthy of the consideration of this house. According to modern parliamentary practice, the first duty of a prime minister or of his ministers, the first duty of a government in fact, is to write the speech from the throne and have it ready for parliament when it assembles. I was pleased the other day at the discussion which took place with regard to the position which the debate on the address should occupy, and particularly so when it was decided to change the procedure this year from that followed last year. Last year the debate on the address ran all over the order paper for days. A procedure of that kind militates against the discussion of certain constituency grievances which ought to be brought before parliament so that they can be remedied. The very fact that according to modern parliamentary practice the preparation of the speech from the throne is the first duty of a government is good reason why the discussion of that speech should be the first duty of parliament after it is read. There we have the very foundation of the Liberal contention that was made the other day. I believe the decision arrived at was sound and if that procedure is followed the debate will be better and after the debate is over the government will feel better for having taken such a common sense course.

In days gone by the speech from the throne was divided into two parts. The king often wrote and read the speech himself; he came down to parliament and delivered it personally. He would then delegate one of his ministers, perhaps the lord chancellor, the lord treasurer or some other member of the government, to state to parliament why it had been assembled. But with that statement, his duty ended. As far as a present-day speech from the throne is concerned, it is prepared by the prime minister, the parliamentary leader of the nation. It differs entirely from those delivered in past years. Were I to select from the speech delivered this year those parts which the king might state himself if he came down in person, or that his representative would really state, there would be two only. The first would be the following:

> Since I have been associated with you as the representative of His Majesty in Canada, I have visited every province of the dominion. I have been greatly impressed by the loyalty, devotion and friendliness of the people, as well as the high courage with which men and women were meeting and overcoming abnormal difficulties in their daily lives.

That is one part which no doubt the king himself would state before parliament. The only other part which I can find in the speech that His Majesty would state is:

> I invoke the divine blessing upon your deliberations, confident that the measures submitted for your consideration will receive your earnest attention.

The rest of the speech belongs especially to the government of the day. As I have shown, the King's part in the speech is simply to express his desires, sentiments, congratulations and compliments to the people. It would not be an address saturated with the spirit of high tariffs or protection or economic nationalism or imperialism. Those sentiments would be entirely free from a strictly throne speech. As I said before, so far as the government's part of the speech is concerned, it was all written by the Prime Minister. Thus every word of the major portion of the speech belongs especially to and deals entirely with the policies of the present government. Such a speech, therefore, should be the subject of free criticism in parliament. Since the speech is really the manifesto of the government or the Prime Minister it can be discussed with the usual licence of debate. Nothing should be mentioned in the speech which cannot be echoed in parliament. Therefore, there is every reason in the world why we should debate the speech conclusively and why that debate should follow immediately after the speech is read.

The Prime Minister stated that we follow closely the procedure followed in the British parliament. All right. I understand the practice in the old land is for the Prime Minister to write the speech and then lay it before his cabinet. I wonder whether any member of the present cabinet ever saw this strange speech before it was delivered in parliament. I am wondering if it is not entirely the product of the Prime Minister's brain and if any member of the cabinet knew what was in it before it was read to the house. The people of Canada are wondering the same thing. In Great Britain the custom is not only to lay the speech before the members of the cabinet but also to lay it before the leading supporters of the government in both houses. I do not know whether the present speech was ever placed before the leading supporters of the government in the house or in the Senate, but I am of the opinion that this was not done and that it was largely if not entirely the handiwork of the Prime Minister, perhaps after submission to a few, but a limited few of the members of the cabinet and an equally limited number of supporters of the government in the upper house. But I do not think the supporters generally of the government were considered at all; they did not know what the speech contained until it was read in parliament. That is not British parliamentary practice.

With regard to the amendment before the house perhaps it should be said, indeed it is important that it should be said, that any speech from the throne can be challenged by the opposition. One reason for this is that we never know when a government controls a majority in the House of Commons. That is one of the realistic attributes of our British constitution. We never know when a government may lose the confidence of the House of Commons, and whenever that happens the government must go to the country. In that respect our constitution is very elastic, and therefore one of the main objectives of any opposition—and certainly it is the objective of the present Liberal opposition—is to challenge the government by way of amendment to the speech. One of our main political objectives is to challenge the present government by this amendment in order to show the people of Canada that this government does not hold the confidence of the country. I do not know whether we shall attain the objective we wish or not, but our desire is to drive the government as quickly as possible to the country in order that the people may decide just what party they wish to guide the affairs of state at the present time.

The speech from the throne touches certain points of national and international policy, and in debating these questions of policy the nation is given a lead, as it were, to the larger questions that will be decided by parliament during the time it is in session. In the present speech from the throne, the first part deals with certain peculiar, fanciful statements. For instance, the statement is made that the world is gradually returning to economic stability and that Canada, as a part of the world, is returning to permanent prosperity. May I say that if Canada is returning to permanent prosperity, the idea that seems to be thrown out here is that it is largely because of the fact that the world as a whole is returning to economic stability, and that the policies of the present government are really not having any effect in restoring permanent prosperity to this country. It is the policies, the leadership and the drive to action that have taken place outside Canada which are largely responsible for the improvement in conditions, if they are improving, in this dominion at the present time. In so far as the first paragraph in the speech from the throne is concerned, it might have been written in a more masterly manner, for when we analyze it closely we find that its wording is not very favourable to the government.

Next we come to the part that deals with the trade treaties of 1932, and the assertion is made that empire trade is increasing; and thrown in with that idea is the statement of the fact that Canada occupies fifth position among the trading nations of the world. Well, it is a fact that Canada occupies fifth position in total world trade among the great nations, but I would point out that Canada occupied that position many years ago, and when she did occupy that position at that time she had some trade worth talking about. The fact that Canada occupies fifth position in total world trade at the present time, when she has the limited total of a little over nine hundred million dollars, is not worthy of very much comment; it does not mean much to Canada, under these circumstances, whether she occupies fifth or sixth place. What we want is an increase in trade, both internal and external, and not until we get that shall we have that prosperity which we desire. I have here the annual report of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the present year, and I find that Canada a year ago did not occupy fifth position. She has attained that position in the last nine months. This report says she occupied a year ago the seventh place. That was the position she occupied in 1932 and in 1931 in total world trade. In regard to total imports, in 1931 she occupied eighth place and in 1932 ninth place. In total domestic exports, in 1931 she occupied seventh place, and during the last year she occupied fifth place. Therefore, putting total imports and exports together, and allowing for the increase in trade in the last nine months, we have the statement that to-day Canada occupies fifth position among the great trading nations of the world. We are glad that this is so, but we are sorry that although she occupies fifth place we have only a little over nine hundred million dollars of total trade. What was the situation under Liberal rule in 1929? At that time, it is true, there was no depression, because as a matter of fact there are no depressions under Liberal government. Liberals have the urge to build up international business and freer trade, both internally and externally, so that depressions are obviated. Rather, prosperity is brought about because prosperity can come about only through individual and collective commercial liberty among the people making up the nation.

I might go on to some of the other portions of the speech from the throne. For instance, in one paragraph the statement is made that the government is going to increase price levels. Hon. gentlemen opposite admit that agricultural prices are not satisfactory, so they are going to give a lift to price levels. The main thing, I would point out, is not an increase in price levels; we can have prosperity under any price level, provided it is not too low. It is not the price level that is wrong with agriculture in this country; it is the fact that the prices are inequitable. What the people complain about is inequality in agricultural prices. The question is, what can you buy with a bushel of wheat or a bushel of turnips or ten bushels of rye or with a bullock or with so many hogs? That is what concerns the farmers of Canada, and unless a party and a policy will place prosperity on a different level, unless a party and a policy will bring about fair prices and a return to those conditions under which the farmer could buy what he should be able to buy with his wheat and cattle, hogs, barley and rye, then we shall not make much progress towards making this dominion the great commercial nation it ought to be.

Then we come to another paragraph in the speech from the throne wherein something is said about the London economic and monetary conference. The statement is made that we are going to have important legislation, including provision for a central bank, brought down. The idea of a central bank was mooted by the Brussels international financial conference, in 1920; it was again mooted by the international financial conference at Genoa in 1922, and both those great international financial conferences decided that a nation which had not a central bank ought to have one. The Liberal party has been to the fore with regard to the establishment of a central bank; in fact, one of its important planks is in connection with such a bank. May I read the plank of the Liberal party on this very important monetary institution?

> The Liberal party believes that credit is a public matter, not of interest to bankers only, but of direct concern to the average citizen. It stands for the immediate establishment of a properly constituted national central bank, to perform the functions of rediscount, and the control of currency issue, considered in terms of public need. A central bank is necessary to determine the supply of currency in relation to the domestic, social and industrial requirements of the Canadian people; and also to deal with problems of international commerce and exchange.

That is the stand of the Liberal party with regard to a central bank, and our position to-day is that we want that bank to be publicly owned and the very best management that can be got in Canada to direct it. When the legislation is brought down we shall soon announce our policy with regard to every detail of it.

The speech from the throne deals with the wheat agreement that will be brought down later. The wheat agreement as it was explained by the Prime Minister and as it has been described by the press of Canada is simply a method of destroying wealth, and to the extent that it is a method of wealth destruction, the Liberal party is opposed to it. There can be no agreement on a policy that will destroy wealth rather than produce and distribute it. Because of this limitation this wheat agreement will be of no benefit to Canada. I do not believe any prime minister or government through such a policy can convince the people of Canada that the proper method to pursue at the present time is to retard our wheat production by fifteen per cent; or, in other words, destroy production, eliminate wealth, leave the tariff structure as it now is attempt to figure out how in some mysterious way by following a policy of that kind Canada can be made prosperous.

What we want is trade within and without Canada. We want an opportunity for this country to exchange in a fair way the products that it can economically produce with those of other countries that they can economically produce. When that situation is brought about, we shall have a flow of trade between one country and another, not restricted by tariffs, not stifled by one interference or another, but with a freedom that will bring about the movement of trade within and without the nation. That is what Canada requires at the present moment and under a Liberal government, when our party comes into power—and that will not be long—we shall have a policy of that kind adopted to restore prosperity to the country.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Another item in the speech from the throne deals with offering securities in the British market. The government is taking credit for the fact that we sold securities there amounting to about $75,000,000. I am glad that we were able to float a loan in the British market and that we obtained that money, because we need it very badly. We have obtained a vast amount of money from the British people; they have always money to lend. But what did we have to pay for that money? Our dollar was then worth about sixty or sixty-three cents in gold and we are borrowing those millions in Canadian dollars, but when we have to pay them back we shall more than likely have to do so—not at sixty or sixty-three cents—but at 100 cents on the dollar. It will thus be seen that the bargain was a good one for the British and that is shown by the fact that the loan was oversubscribed four times. Such a result is not surprising because it is only what we might expect.

In the remaining parts of the speech from the throne certain statements are made about agricultural short term and intermediate credits. Legislation dealing with this matter should be proceeded with without delay. Certainly what the farmers need is short term and intermediate credits, and the opposition will give the government all possible support in prosecuting the necessary inquiry and in forwarding legislation to make such credits available.

Further, some reference is made to the relief act, to the financing of the western provinces, to a program of public works, and to the policy of the government with regard to the single unemployed men. As regards the program of public works about which the government is talking so much and about which we have heard so much in the house, when you are spending a large amount of money for constructing public works here and there throughout Canada, you are practically bringing about a condition of affairs under which any unscrupulous party can go to work on election day and by a mass expenditure of public money bringing about mass voting. Does any hon. member want to have in his riding a mass expenditure of public money and then, based on that, mass voting, or, in other words, mass voting to support as far as possible, the government of the day and to put out of business every Liberal or opposition member who dared to criticize the policy of the government? Such a procedure would bring us back to the time of the war when in constituency after constituency it was impossible for the people to elect the representatives that they desired, but where mass voting overseas controlled the election and put into power the Union government which placed upon the country during the war a debt of nearly $2,000,000,000 which is to-day breaking Canada down financially.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, February 9, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 9, to incorporate The Bishop of the Arctic.—Mr. Geary.

Bill No. 10, respecting a certain patent owned by The Firth-Brearley Stainless Steel Syndicate Limited.—Mr. Kennedy (Winnipeg).

FLOOD AT VAUDREUIL SOULANGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOSEPH THAUVETTE (Vaudreuil-Soulanges) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau). I have received communications from Vaudreuil to the effect that a considerable flood has occurred along the Ottawa river in the parishes of St. Michel de Vaudreuil and Ste. Jeanne-de-Chantel, Perrot island. A large number of people have had to leave their homes, and farmer's flocks should be transferred elsewhere. I request the hon. Minister of Marine, to send, without further delay, engineers from his department to relieve the situation brought on by the accumulation of ice on the lake at Pointe Cascades. This flood is spreading and will be the cause of considerable losses in that district. I therefore beg the hon. minister to send engineers to that district without further delay.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) (Translation): I have noted the statement of the hon. member and I shall take steps to relieve, as soon as possible, the situation caused by this flood.

MILK INQUIRY REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): On May 16 last I directed a question to the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) with reference to the Agriculture Committee's report on the milk inquiry, and the answer at that time was, "The report will be reviewed, and of course if action is necessary it will be taken." I do not see the Minister of Labour in his seat but in his absence perhaps the right hon. the Prime Minister would be able to say if that report has yet been reviewed, and if any action is contemplated in the matter.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The hon. gentleman's question will stand as a notice.

PRIVILEGE—MR. NEILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege, one which I think concerns the rights of every member of this house. Yesterday, under the authority of standing order 44, rule 339, I addressed three questions to the hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Matthews). The record will be found at page 368 of yesterday's Hansard, at the foot of the page. I asked:

> What was the tonnage of coal imported into British Columbia from the United Kingdom during the calendar year 1933?

The minister replied that it was 22,500 tons. I also asked what regular duty had been paid on that, and he told me $6,749.50. I asked him what dumping duty had been paid on that importation, and he did not give the answer. His explanation was as follows:

> At ports where importations of any particular commodity were few the private business of individuals or concerns would be disclosed if such information were given, and this would be contrary to established practice.

I respectfully submit, sir, that that is not correct. In the first place, the consignment was not a single one but a number, and comprised a large quantity, 22,000 tons of coal, which would represent in car lots, 1,100 carloads. It was not one consignment but was scattered over the whole year. It was not simply from one concern; it was from more than one. Moreover, the information I asked for would have revealed nothing whatever about the importers' private business. Had the minister replied that a dumping duty of three or four dollars a ton had been collected, it would not have revealed anything about the amount paid for the coal in the country of origin, or the price got for the coal when exported—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has had an answer to his question.

Mr. NEILL: I have not.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not in order to discuss it. There is no motion before the house. The question has been asked and answered, and if the hon. member wants further information he can ask further questions, but it is not in order to proceed in this way.

Mr. NEILL: I cannot ask further questions dealing with a matter already on the order paper. I am asking the minister if he will bring down that information.

Mr. SPEAKER: I call the hon. member to order.

Mr. NEILL: If I am not to be allowed to state a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, then I appeal from your ruling that I cannot do so.

Mr. SPEAKER: State it at the proper time, but not now.

Mr. NEILL: I appeal from your ruling, Mr. Speaker, that I am not to be allowed to state a question of privilege.

An hon. MEMBER: There is no such ruling.

Mr. RALSTON: Do I understand, Mr. Speaker, that it is not to be allowed on the orders of the day for a member to call the attention of the ministry to the fact that a question has not been answered? That is a matter which affects the privilege of all the members of this house.

Mr. BENNETT: He has already done that.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman may understand that or not, but it is not correct.

Mr. RALSTON: I understood that it was correct. I noticed the answer in Hansard and I respectfully submit that the ministry should take the matter into consideration because it affects the privileges of every member of the house. We surely are entitled to information in regard to the dumping of coal at a particular port. Whether particular cases are to be included is another matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has directed attention to the fact that the answer is not responsive to his question and is not ample for his purposes. Having done that, the matter will be considered by the government and such action taken as may be necessary in accordance with the rules.

Mr. RALSTON: That indicates that no answer will be given beyond what has been given.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has directed attention to the fact that the answer was not adequate.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I suggest to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) that if the government takes this stand as a matter of government or public policy, then the remedy may be exhausted, but that has not been stated. I think this affects the privileges of every single member of this house because anyone is entitled to information having regard to special or regular duties. No minister, either properly or improperly—we are not discussing that phase at the moment—can refuse to include special duties. If this is a matter of public policy and it is so stated, perhaps we may not be entitled to the information, but I think any member is entitled to ask the government if this is to be a matter of public policy.

Mr. RALSTON: If I might be permitted to make reference to the point raised by my hon. friend. In connection with this matter of public policy there have been recent decisions, as the Prime Minister knows, questioning the right of a minister to declare that as a matter of public policy a certain paper or document is not obtainable. Even the records of Scotland Yard—

Mr. BENNETT: That was the decision of a court.

Mr. RALSTON: But this is even stronger, this is the court of parliament. Even the records of Scotland Yard have been regarded as not being absolutely immune to production.

Mr. BENNETT: At the risk of trespassing upon the time of the house I would point out the fact that on the orders of the day being called the hon. member for Comox-Alberni was very properly within his rights when he directed attention to the fact that an answer given to a question asked yesterday indicated that the minister regarded it as an improper exercise of knowledge to give details with respect to individuals. When the hon. member had directed attention to that fact he had served his purpose unless he desired to move a motion of censure which is always within the rights of any hon. member. Attention having been directed to the fact, the government will now give consideration to the matter. My own personal view at the moment is that if more than one person is concerned the information should be made available, but if only one is concerned, then it would be an improper exercise of power.

Mr. RALSTON: Not necessarily.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps not necessarily, but that should be the general rule. I shall look into it and a statement will be made. In connection with the Scotland Yard case, I should like to say that it was a judge of a court of law and not the court of parliament that determined that certain papers should be produced. The case is under appeal at the moment to decide whether or not the observations made by Mr. Justice Macnaghten the trial judge, were correct. I cannot see that this case has any particular application to the present instance. If the administration does not discharge its duties by affording information to the extent that a questioner may think desirable, the questioner may then move a motion of censure of the administration. I think I can point out instances where this has been done in Great Britain and I recall one case in this parliament. About twenty years ago the session was prolonged considerably, the house sitting all night in fact, because certain information was not forthcoming from the government of the day to questions asked by members of the then opposition. The question raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni will be considered and the position of the government with respect to it indicated on Monday next.

Mr. NEILL: I am quite willing to accept the statement of the Prime Minister and I thank him for his courtesy. A little courtesy from the chair would have shortened this debate.

Mr. BENNETT: I think in fairness to this house and upon consideration the hon. member will withdraw that statement. I put it to him if it is not desirable that he should.

Mr. NEILL: In deference to the Prime Minister's request, I withdraw my statement.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gobeil for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose last evening at eleven o'clock I had concluded my remarks in connection with the various portions of the subject matter making up the speech from the throne. I have not the time to summarize the statements I made last evening but shall go on to deal with the mover (Mr. Gobeil) and the seconder (Mr. Barber) of the address. I congratulate both speakers upon the contributions they have made to the debate on the address. The hon. member for Compton, who moved the address, made the following statement with reference to himself:

> . . . a representative of a constituency which in 1930 elected its member to carry out the policy of our illustrious leader of whom we are so proud.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am glad hon. members opposite say "Hear, hear." I would not think very much of members of any party who did not back up their leader. However, the point I intend to make is that the statement of the hon. member is to the effect that the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite is the policy of their illustrious leader. It is not the policy of the cabinet, it is not the policy of the party; it is the policy of one man upon whom they look as the political Moses of the dominion. I hope the time will soon come when hon. gentlemen opposite will have a party and not a one-man policy, a policy in which every member of the Conservative party from ocean to ocean can take part. When that time arrives they will be able to make a more satisfactory contribution to the upbuilding of Canada.

The hon. member then went on to say that in his and other parishes in Quebec they have that racial and bilingual harmony which goes to make a great province. May I suggest to the hon. gentleman that when he gets through giving testimony of that kind with regard to Compton he should go beyond the borders of Quebec, he should go east and west all over Canada and try to repair the damage deliberately done in 1930 by the racial and religious disharmony preached by his leader and every member of his party. It is because of this that hon. gentlemen opposite are to-day sitting to the right of Your Honour.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I must rise to a point of order. The observations made by the hon. gentleman are calculated to accentuate the difficulties to which he sometimes refers. On behalf of myself and others I desire emphatically to deny the statement just made. It should be withdrawn.

Mr. McINTOSH: I accept the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) but my opinion is practically the same—unaltered.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman's opinions are things to which he can refer anywhere but in this house he is bound by certain rules. Within the house his opinion is what he says and I submit that the charge made directly against myself and other members of this party as to racial differences in this country is something that should not be permitted to remain uncontradicted and unchallenged. The statement is entirely unwarranted and I ask that it be withdrawn in toto.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am glad the Prime Minister denies it. It was worth while making the statement if only to have the emphatic denial of the Prime Minister,—he could not as one member of the party, subscribe to it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. McINTOSH: I have withdrawn.

An hon. MEMBER: No, you haven't.

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes, I have. I have accepted his statement on the Prime Minister's assurance that it is not true so far as he is concerned, and I conclude my remark with the hope that not only the hon. member for Compton but every other hon. gentleman belonging to the party opposite will stand by the statement made by the Prime Minister in parliament to-day. If they do, and do not carry racial hatreds into effect on election day on future occasions, we shall certainly have a more harmonious dominion, something which we all devoutly desire.

I come now to the remarks made by the seconder of the address, the hon. member for Fraser Valley. That hon. gentleman made the statement that our economic destiny is bound up with that of our neighbouring nation, the United States. I believe that is to a large extent true, but I would parallel with that the statement made by the Prime Minister in his speech on the address in this house on January 30, when he said:

> The principal fall in our external trade has been with the United States of America, and the reason for it—if the reasoning of the right hon. gentleman is to be applied at all—is to be found in what he said yesterday.

That is to say, the reason is to be found in the high tariff structure existing between Canada and the United States. Now, here we have the seconder of the address practically advocating reciprocity with the United States, while the Prime Minister happily tells us that because of the high tariff structure our trade with the United States has gone down in recent years.

Mr. BENNETT: What he said was that the high tariff rates imposed by the United States had prevented our selling goods in their markets.

Mr. McINTOSH: I understand what the Prime Minister is trying so hard to explain; I accept his statement in that regard. But the fact is that while the United States contributed to the building up of that tariff structure we played our part too, in the reciprocity election of 1911, and since, in erecting this almost prohibitive tariff wall. There is consequently much blame attaching to this government as well as to the United States. I am not placing all the blame on the United States, nor am I blaming this government entirely, because there is a joint blame in this matter, and hope for the future lies in the gradual demolition by the Liberals of this tariff structure, with consequent reciprocity between the two countries in imports and exports. That is all the time I have at my disposal for the discussion of this particular question.

I come now to railways, which is a very important matter in so far as the constituency of North Battleford is concerned. Development in Canadian railway facilities during the last fifteen or twenty years has been remarkable. In 1913 the Canadian railways carried approximately twenty-three billion tons of freight one mile; in 1928 they carried approximately forty-one billion tons of freight one mile; in 1930 they carried approximately 29 billion tons of freight one mile; and in 1931 they carried approximately 25 billion tons of freight one mile.

In 1913 the freight carried one mile per mile of line was approximately 800,000 tons, and in 1928 it was well over a billion tons. What does this mean? It means that there has been an increase of 80 per cent in the freight movement between 1913 and 1928. And how did that take place? It was due to the increased technical and mechanical efficiency; heavier ballast; heavier rails; larger cars; more powerful engines; more efficient operation; greater speed of trains by approximately 25 per cent; the increase in the average trainload during the years from 300 to 500 tons; and lastly, it was due to the larger number of tons per load on every car, which was increased from practically 19 to 25.

In so far as the dominion railway problem is concerned, what we need is tonnage. We need freight; we need business, and the only way to get the railways on a sound foundation is to get trade and business and tonnage. How will we do that? We can do it only by paying attention to certain fundamental facts, some of which are to be found in the present policy of the Liberal party. One of those planks is the abolition of unemployment. Another plank in the Liberal program is to liberate external trade, and that can be done only by trading with as many nations as possible, negotiating treaties with countries willing to trade with us on a reciprocal basis; by abolishing the extravagant increases in tariff; by abolishing all unwarranted extra taxes; by substituting stability for uncertainty; by continuing the Liberal policy of the British preference; and by a percentage reduction in existing tariffs rather than a percentage increase against foreign countries in those tariffs. Next we have to liberate internal trade by putting an end to artificial price control and agreements in restraint of trade, and eliminating price fixing in connection with agreements that tend to restrict and hamper trade internally. Internal trade has become honeycombed, enmeshed by secret understandings and agreements. Liberals also firmly believe we can develop trade by putting into every industry the spirit of democracy and by playing fair with both railways.

In connection with railway facilities, I have received from the riding of North Battleford a petition containing practically five hundred names, asking for better rail facilities in the upper end of northwestern Saskatchewan. In that area there are practically ten thousand new settlers, largely from the southern districts. Many of them are on relief. They have no railway facilities. There is a line running from St. Walburg about one hundred miles from North Battleford to Edmonton. A stretch of about forty miles remains to be graded, but the contractor was taken off his job years ago and that stretch of country is left untouched—not railroaded. About seventy miles have been graded and the ties are decaying by the roadside, but no steeling has been done. May I ask the government of this country to-day, the Minister of Railways, and all those who have to do with railway development and construction in this country to take this petition into serious consideration and at the earliest opportunity give these ten thousand settlers the railway facilities they deserve. The petition is directed to the minister of Railways and reads as follows—

Mr. BENNETT: I think there is a rule with respect to the reading of petitions. This was tried once before. Petitions can be presented in a certain way. They are not to be read but referred to, and in a speech an hon. member cannot circumvent the rule by reading a petition.

Mr. McINTOSH: If the Prime Minister objects—

Mr. BENNETT: The rules of the house object.

Mr. McINTOSH: And the Prime Minister deliberately follows up the objection; is that right?

Mr. BENNETT: No; I am for the moment custodian of the rules.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am custodian of the rules too, and I will try to abide by them. May I say then that the petition is from Loon Lake and other areas known as St. Walburg, Red Cross, Makwa, Loon River, Flat Valley, Good Soil and Beacon Hill. In these districts, as I say, there is a population of about ten thousand brave and determined souls. They are miles from any railway, situated in a productive mixed farming area, and my request to the government is that they give this petition their earnest consideration, in the hope that something will be done in the near future to provide these splendid people with the railway facilities they require to develop that district, to build up northern Saskatchewan, and to develop tonnage as well for the Canadian National Railways. So far as that area is concerned, besides the seventy miles of Canadian National steel required, and the forty miles or more of Canadian National grading that has to be done, the Canadian Pacific is building eastward from Meadow Lake towards Loon Lake and Makwa. The line is being extended westward into Alberta. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company a few years ago was also considering building northward from Meadow Lake into the Beaver River country—over 50 miles distant.

With respect to the Canadian Pacific I would say that the settlers are looking to it as well as to the Canadian National for action and when both railways take action on this long overdue railway construction problem in that large portion of the province, we may look for it to be one of the most flourishing districts of western Canada. Those settlers who by hundreds and thousands have gone into that area during the last three or four years are having a hard struggle to exist; some of them are from fifty to sixty miles away from railway service and there is no one to whom they can look for encouragement but their member, the Minister of Railways, the government of Canada, the board of trustees of the Canadian National Railways, and the Canadian Pacific Railway. When this urgent railway situation is understood, as a humanitarian and paying business proposition, if action can be taken, I hope it will be taken at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. THOMAS F. DONNELLY (Willow Bunch): Mr. Speaker, every session since this government came into power, the speech from the throne has contained some reference to our return to prosperity and the speech this session does not differ from previous ones. The first paragraph I find put into the mouth of His Excellency the Governor General, is this:

> You are summoned for the dispatch of public business at a time when there are sound reasons for believing that the world is gradually returning to economic stability. . . . Canada occupies a leading position amongst those countries where the evidence of a return to permanent prosperity is most convincing.

Ever since 1930 we have been told that prosperity is just around the corner. So far as the district from which I come is concerned, that return to prosperity is just as far away as ever. I am sorry to say that in the constituency which I have the honour to represent we have had an absolute crop failure for five years in succession and the poverty and want that exist in that district I have not seen before in the thirty years that I have lived there. True it is that this poverty and want are not due to any political party; they are due to Providence; Providence has been unkind to us. But we still have faith; we still believe better times are ahead of us and I am glad to say that prospects this year are somewhat better. We hope and trust in the years to come we shall have the same prosperity that we had before. Some people say: Why do those settlers not move out of the country? They have lived there for some twenty-five years during which they have enjoyed good crops; that part of Saskatchewan for twenty years produced more wheat than did any other part of the province, but during the last five years the crops have been complete failures. It is impossible to convince those people that conditions will not change and that we shall not have similar crops again.

In the matter of the relief that we have handed out in that district, I will say this for the government that no politics have been played. If I were going to criticize the relief handed out there I would criticize it entirely from a business standpoint. There has been displayed a lack of business ability in handling it; all kinds of mistakes have been made and in fact more mistakes have been made during the past year than was the case in the first year that relief was handed out. I do not, however, intend to deal with that question.

There are other parts of Saskatchewan in which we have had good crops, other parts where the people have obtained twenty-five, thirty-five and forty bushels to the acre and even in those districts we find no sign of prosperity. The farmers there are not able to balance their budget, to pay their debts, their taxes, the interest on their loans, and to live. Gradually, year by year, they also are going behind and if with crops such as those, running from twenty-five to forty bushels to the acre, they are not able to balance their budget, what will be the situation when the lean years arrive because just as sure as day follows night there will be lean years.

It will be remembered that last year there were some uprisings, some troubles amongst the farmers in the United States. If conditions there are bad for the farmers, the situation in western Canada is many times worse, because contrary to what the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) said, the prices that we receive in Canada for agricultural products are far below those which the farmers receive in the United States. It must be remembered that the two great products we have in western Canada are cattle and grain. After I heard the right hon. gentleman tell us of the high price we received, I took the trouble to go to the reading room in order to consult the Chicago Daily Tribune and the Manitoba Free Press. I made a comparison of prices paid for certain commodities on January 30, 1934, the day after the Prime Minister spoke, and I wish to place the figures before the house because they tell a tale why our farmers are worse off than those in the United States. Let me first of all take cattle:

Commodity—	Chicago	Winnipeg
Steers from 1,100 to 1,500 pounds	$5 60 to $7 35	$4 00 to $5 00
Steers 700 to 1,000 pounds	5 35 to 7 35	4 00 to 5 00
Stockers and feeders	2 25 to 5 25	1 25 to 2 50

Stockers and feeders are the predominant cattle on our ranches in western Canada. On that day the bulk of the cattle in the Chicago stockyards sold at from $4.50 to $6.75, while the best price we got in Winnipeg for our cattle was $5; the average price for cattle sold in Chicago was $5.50, while the best price in Winnipeg for the best animal we could raise was $5.

Commodity—	Chicago	Winnipeg
Calves	$2 50 to $7 50	$2 00 to $7 00
Lambs	5 75 to 9 00	3 00 to 5 50
Good lambs	8 75 to 9 00	5 50
Sheep	2 00 to 7 75	1 00 to 2 00

The bulk of the sheep and lambs sold in Chicago that day ran from $8.25 to $9, while for the best lamb that we can produce, all we got in Winnipeg that day was $5.50. I live right along the border and if we compare Canadian prices for cattle with those paid right across the line every day, it will be found that we are getting from $1 to $1.50 for ours whereas across the line they are getting from $3 to $3.50. The farmers in Montana are getting twice as much as we do in Saskatchewan.

Then we come to hogs, in Chicago $3.75 to $3.85; in Winnipeg $8.75 plus $1 for each hog making about $9.25; this the Prime Minister dealt with. But surely the Prime Minister knows, or should know, that there is no comparison whatever between the Canadian hog and the American hog. The American hog is short and fat, produced for lard, ours is a long hog produced for bacon. They do not have any bacon hogs in the United States. They are trying to get a bacon type there now.

Mr. BENNETT: I must interrupt the hon. gentleman, I was speaking about the export of hams.

Mr. DONNELLY: I always thought that hams were part of the hog.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Hams are not bacon.

Mr. DONNELLY: Did the Prime Minister tell us anything about the $2 processing tax which is handed back to the producers in the United States. The Americans do not produce Wiltshire sides, does the Prime Minister know that? Does he know that in years past we were exporting bacon to the United States? If we had reciprocity today we would still be exporting there. We had a good market there until the tariff was made prohibitive. Even now bacon is being smuggled across the line. Americans are buying our bacon and paying the tariff, because they like our bacon. Not only that but our American cousins are going in for the same kind of hogs that we produce, a bacon type. But I want to hurry on and deal with wheat and grain, the most important crop we have in western Canada. I asked the Prime Minister about this and he put me off with something about duty. The following are comparative prices on the same day in Minneapolis and in Winnipeg even though we had a better exchange rate with England.

	Prices in cents
	Minneapolis	Winnipeg
No. 1 wheat	89½ to 92½	67¼
Oats 2 C.W.	36¾	35¼
Barley	36 to 76	36 to 48⅛
Flax	190 to 194	138 to 154
Rye	62½ to 64½	41 to 49⅛

Our No. 3 wheat is as good as their No. 1. Our oats are half as good again as theirs, theirs is a light thin oat, all shell.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the tariff?

Mr. DONNELLY: Yes we have a tariff, and how does it help us? We have a 30 cents a bushel tariff; that is the reason we are getting so good a price! We will take it off, it is not going to be long either, as soon as we go to the people. In my constituency they have appointed an undertaker for the relief officer. But continuing the comparison of commodity prices:

	Prices in cents
	Chicago	Winnipeg
Butter, lb. . . .	26 to 27½	23¼
Turkeys, lb. . . .	10 to 15	7 to 11
Chickens, lb. . .	9¼ to 14	9 to 15
Geese, lb.	10	7
Ducks, lb.	11 to 14	9
Eggs, doz.	17 to 20½	14 to 25
Potatoes, cwt. .	175 to 200	73

We have one cent edge on chickens, but there is an explanation of that; the United States being a warmer country they come on the market earlier. For eggs, the present price in the United States is the same as ours will be in three months, for the same reason, eggs coming from the southern states make the price in Chicago lower at the present time.

These, Mr. Speaker, are some of the prices for commodities which the farmers produce in western Canada, showing conclusively that the farmers across the line get a better price for everything that they produce. Therefore farmers in the United States ought to be better off. But, some hon. gentlemen will say, look at the cost of production. But I say that the cost of production across the line is a lot less than it is with us. The price of machinery across the line is 20 to 25 per cent less than it is in Canada. The hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) the other night referred to prices of machinery. I will take his own figures. Of the seven pieces of machinery he referred to only one has no duty, that is the John Deere tractor, therefore the reduction in the price of that was on account of the lower costs of raw material and labour. Were it not for the tariff we should have the same percentage of reduction on every other piece of machinery. But what do we find? The John Deere tractor the hon. member says sold in 1930 for $1,170 and in 1933 for $940, a reduction of $230, or 19½ per cent. Prices of every other piece of machinery should also have been reduced 19½ per cent. On that basis what do we find? I quoted the prices of implements in 1930 and 1933 as follows:

Article	Price 1930	Price 1933	Proportionate Reduction	Reduction	Resultant price
14-inch John Deere gang plough with 4-horse eveners..	$ 149 00	$ 136 50	$12 50	$29 05	$ 119 95
Five-section diamond harrow complete with 1-piece pulley hitch drawbar..	33 90	33 90	.....	6 61	27 29
Eight-foot outthrow Bissell disc harrow with 4-horse eveners..	72 00	68 00	4 00	14 04	57 96
No. 241—7-foot 9-tooth field cultivator, stiff tooth, with 4-horse steel eveners..	113 50	108 50	5 00	22 13	91 37
Model "C" manure spreader with 4-horse steel eveners..	204 00	198 00	6 00	39 78	164 22
2-size Van Brunt drill with double disc ops..	249 50	212 50	37 00	48 65	200 85
25-42 Goodison all steel separator complete with feeder, blower and perfection weigher and register..	1,530 00	1,470 00	60 00	298 35	1,231 65

Mr. TURNBULL: Will the hon. gentleman permit an interruption? Will he deal with the 16 foot John Deere combine, 50 per cent reduction?

Mr. DONNELLY: That is a new combine put into the field. I am dealing with someone a little bigger than you are. When I am out on a big game hunt I have no time to stop to skin a skunk.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw the words he has just used. He said when he was out on a big game hunt he had no time to stop to skin a shunk. I think that is entirely improper, and I would ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw it.

[Mr. Donnelly.]

Mr. DONNELLY: To whom is Your Honour referring?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am referring to the hon. gentleman, who said that when he was on a big game hunt he had no time to stop to skin a skunk. I do not think that is parliamentary language.

Mr. DONNELLY: What do you want me to say, a pussy cat?

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. gentleman understands what is parliamentary language and what is not. I would ask him to withdraw those words.

Mr. DONNELLY: I will withdraw them, but I do not know why they should be withdrawn.

Now I should like to say just a word with regard to the implement called a combine, to which some reference has been made. These combines were new implements put on the market in 1929. They were not manufactured in Canada, and the result was that the price was abnormally high in that year. The combine manufactured to-day is a new implement; it is made in cheaper ways and by cheaper means, and there has been just as great a reduction across the line as there has been in Canada.

I must hurry on, because my time is passing. Not only do we find that in the United States the prices of implements of production are less, but that applies also to harness and wearing apparel. I have seen a pair of overalls brought right across the line costing 85 cents for which I would have to pay $1.50 in Canada, and then I would not get an article as good, and the one will wear just as long as the other. I have seen them worn, and I know what I am talking about.

Then I should like to say a word with regard to gasoline. When I went west last spring I went by North Dakota; I came to a place called Kenmore where I filled my car with gasoline for which I paid 17 cents a gallon. That included a state tax of four or four and a half cents per gallon, which would make the price 12½ or 13 cents per wine gallon. If you reduce that to imperial gallons you get a price of something like 17 cents per gallon. At that time the exchange rate was about 15 per cent, so we will say that the price was somewhere in the neighbourhood of 20 cents a gallon. I drove thirty miles to the border and another thirty miles to Estevan, where I filled up my car with gasoline once more. There I paid 33⅓ cents per gallon, three gallons for a dollar. Deducting the tax, the price in Canada was 27⅓ cents while sixty miles away, across the line, the price was about 20 cents. In the United States the farmers obtain their cylinder oil and gasoline for much less than we pay in Canada, and thus they are able to carry on their farming operations for much less.

There is only one matter in regard to which the people across the line are at a disadvantage as compared with Canada; that is in regard to their taxes. In the United States taxes are a little higher at the present time than they are in Canada, but in western Canada taxes are gradually increasing until now they are almost as high as they are across the line, so there is very little difference in that regard. Someone may say, "What about the price of land?" Let me tell you that the price of land is almost on a parity in the United States and Canada to-day. In neither country is it an asset; it is a liability on both sides of the border. You can hardly borrow a dollar on farm land in western Canada or the United States to-day.

We are told, however, that conditions are somewhat better than was the case last year. That may be so to a certain extent, but I should like to ask what this government has done in the way of bettering prices. If prices are better in western Canada, or for that matter in eastern Canada, what is the reason? It is simply because of the policy followed in the United States, and for no other reason at all. This year we are not receiving any more for our wheat, in gold, than we received last year, but last year our gold was worth only $24 an ounce, while this year it is worth $35 an ounce, that accounts for the difference. The increasing value of gold has increased the prices of our commodities and this year, as in the past, we have followed the lead of the United States. For some reason or other this government think they must continue to follow the policy of the United States in regard to their currency. Why should they continue to do so? Last year and the year before they did everything in their power to boost the price of our money and keep it on a parity with United States money, but as the Prime Minister said the other day this year they are just letting it go and doing nothing.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that this government have done nothing whatever to better conditions in Canada. The Prime Minister goes from coast to coast telling us about our great farms, our great mines, our great fishing industry, and so on, and we say, "Yes, we have those." Then he goes on and tells us about our great Canadian people, about their courage, their endurance, their fortitude, and so on, and we pat ourselves on the back and say, "Yes, we are just as good as the best of them," and that is quite true. But then we ask, "What is the government doing in order to get the people to take advantage of these great natural resources in order that they may make a living?" And we answer, "Nothing." If there is one indictment more than another to be preferred against this government it is that they are doing nothing whatever to better conditions. They have no plan, no scheme or anything. Is there nothing they can do? To-day every country in the world has some plan by which they hope to lead their people back to better conditions, but this government have done nothing whatever.

The government tried to do something with regard to wheat; the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) referred to that the other night. I should like to say just a word or two in regard to that subject. First of all they gave a five cent bonus, but I do not want to refer to that at all; that is a dark page in their history. We received no benefit; we had to pay more for our flour and seed as a result. Then they stepped into the market and put in John I. McFarland to gamble in wheat. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) said he was only buying futures and hedges and options, and that this was not gambling but legitimate business. Why, Mr. Speaker, there are only two kinds of people on the market who buy futures or hedges; they are the men who intend to take the wheat and the men who go in there to gamble. Does Mr. McFarland intend to take the wheat? The Minister of Trade and Commerce knows very well that he does not. It is gambling in wheat; that is absolutely all there is to it. In 1930 Mr. McFarland was put in there to sell the carry-over of the pool, when it appeared that the pool would become insolvent. They asked the government to help them financially, and what did the government say? They replied, "Yes, we will do so if you put in a satisfactory man to act as receiver." They were asked whom they wanted, and the government said, "Well, there are John I. McFarland, Mr. Brownlee and others," and they decided on Mr. McFarland. Then when I asked the minister in the spring of 1932, about two years ago, if Mr. McFarland was buying options, futures and so on, the minister replied that Mr. McFarland had not bought a bushel of wheat, so far as he knew. Six months later, however, the Prime Minister rose in his place and told us that Mr. McFarland had been buying wheat since 1930. Whom are we to believe? What does the Minister of Trade and Commerce say? I want to read this because it is a gem. I am quoting from page 2083 of Hansard of 1932 where I find this:

> Mr. Stevens: Mr. John McFarland, of course, is independent of parliament and of the government.

Independent of parliament and of the government! Gambling in wheat with the public money and not responsible to anybody! Can you think of anything worse than that? Seventy-seven million bushels given to him to sell, and he told us last year he had not sold a bushel—not one bushel. He said he had 140,000,000 bushels approximately, and to-day I am told he has between 150,000,000 and 200,000,000, and even though we have a better exchange rate with England that he stands to lose from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000, and they do not want to tell us anything about that. Should we not have an investigation into this, Mr. Speaker? The Minister of Trade and Commerce talks of the unethical methods of chain stores and departmental stores and says they ought to be investigated. I say that we ought to investigate some of his unethical methods of gambling in wheat.

Then the Prime Minister goes to Toronto and stands up and tells the Toronto board of trade this:

> Already there were signs of men moving to get back into the stock market in the hope of recouping the losses they suffered in 1929 and 1930. A return to the reckless speculation of the pre-depression days would only bring a repetition of the heartbreaks and sorrows of the past few years, he warned.

He went on:

> This government will endeavour to do all in its power to prevent that.

Yet he himself is doing that very thing. Where is the difference between gambling in wheat and gambling in stocks? Let him take a little of his own medicine. Is it because he knew he was losing so much money in the grain market that he advised his hearers not to go into the stock market? Probably he got his fingers burned. Do as I say, not as I do, he says.

Where does the money come from, Mr. Speaker, for this gambling in wheat? We are told that it was put through under that item known as Unemployment and Farm relief. Taking the public's money to gamble in wheat—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Under peace, order and good government.

Mr. DONNELLY: Yes. Taking the public's money and starting out to gamble in wheat, and then we cannot get any accounting of these transactions. I think we should have an investigation into the whole thing. We want an investigation into this. We want an accounting of every bushel he has bought and of every dollar he has spent from day to day and week to week. The public are demanding it, and they will not be satisfied until there is an accounting.

One thing more. They started in here lately with another proposition, and the Prime Minister gets up and tells this house last year—I am quoting from Hansard:

> It means that two ships lying side by side along the quay in one of the ports of old England, one from Canada and the other from another country, the ship from the other country will not be permitted to unload until six cents per bushel has been paid on her cargo, while the ship from Canada is permitted to unload without the payment of a single cent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DONNELLY: Yes, "Hear, hear"—great stuff! What do you think would be the result? You would think that ships would be going across from Canada to England taking cargo after cargo of wheat, while the grain of other countries would not be getting into England, but actually what do we find? We find from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics that in August, September and October, 1933, as compared with August, September and October, 1932, Canada shipped 9,000,000 bushels of wheat less in those same three months, while on the other hand the Argentine, which did not get this six cents a bushel preference, which had to pay a duty of six cents a bushel, shipped 11,000,000 bushels more. We shipped 9,000,000 bushels less and the Argentine shipped 11,000,000 bushels more. What a great benefit that six cents a bushel preference was to us! We sold a lot more wheat, didn't we? Russia also shipped 150,000 bushels more than she did the year before, and paid the six cents duty. That preference must have been a great help to us!

Our belief is that this sale of wheat has not been pushed enough. We have not been active enough in the sale of our wheat. Let me quote from an article in the Winnipeg Free Press of June 10. It says:

> Since January 1 (to June 1, 1933) about 267,000,000 bushels of wheat and flour have been shipped from Argentina, Australia and Canada. The largest amount, 104,000,000 came from Australia, while Argentina shipped 83,500,000 and Canada 80,000,000 bushels.

What a great help that preference is to us! The article goes on:

> This showing on the part of Canada is poor, considering that very cheap all-water transportation from the head of the lakes has been available and ocean freights from all ports have been offered at distress rates. One might be prompted to ask, therefore, why this dominion, with a surplus so large and a new crop not very distant, has trailed in the sale of wheat with only three surplus countries competing in the world market. Has our selling policy not been vigorous enough or have our prices got out of line for export, or both?

That is all that John I. McFarland's buying futures has done. It has put our wheat out of line with the rest of the world, with the result that our wheat has not been sold, while wheat from other parts of the world has been sold from time to time.

I intended, Mr. Speaker, to place before this house some of the plans which the Liberal party has for bringing us back to prosperity, and I intended to compare them with the platform and policies of President Roosevelt of the United States, and also to compare conditions here with conditions in Australia, but I see that my time is up and I will deal with that on another occasion. This country has apparently had no plan. Every other country in the world has had some plan for bringing back prosperity, and the most outstanding country in that respect is Australia. Every government to-day should be searching the records to see what other countries are doing, in order to help get us out of this depression. What has been done in Australia? In 1931 the commonwealth of Australia was practically bankrupt. It was faced with a deficit of over $200,000,000. Australia sent to England and got an expert from the Bank of England, Sir Otta Niemeyer, to go over to Australia and investigate her affairs. He did so, and as a result Australia put into effect what is called the premiers' plan. I have not time to give more than the headings of it at the moment. The premiers' plan was for two purposes, first, in order that Australia could adjust her debts, and secondly, to increase the price of her low commodities and be able to balance her budget. The first thing they did was to put into effect a reduction of 20 per cent on all controllable government expenditures. The second was a conversion of the internal debt of the government on a basis of a reduction of twenty-two and one half per cent in the interest rates. The third was the securing of additional revenue by both the commonwealth and the states. The fifth was the reduction of bank and savings banks rates of interest and deposit advances. The next was relief in respect to providing markets and the next, a reduction of customs duties. From time to time interest rates were reduced. On September 1, 1932, the commonwealth budget provided inter alia for a further reduction of pensions and salaries, decreased customs duties, the final removal of import prohibitions, exemptions from sales tax and primage and suspension of the gold bounty. These are some of the things they did as a result of which we find that to-day Australia is balancing her budget, even having a surplus last year. Her bonds are selling in the markets of the world for a greater amount than ours. I should lke to quote from the London Times of December 14, 1933, as follows:

> A number of new issues have been floated in the past week or so, and pride of place among them must be given to the latest Australian conversion loan. This, the sixth conversion operation to be carried out by the commonwealth since the autumn of last year, concerns primarily the holders of five and five-and-a-half per cent loans of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, and Tasmania to a total amount of £16,647,349, who are invited to exchange their holdings into a similar amount of commonwealth three-and-three-quarters per cent stock, 1946-49, at a price of 99 per cent for the new stock. Cash applications were also invited at the same price to make up any balance that may not be converted, but the cash lists were closed at 11.25 a.m. on the day they were opened; the conversion lists will remain open until Monday next. Enormous improvement has taken place in Australia's finances since the reforms introduced by the present national government, and her economic position is also much better.

Australian bonds due in 1946 paying only three and three-quarters per cent were selling for 99 while Canadian bonds due in 1945 paying four cent were selling at only 96.

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, although the well drafted speeches of the hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the address have not yet convinced the member for Témiscouata of the soundness of their arguments, let me congratulate them very sincerely upon the correctness of their language. I am sorry that I cannot pay the same compliment to the one who was responsible for the abominable French translation of the speech from the throne. On February 6 I asked a question of the government, as appears on page 301 of Hansard. My question was as follows:

> May I ask if the government is aware that the French version of the speech from the throne published on January 25, 1934, in an extra of the Canada Gazette, in the Hansard of both houses of parliament and the French dailies, is stuffed with grammatical errors, translation mistakes, nonsense, misconstructions, wrong interpretations, inaccuracies and blunders of all kinds, totalling three score and over.

I was then told by Mr. Speaker to put the question on the order paper. Although I sent a copy to the assistant clerk before six o'clock of that day, it has not as yet appeared upon the order paper. My complete question will include also the following:

> 2. Is it the intention of the government to ascertain whether the published French version of this most solemn document of the session reflects on:
> (a) His Excellency the Governor General upon whom has been imposed the task of delivering it in his own name;
> (b) Canadian parliament which under the constitution is bound to give the same consideration to the French as well as to the English language;
> (c) French speaking members of both houses of parliament;
> (d) the whole Canadian community of French origin; and > (e) the various staffs of official translators?
> 3. In the event of that being the case, is it the intention of the government to have the French translation of the speech from the throne struck out from the said official publications and a proper French version substituted thereto?

I should like to mention one gross mistake which was made not only in construction but in constitutional law. The first three words put into the mouth of His Excellency by the government are "you are summoned." These are translated into French as "Je vous reunis." Upon page 1225 of the Canada Gazette of December 16 appears the proclamation for the convening of the house. This is signed, not by His Excellency but by Mr. Coleman, Under Secretary of State. The houses of parliament were summoned not by His Excellency, but by the government with the assent of His Excellency, which is altogether different. In fact, it was not His Excellency who summoned parliament for this session. Time does not permit of my going into the details of this matter. I have brought to the attention of the house the first mistakes which have been made both in the French translation and constitutional law. This proclamation notifying hon. members of the opening of this session is preceded by forty-two notices of bankruptcy but the greatest bankruptcy of all, that which has occurred in the government policy, is not mentioned as such.

Several meetings have been held in the province of Quebec at which were present the three French-speaking ministers with their Tory supporters within the province. One of the favourite arguments put forth is that the members of the opposition have been deliberately wasting the time of the house without offering a single constructive policy to the government.

The speech from the throne contains a paragraph relating to economy which reads:

> The accounts of last year will be laid before you. The estimates for the coming year will be submitted at an early date. They have been prepared with a regard for rigid economy consistent with the requirements of the public service.

I direct the attention of the house to Hansard of February 7 of last year and I hope to have an opportunity of quoting some of the remarks made by my genial friend, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). In the speech of that day of the hon. member for Temiscouata there is the following:—

> First of all, there are eight vacancies in the Senate. The government have a majority in the Senate, and they are sure to carry their legislation through that body, whenever they think fit. What is the necessity of spending $32,000 per annum in order to fill those vacancies? The government could wait until a time immediately preceding the next general elections, whether they take place this year or next. If they take place this year the government would save $32,000, and if next year, $64,000.

Last year the vacancies in the Senate numbered eight and the saving in salaries was $32,000 less ten per cent, a net saving of $28,800. I congratulate the government upon having accepted a suggestion from the humble member from Témiscouata. In 1933 the number of vacancies totalled fifteen and if the same policy had been followed it would have meant an additional saving of $60,000, less ten per cent, or $54,000 for this session and $82,800, for the two years. On December 30, 1933, seven senators were appointed. Why were these appointments made? Was it because three new Liberal members were to be introduced by the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) at the first sitting of this house while the government had no newly elected members to introduce? Was it the intention of the government to counterbalance the publicity attending the introduction of three newly elected Liberal members to the house by the appointment of twice as many senators plus one, while there was no urgent necessity for such appointments and while the strictest economy is being preached by the government itself in the speech from the throne.

Another Tory slogan of last summer in the province of Quebec was this: It was said by Tory speakers, "At the next election you will have to choose between order, represented by the Prime Minister and his government, and disorder, represented by the C.C.F." The Prime Minister was spoken of as orderly and the C.C.F. and the hon. gentlemen to my left were described as disorderly. I have in my hand some political propaganda which was widely distributed in the Restigouche-Madawaska election. It is rather a screen, and at a joint meeting I showed it to the Tory candidate and told him that if it was a screen it was not wide enough to hide his face and his feet. Here is the quotation, first as it appeared in French:

Un vote pour M. Paul Dubé—

He was the Conservative candidate.

—est un vote pour la paix, l'ordre et la prospérité. C'est un vote pour le bon gouvernement. Il vaut donc mieux être sur le bon côté, celui de la justice, du droit et du maintien de nos traditions.

The translation reads:

A vote for Mr. Paul Dubé is a vote for peace, order and prosperity. It is a vote for good government. It is better to be on the right side, that of justice, right and the maintenance of our traditions.

And how was it explained? It was explained by Mr. Dave Stewart, Tory provincial Minister of Public Works in New Brunswick, whom I met at the meeting. I was astounded at what he said. He said, "If you do not vote for the federal Conservative candidate you will get nothing from the provincial government for your roads." It was enough to disqualify that gentleman politically.

Mr. VENIOT: He will be disqualified in the next election.

Mr. POULIOT: I told the people then that Mr. Stewart was using the same language as the devil used speaking to Our Lord after He had fasted forty days. The devil showed Him wonderful plains, rich cities, and said to Him, "Kneel before me and I will give it all to you." That was the sort of language used by the Tory minister of New Brunswick —"Kneel before me and I will give you anything you ask." I told that Tory provincial minister that the answer of the electors would be the same as that given by Our Lord to the devil—"Do not tempt Me; vade retro, Satanas."

An hon. MEMBER: The Tory devil.

Mr. POULIOT: Parliamentary rules do not permit of such language. Another slogan was this: It was said that the Canadian people did not pay any attention to Liberal policies. In Yamaska the election was between a Conservative and a Liberal, but in the Restigouche-Madawaska election as well as in Mackenzie there was also a C.C.F. candidate. Now, the Tories had repeated throughout the recess that the real issue was between the Prime Minister representing order and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) representing disorder. Why then was not the Prime Minister courageous enough to meet the electors of Mackenzie, Yamaska and Restigouche-Madawaska and personally submit to them the thousandth renewal of the unfulfilled promises of 1930? He did not even dare show up in Restigouche-Madawaska, in his own native province of New Brunswick, and this was greatly resented by the electors of that constituency. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) on the other hand was not afraid to speak several times in each constituency—Mackenzie, Yamaska and Restigouche-Madawaska. The Liberal party won the battle on the whole front, and I am particularly glad, as a humble backbencher of the Liberal party, to congratulate warmly the hon. members for Mackenzie, Yamaska and Restigouche-Madawaska on their magnificent victory at the polls. My duty was to give my hearty support to my hon. friend from Restigouche-Madawaska, and I must pay every tribute to the intelligence and patriotism of the electors of his constituency, and to my own dear friends whom I met during that campaign. Many of them came from my own neighbouring constituency. The hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska is a parliamentarian of seventeen years' experience in the local chamber and he will be a distinct asset to this house.

It is noticeable that a storm of wrath and indignation blows throughout the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from Nova Scotia to British Columbia. The Canadian people are dissatisfied with the statements of the Prime Minister and the inactivity of the government in so many important matters.

The amendment proposed by my right hon. leader reads:

We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's present advisers do not possess the confidence of the country.

I had the honour to accompany my leader, in the beautiful city of Campbellton, where two meetings were held in crowded halls. Turning to the Montreal Star of Friday, October 20, I find an article under the following heading:

King assails agreement to cut wheat acreage. Says Conservative tariff policy strangling trade in speech at Campbellton, N.B.—Charges Bennett preelection promises unfulfilled.

My hon. friend from Restigouche-Madawaska spoke, and according to the report:

He charged the Prime Minister with adopting an "I can't" attitude in the face of serious conditions.

The member from Temiscouata spoke at these two meetings. He spoke very plainly and frankly to the people there, and according to the report he said:

"Competition ever, amalgamation never" had been the cry of Mr. Bennett in regard to the railways when he attained power, said Mr. Pouliot. Mr. Bennett and Mr. E. W. Beatty, president of the C.P.R. were friends, he continued. He had no objection to their being friends just so long as the friendship did not influence Mr. Bennett. But Mr. Beatty returned from Europe and said, "We must have immigration," and then Mr. Bennett echoed "immigration is badly needed."

Many years ago Mr. Bennett had referred to Mr. Meighen as the gramophone of Mackenzie and Mann. "To-day Mr. Bennett is the gramophone of the C.P.R.", aserted Mr. Pouliot. He declared that if a $60,000,000 guarantee was to be given to the C.P.R., parliament should have been summoned to approve such a guarantee.

The day after, my hon. and genial friend the Minister of Finance also held a meeting. He was fresh from the world economic conference, and I saw in the Citizen of August 28, 1933, that the hon. gentleman anticipated great benefits from the conference. The heading declares that:

Hon. E. N. Rhodes feels nations better acquainted.

That is very nice but it does not mean much to the pockets of the Canadian electors. The minister held a meeting in the same city of Campbellton, but he did not hold two meetings—just one, in one hall, and even that was not filled, notwithstanding that he was accompanied by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren), the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) and many other distinguished speakers. The city of Campbellton, formerly Conservative, gave a splendid majority to the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska.

At Edmundston on nomination day I was pleased to cross swords with the hon. member for Dorchester, (Mr. Gagnon), who was just back from Yamaska. My speech was very simple. It consisted merely of quotations from Hansard of questions put to the government, which the Prime Minister has always refused to answer. There were questions of special cars to the superintendent of railways, questions on imports of butter, on firms importing butter during the three or four months preceding the 1930 election, and on tax free bonds. I quoted Hansard of last year when the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) stated to the house that those tax free bonds should be converted. We have a new Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Matthews) whom I congratulate upon his promotion. We remember in the first year he was a member of the house he made a speech about loan conversion, and I hope he will convert his own friends in the government in order that they may convert the tax free bonds so that those who have money shall pay in future. At that meeting the audience blamed and censured the government for hiding the truth from those who have the right to be acquainted with it. What was the result of the election? I was there and noticed the great popularity of the Liberal candidate. Both the C.C.F. and the Tory candidates lost their deposits; the Liberal candidate was indeed very popular, but the verdict of the electorate proved also that the government does not possess any more the confidence of the country.

On Monday of last week, January 29, 1934, as reported in Hansard at page 9, I asked the government whether it was the intention to table the Amulree report on Newfoundland. What was the answer of the Prime Minister? It was the same as he always gives, that it was not proposed to table it; the report, he said, was not in any sense connected with the operations of the government. Let us go back to last year. On February 7, 1933, the hon. member for Temiscouata said:

I see that this government has loaned $700,000 to Newfoundland; has saved that dominion twice from bankruptcy. These are large sums of money. We are not interested in the welfare of Newfoundland any more than that there are human beings there; we are not more interested in their affairs than we are in the welfare of Germans, French, Spaniards or Roumanians.

Mr. Cowan (Long Lake): Oh, yes, we are.

What was the answer of the Minister of Finance? We find it at page 1874 of Hansard. I will read it, but I cannot do so with the tremolo he had in his voice when he was speaking about the matter. He pointed his finger at me in a very indignant way.

Mr. RHODES: Never.

Mr. POULIOT: I prefer my hon. friend when he is smiling in such a genial way. This is what he said:

My hon. friend—

That is the hon. member for Temiscouata.

—has said that Newfoundland means no more to Canada than does some foreign country. I do not think he will have many other members in the house or people in the country who will subscribe to that kind of view. Newfoundland is the odest dominion under the crown. It has been, and quite properly so, one of the boasts of the British people that they have always met their obligations. There has never been a default. When it was open to us in cooperation with the mother country, to lend a hand to the oldest dominion, a sister dominion, I claim we are entitled to consideration for having come to her assistance under those circumstances. What we did was to say to the banks who came to the assistance of Newfoundland at that time, that we would stand behind them in cooperation with the mother country in case eventually Newfoundland found it impossible to meet her just obligations. So far from being criticized, I think we have every reason to take credit for having lent that helping hand under those circumstances. I do not need to place it on the ground of patriotic consideration. If, as has been the case in times past, we have come to the assistance of those who have met with disaster in foreign countries, surely we are entitled to come to the assistance of our sister dominion, Newfoundland, in the circumstances.

Is it not beautiful? Naturally this was done, in virtue of the blank cheque policy, as the hon. gentleman said in reply to a question of mine last year. But if I was right last year, why did the Minister of Finance, to use the expression of his own friends, waste the time of the house by censuring me? If on the other hand I was wrong, then why did the Canadian government, at the last world conference at London last summer or immediately thereafter, follow the lines of my humble suggestion? I do not blame the government for having accepted my suggestion, far from it, because millions of dollars have been saved thereby to the Canadian exchequer, but we are highly interested in seeing the Amulree report in order to find out whether it recommends the refund to the Canadian government of the loans guaranteed in favour of Newfoundland.

This is not so bad, but there is something else and I wish to tell the house that in any speech of mine I have never made a personal attack against any member. On the other hand, there are things which are done by a public man which are related to public matters, especially when a member receives a public grant for something, and in that case we have a right to know to the last cent how it is expended. We are entitled to ask for this and to be told, and such remarks shall not be considered as a personal attack upon any member. Last year I spoke about a second-hand American-made car and I said this:

I have an objection to Canada's coat of arms being on this car. If the car belongs to the country I do not see why the country has bought for the Prime Minister, the apostle of "Canada first," an American made car. If it is privately owned by that gentleman, he has no right to put the coat of arms of Canada on his car.

I am glad to tell the house that the Prime Minister has conceded that this remark was quite right and he has had the coat of arms removed from the radiator of his car. I congratulate him on doing so; it is a step in the right direction. The Minister of Finance at that time said this:

I submit my hon. friend—

He was referring to the hon. member for Témiscouata.

—went a little too far when he brought the name of the Prime Minister into the discussion in connection wth a matter which, after all, is his personal and private affair. I say to my hon. friend that the car owned by the Prime Minister was purchased by him in Canada as a second hand car, from a man in needy circumstances who wanted money. I am not going to stress that angle of it, but I know that idea was in the mind of the Prime Minister when he made the purchase. He had to have a car of some sort and he purchased it with his own funds.

That is all right, but I subscribe $400 a year for the upkeep of that car, so I must know whether it is a Canadian or United States make of car. I will not say there is a lack of judgment; English is not my native language, but I will say that it is a misuse of judgment. This is a gentleman who is the protagonist of "Canada first," who says that we must buy Canadian products, and yet he buys a United States made car, and not only that, but a second-hand one. He could have helped his friend by lending him some money on his I.O.U. The question of charity does not come into the matter. Here is an American-made car bought by the Prime Minister whose policy is "Canada first." We see that car at the door of the east block every day as an advertisement for American-made goods. How can the Prime Minister speak to-day against purchasing American products? He himself shows that when he says, "My policy is Canada first;" he is not serious, the car that stands there proves the contrary.

I continue to quote my hon. friend the Minister of Finance:

> I say I have not the slightest doubt that not only does he give away his $1,800 but much more besides. And when my hon. friend suggests that his only contribution to charity was $250—
> Mr. Pouliot: I did not say that.
> Mr. Rhodes: I am glad to hear the hon. member say he did not make that statement, because my interpretation of his remarks was that it was his impression the Prime Minister's benefactions were limited to that small sum of money. I am glad the Prime Minister is not here. Even although he may be absent I do not purpose going as far as I might go, but I feel obliged to say that the Prime Minister in his generosity towards his fellowmen is second to no man with whom I have ever come in contact in my lifetime. His modesty in connection with his benefactions, which I know to be numerous, is in marked contrast to the character which hon. gentlemen in this house would give him when they accuse him of being a Mussolini and a dictator.

I wonder if Mussolini or any dictator has an American-made car. But my idea was that having been deprived of $400 of my indemnity, and that amount having been given to the Prime Minister, who is much richer than I am, I wanted to know where that money was going. I said he subscribed only $250 in the Ottawa drive. What happened? Three days later he subscribed $500, a hundred dollars more than the tribute I have been forced to give him. A lady wrote me asking me for my contribution and I replied to her saying: My lady, I send you one dollar. My real contribution is $251, because the Prime Minister has subscribed $250 on my behalf.

Now, sir, there is something else that was mentioned in that speech on the 7th of February, and that is the Tokyo legation. I thought it was absurd for the government to build that legation when they were refusing to construct a building for the Supreme Court of Canada, but were letting the judges sit in a former stable; or to build a new library to preserve the treasures that are in this library, which is not fireproof. But the hon. Minister of Finance said: You will get a good explanation when the estimates come before the house. I was not here when the estimates for the Tokyo embassy came before the house, but what did I see in the Ottawa Journal of September 1 last?

> Hon. H. Marler Is Financing New Tokyo Legation.
> Dominion to repay actual cost, not exceeding $200,000 in ten years at 5 per cent interest.

That is a great bargain—the government can borrow money at four per cent and pay five per cent to Mr. Marler because he builds that legation in Japan. The Minister of Finance had some delightful words about it; he spoke about the patriotism of Mr. Marler—his words will be found at page 2009 of unrevised Hansard of February 7, 1933.

Another item to which I referred was the Canadian Pacific loan. I objected to that loan last year in the same speech. I said that under the blank cheque act it was unfair for the government to supply money to any private concern. Last year the government supplied quite a large amount, and this year it is much worse; they guaranteed $60,000,000. Sir, it is too bad that the government did not convene parliament in order to have that matter fully discussed before the house.

I hold in my hand a sample of the propaganda used in the Restigouche-Madawaska election. What is said? "If you want prosperity to come back to the labourer and the farmer, vote for Paul L. Dube, the government candidate." It is the same old story. And there was another defeated candidate campaigning with him. I have his own program at the last election; it was drafted in exactly the same words. Sir, I do not wish to be offensive to any member of the cabinet—there are some very likeable gentlemen among them—but let me tell them that if I have mentioned the automobile matter and the Ottawa relief drive incidents it is to show them that they should not be afraid to speak to the Prime Minister; they should not kneel down before him; they should speak to him as man to man and have the courage to tell him, when he boasts in a bombastic way—

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): He never does.

Mr. POULIOT: —they should tell him to cool down. The hon. member who spoke before me said that in his constituency they had appointed an undertaker for the Conservative party; I suggest that the hon. member for Long Lake be embalmed in his lifetime. I will ask the hon. member for Long Lake and the hon. gentlemen who sit on the front benches to have the courage to speak plainly to the Prime Minister so that he will understand that in the cabinet council those who sit with him are men and not slaves.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): It is well, Mr. Speaker, that the speech from the throne gives the opportunity for discussion of other matters than those referred to in the speech, because there is very little in this speech from the throne that is of any great importance. It is mostly made up of platitudes that do not amount to anything. I am sure that the people of Canada are disappointed that there is not more in it. The old saying is true that hope springs eternal in the human breast, and I am sure that the people of Canada were looking forward to something worth while in the speech from the throne. I believe the government has missed a real opportunity for taking bold steps in the way of reconstructing the economic life of this country. I believe they could have the people of this country with them in almost any steps they might take having for their purpose the improvement of the general condition of the people of Canada. However, there is in the speech no departure from the program that has been followed in the three or four years of the life of this parliament. Not only is the speech itself disappointing, but the speeches made on the address in reply by both the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) have also been disappointing. At perhaps the most serious time in the history of the world they have really talked irrelevancies so far as this debate is concerned. The other day I picked up a book entitled The Liberal Way, in which I read a speech delivered by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). At the beginning of the speech he had this to say:

> Never before in the history of mankind has the world known a period of such rapid transition, and of such great unrest, as it is experiencing in these very years.

Despite that fact, and his realization of it, he spent an hour of the time of this house in discussing the question of titles. The Prime Minister chided him for the irrelevancy of his remarks, and then took up an hour and ten minutes discussing the same subject. The people in my constituency are not concerned with titles; there are other things of greater importance with which they are concerned. A great many of them are concerned as to when they are going to get into employment again. Many of them are concerned with the question of when their sons are going to leave the unemployment camps, and a great many of them are concerned with the question of when their children who have finished their education are going to find something to do. These are some of the questions with which the people in my constituency are concerned, and I have no doubt that this is the general feeling all over the Dominion of Canada.

I do not know that it would be correct to say that my constituents are not concerned in some small degree in the question of titles. There was a rumor abroad that if titles were restored in Canada the Prime Minister might receive a peerage, and that in this case he would leave the country. As far as the people in my constituency are concerned the king's prerogative cannot be exercised too hastily if that can be brought about. If they could do the same thing for the leader of the opposition I believe that would meet with approval also.

Miss MACPHAIL: That is pretty hard on the old country.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, but in these days it is every man for himself.

Mr. SENN: Is that your theory?

Mr. MacINNIS: No, it is the theory of those who support capitalism.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Where would you send Judge Stubbs?

Mr. MacINNIS: Judge Stubbs can look out for himself. That reminds me that there has been a very considerable change in the attitude of the parties in this house since the special session of 1930. Our friends the Conservatives have lost the confident bearing which they had at that time, and I believe they have lost some of the arrogance which they displayed when this parliament first met. I believe their more humble attitude becomes them very much better. Our Liberal friends have emerged from the valley of humiliation; they feel very cocky at the present time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacINNIS: Quite so. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) referring to the British farmers the other evening, said they had tasted blood and were looking for more. Our Liberal friends have tasted blood, and they are looking for more. They tasted a little blood in the three recent by-elections, but I would suggest that they would show wisdom if they made haste slowly. Unless they have some other policy than they have placed before the people of this country so far they are not going to make any better fist of finding a solution for the problems of this country than the party in power at the present time.

That brings me to the by-elections and the general political activity in this dominion during the recess. My hon. friend from Last Mountain (Mr. Butcher), in his speech the other evening, said that the C.C.F. were given a bad licking in the province of Nova Scotia. That is not so; they did not enter the contest. The fact is that they did not get a licking because they were not in the contest. We had no organization there; two men ran on their own, taking the C.C.F. label, and they were defeated. That is not a licking. The hon. gentleman then went on to refer to the by-election in Mackenzie, and he stated that I took the C.C.F. candidate into that riding and introduced him to the people. I did not expect that from the hon. member for Last Mountain, whom I have always considered a gentleman. If he had wanted the facts in the case he could have secured them very easily. I was asked to go into the Mackenzie riding for the nominating convention meeting two months before it was held. At that time the C.C.F. candidate who ran in Mackenzie was still on the bench, and consequently was not eligible for nomination.

Mr. HANBURY: He knew he was going to be eligible.

Mr. MacINNIS: He did not know.

Mr. HANBURY: We did.

Mr. MacINNIS: Possibly you had the ear of the commissioner. The fact is that I was asked to go in there, and I certainly did not introduce the candidate into the riding; he was selected at a nominating convention that was just as democratic—though perhaps there was less beer—as the convention which nominated the Liberal candidate.

Mr. VALLANCE: Pretty small politics.

Mr. MacINNIS: My hon. friend from South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) said that our candidate was hand-picked. My hon. friend ought to be an authority on that, because I understand that he was hand-picked himself, or perhaps it was hand-plucked.

Now let us analyze the situation with regard to the Mackenzie election; I do not think it looks so bad for the C.C.F. The leader of the opposition said that Mr. Campbell, the previous member for that riding, was elected with a majority of 3,076. That is quite true, but the right hon. gentleman did not tell the house that there were two Liberal candidates in the last election, and that instead of Mr. Campbell having a majority of 3,076 over the other candidates, he had a minority of 356 votes.

In the by-election of 1933 there were four candidates, the United Front, the Conservative, the Liberal and the C.C.F. The Prime Minister made the statement that this was the first time in a generation that the Conservatives had run a candidate in the Mackenzie riding, and the question might be asked why they ran a candidate this time. Perhaps our Liberal friends are not altogether wrong when they say that the former member for Mackenzie was favourable to the Conservative party. At all events they never ran a candidate against him, and consequently we can only assume that he had Conservative support. On that assumption the only reason the Conservative party ran a candidate in this election was to help out the Liberal candidate by taking away from the C.C.F. man the Conservative votes that usually went to the Progressive candidate. So my friends should be a little more generous and thank the Conservative party for helping them win the Mackenzie seat.

Mr. VALLANCE: We did not run one against you, either.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The Consevatives could not support Stubbs.

Mr. MacINNIS: They were very much more afraid of Stubbs coming here than were the Liberals, and that was another reason why they wished to help out their Liberal friends.

Now I come to the British Columbia elections, the first major political fight since the organization of the C.C.F. We had no money, we had no breweries, we had no press.

Mr. HANBURY: What do you mean by "no"?

Mr. MacINNIS: The usual meaning of the word. It is one of those simple words which it is difficult to define.

Mr. HANBURY: No money?

Mr. MacINNIS: We had no money. We did not have any. We were confronted with the most unscrupulous and scurrilous campaign that was ever waged in the province of British Columbia. Our Liberal opponents stuck at nothing. The only question they asked was, would it bring votes? If it did, it was done. Every appeal to fear, every appeal to prejudice, every appeal to passion, every appeal to ignorance that could possibly be made was made by them during that election. Yet despite that, the C.C.F. made a very good showing. The Liberal party received 151,000 votes, about 42 per cent of the total, and they won 34 seats, while the C.C.F. got 115,000 votes, or 33 per cent of the total, but won only 7 seats. All the other candidates combined got a total of about 92,000 votes, or 25 per cent of the votes, and received 6 seats. If the C.C.F. had received seats in proportion to the number of the votes polled, then instead of having 7 seats they would have had considerably over twice that number. We are indeed very well satisfied with the results. We shall be better prepared when the next election takes place, and we are quite satisfied that when that time comes, whether our Liberal and Conservative friends are joined together, as they very soon will be, or are fighting separate campaigns, we shall be able to give them a run for their money.

Mr. RALSTON: Will you have some money next time?

Mr. MacINNIS: We do not need it because we have what is more fundamental—we have a policy—and I shall refer to that later on.

Another thing has happened since the election in British Columbia to which I wish to refer. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), during his speaking tour in the prairie provinces, at one of his meetings made a statement that went something like this: You may be hard up now, he said, but at least you are free, but just wait until the C.C.F. gets power, and then you won't have even that. Well, Mr. Speaker, let us see just how free some people in this country are. I am sorry the leader of the opposition is not present at the moment. I should like to have asked him if he had ever lived in a company town or in an employment camp. If he had ever been in any of these places he would have a better understanding of what freedom means and to the extent to which it may be exercised by the workers in this land of freedom. There is a Mackenzie constituency in the province of British Columbia. It takes in some of the company towns on the west coast of the province, Powell River, Ocean Falls and some of those places. This constituency of Mackenzie elected a C.C.F. candidate even if Mackenzie in Saskatchewan did not. And what happened? The managers in this company town of Powell River are now discharging the men in their employ who dared to exercise the prerogative of their Canadian citizenship by voting for whomsoever they liked. These men voted and worked for the C.C.F. candidate in that constituency—and such action did not meet with the approval of the company so the men are dismissed.

Mr. HANBURY: Was there not a secret ballot there?

Mr. MacINNIS: There was a secret ballot, yes, but the names of these men who took part in the C.C.F. organization were not secret, and these men, some of whom have given as long as twenty years faithful service to this company, have been discharged without an hour's notice and replaced by other men brought into Powell River from Vancouver and elsewhere. This is an American company. In those company towns the company is mayor, alderman, laundryman, landlord, boarding-house keeper, and many other things. In some of these towns it is sufficient for a man to have a labour or socialist paper sent to him through the mail; the post office being on the company's premises, the receipt of that paper, is as good as an order for his dismissal. These companies have received concessions from both Liberal and Conservative governments in the province of British Columbia, but those governments never took the trouble to see that the men working for the companies were protected. The men are not allowed to organize. The government never saw to it that they were given the opportunity to organize into a trade union if they saw fit. And yet our friends talk about liberty.

The leader of the opposition was also very much afraid that at some time he might come under the command of the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) and have to take orders from her. Well, I do not know whether her orders would be any harder than the orders given in a company town by an American company.

Miss MACPHAIL: That is not going very far.

Mr. MacINNIS: Probably not far enough. There is nothing much that can be done in this house to remedy the conditions I have spoken of, but I hope that when the question is raised in the provincial legislature, as it certainly will be, our Liberal friends will be as liberal in the house as they were before the election.

There is one other matter to which I wish to refer. It is rather strange that it has not been more emphasized during this debate, and that is the guarantee of $60,000,000 to the banks of this country on their advances to the Canadian Pacific Railway. If I might use an expression that is often used by the Prime Minister in this house, do hon. gentlemen realize the significance of that? Do they really appreciate what it means? Here is the largest commercial organization in the Dominion of Canada, a Canadian institution if you like, with its signs up everywhere that its transportation system spans the globe. Now what does this guarantee mean? It means that this company along with five hundred thousand or more, possibly a million, of the other inhabitants of this country is at present on relief, and the dominion government is dealing with it far more generously than it is dealing with the ordinary person on relief.

The Prime Minister tells us that the security for the loan is good, but the fact remains that the company went to Great Britain to try to raise the money, and they could not raise it there. Why? Because the money lenders in Great Britain did not think their security good enough. They also went to New York to try to raise the money but the money-lenders in New York would not make a loan to them. Why? Because their security was not good enough. Then they went to the Canadian banks and the Canadian banks would not loan them money for the same reason. They did not think the company's security was good enough. I wonder if the government, before loaning this money, asked the officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway what they had done with the profits of the many years of prosperity which they had enjoyed, because we all know that the Canadian Pacific Railway did have some very profitable years. In 1928 this company made a net profit of $51,693,450; in 1929 the net profit was $43,144,543 and in 1930, $38,246,658. The total for the three years was $133,084,651. I think that any company having made such substantial profits for so many years should be able to carry on for more than four years of hard times. The people of this dominion should be careful that they do not take over another bankrupt railway company upon the same terms as they took over the last one.

There is not very much in the speech to which I desire to refer but there are a few things in it which those of us in this corner have been pressing upon the government for several years. There is the promise of legislation to facilitate the efficient and profitable marketing of live stock and agricultural products. It is very noticeable that no matter what party is in office or, in fact, what party is in opposition, the only policy of any government which is of any value is a policy looking to the promotion of cooperation. The Labour party in Great Britain was in office in 1931 and they brought forward legislation for the marketing of agricultural products. This entailed the compulsory organization of the producers as well as compulsory marketing. At that time the Conservative opposition opposed the legislation, yet during the last session of the British parliament the Conservative government put substantially the same kind of legislation into effect. The farmers of this country are asking that similar legislation be put into effect here. It has been tried in British Columbia and other provinces but has been declared to be ultra vires the power of provincial governments. The legislation in itself is all right but it does not go far enough, as the farmers will soon find out.

As a matter of fact, the farmers, in asking for legislation of this kind, have arrived at the stage the working men of this country arrived at when they began to organize into trade unions. The farmers have arrived at the trade union stage, if you like. All they are asking for is a closed shop in agriculture. When this legislation came up in the province of British Columbia I was a member of the city council of Vancouver. Every member of that council opposed this legislation except myself. I took the position that I was a member of an organization that had a closed shop and what was good for me, was good for the farmer. Anyway, I felt he was entitled to it if he wanted it, whether or not it was good for him. I think the farmer will soon find out that no matter what legislation is passed, what really matters is the existence of markets. A union is beneficial to a working man only as long as he has a job; the minute he loses his job, a union can do very little for him. The farmer is in the same position. His cooperative organization will be of benefit to him as long as he is able to dispose of the products of his labour but when there is no market, his cooperative organization will not be of much benefit. However, I am sure that hon. members in this corner of the house will give the government every assistance in passing any legislation which will tend to improve the position of the farmers of this country.

The organization of a central bank is also mentioned in the speech. We in this corner of the house have been asking for this for many years. Our Liberal friends tell us that they are in favour of it and have been in favour of it for some considerable time. I believe that is so because I have in my hand a copy of a resolution which was passed at the great Liberal convention held in Winnipeg in 1917. They were in favour of it at that time but they had nine years in office and did not do anything to give effect to the resolution which they passed. Some of my Liberal friends may have forgotten this resolution, so I should like to put it on record. It reads:

That, in the opinion of this convention, the time has arrived for the reorganization of the banking system of Canada, so as to bring it more nearly within the democratic spirit of proper regulation and control by the people, and with this object in view, be it resolved that:—

1. The banking system of Canada should be placed under the control and regulation of a banking commission invested with plenary powers in all matters pertaining to banking, currency, coinage and credits, and, in particular power to regulate and control:

(a) The issues of public currency;
(b) The coinage of gold and silver;
(c) The purchase of bullion produced in Canada;
(d) The amount of call money loaned outside of Canada;
(e) Interlocking directorates;
(f) The supervision of credits;
(g) The capitalization of banks;
(h) The payments of dividends;
(i) The relations of subsidiary trust and money-lending concerns to banks;
(j) And generally, all such matters that are necessarily incident to the proper regulation and control of banking and currency.

2. Be it further resolved in connection therewith there should be established a national bank of Canada, as a central reserve institution, upon whose board of governors should also sit, amongst others, ex officio, the members of the said banking commission; the objects of said national bank to include inter alia the primary responsibility of marshalling and mobilizing the gold and silver reserves of the nation and the ownership and control of the issues of public and national currency.

That resolution was passed unanimously at the Liberal convention of 1917. During their nine years in office the Bank Act came up for revision, but despite the fact that this resolution had been passed the president of the bankers' association was able to say that all the major amendments which had been made to the act had been sponsored by the association. This matter is coming up this year and I hope our Liberal friends will be a little more articulate in its favour than they were in 1923 when the Bank Act was last up for revision.

The speech from the throne tells us that we are being called together at a time of improving conditions when there are sound reasons to believe that permanent prosperity is near at hand. There may be a slight improvement in the economic condition of the Dominion of Canada, it may be said that throughout the whole world there is a slight improvement in the tempo of production and trade but I do not think there are any signs which would indicate that we are on the way to a return of what we have been pleased to call prosperity.

In the province of British Columbia the unemployment situation this year is very little different to what it was last year. As far as the city of Vancouver itself is concerned, it is costing more this year for unemployment relief than it did last year. For the two weeks ending January 17 there were 8,626 on relief, 184 more than in the previous two weeks, and the cost for these two weeks was $94,919, while the cost for the comparable two weeks in 1933 was $88,652. Taking the whole province, the situation is not materially better. There was a decrease of little less than 2,000 in the number of those on relief on January 1, 1934, as compared with those on relief on January 1, 1933. So that the situation as far as British Columbia is concerned is certainly not improving at a rate that would lead us to believe that prosperity is just around the corner.

The Prime Minister some little time ago honoured our city with a visit and made the statement that he did not want to leave a bankrupt country for the younger generation. It seems to me that if we do not do something for the younger generation, very shortly the danger will be that we shall leave a bankrupt younger generation to the country. This is the way the situation is developing at the present time.

The seconder of the address (Mr. Barber) in a complimentary way referred to the manner in which the city of Vancouver had dealt with the unemployment situation in the last year. The city of Vancouver has indeed had a difficult situation to deal with ever since the depression began. As pointed out by the hon. member, we have had far more than our share of Canada's unemployed, largely because of the milder climate on the Pacific coast. The city at the beginning of last year was faced with this situation, that it could get no further credit; it could not borrow money, and the banks insisted that it should carry on the activities of the city with such money as could be raised by taxation. We have done so, but those who have borne the brunt of that economy have been the unemployed and the children of the city of Vancouver. The municipal inspector of schools reported at the end of the year that there were four thousand school children in Vancouver in need of dental attention which could not be afforded since the school board was compelled to close the dental department on March 31. The city of Vancouver has been able to care for its unemployed without further borrowings, but it has done so at the expense of the present and future health of the children of the city. But more than that, although Vancouver is the third largest city in Canada, we had one main library and a branch library, and the branch was closed altogether. The main library was closed for two months of the year, and for the rest of the year was open only during certain hours of the day. I do not think we need look with pride on the administration of affairs if we are going to curtail the cultural activities and those activities that are necessary to the health and well being of the people. There is nothing further I wish to say at this time except to remark again that it is regrettable that this government did not take advantage of this opportunity to bring forward legislation which would undoubtedly have the support not only of the house but of the country at large as well—legislation that would tend to raise the continually depressed and falling standard of living of the great majority of the people in this dominion.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I propose to use the short time at my disposal in presenting to the house and the government a brief statement of the situation in the coal mining industry, which is one of the largest in the district I represent. I have in my hand the record of output of the coal mines of Vancouver island for the last year. They produced in 1933 601,000 tons as compared with 749,000 tons in 1932, a decrease of 148,000 tons. There was a substantial decrease the year before. Of that 148,000 tons of shortage, I can tell where at least 32,000 came from; 22,500 tons were imported from Britain, which should not have been imported, and 9,300 tons came from the United States, which is just about the shortage in the Cumberland mine situated in my district. The shortage there was 36,300 tons.

I obtained the other day a return showing the amount paid by the government under the bonus system they inaugurated a couple of years ago. The quantity on which bonus was paid was this last year 53,904 tons as against 72,284 tons the previous year, and the amount paid in cash, at 50 cents per ton, was this year $26,952 as against $36,132 the year before. That was all for bunker coal, on which the bonus is 50 cents a ton. It will be recalled that the government granted a bonus of $1 a ton for export coal, but I am sorry to say that this last year, as the record shows, no advantage was taken of that. In the previous year there was 600 tons but this year there was none. The Minister of Mines will remember, as I remember, very definite and positive assurances that were held out to us that if this bonus of $1 a ton for export trade could be obtained there was little doubt that it would develop into a trade of about 50,000 tons. The responsibility for what has happened lies elsewhere. It is not the fault of the minister, and possibly it is nobody's fault; it may be merely a misfortune. But there is certainly a great difference between expecting to ship 50,000 tons and not shipping any.

In the fall of 1932 I discovered that under the terms of the Ottawa agreements with Britain, coal was being shipped from Great Britain. That coal, I found to my astonishment, was being subsidized by the British government. I do not know and I have not been able to find out the extent, but I have positive knowledge it is subsidized under the Coal Mines Act of Great Britain. It is further subsidized by what might be called ballast rates. That is, ships are coming here to get wheat and lumber under the imperial conference agreements and often, rather than come out in ballast, they take coal at what is practically the same cost. This runs about one-third of what the regular rate would be or what the rate is on the homeward run.

Last year I protested in the house against this situation and I was told that it was easy to find fault and was asked what remedy I could suggest. I very promptly replied that the remedy was obvious and right in our hands, and that was the imposition of a dumping duty. That was in March, and along about the end of May the government announced that they were going to impose a dumping duty. With that childlike confidence in governments that has handicapped me in my political life, I went home and told my friends that everything was all right; that the government was going to impose a dumping duty. I should not have said that; I should have said that they were going to proceed mildly in the general direction of considering whether they would or would not do anything. That is what the government did, anyway. I have in my hand a clipping from an Ottawa newspaper, I think the Ottawa Journal, and of course it must be right. The article is headed:

> Action is taken to stop dumping bituminous coal. British producers invoiced coal at below market prices.

The article, which is quite a long one, says that the government has been aware of the situation and is going to stop it. It stated that this coal is being brought out at very low prices and a case is quoted where the difference between the fair price and the price it was being sold at for export was something like ten shillings a ton. It was stated that the government was going to charge a dump duty equivalent to the difference between the invoice price and the minimum price in the zone where the coal came from. It was said that this would not yield much revenue but it would have the effect of keeping our British Columbia coal market for British Columbia, which, of course, is desirable.

Later on the government issued a circular to their customs agents to the effect that they had reason to believe that coal was being dumped; they gave a list of the minimum zone prices in Britain and suggested that their agents should use that in arriving at the dumping duty. I might explain what the zone system is. The British Coal Mines Act divides Britain into zones and fixes a minimum price under which coal must not be sold in the different zones. Mark you, this is a minimum price; they can, if they like, go much higher. This article bears all the impress of being genuine and having been obtained from some authoritative source. In one case the National Revenue office was quoted as being the authority, although I must say in fairness to them, they denied it. At any rate, it was shown in this article that while the minimum zone price was about fourteen shillings a ton, coal was actually being sold at ten shillings for export to Canada and at eighteen shillings for use in Britain. This price of ten shillings was, as will be observed, eight shillings below the regular selling price in Britain, but the government did not take any notice of that. One would think that the difference in price would mean a dump of eight shillings a ton, but the government told their agents to use as their guide the minimum prices quoted in Britain and apparently that is about all they did. The best information I have as late as November 9 is that no dumping duty had been applied at that time. I do know, because I was told, that the first 9,637 tons got in free—rather a poor start. Might I say, nothing was done—Perhaps I am not justified in saying that but I can say this: I do not know and if the question that I asked yesterday is not answered, when shall I ever know?—if the government have power to impose a dumping duty and not reveal the extent of it. This puts one in a very awkward position.

I want to turn for a moment to the question of anthracite. This last year 3,626 tons of anthracite were brought in, valued at $16,929, which works out at $4.68 a ton, or, in other words, the best coal in the world valued at about $4.70 a ton. Can our friends in Nova Scotia with their bituminous coal mines and we with our deep coal mines compete with that? Further than that, according to the British agreements, the anthracite coal is liable to no regular duty. When I learned that, I said: Well, then, there are various forms of dumping; we will apply under section 6. I said: Why are you not applying section 6? Section 6 is one the minister can apply in order to impose a dumping duty. The answer I received was: Yes, but anthracite coal does not come under that section, because a ruling has been made that anthracite coal is not of a class or kind produced in Canada, and therefore section 6 does not apply. It is very easy to give such rulings, but it is not so easy to justify them. It is not correct to say that anthracite coal is not of a class or kind produced in Canada. That is all that is the matter with that argument and if it is not true, it should not be adduced.

Mr. YOUNG: Where is anthracite produced in Canada?

Mr. NEILL: In Alberta at Anthracite, near Banff. I have before me the records provided by a government department of the production for the last six years. It runs about 900 tons a year; the mine is a small one, I admit. Possibly the demand out there is low or the coal hard to dig, I do not know, but if it suited some manufacturers in the east to say that goods were being produced in Canada, they would not have to produce 900 tons of it; if they produced three dozen, that would suffice. I think I could quote an instance that occurred not long ago where, for the purpose of obtaining a higher tariff, they erected a bogus factory in Canada and produced a few dozen or scores of articles. I submit that a production of 900 tons a year means that anthracite coal is being produced in Canada, and therefore when imported it should be liable to the dumping duty.

Failing in that, I turned to section 43 and I said: At least we have them there. This is a section where the minister, on being convinced that any article is being imported under conditions prejudicial to producers or manufacturers in Canada, can fix any valuation he likes, a fictitious one, of course, and he has often done so, fixing a very high one. I said: We have got them there; but, oh, no, I was then told that according to the British agreement, this section did not apply to anything coming under a British preference, so we were balked again. Therefore the situation is this: anthracite comes in subsidized by the British government, subsidized by a low freight rate which is practically that of ballast, likely to be reduced still further very shortly, because the steamers are going to be subsidized by the British government, paying no regular duty, no dumping duty although obviously it should be liable as it is produced in Canada, and with no valuation under section 43 because the agreement so states, and this may result in British anthracite flooding our market. It is true that only 4,000 tons were imported last year, but our market is wide open to the British as our defences are down and we have no protection whatever because of the conditions I have mentioned and of cheap labour in the old country.

To turn to bituminous coal again on which the importation is greater under the Ottawa agreements there is a duty of thirty-five cents instead of seventy-five cents a ton which is what we pay when we ship our coal to the country to the south of us. It too is subsidized in just the same way, allowed to use the minimum zone figures instead of the real price at which it is sold at home, and by low freight rates and all the rest. There can be a dumping duty put on bituminous coal, that is what I am pleading for to-day, and that is what I wanted information about yesterday. They allowed 9,000 tons to come in free which gave them a good start. Let me give an illustration of how vigourous this development is going to be. I have in my hand a number of advertisements of coal:

Here is another, a great big thing that must have cost quite a lot of money, making all the standard arguments in its favour, by a company which has all kinds of money behind it, and branches all over the world; if it once gets a footing in the British Columbia market it will be very hard to dislodge. It may be said: "Oh well, it is not much after all." But isn't it? It was 1,100 tons the year before and 23,000 last year, an increase of something like 2,200 per cent—rather a substantial increase in these days of declining trade. That is why I am so anxious to find out whether the dumping duty is imposed on this coal, and if not, why not. As I say, the last I heard, in November, was that they were going to get an analysis of the coal. Well, when it is coming in at the rate of 23,000 tons a year, if they just begin to get an analysis, it will be six months before they get around to putting a dumping duty on. Then I asked what amount was paid under this head, and I am told that to give the information would disclose private business. How could it? All I asked was to know the amount of dumping duty paid; not paid by Jones, or Smith, or any individual, nor the percentage, but only the amount of dumping duty. The answer could have been $50,000 or $10,000, or it could have been $4 a ton; would that betray the private business of anyone? Would it betray the price at which they bought the coal or the real price in the old country? It would do none of these things; it would be only a record of what the government collected. If the Minister of Public Works lets a contract for a wharf, it is always open to us to ask such particulars, and he always readily and cheerfully answers, telling us not only who got the contract but all the people who bid for it, and what the detailed estimates were, not only of the man who got the contract, but of the other men who also bid. Any of us can ask for that and get it. Is not information of that kind much more private business than to know whether an aggregation of importers paid dumping duty on this 23,000 tons and if so, what amount? The Prime Minister said he thought it should be given if imported by more than one man; it was, but even if it had been only one it would not reveal his private business. Another point that makes it so objectionable is that it is such a dangerous precedent. Where is it going to end? My friend and I are competitors in the coal business; he cuts prices, I want to know why. I say; I wonder if he is paying dump duty—I know I am. But I have no way to find out. The dumping duty can be put on and taken off, there is no way to find out whether I am getting a square deal or whether he is.

It may be suggested: Oh well, I am playing politics. Nothing of the kind. Several members of the cabinet know that on several occasions I have take action very different from that, when I could have made a lot of political kudos by not dealing directly with them. Here is a telegram which I find in a return I got the other day; it was sent by the secretary of the Mining Association of British Columbia to the Prime Minister:

> Coal operators here all of whom are members of this association fear that budget proposals designed to protect and assist the British Columbia coal industry will not only fail to accomplish that purpose but will have a contrary effect and cause irreparable injury.

Here is a letter from the Hon. N. A. McKenzie, Conservative Minister of Mines in British Columbia at that time. He writes to the Minister of Mines and says:

> —but I am afraid that the budget's coal policy will injure more than it will benefit the coal business of this province.

He was then a Conservative cabinet minister, so he was not saying it for political effect. That is the way this is regarded out there by men in a position to judge. I am not arguing the merits of the dumping duty system at all; it is often abused and will be again, but we have the system and we are entitled to the benefit of it. We have a high tariff; we have had for some years, and it is alleged by many people in the west that it was imposed simply for the advantage of the eastern manufacturer. I am not saying that, but I say that is often thought and said. If that is the case it peculiarly becomes those who father this tariff, and who support it, to be very careful to see that it is properly and legally applied for the benefit of the natural producers in the west. Suppose it had been shirts or shoes coming in; I do not think we should have had to wait until the equivalent of 20,000 tons came before they began to think of taking some action; until a powerful British corporation had got a vested interest started in British Columbia. You know how hard these vested interests kick if there is a proposal to put them out of business; we would have the British government complaining that we were not playing the game under the Ottawa agreements. Our right to use the dumping duties is one of those compensating adjustments which the Prime Minister spoke of some years ago, and quite properly so. I would urge that the dumping duty be put on to the full, not playing with some minimum zone thing, but on the difference between the fair price at which it is sold at home and the price it is sold at for export. Remember that as a result of the imperial conference we are compelled in British Columbia to compete with coal which is (1) subsidized by the British government; (2) subsidized by low wages; (3) subsidized by low freight rates, practically ballast rates, and, (4) in the case of anthracite, given the advantage of paying no duty, no dump duty, a price of $4.70 a ton, and no possibility of raising the valuation; and in the case of bituminous, a low duty and the other advantages. We are paying part of the price of the imperial conference agreements. We have lost entirely the coal market that we enjoyed in the United States, just as we lost the lumber market we enjoyed there, not by any deliberate action of the government, but simply by what one might call the local incidence. I have no doubt that is what the Prime Minister had in mind when he spoke about compensating adjustments.

Mr. MANION: Had we not lost the lumber market in the United States long before the imperial conference agreements?

Mr. NEILL: No, certainly not.

Mr. MANION: I think we had.

Mr. NEILL: Well, I don't. There is this much to be said—and I want to be fair—when these ships come from Great Britain for lumber and wheat they are not all coal burners, most of them take some coal from us. That is to our advantage, but the report I read a few minutes ago shows that the bunkering trade is decreasing, so that phase cannot have done us much good. We pay in every direction for the high tariff, so let us share in the arrangements under the high tariff designed to let the producing interests keep the market. This is a chance, not for the manufacturers but for the actual producers, those who produce coal and lumber and fish—original producers, as I might say—it is a chance to give them a fifty-fifty deal.

We are entitled to the benefit of the tariff the same as the eastern manufacturer. He is quick to take advantage of a dumping duty; it is within his right, but why should not we? If I have any kick about that it is against the act, not against their action in taking advantage of it. It is there; it is the system we live under; we need it—God knows we need it badly in British Columbia to protect our coal market—and all we ask at the present time is that the government see that the dumping duty is put on. And I might express a mild desire to be told positively that it was put on and to what extent. I urge the government that the immediate and insistent need of the coal industry in British Columbia to-day, besides other remedies, is to have this dumping duty imposed speedily and steadily.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton) moved the second reading of Bill No. 5, to amend the criminal code (appeals).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have already explained the purpose of this bill, which proposes two amendments to section 750 of the criminal code, dealing with appeals from summary convictions. The first amendment is for the purpose of providing that an accused person who has been convicted under part XV of the code, and who has been sentenced to a fine, may have the same rights, pending his appeal, as are already provided under the code for persons who have been charged with and convicted of a crime and sentenced to imprisonment without fine or to a fine and, in default of payment, to imprisonment. In either of these latter two cases the accused person can enter into a recognizance and remain at liberty pending the appeal, but the strange thing is that a person who has been convicted of an offence for which he is sentenced to a fine and not to imprisonment has to pay the fine immediately or he may be liable to an order for distress. The purpose of the amendment is to give him the right, pending his appeal, to enter into a recognizance and remain at liberty until his appeal is heard.

The second amendment would preserve to a person who has been convicted under the summary convictions part of the code the right of appeal notwithstanding that he may not, at the time of his conviction and sentence, have given an unequivocal indication of his intention to appeal. As the law now stands, and it has been settled very well by the cases, if a man is sentenced to a fine and, perhaps without knowing of his right of appeal, pays the fine and costs without giving an unequivocal indication of his intention to appeal, by that act he waives his right of appeal. If later, discovering his right to appeal, within the time provided, he lodges such appeal, he may be met by the crown when the appeal comes on for hearing, with the objection that he has lost his right of appeal. The purpose of the amendment is to preserve such right unless he has given some unequivocal indication that he does not intend to pursue an appeal.

I do not know that I can add anything more. I have the case law here if any hon. member wishes to be persuaded as to the accuracy of my understanding of the law.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does this just cover cases of convictions before a magistrate?

Mr. BURY: Yes, it just covers trials before a magistrate, summary convictions.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, personally I see no objection to the two amendments proposed in the bill now before the house, but when the bill was introduced a few days ago I took occasion to refer it to the law officers of the department, asking them to consider it and let me have a report. I do not think the report is ready as yet; at least I have not received it, and my suggestion is that the bill might be read a second time—because I think in principle it is right—and then allowed to stand in committee until I receive a definite report from the law officers of the department. If that could be done I would be obliged.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gobeil for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King.

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, at the outset may I extend my congratulations to the hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne. That they performed their duties in a creditable manner was amply evidenced by the hearty response they received from their followers.

For my own part I have felt that in the house this session there is a determination to get down to the very serious problems that are confronting our people in a manner that shows a desire to deal with them in a definite way. I refer particularly to the address of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) a few days ago, during the course of which he asked for cooperation and the general sympathetic consideration by all members of the house of the problems now facing us. I was in hopes that this sentiment would continue to prevail throughout the session, and I think there has been some evidence that we are making progress in that regard; I believe a determined effort is being made to approach the problems ahead of us with an open mind in an effort to relieve the distressing conditions which exist throughout the country.

I was disappointed, however, when I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson), which left the inference with me that the people of eastern Canada felt that they were becoming unduly burdened because of conditions in western Canada. I think that is unfortunate, and I hope that spirit is not general throughout the east. After all, many of the people in western Canada are blood relatives and kinsmen to the people in eastern Canada, and it was hoped that a spirit of sympathetic cooperation could continue to exist between the east and the west. I do hope that the sentiments expressed by the hon. gentleman are not generally held in eastern Canada. I think his remarks were very well answered by the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) a few nights ago. He gave evidence as to the situation that actually exists in western Canada, so I do not think there should be any doubt as to what the west is actually attempting to do under very trying circumstances.

In that regard, Mr. Speaker, I should like to go a little further and indicate some factors which particularly affect the situation in the west to-day. After all, eastern Canada has gained a great deal from the west and the west has meant a great deal to the east. I think it is well to recall to the house that many business institutions, financial houses and other organizations which have their head offices in the east depend to a very large extent on the west for their well being. That applies particularly to our banks and other financial institutions as well as most of our manufacturing concerns. In the west we have also a seasonal condition which is very extreme, and which brings about other conditions that are difficult to deal with. This was a new country; it developed rapidly, and that rapid expansion probably has been responsible for the heavy borrowings that have been made. These things will adjust themselves, however, when conditions in western Canada improve.

Just in this regard, so that the picture may be more vividly brought to the minds of hon. members of this house, I should like to refer to a few matters of particular importance to our western provinces. For example, I have before me a statement showing the total value of the field crops by provinces for the years 1928 and 1933:

Total, Values of Field Crops in Canada, 1928 and 1933

	1928	1933	Per cent Decrease 1933
Prince Edward Island	$ 12,444,000	$ 8,841,000	28.95
Nova Scotia	18,824,000	11,385,000	39.52
New Brunswick	18,275,000	12,396,000	32.17
Quebec	130,363,000	67,524,000	48.20
Ontario	243,768,000	124,565,000	48.90
Manitoba	113,492,000	33,188,000	70.76
Saskatchewan	348,586,000	75,767,000	78.26
Alberta	220,786,000	76,153,000	65.51
British Columbia	18,465,000	12,118,000	34.37

Taking the three western provinces as a whole we find the reduced value of their field crops to be 78·1, whereas the reduction in the other provinces is only 38·6 per cent. Consequently hon. gentlemen will see what western agricultural conditions with respect to their main crop have really meant to the western provinces and can realize the effect those conditions have had on the purchasing power of that section of the country.

One could give the figures for live stock. Just in passing I might mention that in Saskatchewan the capital value of live stock in 1932 was $63,000,000, as compared with $146,000,000 in 1928, a reduction of 56 per cent; Alberta $53,000,000 in 1932 and $120,000,000 in 1928, a reduction of 56 per cent; Manitoba, in 1932, $29,900,000, and in 1928 $70,500,000, a reduction of 57 per cent.

Take minerals, to which I shall not refer in detail except to say that, so far as Manitoba is concerned, it is the one bright spot on the horizon. Manitoba's mineral production has increased in value from $4,186,000 in 1928 to $8,714,000 in 1932, an increase of 108·1 per cent. In Ontario there was a reduced value in mineral production of 20·1 per cent. As I say, that is really one of the bright spots so far as Manitoba is concerned.

With respect to fisheries the value of the fishery products of British Columbia in 1928 was $26,500,000, and in 1932, $9,900,000, a reduction of 62 per cent. Here again Manitoba is particularly interested. We find that the value of her fishery products, which in 1928 was $2,240,000, had gone down in 1932 to $1,204,000, a decrease of 46 per cent. Ontario had a similar reduction. Manitoba and British Columbia depend to a large extent on this product.

Lumber and sawmill products are of importance particularly to British Columbia. We find that their value was reduced from $62,500,000 in 1928 to $26,831,000 in 1932, a decrease of 57 per cent. Here again Manitoba has suffered a considerable loss in the value of these products, falling from $2,045,000 in 1928 to $547,000 in 1932, a reduction of 73 per cent. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, you can realize that the monetary returns from these natural resources of the western provinces have been very materially depleted so that it has been impossible for them to meet their obligations in the manner in which they were accustomed to do in the past.

Reference has also been made to the financial situation of our various provincial governments. It has been suggested that they have been giving too many public services, and that they were unable to pay for them. I want to place on record what the government of Manitoba has been doing in the last three years. In 1931-32 the cost of the controllable services in Manitoba was $9,070,000; in 1932-33 $8,218,000; in 1933-34, $6,852,000. The total reduction in controllable expenditures in Manitoba in 1933-34 as compared with 1930 has been 30·1 per cent. I hope the people of eastern Canada will realize that the government of Manitoba, and the same can be said for every provincial government in the west, as well as for the municipalities and other public bodies, has been making a very definite attempt to curtail expenditures just as far as it was humanly possible to do so. When a reduction of 30 per cent in controllable expenditures of any province is made within three years, I think it will be admitted that they are doing their level best to meet the situation with which they are faced. So I would like to disabuse the mind of my hon. friend from Lanark who suggested that western Canada is not attempting to do her part in carrying the obligations which have been placed upon her. Western Canada, if given the opportunity, will come back and will be that great, open market for the products of eastern Canada when times and conditions improve. I hope that our eastern friends will lend a hand in giving the west that sympathetic cooperation which it is entitled to receive as a part of this great dominion.

I wish now to direct my remarks to a few things which were said by my very good friend from Souris (Mr. Willis) in the rough and tumble speech which he made the other evening. He seemed to be particularly concerned over the political designation of some hon. members on this side of the house. Personally I am not very much concerned what I am called so long as I am not called a Tory. I would much prefer to be called a Liberal-Progressive than a Liberal-Conservative. To me the calling of a person a Liberal-Conservative is stretching the point just a little too far. The points of view of Liberals and Conservatives are so much in conflict that one wonders why such a title should be maintained. Perhaps my hon. friend from Souris is beginning to realize the ridiculousness of his situation when he attempts to get himself known as a new type of Conservative, as reported in the speech he made a few days ago.

My hon. friend from Souris in his speech the other evening made a very interesting admission, one which I am sure his constituents will not look upon with favour. Referring to tariffs, he said the other evening:

We in western Canada—

I assume he means the Conservatives—

—accept the inevitability of protection because we know that in the St. Lawrence basin there is to be found fifty-five per cent of the Canadian population.

I am rather surprised that he should let a slip like that go by. Personally, I do not accept the inevitability of protection, and I propose to use what little influence I have in attempting to show the people of Manitoba just what tariff protection means to them. My hon. friend then harped upon the theme he has been expounding in this house for some time and attempts to prove that tariffs were lower under the Conservative administration than they were under the Liberal. In so doing he takes the value of goods imported together with the actual amount of duty collected thereon, and from that he tries to establish an average ad valorem rate of duty. He knows his statement is fallacious and misleading to the highest degree.

I have taken the trouble to look up some figures in this regard and I propose to set them out. The year 1922 was really the last fiscal year in which the policies of the Conservative party were in effect. I find that the total imports for that year were valued at $747,800,000, and the duty collected thereon was $121,480,000; 1930 was the last year in which Liberal policies were in effect for a full fiscal year. The total imports for that year were valued at $1,248,000,000 and the duty collected was $199,000,000; 1933 is the last fiscal year in which the policies of the present Conservative government were in operation. The total imports for that year were valued at $406,200,000 and the duty collected was $77,000,000. If we deduct the value of alcoholic beverages and the duty collected thereon, we find that in 1922 the ad valorem rate of duty collected was 15·3 per cent, while in 1930 it was 14·5 per cent. In 1933, we have to add an excise tax of three per cent upon the duty paid value of the goods imported, which brings the ad valorem rate for 1933 up to 21·9 per cent. The calculations made by my hon. friend are a bit astray.

In addition, he leaves out many things which he knows should be considered in arriving at a fair calculation of a tariff structure. He knows that there are several factors which should be considered if one is to be fair in this matter. He knows that if a high rate of duty is placed against goods, they are shut out of the country, the only goods that will come in are those classed as luxury goods which pay a comparatively high rate of duty compared to their actual value. He knows also that under our system of ad valorem and specific duties price changes affect materially the amount of customs duties collected as compared with the value of the goods. He reviews a period of declining prices and compared it with a period of rising prices in an effort to make people believe that he was working out a fair average of tariffs.

Let me illustrate what I have in mind. I will take an extreme case, such as 100 tons of steel rails valued at $50 per ton and paying a specific duty of $5 per ton. The value of these goods would be $5,000, the duty collected would be $500 and the ad valorem rate would be ten per cent. But assume that prices have changed and the same 100 tons of rails are valued at $25 per ton, a total value of $2,500. The same specific rate applies. The duty collected is still $500 but the ad valorem rate has increased to 20 per cent. I assume my hon. friend would say that this represents an increase of 100 per cent in the tariff. He did not take into consideration the period of great industrial expansion which we had during the war when a large amount of raw material came into the country at a very low rate of duty or free of duty and was later reexported. My contention is that it is impossible to compare the ad valorem rates of duty on goods coming into this country at any particular time with the rate on goods coming in at another time.

I should like to give the actual tariff rates which applied on certain classes of goods which are of particular interest to western Canada as a whole and to the people in the constituency of my hon. friend as well. For example, take mowers, binders, reapers, cultivators, harrows, horse-rakes, seed drills, manure spreaders and weeders. In 1921 the British preferential rate on this item was 12½ per cent; the intermediate rate was 12½ per cent and the general 12½ per cent. In 1930 the British preferential rate was free, the intermediate was 6 per cent and the general 6 per cent. In 1933, the British preferential was still free, but very little if any of this class of goods is brought in from Great Britain. In that year the intermediate rate was 15 per cent and the general, 25 per cent. The greater proportion of these goods come under the general rate. The same thing applies to plows and threshing machines. In 1921 the British preferential rate on this item was 12½ per cent; the intermediate, 17½ per cent and the general, 17½ per cent. In 1930 the rates were free, 10 per cent and 10 per cent and in 1933, free, 15 per cent and 25 per cent. The same thing applies to nearly all other classes of farm machinery brought into the country. In the case of spraying machines, fruit and vegetable grading machines, pruning hooks and pruning shears, in 1921 the British preferential rate was 12½ per cent, the intermediate 20 per cent and the general 20 per cent. In 1930, the rates were free, 10 per cent and 10 per cent respectively while in 1933 they were free, 15 per cent and 25 per cent. In the case of well drilling machinery of a kind not manufactured in Canada, the rates for 1921 were 15 per cent British preferential, 25 per cent under the intermediate and 27½ per cent under the general. In 1930 the rates were free across the board. In the case of machinery for concentration of ores, in 1921 the British preferential rate was 15 per cent; intermediate, 25 per cent and general, 27½ per cent, while in 1930 the rates were 10 per cent, 15 per cent and 20 per cent respectively. Mine hoists, of a class not made in Canada: in 1921 the British preferential rate was 15 per cent; intermediate, 25 per cent, and general 27½ per cent, while in 1930 the rates were free, 5 per cent and 10 per cent respectively. In 1921 the rates on engines for fishermen's boats were British preferential, 15 per cent; intermediate, 25 per cent and general 27½ per cent; in 1930 under the British preference they were free; under the intermediate tariff 12½ per cent and under the general 15; and in 1933 the figures were free, 12½ per cent and 15 per cent. I could enumerate a large number of others. Hon gentlemen will recall that a duty of 25 per cent was placed on cream separators and 10 per cent on barbed wire. I do not think therefore that my hon. friend's tariff averages will amount to much when he tells the people the tariffs that have been imposed specifically on the various articles in the tariff schedule, particularly those affecting the farmers of western Canada. That is my point. The averages do not signify anything but merely confuse the whole issue so that people do not thoroughly understand it. One should at all times give the actual rate of duty if one wishes to be fair in this regard. I should certainly expect that the hon. gentleman would be just as much interested in making it possible for the farmers of the west to receive their goods at as low a cost as possible, instead of accepting the inevitability of protection. I suppose he means by that that he is not going to labour the matter very much inasmuch as he realizes the preponderance of population in eastern Canada to be the determining factor in such matters. For this reason he is going to be content to let the inevitable continue. Personally I am not going to take that position; I refuse to accept the inevitability of protection in this regard. I propose to use all the influence I have to bring about a reduction in tariffs. Surely the hon. gentleman must realize that even his leader admitted the injustice of the tariff when he introduced the five cents per bushel bonus on wheat, describing it as a compensating adjustment for western agriculture. Instead of accepting the inevitability of protection with respect to tariffs; he should take his place alongside the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stitt), who made a courageous speech in this house the other afternoon, he would then be making a real contribution to the house and to the country.

I wish now to direct my remarks to the wheat agreement. I view this agreement a little differently to the way in which some hon. gentlemen in this house regard it. I do not think anyone likes the agreement; I do not think that even the government likes it. I do not see how any person in Canada can view with favour a reduction in wheat acreage. More than that, in my opinion it does not matter whether the agreement is made effective or not; natural causes will carry out the purpose of the agreement whether it is adopted or not. Moreover I cannot see that we are going to be able at the rate of shipments to-day to come up to the quota allowed under the agreement this year, namely, 200 million bushels, without forcing sales and thereby depression prices. So far no machinery has been set up to handle it, and apparently it will be left to take care of itself, so that we shall still have a large carryover next year. In 1934-35 we are to have a quota of 15 per cent less than the average of 1931-33, which is estimated to give us a quota of from 263 million to 294 million bushels. I still feel that we shall have difficulty, in shipping this quantity of grain even in that crop year. So that we are likely to arrive at the end of 1935 still holding a considerable quantity of wheat.

I doubt whether the quota system so far suggested can be worked back to the farmer, and if an attempt is made to carry it out it will require a terrific amount of supervision to carry it out. On the other hand, if I could be convinced that this wheat agreement would be lived up to, not only to the letter but in the spirit, by all the countries subscribing to it, and if it could be demonstrated to be a step towards a genuine form of international cooperation, then I think that Canada should play her part in the matter. But I do think that the machinery so far suggested is not sufficient to carry out the agreement. It seems to me that it will be unfair to the producers if an attempt is made to carry it out without some additional machinery in the form of a national marketing organization. Suppose we come to the end of the crop year 1935, when the agreement expires, and our own crop is going on the market. We might have a big crop in this country and the tendency might be to keep prices down. If it were found later on, through the working of the agreement or otherwise, that the world's surplus of wheat had been considerably reduced, with the resulting increased prices later on, we should find this situation then, that the farmer would be delivering grain in the fall at low prices while someone else would be getting the advantage of the later increase. The same thing happened in connection with the London agreement with respect to hogs this fall. I saw many farmers last fall delivering hogs at 4 and 5 cents per pound, only to find when the agreement became more effective, hogs increased in price to almost 9 cents per pound on the Winnipeg market. It is hardly fair to place one class of people in a preferred position, leaving another class subject to the ordinary fluctuations of prices when normal conditions do not prevail.

There are several other factors in regard to which I think it is particularly necessary for us to have information before the agreement is implemented. For instance, I should like to know on what basis the figures have been calculated as affecting other countries entering into this agreement. I think it is also essential to know just what the situation is as regards rye. Wheat and rye go together so far as the old country production is concerned. I am told that the rye production in the European countries has been materially reduced at the expense of wheat. Now, if they reduce wheat, what will they do with rye? In my own province there is durum wheat to be taken into account. I presume it is included in the total amount contemplated in the agreement. Durum is used for different purposes. I am told that the Italian people in particular are making very high class macaroni and spaghetti products out of our durum wheat, whereas our Canadian manufacturers of similar products are continuing to use our ordinary wheat.

The other day the Prime Minister showed to the house a poster from France indicating, that the French people were attempting to carry out the spirit of the wheat agreement. I am prepared to accept that. I also saw that poster some time ago and I am told that in addition to placing that poster in all the post offices throughout France, the French have enacted legislation whereby they will penalize any farmer who breaks up any new land and sows it to wheat. If that step has been taken with the idea of carrying out the spirit of the agreement, well and good, but we should watch very closely to see whether that is the situation. I accept in good faith the propaganda they are putting out, but we all know the people of France are to-day beginning to protest against the high taxes they are paying because of the high duties imposed on wheat, so that these matters must be watched carefully.

There are other matters that should be kept in mind in the carrying out of this agreement. It is not sufficient to let it work alone; we should at all times be endeavouring to find new uses for wheat. I am told on good authority that, for example, in this country 35,000,000 bushels of wheat are being fed to poultry. One can hardly realize that such a quantity could be used for that purpose. There must be other uses to which wheat can be put and may I say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) that a very definite effort should be made to popularize the use of wheat throughout the world. Other concerns who are using other kinds of food products put on extensive advertising campaigns to demonstrate new uses for the different products they have, yet I have failed to see any definite or constructive effort to sell wheat or to popularize it in other countries or even in this. Would the General Motors company be content simply to send its automobiles and trucks over to Liverpool or some other market and leave them in a warehouse there hoping the people would come in and buy them? Certainly not. We must get a definite, active campaign started to popularize the use of wheat and make everybody eat just as much of it as possible.

I wish to repeat that if an attempt is going to be made to carry out the wheat agreement there must be added to it or made a part of it some form of national marketing organization. I would hate to see the marketing of grain left to a wide open speculative system and the farmer subjected to the abuses that might follow it. I know it will be difficult to carry it out; I am afraid the situation at the present time is such that there may be a disposition at least on the part of some, because of what has been happening, to increase rather than to decrease their acreage. On the other hand, however, I feel that at least for this year it is not going to be necessary actually to set up any machinery to carry out the wheat agreement, the simple reason being that natural causes such as drought, grasshoppers, lack of feed and lack of power to put in a crop, will reduce the acreage to the desired extent.

Reference is made in the speech from the throne to the creation of a central bank, all parties being agreed on such a policy. I do not in any sense feel competent to deal with a matter of this kind, but there are two points that stand out strongly in my mind with regard to it. In the first place, if our monetary policy has such a vital effect on the livelihood and welfare of the people, it seems logical that our currency should be nationally controlled. Secondly, with all the ramifications and the sad experiences that Canada has had in the field of international exchange in the last few years, it would seem proper that we should have a national bank to speak for all of Canada, with respect to international monetary affairs. I feel, however, some people have received a wrong impression on what a central bank will do; there are some who think that simply by the establishment of a central bank, credit will be easier for them. That is not the case. A central bank, government owned, will have to conduct its banking business on just as sound a basis as our private banks have done in the past. The creation of a central bank will not make interest rates any easier for the ordinary individual, and as long as government and other public bodies continue to pay high rates of interest, just so long will the individual have to do likewise.

Another important matter that arises in connection with our banks is this: many directors are also directors of other corporations. I am just wondering if the ordinary individual receives the same consideration as that accorded to these other corporations. It is important that that point should be brought forward. Further, the inference has gone abroad that the lack of bank accommodation, particularly to farmers, has been because of heavy losses that those institutions have taken in the agricultural business. In the revision of these bank charters the situation with respect to bank losses should be definitely brought out because I doubt very much whether their losses have been sustained in the agricultural business.

Mr. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Hull) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased, indeed, at the outset of my remarks on the address, to have the opportunity of extending my sincere congratulations to the three members elected since the last session. If we glance over the various sections of this country, we note that the people seem to be unanimous in censuring the policy of this government. In Saskatchewan, the Conservatives have almost been entirely wiped out; in the constituency of Mackenzie, the party to my left has been crushed and a Liberal has been elected by an almost incredible majority, in Quebec, the Yamaska election gave the same result; in the Maritime provinces, the Liberal candidate carried Restigouche-Madawaska by almost an incredible majority. This seems to be a harbinger of the people's feelings. The nation which had no opportunity, previous to these three elections, to express its wishes, has just given its verdict which condemns without a shadow of doubt the party in office, and in my opinion, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) should in the near future appeal to the people. The members elected have always been Liberal, are highly gifted and appreciated by their constituency; I, therefore, associate myself with all in extending to them our sincere congratulations and our wishes for a brilliant career in the house.

Undoubtedly there exists a crisis the like of which has never been felt for a number of centuries. It is world wide and no country can boast of having escaped its consequences. We are passing through an era of change and evolution and all nations harbour in their midst, to-day, a restless element, dissatisfied with their lot, wondering whether to continue the capitalist system or adopt new ideas. In Europe, various nations have discontinued the parliamentary system to adopt either fascism of nazism or bolshevism or again other forms of government unknown in America. Within a year the United States themselves, without entirely doing away with the capitalist system, have thought fit to change it so as to give to the state a greater control over the economic life of the country, a control extending to trade, industry and to all other fields of national activity. In this country we have continued our capitalist system without change. In my opinion, it is still the best for a young country like ours, considering its relative situation; however, I admit, with many others, that the abuses of this system are responsible for the present state of things.

Undoubtedly, Canada like all other countries, suffers from depression and unemployment. All admit that we have unemployment. Perhaps, we disagree sometimes as to its spread; we certainly do not agree as to the remedies to apply in order to relieve the situation. Within the last three years, unemployment has certainly spread in our country. The only remedies have consisted in government loans, new taxation, in money expended on public works, contributions to distressed provinces or doles.

Public works were the first which the government endeavoured to apply, all know with what success. It was an exceedingly expensive method. Proportionately it gave the least results for the money expended in order to relieve unemployment. This method was dropped by the government in order to adopt purely and simply the dole system and charitable means.

To-day, the dominion, provincial and municipal governments carry on the dole systems, giving from hand to hand to those in distress. However, this system has very little improved the situation of those who are in want. I have but to point, as an example, to the city I represent to prove that, notwithstanding the large amounts expended in our midst to relieve distress, we are, more than ever, faced with unemployment and poverty. At the 1931 session, 2,000 persons, in Hull, were depending on government assistance. The number has increased to 6,500 within three years. Notwithstanding public works carried out, the number of unemployed has increased and will continue to do so, unless a remedy is found to bring new life to industries which give work to our people.

At present, in the city of Hull, with a population of 29,000 souls, we support 6,500 persons, at a cost of $30,000 per month, supplied by the Dominion and provincial governments and one-third by the municipality. We have no choice, we must make a loan of nearly $600,000 to meet the outlay necessitated by unemployment, public works and the funding of our floating debt. And I must confess that, at the last projected public sale of properties, the list comprised 841 properties to be sold for municipal taxes. This does not include vacant lots but only houses. We have reached the point where certain property holders prefer demolishing their houses than pay their taxes or run the risk of having to pay higher taxes.

Do not imagine that I blame this government alone for such a state of things. The situation existing in Hull, is that, I think, of all other cities in the Dominion. It is the result of many past events, it is the consequence, probably, of the inconsiderate increase of the national debt, of our shortcomings, and I think it would be ridiculous to blame one man or a party for what we are reaping to-day. However, I believe that the party in office has not put into practice any policy which might relieve the situation or uproot the evil.

So far as unemployment, suggestions were made by both the Liberal party and the party to my left. The government did not follow these suggestions and has not succeeded in improving the situation. Why this obstinacy in refusing to appoint a federal commission, comprising the representatives of all public corporations, who are familiar with the conditions existing throughout the country, so as to cooperate with the Dominion, provincial and municipal governments in the distribution of relief, the methods to be adopted to find work for those who are unemployed and thereby improve the lot of those in distress?

As a permanent measure, the enactment of an unemployment insurance was often suggested. This unemployment insurance scheme has not been carried out or been considered or even communicated to the house, as a measure, by the government. It is, perhaps, difficult to put it into practice at a time of crisis. However, if we delay too long and prosperity returns, we shall soon have forgotten our present hardships and we shall pigeon-hole a measure which should be enacted in a country which seeks progress, in a young country like ours and which may become very prosperous.

The present act to relieve unemployment contains provisions in connection with the back-to-the land movement. This scheme can certainly be very helpful to those who, in our cities, depend, to-day, on the dole. Again, this evening I came across a last year's report on the subject. In Ontario, 329 families, comprising 1,763 persons were settled by the government on lands in New Ontario. Those who do not yet suffer from the get-rich-quick ailment—an ailment which seems to have spread in certain sections of our country —those who have sufficient courage to forsake city life so as to settle on new lands, will certainly find there, a home, fuel and food. If it be not a luxurious life, it is certainly a healthy one, the one our forebears were familiar with and which gave them the means of raising large healthy and bright families.

I am aware that it is difficult to persuade a great number of city folks to give up the easy city life to settle on lands and undergo the hardships of a settler; however, I think that the government, through advertising and giving greater assistance to those who wish to settle on lands, should endeavour to increase the number of those who are happy in the country. In Quebec, it seems that this return to-the-land movement is the one which benefits most of the people.

I, therefore, congratulate the government for having thought of setting aside an amount for the back-to-the-land scheme. However, I request the government to decrease, if not to completely eliminate the quota which municipalities must furnish in the settlement of these families.

The financial situation of towns in Quebec —I am not acquainted with the situation of towns outside of this province—is such that our municipal councils find it impossible, at present, to furnish one-third of the amount required to settle these people on farms. Both Dominion and provincial governments should, in my humble opinion, share the cost of settling these people. Colonization is not within the purview of municipalities, but of provincial and Dominion governments. Why then not unburden the municipalities of this weight, when they are almost faced with bankruptcy? I feel certain that the people of Canada would be grateful to the federal and provincial governments, if such a measure were enacted.

May I now refer to our trade. I shall not quote any figures, as numerous speakers who have preceded me have done so in their speeches. Statistics have their importance; however, it is said that they can be twisted as one wishes. I prefer expressing the views of the people, with whom we come in contact daily, in connection with the present situation, the way the country is managed and what is expected from our legislators. There is no doubt that, in value, our trade imports and exports have decreased by half. No one denies that. As to the figures, the Bureau of Statistics proves it beyond doubt. Has it decreased in the same proportion as to volume? Without quoting figures, I think the ratio is the same. If not, how explain the considerable deficits of our transportation systems, either by water or railway? If the same quantity of goods had been carried during these last years, no doubt the revenues of our transportation systems would have been larger than they are. To Liberals and serious people, the cause of these deficits is necessarily to be found in the fact that the present tariffs have hindered the expansion of our trade abroad. Reciprocity was discussed last year; I trust that the government this year will negotiate such a treaty with the United States.

I have, sir, in my few remarks, endeavoured to express my views on present conditions. We take a great interest in all these problems and I trust this government will take the necessary measures to bring back prosperity to this country.

Mr. GEORGES BOUCHARD (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a few words before this largely depopulated house at this late hour of this parliamentary week it occurs to me to remark upon the fact that the government this year could not draw upon newly elected members in choosing the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Of course that is due to no mere whim of fate but rather to a decided expression of the opinion of the public at large. The government should not forget the old saying, after the three elections that have been lost, that three is a crowd. We all expect that the day will soon come when this will be demonstrated.

Both the mover (Mr. Gobeil) and the seconder (Mr. Barber) of the motion have acquitted themselves well, and what they lack in ingenuousness they make up, perhaps, in political ability. They have demonstrated, it is true, a youthful faith in the policies of their government, a faith, however, which is not in keeping with the thought of the people at large.

My congratulations naturally go to the three newly-elected members. They have championed the rights of the people; they have championed Liberal thought, and they were all elected by large majorities, which is a sign of the times. The enticements of the spider which succeeds in catching the fly in its web are nothing in comparison with the enticing promises that were made during the last election to induce the people to vote for the Conservatives. Statesmen in these times I know are not sleeping on beds of roses. But instead of trying to apply some permanent cure to our diseases it seems to me they merely resort to all sorts of expedients, they are like a little boy playing with a yo-yo, drawing taxes up and letting them out again. The palliatives applied by the administration have accentuated the disease instead of curing it, and indeed no serious effort has been made to remedy the situation. The country is entitled to something more than mere palliatives. Those who have gained power through extravagant promises should not be surprised at evidence of an extravagant distrust on the part of the people.

I do not propose to deal at any great length, Mr. Speaker, with the different proposals contained in the speech from the throne. I shall not give any figures; as a matter of fact I think they have all been given. With his usual mastery of facts my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) has dealt with this question in a very illuminating way, so much so that he has silenced my hon. friends opposite. The speech from the throne, in common with the four previous speeches, is a masterpiece of illusive statements and evasive hopes. The popular mind cannot be changed at once by glowing prophecies of instant recovery, without some more substantial evidence being offered. The supreme efforts of the government in its dying days—I hope—will not revive the public confidence so widely shaken by nearly four years of inefficient administration.

Perhaps you will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, when I state that the economic depression has brought about a greater intellectual ferment, with a natural desire for new ideas and a greater disposition towards the exchange of views. Unfortunately these new suggestions have not gained the support of the government benches, where a lack of cooperation is obvious. In their public utterances hon. gentlemen opposite charge us with a lack of cooperation, as though the official opposition were in power. Well, we are here to offer our suggestions and it is up to the government to put them into effect. With no desire to claim credit for a panoramic mind or a quack cure-all remedy I wish to express a few reflections at random, such as might be uttered by a habitant looking over his country. Coming from the province with the highest proportion of spinning wheels and the smallest proportion of steering wheels I am bound to be rated as a traditional, not to say a fossilized, old-fashioned type, but it is clear to me that having regard to the impulse of industrial, commercial and financial forces the world today is a world in compartments, more mechanical than thoughtful. An attempt has been made to build sky-high a great industrial tower, a Babel, which has brought about a confusion of languages, and in all this turmoil the dominating voice is that of the bankers, who form a kind of moneyarchy. In this period of turmoil, which has been accentuated by this government, the financial man is speaking one language, the farmer another and the labouring man another, and with the present government in power there is very little hope for any complete understanding.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that it is the duty of public spirited men to offer their contributions when the ship of state is struggling against a heavy sea. It is not only for the crew but also for the passengers—or the back benchers—to lend a helping hand. Unless capitalism, which is no evil in itself, is rationalized, socialized, humanized and ruralized we do not know where the ship of state will land. What I claim for agriculture is not for mere class advantage but for the good of the country. During this present crisis the farmers have given the world an example of fecundity, perseverance and endurance, but with the policies of this government complicating the situation the future is very cloudy. By increasing the tariff this government has increased the price of practically every commodity the farmer has to buy and has made it more and more difficult for the farmer to trade with the world. The tariff on cream separators, barbed wire, fertilizer, cotton goods and so many other commodities has not been put there to help the farmer. A government which allows manufacturers to pile up dividends in the face of farmers putting in long hours of labour on the land should not be surprised at the results of the recent by-elections.

The other day when the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) was so ably winding up the debate on his motion for shorter hours of labour I was reflecting on the force of his arguments, which were not less convincing than those advanced by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan). I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that shorter hours are bound to come with the ever increasing efficiency of machinery, but this is only one feature, and it should be interwoven with a scheme which at the same time would afford similar advantages to the workers on the soil. Let us get all the protection possible for the manufacturers, also all possible advantages for the labour men, such as shorter hours, a minimum wage, unemployment insurance, and so on. To all these policies I do not object at all, but if, while the government is applying these policies, the farmer is neglected by the government as he is at the present time, the evils from which we are suffering will only be increased. Today the farmer is over-neglected and the manufacturer is over-protected, and what is the final result? The present crisis, I submit, is more than anything else a question of unemployment, and unemployment is a result, more than anything else, of a disinclination to the land. But what is worse, this government, not satisfied with having plagued the farmer with high tariffs, taxes on sugar and postage stamps, sales taxes and so on, is asking the farmer to pay for that for which he is not responsible.

I think you will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that unemployment is a by-product of industry, and now the government is turning to the farmer and asking him to pay his share of the unemployment in industry. Professor H. E. Armstrong writes in the Sunday Times of recent date:

> We have too long made manufacturing industry the prime object of our national being. We have largely sold man's birthright, agriculture, for no mere mess of potage, but for mechanisms with which we can accomplish almost anything that we desire to do, even to the extent of making ourselves all but unnecessary. We call this rationalization. Nothing less rational could well be.

We have deprived the farmer of his markets by our excessive tariffs and are now asking him to pay a large share of the taxation to cure unemployment. But that is not all. While the government of my province has spent up to the end of the year 1932 over $150,000 in premiums to the farmers to help them buy fertilizer, at the same time this government imposes a tax in the form of a tariff on the fertilizer which the farmer uses when it enters this country manufactured. I agree with Professor Albert Einstein who, addressing the students of California Institute of Technology, as reported in the New York Times of February 25, 1931, said:

> Why does this magnificent applied science which saves work and makes life easier bring us so little happiness? The simple answer runs, because we have not yet learned to make sensible use of it.

I am not against progress, science or mechanical development, but we must make a very wise use of these things. I am not in antagonism to the interests of labour and of the city dwellers. Far from it; I invite them to realize as has been said authoritatively, "not charity alone but fraternity is indeed calculated to remove the mountains of misunderstanding that all too often divide us."

In a review of a book recently written by Mr. Wallace Brett Donham I read:

> Migration of farmers to cities will go on in view of the enhanced competition of foreign agricultural producers and the effect of better farm machinery, but industry will not offer indefinitely increased employment either to them or to others, because the technique of production is likely to keep up its advance even at an accelerated pace. The wants of the population will lag behind productive capacity since new articles or inventions for popular consumption will not be found in sufficient number or make their way to popularity quickly enough to take up the increasing capacity of industry.

Sooner or later, and I think the sooner the better, with the ever increasing efficiency of machinery, we will have to turn to the land in order to find occupation for our unemployed. We must turn to the land not only for the benefit of those who are now unemployed in the city. But before dealing with that question further I should like to illustrate by a few examples the discrepancy that has always existed between this government's treatment of the rural population and of the urban population.

In my constituency, where my people have contributed a large share of the revenues of this country, what is happening? We have contributed all sorts of taxes. We have a few hundreds of unemployed. But are they taken care of by this government? We have three projects in view at the present time. The first is in connection with the wharf at Riviere Ouelle. For many years this wharf had been kept in good repair. It was very necessary for this constituency but it was partly destroyed by a storm. We expected that this matter would receive some consideration from the government, but it has not. On many occasions when the estimates were being considered I have reminded the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) of the necessity of repairing this wharf. I have written a number of letters which I shall not take the trouble to read to-night. Notwithstanding all this, nothing was done. Under the good administration of the previous government there used to be something like $20,000 spent in my constituency. The expenditure of this money took care of the floating population of labour.

The second project is in connection with the draining of the Riviere Ouelle peat marsh. When this marsh is cleared and properly drained it will allow for the cultivation of about 5,000 acres sufficient to take care of from 25 to 30 families of unemployed. We asked the government for a little help in this connection but for some reason it was cancelled.

The third project had been approved by the provincial government and had been submitted to the consideration of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) under schedule number 34. I refer to the straightening of the roadway, the building of culverts and so on, on the highway from St. Alexandre to Fort Kent. I wrote the best letters I could to the minister and told him that I desired to meet him in order to discuss the whole matter, but nothing was done. This work would take care of practically all the unemployed in my constituency.

I have mentioned these three cases in order to illustrate my argument that while the unemployed are taken care of in the cities, not the slightest attention is given to those in the rural districts. During the last calendar year only a trifle of perhaps $2,000 was spent in my constituency. I do not want to antagonize city members, but I desire to illustrate my point. There is a continual drift of country people towards the cities. This is a social disease and in an effort to cure it our long-sighted statesmen claim that there is only one remedy—back to the land. But still they are inducing the country people to come to the cities by their neglect during times of stress. There never was a time when the government would receive such overwhelming support for the building up of a practical world system as the present. If the opportunity is neglected, the failure will be so much the greater.

Instead of remedies we are given promises. The following appeared in the Evening Citizen of February 7:

> Defeatism
> Premier Bennett addressed the Toronto Board of Trade as a chastened leader last Monday when he said:

"I would like to promise you a spectacular move that would make you hip-hurrah—but, gentlemen, you did too much of that a few years ago, forgetting that some day the bills would have to be paid."

We did that because we believed his promise that we would have prosperity. He continues:

We cannot offer you anything spectacular—nothing but thrift and hard work.

There were many of my constituents whom I could not convince to vote for me. They believed in these wonderful promises. When they came to me, I told them frankly; "My dear people, we have a crisis and you have to be thrifty; you must save your money." They were told by the other side that if Mr. Bennett was returned to power there would be work for every one. They replied to me: "He is a wealthy man and he can tell us a trick or two about how to become wealthy ourselves."

Mr. DUPRE: The period of time to which the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) was referring was that before 1930.

Mr. BOUCHARD: The promise was distinctly made to us, and now he comes before the same people with statements far different. I do not doubt his sincerity; I think he was sincere, but he failed. It is not my fault, and perhaps it is not his; but his policies were not proper, and he now comes to us and says he has nothing spectacular to offer. Everything was spectacular in 1930, and now there is nothing for it but thrift and hard work. One thing however is now left out—iron heelism. May I say that we need no new Moses to lead us out of our plight. The cure is the application of common sense and the old and tried principle of freer trade and economy.

Let us consider for a moment something that goes deeper than this. As I said at the beginning, under the present administration of the world, every country is over-urbanized, over-industrialized and under-ruralized. What is the remedy? Expansion of farming. The land always remains the safe refuge. I know that it will bring a smile to the lips of industrially-minded people, and it may seem paradoxical, when the Prime Minister of the country is talking about reducing wheat acreage, to suggest as a remedy the expansion of farming. But the fact is that agriculture is Canada's fundamental industry, and when I say this I am not suggesting an increase in farm lands but an increase in the farming population of the country. I repeat, with the ever-increasing efficiency of machinery how can you take care not only of the unemployed of to-day but of the unemployed of the future? We have receded too fast from a civilization which was rural towards a civilization which is over-industrialized. Perhaps I might quote a paragraph or so from an article from its Dublin correspondent, under the heading, The Great Safeguard, which appeared in The London Times of January 31, 1932:

With eight persons on the land for one in manufacturing industry we have escaped the burden of direct unemployment and urban distress. The economic hardihood of the small farmer and his family has been the country's great safeguard and has enabled it so far to battle with the storm.

Let me for a moment discuss the great cry, "back to the land." The most pressing aspect of unemployment in the future will be to find occupation for the people outside large scale industry, and therefore "back to the land" is the watchword. There is at least a redeeming feature in the present crisis: people are thinking more rurally. I do not quarrel with those who advertise the back to the land movement but I doubt its success except in special cases, and I am sure that when the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) spoke about the back to the land movement he had colonization more in mind. I am strongly in favour of colonization, but the back to the land proposal is a terrible indictment of our social system.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): In rising to make a few remarks in regard to the speech from the throne I wish to discuss some items therein affecting particularly British Columbia. The present speech, like many of its predecessors, contains some platitudes and some proposed legislation, and in the first place I wish to deal with the trade agreements. I notice that every hon. member on the other side who has spoken has taken time to put before the house figures showing that the trade with Great Britain has greatly increased under the present administration as compared with our trade heretofore. These figures are put forward in phrases that are very cleverly drawn up, because I find on page 128 of Canada 1934, an official handbook issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, the statement that Canada's total trade for the fiscal year 1933 amounted to over $880,000,000 a reduction of 23·9 per cent compared with 1932 and 48·5 per cent compared with 1931, but this is the sentence that interests me particularly:

In spite of the large decrease in the past three years total trade is now nearly eight times that at confederation.

Surely that is going back pretty far for a comparison. Hon. gentlemen are endeavouring to convey to the country the impression that since the Ottawa agreements have been put into effect Canada's trade has been just wonderful. But if one examines the figures closely one must be impressed with certain facts. Granted that the trade with Great Britain has increased, why should it not increase?—because during the first two years after our hon. friends opposite came into office, that trade had greatly decreased and the trade of Canada generally had gone down to the lowest level in many years. So, if trade between Great Britain and Canada has increased, this is no wonder when you have in mind the low ebb it had reached at least prior to 1933. I would point out that our trade with Great Britain in relation to our total trade is really less than it was in 1929 when the Liberal party was in power. That is significant. In listening to speeches delivered by hon. gentlemen opposite bolstering up the trade figures, I was reminded of a man whose business in 1930 amounted to $10,000, which in 1931 had dropped to $1,000 and in 1932 had increased to $2,000. In making out his report to the directors he stated that during 1932 the business of the firm had increased 100 per cent. That is just as good an argument as telling the house and the country that Canada's trade with Great Britain has increased, because we know that it was at the lowest ebb it had reached in many a long year.

I listened to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), both in the house and in Vancouver, giving prices of agricultural products in this country as against those across the line and elsewhere, and pointing out that we in Canada were receiving higher prices for our products than they were in the United States and, I believe, in some other countries. When he was quoting prices on certain agricultural products affecting British Columbia, particularly eggs, I noticed that when he picked out the prices and the cities in which those prices prevailed, he compared prices in Montreal, which is, by the way, a cold city, with those in Kansas City, which has, I believe, a warm climate. But he omitted to mention that in the state of Washington, which is adjacent to British Columbia, they were at the time paying two cents a dozen more than was being received in our province. If he had cited the prices prevailing in two contiguous areas with similar climatic conditions, the comparison would have been much fairer than one based on Montreal and Kansas City.

I shall, however, mention prices of some other agricultural products in British Columbia, and I shall ask hon. members to tell me after I am through where the farmer is getting less. Just before I left for Ottawa a farmer close to me had three cows to sell. I am aware that cow meat is not the very best; we all know that prime fat steers are the best for the market. These cows ran from 1,000 to 1,200 pounds live weight, and he was offered $15 for the three. Another farmer close to me had two cows for sale when the dealer came around and he was offered $3 for the two. I well remember the farmer's remark to the buyer; he said: "Well, I have never sold a cow for $1.50 in my life before, but I will tell you what I will do; I will sell you one for $3 and give you the other for nothing." I mention this just, as the Prime Minister has often stated, to keep the record straight.

I am going to cite a case in regard to fruit and this time I shall not confine it to the Fraser valley and Vancouver. This information was given to me by a fruit grower at a place called, I believe Fauquier, while I was going through the interior during the last election. He shipped seventeen boxes of pears to Medicine Hat. I would like the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw) to hear this. This man was charged $13.18 for freight, and after all charges were paid he received only $2.29 out of which he had to pay for the nails and the boxes. The result was that seventeen boxes of bartlett pears netted him exactly six cents. One does not quote these figures with any degree of pride. Why should he? Why should any hon. member come here and glory because the farmers or any other producers are getting low prices? I am mentioning these facts because we have heard so much about prices in Canada being higher than in the United States or other countries. I am citing figures on which I have the facts, and I ask hon. members to tell me where farmers have been getting for that class of product less than the prices I have mentioned.

In the legislation that we expect will be introduced by the government at this session, I am interested particularly at this time in that with regard to marketing, and I should like to spend a few moments in dealing with it. Let me say in passing that I hope the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) and the Prime Minister will expedite as much as they can the marketing legislation, particularly as it affects the milk producers of the Fraser valley. My reason for asking this is that we in British Columbia, and particularly in the Fraser valley, are anxiously awaiting the proposed legislation because, if it is unduly delayed, it will mean that no amending legislation can be put through by the provincial government this session to enable the dairy farmers of the Fraser valley to take advantage of any dominion legislation in order to improve the present condition and prices there. For the benefit of the house I should like to give a resumé of the conditions affecting milk producers in that area.

There are some 3,000 milk farmers in the Fraser valley and the lower mainland, owning approximately 45,000 cows, the yield being roughly speaking, 7,000,000 pounds of butter fat per annum. Of that amount only 3,000,000 pounds are sold in the shape of fluid milk which has been selling to the householder for nine cents a quart, the present price now being, I believe, one cent higher. The remaining 4,000,000 pounds must be sold in the form of butter, cheese, evaporated milk and other products which sell to the householder for about half the price of milk. The milk farmer is receiving two and a half cents a quart for his pool price, but Vancouver milk prices are nine cents a quart delivered at the door and eight cents at the retail stores. Of the 3,000 milk farmers, 2,700 are organized; the other 300 are independent. Some of those 300 independents underbid and thus prevent any attempt at stabilizing the price of milk, because the independents go after the fluid milk market, where the price is the best and the profits are higher, and undercut the cooperatives who must share the low returns of all milk products marketed. They also raise the cost of distribution because they duplicate services which should be unified. There are seventeen distributors delivering milk, but only a handful of farmers who are selling milk from door to door. Their wagons are peddling milk from door to door in a ruinous way and the milk farmer is paying for this duplicate distribution and for the nerve-wracking price cutting tactics of the independent. It is not the consumer that is breaking the prices. Vancouver is getting milk at 9 cents; Calgary pays 11 cents, Edmonton 10 cents, Winnipeg 10 cents and Victoria 11 cents, showing that Vancouver is not holding up the consumer in the price of milk. Instead of 30 cents a pound that the farmer is now getting for butter fat, he could be getting nearly 40 cents; instead of 2½ cents per quart he could be getting 3 cents or 3½ cents. By eliminating duplication in distribution the farmer could be paid still more, probably another cent per quart, and the consumers in Vancouver would not be called upon to pay any more, because it is the cost of distribution that is running up the overhead. Vancouver consumers use 80,000 quarts of fluid milk per day. If the farmers could be paid two cents a quart more by the above methods, it would mean an additional $1,600 a day or well over half a million dollars a year for the farmers of the Fraser valley and the lower mainland. That is the price that 3,000 farmers are paying for the refusal of 300 independents to cooperate. We hope that the legislation that is to come will be brought down just as soon as the Minister of Agriculture and the Prime Minister can have it placed before us for consideration. It should be brought down before the session at Victoria is near prorogation, because if it is left too long it will mean that no enabling legislation can be put through the provincial house this year, with the result that over half a million dollars will be lost to the farmers of the Fraser valley.

In that connection I would like to make a few remarks about the statement of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis) when, speaking of the milk bill, he said, that the farmers in the Fraser Valley or in British Columbia were in just about the same position that the trade unionists were twenty-five or thirty years ago. Let me say for the benefit of the house and of the hon. member for Vancouver South, and speaking as a trade unionist with as long and as good a record as he has, that in that bill the Fraser valley milk producers jumped far ahead of any trade union movement. At one stroke they went years ahead of any trade union legislation, because, as most of us know, joining a trade union is not compulsory. Members are generally brought into a trade union by moral suasion, or perhaps during times of strike by picketing.

Mr. MacINNIS: I would like to point out that the farmers are asking legal sanction for what the trade unionists try to enforce without legal sanction.

Mr. REID: Not all trade unionists have asked for the same thing, because I belong to a union that has never asked for compulsory membership.

Mr. MacINNIS: We never asked for that.

Mr. REID: The hon. member made his speech. I know just as much about this matter as he does, and when it comes to that I have a good record in unionism second to no one in this house. I say that without any boasting at all. Trade unions never ask the government for legislation to compel every man to join; the farmers in British Columbia have done so, and this enabling legislation seeks that very thing. But, as many hon. members know, they ran into a snag or two in connection with indirect taxation that conflicted with the federal powers and provincial jurisdiction. This statement may interest the house, and I make it with a great deal of pride, that the marketing legislation now before the government of Great Britain, especially that relating to the marketing of milk, was based on the bill introduced into the British Columbia legislature by the farmers of the Fraser valley. We take a great deal of pride out there in the fact that British Columbia has given the old country the lead in orderly marketing. Before passing on I reiterate my previous statement, because I realize how serious conditions are among the farmers out there; I ask the Minister of Agriculture and the Prime Minister to expedite the proposed marketing legislation to the utmost of their power so that we may have enabling legislation passed in Victoria this year.

There are some other matters in the speech from the throne to which I should like now to refer. I note that it states the following in reference to the world monetary and economic conference:

> The conference adjourned without dealing with many important subjects, but arrived at conclusions of especial interest and concern to Canada in respect to central banks, the gold standard, and the percentage of metallic coverage essential to the successful functioning of gold as a medium of international exchange.

I repeat what I said a few days ago in connection with gold coverage: I think the Prime Minister was derelict in his duty in not having appropriated all the gold of this country and added it to the treasury, or carried out the provisions agreed on at the imperial economic conference here by immediately reducing the metallic coverage of our currency so that further currency amounting to over $100,000,000 could be issued. I am particularly well pleased, Mr. Speaker, that Canada has seen fit, through its finance minister, to sign the agreements, which I hope will be ratified by parliament, relating to silver. I will have more to say on that subject later on, because as the house well knows I have a resolution asking the government to recognize silver, which I hope will come up in the near future. In passing however, I should like to say that I think great praise should be given to the United States for giving a lead in this regard, especially as they have a large accumulation of gold and could have withstood the attacks of the advocates of silver; but the United States government, even though having the most gold of any nation, was the first to lead the way in making silver as well as gold a basis for currency.

The other day the Prime Minister corrected me in what I said about a speech delivered by him in Vancouver. In that connection I will read the statement he made and leave it to the house to say whether it could not be rightfully interpreted as meaning just what I said. Speaking of the debt of Canada, including the railway debt, he said:

> Where is the spirit of our pioneers who tilled our soil and worked in our forests? Did they go to the government whenever they wanted anything?
> They did not ask governments to be a wet nurse to every derelict.

Many were led to believe that the remark related to those who are destitute and on relief. It was so interpreted by many there; as a matter of fact on the following day letters appeared in the newspapers protesting against such an insult. We have heard, Mr. Speaker, a great deal of praise of Canadians for their endurance during these trying times; it is a wonder the government does not give the people of Canada any reason to pay tribute to the powers of performance of the government.

I would like to speak also of another part of the speech from the throne, that which relates to relief. There is a paragraph in the speech which states that the Dominion government is doing everything possible to help the provinces during these terrible times of crisis. I hope the Dominion government will do all it can to help the provinces refinance the heavy loans they have had to negotiate and at much lower rates of interest than they are called upon to pay at present. In my opinion that would be some real help indeed.

When I brought up the question of relief, however, I intended to deal with the province of British Columbia and in that particular my remarks are not going to be too critical, though I have certain suggestions to offer which I believe should be placed before the house. Before doing so, however, I would direct attention to the fact that British Columbia is carrying a heavier load than most provinces. Many reasons could be given as to why that is so; I think one in particular is that due to the fine climate we have in British Columbia many thousands of people have drifted there from other provinces, and I do not think that strictly speaking, these transients should be charged against either the municipalities or the British Columbia government. Take the case of the city of Vancouver; I have here the number of people on relief in November last, in a statement which I obtained just before I left for Ottawa. I find that in Vancouver some 6,676 transient single men are being cared for. These men have come largely from other provinces, and the city of Vancouver should not be charged with the relief which they entail. There are some 720 transient families in that city as well, a very large number indeed. If one had time to go through the list I hold in my hand, which gives the figures for the mainland only, he would find that there are 1,058 transient families on relief in British Columbia, and that does not take into account Vancouver island or the territories in the north and elsewhere which are looked after by the provincial government. He would find also that there are 6,852 homeless single men being looked after.

The Prime Minister has made it very clear, especially since the last election, that the duty is on the municipalities first of all to take care of the unemployed and destitute, and that when the municipalities are unable to do so it becomes the duty of the province. During the election campaign of 1930 it was interpreted in the opposite way, but at all events I think it would be well if some special check were made by the Dominion government and some greater interest taken in how the relief generally is carried on throughout the entire province. I do not think it is well to have some municipalities pay a set scale of relief with no work, while other municipalities pay a certain scale with work; and others again provide work but pay only small wages. There is a great deal of dissatisfaction throughout the province because of that fact.

Let me cite one case, to show the inequalities in the granting of relief. About two months before I came here I attended a meeting of returned men. One of the major subjects discussed there was the question of a German family who had been in Canada just five years and three months and who were drawing $31 a month in relief, while their neighbours, some of them returned men who had offered their all for this country, were being given only $9, $10 or $11 a month. You can imagine the feelings of these returned men when this German flaunted his cheque in their faces. I suppose if the Prime Minister were here he would rise in his place and say that this is not a question for the Dominion government but that it is primarily a municipal or provincial affair and that my complaint should be taken to the province. After struggling with this question for three years, however, surely the Dominion government are not going to adopt that stand forever; surely they are not always going to hide behind the British North America Act and say they cannot do anything. It is high time something effective was done in connection with inequalities and injustices such as this, because after all the Dominion government must have some responsibility since they are contributing large amounts to the various provinces.

I have another complaint which I should like to direct to the attention of the government as well. As badly as relief and the relief camps were administered by the late administration in British Columbia they did one admirable thing in connection with the purchasing of supplies. As many hon. members know, many camps have been taken over by the Department of National Defence. Before that was done, however, the camps in my constituency were purchasing their supplies from the farmers in the immediate vicinity. They bought potatoes, turnips, carrots, pork, beef and milk directly from the farmers, and they paid the current market prices. It is very noticeable, however, that since the Department of National Defence took over the camps it has been Pat Burns and Swift's who have furnished all these supplies. This has occasioned a great loss to the farmers in my constituency, and they feel that there is something wrong when the produce is bought first of all as cheaply as possible by these firms, trucked into the city of Vancouver, and then brought back out again. I think the government might well take note of a situation such as that, because that comes directly under their jurisdiction and control.

With regard to relief in British Columbia, Mr. Speaker, I should like to add that some of the municipalities are still in grave difficulties. One municipality, to which I directed the attention of the house two years ago, the municipality of Burnaby, still has 25 per cent of it population on relief. I doubt if any district in Canada has a larger proportion of its inhabitants on relief. With a population of 25,000 Burnaby has over 6,000 people on relief.

I believe that public works should be started, and I do not believe any municipality should be allowed to give relief without some return. I also believe that the wages paid those in the camps should be increased, even if the hours or days of work should be lessened. This handing out of 20 cents a day, even with food, clothing and shelter, has broken the spirit and taken the very life out of many of those who are in the camps. The government would be well advised to put into effect some uniform system throughout so that the same relief scale would be in force throughout the province. I believe some return by way of work should be asked for, but the men should be paid a decent wage which will permit a decent standard of living.

Two or three days ago I directed a question to the Prime Minister with regard to the entry of cattle into Great Britain. I did so because I have listened to hon. members opposite take great praise for the amount of produce leaving this country for Great Britain. The statement contained in the article which I am about to read indicates to me a very serious situation so far as the cattle industry of this country is concerned, and it affects not only the cattle industry but our egg exports as well. I read this article to the house because I wish thereby to draw it to the attention not only of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) but also of the Prime Minister. I quote from the Vancouver Province of January 27 of this year:

Grave fears for the future of the beef industry of western Canada, which have been showing renewed life, were expressed by members of the Western Canada Livestock Union at its annual meeting in Moose Jaw, according to Jack Byers, manager of the Western Stock Growers' Association, who returned to his Calgary office this week.

Before Great Britain placed the quota on Canadian exports, limiting the quantity of beef cattle for the first three months of 1934 to the number shipped during the same period of 1933, the stock business on the prairies had developed very rapidly in the production of cattle of suitable type for that market, Mr. Byers said, and the future appeared brighter than for some time.

"We were hoping that Great Britain, the only market to-day for our surplus, could be built up during the coming years until the period from 1893 to 1913, when 150,000 head of cattle were shipped annualy, was approached."

The major difficulties of providing facilities for ocean transport and sufficient numbers of good quality animals had been practically overcome, Mr. Byers said, with the assistance of Hon. H. H. Stevens, minister of trade and commerce, when the quota, described by Mr. Byers as a bombshell, threatened to demoralize the industry in the west. He added:

"Although we are placed in a much less favourable position than Ireland, our chief competitor for the English business, no attempt at bargaining by negotiation was made, with the result that while Ireland is allowed to ship 1,775 fat cattle and 5,066 store animals each week at about 84,000 head in the three-month period, Canada will be limited to 7,900 head in the same period. This limitation is imposed at a time when available ocean space has been built up to 13,000 head in three months."

Stockmen were beginning to realize the seriousness of the position that would arise in the near future, Mr. Byers said, and the belief that Canada would have fewer cattle to ship this year appeared to have been swept away by the facts.

As hon. gentlemen know, the industry was given an impetus by the negotiations between Canada and the United Kingdom looking to the entry of Canadian cattle into that market, and particularly so after the Ottawa agreements. The article continues:

In the first twenty days of the year 3,000 head of the 7,000 allowed for three months had been shipped, more than twice the number of last year. It appears probably that the end of February would see the quota exhausted, and the only available market for the western industry closed.

The article goes on to say that this serious condition has been drawn to the attention of the government. If the facts are as stated, it will certainly be a serious blow to the cattle industry, and the fault I find with this government is that it was not active enough in bargaining at the time Ireland and other countries were bargaining with Great Britain in connection with this very matter.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that that is all I have to say to the house at the moment, because, as I said before, I shall place before the house my views on the silver question when my motion comes up for debate.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak to-night at this late hour but inasmuch as the government are not ready for a vote I shall try to save them from being defeated.

Mr. MANION: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but the government has been ready for a vote all day. There has not been a speaker on the government side all day, I believe.

Mr. HEENAN: At any rate, Mr. Speaker, we have before us the motion for the adoption of the speech, and the amendment thereto of the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) to the effect that the government has lost the confidence of the house and the subamendment moved by my hon. friend from Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) that both the Conservative government and the Liberal opposition have lost the confidence of the people. If the subamendment were carried it would be in effect a vote of confidence in my hon. friends in the left corner of the house, and that would be an easy way for them to get into power.

Speaking directly to the subamendment—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is in error. There is only one amendment before the house. The subamendment was ruled out of order.

Mr. HEENAN: I think it would have been better if we had voted the subamendment down rather than have it declared out of order. I am not so sure as my hon. friends to my left that the people have lost confidence in the Liberal opposition. In fact as I go through the country, and I travel quite a bit, sometimes having the honour of pulling my hon. friends opposite through the country at a high rate of speed, but always in safety—

Mr. MANION: We have always had a good pull.

Mr. HEENAN: When you place yourselves in my hands I can assure you that I will keep you safe from drowning, except politically.

When one recalls what the Liberal party did for the workers of this country I am certain it will not be said that the labouring men at least have lost confidence in the Liberal party. I could cite many instances of what has been done which some hon. gentlemen apparently have forgotten. But before I take that up I want to point out to my hon. friend, who, if he did not move a motion to that effect, certainly thought it anyhow, that the people have not forgotten that the Liberal party when in power increased the trade of this country one and a half times, reduced taxation, and in the last five years they were in power reduced the national debt by $257,000,000. In addition, under the policies of the Liberal party when they were in power, there were more persons employed in this country than have ever been employed in times of peace since confederation, and those men and women who were employed, especially during the last four years of the Liberal regime, were receiving the highest rate of wages ever paid in Canada in times of peace. During the last four years of the Liberal regime the wages of the workers in this country, as government statistics will show, were increased on the average by over 15 per cent. During those four years all labour disputes were settled under acts of parliament that were placed on the statute book by a Liberal government, and by thus avoiding strikes in the settlement of disputes hundreds of millions of dollars were saved to Canadian wage earners.

I could recount many pieces of legislation that were put on the statute book, and many orders in council that were passed by the Liberal government in the interests of the workers. I shall give just a few examples.

The Liberal government appointed a labour representative to the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways. That gentleman has since been displaced. A new board has been set up and this government has not seen fit to appoint a representative of the thousands of railroad men employed by the Canadian National Railways.

The Liberal government repealed the Hanna order which prohibited Canadian National employees from appearing on the public platform or running for political honours. We regarded these men as free citizens and I trust they will continue to be so regarded.

The Liberal government placed the Combines Investigation Act upon the statute book of this country. They used that act and they prosecuted and broke up combines which were operating against the public interest. They did not go out and make speeches about it; they put the act into operation.

The Liberal government amended the federal workmen's compensation act to provide free medical treatment and hospitalization in compensation cases and extended the act to provide compensation to government railway employees in Prince Edward Island upon the same basis as that applied in New Brunswick. The Liberal government extended the fair wages policy and applied it to the development of water power under federal jurisdiction. Canada was the first country in the world to adopt a policy of that kind. The Liberal government appointed a fair wage officer for the maritimes. But there is none there now, and this above all times is when a fair wage officer is needed in the maritimes just as he is needed in any other part of the country. The Liberal government passed an order in council prohibiting contractors and employers from bringing labour into the country under contract.

The Liberal government passed the Old Age Pensions Act, in spite of the ridicule heaped upon it by the Conservative opposition, not only inside but outside the house. Even as late as 1930 hon. gentlemen opposite went through the country telling the people that the old age pension plan of the King government was of no use and was unworkable, but that if they were placed in power they would put into effect a national system of old age pensions and pay one hundred per cent from the federal treasury. They worked upon the old men and women of this country and the way they deceived them was a disgrace. Notwithstanding all the ridicule that was heaped upon it, the old age pension plan adopted by the Liberal government is taking care of over 70,000 aged Canadians. While I am on this subject I should like to refer to the propaganda used in the maritimes during the 1930 elections. I have in my hand a full page advertisement which appeared in the Halifax Herald of July 5, 1930. While I was in the maritimes it was a daily occurrence to read such stuff in the Conservative papers and especially in the Halifax Herald. This advertisement shows an old man and an old woman congratulating themselves and thanking heaven that at last a man had arisen who was going to give them one hundred per cent old age pensions. The picture of R. B. Bennett is in the corner.

Mr. DURANLEAU: They are giving seventy-five per cent.

Mr. HEENAN: Seventy-five per cent is about as far as any Conservative government will go, any time, any where. There is the following notice at the bottom of the advertisement:

> The national old age pension policy of the Conservative party's platform, to which they are unalterably pledged, provides that the dominion treasury bears the entire cost.

That is the way the aged people in the maritimes as well as in other parts of the country were deceived. In case there was any doubt as to the position, after the Prime Minister returned to Ottawa from the maritimes he endeavoured to make sure that the people down there did not misunderstand his views. The elections were to be held on July 28, 1930, and he addressed a letter to the people of Nova Scotia on July 12. After ridiculing the leader of the opposition and his attitude with respect to the constitution and other things, he ends his letter by saying:

> If returned to power on the 28th of this month, I pledge my party to pass a national old age pension bill by which the federal treasury will provide all the money required, thus treating all the old people alike, whether they live in the maritimes or in any other part of Canada.
> Faithfully yours,
> R. B. Bennett,
> Leader, Liberal-Conservative party.

My hon. friend, the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) says, "We will give them seventy-five per cent."

Mr. DURANLEAU: To date, yes.

Mr. HEENAN: Where is all the money he promised them in 1930?

The Liberal party passed legislation which had been sought for some time by the labouring men of this country. This legislation was for the purpose of preventing fraud with respect to union-made goods. Many concerns throughout Canada were advertising goods as union-made when in fact they were made in non-union shops. This act gave the right to labour unions to own and register their own labels.

Before we left office we took up with the various provinces the matter of instituting an unemployment insurance scheme. Some of the provinces were in agreement in that regard, and I am satisfied that had the Liberal party been returned to power we would not now be merely talking about unemployment insurance; we would have it in operation. For the benefit of my hon. friends in the corner, I will say that when the Liberal party is returned to power, which should not be very long, we will place in operation a workable unemployment insurance scheme. It will not be one like that which I contemplate my hon. friends opposite will bring in just five minutes before the elections, some kind of actuarial scheme which will never work in a country such as Canada.

By order in council we applied the eight hour day to all government employees who had been working over eight hours. We applied the fair wages clause and the eight hour day to all public works and public contracts. We went as far as we understood we could go under the constitution. We took the beam out of our own eye and were leading the way. We were not like the Prime Minister who upon his return from overseas not long ago declared to all and sundry that this country could not experiment in shorter hours and higher wages; it was an exporting country. I am satisfied the Prime Minister did not voice the sentiments of the majority of the people in this country when he intimated that Canadians must work longer hours at lower wages in order that we might be regarded as a low-paying country and thereby be able to sell our products in the markets of the world.

The Liberal government did something for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and his friends the postal workers who had taken part in the Winnipeg strike. An injustice had been done to these men by the withholding of wages from them, and the Liberal government passed a measure to reimburse them these back wages to the extent of $100,000. It was not all that they were entitled to, but it represented a fair measure of justice. And need I remind the house that the Liberal government put upon the statute book the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, which the labouring men of this country have effectively invoked. The enactment of that measure has resulted in the saving of hundreds of millions of dollars without the necessity of a soldier or a policeman going in to settle any disputes. I could enumerate many more, but I think I have said enough to indicate that the Liberal government did something for the labouring classes of this country.

When we come to the amendment, if anyone wants proof of the statement it contains, that the government has lost the confidence of the people, all that has to be done is to go among the farmers and the business men of the country, to talk with men in sleeping cars, in smoking compartments, in the hotels, wherever men gather together. They will tell you. The people of the country are waiting to vote against the government, but the government has not gone out to ask for a new mandate. It is manifest that this government has lost the confidence of the people.

All you have to do is to look at the condition of farmers anywhere in Canada. Go through the country to-day and ask the very question the Prime Minister himself put to them. Ask them, "How much more money have you in your pocket to-day than you had in 1930? Let that be your answer." Well, I say, let that be their answer to-day. Take the three western provinces. Their gross revenue decreased from $843,153,000 in 1928 to $273,738,000 in 1932, or a loss from 1928 to 1932 of $569,415,000—a loss incurred since this government came into power, a government that was going to blast a way into the markets of the world for the farmers of Canada. I would refer hon. gentlemen to the memorandum submitted by the United Farmers of Ontario, taken from statistics issued by the Dominion government, showing the value of field crops in Canada. In 1928 the figure was $1,125,000,000, and in 1932 it was $416,586,000, or a loss in field crops throughout Canada of $708,417,000. Not much blasting there. Every man on the other side of the house, and many supporters of the government throughout the country, promised the farmers not only to blast a way into the markets of the world but to bring about higher prices for the things the farmers produce.

Again, the government promised the workers of Canada a higher standard of living. Well, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has told us something about conditions in the camps in British Columbia—he did not call them slave camps but he ought to have done so. I will coin a new name for them; I will call them distress camps, because, in northern Ontario at any rate, everyone in distress is put in these camps, and given distress wages. This government contributes thereto. It allows the Ontario government to place young Canadians, the flower of Canadian manhood, in these distress camps, paying them $5 a month with their board in the summer and $10 a month with board in winter. The Dominion government itself, up at Lac Seul pays 20 cents a day; it does not pay the men there $5 per month because if they lose time through weather conditions or sickness they lose their pay for that time. That is the higher standard of living which this government promised the workers in 1930. And to carry the deceit further—because it is nothing less than deceit—this government actually counts those men as employed; it provides for them in the statistics as employed men, while the Ontario ministers are going up and down the country ashamed of it—ashamed to this extent, that in their speeches they declare specifically that these men are not employed. They say that the camps are not work camps but camps where young men without homes are placed during the winter, and further that the money given them is not wages. Well, anyone knows that it is not wages; we need not be told that. Yet this government counts these thousands of men among the employed in order to deceive the people of Canada.

Take next the railway situation. I am glad to see the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) in his place, because the railway situation can be taken in any country as the best barometer of the progress or otherwise of the community. In 1929 the number employed in the railways in Canada was 187,000, in round figures. In 1931, the first full year of the Conservative regime, it was 154,000, and in 1932 it had fallen to 132,000. This last year the number was 122,000. In other words, in round figures, there were 65,000 less employed last year than there were during the last full year of Liberal regime. And this is the direct result of the Conservative party's policy of strangling trade in Canada. What does it mean in purchasing power? In 1929 the wages paid to the railway men of Canada amounted to $290,000,000, whereas in 1933 wages to railway men amounted to $160,000,000, or a reduction of $130,000,000.

Further, this government promised "amalgamation never, competition ever", and I believe that to-day they still say there has been no amalgamation of railways in Canada. But I am one man who has stood up on the floor of this house and outside as well and declared that the railways have been amalgamated as a result of the legislation passed last session, amalgamated in everything but name. It is deceit of the worst kind to call it cooperation or anything else than amalgamation. The Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) the other day made a speech, right in Ottawa

I believe, in which he referred to the railway question; and he is preparing now for the full amalgamation of the railways. Had one of the Liberal ministers made a speech of that kind I can imagine gentlemen now sitting on government benches rising up and saying something like this, "These gentlemen have no regard for cabinet solidarity". Hon. gentlemen opposite are making speeches in various parts of the country to please the people in those different parts; but in the house the Minister of Railways and the Prime Minister say that there is no thought of amalgamation of the railroads of Canada, while their colleague the Secretary of State the other day made a speech which was practically to the effect that the railways must be amalgamated.

Mr. MANION: He said that under certain conditions they must be amalgamated.

Mr. HEENAN: Yes, if the Conservative government is kept in power, they are bound to be amalgamated because they are strangling Canada. Last year the bill which was passed provided for what? The formation of new companies, the stock to be equally owned by the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National.

Mr. MANION: And it forbids amalgamation.

Mr. HEENAN: It provides for amalgamation all the way through, and at the end the government accepted an amendment which, had I had anything to do with it, would never have been placed in the bill because it means nothing; it is simply window dressing. After provision was made for amalgamation of the railroads, another clause was inserted stating: Nothing herein contained authorizes the amalgamation of the railroads of Canada, while the fact was that they were already amalgamated. The amalgamation of the railways of Canada is provided for, in everything but name, in section 16 of the act that we passed last year. That was the most gigantic piece of deception that was ever put over white men in a white man's country. We see the surveyors all up and down the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National to-day, making surveys with a view to connecting the two lines; we see the pooling of passenger and freight trains. There is provision in the act for taking running rights over one another's road and the use of joint equipment. Not so long ago a Conservative member said in Winnipeg: "All the bill provides for is to eliminate duplication."

Well, when you eliminate duplication, what have you ? You have amalgamation; there is no use in trying to deceive ourselves any longer.

Mr. MANION: There is at the present time no amalgamation whatever of the two railways. Just because the hon. gentleman keeps on repeating the word "amalgamation" does not make it a fact.

Mr. HEENAN: Just because the hon. member denies it does not mean that it is not a fact. There are to-day 65,000 railway men fewer than there were in 1929. Men and women are being thrown out into the gutter to-day, including railroad men with twenty years or more experience.

Mr. MANION: No such thing.

Mr. HEENAN: Still hon. gentlemen sit there and say that we have not any amalgamation! The railroad men who are losing their wages know that we have.

Mr. MANION: They do not know any such thing, and neither does my hon. friend; he is just talking.

Mr. HEENAN: What are the excuses for all this? Not very long ago some Ontario minister who made a trip through northern Ontario made the most ridiculous excuses that statesmen or alleged statesmen ever made in this or any other country. It was flippancy of the worst kind, but it was left to one particular gentleman to make this excuse and it is one of the worst that was made. The Hon. Howard Ferguson, the Hon. George Henry, the Hon. Mr. Finlayson, Minister of Lands and Forests, and my hon. friend the present Minister of Railways, made a trip through northern Ontario and told the people that the reason there were so many unemployed was because of the policies of the former federal government; but this is what they say now after they have had three years to put their policies into effect:

> There are people who will say to you that the troubles that we are passing through to-day are caused by the government of the province of Ontario, or of the Dominion of Canada. Those of you who think and read and exercise ordinary intelligence and sense know that the government of Ontario or the government of Canada have not produced the results through which we are passing, but the Great war has been the cause of it.

According to this, the war that ended fifteen years ago was the cause of it and yet three years ago this same gentleman, whose words I am now quoting as reported in the Fort Frances Times of November 2, 1933, had the audacity to face an intelligent audience and say in effect: "I deliberately lied to you in 1930; I deceived you and I put policies into effect that betrayed you. Now I have come around to tell you that if you had used ordinary intelligence and common sense, you might have known that I was trying to fool you in 1930."

The other day when the Liberal leader attempted to quote from a prayer, the Prime Minister said across the floor of the house that this was as near blasphemy as had ever been uttered in the house. Not so long ago the same Prime Minister went to Toronto and, speaking before, I think it was the Ministerial Association, said: "Nothing but the grace of God can save this country." Now when my hon. friends think there is an uplift, that we have turned that corner for which we have long been waiting, they are not giving God the credit; they are saying that the credit is due to the policies of the Conservative government which they represent. I do not know whether one would call that blasphemy or not, but it is just highway robbery of the worst kind, trying to steal from the higher power the credit for bringing this about.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, February 12, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Humphrey Mitchell be substituted for that of Mr. Henri Bourassa on the joint committee on the restaurant.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 11, respecting Prudential Trust Company Limited.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 12, respecting patents on certain inventions of which Duplate Safety Glass Company of Canada, Limited, is entitled to the benefit.—Mr. Lawson.

PETITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. EUSEBE ROBERGE (Megantic) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the table of the house a petition from the municipality of Plessisville which reads as follows:

At a general meeting of the municipal council of Plessisville, held on the 5th day of February, 1934, under the chairmanship of His Worship Mayor Eudore Fournier, and at which were present the following councillors:

Mr. SPEAKER (Text): Will the hon. member state just what the petition is?

Mr. ROBERGE (Translation): Mr. Speaker, petitions are circulated in the counties on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, requesting the government to levy a tax of 20 cents per pound on leaf tobacco, sold directly or indirectly by dealers to consumers. The petition of the municipality of Plessisville protests against such a taxation. I beg to lay also on the table of the house two more petitions bearing on the same subject, one from St. Anastasie de Nelson, Megantic county, The other from St. Methode d'Adstock, Beauce county.

PRIVILEGE—MR. WILLIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ERRICK F. WILLIS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. Hansard of Friday, February 9, at page 440, reports the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir) as using the following words with regard to myself:

He knows his statement is fallacious and misleading to the highest degree.

I refer Your Honour to standing order 41 and for your reference I quote paragraph 297 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, as follows:

The imputation of bad motives, or motives different from those acknowledged, misrepresenting the language of another, or accusing him, in his turn, of misrepresentation, charging him with falsehood or deceit; or contemptuous or insulting language of any kind; all these are unparliamentary and call for prompt interference.

I submit that the words used by the hon. member for Macdonald come directly under that part of paragraph 297 which states, "the imputation of bad motives, or motives different from those acknowledged, misrepresenting the language of another," and I ask therefore that the statement be withdrawn and that it be expunged from Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: Without doubt the words, "he knows his statement is fallacious and misleading to the highest degree" are unparliamentary. It is not unparliamentary to contradict a statement made by another hon. member when an hon. member disagrees with him but it is not parliamentary to accuse another hon. member of wilfully making an incorrect statement. I ask the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir) to withdraw these words and I ask the house to consent to their being struck out of the record.

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, I readily acquiesce in your request but I hardly think that my words were misplaced in any sense at the time.

Mr. WILLIS: Mr. Speaker, I should like to know if that is a withdrawal?

An hon. MEMBER: Do you want him to go down on his knees?

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member should make an unequivocal withdrawal.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): I do.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

MEDICAL SERVICES IN CITY OF WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, on January 29, I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) the following question:

Mr. Speaker, is the government aware of the action taken recently by the medical profession of the city of Winnipeg with respect to medical services formerly afforded families on relief? If so, in the event of other means failing, will they intercede on behalf of these people and see that they are afforded proper medical services.

I received this answer from the Prime Minister:

Mr. Speaker, representatives of the medical profession met me in Ottawa some weeks ago, and later a communication was sent to them indicating that there was no reason to believe that the provinces would not discharge their constitutional duties with respect to the health of their citizens. That point has been stated and restated so often it is difficult to understand why a question should be asked with respect to it.

Recent conditions locally, particularly in the city of Winnipeg, indicate that the provincial government of Manitoba has declined to share any portion of the burden of medical attention to these families on relief. May I therefore restate my question to the Prime Minister and ask if the government is prepared to intercede on behalf of these people and see that they are given reasonable medical attention?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The federal government has no power to compel a provincial government to discharge its constitutional duties.

[Mr. Speaker.]

BANKING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. T. LUCAS (Camrose): A Canadian Press dispatch in this morning's paper states:

Banking legislation occupied the Dominion government almost exclusively at a three hour session of cabinet council Saturday, and it is anticipated the bills to authorize establishment of a central bank, and to revise the Bank Act, will be brought into the House of Commons this week.

Several conferences between Prime Minister R. B. Bennett and Hon. E. N. Rhodes, Minister of Finance, and officials of the Canadian Bankers' Association have taken place in the past fortnight and the draft bill has been revised several times since it was printed.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member proceed to ask his question?

Mr. LUCAS: That is all I wish to quote. I want to ask the Prime Minister, because I do not want to give a wrong interpretation to the article, is this Bank Act being revised and the legislation for a central bank being drafted to suit the bankers only or are other interests being considered?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): If the hon. gentleman was as assiduous in the discharge of his duties as in endeavouring to make unnecessary trouble it would be really better for this country.

RADIO CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. OLOF HANSON (Skeena): I have received telegrams and letters from the territory on the Canadian National railway between Prince Rupert and Jasper in regard to radio reception and interference. I took the matter up with the chairman of the radio commission, Mr. Charlesworth, and he referred me to the minister. The people out in that territory would like to have an inspector go over that section of the country and see for himself the difficulties and hear the grievances which the people have with respect to radio reception. The territory comprises 700 miles, and I think it would be well if an inspector were sent out to size up the situation for himself. There has never been an inspector over that territory, and I think it is about time one should go there.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): In answer to the hon. member for Skeena I shall be pleased to look into the matter immediately, and if at all possible the nearest inspector will be sent out there to make a general survey of the whole situation.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Thank you.

SEED FOR ONTARIO FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ECCLES J. GOTT (South Essex): Before the orders of the day are called may I make a brief inquiry of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir). In view of the sympathetic consideration that has been given to stricken agriculturists throughout the country from time to time, I would ask what is the policy of the government with respect to farmers in western Ontario who are without seed and without funds to purchase seed?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): I think the hon. member realizes that that is a question for the provincial government.

Mr. GOTT: It has not been a question for the provincial government in days long since past.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

POSTMASTER GENERAL—PAYMENTS

Mr. POULIOT:

Will the parliamentary indemnity of the hon. the Postmaster General and his annual allocation of $2,000 for automobile be paid him during his trip to Cairo, Egypt?

Mr. BENNETT: May I say that the only answer that can be given to this question is that the case will be dealt with as all similar cases heretofore have been dealt with under the practice of parliament.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY LOAN

Mr. POWER:

To what extent was the Canadian Pacific Railway indebted to the Bank of Montreal for loans or advances made by the said bank to the company at the time: (a) when the Canadian Pacific Railway Company requested the government to guarantee a loan of sixty million dollars; (b) at the time of the passing of the order in council which actually guaranteed the said loan?

Mr. BENNETT: I indicated the other day, I think, that this was an improper question. I am bound to say that with respect to the private business of the railway company and the bank this government is not informed except in the course of conversations in a general sort of way when matters are under consideration. With respect to the guarantee, it was known that there was an indebtedness to the bank, but I do not think we should be asked here to indicate what the relations are between a bank and its customers when such information comes to the knowledge of the government under those conditions.

PARCEL EXPRESS RATES

Mr. ROBERGE:

1. What was the rate per pound in 1930 for the transportation by express of parcels of the following weights: 1 pound, 5 pounds, 10 pounds, 15 pounds, and 20 pounds?

2. What is the present rate for these parcels for transportation by express over a distance of 200 miles?

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman can get this information just as well from the express companies, but if he wishes us to do it for him I have no particular objection. But I think it is hardly necessary to put the question on the order paper.

Question dropped.

GASPE BIOLOGICAL STATION

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Is it the intention of the Department of Fisheries to open a biological station and school in the Gaspe peninsula; if so, when and at what place?

2. Will this school be independent of other stations or merely a sub-station?

3. Have representations been made that suitable professors can be supplied by universities in the province of Quebec, and will effect be given to such representations?

4. Has His Excellency Mgr. Ross, of Gaspe, made any representations to the Minister or the government on this subject, and what answer was given him?

5. Have any negotiations taken place between the minister or the government and the government of Quebec or any of its ministers or officials, on this subject, and what has been the result of such negotiations?

Mr. BENNETT: I do submit, Mr. Speaker, that this question should not be asked in the form in which it is, especially by a distinguished parliamentarian who has been in the chair. The intention of the government is made known by legislation or by provision in the Estimates, and it is hardly proper to ask through a question on the order paper what the intention of the government may be, and when that intention, which is purely problematical, as indicated by the question, may be made effective.

Question dropped.

JACQUES CARTIER CELEBRATION

Mr. MARCIL:

What action does the government intend taking to commemorate the 400th anniversary of the landing of Jacques Cartier at Gaspe?

Mr. BENNETT: This is in the same position as the previous question.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY LOAN

Mr. RAYMOND:

1. By whom, and if a company, by what officer, and on what date, was the government solicited to guarantee the loan of $60,000,000 made by the Canadian Pacific Railway?

2. Before the adoption of the order in council of November 29, 1933, guaranteeing the loan of $60,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway, did the government, or one of its members, ask the banks to contribute to this loan, verbally or in writing, and on what date?

3. Did the government or any member thereof promise or take the obligation in writing to guarantee this loan, and under what form and on what date?

Mr. BENNETT: Obviously part of this question can only be answered by disclosing private business between the banks and their customers. With respect to the first part of the question, the answer is very difficult to make because representations were made from the president of the railway company from time to time as to the condition of his railway and the inability to sell its securities. I could not fix the dates with any exactness with respect to that. So far as the next question is concerned, no one connected with the government asked the banks to make a contribution to the loan. The arrangements were made by the raliway company with the banks, and not between the banks and the government. I cannot quite understand the third question, which reads: "Did the government or any member thereof promise or take the obligation in writing to guarantee this loan, and under what form and on what date?" I cannot answer that beyond what is indicated in the document that has been tabled and also set forth at length in the observations I made to the house a few evenings ago.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. What grants have been paid during 1933 by the Department of Agriculture to any fairs, agricultural societies, live stock, or farmers' organizations, in Canada?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Question dropped.

ROYAL WINTER FAIR, TORONTO

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. How much money was paid to the Royal Agricultural Winter Fair, at Toronto, during the year 1932?

2. On what dates were payments made?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Question dropped.

3. Is he still in receipt of a pension?

Mr. MacLAREN:

1. Yes.

2. Hon. D. M. Sutherland: March 14, 1919, to April 30, 1921, $19.50 per month; May 1, 1921, to March 31, 1927, $26 per month; from April 1, 1927, $32.50 per month, which continues in effect.

Hon. R. J. Manion: February 10, 1918, to February 28, 1919, $16.67 per month; March 1, 1919, to June 30, 1919, $8.34 per month, when pension was discontinued at his request.

3. Answered by No. 2.

4. What price did the government pay for any silver purchased?

5. Did the Dominion government sell any silver during the past twelve months?

6. If so: (a) what amounts were sold; and (b) what amounts were used by the mint for coinage in Canada?

Mr. RHODES:

5. Yes.

6. (a) 32,272 ounces fine in mint sweep exported, and 1,750 ounces fine to manufacturers; (b) none of the silver referred to in 3 was used for coinage. The silver used for coinage during the year was obtained from worn and mutilated coin.

ANTHRACITE COAL PRODUCTION

Mr. NEILL:

What was the tonnage of anthracite coal produced in Canada in each of the years from 1930 to 1933, inclusive?

Mr. STEVENS:

The Dominion Bureau of Statistics have not recently recorded any production of anthracite in Canada. It is understood that there is a small deposit in the Cascade district of Alberta which is being operated by one company at the present time, and which is anthracite in character. The output is only a few hundred tons annually, and has not been separated either in the reports of the Bureau of Statistics or of the Alberta government from the bituminous output.

5. What were the dates of approval?

6. In what areas, if any, were tuberculosis tests actually made?

4. If so, who is he and on whose recommendation was the appointment made?
5. Who laid the complaint, if any, against Mr. Verge?
6. Has the new appointee any experience as returning officer?

Mr. CAHAN:

1. Yes.

2. Because, after an enquiry under oath pursuant to section 18 of the Dominion Elections Act, the Chief Electoral Officer concluded that the returning officer had failed competently to discharge the duties of his office in that, after certain deputy returning officers had refused ballots to persons who were not qualified to vote, the returning officer, without an investigation of the qualifications of the persons concerned, intervened and used his authority to cause ballots to be furnished to them, whereupon they voted, contrary to the statute.

2. Yes.

3. No; the final schedule of reserves to be conveyed by the province was checked by the Department of Indian Affairs and returned to Victoria, February 22, 1933.

SECRETARY OF STATE DEPARTMENT—TRANSLATOR

Mr. RAYMOND:

1. Is the "one translator in the Department of the Secretary of State who translates foreign languages into English and French for all departments of the public service," as per the statement embodied in the explanatory notes of the Secretary of State's Bill No. 4, a competent translator to translate English or any foreign document into French?

2. Has the "one translator" passed any examination to establish his competency in translating into French language? If so, what certificate has he received, and from what authority?

3. Is the work of that "one translator of the Department of the Secretary of State" performed up to date? If not, how many months is the translation of foreign documents entrusted with that "one translator" delayed, for want of help?

4. Why has the Department of the Secretary of State not engaged a sufficient number of translators to attend efficiently to the various documents, for the translation of which explanatory notes of Bill No. 4 declare "the Secretary of State has frequently to procure assistance from outside the public service?

Mr. CAHAN:

1. The translator of the Department of the Secretary of State was engaged to translate into English correspondence and other documents in western European languages, namely; German, Dutch, Flemish, Italian, Spanish, Portuguese, Norwegian, Swedish, Danish and Icelandic, for all departments of government, and he translates a limited number of documents into French as required. In the past year from January 1, 1933, to January 1, 1934, this translator for twenty-two offices of government has translated 1,516 foolscap sheets of letters, certificates and technical documents, as follows: 82 from Danish language, 85 from Dutch, 7 from Flemish, 10 from French, 574 from German, 7 from Icelandic, 478 from Italian, 1 from Latin, 64 from Norwegian, 8 from Portuguese, 133 from Spanish, 67 from Swedish. In addition this one translator has acted with the Civil Service Commission in valuing 327 examination papers in French, German, Italian and Spanish.

2. The translator was employed temporarily in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Post Office and Interior until 1921, when he was made permanent by the Civil Service Commission. I do not know what examinations he passed, but I do know that he is very competent to translate into English or French the languages mentioned in my first answer.

3. The correspondence is practically up to date, but certain technical book work to be translated into English is not yet completed. No complaints have been received as to any alleged delay throughout the year.

4. No appropriation is made by parliament for the payment of any additional translators; and no additional translators are needed in the public service if the work of translation is properly distributed among and duly performed by the translators now employed in the public service.

Mr. MARCIL moved:

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES MINING REGULATIONS

Mr. HEENAN moved:

For a copy of all moratorium in connection with mining activities in the Northwest territories.

Mr. BENNETT: I would ask what this means. Probably it is covered by the succeeding motion for a copy of all regulations.

Mr. SPEAKER: I cannot interpret the meaning of the motion. Does the hon. member want it dropped?

Mr. HEENAN: No. As I understand the matter, there is a moratorium on mining activities in the Northwest Territories exempting the miners from performing work with respect to assessment. That is quite different from the regulations.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. BENNETT: No. One cannot ask the house to pass an order covering "all moratorium." I would say that the subsequent motion for a copy of all regulations regarding the work on all mineral areas would cover the regulations such as the hon. member has in mind. Possibly the motion had better stand in order that the hon. member may have an opportunity to amend it if he thinks that is desirable. The house cannot be asked to pass something which is not intelligible.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion will be dropped by the hon. member for the purpose of revision. The wording is not intelligible.

Motion dropped.

[Mr. Raymond.]

SHIPPIGAN, N.B.—WHARF

Mr. VENIOT:

Also a statement showing as to whether or not a contract was awarded, and if awarded, the reason for its being cancelled.

CORRESPONDENCE RE WHEAT AND FLOUR SALES IN THE ORIENT

Mr. MOTHERWELL:

For a copy of all correspondence, cables and other documents, exchanged between the Honourable Herbert Marler, Canadian representative in Tokyo, Japan, or the representative of any other country, and any member of the federal government, with respect to the possibility and practicability of disposing of more Canadian farm products, especially wheat and wheat flour, either in Japan or China, during the past three and a half years.

Mr. BENNETT: This raises a question to which I directed the attention of this house, and particularly the right hon. leader of the opposition, something over a year ago. There are two forms of communication carried on between the government of Canada and its representatives abroad. Cables are passing frequently, and it has never been the custom to bring them down in this house. On the other hand reports on trade matters are always available to parliament. In passing this order it must be understood that only those documents that are of a public character can be produced; as distinguished from communications passing between the government and its representatives abroad.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Quite satisfactory.

LIFE INSURANCE

PROPOSED SYSTEM OF NATIONAL COMPULSORY INSURANCE

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin) moved:

That in the opinion of this house, the government should give immediate consideration to the advisability of nationalizing life insurance.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving this resolution I would like at the outset to make it clear to the house that my object is not particularly to criticize our Canadian life insurance companies nor the foreign companies doing business in Canada. That is to say I have no reason to suspect that these companies are not carrying on their business as efficiently and also as safely as such companies are anywhere in the world. So I hope the discussion that may ensue will centre upon the question whether or not the business of life insurance in Canada could be done more efficiently and more cheaply for the people through the agency of the government than by private companies. In answering that question we have to ask what life insurance is for. What is the main consideration? Is it to keep the life insurance companies going? Is life insurance carried on in Canada for the purpose of collecting enormous funds in the hands of individual companies for investment? Or is not the object rather to provide protection for the people of Canada who need insurance? In this connection Judge Louis D. Brandeis, in commenting on an investigation carried on into the operations of life insurance companies in the United States, said:

> The business is carried on for the benefit of others than the policyholders. The needs and financial inexperience of the wage-earner are exploited for the benefit of wage-holders or officials. The results establish conclusively that, in the conduct of the business, the interest of the insured are ignored.

That was the comment of a judge summarizing the evidence that had been put before a special investigating committee with regard to life insurance companies in the United States, and I am reasonably sure that, if there were to be a similar investigation in Canada such a comment would prove applicable to our own companies.

Life insurance is essentially social in character. In fact it is its social character that makes it possible. Further, because of its social character it is, unless it is tampered with, the safest business in the world. In the last analysis it really means that all the individuals embraced in one insurance company undertake together to protect one another to a given amount against the risks of mortality. There are always more policy-holders remaining than the number who die, and unless the funds of the contributors are misspent or badly invested there is no doubt about the safety of the business.

We have to ask then, with regard to our insurance companies in Canada, whether or not they are carrying out the chief function of life insurance, which is to insure the people. Or is the emphasis being placed principally on the success of the companies from a business point of view? Are there people in Canada to-day who are not insured who ought to be insured, and are they not insured because the price of insurance is too high? Then is it or is it not so that the cost of insurance to the people of Canada who are insured is so high as to be a great burden upon many, so that under pressure of a depression such as we are passing through large numbers are compelled to yield up their insurance, either by taking its cash surrender value or by letting it lapse and losing it entirely? Do these things not indicate, if they are as suggested, that the price of life insurance is too high to those who are insured, and prohibitive to those who are not?

Many people in Canada are not insured to-day, and I think it can be shown that those who are insured are paying much more for their insurance than should be necessary or would be necessary under a government scheme. Life insurance as carried on by the private companies is fairly successful, for those who can afford it, but there are many people who cannot afford it, and those are the people who need it most. The classes of people who need life insurance most in Canada obviously are poor people with large families, and those who may be regarded as poor risks, who either are not accepted at all by the companies or else the price is so high as to be prohibitive.

Let us look for a moment at the number of policies in force in Canada at the end of 1932. I find the number to be:

Industrial policies..	4,097,592
Ordinary policies..	2,487,691

In 1931 the total number of persons in Canada fifteen years of age and over was 7,095,571. It is common knowledge, I think, that in ordinary life insurance one individual may have a number of policies, two or three or in fact many in some instances. So while under the ordinary insurance classification we have 2,487,691 policies it is altogether likely that this does not mean that more than a million or so people are insured, because each indivdual thus insured probably will average about two policies. Moreover it must be remembered that in connection with industrial insurance a great number of children are insured, and these are included in that four million. So if we take into consideration the number of children insured under industrial policies and the duplication of policies which we find under the other classifications of insurance, it is very doubtful if the number of people insured in Canada is greater than about half the number of people who require insurance. In other words I would say that about half the people of Canada who need insurance have no insurance at all. I do not think hon. members of this house will seriously dispute my contention when I say that the high cost of insurance, under our private insurance companies, makes it difficult for most of our people to get any insurance at all, and in fact it is impossible in many cases

The total number of companies doing business in Canada is some 62. In 1932 there were 43 active companies, 28 Canadian, 6 British and 9 foreign. In addition to those active companies there were six British companies and five foreign companies registered to transact life insurance but which have practically ceased to write new insurance, their business being confined to the policies already on their books, eight companies, four British and four foreign, were authorized under the act to transact business in connection with policies written prior to March 31, 1878. So there are forty-three active companies in Canada and sixty-two companies doing business to some extent.

I found some difficulty in getting information as to the salaries paid the chief officials of the Canadian companies. The note from the department of insurance states that the managers do not constitute a well-defined class, that the officials and employees designated as managers in some companies are known by other designations in other companies. In the annual report of the department the total of head office and branch office salaries were given, from which the following figures have been compiled. For the year 1932 head office salaries of Canadian companies amounted to $10,089,615; for British companies doing business in Canada to $240,271, and for foreign companies doing business in Canada to $1,144,935, thus making a total head office salary account for all the companies doing business in Canada of $11,474,821. Then for branch office salaries, those of Canadian companies amounted in 1932 to $9,677,859; for British companies, $220,311 and for foreign companies $3,165,306. So we have the total head office and branch office salaries amounting to $24,538,297.

In passing we might note the enormous amount of money tied up in head office buildings. In 1932 the amount tied up in head offices in connection with Canadian companies was $39,359,124 and in connection with British and foreign companies $3,473,345, making a total of $42,832,469. Is it reasonable to bury $42,832,469 in head office buildings while hundreds of thousand of our people have no insurance?

The salaries of insurance executives are perhaps among the highest in the country, both in Canada and in the United States. The president of the United States and the ten members of his cabinet receive a total of $225,000 a year. The eleven highest paid officials in the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company received, in the depression year 1931, more than three times as much as was paid the president and cabinet of the United States; in other words, they received $684,000. This company has on its payroll 39 officers receiving salaries greater than the members of the cabinet receive. Three other companies paid their eleven highest paid officials more than twice as much as the president and his cabinet received. The New York Life Insurance Company paid their officials $604,800 and the Prudential Insurance Company $544,000.

In this connection I might just mention the salaries which are paid some of the officials of United States companies, many of which do business in this country. I am sorry I have not the actual figures in this connection for Canadian companies. First there is the Equitable Life Assurance Society; in 1929 the salary of Mr. T. I. Parkinson, president, was $75,000 per year, but that was increased so that in 1932 he received $100,000 per year. I think in the same company there are about four vice presidents who receive about $40,000 annuallly. Mr. F. H. Ecker, president of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, received $175,000 a year in 1929, which was later increased so that in 1932, during the depression, he received $200,000 annually. There are two or three vice-presidents in that company, one of whom receives $125,000 annually, another $40,000 and another $35,000. In the Mutual Life Insurance Company the president, D. F. Houston, received $100,000 per year in 1929, and later that was increased so that in 1932 he received $125,000. Mr. T. A. Buckner, president of the New York Life Insurance Company, received $100,000 in 1929 and $125,400 in 1932. Mr. E. J. Duffield, president of the Prudential Insurance Company of America, received $125,000 in 1929 and the same in 1932; his salary did not increase with the depression. I think these figures indicate that there is no need for us to be disturbed about the well-being of those who are in charge of some of our insurance companies.

A few years ago the state of New York made certain investigations as to the cost of acquisition of new insurance by the different companies. Again I have been unable to get the figures accurately for Canada, but in a moment I shall give them as I have them here.

Mr. EULER: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? He is giving the salaries of joint stock insurance companies. Has he any information as to the relative salaries paid by mutual insurance companies?

Mr. IRVINE: I think some of the companies I quoted are mutual companies. The Metropolitan is a mutual company.

Mr. EULER: Entirely so?

Mr. IRVINE: Entirely so. I am not sure as to whether some of the others are entirely mutual, but I did not take the trouble to differentiate between one and the other with respect to salaries.

A few years ago the New York State Insurance Department made a study of the cost of acquisition of new insurance by the different companies. The investigation covered forty-seven companies authorized to do business in New York state and 215 companies not permitted to do business there. It was found that the acquisition cost in ordinary insurance was forty-eight per cent of the first year's premium for the forty-seven New York companies which are limited by law, and seventy-five per cent for the others. For the year 1929 the first year's premiums in the companies doing business in New York totalled $278,600,000 out of which $122,800,000 was absorbed by commissions. For the year 1932 the first year commissions paid in Canada were as follows:

Canadian companies	$10,999,042
British companies	142,118
Foreign companies	1,376,492
Total	$12,517,652

Something of the meaning of these figures may be brought to our attention forcefully if at this time I refer to certain data which I have obtained through the Spectator Company of New York. This information is taken from the Life Insurance Policyholders Pocket Index of 1927. The table I have before me indicates the whole amount insured by certain companies, the total income for certain years, the total claims, the excess collected and the mortuary experienced per one thousand dollars. It begins with the Pacific Mutual Life, which commenced business in 1868, and the figures in connection with which are as follows:

	Whole amount insured	Total income 1926	Death claims paid	Excess collected	Mortuary experienced per $1,000
Pacific Mutual Life	$628,535,911	$28,252,847	$3,475,453	$24,777,394	$5.54

I am not going to go into figures in connection with all these companies because I fear they would probably weary the house too much. The result of the table however is as follows: The average income for each $1,000 insurance in force was $43.35. The average mortuary cost per thousand was $4.91, showing a very considerable spread between the amount required to meet death claims and that collected by the insurance companies. I have not the figures for Canada showing the same comparison, but so far as I can gather there is no reason for us to suppose that there is a very great difference, between Canadian companies and that of companies in the United States, to which I have referred.

I wish to point out that policies which lapse from year to year constitute a serious problem not only to the lowest paid classes in Canada, but it materially adds to the cost of insurance from a national point of view Ordinary insurance policies which lapsed in Canada in the years 1930, 1931 and 1932, were as follows:

Ordinary Insurance Policies Lapsed—1930-31-32

	No. of policies	Amount
1930	120,043	$265,052,125
1931	134,369	271,390,203
1932	127,466	252,565,765
Total	381,878	$789,008,093

Those, Mr. Speaker, are the figures for ordinary policies. I turn now to the industrial table of lapses, and find the following:

Industrial Insurance Policies Lapsed—1930-31-32

	No. of policies	Amount
1930	448,834	$132,651,052
1931	457,547	128,763,558
1932	556,801	150,185,896
Total	1,463,182	$411,500,506

Putting these figures together we have the following table showing the total ordinary and industrial insurance policies lapsed for the years indicated.

Total Ordinary and Industrial Insurance Policies Lapsed—1930-31-32

	No. of policies	Amount
Ordinary insurance policies lapsed	381,878	$789,008,093
Industrial insurance policies lapsed	1,463,182	411,500,506
Total	1,845,060	$1,200,508,599

Mr. REID: Has the hon. member any figures showing the amount of premiums paid on lapsed policies?

Mr. IRVINE: No, I am sorry I have not that information. Adding surrendered policies to these figures it is estimated that about 2,000,000 policies lapsed involving over two billion dollars worth of insurance.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Has the hon. member given the figures showing the total lapses or are they confined to any particular year?

Mr. IRVINE: These are the total lapses for the two main divisions of insurance, namely ordinary and industrial, for the years 1930, 1931 and 1932. These figures, I believe, tell a really tragic story when we stop to consider the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who, perhaps for years, have been trying to protect their families but during the past few years have had to release their hold and lose all that they had paid.

Let me now compare the only state insurance scheme concering which I have been able to get figures, with the companies with which I have been dealing. The ratio of expenses to gross premiums for the first year policies in the Massachusetts system in 1929 amounted to only 9·17 per cent, whereas the average for all companies doing business in that state was 49·21 per cent. It ran as high as 78 per cent in the case of one company. Private companies doing business in Massachusetts had an expense ratio to all those premiums of 18·32 per cent for ordinary policies and 26·34 per cent for industrial policies. These were the figures based on all business done in 1929. In the case of the Massachusetts savings bank system, this ratio was only 4·63 per cent. According to the annual report for 1929 of the Massachusetts commissioner of insurance, by eliminating selling costs, advertising and high salaries, the Massachusetts savings bank life insurance system was able to sell insurance 26 per cent below private companies and more than 50 per cent below the commercial rates on the weekly premium plan. Detailed figures show that in some cases two years' protection in a private insurance company cost the insured five times as much as it would have done under the state scheme. Another instance is that of a holder of a twenty-year endowment policy, aged 30 at entry. In the case of a $250 policy, the net result at the end of two years showed a cost of $2.50 under the savings bank life insurance scheme as compared with a cost of $31.20 in the case of a private company. In this instance the policy holder paid more than twelve times as much for $250 protection in an industrial insurance company as he would have had to pay for insurance under state control.

I see that my time in running short and I must turn from these figures to urge an argument based thereon. I urge that the whole life insurance business of this country should be taken over by the government. It is obvious that in a forty minute speech one cannot give a detailed plan for the taking over of insurance companies, but I do not know of anything that could be taken over more easily. The entire paid-up capital of all insurance companies in Canada amounts to only $10,000,000, and this is $10,000,000 that they have no business to have. Insurance companies do not need capital of that sort; $10,000,000 of unneeded capital is only an added charge upon the policyholders. It serves no other function. If the government took over the business now done by private companies it would be in an even better position to meet the requirements of the policyholders than private companies are. If the will was present, I do not anticipate any difficulty in the government finding a proper, efficient and effective way of putting this scheme into effect.

Perhaps one of the greatest advantages in favour of a state scheme is the wider distribution of risk which is made possible. The wider spread that can be given to the risk, the lesser risk there is and the cost of insurance accordingly becomes less. We have but to take the idea which is exemplified so well in group insurance and apply it to a still larger group, say to seven million Canadian citizens. As the group is enlarged, the cost is decreased. Under the group insurance plan an insurance company can go into a factory and sign up a group of fifty men without medical examination. They know from their actuarial experience that it is quite safe. They are able to give insurance to the oldest man as cheaply as the youngest. If that can be done with a group of fifty, it can be done much more easily with a group of seven million. By making this a national business and spreading the risk out to seven million people we can reduce the cost of insurance to a fraction of what it is now costing under the competitive system, figures in regard to which I have just given.

The next point in favour of nationalization is the compulsory feature. I suggest that our national insurance should be compulsory, it should apply to every person in the state who reaches a certain age. This age can be fixed at fifteen, eighteen or twenty, that is a matter of detail. The maximum and minimum of the policies is another detail which could be arranged. The compulsory feature would reduce greatly the cost of insurance. At present we have forty-three companies in Canada, each with a network of agencies across the dominion; there are forty-three head offices and branch offices of each company in almost every city, town and village. There is an enormous cost in getting business under these conditions. A compulsory system under state control would permit this business being obtained for practically nothing. With a national compulsory scheme permitting the spreading out of risks there would be a material reduction in the cost of insurance and it would be brought within the reach of millions of our people who are now unable to obtain protection in a private company.

Another point to be considered is the amount of insurance investments in relation to the national economy. Perhaps I have time to put on record the figures in connection with the investments of Canadian insurance companies which I obtained from the Department of Insurance. These figures are the book value of the assets as at December 31, 1932. The Canadian real estate assets were valued at $55,034,238; the non-Canadian at $3,303,321, making a total of $58,337,559. I have not the time to give the details of other assets, so I shall give only the totals. The total Canadian assets of the Canadian companies were valued at $1,015,253,376; the non-Canadian at $528,182,242, making a total of $1,655,104,037. The total investments of these companies amount to well up to two billions of dollars.

I am one of those who believe that the time has come when this country will have to exercise some control over investments. If the Canadian government should make such a decision in the near future it would be necessary for them to obtain control of this tremendous sum which is now at the mercy, if I may say so, of these private companies. It is not too much to say that these private companies collect money from the people of Canada and then invest that money to the detriment of those who subscribe. Sometimes the investment may be safe enough but I am sure that very often it is made in enterprises which do not need further capital. Over capitalization causes a rise in prices of the commodity produced to the very people who have furnished the money for the investment. Let me give an example. When binders were made by hand they could be bought by the farmers of Canada at about $100, but when the machine production made it possible to stamp out hundreds almost like biscuits, they cost about $300 apiece. The rise in price was due very largely to over-capitalization, and insurance companies have done their share of over-capitalization among industries both in this and in other countries. I contend that a government cannot afford to allow an investment of two billion dollars to be made by these sixty-two private companies if there is to be any control of investment with a view to national policy. I sincerely hope that the day is not far distant when the government of this country will insist on planning its investments with a view to the national economy, and thus taking hold of insurance from that point of view as well as from the point of view of giving insurance to all of the people of Canada at the lowest possible price. Let me also point out that the nation really is in the insurance business, whether it wants to be or not, for when an individual dies and leaves his dependents unprotected, their care falls upon the community. The community must take care of those who are not protected by insurance whether it is in the insurance business or not. I submit that it is bad business for the community to pick up only those who are entirely incapable of protecting themselves and to allow the cream to be skimmed off by the private insurance companies who take as policyholders those who are well able to pay for insurance, and who perhaps scarcely need it at all.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): I wish to make a few remarks on this very important subject, not because I feel at all competent to deal with it exhaustively, but because I believe that insurance is one of the weapons that can be used in fighting poverty. We have poverty in this country from coast to coast. We have poverty that is an unsatisfied need for goods, side by side with unemployment, which is an unused ability to produce goods. Every observer will admit that these are the two great tragedies of the present time. If we can get a system of social credits which will solve these problems, by all means we should do so, but if we cannot we should at least come to grips with these problems and not pass up any opportunity of making things a little better. The social consciousness of the people of this country has been deeply stirred by the distress which has been brought about.

Insurance should do three things: (1) It should encourage the non-thrifty to save; (2) it should make secure for the industrious the product of their thrift; (3) above all, it should give that sense of security, in fact, that actual security which would bring satisfaction and freedom from worry to those who otherwise would view the future with fear and dread.

With most of the insurance schemes the agriculturist has nothing to do. He is excluded from the Workmen's Compensation Act. He would likely be excluded from an unemployment insurance act. But if insurance could be brought within reach of the agriculturist a great service would be done and he then would have the opportunity of sharing in its benefits.

We realize that the insurance companies have stood up reasonably well under the stress and strain of the last four years of depression. We realize that the insurance companies persuade most of the people to take out insurance. It may be true that they are taking a cut for themselves of 20 to 25 per cent, but if they are looking after our interests we perhaps would not begrudge them that percentage.

I wish to go into some detail and try to make clear just how safe our insurance is at the present time. Insurance has become a tremendous—a powerful—institution in Canada. It has been said there are some forty-three companies actively engaged in business, twenty-eight Canadian, six British and nine foreign. The life insurance in force in this country is around six and a half billion dollars, and the total assets of the insurance companies are $1,632,528,293. Out of ten million people in Canada there are in force ordinary policies to the number of 2,487,691 and industrial policies to the number of 4,097,592. The ordinary policy averages $2,143, and the average industrial policy, $201. Of course, Canadian companies do business in many other countries in the world besides Canada.

The report of the Superintendent of Insurance gives these interesting figures. It states that out of each $100 of income received by an insurance company, $61.32 goes in disbursements in assurance and annuity contracts; $14.50 in general expenses; $1.51 in taxes; 33 cents in dividends to shareholders; $7.06 in other expenses, and $15.28 carried to reserve.

We must also realize that insurance is largely based on three things—the mortality tables, investments, and premium income. The mortality tables are compiled with great care. They give exact information that can be obtained by the insurance companies who can thereby tell just what calls are likely to be made upon them within any given period of time. The companies have perhaps been getting the breaks in this regard lately because people are living longer than they formerly did, and it must be said that the insurance companies are doing their part to help prolong life. They are paying for periodical medical examinations and are broadcasting health knowledge in very many ways, as well as supporting hospitals and similar institutions.

When we turn to their investments, we find that the funds of Canadian companies are widely diversified. They have invested in dominion, provincial, municipal, foreign and industrial bonds, also in preferred and common stocks. They have gone in for such things as power, apartment blocks, railways, real estate, farm mortgages and so forth. Anyone looking over a list of these investments will realize that the securities of life insurance companies have in some cases depreciated very largely in recent years. Of course they have only a certain percentage of their funds in any one type of investment, but summing up the investment program we must conclude that the companies are reasonably well managed and can carry on so long as the normal growth of the nation continues. And it is on that assumption that the security of the policyholder rests.

Insurance companies have a continuous stream of money coming in as premium income. This is a very substantial amount. In 1932 for the ordinary life industrial policies in Canada there was received in premiums $137,029,051, with perhaps another $4,000,000 for group insurance. This has increased rapidly in recent years. In 1931 it amounted to $144,000,000. But in 1922 it was just $67,000,000; in 1912, $23,000,000; in 1902, $10,000,000; in 1892, $4,750,000 in 1882, only $1,500,000.

This income has increased and it can continue to increase just so long as the volume of business increases, the population increases, the popularity of the insurance keeps up and the ability of policyholders to pay continues. From these sources insurance companies receive their returns and upon this security they are able to make their payments to policyholders. Therefore we must recognize these factors in estimating the strength of insurance companies.

During times past insurance was written on many different plans such as term insurance, endowment insurance, twenty pay life and so on, but recently I understand that the popular policies are life income, or refund annuity, and that our chartered companies are selling a great deal of insurance on this basis. It must be remembered that in years long gone by the Dominion government established a system of government annuities and in so doing they provided for Canadian funds a place for investment which stands high to-day. My reason for rising now is to try to put forward the idea that by the use of this scheme as a framework, a policy could be worked out which would go a long way toward providing unemployment benefits and perhaps looking after the requirements of old age pensions. I know it is stated that rates for these annuities are too low; that they are based upon out-of-date mortality figures and that the government is paying all expenses of administration; but the fact remains that this stands out as one of the premium investments at the present time.

Let us take a few examples. Persons taking out annuities can start paying at any age; they can pay monthly or quarterly or yearly or, if they so desire, they can purchase their policy with a single payment, a single premium. If a man aged twenty wishes to have an income of $100 per annum after he has reached a certain age, the yearly premiums are as follows:

Years of age—	Yearly premium
After 70	$ 4 64
After 65	7 08
After 60	10 61
After 55	15 71
After 50	23 14

Supposing he does not wish to involve himself with these payments over a long term of years and desires to settle the matter at once; if he starts at twenty years of age with the idea of having an annuity of $100 after he has reached seventy years, he will pay a single premium of $102.55. That is a surprisingly small sum of money which would accumulate sufficiently in fifty years to pay him $100 a year as long as he lives.

Mr. SPENCER: Does the hon. member mean $100 a year or $100 a month?

Mr. GERSHAW: It would be $100 a year. At other ages the single premium would be:

Years of age—	Single premium
After 65	$150 98
After 60	216 22
After 55	301 89
After 50	412 13

For women similar rates are given in the table. These policies are flexible. If a man wished to have his annuity start at seventy and then later on desired to have it start at sixty or some other age, that could be arranged. Supposing he takes out an annuity and dies before he reaches the age at which the annuity was to start, then all he has paid in plus four per cent compound interest is paid to his estate. These figures are under plan A. If he wishes to have the annuity guaranteed for any term of years, that may be obtained by the payment of a slightly higher premium.

I understand it would perhaps not be advisable for the government to assist an optional, noncompulsory form of protection like this, but some other scheme could be worked out. For instance, the officers of the income tax branch know what income almost every person in Canada is receiving from wages or dividends. They could ask those who are paying income tax to pay a little more and thus get this protection. They could ask those who are not paying income taxes to contribute some of these small amounts that I have mentioned and thus make sure that their old age would be provided for. With this as a basis the government would be justified in contributing certain amounts, probably asking the industries to contribute certain sums and thus work out a scheme which would provide protection in case of unemployment or sickness, and perhaps for old age pensions at a younger age than that at which they start at the present time. I believe along these lines something could be done to evolve a workable plan that would banish the spectre of poverty and want and along these lines the government could very well nationalize insurance.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I had rather thought a subject of this importance would have received at the hands of the house more attention than is apparently indicated by the limited number of speeches we have had upon the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine). At the outset of his remarks he said that he had no intention of criticizing insurance business, nor had he reason to think the business in Canada was not conducted as effectively and efficiently as in any other part of the world, but he very shortly afterwards followed that by a citation from, I take it, a decision of Judge Brandeis of the United States, whether he was sitting as a judge or a commissioner, I am not at the moment aware. At all events, the citation which he gave and which I was not able to take down owing to the rapidity with which my hon. friend speaks, was a criticism of the manner in which insurance business had been conducted in the republic to the south. Then he proceeds to say he is not sure that the same criticism might not be levelled against the insurance business in Canada. I submit that the hon. member's reference to the statement of Judge Brandeis was hardly in keeping with the statement he made at the outset of his remarks; and that, even assuming that the criticism of Judge Brandeis was true with respect to insurance in the United States, it by no means follows that it is true with respect to insurance in Canada. I think that, by and large, we have reason to feel proud of the stupendous insurance business which has been built up in Canada, and, on the whole, of the character of that business and the manner in which it has been conducted. I think it compares favourably with any similar business to be found in any country in the world. While I am not suggesting for a moment that it is not capable of improvement—no human institution is perfect—I do say that on the whole it has served the people of this country extremely well, and I deprecate any suggestion, emanating either from the resolution or from discussion in the house, that we have not full confidence in and reason to be proud of the manner in which insurance has been conducted in Canada.

My hon. friend cited some figures as to salaries paid to insurance executives in the United States. I have never heard criticism levelled against high salaries paid to insurance executives in Canada. I am prepared to admit that my personal feeling is that we have gone too far in many instances in the high salary field—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. RHODES: I do not believe any man is worth the gigantic salaries paid to executives in some institutions, chiefly in other countries. On the whole we have been happily free from that tendency in Canada, with rare exceptions. But having said so much let me say this: I have no doubt in the world you could get insurance executives for $1,000 a year. But they would be the most expensive men you could possibly get. It by no means follows that because you pay an excessive salary to an executive, ipso facto the cost of insurance is going up. Even if salaries are excessive, the successful management of the business is of far more importance to those dependent upon it than the mere amount of the salary, which after all is but a trifling percentage of the amount involved in the business. It would be a mere fraction spread over the millions of policy-holders in a given company. If salaries of executives were eliminated altogether the effect on the dividends paid to policy-holders or the premiums collected would represent but a fraction of a cent. So my reference to that is merely to indicate that it has practically no effect upon the main result.

Mr. IRVINE: With sixty-two companies it would help some.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend gave a multiplicity of figures. I do not propose to follow him in detail even if it were desirable, but I will cite a few figures which I think have an important bearing upon the manner in which we should approach the consideration of a resolution of this kind. I think perhaps my hon. friend will agree that perhaps one of the main essentials of life insurance is security, both for the business and for the policy-holders. In that connection I may point out that during the eighty-five years that life insurance has been in force in Canada under government supervision there has never been a dollar lost to a policy-holder. Furthermore, during the past fifty years, in which there has been government supervision of foreign companies doing business in this country, and deposits have been required as security for the fulfilment of insurance contracts, there has never been a dollar lost to a policy-holder through effecting insurance in any foreign company. Our records are complete with respect to insurance companies back to the year 1875, a period of fifty-eight years. During that time the total income of Canadian insurance companies was $4,235,746,206. This is composed as follows:

Insurance premiums and consideration for annuities	$3,153,611,819
Interest, dividends and rents	876,143,383
Other receipts	205,991,004

During those fifty-eight years the total dividends paid to shareholders of insurance companies was $29,092,923, seven-tenths of one per cent of the income. On the other hand, during the same period there was paid in dividends to policy-holders the sum of $413,347,725.

Mr. MORAND: That includes mutual companies?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, that includes mutual companies, Canadian companies of all kinds.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Canadian and foreign business?

Mr. RHODES: I am speaking only of Canadian companies but that includes the foreign business as well as Canadian business. I propose in a moment to deal with the question of foreign business of Canadian companies. Now my hon. friend did not say so in words, but I assume he subscribes to the point of view of his leader the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) who has stated that he does not advocate confiscation, that he believes that where the state acquires private undertakings it should compensate the owners. That being so we must look into the question of the liabilities involved in case the Dominion of Canada were to determine to take over the life insurance business of existing companies. My hon. friend gave the paid up capital of insurance companies as $10,000,000. I would not for one moment suggest that my hon. friend would deliberately mislead the house, but he altogether failed to take into consideration the premiums which were paid on subscriptions to stock in insurance companies, which represent several millions. He failed to take into account the accumulated earnings which appear to the credit of shareholders, which represent many millions more.

Mr. IRVINE: All stolen from the policyholders.

Mr. RHODES: No, I do not subscribe to that point of view at all.

Mr. IRVINE: I do.

Mr. RHODES: Not stolen from the policyholders at all. As a matter of fact under the law shareholders of insurance companies are entitled to take up to ten per cent of the earnings of the company. But voluntarily they have reduced that to five per cent, leaving the remaining ninety-five per cent available for the benefit of the policy-holders. Some companies have never taken full advantage of that five per cent; they have allowed substantial sums of money to appear as accumulated reserves for the policy-holders.

Assuming that it were desirable to take over the insurance business in Canada, what does it involve in the way of immediate commitment on the part of the dominion? As of December 31, 1928, the stocks of the Canadian insurance companies were selling at a market value of $94,000,000. I have no doubt that at once I will be met with the statement that those were boom times and that this was an inflated value. I am quite prepared to subscribe to that point of view. In this year of depression these same stocks represent a value of no less than $34,000,000; in other words the value of the stocks of the insurance companies held by the shareholders in Canada could be sold, on the present depressed market, for $34,000,000. I think it is fair to say that the main factor which determines the value of a stock on the stock exchange is its earning power; there are other factors as well but the main factor is the earning power. As the stock was selling at too high a figure in 1928 I submit that it is selling at too low a figure to-day, because the earnings of the insurance companies are very small. Consequently the price has gone lower than the actual value. That price of $34,000,000 has no regard whatever to the equities behind these shares, so I will take an arbitrary figure of $50,000,000 as being certainly a fair figure though, probably too low, of the cost if we desired arbitrarily to take over the insurance companies in Canada.

At 4½ per cent, which is the price we have to pay for money to-day, with that cost of $50,000,000, in order to break even we would require a revenue of $2,250,000 a year. As a matter of fact the total dividends paid to shareholders of Canadian companies last year was less than half that amount, so that upon the mere basis of dollars and cents we would be confronted immediately with two things. First we would be increasing the national debt by the sum I have indicated, and in addition we would be creating a yearly obligation in the form of interest which would require us to take more from the insurance policyholders than is being taken under private management.

In concluding his remarks my hon. friend said that we must make this nationalization compulsory. It may be that his advocacy of that policy came at the end of his speech, when he was a bit hurried for time, but I noticed that he did nothing more than merely assert that this was what we should do. There are several questions I should like to put to my hon. friend. Assuming that it were desirable to take over the whole of the insurance business and it were wise to make insurance compulsory what would he do in the case of the man who says, " I cannot pay." Would he insure every adult over the age of twenty-one, without medical inspection and without regard to health? If he did so his cost of insurance would be infinitely more than it is to-day, because one of the reasons why the cost of insurance is kept at a low figure is the very careful selection made by the life insurance companies.

Just on that point let me say that my hon. friend from Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw) put his finger upon one of the greatest services that is being rendered by the insurance companies. They do not by any means confine their activities to the endeavour to sell insurance in order to make a profit; they enter very largely into social service activities, which are of lasting benefit to the health of the people of the country, by their social service work, their support of public health institutions, public health education and control, especially with regard to maternal and infantile mortality and tuberculosis, and the provisions obtaining in many companies which call for medical inspection on the part of policyholders at stated periods.

To-day in Canada there are policies in effect, issued by Canadian life insurance companies, aggregating somewhere in the neighbourhood of seven thousand million dollars. That is the face value; I think I can find the exact figures here. The exact figure is $7,225,000,000; that is the face value of insurance policies issued by Canadian insurance companies, but of that sum only $4,300,000,000 is applicable to policies issued within the Dominion of Canada. The remainder, $2,900,000,000 represents the aggregate face value of policies issued in foreign countries. So I put this question to my hon. friend from Wetaskiwin: If he is going to nationalize the insurance business in Canada what is to be done with respect to the insurance business in foreign countries? Are we to lose that business? Certainly we cannot retain it unless we allow reciprocal rights to those in other countries to insure in Canada, because I may point out to my hon. friend that one-third of the total insurance business in Canada is done by companies in foreign countries. If my hon. friend does restrict Canadian insurance companies to the Canadian field he cuts off that business, and in doing so he limits that spread of which he spoke a while ago when he said that the more insurance policies issued and the larger number of people insured, the cheaper the insurance would be for the individual.

In that connection, lest I forget, let me point out that if he is going to take over the insurance business in Canada as a national undertaking, what is he going to do with that amount of insurance now held in Canada by foreign companies? If he takes it over he has to compensate, and if he compensates he has to make a further commitment in addition to the figures which I gave a short time ago.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the minister the value of the policies held in Canada by American or other foreign companies?

Mr. RHODES: I am not sure that I have those figures under my hand. If I have them I will try to give them before I conclude. My hon. friend did not say so, in so many words, but he clearly left the impression upon the house that if insurance were conducted by the country the matter of profit would be eliminated and that as a result insurance would be cheaper for the individual. In that respect we have before us experience in life insurance covering a period of a great many years and this experience does not bear out the assertion made by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin. On the contrary, may I explain that in Canada we have a scheme of insurance covering civil servants which has been in effect for some forty years. There are some 40,000 civil servants in Canada who would be entitled to the benefits of this insurance scheme; however, despite the fact that the scheme has been in effect for the period of time I have stated there are to-day only 6,731 civil servants who have embraced the opportunity of insuring their lives through this medium. That is the position, notwithstanding the fact that the premiums are so low that they do not allow anything whatsoever for overhead costs. Those costs are borne entirely by the taxpayers of Canada. And I should like hon. members to bear in mind that I am not complaining.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Is that confined entirely to the civil servants?

Mr. RHODES: Yes. It is estimated that the rates on that insurance are something like 75 per cent of those on ordinary non-participating insurance offered by the life companies. One of the reasons it was placed at such a low figure was to effect a compensating advantage in favour of the civil servants when in 1893 the Civil Service Superannuation Act was amended and larger contributions were called for.

Mr. MORAND: Does that insurance actuarially carry itself?

Mr. RHODES: No. I am speaking subject to correction, but I believe it is correct to say that on an actuarial basis it does not carry itself, apart altogether from the cost of overhead which I have mentioned.

Mr. McGIBBON: What contribution, if any, does the government make?

Mr. RHODES: The whole cost of management, the expenses in connection with staff, stationery and so on. Then, of course it guarantees payment.

Mr. IRVINE: What sort of insurance is it?

Mr. RHODES: Life insurance.

Mr. IRVINE: Well, there are various kinds of life insurance; what sort is it?

Mr. RHODES: Probably the nearest example we can get concerning the efficiency of state life insurance as contrasted with that conducted by private companies is to be found in New Zealand. In that country the two types of insurance for a period of sixty years operated side by side. The facts are that to-day the total amount of insurance conducted by the state of New Zealand amounts to $104,000,000 whereas that conducted by the private companies amounts to $444,000,000. Not only is the amount under the control of private companies more than four times as large, but the private company business has tended to increase at a ratio greater than that of the state. That is the position in a country which is perhaps less subject to outside influence than obtains in most countries.

Mr. EULER: Has the minister any information on the point as to whether or not, because of the fact that the state is in the insurance business in New Zealand, the rates have possibly been reduced as a result of state competition?

Mr. RHODES: I would ask the hon. member to keep that point in mind, and I shall answer it before I have completed my remarks. At all events, I shall give the answer as I see it. In the last twenty years the amount of insurance conducted by the state of New Zealand has increased by ninety per cent whereas in the same period the amount of insurance effected by private companies has increased by 250 per cent.

Mr. CHAPLIN: How do the rates compare?

Mr. RHODES: With the rates in Canada?

Mr. CHAPLIN: The rates of the two systems in New Zealand?

Mr. RHODES: Their rates must be similar, otherwise the proportion of insurance conducted by the state would tend to increase, rather than diminish, with respect to the total volume of insurance in force. That thought leads me to say that insurance is a very peculiar business; I know of none other comparable to it. It is a type of business that has to be sold. It is a commodity the selling of which requires intensive effort. I believe that fact is proven beyond doubt by the circumstances that where you find state and private companies competing the private company wins out on every occasion.

Answering the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) may I say that when the royal commission on insurance sat here in 1906 this very question was raised. I have before me a portion of the evidence given by Mr. Thomas Bradshaw, who, at that time, was general manager of the Imperial Life Insurance Company. Perhaps it would not be amiss to read the whole of it, despite the fact that it is a fairly long paragraph.

I am afraid my views are not in accord with the views of most of my colleagues, but I judge that they will give me credit for sincerity in holding the views I do upon that subject. I have endeavoured to consider this matter from a public standpoint strictly, and therefore believe that state insurance is practical under certain conditions. I believe that state insurance would have a most helpful effect in educating public opinion as to the merits and the necessity of life insurance, and thus incidentally prove of very great benefit to the life insurance companies of Canada. I believe that state insurance under a sound management would be helpful in assisting the regular life officers in reducing their rate of expense, and also helpful in assisting in solving some of the other vexatious problems which they are constantly brought in contact with. I do not think that such a department would be antagonistic to the interest of the regular life insurance companies, but would rather prove an adjunct to the propaganda of the popularizing of life insurance. I think it may be likened unto the Post Office Savings Department. The experience has been, I believe, that the Post Office Savings Department of Canada has rather helped the chartered banks, has assisted in popularizing the thrift and increased the savings accounts in the chartered banks of Canada. So for these reasons, and for some others, I believe that state life insurance would not be an evil, but a great blessing to the public of this country, and I believe that the field is broad enough and is growing, and is able to sustain not only a life insurance department but to sustain and to make even more prosperous the life insurance companies which are at present operating in this field.

And Mr. T. B. Macaulay of the Sun Life Insurance Company gave the following evidence on the same occasion:

Mr. Bradshaw's last remark covered nearly all I had to say on this matter, because my position is simply this: I have no objection in the world to the establishment of a state life insurance department if it is thought desirable. I quite agree with Mr. Bradshaw that if these different things that he speaks about, if such a department can be managed free from politics, if the management is given a free hand, if the investments are not put into government securities yielding very low rates of interest, but the same scale is exercised in selecting them as in the case of a regular life insurance company, and if all the other things that go to make a successful life insurance company are put into a government institution, I see no reason in the world why it should not be a first-class success. But even if it were a first-class success I do not think it would amount to anything better than another first-class company. That would be all that would result.

I might make some observations with respect to the government entering business.

This is a matter to which I have given a great deal of attention, and I know the same applies to many hon. members of this house. There are certain activities, even in this country where the trend is to expect the government to do everything, which are peculiarly adaptable to government handling. On the other hand, there are many phases of business which the government is not equipped to handle. If there is one business more than any other business of a highly specialized character which the government cannot be equipped to handle, it is the life insurance business. I submit in all seriousness that if it were possible to take over the life insurance business, assuming that it could be conducted by the government as efficiently as it is conducted as a private enterprise—I do not admit that but I will assume it for the sake of argument —it would lose that driving force without which the business would not increase and prosper as has been the case under private management. This is one of the classes of business which the government ought not to engage in unless it does so in competition with private enterprise and obtains the benefit of the stimulus which comes from competition. Even then it loses out in competition with private business as has been proven by experience not only in New Zealand but in Canada. We might take the case of England where insurance was sold through the post-office for a great number of years. This system was in force from 1864 but was abandoned in 1928. The insurance was sold at less than cost but the whole matter was the subject of an investigation in 1920 by a committee presided over by Lord Parmoor. That committee found that although the expenditure incurred in administration was low and the terms of insurance much more favourable than those offered by insurance companies, the number of applications for insurance was extremely small and the system could only be described as a failure, one reason for this being that the system was not competitive and did not adopt canvassing methods. In July, 1928, the select committee on estimates recommended that post office life insurance business should be discontinued. This goes to illustrate that where you do not have that driving power behind the seeking for business, which I submit you cannot have in a state insurance, if you do not fail, you certainly are not going to have that degree of success which obtains in the case of a private company.

Mr. IRVINE: I suggest also that that might be regarded as illustrating the power of the insurance companies over the administration.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. RHODES: I hope my hon. friend will not think I am disrespectful but I must state that he had his full forty minutes during which I did not make one single interruption. He has interrupted eight or nine times and in addition he will have an opportunity to reply. That ought to be sufficient for the purposes of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin and he should not interrupt me in the course of remarks which of necessity have to be given without that degree of preparation which I should like to have in dealing with a subject of this importance.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Would the minister say a word or two about the compulsory aspect of the matter?

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) has asked me to say something further with respect to the compulsory aspect of this matter. I must say that I was rather amazed at the suggestion of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin. I had not given thought to that phase of the matter but I think the queries which I put to him indicate what is in my mind. What machinery could the government adopt to compel an individual to pay for insurance, even assuming that he is physically fit and a proper subject for insurance? The most the government could do would be to put him in gaol if he did not pay and that only makes the second condition worse than the first. We not only do not get the amount of the premium which he owes but we are put to the expense of providing him with free board and lodging. Are we to insure every individual when he reaches the age of twenty-one without any reference to his physical condition ? If that be so, then we will have to take in the lame, the halt and the blind. Are we to enter upon a gigantic scheme of benevolence and not have the matter dealt with upon an actuarial basis? The other alternative is to have this insurance stand upon its own feet and make the premium at least sufficient to carry the policy. In this case we would be confronted with such high premiums that no one would insure. This seems to me to be the obvious answer.

I appreciate that all my hon. friend asks for in his resolution is:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give immediate consideration to the advisability of nationalizing life insurance.

But I would not wish it to be thought that the government is prepared to consider the nationalizing of insurance. Therefore, this resolution cannot be accepted by the house. It adopts a principle which, in my judgment, is unworkable. No public reason has been given why it should be introduced. We are being well served at the moment. On the one hand we have the benefit of private management, with the urge which must be behind private management if they are to make a success of a business of that character. On the other hand, we have the benefit of supervision which has been of a singularly high type. This may be because we have been served by one of the most efficient public servants with whom I have come in contact in the person of the Superintendent of Insurance. I do know that the manner in which he has conducted his inspection has caused the insurance department of the Dominion of Canada to be looked up to as a pattern and an example by other countries of the world. On a recent visit of mine to the United States I had the privilege of meeting the members of the life insurance presidents' association during their annual meeting in New York. I was struck with the flattering remarks made by all of those who were associated with the insurance industry of that country as to the character and method of our inspection.

I hope the house in its wisdom will reject this resolution.

Mr. HENRY E. SPENCER (Battle River): The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) does not seem to be enthusiastically in favour of the resolution before the house. I agree that we have reason to be proud of our insurance companies in that they have not collapsed under this crisis, but they may have been kept going simply because of the penalties they have taken out of the people who have been insured.

I was very glad to learn that the Minister of Finance is critical of the very high salaries that are being paid in the insurance world to-day, although he rather implied that if you got cheaper men they would not be worth anything at all. But when the enormous salaries that are being paid, as stated by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine), are recalled, higher salaries perhaps than are being paid to any other executives, even such high executives of the United States government as were mentioned, and when it is realized that these salaries have been increased as the depression has deepened, I think it will be agreed that it is time we asked some questions about these enhanced salaries. I would point out to the Minister of Finance that it is not always right to say that if you pay a less salary you do not get the same service. For if I might refer to the minister's own last words, we have in the employ of the dominion government one of the most valuable men possibly in the insurance world. He is doing a most excellent work, and he is to-day getting only one-twentieth of some of the high salaries that have been mentioned on the floor of the house to-day. So it is not necessarily a case of paying very high salaries to get efficient business men. I would also point out that although the insurance companies have not failed, it has been due largely to the fact that we have most efficient civil servants looking after their integrity. It is only a few years ago, on December 1, 1931, that a special order in council had to be passed to enable insurance companies in Canada to value their securities above the market price. I know that this was not done possibly except for the sake of one insurance company, but all the insurance companies had to accept what was being done.

I would also refer to the fact that the general manager of that one particular company was getting, and I suppose he is getting to-day, no less a sum than $100,080, and in spite of that nice little salary his company was so badly managed that he had to write off not only millions but hundreds of millions in the value of its securities due to the fall in the value of common stocks owned by his company.

The minister also referred to the very low cost of Canadian insurance. I wonder if he really heard the figures that were given by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin who pointed out that in the years 1930, 1931 and 1932 lapsed policies amounted to $1,200,000,000 and surrendered policies which people could not continue to carry to no less a sum than $787,000,000. Surely there is something wrong with our life insurance business when over two billions of dollars of insurance has to be dropped in the course of a few years. Does that not show, as the mover of the resolution very well pointed out, that life insurance is too expensive. It is too expensive partly because of the enormous amount of overlapping. I understand that to get the first premium it costs, according to the figures given, anything from 48 to 75 per cent of the amount of the first premium.

The Minister of Finance started out and tried to build up a case against state life insurance, but he certainly cannot say with the short term insurance we have to-day, even though no insurance company may have failed, that we are giving the people of Canada an opportunity to get reasonable life insurance.

Some years ago I happened to be taking out some insurance in one of our western cities, and I said to the chief official of the company, "You know, I am of the opinion that life insurance should be a state function." And to my surprise he replied, "Of course it should. That is one of the functions the state should look after, but as long as the state is not doing it, we take the opportunity of going into the business." That is largely the reason why private insurance has gone ahead so far, because, although we have a little government insurance to-day, it is not being pressed while private insurance is being pressed very strongly. It is carried on by high pressure salesmanship, and the people pay, and pay very dearly. The point is that at the present time those who need insurance and should have it cannot get it. They have to pay too much for it, and when it comes to a time like we have had in the last few years, when conditions are hard, many who carry life insurance have to give up their policies.

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville): I should like to give some time to this resolution, Mr. Speaker, but owing to the fact that I have a resolution to follow immediately, I shall have to give the resolution of my hon. friend from Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) the minimum of attention in order that I can give the maximum to my own, interested as I am in insurance.

My remarks on the resolution now before us are based on certain statements made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). He predicates his remarks on individual initiative and also on the rights of private property. He began his speech by stating that he was proud of insurance as it is being conducted to-day in Canada by the private companies, but I would point out that the point is not so much whether we are proud of the present insurance system as run by private individuals in this country as it is a question whether the business could not be more effectively and efficiently and cheaply run by the state.

The Minister of Finance instanced insurance in the civil service as a criterion by which we could judge the business of insurance if controlled by the state, but he gave no facts or conditions whatsoever in regard to that, and therefore in this house at least to-day we are not in a position to measure what success state insurance would have as judged by insurance as it is being carried on in the civil service to-day.

[Mr. Spencer.]

The minister also said that the present day insurance companies are doing everything possible to prolong the life of their policy-holders. But it seems to me that insurance as it is controlled to-day by private enterprise is more interested in the financial health of the shareholders thereof than in the health of the policy-holders. Only two years ago the government had to come as a sort of physician to the rescue to save insurance companies through an order in council by pegging their shares, that is, by striking an average price over five different periods. If the minister predicates his statement on private enterprise, I might say that the state meanwhile has usually shown far greater solicitude for the rights of property than for the rights of man. Joseph Chamberlain made this statement some years ago:

> The rights of property have been so much extended that the rights of the community have almost altogether disappeared, and it is hardly too much to say that the prosperity and comfort and the liberties of a great proportion of the population have been laid at the feet of a small number of proprietors, who neither toil nor spin.

Most of those shareholders surely are in the position of those who neither toil nor spin. Certainly a great deal of the exorbitant profits which they have made have not been earned through any excessive toiling or spinning. Mr. Lewis, another authority on insurance, has this to say in regard to state insurance control:

> The state should move cautiously and tentatively in the direction of experiment; but, as the evolution of the modern state plainly shows, must move. It must often subordinate the independence of the individual to the general good; it must work out many of its beneficent purposes by collective means; it must sometimes compel the individual to do that which he ought to be willing to do.

I maintain that nothing said in the house to-day shows that insurance could not be efficiently and effectively carried on by the state. Notwithstanding the fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) has said that the insurance business is too intricate to be carried on by the state, I still hold that it is possible for the state to carry on insurance very efficiently and effectively. It is no great mystery; the business of insurance in both this country and all others is to-day the safest I know. The application of the insurance principle, in my opinion, presents no great difficulties or risks. It is not, as has been suggested, some venture upon unknown seas; it is the safest business in the whole world. It is not as complex as the Minister of Finance would have this house believe. Therefore, I think for the state to assume the business of insurance would not involve its entering upon any new untried and dangerous ground. Insurance under government operation would be purely mutual, and if it should be administered on a basis of profits, the profits would certainly go to the state treasury rather than to the pockets of shareholders of private companies as is the practice at present. State ownership would prevent the system of interlocking directorship which we have in this country at the present time and through the instrumentality of which $200,000,000 in worthless shares have been thrown upon the present insurance companies to the detriment of the policyholders thereof.

The first and fundamental principle of insurance is mutuality, the principle of each for all and all for each. Doctor Gerhart has said this in regard to insurance control by the state:

> All human progress which is essentially an increase in social well-being has arisen from some improved method of cooperation, whether this new form of cooperation has resulted from private initiative or from public compulsion in obedience to enacted law. There is probably no other form of cooperation which is so fundamentally valuable to the cooperative members, indiscriminately, rather than particular members, than insurance.

In insurance is found every essence of cooperation. If that is so, I hold that any cooperative movement would be more successful, controlled by the state than it is at the present time, controlled by private individuals. In Italy there is a criterion by which we can judge state insurance. They have a monopoly of insurance there; by the Italian law of 1912 insurance in that country has been made a state monopoly. The issue of all policies of life insurance is entrusted to a national institute of insurance, a department of the state to which the state treasury issues the money necessary for its operations and whatever profit results does not go to the normal expenses of the state but is set aside in toto for the specific social purpose of providing pensions for workingmen.

Switzerland also provides for state monopoly of insurance, especially in the case of accidents and sickness. New Zealand at the present time has a system of state insurance, although competition of private companies is allowed there. I believe, fundamentally, scientifically and mathematically, state control of insurance is advisable, practicable and possible. If we had state insurance it would certainly aid the Minister of Finance in financing the affairs of Canada more efficiently than is being done at the present time. Bonds could be sold to these insurance companies and I do not see why investments should not be limited to government bonds rather than allow the managers, presidents, administrations of the present concerns to gamble in all kinds of worthless shares and even in all sorts of worthless mortgages. In insurance as it is being carried on to-day by private concerns, there is too much overhead, too much overlapping, too many agency branches overlapping throughout the country. It has been suggested that if insurance were made a government monopoly, this would entail the confiscation of the buildings of these private concerns, but in Edmonton most of the buildings in which these insurance companies do their business do not belong to the companies; they are rented, and most of the business in Ottawa is also done in rented buildings. It is only at headquarters in Toronto and similar places that they actually own their buildings.

I shall conclude with the remark that under state supervision of insurance the families and the policyholders would be better safeguarded than they are now under privately owned insurance companies.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): I am glad to say, Mr. Speaker, that there is not a great deal to which to reply. Not much objection has been taken to the resolution, and the arguments of those who did take objection were not effective. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), was the chief objector to the motion. He, speaking for the government of course, says the government will not let it be thought that they are willing even to consider such a resolution. Let me say to my hon. friend that the government might better consider it. Let me also say that it is only too obvious that so far the government have not considered it. This is not a question that can be thrown aside with that suggestion of untouchability. I hope my hon. friend will not take that attitude with regard to other matters of this sort. The government has a duty to consider whether the people of Canada can get safer and cheaper life insurance through government ownership and control than through private companies.

The Minister of Finance says that while I stated that life insurance companies in Canada are perhaps as good as those in any other country, I suggested the contrary, when I quoted findings with regard to insurance companies in New York and pointed out that the same might be true of some companies in Canada. When I say that Canadian companies are as safe and as efficiently managed as any others I also say that they are not any better managed or any more efficient than companies in other parts of the world. So when we find certain conditions in connection with well-managed and safe companies in New York it is reasonable to suppose that you could find pretty much the same thing in regard to Canadian companies, particularly when some of those New York companies are doing business in Canada.

The minister also said there was no criticism to be made about high salaries in Canada. Again I want to tell him that some of the companies to which I referred do business in Canada. And may I suggest to him that I know there are managers of insurance companies in Canada getting salaries they are incapable of earning, and they can do that only at the expense of the policyholders.

The minister dealt with the liabilities involved, but I am bound to say that I know no more about the liabilities involved than I did before the minister started. No doubt that is my fault, but so far as I am concerned his presentation was so utterly confusing that I was not able to follow it. I would say that if the liabilities have to be taken over and met in the way the Minister of Finance tried to describe I am sure this is not the government to do it; we will have to wait until we get some other government, for apparently there is not the knowledge of insurance or the appreciation of its importance to the average citizen that we would expect from a government that could be expected to handle adequately a business of that sort.

With regard to the compulsory feature, the Minister of Finance thinks he has knocked my whole argument into a cocked hat when he asks: What would you do with a man who could not or would not pay his premium? Well, what do you do with anybody who does not obey the law of the country? There must be punishment of some sort. What is done now? When a man cannot pay the premium charged by private companies, and dies leaving his children starving, what do we do? The community takes care of his children and feeds them, whether it be the municipality or the provincial government. So it could not be any worse under compulsory insurance. But I am quite sure that if the minister turned that great mind which he undoubtedly possesses to the simple little problem of what to do with a man who refuses to pay his premium under a compulsory system he could find some way of dealing with the matter. I believe I could.

Then he says: Are we to look after the lame, the halt, and the blind? What else is insurance for? What does my hon. friend suppose it is for? Would he look after the strong and those who can foresee everything? Such people do not need to be looked after. It is the very essence of insurance that it takes care of the lame, the halt and the blind; if it does not do that it is not worth having. As I pointed out, we, as a nation, have to do that already whether we go into the insurance business or not. Having then to do it for those who cannot pay anything at all surely we should not allow private companies to skim the cream by taking the business of people who can pay and leaving the state to carry those who cannot.

Then as to what is to be done with the insurance business in foreign countries, are we as a nation to go into foreign countries to do business? No, let us mind our own business. Our business is to insure the people of Canada. We are not interested in trying to insure Americans and the people in other countries; we will let them look after their own business.

Then the minister said that in New Zealand they have private companies operating in competition with government insurance, and if I got his figures correctly I think they were to the advantage of the private companies.

Mr. RHODES: Four to one.

Mr. IRVINE: I would expect that. Who would not? If private companies in New Zealand had as much influence over national affairs as private companies have in Canada, I wonder it is not six to one. Let me tell the minister that it is not possible to carry on national insurance schemes side by side with private companies in Canada; it simply cannot be done. To quote figures of that sort is purely and simply absurd. I know of no nationalization proposal in this country which when attempted has not been used solely with the idea of proving that it cannot be done—thus safeguarding the preserves of private enterprise and contending from the designed failure of public ownership efforts, that only private companies can do the business efficiently. Certainly I do not wonder at hon. gentlemen, or certain gentlemen who may not be honourable quoted by the minister, being willing to let the nation go into insurance in competition with private companies. Of course they would leave the nation to do all the educational work respecting insurance, and we may be sure they would try to reap all the business for the private companies. That is what they do in New Zealand; that is what they would do here under that system. For my part I would certainly vote against a system of government insurance on a voluntary basis and in competition with insurance companies.

I think that covers all that the minister said. I still think, with my colleague who has just sat down, that no argument has been advanced to show the Canadian people why the government should not manage the insurance business of this country for the benefit of the people of this country. That question still remains to be considered. But we are told that the government will not even consider it. Well then, we shall have to look for a government that will consider this and other questions of like importance.

CANADA'S FOREIGN POLICY

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO INDUSTRIAL AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS COMMITTEE FOR STUDY AND REPORT

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the whole subject of foreign policy of Canada be referred to the committee on industrial and international relations for study and report.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the resolution moved by myself and seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, the whole subject of foreign policy of Canada be referred to the committee on industrial and international relations for study and report.

My remarks on this motion might be prefaced by the question: Has Canada a foreign policy and, if so, what is that foreign policy? The foreign policy of Canada should be considered relatively in order to arrive at any intelligent understanding of the problem. Thus, the promotion of our commercial and financial interests abroad, the provision of maximum security at home and the minimum of commitments in order to achieve this end, just about sum up what is involved in such a policy. If Canada has a foreign policy, very few people realize the fact or knowing so, have an intimate knowledge of the working thereof. This lack of knowledge is not limited to the rank and file in Canada. I wonder how many hon. members of this house could explain Canada's foreign policy? Yet in this great age of interdependence of nations a knowledge of foreign policy is absolutely essential. More and more clearly are people beginning to realize the economic unity of the world and the impossibility of any country living unto itself. Things have come to a pass where our neighbour's troubles are merged with our own difficulties and where a solution of the latter cannot be hoped for without a solution of the former. While foreign policies must always envisage the possibility of war, they must at the same time strive peacefully for peaceful objects. At the present time the world is clamouring for peace, but there is no peace. It awaits the return of prosperity, but there is no prosperity, for we cannot have the latter without a propagation and realization of the former. We cannot have our cake and eat it too; we cannot make an omelette without breaking the eggs. We cannot maintain peace without the application of the essential contributory factors; we cannot return to prosperity without a cultivation of the peaceful arts and pursuits incidental thereto.

Canada's foreign policy primarily must be considered from two angles. First, our status in the British commonwealth of nations and, second, our attitude to the rest of the world, especially the United States. Our foreign policy must really be considered from a threefold angle. First, there is our position on the North American continent with our close proximity to the United States; there is our attitude to Great Britain and the other dominions, and there is our attitude as a member of the League of Nations. For many years Canada was regarded as a colony, as a mere child that had to be looked after until it reached the age of maturity. This weaning process lasted until comparatively recent times when Canada began to ask for the right to do things on her own initiative. Prior to 1914 everything was conducted through British diplomatic channels but consequent upon a series of imperial conferences as well as the passage of the Statute of Westminster in 1931, a large degree of autonomy was allowed the various dominions. Therefore, Canada to-day is considered as an equal partner in the British commonwealth of nations, a sovereign state, a sort of daughter in her mother's house but mistress in her own. If Canada is now on an equality with the mother country, as has been said already, it would naturally imply freedom of control by Great Britain in the conduct of the foreign policy of this country but the actual conduct of foreign affairs seems likely to be carried on for some time yet by Great Britain.

Canada's weakness in this respect is due to the lack of a developed foreign policy technique, an experienced personnel and a diplomatic tradition. There is also the tendency of each sovereign member of the commonwealth to adopt the regional rather than the collective idea of security. The term "general policy" is used somewhat loosely for the diversified interests of the various members of the commonwealth will preclude any real commonwealth foreign policy. The foreign interests of the members of the commonwealth being regional rather than general, foreign policy machinery possibly will have to be set up to strengthen the political co-operation between those members of the commonwealth which, in a specific region, may have mutual interests or even mutual conflicts. For instance, Great Britain and Canada are interested in the United States and that country must be considered as the keystone of our foreign policy.

The British Empire is not a political but a moral entity, almost wholly dependent for its existence upon sentiment. All the members thereof mutually enjoy certain traditions, laws and institutions but it is doubtful if any general foreign policy would be possible except in the case of certain major issues. In so far as security is concerned, as I have said already, both Great Britain and Canada must regard the United States as being the keystone of their foreign policy, but the same could not be said of South Africa. For instance, what connection is there between New Guinea and the Canadian Northwest? Living in close proximity to a powerful neighbour, Canada certainly must have interests in common with that neighbour. There are many who believe that both the United States and Canada are opposed to the superstate idea of the League of Nations as well as to any foreign entanglements in Europe. The Monroe doctrine gives Canada potential protection from foreign attack while the British navy affords both actual and psychological security on both coasts. Canada's position on the North American continent and her growing interests in the Pacific identify still further her relations with the United States in connection with far eastern questions.

Anomalies in the foreign policy situation must undoubtedly appear. While the United States affords Canada a potential protection, the Dominion of Canada nevertheless is not in the least inclined to join any pan-American union that would involve Canada in contentious issues between the United States and the Latin American republics. Any discussion of foreign policies would then have to take into consideration the question whether or not Canada should undertake political and economic obligations in matters in which this country has merely a remote and indirect interest.

As regards British-Canadian relations it has often been asked whether such obligations should bind Canada as a fully sovereign power or state. The following wording in Article IX of the Locarno Treaty of Mutual Guarantee, 1925, has been recommended as a remedial routine practice:

> The present treaty shall impose no obligation upon any of the British dominions, or upon India, unless the government of such dominions, or of India, signifies its acceptance thereof.

Our associations with Great Britain have provided us with a large available market as well as with military and naval protection. On the other hand, it has involved us in many controversies and conflicts. What therefore, Mr. Speaker, shall be the attitude of Canada in the event of British participation or entanglement in another European or far eastern war? Competent observers throughout the world feel that war is imminent in both these fields. Is the entrance of Great Britain to involve Canadian participation as well? That is a matter which I think is worth discussing in the committee on industrial and international relations.

The League of Nations, to which Canada belongs, and which in theory at least was supposed to be a sort of superstate, bears little relation to its pattern, the covenant. In an ideal international society the League of Nations might provide complete security, and in addition enable its members to deal justly with such matters as trade, tariffs, currency, and so forth, but the events of the past three years indicate that we have not yet reached this utopian stage, and it is desirable, while keeping the league ideal in mind as our ultimate goal, to examine the realities of the world situation. In a real world we must deal with conditions, and not theories. The League of Nations, while it is an ideal, has nothing more practical to offer than persuasion to set right a world where might still seems to be the only dominating force. No one will say that Japan had any just claim to Manchuria, but she took it nevertheless with the tacit consent of countries which looked upon that action as a check upon Russian designs in Europe.

How are you going to deal with nations that regard their own interest as primary and that of other countries as secondary, or which consider their own survival alone as important, and the destruction of other countries as a matter of indifference? How are you going to apply the Kellogg peace pact to outlaw wars when at the same time it permits of defensive war? Even Japan has claimed that her recent warlike activities in Manchuria and China were prompted by defensive considerations. Other countries have also done the same thing in the past.

In the present unstable condition of Europe most of its countries are more interested in political and defensive relations than in economic. Unhampered by an impending attack, Canadians doubtlessly think more of economic relationships when dealing with foreign policies. There is no Versailles treaty to bother Canada and the United States, but that treaty has split Europe into two clear-cut camps—the status quo and revisionist groups, which will sooner or later come to grips on the European continent. The Versailles treaty, instead of settling matters, has only aggravated the situation. It has turned Europe into a sort of political and ethnological crazy quilt. Frontiers were fixed on no principle, ethnological, geographical or equitable, but were rather dictated by animosity, vindictiveness, Chauvinism and greed. The dispossessed countries swear to regain their lost territories, and the victorious states just as vigorously defend their ill-gotten gains. With Europe virtually sitting on top of a volcano which might at any moment erupt and light a flame throughout the world, the formulation of a Canadian foreign policy in regard to that continent is a matter of extreme delicacy and great caution.

What interests Canada is the possibility of British participation in such a war, and the effect of such participation on this dominion. Canada has had some experience of the external sacrifices and of the internal dissension caused by such participation, and it is a real question whether this dominion would survive as a political entity such another experience. Should Canada refuse the mother country support, or for that matter, should the remainder of the commonwealth refuse support to any one of its members whose existence was threatened, this one unifying tie will have disappeared and the empire as we understand it will have ceased to exist. To paraphrase the words of Hamlet, to be or not to be a member of the British Commonwealth of Nations would then be the question. Pulling somebody else's chestnuts out of the fire is too poor a reason for Canada to get mixed up in a war in which she is not at all directly interested, but on the other hand the breaking-up of the empire might be too great a sacrifice for her to stay out. Popular opinion in Canada would then have to be the deciding factor as to the action to be taken; for the empire is not a rigid but an elastic organization composed of the constituent elements, owing a common allegiance to the whole, but retaining the right to control its own domestic and foreign affairs. If it is not desirable that Great Britain or any of the dominions should control those foreign affairs that are of primary concern to one dominion, so it is equally impossible and undesirable for the dominions to seek to control those foreign affairs which primarily affect Great Britain. But where the issues are of primary concern to all parts, they must then be dealt with by the empire as a whole. In the last great world war public opinion in the various dominions decided on participation along with the mother country. But a similar decision in another such contingency may not be unanimous. Foreign affairs nowadays have to do very largely with economic questions such as trade, tariff, coal or oil concessions, international debts, immigration, fisheries, power or navigation rights in boundary waters. As has already been pointed out by me, the tendency of Canada is to coordinate foreign relations with her economic relationships. Our policy, therefore, is formulated with a view to foster or improve our trade and commercial relations. For many decades the European market has absorbed the surplus products of this continent such as wheat, cotton, oil and many highly finished manufactures.

Mr. ARTHURS: Cotton?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: United States cotton. I had reference to this continent. Of late years, however, the accumulating bankruptcy consequent upon the last war has left Europe so weak and impoverished as to make it impossible to call forth anything like the trade the European market used to command in prewar days. Extreme economic nationalism is not only strangling trade among the various countries of Europe but directed toward keeping out Canadian products from what was and still might be a valuable market. It has also been suggested that Canada's position on the North American continent and her growing interest in the Pacific make her foreign policy on far eastern questions usually identical with those of the United States, that is, as regards matters of defence and security. Yet trade with the far east is a very desirable object. In 1930 the trade mission which was sent from this country to the orient to investigate trade possibilities there brought back the report that China and Japan constituted Canada's greatest and richest potential market. But how is Canada going to reconcile her desire for security with her desire for better markets? In this regard how is she going to reconcile her alliance with the United States with her status in the British commonwealth of nations? In an article dated June, 1933, in The Round Table, it is stated:

The strain put upon the relations between Canada and the United Kingdom because of the divergence of policy between the governments of the United States and the United Kingdom on the Sino-Japanese dispute has not yet had time to show its full effects. It may be that Sir John Simon has thrown Canada into the arms of the United States, as Professor Arnold Toynee sugested at Chatham House in February of last year. Be that as it may, the events of the last two years have shown how difficult it is for Canada and the United Kingdom to cooperate on foreign policy in matters concerning the far east, because of that fact that the foreign policy of the United Kingdom is at present dominated by European considerations, whereas the interests of Canada will in the future be mound up more closely with Far Eastern than European developments. But only a few Canadians are at present giving any consideration to the effect of far eastern affairs on Canada's future relations with the United Kingdom. Most of us are fervent believers in the doctrine of solvitur ambulando.

Since Canada has secured autonomy in the imperial field, she will naturally strive to secure or enlarge her activities in the international field. In other words, a foreign policy will have to be developed in Canada. Hitherto, being still in the colonial stage, all Canada's foreign responsibilities were handled by the mother country; but Canada having come of age, as it were, the necessity for clarifying her ideas on the realities of the international position has become readily apparent. The need is especialy urgent in view of the present right of each dominion to negotiate directly with foreign governments and also the established principle that this dominion is bound by a treaty signed by its representatives.

An attempt has been made in this short address briefly to touch upon some of the political combinations on which our foreign policy must be based. Great Britain as the mother country, the United States as a friendly neighbour and powerful state, and the far east as a potential market or potential source of attack, form a triangle in our polical existence around which most certainly our foreign policy has to be formulated. Of course in this regard the continent of Europe cannot be ignored or excluded, but Europe is not as immediate a menace as is the far east. The aim of this address is to draw attention to Canada's capacity to form and pursue a consistent foreign policy and to this end to point out to the house the necessity of a committee to study the whole matter. This may be a strange procedure, but in this regard I have a precedent in the United States which has a foreign relations committee to which matters pertaining to foreign policy are usually referred. This body incidentally has power not only to advise, but also to withhold consent. In Canada, however, the matter of foreign policy is solely in the hands of the federal government. Few members know what is being done in this connection since the matter in Canada is not subject to constructive parliamentary criticism as it is in the United States. In view of Canada's rapid development and increasing international relationships it is thought the subject of foreign policy should receive greater consideration both within and without parliament. It has been suggested that to this end courses for the training of graduates in diplomacy should be given in all our Canadian universities and certainly a great deal more attention should be paid to this subject in parliamentary spheres. I know of no better body where this subject could be discussed than the committee on industrial and international relations. In view of our growing importance in the international field, a knowledge of foreign policy by parliament and the public at large is urgent. As to the actual administration of foreign affairs, there is no question that a competent and sufficient staff of properly trained men is necessary, but as to the actual elucidation of the matter and the dissemination of knowledge on such subjects, I know of no better method than to refer the whole matter to this committee on industrial and foreign relations for study and report.

If Canada is now a grown-up member of the commonwealth, then it is time that she should play her part like a mature person. This continual tugging at the maternal apronstrings and running to cover under the parental wing, as was Canada's metaphoric position prior to the passing of the Statute of Westminster and the various imperial conferences of recent times, most certainly would not be in keeping with the dignified status we now have in the British commonwealth and as a member of the League of Nations. If Canada is now daughter in her mother's house and mistress in her own. her policy should be formulated accordingly. The fearful cry-baby colonial inferiority complex of the past should make way for a more mature and dignified dominion status attitude. One obvious indication of such a stage of maturity would be the formulation of a real and genuine Canadian foreign policy. If Canada really is a nation, as we have recently been told she is, then one manifestation thereof would certainly be the formulation of such a policy.

I do not see why the whole matter of Canada's foreign policy should not be considered and discussed by the committee on industrial and international relations for study and report. Why could not the various delegates that we have been sending to Europe and the League of Nations during the past few years give some report to the house on what is going on over there? We have at least two former ministerial delegates to the League of Nations, in the persons of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), who most decidedly could tell us a great deal about it. This house could gather a vast amount of information if the matter were dealt with by the industrial and international relations committee. If the government is fearful of divulging certain information to the public at large it could easily ask that committee to hold some of its meetings in camera, or else give orders to the press not to report matters discussed therein. This is no unusual request, as matters of foreign policy are continually being discussed in the United States committee on foreign relations. Why, then, the reluctance to set up a similar committee in Canada? I am not asking for a new and separate committee; all I am requesting of this house is that the whole subject of the foreign policy of Canada be referred to the committee on industrial and international relations for study and report.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to be allowed to congratulate my colleague (Mr. Luchkovich) on his very fine presentation of what I regard as a most important problem. As I came into the chamber to-night a friend said: The trouble with this resolution is that it deals with a matter that is very academic. I am afraid that pretty well represents the attitude of the large majority towards these questions; yet when we come to think of it, a few years ago we passed through the great world war which meant the loss of the lives of a large number of Canadians and the burden of an almost intolerable debt. One might think that having been precipitated into that conflict we would from then on take rather seriously our relationships with other nations. We are carrying the burden entailed by paying pensions and trying to raise the money to pay the interest on the war loans, and yet have little to say, and I believe are thinking very little, about our world relationships.

Last September in the city of Toronto there was held under the auspices of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs a British commonwealth relations conference which gave a good deal of attention to the question of Canada's foreign policy in relation to that of the empire. Although this conference was entirely unofficial and its meetings were held in camera, the discussions which took place were very illuminating indeed and ought to be of service throughout this country. I will not give the names of the delegates from the different dominions, other than perhaps those of the United Kingdom as they are best known to most of us. They included Viscount Cecil, Right Hon. Sir Herbert Samuel, Donald B. Somervell, Sir John Power, Philip J. Noel-Baker, Mr. Gathorne-Hardy, Hamilton W. Kerr, Professor Arnold J. Toynbee, John W. Wheeler-Bennett, and Professor A. E. Zimmern. That perhaps will give some idea of the character of the men who sat for some days and discussed questions of the kind referred to by the hon. member for Vegreville (M. Luchkovich)

I should like to read two paragraphs from the report of the rapporteur of the commission which dealt with the machinery required for cooperation in foreign policy. These paragraphs bring us right to the heart of the resolution before the house to-night:

> There was general agreement that the supply of information furnished to dominion governments by the foreign affairs department of the Dominion office was full and regular, communications passing from the foreign office daily to those governments through the Dominions office. Copies of these documents were also supplied regularly to all the high commissioners in London, except to the High Commissioner of New Zealand who is content to receive only such documents as he asks for specially. An Australian member that the Australian liaison officer was able to perform a very useful function in amplifying and interpreting information by daily personal contact with the officers of the Dominions office, Foreign office, service department and other offices.
> There was an equally general admission that the information forthcoming was neither passed on to nor discussed adequately by members of parliament, by the newspapers, or by the public. It was recognized that some of this information was necessarily confidential, but it was believed that much of it might profitably be passed on to parliament and the press. It was suggested that classification of Foreign office information as confidential, discretionary, or free might facilitate its dissemination, but it was objected that classification might make it easier for a harassed minister to shelter himself behind confidential dispatches. The trouble went deeper than that. It was noted that interest in the parliaments of South Africa and New Zealand at all events in the work of the I.L.O. was much greater than in the political work of the league and external affairs generally, partly at least because regular reports on the work of the I.L.O. were laid on the table. Generally speaking, in all dominions it was admitted that too often information on external affairs could only be extracted by questions in the house.

I think probably that statement, which was compiled to represent the consensus of opinion of those present from all the dominions, fairly described the position in our own country.

Until very recently, in fact until the war, there was only one foreign country with which we had any close associations, the United States. And since we have always had an unguarded border there has been very little danger of military action there. Our relationships with the United States, on the whole, have had to do very largely with international trade. Possibly it is owing to that fact as well as to our distance from Europe that it is only in recent years that any question has arisen with regard to general world policies. But I submit that, as has been pointed out so clearly by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Luchkovich), we have come to the point when we can no longer go along indifferent to the great world movements about us and to our relationships with the other nations. Whether we like it or not, since the war Canada has been drawn into world currents.

First of all, there is the question of our relationship to the United Kingdom and the whole British Empire. If all the parts of the British Empire were self-governing dominions, the question would be exceedingly complicated, but in addition we have dependencies of all kinds, crown colonies, protectorates and so on, in almost every part of the world. It cannot be gainsaid that the conquests of Great Britain in earlier years have laid an enormous burden upon the motherland. As we look back over history we must confess that to a very considerable extent empire has meant and probably still means exploitation.

Without going into that matter, however, I would point out in this connection that so far as we are concerned, the policies of Great Britain in Egypt, in India, in Afghanistan, in Japan and in remote islands of the sea might very easily involve her in war, and if Great Britain is involved in war it is a question as to where Canada stands. It is all very well to say that Canada would respond immediately as she did in 1914. I am not at all sure of that. The question is whether we, with our status as a self-governing dominion, can be or should be called upon to join with Great Britain if she gets into some difficulty over policies concerning which we had no control whatever, and in the making of which we have had no voice. That is an exceedingly important question.

Not long ago a prominent Canadian public man suggested that Canada should withdraw from the League of Nations on the ground that matters were becoming so complicated that possibly it would be as well for us to get out while the going was good. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the selfsame argument that would lead us to leave the League of Nations would force us to sever our connection with the British Empire. The members of the British Empire are almost as far-flung as are the members of the League of Nations itself. The fact is that as long as we have a common crown we cannot very well remain indifferent to the policies of the United Kingdom. So surely it is an important thing that at this stage, in a time when we are not yet involved in war, we should know what our policy would be in case certain contingencies should arise.

Not only is Canada a member of the British Empire; she is also a member of the League of Nations, and as a member of the league she has undertaken some very serious responsibilities. I do not think most hon. gentlemen have stopped to think what really is involved in our membership in the league. I should like to quote two paragraphs from the Treaty of Peace with regard to our commitments under the covenants. Article 16 states:

> Should any member of the league resort to war in disregard of its covenants, under articles 12, 13 or 15, it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the league, which hereby undertake immediately to subject it to the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking state, and the prevention of all financial, commercial or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking state and the nationals of any other state, whether a member of the league or not. . . .
> The members of the league agree, further, that they will mutually support one another in the financial and economic measures which are taken under this article, in order to minimize the loss and inconvenience resulting from the above measures, and that they will mutually support one another in resisting any special measures aimed at one of their number by the covenant-breaking state. . . .

It may be said that we are not going to take these covenants very seriously.

Mr. McGIBBON: Japan did not, did she?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Neither did Canada; if we had done so, Japan would not have gotten away with things as she did. That treaty of Versailles, which at the time was supposed to give promise of an era of peace, surely ought to mean something to us. If it means nothing whatever, I suppose the only thing for us to do is to get out of the league, but at the present moment we are members of the league and as such are bound in honour, as well, I take it, as by what might be considered international law, to live up to our obligations.

More than that, however, we are not only members of the British Empire and of the League of Nations; whether we like it or not we are living in a closely integrated world. It is all very well to say that we should get out of the British Empire, if anyone does say so, or that we should get out of the League of Nations, as somebody has suggested. But we cannot get out of the world, and to-day the world is one vast neighbourhood. We can no longer maintain the policies of isolation which were possible for the United States and Canada until a comparatively few years ago. In the old days we used to think we could drive here, there or yonder without anyone to say us nay. To-day we cannot get through the city streets without rules of the road, traffic policemen and traffic signals of all kinds. In a modern, congested city street it is simply impossible to get along without having some very definite conventions by which we may determine our relationship to our neighbours.

That is the kind of world in which we live to-day. We cannot possibly live an isolated life. In the old days we might very well have said, "Well, if China and Japan want to go to war let them go to it; we will stay safely on this side of the Pacific." That would be quite an impossible thing for us to-day. Surely we have not forgotten that it was a murder away in Serbia that was the match that brought about the conflagration which spread to all parts of the world. We can no longer remain isolated; whether we like it or not we are in contact with the other nations of the world, even those in the most remote parts, and in my judgment we must build up some sort of world arrangement, some collective system, or we can look forward only to chaos and disaster in the years to come.

Without developing that thought further, though I think it is a vitally important question, I should like to point out that so far as this house is concerned we have in practice very few opportunities for the discussion of foreign policy. It is true that we may ask a question of the minister to which generally speaking, we do not receive any very illuminating answer. We may wait throughout the session until estimates are under consideration. Why it is, I do not know, but frequently the estimates for the Department of External Affairs come up for consideration about the last day of session when every hon. member is tired out and wants to get away. I have noticed year after year, that there has been practically no chance for careful consideration of these matters.

I do not know that I could better illustrate the situation than to describe what occurred in connection with the very question concerning which one of the members interjected a remark, namely, the Manchurian affair. On November 18, 1932, I asked the Prime Minister the following question as to Canada's policy in the far east: "What, if any, is the policy of His Majesty's government in Canada in regard to the situation in the far east and to the Lytton report?" His reply, as it appears in Hansard of November 21, 1932 is, in part, as follows:

> Perhaps I can best serve what I conceive to be the public interest by indicating that it is not thought desirable to enter into a discussion at this time with respect to a matter of this kind, for it not only cannot serve the public interest but would be anticipating action which might be taken, and therefore is to be deprecated. . . . Our relations to this matter arise primarily from the fact that we are a member of the league of nations and we must sit on that report and determine what action shall be taken to give effect or otherwise to the recommendations therein contained . . . but the broad general rule is that a matter that is sub judice, that is to say, a matter that is being considered by a body charged with authority as is the league of nations—the assembly—with quasi judicial powers . . . should not be the subject of expressions of opinion publicly.

That, to me, is a most extraordinary statement. The League of Nations, a deliberative body of which we were a member, were considering a report. The league was not a court; the matter was not sub judice, but was one for general consideration. Yet, we in this House of Commons were denied the opportunity on that occasion of either discussing the matter or obtaining a statement as to the policy of the government.

The next reference to this matter was on December 8, 1932, when, at Geneva a statement was made by Mr. Cahan, Secretary of State, which aroused almost consternation across Canada. In an article appearing in Interdependence, March, 1933—a journal issued by the League of Nations Society in Canada—Professor Soward made the following devastating criticism:

> A speech which never once endorsed directly league principles, which departed from our position of last March, which singled out the injured party for most of the recrimination, is not the sort of speech which some of his distinguished Conservative predecessors at Geneva, like Sir Robert Borden, Sir George Foster or Sir George Perley would have made.

It falls far below the standard they set. Mr. Cahan's attitude is not the sort which Mr. Meighen assumed in the Imperial conference of 1921 when the renewal of the Anglo-Japanese alliance came before the conference.

Members will recall that Mr. Meighen took the position that our policy must be very closely related to that of the United States.

The next we heard of the far eastern questions was on January 30, 1933, when in a rather ambiguous statement the Prime Minister said:

> The Secretary of State had his instructions, and he made it abundantly clear—I saw him in London—that his speech as a whole did not in any sense depart from them, although isolated sections of it might leave the impression that he was endeavouring to support one particular phase of the situation rather than another. I think the speech as a whole shows no departure from the general principles which I indicated to the house as being the views of the government in matters of this kind.

And he concluded:

> As he will be back here very shortly he will be able to explain the situation fully.

The next development in that matter was a pronouncement of Canada's position by Doctor Riddell, and if I have had to criticize the ambiguity of the Prime Minister's statement and criticize the statement of the Secretary of State I must confess that the statement given on behalf of this government by Doctor Riddell was an excellent one. Next we learned that Canada had become a member of the advisory council—which, I should judge, would be a rather important position—in connection with the Sino-Japanese situation. Since that time, with one exception to which I shall refer, we have had no information whatsoever with regard to the situation in the far east, and to this day we do not know what the policy of the government is.

Some of us had been hoping that throughout the session we would have a chance to ask questions of the government, but no opportunity was granted until the estimates for the Department of External Affairs came up for consideration. The estimates were passed without any discussion whatever, one item being held over. Later, in the final rush, the item came before the committee at a time when very few hon. members knew that this important subject would be under consideration. On that occasion the Secretary of State made a statement which, at that late stage of proceedings, no one had a chance to discuss.

I place this matter before the house not in order to promote a discussion of the Japanese question at this time, but rather to indicate the lack of information regarding government policy and the lack of opportunity given to hon. members to discuss matters of vital public importance.

I said a little while ago that we are a member of the League of Nations. We are also a member of the International Labour Organization. Each year delegations go to attend the conferences of these bodies. We have not had the advantage of having a report from our delegates. I am not blaming the present government for this; I do not want to be misunderstood. Attention is being called to this situation in the hope that possibly it may lead to the development of a procedure which will be more satisfactory than the one which has come down to us from the past. It is true that last year Sir George Perley on his return from the disarmament conference did make a statement to the house, but it has not been the practice for us to have any statement from delegates returning from the League of Nations. I believe all hon. members would be pleased to hear a report from the Minister of Railways, who has made some very excellent speeches outside the house. We should have the advantage of such speeches in the house.

One cannot attend the sessions of the House of Commons at Westminster without feeling that we enter there a very different atmosphere. England, although not actually a part of the European continent, is just on the edge and it is natural that European affairs should enter into discussions of ordinary matters of policy. We recognize that the parliament of the United Kingdom must discuss affairs relative to the whole British Empire and in Great Britain an opportunity is given for such discussion. A number of voluntary committees representing all sections of the house are continuously at work considering matters pertaining to foreign affairs.

I think it is taken for granted that an informed public opinion on these matters is highly desirable at the present time, but how can we hope that the public will become greatly interested in them if they receive no discussion in this parliament, if they are considered to be so far removed that members of parliament will not take the trouble to make inquiries concerning them or to discuss them as they would matters nearer home? It would seem to me that if the proposal of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Luchkovich) were carried out, it would go a long way towards stimulating public opinion in this regard.

Hon. members will recall that a few years ago a committee on industrial and international relations was set up. A number of industrial matters were referred to that committee, such as minimum wages, unemployment insurance and so on. Unfortunately the law officers of the crown stated that a great many of these matters came under provincial jurisdiction and nothing very definite in the way of legislation came out of the inquiries. So far as I can recall, only one matter relative to international affairs was referred to the committee. This was the motion of the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) that scholarships should be established for the study of international affairs. Again there was no very definite result from the inquiries of the committee because it was considered that this might be an educational matter and that provincial jurisdiction might be involved.

But there are other important matters which clearly come under federal jurisdiction. What are we going to do about the league? Are we going to continue our membership and, if so, what policy is Canada to advocate? I think we ought to know. Negotiations have been going on between Sir John Simon and Italy, and as far as an outsider can determine, these negotiations might very easily weaken the influence of the league. I am glad to see the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in the house this evening, and I think we have the right to know from him the attitude of the government in respect to this matter. It seems to me that Canada being a member of the league, we members of parliament have a right to information on such matters. If the government has formed some policy, the country should be informed as to what it is. The same thing is true in connection with the disarmament question. We have been a member of that conference which has dragged on year after year and which now seems destined to absolute failure. The conference has not been formally disbanded but in the meantime the making of munitions of war is being carried on at a tremendous rate. Are we making any representations to the league in this regard?

I am well aware that numerically Canada is a small nation, but the Prime Minister likes to tell us that we are the fifth exporting nation in the world. If that is so, we ought to be sufficiently important in world affairs to have something to say with regard to this matter. In one visit abroad to the league I was told again and again that Canada occupied a strategic position in world affairs through being a part of the British commonwealth of nations and being located on the North American continent side by side with the United States. It was stated that Canada might be reasonably looked to to interpret the attitude and viewpoint of the United States toward other parts of the empire and to the League of Nations. I wonder if that is true?

Since Canada is located on the Pacific as well as on the Atlantic, we have vital interest in what is going on in the far east. One can hardly read the despatches recently appearing in the press without being apprehensive of the ultimate breaking out of trouble between the United States and Japan. Every careful student of international affairs must recognize dangerous possibilities in the present situation. If friction should break out and war should ensue, can any one believe that Canada would be able to keep out of the conflict?

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Some hon. member asks "why not?" There is a definite possibility of aerial warfare. The United States owns Alaska and there is a considerable gap between the Alaskan panhandle and Seattle. Undoubtedly, planes going backward and forward would pass over our territory and I do not think it would be very long before our position would become extremely delicate. It is all very well for hon. members resident in the east to believe that any future trouble will be largely in Europe, but they should not forget that Canada has a western outlook. The problems of the orient are of vital importance to us and we ought to know what our policies are with regard to them. We ought to know whether we are likely to follow the policy of Great Britain or the policy of the United States, which latter we did at the time Mr. Meighen threw his influence against the renewal of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. We ought to know the policy of the government on such matters.

It may be said that questions of this kind should be left to the Department of External Affairs; I do not think they should. They have not been so left in Great Britain. I recognize that a great deal of the information which comes to us from Great Britain as well as some of the information from our embassies in Japan, Paris and Washington, must be considered as confidential, but some of it ought to be available to hon. members of this house. We should not be left in the dark as to the main lines of the government's foreign policy.

We all know the procedure of our select committees. In such committees an informal atmosphere prevails. The members do not sit in opposing ranks as we do here in the house. In the committee we sit around the room and the discussion is very informal in character. Further than that we can call witnesses. I would think that at least in the beginning, if this suggestion is adopted, we might have the Under Secretary of State for External Affairs come before the committee and tell us what he is free to tell. I am quite sure that he would be glad to give a great deal of valuable information, as he did at the time the resolution of the hon. member for Southeast Grey was under consideration. Further, it would seem to me a very reasonable proceeding that the delegates to the League of Nations and the International Labour Organizations should be present before that committee and make a report. After that, as we all know, these reports would be given publicity by the press, and these proceedings would form the basis for discussions throughout the entire country.

I am not suggesting that we in Canada will at one bound attain a fullfledged foreign policy. Our policy will approximate, I should judge, to that of the motherland, but we ought to know what the policy of the motherland is, and adopt a definite attitude toward that policy. Every intelligent citizen of Canada ought to be kept informed.

I am glad to support a resolution of this kind, not only because it gives us the opportunity of a discussion of such questions early in the session before the final rush sets in, but also in the hope that the government will give serious consideration to what seems not an unreasonable suggestion, and one that might be of great practical value to this country.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from a meeting where I was endeavouring to impress upon those present the importance of some of the matters to which the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Woodsworth) has spoken. I was endeavouring to point out that in this country we have a citizenship that begins with the municipality, and from there extends to the province. In the province we have our citizenship as Canadians, and then our citizenship as members of the British Empire. From that we have a world citizenship arising out of our relations with the League of Nations and our commitments under the Treaty of Versailles.

I did venture to point out the difficulties of any Canadian having a clear appreciation of the complexities, indeed almost insuperable, that have to be overcome in order that we may have a clear perspective of our world citizenship. I cannot but think that while it is highly desirable that we should not for a moment lessen our activities and our desire to promote peace and the reign of law and the rule of reason, we must not by the observations we make here or elsewhere endeavour to induce the people to believe that we are a nation with the power and the authority to assert our views in the degree expressed by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat.

We occupy a position midway between the occident and the orient, and our influence is of course great because of that fact. We are deeply interested in the eastern civilization because of trade and because of the fact that upon the Pacific there are thousands of miles of our coast line. We are interested, of course, in the European civilization and vitally interested in the policies that are pursued by Great Britain.

But I need hardly point out to this house what every member realizes, that the foreign policy of the British Empire is perhaps the most difficult thing to contemplate that man can think of. Why? Because you have autonomous communities in South Africa, in New Zealand, in Australia, in Canada, and we have claimed and have been accorded rights equal so far as general principles are concerned to those possessed by the citizens of Great Britain. But we have neither the might of a navy nor the force of an army, and when we in the international field endeavour to express our views we are measured, unfortunately still in this day, by our ability to carry forward any undertaking to which we commit ourselves.

Those members of this house who have followed with care, and some have—some have not because of the very nature of the complex problems involved, and with the duties cast upon them from other angles they have not had the time to give to it—those who have given thought to the matter will realize that this country has steadily endeavoured to promote peace and disarmament. On all occasions where the opportunity has offered the Canadian people have at once supported every measure, international or otherwise, that would insist upon developing an atmosphere of peace—the Kellogg-Briand pact, questions relating to the arbitration of justiciable disputes, the maintenance of our representation at the League of Nations with respect to the International Labour Office, attendance upon the meetings of the League of Nations—all these things that could be done by this young dominion to promote the cause of peace have been done.

With respect to disarmament, what is the position of this dominion? Will the hon. gentleman who has taken his seat suggest for a single moment that the views of Canada with respect to disarmament have in the very nature of things been seriously considered abroad? What have we to disarm? Will any hon. member say? All we can do is to throw the weight of our influence and the weight of our assistance and votes towards every cause that looks towards bringing about disarmament. In the short time that I have been responsible for any foreign affairs, I have always expressed it in these words, as I did on the occasion of the visit to this country of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, that so long as nations have armaments, just so long will you continue to have the invitation to use them. Whether you like it or not, tanks, aircraft, torpedoes, submarines, all these forms of armament, if they are constructed, tend to develop the view that they should be used. There are those commentators upon the late war who believed that it was entirely attributable to the fact that a moment was reached when with all the developments that had taken place in the construction of arms, and with the equipment of troops, they could no longer be held in leash, and conflict was inevitable.

To the extent of our ability this country has thrown itself with all its force on the side of peace and disarmament. Whether it be the government that was lately in office or this administration, it matters not; for ever since we have had a voice that voice has been raised for peace and for disarmament.

But now the question is raised in this chamber as to the lack of facilities for discussion. When the estimates are before this house discussion can be prolonged for days to obtain by question and answer any information that might be desired. So far as the production of papers is concerned, any hon. member who desires to do so can read the journal of the League of Nations. It must be within the memory of the house that within the last few weeks an appeal has been made to the Canadian people over the signatures of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Woodsworth) and myself, asking for more study on the part of the people of the problems that are involved. We believe as a result some good has already been accomplished; local organizations, branches of the League of Nations, have been created in small communities for the purpose of systematic study, through the publications of the league and through the journal, its newspapers, of just what are the problems that have to be considered.

But I should like now to turn from that phase of the question to the terms of the resolution. I cannot accept it. No member of any administration charged with responsibility, which has a majority in the House of Commons, would accept that resolution. If I might say so, it is a very cleverly devised part of the campaign and program of my hon. friends who sit opposite and to the right. This afternoon it was the nationalization of insurance; to-morrow it may be the nationalization of the banks; to-night it is one step forward—not a responsible government any longer, but government by a committee of the house instructing the administration with respect to foreign policy. This is subtle, clever, indicating that new methods are to be adopted rather than the old, frontal attack methods that have heretofore prevailed. But the glove still covers the mailed fist.

Let us look at what representative institutions are. Is there an hon. member belonging, at any rate, to the Liberal party who does not realize that this resolution asks that the whole subject of the foreign policy of Canada be referred to the committee on industrial and international relations for study and report? That is not the way in which Canada has been governed and it is not the way in which it will be as long as we have representative institutions and responsible government. When the government departs from that policy which the house believes should be followed, a vote of censure secures its defeat. Thus England is governed; thus under a socialist administration England was governed. No committee hearing witnesses and discussions makes a report to the house as to what the government should or should not do; the government acts and upon its actions it stands or falls. The responsibility for its conduct lies with the administration and by its conduct it must stand or fall. A committee may be set up, indeed it may consider many phases of matters, but how could a government function if a committee instructed to study and report as to questions of foreign policy made a recommendation that a certain line of action should be followed without being cognizant of the facts that control and influence the action that must be taken?

Only last week I asked the Under Secretary to have prepared a white paper for circulation amongst the members of this house, containing a full and complete report of what had taken place at the disarmament conference in the way of suggestions, together with the final report, also together with the present recommendations made by the British government as to the settlement of the problems involved, and in addition, a copy of the speech of Sir

John Simon, Foreign Secretary, in connection with the matter. I did that in order that the house might be informed before the estimates came up for consideration. But am I to be told that the government of this country, which after all has no army and no navy and is not concerned about the problem of disarmament as regards having anything to disarm, but is vitally interested in everything that affects the welfare of the world at large and that larger world citizenship which we have accepted—concerned as we are about that, am I to be told that the government is to be directed by a committee on foreign relations? If you will consider the number composing the committee, you will see that it is rather a large one. Are they to meet regularly in a room in this building, to have brought before them papers and documents and to inform the government of the principles that must govern in connection with foreign policy? Foreign policy is something that changes from hour to hour, from day to day. Of course only the broad outlines of a great policy can affect the Dominion of Canada. Those broad outlines of Canadian policy are to maintain peace, to assist disarmament, to bring it about so far as our power is concerned, and, further, to lend our influence and the strength of our position by reason of our geographical situation and our numbers to offer measures that may be promoted within the British Commonwealth of Nations to secure those two ends which are fundamentally the principles upon which democracy lives, namely, the maintenance of peace and the elimination by the nations of the world of arms and equipment for war purposes.

Then there is the question of arbitration, the determination of justiciable disputes by arbitration and awards; all these matters are to be promoted. I remember when Earl Granville went to the Foreign Office, he was told by the Under Secretary: "There is not a cloud upon the sky; there never was a moment when the sky was clearer," but in four weeks the nations of Europe were locked in war. I wonder whether one realizes how difficult it is to maintain any principle of continuity with respect to our foreign relations and, on the other hand, to maintain that principle mentioned in the resolutions of 1926 and the statute of 1930, that is cooperation and association with the other nations of the British Empire for the purpose of promoting the well-being of the whole?

We certainly cannot accept this resolution; we cannot accept the responsibility that is involved in the passing of a motion such as this, but the fullest opportunity is always afforded when the estimates are before the house to make all inquiries within reason, and if the question is not against the public interest, it will be answered. With this proviso the fullest opportunity will be afforded to every hon. member to ask questions in connection with any matter that affects this country in respect to its relations to the rest of the world.

So far as ministers are concerned, we have only three offices abroad, one in Paris, one in Tokyo and one in Washington. On this continent we are concerned more with matters that arise from administration and trade than with matters of diplomacy as they are understood in the older countries. In Paris the position is much the same; for I do not disguise from any hon. member that our influence among the nations of Europe qua nation is measured by our guns and ships, but qua our power in conference, measured by the fact that we represent 10,500,000 people and that those people are on the northern half of the North American continent. In Tokyo we are constantly in communication with our office there. As regards difficulties of great delicacy between the great empires of Japan, China and Russia, we are kept informed every day of the problems that confront the statesmen of the old world, but who within sound of my voice suggests that the foreign policy of the Dominion of Canada with respect to Japan can affect the world position?

Now, there is such a thing as sweet reasonableness. There is such a thing as having a proper perspective. There is such a thing as being able to see a position without exaggeration, to understand that great as your country is, important as it is, great as is its influence, it is not exactly what you would call a policy-compelling influence; because we have neither of the factors that go to make it such, in a world that resorts to war for the arbitrament of difficulties. But we will endeavour, as I repeat, and I cannot repeat it too frequently, to use in every possible way the influence that comes to us by reason of our position and the strength of our position within the British Empire to uphold every effort that is made to promote peace, to advance the principle of peaceful settlement of difficulties in the world's court, and above all to secure, if it be within the wit and power of man, that disarmament which will cease to make the possession of arms an invitation to breach of the peace.

Therefore I hope that upon reconsideration the hon. member who moved this motion will realize that it is the negation of responsible government, the destruction of the very structure that has been built up through the efforts—the opposition would say their efforts, but through the efforts of Canadians of all parties, that government shall be responsible to the House of Commons; and that when its policies, its conduct of foreign or domestic affairs, bring a vote of censure or condenmnation by this chamber, it ceases to function. For that reason we cannot accept this resolution or adopt the principle which underlies it. As I say, when the estimates are before the house the most ample opportunity will be afforded to every member to discuss until he is weary of the discussion every phase of our foreign policy, and I shall endeavour to the extent of my ability to answer any questions that are suggested.

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville): It was with no intention of pressing this resolution to a vote that I proposed it this evening. The Prime Minister a moment ago said we would have ample opportunity to discuss this matter when the estimates for external affairs are brought down in the house. For the past eight years I have noticed that the estimates for external affairs usually are brought down three or four days before prorogation, therefore little or no opportunity is afforded any member to discuss a matter of such great weight as the foreign policy of Canada. Now I have always been considered by my friends, and I believe by most hon. members in this house, as a pretty good sort of fellow. No one ever convicted me of being subtle until the Prime Minister of Canada registered that conviction to-night. I wish I did have the subtlety to get out of the position the Prime Minister has placed me in, but, being only a good fellow and having no subtlety, I am going to say no more on this subject. My only purpose in raising the question was to learn something about the foreign policy of Canada, and I thought this was one method of approaching that all-important matter.

We have had many delegates to various conferences concerning Europe and the far east, but none of them has ever reported to the House of Commons. The suggestion has been made that if we want to know something about the foreign policy of Canada we should read the periodicals and the proceedings of the League of Nations and other publications. Well, Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned I cannot find time to read all those periodicals; and if we were to try to arrive at some knowledge of the foreign policy of Canada by reading these numerous and very voluminous publications, hon. members will agree with me that the attempt to arrive at such knowledge would drive every one of us crazy. Therefore I thought that if we could get a short resumé from the delegates who have attended these various conferences, we would all be wiser as to the situation in which Canada now finds herself in relation to other countries. All I wanted was to have the government unscramble the very much scrambled situation in which Canadian foreign policy now finds itself. We have had it unscrambled to a certain extent this evening, but the process could be carried much further if the matter were considered in a committee and discussed at some length by the various delegates whom we send to these several conferences.

I do not intend to press the resolution, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the house the resolution will be withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

PENITENTIARIES

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO STUDY CAUSES OF CRIME AND TREATMENT OF CRIMINALS

On the motion being called:

Miss MACPHAIL:

That, in the opinion of this house, a special committee should be set up to investigate the causes of crime and to determine whether the penitentiaries of Canada are doing all that could be done towards protecting society by the reforming of the criminal.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the intention of the hon. member to proceed with the resolution?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the resolution is called again and stands it will be dropped from the order paper.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Speaker, a special arrangement has been made at the request of the mover of this resolution, who on account of ill health is not prepared to proceed with it. Your Honour noted the arrangement at the time, I think.

Mr. SPEAKER: My understanding was that in order to keep the resolution alive the debate would be commenced and adjourned; then the motion would hold a place on the order paper. If with the unanimous consent of the house the resolution is allowed to stand and not leave the order paper, there is no objection on the part of the Speaker. With that understanding the resolution stands.

Motion stands.

FEDERAL HEALTH POLICY

COOPERATION WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS—PROPOSED REFERENCE TO INDUSTRIAL AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS COMMITTEE.

Mr. HENRY E. SPENCER (Battle River) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the federal government should adopt a definite health policy which could be carried out in cooperation with the provincial governments, and with this end in view, the subject should be referred to the committee on industrial and international relations for consideration and report.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I trust that the wording of this resolution is such that the Prime Minster (Mr. Bennett) will not think for a moment that it is put forward with the one idea of undermining the confidence of the country in the government. I put it forward with the strong hope that I shall get a great deal of help not only from this corner of the house but also from the official opposition and from government supporters themselves. I hope it is worth considering carefully and that ultimately it will be accepted.

I think every hon. member in this house recognizes the great importance of public health. The house must also recognize that in these days of stress we are bound to have a great deal more sickness than in good times, because people are much poorer and have not the means with which to call in the necessary medical assistance, and many of them put off calling for aid until it is too late. In 1930 I had the opportunity of introducing a resolution along somewhat similar lines, dealing with full-time health units. The resolution read as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration advisability of making grants to the provinces equal to one-third the cost of establishing, and to cover permanently such full-time health units as may be organized.

That resolution was accepted by the government of the day, but within twelve months the government changed and nothing was done. I introduced another resolution along these lines in 1931, after the new government came into power, and they were good enough to accept the resolution then proposed, but owing to the fact that the financial crisis was upon us nothing was done. Therefore I come forward to-day with another request in the hope that some definite policy may be formed in regard to public health in cooperation between the federal government and the provincial governments.

Under the British North America Act I understand nothing is definitely said with regard to the care of health, and though it is necessary for the federal Department of Health to carry on certain work, most of the work is thrown on the shoulders of the provinces. So far as I know every province has some sort of policy and some sort of department looking after health, but much more can be and should be done in cooperation by the federal and provincial governments. I have five notations under my hand outlining subjects which I think are distinctly a federal responsibility, since each one has a national aspect. I appreciate the fact that the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Maclaren) has come closer so that he can hear what I am about to say. The five points which have a national aspect are first, tuberculosis; second, cancer; third, the prevention and control of insanity; fourth, venereal disease and fifth, child and maternal welfare.

Surely no province can be expected to deal with these matters, which should be handled by the federal government in cooperation with the provinces. We all recognize that the care of health is a serious matter not only for the individual but for the state as well. We have only to go back to the time of the war to realize the enormous cost of ill health to the nation. The other day I looked up some figures with regard to the number of men who volunteered following the outbreak of war, and I found that of a total of 465,984 some 45,000 were medically unfit. Of the remainder some 100,000 were sent overseas but, under the stress of training, were found to be physically unfit for service. All this cost the country a huge amount of money. I recall that the late Sir Arthur Currie, speaking in Montreal, laid emphasis upon the desirability of greater care being taken with regard to the health of our people. Later in the war, when conscription was brought in, I found that of 264,355 persons called only 83,355 were accepted; in other words 68 per cent were rejected, so that one can readily see the enormous expense to the country which resulted. If we had some definite policy of cooperation between the federal and provincial governments by means of which the health of our people could be kept at a much higher level than is the case to-day, such things would be impossible.

The other day some figures were presented to me by the Canadian Council on Child Welfare. We must remember that up to a year or so ago a large amount of money was being spent every year to bring people into this country, but when all is said and done the children most worth rearing are the children born in this country. Therefore I should like to present some figures in that regard. I find that of 235,666 children born in Canada in 1932 no less than 7,284 were still-born; 17,263 died before their first birthday; 21,874 died before their fifth birthday and 1,181 mothers died in childbirth. It is said that most of these deaths were preventable. One cannot look at these figures without realizing the great loss which might be obviated.

It is recognized that when sickness descends upon a household it affects the people in two ways. There is the expense of the medical, hospital and nursing attention, and there is also the fact that as soon as the bread winner is taken ill his wages usually stop. It is estimated by some health organizations in this country that in medical expenses and time lost Canada loses some $300,000,000 yearly, yet the total amount of money being spent in this country by government agencies in regard to the health of our people is only about $6,000,000.

Now I should like to point out that there are three diseases from which death may be prevented with proper care. There are diphtheria, typhoid fever and tuberculosis. Yet every year we lose about 11,000 people as a result of each of the first two diseases and about 8,000 as a result of tuberculosis. We find on consulting statistics that some people pay fully for medical attention, some pay in part and many cannot pay at all. The figures I have before me show that 49 per cent of the people who are sick pay in full, 20 per cent pay in part and 31 per cent pay nothing. There may be an odd one or two in the 31 per cent who intentionally do not pay anything, but I do not believe the average man or woman would attempt to avoid paying their bills for sickness if they could possibly meet them. As good health is something which we should strive to have among our people and as sickness does not stop at one's door, or even at provincial boundaries, it is essential in the interest of communities that we should take care of those who are sick, and we should further see to it that to the greatest possible extent preventive measures against sickness are taken.

We have an army of trained men and women with knowledge of health measures. It is unfortunately true that many of them are not fully engaged because the demand for their services, on account of expenses, is not made. There is the further fact, however, that many of them, although attending patients cannot obtain payment for their services and, for that reason, are working under a great handicap. I have but to draw attention to a situation which arose only a few weeks ago in Winnipeg. A few days ago in this House of Commons we were told that a doctors' strike had occurred in that city. That stand was taken by the doctors, not because they wanted to, but as a measure of self-defence. Apparently a condition has arisen in Winnipeg whereby the doctors cannot be sure of obtaining for their services enough to give them a decent living, and they want to force the responsibility upon some one so that their bills may be paid. With that in mind they have signed the following pledge:

> I undertake to refuse free medical service in the office, hospital or home to any individual in receipt of relief, unless an emergency exists. An emergency is one in which life is in imminent danger and for which immediate action is required. This is to take effect on and after the fifteenth day of February, 1934, unless the civic and/or municipal authorities concerned have made satisfactory arrangements with our committee.

I believe that is probably one of the most serious situations facing any city in Canada, and is a situation with which not only cities but country districts will be confronted if some plan is not forthcoming and some arrangement is not made between governing powers on one hand and the people on the other. Something is being done, but in too small a way.

Mr. ARTHURS: In what regard?

Mr. SPENCER: I will come to that. I know full well that the federal government does not undertake to take care of the full health program, and for that reason provision for only a limited amount of money for health purposes is placed in the estimates. Looking at the estimates for the year 1928 I found that while we were spending only $900,000 for health we made provision for the expenditure of $1,800,000 on penitentiaries. In the estimates presented this session we are spending $2,833,000 on penitentiaries and, so far as I can ascertain we are spending only $830,000 on health.

Dealing with another aspect of the situation, may I remind hon. members that a few years ago in our twenty-three universities 9,525 students were enrolled, while at the same time in our fifty-two mental asylums we housed no less than 25,259 inmates. This, in itself is a serious situation and one which should be given very serious consideration. We recognize to-day that generally speaking city people are healthier than people in the country. That is exactly the reverse of the situation that obtained a few years ago, and it has been brought about because in the cities there has been a certain amount of definite health organization. For that reason the health of the city people has been kept in a better state. Country people, who are without that care, are suffering a higher death rate and a higher rate of sickness. Quite properly the federal government takes care to keep out of the country all people suffering from any serious illness. Surely, if they recognize their responsibility to keep sickness out of the country they must recognize a responsibility to keep in good health those people inside our borders.

Undoubtedly excellent work has been done in connection with full-time health units. Particularly is that so in the provinces of Quebec, British Columbia and Alberta. In order that the house may have some idea of the work done in these units I should like to give the figures showing the death rate in three units of the province of Quebec, and indicating how, owing to the organization for the care of health, deaths have been cut down:

	Deaths per thousand 1926	Deaths per thousand 1928
Unit No. 1..	46	19
Unit No. 3..	26	14

These figures give one great hope as to what can be done and, of course, they indicate only a beginning. Furthermore, with the full-time health units taking advantage of endowments from the Rockfeller Foundation, which are given only for three years, it is essential, if they cannot afford to carry on without that help, that the federal government step in and give them aid. I am pleased to quote a statement of the present Prime Minister made in 1931, when I introduced my resolution favouring full-time health units in Canada and made the request for help from the federal government. On that occasion he said:

> Touching the necessity for the establishment of health units nothing need be said. I think the case is complete and almost before it is stated.

I have always recognized that for many years the present Prime Minister has taken a great interest in the care of health. Therefore I hope that he will give this resolution his very very sympathetic support.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does he not realize that under present financial conditions nothing can come of referring a resolution of this sort to a committee?

Mr. SPENCER: I appreciate that at the moment, with financial conditions as they are, nothing can be done, but we hope that trade is on the upward trend and that success is somewhere around the corner. If that is so—and we most sincerely hope it is—we might fairly give consideration to this matter now, even if we cannot do anything for twelve or eighteen months.

I should like to quote from the comments of a well known public woman who, speaking at a health meeting, said:

> Curious, is it not, that we cull our flocks and herds, allowing only the finest and most physically perfect to breed and yet when it comes to the human race, we allow the mating of the most diseased and imperfect, both mentally and physically.

She goes on to say:

> How long will sentiment outweigh good sense in dealing with this problem of the propagation of the race?

Some one asked me a moment ago what progress had been made in certain parts of Canada. A start has been made in Saskatchewan with municipal doctors, while Alberta has started with municipal hospitals. We have government clinics here and there which are giving some help, while examinations at schools are found to be very valuable. However, with all of this, we are merely scratching the surface. There should be some plan of cooperation between the federal and provincial governments in connection with preventive medicine. When all is said and done, too much work is done in simply making people well. If we exercised preventive medicine we would save the people a lot of sickness and bring about a higher standard of health. We would be a healthier, happier and richer nation.

Compulsory health insurance was started in Germany as far back as 1883, in Bismarck's time. Canada is supposed to be fairly well up to the front in social development, but in this respect we are far behind Germany which started this thing fifty-one years ago. Austria, Norway and other countries followed. Great Britain has a volunteer scheme, as have Italy, Sweden, Denmark, Belgium, France, Spain, Switzerland, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. All of these countries are ahead of Canada as far as the care of health is concerned.

A medical service should provide scientific diagnosis and treatment if needed; it should provide adequate pay for doctors and nurses; it should encourage health education, and it should correlate the work of all health agencies. If this were done the doctor would be assured an adequate income. His standard of living would be raised and he would have access to the proper equipment. It would provide regular examination for the patient, which he does not have at the present time. It would provide hospitalization, nursing and medical care irrespective of financial position. We must recognize that we cannot have anyone suffering sickness just because he has not the wherewithal. I admit that considerable free work is done, but there are many people who will not call in medical aid until the last moment, until very often it is too late, when they feel they cannot afford to pay. A provincial scheme is being put forward during the present session of the Alberta legislature to cover the whole province, and I have hopes that it will be accepted. However, no province, particularly a western one, can carry a scheme like this by itself.

In conclusion, I desire to make four suggestions. The first is that public health should be put on a business basis. The second is that the federal and provincial governments should increase expenditures for health as quickly as possible. The third is that the medical profession should be asked to cooperate, and I am sure that a great number of doctors, particularly those in the rural districts, will be only too willing to do so. The fourth is that the education of the public in health matters should be pressed. With these suggestions, I express the hope that the house will accept this resolution.

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Spencer), and I should like to make a few observations with reference to what he has said.

Taking a broad view of public health, both in the care of the sick and in the matter of sanitation, it is true that a large part rests with the provincial governments, but at the same time this is an incomplete statement of the case. I should like to indicate to the house just where the federal government and its Department of National Health enters in an important way into the measures that lead to the improved health of the people of this country. I would direct the attention of the house to an organization known as the Dominion Council of Health. This organization meets in Ottawa twice yearly under arrangements made by the federal government. It is composed of fifteen members which include a health officer from each province, representatives of agriculture and women's organizations, as well as a specialist in public health. I direct the attention of the hon. member who moved this resolution to the existence of this organization. It represents an attempt on the part of the government to nationalize in a manner the care of the sick and to improve sanitation. It brings together representatives from all the provinces and I think provides an example of cooperation. The fundamental principle in the council is cooperation among the provinces and I believe it meets to a considerable extent one of the matters referred to by the hon. member. In addition to cooperation, it strives to bring about standardization of methods and the adoption of uniform systems of reporting vital statistics, and deals with other important matters. I place this before the house as one effort which has been made by the federal health department to bring about cooperation among the provinces and to add to the efficiency of sanitation.

In discussing public health and its importance I think it is well that we should not fail to recognize the great advances that are now taking place in Canada. Whether you approve of the system or not, the fact is that in recent years there has been a marked advance in sanitation and in the care of the sick. It is true that a large part of that is done under the provinces, but the fact remains that the advances are very marked and very striking. Health units, for instance, have been mentioned. This is an organization of not many years standing, and was especially adopted for the benefit of those living in the country, far from the ordinary medical and nursing facilities. It is an organization that can be highly commended. It is there and it is growing.

I have referred to the council of health as being one method of reaching out through the country and advancing the care of the sick. I should like to mention some others. What is the federal department of health doing to-day in reference to drugs, proprietary and patent medicines, and foods? The work that is going on is very important indeed. The department which I have the honour of administering guards against exaggerated and false claims in regard to drugs that are on sale to the public. That comes under the federal department of health, and I trust that my hon. friend will include it among the important federal activities which are carried on. Proprietary and patent medicines and other medicines of that character must fulfil certain requirements. They must state on their labels the constituent or potent drugs which enter into their composition. It ensures that they do not exceed the proper dosage. It also prevents undue claims being made to the public. It protects the public who are so prone to depend on something that holds out to them great hope—cures for tuberculosis, cures for cancer, and so forth. All that work is being quietly but effectively done under the federal department of health to safeguard the people of Canada.

I venture to think that many hon. members may not be conversant with the fact of the connection between radio and the Department of National Health. It has been arranged, and is being carried out satisfactorily, that all radio broadcasting on the question of health and on cures and drugs must first be submitted to the department of health to be passed upon before it is broadcast. That has been found to be practical and successful. It is the means of preventing exaggerated advertisements being broadcast over the radio.

My hon. friend also referred to five diseases or five branches of disease in regard to which he thought the federal government should cooperate with the provinces to a greater extent than at present. Let me mention them.

Tuberculosis. Well, the government has for many years assisted in supporting the national organization for the prevention of tuberculosis —not spending an enormous sum, it is true, but still it has supported and is represented on that organization. Every endeavour has been made by the department to increase the influence of the organization in dealing with tuberculosis.

Then there is cancer. The federal government is not taking any special action in regard to cancer, but we know that during the last few years in almost every province extensive expenditures have been made for the purchase of radium. We are aware that the province of Ontario especially has developed cancer clinics, equipped with radium, where the work is going on in a very important way. It seems to me that the important thing is to have the matter dealt with properly and efficiently, even if it is not done under the federal department, and that work is being done efficiently.

As regards venereal disease, one must not forget that the federal government, because of its desire to help on that movement, made substantial grants for a number of years for dealing with venereal disease. A grant of over $100,000 a year was made for a number of years to assist that movement and put it on its feet.

Mr. SPENCER: Is the government still making the grants?

Mr. MacLAREN: No. The understanding at the outset was that the federal government would make a contribution, and it was a very substantial one, for a number of years, with the object of putting the matter in operation and supporting the organization.

In reference to child welfare, the department of health keeps in close touch with the child welfare association. One of its aims is to further the care of maternity cases, of mothers, infants and children, and this cooperation has advanced in the last year so that there is now a special connection between the Department of National Health and the child welfare organization. That is something which I believe will lead to increased efficiency, and hon. gentlemen will have the opportunity of hearing more about it when the estimates are under consideration.

Quarantine and immigration come under the jurisdiction of the federal department of health, in order that the government may protect the health of Canadians by preventing the admission of serious infectious diseases. The officers of that department, so far as immigration is concerned, are responsible for seeing to it that only those who are healthy and free from disease are admitted to this country. I trust I have given some examples of the really important work carried on by the department and affecting the whole of Canada.

I am afraid that the government will not be able to support the resolution, which is similar to the previous one asking that the matter be referred to a committee for report. The government is responsible for the efficient and satisfactory administration of the department of health. I do not know the views of the mover of the resolution, but it seems to me to be desirable in a matter of this kind that the motion should not be pressed to a vote. I trust he will view the matter in that way. In any case, however, the government will not be able to accept the motion.

Mr. SPENCER: Before the minister takes his seat, if he cannot give me some more hope than he has so far as regards the principle of the resolution, I would rather press it to a vote. The minister has certainly thrown cold water upon the whole question of cooperation in the matter of health. If he will give me any hope at all, I shall not press the matter to a vote, but I certainly cannot sit still under the last statement of the minister.

Mr. MacLAREN: I do not understand my hon. friend's suggestion that I am throwing cold water upon the question of cooperation between the provinces and the dominion, as almost everything I have said has been supporting it. I have given him many examples of the dominion government and in particular the department of health doing all it can to promote cooperation among the provinces. There is, so far as we can carry it out, a close connection between the provinces and the federal deaprtment of health. For example, there may come to the federal department information of an important character concerning, perhaps, some infectious disease, and that information is conveyed to the health officers of the different provinces. There is cooperation in that respect. There is an attitude of mutual helpfulness between the provinces and the federal department; there is a good understanding, and I wish to convey to the hon. member that I am not throwing cold water, as he says, on the question of cooperation. I am indicating that there is a cordial recognition of the importance of the whole question, and an attitude of increasing, so far as possible, active cooperation between the various provinces and the dominion.

Mr. ERRICK F. WILLIS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in regard to the resolution now before the house, because I am deeply interested in any policy which would give better health to the general public. The resolution before us, in my opinion, would involve a strengthening of the duplication of services which now exists as between the federal and provincial governments, and for that reason I am opposed to it. In the province of Manitoba from which I come we have a department of public works, even as we have here; a department of labour even as we have a federal department of labour; a railway commissioner even as we have a minister of railways at Ottawa; a minister of health even as we have the Minister of Health (Mr. MacLaren) who has just spoken; a department and a minister of agriculture just as we have in the federal government here; an attorney general just as we have a solicitor general here; a provincial treasurer as compared with the minister of finance and also a minister of mines just as we have a minister of mines at Ottawa. In my opinion the whole question of the matters to be handled by the federal as opposed to the provincial government should first be redefined in the light of present day circumstances, rather than that we should do anything to increase the duplication of such services. I do not agree with nor am I in favour of an amalgamation of the western provinces to bring this about. I hasten to make this remark due to the fact that the press in Montreal recently said that I had made such a statement. Rather do I think we should commence now to define those matters over which the federal government has sole jurisdiction and responsibility as against those over which the provincial government has sole jurisdiction and responsibility.

Let us consider for a moment the question of public works. Recently as a relief measure we constructed public works partly through the municipalities, partly through the provincial government and partly through the federal administration. If the poor voter, the forgotten man on the street, desired to make any complaint in regard to public works he had nowhere to go. He might try, if he would, to complain to the municipal council; he was passed on from the municipal council to the provincial government, from the provincial government to the federal government, and then, no doubt, the federal government passed him back to the municipal council again. This is on account of the fact that the individual responsibility of these bodies in connection with public works and other matters is not sufficiently defined. This fact is more clearly revealed in the operations of the department of labour whereby we now administer relief. Again the poor forgotten man has nowhere to go; he does not know where the responsibility rests. Here also we require a redefinition of where that responsibility may lie, because if you do not say definitely where it lies, you put a premium upon lying and much of it is done.

Mr. IRVINE: May I ask what is going to become of this forgotten man while my hon. friend is finding out where the responsibility lies?

Mr. WILLIS: Perhaps in view of the fact that the hon. member is creating a new party he will need some of these forgotten men in it.

Mr. IRVINE: If we have them all we will have the biggest party.

Mr. WILLIS: Then we come to the question of railways. I am completely at a loss to know what the railway commissioner of the province of Manitoba does. We have such a commissioner and no doubt he has some work to do. We also have a minister of railways in Ottawa and a department of railways in Ottawa, and why we should have the two services I am at a loss to know.

A duplication which perhaps will come still more closely to the attention of hon. members is that in connection with agriculture. We have experimental farms and experimental stations and experimental plots, some carried on by the provincial governments, some carried on by the federal government; and also so far as I am able to see from close observation of those within my own constituency there is complete lack of cooperation between the two administrations. It seems to me that the experimental farms of this country either should be run by the federal government, in order to coordinate these services, or else should be run solely by the provincial governments with a view to provincial requirements. At the present time we have scattered over the country experimental farms, experimental stations and other experiments which are costing the people a great deal of money and which if coordinated would be of some use to the public.

Again we have the attorneys general of the provinces and we have the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice at Ottawa. The fact that companies can be organized within provincial jurisdictions gives opportunity for those who desire to set up companies to sell nothing to someone for something. By this lack of cooperation, this lack of definition, avenues are opened to the man who desires to sell what he should not be permitted to sell, and to those who are trying to undermine the better kind of business in this country.

Then, as to the departments of mines, we have a minister of mines at Ottawa. I am not very well versed in what the provincial minister of mines does in the province from which I come; no doubt in most provinces they place provincial restrictions on a national mining policy, rather than seek to cooperate with the federal department.

The main point which I desire to make is that the present resolution is an attempt to increase the duplication of services to pay for which the taxpayers of this country are carrying a heavy burden. Whether we need at this time a health policy or not, I say the first step for the hon. member to take is to redefine the jurisdiction of governments in this country as between the dominion and the provinces. Having done so he can then pursue his measure, placing responsibility where it belongs. Therefore I point out again the very vicious policy that prevails in this country in respect of duplication of services as between federal and provincial governments, and say that I am against the motion, not that I do not desire better health conditions in this country, but rather that I think the wrong course is being taken to that end. I think first we should redefine those matters which are provincial and those which are federal, in order to relieve the forgotten man, the taxpayer of this country.

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put briefly before the house the point of view of the industrial worker in connection with health services. The statement was made this evening that the health conditions in the farming communities are much below those in industrial communities. No figures were quoted, and I am inclined to disagree with that conclusion. I think the health services in this dominion, particularly from the point of view of the medical men, stand in the same relationship to the nation as the schools did a century ago, a condition of, might I say, anarchy. A century ago the boys and girls of this country got a more or less indifferent education, owing to the lack of organization, the lack of interest on the part of the state in educational facilities for the average boy and girl of working class people of that time. So in the development of our modern civilization, and largely through the efforts of those of progressive viewpoint, the opinion was eventually crystallized into action that every boy and every girl in the country should, in the interests of the state and in the interests of industry and commerce, receive an education. The development of our educational institutions has been one of the driving forces of our civilization. I think it fair to say that to-day the medical profession stands in the same relation to the country and its services as education did many years ago. It is a tragedy that the state should spend the enormous sums it does on the education of our young physicians, and that on the completion of that education they should have to sit down and wait ten or fifteen years before they get anything that approximates a livelihood. Particularly is this true in view of the fact that it is not because of any lack of desire and need on the part of many people for expert medical advice and attention, but because of their lack of ability to meet the financial obligations that would confront them should they seek that advice. I am not unmindful of the enormous contribution that the medical profession has made to the people of this dominion, but frankly I believe that policy is absolutely unsound. We have long since passed the stage when physicians and surgeons should be expected to make that contribution to our hospitals and to the people in general without thought of reward. They are the only section of the professional classes who do so; no one ever heard of the lawyers doing it, or the teachers, or, might I say, even the preachers. Eventually we shall have to deal with the problem in conformity, of course, with the particular conditions existing in this dominion, as they did in Great Britain when they instituted their national health and insurance system. I believe that is one of the great social questions that will have to be met by this dominion. It is one of the predominant questions confronting our people—the provision of health services organized on a sound basis and administered by the state. You had in Great Britain at the inception of this form of legislation the same condition that you have in this dominion to-day, that is, active organized opposition of the medical fraternity within the country.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the hon. gentleman mind if I pointed out further that the provinces and the dominion each exercise jurisdiction? That is the difference between Great Britain and Canada.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am well aware of that fact, and many times in this house I have expressed the opinion that in the very near future amendments will have to be made to the British North America Act to permit the government of this country to meet the problems of this industrial age in conformity with the very necessary social measures that we think should be in operation here.

If I may digress for a moment, I might point out to the Prime Minister that I had some experience in Europe this summer with regard to developments in different countries. In some countries one sees the development of dictatorships while others, of course, have remained with democracy. I believe the greatest contribution made in Europe in the last generation has been made by the British people in their approach to the question of social insurances. In the last generation they have practically redistributed the wealth of Great Britain; they have had a revolution in regard to the distribution of wealth without the loss of a single life or the shedding of a drop of blood. Frankly I believe that is a far better way to approach these problems than the way in which they have been approached in other countries.

To get back to my point, however, I believe that in this dominion we will have to meet the points raised by the Prime Minister. Unquestionably the question of jurisdiction arises in regard to all these social services, including unemployment insurance and national health insurance, but if, in order to organize properly on a national basis, it is necessary to amend the British North America Act, I think that should be done as soon as possible. But we have a right to know whence the opposition comes with regard to such an amendment to the British North America Act, whether from the federal government or from the provincial governments, in order that we can bring into being the forces of public opinion—those forces that make a democracy and which are the very basis of its life—that are necessary in order to crystallize opinion in the various provinces with regard to such an amendment. I believe this would be in the interests of the medical profession as well, and I speak with some knowledge of their sacrifices. I believe it would be also in the interests of the great mass of the people in this country; the institution of a sound national health insurance scheme would be a great advance over the present condition which exists within the medical profession and would go some distance towards solving the problems of the profession with regard to the treatment of ill health and sickness in this dominion.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. SPENCER: I appreciate what the Minister of Health (Mr. MacLaren) has had to say with regard to the dominion council of health. I knew this body existed, but however good its intentions may be it cannot do very much in the way of spending money without the sanction of this house. The House of Commons is supreme; that is why we bring up these resolutions. I am offering this resolution to-night in order to secure the opinion of the house, because if the house goes on record as supporting a resolution of this kind it makes it possible for the dominion council of health, in its wisdom, to recommend what might be done to improve conditions.

For the life of me I cannot see why the minister should still object to the resolution going to the committee as proposed. I understood that last year it was agreed among certain members in different quarters of the house who were interested in health matters that the proper committee to consider health questions would be the committee on industrial and international relations. The government of the day have a majority on all the committees, and they are far better places to discuss these questions than in the house. The government have their own chairmen and have majorities on all committees. We could do excellent work if we were allowed to discuss these health matters in committee and bring in a report.

After I said I really did not appreciate his stand in regard to the resolution in the first instance the minister did go a little further.

I understand now that he is in sympathy with the principle of the resolution, and that it has his good wishes.

Mr. MacLAREN: I did not indicate that I was in sympathy with it at all; in fact I said that I was opposed to it. I said I was in sympathy with the idea of cooperation.

Mr. SPENCER: With the principle of the resolution.

Mr. MacLAREN: Not at all. This resolution proposes that a committee deal with the matter of policy. That was one reason why I objected to it; I do not think a committee should form a definite health policy for the government. Let me make it clear that I agree as to cooperation; that is our duty. I also agree that the work should be increased and that the work carried on throughout the country, whether by the provinces or by the federal government, should receive our approval. But I am opposing this resolution which seeks to establish a definite health policy.

Mr. SPENCER: I cannot see why the minister objects, but I am not going to press my point. Surely any government should have a definite policy with regard to these matters; I had hoped that the minister had a definite policy, in cooperation with the provinces. If he has not such a policy I hope he will soon get one; if he has a definite policy then I think it is up to the minister to declare it to this house. The minister mentioned in detail certain definite work done by the federal department. I should say that probably the federal department would not give up some of that work, that there are some angles of public health in which they claim a prior right, such as quarantine, immigration, and all that sort of thing. That indicates the difficult position in which we are placed with regard to this particular subject.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis), who criticized the overlapping as between the dominion and the provinces, but I think the hon. gentleman was wrong with regard to the question of health. I believe it might be much easier to put some of these other matters under the definite jurisdiction of either the federal government or the provinces, but the question of health is entirely different. There are certain matters which I am sure the federal government would not allow to get into the hands of the provinces at all. I would have no objection if the federal government wanted to take over the whole question, but they would not do that either. Therefore the provinces are forced to set up their health departments, and that being so it is imperative that cooperation should be pushed for all it is worth as between the federal and provincial government.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, this resolution was introduced; I had hoped to get a definite expression of opinion from the house which would strengthen the hands of the minister in bringing forward some plan which would let us know where we were going. We do know where we are going with regard to education, a matter which was brought up this evening. We have a definite plan in respect to the question of education, but we have only to go through the country to see the extraordinary situation existing in these times of crisis so far as sickness is concerned. We learn that the doctors in Winnipeg have gone on strike because they cannot earn a living. I am sure they do not strike because they do not want to give people necessary medical attention, but simply because the people are poor and cannot afford to pay their fees. Something has to be done. I believe on two or three occasions one of the hon. members from Winnipeg has brought this very important matter to the attention of the house. What are the doctors in Winnipeg going to do? They say they will not accept a case, unless it be one of emergency. When does an emergency occur? Hon. members may be familiar with the old story about the man who said he could feed his horse on nothing. He did very well until he got down to one straw a day, and then the horse died. That is the position we are likely to be in. When we hear the doctors say they will not attend except in a case of emergency. When that emergency arises many of the patients will have reached a point where help will be of no use.

As the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) said, we are facing a problem which could be compared with the educational problem of a generation ago. I believe it is about time the public realized that it is much better to pay a small insurance fee, through taxation, so that in the case of sickness a demand for proper services could be made. When people are well they can afford to pay a small amount of money for such a purpose, but when they are sick they may not be able to pay heavy fees for medical attention.

I must say I was quite disappointed that the minister did not bring forward a more definite plan. Of those who volunteered for war services we must remember the large number who were found to be unfit for military service. Undoubtedly those men thought they were fit, but upon examination found it was discovered that they had something the matter with them. From the national point of view alone it seems to me that this matter of health is one which we cannot afford to overlook. I know there has been an effort to cut down grants for health measures, such as those relating to venereal disease and so on. I believe that by such action we are simply making ourselves poorer. The time has come when we should put first things first; when all is said and done the human being should be our first consideration. We should definitely state whether or not we are going to try to make this nation healthy, and whether we want to put it into category A, B, C or D. Then, having made our plans, we should find some way of financing them. Surely we have not yet tapped all the sources. The hon. member for East Hamilton has said that in Great Britain a tremendous amount has been done with regard to the care of health, certain social legislation has worked wonders in improving the health of the people.

It seems to me that too many people are saying: "Oh, matters relating to money, or the ways of collecting it, are far more important than the care of the health of our people." I believe the time has come when we should change that attitude, decide first of all that we are going to have a happy, contented and healthy people, and then set about to put them in that condition. There may be a good deal in the argument of the hon. member for Souris as to the overlapping of federal and provincial departments. No civil servant wants to give up his particular end of the work. At the same time I believe he was quite wrong in his criticism of the overlapping of health measures. We must realize that we cannot give the whole work to the provinces, because in so doing we should be interfering with the care of immigrants in quarantine, and like matters. At the same time the federal government will not take over the whole responsibility for the health of the people, and it may be that they should not. As some of the work has to be done at one point, such as at the coast, and other work elsewhere, it becomes a matter of cooperation.

I repeat, I regret very much that the Minister of National Health did not take a more constructive attitude. We were handicapped during the regime of the last government with an attitude similar to that taken by the present minister. Had I not seen the minister speaking this evening, I would have said it was the one who held office five years ago.

Mr. MacLAREN: What about great minds?

Mr. SPENCER: Yes, great minds think alike. At the same time I feel that the public are demanding something more in the matter of public health. As I said before—

Mr. SPEAKER: I must call the hon. member's attention to the fact that it is now eleven o'clock.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[Mr. Spencer.]

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 13, respecting the Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Company.—Mr. Stinson.

PRIVILEGE—MR. LUCAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. T. LUCAS (Camrose): I rise to a question of privilege. Yesterday, on the orders of the day, I quoted from a Canadian Press dispatch to the effect that several conferences had been held between the Right Hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), on the one hand, and sundry officials connected with the Canadian Bankers' Association on the other. The dispatch also further implied that as a result of the said conferences the proposed banking legislation had been redrafted several times. On the basis of this dispatch I then asked what I considered to be a perfectly proper question, and one which was intended to be neither humorous nor offensive. I inquired whether interests other than those connected with banking institutions were being consulted on this important question. I was unable at the time to hear the Prime Minister's reply, but later on reading Hansard and also the press, I discovered that that reply made an unfavourable reference to my conduct in this house. The Prime Minister's remarks will be found on page 460 of Hansard as follows:

> If the hon. gentleman was as assiduous in the discharge of his duties as in endeavouring to make unnecessary trouble it would be really better for this country.

I might pass over the suggestion about my being a trouble maker, but the implied statement by the Prime Minister that the member for Camrose is negligent in the discharge of his duties is one which I am not prepared to accept, even from the right hon. gentleman, and I demand that these remarks be withdrawn.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the statement which the hon. gentleman has made is a correct statement of what transpired; the question that he asked was somewhat different from what he has just stated. He read an extract from a newspaper—which is against the rules of the house—and made this observation:

> That is all I wish to quote. I want to ask the Prime Minister, because I do not want to give a wrong interpretation to the article, is this Bank Act being revised and the legislation for a central bank being drafted to suit the bankers only or are other interests being considered?

Obviously that question did not require any serious answer, and the answer was:

> If the hon. gentleman was as assiduous in the discharge of his duties as in endeavouring to make unnecessary trouble it would be really better for this country.

That is a fair statement, and it represents no aspersion on the hon. gentleman; because, to suggest that the government was legislating for the bankers only and not for the people, is something which no government would have the right to treat as a serious question, based on a newspaper article which itself should not have been read.

Mr. LUCAS: I am not prepared to accept that explanation. I refer you, Mr. Speaker, to standing order 41, paragraph 297. The Prime Minister distinctly implied that I was not assiduous in my duties in this house—

Mr. BENNETT: Not a bit.

Mr. LUCAS: Yesterday, on the orders of the day, Mr. Speaker, one of the members supporting the government appealed for your decision against the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir), in relation to a similar occurrence, and that hon. gentleman was asked by Your Honour to withdraw.

Mr. BENNETT The two things are not the same at all.

Mr. LUCAS: Mr. Speaker, I ask for your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: What is the point of order raised by the hon. member?

Mr. LUCAS: On a perfectly proper question which I asked in the house yesterday and which called for a civil reply, the Prime Minister stated as reported on page 460 of Hansard:

> If the hon. gentleman was as assiduous in the discharge of his duties as in endeavouring to make unnecessary trouble it would be really better for this country.

He has distinctly implied something against my conduct as a member and which is contrary to the rules of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question as asked was undoubtedly out of order and the fact that the Prime Minister chose to make the reply that he did to the hon. member asking the question is a matter for the right hon. gentleman; if he is of opinion that another hon. member is making unnecessary trouble, it is not out of order to say so.

Mr. LUCAS: I insist that the Prime Minister was imputing improper motives to myself as a member of this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may not agree with the statement of the Prime Minister, but there was nothing out of order in it nor any point of order under the rules of the house. The question undoubtedly was out of order and would have been so ruled by the chair had not an answer such as that quoted been given.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): I rise to a question of privilege in regard to this matter. You, sir, stated just now that the question which the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas) asked of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) yesterday was out of order and that because it was out of order, I take it from your statement, the Prime Minister could make any answer he saw fit. It would appear to me that if the question was out of order, it was your duty so to state at the time without permitting the Prime Minister to reply, but in his reply, if anyone reads the statement, he would lead the public to believe the hon. member for Camrose is not assiduous in the discharge of his duties in this house. I protest against that attitude, because I know my hon. friend discharges his parliamentary duties just as well as does any other hon. member and there should be no reflection made in that regard. I protest against your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understood the Prime Minister this afternoon to say that there was no intention on his part of implying impropriety on the part of the hon. member who asked the question.

Mr. BENNETT: Except in asking a question which in itself imputed wrong motives to a government—that was what I tried to say. It was a question which as it read imputed wrong motives to the government and it was out of order.

Mr. LUCAS: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must not continue this discussion. The question was asked and answered. As I said a few moments ago, the question in the first place was not in order and nothing in the Prime Minister's statement of yesterday was out of order.

Mr. LUCAS: I must appeal against your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: There must be no more discussion; that is my ruling.

Mr LUCAS: Might I ask just what your ruling is on this question?

Mr SPEAKER: My ruling is that the hon. member is out of order.

Mr. LUCAS: I am sorry, but I must appeal against your decision, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Camrose has appealed against your ruling. Will you please put the question?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member for Camrose to put the statement of his appeal in writing so that I may know what it is.

On February 12, on the orders of the day being called, the hon. member for Camrose quoted from a Canadian Press dispatch in that morning's paper, as follows:

Mr. W. T. Lucas (Camrose): A Canadian Press dispatch in this morning's paper states:

Banking legislation occupies the Dominion government almost exclusively at a three hour session of cabinet council Saturday, and it is anticipated the bills to authorize establishment of a central bank, and to revise the Bank Act, will be brought into the House of Commons this week.

Several conferences between Prime Minister R. B. Bennett and Hon. E. N. Rhodes, Minister of Finance, and officials of the Canadian Bankers' Association have taken place in the past fortnight and the draft bill has been revised several times since it was printed.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member proceed to ask his question?

Mr. Lucas: That is all I wish to quote. I want to ask the Prime Minister, because I do not want to give a wrong interpretation to the article, is this Bank Act being revised and the legislation for a central bank being drafted to suit the bankers only or are other interests being considered?

Right Hon. R. B. Bennett (Prime Minister): If the hon. gentleman was as assiduous in the discharge of his duties as in endeavouring to make unnecessary trouble it would be really better for this country.

To-day the hon. member for Camrose complains of this statement made yesterday by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister explained that he had not intended to cast any reflection on the hon. member for Camrose, and the hon. member for Camrose continuing to discuss the matter, he was ruled out of order by the Speaker, on which ruling the hon. member appeals against the Speaker's ruling that he was out of order.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chair be sustained? And the ruling was sustained on the following division:

BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) made an inquiry the other day, and I promised I would reply yesterday. By an oversight the matter was not then dealt with. I find on investigation that the rule has been that when questions are asked the answer to which would disclose the business of an importer, such answer has not been given. That has been the rule. I see no reason why it should be departed from. I am not expressing any opinion with respect to this particular case, but I promised I would indicate to the house what the rule has been so far as I can ascertain.

WHEAT AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): I would like to address a question to the Prime Minister. On Friday last Mr. Sanford Evans made a speech in the Manitoba legislature in which he dealt with the wheat agreement, and stated that besides the main contract a supplementary agreement existed but it had never been made public. I would like to ask the Prime Minister if there is any other agreement in existence except the one we have in our possession.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) probably knows that the Prime Minister of Manitoba sent a telegram, to which an answer was sent. I have not the telegram before me, but the sense of it is this, that there is no agreement entered into that has anything to do with the question of production. It was agreed that 560,000,000 bushels would be required to meet the demands of the importing countries, and of that quantity 200,000,000 bushels were allocated to the Dominion of Canada. But although Russia signed the agreement it was not determined what the quota of Russia should be. That was to be settled by the importing countries. That was the only point left unsettled, and at the meeting of the advisory committee in London a few days ago the matter was still under consideration, and has not yet been finally settled as far as I am aware. Russia claims that their available quantity of exportable wheat amounts to more than in the opinion of the representatives of the other exporting countries was available. The result is that no final arrangement has been arrived at. There is no agreement that in any sense affects the production of wheat, supplementary or otherwise. The only question was, and I suppose that is what Mr. Evans had in mind, what the allocation should be with respect to the 560,000,000 bushels that were agreed upon as being the requirements of the importing countries. The 200,000,000 bushel allocation to the Dominion of Canada was not in any sense called in question nor is it callable in question.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, February 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gobeil for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE: (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I find it a little difficult to speak immediately after this family quarrel we have just witnessed, but you may be sure that we who have voted for the general rule that the rules of this house should apply to all in an equal manner, had no intention of taking away the support of the almost consistent supporter of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett).

Mr. BENNETT: Is there any rule, Mr. Speaker, that permits the hon. gentleman himself to violate a rule by making the statement he has just made? He voted against a ruling of the chair—mark you, a matter that is ended—and with his large experience he has now said that he did so in order that the chair might give equality to all. That is an insult to the chair and a direct reflection upon the rule of this house which was just adopted by a majority of 66. As a matter of order, if the hon. gentleman is going to be tenacious about questions of order, let him observe the rules and discharge those amenities in the house that a majority of 66 have said should be discharged.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Of course, Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman has developed the habit of considering as an insult every opinion we have held which differed from his own. I have differed with the ruling of Your Honour, but certainly my vote cannot be considered at all as a reflection, an insult or anything of the kind.

Mr. BENNETT: Good.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I see the clouds are already disappearing, and I hope my right hon. friend will soon resume his usual good humour.

Mr. BENNETT: That cheap talk does not go far, you know.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That would follow the four hour talk of my right hon. friend. I am always pleased to follow the remarks of the right hon. gentleman in complete silence and even with admiration, though with disapproval most of the time. I only ask him to reciprocate, and if he cannot approve of what I say at least he might remain silent.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: As long as the rules of the house are not disobeyed.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Of course my right hon friend always upholds the rules of the house. I have seconded this amendment, Mr Speaker, and that is my justification for taking part in this debate before the motion comes to a vote. As a general principle I believe everyone will agree that confidence is the bond which must exist between governments and those they rule. Confidence is what gives strength and success to their undertakings; confidence is the mainspring, the breath of life of governments, and without it no legislative, administrative or executive act of a government can carry any weight.

Especially is this so at a time of trouble and unparalleled difficulty. To-day many nations are fighting depression and ruin. Peoples with their backs to the wall have been attempting new and startling experiments. In his address the right hon. gentleman referred to President Roosevelt of the United States having been given dictatorial powers much greater than those which the House of Commons has conferred upon the Prime Minister. He forgets, however, this vital and fundamental difference between the two cases. Have you noticed, Mr. Speaker, that in every country where unprecedented powers have been granted leaders, whether it be in Italy, in Germany or in the United States, those leaders have behind them the solid support of the country. Do you believe that President Roosevelt would have been able to enlist what appears to be the unanimous support of the United States in the great initiatives he has taken in order to fight the depression in the United States if he had not had behind him the support of that nation? Opinions may differ as to whether he will succeed, but everyone agrees that he is fighting courageously and that he has the confidence of the masses in the policies he is trying to carry out, because he has proved himself independent of all controlling interests whether social or financial and because he is fighting the battle of the people. He has created a spirit, a state of mind and a national will in his country to try to come out of the abyss. He acts; he has done something, and even that is better than paralyzing inactivity.

In Ottawa, unfortunately, confidence is lacking, and without it nothing efficient can be done. The ship of state does not move.

Mr. COTNAM: Nonsense!

Mr. LAPOINTE: Who said that? It must have been an intelligent man who spoke just now. I repeat that the ship of state does not move. At times the engine makes considerable noise, sometimes agreeable and sometimes less pleasant, but somehow it does not seem able to gather headway. The government does not possess the confidence of the people. My hon. friend says nonsense; his electors will show that there is some common sense in what I say.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My electors will show you, all right.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am rather pleased to have apparently injected some life into the corpse. The government is the object of a deep and reasoned distrust, and a little later I will try to explain one or two of the reasons for that distrust. The plain truth, however, is that the government do not possess the confidence of the country, and they know it.

Mr. MALONEY: How did you find out?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There are unmistakable signs of that distress. Find out?—Well, we have had by-elections quite recently, and the verdicts have been both unequivocal and definite.

Mr. MALONEY: How about Three Rivers?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, that was in 1931,—three years ago.

Mr. MALONEY: And Athabaska?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Well, what about 1930; there was no doubt about that. But the verdicts have been most definite and unequivocal. The voice of the people cannot be denied in that regard. Not only in the by-elections have they spoken, but even in the provincial elections where governments have been led by friends of the right hon. gentleman opposite, they have been doomed. The results in Nova Scotia and British Columbia are both unequivocal and definite.

Mr. ERNST: They are sorry already in Nova Scotia.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Federal issues have been discussed generally in all those elections. Even the government of the hon. member from Ontario who has just spoken is shivering on the brink.

Mr. GOTT: The Liberals will not elect twelve members in Ontario; they have no leader, or followers.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask hon. members not to interrupt.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I like it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I know the hon. member addressing the house is quite able to take care of himself, but he should not be interrupted.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The government in Ontario exists only because it has extended its life for a number of years longer than the electors had in mind when electing it to power. The result in one by-election, namely that in East Kent, shows the trend of public opinion in the province of Ontario.

In his address the right hon. gentleman opposite suggested that defeat is the fate of all governments in times of depression. Well, it is not the fate of the government in the province of Quebec. In that province quite recently there have been three by-elections. One was contested and the Liberal candidate was elected by an increased majority. The two others were unopposed. One vacancy was in the constituency of Jacques Cartier, a constituency which in this house is represented by the general organizer of the Tory party in the province of Quebec. He allowed a man who at the last general election was his opponent to go unopposed to the provincial legislature.

An hon. MEMBER: Wait and see.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, wait and see. That is the great cry for victory in every battle. Hon. gentlemen coming from my province know that in every instance federal issues were discussed. Their friends bitterly resented those discussions in the by-elections.

The Prime Minister and his government have been on trial everywhere, in every part of the country, in every agricultural, industrial and mining constituency throughout Canada. East and west, north and south there has been a united verdict. I have too great personal admiration for the right hon. gentleman leading the government—and he knows it—to believe for one moment that he will force himself upon an unwilling country, despite the advice he receives from those around and behind him. Let him not be deceived by the cheers with which he is acclaimed and by the interruptions with which I am received when speaking. The most powerful force in the consolidation and support behind my right hon. friend opposite in this House of Commons is the terror of a dissolution. Their cheers, and my right hon. friend knows it, have the same value as the musical expressions of those timorous people who sing when they pass a cemetery.

I have this further to say: Some people appear to be under a delusion that when a government is elected for five years it must go to the limit of its term. The other day the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) stated that his reason for opposing the amendment is that this house was elected for a term of five years, and that it must go to the limit of its term of office. Last week one of the newspapers of my own city in a well written editorial took the same stand, and said that the Prime Minister must not mind the demands for a dissolution, that he had been elected for five years and that he should stay for that length of time. This is a mistake. The American constitution provides for the election of a president for a fixed number of years. The British or Canadian cabinet has no such term of office. Its life depends on the confidence of the people and the country. It is in direct violation of the principles of our constitution that a parliament should continue its existence when it no longer commands the support or enjoys the confidence of the majority of the people. This government to-day is in as humiliating a position as was the Conservative government, or whatever its name was, in 1921. At that time all the by-elections had gone against the government when my right hon. leader moved an amendment to the address similar to the one we are now discussing. On that occasion I quoted statements of British statesmen and British constitutional authorities in support of the views I have just expressed. Time does not permit me to quote all of them in this debate, so I shall refer to only one or two. When Mr. Gladstone had dissolved parliament before the expiration of his term of office because of the fact that by-elections had gone against him, and when he had been reproached in the British House of Commons for having taken such action he said:

I think he—

Meaning the gentleman who had spoken.

—fundamentally misunderstands the constitution of this country if he supposes that the actual majority that a government may possess in an existing House of Commons is sufficient to give it more moral and political strength for the discharge of its arduous duties, after it has become apparent or when it is becoming clear that the possession of that majority is not agreeable to the sense and the convictions of the country.

And he added:

. . . and the mere possession of a parliamentary majority, satisfactory as it is when it is a true indication of the actual current of feeling and opinion of the country, is no adequate support and no adequate warrant for the continuance of a government in office if it has become clear, or when there is reasonable ground for supposing that the desires of the country are in an opposite direction.

Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman in 1905 took the same stand. At that time his remarks were:

The moment the House of Commons gets out of touch and harmony with the country, then that plea for retaining office dissolves; and the right hon. gentleman has no right to entrench himself behind the confidence and support of his friends here after it is known to all mankind and to himself, as well as to any of them, that he has lost the confidence of the country.

I should like to quote Professor Dicey in his Law of the Constitution and what Sir William Anson says in his Law and Custom of the Constitution, but if any hon. gentlemen would like to see those quotations I would refer them to the Hansard of 1921, page 464 and following pages.

We are moving this amendment because it is the right and the duty of the opposition to protect as far as it can the constitutional doctrine of the responsibility of parliament to public opinion. The Prime Minister has lost the confidence of the country largely because of his unredeemed pledges, his broken promises, and the facility with which those promises were repudiated by one who had represented himself in 1930 as having found the key to an earthly paradise. I shall not refer to those promises as they have been quoted quite frequently in this house, but one cannot help remarking the singular similarity between the way the right hon. gentleman emphasized those pledges and the way Herr Hitler in Germany speaks to his people. The Prime Minister used to finish his sentences by saying, "or I will perish in the attempt." Hitler, in his momentous address to the German people on the eve of the so-called elections a few months ago used the following language, "If I fail, hang me to the gallows." Mr. Speaker, we are not cruel on this side of the house and the only thing we want to hang my right hon. friend with is the ballot boxes of the electors of Canada.

The public distrust which is shown everywhere in the country is largely due to the failure of all the policies which have been initiated by this government, and which have almost ruined our trade and made our agriculture destitute. At every meeting where it was my privilege to speak, either at by-elections or elsewhere, I have asked the friends of this government to name a single one of its policies which has been successful. At last one of the ministers seemed to take up the cudgels and discussed at length the reduction of the expenditure of the Canadian National Railway. What a tremendous achievement!

The trade policies of hon. gentlemen opposite have inflicted a death blow to our national railways. Our railways do not carry any more freight; some stations are closed; shops are inactive; men are dismissed or suspended, and others have had their wages cut; and then the government is proud of that record of having reduced the expenditure on the Canadian National Railway. The government deserves as much credit for that reduction of expenditure as an inefficient and unsuccessful merchant deserves who, when he is on the verge of bankruptcy, dismisses his employees, closes some of his stores and buys no more goods. He also reduces his expenditures.

We have been told every session to wait. At the first session we were told to wait until the imperial conference took place in 1930. In the following session we were told to wait until the Ottawa conference took place. Then afterwards we were told to wait until the world economic conference took place. Well, it has taken place, and the best that can be said about this last conference is that its failure did not cause the tremendous consequences which had been predicted that lack of success would bring about. Every statesman, everyone who had anything to do with that conference from the illustrious personality who opened it down to the humblest delegate, all stated that the strongest reason for the success of the conference was that the peoples of the world could not face the result of failure. But fortunately the breaking down of that conference does not seem to have been followed by anything more disastrous than what preceded it. We would be justified, however, in believing that sooner or later the world will suffer greater material harm if there is no international agreement as to trade, and if the nations do not begin to realize that they cannot all of them try to sell the same things in the same market at the same time. They must try to cooperate and exchange goods with one another and modify tariffs, quotas, embargoes and so forth.

That conference served to emphasize in a most glaring manner what is the real trouble in almost every country in the world. On the first day the delegates were all unanimous as to the changes that had to be made. They all deplored the economic situation brought about by the policies of the individual countries. Secretary of State Hull, of the United States, summarized the evil in this way:

> Economic nationalism as practised since the war comprises every single method of obstructing international capital and trade, such as high tariffs, quotas, embargoes, exchange restrictions and depreciated currencies.

Everybody seemed to agree that something must be done, but immediately after the real work started, the fight began so that the coming changes should not affect the respective countries of the delegates. The same condition exists in the national field. Everybody in Canada seems to admit the necessity of reforms, but those who seem to have most to do with the government of the country are not willing that those reforms should affect themselves or their respective industries.

The Prime Minister, of course, had disqualified himself from assuming any position of leadership in the promotion of needed reforms at the conference because as soon as he took office he summoned parliament for the purpose of erecting a wall around Canada, a wall of tariffs, high duties and embargoes. What moral authority could he have, then, to preach the return to economic sanity and cooperation? The Prime Minister now gives as his justification for his tariff policy of 1930 that we had then an unfavourable balance of trade, and that had to be changed. I do not wish to express any opinion as to the merits or demerits of a favourable balance of trade, but I remember many hon. gentlemen opposite who said in my presence in this house that it did not mean anything. Further, during all the years when we had an overwhelmingly favourable balance of trade, the right hon. gentleman and his friends were just as vociferously clamouring for higher duties and higher protection in this house.

May I also say to the Prime Minister that what the people of this country are most anxious for is not a favourable balance of trade, so far as the trade of the country is concerned. What they do want is a favourable balance of trade in their own business, and that balance has been unfavourable because of the policies of the administration. The Prime Minister has been most unfortunate in translating patriotism into tariff barriers. In 1930 he erected that barrier of the tariff just before he went to the imperial economic conference, where he proposed to lower our tariff by ten per cent to the countries of the empire in exchange for a preference in the British market. But, of course, they all realized over there that when a wall is so high that it is impossible to get over it, it does not mean much to have it cut ten per cent if you cannot get over the wall even then. And that is why one of the fellow delegates of the Prime Minister qualified his proposal in a way which, in this parliament, we are too courteous to describe.

Following this we had the Ottawa conference. This conference has been described as a great achievement by the mover and seconder of the address. I consider it another link in the chain of harmful policies which are hampering world trade. As the right hon. gentleman had tied his hands in advance, before he went to the conference in 1930, so he tied his hands in advance, by the Ottawa agreement, before he went to the world economic conference of 1933. We have higher tariffs against all nations on a large number of articles, and he bound us by treaty not to change those tariffs, before entering into negotiations and common agreement with other nations.

In the Contemporary Review of January, 1934, Sir Archibald Sinclair gives the reasons why he has crossed the floor in the British House of Commons. At page 4 he says:

> It is true that the economic situation remained grave, but in the view of the Liberal ministers it was being aggravated by the protectionist policy of the government, and from their standpoint the only possible justification for remaining in the government was the hope that the world economic conference would result in an abatement of economic nationalism throughout the world and the restoration of world trade.
> This hope, however, was impaired, if not destroyed, by the Ottawa agreements. If international trade was to be restored, one of the primary objectives which the British government were bound to pursue at the conference was the abolition of quotas which Mr. Runciman, the President of the Board of Trade, described at St. Ives on February 2, 1933, as "insane" and "the curse of European trade." Yet as a result of Ottawa we should be adopting quotas in this country at the very time when the Prime Minister, as chairman of the conference, would be appealing to other nations to relinquish theirs. Similar exhortations would be delivered by leading British ministers to foreign nations to lower their tariff walls; yet at the same time, as a result of Ottawa, large increases of British tariffs were in contemplation.

My right hon. friend can see therefore that we are not the only ones who deplore the trend that matters commercial have taken as a result of the Ottawa conference. My view is that economic imperialism as initiated by the Ottawa conference is not much better than economic nationalism as practised by the right hon. gentleman in 1930.

I am afraid that the forty minute rule will prevent me from saying all that I should like to say with respect to trade and similar matters in relation to the economic conference, because there is one question in particular on which I desire to say a word or two. I refer to the question of titles. I do not wish to discuss this matter at any length, but merely to defend the action of the House of Commons of 1919 and to repel the charge of the Prime Minister that it was an affront to the King on the part of those who voted for that resolution. It is true that the resolution was not an act of parliament. The right hon. gentleman has built up a man of straw in order to knock him down when he says that only an act of parliament could abolish the prerogative. Nobody ever said that the prerogative did not exist; nobody ever said that this resolution of the House of Commons destroyed or abrogated the prerogative. It did not abolish it, nor was it intended to abolish it; it merely conveyed the will of the people of Canada, through their elected representatives, that this prerogative should not be exercised so far as Canada was concerned. The right hon. gentleman knows very well that, either by statute or by the conventional rules of the constitution, the King's prerogatives have been transferred to the ministry. Many people have queer ideas regarding the royal prerogative. In the exercise of the prerogative the crown acts on the advice of its ministers, who are responsible to parliament for the proper exercise of the authority. There is in fact no executive act of the crown for which some member of the ministry or the ministry collectively is not responsible. Things which the King formerly did by virtue of his prerogative he now does by virtue of the advice of those to whom the discretionary power has been transferred. And so, as Dicey states in his Law of the Constitution, eighth edition, page 421:

> We may use the term "prerogative" as equivalent to the discretionary authority of the executive.

Ridges, in Constitutional Law of England, fourth edition, page 157, says:

> The prerogative is no longer the personal prerogative of the king but the privilege of the executive.

Of course, everyone knows that honours are not bestowed by the King but by the Prime Minister. When His Majesty the King is mentioned in the resolution of 1919 it is His Majesty the King in the constitutional sense, namely, the authority that has discretionary power, the executive. I have no objection to the change which my hon. friend from East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) is making in his resolution in order to meet the views of the Prime Minister and take away from him an excuse for opposing the resolution, but I still believe he was right in the way he had originally proposed it.

The Prime Minister suggested that his predecessors and those who were here in 1919 had no time to see his point because of pressure of business. Let me tell him that the question was studied and considered and discussed for two consecutive sessions. A strong committee of the house was appointed and it sat for a long time. Strong men were on the committee, and the resolution was drafted as the result of the work of that committee. The resolution was voted for and approved by gentlemen who would not agree to anything which would have been an affront to the King. And I may say to my right hon. friend that there were men on this committee who would have been able to see whether or not there was an affront to His Majesty. The Hon. N. W. Rowell, present president of the Canadian Bar Association, was one of those who voted for the resolution, and he does not deserve the imputation conveyed in the words of the Prime Minister. So was the Right Hon. W. S. Fielding, and he did not deserve this imputation. So was my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion), so was my hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon), and so were many others who voted on that resolution, as I did.

Mr. McGIBBON: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to explain—

Mr. LAPOINTE: If my time is extended I have no objection. It is not at all an affront to the King to say that honours in the old country have been sold time and again and have been a source of corruption; nor was it an affront to the King to say that in this country titles were granted in a most tactless way. And that was the reason why the institution had become so discredited in Canada. We offer no affront to the King when we say this. It was the ministry that was responsible and it was the ministry that deserved the imputation. With reference to the speech of His Excellency, I have even heard some say that it was a stupid document. Surely nobody means that as an affront to His Excellency; it is because His Excellency has the misfortune of receiving bad advice from those who are responsible for the drafting of that document. May I say at this point: Why throw this bone of discussion into the arena at the present time? Why divide the people on the question? Who asked for it? Were we not happy without it? Was there any body of public opinion anywhere clamouring for this obnoxious practice? I have heard it said that because of this restraint, Canada was on a footing of inferiority with other British countries; indeed, that Canada was not equal to Newfoundland where there are more knights to the square mile than anywhere else in the world, that Canadians have an inferiority complex when they think or speak of the ancient colony. This alleged wound to the national dignity is sheer nonsense, to use an expression that has been used by the other side this afternoon. Canadians have never been prouder of their country than they have been since 1919. May I mention the Peace treaty, the League of Nations, higher constitutional development, the conference of 1926, the Westminster Statute, and to please my right hon. friend I shall even include the Ottawa conference. Canada is a nation. We may have no ribbons or medals, but we have pride of country; we have national dignity; we have love of service for what service carries in itself for those who devote themselves to it.

Let me say, though, as regards those who were selected this year to receive titles, that no better persons could have been found in Canada. But do hon. members think the prestige of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, one of the greatest legal men of the world, has been enhanced because he has been given this little word before his name? The same is true as regards the Chief Justice of my province; no better man exists in the world, but he did not need that title. In my city of Quebec I know a good lady who really deserves anything in the world, but the O.B.E. or C.M.G. or whatever the letters are does not add anything to the prestige of that lady; she does honour to the order she has been given; the order does not add anything to her.

Before I conclude, there is one thing I should like my right hon. friend to tell us as soon as possible. In western Canada on two or three occasions and even in the house last session he stated that there are some distinguished Liberals who have told him they approve his policy. Everywhere I have spoken, I have asked the right hon. gentleman—probably he did not read my speeches—to tell me who that most distinguished Liberal is? Where does he live? Surely he is not in Restigouche-Madawaska or in Mackenzie. Is he in Nova Scotia? Is he in British Columbia? Let him tell us the name of that most distinguished Liberal who has the confidence of the Prime Minister. Surely we are entitled to that disclosure.

While my right hon. friend is in the mood of taking us into his confidence I would like him to tell us where Canada stands as regards the advances or guarantees we have given in connection with wheat. This question has been discussed vaguely each year for the last two years, but so far nobody has been able to find out where the country stands financially so far as the wheat question is concerned. We would like also to have all details as to the guarantees that have been given to the railway companies or other corporations or other people. We want light during this session of parliament.

Mr. CANTLEY: The hon. gentleman needs it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I hope so. My concluding words are these: We are not the majority of this house, but we represent the majority in the country and as such it is all the more our duty to require all information and to defend the rights of the people during the present session. Nothing will prevent us from doing so. Hon. gentlemen opposite have a majority in parliament, it is true, but I would not change with them because we have the majority in Canada.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, in a sentence I should like to join with those others who have congratulated the mover and the seconder of the address on the splendid way in which they carried out that always difficult duty. We have been sitting in the house now for something over two weeks listening to a so-called debate on that motion, and I have noticed that practically all of the debate has been carried on by the official opposition. I had my secretary yesterday count the number of speeches and he informed me that the government had made eight; the C.C.F. had made eight and the Liberals, counting my hon. friend (Mr. Lapointe) who has just taken his seat, had made twenty-eight speeches. I have been sitting in this house now for nineteen sessions and I say in all sincerity that this has been the dullest, the most destructive and the most useless debate I have ever heard in the House of Commons. In a last minute effort to resuscitate the body which they have practically killed, my hon. friends are, I understand putting on three of their headliners to-day, the hon. gentleman who has just spoken being the first. Without meaning to say anything offensive to him, I do not think he has raised the average at all. In his speech he had but one good word for anybody and that was for President Roosevelt. His leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) preceded him in the same attitude. All I have to say about that is that if my leader had dared to take the arbitrary course that President Roosevelt has taken on many questions on many occasions, I can just hear the purple being torn off the skies by the leader of the opposition and the ex-Minister of Justice in accusing my leader of being a tyrant and an autocrat.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat says that we have not the confidence of the people and that therefore we should go to the country. Well, we shall be taking a vote on that question very shortly and perhaps this afternoon we shall know whether we have the confidence of the people. The only way in which one can judge of the confidence of the people of this country is to judge by the confidence of the house. It is rather a new doctrine that the hon. member for Quebec East is putting forward to-day that the opposition is the party which should fix the time for an election. I have never before noticed my hon. friend when he was a member of a government asking our opinion as to when an election should be called and I can assure him that we shall not ask his. His statement that the majority in the country is supporting them will have to be proved on the next occasion that the majority in the country get an opportunity, but I well remember during the last election in 1930, not only he but all the other followers of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie King) including the right hon. gentleman himself, insisted that they had the majority supporting them then, although, as the result showed, that was not the case.

I am sure my hon. friend from Quebec East will pardon me if I do not spend any more time on his speech. I endeavoured to jot down any real points he made so I could deal with them, but as he made very few there is almost nothing for me to deal with. I am however, going to deal with some points made by some of the other lieutenants of the right hon. gentleman. My hon. friend, the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) and my hon. friend, the member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) recently visited my constituency, and I thank them for doing so, because never did I have such meetings there as those I have had since then. The hon. gentlemen in their speeches, which I am sure were very well received, because I know they had good crowds, made some statements which I intend to deal with because they illustrate the high, wide and handsome way in which the lieutenants of my right hon. friend are going to deal with the issues in the coming election. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre made the statement—I quote from the Times-Journal which, not being one of my active supporters, I hope quoted him correctly, as they usually even quote me correctly—

Mr. HANBURY: But not your leader.

Mr. MANION: I do not know what my hon. friend is referring to. The hon. gentleman made the statement that Canada's debt was slashed in the five years of the Liberal regime by $257,000,000.

An hon. MEMBER: More than that.

Mr. MANION: That is the figure quoted in the Times-Journal. I wish to point out that that may be correct as far as the direct debt is concerned, but my hon. friend, like the right hon. gentleman himself and other lieutenants of his, forgot the indirect debt which was added to this country during their regime. From 1923 to 1930 the railway debt of Canada was increased to the extent of $461,000,000, just about double the amount of the decrease as given by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. And the interest on the railway debt was increased by $20,000,000 per annum. That is the indirect charge that is being paid by the people of this country through taxes at the present time. So they are not fair in stating that they cut down the debt of this country at all.

Then another statement my hon. friend made, in speaking of the wheat marketing policy of the government, was that the people have already suffered a loss of $30,000,000 by the action of this government. I merely say that the people of this country have not yet at any rate suffered a loss of one penny. The deal is not completed and no one knows at this moment whether we will suffer a loss at all or reap a profit.

Speaking of the royal commission on railways, my hon. friend said its recommendations were for a policy of amalgamation. That is absolutely untrue, they absolutely declared against amalgamation. Then he went on to say that by this amalgamation the government was trying to effect the absorption of one of Canada's great transportation systems, and an accounting would have to be asked for this effort to destroy public ownership. That is so plainly a misstatement that I do not intend to deal with it except to say that for the right hon. gentleman to say,—and he is supported by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) on every platform on which he goes—to say that this government is attempting to bring about amalgamation does not alter the fact that the law of this country to-day, introduced by the present government, prevents amalgamation. The last clause in the act to which he refers reads as follows:

> Nothing in this act shall be deemed to authorize the amalgamation of any railway company which is comprised in National railways with any railway company which is comprised in Pacific railways nor to authorize the unified management and control of the railway system which forms part of National railways with the railway system which forms part of Pacific railways.

So that amalgamation is absolutely forbidden by the law of this country. There are two distinct and separate managements for the railways, there is no hint of amalgamation. There has been some pooling of passenger traffic and probably there will be more, but as far as amalgamation is concerned there has been no hint of it and there will be none under this government.

Then the hon. gentleman brought in a subject which I say should not be brought into politics at all, and which up to his coming into this house was kept out of politics. He spoke of "another gross breach of faith by this government" towards the returned soldiers. There has been no breach of faith towards returned soldiers by this government, and I will be fair to the other side and say that there was no gross breach of faith by the late government towards returned soldiers. All the governments of this country from 1919 on have been eminently fair to the returned soldiers, and I make the statement now that I have made many times, that the returned soldiers of Canada have been treated better than the returned soldiers of any other country in the world.

Mr. HANBURY: By legislation, but not in operation.

Mr. MANION: It is possible that by some rigidities of the pension commission, if you will, there may have been an occasional injustice done. These injustices, if they exist, can be corrected, and as far as I am concerned and this government, we are anxious to correct any injustices, as anxious as my hon. friend who has just spoken and as all hon. members on this side or the other side or the third side have been in dealing with questions affecting returned soldiers in the soldiers' committee. But I suggest to my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre that when he or his friends attempt, as I am told they are doing, to inject this question into politics—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. MANION: I am glad to have that statement. At any rate he did throw it into politics in this statement in Fort William. When he or any hon. member brings the returned soldier question into politics he is doing the greatest disservice to the returned soldiers of this country that he or any man can do. No body of men stand to suffer so much by bringing the returned soldier question into politics as the returned soldiers themselves. I suggest to any of those who think of bringing it into politics, whether they are within or without this house, that they should be very hesitant about making such a move.

I do not intend to deal any further with my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre; I wish now to deal with statements made by the hon. member for Melville. He made a speech at Fort William, and like the hon. member for Vancouver Centre he was very well received, they all liked him very much. I do not think they took him very seriously, because one man said he was the most comical man who had ever come to Fort William. The hon. member for Melville said that the whole bonus policy on wheat was asinine and stupid. I suppose he does not find any fault with that quotation?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think that yet so far as the government's policy related to those who had no crop.

Mr. MANION: What puzzles me is that when that policy was being put in force the hon. gentleman was sitting in this house and I do not remember that he took any such attitude then. I remember standing in this house and daring any hon. member on the other side to stand up and oppose the wheat bonus policy, and not one rose to oppose it. Certain hon. gentlemen over there took the attitude that some details should be changed, that it should be carried out in some other way—

Mr. HEPBURN: You are quite wrong. I opposed the wheat bonus policy and spoke against such policy.

Mr. MANION: Yes, I think that is correct, I think the hon. gentleman who now leads in absentia the Liberal party in the Ontario house did.

Mr. HANBURY: What was the vote reported in Hansard?

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman said Canada got no preference out of the imperial economic conference whatever—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: For wheat.

Mr. MANION: That is not what the paper quotes him as saying. But we get six cents a bushel on wheat, if you limit it to that.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The Prime Minister does not say so.

Mr. MANION: This paper quotes the hon. gentleman as saying we get no preference whatever. On wheat we get six cents; we get a preferential quota on bacon and ham; a most substantial preference on cheese, apples, etc., and on copper, and a ten year preference on Canadian grown or manufactured tobacco. These are among the preferences we get.

Then the hon. gentleman spoke of the price of wheat, and he said that my right hon leader had driven down the price of wheat to the lowest it had been in three hundred years. Well, I do not need to deal with such a statement as that, because I do not think that even my hon. friend would seriously contend that the Prime Minister of Canada has the power to drive down the world price of wheat to the lowest it has been in three hundred years. The only thing I have to say in regard to the hon. gentlemen who were in my constituency—and whom I will be happy to welcome back before the next election because if they come at that time I think I will get an acclamation—is that when a new edition of Baron Munchausen is published, I hope their speeches will be included.

My only reason for making these references is that they illustrate the attitude the hon. gentlemen take when they get away from Ottawa, in places where they think—wrongly, I am sure—that the people do not understand these questions. I have a particularly cultivated and highly educated constituency, and I suggest to my hon. friends that when they try to put over this sort of stuff they should stay away from Fort William; my constituents have had a good member too long to be uninformed on any of the public questions of this country.

Now I should like to deal for a little while with my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) who spent four hours and twenty minutes, covering forty-two interminable pages of Hansard, weeping and wailing and gnashing his teeth about the terrible conditions in this country and the way the government is forgetting to do anything, not to help the country on the up-grade because he does not admit there is any up-grade, but to prevent the country from going further down-grade. Jeremiah, I think, was a cheerful optimist compared with the right hon. gentleman in his four hour and twenty minute speech the other day. What I should like to ask my right hon. friend is why he took four hours and twenty minutes and why he covered forty-two pages of Hansard in order to say what he could have said completely in one sentence; that is, that he had no use whatever for this government or any of its works, and that he would not admit of an improvement in business conditions in Canada, even though that improvement had already taken place. That was the attitude taken by my right hon. friend. The fact that the improvement has taken place did not affect him in the least except in reference to the coming election. He wants the election sooner, because he is afraid the improvement is coming too quickly. He does not like our tariff policies, our trade policies and pacts, our agricultural policy, our wheat agreement or our unemployment measures.

Mr. DUPUIS: Or titles.

Mr. MANION: I am not sure about that; he said he had nothing against titles. I think perhaps he is looking forward to the next time he gets in power. He objected to titles from their constitutional aspect but not from their personal aspect. He does not like our railway policies, and for that matter he does not like any of our policies. The impression I got from his speech was that he does not like the government, but the things that depressed him most were the Prime Minister's speech and the Prime Minister's optimism. As a matter of fact the right hon. gentleman objects to optimism of any kind; he does not think there should be any optimism at all. He thinks this government caused the world depression, and I think if he told the truth he would say that in his opinion we caused the war. Travelling home the other day, in company with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart), I looked over his speech; I spent my time reading the whole forty-two pages of it. I belong to that religion, Mr. Speaker, which believes in purgatory, and since reading that speech I have come to the conclusion that when I suffer in purgatory for my sins I am going to be forced to do my suffering in reading the right hon. gentleman's speeches.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope my hon. friend does not flatter himself by thinking he will get off with purgatory.

Mr. MANION: Well, I am even more convinced, Mr. Speaker, that if I go to hell I will be reading his speeches all the time; yes, and the Prime Minister suggests, that I may even have to listen to them there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend might be happy, even where he suggests, if he did not have to listen to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. MANION: Probably the Prime Minister will not go there; he will probably go to a better land than either my right hon. friend or myself.

To be serious again, the right hon. gentleman objected very strenuously to the suggestion that there has been any improvement in conditions generally throughout the country. I cannot agree with his objection, because the Prime Minister quoted, as I am going to quote also, the improvement of 8 per cent in commodity prices in the latter part of last year as compared with the earlier part; security prices are up 63 per cent, farm prices 25 per cent, employment 17 per cent, contracts 72 per cent, industrial production 40 per cent, mining production 27 per cent, domestic exports 13 per cent and revenue carloadings 4 per cent. May I say also that in the last five weeks the revenues of the Canadian National Railways, as compared with the period to February 7 of last year, have been up $2,265,000.

In view of all these facts, Mr. Speaker, no sensible person can deny an improvement in conditions, but the right hon. gentleman says, "To perdition with such facts; if they do not agree with my speech so much the worse for the facts. Statistics and statisticians are crooked; like the House of Commons they are merely rubber stamps for that tyrant the Prime Minister. Therefore," he says, "let us have an election at once—" and under his breath he adds, "—to beat the improvement which is coming along. Let us capitalize the discontent and go to the country forthwith."

Then in his speech he goes a little further and twits us for condemning him and his lieutenants for offering nothing constructive. When I came to that part of his remarks I thought I was coming to his constructive suggestions, but what did I find? I found that he took some pages of Hansard to outline those constructive suggestions, and the first one he offered was a dominion-provincial conference. Well, Mr. Speaker, we have had four such conferences, and in practically everything we do to relieve conditions we are carrying out the suggestions advanced at those conferences. Another constructive suggestion was that we should audit the accounts of the provinces. Well, that might relieve the unemployment of a few auditors, but I do not know that it would help conditions generally throughout the country.

Then the right hon. gentleman went on to condemn the form of government by order in council, as carried on by us. The right hon. gentleman has always taken that stand; he has always played up that point, not only in the house but also throughout the country. I say now that he knows better than anyone knows that no government can carry on at any time without orders in council totalling five or six thousand in a year. There never is a time when orders in council are so necessary as in a time of crisis and emergency such as that through which we have just passed. I say to the house now that had it not been that this government had power to pass orders in council not only would some of the western provinces have gone into insolvency, not only would they have repudiated their debts, but thousands of people would have starved to death before we could have come to this house for the necessary legislation.

Those were the constructive suggestions advanced by the right hon. gentleman. I do not see very much in them to help the situation. In another part of his speech he went on to say that he is going to support the formation of a central bank, and that he is going to support very strongly the establishment of agricultural credits and the institution of unemployment insurance. As I said before, Mr. Speaker, I have been in this house for nineteen sessions, and I think in each of those sessions the question of agricultural credits has been one of the live topics of the day. The right hon. gentleman was in power for nine years. Why did he not put some system into effect? So far as the central bank is concerned, now that we are bringing in legislation to create the central bank he is a great supporter of the idea but, like agricultural credits, this question might have been dealt with also when he was in power.

Finally he declared himself in favour of unemployment insurance, and so did the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. They want it forthwith. I say to the hon. gentlemen that unemployment insurance could not be instituted in any country in the midst of a depression such as we have been passing through; at a time like this it would be impossible to create such a scheme. A time will come without doubt when this subject will have to be considered, and either insurance or something to take its place instituted in order to look after unemployed people in times such as these. But again I must point out to the right hon. gentleman that not only did he neglect to initiate any scheme of unemployment insurance during the nine years he was in power; the right hon. gentleman said at that time what has been so often quoted, that there was no unemployment, though that was almost a year after the depression had begun, for the depression began in October 1929. The right hon. gentleman went on to say that he would not give a five cent piece to any Conservative government in this country for unemployment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: Did I hear my right hon. friend say he did not make that statement? I thought I heard him say so, and I have here the extract. I carry these things with me now, so I was prepared if the right hon. gentleman had denied it.

For four hours and twenty minutes, for 42 pages, the right hon. gentleman gave us defeatism and gloom. He forgot to mention, of course, some of the other promises which he made so enthusiastically; one thing he forgot to mention was his promise that if he was elected to office he would bring about Senate reform. He gave us defeatism and gloom; he had no commendation for anything, no kind word for anybody, and he showed no sign of cooperation. Even the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) who has never been noted for his cooperative policies, twitted the right hon. gentleman the other evening for not giving more evidences of his willingness to cooperate with the government in a time like this. I am going to give the house one instance of something done entirely by the Prime Minister, for which he should have been given some commendation, though so far as I know that has not been done. I am going to put it on record. Back in September or October of last year there was threatened in this country a railway strike. The men on the Canadian National railways and the Canadian Pacific railway were not satisfied with the proposal of the management that another ten per cent be taken off their wages. They protested against this, and they were in a deadlock with the management. When the Prime Minister returned from England they were still deadlocked. Upon that occasion the right hon. leader of the government insisted upon the two of them getting together, and as a result a settlement was brought about. In that connection he received the following letter, and as it is of interest I wish to put it on record. Up to the present I do not think it has been placed on Hansard. Written in Montreal on October 28, it is not marked personal and was addressed to the Prime Minister as follows:

> We are pleased to advise that a satisfactory settlement has been reached to-day in the wage controversy long existing between the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways and their engineers, firemen, conductors, trainmen and telegraphers.
> We appreciate your kindly interest in this matter, and feel that your good offices were largely responsible for the amicable settlement arrived at.

By whom was that signed, Mr. Speaker? It was signed by Mr. H. B. Chase, assistant grand chief of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers; by H. H. Lynch, vice-president of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers; C. S. Montooth, vice-president of the Order of Railway Conductors; W. J. Babe, vice-president of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen; and A. H. Phillips, vice-president of the Order of Railway Telegraphers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not hear the name of Jim Murdock.

Mr. MANION: Let me read again this particular section of the letter:

We appreciate your kindly interest in this matter, and feel that your good offices were largely responsible for the amicable settlement arrived at.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who took his seat a few moments ago, namely the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) asked hon. members on this side to name one policy carried out which has been of use to this country. I say to him that the policy described in this letter prevented a railway strike which, had it taken place would have been a catastrophe to Canada. Yet, my right hon. friend opposite must have known that that threatened strike was impending. Up in Laurier house he sat and not a chirp came out of him in regard to that possibility—not a word, despite the fact that the right hon. gentleman wrote a book which solved every railway question which has existed in the past, exists in the present or may exist in the future. But the right hon. gentleman had no suggestion in regard to this situation.

I can imagine the ranting which would have taken place in this house had my right hon. leader not done something to prevent the strike when he came back.

Mr. BOUCHARD: It was not a policy, it was kindly sentiment.

Mr. MANION: But my hon. friends did not express even kindly sentiment. They have not even that. The railway question is one which the right hon. gentleman opposite has evaded, because it does not reflect any great credit upon the Liberal party. When one looks back to the year 1903, a time when the Liberal party held office, and learns that up to that time only one transcontinental railway existed across the Dominion of Canada, and when one realizes that before they left office in 1911 they originated the second and third transcontinental railways one may in these days know the reason they have not so much to say. They are responsible for bringing about the duplication of railways which exists in Canada at the present time.

Mr. HANBURY: Did you oppose that policy?

Mr. MANION: I was not in this house at that time. Had hon. gentlemen had the vision they could have connected up the Grand Trunk in the east with the Canadian Northern in the west, and we would have had a second transcontinental and probably no present day railway problems. When we remember that in connection with the third transcontinental the then leader of the Liberal party took the attitude that a railway from Moncton to the Pacific coast would cost $13,000,000, and when we couple with that the fact that the real cost of the railway—not to the Pacific coast at all, but from Moncton to Winnipeg—was $173,000,000, we cannot help but believe that hon. members opposite are the ones to blame for the railway problem which exists in Canada to-day.

When we come up to a more recent date, to 1929, a pre-election year, and learn that the right hon. gentleman and his party either permitted or forced the late management of the Canadian National railways to make commitments of $250,000,000 on hotels at Halifax and other places, on steamships, terminals, the purchasing of branch railway lines and the building of others—I say when we realize that they permitted or encouraged the management to make those commitments amounting to $250,000,000 in a pre-election year, when they passed around the railway pork barrel from coast to coast, we know that they should leave the railway question alone. We have had to clean up that mess, and we have cleaned it up.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member who has just taken his seat belittled our efforts. I say here, without fear of contradiction that anybody who knows what he is talking about will realize that we have saved the people of Canada about $15,000,000 per year in extravagant management which obtained under the late government, but which does not obtain to-day. I say, further, that the Canadian National railways are just as efficient to-day as they were when hon. members opposite went out of power. If I have ever in my life done any good work for my country it was when I helped to clean up that mess. We carried on and appointed the Duff commission. Then we appointed Mr. Fullerton, Mr. Morrow and Mr. Labelle to the railway board. I believe the railway history of this government will stand the test of time far, far better than will the railway history of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Then, in regard to trade, the right hon. gentleman abused the present government. He compared the trade of to-day with that of a few years ago. He knows, of course, as well as does any other hon. member in the house, that the whole story of world trade is different to-day, that the trade of the world has gone down sixty per cent, and that the trade of Canada went down as did that of other countries.

Mr. EULER: The same is true of the railways, is it not?

Mr. MANION: Yes, but the same is not true of the railways in regard to the $15,000,000 we have saved in unnecessary extravagances which were being indulged in under the late government.

Mr. DUPUIS: The same is true for 1929.

Mr. MANION: The right hon. gentleman also spoke of our trade with the United States. He forgets to mention that when he was Prime Minister of this country the United States were selling us two dollars worth of goods for every dollar's worth that we sold them. In addition to that, they were putting up barriers against every line of goods we exported to them, particularly agricultural products. When we sat in opposition, as does the right hon. gentleman to-day, and suggested that the government of the day should retaliate, the only reply was that we must do nothing "to provoke" the United States. That was his attitude. While the Hawley-Smoot tariff was being put up against us and while the Fordney-McCumber tariff was working against our interests he sat quietly and said, "We must not provoke the United States." This government has dared to do that. We raised the tariffs where necessary. We treated the United States the way they treated us, and as a result we have the respect of that country. If there is to be a treaty made between this country and the United States I say that the government which has the respect of the United States would be the best government to bring it about.

I have only a few minutes left in which to speak, and in that time I shall sum up what I have said. May I point out that the truth of the whole matter is this—something which hon. members opposite do not choose to recognize when discussing present-day conditions—that the world has been going through four years of the most terrible depression it has ever known, and as a result Canada has suffered its share. There were in industrial countries of the world 30,000,000 unemployed people. In the great rich republic to the south there were 12,000,000 or 13,000,000 unemployed. During that depression period many of the banks in the United States went into insolvency, but not one bank in Canada refused to pay one dollar to a depositor. Throughout the world debts were repudiated. Most of the European countries, if not all, have refused to pay interest on their debts, and some have refused to pay the capital. The South American republics were in the same position. Most of them are not paying interest on their bond debt, so that their bonds are selling at $6 and $7 that were originally purchased at $100. In Russia, that country which some of the hon. members in this house and elsewhere suggest we should copy, millions were starving, while not one person in Canada had to go without food, lodging or shelter—not one. That is the picture which hon. members opposite ignore. Not only did Canada share this condition, but we had such a drought throughout the western prairie provinces that as a result in Saskatchewan alone 300,000 men, women and children would not have been able to live without assistance from this government. They were carried through the winters of 1931 and 1932 by us. I say that no government and no country in the world could have prevented these conditions which were world wide. We had a crisis in the last four years which was just as great as the crisis of the great world war, and my right hon. friend was just as useful to us in this crisis as he was in the other. We have had no cooperation from him, no constructive advice. We have had only criticism, gloom and defeatism, and I should add, the offer of an election. It is often quoted against Marie Antoinette that shortly before the revolution when she was told that the people were crying for bread and could get none, she said, "Why don't they eat cake?" My right hon. friend in offering an election to the people at this time is suggesting something akin to the cake of Marie Antoinette.

Without doubt this government has faults and has made mistakes. We do not deny it. A government that does not make mistakes does not make anything, and a government that does not make mistakes in times like these would do nothing at all, but I submit with all due respect to my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) who boasted so confidently that his party has the confidence of the people, that this country will not throw this government out to take his leader to lead them. I feel almost constrained to say that before they would take the right hon. gentleman they would take the leader of the C.C.F. in the corner, and God knows they would have to be desperate to do that, Mr. Speaker.

What is the purpose of the right hon. gentleman's desire for an election at this time? It is for the purpose of capitalizing the discontent which exists and must exist at times like these not only in Canada but in every country of the world. That is the purpose, and his fear is that the country is going ahead and will continue to do so and get back to its path of progress and prosperity before an election takes place.

In brief, what is the record of this government? During that time of crisis, which was as severe a crisis as the world war, we attempted in every way to relieve the conditions in many ways by the construction of public works in the beginning, and assisting the provinces, the municipalities and the railways to do likewise. We instituted camps for young unemployed homeless men. We have given loans to the prairie provinces, thereby saving the credit of those provinces, and in addition saving the credit of this dominion. We have saved the credit of the banks and of the railways as well. We have given direct relief when we could do nothing else, and no one in this country has starved despite the fact that in Russia millions have starved. It has cost this country $160,000,000 to do these things. But that is not all.

This government put into effect the empire trade agreements, to the credit of my right hon. leader, which increased our trade with the empire last year by $37,000,000 as compared with the year before. We corrected the adverse trade balance which was affecting our exchange, and we have kept our place as fifth among the trading nations of the world, being outdistanced only by Great Britain, the United States, Germany and France. In addition, the Prime Minister settled a threatened railway strike, which I think was one of his major achievements, and much to his credit.

That is the record of this government, a record that is equalled, I think, by no other government in any other country in the world in these times. Canada has come out of this depression in at least as good a condition as any other country of the world with the possible exception of France up until a year ago. France profited by the fact that she was rebuilding her devastated territory, and she was able to hold out against the depression longer than any other country in the world, but France to-day is in difficulty.

In this country we have started on the upgrade. Every index points to it. The world is coming back to its own, and unless the so-called civilized countries of the world are so foolish as to go into another war, the world will shortly be back to where it should be, and Canada will be leading the way. Let us keep our heads. Let us keep steady. Let us as Canadians stand shoulder to shoulder in a time like this in an effort to put this country back on its proper track. This is not a time for demagogism, but a time for leadership, and after the leadership of this government carries Canada back, as it will, to normal conditions, then we will correct other evils. We will deal with such questions as unemployment insurance and planned economy, for I personally believe that we shall have to deal with these matters. But when your house is on fire you do not stop to argue about loans or taxes. The first thing you do is to put out the fire, leaving other matters to be dealt with later.

The Prime Minister has offered a program of public works, which, of course, cannot give employment to every unemployed man in this country, but remember that for every man who is given employment directly on public works, two or more men are also given employment indirectly.

So in conclusion I make this appeal to the whole house, that the whole house help Canada upon the upgrade at this time. Look about at the condition of the world. Look at France, at Austria; look at conditions in the West Indies and in the far east, and tell me, is this a time for partyism, for strife of that kind? I say that this is a time when we should stand side by side, when we should stop reviling our country, stop preaching pessimism, defeatism and gloom. It is a time when every hon. gentleman should stop attempting to hold back the progress of this country and should stand by us and help us in getting this country started on its way forward. We have weathered the worst economic hurricane that this world has ever known and it is our duty as Canadian citizens to endeavour to bring the ship of state into a safe harbour and then, after that is done, we can go back to party strife again if necessary.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the house will permit me, even after the characteristically fiery and ebullient speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) to refer to a matter which he says, and I thoroughly agree with him, must be kept out of party politics. I want to say to my hon. friend and to this house that I am referring to it now because I consider, and I think he and the government will agree with me, that it is a matter which requires the early attention of this house and of the government, being what I regard as a serious injustice in connection with ex-service men that should be righted.

I preface my remarks by saying that I am not making it a matter of party politics. I agree thoroughly with my hon. friend the Minister of Railways in saying that this country should congratulate itself on the fact that the problems of the ex-service men have been dealt with by this House of Commons in a non-partisan manner. Time after time we have had committees of this house appointed, with strong partisans on both sides, and these committees have brought in unanimous reports in the interests of ex-service men.

If the house will permit me for a moment, I want to bring to its attention a matter which I believe cannot stand without comment and which should be put upon record in order that the legislators gathered here may have a conception of what is going on in regard to the administration of the Pension Act in connection with the particular cases to which I refer.

I am calling attention to a practice which has grown up in the administration of the Board of Pension Commissioners whereby this board has assumed the right to determine the validity of marriages. I have a number of cases, but I shall mention only two or three. The situation is this: A man has a disability. He is pensioned for that disability. Under schedule A of the Pension Act, if he is married he gets additional pension on account of his wife, and if he has children he gets further additional pension on account of the children. The Board of Pension Commisisoners within the last year or two at least—I do not know whether this practice existed before—have instituted the practice of ascertaining whether or not the soldier who happens to be getting a pension was previously married or whether his wife was previously married, and if that is the case the board has required definite legal evidence that the previous spouse, either of the husband or of the wife, as the case may be, was dead at the time of the marriage or is dead now. That practice is different from the practice in the courts of this country. In the courts of this country there is a presumption that if a person is not heard of for seven years, by persons with whom he or she would likely be in communication, and if inquiry has been made unsuccessfully to locate such person, that person is dead. Under the criminal laws of this country a man or a woman cannot be convicted of bigamy for marrying believing that the former spouse is dead, even if seven years have not elapsed; and if seven years have elapsed, then the onus is on the crown to prove that the former spouse has in fact been heard of. Now what has the Board of Pension Commissioners been doing? I will give three cases by way of illustration.

First I will cite the case of a man with a disability—gunshot wound in the arm, fracture of both bones, arm deeply scarred, through and through bullet wound in the thigh. This man is receiving a 55 per cent pension, which entitles him to $37.50, and having a wife and six children he is entitled to an additional sum of $42, making in all $79.50. The board discovered that this man had been previously married. The circumstances were these. He was married in 1917 and lived with his wife for one week, after which time she deserted him, moving away to Toronto, and he had not since heard of or from her. He signed what he thought were papers which, as he believed, completely annulled the marriage, and in 1923 he was married again by a Protestant clergyman in Nova Scotia. With the wife of this second marriage he has lived ever since, and they have six children. They are recognized in the community as man and wife, are moral and respectable in every particular, and yet the Board of Pension Commissioners, upon finding out about the previous marriage, sent him in effect a bill for $3,000 for the money they had paid him on account of this second wife and the children, taking the view that this marriage was bigamous and that the children are consequently illegitimate. They have sent him a bill for $3,000, saying to him, "Until you pay us back to the full that $3,000 we shall not pay you one cent of the $37.50 pension." That is the practice in this particular case.

Mr. BENNETT: Without disclosing the name, the hon. member might put the man's number on record.

Mr. RALSTON: I can give it to my right hon. friend. This man writes me:

> I was a whole day signing papers in Halifax clear from my previous wife.
> I have six small children suffering from cold and unnourishing food. Can't my children claim their part of my pension either? If not, couldn't you get me relief for the winter months anyway. I have tried fishing and my arm gave out on me so please do something for me if you can. If I could keep my family together for a few more years I would have lots of help then. Kindly do what you can for me. My wounds cause me sufficient pain but watching my family suffer causes me more pain so please help me.

I have in my hand the letter of the Board of Pension Commissioners, in which they say:

As the statute makes no provision for the payment of additional pension for an illegal wife or for illegitimate children the board had no alternative but to cancel the allowances from date of award.

In other words, the Board of Pension Commissioners, sitting in their judicial capacity, simply bastardized these children and declaring the marriage bigamous, without affording the man an opportunity to present his case. His pension is cut off and afterwards, if he wishes, he can make representations.

The second case is that of the wife of an ex-soldier. She was married in Ireland in 1884 and lived with her husband a year, when he deserted her. She never heard from him and believed—in fact was told—that he had died in the United States; and seventeen years afterwards she married another man in Scotland. This man is now refused a pension on account of his wife because forsooth the Board of Pension Commissioners say that there is no proof of the death of the woman's former husband, notwithstanding that the common law, as the Prime Minister and other lawyers in the house know, presumes under such circumstances that the previous spouse is dead.

The third case is perhaps the most serious, that of a man with hip amputation. This man was married in 1906 and his wife deserted him. He pursued inquiries for fifteen years but could not find her; he had no word of her. He got an order from the chief justice of a court of one of the provinces in this dominion that the first wife was presumed to be dead. Yet the Board of Pension Commissioners has reduced the pension of this man with a leg off at the hip. He was getting, I believe, something like $99 and they have taken all but $5.31 a month in order to repay what they say was an illegal payment of pension.

I mention these cases because in my opinion they are matters that should be taken up immediately by the house. I know that the government has them under consideration now, but the point is that time is running and these cases are urgent. They are all quite old, and still no action is taken by the board. I can only say that in cases of this kind, where good faith is shown, where people marry believing that they have the right to do so, and perform the duties of husband and wife, raising children and supporting them, the country, to say the least, should not fine them if something is discovered to be wrong with their marriage. The state should not take away under these circumstances what had already been paid, particularly when the Pension Act, under section 2 (c), recognizes that "children" includes illegitimate children, and when the act in another section recognizes that a widow, even though there has been no proper marriage service, was the wife of the man concerned for the purposes of pension. The rule of the board is harsh and unjust and remedial measures should be taken in connection with this matter.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has followed pension matters with so much more attention than most members of the house that perhaps he will answer this question. Does he think that there is any power under the statute to compel the Board of Pension Commissioners by executive action? I have been unable to satisfy myself, though I have spent a good deal of time trying to find a means of meeting the situation.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think there is. I think the decision is purely with the board under section 5, which gives them the right to adjudicate. But the right to adjudicate includes, I submit, the right to be heard on the part of the person affected, and the board should not sit in their office and make an order for a deduction from a man's pension without giving that man—or woman as the case may be—an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. BENNETT: I share the hon. gentleman's views entirely, but my difficulty has been to deal with the matter by any method short of amending the statute, because we cannot compel the pension board to do anything.

Mr. RALSTON: Then it is all the more necessary that the house should take cognizance of it, because grave injustice is being done.

Now, there are other pension matters to which I was going to refer but I shall not be able to do so because my time is going. I did wish however to bring this particular question to the attention of the house.

I am afraid I cannot attempt to follow the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) in the peregrinations of his speech, but I will deal as I proceed with a few of the points he made. He did not answer, as I thought he would, my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) with regard to titles, and it seemed to me that the criticism which was made by the hon. member for Quebec East to the effect that the Prime Minister had taken an hour and a half mouthing legal technicalities in connection with a matter that does not present any legal difficulties but is purely a question of policy, as to whether the wishes of the people's representatives in this country were to be observed, was a subject to which the right hon. gentleman might have given more attention. The Prime Minister discussed the legal aspect of the question. He read speeches by Lord Reading in the House of Lords, he quoted Mr. Justice Patterson and other constitutional authorities. But that is not the question which the people of this country are asking. The people of Canada are asking this: When the Canadian people through their representatives in the House of Commons in 1919 put on record a respectful request to the sovereign asking that titles be not granted and when that resolution stands on the books of this country to-day unchanged except that it is confirmed by a resolution in 1929 refusing to reopen the subject, why do you, Mr. Prime Minister, in the face of that, recommend titles and, in effect, affront, to use my hon. friend's word, the House of Commons? His answer was, as the hon. member for Quebec East indicated; I want to deliver the House of Commons from the charge of having affronted the sovereign.

I have not time to read more than just the first paragraph of the resolution which was passed in 1919 and which, it seems to me, was a fairly respectful one. It states:

> We humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that Your Majesty hereafter may be graciously pleased to refrain from conferring any titles upon your subjects domiciled or living in Canada.

Could anything be more respectful than that? Oh, but, my right hon. friend says, that was interfering with the prerogative of the crown. Who, as the hon. member for Quebec East suggested, forwarded that resolution to Downing street and through Downing street to Buckingham palace? Was it a gentleman accustomed to affronting the crown, a gentleman unversed in constitutional law? He was a gentleman who, I think my right hon. friend himself will admit, knows as much about constitutional law and practice as he does; it was none other than the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden.

Mr. BENNETT: He was directed by the House of Commons to do so.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not care whether he was or not, but my right hon. friend says that the right thing to do is to fly in the face of the House of Commons and not to do as it directs.

Mr. BENNETT: He was not here himself.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. RALSTON: I did not hear the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden suggest that he was affronting His Majesty.

Mr. BENNETT: He was not here.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He was leading the government.

Mr. BENNETT: No—Sir Thomas White.

Mr. RALSTON: Sir Robert Borden was no doubt communicated with when the dispatch was transmitted. That is the only excuse my right hon. friend gives. The question is not what Lord Reading said in the British House of Commons or the Hansard case which has nothing to do with it at all. The Hansard case was one where it was decided that the rules of the House of Commons did not protect a person outside the house from some action an individual might bring against him; it had nothing to do with this question at all. But my right hon. friend took about an hour and a half to deal with those various learned authorities. The whole question the people are asking is this: Is the Prime Minister going to pay attention to the wishes of the House of Commons as expressed and as never amended, or is he not? My right hon. friend says that this was an affront to the sovereign. He knows quite well who was addressed by that resolution. As he himself has said many times, the sovereign is represented in this country by his advisers and that resolution was in effect a request to the advisers of the sovereign asking that they should not recommend titles.

Mr. BENNETT: What nonsense.

Mr. RALSTON: My right hon. friend knows quite well the sovereign never exercises that prerogative without the advice of his advisers. Therefore on this matter of titles we still come back to the question: Why did he do this? We can make any guess we like. I do not know whether it was an error of judgment on my right hon. friend's part or a determination to fly in the face of the wishes of the people. It is difficult for one to find any reason for it. In the answer he has made he certainly does not give any reason and, in dealing with the matter as he did the other night, he completely sidesteps the real issue.

Mr. CAHAN: If we consider the many resolutions passed by the House of Commons in the last fifteen or twenty years, does the hon. gentleman suggest that those various resolutions are binding upon a new parliament and a new government?

Mr. RALSTON: In the first place, to give my hon. friend a direct answer, I say that they are binding as an expression which has never been changed of the judgment of the Canadian people. That is the way in which they are binding. They are not binding in the sense that one could get an injunction against some of the recipients of titles preventing them from using the prefix "sir."

Mr. CAHAN: I should like to have a more definite answer. Numerous resolutions have been passed in the house in the last fifteen or twenty years and appear in the votes and proceedings. They are an expression of the judgment of the members who voted in favour of them, many, if not the majority of those members have passed away. Are those resolutions still binding upon this parliament?

Mr. RALSTON: They are binding as resolutions of this house. My hon. friend knows that we are to-day acting on statutes—

Mr. CAHAN: That is another matter.

Mr. RALSTON: —that were passed by people who are dead and gone—

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly.

Mr. RALSTON: —and approved by sovereigns who are dead and gone. That resolution, passed in the house in 1919, even if every man jack of the members voting for it then were dead, would, as a resolution, be as binding as a statute enacted in former days would be, as a statute, although the members supporting it were since dead. It is binding as a resolution, as an expression of the judgment of the people upon the Prime Minister—

Mr. CAHAN: An expression of the opinion of the Commons of that day.

Mr. RALSTON: —and he himself admits that he derives his authority from the House of Commons. I say to my right hon. friend that he cannot get out of the difficulty by saying: Oh, this house did not pass the resolution. Have we at every session formally to pass a resolution confirming all the resolutions that have been passed previously? The resolution stands and nobody recognized that fact more clearly than the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) who in 1929 introduced a resolution for the purpose of reporting upon the advisability of amending, rescinding or qualifying the resolution of 1919 which he then regarded as binding. But what is the use of talking about something being binding? We are talking about the Prime Minister flying in the face of what he knew to be the registered wish of the people through their representatives and a wish not yet changed. He has not so far given an answer that will satisfy the people as to the exercise of that right.

This brings me to a matter concerning which the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) had considerable to say, and that is the subject of railways. My hon. friend cannot resist discussing railways and as usual his enthusiasm quite carries him away. My hon. friend has not made a very careful study of the history of railways in this dominion.

Mr. MANION: Yes, I have.

Mr. RALSTON: If he has, he concealed the fact very well to-day. I cannot take the time of the house or my own to go into the matter in detail, but let me make this statement—and my hon. friend can verify it for himself—first, that the party of my hon. friend supported the proposition for a second transcontinental railway in 1904 in the form or a resolution sponsored by their leader the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden, who proposed an alternative transcontinental railway to the Grand Trunk Pacific which was proposed by the government of the day; second, that in 1912 the Conservative party, led by the Right Hon. Sir Robert L. Borden, in conjunction with the government of British Columbia, by making a vote of $6,000,000, put the last spike into the transcontinental nature of the Canadian Northern Railway. The Prime Minister, speaking in Montreal the other day, made a very good non-partisan speech except for one thing; he tried to leave the impression that it was due to the subsidy granted by British Columbia that the Canadian Northern Railway was made a transcontinental road in 1912.

Mr. BENNETT: So it was.

Mr. RALSTON: It was not due to the subsidy granted by the province of British Columbia any more than it was due to the government of which my right hon. friend was a supporter at that time, which provided the money for the extension of that road from Edmonton through the Yellowhead pass, and the province of British Columbia carried it the rest of the way to Vancouver.

Mr. BENNETT: I must rise again to a question of privilege. I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but he must know that the contract between the Canadian Northern British Columbia and the province of British Columbia was to build that railway under guarantee of bonds. All that was done by this government was to give a subsidy in aid, and the road was partly built when that subsidy was given.

Mr. RALSTON: That is what I am saying. I say my right hon. friend's party supported the making of the Canadian Northern a third transcontinental railway. And I am not sure that my right hon. friend did not support it too. At any rate my right hon. friend had no objection to it then. Reading the debates at that time I find that he frequently interrupted to give informative explanations—I say that with all seriousness—particularly with regard to the law in the matter. The Liberals pointed out that we had no business paying money to a road the rates on which were controlled not by the Board of Railway Commissioners but by the province of British Columbia. In the speech of my right hon. friend the other day he referred to Sir Wilfrid Laurier as having committed a grave error in connection with the matter of railway policy. He said:

Every morning as I go to my work I pass the statue of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and I pay tribute to the fact that his disinterested patriotism was known to all men; he desired to do what was best for Canada. But the fact is that he did not foresee, when he and his government pledged their support to the construction of two transcontinentals in addition to the one we then had, that this meant certain and sure insolvency to the roads themselves.

As I have pointed out the Conservative party were equally strong in support of the two additional transcontinental lines. Let us compare that statement made by my right hon. friend in 1934 with a statement made by him in this house in 1912 at page 11776 of Hansard, with regard to the necessity and desirability of a third transcontinental road. I find here that the Hon. Frank Oliver was speaking. He said:

The Canadian Northern railway, in that part of its line which lies between Winnipeg and Edmonton was a pioneer enterprise, but that part of its line from Edmonton to the Pacific coast, and that part of its line proposed by this resolution to be aided from Port Arthur to Ottawa is not a pioneer enterprise to anything like the degree that either the Canadian Pacific railway or the Grand Trunk Pacific was.

The hon. gentleman who answered him was Mr. Bennett, and this is the answer:

Mr. Bennett: Do not we require a third transcontinental line—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: Go on and finish it.

Mr. RALSTON:

—as a spout for western grain? And hence is not the construction of the road from Fort William to the seaboard absolutely essential if the value of the other lines is to be maintained?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: That is so.

Mr. RALSTON: This is the gentleman who salutes the statute of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, but feels that he committed his country to a policy of certain and sure insolvency of the roads themselves.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. RALSTON: My right hon. friend was in a quite different frame of mind in 1912 regarding the desirability of a third transcontinental railway. Hon. gentlemen know the history of that road after the act was passed in 1912 and the assistance given by the Conservative government whereby the road was extended to Vancouver—$45,000,000 guaranteed in 1914 and the transcontinental nature of the Canadian Northern recognized. Then the Drayton-Acworth report came, and in 1917 the Dominion of Canada paid $10,000,000 for worthless stock of the Canadian Northern under my hon. friends opposite. That ought to be enough as far as the three transcontinental roads were concerned. My friends were for a second road in 1904, they completed the third road in 1912 and then bought it in 1917.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of privilege I will have to correct the hon. gentleman again. In 1917 it was the Union government.

Mr. RALSTON: I leave the country to make the distinction. It sounded to me as if the Minister of Railways was sending out another wail and appeal for Union government in the concluding part of his remarks. Be sure of this, that when my hon. friends ask for cooperation, whenever they want help, it is a sure sign that they are in pretty sore straits. No party has been more independent than that of my friends opposite. They have had a majority of about forty in this house, they have had the whole treasury of Canada at their backs the last three years, they have had for a good portion of the time all the powers of parliament, but now in 1934 they call on the Liberals, whom they have despised up to date, to cooperate because they are getting in a bad hole.

Mr. MANION: Call on them to play the part of Canadians.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Red-blooded!

Mr. RALSTON: Now let us take another step in regard to railways. So far ownership; now regarding amalgamation of the roads making up the present Canadian National system. My hon. friend talks about this great conglomeration of roads which was foisted on them and which caused such a serious increase in the debt and such heavy inroads on the expenditure of Canada. I have not time to go into details further than this, that my hon. friends—I will say the "Union" government in deference to my right hon. friend—put Mr. Hanna in charge of the Canadian Northern and the Canadian government railways in 1917, including the Intercolonial; they put Sir Joseph Flavelle in charge of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Grand Trunk soon after, and they ran these two disjointed roads under an advisory committee headed by Mr. Kelley. They passed the Canadian National Railway Act in 1919 but did not have the courage to declare that act; the succeeding government found it on the statute book in 1922—

Mr. CHAPLIN: That is not correct.

Mr. RALSTON: —and the government found that system of roads, as Sir Henry Thornton said, like an orchestra out of tune—

Mr. BENNETT: On a question of privilege again, the order in council was passed after the decision of the privy council in the Grand Trunk case, and recites that fact.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is this a debating society?

Mr. BENNETT: No, but misstatements cannot be allowed to pass.

Mr. RALSTON: On what question of privilege my right hon. friend is rising, I do not know I am sure.

Mr. BENNETT: The question as to a misstatement of fact. It is always competent to correct a misstatement of fact.

Mr. RALSTON: My right hon. friend knows the rules of the house, and knows that there are plenty of hon. gentlemen on that side who are quite capable of dealing with the facts. What I say is that although the Canadian National Railways Act was passed in 1919, the then government did not declare the act but ran this bundle of roads in a disjointed fashion until 1922, when under the King government Sir Henry Thornton was put in charge. My right hon. friend seems to think that all the expenditure was incurred under the Liberal administration. Does he forget that they themselves assumed an indebtedness of $1,700,000,000, on account of these roads? Let him compare that sum with the $461,000,000 which he says was spent under Liberal administration. Let me tell him now what happened with regard to the administration of these roads under governments of which he was a supporter and under Liberal governments. First take the amount earned by this system of roads and available for all interest; from 1919 to 1921 there was nothing whatever available, but there was an average deficit of $22,000,000 yearly. From 1922 to 1930 there was an average surplus of $24,000,000 per annum. For 1931 there was a deficit again of $5,000,000; I have not the figures for 1932. Secondly, I make the same comparison, after paying interest to the public: from 1919 to 1921 the annual deficit was $53,000,000. From 1922 to 1930 the annual deficit was only $15,000,000, whereas, as I say, in the regime of my hon. friends opposite, in the three years they had it before 1921, the deficit had been $53,000,000, and in 1931 the deficit was $60,000,000. To sum up, the total deficit in the management of this system of roads called the Canadian National, from 1919 to 1931, was $351,000,000. In the nine years from 1922 to 1930, years of Liberal rule, the total deficit was $132,000,000, while for the four years of Conservative rule from 1919 to 1921, and for 1931, there was a deficit of $219,000,000.

Let me read from that oft-quoted speech of the Minister of Justice in which he told us what a wonderful road this is. On March 7, 1929, speaking on this question, he said:

> Let me say, in concluding my remarks on this phase of the subject, that the National railway system in this country constitutes a lasting monument to the ability and statesmanship and determination of a single man, a member of a former Conservative government, and subsequently Prime Minister of that government. It is to his ability and foresight, to his statesmanship and determination that the people of Canada are indebted for this wonderful system of National railways.

That is the situation, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the railways, I hope my hon. friend the Minister of Railways will just curb himself in future and deal with the facts when he comes to consider who is responsible for the railway situation in this country.

Mr. MANION: To keep the record straight, would the hon. gentleman just add that his government increased the interest charges by $20,000,000 annually?

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly I will, but I say that is a mere bagatelle compared to the seventeen hundred million of my hon friends.

Mr. MANION: The seventeen hundred million takes in the intercolonial and all the old railways.

Mr. RALSTON: Now my hon. friend is beginning to find out that a number of old roads were included. He is anxious to get out from under.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Would the hon. member permit—

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend will pardon me, I really have not time. This railway story has been told very often, and my hon. friend does not stick any too closely to what are the real facts in connection with the case.

I should like to deal with another matter mentioned by the Prime Minister and also by the Minister of Railways; that is, these figures with regard to the improvement in conditions since the spring of 1933. Heaven knows no one is suggesting that there is not an improvement in conditions since the spring of 1933.

Mr. MANION: Yes, your leader did.

Mr. RALSTON: I beg my hon. friend's pardon; my right hon. leader suggested that it was not necessarily evidence of permanent improvement, as stated in the speech from the throne. My hon. friend did not get that. Everyone knows there has been improvement since the spring of 1933. You must improve; you must go higher after you get into the subcellar, and that was where we were, absolutely down to rock bottom. We have improved, and I hope sincerely that we may keep on improving. But what my hon. friends have not told us yet is what they have done to bring about that improvement. That is the real question. They have done everything possible to cripple trade and increase the taxes in this country. They speak about the Ottawa agreements, and I am going to deal with those in a moment, but I have not seen any trade arrangement made by this government which has perceptibly accelerated the normal increase of trade which has taken place in all the countries of the world.

My hon. friend the Minister of Railways spoke of wholesale prices. Well, in wholesale prices I think he will find very little comfort, because the United States is considerably ahead of us in regard to increases in wholesale prices. But my hon. friend just tosses that to one side and says, "We have increased wholesale prices." Of course we have; let us take what comfort we can out of it, but there is not much credit to the government in that fact. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister put on Hansard the increase in steel production since the beginning of 1933, but the percentage of increase in the United States was far greater, and that jumble of figures which he put on Hansard and which appears at pages 75 to 79 fails to show anything which any reasonable man could say was done by the present government to assist in producing any increase.

Then my right hon. friend spoke about the increase in Canadian exports to Great Britain since the spring of this year. We are glad there is an increase, but does my right hon. friend realize that the pound, which was $3.84 last January, had risen to $5.09 in December, and that the buying power of the pound in the Canadian market was increased accordingly? Naturally under those circumstances the British people would buy more from the Canadian market. Does my right hon. friend realize that conditions have improved in Great Britain, which surely ought to have something to do with the increase in exports by the Dominion of Canada to the old country? That was not mentioned at all. On reading the Prime Minister's speech one would think that the sole cause of this increase was the Ottawa agreements fostered by himself and his government.

Then my hon. friend the Minister of Railways said that imports from the United States had decreased perceptibly. That is quite so, but is that a matter for comfort? Is that a matter for congratulation? Generally speaking our imports from the United States are producers' goods and producers' equipment, goods which we use in manufacturing, and if our imports go down it means that our industrial activity has been curtailed by just that much. If my hon. friend will look at the trade returns for 1932 he will find that 65 per cent of all our imports from the United States were producers' goods and producers' equipment, or in other words things we needed to work with or work on. In those things our imports have gone down considerably, but I do not regard it as a matter for congratulation at all; it seems to me that decreased imports of raw material and of equipment simply mean that our national activities have declined. If we do not import that material it means that our producing industries have slackened accordingly.

My hon. friend quoted some comparative figures, and then he went on to say that we must not run down our country. I wonder if he has read the speeches delivered by his right hon. leader from one end of the country to the other during the summer of 1930: for instance "The cries of women and little children calling to us to ease their pain." That is just one sample; they will be found in Hansard. At the risk of incurring my hon. friend's displeasure, but in order to place the facts on record so that we may not try to fool ourselves about this situation, I should like to quote a few comparative figures also. The Prime Minister said we had improved more than any other country in the world; at least that was the gist of his remarks. I have made a comparison of increases in the trade of Canada as compared with increases in trade in the United Kingdom as between 1932 and 1933, converting sterling into Canadian dollars at current monthly rates of exchange. They are as follows:

	Percentage increase of imports 1933 over 1932		Percentage increase of domestic exports 1933 over 1932
	Canada	United Kingdom	Canada	United Kingdom
April	−31.3	− 3.1	−25.7	−23.
May	−25.8	+10.6	+12.6	+10.2
June	−17.5	+ 1.8	+12.5	+ 5.1
July	+ 0.1	+25.2	+21.3	+23.3
August	+ 6.1	+28.2	+ 8.3	+30.7
September	+12.2	+34.	+37.	+54.5
October	+10.7	+30.7	+ 6.3	+44.2
November	+15.7	+40.	+31.4	+49.7
December	+22.1	+40.1	+19.5	+26.2

Those increases in the United Kingdom are rather surprising, because we must remember that the United Kingdom got into her stride before Canada did, and therefore she was up the scale a considerable degree when these increases of 1933 came to be recorded. In spite of that, however, she made greater increases than Canada made both in imports and exports, taking them by and large, except with regard to exports for the first two or three months.

Then, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Railways tried to find some constructive act of statesmanship on the part of this government, and he trotted out a letter from a trade union, an "unsolicited testimonial" you might call it, to the work done by the Prime Minister. I noticed that the Prime Minister rather modestly hung his head; I do not believe he knew that his colleague was going to read that letter.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has spoken for more than forty minutes.

Mr. RALSTON: If I might have the indulgence of the house for four minutes I believe I could finish my remarks.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member was interrupted for at least that time.

Mr. RALSTON: That was the outstanding thing to which the Minister of Railways called attention as the headliner in government activities. On this side, while we do not boast about it or read letters about it, we at least can remind the house that the right hon. leader of the opposition was deputy minister of labour for some years and I am sure that the sheaf of letters which he would have in his possession and which, if he were in that frame of mind, could be produced, indicating the services which he rendered from time to time in settling labour difficulties, would rather put in the shade this one letter over which the minister has made so much fuss.

Mr. DUFF: What about services during the war?

Mr. RALSTON: I do deprecate the insinuation by the Minister of Railways concerning the action of my right hon. leader during the war.

Mr. DUFF: It was rotten.

Mr. RALSTON: It was unworthy of him or of any other hon. member in this house.

Mr. DUFF: It was rotten.

Mr. RALSTON: I wish to say only this, that the Minister of Railways—and I wish he were in his seat—might have attended a ceremony in which the Canadian Legion presented my right hon. leader with a life membership in recognition of his services and interest in the welfare of ex-service men and their dependents. That subject should not have been brought up in debate in this house and I do not think hon. members opposite, generally speaking, have any more approval of it than I have.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is dirty fighting.

Mr. HANBURY: But it is typical.

Mr. RALSTON: I suggest that what my right hon. friend opposite really does as he goes to bed at night—and I hope he will not accuse me of being blasphemous—is to fall on his knees and thank God for Roosevelt, thank God for Great Britain and thank God for a situation around us whereby our condition is being stabilized, and improved notwithstanding the inaction of this government. All they do is to tell us to tighten our belts, to remember the traditions of our forefathers, to have patience; and may I add that the people of Canada are getting mighty tired of it. This government has done its best to discourage industry, so far as primary producers are concerned. For example, let us consider the fishermen. The duties on gasoline, on oiled clothing, on rubber boots, on food, and on many other commodities have been increased, and there is the tax on sugar. Everything has been made more expensive, but the fishermen has to sell in an unprotected market and at the same time has to beg this government for a little relief —not a big amount—a little relief, in the way of small public works and facilities in order that he may be able to pursue his calling in comparative—and only comparative—safety. Imagine a fisherman out on the Atlantic in this winter weather following his vocation in order to make new wealth for Canada and paying increased taxes on the things he uses and at the same time getting little consideration from this government when he asks for comparatively insignificant assistance which would help him in connection with his work.

I say to you this, Mr. Speaker,—and this is my last word—notwithstanding the fact that my right hon. friend's promises have been unfulfilled, notwithstanding the increase in taxation, notwithstanding the tremendous increase in debt, notwithstanding the broken pledges regarding employment, notwithstanding the barriers which have been placed in the way of trade, notwithstanding the handicaps under which this government has placed this dominion, Canada is coming through, and we all are profoundly thankful for it, but I say it is not because of, but in spite of the administration of the present government.

My hon. friend the Minister of Railways has pictured the ship of state. The ship of state is manned by a crew scared to do anything; they are so fearful that they will not even touch the sails. They say, "Be cautious, be careful." They are even afraid to stand by the wheel and steer a definite course. They cannot even make up their minds to avail themselves of the auxiliary power. Canadians, the passengers, say to them, "For heaven's sake do something and get us out of the storm." This crew's only reply is, "Be patient, the storm is passing." But suddenly the captain has a bright idea; he says, "There is something we can do; there is a bronze tablet on the companion way with the names of the great and the illustrious on it. Let us polish up the bronze tablet." That is the best he can do in the way of seamanship. What I mean is that the right hon. gentleman does not attempt to tackle and solve the pressing problems for the welfare of the Canadian people but busies himself instead with the matter of titles.

I submit that this government has done at least one thing: it has proved Canada's inherent soundness, because a country which can weather the conditions of the past three or four years with a government like the one sitting opposite to manage its affairs need have no fear for the future.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gobeil for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with previous speakers in this debate in extending my very sincere congratulations to the mover (Mr. Gobeil) and the seconder (Mr. Barber) of the address. Unfortunately at the commencement of all our sessions the leaders of all parties in the house find it necessary to pay tribute to those who have passed the great divide since the house prorogued. May I in a very humble way this evening be permitted, sir, in this house to try to express the great loss which the Dominion of Canada has sustained since last we parted on account of the death of that great and distinguished Canadian, Sir Arthur Currie. I think, sir, that I am voicing the sentiments of every hon. member on the floor of this house when I say, without at all presuming to add to the marvelous tributes that have been paid to his memory, that he was great in war, great in peace, and great indeed in the heart of his country. May I also be permitted to place upon Hansard a quotation from one of his recent speeches, because it deals with a subject which I intend to present to the house this evening, and which has already been referred to by two of the speakers this afternoon:

> Our hope in war was to salvage the old moral values of civilization. Our hope in peace when we came home was to use our influence and strength for the placing of our country on a little higher plane.
> Our determination was to see that our broken comrades—the shattered wreckage of the war—and the dependents of our dead comrades should never want nor suffer need. Our intention was to prove to our country that grief and hate were not the only results of the courage and the death of ten million men but that mutual help and service and sacrifice were still alive in our country.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, to use those words by way of a preliminary towards the consideration of a discussion in regard to pensions, but before I pass along, may I refer by the way with the utmost commendation to the appointment made yesterday, I understand by the government of the new Sergeant-at-Arms of this house. I think that appointment reflects great credit upon this administration, that it is one of the finest appointments they have made during the last four years, and I commend that appointment very heartily.

My honourable, temperamental and rodomontade friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), speaking in the house this afternoon, had the supreme, the sublime yet customary effrontery to say that I had suggested the injection of the pensions question into the arena of party politics. I think, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend has forgotten my attitude in this house during the last three and a half years. He surely must have forgotten my attitude on this question last year in this house. If he had only consulted his own colleagues in the administration I am sure he would have been told that when the pensions question was before this house last year I assisted the hon. Minister of Pensions (Mr. MacLaren) in piloting that legislation through this house in a non-partisan way when there was some criticism coming from my own side of the house. So I want to tell my hon. friend the Minister of Railways that I resent and I repudiate the suggestion that he made. In my experience in this house in the last three and a half years he is the only one, Mr. Speaker, that has ever suggested or insinuated that any hon. member of this house had ever endeavoured to bring the question of pensions into the arena of party politics.

Mr. MANION: I quoted the hon. gentleman's speech in Fort William, not in this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): All that I said at Fort William I am going to repeat on the floor of this house to-night—every single word—and if my hon. friend will not agree with my conclusions when I am through, then I shall be glad to withdraw anything that I said at Fort William or here to-night.

May I be permitted the indulgence of the house very briefly indeed to traverse the history of pensions legislation in this dominion?

In the first place, after the armistice we had the appointment of the Board of Pension Commissioners, with their exclusive jurisdiction, with no right of appeal to any body existing, with the statutory appointment of the commissioners for ten years, and with ministers of the crown having no authority whatsoever over the board, and with the right of decision retained by the commissioners sitting here in Ottawa. We recall the widespread dissatisfaction that existed in the dominion. We had parliamentary committee after parliamentary committee appointed from the floor of this house, and eventually we had that royal commission presided over by my distinguished and able colleague the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) which considered the whole question in the year 1922. As a result of their recommendations, in the first place, that some form of appeal tribunal should be set up, in the second place that an opportunity should be provided for the appearance of the applicant before the body making the final decision, we had set up in 1923 the federal appeal board.

We had further dissatisfaction existing throughout the dominion, coming down to the appointment of the special committee appointed by this house in 1929-30 and presided over by my hon. friend the member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). As a result of the recommendations of the latter committee we had established in this country the pension tribunals system, numbering twelve, with wide powers of jurisdiction, with an extensive pensions advocate system being set up, with commission counsel appointed to represent the state, with automatic reference to the pension tribunals of many cases, and the establishment of a final court, the pension appeal court. It transpired after these courts commenced to function that about fifty per cent of the applications heard by the tribunals were being allowed, that these favourable decisions were being appealed in wholesale fashion to the appeal court by the Board of Pension Commissioners, and that the great majority of the appeals entered by the Board of Pension Commissioners were being allowed by the pension appeal court. So then we had the appointment of the Audette committee, formerly the Rinfret committee, which reported to the administration last year, with three separate reports made to the minister, and presented by the minister to this House of Commons. As a result of these reports the Minister of Pensions introduced in this house last year Bill No. 78, under which new machinery was going to be set up. At my suggestion a special select committee of the house was formed to consider the subject. On that committee were several members on the government side of the house, some on this side and some from the far corner to my left. After a good deal of hard work and careful deliberation the committee presented its report to the house. May I quote very briefly what was said on that occasion by three of its spokesmen. The hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) said:

> In conclusion, I think I voice the opinion of every member of the committee in saying that the work was done by your committee most earnestly and with no desire except to serve the interests of the public and at the same time the interests of the returned men.

Personally, these were the views I expressed:

> I wish to make one observation, that we have adopted in the first place the principle of merger between the Board of Pension Commissioners—

And this is the part I wish to emphasize:

> —and the tribunals. . . . We have endeavoured to ensure that the personnel of the tribunals and of the Board of Pension Commissioners shall have equal chances in the discretion of the governor in council, and also that the clerks and under-staff shall be in the same category, so that the objections which we have all been receiving from our various ridings have been as far as possible met by your committee.

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman), speaking in the same debate, in order to make the representation complete said:

> I hope they will also keep in mind, as they undoubtedly will, the personnel of the pension tribunals. Apparently these men have achieved a unique success, something rarely accomplished. They reviewed many cases, some of which they accepted and some of which they refused, but I have heard only of a few cases of dissatisfaction in connection with unsuccessful applicants whose cases were heard by these tribunals.

Now let me say here that an agreement was reached by the members of the committee last year—and I am in the judgment of hon. gentlemen who are supporting the government—that equal representation would be given the personnel of the pension tribunals in the formation of the new Board of Pension Commissioners. That pledge was given the committee; otherwise there would not have been a unanimous report.

Mr. BENNETT: It was not communicated to the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is probably where the fault lies; but I state on my honour, and I am within the judgment of the members who served on the committee, that such an understanding was reached, because otherwise there would not have been a unanimous report. My hon. friend from Ottawa can back me up and substantiate every word I say. That legislation would not have been submitted to the house by a unanimous vote of the committee had there not been such an understanding, and I so stated when I supported the hon. member for Parry Sound and the Minister of Pensions in piloting the legislation through the House of Commons. The only thing that I said in Fort William was that someone broke faith with the committee of last year, and I repeat it on the floor of the House of Commons. What happened? This measure was proclaimed on the 1st day of October. Look at the personnel of the new commission—and I am not criticizing them individually; I mention them merely to show that someone broke faith with that committee which comprised members from all parts of the house, members supporting the government, my friends to the left of me and members representing his majesty's loyal opposition.

Mr. MacLAREN: The chairman of the committee informs me quite differently.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am within the judgment of the members of the committee.

Mr. GEARY: The hon. member's recollection is entirely different from mine, and I was on the committee. How could that committee make any arrangement about who should be appointed? I want to tell the hon. member that my recollection is entirely at variance with his.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Nevertheless I am in the judgment of those who were present at the committee hearings representing all the ex-service associations of the dominion, and whose considered conclusion was that that bargain would be kept, that pledge honoured. In the formation of the new board, the personnel of the old Board of Pension Commissioners has been retained, with the chief medical adviser, with one of the old commission counsel, with one of the medical advisers from the Montreal unit, with a gentleman from Toronto whom I do not know but who was not with the old organization; while the only one appointed from the pension tribunal, as recommended by us on this side, who endeavoured to bring about a non-partisan conclusion, was Sir Richard Turner. All the rest, with the exception of that gentleman from Toronto, were identified with the old Board of Pension Commissioners before this new legislation was passed.

I wish now to discuss for a moment a matter referred to this afternoon by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth. Last year this question came up before the same committee, and we put a special section in Bill 78 to provide that where any pensioner's entitlement was in question he should be given ample notice of hearing. I understand that the act was not proclaimed until the first day of October, with the result that practically all the work of reviewing, as I am informed, was completed under the old machinery before the precautionary section which we inserted came into force. I am not blaming the administration in this regard, but to-day there is widespread feeling throughout the community, and that is all I said in the city of Fort William.

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to do the hon. gentleman any injustice; I quoted the paper in which he was reported as having accused us of a gross breach of faith.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I still say that there was a breach of faith in regard to the promise given that committee last year.

Mr. BENNETT: No such pledge was given that I had knowledge of, nor bargain, and the members of the committee deny it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I can only say to the Prime Minister as frankly as possible that it was my understanding, and I am sure it was the understanding of the member for Ottawa; it was the understanding of every single one representing ex-service associations present before the committee..

Mr. MacLAREN: I have come in very close contact with the situation and I can say that there was no understanding, so far as I know. To the best of my knowledge there was no understanding in regard to the appointments.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am glad to accept the minister's assurance, but I repeat it was the understanding arrived at by the committee. I so stated myself in discussing the bill before the house, and it was certainly understood by all those present in the committee; and from that position I refuse to recede one iota. Now, in regard to the cases referred to this afternoon by my hon. friend, my understanding is that a very serious situation is developing throughout the dominion so far as dependents of soldiers are concerned. My information is that some thousands of marriage cases have been already reviewed, and in about six hundred, as the result of some irregularity of procedure discovered, very drastic action has been taken. I am informed that there are twenty thousand investigations pending along this line, and in this connection I would make a constructive suggestion. I do not believe for one moment that the review of these cases should be left to Colonel John Thompson, the chairman of the board. I have more faith in the Minister of Pensions and more faith in the president of the appeal court than I have in Colonel John Thompson, and I suggest to the minister, inasmuch as this is a very live question throughout the dominion, that he himself, the president of the appeal court and the chairman of the commission, review all these cases and if there is fraud institute prosecution; if not, then the pensions should be reinstated on a meritorious basis if no other way is possible. I make that suggestion in absolute good faith.

I have from Winnipeg a case of which the minister may know where in 1933, twenty-seven years after the wife had disappeared, an order of the court was obtained from the chief justice of Manitoba, presuming the death of the first wife. It is this sort of thing done by the pension commission that defies a reasonable presumption of justice on their part. This man with an 80 per cent disability from overseas service and with his leg off, receives sixty-one cents a month and $4.60 for clothing allowance, as a result of his pension being absolutely obliterated by officials of the commission who are over-riding the concrete conclusions of the chief justice of Manitoba.

I agree entirely with the Minister of Railways when he suggests that on these questions of pensions there should be cooperation. There always has been by all parties in the house. That is why I felt that last year the understanding arrived at was not lived up to and that under false pretences we agreed to the principle of the legislation on the understanding that equal consideration should be accorded the pensions tribunals as would be shown the Board of Pension Commissioners. If there is a conflict of opinion between my hon. friends opposite and myself in regard to what happened there, I can only regret it but my recollection is very definite. Parliament has always put humanity before ruthlessness in the administration of our pension system and has dealt with the question regardless of any partisan consideration. I am sure the genius of parliament can still rise above the ruthless administration of any commission and see to it that we combine and cooperate as between the great interests of the ex-service men and their dependents and the interests of Canada as a whole.

Mr. BENNETT: Might I say to the hon. gentleman that the government has already determined, as I indicated in part this afternoon, that in all those cases where men's pensions were taken from them without notice, they should be restored. That has been decided. The method by which it is to be done, whether by legislation or otherwise, is a matter on which I ventured to ask the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) about to-day. I believe under the provisions of the Relief Act we may be able to accomplish it. It is proposed to be done if it can.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I certainly thank the Prime Minister for that statement. I am sure that ex-service men throughout the dominion will greatly appreciate it. As I said at Fort William, so I say here, that I believe one man is responsible for most of the grief and pain we have had as regards the situation in Canada.

May I now pass on to a consideration of the resolution before the house, moved by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) and seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber)? We have had an amendment moved by my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) and seconded by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe). If I am not out of order, we had for a few inglorious days a subamendment moved by those glorious gentlemen in the corner, for a vote of no confidence in His Majesty's loyal opposition. I want immediately to place myself on record by saying that it was the most vexatious, facetious and stupid thing ever done in the Canadian House of Commons. When I saw my hon. friend the sardonic member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner), seconded by the greybearded, ascetic member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) suggesting no confidence in His Majesty's loyal opposition, I wondered whether this was the crowd that ever aspired to share in the government of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member can slap them all he likes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are the foster children of my hon. friend's party. Nothing has conduced more to the establishment of the autocracy of a class dictatorship in the last four years than the autocracy of the Tory government which we have had since 1930. I said before that I was surprised at the Prime Minister, especially in view of his attitude in the house, in tolerating for one second, a vote of no confidence in his ministry hanging over the head of the administration while they discussed other business. I desire in the most restrained way possible —and it is difficult to be restrained when one discusses this administration characterized as it has been by such superlative ineptitude for the last few years—to say that the government is without question now doddering to its doom all over the country.

Even the buoyant, flamboyant Irish Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) cannot save them. They can appoint a committee to investigate price spreads; they can establish a central bank and make a wheat agreement which has not the support of the Canadian west; they can have a silver agreement which is so weak, they do not know how to deal with it; they can introduce marketing legislation for which the west is hungry and of which no announcement has yet been made, and they can have a moderate program of public works, but nothing at all will save them from the wrath to come. They have lost the confidence of the people. Why not? Take them by their record. What is the greatest problem before us to-day? It is the widespread, terrible question of unemployment. Let us look at the record of the administration. The house will remember the promises made by the right hon. gentleman in 1930 when he went to Regina, Calgary, Edmonton and Victoria and said: "There is no excuse for unemployment in Canada if a government does its duty; Mr. King promises you conferences; I promise you work, work for all who are able and willing to work; I will never support with my voice and vote a system of the dole." Yet we have had the dole in this dominion for the last two years.

What happened in the special session of 1930? A sum amounting to $20,000,000 was voted for the relief of unemployment, and tariffs were raised on some two hundred items against our fellow nations in the empire. This opposition asked four things: we asked the government to follow the proper procedure and bring in a supply bill; we asked that the House of Commons should retain control over expenditure; we asked for a thorough and complete audit by the Auditor General of Canada, and we asked for the appointment of a national relief commission.

Then came 1931 and another bill was introduced dealing with relief of unemployment, then with farm relief. Finally that gem came in that is well known throughout Canadian history—the vicious, pernicious and wicked phraseology "Peace, order and good government." The government had been functioning by instinct; all their acts have been performed from that day to this under the guise, title and character of peace, order and good government. What was done in that session? Do hon. gentlemen recall that it was the last order of the month of July, of the whole session, when this unemployment bill was brought down, substituting the authority of the executive for that of parliament? What have they been doing under the guise of peace, order and good government? They have given guarantees to insurance companies; they have made advances to banks and to private corporations to the extent of millions of dollars; they have increased the strength of the armed forces of Canada without ever consulting the Canadian parliament; they have arranged for the prohibition of the export of gold and made an agreement with certain agents to stabilize the wheat market—gambling in futures! The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) knows something about the administration of the criminal code. How does he sit quiet at the council table when he knows that a man who engages in a lottery to the extent of a few dollars has to face a magistrate and be liable to a fine or a term in gaol? Here is the government of the Dominion of Canada engaged in comprehensive gambling for two or three years and no one says them nay. The Minister of Railways asked me this afternoon in regard to my statement in Fort William, in which I said $30,000,000 had been lost. May I ask him this question: How much has been lost; will he tell me now?

Mr. MANION: No, but my hon. friend cannot tell either whether there has been anything lost or something gained.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I must say my facilities for suppression cannot possibly equal those of my hon. friend. When he accuses me of giving improper information he may be right; my figure of $30,000,000 may be wrong. If so, will he take the house into his confidence now and tell us what is the exact situation, what is the extent of the loss or gain?

Mr. MANION: On what?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On the gamble of this administration in wheat futures in western Canada. Will he tell me now?

Mr. MANION: No, but I will tell my hon. friend that he had no right to make the statement he made.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will my hon. friend correct me?

Mr. MANION: I did.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He did not and he will not. Then I will pass to another item, under peace, order and good government. This item is in the department of the Minister of Railways. Here we have the famous order in council No. 2719: 2,000,000 railway ties at a price not exceeding 65 cents each. No tenders were called for. I ventured to ask the details of this transaction, and the minister said: "No, no; this is secret; this affects the Canadian National Railways." All this secrecy and suppression in the name of peace, order and good government!

An hon. MEMBER: Bad government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Then we come to 1933, the last session of parliament. The same policy is pursued—For unemployment nothing but the dole. On relief in February last 1,357,562; heads of families, 252,000, and I think about $140,000,000 expended by this administration on relief; the municipalities and provinces facing a condition of virtual bankruptcy. This is the record of this government in regard to Canada's biggest problem. In September, 1930, 117,000 unemployed; at the present time 500,000 to 600,000, after the expenditure of these vast sums.

Then take the question of our debt: in three years of their administration hon. gentlemen opposite have increased the national debt of Canada by over $455,000,000. Do they deserve the confidence of the Canadian people?

An hon. MEMBER: They have not got it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Take our trade—down $1,717,000,000 in the space of three years. Yet the Minister of Railways thinks this government deserves the confidence of the Canadian people! My hon. friend mentioned France this afternoon; well, she did something the other day; she changed her prime minister, and I think it is time Canada did the same thing. Take the expenditures, mounting by $159,000,000 in the last few years. Our business men are enduring enormous taxation, customs and excise taxes which are much higher than they were in the old days; business profits tax, income tax and sales taxes dwindling; customs receipts down from $156,000,000 in 1928 to $104,000,000 in 1932; excise from $57,000,000 to $48,000,000; income tax about the same; sales tax from $70,000,000 to $41,000,000.

Take the debt of Canada; what are they doing about it? The trouble is that the Prime Minister is deafened by the clamorous voices of conventional finance. His fetish has been sound money. I say to my friends that the first duty of any administration in Canada is to meet with courage and determination the challenge of our public debt. In my humble opinion no party can long survive in this dominion unless there is a recasting of the entire debt structure, both of the provinces and of the dominion. Last year a committee of the house held an investigation into the question of interest. But has anything been done in a big way? The government have been nibbling at it, but what has been done in a big way towards the reduction of interest rates in Canada in the last four years? The federal government since the close of the war has paid out $1,900,000,000 in interest alone—an exorbitant figure. There must be a recasting of this whole question, in my humble judgment, as was done in Australia, by a combination of voluntary and compulsory conversion. There must be a writing down of interest rates on public and private obligations all across the Dominion of Canada. That is the only way that we can meet the question of unemployment. We have had suggestions from our friends to the left in regard to shorter hours; I agree with them. We have had resolutions in regard to unemployment insurance; I agree with that. We have had various schemes to remedy unemployment, but in my judgment we can never cure the unemployment situation that prevails to-day until we solve two great problems, the problem of our trade and the problem of finance. In my humble judgment those two great questions are indissolubly intertwined. Some hon. members believe that the tariff affords a panacea for all our troubles. There are others, sitting to my left, who believe that monetary reform is the panacea for all our troubles. I agree with the remarks made by Lionel D. Edie in his great book on banking and credit, in which he says that the economic theories of the industrial equilibrists dovetail into those of the school of monetary reform. The trouble with Canada has been that both major parties have been deliberately directing their trade policies towards the empire—and I am not criticizing or complaining of that—but the financial policies of this dominion have been linked with the great republic to the south. Canada must wake up to the fact that financial policies and industrial policies cannot be kept separate. It is one of the important functions of governments in the future to recognize that these two must be linked up. A solution of our unemployment problem is impossible until we have arrived at the answer to these two great questions.

We have had discussed also the question of note issue and metallic coverage. Two years ago in this house I suggested action on this subject, and it is strange to find now so many reformers in the house, on both sides, who were not so keen on these ideas two years ago, but who are so ready to proclaim these theories to-day, when the government is facing defeat and disaster before the country. In regard to the note issue, the view of some of the best economists, including John Maynard Keynes and the English Macmillan committee, is that a metallic coverage is not necessary for internal currency. Even at the world economic conference they reduced the required metallic coverage from forty per cent to twenty-five per cent for external obligations. The Macmillan committee went further and assessed the scientific basis for a managed currency as one-fifth of the bank deposits. In Canada this would be one-fifth of $2,000,000,000, or $400,000,000, leaving the way open, in my judgment, for a safe addition to our present note issue of over $200,000,000. That is without considering at all the appreciation in value of our present gold reserve. So I say that instead of drifting idly and uselessly as this administration is doing, it should be facing these questions of our financial structure, our public debt, our interest obligations, and a comprehensive public works program.

In regard to that may I make this observation; I believe a public works program carried out by a government to be too expensive to justify itself. I should like to see a great scheme by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works to co-operate with industry throughout Canada so that we will have the most effective results from whatever scheme of public works they intend to carry out.

My time is getting short. I had intended paying some floral tributes to my hon. friends on the left, these wild-eyed socialists who gave us such a very interesting time in the province of British Columbia. My hon. friend the member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis) was boasting the other night because they are the official opposition there: My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce will remember as I do that we had socialists in opposition in British Columbia thirty years ago, four of them; since they have increased from four to seven in thirty years I desire them all good luck in their progressive acceleration in future years. Possibly when the Woodsworth resolution comes before the house I shall be able to tell this House of Commons and the country what some of their spokesmen said in regard to the compulsory teaching of socialism in schools, and in regard to the dismissal of teachers who would not teach socialism in the schools of British Columbia.

The Liberal party, Mr. Speaker, will go to the country as a centre-forward party with a definite policy. I believe the people of Canada will reject the reactionary toryism which they have had for four years and also the wild radicalism of the socialists in the corner. We have a policy and we have a mandate. I want to tell my garrulous friend opposite that in the last eighteen months practically every province of Canada has spoken. Manitoba spoke very definitely in accents of victory in favour of Liberalism eighteen months ago. Then South Huron spoke in accents of victory about fifteen months ago. Last summer Nova Scotia spoke, also in accents of victory, and returned a Liberal government to power. On October 23 last we had three by-elections in which the policies of this administration were strongly condemned, and in which the policies of the would-be administration in the corner were repudiated. Then we had British Columbia, which to-day has a legislature consisting of 34 Liberals and 7 C.C.F. members, with the Tory party shattered to pieces. In addition to that we had a by-election in the city of Calgary the other day, at which the Liberal party was returned by a majority of something like 2,000 votes.

I say to my right hon. friend, the Prime Minister, who is getting so impatient now: let him take heed of what I have said. I say to my right hon. leader, and to all my colleagues around me: be of good cheer; Liberalism is on the march and the heather is on fire.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, from the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Mackenzie) I would gather that he is not quite satisfied with the present government. It rather dawned upon me that in some ways the government, and particularly the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), had not conducted the affairs of the country just to the liking of the hon. member. Though I followed him carefully I could not discern anything constructive or helpful either in his address or in that of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), which preceded his.

I must confess that I have been torn between two opinions, two tendencies: the one, that which quite naturally impels anyone sitting in a party government to reply to the attacks that are made by those opposite; and the other, the fact that I am conscious that this country is not tolerant of the time of parliament being expended in party vituperation and recrimination. I believe the country would prefer that the problems facing it should be discussed in a dispassionate manner. On the other hand, however, if we were to remain silent we should likely be reminded, as we were reminded by the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) on one occasion, that, in the classical language of the hon. gentleman, we were a bunch of mummies. So, Mr. Speaker, if I fail to follow the hon. gentlemen in that vociferous vituperation which characterized their remarks this afternoon, and rather trust to facts to answer their arguments, perhaps the house may at least acquit me of any lack of seriousness or courage.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat spent a considerable portion of his time dealing with the problem of pensions. I shall not continue that discussion beyond saying this to my hon. friend: He made a statement which I think he ought not to have made quite in that form; he charged bad faith on the part of the government and members on this side of the house in regard to appointments to the pensions commission, and stated that a definite undertaking had been made in the committee to allocate the appointments on a fifty-fifty basis as between the board and the tribunals. The chairman of the committee later will have an opportunity of replying, but he advises me that there was no such understanding. Apparently my hon. friend became confused in what was said at the time; I will not say that he has intentionally done so in order to charge us with bad faith, but the fact is that there was no such understanding. I will leave the explanation of the details to the chairman of the committee.

I should like to deal with some facts, if I may put it that way, in connection with statements brought forward by hon. gentlemen opposite. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) and others have definitely charged that this government has done two things: first, closed the markets of the world, and, second, raised the rates of duty in this country to an inordinate degree. These two statements have been reiterated so frequently that perhaps it would be well to place upon Hansard some interesting facts in regard thereto.

The first statement was that the markets of the world have been closed. May I say to hon. members opposite that they have made this statement so often throughout the country that I believe a great many people actually believe it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friends confirm that statement now. Will they follow me while I recite just a few facts, and I would not be so unkind or unfair, or so untruthful, as to ascribe to the right hon. gentleman who is now the leader of the opposition and who was then the leader of the government the responsibility for the facts which I am about to place on Hansard. I hold in my hand certain statements which I will hand to Hansard for the convenience of the house and to which I shall refer hastily as I proceed.

The first statement refers to France, and shows the lowest rates of duty and highest subsequent rates between December 29, 1921, and August 7, 1930, when we came into office. It will be noted that this is the period during which my right hon. friend led the government of Canada, and let me repeat that in what I am about to say I do not ascribe to him any responsibility at all. But I ask him to do one thing; I ask him at least to extend the same courtesy to this government, because neither he and his government nor the Prime Minister of the day and his government can possibly control the countries of Europe in regard to the closing or opening of their markets.

Here are the facts. We find that in 1924 the duty on wheat entering France was eleven cents a bushel; that was when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office. When they left office in 1930 the duty was eighty-five cents a bushel. Was that market closed? In 1924 the duty on wheat flour was twenty-four cents a hundred, but in 1930 it had increased to $2.28 a hundred. Oats carried a duty of four cents a bushel; by 1930 this had become eighteen cents a bushel. The duty on barley was three cents a bushel; in 1930 it was eighteen cents. The duty on cheese was increased from forty-five cents a hundred in 1926 to $1.78 in 1930, and we find the same condition in regard to lard, fresh apples, zinc, lead, bronze powder, kraft wrapping paper and so on; in every case there was a substantial and in many cases a prohibitive increase in duty during the period my right hon. friend was in office. The complete list is as follows:

We now turn to Germany.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Those goods were our principal exports.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. Turning to Germany I find that while wheat was free in 1922, in April, 1930, it was 98 cents per bushel. We must realize that there was a duty of 98 cents per bushel. In 1922, there was no duty on wheat flour, while in April, 1930, there was a duty of $3.40 a hundredweight. Oats ranged from free to 44 cents per bushel; rolled oats from $1.08 per hundredweight to $3.40 per hundredweight; rye, from free to 91 cents per bushel; apples, packed, from $1.08 per hundredweight to $1.62; butter, from free to $5.50 per hundredweight; cattle, from free to $2.90 per hundredweight; lobsters, from 11 cents per pound to 87 cents per pound. Then there were great increases in the rates on canvas shoes with rubber soles, unvarnished rubber footwear and varnished rubber footwear. On raw aluminum blocks or bars the rate was raised from free to $2.75 per hundredweight. For full information I shall place the table on Hansard:

These increases occurred during the time the right hon. gentleman opposite was leading the government of Canada.

I now turn to Italy and find from the figures that while in the year 1921 wheat was free, it increased in 1929 to 73½ cents per bushel; wheat flour, free to $2.08 per hundredweight; newsprint, free to 70 cents per hundredweight; tires and tubes, $9.65 to $13.15 per hundredweight; ham, free to $2.19 per hundredweight; bacon, free to $1.05 per hundredweight. The table will contain the complete information:

Then, turning to Finland, we find that the rate increased on wheat flour from $1.03 in 1921 to $1.83 in 1925. On Aluminum cables it increased from 48 cents per hundredweight to $2.30 per hundredweight. The complete figures are shown in the table:

1921 conversions made at 53 cents per yen.

1930 conversions made at 49·8 cents per yen.

It will be seen the relation between 1921 and 1930 rates would be practically as shown above whether rates are quoted in dollars or Japanese yen.

Comparsion with 1933 rates is affected by the substantial depreciation of the yen. As specific rates in yen were increased 35 per cent in June, 1932, to offset some of this depreciation the comparison cannot be exact whether expressed in dollars or in yen.

So far as China is concerned we find a similar position. The rate on bacon and ham increased from $1.02 to $5.14 per hundredweight; butter, $1.54 to $5.88; condensed milk, 55 cents to $1.96; evaporated milk, 37 cents to $1.11 and so on down the list. All these items show considerable increases during the period the right hon. gentleman opposite was in power:

In the Argentine we have a similar situation. The rate on tires and inner tubes increased from 34 cents to 49 cents per pound; on rubber boots, from 31 cents to 41 cents per pound; and there are increases shown for canvas shoes, malt, and so on. Then, the figures for Mexico, Venezuela and Cuba tell a similar story:

These are increases in the duty in many of our best markets, such as France, Germany, Italy, China, Japan and so on. May I say to the right hon. gentleman that the closing of the markets in Europe occurred while his government was in office. I repeat, I am not saying the right hon. gentleman was responsible for closing the European markets, but I submit to him, to the house and to the country that because of the continuance of the duties which we found when we entered office, hon. gentlemen opposite have no right to say that this government and this party by its policy have closed the markets of the world. I now turn to another charge.

Mr. HANBURY: Would the minister permit a question? Will he tell us what the duty on lumber going to the United States was in 1929, and what it is to-day?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The duty is exactly the same.

Mr. BENNETT: The same as it is now.

Mr. RALSTON: There is a $4 excise tax.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, that is not duty.

Mr. STEVENS: I will answer my hon. friend's question. The United States government, under its Revenue act, placed a special tax of $3 a thousand upon lumber. I believe that tax was put on in 1932. Apropos of the question, reading from the Vancouver Sun of January 19, I find an address by Mr. McDonald of New Westminster, President of the British Columbia Lumber and Shingle Manufacturers' Association. My hon. friends know that Mr. McDonald while an outstanding citizen of British Columbia and a public spirited gentleman, has always been a prominent Liberal so far as politics are concerned.

Mr. HANBURY: So far as we know.

Mr. STEVENS: Apropos of the question of lumber, this is what Mr. McDonald states:

> Through the enterprise of our association coupled with splendid help of the federal and provincial governments by way of tariff preferences, subsidized shipping services and financial assistance, we have been enabled to increase our foreign markets from 160,000,000 feet in 1929 to 428,000,000 or nearer 429,000,000 feet in 1933.

Mr. McDonald goes on to say:

> Every branch of the industry should be a unit in promoting, pushing and financing an intelligent and unified program of market extension so that reasonable returns can be possible for labour, capital and government exchequer.

Then he sets out a table, the grand totals of which are these: The export in 1932 of 446,889,543 feet increased in 1933 to 661,921,061 feet—the table sets forth the countries to which it was shipped. I shall set out a few, showing the outstanding increases. To South Africa, due entirely to the Ottawa agreements the benefits of which my hon. friends so persistently deny, the increase was from 5,664,646 feet in 1932 to 18,213,254 feet in 1933. To China, another market which we have definitely assisted by government intervention, the amount increased from 53,341,172 feet in 1932 to 130,596,268 feet in 1933. And, because of the agreements the amount to the United Kingdom increased from 108,314,682 feet to 270,208,051 feet. Then Mr. McDonald goes on with further references to the increases in this industry. I have referred to these figures because hon. members opposite insinuated that because the United States imposed a special tax against Canadian lumber, this government was responsible for it. Further, I have intimated to hon. gentlemen opposite, at least in part, some of the things we are doing to extend Canadian trade.

The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth stated this afternoon that not only had this government done nothing for trade, but that it had done its best to stifle trade. He nods his head now. That, I say, is a most unfair statement—I was going to say a most untrue statement. It is not in accordance with the facts. However, before I come to that may I refer to the statement that has been made that this government and party have unduly increased Canadian tariffs. That is the statement which is quoted everywhere. The facts will disclose whether or not it is true. I say without fear of contradiction—and I see hon. members opposite whom I could name who know perfectly well that what I am going to say is true—that there are industries in Canada which, had we not taken action to protect them against unfair dumping from other parts of the world, would have gone down and out, and the employment in those industries would have been lost, as well as the industries themselves. There is no question about that. And there is no doubt—as if time permits I shall show later on—that had the right hon. gentleman who now leads the opposition been saddled with the responsibility of facing these issues in the last three or four years he would have done as we have done or would have lost out in this House of Commons, because the sense of the house is certainly behind the protection and the preservation of Canadian industry.

Again let me put to the test of actual statistical facts, the statement that we have unduly—the word used by one hon. gentleman was "inordinately"—raised the tariff in this country. Others say that we have raised it to the point of prohibition. Well, here are the facts. The average rate of duty on all goods for the fiscal year 1929-30 was, under the general tariff 15.51 per cent; treaty tariffs, 28.56 per cent; British preferential, 14.11 per cent. In the calendar year 1933 the general tariff had been increased to 17.92 per cent, or by 2.41 per cent, or less than two and a half per cent increase; treaty tariffs had been advanced by .45 per cent, or less than half of one per cent; and the British preferential had been advanced .28 per cent, or just a little over one-quarter of one per cent. But the increase in the British preferential was due to the transference of the liquor item from the general tariff under which it had always theretofore been, to the preferential tariff, and if you exclude liquor, the British preferential tariff to-day is on the average 11.69 per cent, or 1.59 per cent less than when this government took office.

So the facts, Mr. Speaker, are that there has been a slight, only a slight, increase in the general and intermediate tariffs, but there has been an actual diminution in the rate of duty under the British preferential.

The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat said a few moments ago that we had raised the duty on two hundred items under the 1932 empire agreements.

Mr. RALSTON: Had fixed the duty.

Mr. STEVENS: He said "raised". But as a matter of fact we lowered the duty on 136 items which he forgot altogether.

Mr. RALSTON: And then added dumping duty.

Mr. STEVENS: No. The only dumping duty that applied was the exchange dumping duty owing to the dislocation of international exchanges. Does my hon. friend or any hon. gentleman who has given this matter thought suggest that any country can proceed with its trade relations with another country when there is a complete dislocation of international exchanges without taking some measures to deal with the problems that arise out of that dislocation?

Mr. RALSTON: Not the measures taken by this government.

Mr. STEVENS: This situation faced all the world; we had to meet the exigencies of the hour and the day—changes in rates of exchange, very wide fluctuations, creating conditions that simply had to be met. It is true that during the period the British pound was down to $3.29—I think that was the lowest point, or thereabouts—when it was between, we will say, $3.25 and $4, there were certain impositions of exchange-adjusting duties. Nobody questions that. Nobody is apologizing for it or suggesting that we should apologize for it. It was done under necessity, and was recognized by the British authorities as necessary. Not only that, but it was done very skilfully because the way we figured it out was accepted by the British exporters as fair and equitable.

Mr. RALSTON: Except that they asked you to take it off.

Mr. STEVENS: No, under the trade agreements they did not ask that. My hon. friend cannot interject such statements as that because I happen to have a bit of a memory myself. What the trade agreement said in article 17 was that His Majesty's government in Canada undertook that as early as conditions would warrant the special duties and impositions of one kind and another would be removed. The representatives of the United Kingdom recognized fully in our conferences with them that these things were temporary and that we were dealing with them in good faith.

I wish to turn for a moment to the question of our trade. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that we have lost our trade, that our trade has been dissipated. I have here some rather interesting figures, given by the chief statistician of the League of Nations, which show the fall in world trade. In 1929 world trade amounted to $68,641,000,000; in 1930, to $55,575,000,000; in 1931, to $39,769,000,000; and in 1932 it had fallen to $26,611,000,000. That is the gauge, Mr. Speaker, of the trend of world conditions, and that is the gauge that should be applied to Canadian trade in order to interpret correctly whether or not Canada is suffering unduly in comparison with the rest of the world. My hon. friends, of course, in their party enthusiasm, brush aside all these considerations. They charge us with responsibility for the loss of trade. They totally ignore the fall in the price level throughout the world. I shall show in a moment the volume increase in our trade which I think is very encouraging. But whether we like this government and its policies or not, common decency and fairness demand that we measure the trend of Canadian trade by comparison with the trend of trade throughout the world. What if in 1930 we did have, as everybody had, expectations and hopes that the depression then under way, or the depression which was under way before we took office, would not last as long as it did? Is that a deplorable thing? I remember in the early days of the war how nearly everybody said that it would be over by Christmas of 1914; and there was just an odd person or two who said that it would last a year or two. Lord Kitchener was looked upon as a base pessimist for prophesying that it would last three or four years. But it lasted longer than anyone dreamed of; and so when we entered this depression in the fall of 1929, when the great collapse of the New York stock market occurred and precipitated the period of depression the general opinion throughout the world was that one year, or peradventure eighteen months, would see the end of the depression, as we had seen other cycles pass in years gone by. But all over the world without exception the depression continued to get deeper and deeper.

Someone referred this afternoon to Great Britain emerging from the depression earlier than we have. That is true, but Great Britain was in the trough of the depression for some years before we entered it; and that ought to be remembered. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth was not very fair when he made a point of Great Britain emerging in advance of this country or making more rapid progress, if you like to put it that way, because he ignored entirely the effect upon this country, as upon other countries, of Great Britain's going off the gold standard. I am not questioning the right or the wisdom of that step. As a matter of fact, I belong to that school of thought that believes she was right, but the effect was terrific throughout the world. I do not think that any economist up to the present time has ever properly gauged its effect upon the world. That is a fact over which we had no control and no possibility of control.

Then again there was the economic collapse of virtually all the countries of Europe, as I shall be able to show. My hon. friend points out that Britain is a little in advance of us in recovery, and I glory in the fact; I think it is splendid. But it is due partly to their farsightedness as statesmen and partly to the following of those careful and cautious policies which characterize Mr. Chamberlain as Chancellor of the Exchequer. And may I say to my hon. friend that the Prime Minister has been charged with walking step by step with Neville Chamberlain, the very gentleman who is responsible for the conditions in Great Britain which the hon. member opposite lauded this afternoon. In other words, he condemns the Prime Minister of Canada for following the same policy.

Now let me turn to British trade. I will place on Hansard a statement I have here with regard to Canadian domestic exports to the United Kingdom for calendar years 1931, 1932 and 1933:

Settler's effects	$	420,718	401,477	450,121

These figures indicate the trend of Canadian business. Now, we ask this house and the country, not to look at the last three years of depression through which we have gone in common with the rest of the world, but to put to themselves this question; Is the government's policy of to-day leading us out of the depression? I submit that it is. I submit that these figures show a tendency towards an increase in business, and I contend that this is due directly to the policies of the government.

[Mr. Stevens.]

I shall now very briefly deal with the situation from the trade standpoint of Europe. Under modern conditions governments are confronted everywhere with peculiar difficulties. First, there are the day to day problems, due to disturbed world conditions, which we are called upon to face. As I said a moment ago, the government might be faced with a condition where a country's currency had suddenly and rapidly depreciated, and we were faced, as any government would have been faced, with the necessity of adjusting that changed condition to the rates of duty that were being imposed under par conditions. Then there is the more complex question of gauging what lies ahead, what changes are lasting and what permanent adjustments are necessary in connection with the trade problem. That is one of the most difficult things the country is confronted with to-day. To what extent are we to accept as permanent, for instance, the quota system of Europe? Do hon. gentlemen opposite appreciate the fact that virtually every country in Europe imposes quotas in addition to high duties? Take France: France has some three thousand items in her tariff and out of these thirteen hundred are under quota, arbitrarily fixing the quantity of goods that various countries may ship into her market. And so with Belgium, Italy, Germany, Spain, the Netherlands and other countries—all these are imposing quotas upon other countries, not against Canada alone but against all other countries in the world. All this arises out of the dislocation of trade owing to the collapse of international exchange.

There are evidences of improvement in the price level throughout the world. This, as hon. gentlemen angularly opposite will recall, is a problem which has been exercising the minds of economists and particularly those who are studying affairs from the standpoint of the primary producer. Various suggestions have been made. One common suggestion put forward in this house and out of it has been that there should be a wide and, I use the word not unkindly, reckless issue of notes irrespective of metallic backing or anything else. Such suggestions, looking to extreme inflation, have not been favoured by the government; they have not been favoured by any governments in the world since 1922. They were tried then with disastrous results. But such measures as various governments in the world have applied to the solution of the problem are now gradually finding effect, and there is a steadily increasing price level for primary products.

The hon. member who took his seat a few minutes ago said that this government was guilty of gambling in wheat, and that we had lost $30,000,000. No statement could have been further from the fact than that. This government is not either directly or indirectly gambling in wheat. The hon. member for Melville made the same statement the other night. What this government has done is this. It has supported Mr. McFarland, who was chosen as their manager by the pool selling agency for the three western pools. The government has stood behind that selling agency, controlled by Mr. McFarland, in taking care of wheat futures on the Winnipeg market. What does that mean? My hon. friends from the west know what it means. Every autumn when the Canadian wheat crop is harvested and poured upon the market, the ordinary buying agencies cannot absorb the quantity of wheat offered; the milling and export agencies cannot absorb it. It is a physical impossibility to absorb the wheat so offered, and if no other agency were present that wheat would be backed up on the market and there would be unquestionably a collapse of prices. Therefore throughout the years there has grown up in this country and in the United States what is known as the purchase of futures, that is, contracting to take wheat one month, three, six, or nine months ahead as the case may be. That contract to take that wheat is what makes possible the orderly marketing of the Canadian wheat crop. That has been going on for years; it is a developed system.

But what happened two or three years ago was this: with the collapse in the price of wheat together with other commodities on the world market, wheat speculators were driven out of the market. So the pool selling agencies found themselves with a substantial quantity of wheat in futures on their hands and the farmers of the west were faced with the necessity of having some institution or organization absorb those future contracts. Therefore, the pool selling agencies, under the direction of Mr. McFarland, took up the slack, to use a common expression, absorbed those futures as they were offered on the market, and every future contract represents actual wheat in the storage elevators or back in the country elevators in western Canada. Every future contract is represented bushel for bushel by wheat somewhere in physical form in Canada, capable of delivery when required by the holders of future contracts.

Mr. DONNELLY: Would the minister tell us the difference between buying futures and gambling in them?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. My hon. friend knows quite well, as do many other hon. members, that were it not for the purchasers of future contracts on the Winnipeg or Chicago market, as the case may be, it would not be possible to market in orderly fashion the western wheat crop. No one knows that better than does the western farmer; but it is quite true that the purchaser of future contracts, whether in Chicago, Winnipeg or elsewhere, may be a speculator in wheat. Who buy future contracts? First, the millers for their future use, because millers will buy in October or November for delivery in May or July. That is their regular practice. They thus ensure a certain amount for their requirements. Exporters, in anticipation of their requirements, purchase futures. Futures are purchased for the Scottish Cooperative, which is one of the biggest organizations. Purchasers for the big milling interests in Great Britain, Bunge, Dreyfus, the great dealers on the European continent, all buy futures for delivery at some future date. I am reminded that the Stamp commission which went into this whole question made a decision—and it was accepted—which was distinctly in favour of those who had wheat to sell, namely, the producers. It is vital to the producer of wheat in the prairie provinces that when his time of delivery in the fall comes, there should be some agency available to absorb the excess of wheat that is offered for sale, and that is all that has been done. If there were no buyer there would be no sale. My hon. friend knows that had Mr. McFarland, the head of the pool selling agency, refused to take up in the fall of 1932 and again this autumn, the excess delivery over purchases by the mills and the exporters, there would have been a wholly disastrous slump in the price of wheat beyond any point to which it actually went. Last fall I pointed out all these facts to some hon. gentlemen opposite. Would my hon. friends now say: You have been gambling in wheat; why have you not come out into the open? Anybody who knows anything about business knows that if a government were to disclose its hand day by day in regard to these things, it would have ruined the wheat market. There is not a single dealer in wheat, whether he is a producer, or a representative of the pools, or any of the purchasing or selling agencies, but would tell any hon. gentleman that what I have just stated is true. It would have ruined the market.

We have been faced in Europe with quotas, with high rates of duty for which we were not responsible, which were in existence before we took office. Faced with these conditions, not because we have closed markets, we have done everything that ingenuity, skill, foresight and the backing of the government could do to hold the wheat market of Canada steady in the interests of the producers.

I should like to have dealt with a few other questions, but I shall not infringe upon the time of the house. In conclusion let me say this: this is the situation in our great markets, namely, Great Britain and the continent. Fortunately Great Britain now gives us a sheltered market due to our agreement, but in the great European markets of France, Germany, Italy, Belgium, Holland, Norway, Sweden, Czechoslovakia and so on, due to the disturbed conditions which have obtained in the last few years, unfortunately for us, as well as for others, systems of quotas and high rates of duty obtain, but we hold with the governments of those countries the most friendly relations. I do not know of any of them that are not on the most friendly terms and I am hopeful that as time goes by and as conditions improve, those markets will be an increasing source of absorption of Canadian products.

Mr. EDOUARD LACROIX (Beauce) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, before this debate closes, I wish to briefly discuss the financial and economic situation of the country, such as it appears to me. I disagree, sir, with the views expressed by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) who moved the address in reply to the speech from the throne. To restore prosperity to this country one must, first, desire it, and the government certainly does not. Is it by its policy of indifference or by its exaggerated policy of protection that we shall succeed in restoring prosperity? Prosperity, under the Conservative regime, is like a flower which hardly blossoms, and hon. gentlemen on the government benches must know that they cannot coax it, they must show themselves worthy of it and deserve it. Can we hope that prosperity will be restored to this country?

I fear that we shall never see it again. We shall certainly not prosper before we can improve our situation, federal, provincial or municipal, and put our financial affairs on a sound footing, and, so to speak, make an inventory of the country's finances.

I contend, sir, that we must first know how we stand, salvage the ship of state which is sinking. I, moreover, state, as we are all aware, that Canada will soon be bankrupt. Very soon we shall have to repudiate our liabilities or default, unless we act immediately. Where is the so called government policy of sound money leading us to, where has it led us hitherto? What do the government's followers think of the labour situation? What do they think of the labourer without work who toils for a pittance? The representatives of the counties adjacent to the Quebec district understand what I mean by a labourer working for a pittance. They are numerous in their counties and I wonder why they have not protested hitherto. The farmer, unable to obtain credit, is forced to leave his farm and seek another home on new land. The country merchant has lost 60, 80 and 90 per cent of his stock; the manufacturer, in certain industries, is on the road to ruin. For instance, in the paper industry, 56 per cent of the companies are bankrupt or reorganizing.

The figures which I shall quote, sir, will exactly describe the situation of municipalities, provinces, and Canada as a whole; it will, perhaps, impress many of us who are wondering where we are bound for and when the ship will become stranded? In 1911, the national debt amounted to $340,042,052; in 1921, $2,340,878,984; in 1930, $2,177,763,959; in 1933, $2,599,089,000. While in 1933, the dominion debt for the guarantee of railway bonds—less the $60,000,000 lately guaranteed to the Canadian Pacific Railway—amounted to $996,148,000. In 1930, the provincial liabilities amounted to $1,363,382,000. In 1933 also, indirect liabilities amounted to $215,977,000. In 1933, municipality liabilities had reached $1,584,000,000. The total debt of Canada in 1933, including railway guarantees, not including, however, the $60,000,000 guaranteed to the Canadian Pacific Railway, but including the provincial and municipal liabilities, amounted to the fabulous sum of $6,758,-596,000 or $651.33 per capita.

According to the figures I have just quoted, the total debt of Canada between 1930 and 1934 has increased $1,167,236,444. That comprises all the dominion, provincial and municipal liabilities, namely, a yearly increase of $291,809,111 or $29.08 per capita, by which we aggravate the situation of this country.

To better analyse and understand this extraordinary state of things, I took the pains of looking up the United States's national debt and comparing it with ours, seeing that the United States government's policy is striving to wipe out its domestic debt. I find that in the United States on June 1, 1933, the federal, state and municipal governments, including county councils, had a total debt of $42,223,249,000 or $355.10 per capita. In Canada our debt amounts to $651.33 per capita compared with $355.10 in the United States. This means that every Canadian owes the double of what the United States citizen owes. Moreover, the United States have no outside debts, while ours amounts to 40 per cent of the total debt.

Recently, at Vancouver, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) drew the attention of his audience to this fact. In Toronto, he stated that Canada's credit could not be further extended. In Montreal, he attributed our colossal debt to railway construction. To my mind the responsibility rests not alone on railways, but mostly on the public men who then voted these guarantees to railways. The government in office in 1911, 1912, and 1913, of which the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) was a supporter, voted on many an occasion subsidies and guarantees to the Canadian Northern, owned by MacKenzie and Mann; and I could point out many instances where our Prime Minister himself approved these subsidies and guarantees to that railway. In 1914, according to Hansard, did he not state himself that in 1912 and 1913, he had approved of these subsidies? I simply wish to show that if the country's liabilities have reached this colossal figure, all must shoulder their own responsibility and not place the burden on Sir Wilfrid Laurier's administration.

Another event which we have not forgotten and which is the cause of our present plight, is the great war with its enormous waste. One well recalls the memorable speech of the right hon. Mr. Meighen in the course of which he exclaimed, "To the last man and to the last dollar!" Well, sir, the last dollar is gone and no one wants to be reminded of it.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Will the hon. member permit me to ask a question?

Mr. LACROIX (Translation): Certainly.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): You mentioned a moment ago the country's debt and stated that our total liabilities, including municipal and school debt, amounted to $8,000,000,000.

Mr. LACROIX (Translation): $6,758,-596,000.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Can you state what is Canada's total assets?

Mr. LACROIX (Translation): I shall answer the question as follows: If Canada's debt amounts to $6,000,000,000 and if we continue to increase our debt by $29 per capita each year; moreover, if lumber continues to retail at $6 per 1,000 feet, b.m., Canada's credit is not worth much.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Will the hon. member permit me to give him some information? I think it may be useful to him. I shall refer the hon. member to the Canada Year Book.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): That is not a question.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Is the hon. member aware that Canada's assets amount to $30,000,000,000, namely $3,000 per capita.

Mr. LACROIX (Translation): The hon. member does not seem disposed, this evening, to settle Canada's debt.

If we desire prosperity in this country, we must first put our house in order and make use of stringent means which the situation demands. Why not forsake this policy of sound money and increase the purchasing power of our people? If the United States have found it necessary to deflate their dollar to 59 cents, and soon to 50 cents, when their debt per capita amounts to only $335·10, why should we, in Canada, strive to liquidate our debt with money of fictitious value and which would not be acceptable to our people?

If the United States find it necessary to stabilize their dollar at 50 cents, and if our liabilities amount to double what theirs are, I state that the par value of the Canadian dollar should be 50 per cent of the value of the United States dollar; namely that we should stabilize our dollar at half of its present value.

Moreover, other countries have set the example. In 1920, France made an inventory of her assets and studied the paying power of her people and came to the conclusion that to honourably meet her liabilities she had to stabilize her franc at 3·92 cents, namely, 19½ cents on the dollar. Great Britain also resorted to deflation on the pound sterling. Sweden, Norway, Italy, Belgium, Japan and many other countries were forced to deflate their currency so as to meet their liabilities.

It may be asked—that is, perhaps, what the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé (Mr. Barrette) wishes to find out—How shall we meet our liabilities abroad? We can do so, if we wish. Canada ranks second among gold producing countries. According to the Bureau of Statistics, in 1933, we produced $60,880,000 worth of gold, reckoning its value at $20.67 an ounce. However, if it is appraised at market value, namely $35 an ounce, the gold production in our country, in 1933, amounted to $103,077,450. Why not fund this foreign debt at fifty years and pay it with the products of our gold mines, and not by crediting the capitalist with a premium on gold as we are at present doing, leaving the impression that we are very wealthy.

Recently the United States revalued all their gold and the government alone were credited with the profits. Even on gold held in reserve by the United States national banks, the premiums was credited to the government and not to these banks. I wonder why we should pay the premium to gold producers in this country instead of crediting it to the government.

We could, sir, utilize another natural resource in order to liquidate our liabilities. The means which I shall suggest may not please every one; however, when one wishes to pay his debts, all legitimate means are resorted to. I refer to gasoline and oils sold in Canada. According to last year's statistics, we consumed 503,800,000 gallons of gasoline. Two years ago the consumption amounted to 100,000,000 gallons more. Why permit this gasoline to be sold from 7 to 10 cents more, per gallon, than it should sell? Who benefits by it? Who are those who are benefited by this 7 to 10 cents margin over and above the cost price? The profits in such a transaction go to Rockefeller, the Standard Oil of New Jersey, the Imperial Oil of Canada, a subsidiary company and other oil companies which are connected with and owned by the Imperial Oil Co. of Canada.

In April last, the Standard Oil and the Pan-American Oil submitted to me a price for a cargo of gasoline; I wish to quote their figures in order that they may appear in Hansard. For a cargo of gasoline loaded in the Gulf of Mexico, the Standard Oil and Pan-American Oil asked me 3·25 cents per gallon. The transportation company charged 35 cents per barrel for this shipment from the Gulf of Mexico to Quebec, or 0·82 cents per gallon, a total of 4·07 cents per American gallon, delivered in Quebec. Comparing the United States gallon with that of Canada, the latter contains one fifth more. Therefore, in April last, the large United States trusts, owners of the Imperial Oil and other Canadian companies, asked me 4·89 cents for an Imperial gallon, delivered on board ship in the port of Quebec.

What was, then, the sale price of gasoline on tank cars, at Quebec and Montreal? I inquired and found that the Imperial Oil and the Champlain Oil, were selling gasoline at 12·5 cents per gallon, at Montreal and that the shipping cost from Montreal to Quebec amounted to 2·5 cents per gallon—

Mr. DUMAINE (Translation): Shame!

Mr. LACROIX (Translation): —namely 15 cents per gallon delivered in Quebec, or a spread of 10·11 cents per gallon between the Standard Oil prices—4·89 cents per gallon—and those of its subsidiary company, the Imperial Oil—15 cents per gallon.

Why tolerate such a situation in Canada and thus permit the removal of $50,300,000 of the people's savings, because a group of men known as the gasoline trust are benefited by an exaggerated protection.

This proves how shameful are the profits of the gasoline trust in Canada. Last summer, as you are probably aware, tourists, at Lasalle, Quebec, could only purchase three gallons of gasoline for $1, while, across the border, at Plattsburg, they obtained six gallons for the same price. Yet we do not bestir ourselves when the public debt increases $29.08 per capita yearly! If it is desired that the Canadian people should continue to pay top prices for their gasoline, why not levy an excise tax of 10 cents per gallon? Let us do away with tariff barriers and permit outsiders to sell their gasoline in this country. We shall then soon find out that gasoline will sell less than 30 cents per gallon, even including this aforesaid excise tax and those levied by provincial governments.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that it would somewhat be a great sacrifice for this government to turn against trusts, especially the gasoline trust, the Standard Oil and Imperial Oil. That is why I wanted to explain our financial and economic situation such as I see it and to suggest certain remedies.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Were investigations requested under the Liberal administration?

Mr. LACROIX (Translation): If the hon. member will deign to reply to my question, I shall ask him what relief he is giving, at present, to the people of his county who are not earning anything?

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Everybody is earning.

Mr. LACROIX (Translation): Steps must be taken, sir, before it is too late, otherwise, we shall have the sorrow of seeing our country pass under the guardianship of Great Britain, just as Newfoundland is, at present. I shall vote, sir, for the amendment and against the main motion.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Mackenzie King) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to make a long speech, but just to unveil a monument covered with the union jack—I mean the Ottawa conference agreements.

On January 29, the mover of the address in reply is reported at page 10 of Hansard as follows:

The Imperial conference agreements, in force for over twelve months, have given most satisfactory results, and the government under the leadership of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has cause to rejoice.

[Mr. Lacroix.]

The seconder of the address in reply is reported in Hansard at page 13, as follows:

In 1930 the leader of the Conservative party, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) gave to the people of this dominion a pledge that if he were placed at the head of government in this country he would see to it that Canadians were afforded an equal opportunity with their competitors to carry on the development of Canada. That pledge has been fulfilled to the letter.

These are quotations from the speeches of the hon. members for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) and Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) as they are reported at pages 10 and 13 of Hansard.

Let this smoke screen of burning incense clear up. I shall deal item by item with the products which were mentioned in the summaries disclosed by the Prime Minister in his speech of October 12, 1932, as follows:

I was speaking to the High Commissioner for Canada yesterday with respect to this item and I find that we do not enjoy the benefit of the market we should have in Great Britain for Canadian honey because we have not standardized our product. "The restrictions, removal of which is provided by the agreement, have materially impeded the forwarding of Canadian cattle to Great Britain and have unduly increased costs in developing this trade. At the present time the only Canadian cattle eligible for licensing to interior markets and farms in Great Britain are store cattle—defined in the Importation of Animals Act of 1922 as "castrated male or spayed female bovine animal intended for further feeding purposes and not for immediate slaughter." All male and female cattle, as well as cattle shipped as "fats" may be landed only for immediate slaughter. To insure against cattle in finished condition being shipped as stores, the British port veterinarians are authorized to classify as near fats any cattle which in their judgment could not properly be termed "stores." Such cattle, if licensed to farms or feed lots, must be retained for at least twenty-eight days before being returned to market. The purpose of this has been to prevent, as far as possible, competition of Canadian finished cattle with home finished cattle on interior markets and it has had that effect." (Mr. Bennett, October 12, 1932—Hansard, p. 125.)

(Mr. Bennett, October 12, 1932, p. 126.)

(b) Butter—

"The proposed treaty should also result in a gradual increase in the price of creamery butter, in which case Canadian agriculture will benefit, not only from the increase in price, but also from the increase in production, which will result from an increase in price." (Mr. Bennett, October 12, 1932, Hansard, p. 127.)

Average value of butter, 1930, 30 cents per pound; 1933, 17 cents per pound.

"It is however important to keep in mind that the various milk product industries act interdependently in maintaining a staple price for these commodities. (Mr. Bennett, October 12, 1932, Hansard, p. 127.)

Sir, it is pretty hard for the house to understand the full meaning of figures read so hastily, until they appear in Hansard, but I wish to conclude thus. I have in my hand a book written by a very distinguished member of the press gallery, Mr. Léopold Richer. It is entitled Marché de Dupes? or A Fool's Bargain? This is the only way to describe the agreements of the Ottawa conference. I will say no more, I leave the figures to speak for themselves. I do not wish to offend anyone but it is a crime to burn incense before the right hon. Prime Minister by telling him that his policy has been a success, when taking one by one the summaries he has given to the house we prove that they mean not only a loss in exports but also a decrease in home consumption. The facts are there; what I have said is not based on imagination; it is not a tale I have told to the house, I have obtained the figures of exports and imports from the bureau of statistics. I have worked on them for three or four days; now I hope there are some gentlemen on the other side of the house who will tell the Prime Minister that he has shot his bolt and it is time for him to remove himself gently from the picture. We might wait another year, for an election—provided that the Conservative party and the government select another leader—and try the administration for a year longer under that new leadership.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) I move, Mr. Speaker, seconded by Mr. Gardiner, that the following words be added to the motion:

We respectfully regret that Your Excellency's present advisers have not taken such steps as are necessary to deal adequately with unemployment, to reduce the burden imposed by the public debt, and to put the agricultural industry on a basis that will ensure to the farmer a decent standard of living.

The position of a third group in the house is a somewhat difficult one. If we vote nonconfidence in the government it may be interpreted as indicating that we have confidence in the official opposition. But such is not the case. Hence the subamendment which we introduced at an earlier stage of the debate, which however, was declared out of order. We now seek to place our position before the house.

May I point out that when we vote against the government we do not necessarily reject or disapprove of all the measures mentioned in the speech from the throne. We recognize that there are some good measures indicated in that speech, some things that we may approve. When the legislation is actually brought down and we understand more fully the details of it we may be inclined to vote for certain measures proposed in that speech. But on the whole we feel that the proposals are altogether inadequate to meet the situation with which we find ourselves confronted at the present time. Hence while we join with the official opposition in voting for their amendment, we now put forward our own amendment, and possibly they may reciprocate by voting for it.

Mr. BENNETT: The family will get together.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is a good amendment.

PRIVILEGE—MR. COOTE

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, a question of privilege; would you permit me to say that I was paired to-night with the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, February 14, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

TABLE OF PRECEDENCE

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. Who prepares the list of precedence for Canada?

2. Is such a list prepared in Canada; if not, why not?

3. Is it the intention of the government to establish a list of precedence for Canada and have it prepared by Canadian authorities, taking into account the special conditions of our country?

Mr. CAHAN:

1. It is the prerogative right of His Majesty the King to confer upon his subjects in any of His Majesty's dominions such rank and place as to His Majesty "may seem meet and convenient."

The first table of precedence for the Dominion of Canada was prepared at confederation.

[Mr. Séguin.]

A revised table of precedence, bearing date November 3, 1879, was published in the Statutes of Canada for 1880 (43 Victoria, p. xxii).

An amendment to the table of precedence, bearing date December 29, 1893, was published in the Canada Gazette of January 20, 1894, at page 1224.

The table of precedence as finally revised, bearing date December 3, 1923, was published in the Canada Gazette of December 23, 1923, at pages 2075 and 2076.

2. I presume that in the preparation of the last revision of the table of precedence, bearing date December 3, 1923, the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, then Prime Minister of Canada, had the responsibility of advising His Majesty.

This table of precedence applies exclusively to subjects of His Majesty resident in Canada. Subjects or citizens of foreign states, temporarily resident in Canada, have, in two instances, been given places, by courtesy, at government functions in Canada.

When an apostolic delegate of the Holy See was first sent to Canada in 1899, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier arranged for this delegate, by courtesy, a place next to lieutenant-governors of provinces and precedence over the prime minister of Canada.

In 1927 the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, then Prime Minister, directed that ministers plenipotentiary, accredited to Canada by foreign states, should, by courtesy, have place next after the prime minister of Canada; and that the apostolic delegate of the Holy See should have place after ministers of foreign states. Since that date no change has been made in the table of precedence.

3. This government, while holding office, must accept responsibility for advising His Majesty in the exercise of his prerogative rights in conferring upon his subjects in Canada such rank and place as to him "may seem meet and convenient."

PENITENTIARIES

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, a special committee should be set up to investigate the causes of crime and to determine whether the penitentiaries of Canada are doing all that could be done towards protecting society by the reforming of the criminal.

She said: Mr. Speaker, first I wish to thank the Minister of Justice ((Mr. Guthrie) and the house for their kindness for allowing the resolution which stands in my name to keep its place on the order paper, contrary, I believe, to the rules of the house. I am not usually one who is interested in receiving special privilege, but in this case I am only too glad that the resolution is first on the order paper, in order that we may this year discuss this question, which is becoming each year more important. And I think if special privilege is to be extended by the house, there is no group to which it could better be extended than those who are hidden away in a little world of their own, a world that I think is sometimes too hard and too difficult.

Perhaps there has not always been the interest in the subject of our prison population that there should have been. As well as accusing others in the house of neglect in this matter I plead guilty myself to failure to take a sufficient interest in the fate of our fellow-citizens who are for the time being in penitentiaries. But this year there has been a considerable awakening of interest in the subject. Among the reasons for this is the fact that serious riots occurred in some penitentiaries in Canada, and, particularly following the riot in the Kingston penitentiary, rather spectacular trials were conducted, in which accused rioters were represented by W. F. Nickle, K.C., of Kingston, and Mr. Frank Regan of Toronto. Following that came the publication of a series of articles entitled The House of Hate in Maclean's magazine and a book, The Shackling of the Transgressor, first published day by day in the Toronto Globe and later in book form. I want to say that I feel a debt of gratitude to Maclean's magazine and to the Globe and to these two men, one a broker and the other a doctor, who had served terms in the Kingston penitentiary. I feel that, being men of education, having been one with us in the world outside; then serving a penitentiary term and telling their story to the world on coming out, they have done much for the inmates of the penitentiaries. I think there is another reason too why there is increased interest,—although it is not very manifest at the moment, Mr. Speaker—and that is because the number of prisoners in Canadian penitentiaries is increasing. In 1923 the number was 2,582 and the cost of maintenance $1,995,760, while for the year ended December 31, 1933, the number of prisoners was 4,225 and the cost of maintenance $2,941,-

400. So there has been a considerable increase both in number and in cost. Then people who are interested in youth are now distressed to find that a very large proportion of this number are very young, a large percentage,—I have not the exact figure but I know it is high,—are under twenty-five years of age. And when one thinks that on the outside there are great numbers of young people, perhaps one should say particularly young men, roving about without work, restless and discontented, one can see how concerned every one must be in the matter of the return to society of the youths who have been convicts in a better frame of mind than that in which they entered these institutions of punishment.

I worded the resolution as I did, asking that a special committee of the house should be set up to investigate the causes of crime and determine whether the penitentiaries of Canada are doing all that could be done towards protecting society by the reforming of the criminal, because I felt that if a special committee of the House of Commons were set up it would mean that quite a number of the members of this house would make a careful study of the causes of crime and of the administration of the penitentiaries. Having done so they would not lose interest in the subject, and since they would still be members of this chamber I felt that the interest that began in the committee room would be carried into the House of Commons and, I would hope, into legislation.

It is not that the condition of the penitentiaries has not been investigated. In 1914 a royal commission investigated Canadian penitentiaries because of great dissatisfaction existing at that time. They brought in a very excellent report, which I read through yesterday, and I am very sorry to say that many of the recommendations made by that commission as long ago as 1914 have not yet been implemented. Then, possibly because that was so, and because there was a great deal of dissatisfaction, a small committee that in its nature seems a good deal like a royal commission, was named in 1920 by Hon. Mr. Doherty, then Minister of Justice. That small committee, which was a roving committee and travelled extensively, had as members O. M. Biggar, K.C., W. F. Nickle, K.C., and P. M. Draper. They made a report, which is the best thing on penitentiaries that has ever been published in Canada. They gave a plan for the carrying out of the reformation of the criminal rather than only punishing him. I am sorry to say, however, that very few of the recommendations made by them—some it is true—have been put into effect.

I do not intend to go into the subject extensively, that would be too much to try to do in forty minutes, and I do not feel quite equal to covering the whole field, but I want to open it in order to give members who are interested a chance to debate the question. One can say without fear of contradiction that the Penitentiary Act is founded on vengeance, and that while that is so the reforming of criminals cannot be accomplished by its administration. Admittedly the administration is better than the act; it was admitted both by the royal commission and by the Doherty committee that the administration of the act was better than the act itself, and that the act was often honoured more in the breach than in the observance. To substantiate that statement I should like to quote briefly from pages 10 and 11 of the Doherty committee report, and I am very sorry to say that so far as I have been able to find out this is the last copy of the report that is available.

> The earliest attempts in the direction of a criminal procedure looked merely to the regulation of personal revenge. Later the state assumed the duty of avenging crime and forbade any direct intervention by those who suffered from it; but the revengeful character of punishment has persisted and the penitentiary system still bears the earmarks of its origin—

Again, on page 11 they say:

> Almost all the inmates of the penitentiaries must before they die be returned to freedom, and each prisoner on his release will be called upon to live the ordinary life of a free man. Society therefore must inevitably suffer, if during his term a convict's spirit has been broken, if his habit of industry, if it existed, has been suppressed, and to the extent that his morals have been corrupted by prison associations. It is also true, of course, that the convict himself suffers, but that consideration does not for the present purpose appear to be of primary importance. He has been guilty of a crime which, if he had lived a century ago, he would probably have expiated on the scaffold. That there should be suffering is inevitable, but it is ridiculous that society should store up trouble for its honest members, weaken itself, and involve itself in large and unnecessary expenditures.

That is my attitude. I do not think we should expect that there would not be suffering on the part of the convict; there must be, but there is suffering that will be beneficial and suffering that will be a continual humiliation and irritation, which would not help the convict to come out of the penitentiary wanting to be a better citizen, but which would rather help him to come out with the feeling that he wanted to avenge himself on society.

A very interesting study of youthful offenders or research has been made in Canada, the closest thing we have had to a scientific study of the question. The report is published by the Canadian Council on Child Welfare, but it was written by Frank Sharpe, Esq. I do not want to take time to give the names of the very eminent people who served on this research committee, but they worked in conjunction with Brigadier General Hughes. They chose fifty-six boys who had been sentenced to penitentiaries prior to the end of the twenty-second year of their life. This is a very interesting pamphlet, and in their conclusion they say:

> Our old methods were founded on vengeance, and it is only so far as we frankly acknowledge that this is still their foundation that they have the slightest claim to our respect. If it be vengeance we are after then let us go ahead as we are. It can then matter little whether we injure society or not, for vengeance must always be blind to other interests. But then if we are to continue with these methods let us give over our hypocrisy; let us stop talking about the reform of the prisoner and the protection of society.

The names of those who served on the committee are outstanding; they cover a wide range, including psychiatrists, trained social workers, a professor of psychology and so on.

In my opinion crime is a disease of society, and it is not fair to wreak the whole results on the head of the criminal himself. Many, and in fact most, I think, of our criminals are either badly born or badly reared or both, and they have had very little chance to make good. I think heredity and environment determine what we are, and we have been luckier than they. I remember that when I visited Kingston penitentiary I was invited to address the women prisoners. I may have told you before that this was the hardest thing I have ever had to do in my life, but as I faced those women I did not feel myself different from them; I simply felt that I had been in much more fortunate circumstances. I feel, too, that economic conditions play a great part in determining whether we will have a large or a small crime problem. This royal commission of 1914 used a remarkable sentence in its report: it said:

> The fact is that the more closely the treatment of the prisoner approximates the treatment of the free man, the less likelihood is there of individual or organized outbreaks of violence.

I think that is true; I think if from 1914 on the Penitentiaries Act, the regulations and the administration had been woven around that central idea we would not have had the penitentiary riots which we did have last year.

Now I am going to take a short time to point out some of the things that obviously must be done, things that we all know and as to which there can be very little argument. One is that when a prisoner is entering the institution there should be a very careful examination made not only in regard to his physical and mental health but also to determine his interests and training, if any. Then an effort should be made, using sound educational principles and starting from where the prisoner is, to lead him out into a better place. I do not think that can be done by unskilled people. It does not make any difference what splendid intentions the warden might have; unless he or someone acting with him is a trained psychiatrist, a skilled doctor, knowing something about criminology and sociology, there is very little the warden can do to save the prisoner from himself.

Another point is one which I have argued in the house already; it was accepted by the house, but was never acted upon. It is this: Once the prisoner is received and classified by someone who understands the why of human behaviour, then he should have work, not only monotonous and uninteresting work but work that he likes to do, and if he does not like to do any work every effort must be made to induce him to like some sort of work. Some years ago I argued in this house that prisoners should be paid for their work, that the cost of their maintenance should be taken out of their pay and the balance either allowed to accumulate for the prisoner on his release or go to maintain his family during his term in the penitentiary. That position has been taken by the Canadian Bar Association; I have in my hand the report of the committee on the administration of criminal justice, which report was adopted by the association. The same position was upheld by Brigadier General Hughes in report after report, which I placed on Hansard previously. Year after year, starting in 1919 and continuing until he retired, General Hughes took that position. The same attitude was taken by Alfred E. Smith when he was governor of the state of New York and by the superintendent of the United States federal institutions that correspond to our penitentiaries.

There is no doubt at all that the man who is in a prison and is no longer in any way responsible for his family is apt, if he is a good type, to feel disgraced and, if he is not a good type, to feel relieved. In either case it is very much better for him if the responsibility for his family remains his own, and if he knows that by his own work he can discharge it. I recall how often in this House of Commons it was said that organized labour was against such procedure. That is not so, as is shown by a long statement written by Tom Moore, president of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and addressed to Brigadier General Hughes. I am not quoting from it, because I have done so on a previous occasion, and any hon. members who wish may obtain it and read it for themselves. On the occasion I debated this subject in the house I had letters from mayors and heads of municipalities who said they hoped very much that not only would the house adopt the resolution, but that it would implement it, because they were always asking to have prisoners released not because those prisoners had not committed a crime but because the municipalities did not want to be saddled with the responsibility of caring for a prisoner's family. I have a letter in my possession, one which I prize very much, which was smuggled out to me from the penitentiary at Kingston immediately following the last debate on this subject in the House of Commons. One paragraph of the letter is as follows:

> It is peculiar to note that in such institutions as the Ontario reformatories at Guelph and Burwash a wage is paid to the men although the revenue produced by these institutions is negligible while the penitentiaries, which do produce considerable revenue and could be made to produce a great deal more, pay no wages at all but turn a man loose with only $10 dollars with which to face the world in his uphill fight for rehabilitation. What is this to a man who has no place to go, and not so much as an extra collar or handkerchief to his name? He must obtain employment, not through outside assistance but by his own unaided efforts, and the very clothing he wears which stamps him indelibly as an ex-convict is an impediment to his success. How much greater his chances would be if he had a small sum of money as a result of his own labour with which to provide himself with suitable clothing and thus restore his self confidence without which failure is almost inevitable.

In the reports of both the commissions to which I am constantly referring, namely the royal commission of 1914 and the Doherty committee of 1920, work with pay was recommended, and the Doherty committee went so far as to say that if action were not taken there were certain circumstances, taking into account the time of year, under which a prisoner should be given $25 instead of $10 on release. Any hon. members who have read Shackling the Transgressor by Doctor Withrow, will notice that he as well has dealt with this matter. That is all I am going to say about work with pay. I feel the subject does not need to be argued before an intelligent body such as the House of Commons of Canada.

[Miss Macphail.]

Then, may I say a few words concerning the health of convicts. I have talked to a great many men who have served sentences in the various penitentiaries. Particularly those who come from Kingston say, and are saying up until the present time, that men who are clean and those who are unclean have their clothing washed at the same time and place, and that the men who are in good health are always terrified lest they should catch some loathsome disease from those who are not. They say that in the barber shops there is no real effort made to sterilize the instruments used and so to save the healthy from the unhealthy. It is true, also, that tubercular patients are allowed to mingle with their fellow convicts. I am expecting this statement to be denied, but may I say that it need not be because I happen to know very well a man who is sentenced to a five-year term in Kingston penitentiary, a man who is a one hundred per cent pensioner, is very ill from tuberculosis, had hemorrhages as long as three or four years ago and for several months after that time was in a military hospital. He is a man with a fine social outlook and very much better than a great many people I know who are not in the penitentiary. I know him well.

Mr. JACOBS: Will the hon. member give us the names of those she knows who are not in?

Miss MACPHAIL: It would take too long; I want to finish in forty minutes. Anyone who is familiar with the construction of penitentiaries, or has visited one of these buildings, knows how bad a place it is for those suffering from tubercular trouble, because it is very difficult for them to get direct sunlight and almost impossible to get fresh air—probably I should say more or less fresh air. As the cells are constructed the windows are at such a distance from the floor that fresh air and light are of very little use to the sufferers and this was the condition in the case I have mentioned.

Probably the matter I am about to discuss should not come under the heading of health, but I shall discuss it from that viewpoint. I remember very well when the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) was Minister of Justice I asked him a question regarding shackling to the bars. On that occasion he told me that at that time when a prisoner was shackled to the bars his hands were never placed higher than his waist. I feel sure Mr. Lapointe believed in the accuracy of his statement, just as I would believe that the present Minister of Justice was sincere if his answer were the same. It just happens however that that is not true. Shackling to the bars means shackling the prisoner to bars with his hands anywhere from a point waist high to stretching them as far above his head as they can be stretched. More often they are high above his head than on the level of his waist.

To prove that point may I quote from the report of the Doherty committee. I realize I do not need to do it, but probably some hon. members may think I should. At page 47 I find:

> Again, the committee was assured by one warden that the punishment of shackling to the cell gate was never executed with the hands higher than the waist, and was indeed informed that it was so limited by regulation, but instances were found of convicts who had undergone the punishment with their hands fastened as far above their heads as possible.

That was told me by convict after convict who came out. I would have believed it anyway but I must believe it when I read it here, read it again in the report of the royal commission and in Doctor Withrow's book. So there is no use saying that it has not been so up until now; whether or not that condition exists now we may possibly learn later.

I am not going to take time to deal with paddling other than to say that I think the right that the warden has enjoyed, and this seems a curious word to use when we think of paddling, has been abused, and that the wardens have in far too many cases, and in many of our Canadian penitentiaries, paddled prisoners for very slight offences. In fact, paddling has been given for acts which were hardly offences at all. Then, anybody who has read this book will remember about the poor fellow who had the withered arm. The prison authorities wanted to take his arm off, but he did not want them to. He said it was his arm and that he did not want it off. Because of that he was paddled. After all, paddling has been given for offences much less than that.

At this time there is supposed to be no dungeon in Kingston—it disappeared very suddenly. There was one for a long time, and then suddenly we find there was not one. The superintendent of penitentiaries made the statement that there was no longer a dungeon. That statement was discredited by Mr. Nickle, Junior, of Kingston, who went with the superintendent into the dungeon. He found that when the door was closed it was a dungeon, but not when the door was open. Since the doors open so that they are right along the wall and might not be noticed by a person who was not familiar with the construction it might be that some of the ministers who went there and said there was no dungeon could have been mistaken. They should have gone in, closed the door and tried staying there for twenty-four or forty-eight hours' time. Probably at the end of that time they would have changed their minds.

Then, may I make some comment concerning bread and water, or starvation as a means of punishment. The Doherty committee made a report in this connection, and from page 47 I read the following:

> For example, the regulations limit the diet of bread and water to "not exceeding twenty-one consecutive meals," but the committee found one instance in which a convict had been kept upon that diet for several weeks, only one full meal a week being given him, the rule thus being observed in the letter but flagrantly broken in the spirit.

I talked to one of the lawyers who defended the convicts after the recent riots, and he told me that a man who in the papers was reported to have been in solitary confinement for twenty-three years was an object of such terrific pity that the lawyer, after seeing him and trying to hear him—because his voice had almost gone and he could hardly be heard—almost despised mankind, and thought it could not be possible for a human being to be reduced to such a state. And that is not a long time ago; it was just last summer. To use the lawyer's own words, this man was "a poor broken thing."

Another thing that helps to break the spirit of the strongest and the best in the penitentiaries, and I do not think it is even used as punishment, is the long, long hours of confinement in their own cells, from five o'clock on Saturday through Sunday night with almost no break at all except possibly half an hour for religious service. Conditions may be slightly better in that respect now, and I shall be glad to learn that they are. Both these reports from which I have quoted say that all the penitentiary authorities agree that the men on Monday morning showed the suffering through which they had passed. I will quote one or two sentences:

> The committee has been impressed by the unanimity of penitentiary officers on the subject of the depressing effect of long continued confinement of convicts in their separate cells. Many of them have referred to the hardship imposed by the continuous solitude between four or five o'clock in the afternoon and six or seven o'clock the following morning, and the superintendent stated that, when this confinement was continued from Saturday over an intervening Sunday and a following public holiday, it was easy on the Tuesday morning to observe the marks of suffering. At some penitentiaries half a day's labour is done on a statutory holiday following a Sunday, but this is not universal, and the following general regulation is consequently recommended.

This was the recommendation of the committee in 1921:

On any day, whether a Sunday, public holiday or other day, upon which at least a full half day's labour is not performed by any convict fit for work and not in isolated confinement under these regulations, such convict shall be permitted to be out of his cell during such day for at least three hours, of which at least one and one-half hours shall, weather permitting, be passed in the open air in such proper recreation as the convict desires, but under necessary supervision.

I shall not take time to go into the question of hospitals as that may be dealt with by some who speak after me, and it would take some time if I entered upon the subject at all. When one thinks of a hospital one thinks of a room with comfortable beds, and not cells, but until very recently if a convict was ill no one could get to him from the time he was locked in at night. The cells were all locked up until the morning, regardless of how bad he was. There were exceptions, but they were so rare that one does not need to stop to enumerate them. More than one prisoner has died locked up in his cell alone with no one able to get near him.

Another thing I feel is that in this advanced and enlightened age in which we are living, education ought to be stressed in the reformation of those who have sinned against society, but all the time that is allowed for that purpose is at the very outside forty minutes. The men have to eat their dinner, have their class, and get back to work within one hour, and if they are the last man to get their tray and are late getting into their cell, they may have only twenty-five minutes, but it could not be more than forty minutes at the outside. No doctor and no one who has ever taught school would say that it was much use trying to teach people anything that requires the use of their heads when their stomachs are busy attempting to digest the food they have just eaten. That is really quite an example of the foolishness of the whole penitentiary administration. Not that I am blaming this administration, but the act itself and the regulation. I cannot think of a stupider time to have a class than immediately after dinner when the men have worked hard at manual labour all morning.

Undoubtedly public opinion is changing in regard to the treatment of prisoners. While the prisoner must be punished, and must understand and submit to discipline if he is mentally fit, and if he is not he should not be in the institutions I am discussing, yet people are beginning to see that while all that is true, while society must be protected and the offenders punished, unless they come out with a social consciousness, society is really punishing itself rather than punishing the criminal. There is a changed viewpoint which up until now has not expressed itself in legislation, regulations or administration.

I am not going to deal with the question of parole, which is a big subject, or with the reinstatement of the prisoner in civil life. At no time does the prisoner need help more than when he is being released from the institution, and if society were attempting to protect itself, it is then that we should give all the help we can, not for the sake of the prisoner, if you like, though personally I do not desire to say that, but at least for the sake of society itself which must absorb that prisoner. I think we could go a long way. Many of you have no doubt read of the interesting experiments that are being carried on at Auburn and Sing Sing in the direction of self-government within the institution, but I am not going to discuss that now.

I want to say a word or two about the necessity for very highly trained officials—superintendents, wardens and guards. They should know the cause of human behaviour, particularly the superintendent and the wardens, and the guards could be trained by them. I feel that in the House of Commons we have too long put off our duty in this matter. Those who administer the act are not so much to blame as those who have the duty of rewriting the act and changing the regulations, and have failed to do it. I feel that the whole theory must no longer be based on vengeance but must be based on reform of the criminal.

I will finish by quoting from the conclusions of this excellent report that was made by the committee of these three learned gentlemen appointed under Mr. Doherty's administration in 1921:

Exactly as some schoolmasters of a century ago would have said that our modern scholastic system was impossible because too "soft," exactly as some officers of the insane asylums of fifty years ago would have said that the modern treatment of the insane was unthinkably dangerous, so some penitentiary officers of to-day will say of the plan proposed in this report. This argument, in itself answered by the schools and asylums, may be supported by an allegation that, under the proposed system of administration, imprisonment in a penitentiary will lack deterrent effect.

And their last words are:

Speaking for themselves, the members of the committee would not before undertaking this investigation have believed that the penitentiary system could have been as needlessly cruel as it in fact is, and the absence of those features of the system which involve unnecessary mental or physical suffering would not to any of them make prison any the less abhorrent. If that view represents, as it is thought to do, the views of the average educated person, certainly the imagination of the uneducated is not so acute as to suggest a wide difference between forbidding prison walls concealing an unnecessarily cruel, or only an inevitably painful system of punishment. Even if the contrary were true, the benefit to society of a system really directed to the reform of criminals would far outweigh any possible disadvantages of the change; the modified unwillingness to undergo imprisonment of an occasional weak-minded person who had no objection to the restriction of his liberty would by no means be sufficient to counterbalance the benefits accruing to society from a proper system of administering the whole penitentiary population.

I ask the house to support the resolution.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member quoted a letter to the effect that prisoners were given a suit of clothes which stamped them as ex-convicts. Does the hon. member know that of her own knowledge?

Miss MACPHAIL: Several people who have seen them have told me that that is the case. I am speaking of knowledge which is three years old and I do not know what has happened in the meantime.

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): Mr. Speaker, there was a discussion last year of this matter and as there is a penitentiary located in my constituency and another which is close to the border, to me the subject is an interesting one and has been a matter of personal study for the last twenty-five years. After reading all the literature I could get upon the question, I am satisfied that no person can offer a hundred per cent solution for the problem. I am not a sentimentalist or a sob sister, nor am I opposed to punishment. According to my own view, the punishment may be changed a little, but that does not make it any better.

For many years I have taken an interest in this question and I cannot understand why criticism should be levelled against those who have expressed opinions and made statements in regard to it. Prison reform is a matter of long standing in Canada as well as in other countries, and will continue to be of vital importance just as long as we have crime and institutions for the punishment thereof. I should like to read a letter dated at Kingston, June 24, 1848, which will give the house some idea as to the length of time such matters have been of vital importance in Canada. The letter reads:

Provincial Penitentiary,
Commission room,
Kingston, 24th June, 1848.

Sir:

I have the honour, by desire of the commissioners appointed by His Excellency the Governor General to inquire into the management of the penitentiary, to intimate to you that the commissioners commence their investigations in the courthouse here on Monday next.

The commissioners are desirous to avail themselves of your information on the subject of their inquiries, and will be happy to receive you at two o'clock on Monday, should that hour be convenient for you.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your most obedient servant
Geo. Brown,
Secretary.

This letter was addressed to Dr. James Sampson, one of the first physicians to attend the penitentiary. As long back as 1848 the question of investigation was before the public.

I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in a statement he made to the press some time ago, gave a good definition of the function of a penitentiary. He declared that penitentiaries were, first, for the punishment of those who had disobeyed the law; second, for the deterrence of others who might break the law in the same way, and, third, for reformation. I think the Prime Minister has summed up in his own unique way the function of penitentiaries. We must consider whether the penitentiaries are to-day performing the functions which the Prime Minister stated they should perform. I intend to outline several points in this connection. I intend first to give the reasons why they have failed; second, to deal with the reports which have been made and, third to deal with the disposition made of the young.

In my opinion this country must adopt for the young a different punishment from that which has been used in the past. A penitentiary is not a place in which to put young people. The punishment meted out in the past to the young has provided a gradual, graded ascent to the highest type of criminality. A boy is sent to a reformatory, he becomes lonesome and runs away. What punishment is given? In the province of Ontario it is two years in the Kingston penitentiary. Boys from fifteen to eighteen years of age have done six years in Kingston penitentiary for a six months' commitment to a reformatory. I ask the house and the public generally: Is that a proper way to treat these young people? I am not speaking in a partisan way, nor am I criticizing our ministers of justice. I know both the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) and the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and I am confident that if the minister had the proper information before him he would not for one moment approve of such treatment. When these boys have completed their two-year term in the penitentiary they are sent back to the reformatory to complete their six-months' sentence, and very often this return is by way of a gaol. This is not a matter well known to the public. The former superintendent of Kingston penitentiary told me that he had handled as many as ninety boys who had been sent to him from the reformatories. The penitentiary administration may well say that this is not their fault, that they have to punish them according to the law; but if that is so, the sooner we appoint some body to review the whole system, the better for the young people of this country.

I should like to make certain recommendations in regard to this matter. Let us consider in what way the penitentiary administration has failed. I think the first cause of failure is its desire for secrecy. Guards have been placed across the street from my home to watch and see what officials or guards of the penitentiary came to see me. Reports were made and I have heard indirectly that those who came to see me were dismissed. There is also an order in the penitentiary that a guard having a complaint must not approach a member of parliament, upon pain of dismissal.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask who issued that order?

Mr. ROSS: I do not know, but I do know that it was issued at two different times. The officials of the penitentiary administration in times past have used cabinet ministers, political organizations, returned men's organizations and women's organizations to secure their positions, and yet they post an order forbidding the under man from using the same path which they have trod.

I think the second reason for their falling down is the incorrect reports which are issued. I am sure that the present and past ministers would have taken action had they realized just what was taking place in this regard. I am not criticizing one administration more than the other.

Let me refer to some of these reports. In the present report, on page 12, speaking of the institution of games of ball, it says that occasional shouts irritated the people of Kingston and Portsmouth. Just imagine how the people in that vicinity will think of that report! To use the expression "occasional shouts" is a criticism in regard to magnifying complaints. The complaint was not of an occasional shout. No one will object to the prisoners being allowed to play ball and we can commend them for doing so; but the fact was that from half past ten or a quarter to eleven on Sunday morning until noon there was not an occasional shout, but a terrific volume of blasphemous, vile language that the people going to and sitting in church resented. That was perhaps occasioned by the convicts for the first time being allowed to take part in a game, and the nuisance may wear itself out. But where an official submits that kind of report to his minister and to the public as if what was complained of was merely an occasional shout, it is an absurdity. I want to refer to other parts of this report which are of the same nature, but I have not the time now; perhaps later on I shall have an opportunity to do so.

These inaccuracies in these reports coming from such a source to the public make it difficult to know whether in every report the exact situation is disclosed. In 1929 the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) asked the then Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe): What is paddling? He replied and I am using his exact words—"Paddling is spanking with a small strap, not a cat-o'-nine-tails, but a small strap about eighteen inches long and there is nothing cruel about it."

I do not know whether my hon. friend has ever seen paddling; I have not seen it, but I am now showing to the house what a little paddle, a little strap eighteen inches long, is like. I have in my hand an official paddle It has been changed a little and maybe it is somewhat lighter. As I said at the beginning, you must punish. I was brought up in an old Scotch school where my parents thrashed, where the school teachers thrashed, and we got no sympathy when we went home and said that we had been thrashed but received another thrashing. This produced very good men and women, but I do not believe in barbaric punishment. When you look at that paddle, you see a little bit of barbarism. It puts me in mind of what happened in the trenches at the beginning of the war when we started those trench raids. Our engineers, believing we were back to the old days, got a long club and on it they had spikes, an old barbaric instrument. That was proper in its day, but the soldier of to-day would not use it and a hundred of those clubs that were made were not and would not be used. Let me tell the house that one warden on his appointment to Kingston penitentiary, when he saw this strap, refused to allow it to be used. I do not think any person could say that the paddle I am exhibiting was a little strap eighteen inches long, small and nothing cruel about it, but that is the kind of thing we are told. Hon. members can see the holes in the paddle which have one object and there are possibilities: the holes allow for seption of the skin and if a guard wishes—and I am giving this information from a direct source, from a man who has used it, I do not care how many hundred guards will deny it—with a sudden jerk he could tear the skin off a convict. Guards who have used this little strap have told me that two blows of it renders the flesh just like a piece of jelly.

Let me pass on to another report. In 1931, there was published in the press a great story about a plot being discovered in the penitentiary and of men being found there with daggers, stilettos and all sorts of things in preparation for a general break-out. I am not going to deal with the punishment of the fellow who is guilty of such a thing, but I want to exhibit to the house some of what in the report are called daggers, stilettos, swords, with which instruments they were going to murder guards and make a general break-out. I hold in my hand two of the stilettos. What are they? They are ordinary files made into bearing scrapers for use in cleaning motors and similar jobs. What I want to point out is this: that that false report of conditions resulted in one of the very best returned men I know losing his position. He protested against it and asked for an investigation, but he could not get one and he lost his job. He was a man who, after doing three years service overseas, had returned to Canada and prepared himself as an instructor in motor mechanics work. These instruments were on hand in the penitentiary before he ever went there, yet the finding of them was reported as the discovery of a great plot and this man lost his job. To-day that returned man, his wife and four children are suffering want as a result of lack of a proper channel of investigation by which he could be heard.

Last year the question of treatment of these cases came up and I protested against the manner in which decisions were made. As I say, every one of these guards who is dismissed comes to me, and I do not want to know the reason for the dismissal so long as they know and they have had a proper hearing. Last year it was decided that the crown had the right to dismiss a guard even if at five o'clock at night he got his dismissal without any hearing. I thought that was very unfair and un-British, yet that is continued in spite of a ruling made by the Prime Minister whose language as expressed in the house with regard to this treatment, I am going to quote. He said:

> It is the old question that no man can be dismissed from his appointment by the crown without having the opportunity to be heard, as was held by the Privy Council in the Phipps case. Sometimes a narrow meaning is placed upon the expression "removed for cause." It is believed this would cover charges of misbehaviour, which of course he would have an opportunity to meet, and he may be removed for incapacity—

Of course that is almost fundamental.

> —if a man has had a mental breakdown and is no longer able to carry on, it follows that he should be removed from his position. The other provisions, inability or failure to perform his duties properly, come under incapacity, they cover the case if he becomes unfit for the position as it may have expanded, or perhaps was not fit for it when appointed. It is perfectly clear, as I say, that the person concerned must have an opportunity to be heard in his own defence, in any case.

That is a statement by our Prime Minister, and he has been pretty fair in regard to breaking up this matter of secrecy. We must be grateful to the Prime Minister for saying that penitentiaries should be and could be visited by others than those having the statutory right. He opened it but at the time he did that there was in existence an order that nobody but those having the statutory right could be admitted to the penitentiary.

Now I come to another report; and in this connection perhaps I did feel a little aggrieved at my friend, the Minister of Justice, because I felt he was not getting proper information. At the time I brought up the matter of what was then called the preferred penitentiary I stated that a distinction was being made between classes, and that in our opinion the institution was not properly administered. There was favouritism. I would not like to mention all the favouritism that was going on. Afterwards the minister was good enough to admit that he had been misinformed. I want to tell you what was going on at that time. There was one class, brokers, who were admitted there holus-bolus. Their wives could come to that institution just when they liked. They were met at the station by the warden's car and were driven from the station to the warden's residence. Having deposited the wives of these favourites there the car then went down to the penitentiary and brought the broker inmate up from the penitentiary. Let me tell you what happened one day. One day the wife of one of those brokers arrived at the station. On the same train was the wife of another convict who was just getting her one day a month visit, she had a little child by one hand and another in arms. She walked that five or six miles, there and back, while the wife of the other convict was borne in the warden's car. Now that raised a great deal of criticism and feeling that our institutions were showing favouritism to classes. Perhaps that deals sufficiently with these "incorrect" reports as far as they go.

I want to say in the second place that many things have been done this year. I want to give credit where credit is due, but these things would not have been done had certain events not happened. Perhaps I am going a little too far, perhaps the minister would have done things; I think he would if he knew. Reforms have been carried out, but many of these reforms during my twenty-five years' experience have been the result of outside interference and outside pressure. Let me refer to some of them.

A great deal has been said about the hole. I admit right now that I have not read Maclean's magazine and I have not read the Globe. I spent five or ten minutes at the hearing of these trials; I think they were a great mistake. As far as I was concerned there was only one case I was interested in, that of the boy, Bailey, I referred to. I want to give you the history of that hole. Before the war there was a commission appointed and it made an investigation. They found what was known as the dungeon or the hole. Some people think it is a deep dark place down under a stone castle. Forget that. But any place where light is restricted and ventilation precluded to me is a hole, one member of that committee was a doctor. He visited what was then known as the hole, which was under what was known as the insane ward of the prison, and it was absolutely dark. Men were running in that place on their hands and knees—this doctor is yet living and can confirm or refute me if he likes, but these are his own words to me—men were running on their hands and knees in that dungeon, and clubs and sticks had to be used to keep them from biting, as the investigators went through. As a result of that investigation that dungeon was done away with. Then a second dungeon was put in operation; it has been visited by some in its present condition. This dungeon as it existed just a very short time ago, later than the trials, is a cell somewhat over five feet underground, with restricted light, admittance to which was by a wooden door. That door contained three or four one inch holes which admitted the only light. That place was dark, damp, ill ventilated—the only ventilation yet I think is the pipe up to the keeper's quarters. But thanks to outside influence, investigation, interference, the wooden doors have been removed. Now why lead the people to think that was the condition that prevailed there all the time? Only recently was the change made, only a short time before my hon. friend made his visit. I cannot see any reason for refusing to consider these things. Let us say we will improve them. These things are wrong, they are not in accord with the civilization of the present time, they might have been sanctioned in times past but civilization now sets a higher standard and does not tolerate such things. That hole was there with that wooden door, and guards had to examine it frequently because the hinges got rusty from the damp and it often needed repair. It is better now; our administration of the present day has done that much. But in this report they refer to many things that were done about twenty years ago, and seem to be taking credit for them. So much then for the dungeon, and the good done by outside interference, outside investigation. Now let us pass to another feature.

In 1919 an investigation was held and there was much criticism in regard to hospital conditions. Nobody has taken any notice of the report. It has been left dormant. I want to show you what has taken place in connection with hospital conditions in the penitentiary, again through outside interference. This is a letter written by a very celebrated surgeon of Kingston:

228 Brock St.,
Kingston, Ont.,
December 1, 1919.

To: The Acting Warden,
Kingston Penitentiary,
Portsmouth, Ont.

Having been called to the Kingston penitentiary on Thursday last, Nov. 27th, in connection with an operation to be performed on a convict at that institution, I made most forcible objections to the so-called operating room at that institution and with your permission I beg leave to place in writing the substance of these objections.

In thus voluntarily thrusting myself into the internal economy of your institution I am satisfied that you personally have not the slightest responsibility in the matter. I am also firmly convinced that if this state of affairs be brought to the attention of Gen. Hughes it will receive consideration and action thereupon, because I am of the opinion that he will be only too pleased to have his attention called to anything in his department needing improvement.

Possibly someone not conversant with the facts might think there was some political or other object influencing any arrangement of the medical or surgical administration of the institution. Permit me to say that I am perfectly indifferent to either shade of politics, excepting as a citizen of Canada; that I have been professor of surgery in Queen's university for many years and consultant and surgeon Queen's military hospital; that I am not in general practice—confining myself to surgical consultations and operations. I mention the above facts in the hope that these positions at the very least will lend weight to my unsolicited report.

I might further say that I have been doing surgical work for over thirty years, and that in all my experience I never saw such a so-called operating room as I did in the Kingston penitentiary on my visit on Thursday last. I could not realize that it was an operating room, as the only furniture it possessed was an antique metal table of four legs and a flat top, apparently supposed to be an operating table, but if so of the type that had been discarded from our dissecting rooms over a quarter of a century ago. This was the only furniture in evidence, surgical or otherwise, in the room. Sterilization, a great necessity in every operation, major or minor, seemed to be unknown or unappreciated, as the only sterilizing apparatus I could discover was a small tin dish and the only method of sterilization with this was apparently a kitchen range. Asepsis was apparently unknown, there being a total absence of sterile dressings, in fact an absence of the knowledge of the need of such dressings. Of surgical instruments I could discover none, excepting a small hand case with a few minor instruments in it. Fortunately for the above operation the medical officer in charge had brought a complete sterilized outfit, instruments, gowns, towels, etc., from a nearby hospital. The whole outfit would have been a fit subject for the pen of Dickens, who wrote of the deplorable state of the nursing and medical services in his day.

Without being unduly harsh, in my opinion the operating room of the Kingston penitentiary and its contents are a disgrace to the administration of justice in Canada, as well as to the twentieth century of aseptic surgery. It would also seem as though if a convict received a serious injury and was admitted to the operating room he could lay aside all hope of surgical asepsis.

I understand that in the case of any convicts having required operations in the last few years the same had been transferred to the General hospital or the Hotel Dieu, but as this is contrary to law and it is altogether likely that out of six or seven hundred convicts more or less surgical operations are required, I submit the above facts in the hope that at least, in this modern day of surgery, some attempt at the best surgical fittings should be afforded these unfortunates, and I am satisfied that the cost of the provision of such necessary surgical fittings is only a matter of minor importance, especially as it is quite possible that much of the outfit required may be secured from the militia department, which, no doubt, has a surplus either left over or returned from overseas.

That report was made in 1919, but no action followed. On March 22, 1920, a second surgeon was called, and I want to say that the letter I am about to read was sent first to the warden; no action. Then it was sent to the superintendent; no action. Finally it was sent to the minister, but still no action. I should like to read it, to show the view taken by the second surgeon:

Although I am but temporarily employed as surgeon to the Kingston penitentiary, and although I have acted in that capacity for but a short space of time (yet long enough to know whereof I speak), I feel it incumbent upon me, feel it my bounden duty, first as a doctor and secondly as a citizen to bring to the attention of those responsible the grave defects in the system (if system it may be called), of caring for the sick in this institution.

I am quite aware that a man, when he becomes a prisoner, forfeits his rights of citizenship, but I maintain that he does not forfeit the right to humane treatment when, in custody, he becomes ill. I am going to prove that under the now existing conditions it is impossible for the sick to receive the minimum of care which present day medical standards demand.

It is not my intention to deal in this report with detail, but merely to point out a few of the outstanding features which must be remedied at once, not only for the sake of those who are obliged to be treated under such circumstances, but also for our own sakes, if we are to lay any claim to justice and humanity, in the treatment of our fellowmen.

One of the oustanding defects is lack of proper system, and to this may be laid many of the faults which I will speak of later.

Then he goes on to speak of the hospital staff, whom he describes as inexperienced, inefficient and untrained.

There is no adequate equipment for the treatment of cases, no clinical charts for bedside notes, no means of keeping records or daily notes on cases, no record of treatments or medicines given. In many cases I find treatment is neglected. There is great delay in filling prescriptions and getting patients started on prescribed treatment. Example—a post operative case for whom I ordered canstant applications of heat and other treatment, received no such care from 9 a.m. on the day of the operation, until 4 p.m. the following day, other than a little nourishment at breakfast and dinner time, on the day following the operation.

In the cases of two tuberculosis patients, with severe coughs, I ordered certain medicines for them, this is the third day since the prescription was ordered and so far it has not been filled, despite my daily inquiries. . . .

I find great difficulty in placing responsibility in carrying out my orders in the intervals between my visits. These orders are taken in an unmethodical, haphazard way, and I find in many instances they are disregarded altogether, and in other cases carried out in a manner which best suits those in charge. . . .

The operating room is such in name only. One operating table, and sink (with hot and cold water) are its only equipment. There is no sterilizer, no sterilized goods for operations or dressings, no gowns, gloves—in fact, it is impossible to do even a minor operation under proper conditions with the equipment at hand. A short time ago I had occasion to operate on one of the prisoners and found it necessary to bring everything required from a local hospital.

The hospital attendants have absolutely no idea of technique, and it is impossible with the present facilities to do a dressing aseptically. . . .

There are a number of men in this institution suffering from syphilis in different stages, and there are also cases of gonorrhea. No attempt has been made at segregation, and therefore there is no protection for the unaffected inmates. . . .

Tuberculosis patients of which there are at least four serious cases at present, in hospital, do not receive anything like the treatment necessary for such condition. I found these men confined in bed in their cells, which are dark and poorly ventilated.

I think that is enough. In spite of complaints from the inside staff, no action was taken. To-day, as a result of outside interference, we have there a splendid sterilization plant, but it required forcible outside influence to get that equipment into the penitentiary. To-day, however, I think we have reached the stage when something further should be done. To-day the cases are treated in cells, just as they were treated then. The hospital is a large block with cells running back to back down the centre, and no matter how severe the illness, unless a change has been made in the last few months, the patient is treated in one of these cells. At the time this report was made it was an order that no attendant, medical or otherwise, could gain admission to that cell no matter from what illness the man was suffering, pneumonia, typhoid, or anything else. The only thing that could be done by the man in charge was to put some medicated tablets on a saucer and slide them across the floor to the convict.

These cells are there to-day and that is the treatment given. I wish I could impress upon my good friend the minister that this is not what our present civilization wishes. I know that we do not all appreciate the difficulties in the administration of a penitentiary; it is one of the most difficult jobs a man could be given, but no matter how inexperienced a man may be when he is made superintendent or warden, within a week or two he seems to know everything about the institution and can upset what has been done in the past, whether it be good or bad. It takes a man some years to get acquainted with the problems which exist in the administration of a penitentiary, and I do not know whether he would thoroughly understand the question if he remained there a lifetime. But no matter how inexperienced an official may be, his word goes with the officials who administer the department, and I do not think that is sound.

I think the recommendation that these cells should be retained is very wrong. I cannot see where there would be any great difficulty if the cells were taken out and that section of the institution made into a ward. With the cells as they are to-day, on one occasion five men took the clothes off a doctor and the attendants, dressed themselves in the garments of the doctor and officials and almost walked out the gate. They could not do that if there was an open ward. They locked the poor doctor and his attendants in the cell.

Mr. GUTHRIE: When was that?

Mr. ROSS: That was before the war. I believe I have shown the difficulty of dealing with this matter when we do not receive correct reports. There is great difficulty even when dealing with the inmates and the guards. So far as the inmate is concerned there is always the possibility of parole and in ninety per cent of the cases he is not going to tell you the exact situation for fear the information he gives will interfere with his parole. With the guard there is always the possibility of his being thrown out, he cannot even speak to a member of parliament.

The point I am making is this, that very often an upheaval, such as the one which took place recently, is required to get some kind of action. I have before me the list of the people who were examined as mental cases following the last riot. The one great fault I have to find is that there is no attempt to separate these people according to their mentality. I am not referring to the simple mentality, but to something different. The report shows that during the trial one inmate claimed that he had been twenty-three years in close confinement. Of course, right off the bat I believe that is ridiculous. The history of this case is shown and I do not think anything could better illustrate the failure of the system than the publication of the circumstances concerning this man. The superintendent's report states the following:

He first entered Kingston penitentiary on November 30, 1904, having been convicted of murder, and sentenced to be hanged, which sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. His sanity was questioned in May, 1905. He was kept under observation, and pronounced insane on September 15, 1905, and kept in the insane ward in Kingston penitentiary until he escaped in May, 1907. At that time, he was at large for two weeks. On his recapture he was again confined in the insane ward, and constantly under medical observation. On June 25, 1915, he was transferred from Kingston penitentiary to the prison for the criminal insane at Guelph, on the closing of the ward for the insane in Kingston penitentiary. In August, 1917, he was transferred to the asylum for insane at Hamilton, Ontario, escaping from that institution on August 31, 1917, and was at large until rearrested on February 6, 1918, charged with passing counterfeit money.

May I add that this man can saw a steel bar with a paper saw. The report continues:

He was returned to the asylum on February 9, 1918, and from there escaped on June 15, 1919. He was at large until May 12, 1920, when he was rearrested in Boston, Massachusetts, for breaking and entering. He was convicted and served seven months in Boston jail. He was at large from the expiration of that sentence until June 22, 1921, when he was convicted at Suffolk Superior Court, Massachusetts, for robbery while armed, and sentenced to six to nineteen years in Massachusetts state prison. On August 12, 1921, he was transferred to the Bridgewater insane hospital, Bridgewater, Massachusetts, from which he escaped on September 10, 1921, and was at large until rearrested and convicted on January 20, 1923, at Montreal, on a false pretences charge. He was returned to Kingston penitentiary on February 3, 1923, and from there transferred to the Ontario asylum at Guelph, on February 5, 1923, and from that institution escaped on December 28, 1926, being returned three days later. He was eventually pronounced sane on April 29, 1929, and returned to Kingston penitentiary, in which institution he is still serving.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but he has spoken forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. ROSS: I wish to say only this: I would have no object in saying that any one set of officials could conduct this institution better than another. I do say however that our system is wrong. The fault may not lie at the door of the penitentiary, but the system should be revamped, and evidence concerning it should be reviewed by someone. I have one particular object in taking part in this discussion and doing what I have done in the past, and that is to bring about some system whereby we may prevent the young people from going to our penitentiaries. To-day the penitentiary has been defined, so far as its functions are concerned. What is it? It is a large pot into which everything is dumped—thugs, murderers and convicts of all kinds. There may be some decent fellows, and there are boys of fifteen, eighteen and twenty years of age. No distinction is made between them. There is no line drawn between the good and the bad. My recommendation in regard to these boys will be made at some other time.

The condition in which they are in there, Mr. Speaker, is pitiful. I do not care how many people will deny my statement when I say that from the time those fifteen year old boys enter our penitentiaries they come under the influence and force of the worst moral perverts to be found or which could be found anywhere in Canada. For years back guards have told me that every boy of fifteen years who enters the institution is at once the object of moral perversion. Only the other day a boy of fifteen years came from Windsor. He was without socks, was wearing shoes that a pig would not wear, a coat which looked as though the dogs had torn it, and was wearing a collar but no shirt. What attitude and disposition must that boy have to society? Is there no hope? Can we not hope that some strong influence will bring a change?

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the discussion on the motion now before the house has taken such a wide range that in the time allotted to me I shall not be able to touch more than the fringe of some of the questions that have been raised. At some later time in the session, therefore, when a better opportunity will be afforded to do so, I shall take occasion to discuss many of the matters that have been raised here to-day and which I cannot deal with in the forty minutes allotted to me.

There are one or two observations of a preliminary nature which I should like to make in regard to the whole penitentiary question. There is a genesis to the agitation which has been carried on for the last year and a half in regard to penitentiary administration, and that genesis will be found in the conviction of eight communists in Toronto about two years ago, at which time we were indirectly warned that we were inviting trouble for ourselves in the penitentiary if these men were treated as ordinary prisoners.

From that time on, a very active propaganda has been carried on throughout Canada by such organizations as the Canadian Labour Defence League, the Workers Unity League and other organizations of the same kind, which are all more or less tainted with communism. When I tell the house that the communications which have been sent directly to me during the past year have numbered over fifty thousand from all parts of Canada, one can see at a glance that there is some directing force to the whole propaganda that is being carried on, and that is centred in the city of Toronto. The most recent communication that I have had was in the nature of a Christmas seal which was placed on express parcels during the recent Christmas season, and which I exhibit now only as a curiosity. It reads:

Mr. Guthrie who ordered the attempt on Tim Buck's life.

That is the Christmas seal that was put on express parcels in Toronto during the month of December last, in addition to the fifty thousand odd communications that have been addressed to me by way of postal card, circular, letter and petition, to which, I need not tell the house, I did not take the time to reply.

The most recent letter that has come to me came to-day, and I might take time to read it. It is an intercepted letter addressed to one of the eight communist prisoners in the penitentiary whose name I shall not give, from the Workers Unity League, and is dated February 7th instant. It reads:

Dear fellow-worker:

We offer you our heartiest revolutionary working class greetings on your 43rd birthday —the second birthday that you are forced to spend locked up behind the cold steel bars and stone walls of the Bennett government.

Fellow-worker, we know that you are with us in spirit at every step of our struggle, we feel your power and strength in every phase of our work. The great work that you accomplished in the Canadian Labour Movement was and is the granite-like foundation upon which we are building up the revolutionary industrial unions. We are doing our level best to carry on your work, trying to carry out in life all of your policies and aims.

You will be glad to know that our movement is steadily forging ahead, winning new sections of the workers to our revolutionary program and struggle—and that, although the ruling class dealt us a truly heavy blow when they tore you away from us, nevertheless they have failed to halt us as they planned and expected. As you and Tim Buck predicted—our cause advances!

Tens of thousands of Canadian workers will greet you on February 11th as the leader of the revolutionary industrial unionism, as the stalwart and unshakeable symbol of all that we hold dear, of all that we fight for. Hold firm dear comrade! We are fighting hard for your release. We need you back in our ranks. We will win you back to your rightful place—at the head of the revolutionary industrial union movement of Canada.

With our warmest working class greetings,

Thomas Charles Sims,
On behalf of the National Executive Board.

My object in bringing this to the attention of the house is to show that there has been an active propaganda in regard to penitentiary matters. I would also point out that it was all fixed upon one institution. There are eight penitentiaries in Canada. They are all operated under the same government, upon the same principles, and under the same regulations, but the whole agitation has been directed to Kingston penitentiary where the eight communists are confined, having been sentenced to fairly long terms by the highest court in the province of Ontario. Why was there no attack on the other institutions? The management is the same, the regulations are the same, the conditions are the same; but the whole attack has been focussed on the Kingston penitentiary where the eight communists are confined.

Miss MACPHAIL: May I ask a question? I hope the minister is not attempting to link my interest in the penitentiaries with the communists who have flooded him with letters and petitions?

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, I was not referring to my hon. friend from Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) in any way. I am talking about the whole agitation which has been going on for the last twelve or fifteen months and which everybody knows about, an agitation developed by reason of the fact that the Canadian Labour Defence League not only supplied all labour organizations, trades and labour councils throughout Canada, with a most lurid account of conditions in Kingston penitentiary, unfounded, untrue in the statements that were sent out, but petitioned and memorialized to the various churches of Canada. Then the matter got into the press. Then certain former inmates who had been liberated on ticket of leave and the like saw the opportunity of carrying on a campaign in the newspapers, publishing books and letters, and the Toronto Globe in its publication of the Withrow letters certainly added fuel to the flames.

A greater overstatement of conditions was never contained in any volume than I find in this book Shackling the Transgressor. It is unfounded in every respect. It is an exaggeration in every subject with which it deals. A great many of the instances referred to in this volume are absolutely untrue, and I refer to it now only because the hon. member for Southeast Grey has referred to it.

Withrow was a convict in Kingston penitentiary. He apparently is a man of education and some refinement, and I can well imagine, and we can all realize, that to such a man the daily monotony of prison life is a terrible punishment. As he says in his book, the click-click of the locks, the tread-tread on the corridors of the other prisoners, got on his nerves. A term of imprisonment in a penitentiary is a terrible punishment to a man of refinement or education. Of Withrow's experience in the penitentiary, which began prior to my having anything to do with the penitentiaries and ended in October 1929, I cannot speak with as full information as I would like as to the conditions which prevailed there. I have not that intimate knowledge of the conditions which prevailed in those days, but from the files in the Department of Justice I have been able to look up certain statements contained in the Withrow book, and I know that they are absolutely false and unfounded. The grossest kind of exaggeration has been indulged in. I shall give only one or two instances as I have not time to give more. Here is a sample taken from page 114 of this book, Shackling the Transgressor:

The chaplain looks upon Red—

That is a prisoner in the institution—

—as his curate for my friend sees to it that none of the religious rights of their faith are neglected by the Roman Catholic patients. On the first visit of the new archbishop to the prison it was requested by His Grace that "Red" should read the address of welcome. My friend came to me and asked if I would help him in the preparation of this address. I agreed and Catholic and Protestant wrestled with the proper wording and I typed the final draft. Though the committee selected the work of another inmate, "Red" was the orator on the special Sunday and I have always felt a glow of satisfaction at being associated with "Red" Ryan in such a bit of service.

His Excellency the Archbishop of Kingston called on me a short time ago and called my attention to that paragraph and said, "Mr. Guthrie, that is untrue." I did not like to use anything that had been conveyed to me in a private conversation by His Excellency the Archbishop, and so a few days ago, on January 27 last, I wrote him a letter and in reply he authorized me to make use, if I saw fit, of his statement in parliament. He wrote me as follows:

You are at perfect liberty to use as you see fit the remarks I made about the address presented to me on the occasion of my first visit to Kingston penitentiary. These are correctly contained in the second paragraph of your letter to me, viz.:

"I understand that Your Excellency was not consulted in regard to this matter at all, and that you did not request Red Ryan either to prepare or present the address in question, and that as a matter of fact, he did not read the address."

I absolutely requested no one either to write or present an address to me, nor did I know anything of it until I was about to go to the penitentiary.

So much for that statement in the Withrow book. Let me mention just one other.

He referred to an unfortunate happening in Kingston penitentiary in the year 1928 or 1927, I am not sure which, when a prisoner, McCloskey, killed a guard. He was subsequently tried, convicted and hanged. According to Withrow this prisoner was a quiet, well-behaved young fellow with no ill will to anybody, and he further says that he did not receive a fair trial, that he was really a mental case, and that had he been properly defended he would not have been hanged. Now without any solicitation on my part the lawyer who defended this man on his trial—he was tried twice as a matter of fact—has communicated the facts to me: that the prisoner had no excuse for the terrible act he committed, that he killed that guard, that he had no provocation any more than that he did not like the guard. The guard was a man whom everybody, even the prisoners, liked and respected. The prisoner had two trials, was defended at the cost of the attorney general of Ontario, and was convicted at both. All these facts were written by this lawyer to the Toronto Globe when it published this article from Withrow's book, but the Globe refused to publish the lawyer's letter. I have the lawyer's letter here but I shall not take the time to read it, although I may do so on a subsequent occasion. If I had the time I could analyze the Withrow book, but that book pertains to a time when I was not Minister of Justice. However, I am satisfied that the conditions pictured in Withrow's book were not true of the administration of my predecessor. The whole thing is an unfounded insinuation and an attempt by Withrow to get even with the system under which he was punished.

May I touch upon a matter rather personal to myself. This concerns an interview published in the newspapers on December 1 last. I happened to be arriving in Quebec city that day at half past seven in the morning. As I stepped off the train I was accosted by a newspaper man who asked me about conditions in the penitentiaries and whether or not there was to be an investigation. I told him that upon two occasions last spring deputations from the Canadian Labour Defence League had come to Ottawa asking that an investigation be held under royal commission and that the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) had made a decided statement to both deputations that there would be no investigation by royal commission. Lest it should be thought I was hiding anything, I told the newspaper man that conditions in Kingston and the other penitentiaries were perfectly satisfactory and that so far as the penitentiaries and headquarters' staffs were concerned, they would welcome an investigation. But I said there was not to be an investigation by royal commission. Unfortunately it was stated in the headlines that I wanted an investigation by royal commission but that the Prime Minister had refused. This was an entirely erroneous statement and I have given the house just what occurred.

Prior to the outbreak of the riot in October, 1932, there was an attempted outbreak in August, 1931. This has been referred to by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) who produced some dangerous looking weapons—I would call them knives or daggers—to the view of the house as though they were some simple tools for use in the factory. The history of this matter is rather interesting. These weapons were made surreptitiously in one of the shops at Kingston and were hidden there for the purpose of assisting in a revolt in that institution. It was stated by someone that they had been taken from a knitting or other kind of machine and sharpened up for the purpose. The hon. member for Kingston said that they were files, but it is evident they had been manufactured into weapons of offence of a very dangerous kind.

Mr. ROSS: I do not want to interrupt, but for the sake of clarity I might say that those things were there for twenty years and the challenge had been made to investigate.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is not the report of the occurrence which was laid before me. Some five or six men were implicated in this contemplated riot, which was to be a very murderous affair. One or two days before it was to be pulled off, one of those concerned got cold feet, as the saying is, and told one of the officials of the penitentiary. All those implicated were promptly locked up in their cells. Word came of where the weapons were concealed. If they were ordinary tools belonging to the shop, why were they concealed? After a considerable hunt they were found, and I believe there were six or eight of them. According to the man who informed the guards, the outbreak was to take place at or shortly before the noon hour when a certain truck usually arrived with goods. The men on the truck were to be seized and the truck was then to be driven at full speed against the gates. They realized that possibly some might be killed but they were willing to take their chances. If they got to the main gate, they thought they could overpower the guard and get out. Those men were punished and the man in charge of that shop was let out of His Majesty's service in the penitentiary staff at Kingston. As the saying is, he was let out in order to promote efficiency. I am sorry that he happens to be a friend of the hon. member for Kingston. I do not like to have him displeased but the evidence and recommendations placed before me left me no alternative. I had to act and I did act accordingly.

There was a change made in the staff shortly before the riots. General Ormond became superintendent of penitentiaries on August 1, 1932, three months before the riot in Kingston penitentiary. General Ormond had a long career as a military man and I believe at one time had been in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. He was accustomed to handling and managing men. He had been in the department only three weeks when he had a preliminary discussion with me in regard to both Kingston and St. Vincent de Paul penitentiaries. At that time he elaborated to me certain suggestions by way of reform in these institutions which he promised to work out and let me have in detailed form at an early date. Some of the reforms he proposed would take some time to develop and both he and I considered it necessary that he should consult more of the wardens before instituting them. I think that at least ten or fifteen reforms were carried into effect shortly after the discussion in August, and some time before the riot, when there was no trouble in Kingston penitentiary, they were well under way. After the riot the time of the superintendent was taken up with the consideration of conditions at Kingston and the straightening out of the difficulties. On January 1, 1933, the new regulations, which were considered by most people as being rather sweeping, were brought into force. I know that from one end of Canada to the other I have received commendation from men in high places of the reforms which have taken place in the penitentiary system of Canada since January 1, 1933. The superintendent has been very diligent, working on an average of fifteen to sixteen hours daily. He has been reasonable, his suggestions have been sound, and he has made a more intensive study of the whole penal system than I thought would have been possible in the time at his disposal. He has visited a number of similar institutions in the United States; he has made comparisons and examinations of methods which prevail in that country and such experience as he has had and such knowledge as he has gained, he has brought to bear in regard to penal institutions in Canada which are under his charge. He has worked a tremendous reform and anyone who takes occasion to read the report which I laid on the table a week or ten days ago will see those reforms carefully noted on one of the pages. The house will be amazed at the changes which were inaugurated and carried into effect by General Ormond within five months of his appointment as superintendent.

But he has not stopped there. In this very report he discusses fully most of the questions which we are considering in this debate. He deals very fully with the question of segregation of prisoners, with the hospital situation, with the question of juvenile offenders, with the question of payment of wages to prisoners, which he likewise favours. He recommends the institution of training schools for guards and staffs in the penitentiaries. He is very strong in his recommendation for a psychologist in each penitentiary in Canada in order that a prisoner on being received into the prison may be carefully examined as to his circumstances, his past life, his adaptability and the possibility of improving him while he is there. All these things are discussed in this report of the superintendent; it contains on these subjects fuller information than we have had before the house on any previous occasion.

I am aware that some recommendations contained in the report of 1914 were not adopted, as was also the case with some contained in the report of 1921. Why my predecessors in the Department of Justice did not see fit to adopt those recommendations, I cannot say; but I think with two exceptions they are all in force now. In one of these reports there is a recommendation that the prisoners should not be fed as they are now, on the cafeteria system. At present every man passes along a counter with his tray, receives his food allowance and carries it to his cell. He eats his meal there. One of these reports states that that system, known as cellular feeding is all wrong and recommends that dining rooms be established in order that the prisoners may mix with one another at meal hours. That is a highly debatable question. Many of our prisoners object to the common dining room. They do not want to be subjected to close association with some of the men beside whom they may have to sit. They prefer the cellular feeding; they say that it gives them more time; they have time to rest, to reflect. Some prisons in the United States have adopted the dining room system; some in England have done likewise, but all have not done so and it is a debatable question which is the better system so far as penal institutions are concerned.

It is also stated that we should have some definite scheme of segregation in our penitentiaries, and I entirely agree with that suggestion. I believe the best discussion on the subject is that contained in the superintendent's report and also in more lengthy reports which he has submitted to me, compiled from practically all modern prisons in the world. The question of segregation is a difficult one. Many leading men in the various churches of Canada have discussed the matter with me, and when I have asked them on what principle they would base segregation, they would immediately say: Age; keep the young men apart from the older ones. Well, when I pointed out to them that some of the young men are about the worst offenders we have, they immediately began to change their view. Others will say: Keep the first offenders by themselves. That is also a reasonable suggestion, but we sometimes find that a first offender is guilty of a very serious crime of violence; he is a gunman; he may be guilty of manslaughter. Would you let a gunman, if you have caught and sentenced him only once, associate with other first offenders? The problem is complex; in no country has it yet been satisfactorily settled. But the superintendent is certainly developing what appears to me to be a very satisfactory arrangement. He proposes to form within the penitentiary itself a local court to consist of the warden, the chaplain, the schoolmaster, the keepers and some of the other officials, where they will examine a prisoner on his entrance with a view to seeing what he is best adapted for and what his history has been. Then he suggests that there be attached to the staff of each penitentiary a psychologist, a man competent to inquire into the convict's past and present and into his future possibilities, and that on the report of that board he be placed in either class one, class two, class three or class four according as the prison may permit of segregation into two, three or four classes or more. The scheme which he elaborates is a complicated one, but I think, in the end, it would prove very useful in our institutions. You cannot have segregation satisfactorily carried out on the principle of age. Many of our young offenders have had four or five convictions, so that you cannot have segregation along the line of first offences as I once thought it might be carried out. There are other considerations, but I think with the scheme now presented by the superintendent, a more satisfactory result will be obtained than anything that has been hitherto achieved in regard to Canadian penitentiaries.

The next point that has been brought directly to my attention by the superintendent is the question of a new parole system. I believe he likewise deals with that in his report, but whether he does or not, he has elaborated his ideas very fully to me in another document which I am considering at the present moment and which I think I shall be able to discuss more fully when the estimates are before the house. If the hon. member for Southeast Grey, instead of devoting her time to the reports of 1914 and 1923, would make a careful study of the suggestions contained in the most recent report in regard to the matters she has discussed, I am sure she could then form a better opinion; and if she will communicate with me the ideas she has formed, I shall be glad to take them up with the superintendent and see if they can be used in the plan which he is about to recommend to the department.

Let me say this in regard to the hon. member for Southeast Grey: she is an exceedingly sympathetic member of the house and it is all to her credit that she is so; but I am informed that there are cases in which her sympathies rather get the better of her. I received from her a somewhat alarming telegram in October last. I mention that because she herself has referred to this case in the address which she has made on the motion to-day. I shall not give any names, but the telegram I received, either in October or November, was to the effect that a certain man then in Carleton county gaol was sentenced on October 13 to serve five years in Portsmouth penitentiary, that he had tuberculosis and such a sentence means death. She states further:

I am interested that he be sent to Burwash, Guelph or Mimico. I have known this man favourably for four years. He is an ex-service man with a good record. Tuberculosis due to army.

In discussing that particular case to-day, the hon. member for Southeast Grey said: "He is a man who had a fine social outlook," and she spoke well of him. I am afraid my hon. friend does not know the man as well as the records know him. I am afraid he is not the kind of man to be encouraged, though we have every sympathy for him so far as his physical condition is concerned. As soon as I received the telegram I notified the gaoler in the Ottawa gaol, an institution over which I have no control, to look specially after the prisoner. Of course when he was conveyed to Kingston he came under the control of the department, and there we have given instructions that his case be closely watched and that everything that can be done should be done for him. From the medical reports I am inclined to think that he is not such a serious case as my hon. friend the member for Southeast Grey has been led to believe. But I am sorry to say that his criminal record is a very bad one. His first conviction was for indecent assault at Winnipeg. His second was for a bestial crime which I will not mention in this chamber, for which he was sentenced to five years in the British Columbia penitentiary. He was released on ticket of leave to enlist in the Canadian expeditionary force, in which he served, but before he went he was again convicted of indecent assault and sentenced to twelve months. In 1919, after the war, he was convicted at Toronto of forgery. In 1920, again at Toronto, he was convicted of an indecent assault. On the 27th of December, 1920, at Toronto, he was convicted of theft and sentenced to nine months. On June 17, 1922, at Toronto, he was convicted of theft and sentenced to six months. In August, 1925, at Ottawa, he was convicted on a charge of gross indecency and sentenced to four years in Kingston. In March, 1926, he was transferred to the Manitoba penitentiary. On October 13, 1933, at Ottawa, he was again sentenced to five years in the penitentiary for indecent assault. That is the case. I do not wish to make any comment more than to say that the tubercular condition spoken of has not yet developed to a serious extent. The case is being closely watched and every medical attention being given.

I am afraid my remarks are a little rambling, because I see a little note in regard to the Collin's Bay matter mentioned by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross). At the time of which he speaks, when the brokers were at Collin's Bay, there was a warden at Collin's Bay named Jackson. I think I mentioned in this house last session that when I came into office under the present government I found a very unsatisfactory condition of affairs existing between the high officials in Ottawa and some of the wardens and staffs at the various penitentiaries. No one knows better than my hon. friend from Kingston of the friction which existed. I was away most of the autumn of the first year that I was minister, but in the spring of 1931, through the instrumentality of my hon. friend from Kingston, information came to me that matters at Collin's Bay were not satisfactory, that warden Jackson was not properly performing his duties. The statements were so glaring that I was disinclined to credit them; I thought they were mere rumours. I called the superintendent before me and inquired fully into them, and he said the warden was one of the best officers on the staff. I went further and had the warden before me, and I must say he convinced me that he was carrying on according to regulations and that the rumours were not well founded. Subsequently, however, other information came to me and I found that the warden was guilty of very grave breaches of duty. Without going through the form of a trial, which my hon. friend thinks should take place in every case, I retired the warden from the penitentiary staff, simply on the ground that I was trying to promote the efficiency of the service. I am sorry to say we have had to do the same with a number of officials at Kingston who proved thoroughly inefficient in the time of danger during the riot of 1931. I have no personal knowledge of any of the individuals who were displaced; I never saw them; I acted solely on the reports of the officials who advised me, the superintendent and the warden. When an adverse report came in in respect of those guards, I felt it my duty to let them out. There are serious responsibilities in all penitentiaries; you cannot have guards who are disobeying or disregarding regulations or smuggling out letters. You cannot trust them. When adverse reports came in which satisfied me that their efficiency was not what it should be, I retired him. If in doing so I have offended in some instances my hon. friend from Kingston or other residents of that city who have written me very strong letters on the subject, I am sorry. But I felt it my duty to act as I did; we had to create some thirty or forty vacancies in the staff of that institution, which were subsequently filled by other appointments.

One other matter, and I will close with this. So lively became the agitation in the press and from the pulpit and in the various social service and church councils throughout Canada in regard to Kingston penitentiary, in which the eight communists were incarcerated —not in regard to the others—that the maintenance of order in that institution became a very serious problem. Time and again the warden has sent me, through the superintendent, information as to incipient outbreaks. Time and again since last I had the honour of speaking on the subject in this house we have had threatened revolts. Each new prisoner that came from Toronto immediately passed the word: "All the newspapers are for you, boys, and all the churches—everyone is for you; another revolution and we will all be out. A very serious and difficult situation has arisen on at least half a dozen occasions within the last ten or twelve months. On one occasion, I think in the month of September last or perhaps later, an influential deputation arrived from Toronto representing the Social Service Council of Canada, a body which is recognized throughout the length and breadth of Canada as one of the very best social organizations we have. To that organization the Prime Minister intimated that he would be only too glad—and so would I—if they as a committee were to visit all the penitentiaries in Canada, make the fullest inspection they desired, and submit to the government their reports and comments thereafter. They said they would do so. But within a few days a great many letters came to me from reputable citizens asking for similar privileges, I am going to read only one or two of them. By the United Church presbytery at Almonte permission was asked for three ministers of the United Church to visit the penitentiaries unaccompanied by a guard, and with the privilege of interviewing any prisoners they saw fit, and we granted them permission to do so. I did not ask for any report from them, but they made one, and I am going to read it. This is a letter dated November 10, 1933, addressed to myself:

Dear Mr. Guthrie:

I thank you for the permission to visit the Kingston penitentiary, which under its wide privileges and accompanied by other members of the party, I availed myself of on October 31st and November 2nd.

They stayed three days.

Having consulted together as to the vital things and then gone back after the first visit to check up, we agreed that our reaction was that of surprise; from the moment we stepped in to the well-kept courtyard, throughout the inspection of both male and female prisons and the new women's prison—we saw nothing but efficient management, care for the physical well-being of prisoners, fair regard for the cultural and vocational side of things, and a spirit of evident deep concern of the principal officers in their tasks for the well-being of the men, and which in general is admitted by prisoners we interviewed.

The buildings are well-kept, well-heated and ventilated; the cells in all blocks are well-lighted, and in the evenings have sufficient light to permit comfortable reading, having 25 candle power Mazda lamps. There is a good toilet, wash basin, sufficient bedclothes, and fair bed—all in good condition—no odour anywhere—and every evidence of abundant good reading matter in the cells, including a Bible and in many cases a prayer book or catechism. We saw the meal being served, were surprised at its quality, and checked up on the menu. On the score of living conditions, clothing, food, reading, sanitary conveniences, I am sure no one could visit the place and complain.

Special attention was given to cells in the prison of isolation and that under the keeper's hall;—

This is the so-called dungeon.

—nothing that resembles the unsanitary conditions complained of in newspaper articles could be found, in fact the cells were larger and the afternoon sun flooded the "Two-Gun O'Brien" cell, and a shower bath is at the end of the range.

The various shops were operating under good "shop" conditions—and apparently provision is made for instruction in useful trades; and fine work in woodwork, clothing, printing and mail bags were examined. The library astounded us, prisoners having access regularly to more magazine literature than the majority of people outside big cities, and plenty of good fiction and non-fiction. I have a catalogue and checked up on the shelves and in the cells.

The hospital conditions are commendable—

The criticisms offered by my hon. friend from Kingston go back fourteen or fifteen years, and conditions have been greatly improved since that time.

—and our conversations with Dr. Platt and Dr. Cumberland, the inside staff and orderlies as well as inmates in hospital, show that prisoners are well cared for and have medical, surgical and dental services regardless of cost. The men throughout the prison seem in good condition, and those who have had "solitary"—

That is solitary confinement.

—were ready to repudiate claims of inhumanity.

The chapels and school are older buildings with wooden floors. Provision is made for education of all illiterates: and good results at entrance examinations are noted. The schoolroom itself needs to be changed, being too drab, and the Protestant chapel is obviously not as well loked after as the Roman Catholic. Interviews with the Roman Catholic chaplain, Very Rev. Dr. Kingsley, shows him to be exceptionaly well fitted for his task: and as the Protestant chaplain is but newly appointed no opinion can be expressed.

In short, we felt strongly that the whole prison is being administered with a firm but fair hand; the warden is accessible and complaints are attended to—the men seem to appreciate his evident desire to be fair. They said unequivocally that the square shooter got a square deal.

The female prison is beyond reproach—and one could be envious of the regard the prisoners expressed for Miss Robinson—the women are getting a training in decent living and their bedrooms, handwork, and tasks prepare them at least to make decent housemaids—and "Doris" is a splendid example of what can happen even in a penitentiary—as "Red Ryan" is in the other section.

We saw the "paddles" and "cats" old and new—and throughout—there was no evidence of any desire to evade and we saw the prison operating on usual schedule. Our party is convinced that to bring on an investigation at present would be to make for restlessness and to impede a good work being done. This warden is highly appreciated and his views are those of a man trying his best—and in view of the complexity and difficulty of the material he works with—he has accomplished much. The men appreciate the new tobacco (smoking in morning and afternoon) regulations—and the playing of softball and talking during recreation. It would be bad for discipline to reverse the policy.

The conditions under which visits to prisoners are made seem fair—and the only real complaints we could uncover were about the relative merits of men who got parole—an undercurrent that "offenders against persons" were given preference over "offenders against property." This we did not attempt to investigate —but the records would show. Some feeling that there might be an enlargement of the parole system to release exemplary prisoners was expressed. Several men said "What is there to be good for?"—meaning that "inside good conduct" was not as powerful as "outside influence." Personally I felt there was plenty of incentive to good conduct—and that your own address at last session of parliament after the riots was explicit on the working of "parole."

In all, after having specifically looked for evidences of brutality, vicious conditions, bad sanitation and the like, we are compelled to report that the institution will bear inspection —confident that others like ourselves—will find the same result and endorse the administration.

We feel there is something wrong when publications can make such a disturbance in public opinion by what to us must be regarded as maliciously distorted reports. The public would be satisfied if it knew and I am prepared at any time to tell the story if it will help to bring out the facts.

Again thanking you for the opportunity—and I will report to the church headquarters what I have seen and heard.

That was a commission of three men who undertook an investigation on their own behalf. I am going to reserve other reports for another time. I have here reports from the same church at Spencerville, from the Kingston conference of the United Church, from the Prisoners' Welfare Association of Montreal, and a very elaborate report from the Social Service Council of Canada. I am going to read just one line from the letter of the chairman of that council.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not want to interrupt the minister—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carry on.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I realize that I will have another opportunity, and to-day I cannot deal with the matter as I should like. However, I should like to read a few lines from a letter written by the chairman of the Social Service Council of Canada, an institution which was highly commended by the Toronto Globe when it said that since the social service council had taken up the matter there must be a royal commission. I have the full report, but I will read the letter only:

The criminology committee of the Social Service Council of Canada desire to express to you their appreciation of the permission granted several of their members to visit the penitentiaries throughout the dominion.

The impression gained by the visitors as to the management of these institutions was distinctly favourable; the reforms introduced under your administration had effected a great improvement in the whole atmosphere, while the members of the staff, especially those highly placed, seemed to be of excellent character. We believe that more improvement has been made in the last year or two than in any similar previous period and for this we express our cordial gratitude.

We understand that the government has under consideration yet fuller reforms. We hope that, broadly speaking, these will follow the line suggested in the annual reports of the superintendent of penitentiaries during the last twelve years.

The report of the criminology committee wihch has just been passed by the council, and which will be issued shortly, will be sent to you for your information without delay.

I have the report before me as well; it is too long to read to-day, but I will read it on a subsequent occasion. With a single exception all those who have gone through these institutions, all men of high standing, have reported favourably. The single exception is a man who, I am afraid, from his attitude and the remarks he made while in the institution, is friendly to the Canadian Labour Defence League.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like to ask the minister if all these reports refer only to the Kingston penitentiary.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, they went through all the penitentiaries, but the reports seem to focus on Kingston. In no case have I had any complaint with regard to other penitentiaries, though I have had thousands upon thousands of complaints in regard to Kingston. They all point out certain matters of reform which, as I said, are still under consideration. They all refer to the question of segregation; they all deal with the question of paroles and the appointment of a parole board, either within the penitentiary staff in each institution or in some other way. There are several common suggestions in all the reports I have received, but the tenor of all has been very satisfactory from the view of the department and the staffs of the penitentiaries.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister take just one moment to deal with the statement that is being quite assiduously circulated in certain circles, that the government gave instructions to shoot Tim Buck?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I cannot speak on that question because it is a matter which is under investigation by the courts in Toronto. This I will say, however; I knew nothing of it and heard nothing of it until I read about it in the Ottawa Citizen a few mornings ago. The matter is entirely in the hands of the attorney general of the province of Ontario, without any knowledge of the matter on my part. I have the papers here but I shall refrain from discussing the matter, because it is before the courts.

Mr. H. A. MULLINS (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago I had the privilege of visiting Kingston penitentiary and looking into conditions existing there. The report given by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) is as I found it. I entered that institution and found nothing about which I could complain. On my visit I was accompanied by one of the leading ministers of the city of Toronto, the Reverend W. A. Cameron. When we entered the institution I said this to him, "Let the chips fall where they may; we will hide nothing, and we will find out all that is going on inside this penitentiary." I went in with purely humanitarian feelings on behalf of the men. I filled my pockets with cigars which I intended to give the prisoners, but after reading the sign inside the gates to the effect that if I distributed my cigars I would have to remain inside for a period of one year and pay $100 fine, I refrained from handing them out.

The picture as I entered the gates in the company of this reverend gentleman was this: Fifty or sixty of the prisoners were in the yard playing softball. They were as fine looking young men as any man would want to look at. May I add that I was very much surprised when I saw such fine men in penitentiary, when I looked at the young men who are incarcerated there, men of the type who should be good Canadian citizens.

There has been some criticism hurled at this government suggesting that it has been guilty of certain irregularities, so far as this particular institution is concerned. So far as I could ascertain these accusations are absolutely unfair, and I could not see evidence of any irregularity or breaches of regulations as provided such as have been set out in the Toronto Globe and in the book printed by Doctor Withrow. I do not know the object behind the writing of the book, but it seems to me that the author wanted to pin the alleged unfair treatment upon this government. I went through the commissary department to find out what kind of food the prisoners were getting, and was fortunate enough to be there at meal time. The men walked in, cafeteria style. Stopping one of the prisoners I said, "Let me look at your dish." He was carrying an aluminium plate divided into four parts, in one corner of which he had some very good looking vegetables, in another corner potatoes, in another six or eight prunes and in the fourth a liberal serving of roast beef. In addition to that he had a large currant bun. Then, on top of that he had three ears of corn, and a mug of tea, I said to my friend, "It looks as though they are well fed; surely that is a liberal meal."

May I add that the meal I saw at Kingston penitentiary was more liberal than the one I had seen in Duke Street gaol in Glasgow.

Mr. VALLANCE: You have been there, eh?

Mr. MULLINS: I happened to visit that Scotch gaol on one occasion some years ago when I was visiting Glasgow, and saw the prisoners fed on bread and water. I saw them picking oakum. Then, I saw prisoners in Pentonville prison where they were working on the treadmill. When I walked into Kingston and saw how the prisoners were living I was convinced that they were treated much better than were the prisoners in old country gaols.

Commencing my trip through Kingston penitentiary, I said to the warden, "I want to see what I want to see, not what you want to show me," and for that purpose I had a list made out. First I went into the supply kitchen and viewed the food supply. With one exception it was the very best, and concerning that exception I came back and complained to the minister with the result that I believe he has since remedied the condition. I looked into the conditions in which the men were living in their cells, and I found them just as the minister has explained,—comfortable quarters. If some hon. members in this house had pioneered out in the west they would have had to live under tougher conditions than do those inmates of Kingston penitentiary.

As the minister has stated, in the cells there are wash basins, lavatories, and a bed with a comfortable spring mattress leaning up against the wall. It was much better than the condition in Pentonville prison where the prisoners had to lie on boards with only small blocks for pillows which they put under their heads. I must say however that the men in Kingston were comfortable and they had warm blankets. They had books on their shelves, and had access to the library from which they could get any book or magazine desired.

I was very anxious to see this hole we hear so much talk about, to which reference is made in the Toronto Globe and about which so much is said in Doctor Withrow's book, and I found it below the officers quarters. I asked, "Where is this paddle? Get the paddle until I see what it is like." I do not know what the hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Ross) has in his hand; I do not know whether it has three cornered or round holes in it. The one I saw had round holes. I said to the guard, "If you wanted to administer this instrument a little strenuously, or if you had a grudge against a prisoner you could give it to him to a degree a little stronger than tapping." The guard I interviewed said he had administered this strap for fifteen years. I said, "You should know something about it; show me the one that has the square holes." I was referring to the one about which there is so much talk in the Toronto papers and in Doctor Withrow's book. I said, "I want to see the one that has diamond shaped holes." His reply was, "We never use that; this is the paddle that we have used here." Then he got the other instrument called the cat-o'-nine-tails,—but what a difference between the one I saw in Pentonville prison and the one shown to me in Kingston. The one I saw in the Kingston penitentiary was made of a few strips of soft rope which had no knots in them, and it did not look as if it would inflict great injury upon or hurt any man very badly. In the hole where they gave prisoners the paddle there was a table similar to the bench in front of me. The process was described to me as follows: They placed the man's feet in position and strapped them, then they put his hands in position and administered the paddle about which the hon. member for Kingston City has spoken. It did not look to me as though it would hurt badly, I cannot agree with the statements made by Doctor Withrow or the Toronto Globe. I did see in the hole something which I did not like, and upon my return home I reported the condition to the Minister of Justice. There was a man there who was criminally insane, and I agreed with Mr. Cameron that he should be moved. I understand from the minister that that man was moved to Guelph and is now being taken care of under different conditions. I went through all the shops and interviewed many prisoners. I came across one prisoner whom I had known in Manitoba as a school teacher in the northern part of the province. I asked him what the conditions were. I said to him, "I knew you when you were a school teacher in Manitoba. What are you doing here?" He answered, "I am doing ten years." I said, "That is not what I asked. What brought you here?" "Insanity," he said. "What do you mean by insanity," I asked, and he replied, "I forged four cheques in Winnipeg and then four more in Toronto, and I was insane for doing it. I have ten years to put in here."

I interviewed a good many of the prisoners and tried to find what was wrong, and they told me, even Norman Ryan himself, that conditions were all right now, that the boys had cigarette papers. I did not know anything about the riot, but I want to say to this house that I went there on behalf of the inmates, and intending if I saw anything wrong that I was going to try and get it put right by going to the minister or bringing it up in the house.

All the propaganda that has been carried on by this man Withrow in my opinion is absolutely unfair to the Minister of Justice or the previous government. After looking over that institution at Kingston as carefully as I could to see if anything could be done for the betterment of the men, I went over to the women's department, like the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) did, and I saw the women that were there. I had afternoon tea there. I saw the way they were living and how they were taken care of. I found one woman there that came from Manitoba and I thought I could find out from her if there was anything wrong. I sat down with her and said, "Tell me what is wrong here. What is there that we can remedy?" She said, "Nothing at all. Look in those cells and see what you find wrong there." I looked in those cells, and this was the sight I saw. A splendid bed, with a nice counterpane on it, a nice dresser with all the toilet requisites that a woman uses. I could not see anything there to complain about. There was nothing to complain about in the food; it was the very best. I left that institution with my friend, whom most of you know, one of the most outstanding preachers in the city of Toronto, the Reverend W. A. Cameron, and I said, "Mr. Cameron, I cannot see much to complain about in this institution except that one case, and I am going to remedy it." I made a trip to Ottawa and I interviewed the minister, and that case was looked after.

Leaving Kingston penitentiary and coming to the province of Manitoba, while I was addressing a meeting in Winnipeg one day I said to the warden of Stony Mountain penitentiary, "I want to see your institution." He said, "When will you come?" I said, "I will come to-day." He said, "No, to-morrow." I said, "No, you are not going to do any window dressing for me. I want to see what is wrong with the institution." I motored out that afternoon to the penitentiary and I spent from one o'clock until seven looking over that institution very carefully. I could not see anything there that enlisted my sympathy except one poor chap that was lying very ill on a cot. I brought his case to the minister's attention and he moved right away to release him, but unfortunately the poor chap died before he was released. I also saw in that institution the cell in which a friend of mine who had lived in the city of Winnipeg had just passed away. I was aware that we would have been criticized if we had tried to get him out because it would then have been said from all corners of this house that there is one law for the rich and one law for the poor. I saw the cell that man died in, a man I had known in the city of Winnipeg for close to half a century. Looking carefully through that institution I could not see anything wrong to report. I am not discussing this question from the point of view of party politics at all. I went there to do what I could on behalf of the men, to see if there was anything wrong that could be remedied. There was nothing whatever. I can say emphatically to this house and the country that the institutions I visited are administered under the very best conditions.

I would, however, say to the Minister of Justice, and here I agree with the hon. member for Southeast Grey, that a little more money should be given to these men when they come out of the institution. Ten dollars is a very small amount.

Miss MACPHAIL: It is five dollars.

Mr. MULLINS: The hon. member says five dollars, but I understand that it is ten dollars. I understood from one prisoner that he got ten dollars, but that is a small amount for a man to start out with after being in there for a number of years, and I think a little more money should be given them until they become established and find a position.

There is another matter I wanted to mention. After visiting the institution at Kingston a man telephoned me one day and said, "I would like to see you. Is it possible to have an interview with you?" I said, "Yes, I will meet you." I did not know what his business was; he did not tell me, and I did not know what he wanted. I met him on Bay street in the city of Toronto. I did not know at that time that I was sitting in a room with the worst criminal that had been in penitentiary. He came to me with his story. He said, "You were down through Kingston. I have just been released." I asked him, "What were you there for?" He said, "Manslaughter." I asked him, "What did you do? Where did this happen?" He replied, "I had been out to a press meeting and had taken some liquor. I was driving a car and killed a woman, and I was sent to Kingston for three years." That was a deliberate lie, absolutely. He said that he had worked on several newspapers in the city of Winnipeg, on the Tribune, for one, and he enlisted my sympathy. I felt for him. He said that he had walked that morning from Parkdale down to Bay street and that he hadn't a five-cent piece. I said, "Can't you get a position?" I told him that I would try and get him a position somewhere in the city of Toronto. He said, "I cannot get a position because I have to tell every bonding company where I have been for the last two years, and immediately I tell them I have no chance at all—I have just come from the T. Eaton Company and they have refused to give me a position." I felt very sorry for him. My sympathies were enlisted, and I said, "I am the director of a bonding company and probably I can help you out if the circumstances are as you say." When I arrived in Ottawa I went to the department and told them that I thought it was bad to have detectives shadowing these poor chaps when they came out of the penitentiaries. This man told me that when released from the penitentiary he had been given ten dollars and a suit of clothes. He stated that there was not a detective from the Atlantic to the Pacific who would not recognize the suit of clothes he was given. I told him that he must be wrong because I had looked at the clothing being made in Kingston and I could not find any distinguishing marks. I asked him how a detective would recognize the suit and he told me that the breast-pocket was put on the right-hand instead of the left-hand side. This was a deliberate lie. I told him that I had not looked close enough to find that out, but later on in Stony Mountain I asked the man who was cutting the clothing where he put the breast pocket. He told me that it was always put on the left-hand side. I asked him if this was always done, and he said it was. He told me he had been there for five years and before that had been located in Kingston, always as a cutter. This former inmate told me that he had sold his suit of clothes in Kingston for a mere pittance. He told me of other conditions which existed, of how he got in things from the outside and so on. I gave him all the money I had in my pocket, but he had told me a deliberate lie. This was his system. I was informed in the department that there were eighteen convictions against this man. When I found out that his story was a lie, my confidence was shaken. I have nothing but kindly feelings for the men in the institutions and I want to be of as much service as I possibly can.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the hon. gentleman know that that is the same person who supplied information to Campbell whose articles appeared in Maclean's?

Mr. MULLINS: Perhaps he is. I know I interviewed a magazine in Toronto where this chap had been trying to sell some articles, but he was turned down. I admit I was deceived. I felt very sympathetic towards him because he said he came from the city of Winnipeg and had been a reporter on the Telegram, an old Conservative paper which we used to have out there. He stated that he had later been on the Tribune, but I found out later that he had not been connected with either of these papers.

I think that many of the attacks which have been hurled at the minister have been instigated by this type of man. I do not know anything about the brokers about whom we have heard but if they are these chaps who put out watered stock and floated companies, I would not like to see them. Many of us here have had something to do with watered stock and our sympathies would not go out to those chaps. I knew some of them and I was sorry to see them sent there, but if they were treated in the manner stated by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross), I do not think there can be any complaint. Perhaps I would have treated them a little more harshly.

When I went to Kingston the warden told me he was glad to see me and that outside of the hon. member for Kingston, I was the only member of parliament who had been there since he had been appointed. Hon. members should go to Kingston to look into these things themselves. I think they will find that everything possible is being done for the men who are there. I visited both institutions with an absolutely open mind and if I had found anything detrimental to the inmates I would have brought it up on the floor of this house.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 15, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

PRICE SPREADS AND MASS BUYING

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, under the heading of presenting reports of committees I beg to offer the first report of the special committee appointed to inquire into price spreads and mass buying.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it will be noted that the numbers of copies to be printed was left blank. I asked the secretary of the committee to give me some suggestions as to the usual practice, and the suggestion is that one thousand copies in English and two hundred and fifty in French be the figures inserted. With the consent of the house I ask that these figures be inserted.

I beg to move that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

2. Was an inspection fee of $3 per car charged in each case for this service?

3. If so, what was the total amount of money collected from this inspection charge in Ontario, Quebec, and Nova Scotia, during the shipping season of 1932-33?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort):

*CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—RAILWAY TIES

Mr. VALLANCE:

2. If so, to whom, for what quantity and at what prices?

3. Have any of these contracts been cancelled?

4. If so, with whom?

Mr. MANION: In regard to that question, the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) asked the same question about his constituency the other day and I gave him the following answer:

The Department of Railways and Canals has no information with respect to tie purchases by Canadian National railways, and the railway in the past has taken the stand that the bringing down of information of this nature is not in the public interest.

If it relieves the minds of my hon. friends opposite I might tell them that I was in Geneva when the orders were given last year so I know nothing about them.

Mr. EULER: The cables were working, were they not?

Mr. HEAPS:

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. No.

2. See section 36, chapter 166, Public Works Act, R.S.C., 1927, regarding the calling of tenders for works to be done by contract.

All contracts awarded by the Department of Public Works provide for minimum rates of wages to be paid by the contractor in accordance with rates fixed by the Department of Labour.

*GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES RECEIVING WAR PENSIONS

Mr. GIROUARD:

1. How many persons employed by the government of Canada receive a pension from the pension board, in addition to their salary?

[Mr. Gordon.]

2. What is the total amount received as pension and the total amount received as salary?

Mr. CAHAN: A year ago the hon. member made a similar inquiry and an order for return was made. It has been impossible during the year to obtain anything like a satisfactory return to that order, although to-day I have laid on the table of the house the best information we could obtain. During the present session I have laid on the table of the house sixteen portfolios containing the names of between 99,000 and 100,000 persons receiving pensions. To ascertain who of all those in the public service of Canada are receiving such pensions is impossible by mere comparison of names. It means that each department must send to every employee in the public service, permanent or temporary—

Mr. BENNETT: Including those in foreign countries.

Mr. CAHAN: —to ascertain whether that person is one of those 99,000 or 100,000 persons whose names are mentioned in the sixteen portfolios I produced. It is impossible to answer the question now, and the departments report that it is impossible to prepare an answer in less than ten or twelve months or perhaps more. Therefore I ask the hon. gentleman if he would drop that question under the circumstances.

Question dropped.

DALHOUSIE, N. B.—WHARF

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. How much money was spent for repairs to public wharf at the port of Dalhousie, New Brunswick, from May 1, 1930, to December 31, 1933, and how much in each year?

2. How much money was spent for dredging at the port of Campbellton, New Brunswick, from May 1, 1930, to December 31, 1933, and how much in each year?

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

GUARANTEES, LOANS, OR GRANTS TO PRIVATE CONCERNS OR CORPORATIONS

Mr. EULER:

What guarantees or loans or grants have been made in the years 1931, 1932, 1933 and 1934, to persons, or private concerns or corporations?

Mr. RHODES: Return tabled herewith.

BRITISH COLUMBIA STEAMSHIP SUBSIDIES

Mr. NEILL:

1. What are the names of all ship owners, or shipping companies, receiving during the calendar year 1933 from the Dominion government payment for services originating either in Vancouver or Victoria, British Columbia, whether subsidized for a distinct service or receiving payment for carrying mail either on a flat rate or so much per unit?

2. What is the amount paid to each company?

3. Are any of these owners or companies required by the terms of their contracts to use British Columbia coal on their boats; if so, which, and have they adhered to such condition?

Mr. CAHAN: Return tabled herewith.

FORTY DAYS IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have but one word to add with reference to question No. 3 which is on the order paper since January 30. It is the only one of my questions which remains on the order paper, and I would request the hon. Acting Postmaster General (Mr. Dupré) to kindly reply to it as soon as possible, because, should this question remain alone on the order paper, it will become lonesome and others will turn up to keep it company.

May I ask the Acting Postmaster General if question number 3 will be answered before the Postmaster General becomes a Moslem?

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Acting Postmaster General) (Translation): In reply to my hon. friend, I shall be in a position to give him further information within a few days.

MONTREAL–OTTAWA TRAINS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): I should like to ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) if he has received any representations concerning the train schedules between Ottawa and Montreal. Both companies have reduced their schedules considerably, for which they should be commended, but the remaining trains of both companies leave at the same hour. For instance, in the afternoon you have two trains at half-past three and two trains shortly after four o'clock, with no service at all for the rest of the afternoon. I may say that I do not speak for the members of parliament who travel on their passes; I have received many representations from citizens of Montreal who come to Ottawa in the morning and must return to Montreal not later than 4.20 in the afternoon.

My question to the minister is whether he has received similar representations, and whether it is within the power of his department to make suggestions to the companies accordingly.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): I will answer the last question first. I have not received such representations, and the matter does not come within the purview of my department at all. The hon. gentleman is still mayor of Montreal, and I suggest very sincerely that he might call upon the president or the chairman of the board and make these representations in person, because otherwise I shall be merely passing on his representations to the companies. I shall gladly do so if the hon. gentleman wishes, but since he lives in Montreal it might be as well for him to take that action. I have had individuals mention the matter to me incidentally, but I have had no representations of any kind, though I think the matter is worthy of consideration.

Mr. RINFRET: Perhaps I might take the advice given by the minister the other day and ask for his cooperation. We might both do it.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Then I should like to ask the minister if we may expect his department to be abolished, because apparently it has no authority at all.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

MONTREAL–QUEBEC TRAINS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Since the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) has expressed his willingness to transmit to the chairman of the board the representations made by the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret), I wonder if he would add those I am about to make on behalf of the city of Quebec. There is a train leaving Montreal for Quebec at 6.10 in the afternoon. Unfortunately the train from Ottawa arrives in Montreal just after the Quebec train leaves. I think it would be very easy to correct this situation, and if a change were made it would be a great advantage to all the Quebec people.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): I will very gladly transmit this representation, which I think is very reasonable. In reply to my hon. friend the Liberal whip (Mr. Casgrain), who suggested that my department might be eliminated—and I suppose he suggests that I might be eliminated also—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No; oh, no.

Mr. MANION: —I should like to suggest to my hon. friend that neither under the late government nor under this government has the department anything to do with the time tables of the companies. However, I will be very glad to transmit the representations of my two hon. friends to the chairman of the board.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Might I ask the minister what are his duties now?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps in a hundred years or so, when the Liberal party is in power, they may make the hon. gentleman Minister of Railways so he can find out for himself.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). Can he give the house any information as to when we may expect the standing committee on banking and commerce to begin its work?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I would anticipate that it would begin almost immediately, but up to the moment there is no business to be transmitted to that committee.

RAILWAY TIE CONTRACTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): I have a matter to which I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion). In spite of the fact that he has repeatedly stated in the house that he is not responsible for what may be done in the administration of the Canadian National Railways I hope he will take this matter into consideration and try to get the information.

In order to put my question I will have to explain the matter a little, but I am not trying to make a speech at all. In 1932 railway tie contracts were called for, and it was stipulated that a certain amount would be paid by the contractors to the settlers and farmers for the ties they provided. This was done to help unemployment. When the contracts were issued this stipulation appeared therein, but that clause was never carried out. In many cases the contractors sold their contracts to sub-contractors for such prices that they were not able to pay the settlers and farmers the amount stipulated in the original contract.

I would ask the minister if he would be kind enough to take up the matter with the railway administration in Montreal and see why these provisions were not carried out. I am making this a statement of fact; I know what I am talking about.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Yes, I will gladly do so.

MILK INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): On Friday last I directed a question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), and in his absence the Prime Minister said that the question would stand as a notice. It had reference to what the government intended to do with respect to the report of the agriculture committee with regard to the milk situation.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The Minister of Labour has been ill for some days; he is here to-day, but he has not had an opportunity of seeing the question. He will answer it in due course.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gobeil for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Woodsworth.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Just before the house adjourned on Tuesday last, Mr. Speaker, I moved the following amendment:

> We respectfully regret that Your Excellency's present advisers have not taken such steps as are necessary to deal adequately with unemployment, to reduce the burden imposed by the public debt, and to put the agricultural industry on a basis that will insure to the farmer a decent standard of living.

In our judgment there are three outstanding questions confronting the people of Canada, to the solution of which the government after some three years have made no very great contribution. The first question is that of unemployment; the second is that of the public debt—and I think I might add of private debts as well—and the third is the deplorable position of the agricultural industry. In that connection also I might add the fishing industry, which is almost as badly off.

It is not my intention to quote any elaborate statistics with regard to unemployment; in fact it is almost impossible to obtain any accurate statistics. At best those in charge of the statistical department will give us only a rough estimate. Possibly however we may have some idea of the real situation when we remember that there are under relief to-day in Canada 1,220,000 individuals, including men, women and children. Some of these, of course, are among the number being assisted in the dried out constituencies of Saskatchewan. But, even making allowance for these it is obvious that a very large number are under relief because of unemployment. In my own province of Manitoba, for example, I find that in December a total of 81,943 persons were receiving unemployment relief. This figure shows an increase of 9,434 over the total for December, 1932. Other parts of the country tell a similar story.

I do not intend to quote the pre-election promises of the Prime Minister and other members of the government, as has been done so frequently in this house, but I do want to take this occasion to plead for the unemployed. I know that a constitutional question is involved. Men on both sides of the house admit that the British North America Act does not divide general and local powers in accordance with modern developments, and when it comes to a question of unemployment it seems as though we are touching one of those questions in connection with which a revision of the British North America Act is most required. It is quite obvious that the occasional case of poverty that we had sixty years ago could be dealt with locally, and was essentially a local responsibility, but I need not urge that unemployment on the vast scale that we have to-day is in a totally different category from the few needy individuals who were under poor relief sixty years ago. If we had a famine, a plague or a flood the federal government would have no hesitation in coming to the assistance of a province. I suggest that wide-spread unemployment is almost as disastrous as a flood or a plague, and until such time as we can secure an amendment to the British North America Act which will legally place all responsibility upon the shoulders of the federal government —where I believe, it ought to be—it seems to me that the federal government should be willing to assume the responsibility. As it is to-day we have a tri-partite arrangement under which the federal government gives a certain proportion of relief, the provincial another, and the municipal another. As the years have gone on the provinces—this applies at least to those in the west—have become less and less able to assume their share of this burden, and the municipalities are in a worse plight. Several of the schemes that we have are dependent on the cooperation of the municipality, but in many instances those municipalities are not in a position to put up the necessary funds.

Just before I left home I met a delegation from a small municipality in my own district where certain individuals wanted to be sent out under the farm scheme. As it was under an administrator the municipality could not possibly advance the funds necessary, hence the men who were very needy could not come under the governmental scheme. In fact, in that same municipality men told me that they were living in a condition very little removed from serfdom, that they could not leave the municipality even for a few days without reporting to the relief officer. If they failed to comply with such regulation they were immediately cut off from relief. That is not a condition which should prevail in a free country.

Then, as to food, many families are receiving an amount smaller than that which is necessary to maintain them in proper health. I wonder whether we realize, too, that very often the clothing is altogether inadequate. The difficulty is that it is not merely insufficient to keep out the cold in this extreme winter weather, but in addition to that it is contributed very largely by private and philanthropic relief agencies of various kinds, with the result that for some years a great many people have been forced to be clothed with second-hand clothing. I believe that has a most demoralizing influence on a family. I suggest that very few of us could stand up under that kind of thing month after month and year after year.

Then, there is the question of shelter. I believe it is generally recognized that in order to maintain an ordinary family in decency there should be so many rooms in which they are to live. Many families are being huddled into a single room,—men, women and children indiscriminately. Social workers are meeting with cases of immorality with which they have to deal, and which have arisen through such housing conditions.

Another difficulty which comes before us very frequently in this extremely cold weather is that concerning fuel. Food, clothing and shelter used to be considered sufficient to cover all the vital needs, but in these days we need fuel. In many parts of the country, particularly in the west, there is no wood available. Frequently coal is not supplied, and often when there is a supply of wood it is of a very poor type, such as poplar which will not burn throughout an entire night, a condition which is not pleasant in our forty-below-zero weather, and one which causes great suffering to women and children. Such matters are not taken into consideration when relief measures are considered.

Mr. DUPUIS: Will the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes.

Mr. DUPUIS: What section of the British North America Act does the hon. member wish to have amended, and in what way?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not wish to discuss that matter to-day, but I was speaking of unemployment.

Mr. DUPUIS: We would like to know, because I understand the hon. member is making a suggestion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so; the British North America Act ought to be amended so that a large volume of unemployment such as now obtains should not be left entirely to the responsibility of the province or municipality, but should become a responsibility of the federal government. I have that particular clause in mind.

Mr. DUPUIS: It is now under provincial jurisdiction?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, so it is claimed,—section 92.

Returning to the subject of relief may I say that in addition to food, clothing, shelter and heat there is the necessity for light. Perhaps when people used candles or lamps they could get along, but now most homes are lighted with electric lights and unless there is an allowance made for that the family is in darkness.

Mr. St. PERE: Mr. Holt is cutting off the light.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: One hon. member from Montreal has suggested that Mr. Holt is cutting off the light. There is not much doubt but that is the case in Montreal. Then, there is the difficulty I mentioned the other day, namely that of medical attendance. Hardly any family can get through a year without some medical or dental attendance. So far our relief arrangements have made no provision for such attendance. While sometimes people can get through a few months without medical attendance, as year after year goes by teeth will decay, adenoids and all that sort of thing will develop. In some cases glasses have to be obtained, if children are to have the benefit of education. These contingencies are not fully provided for.

In addition to that, though some may think that I am now going too far afield, I would point out that a great many children cannot even get the money to buy the necessary school books, pencils, scribblers—those little things that may be thought beneath the dignity of parliament to consider but which are very vital indeed when you come to the family budget.

There is the question of recreation. We cannot hope that whole families will go along year after year without any provision for recreation. At least the families will not be in very good condition if they do so. This opens up a tremendous field. I think of the fathers, many of them going along from year to year without any employment and losing their self-respect. I think of the mothers becoming discouraged, unable to maintain their hope for the future. I think of the children growing up never having known their father to be at work, never having known what it is for the family to be independent, and they themselves without any prospect even of securing a job.

Mr. ARTHURS: There are some like that in good times.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is quite true, but they are comparatively rare. My point is that even the best families are going to suffer deterioration under conditions that now prevail.

Then there is the question of the single men, of whom more than 48,000 are to-day employed chiefly in our relief camps. These relief camps are being maintained under the Department of National Defence. I do not think it is a good thing that this relief work should be placed under the military in any way whatever. I admit that these men are receiving decent food, and in many cases clothing and shelter, but I do submit that there is nothing in the life of the relief camp to give these men any real hope. I think it is the surest way to develop bums and criminals.

Mr. BOUCHARD: That is a national offence.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes it is, and it should be so considered, and ruled out of order. But in all seriousness I do suggest that you cannot expect young men in the prime of life to go into these camps to get a bare living month after month, and some of them year after year, without their losing hope. I think of the moral influences which prevail in such places. Young men who under normal circumstances would have a certain amount of social life and would look forward to marrying and rearing their own families are now deprived of all the amenities of home life and are simply kept in these camps for an indefinite future. Really I wonder that there are not more criminal acts in this country than there have been in the immediate past.

I also think of some of the younger people in their parents' homes some of whom have passed out of school but cannot get work, and some of whom have never yet had a job. I know some children who are repeating their last year in school simply because there is nothing else for them to do. Others of them are wandering around the streets and contracting all sorts of bad habits.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that this is a serious national situation that confronts us, and I submit that if this kind of thing is allowed to continue very much longer it will be impossible to maintain the morale of our people.

Further, there has been an enormously heavy expenditure with nothing to show for it. A few years ago the Prime Minister stated that he was opposed to the dole, and he provided a measure of public works. Later on it was said that the public works were too expensive, and we went back again to the dole.

Mr. BENNETT: May I correct the hon. gentleman? The provinces selected that form of relief.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That may be, but again we get back to this question of jurisdiction. The provinces selected that form of relief because it was impossible for them to put up their share of the funds to carry on the public works. Everyone knows that to be the case, and the government cannot escape the responsibility for the change of policy simply by shifting it on to the shoulders of the provinces which could not possibly go through with the original program. We cannot ascertain very closely just what is being expended. I am told that up to

February of the present fiscal year some $17,000,000 has been expended, and in the month of December last the Dominion government expended in direct relief no less than $6,000,000. If we wish to calculate the total spent on relief, we must remember that in very many instances the provinces to-day are spending as much as the dominion, the municipalities as much as the provinces or the dominion, and on top of that there is the enormous sum provided by private philanthropy. It is an appalling situation

What steps are being taken to meet this situation outside of the dole, if I may call it such, for such I think it is? I think a few years ago we were all reading articles on technocracy which made us realize that at least in mechanical industries a smaller number of men could produce all the necessaries of life. Perhaps everybody does not realize that more or less the same thing is taking place in the industry of agriculture. I hold in my hand an article written by Frank H. Williams, and published recently in the Free Press, in which it is stated that one Alberta farmer not very long ago harvested some 10,000 bushels of wheat without employing a single hand. He was farming some six hundred acres and using modern machinery. There are probably over eight thousand combines in the west to-day. That means simply this, that whereas in the old days when the cities were overcrowded we could send a great many of our young people out to the country to help with the operations on the farm, and farm boys in one district could move into another district where there was more work, that source of work has now been shut off, and, I think, shut off permanently.

There are some people who tell us that the back to the land movement will save the situation. I cannot see it. Already we are producing more on the land than we can market, and if we send people out to the land they would meet a large number coming back from the land into the cities. If we reduced our farmers to the peasant status it might be possible for them to live on small patches of land. That might be possible in the east, but it would not be possible in the climate and under the conditions which prevail in a great many parts of the west.

We have urged in this house again and again that under these circumstances the government should put into force some sort of unemployment insurance. That was urged only two or three days ago by the Trades and Labour congress. I quite admit that there would be difficulty at this time in piling up sufficient reserves, but in this matter we are somewhat in the position of the Irishman who was going to thatch the roof of his cottage. When it was raining he could not thatch the roof, and when it was not raining he did not need it. We do not seem to get unemployment insurance started either in times of employment or in times of unemployment.

I do not propose to discuss the vexed question of whether unemployment insurance should be contributory or not. The non-contributory schemes have been so overtaxed in Great Britain and other countries since the depression that they have more or less broken down. It might be difficult at this time to set up a contributory scheme which would meet the needs of the vast majority of our unemployed people. It might meet the needs of a certain number. I submit that sooner or later we must face the conclusion that industry should carry its own burdens instead of allowing the poor individual worker, who to-day has no control over his conditions of work, to bear the whole brunt of unemployment.

I am glad to know that the government proposes to put into effect some sort of scheme of public works. This seems to me to be a step in the right direction although it has been too long delayed. The scheme proposed is as yet indefinite but if it contemplates joint action with the provinces and the municipalities, as was done before, I am afraid that it will be foredoomed to failure. Many of our most needy districts are not able to bear any proportion of the burden of public works. If public works are to be undertaken I urge that they be in the form of the building of homes for the people rather than the erecting of more or less unnecessary public institutions. In time such homes would become self-supporting and not be a permanent burden upon the taxpayer. I do not think I need to develop this phase of the question much further. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) covered this phase very well in the resolution he moved the other day, which read:

> That, in the opinion of this house, in view of the large number of unemployed, and with the necessity of increasing the purchasing power of the people, it is expedient that the government give immediate consideration to the inauguration of a large scale program of public works, to be financed by a direct issue of non-interest bearing dominion notes.

It seems to me to be intolerable that we should have in Canada such abundant resources, that a portion of the population should be living in comfort or even luxury while a considerable portion is living in abject misery or great anxiety. The present system under which we are working is tending gradually to aggravate that situation.

I should like to give the house some figures to show how wages have failed to keep pace with dividends. A study of the sheltered industries demonstrates this very clearly. In 1930 the dividends and cash bonuses paid showed an increase of 18·9 per cent while the wages paid showed a decrease of 8·8 per cent. In 1931 the dividends and cash bonuses decreased by 1·6 per cent but wages decreased by 35 per cent.

Mr. MORAND: Is that due to the number of employees or to the rate of wages?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is not apparent from the statistics which I have. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics gives the total amounts paid in wages while the dividends are based upon figures which appeared in a survey of corporate securities issued by the Financial Post in 1933.

Mr. HACKETT: All held in Canada?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The dividends are created in Canada. In any case, they demonstrate my point that wages decrease much more rapidly than dividends and that while in some cases dividends may increase, wages go on decreasing.

Mr. MORAND: That may be due to the use of machinery.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That may be so; I am indicating a problem which is perhaps created largely by machinery.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the hon. member know that many of the industries making returns are merely turning an old dollar into a new one in order to give employment? During the last few years I am bound to say that this would apply to at least thirty per cent of the industries.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not at all sure that that would affect the significance of these figures.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes, it would.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I might say that in connection with the iron and steel industry I was unable to obtain the figures for 1932 In 1930 the dividends and cash bonuses paid in the oil refining industry decreased ·1 per cent while the wages decreased 1·6 per cent. In 1931 there was an increase in dividends and cash bonuses of 1·2 per cent but a decrease in wages of 28·8 per cent. In 1932 the increase in dividends and cash bonuses amounted to ·7 per cent while the decrease in wages amounted to 33·2 per cent. The figures with regard to the sugar refining industry are even more startling. In 1930 there was an increase of 84·9 per cent in dividends and cash bonuses while wages decreased 3·5 per cent. In 1931, dividends and cash bonuses increased 198·1 per cent while wages decreased 13·7 per cent. In 1932 the increase in dividends and cash bonuses amounted to 254 per cent while the decrease in wages amounted to 19·7 per cent. I think these figures demonstrate clearly that there is no proper relationship between wages and dividends. The figures for these industries are taken from tables which cover other industries as well, but I have not the time to give the house the detailed information. The other industries include cement, chemicals, bonds, gold, silk, electrical apparatus, meat packing, brewing and glass. The totals for these industries are as follows:

Year	Dividends and cash bonuses	Salaries and wages
1929..	$49,543,232	$232,994,000
1930..	53,001,249	222,801,000
1931..	53,017,954	184,378,000
1932..	49,263,613	148,693,000

Mr. CHAPLIN: The hon. member is giving the figures for salaries in millions where it should be thousands.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am giving millions where it ought to be millions. I might say that the decrease in salaries was quite small when compared to the decrease in wages. I think these figures show clearly that wages and salaries, which in the long run mean purchasing power, are not keeping pace with the increase in dividends and cash bonuses. We are being required to pay an ever-increasing amount of fixed charges while we are receiving smaller and smaller amounts with which to carry that burden. Surely this kind of thing must inevitably lead to disaster.

I come now to the second question, that of the public debt. Every year we have presented to this house large blocks of expenditures which are classed as uncontrollable expenditures. These are increasing steadily from year to year. We sometimes make a cut in the services to the public but we never think of cutting the interest charges. I do not think this matter has ever been better put than it was by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in the statement he made before the committee on monetary and financial questions at the Imperial economic conference of 1932. I should like to quote one or two paragraphs, as follows:

Interest charges represent the most important of the fixed or semi-rigid elements in our cost structure. If prices remain on their present level, such charges will constitute an intolerable or almost intolerable burden in many cases. Even if it can be borne, the fortuitous gain to the creditor of 40 to 48 per cent in general purchasing power above what he contracted for appears to be a grave injustice.

That is the contention we have been making for a great many years in this corner of the house; the bondholder is receiving almost half as much more than the amount to which he is entitled. The Prime Minister admits that he is not entitled to receive what, to use his own words, is a fortunate gain. But we the taxpayers of the country are continuing to pay it. I ask the Prime Minister: What is he doing about that situation? His government has been carrying on for over three years now, and there has been no effort whatever to reduce that burden of public debt.

Mr. BENNETT: We did convert $640,000,000 of debt and in my judgment, as I have stated publicly, the only conversion that is possible now on any large scale will be after the last of the 5½ per cent tax exempt securities fall in 1937. I will give in due time the reasons why.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I shall be glad to receive that information, but that does not touch the main question as to whether, because of some arrangements made years ago, we should go on indefinitely paying 40 or 50 per cent higher than what is just. I do not see why we should continue to do so simply because of financial arrangements which legally have made it possible. That is something that cannot be got round by such an answer, as given by the Prime Minister. It is all very well to talk about keeping contracts; but when the terms of the contract are fundamentally changed there surely is need to revise the original contract. I continue to quote the Prime Minister:

Moreover, such fixed charges, except as they are reduced by bankruptcy and reorganization, are not being adjusted by the normal corrective processes which falling prices are supposed to set in motion. Indeed, it seems that new disequilibria are created almost as rapidly as old maladjustments are corrected and the paralysis of business enterprise with profit margins uncertain or non-existent continues. Trade languishes and unemployment persists or tends to become aggravated. One of the most important effects of the fall in prices is the increased burden of the fixed charges payable on our governmental and private obligations held abroad, chiefly in the United States and the United Kingdom.

As one dollar to-day will purchase at wholesale 48 per cent more than it did in 1929, the real burden of the service charges on these foreign obligations has increased from $362,000,000 to $535,750,000.

I would point out to the Prime Minister that after all it is an arbitrary arrangement by which bonds and mortgages have a first claim on national or private income. Why should the man holding a mortgage receive 100 per cent before the man who has given the mortgage is permitted to have anything at all. I know that this is the ordinary arrangement to-day; but when there is such hardship in the country why should it remain the ordinary arrangement? We cannot remain oblivious to the appalling effect upon great masses of the people, and in my judgment the time has come when that convention, though it is legalized, will have to be fundamentally changed. There are some limits to this in ordinary life. If the bailiff goes in there is usually something left; he cannot strip the house of everything.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Not much left, I admit, but there is something in the way of compassionate allowance permitted.

Mr. BOURASSA: Tools for work.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes. But in larger affairs that is not permitted; there is nothing of that kind in the realm of national or international affairs. There are also in business what are known as insolvency proceedings, and when a man is utterly incapable of ever paying in full he is allowed to pay off his creditors at so many cents on the dollar and he goes free. I fancy we shall have to have some such process in connection with large public indebtedness; under this system there is no other way out.

The other day I called attention to the fact that we had a debt, federal, provincial, municipal and in connection with public corporations, of over $800 per head. There has been a scaling-down of certain international debts, even Great Britain practically falling in line, although it may be said that she has given a token payment to the United States. There is not the slightest doubt in my mind that we shall have to have some scaling down of internal debts as well. Even Great Britain did that when she went off the gold standard;

she did so at one stroke to the extent of 25 per cent. France did the same when the franc fell from 20 to 4 cents, making an enormous reduction in debts. Why should we continue to stagger under a tremendous load simply because we have some fantastic ideas with regard to "national honour," "sound money" and the like. Have we no national honour with regard to the 1,220,000 people under relief, and at that such inadequate relief, or the millions of other people who hardly know which way to turn?

Mr. DUPUIS: What is the actual value of the Canadian dollar?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I leave the Minister of Finance to answer that. We could cut down the face value of bonds, or reduce the interest on bonds, or there might be some form of reflation: or a special tax might be put on wealth, which latter I think perhaps would be the best way of meeting the situation.

Mr. HANBURY: What about repudiation?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not suggesting repudiation; I am suggesting another way of getting at the difficulty. The greater part of the bonds are undoubtedly held by the wealthy; the wealthy people should be called upon much more than they are to pay interest on these bonds.

An hon. MEMBER: Where are they?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There are some very wealthy people in this country.

Mr. CASGRAIN: There are no more.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, there are.

An hon. MEMBER: How many?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We are not permitted to know. The Minister of Finance says that it is not in the interests of the people to know who they are. The truth is it is not in the interests of the wealthy people; that is the real situation.

Let me pass on now to the other matter which we have included in our resolution, that is, the deplorable condition of agriculture. We cannot hope for general prosperity in this country unless there is an improvement in agricultural conditions. It becomes necessary to bring the prices of agricultural and other primary products somewhat into line with those of other commodities. I know that this is a problem that faces all countries, but none the less it is a matter of concern to Canada. Here again I think perhaps I am on safe ground if I quote from the Prime Minister himself. In the same statement from which I quoted a few minutes ago, before the committee on monetary and financial questions of the Imperial economic conference of 1932 he said:

> Canada, like all other countries, has suffered severely from the calamitous fall in commodity prices. Since August, 1929, our index of wholesale prices has fallen 32 per cent and is now only 4 per cent above the pre-war level. This means that the dollar has increased in purchasing power by 48 per cent. As a result of this rapid and persistent decline in the general price level and the inevitable disparities created between different kinds of prices, normal business relationships have been disrupted, profit margins have disappeared in many cases, enterprise has been discouraged, unemployment has steadily increased, the fiscal problems of all our public bodies have been greatly aggravated, and the burden of fixed charges is exerting an almost intolerable pressure upon some of the strategic elements in our national economy.
> Only a few facts need be cited to illustrate the way in which the traditional alignment of economic forces in this country have been sundered by the different rates of speed at which the various parts of our price structure have succumbed to the deflationary pressure of falling prices.
> While wholesale prices have been falling 32 per cent, our cost of living index number has fallen only 19 per cent. On this basis the purchasing power of the dollar has increased 24 per cent.
> Prices for raw materials, here as elsewhere, have fallen much more rapidly than wholesale prices generally. Thus, prices of raw and partly manufactured materials have fallen 47·3 per cent since August, 1929, whereas prices of fully and chiefly manufactured articles have declined only 26·0 per cent. Farm products have been particularly hard hit, the decline averaging 56·4 per cent. Wheat, the staple of the western farmer, has fallen from an average price of $1.50 per bushel in 1926 to 55 cents in June, 1932, a drop of 63·3 per cent, giving an index of 36·7 as compared with one of 70 for manufactured goods at wholesale.

It is over a year and a half since the Prime Minister gave that very clear statement of the situation. But what has he done to alter or better the situation?

Mr. MYERS: A whole lot.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Some hon. member says a whole lot. The western farmers cannot see where it comes in.

Mr. MYERS: Farmers are not all in the west.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The eastern farmers cannot see it either.

Mr. MYERS: They are better off.

Mr. CASGRAIN: They are worse off.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Prime Minister now proposes to limit the production of our chief agricultural commodity, wheat.

Mr. BENNETT: At the instance of the provinces.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, I am quite willing to add, at the instance of the provinces. And as I said before, I think probably under the circumstances it is an almost inevitable development. But I want to say that if that action is to be any advantage at all it has to be followed or accompanied by some measure of price fixing; otherwise it may prove disastrous.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is quite within his rights in saying that, because the advisory committee, meeting at London, with the importing and exporting countries, have been considering that very point within the past six weeks.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is all very well for the advisory committee sitting in London, but what I want to know is what the government sitting in Ottawa is going to do.

Mr. BENNETT: They cannot fix prices.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Prime Minister says they cannot fix prices. Ottawa cannot fix prices in the world market, but Ottawa can fix prices in the domestic market.

Mr. BENNETT: No. They cannot fix prices in England, neither can they, according to the judgment of the privy council in the Board of Commerce case and the newsprint case, fix prices in Canada. That is for the provinces.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There again we come to the British North America Act. I submit that if this federal government were serious about the matter it would be comparatively easy to arrange such matters at least with the three prairie provinces, that are most concerned. We have the fruit-growers of British Columbia begging for some sort of legislation to be enacted here in order that they may be able to control their product in British Columbia. I think the time has about come that the public will not much longer tolerate this shoving of the matter by the federal government over to the provinces and the provinces footballing it back to the federal government. Where there is a will there is a way!

Only the other day in Manitoba I was handed a memorandum by an actual working farmer which I think fairly well puts the position as the farmers, or at least a considerable number of them in the west, see the situation. I should like to read a few paragraphs:

> First let me ask: Does the farmer as the primary producer of food, perform a necessary service to society in general that entitles him to a decent living, an opportunity to retire at sixty or seventy years of age on something better than our present old age pension, and in the meantime be able to pay his way, pay taxes and have some slight chance to keep free from the nightmare of debt that is his present heritage? If the answer is yes, then why do the people in the urban centres of this dominion "through the medium of the processors and distributors of foodstuffs" absolutely refuse to pay to the farmer the costs of production of the food they eat? . . .

I think it is clear that the farmer to-day is producing at less than cost price, and at less than a price that would enable him to maintain a decent standard of living. It may be that a very large proportion of the difference between the cost price and the sale price, is taken by middlemen, but in that case the government must intervene. He goes on:

> The railways charge the same or higher rates on all our products. The commissions for selling grain and live stock and charges at stockyards are the same as when prices were three times what they are now. Packers and retailers are charging for their services, a higher percentage of the retail selling price than ever before, with the inevitable result that the portion of the consumer's dollar that now reaches the farmer is the lowest in the history of this dominion, and as a result our purchasing power has almost vanished. . . .

I wish the eastern manufacturers could really see the significance of the failure of the western farmers. I cannot see how the east is going to be prosperous unless we have prosperity among our farmers in the west and our farmers all over. I continue to read:

> No appreciable or permanent improvement will or can ever take place until some system is devised whereby the price levels of the main necessities of life are permanently fixed and stabilized in as far as that portion of farm produce that is consumed in Canada is concerned, and some definite control established over processors, distributors, etc., so that each may receive their fair and just share of the final retail price according to the service they perform.

My farmer friend then goes into some computations as to what has been lost in the last two or three years by the farmers of the three prairie provinces; that is, taking the price level of 1929 and comparing it with the price levels of later years and showing the smaller returns that go to the farmer. Then with regard to grain, suppose a dollar a bushel represents a fair return to the farmer for his wheat; the difference between this and the price he has actually been receiving means an enormous loss to the farmer. It is a mere guess, but it is calculated that through changes in the price level the farmers of western Canada have lost in the last three years something like half a billion dollars. Let me point out that if that figure is at all correct that means half a billion dollars less of spending power, and that affects the whole country.

My farmer friend goes on to offer a suggested resolution which I think is worthy of consideration by this house; I offer the first part of it:

> In view of the fact that agriculture is in a most deplorable condition, having suffered more than any other industry from the depression, loss of markets and the foreign exchange situation, and that there is no improvement in world markets yet in sight;
> This house hereby instructs the government to at once to appoint a non-partisan board or boards with full and arbitrary powers to, first, determine and fix a fair price that shall be paid to all primary producers of the main necessities of life, food, clothing and fuel that are produced and consumed in Canada, and control the marketing of same; second, determine and fix maximum prices that may be charged by those engaged in transporting, processing and distributing said necessities within the confines of this dominion; third, to have complete control of the marketing abroad of all surpluses of agricultural products that may be under price control.

When the government is so solicitous of the welfare of big industries in this country, so careful to protect them from outside competition. so careful to see to it that there are such arrangements as will enable the banks to maintain their earnings and to enable the railways, if not to maintain their earnings at least to guarantee their shareholders from loss, it does seem to me that the time has come when something should be done for the agricultural worker in this country.

Mr. BENNETT: I think I shall have to correct the hon. gentleman; there has been no guarantee that the shareholders will not sustain a loss. On the contrary it is quite possible that they may; they have already had a loss, on paper.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then the situation is worse than I had painted it. I am talking about the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and if even the $60,000,000 guarantee is not going to save them I say the situation is much worse.

Mr. BENNETT: That was not what I suggested.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the Prime Minister repeat his statement; I did not quite catch it.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman said the government had guaranteed that the shareholders would not sustain loss. I am bound to say that if he will read the document he will see that this is not what was said. He will observe that $100,000,000 of the four per cent securities of the railway company were delivered to the banks as security for the guarantee of $60,000,000. If there is a failure to pay, under the provisions of the statute the shareholders are squeezed out and the four per cent security holders take possession of the property.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If the securities were not good enough for that loan I cannot see that the securities were worth enough to be very much good to this government.

I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that the suggestions I have offered involve a very considerable departure from the conventional ideas that we have held with regard to the conduct of business in this country, but I submit that our present capitalistic system has proven itself not capable of paying dividends and at the same time paying wages, and that our government is not in a position to pay fixed interest charges on bonded indebtedness and at the same time give those services for which the government exists. That is the inescapable dilemma which we find presenting itself at the present time. A few weeks ago I was very much interested in an editorial appearing in the Winnipeg Free Press in defence of capitalism; It stated:

> Capitalism offers to everyone a free field to produce whatever he can and to sell for what he can get. . . . Capitalism, like socialism, has a well rounded theoretic base, and the chief practical advantage based for it is that it brings about the steady rise in living standards which result only from a constant gain in productive efficiency.

The fact is that capitalism is not bringing about a steady rise in living standards.

Mr. HANBURY: What has brought it about?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Undoubtedly in the past capitalism has brought considerable gains in the standard of living; I do not deny that, but I say we have reached the point where that is not true to-day.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Then we should revert to the old order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, we should not revert at all; we should go on to a new order. It is very easy for an hon. member to say that we should revert to the old order. I do not think we can turn back the hands of the clock; we must proceed to a new order. This very editorial in the Free Press is followed by a second editorial, from which I should like to read a few sentences:

> . . . the city also gives relief to a large number who are working but not earning enough to support themselves and their families. . . . But many employers are taking advantage of this situation to pay extremely low wages. . . . It may well be that some employers are so hard pressed that they could not pay normal wages. . . . But employers should not be allowed to take undue advantage of the fact that relief is available for those who do not earn enough to maintain their families.

The editorial refers to some employers paying as little as $6 a month. There you have an example of a very distinct lowering of our standards of living, and advantage is being taken of the giving of relief. Practically, relief is a subsidy to low wages. That is an intolerable situation.

The other day the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) referred to us in this corner as wild-eyed socialists, and one might imagine that we had not given very careful consideration as to how the policies which we advocate are to be brought about. I will not take time to-day to indicate in detail how these policies can be carried out, but I would venture to refer the hon. gentleman to a little pamphlet issued not long ago entitled Social Reconstruction and the British North America Act, by F. R. Scott, who is associate professor of constitutional law and federal law in the faculty of law of McGill university. This pamphlet is devoted to a consideration of these problems, "Can we build a new society without destroying the constitution?" and, "Is the C.C.F. program possible under the British North America Act?" Anyone who is interested in these questions has ample opportunity fully to consider them from the purely constitutional point of view.

Before I sit down I think I must not allow to pass altogether unchallenged certain statements that have been made in this house with regard to the C.C.F. group. There has been adopted what I consider to be a very unfair method of attack. Individuals have busied themselves in making collections of press clippings, and it must be remembered that many of the newspapers are Liberal or Conservative, sometimes prejudiced against us and sometimes very hostile to us. In many cases the reports are by no means fair representations of what was actually said. So we find individuals in this house who have nothing better to do than go through the files of their own papers, collecting the most unfair of these reports, and then reading them to the house as though they were fair accounts of what the C.C.F. stood for. We have no adequate press service, so I should like to correct one or two of the outstanding misrepresentations which have been made in this house, as well as one or two which have been made outside. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) is reported by the Weyburn Review, of November 2, to have stated:

> Referring to the Beauharnois case, Mr. Young said money had been sent by this corporation to Winnipeg to help the C.C.F.

I hope the hon. member for Weyburn made no such statement, as it is absolutely untrue.

Miss MACPHAIL: The Liberals got it all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is preposterous that a member who is a supporter of a party that has had to pass through the valley of humiliation with regard to the Beauharnois case should try to unload any share of the blame upon any member in this corner of the house.

I would direct the attention of the house to the fact that there is now pending a suit for $53,972, launched against Sweezey by the executors of the Sifton estate. According to the press, the brothers of Mr. Sifton claim that he exacted an advance payment of $5,000 from Mr. Sweezey when he undertook the furthering of Mr. Sweezey's interests with the understanding that $50,000 additional was to be paid over if the administration of Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, then Prime Minister, approved the Beauharnois canal plan. The Siftons maintain that their brother in fact rendered the required services to Mr. Sweezey so effectively that the development of the Beauharnois project was approved by two orders in council dated March 8, 1929, and June 22, 1929.

In view of circumstances of that kind I think it ill behooves the hon. member for Weyburn to make the statement which he is reported to have made. I say that statement is as untrue as the statement made in some parts of Quebec to which the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) referred, to the effect that the C.C.F. was in receipt of money from Moscow. It seems to me ridiculous that we should have to be subjected to such statements as that.

Miss MACPHAIL: We are in receipt of money from nowhere.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Have you any?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am willing to share with my friends from both political camps all the money I have received from Moscow.

Then, only a few days ago the hon. member for Vancouver Centre made reference to the defeat, as he described it, of the C.C.F. in British Columbia. I believe the hon. member was unfair in his reference or I would not refer to the matter. He spoke of the C.C.F. through a large number of years having advanced from four to seven members in the British Columbia legislature. Of course we know that the C.C.F. came into existence only about a year and a half ago. There were some socialist members who sat in the British Columbia legislature some twenty years ago. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre did not point out that whereas the Liberal party in the recent provincial election secured something like forty-two per cent of the votes cast in the province of British Columbia, the C.C.F. secured about thirty-three per cent. If there had been a system of proportional representation the situation in the legislature of that province would be very different from what it is to-day. I think instead of finding those figures anything to gloat over the hon. member might very well read the summary of the situation as it appeared in the Montreal Star of November 7. I quote the last paragraph of the editorial:

> The point we are seeking to make is plain enough. The Conservative party disappeared from the scene in British Columbia. This ensured a smashing Liberal victory. But there is no talk of either of the old parties disappearing in any other contest, especially in the federal contest. Presumably, they will be waging a furious party fight along the old lines. This will in many constituences divide the old-line vote fairly even, and let the C.C.F. candidate win if he gets slightly over one-third of the electorate. So when we are sending wreaths to the grave of the C.C.F. because of their failure with Stubbs—probably a poor candidate—and their comparative failure in British Columbia with one of the parties eliminated, we had perhaps better save our money for propaganda among the electors on the necessity of postponing our sham party fights for a while and facing a real danger—an economic revolution that would wreck most of our established institutions.

Mr. MORAND: Do you agree with that statement?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I agree with the summary of the election results. So far as the wrecking of our institutions is concerned, may I point out that in my judgment the program of the C.C.F. is the only thing which will save our institutions. But the point to which I would refer particularly in this connection is the type of campaign waged against the C.C.F. in British Columbia and which, it appears, is to be maintained in this House of Commons.

For example, there was an indefensible and irreverent expression used by a man who was a C.C.F. candidate in the recent provincial election in British Columbia. That expression was heralded throughout the country as being representative of the general point of view of the C.C.F. Let me point out to this House of Commons that the expression to which I have referred was used fourteen years ago, but was dragged out in this election and quoted frequently, as if it had been uttered during the election campaign. That is not fair play, and I hope no hon. member in this house will defend it. For a year that particular candidate had been vice-president of the Union of Municipalities of British Columbia; for two years he had been president of the Union of Municipalities of British Columbia; for one year he had been chairman of the committee on unemployment of the Union of Canadian Municipalities, and he had been reeve of Burnaby. He had been living an eminently respectable life, and yet because fourteen years previously he had made a mistake, he was criticized.

Mr. HANBURY: He does not think it is a mistake.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury) states the gentleman does not think it is a mistake.

Mr. HANBURY: He does not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am glad the hon. member has made that statement. This is what the gentleman in question said in regard to the matter:

> At the convention of trades unions of western Canada, very early in the year 1919, I made a chance remark—there was no speech—on the spur of the moment which I not only regret at this present time, but regretted immediately after it was made.

Mr. HANSON: He does not repudiate it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, he says he made it, but he regrets it. I believe I recall it is written that Saint Peter denied his Lord three times, even denied him with an oath, but that fact has not prevented him from being held ever since in greatest reverence by a very large section of the Christian community.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): What has all this to do with the amendment, anyway?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will come to that. These matters, to which I have devoted only five or ten minutes to-day, were discussed previously. I believe the hon. member who has just spoken was not present during most of this debate, or he would have heard the discussion.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I should like to know the relevancy of it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Telegraph-Journal of Saint John, New Brunswick, in its issue of November 14, 1933, commented on the British Columbia election as follows:

> The result is more than a Liberal party success. It is a victory for the forces of sane and solid British principles over the forces of revolution and godlessness.

Mr. Speaker, I submit it is not fair that men who for some twelve or thirteen years have been known in this House of Commons and who represent a very considerable section of the population of Canada should be maligned in this fashion. There was even an Anglican clergyman, a dignitary out in British Columbia who wrote to a certain candidate asking an opinion with regard to religion. That candidate replied, and the Anglican dignitary came out and denounced the C.C.F. because his reply had come from a C.C.F. candidate expressing the opinion on religion held by that body. May I say that the reply was not received from a C.C.F. candidate at all; it was from a member of another party which has no connection with the C.C.F.

Mr. DUPUIS: From a socialist, was it not?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It may have been from a socialist. I fancy there are a few Liberals in Canada who might be quoted in a way which would not meet with the approval of the hon. member who has interrupted.

Mr. DUPUIS: That does not settle the question.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But, so far as respectability is concerned, and without going into a detailed discussion on the subject, I might point out that the present house leader of the C.C.F. in British Columbia is the Reverend Robert Connell, a retired Anglican clergyman. If the C.C.F. had stood for godlessness and revolution I can hardly imagine that they would have selected as their leader in the legislature a gentleman who had been an Anglican clergyman.

In closing may I say to the hon. member from West Hamilton that I have gone into this matter because it has been introduced again and again in this debate and we have sat quietly; we have not made any attack upon the Liberal party or the Conservative party but have simply tried to defend ourselves against what I believe to be unwarrantable misrepresentations.

As we look over the situation in Canada and in the world, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that our problems are too serious for us to spend very much time in this kind of party bickering. I believe that the time has come when the people of Canada are expecting some action to be taken. We have not confidence in this present government, as is indicated by our vote the other night and by our own amendment. But at the same time, if the present government would give us a lead in the way of a solution of the problems I have indicated, I think it would receive the full support of members in this corner of the house. We are far more concerned with the condition of the people in this country than we are with the party game. Many of us come directly from the people and are living close to them and we realize the seriousness of the situation. There is hardly anyone who does not recognize that democracy is on trial to-day. People outside are saying, what good is parliament; what is parliament for if it cannot solve these big problems of unemployment, a demoralized agricultural industry, and the intolerable burden of debts?

We have been departing very largely in recent years from our older Canadian ideals. In the earlier days we believed that everyone should have a chance. I do not believe that it can honestly be said by any member here to-day that in these days every Canadian has a chance. I think of all these young people who are growing up in our homes; they have not the chance that their fathers had; they have not even the chance that their grandfathers had, because if their grandfathers worked hard enough and slaved long enough hours they had a chance to make a decent living. But our people under modern conditions have not even a chance to work. So I say we are departing from the old Canadian ideal that everyone should have a chance.

In the old days when our forefathers settled here all men were more or less equal. One might have fifty acres, another a hundred, and another two hundred, but substantially we were all more or less on an equality and were good neighbours. To-day that is all changed. We have, on the one hand, great aggregations of wealth, and on the other hand, unemployment and insecurity. I believe the time has come when we shall have to get back to the older Canadian ideals and provide for a greater measure of equality among the people. I do not see how Canada can be maintained as a democracy unless we have in very large measure economic equality.

With regard to democracy itself, it may be that we still have the forms of democracy, but I submit that as long as the big moneyed interests have so much influence in the formulation and control of the policies of this country we cannot be said to have any real democracy. As I pointed out the other day, in Newfoundland they have surrendered even the forms of democracy, and that former independent dominion is now being administered by a board responsible to London. The western provinces of this country were almost threatened by our Prime Minister a year ago, in a letter he wrote, that unless they could balance their budgets, or more nearly so, it might be that he would require them to appoint an administrator acceptable to this government who would carry on the affairs of the province. Where is our democracy going under those circumstances? Already many municipalities are in that very position. So I say that although we have the forms, we are losing the real sense and the real benefits of democracy. It would seem that at the beginning of a new session of this parliament we should once and for all forget our party squabbling and get down to real business.

I submit that we have a right under the present circumstances to demand that if the government is to remain the government of this country, it must make a determined effort to solve some of these outstanding problems that confront the people of Canada to-day.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire at all to enter into the general questions raised in this debate. My purpose in rising is simply to refer to a statement that was made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), speaking in this house on the 13th instant, as reported in Hansard at page 536. He said:

> Now let me say here that an agreement was reached by the members of the committee last year—

He was referring to the committee on pensions.

> —and I am in the judgment of hon. gentlemen who are supporting the government—that equal representation would be given the personnel of the pension tribunals in the formation of the new Board of Pension Commissioners.

I had the honour to be chairman of that committee, and we went into the matter with very great care. At the commencement of the labours of that committee, we received numerous telegrams, all originating from one source, protesting against the abolition of the tribunals. This was taken to mean by many that they did not care to have the personnel dropped, and during the first three days of our debates in the committee it became increasingly apparent that in order to satisfy some of the members at least, an arrangement should be made.

The bill that we were examining was Bill No. 78, for the purpose of shortening the procedure in soldiers' claims, so that finality would be had within a shorter time. I pointed out to the committee that I did not believe that any government or the minister would accept a proposition of that kind. I spoke to members of the legion, to Major Roper, the head of the legion, on this matter, and pointed out to him that as it was very necessary in the interests of the soldier that the legislation should pass we might come to some other arrangement. Subsequently Major Roper and I prepared a resolution which passed the committee. This resolution was for the purpose of dissolving the old Board of Pension Commissioners and also the tribunals and forming a new board to be known as the Canadian pension commission. Nothing was suggested in any way or shape as to who should be the members of this commission. The only point that was raised was as to who should be eligible, and it was mutually agreed that the members of the then tribunals should be eligible for appointment to this commission. We had no power to go further had we chosen to do so.

I might also point out that in the latter days of that committee several other resolutions were brought forward which we were unable to deal with but which we passed, and instead of incorporating them in the ordinary report I had them forwarded to the Prime Minister for his attention. Had there been an arrangement such as stated by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre it could have properly been brought forward in some such resolution. However, there was no arrangement of any kind other than as I say, and I think that those members of the house who were present will bear me out in that statement.

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to-day to discuss the question of titles, or the relatively unimportant matter of the balance of trade, nor am I going to burn any incense at the shrine of the golden calf sometimes known as the gold standard, nor submit any figures to show whether or not this country is coming out of the depression and is again on the way to prosperity. I may say with regard to the latter that any improvement which this country has experienced during the last few months has been very largely the result of the policies of President Roosevelt of the United States and of the psychologic and material effects which they have had in this country.

I have no desire, sir, to indulge in any partisan criticisms of the government in their administration of the affairs of this country for the last three and a half years. I appreciate the difficulties with which the members of the administration have to cope. Their every day routine duties in the ordinary course of events added to the problems which have come to the government during the present depression occupy their minds and activities but this does not excuse the administration from trying to grapple definitely with the vital causes of the present depression and from enunciating and putting into action policies which might be expected to improve conditions.

I am not going to indulge in recriminations but I think it should be remembered that the present government, and more particularly the leader of the government (Mr. Bennett), asked for the responsibilities with which the people of Canada have entrusted them. I do not intend to dwell upon the promises made by the Prime Minister other than to say that with the intelligence which he possesses to such a high degree he must have known that those promises could not be fulfilled. The people of Canada are entitled to some definite action in the long crisis in which the country finds itself. I regard the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) as my personal friend and he has stated in his own picturesque language that the house is on fire and that it is our duty to attend to the putting out of the conflagration. May I say to him that the house has been burning for almost four years and I think the people of Canada have nearly reached the conclusion that since the present administration has not had any great success in subduing the fire, it is about time we changed the fire brigade.

During the course of his remarks the other day the Prime Minister referred to the fact that each morning on his way to his office he passed the statue of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He made certain remarks in connection with that but I would say to him in all sincerity that when he enters this building each day he should read and reflect upon the inscription over the doors of this building which reads, "Where there is no vision, the people perish." If I have any outstanding criticism to make of the government it is this: I gathered from the remarks of the Prime Minister the other day in Toronto that he is convinced not only that Canada is sound—I believe that—but that conditions are basically sound and it is not necessary for him to take any particularly drastic steps to bring about what I consider to be necessary to correct present conditions in Canada. I am open to correction in quoting his remarks as sometimes my right hon. friend says that he is wrongly reported. I think he is on record as saying when he left the boat at Montreal some time ago upon returning from England that he was opposed to higher wages.

Mr. BENNETT: I explained that observation the other night; I was referring to the N.R.A.

Mr. EULER: That remark has left an unfavourable impression upon many people who, like some in my own city of Kitchener, are working for nine cents an hour or less. On another occasion he said that poverty is a blessing. Such a statement may be essentially true, it may have some merit but it does not fall with very good grace upon the ears of those who do not know from where their next meal is coming, unless it be out of the charity of their fellowmen.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what he said.

Mr. EULER: Misreported?

Mr. BENNETT: Add the rest of what he said. He was speaking to young people.

Mr. EULER: There are a great many people who are out of work to-day and who do not know from where their sustenance is to come.

Mr. BENNETT: He was speaking to young people; read what he said.

Mr. EULER: Speaking in Toronto the other day—I am trying to be careful as I do not wish to misrepresent the Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: You are doing it now. The statement that I said that poverty was a good thing is not the whole statement. I was speaking to a group of young people in connection with the Leonard foundation and I stated that in comparison with those who had the sustenance to secure an education, that sort of thing was best as it stimulated effort upon their part.

Mr. EULER: It may be that—

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member should read the report.

Mr. EULER: —the special circumstances under which the Prime Minister made that remark would make it sound all right to those who were listening at the time. Being a younger man than the Prime Minister, perhaps I should not make this remark, but I do say that that sort of thing does not fall very gratefully upon the ears of Canadians who are in a position of dire distress.

The other day in Toronto he made the statement that the government had nothing spectacular to offer. I have no particular fault to find with that statement, but he went on to say that all he could suggest was hard work and thrift. Such a statement might be all right to people who have employment and who are receiving something in the way of wages with which they can exercise the virtue of thrift, but it is this statement that causes me to rise to-day. It seems to me that the statement that hard work and thrift are the only remedies for the Canadian people shows a mental attitude on the part of the Prime Minister that nothing is to be done, that he is going to stand pat and that we are not to have any definite policies to correct the conditions under which we labour to-day. He seems to think that everything is basically sound, our financial system, our industrial system and all the rest of it. He seems to think that if we only wait and work hard and apply thrift, everything will be as we should like it to be. With that statement I take absolutely definite issue. I do not see how any intelligent man who has observed the trend of circumstances in this country during the last few years and who has seen the tremendous changes which have taken place during the last ten, fifteen or twenty years in industrial relations and the crowding of people into factories in our cities, can help but realize that something is wrong. These conditions should be studied very carefully and a conscientious government should try at least to apply some remedies.

It is a definite law of nature, in the animal world, the vegetable world and the human world, that when great changes take place it is absolutely necessary that those who may be affected by such changes should adapt themselves to the new conditions. If they do not, the penalty is that they must perish. It would be unfortunate if we passed out of this depression—perhaps not to the heights of the so-called prosperity which we had in 1928 and 1929—and made no changes in our manner of meeting conditions which will recur again and again. I say with absolute conviction that when they do recur, they will be worse than they have been during the present depression. I believe that many of the capitalists—may I call them that?—or the leading men of this country realize this fact to-day and many of them are quite ready to follow this or any other government that will institute some real remedy to provide a correction of the difficulties under which we labour. The statement has been made that this depression is world-wide. That may be perfectly true but it does not follow that we in Canada cannot do something to set our own house in order.

I do not propose to traverse the whole field of whatever remedies might be suggested; instead, I will confine myself particularly to one or two. And the leader of the C.C.F. has already touched very largely on some of the question which I should like to discuss. If we are to find a remedy we must know the causes of the condition that is to be remedied. Of course, the real basic and fundamental cause is the selfishness of the human heart; there is no doubt about that. Every man looks out for himself, and it is perhaps not to be wondered at, when people have no certainty as to what is going to happen in the future to themselves and to those who depend upon them, that every man tries to secure for himself all that is possible. Perhaps it was with a realization of that fact that the Prime Minister—and I say this with all respect to him—made the statement about two years ago that nothing but the grace of God could save Canada.

I intended to speak of unemployment and the question of the debt, as well as of the Canadian National Railways, and then finally if I have time,—because it is the most important subject before us now—to discuss what can be done so that there shall not be, to put it bluntly, so great a spread between the wages of capital and the wages of labour, so that the man who works, the man who produces, may receive something that is more a just approximation to what he deserves than he has received in the past, which I believe is the cause, generally speaking, of the difficulty that faces us to-day. The remedies involve a change from selfishness to unselfishness, the realization if you like of the dependence of one on another, and the recognition of the great fact of the brotherhood of man.

Mr. BENNETT: Can you do that by act of parliament?

Mr. EULER: My right hon. friend has almost anticipated me, for I was going to say that this is not within the sphere of practical politics and that we shall have to adopt some other method in the meantime until there is a fundamental change in the human heart.

An hon. MEMBER: It will take a long time.

Mr. EULER: Yes, I am afraid so. I would say this also, though all within the hearing of my voice will not agree wth it. Our difficulties come in great part from the fact that we engaged in a tremendous war, and I would express the hope that this country will refrain in future from entering into any great conflict unless Canada is itself attacked.

With regard to unemployment, one of the great factors is undoubtedly the introduction of labour-saving machinery. This will become more aggravated from year to year; it is a perfectly natural development, and I am certainly not opposed to it. Whether it interferes with provincial rights or not, I think it must become the policy of this government, either by a change in the British North America Act or through agreement among the provinces, that there shall be some legislation, some sort of action which will shorten the hours of labour so as to spread the work to be performed among as many people as possible; and then, when we have done that, having balanced our budget—and it is impossible to do this until such time as we have balanced our budget—we should have a reasonable unemployment insurance scheme to take up the slack which will exist for all time in the future.

It seems to me to be a reflection on civilization, to say nothing about Christianity, that in a country such as this, which produces all the food that is necessary for the people, which is dotted with industrial plants that can produce, in excess of what we need, everything that the people of Canada need, there should be in this twentieth century a million and a half people on public relief. If it is necessary as an instrument of national policy that we should have certain changes, increases if you like, in the tariff, I should have no objection to that, although I may say by the way that while at the moment I am not particularly criticizing the tremendous increases that have been made in the tariff, I am criticizing particularly the administration and the unwise and unnecessary difficulties that have been placed in the way of business so far as the administration of the tariff is concerned.

I spoke a moment ago of the necessity of balancing the budget. Possibly some of my friends in the corner do not agree that the budget should be balanced, but I believe that before we can put into operation a reasonable unemployment insurance scheme we must balance our budget.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the hon. member include the railways?

Mr. EULER: I am coming to the railways.

Mr. BENNETT: Does he include that as part of the budget?

Mr. EULER: Yes, I desire to make two suggestions whereby it seems to me we could approximate a balancing of the budget; and the first is in connection with the debt, which has already been discussed this afternoon. I need not say that we have a federal debt of something like $2,600,000,000, with a supplementary debt on account of railways of something like one billion dollars on which we have to pay interest; and the whole debt of the country, federal, provincial and municipal, amounts to something like eight billion dollars. It is merely necessary therefore to mention this sum to realize that it is almost impossible that we should ever be able to pay the interest upon it.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member speaks of a billion dollars as the secondary debt. It is much more than that in view of the assumption by the dominion of the guaranteed obligations of the provinces. It amounts to twice that, as he knows.

Mr. EULER: I am quite willing to accept that; it simply assists the argument I am going to make.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. EULER: What I am saying is that the interest on the debt of the country is so great that it seems absolutely essential that this parliament should do something to reduce that interest. I know I shall be charged with repudiation, but there is only one class of possessors of wealth in this country who have escaped the loss that has come to everyone else, and that is the government bondholders. The working man has seen his wages reduced, the farmers are receiving the lowest prices almost in the history of Canada; the retailer has lost by reason of reduction in prices of stocks he purchased at high prices; and so far as the manufacturer is concerned, I may make this observation for the benefit of my friends to the left: many a manufacturer has seen his capital absolutely wiped out. I know whereof I speak, because it affects my own city of Kitchener and the town of Waterloo.

I say therefore to my friends in the corner and to some of my Liberal friends as well that while they seem to have the notion that the manufacturer is constantly fattening on profits at the expense of the consumer, although it is undoubtedly true in some instances, the fact is that during this period of depression the manufacturer has had a mighty hard row to hoe in many cases. I would also say that the man who invested in common stocks and in most preferred stocks, and even in the case of industrial bonds, has taken a very heavy loss.

An hon. MEMBER: Or in real estate.

Mr. EULER: Or in real estate; one could mention a great many others. The point I want to make is, the holder of federal bonds or provincial bonds has been in every case receiving the interest to which his bond nominally entitles him. Therefore I say—and I know I am more or less open to the charge of repudiation, and I shall answer that a little later—I say that it does not seem to me to be unjust or unfair, in face of the emergency through which the country is passing and the difficulty of meeting our expenses, to ask the holders of government bonds to take their reasonable share of loss by way of reduction in interest. I suppose if the average of federal interest rates were taken it would work out as something like 5 per cent—

Mr. BENNETT: An average of 4·6 per cent.

Mr. EULER: I had thought it was more nearly 5. Certainly as far as the provinces are concerned the rate may very well be 5 per cent and perhaps a little more.

Mr. BENNETT: A little under 5 per cent.

Mr. EULER: And that probably applies as well to the municipalities. I am going to suggest very seriously to the government that they should now—not in 1937—take some steps by which the interest rate on federal indebtedness should be reduced to, I might say, 3 per cent. If that could be done this country would save something like thirty to forty million dollars.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not want to take the hon. gentleman's time without his permission—

Mr. EULER: It is quite all right.

Mr. BENNETT: With his permission then I would point out that that is one of the very things that has been considered; but this is a debtor country, and we have a substantial amount of municipal, provincial and federal bonds domiciled abroad, especially bearer bonds, and while the great conversion we did carry out of $640,000,000 was down to 4½ per cent, to carry it below that would be practically asking the people outside this country, over whom we have no control, to accept a lower rate, which would be repudiation.

Mr. EULER: I am glad the right hon. gentleman has drawn my attention to that, because I had intended to mention it, and I fear it would have escaped my attention. I am not referring at the moment to bonds which are held outside of Canada. But the Prime Minister knows, and perhaps members of the house know, that about 73 per cent of the bonded indebtedness of Canada is held within Canada itself.

Mr. BENNETT: That is federal bonds.

Mr. EULER: I am speaking of federal bonds. I know that so far as provincial and municipal bonds are concerned it is not so. Of that 73 per cent something like three-quarters is held by the great financial institutions, insurance companies and others—

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is very patient, I will not interrupt unless—

Mr. EULER: It is all right.

Mr. BENNETT: It is that very fact that causes the difficulty. Insurance companies base their statutory reserves upon a given rate of interest over a period of years, they have made all their computations on that rate, and that is the reason they have held these bonds. In this feature, concerning life insurance companies in this country, both British, American and Canadian, lies one of the very greatest of the difficulties. This matter has been carefully considered by the government on many occasions.

Mr. EULER: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend will see the point at once.

Mr. EULER: I understand the argument my right hon. friend is making. However, without questioning his sincerity in the slightest, I am not entirely convinced. I think that the insurance companies, and other financial institutions such as the banks own about twenty-five per cent of the bonds that are held within Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: No, no.

Mr. EULER: I may be wrong, but I am so informed. I am not convinced that it would not be possible for them voluntarily to reduce the rates of interest by at least one or one and one-half per cent without seriously impairing their obligations to policy-holders. It is after all only a small proportion of their total assets.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a very substantial proportion.

Mr. EULER: How that might be done one might suggest. By the way, it occurs to me that it was the expressed opinion of the Prime Minister, when he was leader of the opposition five or six or more years ago, that the funds of the insurance companies could be made to serve the national financial purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: In a 4 per cent consolidated debenture, yes, and I was denounced as a repudiator of capital.

Mr. EULER: So my right hon. friend, I am glad to say, at one time considered something approximating what I am suggesting at the moment.

Mr. BENNETT: Still is, every day.

Mr. EULER: During the war it did not seem to be very difficult to get the people of Canada to buy bonds, and buy them freely. I think the condition that we are in to-day is just about as desperate as it was during the war. I would offer this suggestion, that the government might very well proceed with propaganda, shall we say, in a campaign, patriotic campaign if you will, asking the people of this country, the bondholders, to consent voluntarily to a refunding at a lower rate of interest of the bonds they hold.

The question of repudiation has come up, but I do not think it would be repudiation if those who did not care to receive a lower rate of interest were paid back their principal, which might be refunded in some other way, perhaps the way suggested by my right hon. friend some years ago with respect to the funds of insurance companies. And although two wrongs do not make a right, we have had repudiation before, we are having repudiation to-day, if that were an excuse. The great United States of America, the wealthiest nation in the world, has repudiated its gold indebtedness under its bonds. They promised expressly that they would be redeemed in gold, and to-day they are not carrying out that promise. By act of congress that has been discontinued. And I think it is not too much to say that France and Italy—yes, and Great Britain—have practically repudiated their debt to the United States. I could come nearer home, and while it is perhaps a small matter, and while there may be a difference of opinion with regard to this, even this government has repudiated, if not its legal responsibility, at any rate its moral responsibility to pay interest and full principal upon certain securities of companies now consolidated with or included in the Canadian National Railways. So it would not be an entirely new thing.

Mr. BENNETT: I am afraid the hon. gentleman is wrong. He refers to the Guelph railway?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: The government was not in any sense obligated on that.

Mr. EULER: We had an argument on that in this house before. I said a moment ago that perhaps they are not legally responsible, but I do contend that there is a very decided moral responsibility with regard to that matter.

Mr. MANION: May I interject? I looked into it very thoroughly, and I do not think there is any moral or other responsibility on the government in that regard.

Mr. EULER: I am afraid we will just have to differ on that.

Mr. BENNETT: There is always a difference as to moral responsibility.

Mr. EULER: If we could accomplish what I have suggested we should reduce our interest obligation by a very substantial figure.

Mr. BENNETT: What rate had the hon. gentleman in mind?

Mr. EULER: The rate I had in mind was 3 per cent. In Great Britain they converted on a basis of 2½ per cent, I think.

Mr. BENNETT: A perpetual 2½ per cent.

Mr. EULER: Now I must hurry on with the matter of the railways. Let me say at the outset that I deprecate very much the apparent tendency on the part of certain members of the government, and perhaps more particularly the Prime Minister, in the house and out, to place the responsibility for the condition of the national railways upon the shoulders of the Liberal party.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. EULER: My right hon. friend says "hear. hear." My own opinion is, and it is backed up by his own, which I shall read in a moment, that the responsibility belongs to both parties.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely.

Mr. EULER: But I understood my right hon. friend to say it rests upon the shoulders of this party.

Mr. BENNETT: The initiative in respect to grants of public money can only be with the government, and no Conservative government was in power when any of these obligations came into being.

Mr. EULER: I am sorry I have not more time to debate that question with the Prime Minister.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: You lost half an hour by interruptions.

Mr. BENNETT: A little exaggeration, as usual.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps the Speaker will be a little indulgent. It is not in the interests of the national railways or of the Canadian people that we should have recrimination of that kind. It ought to be the duty and the desire of every one of us to do all we possibly can to find a way out of the trouble in which we find ourselves by reason of the difficulties of the Canadian National.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. EULER: My right hon. friend in the session of 1916 made the following statement:

After carefully studying this railway matter during the past year, the best conclusion that I can arrive at is that all of us—and I mean the people of Canada as a whole—were somehow infected at that time with a disease which came from over-speculation and optimism run riot, or run mad.

He blames the whole people of Canada, and then he refers to certain speeches he made in western Canada in which he says he objected to taking over these roads and making these loans. Then he goes on to say:

. . . I was very severely criticized by my own friends, and was told that I was lacking in faith in my country and was filled with a spirit of pessimism. So, in the ultimate analysis, under our democratic institutions, the people themselves must accept the responsibility for the condition that exists, and neither the opposition nor the government is vitally concerned, because no government would have initiated the legislation in the terms in which it was initiated except upon the demand of the people manifested by resolutions passed by boards of trade, municipal councils, farmers' unions and associations, and merchants throughout the country—

Then again, with regard to the taking over of the obligations of the railways—and this does not reflect any particular credit upon either of the great political parties—he says:

The reasonable explanation—and it is a very simple one—is that an election was coming on. We ought to face that proposition very frankly; and, what is more, that is a case in which both parties must accept responsibility, because the Conservative party of that day, sitting in opposition, did not oppose that $35,000,000 grant to the Canadian Northern Railway; they did not challenge it. The records show that, and the Conservative party must accept responsibility with the Liberal party, because if the one party initiated this legislation, it is a case in which the other party did not oppose and, not opposing, must share the responsibility.

I do not know that I should quote further, Mr. Speaker, but if I might I would suggest to the Prime Minister that he follow the very good advice he gave in the same speech from which I have been quoting, when he said:

I have heard a great deal said as to who is responsible for it. But all the talk in the world as to who is responsible for this situation will not relieve us from the condition that now confronts us.

Mr. BENNETT: We have to carry it at the moment.

Mr. EULER: Yes.

If there is one thing the war has taught us, it is that recriminations do no good; we have learned that at least.

If I cared to do so I think I could place a good deal of the responsibility for taking over the Grand Trunk Pacific in 1919 upon the Conservative party, and I do not usually bandy party names to any great extent. It was a Conservative government that took over those roads and assumed, I think, a liability of something like $1,800,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: $1,700,000,000.

Mr. EULER: What is a mere hundred million dollars? I am not going to quote him, but the right hon. gentleman, who was not then prime minister, made a statement to the effect that instead of being taken over, with all their liabilities, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern should have been allowed to go into the hands of receivers and have the water squeezed out of them. If that had been done the obligations which we are now carrying would have been wiped out to a very great extent. That ought to have been done, no doubt, but we all have to accept responsibility, including myself because I was in the house when the railways were taken over. I think, however, it absolves this party from at least a great share of the responsibility for the debt under which the national railways are suffering now; I think that follows.

Mr. BENNETT: The resolution was moved by Mr. Pugsley, who wanted to pay them $45,000,000.

Mr. EULER: In any case I know my right hon. friend was in favour of allowing the roads to go into the hands of a receiver.

Mr. BENNETT: And he and Mr. Nickle were the only members in favour of that suggestion.

Mr. DUPUIS: You should have followed the advice of Mr. Lanctot and sold them for $1.

Mr. EULER: I wonder, if we had further railway problems, if my right hon. friend would take the same attitude and say the road should go into the hands of a receiver?

What can we do about the railway debt? Some ten years ago in this chamber I made the suggestion—and I mentioned this last year—that the government might very well investigate the advisability of merging the two great railways, amalgamating them if you like. That suggestion did not receive a great deal of attention at that time; conditions improved and nobody said anything more about it. I have repeated that suggestion on other occasions, because I believe it has to come in order that we may get rid of the annual loss of $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 which we can ill afford to bear. If we had brought about amalgamation at that time we would have saved an amount equal to about one-third of our national debt, which I think would have been very desirable. In the last few months two very significant things have happened. We had the Canadian Pacific Railway come to this government and receive their backing, or their guarantee, to the extent of $60,000,000. Then last week, in the city of Ottawa, we had the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), a member of this government, make the statement that unless conditions improved within a year, amalgamation or a merger or something like that might have to come.

Mr. BENNETT: The Secretary of State made it perfectly clear that he was speaking for himself only, and in no sense representing the view of the government.

Mr. EULER: He is a member of the government, and it just occurred to me that perhaps he was flying a kite to see what the reaction would be.

Mr. BENNETT: I assure you that he was not.

Mr. EULER: It is true that in his speech the other evening the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) stated that so long as this government was in office there never would be an amalgamation. I think it is very unfortunate—and I say this advisedly—that some years ago the Prime Minister laid down the dictum, if I may call it that, "Amalgamation never; competition ever." Competition is not always the life of trade, as I have said; sometimes it may be the death of trade, and it may be and looks as though it will be the death of our railways. He may still have to change his mind. If amalgamation could take place—and let me say that I am speaking for myself alone when I speak of amalgamation—we would save $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 by the reduction in interest charges and wipe out $50,000,00 or $60,000,0040 of an annual deficit on the Canadian National. This would almost wipe out our deficit of $100,000,000 or more, and then we would be in a position reasonably and intelligently to consider the enactment of a definite unemployment insurance measure.

I was going to say something with regard to the financing of such a scheme, but I do not think that would present any great difficulty. So I will conclude my remarks in regard to our railways by saying that in my opinion if amalgamation does take place, as I think it ultimately will, it should be and must be under public ownership. I am sure my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) heartily agrees with me. To transfer the national railways to the Canadian Pacific Railway would be suicidal. They would take the railway and leave the obligations, with their perpetual interest, with the country.

If I may take just a few more minutes I should like to conclude with a few observations upon a subject which I regard as of even greater importance. I believe that by legislation of some sort, by planning or by some adjustment, there should be brought about in this country a condition whereby the spread between the return to labour and the return to capital should not be so great. I have made that statement before in this house. I do not know whether it is the enunciation of a socialist doctrine, but I believe that if the man who produces, who labours on the farm, in the factory—and perhaps I am thinking more particularly of the factory—in the mine or elsewhere does not receive enough money in return to enable him to buy back that which he produces, you are bound to have depression. If he cannot buy the goods they must accumulate and unemployment must always follow.

I am not going to say just how that is going to be brought about. My friends in the corner say that it can be done only by entirely scrapping the present system. I am not ready to go so far as that; I do not believe my hon. friends in the corner of the house are ready to take hold of matters and bring all these things about. If we did anything of that kind I fear we might end in chaos, a condition which would be worse than what we have to-day. I prefer very much more the evolutionary method of approaching this desirable condition of affairs gradually, as we may find it necessary. But I will say this—and I throw this out as a warning, if I may do so—that unless some of these changes are made I believe it is absolutely true that the people of Canada will travel towards socialism a great deal faster than they have done in the past and accept it as their only remedy.

An hon. MEMBER: No, no.

Mr. EULER: I am not sure that hon. members agree with me on that. But I say to my hon. friends opposite and to those sitting about me that the people of this country are looking for some definite lead with regard to the correction of the conditions under which we are living. You say that that is interference with what is usually called rugged individualism. That term does not appeal to me particularly. Rugged individualism has done a great deal of harm; it has led to the piling up of great fortunes and the exploitation of the weak by the strong. We need only to look at the United States to see what has happened there. Disclosures have been made in that country, and it may be that similar ones will be made in Canada by the committee which was appointed only a few days ago. It should not be possible for great accumulations of wealth to take place in this country. It is said that law restricts personal liberty, and that if you have complete personal liberty you have nothing less than anarchy. I would have no hesitation in intervening—not unnecessarily—even with the conduct of business, in some respects, if it would mean the greatest good to the greatest number.

The people of Canada are looking for some action. My criticism is I do not think this government is supplying that degree of action to which the people are entitled. I say again, for myself, and I believe in this connection I can speak for all hon. members sitting on this side of the house, that when the government produces some policy which promises to be productive of the needs that we have in view, I for one would be very willing to cooperate with them.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Gagnon): The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. BENNETT: Go on; we interrupted the hon. member for some period of time.

Mr. EULER: I say in all seriousness that to me it appears that we have adopted and have conducted through the last three or four years a policy of drift, hoping that the course of events and the passing of time will lead to a readjustment, and that these factors will perhaps automatically, or by tying ourselves to the Roosevelt plan, pull us out of the depression. I would say to the government—and I should like to say, if I may, something to encourage them—to proceed with some courage and some initiative on the principle that after all, Providence helps those who help themselves.

Hon. R. D. MORAND (East Essex): Mr. Speaker, we have just listened to a most interesting and, as we always have from the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), a very serious résumé of his views. Those views, however, are not always entirely in keeping with those of his party, and it is interesting to wonder just how during the time he sat with the government he was not able to make more headway with such views as he has now expressed.

Mr. BOUCHARD: We had no crisis at the time.

Mr. MORAND: He began his speech with the very true statement that when there is no vision the people perish. I wonder just how truly that could be applied to the lack of vision shown during the days of prosperity we experienced during and following the war, and just how much of the perishing we find to-day is due to the lack of vision of that time. We know that it was during those periods that the nucleus of our present day troubles formed. Much of that which has grown to the present serious position in which Canada finds itself undoubtely had its very beginning and roots in lack of control and lack of vision in that particular time.

However, we are undoubtedly suffering to-day. The speech from the throne has been attacked in different ways. One method adopted has been a definite vote of want of confidence in the government. Reading the speech of the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), I was interested to find that he said the people of Canada had no faith in the present government, and that the proper way to judge a government was not by the number of members sitting behind it, but by the feeling of the people throughout the country. I wonder how he would correlate that statement with the view he expressed while I was in the house in the session of 1926, when, very definitely at the opening of the session he moved a resolution demanding from hon. members in the house, and not from the people outside the house, the right to carry on. We have now before us the following amendment:

We respectfully regret that Your Excellency's present advisers have not taken such steps as are necessary to deal adequately with unemployment, to reduce the burden imposed by the public debt, and to put the agricultural industry on a basis that will insure to the farmer a decent standard of living.

The leader of the C.C.F. party has moved this amendment because as he has said he wishes to place his party and himself on record to the effect that they have no greater faith or belief in the opposition than they have in the present government.

Mr. DUPUIS: He did not say that to-day.

Mr. MORAND: I believe he said it when he began his speech. The hon. member is always very careful to state, at the beginning of his remarks, that the C.C.F. is not a political party. I maintain, sir, that they have certainly learned all the methods and ways that most political parties have adopted to try to gain power, and I am not too sure that their close association with our friends opposite has not resulted in schooling them in their method of approach, when trying to gain the reins of power.

Mr. VALLANCE: We can teach them a lot yet.

Mr. MORAND: One finds a great deal of similarity between the report of the Regina conference and the original platform of the Liberal party as enunciated in 1919. There is at least definite evidence of the same technique and the desire to spread widely those views which they purpose putting into effect so that they may take in all those people who, they believe, would be affected by a certain type of appeal. In the present instance the C.C.F. has gone one better by trying to keep itself free from the appelation of a party. They leave each roving band under its own direction and free to make an appeal in whatever place or manner it may best be made or can most successfully be worked out. I have no doubt in my own mind that each roving band with a particular chief, whether it be in the maritime provinces or in British Columbia, every night looks towards Ottawa for some general direction, hoping that the end of their labours will be rewarded in their arriving here and securing the power which they so much desire. It is rather interesting to read the labour code as set out in the C.C.F. platform and published in their monthly publication of August, 1933:

A national labour code to secure for the worker maximum income and leisure, insurance covering illness, accident, old age, and unemployment; freedom of association and effective participation in the management of his industry or profession.

When one looks at the platform of the National Liberal convention held in Ottawa in 1919, one finds very much the same thing. For instance, I find there:

The representation of labour on federal commissions pertaining to labour matters; effective legislation for the conservation of human life and health; that in so far as may be practicable, having regard for Canada's financial position, an adequate system of insurance against unemployment, sickness, dependence in old age, and other disability, which would include old age pensions, widows' pensions, and maternity benefits, should be instituted by the federal government.

Mr. MITCHELL: Would the hon. gentleman read the Conservative program of 1927?

Mr. MORAND: I am now comparing the two schools at which my hon. friend has assiduously applied himself in the last few years.

Mr. DUPUIS: As a good student you should go to the Conservative school. What do they say?

Mr. MORAND: Every student undoubtedly reflects the school at which he has been taught, and one can see a very definite reflection in the make-up of this labour code of the C.C.F. If one were sure that it would be applied in the same way as the Liberal program of 1919 was, it would not be necessary to spend any great deal of time in combating the general policies.

We find that to-day the leader of the C.C.F. is very conciliatory in his talk. He is not so provocative, not so aggressive as he was in the first years he was here. Undoubtedly that is the effect of considerable travelling throughout the country during the last few months and a realization that the people of Canada are not ready to accept the full socialization of industry and a socialist government in this country. So, tempering his remarks and his methods in the hope of securing power, we find the leader of the C.C.F. much more conciliatory to-day.

The leader of the C.C.F., my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) always seems to take it for granted that within his group, perhaps within himself, rests exclusive knowledge of conditions of the country, that he and he alone has a full realization of the difficulties and troubles under which the people are now labouring. In speech after speech we always find him setting out all the ills and troubles that exist in the country. Let me assure him that there are many on this side of the house, and indeed I think on all sides, who have just as keen a realization of the actual conditions and just as much sympathy for those who are suffering as he has. It is not a question of realization or of knowledge of what is taking place within the capitalistic system.

I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that there are many men who believe that all is well within the present system under which we are living to-day, but it is not my belief that the people of Canada are ready to scrap that system under which all the progress that we have witnessed in Canada and which has taken place in other countries since the early middle ages has been brought about, and substitute for it something new and untried in the hope that it may bring us better conditions and greater rewards. It is my belief that most of the people of this country are prepared for some changes. I believe that they are prepared to shed those barnacles which have undoubtedly gathered on the ship of capitalism; there is no question of that.

I was rather interested to hear the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) speak of individualism. There is no question that free competition, free individualistic effort, is not the same to-day as it was when men were their own employers, or when an employer had only one or two employees, or when there was ownership management. Free competition and rugged individualism, once it becomes applied in large corporations, too often becomes an engine of destruction rather than an instrument to help make conditions better. There is no doubt in my mind that eventually, and probably very soon, there will have to be some control over these large corporations which to-day find themselves without control of themselves. When you talk of rugged individualism I often think of the workingman arriving at the shop in the morning, being told to hang his hat upon a certain peg, take his place at a certain machine, go through certain operations at a given rate of speed at a certain time of the day, and then return home with his day's work done. Just how much rugged individualism can he apply in that particular job? Whether he is able to carry on or not at the required rate of speed in our modern industrial plants depends entirely on his physique.

Sometimes I also wonder if the man who clips coupons from the bonds that made such a plant possible, a plant that he has possibly never seen, and the products of which are turned out by men that he has probably never seen and certainly does not know—I wonder whether that requires of the bondholder a very great deal of rugged individualism. So far as those who are at the very head of these large industries are concerned, the executives, those who control, to-day and for some years past their individualism depends entirely on their ability to produce dividends. If they cannot do that, they are moved out and someone else takes their place. But that is not the case where there is ownership management, and that is something that will have to be taken into consideration in connection with these large concerns and be corrected.

It is also just as well-known on this side of the house as on the other side or in the corner, that people in industry to-day are not receiving the wages that they should receive to live properly. They are probably receiving all the wages that industry can give and continue to exist, but it is not sufficient to enable the workmen to live properly and carry out those duties and rights that an individual has in this country.

There is another thing that must be faced, and faced soon, by organized society because it is now very evident in every industrial centre, and that is that at the age of forty-five a man to-day is thrown upon the street. I know whereof I speak. In the shops in my own city to-day a man of forty-five years of age has no chance of securing a position, and when a man of that age is in a position, ways and means are found of seeing that he is let out certainly by the time he reaches fifty. These things react upon society because men who have worked a great length of time at one job are not fit for anything else, and when they are thrown out of work they are unable to take care of themselves; for I defy any man to say that at present wages a man can work from the age of twenty to forty-five years and in that time acquire sufficient to take care of himself for the rest of his life. It cannot be done, and that is something which the state, which after all is organized society, will have to take into consideration, and undoubtedly the sooner it is done the better.

I could go on and mention a number of other things that even the return of prosperity as we know it will not right. It is said and believed by everyone here I think that we have reached the ceiling of production in agriculture. We are producing more agricultural products than can be consumed. We are not producing anything like what the land in cultivation and the machinery available will produce. A short time ago I read a statement made in a report, I think of an agriculture committee in the United States, to the effect that fifteen per cent or less of the people of any nation could, if properly organized, produce all the food necessary for the rest of the nation. With these things kept in view there is no doubt that there must be some lopping off and some changes made in the control. But even though these things are facing us I do not think it is necessary to scrap the entire system and to forget all that has been developed down through the ages. We should not throw over all those things which the people stand for and which are based mostly upon natural rights and natural laws. We should not adopt a new system of government such as we hear explained in this house in such a flimsy and cloudy manner. We should not adopt a type of government which cannot effectively be put into operation.

It is said that this government has been a government of laissez-faire, that there has been nothing done. When I hear statements such as the one just made by my hon. friend across the way, that any improvement is due to the policies of Mr. Roosevelt, I sometimes wonder if real attention has been paid to what has been done during the last three years. Surely the changes which have occurred in Great Britain have not been due to Mr. Roosevelt. Surely some credit should be given to this government for the additional markets which were opened up through the imperial economic conference. Surely the higher prices received by the farmers of this country as compared with those received by the farmers in the United States is not due to the policies of Mr. Roosevelt. The farmers of Canada are receiving higher prices for their products than the farmers of the United States where Mr. Roosevelt's policies are being applied. This government had the courage to meet the situation. I am proud to be sitting behind my leader; I am glad to be supporting a government which had the courage to put on such tariffs as were necessary at a time when the whole edifice of this country would have been ruined with the dumping of commodities from other countries. Despite the cry of importers, despite the cry of those who would have gained for the time being through the importation of cheap articles into this country at the cost of our own industries and the exportation of our capital, they saw fit to put on a tariff of sufficient height to provide work within our own country.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Does the hon. member claim that it takes more courage to raise a tariff than it does to lower it?

Mr. MORAND: It certainly takes courage to do it. It took the proper knowledge of conditions as they were and the ability to apply that knowledge rather than paying heed to the popular appeal made at the time.

Surely some credit must be given the government for the fact that during the last few weeks of unprecedented cold not a single person has gone hungry or has suffered from the lack of proper fuel or clothing. I think the government deserves some credit.

Mr. EULER: There is no policy in that.

Mr. MORAND: There is no policy in that?

Mr. DUPUIS: That has been done by the municipalities.

Mr. MORAND: Yes, it has been done by the municipalities, but let me tell my hon. friend of what has occurred in my own municipality. Because of conditions over which they may not have had control or because of the lack of vision at a certain time, there came a time when they were not able to take care of their own people. The dominion and provincial governments then stepped in and they are now paying 100 per cent of the relief. Despite the fact that there are many people who are finding fault, there is not a single person in our town who has gone hungry or suffered from the cold.

Mr. EULER: Does the hon. member mean to say that the giving of relief strikes at the causes of the depression? Is it not merely helping out, the duty of any humanitarian government? It does not strike at the root of the trouble.

Mr. MORAND: There is no question but that it was the duty of the government, but they had the courage to face that duty.

Mr. EULER: You had the support of the whole house in that.

Mr. MORAND: We did not always have the support of the whole house. Your right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) was not always as quick to give that support.

We find that during the eight years that hon. friends opposite were in power and when there was great credit expansion, no control was exercised. This government has had the courage to bring before the house legislation to create a central bank, which will undoubtedly exercise such control as will prevent the large inflations and deflations of credit which have occurred. We find also that the construction of public works is being revived in an attempt to give work to as many as possible. Many of the provinces started such a program but found it was too expensive. It was found that the carrying out of public works and the spending of money did not increase the purchasing power of the country as it should. The matter was allowed to drift, but the government now feels that it is justified in starting a building program in an effort to get as many of our people back to work as possible. We must not forget that the mere spending of money does not increase the purchasing power of the people. For the last three years I have heard my hon. friends in the corner claim that the spending of money on public works would increase purchasing power. So long as the financial institutions of this country continue to call in their credits, all that this would amount to is that the money paid out would be used in the paying of debts and the wiping out of credits. You might spend fifty, seventy-five or a hundred million dollars and not increase the purchasing power by one cent. When the reduction of credit has reached a point where it can go no further, the money spent is distributed throughout the country and the purchasing power is increased.

I should like to suggest to the government that in the carrying out of this program consideration should be given to the possibility of diverting a certain amount of this money in order to buy up stock and provide for loans or bonuses to new industries, industries that are indigenous to the country, industries that will fill a void which we are now having to supply from outside. Perhaps I might give an example; I suggest the sugar beet industry. We import 85 per cent of the sugar we use in this country, and we have land that is capable of growing sugar beets, besides farmers who need that source of employment. We have a market in our own country and the difficulty is to finance such an institution. I would respectfully submit to the government therefore that they think seriously of devoting a certain proportion of that money to the financing of such an industry. It is different from public works. Once an amount of money has been spent to provide employment in the construction of public works, no further work is available; indeed, instead of providing work such a construction is only too often an expense. But when you spend a certain amount of money to assist in the financing of such an industry as I suggest, after the building program is completed there is continuous employment from year to year in the area where the building has been constructed.

I am satisfied that this government fully realizes the situation in Canada; I am satisfied that it is advancing as rapidly as it can in the light of the knowledge it is bound to have, its members sitting as they do on this side; and I am satisfied that the people of Canada are more anxious to see a gradual but steady improvement in conditions, with a gradual change in that part of our system that may be at fault, than they are to see a new order brought about, a new order that might only turn out to be a Frankenstein which will destroy the very ideals they wish to have realized.

I have faith in Canada. I am not quite so much alarmed about the debts of the country as some others whom I hear around me. Let us not forget this fact—that the debts of a country, so long as they are within the country, are the riches of the inhabitants of the country. What we owe within the country is the richness of the country. It is taxable; it is wealth, and is just as much on the credit as on the debit side. Moreover, we have not tapped the natural resources of the country, and in Canada we can create ample wealth. In this dominion, with the knowledge, the education and the science we have at our disposal, we can create all that we need, all that is necessary to make this a real country; and I am convinced that with proper administration, slowly, if you will, but surely, and profiting by the experience we have had in the last few years, not being afraid of changes —and I do not believe for one minute that this government is afraid of changes, for it has given ample evidence that it is not— Canada will come out of the depression completely, as it is coming out to-day better than any other country in the world.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, while I am not able to agree with every statement in the speech from the throne, I do not see in it anything to which I am opposed, any major legislative proposals to which I can object. When the bills embodying the legislation there referred to are presented to the house, differences of opinion about details may arise and we may change our views regarding them, but with the proposals concerning agriculture, silver—I am not sure that I know much about silver—a central bank, the wheat agreement, the agricultural credit question and assistance to the provinces, in principle I am in hearty accord. That is the reason I voted as I did the other day on the straight want of confidence motion, a motion that was purely negative and contained no constructive proposal. For years I have taken the stand in my constituency that I would not support such a motion except when a vote of want of confidence was practically the only way to deal with the question at issue, and especially not when there was before us a definite proposal in the way of a program of legislation.

However, while I agree with these proposals, I do not think they go far enough. I have at times voted on various proposals affecting unemployment, agriculture and debt that I think require attention, and for that reason I intend to support the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). We have heard a great deal in the last four years about depression, and how Canada is pulling through. We have heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) say the banks were—what was it, the sheet anchor of the country? But my impression is that it is the farmers who have been the sheet anchor of the country. I am not saying that I know a great deal about the industrial centres of eastern Canada, but I submit that what has been going on on the farms of the west during the past four years is practically the conscription of the life savings of the farm population of my section of Canada, and that has largely helped Canada to weather the depression as well as she has. It may be a fine thing for an industry or institution to be able to declare dividends under the present circumstances—I do not think it is; there may be a difference of opinion about that—but the people who have been willing to put in ten hours a day working on the land or elsewhere and who have been selling their produce for about half the cost of production and even lowering their standard of living—these are the people who in my opinion have made the major contribution towards enabling Canada to weather the storm of the depression. I do not believe that this lowering of the standard of living is a good thing in itself, but they had to do it; only in this way have they been able to meet the prevailing conditions.

While I agree that there may be difficulties with regard to finance and credits, insurance companies, banks and railways, I do not believe there will be any greater difficulty in adjusting these matters than there has been in the adjustment of the agricultural and farming people to the very trying situation of the last four years.

Unemployment has been pretty well discussed: I will not touch it except to say as to public works, that so long as we do not have to go outside of Canada to obtain material or tools for the purpose, and the works are necessary, I cannot see that we shall impoverish the country by proceeding with them, and we ought to be able to make the necessary financial adjustment to do so.

A great deal has been said as to the public debt and the debt of the national railways, and whether it was increased or decreased during certain years. It is possible, I think, to make a showing as to reduction of debt in various ways, but what we have to deal with in Canada is not merely the railway debt, not merely the debt of the dominion, the provinces or the municipalities, but all debts, including private debts. Under present conditions, where the ordinary industrious farmer in Canada cannot pay his debts or in most cases even his interest, there is need for a tremendous readjustment of price levels.

There is a reference in the speech from the throne to the improvement of prices in Canada, and the suggestion is that it is due to the wheat agreement. I think the improvement in wheat prices in Canada has been due not to a rise in wheat values in the world market so much as to a lowering of the value of money on the North American continent. Other factors may have entered into it, but in my judgment that is the chief one. I believe that by stabilization of a reasonable volume of money in circulation, and by putting back into circulation some of that $900,000,000 that our banks have taken out of circulation in the last four years, we will find means of improving price levels within the Dominion of Canada and so making it possible to come nearer to balancing our budgets and paying our debts with reasonable interest charges thereon.

I am in favour of inflation. I do not believe the statements that have been made in this house against inflation are worth the breath they took to utter. But I do not mean that I am in favour of uncontrolled inflation. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), speaking of inflation a few days ago, referred to Europe. There is no question that inflation in Europe, Germany and Austria, for example, was uncontrolled; money was inflated a hundred thousand times. I think I gave figures last year to show that if we in Canada inflated to the extent they did in Germany a bushel of wheat would be worth something like $700. Great Britain went off the gold standard. She did not go off; she was bucked off. Coming east for this session I remember reading a story about a famous horse called Midnight and the last bucking contest in which it took part. This horse never had been ridden, and the best cowboy they were able to get in a certain part of the United States was thrown in two seconds, though he was supposed to stay on the horse for eight seconds. Great Britain tried very hard to stay on the gold standard. A national government was organized; an election was held, after which the national government held a large majority in the House of Commons. This was all done to keep Great Britain on the gold standard, but within a very short time she was off the gold standard because she could not stay on it. Instead of that being a bad thing for the world, in my judgment it was a good thing; it was the first big step towards reflation, reasonable inflation, and the rise of world price levels. When the United States, under President Roosevelt, undertook to follow that lead in a more vigorous way than Great Britain has undertaken so far, it was another big step towards rescuing the world from a large measure of debt and depression. I think if the government has made one mistake in the last two or three years that is more to be regretted than any other it was the determination to hang on to what was called sound money, to O.K. deflation and refuse to follow Great Britain's lead and go off the gold standard in order to allow a reasonable depreciation or devalutaion of the money in the Dominion of Canada. As we increase the supply of money we decrease its value, just as we do in connection with other things.

I intend, Mr. Speaker, to vote for the amendment, and I also intend to vote for the speech from the throne. According to the rules of the house, that have been drawn up for two parties, that may be quite inconsistent. It may be inconsistent to vote no confidence in the government and then to vote for a measure containing a number of proposals practically all of which I favour. But is that any more inconsistent than it is to vote against the address and then turn around and support the legislation after it is presented in this house? As I said the other day, in connection with these votes you are right and wrong no matter what you do. I intend to do what I think is the common sense thing to do in all the circumstances, in relation to my convictions with regard to the measures proposed.

I am not a lawyer, but I have heard a few constitutional arguments in this house; I have formed some opinions of my own, and I intend to discuss them this evening. The other day the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) went on to discuss the significance of the three recent by-elections, and he added that the government had lost the confidence of the people because of unredeemed promises. During the course of his speech he quoted Mr. Gladstone and Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman as having expressed views which support the position he took the other night when he asked that the government should resign and go to the country. But there has been some change in constitutional practice since the days of Gladstone and Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman. What about the days of the Labour government in Great Britain? I may be wrong, but I do not recall any case when Mr. Gladstone was defeated in the house on a government measure and refused to go to the country. Under Ramsay MacDonald and the Labour party, however, we had votes of that kind time and again in the British house. I remember seeing one newspaper report that stated that the government had been defeated seven times and still did not go to the country. That was a relaxation of the previous constitutional practice.

We have also, Mr. Speaker, Canadian precedents as well as British precedents, and in connection with this very question I should like to quote what the ex-Minister of Justice said in this house. You will remember, sir, that in 1925 we had an election. If I am not mistaken the Liberals went to the country with about 117 members and came back with about 100, and when the house opened the first motion proposed by the then Minister of Justice was the following:

> That in the opinion of this house, in view of the recent general election, the government was justified in retaining office and in summoning parliament, and the government is entitled to retain office, unless defeated by a vote of this house equivalent to a vote of want of confidence.

Then the argument began. I remember how Mr. Meighen jumped into this discussion with all his vigour. Perhaps I had better read Mr. Meighen's amendment:

> That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> In the late general election the candidates of His Excellency's then advisers, at whose instance the appeal to the country was made, were defeated in a large majority of the constituencies,
> That nine ministers of the crown, including the Prime Minister, were rejected at the polls and have no seats in parliament,
> That the party represented in the last parliament by His Majesty's opposition secured in the said election by far the largest support in the popular vote, and has substantially the largest number of members of any party in the present House of Commons.

In discussing the matter the then Minister of Justice said:

> My right hon. friend is one in parliament, as I am one. We are all equal here, and the question whom parliament wants as the executive, the board of control, the cabinet in Canada at the present time, must be decided by members of parliament, not by the cabinet. This being the issue to decide which parliament has been summoned, after we have been charged with being usurpers who have no authority—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lapointe: Then why does my right hon. friend object to having that issue decided?

Mr. Wilson (Wentworth): The people decided it.

Mr. Lapointe: Yes, the people as represented in parliament, not the people of one province or another. The people of all the provinces of the dominion, as represented here by the members whom they have elected, are the judges.

That is perfectly plain. The position he took was simply this, that a government that obtained a majority vote in the house had the confidence of the country. That position was different from the position taken by Gladstone and Campbell-Bannerman, but it was the sensible position to take under all the circumstances, and it is the sensible one to take now.

Mr. HANBURY: You do not want the risk of an election yourself.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): Who in this house wants an election in February or March? If we had a vote of no confidence that defeated the government, would we go to the country without supply and without dealing with any of this legislation? I venture to say there would be conferences right away between the opposition and the government in order that some arrangement might be made to carry on temporarily.

Mr. HANBURY: Why are you going to vote for the amendment, then?

An hon. MEMBER: Who is making the speech?

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I have already explained why.

Mr. SPOTTON: You do not need to explain to them.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I do not mean to be tricked by rules and interpretations of rules made by people with whom I am not in agreement. I will vote for any amendment which appeals to my judgment as having something constructive in it, and something which ought to be taken into consideration by the government of the day.

Mr. McINTOSH: The government are preparing for an election; why not have it?

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): This practice of leaning on Mr. Gladstone who died years ago and on Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, rather than accepting general principles and applying our own common sense to the situation, is a position I cannot take, and I do not intend to be snared by any such argument, regardless of who advances it. I was one of those who supported the position taken by Mr. Lapointe in 1925. I offer no apology for differing with him when he changes his position to-day.

Now then, "the government has lost confidence in the country because of its unredeemed promises". I have listened to the debate; I have heard the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) and I have heard the very excellent propagandist speech of the right hon. gentleman who leads the official opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). What have we got for a Liberal program? Very largely it is the Liberal platform of 1919 with a new date stamp on it. I am not going to say we ought to condemn the Liberal party because it did not carry into effect all the planks in its platform. I am not going to take that position at all. But I do think that some explanation ought to be made as to why, for instance, we are being told to-day that if they come back into office they will give us unemployment insurance. Everybody knows—and I think my friends will understand that I am making this statement because I believe it to be true—that we had fairly good times in Canada between the years 1924 and 1929. Any time Liberals review those years they say, and quite truthfully, that they did certain things—reduced for instance, the public debt, the national railways were prosperous. They say that they had large surpluses. Very well; why was not the country in a financial position to give effect to the promise with regard to unemployment insurance? Why do we have to wait until 1934 and run another campaign on it? At that time we had financial resources; we had the promise of the government in power to carry such a scheme into effect. I submit that question ought to be answered.

I now come to another point. Turning to the paragraph entitled Resolution on Encouragement to Agriculture contained in the booklet issued by the National Liberal Convention of 1919, I find the last clause reads as follows:

> Your committee on agriculture begs to recommend that a special committee be appointed to prepare a resolution upon the banking system of Canada and the adapting of said system to satisfactory loans in connection with land and live stock and to present such resolution to your committee.

There is your intermediate and short term credit. But was effect given to that recommendation? It was not. Governments have within their power that which acts as a great determiner in connection with the balancing of income and the readjustment and equitable distribution of the national wealth, namely, taxation. I do not think we have ever had a government which has really made use of the powers of taxation with a view to redistributing or distributing properly the national income. From the same booklet I find a paragraph entitled Resolution on Financial Condition and Taxation. From that paragraph I shall take the last section, but if any hon. member wishes to hear the rest of it I shall be pleased to give it to him. It is as follows:

That increase of revenue must be sought from an equitable and effective imposition and collection of graduated taxes, on business profits and income, applicable to all incomes above reasonable exemptions.

I call the attention of hon. members to the expression "graduated taxes, on business profits and income." It has been stated that the period of largest profits in the history of Canada was between 1924 and 1929. In the paragraph I have just read we have reference to taxes on business profits and income. Consulting the Canada Year Book for the years 1919, 1922, 1925 and 1929 as to collections under customs taxes, business profits and income I find the following figures:

Year	Customs taxes	Business profits	Income
1919.. ..	$147,169,188	$32,970,062	$ 9,349,720
1922.. ..	105,686,645	22,815,667	78,684,355
1925.. ..	108,146,871	2,704,427	56,248,043
1929.. ..	187,206,332	455,232	59,422,323

But the Liberal party promised a readjustment of taxation so that the indirect taxation falling on the consumers would be lightened. There is no question as to what the platform says about that, because we have the following paragraph from the convention booklet:

Whereas both Great Britain and the United States at present raise more than 80 per cent of their revenue by direct taxation, while Canada raises not more than 20 per cent; therefore be it resolved—

And so on. It would seem that they were going to increase revenue by the business profits tax and by income tax.

So, Mr. Speaker, what we are being offered to-day as a substitute for government policy is very largely what was offered in 1919. I think it will be generally agreed that although reductions were made in the customs tariff during some of those years, notably 1924 and 1926, the general level was not greatly reduced. May I ask, with all due respect, if a new government coming into office to-day would find it easier to reduce tariffs than the government which took office in 1921 with about fifty-one Conservatives in the house and practically the whole of the remaining members pledged to lower tariffs? What about the general trend of tariffs in the world since that time? What about the restrictions—quotas, and so on—which Sir Arthur Salter said were due largely to the wrong operation of the monetary policies of the various countries of the world? We were told very definitely in the speech of the right hon. gentleman who leads the official opposition that what we have of depression in Canada is largely due to the policies of the government. Well, I do not think the right hon. gentleman himself agrees with that statement. In the speech in which he was discussing the C.C.F. resolution moved last year by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) he said this, and I think it is a good thing that that motion was moved because it at least brought this forth:

I remember, at the time the Liberal party appealed for office and was returned to office in 1921, conditions were not unlike those at the present time.

He then goes on to argue what they did when they were returned to power. He says:

And that is exactly what we did, and what happened. After we came into office we reversed in many particulars the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite. They had been raising tariffs, we immediately lowered tariffs. They had been introducing other measures which were restricting trade; we took steps to remove those restrictions, and in a short time, as hon. members know, instead of huge deficits and increased taxation and continued depression this country had for seven years in succession surpluses instead of deficits, reductions in the public debt accompanied by reductions in taxation, and a great increase in trade and employment, with consequent prosperity throughout the dominion.

"We did it"—that was the whole argument. He went on:

I might say that my right hon. friend in the last general election, in opposing the then Liberal administration, adopted very much the same course, only he went a great deal further in what he promised. We were then at the beginning of a part of the present world depression. My right hon. friend stated that it was due to the mistaken policies of the administration. He put it all down to the policies of the administration then in office, and he sought to win the support of the electors by stating that if returned to office he would alter those policies and put others into effect which would end unemployment.

What is the situation? When the Liberal party was in office, "we did it," so far as everything good was concerned, and anything that was open to criticism was put down to the world depression. I ask, what is the difference between their attitude when in office and that of the present government? Exactly the same arguments were advanced by the present Prime Minister when he was leader of the opposition against the Liberals, then in office, as are being advanced by the opposition to-day, and we are being asked to take those arguments seriously! And the same replies came from the other side of the house at that time as come from that side to-day—that the government's policies were responsible for anything good and that the world depression was to blame for anything bad.

Mr. DUPUIS: What are you doing?

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I am going to support all the legislation that I think is in the right direction, and vote against any legislation that I think is not.

Mr. DUPUIS: You criticize—that is all you do.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): No, we have moved an amendment stating what we believe should be done.

With regard to the raising of tariffs, it is said that they were raised because of what had been done in other countries. But there was a strong presumption that the Canada first policy was being used to protect certain people rather than to meet world conditions. That was the impression in the country, that the primary reason for high tariffs was the protection of certain people. I do not know that it is going to be so easy to lower them—certainly no easier than it was in 1921; not so easy, I think.

To hon. members who ask what I want, may I say I want a reasonable inflation. I want a reduction in interest rates, and that can never be done, in my judgment, until the government at Ottawa undertakes to do it. I do not believe that this country can pay eight per cent except in a period of constant and continuous inflation. I believe we require what was mentioned this afternoon, an adjustment of the rewards of industry as between capital and labour, and I see no real constitutional difficulty in doing that, because if the Prime Minister can say to the western provinces, as he did, "Because we are giving you financial assistance we demand that you do so and so," it is just as right for him to say to industry, "Because we are giving you protection we demand that you do so and so in your industries." I maintain that there you have an opportunity to regulate and control by reason of the protection you are giving.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it gives me very great pleasure indeed at the commencement of my few remarks to join with the speakers who have already tendered their congratulations to the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) and the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber), the mover and the seconder of the address. It must have been a source of satisfaction to them to receive the attention which was accorded to them from all sides of the house for their able addresses.

I had not intended to make any observations on the address. After listening to the debate, and reading the addresses that I had not the opportunity of hearing, I felt that the one outstanding fact in all the addresses was that there was practically no criticism whatever of the government with respect to its policy in agriculture. I would be the last person in the house to say that the condition of agriculture in Canada is anything like what we desire it to be, but having regard to the lack of criticism of our agricultural policy I felt that the great majority, nay practically every member of the house with the exception of three or four, has been sufficiently interested in agriculture to follow what has been done by this government by way of policy to assist it, and that their silence was their best appreciation. But after the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) made the sweeping statement that he did, in which he was not followed by any of his supporters except three or four—and may I say that because of the sweeping nature of the statement we paid very little attention to it—I felt that I was warranted in saying a few words if for no other reason than this. I say this in a spirit of kindly criticism of hon. gentlemen opposite, that during parts of the speech of the right hon. leader of the opposition towards the middle of the afternoon there were only twenty-seven of his supporters in their seats in this house. I think we can only take that as an indication that he was not receiving their wholehearted support. I do not think it is fair for hon. gentlemen opposite to give that limited amount of support to their leader, no matter how much they might disagree with him in the views he presented. I felt it rather as a personal thing, the right hon. gentleman being a neighbour of mine, and I can say in his absence that it rather hurt me that he did not receive more support. I would not suggest that hon. members should have remained in their seats for the full four hours and twenty minutes, but surely they could have agreed on a policy of shifts for relieving each other so that at any time there would have been present at least one-third of the membership opposite.

But when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), the leader of the C.C.F. party, moved his amendment to the address, which amendment amounts among other things to practically a motion of want of confidence in the policy of this government in agriculture, I felt that I had no choice but to crave the indulgence of the great majority of the members of the house who had appreciated what had been attempted and done for agriculture, and make at least a few observations for the enlightenment of those who evidently have not been sufficiently interested to acquaint themselves with what has been done for agriculture.

I cannot do better at the outset than to read the statement made by the right hon. leader of the opposition in the course of his speech on the address. I quote from Hansard, page 28, as follows:

> I say the government has not done for agriculture a thing worthy of mention.

And again, referring to the farmers:

> The cost of their clothing, boots and shoes, housing material, farm implements and the like, in fact the cost of everything which enters into production, has been increased.

Both statements are so sweeping that I am sure that everyone who reads them must have been impressed with the thought that the speaker had not given serious consideration to the matter, and that they were the words of a man in desperation. The last statement has been disproved by figures put upon Hansard during this debate by members of the right hon. gentleman's own party. I do not think any hon. member has any doubt as to whether there has been a reduction in the price of clothing, boots and shoes and the implements of production. If he has, all he needs do is to consult his storekeeper or, better still, the catalogues of the large mail order houses.

The right hon. gentleman states that the government has not done for agriculture a thing worthy of mention. He stated that last summer he went through the west and, therefore, had firsthand information as to the condition of the agriculturists in that part of the country. One would have thought that if this matter were so close to his heart it would have been the predominant note in his speeches. I ask the indulgence of the house for a few moments while we go with the right hon. gentleman in his trip through the west. We find his first speech in Winnipeg reported as follows:

> The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation was taking advantage of the discontent at present in the country to present to the people a plan which it claimed would lead to a haven of safety and comfort. But the effect of the plan would be to place the people under the direction of some dictator or dictators. The plan of the Canadian Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is revolutionary in character. It advocates state control of the great industries of the dominion and of Canada's financial organizations. It assumes that state control of everything will result in liberty. In reality the effect will be to destroy liberty.

I should like to repeat part of that statement, and in doing so I am sure it will recall to the mind of every hon. member in the house the speech of the right hon. gentleman during the debate on the address, a speech which lasted for four hours and twenty minutes. I repeat:

> The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation was taking advantage of the discontent at present in the country to present to the people a plan which it claimed would lead to a haven of safety and comfort.

I was in Regina when the right hon. gentleman spoke in that city, and there again he almost breathed words of fire and brimstone against this organization. We will follow him. A report in the Prince Albert Herald, a Liberal paper, in connection with the right hon. gentleman's speech at the "Ridge" picnic, is as follows:

> Two-thirds of the resolutions passed at the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation's conference at Regina can be endorsed by the Liberal party because they embody the principles of liberalism, Mr. King stated.

He is reported as having said at Wainwright on August 10 that "as a matter of fact three-fourths of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation's program was almost identical with Liberal policies." That was within a week. One would naturally expect that in his next speech the percentage would be still higher, but we find that he is following his usual inconsistency. The Winnipeg Free Press, which is not considered a Conservative paper, reports the right hon. gentleman as having said at Wetaskiwin on August 12 that "the whole thing is a sham and delusion." Addressing a number of farmers at Estevan he is reported to have made this statement:

> Had I been Prime Minister of Canada in the last three years you people would not be in the condition in which you are to-day.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia) I was there and he did not make that statement.

Mr. ERNST: You are quite sure he was wrong if he did.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The condition of the agriculturists in Estevan which the right hon. gentleman claimed he would right is best shown by the crops they have harvested. The approximate yield of wheat in the Estevan district in 1930 was six bushels per acre; in 1931, it was almost a complete failure; in 1932, is was six bushels per acre and in 1933, two bushels per acre. I do not think even his most ardent admirers would go so far as to say that the right hon. gentleman could have corrected such conditions. Therefore, he could not have meant that. Even accepting the correction of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McKenzie), that the right hon. gentleman did not say what he is reported to have said, I think it could truthfully be said that had he been prime minister for the last three years the people would have been in a different position. I need no more proof of my argument than the words of the right hon. gentleman in this house which showed his attitude towards relief in the province of Saskatchewan as compared with what has since been done by the present government.

Before dealing further with the right hon. gentleman's remarks, I shall take a few minutes to deal with certain criticisms made by hon. members opposite during this debate. The hon. member for Assiniboia is reported on page 407 of Hansard as follows:

> As a matter of fact, right to-day, although, as the right hon. gentleman mentioned, the hog market in Canada is very good, it can be of no benefit to those people who have no feed for their hogs and cannot fatten them for the market. He did not mention wool. Last year in my constituency wool was selling for from seven to nine cents per pound.

I went to the trouble to look up the prices paid last year for wool, realizing that in the northern part of Saskatchewan a higher price was being paid. I communicated with the Canadian Cooperative Wool Growers Limited in Toronto, and I received the following telegram with reference to the wool market in Saskatchewan:

> Net prices paid to growers southern Saskatchewan their station on main grades of wool follow. Fine staple 14½ cents; fine medium staple 15 cents; fine medium clothing 14 cents; medium staple 14½ cents; medium clothing 13½ cents; low medium staple 12½ cents. Fine medium staple comprised over forty per cent of the clip. Next in order fine staple and medium staple.

Mr. BROWN: What date is that?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): February 9.

Mr. BROWN: 1933?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): 1934. I made my inquiry after the hon. gentleman's statement.

[Mr. Ernst.]

Mr. DONNELLY: What time did the prices cover?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They are the prices paid for the 1933 clip of wool. To make certain that they would be representative I wired to the same association asking them if these were representative prices paid, and what proportion of the wool clip they purchased. This is their reply:

> Toronto, Ontario,
> February 10, 1934.
> Hon. Robert Weir, > Minister of Agriculture,
> Ottawa, Ont.
> Of southern Saskatchewan range wools we handle ninety per cent and about forty per cent of the domestic farm flock wools. Our average price paid net to farmers their station on Saskatchewan farm flock wools twelve to twelve one-half cents. Same average would apply southern Saskatchewan farm flocks. Average price paid range wools southern Saskatchewan fourteen to fourteen one-half cents. Range type wools constitute more than half total wool production southern Saskatchewan and average net price paid range and domestic types together thirteen three-quarter cents.
> Canadian Cooperative Wool Growers Ltd.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Ninety per cent of the wool in my particular part of the country was sold at from seven to nine cents, and smuggled across the line into the United States.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Accepting the hon. gentleman's statement that ninety per cent of the wool in his district was smuggled across the line at seven to nine cents, I can hardly believe that the farmers in his constituency are so wanting in intelligence that when a cooperative organization like the Canadian Cooperative Wool Growers Association is purchasing ninety per cent of the wool at the price they did pay for it—

An hon. MEMBER: They did not.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This is their own statement and I can certainly vouch for it that in our part of the province in the north, where we did not have fine wool sheep, our prices were considerably above from seven to nine cents.

Mr. BROWN: What date?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This is the 1933 clip.

One other statement was made by the hon. member for Assiniboia in which he suggested reciprocity with the United States, and he referred to hogs as one of the items he had in mind. Translating that statement into dollars and cents, for us to have reciprocity with the United States in hogs would mean a loss, based on prices paid in the week ending February 1, of three quarters of a million dollars for that one week. I am sure that no hon. gentleman, seriously concerned about the welfare of the farmers of this country, would suggest that we throw away in one week, for the sake of a fetish, a political argument, a sum of money so considerable as that.

I will now dwell for a few minutes on the argument made by the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) with reference to the price quotations given by the right hon. the Prime Minister in his speech on the address. I checked carefully the prices quoted by the Prime Minister; I was responsible for their preparation, and it is interesting to know that the prices quoted by the Prime Minister were taken from sales tickets of actual sales on comparable markets and comparable quality or grade of agricultural products, agreed upon for years as being comparable in both respects—agreed upon by what is considered in the United States the most reliable authority in that country, the United States Bureau of Animal Industry. The figures quoted by the Prime Minister were, as I stated, actual sales, and they were not extreme top sales but bulk sales. So that it is not necessary with conditions as they are to paint a picture other than is presented by the actual fact of the matter.

In connection with beef prices quoted, if we had taken individual sales—actual sales, not quotations—it would have been a dollar higher or more had we included baby beef; but we did not do that. The hog prices quoted were not extreme tops in hog prices either.

The hon. member for Willow Bunch, speaking with reference to these prices, quoted as his authority the Chicago Tribune and the Winnipeg Free Press. I have taken pains to check the figures in that particular as well, although the two markets are not at all comparable; it would be just as comparable, if not more so, to compare Winnipeg with Toronto or Winnipeg with Montreal as to compare Winnipeg with Chicago, even granting that the prices quoted by the hon. member are not in accordance with the prices that are given for the Chicago market by the United States Bureau of Animal Industry. For example, the hon. member, at page 419 of Hansard, quoted steers from 1,100 to 1,500 pounds, on the Chicago market, at $5.60 to $7.35 and on the Winnipeg market at $4 to $5. The quotation given by the United States Bureau of Animal Industry, so far as the Chicago market is concerned, is $4 to $7.10—lower, both at the bottom and at the top of the scale. For steers 700 to 1,000 pounds the hon. gentleman quoted, on the Chicago market, $5.35 to $7.35, whereas the Bureau of Live Stock Industry gives $3.50 to $7.35. For stockers and feeders, the hon. member quoted, for the Chicago market, $2.25 to $5.25, and the Bureau of Animal Industry gives $2.50 to $5. In each instance the figures given on the authority of the Chicago Tribune fail to tally with the figures given by the United States Bureau of Animal Industry.

Take now the quotations given from the Winnipeg Free Press. For steers, 1,100 to 1,500 pounds, the quotation is $4 to $5; steers, 700 to 1,000 pounds, the price quoted in the Winnipeg Free Press is from $4 to $5. Both these are correct according to actual sales recorded in the markets branch of the Department of Agriculture. Stockers and feeders are quoted in the Winnipeg Free Press, which the hon. member read to the house, at $1.25 to $2.50, and looking up the records of sales on that date—we receive information from the stockyards—we learn that there were no sales of stockers and feeders at all on the Winnipeg stock market on that date.

We have calves quoted by the hon. member, so far as Chicago is concerned, at from $2.50 to $7.50, and in Winnipeg, $2 to 7. The actual top sale in Winnipeg on that date, and it was an actual sale, was $7.50, while in Toronto on the same date it was $9, although in Chicago it was $7.50.

As regards lambs, the figures given for Chicago by the hon. gentleman are $5.75 to $9, and for Winnipeg, $3 to $5.50. There were no lambs sold in the Winnipeg stock yards on that date. For good lambs, the figures the hon. gentleman gave from the Chicago Tribune were $8.75 to $9 in Chicago, and the Winnipeg price he quoted was $5.50. There were no lambs of any kind sold on the Winnipeg stock yards on that date. Quoting from the Chicago Tribune, the hon. member gave, for sheep, prices of $2 to $7.75, and in Winnipeg $1 to $2. There were no sheep sold on the Winnipeg stock yards on that date. I will leave it to hon. members if they require better proof of the weakness of any opinion against the agricultural policy of this government, when to make a case resort has to be had to such statements as that to which I have referred.

The hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) in connection with the wheat agreement made this criticism—

Mr. DONNELLY: Does the hon. minister mean to say that those prices were not in the Chicago Tribune or the Free Press?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member cannot have heard me. I made it very clear that these prices he gave were quoted from the Chicago Tribune and the other prices from the Winnipeg Fress Press.

Mr. DONNELLY: And the papers were wrong? Why blame me for it? Write to the papers and see if they are wrong.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am not blaming the hon. gentleman for it.

Hon. members on the opposite side of the house said that this wheat agreement was all wrong, that there should not be this restriction in wheat acreage. I do not intend to go into the question of the wheat agreement, or to come to the defence of Mr. McFarland, who is operating on behalf of the western wheat pools; that was done very thoroughly the other night by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens); but I would like to say that we have on record statements by the premiers of the three prairie provinces, irrespective of the political party to which they belong, that this was a very essential step to take. The wheat pools of western Canada, which certainly represent a very large number of wheat farmers, have also put themselves on record as being in favour of this agreement. The grain trade, which has a vital interest in the marketing of our wheat, has also put itself on record as being in favour of it. I do not think it necessary to say more. I feel that we are in good company, certainly in the company of a very goodly majority as against the opinions of two or three hon. members who perhaps have reasons, other than the advantage of the wheat farmers, for criticizing the agreement.

I have read to the house the statement made by the right hon. leader of the opposition on his trip to western Canada, that he went there to study agricultural conditions first hand. I was in the west at the time the right hon. gentleman came there, and I think I am giving an honest and representative opinion of what people in the west expected with reference to that visit, namely that there was coming to the west in the person of the right hon. gentleman one who had had such an opportunity as is given to few men in this dominion, one who in the capacity of Prime Minister for nine years had the opportunity of studying international finance, international trade and international relationships at a time when the world was prosperous, when things were certainly much nearer normal than they have been since. Equipped with that experience, he had had three years in the seclusion of Laurier House or his farm in the Gatineau hills to study conditions during the years that have elapsed since this government came into power. Was it then not reasonable that people in western Canada should expect from a gentleman with those advantages, in comparison with others who had been entrusted with the administration of government for a very limited time, some practical, some definite suggestions of a constructive nature to help our country at the present time? But I challenge the right hon. gentleman or any hon. member of the house to state one specific constructive idea that he gave. He stated, as has been his custom, that he advocated wider markets, lower tariffs; but I think the majority of farmers in the west at least feel that there is no citizen in the Dominion of Canada who should keep a more absolute and stricter silence on the question of wider markets and tariffs as far as agricultural products are concerned than the right hon. gentleman himself. For nine years as Prime Minister of this country he saw market after market in country after country absolutely closed in many cases to the agricultural products of this country, markets that were free when he took office but around which tariff walls were put up that made it impossible for the agricultural products of this country to get in. Yet he came to the west and talked of wider markets, throwing out the inference that if he were in office now he would assure wider markets and lowering of tariffs. The only tariffs the right hon. gentleman could lower are the tariffs of this country, and to lower our tariffs would certainly not widen the markets for our agricultural products.

To show still further the inconsistency of the right hon. gentleman on that tour I will quote from a paper whose favourable attitude towards the Liberal party I think no person in this house will dispute. The right hon. gentleman after that tour came east. He went to the Liberal summer school at Port Hope. That he was assiduous in his attendance is stated by the Leader Post of Regina in its issue of September 11, 1933. The report says:

> Two speakers addressed the final session, which was presided over by Hon. Vincent Massey, former minister to Washington. The second of the addresses was delivered by Rt. Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Liberal leader, who summed up the work of the conference. Mr. King had been in close attendance upon all the lectures and round table discussions for the whole period of the proceedings.

Yet in the Leader Post of September 6, 1933 we have this statement:

> (By Canadian Press)
> Port Hope, Ontario, September 6.
> What immediate action could be adopted to increase Canada's exports, particularly of wheat, was canvassed at Tuesday's session of the round table on tariffs at the Liberal summer conference here. At the end of the discussion, however, when everything from reciprocity to free trade had been discussed, no suggested solution was forthcoming.

The right hon. gentleman went through the west and gave the impression that if he were in power there would be wider markets and lowering of tariffs, yet at this meeting, where they were assembled for days with the best brains of the Liberal party in this dominion, and I believe some imported brains from outside the dominion, and with nothing else to engage their attention, they admitted, according to the report of their own paper, that there was nothing they could do to get wider markets other than what had been done and was being done by the present government.

I have taken longer than I had intended in this part of my address. I will now deal for a few minutes with the situation in respect to agriculture as we found it when taking office in 1930.

Tariffs had been raised in practically all countries of the world to protect their own agricultural industries, notably in Germany, France, Italy and the United States. The surplus of bacon and butter that had been going from Denmark to Germany, France and Italy, also the surplus from New Zealand and Australia, being turned away from its accustomed market, had to flow into some market from which it was not shut out by tariff walls. The result was a greatly increased flow of agricultural products into the one free market of the world, that of the United Kingdom. That had such a depressing effect on the United Kingdom market that farmers were practically put out of business overnight and the world market was depressed out of all proportion to what had been the case previously.

In addition to that we in Canada had to face a condition that arose during the last year hon. gentlemen opposite were in office. By one action alone, the raising of the United States tariff against our cattle, about 145,000 head of cattle annually were shut out from the United States market. In 1929 Canada exported over 250,000 cattle to the United States, but their tariff was put up during the time hon. gentlemen opposite were in office to such an extent that only relatively few cattle could be shipped to that country. That great stream of cattle was turned back year after year for us to market somewhere else. Yet we hear hon. gentlemen opposite speak of wider markets.

In the east a similar condition arose in regard to a different commodity. For many years a great milk and cream trade had been growing up between the farmers of the eastern part of Ontario, the eastern townships of Quebec and the maritimes, and the United States, to such an extent that in 1927-28 the flow of milk and cream to the United States was sufficient to have produced 52,000,000 pounds of cheese. Imagine, then, the result of a tariff being placed against that milk and cream, turning back into the home market an additional 26,000,000 pounds of butter or, in terms of cheese, 52,000,000 pounds of cheese. Those were just some of the legacies from the previous administration with which we had to grapple when we came into power.

During the election campaign it was stated that if returned to power we would take steps immediately to give the Canadian market to the Canadian farmer. That has been done so far as it is possible for us to do it by tariff and other means. During the short session of 1930 duties were imposed to shut out the agricultural products of the United States and other countries that were coming in here and displacing our own products. If anyone has any doubt as to whether or not that action was appreciated by the fruit and vegetable growers, and as to whether or not they considered that they were given a better and wider market, I should like to read some communications that have been received from farm associations which have no political tendencies at all. I quote Mr. James E. Johnson, manager of the Norfolk Fruit Growers' Association, Simcoe, Ontario:

> The policy of the government in regard to the fixing of fair market values for fruits and vegetables has been of considerable benefit throughout the whole season in the marketing of the apple crop.

Mr. MacDonald, president of the British Columbia Fruit Growers' Association, states in part:

> The greatest stabilizing influence upon the marketing activities of the growers during the past season was the establishing of the fair market values by the Dominion government; it enabled the growers to market crops which previously rotted in orchards and gardens. It is estimated that $184,000 had been saved by the fruit growers of the province which otherwise would have been lost had the growers been compelled to meet the competition from the United States.

Mr. Somerset, chairman of the Ontario Marketing Board, states:

> The establishing of the fair market value saved the Ontario growers from receiving ruinously low prices during the past season and prevented the marketing situation from becoming a chaotic condition and prices from dropping much lower than were realized.

These are typical communications. To show the extent to which the action of this government gave a wider market to Canadian fruit and vegetable growers I should like to put on Hansard the record of carload arrivals of seven of the chief commodities on twelve principal domestic markets:

	1930 Carloads	1931 Carloads	Increase
Apples	3,032	3,476	444
Celery	190	235	45
Grapes	72	350	278
Lettuce	15	27	12
Onions	617	886	269
Pears	52	59	7
Plums	9	12	3

The converse of the picture is given in regard to imported carloads of the same seven commodities:

	1930 Carloads	1931 Carloads
Apples	476	436
Celery	810	405
Grapes	1,056	541
Lettuce	1,304	862
Onions	725	431
Pears	515	415
Plums	96	58

In each case there was an increase in domestic carload shipments and a corresponding decrease in carload importations.

Mr. DUPRE: Has the minister the total importations of these various products?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, I have not.

Then, Mr. Speaker, having given the Canadian farmer the benefit of the home market the Ottawa agreements gave the Canadian farmer the advantage of a protected market in the United Kingdom. I think perhaps the result of the Ottawa agreements can be best shown by a statement that was made by R. G. Phillips, Secretary of the International Apple Shippers' Association, of Rochester, New York, on the export apple situation:

Re export developments in Canada and the United States:

From the 1928-29 season to April 1, to the 1932-33 season to April 1, the records show as follows:

Canada gained 38 points; the United States lost 38.6 points. Canada has been broadening her field by reciprocal trade treaties and free entry into Great Britain, while United States outlets are being rapidly curtailed.

Canada is broadening her export markets by commercial treaties including Germany, France et al, and under the Ottawa accord, while the United States sits by and sees its markets curtailed. That curtailment will be more pronounced from now on, unless something is done.

Re Economic conference agreements and exchange situation:

The net result of these trade barriers and disruptions was that United States' exports of apples to Great Britain (our best customer) declined 38 per cent this present season to April 1, 1933.

The following is a statement with reference to the export of American apples sold in the United Kingdom. During the current fiscal year to January 4, 1934, 1,629,639 barrels of Canadian apples have been sold in the United Kingdom as compared with 700,512 barrels for the corresponding period of last year, and 1,600,003 boxes as compared with 1,442,361 boxes last year, increases of 133 per cent and 11 per cent respectively. On the other hand, 283,942 barrels and 949,380 boxes of United States apples have been disposed of on this market, as compared with 785,210 barrels and 1,389,450 boxes last season, reductions of 64 per cent and 32 per cent respectively.

In addition to the wider markets we obtained for our fruit growers under the Ottawa agreement I have something further which will be of interest. A tariff agreement with Germany providing a reduction in duty on Canadian apples, effective January 1, 1933, has had a wonderful effect on Canadian shipments to that country. The total shipment to Germany of our apples from April 1, 1933, to January 3, 1934, was 47,350 barrels compared with 843 during the preceding fiscal year.

To-night I had intended to deal only with markets, but I must say in addition to this widening of markets for our fruit growers we have carried on a very active campaign against the inroads made by apple maggots in the infested orchards of Nova Scotia and Ontario.

Mr. VALLANCE: Would the minister permit a question? In giving the exports of the Canadian products to the United Kingdom, has he now in front of him information showing the exports of ham and bacon as arranged under the Ottawa agreements? We are allowed 2,500,000 hundredweight. How much have we taken advantage of?

Mr. BENNETT: Thirty-six per cent.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If it will be acceptable to the hon. member may I say I will deal at a later time with the Ottawa agreements with reference to a wider market for our bacon. As the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) knows we have a right to ship into the market of the United Kingdom free of duty 280,000,000 pounds in any one year.

Mr. VALLANCE: Of what?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Of bacon.

Mr. VALLANCE: 2,500,000 hundredweight?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, or 280,000,000 pounds. During the first year that the agreement has been in force there has been shipped all that is available for export of the right quality, slightly over 70,000,000 pounds.

Now for a few moments I should like to deal with one other of our chief agricultural commodities, namely butter. When this government took office the butter situation in Canada was as follows: Millions of pounds had been shipped into Canada from the dominions of Australia and New Zealand. On top of that our milk and cream, as I said before, had been turned back from the United States so as to increase the production of our dairy products to the extent of about 26,000,000 pounds more butter or 52,000,000 pounds of cheese. The right hon. leader of the opposition has stated that if he were returned to power one of his objectives would be to put the tariff back to the point where it was when he went out of office. That would mean that at the present time the duty against New Zealand and Australian butter would be from one-half cent to one cent per pound. If that were true, making all allowance for extra freight and handling charges butter could have been shipped into this country from New Zealand in April last for a little over twelve cents per pound. It is a very simple matter to follow that back and to find what price would have been quoted for butter fat to the farmer living inland. To ascertain what the result would have been we will take one week, namely that ending April 15, 1933. The price of No. 1 butter in Montreal ranged from 30½ to 31 cents per pound. For the month of April, 1933, Australian finest quality, which is comparable to Canadian butter, averaged in London 12·46 cents per pound. Allowing for one cent duty that butter could have been laid down for 13·46 cents, or a difference of 17·29 cents per pound less than the price our butter was bringing in Montreal. Applying this to the approximate production of 5,500,000 for one week represents a loss of $950,950. That is the effect of the statement made by the right hon. leader of the opposition. If his statement were put into dollars and cents instead of remaining, as it stands, a more or less theoretical statement, it would have cost the producers of Canada in the one week in April of 1933 which I have mentioned a little short of $1,000,000. That is for butter alone.

The hon. member for South Battleford has raised a point as to the effect of the Ottawa agreement in our bacon and hog industry. As a result of the Ottawa agreements the Canadian farmer received an advantage over the farmers outside the empire. That advantage consisted of the right to ship into the United Kingdom in any one year 280,000,000 pounds of bacon. That means that his bacon would be accepted without duty, and he would be selling on exactly the same terms as would the British farmer. The British government as a result of an extensive campaign investigated thoroughly the whole hog situation of the United Kingdom and decided they would have to take some steps, no matter how drastic, to raise the price of bacon in the United Kingdom to a point where it would be possible for an efficient farmer at least to earn a livelihood. Roughly what they had in mind was raising the price of bacon to eighty-five shillings per hundredweight, and they were dealing with bacon comparable in quality to that produced in Canada—and may I state in passing that the hundredweight is 112 pounds. That was made very clear at the time the Ottawa agreements were discussed in the house. It was known to every intelligent member that that was the intention of the British government. Believing that they would carry out their intention, the result could be only this: the price of hogs in Canada was bound to go up, and to go up at least double what it had been previously. That would have been the case had they carried out their intention of raising the price to eighty-five shillings per hundredweight of 112 pounds.

Hon. members in the house and out of the house, and particularly Liberal members in western Canada, knowing that the price was going to go up, through their speeches, did almost everything in their power either by omission or commission, to discourage the farmers from going into hog raising. As farmers, they knew that at least ten or twelve months would be required before any man beginning to raise hogs would have a product ready for the market. Knowing that, nothing has so much incensed me since I took office as to find that men should, through what must have been purely fanatical, political prejudice, stand in the way of their fellow farmers selling their oats and barley through the marketing of hogs for at least fifty cents a bushel instead of selling them, as they must do otherwise, for twenty-five or twenty-six cents a bushel.

Immediately after the Ottawa agreements were made I visited Toronto, where I had called a meeting of all the provincial ministers of agriculture and the experts from all agricultural colleges and provincial departments of agriculture so that without loss of time we could immediately make available all the information in front of us and send it out to the different parts of Canada so that the farmers could prepare to take the greatest possible advantage of the offer contained in the agreements. I would much rather be in the position I am in, having done that and having worked in season and out of season since to improve the quality of our bacon and hogs and to encourage the farmers to obtain the right quality, than be in the position of those people who through lack of support are responsible for the farmers in Canada from the east to the west losing the millions of dollars that they are losing now because these people were not frank enough to bury their political prejudices and tell the farmers of the advantage that was being offered them.

To show how serious the United Kingdom has been in the matter of raising the price of their bacon, I will give some of the restrictions that they have placed on the importation of bacon from foreign countries. The first restriction that they placed on the importation of bacon from foreign countries was 15 per cent. That did not have very much effect because Denmark, Sweden and other countries that exported to the United Kingdom, realizing that such action was going to be taken, dumped all their available bacon into the United Kingdom market. That left a great load on that market which had first to be lifted before any effect of the restriction could be felt. The Danes went further. They cut away the poorer parts of their bacon so that they could get entry into the United Kingdom market of a greater quantity of their highest class product.

In November, 1932 the government of the United Kingdom imposed a restriction of 15 per cent against the countries that had been exporting bacon to the United Kingdom market. The successive restrictions were as follows:

Successive restrictions on foreign bacon imports into Great Britain

Date	Additional per cent	Total to date per cent
November 1932 . . .	15	15
February 1933. . .	2½	17½
March 1933. . . .	2½	20
April 1933. . . .	2½	22½
May 1933.	2½	25
June 1933.	2½	27½
July 1933	2½	30
August 1933. . . .	2½	32½
September 1933. . .	10	42½
October 1933 . . .	—	42½
November 1933 . . .	16	58½

That is, one year after they decided to take this action of shutting out bacon from the United Kingdom market to raise the price of bacon, they had put on restrictions amounting to 58½ per cent. At first, because of the large quantity of bacon in England, the effect of the restriction was very slight, but we see that as it has been increased it has reached a point where it is now in a very fine balance, with the result that a week ago there was a very big rise in the price of bacon in the United Kingdom. If anyone has any doubt as to the relationship between the Ottawa agreement and the advance in the price of bacon in this country, all they have to do, and I shall be glad to supply the information, is to look at the restrictions that have been made and the increase in the price that has taken place in the United Kingdom as a result, and the corresponding increase in the price in this country almost step by step, while in other countries like the United States, which have not the advantage of this sheltered market, the price has not gone up to the same extent. In fact, it went down, although recently it has been going up.

I would like, in conclusion, to say this for those who are interested in the hog industry and in agriculture in Canada. We have been able to arrange with the packers throughout Canada during the past year that they will accept an off-type sow from the farmer and give him in exchange a gilt of the desired select bacon type, if one is available. So there is very little excuse for any farmer not having the proper type of breeding stock. To show the result of this policy and the improvement that has taken place in the hog industry I should like to give a few figures, and I quote them for one reason in particular. We so often hear the criticism in the east that we are going to get the western farmer interested in raising hogs, and that he will raise hogs that will be of an inferior type, with the result that it will have a depressing effect on the market, that these hogs will come on our market here and thereby counteract all the effort they have put into the production of a good quality hog. Reports have been sent out descriptive of the hogs in western Canada. I refer to one article by an agricultural writer in the Winnipeg Free Press which has seemed to percolate all through the east and given a very false impression of what is taking place in the west in the quality of our hog production. The write-up is descriptive of a number of carloads of hogs shipped from the west to Montreal, and the statement is made that not half of one per cent of these hogs representative of the west are select bacon and less than ten per cent are bacon. But the actual standing of the quality of our western hogs is shown by these figures which I will put on Hansard:

	Select bacon	Bacon	Select bacon	Bacon
	per cent		per cent
Alberta	6·05	21·04	7·93	32·56
Saskatchewan.	5·10	17·07	11·86	32·96
Manitoba . . .	14·40	26·46	17·17	41·35

It will be seen that the percentage of select bacon from Saskatchewan more than doubled in 1933 as compared with 1930, and that Manitoba increased its select bacon and bacons in the same years by 45 per cent. So the eastern farmer has no cause to worry about the quality of hogs that are produced in western Canada. Farmers are taking hold of this hog production in a very serious way and are giving every attention to producing the right quality.

One thing I omitted to mention in connection with wheat. At the country elevator we have taken from the farmer's load of wheat a sample which is put into an envelope on which the farmer writes his own name and the kind of wheat that he thinks he has grown. Our officials have then planted it on experimental farms and other plots of ground that have been available to us, and on a certain field day at which experimental farm officials are present these farmers gather at these plots and see, in comparison with others, the quality of wheat they are seeding and growing. It was found out that in some localities that have produced the greatest quantities of wheat, thirty-five per cent of the wheat sown was not considered of a sufficiently pure strain to make it suitable for seed. Realizing the importance, especially at this time when there is such keen world competition in wheat, of having the highest quality wheat possible —it is no good to tell the farmer that his wheat is not of the right quality and that he must raise a better quality if he has not the money to purchase a higher grade of wheat— we have been successful in arranging with the elevator companies in the west to "special bin" wheat from farms which it is shown by the growing tests produce a purer sample. They are to give bushel for bushel of that wheat for wheat that is not of the same degree of purity. Without costing this government a cent there is being put at the disposal of the farmers without cost a wheat of purer quality. This should improve our western wheat and give us a still greater advantage in the markets of the world.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is that now in effect?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It has been in effect since I came east in September.

I regret that I have not taken the time to go into these points more fully. I think hon. members will admit that the statement of the right hon. gentleman that this government has not done a single thing worthy of note or mention to help agriculture leaves them staggered as to the reason for his making that statement. They must realize that he must be completely out of touch with agriculture and knows nothing of the assistance given to that industry by this government. Either that, or he is in such a mood of desperation, as I stated at the outset, that he feels he must damn and condemn everything. He is reported as having stated at Winnipeg that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation's plans must be viewed with gloom. With the kindliest possible feelings I suggest that the tenor of his speech must have been due to a very gloomy environment. He should try to get about him a more cheerful atmosphere, and to assist him in that I undertake the pleasant task of recommending a subscription to the Prince Albert Herald. I am sure he will admit that this is a Liberal publication, but it paints a different picture from that which he gave the house. With the indulgence of the house I should like to quote from an editorial which appeared in this paper on January 4 of this year. I might mention that Prince Albert is situated in the centre of one of the finest agricultural districts in Canada and is the constituency represented by the right hon. gentleman. The editorial reads:

> Government figures show that Canadian trade within the British Empire and with foreign countries is increasing. It is in much greater volume than was the case of a year ago. This suggests that in the larger sphere of international business the tide is turning in a manner that will mean eventual disappearance of the more intense disabilities of unemployment and commercial stagnation that have been paramount during the last three years.

I shall not read it all, but the concluding sentence reads:

> It is certain, however, that the general outlook has improved materially.

Another editorial dated January 18, 1934, just a week before the right hon. gentleman made his four-hour speech, is entitled Encouraging Factors and reads:

> A year ago farmers were receiving twenty and a half cents a bushel for number two wheat delivered at the elevators here. Yesterday the price for the same grade locally was forty-four and a half cents. In drought areas, where no crop was harvested, this price betterment would not have the significance that it has in this part of the province where a fair crop was harvested last fall.

The concluding paragraph reads:

> The recent improvement in wheat prices, the prospect that this will continue, the fact that farmers in this area are able to take advantage of the price betterments, and lastly, the fact that bank clearings are displaying a buoyancy lacking a year ago, are encouraging signs.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, the amendment submitted to the house reads:

> We respectfully regret that Your Excellency's present advisers have not taken such steps as are necessary to deal adequately with unemployment, to reduce the burden imposed by the public debt, and to put the agricultural industry on a basis that will insure to the farmer a decent standard of living.

This amendment is proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and seconded by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner). If the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation had always had such sentiments, I would have agreed with them all along. I am in full accord with what they say in this amendment.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) has just completed an attack upon my revered and respected leader. There is a difference between us on this side of the house and hon. gentlemen on the other. We respect and revere our leader but we do not worship him. He is not a superman; he is human, and that is why we like him. Being a human being, he may make mistakes at times. But the electors of Mackenzie, to whom the Minister of Agriculture spoke several times, said that my leader was right when they elected his candidate by a substantial majority. I am sorry to see the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) leaving the chamber, as I shall have something to say about him later on. Tell a page to tell him that I intend to speak about him. The electorate of this country have decided that my leader is worthy of the confidence of the people. The electors of Mackenzie did not believe what was said by the Minister of Agriculture but they endorsed fully the stand taken by the opposition. The same thing happened in Restigouche-Madawaska. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) spoke there. We spoke also and I am glad that the electors in that constituency believed what was said by the members of the opposition, led by our right hon. leader. They believed in them.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): No.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Smith) should keep quiet, as Restigouche-Madawaska is next to his constituency. He should take a good look at the ceiling of the chamber for he will never see it again after the next elections. The same thing happened in Yamaska. The Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) went there but the people did not believe in him. The electors of Restigouche-Madawaska did not believe what was said by my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré). The Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) was there also but the government has since shipped him to Cairo. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) spoke in that constituency, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) was there also; we were all glad to give our support to the hon. member who was elected in that constituency. He is an asset to this house, as is the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. MacMillan). Their election shows the popular confidence in the opposition. Our stand in the west is the same as our stand in the east; we tell the truth to the people.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member should behave when I refer to the judgment passed upon the policies of this government by a neighbouring constituency. The reason for the laughter of the hon. gentleman is his gross ignorance. He knows nothing and that is why he laughs.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has no right to use such language when referring to another member. He should not allege ignorance on the part of an hon. member, and I ask him to withdraw his remarks.

Mr. POULIOT: For the words "gross ignorance" I will substitute the words "encyclopaedia of general knowledge."

It seems to be forgotten by this government that the trade between Great Britain and the dominions is only nine per cent of the world trade, and when this government, or the Prime Minister alone, raised the tariff at the first special session in 1930, a wall was erected around this country—a wall which has proved a great obstacle to trade. From that time matters got increasingly worse until finally the right hon. gentleman realized that countries are like individuals, that no country is self-sufficient. Then he called the Ottawa conference. It is a mistake, sir, to take an isolated—

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: If there is a doctor in the house I would ask him to assist the member for Victoria-Carleton; he is groaning. Let us take an isolated item like a case of canned salmon or lobster, for instance. Suppose a merchant has not sold anything for weeks, and has no revenue coming in; the moment he sells a case of canned salmon or lobster, or for that matter anything else, if it is only a dollar, he says he has a favourable balance of trade. We should not take all the items separately; rather, we should take them as a whole. Let us take the items that relate to the basic products and basic industries, from the standpoint of exports and imports, and from the standpoint of home consumption. Canada, so far as trade is concerned, can be compared to a departmental store, with two thousand departments, in which the Prime Minister is floorwalker from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Now, in order to ascertain whether the business of a store is good we have to take the purchases and sales in each department and then add them all together. Then we look at the general result.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: I will not do that for the two thousand departments of the store of which the Prime Minister is floorwalker—he suffers from travelitis—but I will take one by one the items which the right hon. gentleman disclosed in summaries in his famous speech on October 12, 1932.

Before I go on to that however perhaps I might say one word in reply to the argument put forward by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir, Melfort). He said that our markets were closed before the Liberal party left office, and that his party found closed markets when they assumed power. Well, I will make my comparison between the year 1930, during half of which the Liberal party was in office, the Conservative party being in office the rest of the time, and 1933. And here let me quote once more the opinion of a gentleman who is no child in the Conservative party—the right hon. the leader of the Senate. On April 8, 1926, that right hon. gentleman made the following statement, as reported in Hansard of that year, page 2253:

Mr. Ross (Moose Jaw): You contend that if the tariff is taken off the prices immediately rise?

Mr. Meighen: We contend it and we know it, because we see the facts.

This was what a former leader of the Conservative party said in the House of Commons in 1926, and he had the support of other gentlemen. I might mention the present Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion):

Mr. Manion: . . . If you take off the tariff you raise the prices of goods.

The tariff was raised unduly by the Prime Minister and his government, regardless of the question of prices. Mr. Meighen himself, and the Minister of Railways—he was not a minister then, and probably could speak more freely—said that if you take off the tariff you raise the prices of goods. The reverse is also true: If you increase the tariff you lower the prices of goods.

Now let us consider textiles, comparing exports in 1933 with those of 1930. In 1933 more manufactured cotton to the extent of $275,000, was exported. There was an increase of $1,280,000 in the export of raw wool and there was a total loss of $345,952 in the export of manufactured woollens. There was a loss of $622 in the export of raw flax and hemp, and a total loss of $9,920 in the export of manufactured flax and hemp, while there was a net increase of $1,199,313. The Minister of Agriculture spoke about wool. What was the external trade in woollen yarns? In 1930 it was $6,916,000, and in 1932, $6,800,000, or a decrease of $116,000. There was a decrease in the export of woollen yarns, the only increase being in the export of woollen cloth, but it did not help the farmer directly. In 1930 the figure of production was $10,313,788, and in 1932 it was $9,090,819, or a loss of $1,222,969 in 1932. Then let us take some other commodities:

Tobacco

1933 exports compared with 1930

Increase in home consumption in 1932-33 over 1930-31, 2,217,477 pounds.

Mr. GOTT: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. POULIOT: After I am through.

Mr. GOTT: I merely want to ask—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member who has the floor does not choose to allow the question, it may not be asked.

Mr. POULIOT:

Canned Pears

Foreign countries	847,851 less
Increase	$2,050,494

Decrease in home consumption in 1932-33 compared with 1931-32, 1,209,934 barrels.

We exported fresh apples to the extent of a little more than $2,000,000 more than in 1930, but on the other hand the Canadian people consumed 1,209,000 barrels less. What is the benefit of that? What is the use of the Ottawa agreements in regard to fresh apples if we eat so much less than we did before, although we export more than we did before?

(b) Dried apples—

To British Empire	$ 39,796 more
Foreign countries	186,878 less
Total loss	$ 147,082

1932	2,791,029

As to bacon and hams, I refer the house to Hansard of Tuesday last. I will just say that in 1932 there was an increase in production of 15,000,000 pounds over 1930 and a decrease in value of $7,901,000; and the price of bacon and ham per hundredweight in 1930 was $24, and in 1933, $11.

Eggs in shell

1933 exports compared with 1930

Increase $ 352,507

Average price of eggs per dozen 1930, 37 cts; 1933, 21 cts.

Decrease in home consumption in year 1932-33 compared with 1930-31, 45,959,763 dozen.

With regard to cattle, there was an increase in exports of $271,000.

Dressed beef

1933 exports compared with 1930

(a) Quantity in cwts.—

Increase 17,012 cwts.

(b) Value—

Decrease $ 672,534

Average price per cwt, 1930, $15.70; 1933, $5.83.

Decrease in home consumption in year 1932-33 compared with 1930-31, 89,161,967 pounds.

As to sheep, lambs and mutton I refer the house to Hansard of Tuesday, but I am very sorry the Minister of Agriculture has reduced his staff of men who look after the raising of sheep and hogs. He tells the farmers: "You should have better products," but he takes away the assistance. I made a complaint about that and wrote to the minister on behalf of the agricultural societies of my constituency, and a long time after I received an answer from his secretary saying that he would look into the matter. But these men have never been reinstated, and they are necessary if the farmers are to have good stock.

As to leather I refer to Hansard of last Tuesday, and the same as to dairy products.

Coming to tomatoes, the exports of canned tomatoes in 1933 show an increase over 1930 of $274,017, but the production in 1930 amounted to 3,389,549 cases, while in 1932 it amounted to only 1,483,266 cases, a decrease of 1,906,283 cases. In 1930 the total value was $7,369,790, while in 1932 it was only $2,588,695, a decrease of $4,781,095. Would it not be better to maintain that value of $7,369,790 than have an export surplus valued at $274,017?

Now we come to grain. On October 12, 1932, at pages 132, 134 and 135 of Hansard, the Prime Minister spoke of grain. He said:

Canada's production of barley could be tremendously increased through the breaking of new land and the substitution of barley for other grains on presently cultivated land. It is essential that Canada widen her market for this product. The 10 per cent preference which is secured to us will assist in improving Canada's competitive position in the United Kingdom market.

And again:

You are all aware that our flour industry has suffered a serious decline, due to tariff walls erected against us by foreign countries, import restrictions and the like. This gives the preference an especial relative value which is already reacting to the benefit of the Canadian wheat producers. Not only does the increase in the sale of Canadian flour widen the Canadian wheat market, but Canadian flour is most important in promoting the direct sale of Canadian wheat. Our secured place in the British flour market means that British domestic millers can only compete with the Canadian flour if they use Canadian wheat standards.

And again:

. . . The preference, it is agreed, will substantially increase the purchase of Canadian wheat by British importers. When this, the greatest of all the markets is secured, the problem of finding markets in other countries for the balance of our exportable surplus is proportionately lessened. When we have secured world markets sufficient to absorb our exportable surplus, our wheat in world markets will as a result enjoy a price which is more in keeping with the cost of production and the standards of living of our farmers in this country. Furthermore, it should be borne in mind that a preferential position in this market will be of immense advantage to Canada in maintaining our great wheat growing areas while world sources of supply are being compelled to adjust their acreage to market requirements.

He was not then in favour of reducing acreage. The value of wheat flour decreased by $41,332,592 in 1932 as compared with 1930

I come now to timber products. Unmanufactured wood decreased by $171,000,000 in 1932 as compared with 1930; pulp decreased by $57,943,419; paper products decreased by $71,751,802, or a total decrease of $300,837,758. Vegetable oils showed an increase in production of 9,257,179 pounds, but the increase in value amounted to only $149,807. The production showed a decrease of 1,678,343 gallons, or of $3,310,329; therefore the total loss amounted to $3,160,522.

I come now to chemicals. The value of production decreased in 1932 by $24,690,261, while minerals and minerals products decreased by $81,361,798. The following table shows how the production of minerals has fallen off in the last few years:

Value of Production of Minerals, Mineral Products and Chemicals in Canada—1930, 1931 and 1932

	1930	1931	1932
Value of metal production including gold; and value of non-ferrous metal products.. ..	$307,427,010	$244,935,479 (Decrease $108,691,098)	$198,735,912
Value of non-metallic minerals and structural materials production; and value of non-metallic mineral products, except glass.. ..	307,710,915	252,662,979 (Decrease $104,151,757)	203,559,158
Value of glass production, including the production of pressed and blown glass and the bevelling, cutting, etc., of plate glass.. ..	12,191,752	9,937,411 (Decrease $3,721,857)	8,469,895
Value of chemical production..	119,969,637	105,501,905 (Decrease $24,690,261)	95,279,376
Value of iron and steel and their products.. ..	569,745,973	374,725,068 (Decrease $343,540,432)	226,205,543
		(Total decrease $584,795,205)

Sir, those are the figures. I am sorry I have not the grand total, but anyone who is interested can add them together.

On the day the world's grain congress opened in Regina, I was listening to the speeches as they came over the radio; I listened to many gentlemen, including the Minister of Agriculture. As I was listening I was preparing a lecture on the C.C.F.; perhaps I was hoping for inspiration from the speeches. What happened? One of those settlers who was put on the land under the Gordon scheme came to my door from one of the new parishes in my constituency. They were praising the farmers in the west; he was a farmer in the east, and he said, "Sir, will you kindly give me something to eat? I came here on foot. I am very poor; I need public assistance, and I would ask you to give me a certificate to the chief of police in order that I may be permitted to beg in the city." Representatives of all the people of the world were united in the great city of Regina, praising the work of the Canadian farmers, while one of them came to ask for a certificate to the chief of police in order that he might be permitted to beg in the city of Riviere du Loup.

Sir, my only word is this: The private members of this house are in close touch with the people. We meet the people; we see them. I know hon. gentlemen opposite are in the same position; they meet their electors and learn their troubles. I regret, however, that most of the members of the government meet no people except those seeking jobs, who are afraid to tell the truth for fear they will not get their jobs. They praise the government; they say everything is fine, and this is why members of the government have no real information as to the trouble that exists, not only among the farmers but among the miners and other classes. This is why I ask my hon. friends who are here—the Solicitor General, the Minister of Finance and any other ministers who are hiding behind the curtain—to tell the Prime Minister that it is time for him to realize that it is foolish to listen to the false praise that is showered upon him. He must be intelligent enough to understand that truth never comes from the mouths of flatterers. I will answer him by a word from the bible, that the wounds of those we love are much better than the kisses of those who hate us.

Mr. J. A. BARRETTE (Berthier-Maskinongé) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the speech of the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) I really wonder whether all his speeches are intended to enlighten the people or the house. I rather think he is the organizer of a certain group who wish to obstruct legislation.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): We do not obstruct legislation, we simply avail ourselves of our rights.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Among the speeches to which I listened with much interest, I may specially mention that of the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Lacroix). The latter endeavoured to draw up the country's balance-sheet; however, he forgot to mention our assets in relation to our liabilities; I think he should have displayed the same interest as if it had been his own budget. He is a highly thought of man, who seems to have a certain grasp of figures and when he prepares his own balance-sheet, I feel sure that he does not forget to include his assets. The hon. member contends that our liabilities amount to $6,751,596,000 which represent $651.33 per capita—men, women and children. He compares this indebtedness with that of the United States which he states amounts to $42,223,249,000, representing $335.10 per capita. When he quoted these figures, I asked him what were the assets of our country, the hon. member did not answer. I wish to point out to him that Canada's total assets amount to more than $30,000,000,000, which represent $3,000 per capita—men, women and children. If you deduct the amount of the indebtedness $651 per capita, you find that the individual wealth amounts to $2,349 per capita.

In the United States the total debt amounts to $42,223,249,000 or $335.10 per capita; their total assets to $247,000,000,000 representing an amount of $1,981, per capita. If one deducts from this amount the $335, one arrives at an individual asset of $1,646. A citizen of the United States, therefore is worth $1,646 while in Canada, $2,349. There is no reason, therefore to feel despondent.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): If you tell this to the farmers, they will not take your word for it.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Nevertheless, they took his word in the past.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): In 1867, the value of the national wealth was not more than $1,000,000,000, and we have increased it to $30,000,000,000, in 1932.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): That is a huge sum?

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Our national revenue which was less than $500,000,000, increased to $5,000,000,000, yearly. I think that these figures are very interesting. Have hon. gentlemen any knowledge what was the amount of deposits in our banks, a century ago?

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Fifty cents.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Not a cent. Have you any knowledge what the deposits in our banks amount to, at present?

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): (Translation): $3,000,000.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): $2,000,000,000; and three quarters of the bonds of our national liabilities are held by Canadians.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Many are held in New York!

Mr. SPEAKER: Order!

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): It gave me much pleasure to hear the right hon. Prime Minister state that public works would be carried out to relieve the unemployment. Among the foremost of these undertakings, I would place those in connection with the University of Montreal. Rather than adopt the dole system, without ever having any beneficial results, I wonder if it would not be possible to finish the construction of the University of Montreal and thus find work for the unemployed.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): And remove it to Berthier?

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): I shall have an opportunity to refer to this matter in the near future.

The President of the United States, Mr. Roosevelt, has just recommended to Congress the expenditure of $225,000,000 to implement the St. Lawrence Waterway agreement and this money will be mostly expended in Canada.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Are you in favour of such a project?

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Does the Washington government, in making such a considerable outlay expect immediate returns? No. In asking such a large amount, Mr. Roosevelt has in mind the future welfare of his country.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): And swallowing Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER (Text): Hon. members should not be interjecting remarks in this way. If they do not agree with the hon. member who is speaking they will have an opportunity to speak for themselves. If they are going to remain in this chamber they must comply with the rules.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): The St Lawrence waterway will entail an expenditure of $225,000,000, to the United States, $75,000,000 of which will be expended in Canada; yet, this enormous amount to a great extent expended in a foreign land, will in no way directly increase the revenues of the United States. The President, however, states that the United States people will benefit indirectly to the extent perhaps of $70,000,000 yearly.

Among the speeches to which I listened in the house, I greatly appreciate that of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett). He stated the back-to-the-land movement must be encouraged so as to relieve unemployment. I look upon the scheme as an excellent one, providing that some discretion is shown in choosing workmen in cities. We must, first, begin by keeping on the land those who are already there, and make life so attractive that they will have no desire to live in cities.

Such a scheme has been, I think, advocated in Montreal and in all large centres by both Liberals and Conservatives, and no doubt will have beneficial results, if we can agree in carrying it out while at the same time safeguarding the interests of the nation. I also listened to the speech of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) who is a legal light, a highly gifted gentleman; however does not his speech somewhat breathe pessimism? That we should immediately appeal to the people to find out what they think of our administration! I trust that before long we shall have the privilege of being judged by them. Personally, I am ready to go immediately before the people. I trust the shock will not be too severe to our friends. We shall fully explain our situation, and I have no doubt that our constituents will realize that we have performed our duty and fulfilled all the pledges given to them in 1930.

We are criticized in the house, but tour the country and you will come across Liberals, manufacturers, traders, financiers and prominent bankers who approve of the attitude and administration of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) who presides over the destinies of this country.

If the opposition is deeply interested in putting an end to the crisis and helping out the country, why so much obstruction, why criticize and prevent us from adopting the address? I admire the gifted member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). He is an excellent lawyer, a good sport, but he likes publicity. That is why he often speaks in the house. I think he has delivered three speeches on the address. What will come of it? His constituents will decide the question at the next election; they may, perhaps, say to him: You have cost the country too much through your obstructive methods! Will he have enhanced himself in the eyes of his constituents, his country? I do not think so.

Mr. Speaker, I only intended to make a few brief remarks in order to establish the facts in connection with the figures quoted by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Lacroix). I wanted especially to point out that he had neglected informing the house as to the assets of this country.

I consider that with our Prime Minister at the helm of the country's affairs, there is reason to hope for better days, because he has succeeded in weathering the crisis and before long we shall witness a prosperity without parallel in this country.

Main motion (Mr. Gobeil) agreed to.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That the address be engrossed and transmitted to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of the house as are of the honourable the Privy Council.

Motion agreed to.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, February 16, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES

RIGHT OF MEMBER TO REVISE REMARKS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it becomes my unfortunate duty to deal with a matter affecting the privileges of the house. My attention was directed to the fact that during the course of a speech in the house the night before last the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) said:

I am not in favour of an election this year.

That remark does not appear in Hansard, and it now transpires that the words were taken down by the Hansard reporter and struck out of the report by the hon. gentleman. I hold the original manuscript in my hand. Though as much care as can be exercised is taken in connection with these matters I think it well to direct attention to the fact that the privileges extended to members do not permit of the elimination from their remarks of statements of this kind.

Mr. BOURASSA: I quite agree with the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, but I could quote an instance where one of his ministers struck out a passage from one of his speeches last year which made it appear exactly opposite to what he had said. Since then, however, he has taken a flight to Egypt.

Mr. BROWN: I have had occasion before this to believe that members have struck out portions of their speeches. We shall have to be more watchful in future.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe the rule has been that grammatical errors and defects of that sort are corrected. In one case I made some inquiries when it was brought to my attention that substantial changes had been made in a speech; the matter was brought to the attention of the house, and the Hansard authorities were advised that it was not competent for anyone to change the sense of a speech. There may be errors in transcription or there may be errors made in taking down the remarks of the speaker because of noise in the chamber. Those are matters with which members may be expected to deal quite properly. I recall in my own case that on one occasion there was a noise in the chamber and Hansard sent for me saying that because of the noise they had not been able to take down what had been said, and wanting to know if I could assist them. I gave them my notes, such as they were—they were not very helpful—and I am bound to say that the report was not entirely intelligent. In this case, however, the words were heard and transcribed, but they have been struck out by the hon. gentleman who used them. It becomes somewhat important for the reason that a few moments previously the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) had been speaking of the necessity for an early appeal to the country. Then one of the distinguished members opposite, who frequently speaks for the Liberal party, said he was not in favour of an election this year, and though Hansard took down these words they were struck out by the hon. member.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I think I heard the remark that was made by the hon. member for Temiscouata. I do not know how much of the text he removed, but the remark about not being in favour of an election this year was associated with a further remark, provided that the present leader of the government was not retained as leader. If the hon. member for Temiscouata struck that out he evidently felt that he did not wish to reflect upon the present Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: No, he left that in. The very courteous observation made by the right hon. gentleman makes it possible for me to read the whole sentence as it was taken down by the reporter and transcribed into typewriting. It was as follows:

> I am not in favour of an election this year; we can wait another year, provided that the Conservative party and the government select another leader to devise new measures and carry on for another year.

What appears, as amended in the handwriting of the hon. member, is this: first, there is the deletion of the words "I am not in favour of an election this year." Then the following words appear:

> We might wait another year for an election —provided that the Conservative party and the government select another leader—and try the administration for a year longer under that new leadership.

The last twelve words are in the handwriting of the hon. member, so he did not remove that portion of his observations.

Mr. POULIOT: I am glad the right hon. gentleman has taken notice of that fact.

CIVIL SERVICE

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO ADMINISTRATION AND OPERATION OF CIVIL SERVICE ACT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

> That a select special committee of this house be appointed, to consist of seven members, to be hereinafter named, to inquire into and report upon the administration and operation of the Civil Service Act as amended, with instructions to inquire into and report concerning the repeal or amendment of any of the provisions of the said act or the substitution therefor or addition thereto of other provisions, as the committee may deem advisable, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses, and to report from time to time to this house.

He said: In moving this motion I believe I should say that it is moved in consequence of the recommendation of the select special committee which was set up a couple of years ago. At that time it was suggested that at each session there should be set up a select special committee to deal with any problems which might arise in connection with the Civil Service Act, its operation, and administration. In furtherance of that suggestion, this motion is made. I know of no reason other than that as to why the motion should be made at the present time, but I now move the motion in consequence of that representation.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask the Prime Minister if that statement applies to the committee on radio broadcasting?

Mr. BENNETT: No, this is in connection with the Civil Service Act.

Mr. VENIOT: Does the Prime Minister know of any problems which have arisen since last session or since the report of the last committee was presented which would necessitate the appointment this session of a committee?

Mr. BENNETT: I know of no specific matters of great import, except that there are always numbers who are not selected for positions to which they think they should be appointed.

Mr. VENIOT: But that is not a matter of investigation.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a matter of course, and is not peculiar. The motion has no significance except, as I say, it is in pursuance of the understanding arrived at that such committee would be set up so that hon. members of the house, if they have representations to make in connection with the administration of the act, may have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it the intention of the government to refer to this committee Bill No. 4 now before the house, the one which was introduced by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) respecting the Bureau for Translations?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is the intention of the government to refer that bill to the committee now being proposed?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. McINTOSH: May I ask the Prime Minister why it is necessary to appoint a special committee to deal with a matter of this kind? I have in mind a recommendation about which the right hon. gentleman has just spoken, a recommendation that was made to the house a few years ago by a special committee appointed to deal with civil service matters. We have a standing committee of the house on industrial and international relations. Why should this question not be referred to that committee? A few years ago it dealt with problems pertaining to the organization of a national civil service council and upon that occasion reported to the house and had its report endorsed.

Mr. BENNETT: The answer is that our civil service is national, and not international.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is not an answer at all.

Motion agreed to.

RADIO BROADCASTING

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO OPERATIONS OF RADIO COMMISSION

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT ((Prime Minister) moved:

That a select special committee of seven members of the house, to be hereinafter named, be appointed, to inquire into and report upon the operations of the commission under the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Act, 1932, as amended at the last session of parliament, to advise and recommend what, if any, changes should be effected in the existing system of radio broadcasting, and whether the said statutes should be amended, in whole or in part, and what, if any, additions should be made thereto, the said committee to have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses, and to report from time to time to this house.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving this motion I would ask unanimous consent of the house to change the word "seven" to the word "nine." There were nine members on the committee last year, and it was thought that that number of members was desirable because of the interest of every province in the matter. However, by mistake, the word "seven" appears instead of the word "nine." With the consent of the house and without moving a formal amendment may we make the substitution?

Then, may I add that this committee is the one which it was promised would be set up, in view of the fact that the statute passed last session amending the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Act of 1932 is valid only until April first next, at which time it expires. In view of the very evident manifestation of desire on the part of the house shown at the last session, that an opportunity should be offered to discuss the problems incident to broadcasting, and without injuring the institution itself by attacks, counter attacks and defences such as arose in discussion last year, this motion is made. In other words, this committee would afford an opportunity for hon. members to present their views, so that a report might be made to the house. In that way there would not be involved a discussion which would destroy the very body which we have desired to preserve.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the house that the number be changed from "seven" to "nine," shall the motion carry?

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

PROVISION OF MEDICAL SERVICE FOR SINGLE MEN IN CAMPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called, I should like to address a question to the government. I believe I would be acting properly if in this connection I addressed the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sutherland). I have had a number of letters from some of the single men in camps in the province of British Columbia which come under the control of the Department of National Defence. Their complaint is that they have inadequate medical service in those camps, and also that the men in camp do not come under the Workmen's Compensation Act. If I am addressing the proper authority, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence, if there is any reason why the men in these camps do not come under the Workmen's Compensation Act of that province.

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has asked two questions. His first is as to whether or not the medical attention given the men in camps is or is not ample. I believe that it is ample, and I have heard no complaints with regard to it. If the hon. member has any particular case in mind I should be very happy to have inquiries made concerning it.

As to the question concerning men coming under the Workmen's Compensation Act, may I answer that I do not think arrangements could be made for that. Again I must say that I have not heard of any instance where a man has been seriously injured in which the matter of compensation would arise.

PETITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. W. PERRAS (Wright) (Translation): I beg to lay on the table of the house a petition from the citizens of the township of Bouchette, Wright county, protesting against an excise tax of 20 cents per pound on leaf tobacco.

[Mr. Bennett.]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY CONCERNING ANNUAL REPORT AND APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) when we may expect the report of the Canadian National Railways, and whether or not it is the intention of the government to appoint the usual committee to deal with that report?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, as to the first question, concerning the report, may I say that I have not asked but I shall inquire and inform my hon. friend in a day or two. The Duff commission recommended against the bringing of the officers of the railway before that special committee but at the same time recommended that the committee might be set up and the trustees brought before it, but in view of the fact that the trustees only began their duties on January 1 of this year it was the thought of the government that it perhaps might not be advantageous to have that special committee at all this year. However, we are in the hands of the house. My own opinion, however, is that there would be nothing to be gained by having that special committee for the reasons I have given. If my hon. friend or other hon. members have different opinions we shall be very glad to hear them.

Mr. EULER: Will the report be referred to some other committee to be dealt with?

Mr. MANION: I had not given that any thought, but when I give an answer in a day or two I can mention that at the same time.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Might I point out that there is no other way in which hon. members of this house can receive authentic information with regard to the operations of the national railway except through a committee at which either the trustees or the officers of the railway will appear. We are unable to get any information in answer to questions of the ministry and it would be a great mistake to have the session go by without hon. members having the opportunity which the special committee affords of getting information.

Mr. MANION: We will take into account the remarks of the right hon. gentleman, which certainly deserve consideration, before we make any decision. In view of what he says perhaps the committee should be set up. I have no objections. The only thought I had in mind was that the trustees have been so recently appointed that they would not be in a position to give us any information themselves, and of course it was against the recommendation of the Duff commission that the officers should be brought before the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The trustees will be able to get the information from their officers I should not think that the intention of the Duff commission in recommending that the trustees were to appear but not the officers, meant that the house should not get all the information it requires.

Mr. MANION: The trustees have not been there long enough to be familiar with the situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They have their officers.

EMPLOYMENT AT CHURCHILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): I have a question to direct to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion). It is directly connected with possible port development at Churchill this summer. Many unemployed men in northern Saskatchewan are anxious to obtain work at Churchill. Can the minister make a statement that will clarify the situation regarding employment at Churchill during the next few months?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): I will deal with that matter when the estimates are up. I think there will be plenty of time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

COMPLETION OF BRANCH LINE FROM NORTH BATTLEFORD TO EDMONTON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. McINTOSH: I have another question to direct to the Minister of Railways, and I hope that he answers this one. It is directly connected with railway construction in northwestern Saskatchewan this summer. I touched upon this subject in my address to the house about a week ago—to be exact, Friday, February 9.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. McINTOSH: It is coming. If I remember correctly, the minister was not in his seat when I was speaking on this subject during the debate on the address; I think he was called out. This problem of railway development concerns ten thousand people in that part of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. McINTOSH: Just possess your souls in patience.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member proceed to ask his question? This is not the time for discussion.

Mr. McINTOSH: That will be done at the proper moment. It is this: Will the minister explain whether his department has any plans under consideration for laying the steel and grading the right-of-way on the balance of the line connecting North Battleford, St. Walburg, Loon Lake, Goodsoil and Edmonton? His cooperation in the solution of this railway problem forthwith would be greatly appreciated.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman knows the position of this matter just as well as I do. He has written me about it a number of times and has also brought it up in the house a number of times. I have given him by letter all the information that I had. He knows that the matter has to be submitted to the management of the railway, and when the management are deciding to recommend to the government and parliament the building of branch lines the railway he is supporting will be given consideration along with others. I cannot give any further information than that. The question is not in the hands of the government but in the hands of the management of the railway.

BRITISH QUOTA ON CANADIAN CATTLE AND EGGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): On February 2, as appears at page 224 of Hansard, I asked the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, a question regarding the importation into Great Britain of cattle and eggs. I would ask the Minister of Agriculture if he is now ready to answer that question or state when I may receive an answer.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): I will look up the question and give an answer to the hon. gentleman later.

FLOODS IN VAUDREUIL-SOULANGES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last, the hon. member for Vaudreuil Soulanges (Mr. Thauvette) made an inquiry in connection with the floods on the Ottawa river, near Vaudreuil, and requested that an engineer of the Marine department be sent immediately on the premises. I wish to inform the house and the hon. member that the following day, an engineer of my department was on the premises, investigating the causes of these floods, which had then somewhat receded, the level of the river being about three feet lower. We are studying the situation so as to ascertain whether it would be possible in the future to prevent such floods.

RADIO CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): Replying to my hon. friend from Skeena (Mr. Hanson) who asked a question regarding radio reception in his constituency, I stated the other day that I would look into the matter and I wish to say that immediately after a very competent inspector was sent into the constituency of the hon. gentleman. On the thirteenth he was at Quesnel, and from there was proceeding to Fort George and Hazelton with special instructions to inquire fully into the situation and give all assistance possible under the circumstances.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I wish to thank the minister for the prompt action he has taken in this matter.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): While on the subject of radio interference, would the minister be good enough to have an inquiry made into conditions at the station at Fredericton and why we cannot get any good service from it up in northern New Brunswick.

An hon. MEMBER: Perhaps you haven't a good radio.

Mr. VENIOT: We have had a very severe winter, which may have had something to do with the poor reception.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Perhaps the snow is frozen.

Mr. VENIOT: Or the radio commission.

[Mr. R. Weir.]

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

The house in committee of supply, Mr Sullivan in the chair.

Harbours and rivers—St. John—Channel improvements, $220,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister explain the item?

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): The amount covered by this item is required to complete a contract with the Saint John Dry Dock and Shipbuilding Company Limited. This contract covers the straightening and deepening of the main channel leading from the bay of Fundy into the harbour and was awarded on July 14, 1930.

Mr. VENIOT: To whom?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): To the Saint John Dry Dock and Shipbuilding Company.

Item agreed to.

Public buildings—New Brunswick—Saint John quarantine station—Partridge island—improvement, alterations and repairs, $10,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This and the following item show increases over last year. Surely the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon) does not expect that more money will be required this year for alterations and repairs. Would the minister explain this item?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It must be obvious to the hon. gentleman that in some years a building will require repairs while in other years it will not. This amount is required for general repairs and improvements to the Saint John quarantine station which is under the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren). There is $1,882 to cover repairs to verandah, painting, repairs to hospital roof and reshingling. These repairs would not occur every year. There is also $7,000 to cover repairs to water supply pipe line.

Mr. DONNELLY: The previous item shows an increase of $57,000 to pay the Halifax harbour commission for maintenance of immigration quarters. Why is that increased this year?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That is to cover an adjustment of arrears of rental over a period of two or three years.

Mr. DONNELLY: If there is to be no immigration we should not need any quarters.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): We must keep up the buildings.

Mr. DONNELLY: Probably for deportees.

Item agreed to.

Maritime provinces—Dominion public buildings, $40,000.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the minister tell us what public buildings in New Brunswick are affected by this vote?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This is to take care of repairs to all public buildings in the province. It is impossible to say just how much will be required for each particular building.

Mr. VENIOT: The minister should have an estimate of what is necessary in the province. I do not require details of the various buildings but I should like to know what is estimated to be required for the province.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This vote is based upon our experience over a period of years. The hon. member will notice that it is the same this year as it was last.

Mr. VENIOT: How is the amount arrived at? Surely when the engineers send in a report to the department that they require so much for public buildings in the maritime provinces they give the minister an estimate for each province. I should like to know upon what that estimate is based.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): From time to time the chief architect receives reports from the district architects as to repairs required to these buildings. According to our experience from year to year we estimate that this amount is approximately correct. We are doing just what has been done over a long period of years. The amount this year is similar to the amount voted last year and we hope it will be sufficient.

Mr. VENIOT: The minister does not seem to get my point. I claim that when the architect submits his estimate to the department which is based upon reports he has received from the local architects, he estimates what he considers to be necessary for the province of New Brunswick. In doing that he would estimate what would be necessary for each building. I should like to know the total estimate for the province. Surely it is not left to the department to guess at what amount is needed. He must submit a detailed statement upon which the department fixes the amount necessary for the province for the coming year.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): There is no estimate before the department at this time as to what the requirements for this year will be. There could not very well be one. This amount of money is placed at the disposal of the department and the architects make their examinations and report from time to time We then apply the money voted by parliament to the carrying out of the needed repairs.

Item agreed to.

Quebec—Dominion public buildings—improvements and repairs, $75,000.
Montreal—instalment on purchase of armoury, installation of fittings, and insurance—under contract, $16,100.
Quebec Citadel—improvements and maintenance, $15,000.
Quebec examining warehouse—repairs and renewals, $10,000.
Westmount—instalment on purchase of armoury, and insurance, $13,600.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask the minister a question in connection with the second item in this vote. It will apply also to the second items in votes 98 and 100. In connection with the armoury being erected in Toronto, I am informed that the specifications for the materials do not call for one hundred per cent Canadian or British manufacture. The regular specifications issued by the department for buildings to be erected under the supervision of the department call for Canadian materials and I should like to know what steps the minister or his department can take to ensure that all the material entering into the construction of the Toronto armoury shall be either made in Canada or within the British Empire.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am of the opinion that while the contract was awarded by the Armoury association, instructions were given to include our standard specifications in the contract as to hours of labour and Canadian and British materials.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to hear that, but my information is that some material of either the heating, the sprinkling or the plumbing system now on the job was purchased outside of Canada and not within the British Empire.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the basis on which this work is done?

Mr. MacNICOL: If the hon. member does not object, I should like to have first an answer from the minister to the question I asked. If there is at present, in connection with any of these jobs, material purchased outside Canada and not in the empire, has the government any control over the use of such material?

Mr. DUPUIS: Where is it from?

Mr. MacNICOL: The United States, I am informed.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It would depend upon the specifications, which I have not before me, as the contract was awarded by the association. I can assure the hon. gentleman however that I will investigate the matter and if there is any violation of the terms the material will be rejected.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the basis on which the government acquires these buildings?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): These armouries are constructed by local associations, in each case, in the city where the building is located. They provide the capital and the government undertakes to pay by instalments, over a period of years, an equal amount in each year covering the cost of construction. The building then becomes the property of the dominion.

Mr. HEAPS: I object to that form of contract being entered into by the government with any private corporation. When public buildings are to be erected the government can better afford to put them up than any private organization. In the first place, an armoury is a public building and should be owned by the government; and secondly, when a private organization contracts to erect such a building, it has to go on the public market to obtain funds and is compelled to pay much higher interest than would be paid if the government itself were directly responsible for the undertaking. There must be a difference of one and a half or two per cent in the cost. The government assumes liability to purchase the building over a term of years, and it simply means that it is compelled to pay a larger sum than it would pay if it were responsible for financing the construction. Why does the government allow a private organization to become responsible for the erection of such buildings, when the government is ultimately responsible for them?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is a practice that has been followed by governments for some considerable time. There is something to be said in favour of my hon. friend's contention, but we must bear in mind that these public works are constructed out of revenue. We do not borrow, except in very few instances, money for the construction of public buildings. These buildings are an expense, and to take the cost out of any one year's revenue would be a very severe charge indeed. Therefore, instead of the government borrowing the money, spreading it over a period of years, it adopts this plan of allowing the local association to construct the building. The association takes the initiative in these matters. They have an interest in it, and it is from the local standpoint that the undertaking is initiated; it is not done on the initiative of the government. From the time the building is completed however it is the property of the government; it is taken over from the contractor. It is under the control of the government and is used by the Department of National Defence.

Mr. HEAPS: If it were not for the government's guarantee the private corporation would not be able to finance construction?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is doubtful whether they would be able to finance it if there were not the undertaking to pay by instalment.

Mr. HEAPS: The government in any case has the responsibility of paying for the buildings; it is liable. Does the government supervise the awarding of the contracts for these buildings?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The expenditures have to meet with the approval of the government under the terms of an agreement made with the association. It must be remembered that these are buildings which, in the natural course of events, should be constructed by the government. They are not buildings that should be constructed by any private corporation. The architect is appointed by the association and the government exercises very close supervision over expenditures, and if there is anything outside the scope of the standard agreement which has been developed and perfected over a period of years the expenditure is not approved and the association must stand the expense themselves. There are some instances in which associations do expend amounts in addition to those approved of.

Mr. HEAPS: In connection with this particular undertaking, will the contracts be awarded by tender?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I cannot say whether in every instance they have been advertised, but I know of no instance in which there has not been competition. I have in mind one building in connection with which tenders were invited from nine or ten different people, although in that particular case there was no public advertisement.

Mr. HEAPS: The reason why I am asking this question must I am sure be obvious to the minister. I have in mind a certain city where they contemplate the construction of an armoury along the same lines as the undertaking we are discussing at the moment. It has come to my knowledge that this particular construction will be awarded by private tender. A private corporation is being created to undertake the work, and the only basis on which the money will be loaned is the intention of the government to lease the building over a period of twenty years. I have a strong objection to the government guaranteeing any private corporation in the construction of public buildings, for the maintenance of which the government becomes responsible, though the building remains under the ownership of a private organization for a period of years. Surely the government is strong enough to erect these buildings in whatever part of the country they are required. Coming back to the city I have in mind, a private corporation is being created there to construct an armoury. The government takes a lease of the building for twenty years. At the end of these twenty years the building will have been completely paid for and will then revert to the ownership of the government; but in the meantime the private contractor will receive from twenty to forty thousand dollars more than if the work were advertised and done by public tender. That is where my objection comes in to the construction of these buildings. I believe that in order to avoid anything savouring of favouritism or overcharging in the construction of buildings the only fair thing to do is for the government to own these buildings themselves completely, advertising by way of public tender, and giving every contractor an opportunity of tendering. I should like to get from the minister an understanding that if any more of these buildings are constructed the government itself, whether through the Department of Public Works or the Department of National Defence, will be responsible for letting the tenders and giving every contractor a chance to tender.

Mr. HANBURY: I wish to associate myself to some extent with the criticism of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) regarding the purchase-rental method of constructing public buildings of any kind. If such a building is necessary the government should assume the responsibility and place before the house an estimate for such construction. I believe the purchase rental method is an evasion of the rights of this parliament; the matter is brought before the government and a contract entered into without parliament being consulted. The government enters into obligations and then comes to the House of Commons and says: We have these obligations and it is now your duty to pass these amounts. The minister has explained how this has been brought about. An association is formed and I think the minister will agree with me that it is purely a paper organization; it is based entirely on the strength of the contract that they can enter into with the government. The question of calling for tenders is technically left with the organization; they may call for tenders or they may not. The government may require the calling of tenders and as a matter of fact usually they do, but after all, the government have entered into a contract with a paper organization and are to all intents and purposes giving them great freedom in the manner in which they conduct their business.

If we are to have armouries in Canada—and I for one believe we must have them—we should carry out the armoury business in an open and aboveboard manner, place the estimates for such construction before the house, let the house consider whether such construction is advisable or not and if we cannot get public opinion as expressed in the House of Commons to support such measures, then I do not think the particular armoury in question should be erected. In the past the reason this method was adopted was due to fear on the part of some members of the government of the day that they could not secure the support of the house for the construction of armouries. I for one believe that time has passed, but I do not think that method should ever have been adopted, and I suggest to the government that if they wish to construct armouries in future, they should lay their plans before the house and let us consider what armouries we should have in Canada.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I am afraid there is some misconception in this matter; these are simply regimental armouries built for one regiment. The association mentioned is a regimental one and in no case are the plans of the association approved by the Department of Public Works before the Department of National Defence have passed on and approved them. Moreover, the first allotment on the first contract made with either the Department of National Defence or the Department of Public Works is always submitted to the House of Commons when the first instalment is voted in advance of construction. The only armouries of the kind that have been built in the past are, as I said before, regimental armouries for one regiment or brigade. All other armouries affecting other arms of the service or for more than one regiment in one city are always built by the Department of Public Works.

Mr. HEAPS: The hon. member has completely evaded the real issue at stake.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I was not replying to the hon. member.

Mr. HEAPS: I am trying to point out that the question has nothing to do with the purpose for which the building is being constructed. The point is whether the erection of public buildings is to be turned over to private corporations. If public buildings are to be erected, the proper body to control their erection is parliament; parliament should have control over the money it is voting and over the building once it is erected. I did not even raise the question of armouries or oppose their construction; I am raising an entirely different point. I object to parliament being asked to vote money to a private organization. If parliament is responsible for the erection of a public building, it should control the money and the building itself. Will the minister say that in future no such plans will be approved by the government, but that parliament will assume all responsibility in connection with the erection of such buildings?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This practice, as I have said, is not new. I think it originated in 1925 in connection with the construction of an armoury in the city of Montreal.

Mr. HANBURY: Was it not Regina?

Mr. RALSTON: Westmount.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I think the Montreal armoury preceded the Regina one. The former Deputy Minister of National Defence understands the situation very well and the reason these buildings have been constructed as they have. Let me say to the hon. member for North Winnipeg that these buildings are from the time of completion of construction taken over by and under the control of the government, and then handed to the regiment that occupies them in the usual way that military buildings are occupied. I point out to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard that the matter must come to parliament for approval of the first item in the estimates and then the whole question is up for discussion. If parliament rejects the item in the estimates, the matter cannot proceed; it is all subject to the approval of parliament.

Mr. HANBURY: Is any contract entered into before the first estimate is approved?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): You cannot enter into a contract before you have a vote of parliament for the amount required. We never enter into a contract until the matter is discussed in parliament and the vote passed. It is on the strength of that vote that the agreement is made with the association.

Mr. HANBURY: The minister says that after the completion of the contract, the government have full control of the building. I understand that legally the building remains in the possession of the building company for a period of years. I believe a limited liability company is formed and this company have officers and hold meetings, and continue to do so for a period of years. The building, while it may be actually in the possession of the government, is technically in possession of the building company.

Mr. HEAPS: Until it is paid for.

Mr. HANBURY: Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): It is my understanding—and I would ask to be corrected by the minister if I am wrong—when the contract is completed and the armoury is taken over by the government, title is thereupon vested in the government, and instead of the government having technical it has legal possession from the time of completion of the armoury.

Mr. RALSTON: As I understand the matter, title is not in the government; it is in the association, but it is under an instalment purchase agreement whereby possession is in the government, so that nothing but the bare title remains in the association and at the end of twenty years, or whatever the term may be, the building automatically comes under the control of the government in the sense not only of possession but of title. The principal objection I have seen to this method—and as a former minister I have at least on one occasion presented to the house a similar estimate—is whether we could get money at the same rate of interest in this way as if the money were borrowed directly. There is a great deal to be said for what hon. members on this side have stated, and probably the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of National Defence will agree. I know I sat in this chamber one night in 1928 or 1929 and heard the present leader of the government absolutely rave, if I may use the word without offence, with regard to a similar proposition in Regina, but it seems that the situation is different now that the right hon. .gentleman is himself leader of a government. The principal objection is the question of interest, but outside of that I do not think there is any question but that the government's interests are protected in every particular.

May I say further, in regard to the Victoria Rifles armoury building, which is the first item in vote 97, that if ever there was a case of merit it seems to me this was a genuine case. For many years that regiment supplied their own armoury premises, which they owned themselves, and of which they gave the government the benefit of the use. I have forgotten whether the building finally went into disrepair or whether it was burned.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: A tunnel was put through.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, and the premises were rendered unfit for use. Then, and only then, this regiment came to the government and asked them to supply premises for them, and that is what this particular vote is for. With regard to the Westmount armouries, I understand that that was started in 1925. Will the minister tell me how many instalments are still due on that building.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The first payment on the Westmount armoury was made for the year 1926-27 and amounted to $12,624. We have made eight payments, so there are twelve payments yet to be made.

Mr. LUCAS: Has the minister any information as to the manner in which these associations raise the money for the erection of these buildings, and what rate of interest is charged?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I believe they issue debentures, and so far as we are concerned the rate of interest is limited to five per cent.

Mr. HEENAN: Would the minister tell me whether under this method of erecting buildings the contractors are governed by the fair wage and eight hour day law passed in 1930?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The clauses regarding minimum wages and so on as laid down by the Department of Labour are sent to these associations, who must embody them in their contracts. We see that this is done.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Has the minister received any requests for the construction of a post office at Ste. Anne de la Pocatière, and if so is there any likelihood that it will be constructed in the near future.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I cannot recall any very recent request, but I should be surprised if at some time during the last few years we have not received a request for the construction of a post office there.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Would the minister be kind enough to secure this information?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Certainly; I shall find out when and by whom the last request was made.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would the minister say whether any buildings used for other purposes are constructed and taken over by the government on the same principle.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I understand that in the past some buildings have been acquired in a similar way. My deputy informs me that the Daly building in Ottawa was purchased on the instalment plan as well as a certain building that we use for workshops. These building were not constructed on the same basis and then acquired, but were purchased from the owners on the instalment plan.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is quite a different principle. The reason I asked that question was because I am of the opinion that there is something in the contention expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard that this is a sort of underhand way of building armouries in this country. There may be other reasons why it is done in this way but undoubtedly this is one of the main reasons.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): In reply to my hon. friend I can assure him that there is nothing underhand about it. There can be nothing underhand when we come to this house and ask for approval of an estimate for this purpose. Just as much information is given in connection with this vote as is given in connection with any other.

Mr. HANBURY: I should like to ask the minister whether the government would give sympathetic consideration to further construction under this plan.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It seems to me that my hon. friend's request cancels the suggestion made by the hon. member for North Winnipeg who asked me to give a pledge that this would not be done again.

I understand that my hon. friend suggests that I should give him a pledge that it will be done.

Mr. HANBURY: No, I ask for sympathetic consideration.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It would not be very sympathetic if we did not do it. Of course I cannot pledge the government as to what their policy will be in any particular case. They will have to be guided by what appears to be best in the circumstances as they are presented in each instance. There is precedence for this action; there is also some merit in it. I recognize the force of the objections to it, but in this case it has been adopted apparently with fairly satisfactory results to all concerned.

Mr. HEAPS: I presume the government are obligated to the amounts set out in the estimates, but I am raising the question in regard to future construction of a similar type. I am asking two things: First, if the department feels it necessary to construct armouries that they should construct them on their own responsibility; second, that if the government do not want to assume the responsibility for the erection of these buildings and think it a better policy to have private corporations undertake their construction, then I want the government to undertake to see that these buildings are constructed by public tender and put up in such a way as to ensure that the government will get the best possible results for the money for which they become responsible. I should like to have the minister's reply to those two suggestions.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The specifications are submitted to the Department of Public Works for revision and approval, and are also submitted for the approval of the Department of National Defence. I cannot give my hon. friend any undertaking that in no case will an armoury be constructed on any plan other than this or that all armouries will be constructed by the government. I can assure him that we will endeavour to see that reasonable competition is secured. Certainly we would not approve of the construction of a building at an extravagant cost. We have our own estimates, and I know of no case in which a contract has been awarded privately or as the result of only one tender. We would want to be satisfied that there was honest, real competition in connection with the awarding of the contract.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. H. A. Stewart.]

Ontario—

Dominion public buildings—improvements and repairs, $95,000.

Toronto—instalment on purchase of armoury, installation of fittings, and insurance—under contract, $44,100.

Toronto public buildings—government's share of cost of local improvements, $2,400—Total, $141,500.

Mr. FACTOR: I should like to ask the minister for the particulars of the third item, amounting to $2,400, for the city of Toronto.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This is to provide for payment of the government's share of the following local improvements in the city of Toronto: sewer on Lombard street between Victoria and Church streets, $1,116.29; an asphalt pavement on Lombard street between Victoria and Church streets, $1,249.97, or a total of $2,366.26, say $2,400 to cover contingencies. These are opposite government-owned property.

Mr. BRADETTE: I just wish to bring to the attention of the committee certain anomalies respecting public buildings in the city of Ottawa, and certain public works. Very often from the other side of the house we hear a challenge to the effect that there is lack of cooperation. I know there is a system in Ottawa, one which is growing, concerning men who are seeking work on the railways, on the Rideau canal, or shovelling snow in front of public buildings. If a man wants to get work on the Rideau canal he has to go to the vice-chairman or the chairman of the Liberal-Conservative Association of the city of Ottawa, and there he is asked if he is a Liberal or a Conservative. I am positive of these facts. Before a man is put on the list so that he may obtain any kind of work from the government he has practically to sign a pledge and to pay the sum of one dollar before his name is entered on the list. He has to say he belongs to the Liberal-Conservative Association. I come from a section of the country where we do not believe in that system. I know that so far as the Cochrane district is concerned there is no playing of politics in regard to relief measures. I do not see any reason why in the city of Ottawa or anywhere in Canada such a system should be in existence. I know that patronage exists, and that it has existed in the past, but I have never heard of any man being asked to sign his allegiance to a certain party before he could get any work. Certainly that should not be done at the present time. Even the sum of one dollar means a lot to many of those men. Some of them would never receive any return from it. I know that if the country was aware of the situation, in view of statements made by the government that there is no partisanship so far as the distribution of work is concerned, the government would be severely criticized. I protest against the practice I have described.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): May I say in reply that I know nothing of what happened in the Department of Railways and Canals. I do know that a few years ago when we were on the other side of the house and my friends were on this side of the house I heard similar charges made.

Mr. HANBURY: And will again.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): So far as the Department of Public Works is concerned I do not know of any such practice as he suggests exists. I do know however that from time to time I receive complaints that we are employing too many Liberals in connection with work of this kind.

Mr. MANION: May I say a word in reply to the hon. member, since he has attacked my department. I do not admit that any such condition exists as he has described, namely, that men have to pay a dollar before they can obtain a position. I admit frankly however, generally speaking, that so far as the appointment of workers on works of my department in the city of Ottawa or elsewhere is concerned, we very frequently do accept the recommendations of the Conservative committee. What is the use of implying anything else, because everybody knows, as the Minister of Public Works has pointed out, that the same charge was made from our side of the house against the last government?

I say quite honestly and quite sincerely that there is no difference, generally speaking, between the system which obtains under this government and that which obtained under the previous one. Not only that, but I believe generally speaking there is a good deal to be said in defence of the practice. I do not mean to suggest that when a man is destitute he should not be given consideration; many of them are. Irrespective of a committee in this city I have on a number of occasions given positions to men who, it was represented to me, where in destitute circumstances. That often occurs, I have not any doubt, in the Department of Public Works, my own department and in others. But, generally speaking, it is obvious that the government in power, whether it be Liberal, Conservative or even a government of my hon. friends in the corner—when, a thousand years from now, they gain power—will probably do likewise. It will naturally give consideration to its friends. I do not think any just criticism can be levelled at that. I do not admit however that the system is, in detail, as pointed out by the hon. member. When my estimates are up for consideration I shall be happy to discuss the whole matter.

Mr. BRADETTE: I wish to repeat that there is a list of those belonging to the Liberal-Conservative Association of the city of Ottawa. The Minister of Railways has mentioned the fact that there is a partisan system. I do not agree with that principle, no matter what party is in power. We do not do that in our section of the country. There is this fact, however, that men whose names appear on the list have to pay one dollar. The Minister of Railways and Canals would not accuse the late government of adopting that practice.

Mr. MANION: I do not admit that it exists now, either.

Mr. BRADETTE: I repeat the statement that it does exist.

Mr. MANION: That does not prove it.

Mr. BRADETTE: I will give hundreds of names, if necessary. If a man is to get any kind of work he has to pay a dollar and sell his soul to the Conservative party to get on that list. I say that that is not fair. The Minister of Railways and Canals would not accuse the late administration of having compelled men to pay the sum of one dollar to belong to the Liberal party and to get work.

Mr. MANION: That is exactly what they were accused of. Whether it was true or not, the fact is that that was the accusation.

Mr. BRADETTE: That does not help the situation. We have been challenged by hon. members opposite to give cooperation. May I say we are willing to give it, but we do not want such practices as this, and particularly under present conditions. I have had men visit me in this city of Ottawa who have told me that every man who gets work around these buildings or on the Rideau canal must sign allegiance to the Conservative party. I repeat that that is not fair.

Mr. MANION: Just because someone has made that statement to the hon. member does not necessarily prove that it is true. Frequently men state things which are not true or correct. However, I shall look into the whole matter, and shall gladly discuss it later.

Mr. MARCIL: I should like to thank the Minister of Public Works for the manner in which he has responded to my request for information concerning my constituency. However, may I inform him if he does not already know it, that no Liberal has had a job in the county of Bonaventure since the Conservative party has been in office. I am not blaming him for that. In our parishes the party leaders have the spending of the money, and they employ their own friends. Probably they are following in the footsteps of the party who preceded them. I am pleased to note that our amiable and truthful friend, the Minister of Railways and Canals, has made a public acknowledgment to-day as to the system prevailing now. It would seem to be the system that to the victors belong the spoils.

Another circumstance comes to my mind at this time. I believe it was in 1929 that the then leader of the opposition, the Prime Minister of to-day, read a letter to this house from the county of Bonaventure complaining severely that the party affected was unable to obtain work because he was a Conservative. The leader of the opposition of that day, the right hon. .gentleman who sits opposite to-day, protested strongly at that time against the practice he described. He stated that poor labourers, no matter what their allegiance was, should be employed, irrespective of party. I should like to have that policy followed at the present time.

Mr. MANION: It is being followed.

Mr. MARCIL: In my constituency there are poor men who do not know where to turn for their meals. If they are to be punished because they voted for the Liberal party I must say that would not seem to be a very fair way of distributing public money. I would ask the minister in connection with any further works that he grants to my constituency to instruct the overseer to see that the work is divided equally. The parish priests have asked from the pulpit that those who are most in need should be given the work and that it should not be confined wholly to one party. That is the reason I am bringing the matter to the minister's attention and raising objection at this time.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I could show to my hon. friend a sheaf of letters from Conservative committees in his constituency complaining that the Liberals are still in power down there.

Mr. MARCIL: That is misinformation.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds) And that they are getting all the work and furnishing all the supplies.

Mr. MARCIL: Not in Bonaventure county.

[Mr. Marcil.]

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): And that the Conservatives are not getting a fair share of the work even when it is being done by day labour.

Mr. MARCIL: Misinformation.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am telling you honestly the information I am getting.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I am pleased of the opportunity afforded to me of discussing patronage. The hon. member for Timiskaming North (Mr. Bradette) mentioned, just now, a kind of a pledge that people have to sign, in Ottawa. I hold in my hand such a pledge from a Liberal club of Quebec. These pledges are not solely required for work entirely paid by one or another government, but also for such work which is paid by both Dominion and provincial governments, in connection with unemployment relief. Instructions to show preference to members of this club are given to engineers of various districts, not only by political organizations but directly by the Quebec government. I have here a document addressed to a highway engineer, instructing him to employ, in relief work, for the repairs of a certain road, 75 per cent Liberals and 25 per cent Conservatives. The hon. member for Timiskaming should come and give a lecture, on the subject, to the Liberals of Quebec, but especially to the Prime Minister of that province.

Mr. MacNICOL: Since I asked the question in regard to the Montreal armouries I have been advised by the departmental official that the specifications for the Toronto armouries do not stipulate that the material—I am not sure whether all the material or not—to be used in the construction of these armouries shall be of Canadian or at least of British manufacture. I am very grateful for the minister's statement a moment ago that so far as lies within his power he will see to it that the material going into these armouries will be Canadian, or at least British material. Construction on the armouries has not yet gone far enough for the use of material of general manufacture, and while the specifications it is said do not call for the material to be made in Canada, I trust that the minister will make every effort, as I know he will, to see that the material so far as possible is Canadian. He is just as anxious as I or any other member of the house that Canadian material and Canadian labour be used as far as possible in the construction of all buildings for dominion purposes. I do know that all the specifications issued for buildings which the department itself erects specify that the material must be of Canadian or British manufacture, and if it is not too late to take action in reference to these buildings that are being erected outside of departmental control, I hope that similar action will be taken. I have no criticism whatever of the specifications other than that. I am told that they are excellent specifications, nor have I any criticism to offer of the contractors, who I am told are the very best, nor of the sub-contractors or workmen. The only thing I am concerned about is that Canadian material and Canadian workmen be used if at all possible, and if not Canadian material, at least British material.

Mr. BOUCHARD: May I suggest that the Finance minister raise the tariff in his next budget so that the request of my hon. friend (Mr. MacNicol), and not my desires, may be complied with?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I have no doubt that that would meet with the approval of my hon. friend who has just spoken. In reply to my hon. friend from Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol), the departmental specifications are exactly as he has stated, and within the last few years they have been revised to make them even more exacting with respect to the use of Canadian and British material. I shall certainly see that in any contracts that may be awarded in connection with these armouries the same standard specifications are inserted, and if they are not already in the contracts, we will take the matter up with the contractors and see if we cannot get them to use Canadian material.

Mr. MacNICOL: I thank the minister very much for his remarks.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): To ease the mind of my hon. friend from Toronto Northwest, may I remind him that the minister who controls importations into this country will see to it that an embargo is placed on the importation of outside goods. I think my hon. friend can rest his soul in peace because, according to the letters I am getting, there is no danger under this ministry of any goods getting into Canada, even from the British Empire, if Canadian goods are available. I cannot understand how anyone who favours tariffs, embargoes and restrictions to the extent my hon. friend does should be at all alarmed over the possibility of foreign material coming into competition with Canadian.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am anxious for Canadian workmen to get as much work as possible.

Mr. BRADETTE: A few days ago, in reply to a question, the Minister of Public Works gave the amount that was being paid for rentals of buildings for the use of the government in this city. I have not the figures before me but they ran into hundreds of thousands of dollars. I understand, and I wish to be corrected if I am wrong, that two floors of the new Confederation building are unoccupied at the present time. If that is true, it would seem to the ordinary man that the whole of that new building should be occupied before further rentals are paid in the city of Ottawa.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I can assure my hon. friend that his information again is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. BRADETTE: Why again?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): There is no space in the Confederation building of any importance that is not occupied. There is not one floor nor half a floor that is not occupied. The amount of rentals paid in the city of Ottawa has been very substantially reduced, and we are now paying over $100,000 less than before we went into the Confederation building, and since we have given up some rentals that we had.

Mr. HEENAN: Referring to the question that has been brought up by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) and the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette), and in view of the frank admission of the Minister of Railways that there is discrimination or, shall I say, patronage with regard to appointments, although I thought we had done away with that—

Mr. MANION: Not under your regime.

Mr. HEENAN: The Prime Minister in the 1930 session promised on his honour from the floor of this house that there would be no such thing as discrimination or patronage in connection with these public works that were being undertaken for purposes of relief. I hold in my hand P.C. 2043, dated August 5, 1931. I feel sure the government believe in their own orders in council, and I should like to quote clause 9 of this one, which reads:

> All agreements with provincial and municipal authorities shall contain a provision to the effect that all persons employed on the works or undertakings referred to herein shall be residents of Canada, and so far as practicable of the locality in which the work is being performed, and in no case shall discrimination be made or permitted in the employment of, or in the granting of direct relief to any British subjects by reason of their political affiliation, race or religious views.

I think that is a very good principle.

Mr. MANION: May I interrupt the hon. gentleman? We were not discussing direct relief, and I do not think the discussion of that matter is in order. The hon. member for Timiskaming referred to ordinary work on the canal.

Mr. HEENAN: I wish the minister would let me finish.

Mr. MANION: I consider the hon. gentleman as being out of order in discussing direct relief on an estimate of the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. RALSTON: If the minister heard the order in council which was read, he would realize that it referred not only to direct relief but to employment.

Mr. MANION: I was not talking about the order in council, I was talking about the discussion. The hon. gentleman has no need to tell me what I am talking about.

Mr. RALSTON: The Minister of Railways seems to be very glib. He rose to a point of order and I am only suggesting that the hon. gentleman was talking about an order in council which deals not only with direct relief but with employment. Reference to such an order in council is in order during the discussion of public works estimates.

Mr. HEENAN: I like to be called to order once in a while by the Minister of Railways even though he may not be the chairman of the assembly. If the government insists upon such a principle in the case of the provinces and the municipalities, it should be good enough for them to carry out themselves. I think it is a shame and a disgrace to see a member of the government stand up and tell this house during times like this when there is so much distress through the country that they are actually taking recommendations of Conservative associations as to who is to receive employment. I agree that in normal times there might be something to be said about such a practice but this government is supposed to enforce this principle in connection with the provinces and the municipalities and yet they act at variance with it, as has been admitted by the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. MANION: I did not admit discrimination at all. I took the attitude that in the case of ordinary work on the canals—nothing to do with relief work—this government was doing the same as the last government. I am not hypocrite enough to say that, generally speaking, we do not prefer our friends to our enemies. As far as I am concerned personally, I would prefer a friend to an enemy where there is work to be performed. As far as relief work is concerned, so far as I know nothing in the shape of patronage has been practised. If I understood the order in council correctly, it deals entirely with relief matters and has no connection with ordinary work on the canals. As I have pointed out on many occasions, I have appointed people to ordinary canal work who had nothing to do with committees but I shall be quite frank and admit that, generally speaking, when ordinary work on the canals is let we do exactly the same as the late government did when they were in power. As a general rule, we take the recommendations of our friends.

Mr. BRADETTE: Does the minister mean his past enemies or his present enemies?

Mr. MANION: The hon. member will find out.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The order in council quoted by the hon. member for Kenora (Mr. Heenan) is in connection with expenditures specifically earmarked for the relief of unemployment. This department issued instructions to all its district engineers and architects that under no circumstances should there be any discrimination and that wherever possible they should consult the mayor, the reeve or the head of the municipality and make a fair distribution of the employment. Preference was to be given to married men over unmarried men or to such cases where the need was greater. I know in many cases rotation was carried out as suggested by the mayor of the town. We received complaints but they were investigated and I should say that ninety out of one hundred were found to be unfounded. I say to the hon. member for Kenora that there was an honest, a sincere and a successful attempt made to administer the moneys voted for unemployment relief. They were administered fairly and in a manner calculated to bring about the greatest measure of relief.

Mr. VENIOT: I would not rise to take part in this discussion were it not for the fact that the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) has confessed so openly that he believes in the system. I believe in the system and I do not intend to criticize the present government for distributing patronage under ordinary conditions in normal times. I did it myself and if I ever have the honour of getting back into power, I shall do it again.

They say an open confession is good for the soul, but I do not know whether the minister needs that. I deprecate the fact that he has made such a confession because in 1928 and 1929 he was one of those who attacked most bitterly not only myself but other ministers of the then government for distributing patronage to our friends.

Mr. MANION: I do not think my hon. friend can lay his hands upon any issue of Hansard where I said any such thing. I am honest enough to admit that the government in power naturally favours its friends to its enemies. I do not think I have ever in my life attacked either my hon. friend or any of his friends for carrying out that idea.

Mr. VENIOT: The Minister of Railways has been on his feet half a dozen times while I have been up only once. If he wishes to reply to me, let him do so after I am finished. Every hon. member within hearing of my voice knows that in 1928 and 1929, and especially in 1927, the Minister of Railways and others were very critical in opposition. He was a member of the committee that held up the estimates of the Post Office Department for twenty-one days. They obstructed the proceedings of the house because I, as Postmaster General, had been distributing patronage. They claimed that I had not done the right thing in the appointment and dismissal of postmasters, and the Minister of Railways cannot deny that.

Mr. MANION: I do deny it so far as patronage is concerned.

Mr. VENIOT: I cannot accept the denial.

Mr. MANION: You do not need to.

Mr. VENIOT: Under the rules of the house I am obliged to accept it, but the records of this parliament will show that I am right. I leave it to the records and ask hon. members to look them up and see who is correct, the Minister of Railways or P.J.V.?

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Who is he?

Mr. VENIOT: Let me go a step further. The Minister of Public Works says that they have been successful in preventing patronage in the distribution of work for relief purposes. Even though he was not fair at that time, I am fair enough to give credit where I think credit is due. I appealed to the Minister of Public Works to stop the patronage in the distribution of relief work in the county of Gloucester and he wrote and told me that instructions had been issued to the provincial engineer that that system should be abolished. The minister, at my suggestion, sent their engineer to a certain port in the county of Gloucester where wharf repairs have been going on. The engineer tried to straighten out, and did straighten out certain conditions that were shameful; but the very moment his back was turned the foreman in charge, under the direction of the patronage gentleman of the county, the defeated Conservative candidate, took these Liberals off the job and put Conservatives back again. These men were in desperate circumstances. There were four of them, fathers of families, with not a bite in the house to eat. They applied for work and were turned aside by the foreman and distinctly told that they had voted the wrong way. It was then, when I was made aware of the situation, that I called the attention of the minister to it. He was good enough to take the matter up, and he tried to remedy it, but it was never remedied. It was remedied one day; but the distributor of patronage on behalf of the government went down the next day and threatened to dismiss the foreman if he did not carry out his instructions. His remarks were these, "I am running the public works in the province of New Brunswick; not the Minister of Public Works of the dominion." I am only pointing this out to show the minister that no matter what efforts are made there are political partisans so narrow that they will take advantage of the occasion to carry out their own free wishes, and to punish those who they think should be punished. In spite of any government that practice will be carried on, but it should not be carried on under the conditions that exist in Canada to-day.

Let me go a step further in the matter of the distribution of work for the unemployed, since it has been brought up and discussed, though I know it does not come up under this item.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Sullivan): I think the chairman is giving too much leeway.

Mr. VENIOT: It is too late to raise that question now; I claim the same privilege as the others. I want to make a submission to the Minister of Railways. I know that the answer will be, "It is a matter of administration with which I have nothing to do." Well, it will be a sorry day for Canada, it will be a sorry day for any government, when a gentleman bearing the title of Minister of Railways has to stand up in the house and say he has nothing whatever to do with the railways of Canada, especially when flagrant injustices are pointed out to him, such as I am now going to mention. The railway authorities at Moncton issued instructions, during a very severe winter, with reference to the clearing of snow in northern New Brunswick, that persons taken on to do that work along the railways should be in the first place married men. I approve of that, for I think it is a good move. They said that there should be no discrimination as to who the parties might be, provided they were in need of work. The instructions were that they should take men who were on direct relief and put them to work along the railway line. In the lower part of the county of Gloucester the railway runs from Tracadie to Shippegan, a distance of some eighteen or twenty miles, and from Inkerman Junction to Caraquet, fourteen miles. The road then runs from Caraquet to Bathurst for forty-five miles. The district between Tracadie and Shippegan had to employ hundreds and hundeds of men owing to the early severe snowstorm, as a result of which the snow was some six feet deep. The section foreman at Tracadie did not, would not employ men on relief; instead, he took on friends of his and put them to work—as many as two men in one family, the sons of a farmer, men who were well to do and had no need of any such work to carry them through the winter. This condition of affairs I brought to the attention of the manager of the Atlantic region, Mr. Appleton, and asked him to investigate it. He told me they had given instructions not to do anything of that kind, but the instructions were not carried out. I believe the matter was investigated and remedied to some extent, but only for a short time. The same thing took place after the next snowstorm. I wish it distinctly understood that I am not blaming or criticizing the minister; I am simply pointing this out that the heads of the railways should get into closer touch with conditions and see that their instructions are carried out, especially in these times when people need work to keep their families.

Under the conditions that exist in Canada to-day there should not be employed on relief work any man who does not need it; it should go to those with dependents, who are out of work and have no means whatever of providing for those dependents. It is for that reason that I bring the attention of the Minister of Railways to this condition of affairs, in the hope that he will have influence enough with the railway administration to see that in future they will get into closer touch—at any rate, those whose duty it is to do so—with the men over whom they have supervision, in order to have the work done without discrimination.

Mr. MANION: I have never heard of the incident which the hon. gentleman has described, and I can say quite frankly that I have never endeavoured to interfere in the employment of any railway men, because that is a matter entirely in the hands of the management. Nor do I think that the Minister of Railways in the late government tried to interfere with employees. I know that my hon. friend made it clear that he was not criticizing me personally, and I shall be glad to pass on to the management the remarks he has made.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Unless I am led astray by my poor knowledge of the English language, the word which the Minister of Railways used to qualify a political opponent, the word enemy, is a very strong one, after the wonderful speech we heard a few days ago asking the house and the country to cooperate with him in putting the dominion on a proper footing. I say this courteously to the Minister of Railways, inviting him on reflection to give a little explanation of this word.

Mr. MARCIL: When I spoke about these works in Bonaventure I referred to federal works; I never thought of works as being carried on jointly by the dominion and the province. The system is this. The province asks for work, and if the dominion agrees to it the province carries on the work. That is the system now in operation. I was referring to the works carried on under the supervision of the minister himself in the repairing of wharves along the sea shore. I make bold to say that during the last three years no Liberal has been employed on any of those works. That situation may have been brought about without the knowledge of the minister, but I would be interested to know whether the minister at any time gave the resident engineer instructions that men should be employed on such works irrespective of their nationality or political affiliations. If that is so, I should like to have the information.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The instructions will be found in Hansard of a couple of years ago, I think it was 1931, when the dominion undertook on its own account a program of public works for the relief of unemployment. At that time, in answer to objections similar to those that are now being raised by my hon. friend, I read into Hansard the instructions given in regard to carrying out works for the relief of unemployment. Those instructions were not given in connection with our regular program of works once we got through the relief program.

Mr. MARCIL: I have had no complaints regarding relief because that is carried on by the municipality.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): My hon. friend is mistaken there. Those instructions were given in connection with relief works carried out and paid for wholly by the dominion in 1931.

Mr. MARCIL: Those instructions are not in force at the present time.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Not in connection with our regular program of works.

Mr. MARCIL: I wanted the minister to admit that.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I said that.

Mr. GOBEIL: Listening, as I did very carefully, to the remarks of the hon. member for Gloucester, I almost thought he was speaking of things happening in the province of Quebec where on all works under the supervision of the provincial authorities no one can get work unless he is a recognized Liberal.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order!

Mr. GOBEIL: I am referring now to relief works supervised and conducted by the provincial authorities, more particularly by the Department of Colonization of Quebec.

Mr. BRADETTE: Is the hon. gentleman a provincial or a federal member?

Mr. GOBEIL: I ask the chairman to give me the same privilege as was accorded to other hon. members who have been speaking on everything. In respect to works undertaken by the Department of Colonization of Quebec, financed fifty per cent by provincial authorities and fifty per cent by this government, the provincial government do not even notify the authorities of the municipality in which the work is done. They simply send instructions to one of their good followers, one of their parish leaders, giving him full power to employ whomsoever he likes, regardless of the municipal authorities, who are not even consulted. I agree in a way with the hon. member for Gloucester on the question of patronage, but at the same time I do not believe the Minister of Railways was quite correct in the statement he made and I intend to give an illustration for my reason for holding that opinion. Under the administration of the ex-Postmaster General, two rural postmasters were dismissed in Compton county without an investigation of any kind and without their having an opportunity of being heard. When this government came into power our friends asked that these postmasters be reinstated, but I could not get that from the present Postmaster General. There is a difference between the principles of the Liberals and those of the Conservatives in regard to patronage and it is this: when the Liberals come into power, they dismiss every Conservative they can and replace them by Liberals. When the Conservatives come into power, they make very few dismissals—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GOBEIL: I agree that they give preference to their friends, and it would be a shame if that were not the case; but they do not go half as far as the Liberals do when they come into power. Some day I will give the house the details, but I have in my hand a document showing that several dozens of civil employees were dismissed after the election of 1926 without investigation and without their having an opportunity to demonstrate whether the complaints made against them were right or not. That is the difference that exists between the two parties.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Were they appointed by the shadow government?

Mr. GOBEIL: They had been in their positions anywhere from five, ten, fifteen to twenty years; I do not know who appointed them.

Item agreed to.

British Columbia—Dominion public buildings—improvements and repairs, $25,000.

Vancouver—instalment on purchase of armoury, $14,000.

Vancouver public building—to meet one year's interest at 5 per cent on mortgage of $400,000, $20,000.

Mr. REID: Would the minister explain what the improvements are in connection with Dominion public buildings? I might follow that up with a question as to the mortgage on the Vancouver public building. How long has that to run and how long has it been in existence?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): As to the repairs on the Dominion public buildings, I can only say that this item is one that we have carried for many years to meet necessary repairs from time to time. We have not any list of them now. The architect will make an examintion and report from time to time the expenditures that should be made.

Mr. REID: It is no special building; it is just general?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No special building—any building that needs repair. As to the item of $20,000 to meet one year's interest on a mortgage, this is required for payment to the Montreal Trust Company of one year's interest on a mortgage of $400,000 held by that company on the Winch building in Vancouver. This building was purchased in 1925, subject to mortgage, and this pays the instalment of interest on it.

Mr. REID: How long has the mortgage to run?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The mortgage is past due, but we are just carrying it on rather than raising the money to pay it off.

Mr. HANBURY: I want for a minute to revert to the question of armouries, as the minister has been good enough to call this item. I should like to ask him what units there are in Vancouver and also what accommodation they have. While he is looking up that information, I should like again to refer to the question of the purchase rental basis and to give the committee some information of which I have direct knowledge. The government were for a number of years renting a building known as the old horseshoe building in Vancouver for the sum of $9,000 a year. It was practically a condemned building and very inflammable, and in that building the government had stored a large amount of very valuable guns and ammunition. As you will see by this item, they have been able to construct an armoury for an annual cost of $14,000 that has provided practically ideal quarters, that is giving some insurance against fire and that encourages those men who are giving their time and attention to the development of our militia.

So, with regard to the construction of armouries, I want to assure the minister and the members that I am thoroughly in accord with such construction where there is need for it. At the same time I should like to point out to the minister and to the Minister of National Defence, whom I am pleased to see in his seat, that there are other units in Vancouver lacking proper accommodation. I refer particularly in the first instance to the Seaforth Highlanders; I think they are called the 72nd brigade, although I am not sure. I think the Seaforth Highlanders are spread over three different buildings. They are one of our best units and deserve some encouragement. I understand representations have been made to the government that an armoury should be constructed. I should prefer to have that armoury built, if it is to be built, by the government in the regular way they construct government buildings, but if we cannot get an armoury on that basis, I am quite prepared to subscribe to the rental basis. I really do think something should be done for the Seaforth Highlanders; and there is another unit as well whose name I have forgotten for the moment. They are located in rented quarters in a different part of the city from that from which they draw the greater part of their membership, and they are also entitled to the support of the government.

In that connection I would suggest to the government that if they are to recognize the militia, and if there is such a thing as defence necessary, probably there is no place in Canada where such encouragement should be more freely given than in Vancouver. Vancouver is on the Pacific and we all look with perhaps some apprehension to what might happen on the Pacific in the not distant future. Vancouver is so situated that it might become involved in any trouble in that area. The government would be justified in giving consideration to this matter, and I think they should give some further encouragement to those men who have been carrying on for a number of years under very great disabilities. Perhaps the minister could tell the committee what stage the negotiations have reached with regard to an armoury for the Seaforth Highlanders, and perhaps if there is nothing of a definite nature he may assure the house at least that very sympathetic consideration will be given and an analysis made of the situation in British Columbia generally and in Vancouver particularly with reference to the further construction of armouries and whatever works of defence may be necessary.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am very glad to hear the remarks of the hon. member, and I appreciate the way he has spoken about the Seaforth Highlanders of Vancouver. Undoubtedly they are one of our best regiments, and they have a splendid history behind them. We in the department appreciate the strong claims they have at the present time for better accommodation; personally I think I would rank their claim above that of any other unit in Canada. For a number of years they have been in quarters that are not satisfactory, but in spite of that their loyalty and support have been magnificent. During the last two or three years, and in fact ever since I have been in the department, approaches have been made with regard to better accommodation.

When I came into office I found Vancouver in a particularly bad situation. The hon. gentleman has referred to the cavalry and artillery, and the condition in which their building was maintained. I think it would be generally regarded that their claim was very strong, because the quarters were condemned and were absolutely unsafe for the storage of valuable goods. So they took precedence, but all during these years we have been in negotiation with the Seaforth Highlanders. The only thing I can say, of course, is that I have every sympathy for their claim, and if it is possible to meet their wishes I shall be glad to do everything I can; for in meeting their wishes we will be working for the good of the country as a whole.

Mr. HANBURY: Would the minister refer also to the unit, the name of which has slipped my mind, which is located in the eastern portion of Vancouver? They are in rented quarters also. Perhaps if the Minister of Public Works referred to his notes he could tell us the name of the unit.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I think that is what is called the Irish regiment.

Mr. HANBURY: I wish to place myself on record as supporting their claims also.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Of course it would be absolutely impossible to provide new accommodation in both cases. When I was in Vancouver last I saw the accommodation provided for the Irish regiment, and while it may leave something to be desired, undoubtedly their case does not approach that of the Seaforth Highlanders.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has raised a question which no doubt is very important in a way, or which at least has to do with a very important principle. To-day I believe that so far as the danger of war is concerned the world is in a more critical situation than it has been at any time since the great war broke out in 1914. But one thing is very clear, and it is that those nations which are arming the most and spending the greatest sums on armaments are the nations who fear war the most. Those nations of Europe that have decided to disarm are not afraid of war breaking out or of being invaded by armed forces, but the nations which are arming to the teeth are constantly in fear of armed invasion.

Recently, Mr. Chairman, the leaders of the three parties in the Dominion of Canada, the Prime Minister, the leader of the opposition and the president of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, made an appeal for peace and disarmament, expressing their hope that everything possible would be done to promote peace. I am convinced that Canada cannot arm either for offence or defence to any effective extent, for the obvious reason that we have not the means. Even if we had the means I believe it would be useless for us to attempt it, and I hope that neither my good friend the Minister of Public Works nor the Minister of National Defence will take any steps to give us further armaments in the city of Vancouver or on the Pacific coast. If we have money to spend I can bring to the attention of the government many ways in which they can spend money to far better advantage than in training soldiers and building armouries. I can show them how they can spend money on the health and education of the children of the city of Vancouver, who are very much neglected at the present time. I pointed out a few days ago when speaking in this house that the municipal inspector of schools in the city of Vancouver stated that the annual report showed there were 4,000 children in the city of Vancouver alone who needed dental care. He stated further that it was through lack of funds that such care could not be provided. Surely, when a necessity of this kind is evident, it is madness to go on spending money on useless armaments or anything to promote or encourage warfare, when far more pressing things are waiting to be done. It is necessary that we should do everything possible to promote our security, but I am convinced that that can be done in other ways, more efficiently than it can be done by building armouries, or anything of that kind, not only in the city of Vancouver but anywhere in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Under the heading of public buildings for British Columbia I should like once more to remind the minister and the government about the situation in Prince Rupert. We have a building at that point which, as I have stated before, would not make a satisfactory barn on a farm. I had before me a few days previously figures showing that at that point we collect hundreds of thousands of dollars for the federal treasury. I know as a fact that in cold weather the employees in the building have to go home because of the unsatisfactory condition of the building in which they are working. It is absolutely necessary that the Minister of Public Works and the government should look into this matter.

May I mention, further, that we have a provincial building which cost $500,000, but their collections are insignificant when compared with those of the federal authorities. I know that the minister has full information, because I have sent it to him myself. He has been approached, also, by the board of trade and different organizations of Prince Rupert. I should like him to assure me that he is looking into the conditions and trying to find a remedy.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): From time to time I have received representations from the hon. gentleman concerning the building in the city of Prince Rupert. He must recognize the fact that we have curtailed our program, and that there is practically no provision for new buildings. I assure him, however, that the requirements of Prince Rupert will not be overlooked when again we reach our stride.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): It may be possible that the work could be done under the new public works program about which we have heard. It may be that the minister cannot say anything about it as yet, but we have heard that there is to be a relief scheme in connection with which there will be certain public works, and I am suggesting that probably it would be possible to have something done under that scheme.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It will not be overlooked in that connection either. Would you allow me, Mr. Chairman, as we have been speaking about armouries, to refer to the point raised by the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol) concerning the specifications for the materials in the armouries at Toronto. I have a copy of the general conditions and specifications for work and material for the fourteenth infantry brigade armoury at Toronto, Canada. The architects are Marani, Lawson and Morris, and on page 21, clause 10, I find the following:

All materials of whatever nature used throughout in the execution of this contract shall be new and of the best quality of their several kinds and must be Canadian and of Canadian manufacture unless the architect is convinced that they cannot be obtained or manufactured in Canada. In every case where a contractor submits for approval materials of any nature other than Canadian origin of the material desired to be used must be stated. The architect will give first preference to the material of Canadian production or manufacture and where materials of Canadian production or manufacture are not obtainable preference will be given to materials of British production or manufacture. No defective, unsound or improper materials worked or otherwise shall be brought to the premises or used in the building. Materials adjudged as such by the architect must be replaced upon demand.

I think that covers the question raised by the hon. member.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am grateful to the minister for reading the specifications. When I received information which apparently was more or less erroneous, namely that the specifications did not call for all Canadian manufacture, I went down to the department and discussed this very subject with the departmental officials. They informed me that the specifications pertaining to armouries built along the plans of this one,—that is, not by the department itself but by outside architects, and with the same financial set up as these armouries have—did not contain such a clause. It was on the information which I received from the department itself that I raised the question to-day. I now have pleasure in congratulating the minister upon seeing to it that the specifications do contain those regulations.

Mr. HANBURY: I should like to obtain some information from the minister with reference to the addition to the post office contemplated to the north of the present post office building in the city of Vancouver. Could the minister give any information in that connection?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): We have no vote for or plans drafted for that building. It will receive consideration in any program which may be brought down for public works.

Mr. HANBURY: On the suggestion of the minister that it will receive consideration I should like to suggest to him that when plans are being made for that addition they should be prepared for a complete building, and that it should not be simply an addition or a repair job. The present post office building does not lend itself to an addition. I would suggest that an addition, when being planned, should provide for the eventual tearing down of the present post office building and, at a later date, the tearing down of the Winch building, and making the building uniform. In connection with the contemplated building I would remind the minister of the large amount of money being expended by the government for the rental of space in the city of Vancouver, and I would suggest to him that, if public works do carry themselves, an extension to the post office building in Vancouver would probably go farther towards carrying itself than many other buildings which might be considered. I hope the government will give very careful consideration to the matter.

Item agreed to.

Mr. RALSTON: Would there be any objection to calling item 106?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): There was some objection.

Mr. RALSTON: Very well.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacNicol): We will proceed to item 99:

Manitoba—Dominion public buildings—improvements and repairs, $15,000.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the minister give details in regard to this item?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This is the same type of item as we have had for other provinces to cover repairs that may be required. I have no particulars. The amount is the same as we expended last year for similar purposes. I do not know where the money will be expended at all; it will depend upon the needs.

Mr. BROWN: I should like to propose a method whereby I think public money could be very profitably expended in the construction of public buildings. I brought this matter to the attention of the predecessor of the present minister. In many places where public buildings have been constructed by the Dominion government, the buildings have been too elaborate costing sometimes $25,000 or $30,000 or $40,000 for a small community, and it has been suggested to me that instead of spending $25,000 or more we could spend $5,000 or $10,000 in the construction of a smaller building, and in that way the work and the money would be distributed much more widely. In our province there are places where land was acquired as a site for a public building as long as twenty years ago, and where nothing has been done to erect the public building. I have in mind two fairly large towns in my constituency which need public buildings and which I think are entitled to them, and from one of them the suggestion has come to me that a public building such as I have mentioned costing a comparatively small sum would meet the needs of the case. Larger buildings constructed on a more elaborate scale, with special heating plant and so forth, of necessity require a caretaker, but a smaller building such as I am now suggesting could be taken care of by the postmaster himself and would meet the needs of the case. It would be cheaper not only in its original cost but in maintenance charges as well.

I do not know what may be included in the government's program of public works. There is nothing in the main estimates for public buildings in the western provinces, perhaps not in the other provinces, but I do not see why the contemplated program of public works should not include the construction of public buildings, and if comparatively small buildings such as I have mentioned were erected, which would perfectly well serve the needs of many communities, the work could be very much more widely distributed and local men would in a large measure be employed.

As to the question of material to be used in these buildings, in the absence of my hon. friend from Weyburn (Mr. Young) it almost devolves upon me to advance a point that I am sure he would advance if he were here, that some consideration might possibly be given to the revenues of the country which would be swelled if outside material were used. There is always a danger of overemphasizing the desirability of using only Canadian material. There is just the possibility that while that may be to the immediate advantage of some buisness concerns, the general interest of the country might suffer if the difference in cost is too great because that would simply come back on the taxpayers of this dominion.

I had a suggestion come to me the other day from a man in the west which might be considered radical, if not extreme, and that is that in the case of public buildings the material should be constructed. That may seem an extreme suggestion, and yet it sets forth a point of view which I think ought to be considered. In the past objection has been made that a large proportion of the money spent on relief works did not go directly to the relief of the unemployed, that too great a proportion went for material. Of course, we know that in the preparation of the materials used in these buildings other men are employed, but is it not just possible that the men employed in these other industries were not as much in need of relief as the men who were doing the actual work on the relief undertaking, public building or whatever it might have been? I think some consideration must be given to that phase of the matter. Naturally we want to see all businesses prosper, but consideration should be given to the point of view that a larger amount of money should be directed to the relief of those in actual need.

I hope that the minister will give consideration to these points and to the desirability of constructing not such elaborate buildings as have been constructed in the past, but buildings on a more modest scale that would perfectly well meet the need of many of the smaller communities to which they would be a source of pride.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I just want to offer a word or two to the genial Minister of Public Works. I do not thing that in this item the minister is breaking his heart by being too generous. May I suggest to him that when this contemplated program of $50,000,000 or more is put into effect he open his heart to the province of Manitoba and give it its just share of public works?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I think it is really the purse, not the heart, that my hon. friend wants opened. With respect to the suggestion of my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Brown) the problem of providing public buildings in these smaller places is a difficult one. I find that the smaller places are rather ambitious to have pretty good looking and expensive buildings.

Mr. DUFF: So are small men.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Quite so, and big ones too sometimes.

Mr. BROWN: But they are more prepared to recognize the situation now than they have been in the past.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The policy has to be very carefully considered in these times of stringency and difficulty, particularly as these buildings are paid for out of revenues. In the smaller places we are rather inclined to encourage the construction of community halls or the rental of a suitable place in a public building constructed by a municipality. We can afford to be pretty generous in the matter of rentals and at the same time get suitable accommodation much cheaper than by providing a building of our own, and I say that the time has come when economy is necessary in the construction of these public buildings. In many of these small communities buildings that were constructed for other purposes, banks and so on, are being offered to us at very reasonable prices, and other buildings that are not now in use, stores and so forth, can be purchased much cheaper than we can construct buildings, which of course involve after their construction an annual charge for maintenance, heating, etc. So the problem is not as easy or as simple as it looks on the surface.

[Mr. Brown.]

Mr. COOTE: I am sure the minister will find quite a lot of bank buildings in towns in western Canada that he could buy. The banks seem to have gone out of the banking business and will no doubt be glad to get rid of some of their buildings if they can get the Dominion government to buy them.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Ours was sold for a church.

Mr. COOTE: I think the suggestion which has been made by the hon. member for Lisgar is a very good one. There are many towns in Canada which should have public buildings in which to house a post office but do not need buildings costing from $20,000 to $25,000. A couple of years ago I went to the trouble of obtaining from the officials of the Alberta government plans for telephone buildings which had been erected in that province. In many cases these buildings had cost only $6,000, $7,000 or $8,000, and a similar building would be quite large enough for a post office. When the minister is considering the public works program for Alberta I hope he will remember that very little has been done in the three prairie provinces in the way of the erection of public buildings. I do not intend to ask for the amounts spent in the various provinces by his department, but if he will go back as far as confederation I know he will find that the amounts spent in the three western provinces do not begin to compare with what has been spent in other provinces.

We do need public buildings in many places but I like the suggestion made by the minister that certain towns might put up community halls in which could be provided suitable space for a post office. I again offer the same suggestion that I made two years ago that in many places the federal and provincial governments should cooperate in the erection of public buildings. Such a building could house the telephone office and post office, and perhaps one or two other government offices. The building could be taken care of by one janitor, it would be cheaper for everybody and would provide better accommodation for the public. There are some places where this could be done, and I think in this respect there should be cooperation between the federal and provincial governments.

I hope the minister presses his suggestion in connection with the erection of community halls in the smaller places. There are many places which need such accommodation. In my own constituency I believe there is only one public building, but I speak subject to correction. I have received requests from three towns for post office buildings, and they are needed badly in each case. I am putting these facts forward in order that the minister can assure the government that there is a real need for the construction of public buildings in various places in Canada. I am sure that nearly every hon. member could tell the minister of places where a public building is needed. I shall be glad to furnish him with a list of the places in my constituency. I remember asking a former minister of public works how much he could spend if a public building was erected in every place where the citizens had asked for it, and he replied that while he had not made an estimate, he thought he could spend well over $100,000,000.

Mr. HANBURY: You would have to inflate the currency.

Mr. COOTE: That would not be a very dangerous inflation, seeing that we have been deflated in currency and credit to the extent of about $700,000,000. Without saying anything more, I urge the minister to present to the other members of the cabinet the requests for public buildings which I am sure he has filed in his office. I take it for granted that most of these requests are warranted.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers—Nova Scotia—under contract—Cow Bay (Port Morien)—breakwater replacement, $17,000.

Yarmouth harbour—dredging, $41,000.

Essential undertakings—

Blandford — breakwater-wharf replacement, $4,500.

Black Point—harbour protection, $3,600.

Broad Cove Marsh — breakwater-wharf replacement, $12,500.

Halifax—repairs to wharfs and replacement of machine shop at R.C.N. barracks and H.M.C. dockyards, $25,000.

Phinneys Green—wharf, $4,900.

Port Dufferin (John Vogler's shore)—breakwater, $4,900.

Port Mouton — breakwater replacement, $6,900.

Trout cove (Centreville)—breakwater extension, $4,200.

Harbours and rivers generally—for maintenance of services, no new work to be undertaken, $225,000.

Mr. RALSTON: I should like to direct the minister's attention to a number of very modest projects which are needed in my province. Most of these are known already to him, either by letter or by personal interview. I should like to gather them up together and put them before him at this time, as most of them come within the terms of the blanket vote for "harbours and rivers generally, for maintenance of services, no new works to be undertaken." These facilities are urgently needed in connection with the fishing industry, particularly the activities of the shore fishermen. They are needed for the purpose of providing safe landing for boats, protection and shelter, and for convenience. That is to say, with the proper facilities the men would not need to leave on the tide an hour or two earlier than they must do at present. With a proper wharf or breakwater the men would be able to have their boats afloat and leave at a later hour. I might say to the minister that these men leave at three, four and five o'clock in the morning and if there are no facilities, they have to return on the tide. Sometimes this return is under pretty strenuous conditions when rough weather happens to kick up while they are out.

The first project is the completion of some work already undertaken at West Baccaro. There was a breakwater and boat harbour there which served this community which is down on the most southerly and westerly point of Nova Scotia at Cape Sable. The activities of this community are confined almost exclusively to fishing, both lobster and fresh. A boat harbour and breakwater is essential and these facilities have been destroyed or injured by storms. I believe the minister has a report in connection with this matter, as some work has been done already.

The total amount needed to complete the projects I have in mind would not amount to a quarter of what we have just voted for military buildings. The vote for military buildings totals about $100,000. There are items which cannot be deleted because they are under contract, but the people do not understand why these large amounts should be voted for such projects when they cannot get the modest sum needed to provide them with very necessary facilities.

The next item is the extension to the breakwater at the west end of upper Surette island. This is another fishing community, and a breakwater would be of great service to the people. The next is repairs to the public wharf and extension of the breakwater at Shag Harbour. When we speak of breakwaters we generally think of them as being large projects, but the one needed at Shag Harbour would be a modest affair and could be carried out with the expenditure of comparatively few dollars. A little dredging is needed at The Hawk and this could be done with departmental dredge, number sixteen. This community is located on Cape Sable island out near Clarke's Harbour, well out in the Atlantic, and the protection is needed for the fishermen. A breakwater was built at Louishead in 1887 but it has been practically demolished. This is a fishing community and the destruction of that facility has proven to be a very serious matter to the people. Some work has been done at Lower East Pubnico, and I should like the minister to carry it on and provide the necessary facilities for this community. The fishermen now find it necessary to go a long distance to the fishing grounds and this facility would prove of great help. Another matter is the building of a road between the landing and the light on Bon Portage island. This would require an expenditure of only a few hundred dollars.

These requests are very modest but they are in the interests of the fishermen. They are needed for the carrying on of their activities and the expenditure of this money would assist in providing employment. It would not be in the nature of direct relief, because it would provide a facility which is as nearly self-liquidating as anything could be; that is to say, it would assist people in carrying on their ordinary vocations. I do urge on the minister favourable consideration of these matters, either in connection with this vote or in connection with whatever program of public works for relief may be carried on. These are not relief projects the utility of which is questionable; they will provide a useful addition to the equipment of these people for carrying on their work.

There are three more or less major projects and these have to come within the relief vote, or at least a supplementary estimate for public works. First there is the need of a facility at Lockeport, the money for which was voted some three or four years ago. The contract was let, but that was cancelled after this government came in. That money was intended for the provision of some sort of suitable facility in Lockeport harbour to afford protection for boats as well as protection for the shore owing to the situation there due to the action of the sea. The fishermen down there have got together in reference to this facility and have determined that this is what would be best—because there has been a good deal of confusion and difference of opinion. The practically unanimous decision is for some sort of substantial piece of blocking, not necessarily attached to the shore, which would probably be the most suitable facility for protecting the boats there.

Another needed improvement is a wharf at Yarmouth, with regard to which representations have recently been made to the Minister of Finance and probably direct to the minister as well. That is a major work. Yarmouth is an important port. There is no public wharf there, but there are a number of private wharves, and the provision of a public wharf would afford employment to men there and would encourage a thriving port which does a great deal of business. It would be to the advantage not only of that section of the country as well as of the whole province of Nova Scotia, but of the country at large, because it is essentially a Canadian port. There are more passengers in and out that port throughout the year than in any other port in Canada. Hon. members may be surprised at that, but owing to the Boston and New York services you will find that the passenger service there is greater throughout the year than in any other Canadian port including Montreal, Halifax and Vancouver.

The other major item is the completion of a breakwater at Port Maitland, a facility which has been needed by the fishermen and the provision of which, so far as it has been constructed, has been of great benefit, having practically provided a harbour where otherwise there would have been open shore, and where a very large fishing industry is prosecuted, both in fresh fish and in lobster.

I commend these three items to the minister, not in connection with this particular vote but in connection with a supplementary vote or in connection with any program which may be instituted by this government in the way of public works for relief purposes.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): As I recall, nearly all these items have been the subject of correspondence and representation in the recent past. It will be seen that the vote has been reduced from last year and it covers the whole of the province. We shall have to take into consideration the demands and requirements of other sections and try to harmonize them, doing the best we can. I am glad that the hon. gentleman has collected them all together and summarized the situation, and I shall give consideration to the larger projects in connection with any program of public works that may be determined.

Mr. RALSTON: The small ones are needed as much as the large items, but I thought they might be taken care of in connection with the general item.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is no exaggeration to say that there are hundreds of similar requests, and we shall have to do the best we can for all sections.

Mr. DUFF: I am rather disappointed in the minister's answer to the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston). He admitted that the vote was smaller this year than it was last year. That is quite correct, and that is the sad part; it shows the way this government has been carrying on the affairs of the country. I hold in my hand the estimates for 1934, and it will be seen by those estimates that for Nova Scotia, in 1933-34, there was voted a sum of $417,900. This year, as the minister apologetically admits, that item has been reduced to $349,500.

We hear a good deal about turning the corner and about prosperity being in the offing, but this does not look like it. I want particularly to sympathize with my good friends the Conservative members from Nova Scotia. How they can sit in their seats and allow the Minister of Public Works of this government to bring down these few small items for that province is beyond my comprehension. So far as my own constituency is concerned, if I were speaking politically I would congratulate the government upon every item left out for that constituency. There is not an item this year; there was not one last year, and there has not been one since this Tory government came into power. Not one dollar has been spent regularly under the department's estimates. It is true that certain items were spent by virtue of the subterfuge known as relief; and the expenditure of relief money by this government in the matter of public works is a disgrace to Nova Scotia. What have we in these estimates? Take the county of Pictou, represented by my good friend opposite. I cannot understand how he can sit in his place and control himself. There is not one dollar for the great county of Pictou. Look back to 1930, or 1929, or 1928, or go back to any of the years to 1922; every year during that period there appeared in the estimates for public works in that county, not thousands nor ten of thousands but hundreds of thousands of dollars. Those were the sums voted for Pictou, the greatest county in Nova Scotia, yes, in the Dominion of Canada, a county which has sent more men than any other county in Canada to the parliament of this dominion, a county which has produced more clergymen and professional men, doctors and lawyers, than any other. And yet, with this government in power and my good friend opposite representing the county—I am sure he must have tried to impress his views upon the minister—there is not one dollar for that county. I do not know whether my hon. friend hopes to get to the Senate, but there is some reason why he sits silent. Take other parts of the great province of Nova Scotia. There is a small vote for Cow Bay, the great district of south Cape Breton. Under the last government, as the minister will find if he looks up the records, there was voted for south Cape Breton alone in 1929 the sum of $125,000; yet under this government, who tell us that they have turned the corner, that prosperity is coming to this country, all they provide for that district is $17,000. And the joke is that this is a revote; it is not money voted this year but money that has been voted for the last two years. Let us take my own great county, where I live and move and have my being, the county of Lunenburg. In these estimates all I find for the whole county, having regard to what the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth says about the fishing industry, is $4,500. Is that the way to treat the fishermen of that portion of Nova Scotia? Does the minister expect that they can pursue their vocation, bringing treasure from the sea and thus building up this country, with an expenditure of only $4,500?

Take the constituency of Cumberland represented by my hon. friend opposite: Is there a dollar for Malagash? No. Yet I know he has gone to the minister and asked that the harbour of Malagash be deepened so that ships can enter there, load salt and deliver it to the fishermen along the coasts of the maritime provinces and Newfoundland. Not a dollar for Malagash in the Nova Scotia estimates. This is another example of "peanut money," and this very estimate of the government is the greatest condemnation of it. As my leader and others have said, the best thing the government can do if they cannot find more money for Nova Scotia for public works such as harbours and rivers, repairs and improvements, than the small items which appear in the estimates, the quicker they resign and let others take charge of the affairs of the country, the better.

Mr. STANLEY: Where is Lunenburg?

Mr. DUFF: I say to my hon. friend he does not know his geography. The government have put in the estimates only $4,500 for the whole county of Lunenburg, one of the greatest fishing areas not only in Nova Scotia but in the Dominion of Canada. All that the government, on account of mismanagement, on account of the fact that they are strangling trade and not trying to do anything for the Canadian people, can put in the estimates for that great county is $4,500. The same policy applies to everything else. I notice in the item of harbours and rivers generally, a reduction of $50,000. Last year the item was $275,000; the year before, if I remember correctly, it was $325,000; in 1930 it was $400,000. I am sorry my good friend the Minister of Finance is not present. He at least should have got something for his county in Nova Scotia. but in the estimates there is not one dollar for the constituency represented by him. This government is riding for a fall as far as Nova Scotia is concerned. I am sorry for my Conservative friends opposite; they should have some influence with the government because they are all strong, silent men, especially silent; but they sit quietly in their seats and allow the Minister of Public Works and the government to bring down these estimates, only five out of twenty counties in Nova Scotia being given a single dollar to try to encourage the fishermen and other businessmen of that great province. This is a shame and a crime. Of course it may be possible that my friend the junior member for Halifax, the hon. member for Pictou, the hon. member for Cumberland, the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the others are being lulled to sleep by the Minister of Public Works or the Prime Minister because perhaps they have been promised part of this $50,000,000 which it is rumoured is to be voted for public works. Why not come out into the open? If we are going to vote that large amount, a portion of which Nova Scotia must get, why not put the items in the estimates?

As far as my county is concerned, politically the less money the government insert in the estimates, the better I like it, because every knock is a boost; every dollar they do not appropriate, means that I shall get more votes in that constituency and I thank the Minister of Public Works and the government for not spending a dollar there, because in the last fortnight I have been receiving letters from Tories as well as Grits saying that when the next election takes place they will give me a greater majority than ever before.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): There is just one interpretation that I can place upon the remarks of the hon. gentleman: I am forced to the conclusion that his appreciation of the people of Nova Scotia is that they vote according to the amount of money spent in their constituencies.

Mr. DUFF: Is the hon. member for Pictou going to stand for that?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I do not think that is a fair representation of the intelligence, the patriotism, of the people of Nova Scotia; it is a reflection upon them which they will resent very keenly when they come to cast their votes. Further, has my hon. friend not heard from his own side of the house a demand for economy throughout the country, for balanced budgets? He would disregard all that and say that this is the time when we should go out with open hands and spend money in the high, wide and handsome way in which his friends spent it, which expenditures unfortunately have seriously curtailed the revenues that are at the disposal of the government at this time. We are forced because of some of the reckless extravagances of the hon. gentleman's friends—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is so.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member's party spent more than we did.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): My hon. friend knows quite well and no member knows better than he does the expenditures in connection with the Canadian National Railways have seriously handicapped the present government.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. member agreed to them.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No.

Mr. VENIOT: He accepted every one of them.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Those expenditures made a serious inroad upon the revenues of this country, and as my hon. friend knows, these expenditures on public works are paid out of revenue and not from borrowings. If we accepted his contention, the budget instead of approaching balancing would be very much more in deficit than it is. Surely he does not consider a policy of that kind in these times of general depression is sound or one that any sane government would adopt.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

Mr. DUFF: When the committee rose at six o'clock the minister had just stated, if I understood him correctly, that the reason this small amount was placed in the main estimates for the province of Nova Scotia was that this money had to come out of revenue, and that he had to economize because the affairs of this country were in such bad shape when the government took office. I will admit that I am getting old, Mr. Chairman, and that I am old-fashioned; I am willing to admit that my memory is bad, but I do not ask you to take my word. If you look at the votes and proceedings or Hansard or the public accounts for 1929 and 1930 you will see that when the budget was brought down in 1930 the Liberal government had a surplus over expenditures of some $82,000,000. So I do not see why to-day, after this government has been in power for four years and my hon. friend has been Minister of Public Works for that length of time, he should say that they can only spend this small sum of money in the great province of Nova Scotia because of the condition of affairs when they took office. Let me remind the minister that Nova Scotia is one of the maritime provinces, a province whose men go down to the sea in ships and do business in the great waters. The expenditure in that province has been reduced year by year so that now it is down to a minimum, and the minister says the reason is the policy of the government previous to 1930.

The minister was not satisfied with that; he had to drag in the railway question. He stated that the fact that the Liberal government had spent money on the railways of this country was another reason why he had to economize in his expenditures on public works. Well, sir, I do not want to go outside of the items under consideration, but the expenditure on railways had or has nothing to do with the expenditure on harbours and rivers. We all know, however, that when the Liberal party took charge of this country we had only two streaks of rust from Vancouver to Halifax, and that by their policy the Liberal party built up a railway in this country. In 1921 the deficit on the railways amounted to $90,000,000, but when the Liberal party went out of office the railways were practically paying their own way. With a Conservative majority in the Senate and a Liberal majority in this parliament we could ask for the construction of the Sunnybrae-Guysborough branch line. Therefore I say that the minister should not try to camouflage the fact that so little money is spent either in the province of Nova Scotia or elsewhere, because the same condition applies in every province. Why should the minister drag in the railway question or the fact that these amounts of money must be spent out of revenue?

I do not want to go into details, Mr. Chairman, but the minister should not pretend that this bluebook sets out all the money that is to be voted for public works; the Minister of Public Works knows the details better than I do, and he knows that in the last three or four years tens and hundreds of thousands of dollars have been spent on public works by way of relief. I have no hesitation in saying that, so far as the province of Nova Scotia is concerned, in a large measure that money was wasted and never reached the people who should have received that so-called relief.

Before six o'clock my hon. friend tried to make out that this vote is small because the revenue is small. Who is to blame because the revenue is not greater? That is entirely due to the policies of this government. My hon. friend knows that in 1928, 1929 and 1930 the revenues of this country were expanding; he knows that in 1930 we had a surplus of $82,000,000, as I said before. The minister knows that trade has decreased under this government by at least seventy-five per cent. My hon. friend and his associates have so restricted Canada's trade that I cannot blame him for reducing expenditures. I pity him. I pity members of the government because they have not seen the necessity for expanding our trade but instead, in order to satisfy certain interests within their own ranks, have endeavoured to restrict trade. As a result trade has dropped, and instead of having a total trade of over two billion dollars as under the Liberal government we have the condition with which we are only too familiar, both in regard to our trade with Great Britain and our trade with foreign countries. That is the reason the minister has to go to the council and to the treasury board and receive this little pittance for his department. I want to say to my hon. friends opposite that so far as the public works of this country are concerned, and so far as the maritime provinces, those great provinces of New Brunswick,

Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia are concerned, we bring new money into this country every year. We go down to the sea and every dollar that we bring in from it is new money which is spent in this country, money which we derive from foreign countries—money for the produce which we take from the sea and export. I want to say to my hon. friends opposite that to-day we have a situation in Nova Scotia due mostly to the actions and policies of this government whereby we are so constricted and handicapped that the people of the province of Nova Scotia, in the fishing section of this country, are practically starving. Again I appeal to the hon. member for Pictou, again to the hon. members for Halifax, and to the hon. member for Cape Breton North-Victoria who will no doubt agree with me that the greatest fishing area in his native province borders his own constituency. I appeal to the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis and to every other hon. member from the province of Nova Scotia, and I say to them, "unite." I say that because I have no influence with this government—I do not want to have. Unite among yourselves and show the government that there is a great opportunity in the province of Nova Scotia, that there is connected with that province the greatest natural resource of this country—the fishing industry. How are hon. members going to improve the conditions when they vote—well, how much do they vote for my hon. friend's constituency? How much do they vote? Let me see, now—not a dollar for Annapolis-Digby, not a dollar for Cape Breton North-Victoria—not a dollar in the estimates. There is nothing in the estimates for Cumberland.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): I beg your pardon; there is.

Mr. DUFF: Where is it? Is the hon. member referring to Phinneys Green?

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): Yes.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, $4,900 for the great county of Cumberland. When the hon. member for Cumberland sat in this parliament with a Liberal government in power between the years 1925 and 1929 what did the estimates show, despite the fact that he was sitting in the opposition?

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): When my hon. friend has completed his remarks I shall tell him what this government has done for the county of Cumberland by way of public expenditures.

[Mr. Duff.]

Mr. DUFF: Probably the hon. member will wait until I have finished.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): I will wait.

Mr. DUFF: I say that my hon. friend must admit that when he sat in opposition to the government the Liberal party certainly made greater provision in the estimates for the county of Cumberland than is made to-day.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): I do not admit that, and I do not think it is true.

Mr. DUFF: Perhaps I had better send for the estimates. The fact remains that although the hon. member is an influential member in the party opposite all he can get in the main estimates for his own county is $4,900. I say this, that we can never expect the province of Nova Scotia to get out of its present condition, and never expect any part of that province to get anything when the government is willing to spend only the small amount appearing in the estimates before us.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: Mr. Chairman, since my hon. friend speaks about estimates, may I say that the estimates are given by the district engineer in Cape Breton, but there is nothing in them for Cape Breton North. But the district engineer is allowed so much and that money is distributed between the counties of Cape Breton North and Victoria.

Mr. DUFF: I am very glad the hon. member for Cape Breton North-Victoria has called that fact to my attention, because I had intended to deal with it. With that in mind I shall ask the minister to give the committee the list of estimates submitted to him and his department by the engineering branch of the province of Nova Scotia. I know that not only he but every other member in this House of Commons from Nova Scotia has submitted recommendations to the engineering department of the province, and the result is found in these paltry amounts appearing in the estimates. I should like the minister to give us the recommendations sent to him from the engineering department at Halifax.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member must know that I have not that information with me; I do not carry it with me. I have only the information as to the estimates presented to the committee.

Mr. DUFF: I shall ask the minister to get it before the amount is voted.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not producible.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): I had not expected to delay the passage of the minister's estimates, but because of the vociferous and stormy denunciation of the government we heard shortly before rising at six o'clock I think that in the interest of accuracy it would not be amiss for me to say a few words with special reference to the county I have the honour to represent in this house. I should not want the house to interpret my remarks to mean that I am perfectly satisfied that everything has been done that should be done with respect to public expenditures in the county of Cumberland or in the province of Nova Scotia. Furthermore I unhesitatingly say we anticipate that other expenditures will be made, perhaps in the very near future, which will more than make up for any delinquency there may be in the vote now before the committee.

In less than two years after this government took office upwards of $100,000 was expended on public works in the county of Cumberland. The money was spent on wharves, harbours, harbour improvements, breakwaters, public buildings and other public services. In a period of less than three years that expenditure has amounted to upwards of $130,000. If the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough reads the papers I feel sure he will have observed that within the last ten days, through governmental action there has been given to one of the industries in the town of Amherst, which is in the county of Cumberland, a contract for upwards of half a million dollars. That money will be expended to the benefit of the town and the people living therein, and will in a measure help to relieve the unemployment problem with which we are faced. Another firm in the constituency of Pictou has been given a contract of upwards of half a million dollars as well. I have not all the figures before me concerning expenditures in the province of Nova Scotia, but I have figures for one or two counties where expenditures have been made since July, 1930. I find that in the constituency of Digby-Annapolis over $600,000 has been expended. In order to be fair to the committee I should say that $250,000 or $300,000 of that was voted before the change of government. In the county of Halifax approximately one half million dollars has been expended. As I say, I have not had time to secure the amounts for the other counties in Nova Scotia, but I do assert that in the main the expenditures by this government since August of 1930 have been just as great relatively speaking as those made in the past by any government in Ottawa. I do not think that we have any reason whatever to complain of the treatment accorded by this government. I should like to repeat before I sit down, as I said at the beginning, that I do not wish my remarks to be interpreted to mean that we are completely satisfied with everything, and that we feel that everything has been secured which we need. Far from that, but I do say that under the stress of world conditions the government has dealt fairly with us, so far as the expenditure of public money in the province of Nova Scotia is concerned.

Mr. CANTLEY: Mr. Chairman, I should like my deep-water friend, the commodore of the Lunenburg fleet, who with the full consent of all the great powers still maintains his position as Lord High Admiral of the LaHave, Georges and Grand Banks, to know how fully I appreciate his self-sacrificing, disinterested and forceful expression of interest in my constituency. The member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) was most flattering in his references to my native county—all in good taste, and all within the strict bounds of truth. My gallant friend, however, in his zeal to berate the government, forgot for the moment that later we shall have supplementary estimates before us; also that old adage that all things come to those who wait. But may I also remind my hon. friend that if he will refer to the full list of public works in the county of Pictou receiving assistance at this time and be content to await the incoming supplementary tide he may perhaps then see that the county of Pictou is still floating in high water. If his constituency be not then equally fortunate I can assure him that he will have as sincere, if less vigorous an expression of my sympathy. That is all I can do for him under the circumstances.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: So far as the county of Cape Breton North-Victoria which I have the honour to represent is concerned, while we have not got just what we would like, I must say that during the last year the Public Works department have spent over $150,000 in developing the natural resources in my constituency. They have developed there a gypsum mine which has been one of the most important events in the history of the county, and all this has been done in the last two years. Before that, for many years we had been trying in vain to get a breakwater built. Within the last two years this government has spent over $125,000 on the breakwater alone. The development of the gypsum mine I spoke of is a great contribution to the solution of the problem of unemployment. The solution of that problem lies in the creation of new industries to provide work, and at this mine at Dingwall there is now employed a great number of men, and the mine is shipping gypsum not only to Canada, but, as the president, Mr. MacFarlane, informed me only yesterday, to England, where it has never been shipped before. The mine has a contract for five thousand tons of gypsum to be shipped to England, and all this is due to this government having spent money at Dingwall and opening up this great industry, building the breakwater, and dredging the harbour so that vessels could come in. Never before had a vessel entered that harbour, but last year before navigation closed, two thousand tons of gypsum were shipped out of Dingwall harbour across the Atlantic to England. So this government has done something for my county and for the development of our natural resources.

Mr. DUFF: I am delighted, Mr. Chairman, that I have got my hon. friends from Pictou (Mr. Cantley), Cumberland (Mr. Smith) and Cape Breton North-Victoria (Mr. Johnstone) to speak, and now that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) has come into the house he may have a few remarks to make after I am through. My hon. friends, especially the hon. member for Cumberland, have told the committee of the great amount of money that has been spent in their respective counties. I thought that we were discussing public works estimates, but the hon. member for Cumberland, in order to draw a red herring across the trail, told us about a contract which the railway company had given in Amherst for the building of cars.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): My hon. friend knows that I stated very clearly what the public works expenditures were. I mentioned $130,000. The other contract was upwards of half a million.

Mr. DUFF: But my hon. friend did mention the other contract of half a million, and I am dealing with that first; I shall deal with the other afterwards. If I had not drawn my hon. friend's fire he would not have got up to object, but would have let me go on. He knows that the half million contract has nothing to do with the public works estimates, that that contract comes entirely within the purview of the railway company, and that this government, as we have been frequently told by my hon. friends opposite, has nothing to do with the railway, that it is a separate entity entirely, that there is no politics in the railway, and consequently my hon. friend can take no credit in the city of Amherst for getting this half-million dollar contract.

[Mr. Johnstone.]

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): It had nothing to do with the railway.

Mr. DUFF: What was it?

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): The harbour commission pier in Halifax.

Mr. DUFF: Oh, I thought my hon. friend was talking of his own county. The hon. member for Halifax will look after Halifax.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): I am speaking for my own county. The contract for half a million dollars was given to a firm in Amherst, the Robb Engineering Company. The other contract went to Pictou county.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend says that this money was spent in Amherst. My hon. friend also said that there was $130,000 spent on public works in his county last year.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): Not last year.

Mr. DUFF: In how many years?

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): Since the change of government.

Mr. DUFF: Very good. Now take the estimates for this year and see how much is being spent in the county of Cumberland. The miserable sum of $4,900. What about last year? I have the list in my hand, and I see that public works were awarded as follows:

Nova Scotia—
East Ferry—wharf and shed, $700.
Lunenburg—dredging, $24,500.
Yarmouth harbour—dredging, $90,000.
Cow Bay (Port Morien)—to repair breakwater and complete extension, $4,500.
Devil's Island—breakwater repairs, $10,500.
Digby—dredging, $34,000.
Finlay Point—improvements, $3,000.
Grand Desert—harbour protection, $2,600.
Lower L'Ardoise—breakwater reconstruction, $14,400.
Little Judique ponds—groyne, $1,500.
Little River—mooring piers, $5,000.
Meat Cove—breakwater extension, $1,800.
Sandy Cove—breakwater repairs, $11,900.
Seaside (Harbourview) — wharf extension, $4,900.
Seaforth—breakwater extension, $5,000.
Spencer's Point—wharf improvements, $3,600.

Not a dollar for Cumberland county in the last two years, except $4,900! As I said this afternoon, this government is not bringing down the expenditures where they should appear in the main estimates, or even in the supplementary estimates. When the Liberal party was in power my hon. friend from Cumberland was treated much better by his opponent and by the Liberal party; for in the estimates for 1929-30 I find, not simply eight or nine items for the whole province of Nova Scotia, but two whole pages, and included among them is a very large sum for the county of Cumberland in spite of the fact that my hon. friend always voted against the government in power. The same thing applies to the previous year. I have in my hand the estimates for 1928-29, during which time my hon. friend represented that great county in the province of Nova Scotia. In spite of the fact that he is a Conservative, in spite of the fact that he and I are —what are we?

An hon. MEMBER: Shipmates.

Mr. DUFF: No, not shipmates, but my hon. friend and I have an understanding; we are always paired. These estimates show two whole columns of public works for the province of Nova Scotia. Some of these works were in Malagash, of which I spoke this afternoon. The Tory government did not vote any money for Malagash, it was the Liberal government. The same thing applies to Dingwall. Who started the operations at Dingwall? It was the Liberal party. They were the first to vote money for the Dingwall operations, not the Tory party. I admit that my hon. friend has done his duty in this house—

Mr. JOHNSTONE: The Liberal party never started the operations in Dingwall harbour. They started the breakwater there and in 1925 they had an estimate for that work. I asked across the floor what amount was going to be voted and I was told $50,000. It has cost $135,000 and the Liberal party never had anything to do with the development of the gypsum operations at Dingwall. I think we were in power last year, and that is when the operations were commenced. They had never been heard of before. A ship came into the harbour last year for the first time and was able to load two thousand tons. Never before had a steamer ever entered the harbour. My hon. friend ought to know that and he does know it. He did not think I was going to be here to-night. I was called to Halifax a couple of days ago but I just got in. I do not think my hon. friend would have said that if I had been here.

Mr. DUFF: I must first apologize to the hon. member for Cape Breton North-Victoria (Mr. Johnstone). Being an old sailor and not having had much education, my English is not as good as it might be and consequently my hon. friend perhaps does not understand what I say. I think the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) will agree that any remarks I made to the hon. member for Cape Breton North-Victoria are equally true as far as his county is concerned. I said, and I repeat it, that during the time he has been a member of this house, he got more money for his county while in opposition, than he has since he has been supporting the government.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: That is not true.

Mr. DUFF: I will prove it. The hon. member has said that the Grits did nothing in the way of dredging at Dingwall. I hold in my hand the estimates for 1930. The Conservative party was not in power that year and my hon. friend was sitting on this side of the house. He was urging that certain public works should be undertaken in his county. I do not know whether he made an impression upon the Minister of Public Works or whether he induced the engineers that these works were necessary, but the fact is a vote was included in the estimates to cover them. Perhaps my hon. friend will give me some credit for that. I remember getting a vote put in for New Waterford in the constituency of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacDonald) for a new public building. I may have had something to do with the vote to which I intend to refer, but I shall give all the credit in the world to my hon. friend from Cape Breton North. He has said that no dredging was done in 1930 but a vote appears in the estimates for that year in the amount of $25,000 for dredging Dingwall harbour. Surely my hon. friend is fair enough to give the Liberal party credit for that.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: What year is that?

Mr. DUFF: These are the estimates for 1930, before the government was changed.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: That was before the government was changed. Excuse me, that was not for dredging. That $25,000 was for the building of a breakwater which cost $125,000. I asked across the floor of this house what this breakwater was going to cost and I was told it would cost $25,000. No dredging was started in Dingwall until last year, and I think the Minister of Public Works will bear me out in that statement. This work was started after considerable effort on the part of the hon. members and the Dingwall company.

Mr. DUFF: Perhaps the Minister of Public Works can answer the question asked by my hon. friend. All I am going by is the estimates which I hold in my hand.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: The first boat that ever entered Dingwall harbour entered last year.

Mr. DUFF: If I were my hon. friend I would not make that admission, because the Liberal government voted $25,000 for dredging.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: Excuse me, they did not; they voted $25,000 for the building of a breakwater. The hon. member does not understand.

Mr. DUFF: I think my hon. friend will agree that we are doing all this in the most pleasant manner possible. All I want to do is to refer my hon. friend to page 35 of the estimates for 1930. On that page appear the letters D-i-n-g-w-a-l-l-, hyphen, d-r-e-d-g-i-n-g, and carried out is, $25,000. I do not know whether that money was spent for a wharf or whether it was spent for a dance in the town of Dingwall, but the estimates say it was for dredging.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: It was put down there for the continuation of a breakwater that should have cost $150,000. The Liberal government put it down at $25,000 but everyone knew that it could not be constructed for that. They put down $25,000 for the continuation of that breakwater and not for dredging.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend does not quite catch my point.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. DUFF: No, it is not carried. If my hon. friend will send to the library for the estimates of 1930 he will find an item on page 35 for $25,000 for dredging at Dingwall.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: For what year?

Mr. DUFF: 1930. I shall go back a little further to see if my hon. friend was trying to do his duty to his constituency. I intend to give him all the credit in the world for it. In 1929 the estimates for Nova Scotia took up almost two pages. I notice on page 34 of the estimates for 1928-29 the following item:

Dingwall (Aspy Bay), breakwater.

Surely my hon. friend will give credit to those of us who supported him in trying to get the breakwater built and the dredging done. I will support him in any effort he makes to get after the government to get breakwaters constructed and dredging done.

Mr. VENIOT: How much was the breakwater?

Mr. DUFF: Since that time my hon. friend has been able to get some money for dredging but that amount never appeared in the estimates. In order to get it he had to go around about seventeen corners and he did not meet prosperity on the way. He had to get into the office of the Minister of Labour; he had to get after the Minister of Public Works; he had to do these things to get the money for the dredging at Dingwall put through as a relief measure. It was not put through in the ordinary way it should have been. That is why I am complaining. As far as Dingwall, Cumberland or Pictou is concerned, I will vote for every dollar which is asked for. But what is the government doing for these counties to-day? We find a paltry $4,900 for Cumberland county and not a dollar for Pictou.

Mr. CANTLEY: The hon. member should learn to read.

Mr. DUFF: The only place I can think of is Phinneys Green, and my hon. friend from Cumberland claims that.

Mr. CANTLEY: You need another pair of glasses.

Mr. DUFF: I am not criticizing the hon. gentleman; I am criticizing his party. In the great county of Pictou, which requires public works and public buildings, dredging, breakwaters and repairs to wharves, there is not a dollar. I know what is coming, the same thing that happened last year and the year before under this government—a blank cheque for $50,000,000. An election is coming on, and when it takes place money will be spent on public works all over the country. And I know my hon. friend from Pictou well enough to know that he will get his share. We heard this afternoon about poor Grits who wanted work and could not get it. The same thing will happen as has taken place in connection with public works under the relief program in Nova Scotia in the last three years. Men who should not have got work at all got it, men who charged the government 15 cents a foot for logs, and foremen being paid $7 a day on wharf repair work under the Minister of Public Works—$7 a day when there were lots of good men who would have done the work at $4 a day. That is what will happen this year under the $50,000,000 program to be surreptitiously introduced under the provision for peace, order and good government.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: What year is the hon. gentleman referring to in connection with the vote for dredging?

Mr. VENIOT: It was 1930.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: Dredging was not thought of in Dingwall until 1932, because no dredging was required. In 1932 we did build a dredge for the reason that the gypsum company had opened a mine, but nothing was said about dredging, nothing was done to take care of dredging until the present government came into power. Then we did get the harbour dredged so that they could open up the mine, from which we shipped this last year 2,000 tons of gypsum to England, something that has never been done before.

Mr. DUFF: If my hon. friend will come across the floor I will show him the estimates. I am sure he does not think that I am trying to mislead him. My objection is that he is too modest, and I am ready to give him credit for getting the Liberal government to provide this money for dredging. But he does not want to take credit for it. I will send the estimates over so that he may see it, and I expect him to give the leader of the opposition credit for voting $25,000 in 1929 for dredging at Dingwall.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: That $25,000 was not for dredging.

Mr. DUFF: A man convinced against his will is of the same opinion still.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: You know as well as I do that it was not.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. gentleman is neither deaf nor dumb and he can read what is printed in the estimates for 1930. Why is he not generous enough to get up and bow to the leader of the opposition and say, "thank you, Mr. Mackenzie King, for giving us that $25,000."

Mr. JOHNSTONE: For the simple reason that there was no dredging in Dingwall until last year.

Mr. DUFF: In view of the small number of items which appear under the heading of Nova Scotia, and with which evidently my hon. friends on the Conservative side are quite satisfied, I should be glad if the minister would read the list of recommendations made by the engineering department in Nova Scotia for the province this year.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I have already explained to my hon. friend that I have not that information, and even if I had it would be confidential. All we do is to take the responsibility for what we recommend to the house. These reports are made more or less in confidence, and until some action is taken on them they do not become associated with the estimates or the expenditures. Now, even at the risk of delaying the passing of this item for a few minutes, I wish to reply to my hon. friend. I am sorry that just before six o'clock I rather annoyed him by something I said. But he has entirely changed his position. Before six o'clock he was thanking this government for not spending money in Nova Scotia—

Mr. DUFF: That is not true.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes, it is.

An hon. MEMBER: Hansard will prove it.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): He was thanking this government because the appropriation was so small, and he said that the result would be that he and his friends would get more votes—

Mr. DUFF: I did not say that.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): —in the province of Nova Scotia. Thereupon I ventured to suggest to him that that was a reflection upon that noble province, which had made such a fine contribution to the dominion, and that in casting their votes they would not be guided entirely by the amount of money that was spent in any constituency, particularly in a time of crisis and difficulty. I am sure that on reflection my hon. friend will agree with me that his great province will rise above the mere matter of the expenditure of money when it is giving its decision on the great questions that will come before the Canadian people. With regard to the expenditures in the province of Nova Scotia, let me give him the amount of appropriation in the general vote for a number of years past. I will start with the year 1924. The appropriation under the general vote was that year $55,000; in 1925-26, $65,000; in 1926-27, $71,000; in 1927-28, $65,000; in 1928-29, $65,000; in 1929-30, $80,000; in 1930-31, $100,000; in 1931-32, $110,000; in 1932-33, $200,000; in 1933-34, $275,000; and this year it is $225,000. And the expenditures out of this vote since this government came in have exceeded the expenditures made from similar votes when my hon. friends were in power.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUFF: I am delighted that the hon. member for Renfrew has reason to applaud.

Mr. MALONEY: Not a cent for Renfrew.

Mr. DUFF: How about five cents?

An hon. MEMBER: Worse.

Mr. DUFF: The minister made the statement that before six o'clock I said I did not want to see a dollar voted for public works in Nova Scotia. He should take back that remark; I did not say that. What I did was to refer to the political conduct of this government in not voting one dollar for my constituency, the great county of Antigonish-Guysborough, with 700 miles of coastline, not voting one dollar for dredging, for public works or repairs to wharves, this year, last year or the year before, because forsooth the fishermen and people of Antigonish-Guysborough saw fit to send me to this parliament. That was what I said. I said that so far as I was concerned it was a good thing politically. I did not mention any other county in Nova Scotia, but I say that there is nothing to the credit of the Minister of Public Works or the government as regards the expenditure of money in that province. My hon. friend read a list, I do not know where he got it, but if he will turn up the estimates for 1928—and I have them under my hand—he will find that he was wrong when he said that in that year there was only some $60,000 spent in Nova Scotia.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I did not say that.

Mr. DUFF: He said for the general vote. The minister was trying to deceive the committee. What I am talking about is the whole amount voted for the province, not the general vote. I hold in my hand a list of the estimates for 1929 showing that there was voted for Nova Scotia an amount of $750,200 and not $60,000 as the minister said. I wonder whether the minister knows there is such a place as Nova Scotia.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I was speaking about the general vote.

Mr. DUFF: I was speaking about the estimates as placed upon the table of the house. My hon. friend was not fair to himself or to the government when he dared to say that only $60,000 was voted. In addition to the $750,200 voted in 1929, there was also a large sum voted for ordinary expenditures. Why was my hon. friend not fair? What is the use of his saying that this government has appropriated more money in the last three years than the Liberal government did from 1922 to 1930? That is not correct, and my hon. friend knows it.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I did not make any such statement. I said that in the general vote the amount was just as I gave it and expenditures had been made from that general vote which my hon. friend is leaving out of account altogether.

Mr. DUFF: I am not leaving the general expenditure out, and the minister knows that. As I said before six o'clock, the total amount to be voted for the year 1934-35 is $349,500. Does the minister know what year he is living in? That includes the $225,000, does it not?

Last year the amount was larger, namely, $417,900 as against $349,500, which includes the small amount to which the minister referred. As I said a moment ago, if you go back to 1930, the amount was $893,700 including what the minister said was for general account. Every year the Liberal party was in power, we had money in the treasury with the result that every county in Nova Scotia, whether represented by a Conservative or a Liberal, received its share of public works. But what has this government done? What has the Minister of Public Works done? Look at his estimates! He should be ashamed of them and of himself. Just to think, because he is a Tory and I am a Grit, but both of us representing people in this country, not one dollar did he put in his estimates for the two great counties of Antigonish and Guysborough! Not a dollar for any county represented by a Liberal! My hon. friend did not even do his own party or his own followers the justice of giving them any decent amounts for expenditure in their counties. No, but he camouflages the matter just as he did in two or three instances in my county by putting it in for relief work, fifteen cents for logs and $7 a day for a foreman. But he was not satisfied with one foreman at $7 a day, he appointed another at $6 a day. Will my hon. friend deny that?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I do not know to what my hon. friend refers; this is the first time I have heard of it.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend is Minister of Public Works in this dominion; it is his duty to see that only a fair price is paid for logs or hemlock planks or timber. It is his duty as custodian of the Public Works department; as a privy councillor it is his duty to the Prime Minister and the other members of the government, to see that no money is wasted in public works. Yet if he will look at his records, he will see that $27 a thousand was paid for hemlock planks when I was buying them for $19; that fifteen cents a foot was paid for logs when I was buying them for ten cents; that eight cents was paid for little poles when I was buying them for four cents, and that one foreman at $7 a day was not enough, they had to get a subforeman at $6. Think of it!

Mr. VENIOT: One fellow to watch the other.

Mr. DUFF: Yes. Yet this is the man who comes before us and says that I was trying to say that in Nova Scotia there was no necessity for expenditure of money. Let him look into his own department and he will see that I know more about Nova Scotia than he does; that I am more interested in it than he is. My only regret is, partisan as I am, with the Conservative party in power, conditions in this country are such that there is no revenue and consequently the hon. member for Pictou and the hon. member for Cumberland can get only $4,900 for expenditures in the year of our Lord 1935.

Mr. CANTLEY: I think it is time this controversy should end; but my hon. friend opposite made the statement that when the Liberal party were in power they appropriated money for expenditure in my constituency. For four years, Mr. Speaker, while I sat on the other side, I appealed to the former Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott) who, I am sorry, is not now able to occupy his seat in the house, and it was only in the session of 1930, with an election immediately in prospect, that he eventually inserted an item of $56,000 in the estimates for greatly needed repairs on a public building at New Glasgow. A contract was let. The repairs cost $86,000 and the incoming government provided the difference between $56,000 and $86,000. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough is trying to leave the impression that no public money was spent in Pictou during the regime of the present government. There was dredging done at Pictou amounting to about $27,000; Cariboo, $15,000; Pictou railway wharves were rebuilt at a cost of over $50,000; Bailey's Brook wharf repairs, $25,000; in Larry's River there was an expenditure of $15,000; more than $10,000 spent at Pictou island, and $15,000 in dredging New Glasgow. These are amounts I have written down from memory. My hon. friend either does not know the facts or is not quite fair. Usually he is fair, but I suggest he had better inform himself a little more accurately in regard to these matters. The hon. member for Cumberland referred to an order for $500,000. The contract was for $1,030,000, one-half going to Amherst and the other half to New Glasgow. I have not any doubt that when the supplementary estimates are brought down I shall be fairly well satisfied with what the government is doing through the efforts of the Minister of Public Works here, and I do not think it is quite fair for the hon. member to make the statements he has.

Mr. DUFF: Since my hon. friend has been good enough to give the Liberal government credit for what it did when his party were in opposition, I may refer to the facts and give fuller details. The item for Bailey's Brook was voted in 1928 when the Liberal, not the Tory government was in power.

Mr. CANTLEY: That is another matter altogether.

Mr. DUFF: I do not claim any credit for getting it, but my hon. friend should be fair enough to say that the amount for Bailey's Brook is in the 1928 estimates. My hon. friend spoke about the Pictou railway wharves. If my hon. friend will look at the 1928 estimates again—and the Tory government was not in power then—he will find an item of $25,000 voted for repairs to the Pictou railway wharves, and no doubt that was included in the estimates due to the influence of my hon. friend. We did not have the depression then, though of course now it is a world depression while in 1930 it was only a Canadian depression due to the Liberal government. Surely my hon. friend should give some credit to the Liberal government for these votes. I pity my hon. friend, and he knows it; he knows he has all the sympathy of my heart. When a Liberal government was in power, with only three Liberals and eleven Conservatives from Nova Scotia, my hon. friend will find that our province received a great deal more money than they have received since.

Now I want to refer to Malagash in Cumberland county. When the Liberals were in power there was an item of $36,000 for wharf repairs, but to-night my hon. friend gets up and tries to apologize for the Minister of Public Works who gives him $4,900.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): I might tell my hon. friend that over $40,000 has been expended on public works in Cumberland county since 1931.

Mr. DUFF: I am sorry it was not $60,000. I say my hon. friend is not being treated fairly, and I wonder why he does not get up and say so himself. I know he does not dare do so in the house, but I know also that he has gone to the Minister of Public Works and raised the roof; he was practically told to get out of the minister's office because he was so insistent in trying to get something for his county. I sympathize with my hon. friend because he cannot get anything from a Tory government. It has always been the same since confederation; Tory governments will not spend money in Nova Scotia. It was while the Liberal party was in power from 1896 to 1911 that all the breakwaters and public wharves were built and all the lighthouses and aids to navigation constructed. Since 1930 the Tory party have torn down everything they could. So I sympathize with my hon. friends. I say to them that if they would support me, instead of having $4,900 spent in Cumberland county and nothing in Pictou or the other counties, we would get something. If my hon. friends would back me up as they should in the interests of their constituents, because they must not forget that it is their duty to see that every possible dollar is obtained for their counties, we would be able to force the minister to vote more money. Of course I know what is coming; the members from Nova Scotia have been lulled to sleep with the promise of the $50,000,000 blank cheque of which they think their province will get a part. But even when that money is spent the Tory party will be defeated in Nova Scotia.

Mr. CANTLEY: I now wish to correct my hon. friend. It is true that $25,000 was put in the estimates during the session of 1928 for Bailey's Brook, but what happened? Mr. Archibald McCall then had the patronage for the county, and he appointed the foreman. When the district engineer went down to inspect the work he reported it was the most disgraceful piece of work he had ever seen, and he dismissed the foreman. Mr. McCall was asked to name a second foreman, which he did; he in turn was also dismissed, and when a southwest gale came in the latter part of August the structure floated out to sea and went down Northumberland strait, so we had to rebuild the whole structure.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): My hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough has made some complaint about the expenditures of money under the Unemployment Relief Act. Let me assure him that the department and the officials have endeavoured to take every possible precaution to see that the money was well expended and that full value was received, and every complaint made to the department either in this house or by correspondence has been investigated. This is the first time I have ever had a complaint from my hon. friend, and if he will follow it up and give me the names and the particulars I will see that it is investigated, and will see what can be done to place responsibility where it belongs.

With regard to expenditures under this general vote I should like to point out to my hon. friend that in the county of Antigonish-Guysborough over $20,000 was expended from the vote of last year.

[Mr. Duff.]

Mr. DUFF: Where?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): In Antigonish-Guysborough.

Mr. DUFF: Where?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): On twenty-five different projects.

Mr. DUFF: You spent $20,000 on twenty-five different projects?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Mr. DUFF: Thank you very much indeed; $800 on each project. Isn't that wonderful? Is it any wonder the country is in such a condition when my hon. friend spent that large amount of money, $800, on twenty-five different projects. My hon. friend says he expects me to go to him and complain about certain conditions in his own department. With all respect may I ask the minister what he is getting paid for? My hon. friend is the Minister of Public Works in this government; he has surrounding him a deputy minister, secretaries and engineers, and it is their duty to see that no money is wasted. It is their duty to see that only a fair price is paid for logs or hemlock planks or timber. It is their duty to see that no foreman gets $7 a day while another foreman on the same work gets $6 a day. It is not my duty to make complaints to the minister; if his officials have not told him of these conditions I say it is not my place to do so, and I am not going to do so beyond what I have said to-night. But I say to the minister, and he knows it as well as I do, that the money spent on public works under the so-called peace, order and good government legislation, was paid to Tories who never should have been made foremen, Conservatives who did not need the money, and so on. The poor people did not get it in the province of Nova Scotia, with very few exceptions. I say that in nine cases out of ten men supplied timber, logs and planks who had no right to supply them. There were poor men who would have been willing to drag ten or twenty logs to where they were needed and who were not allowed to do so. In one case one of the friends of the Conservative party was paid $8,000, out of a $15,000 job, for logs, planks and timber. Another friend of the government on the same job received $1,500 for rope, nails and so on, but how much did the poor labourers get? They received $4,000 out of the $15,000. Was that what relief was intended for? Was that why the money was spent under the peace, order and good government legislation? My hon. friend says I must tell him what is wrong, that I must make the complaint. I say he should go and investigate it himself; it is the duty of himself and his officials. They know as well as I do that most of this money was wasted, that it was given to men who had no right to it.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): When my hon. friend says I know that to be so, he is going far beyond the fact. I have already given him the reasons for my statement, and I have invited him to give me this information in order that I may investigate. He says it is my duty to make an investigation. How can I do so if I have not the information? He says it is up to my officials. I am carrying on with the same officials I found when I came into this department.

Mr. DUFF: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): And so far as I know they are doing their duty well. Other members on the same side of the house as my hon. friend have not chosen to adopt that independent, disinterested position; they have not refused to give information if they knew of irregularities. I submit that if the hon. gentleman knows of any improper expenditure of public money it is his duty to make it known so that an investigation may be held in order that responsibility may be placed just where it belongs. I want to say that I repudiate any responsibility; I repudiate any insinuation that I know of any wrongful expenditure. I assure him that if it is brought to my attention the responsibility will be placed where it belongs and heads will go into the basket, without regard to whose they may be.

Mr. DUFF: I appreciate the noble sentiment expressed by the Minister of Public Works; nevertheless, he is the minister of the department. Every payroll and every account for expenditures in his department is down in the Hunter building, and I say it is the minister's duty, as the head of his department, to say either by himself or through his officials whether certain moneys have been paid, and whether these moneys have been paid properly. It is also the minister's duty to say whether in the province of Nova Scotia or any other province fifteen cents a foot per log is a fair price, whether $27 a thousand is a fair price for hemlock lumber and whether $32 a thousand is a fair price for square timber, and whether there is any necessity for two foremen, one at $7 a day who never saw a wharf before he was appointed and who would have been of no use had not a second foreman been appointed at $6 a day. That is the minister's duty, not mine, and I am not going to assume the responsibility. I am not in the minister's office; let him have his officials —he has plenty in the department—go over the files, and he will find out that my statement is correct.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Does the hon. member suggest that all this should be shown, and that all these details come under the review of the minister himself, or that he has any knowledge of them? I ask him to give me the name of the work, or the place where he suggests these irregularities took place.

Mr. DUFF: I said the minister was responsible as minister of the department.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am trying to assume that responsibility; I welcome the responsibility and am anxious to discharge it. All I ask is that my hon. friend give me the support which I am entitled to receive from him in the discharge of the duties of my position.

Mr. BENNETT: The name of the place.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smoke): Is the item carried?

Mr. DUFF: No; before the item carries I should like the minister to tell me whether or not he will produce a memorandum of the different works which his officials in the province of Nova Scotia submitted to the department to be included in the main estimates. The minister says that is confidential information. I do not agree with him; I say that is a public document.

Mr. BENNETT: This house decided the other way.

Mr. DUFF: I beg the right hon. gentleman's pardon?

Mr. BENNETT: This house decided that it was not.

Mr. DUFF: How?

Mr. BENNETT: A few years ago.

Mr. DUFF: Well then, we must reverse that decision right now. That must have been under a Liberal government. I say that it is a public document and is not confidential at all. The officials of the Department of Public Works, the engineers and their staffs in all the provinces are appointed by the government of this country, and they are responsible to the people. What I should like to know is, in view of the fact that only half a dozen amounts are included in the estimates for the province of Nova Scotia, whether or not these were all the amounts which the engineers and the officers of the department recommended after investigation and after this country had paid those officials hundreds of thousands of dollars to investigate and make reports to the minister and his officials, or whether there are other items. I ask that the item stand until the minister gives that information.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I can say to my hon. friend without hesitation that there were other items recommended and, so far as I know, in years gone by have always been recommended. We have to decide how much money we can apply and appropriate for public works. When that is done we have to make eliminations and cut out certain recommendations, excepting those which we consider to be most urgent and most necessary, and assume responsibility for the position which we take.

Mr. VENIOT: Am I to understand the minister has said that the report of the engineer is so confidential that it cannot be submitted?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I do not say that.

Mr. VENIOT: I understood that.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I do not say that.

Mr. VENIOT: What did the minister say about those reports?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I say that in many cases these reports were of a confidential character.

Mr. VENIOT: Well, that is the point; you would not submit it, or give the contents of it?

Mr. BENNETT: Of course not.

Mr. VENIOT: I am somewhat surprised at that, and I am more surprised that the hon. gentlemen now sitting as members of the government did not take that position when they sat in opposition. I remember quite distinctly that in 1927 when I was asked for a report connected with certain post office trouble in the city of Saint John I then stated that reports had come from our inspectors, and that I considered them confidential. I was forced to produce them on the table of the house. I remember quite distinctly that I agreed that the leader of the opposition of that day, the present Prime Minister, should name a committee of five to whom I would submit all the reports, for their information. The reports were submitted for such information. Then, after the committee had finished its work the then leader of the opposition took the reports and read them into Hansard from the floor of this house. If on that occasion it was right for them to be submitted to the house, or to be put on the table, why is it not proper procedure now?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I think there is a clear distinction between the two cases.

Mr. VENIOT: There is no distinction at all; they are both confidential reports.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): In the case to which the hon. member has referred there was a charge against a certain official, and the reports were in connection with that incident. The reports now in question are made for the purpose of enabling the minister and the department to decide on a certain line of action.

Mr. VENIOT: And the reports to which I referred were made to enable the Postmaster General to decide upon a certain line of action.

Mr. BENNETT: No; one was a matter of policy and the other was not.

Mr. DUFF: These reports are on the file of the Department of Public Works and are not on the minister's confidential file. There is no official in the department, other than the minister, who has a confidential file. These are public documents, documents which the people of this country pay to have made up. We have to pay money to send these engineers around to the different parts of the provinces to find out what works are necessary, and they submit those recommendations to the minister. I say they are not confidential, and that this House of Commons ought to have the right to see what works were recommended by the officials who are paid by this country, and to see what works were cut out either by the government or by the treasury officials.

Mr. BENNETT: Might I correct the erroneous impression held by the hon. member? The recommendations made by officials, upon which the government takes action, are not producible if the government accept responsibility for the estimates, as they do, which are submitted to the house. We discussed this matter, as the hon. member for Gloucester will recall, and he is right in stating that on the occasion to which he refers we did press for the production of the documents. They were not documents to determine a question of policy, but they were documents connected with a particular transaction. The hon. gentleman produced them and read from parts of them, and he will recall we said that having done that they should be laid upon the table. They were produced before the committee, first, and laid upon the table, and he is correct when he states that they were read into Hansard, without comment, as he will recall.

Mr. VENIOT: There was lots of comment.

Mr. BENNETT: The comment came later. But there is a distinction between the two sets of circumstances. As the hon. gentleman will realize, having been Postmaster General, and as the former Minister of the Interior and the former Minister of Agriculture will understand, when the time comes to prepare estimates it has been the custom ever since there has been responsible government to send out people who make reports, and the government adopts its policy. It then determines what action shall be taken, and assumes the whole responsibility. If it were otherwise the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough will understand the result would be that the officials would be the responsible parties, and not the ministers who bring them to this House of Commons. Their recommendations would be the basis of discussion in parliament, and not the estimates at all. That is my understanding, and I have no desire to suggest that a course different from that which has been followed should be followed in the present instance. However, that has been my understanding of it since I have known about parliamentary institutions; for if at the present moment we were to substitute a recommendation of engineers or others for the responsibility accepted by the administration we would have an entirely different system of government. I recall now what the hon. gentleman mentions. It was in connection with Griffiths, and there was a man called Woods. I recall it quite well now. But if my hon. friend looks at it, he will see that that is entirely a different thing.

Mr. VENIOT: If I may be permitted, Mr. Chairman, I cannot agree with the Prime Minister in the matter of confidential information. I can well understand that when an engineer makes a report to a minister on a certain public work, and gives an estimate on the price, his estimates should be confidential until the contract is awarded.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, up to that point.

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friend is quite correct in assuming that attitude. But when an engineer makes a report asked for by the minister on the necessity of certain public works in a province, his report should not be confidential.

Mr. BENNETT: Why not?

Mr. VENIOT: Why should it be? That is not establishing the policy of the government. If it were establishing the policy of the government I would say yes, it should be confidential. But the policy of the government is to carry on public works in this country to a greater or certain extent, and the details of that policy are not confidential once you begin to work out the policy. Then parliament is entitled to the information, except that when contracts have to be let based on an estimate of the engineer, then in fairness to the people who are tendering, in fairness to the contractor and the engineer, the estimate should be confidential.

I go a step further. Time and again I have asked for papers and reports of engineers in connection with public works by way of motion, and I have got them; but I took very good care not to ask for them until after the tenders had been awarded, because up to that point I felt they were confidential. After the contract is awarded, however, they are no longer confidential.

Mr. BENNETT: That is right.

Mr. VENIOT: And in that case we are entitled to the information that we are asking for. My hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough is entitled to the information he is asking for in connection with public works in Nova Scotia that were not done by tender but by day labour. There is nothing confidential in that. We are entitled to know every item that was spent.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am not contending that my hon. friend is not entitled to receive, and he will receive, in connection with any expenditures all the information that is available—the estimates, pay sheets, and everything else. I grant that readily, even without a motion in the house. That is a different thing from the reports of engineers in connection with works that have not been undertaken, and in respect of which no item has appeared in the estimates.

Mr. VENIOT: But where they are intended to be done by day work there is nothing confidential.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It does not make any difference how they are to be done if they are not included in the program.

Mr. VENIOT: You have them in the estimates. Why cannot we get the details?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Again we are at cross purposes. I have not declined to bring down reports and recommendations in connection with anything that appears in the estimates. It was only in connection with what was recommended by the engineers and is not in the estimates that I have taken objection.

Mr. VENIOT: I asked for information in connection with general expenditures, and I was denied it. This afternoon I asked the minister if he would specify or detail what this amount of so many thousands of dollars for general expenditures in New Brunswick was for, where the money was to be spent, how, and based on what reports, and the minister told me this afternoon that he could not give me the information.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That is in connection with an anticipated expenditure.

Mr. VENIOT: It cannot be anticipated because it is right in the estimates.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is a possible expenditure, an item put in to cover repairs, the nature and extent and locality of which are not yet known.

Mr. VENIOT: How does the minister know what to put in there, then?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That will not be known until the architect visits these buildings, ascertains their condition and recommends the necessary repairs. The item is put in there to cover these unknown day to day repairs, some of which spring up entirely unforeseen. How can I give the hon. gentleman particulars of what repairs are going to be required on any public building in New Brunswick next summer?

Mr. VENIOT: I did not ask for that.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The roof may be blown off or it may leak. That is the kind of unforeseen expenditure that this item covers.

Mr. VENIOT: It is not. The amount put in here is based on the report of the provincial architect to the chief architect.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No.

Mr. VENIOT: Then you are guessing.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I said it was based on our experience of our requirements in prior years, and that the expenditures this year would be made upon the recommendation of the architect.

Sir EUGENE FISET: It is really a guess based on past expenditure?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is an anticipated expenditure in the next fiscal year.

[Mr. H. A. Stewart.]

Mr. VENIOT: I asked the minister this afternoon, and he said it was based on the report of the local architect to the chief architect. Now he assumes another attitude altogether. I have got him in a corner on this, and now he jumps. Now he tells me that is not the case. When was he telling the truth, this afternoon or now?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. VENIOT: He told me so and so this afternoon and he contradicts it to-night. I have a right to ask what part of his statement is the truth. That is not unparliamentary.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): There must be some misunderstanding betwen my hon. friend and myself, because the statement I made this afternoon is the one I am making now, or I intended it to be so. The explanation I gave this afternoon was exactly the same as I am giving now, that based on our experience of past years a certain amount was required to make these repairs. The architect estimates what amount will be required this year, as in past years.

Mr. VENIOT: Therefore you are going to spend this $200,000 on guesswork based on the experience of last year. You may not spend a cent of it.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It will be spent on what the engineer finds and reports is necessary after he has visited these works after the spring storms, and after the effects of the winter and ice and all these conditions are known. Then we will make such expenditures, and such expenditures only, as the circumstances render necessary. It is in order that we can meet these unknown and unforeseen expenditures that arise from time to time that we are asking parliament, as it has been asked in previous years for a vote of this character.

Mr. DUFF: The minister is getting away on to the question of the general vote. I am not asking for particulars of how he is going to spend this general vote, whether five hundred or a thousand or two thousand dollars is going to be spent here or there as conditions warrant. That is not what I am asking for at all. What I am asking for is a copy of the reports of the engineers specifying the work which they consider necessary in the province of Nova Scotia. I am not even particular as to the amounts. If the amounts should be considered confidential, leave that out. But the minister cannot possibly argue that if he gave me a list of the works which the engineers had decided were necessary in the province of Nova Scotia anybody would be hurt.

I go a step further. Where does the minister get these items in the estimates? I know the minister has said that he was not responsible for anything that happened in his department so far as expenditures are concerned, and he wanted me to share the responsibility. In the estimates for 1928-29, for instance, I find an item of $2,500 for repairs to pier, Bailey's Brook. How did the department arrive at that figure that it was necessary to spend $2,500 at Bailey's Brook? Simply because my hon. friend got his car out of the garage and went with the engineer from Halifax down to Bailey's Brook, giving him his lunch on the way. They looked over the work and the engineer decided that $2,500 was all that would be necessary.

Mr. CANTLEY: The hon member is working his imagination to death.

Mr. DUFF: The engineering department in Halifax then recommended to the department in Ottawa that $2,500 would be sufficent for Bailey's Brook. Surely that cannot be considered as being confidential. If tenders are called for that work the men who put them in knew that $2,500 has been voted and they put in tenders for $2,499, or $2,497, or whatever they feel is right. There is nothing confidential about it. Let me go a little further and take up an item in which I am particularly interested. This is one for $70,000 to cover dredging at Brooklyn, the Mersey Paper Company Limited to contribute one-third of the cost. I might state to the hon. minister that I got that work done after I was defeated in Lunenburg. I did not bear any ill will against my constituents; they did me a good turn when they defeated me in Lunenburg. I came up to Ottawa and got $70,000 and that amount appeared in the estimates. The dredging contractors knew that that amount had been voted and when tenders were called for by the department, the tenderers governed themselves accordingly. Where is there anything confidential about that? I could go right down the whole list and show that there is nothing confidential about any item. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Cantley) has said that I am drawing upon my imagination, but I venture to say that the hon. member for Pictou, the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Smith); the hon. member for Cape Breton North-Victoria (Mr. Johnstone); the hon. member for Richmond-West Cape Breton (Mr. Rhodes); the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacDonald); the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Black), the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Quinn) and the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) at least two months ago sent a list of works to the government which the engineers had decided were necessary in the province of Nova Scotia. They intimated to the government what they thought should be spent in the year 1934-35. That information should not be considered as confidential simply because the government did not accept their suggestions. That is where the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) falls down in his argument. The government did not accept the recommendations of the officials and he tried to make out that they would be going over the head of the government if this information was accepted. Why was it not accepted? Because the Minister of Public Works, the ministers of the crown and the treasury board felt that this country could not afford to spend any more than this measly sum which appears in the estimates. It is because of the policy of this government that the country cannot afford to spend more. How can the Prime Minister say that it would be a retrograde step if this information was brought down? I say that we are entitled to it. The people of Nova Scotia should be shown exactly what the engineers, who are paid by the ratepayers, think is necessary to be spent in that province. I say again that that information should not be considered as confidential when items which appear in the estimates are not confidential.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. DUFF: It is not carried. I want that information and if I cannot get it, I should like the item to stand.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): We will let it stand.

Item stands.

Alberta—
Dominion public buildings—improvements and repairs, $15,000.
Edmonton—government's share of cost of local improvements, $1,160.
Edmonton—tractor for postal purposes, $1,600.

Mr. BURY: In connection with the item of $1,160 covering the government's share of cost of local improvements at Edmonton, could the minister advise just what that covers?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The government's share of the cost of an asphalt pavement in front of the old Dominion Lands building on 100th street which is now utilized for armoury purposes.

Mr. BURY: There is nothing to cover the cost of the sewer from the government grain elevator?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No.

Mr. BURY: I understood that there was to be an item in the estimates to cover this.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Possibly that will be under Trade and Commerce; they have to do with the elevators.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not rise to criticize this vote, although it is very meagre. The government has explained that it is unable to spend more money this year because of the depression, and I do not want to add anything to what has been said to-night with respect to the depression. If the government's policies were changed I do not think there would be any necessity for such drastic cuts in necessary public service. However, I have another object in view in speaking this evening. Every once in a while someone from eastern Canada takes it upon himself to point out the tremendous costs incurred by the government in western Canada. I ask my hon. friends from eastern Canada to glance through the proposed expenditures for the three prairie provinces. The estimates this year are no different from those of the past thirteen years. I am not so familiar with conditions before that time, but the country was new and the expenditures could not have been heavy. No individual in eastern Canada has the right to say, either publicly or privately, that the government of Canada is making huge expenditures in western Canada. With the single exception of the expenditures for relief, a calamity similar to occurrences in the past in the east, it would be hard to discover expenditures of any great amount. Time and again we are treated to a tirade by people in eastern Canada to the effect that the cost of carrying western Canada is out of all proportion to the cost applicable to the rest of the country. I want to state publicly that for the past thirteen years the 2,000,000 people who live in the western provinces have not had anything like their fair share of expenditure. To-night we have listened to the complaints of hon. gentlemen from the old province of Nova Scotia sitting on both sides of the house. Year after year the eastern provinces have been voted ten times the amount voted to the three prairie provinces. The cost to the federal government of carrying the western provinces has been small compared with the expenditures made in other parts of the country. I exclude British Columbia because that province has a coast line and at times heavy expenditures have been made in that connection. Some of these complaints come from the maritime provinces—I do not say they are made by hon. members of this house, but they are made by very influential people. They do not go down very well with us in the west, particularly with those of us who happen to have been acquainted with the estimates for years past and are likely to see them in the future, because we have no rivers, no dredging, no harbours, so that all we get from the federal government—and we are taxpayers equally with the people in the east—is money for repairs to public buildings and once in a while a public building. I can quite imagine that my hon. friend from East Edmonton has made representations. I know that there is necessity for expenditures in the west as well as in the north which is opening up, but we shall not get them; I find in the estimates no appropriations for work of that sort. I rise now to protest against that kind of thing. In the light of these estimates, and of the estimates of previous years, I say that the residents of western Canada have not received anything like their proportionate share of the expenditures voted year by year by the federal government. If you glance at the estimates this year you see that the expenditure is so paltry as hardly to be worth mentioning. I know that representations have been made to the Department of Public Works and to other departments as well for expenditures; but we are told—rather, I should say, they are told, because I am not now in the habit of inquiring—that the money cannot be given; the depression is on, and therefore it cannot be done. I venture to say however that when this government changes, as it will change when there is a general election, the depression will not cut much of a figure in the demands that will be made upon the successors of hon. gentlemen now in the government. We shall hear in no uncertain way, when the Liberal government is in office, that money ought to be spent.

I have not a great deal of sympathy with my hon. friend who is getting such a panning to-night, because in former days he was one of the gentlemen who contributed their fair share of the panning of ministers in the previous government. He knows now what the responsibilities are like and he must be prepared for a pretty severe castigation, not only on his own account but for the sins of his fellow members in the government. He and some of his friends were fairly good at criticizing in more prosperous days, and I would submit to him now that the prosperity then was brought about by the fiscal policy of the government of that day. Indeed, had the same fiscal policy been carried into effect by this government there would to-day be a different story to tell. I think now of all the spacious promises made by himself and his leader and other members of the government of what they were going to do for the people of this country. What a wonderful country Canada was going to be; what a wonderful place to live in. But now we hear excuses made on any and every occasion that there is a world depression. There was no world depression in 1930, however; hon. gentlemen never heard of such a thing. All the fault then was the government's. My hon. friends cannot change their argument.

I am amazed as I sit here and watch the performance of hon. gentlemen opposite that in very few particulars have they changed the method of administration in any respect. They are carrying on very much in the way the government whom they succeeded carried on, and day by day they are finding out that after all the old government was not such a poor government, that its methods were not so terribly bad as my hon. friends opposite depicted them. When it comes to administration they have to carry on very much in the same way. They were going to nationalize unemployment, but they have to carry on through the agency of the provincial governments. My hon. friend is spending some money—very little, and it is being reduced—but another agency will spend it and do some of the work formerly performed by the Minister of Public Works.

Taking it all in all, therefore, there is a tremendous difference between sitting on this side and sitting on that side. I must confess that there is great freedom from anxiety over here. There is one gentleman with whom once in a while I do sympathize, and I say that freely, and that is the Minister of Finance. He is the one who has to find the money, and I say to my hon. friends opposite that their policies make it absolutely impossible for him to find it. Year by year he is finding himself in this difficulty, a difficulty every year aggravated. Every year there is a little more cut off expenditures—why? Because we cannot get the revenue, and if there were no election in sight for the next two years this performance would go on, with constantly decreasing revenues. No reference is made to the fact that we are losing over $100,000,000 in customs and excise, though the Minister of Finance knows it. But that is to be made up by direct taxation from some other source. Notwithstanding all the additional taxation, however, we have to admit, when we glance through the estimates, that they are going down, with the result that very much needed services will have to remain in abeyance.

I want to make it perfectly clear that I am ready to take up the cudgels on behalf of my own part of the province, and I say with full assurance that not only are we not getting more than we are entitled to, but we are not getting our fair share. Perhaps I must take my share of the responsibility as well as anyone else, but the fact remains that every western member should take up the cudgels on this question, because it is so irritating at times when we read in the press, or hear, such statements as have been made. I do know that the gentleman who made the statement when he came to Ottawa took it back. I have no desire to raise any question about east versus west, but statements of that kind are not true.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): If my hon. friend confines his remarks to this item, certainly it does appear small and insignificant. But I submit that it is not quite fair for him to limit his observations to, and to base them on, an item such as this. We must look at the whole picture. When he speaks of large expenditures for harbours, undoubtedly the part of the country for which he has spoken so forcefully reaps a benefit from those expenditures, notwithstanding that they are made in other provinces. How would the west market grain if it were not for harbour improvements in British Columbia and at the head of the lakes?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No one complains about dredging in Vancouver harbour.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Vancouver is not the only one; there is New Westminster, and grain goes out through that port. And when you take railway expenditures into consideration, possibly my hon. friend will find some compensation in this direction. He may find some compensation when he surveys the whole field. I admit that the amount is small.

Mr. GERSHAW: Under this item I wish to call the attention of the minister to the fact that if a program of public works is undertaken, post offices throughout the rural parts of the country should certainly come in for consideration. Many of them are poorly equipped, without any waiting rooms, and with inadequate protection for the mails. I know that the postmasters have often to provide buildings themselves, but in many instances their salaries have been reduced and it is impossible for them to do so. We have in Medicine Hat a rather large government building which houses the post office and the customs as well as the health of animals branch, and it has been pointed out to me that that fine building is in need of repairs in several ways—not that any great amount of money should be spent, but it does require certain repairs to keep it in shape. I heard the minister say that the architects visit those places once in a while. How often does an architect visit such a point and is there enough money in this appropriation to provide whatever repairs are needed?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): We have the Dominion of Canada divided up into districts for engineering and architectural purposes. The resident architect at Regina would cover the territory referred to by my hon. friend. If the postmaster or the janitor or any other occupant of the building reports that repairs are needed, or if representations to that effect come from my hon. friend, the matter would at once be referred to the architect and he would investigate and make his report. This item is provided for the purpose of taking care of just such repairs as my hon. friend mentions. The architect does not visit all buildings regularly or at any specified time, but reports are sent to him in the way I have indicated.

Mr. GERSHAW: I would be glad if the minister would have a note of that taken because it has been brought to my attention.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Every suggestion made as reported in Hansard will be carefully reviewed.

Item agreed to.

Rents, Repairs, Furniture, Heating, Etc.

Ottawa public buildings and grounds—

Elevator attendants, $109,000.

Departments generally—char service, including $135 to E. Snowden for firing the noon gun, $408,000.

Heating, including salaries of engineers, firemen and watchmen, $405,000.

Light and power, including roads and bridges, $185,000.

Repairs, improvements, additions and maintenance, $377,000.

Rideau Hall—allowance for fuel and light, $19,000.

Rideau Hall—improvements, furniture and maintenance, $40,700.

Telephone service, $82,500.

Water, $68,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does this item cover all the improvements at Rideau Hall or is some other department doing work there?

[Mr. Gershaw.]

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The only items I notice are for fuel and light, $19,000, and for improvements, furniture and maintenance, $40,700.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend's department did not construct that fence. That is what drew my attention to the matter. By whom was that built? Who pays for it?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The federal district commission undertook that work and they pay for it out of their appropriation.

Mr. RHODES: From the vote to the commission.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I presume that would be a permanent improvement. Do they do anything else?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): They look after the grounds.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Maintenance of grounds?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Has the minister any idea as to the cost?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No; if my hon. friend would make a note of the question, he could refer to it when the estimates of the federal district commission are before the house; this matter does not come under my department.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is just within the last year, is it not, that the maintenance of Rideau Hall grounds and improvements thereto have been placed under the federal district commission? Hitherto, they were under the Department of Public Works.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): My right hon. friend is quite correct. I think this is the second year the commission has had charge of that work. They were given it owing to the fact that they have the necessary equipment and it was felt that the fact they are carrying on similar work of this character made them better qualified.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It also has the effect of showing a saving in the minister's estimates.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This was drawn to my attention just yesterday and as a matter of fact I said it could not be true, but I find now on inquiry that it is true, that the government has divided the work on Rideau Hall and that the actual cost of keeping up that institution is now divided between the federal district commission and the Department of Public Works. Was there any particular reason other than that, as the minister says, the commission has special equipment? It would not have equipment for the maintenance of the grounds.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes, to care for the driveways and all that sort of work, for instance, removal of snow. They can do it more cheaply than we can. What we felt was that with the special equipment they have for the care of driveways, they could take care of this work at the same time.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not want to be critical of the change, but it seems to be rather poor policy to divide work of that kind. The erection of a fence is certainly as much a matter for the Department of Public Works as for the federal district commission, because they would have no special equipment for erecting iron fences. As regards the maintenance of the driveways and the grounds, this is the same sort of work as the Department of Public Works is doing around this and other public buildings. I cannot quite agree with the minister that the government are saving any money by the change. It is work identical with that which is being carried out by the Department of Public Works and to divide it among three or four departments certainly does not tend to cheapen the cost. If the work were concentrated in one department, that would have a tendency to cheapen the cost.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I agree that duplication is likely to increase expense. One reason the work is given to one organization is that it may be in time they will also be given the care of the grounds round the parliament buildings; I am not, however, suggesting that that will be done.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If the government turns over to the commission the care of the grounds all around Ottawa, there would be some strength in the argument, but that is not the case. The Department of Public Works have the equipment and they must have the men to do this work. I do not see how this change is going to lessen the cost.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In justice to the commission and its work, it ought to be appreciated that a large percentage of the amount voted for the commission really goes to carry out work formerly undertaken by the Department of Public Works. Last year, out of a total of $55,000 provided for the maintenance and equipment of properties under the control of the commission, over $44,000 was spent on improvements to the grounds at Rideau Hall. I mention this because it would be unfair, when we come to discuss the item for the federal district commission, to assume that the commission is getting a large amount for general work. It is really getting a large amount for that particular work which formerly was under the minister's department.

Item agreed to.

Dominion public buildings—
Dominion immigration buildings—repairs, improvements, additions and furniture, $10,000.
Dominion quarantine stations—maintenance and repairs, $13,600.
Fittings, general supplies and furniture, $50,000.
Heating, $420,000.
Light and power, $333,000.
Rents, $1,600,000.
Salaries of caretakers, engineers, firemen, etc., $1,030,000.
Supplies for caretakers, engineers, firemen, etc., $45,000.
Water, $75,000.
Yukon public buildings—rents, repairs, fuel, light, water service, and caretakers' salaries, $20,000.

Mr. REID: As regards the item of $1,600,000 for rents, is that for rental of buildings throughout Canada?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes, that is throughout the whole of Canada where we have rentals.

Item agreed to.

Prince Edward island—
Essential undertaking—
Victoria—additional warehouse accommodation, $2,700.
Harbours and rivers generally—for maintenance of services, no new works to be undertaken, $50,000.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): This item, like the others for the maritime provinces and also the rest of Canada, has been reduced drastically. There is only one item in the whole estimate for Prince Edward Island and the total is $52,700. I wish to draw attention to the fact that in 1928-29 the estimate was $229,800 and in 1927-28 it was $339,800. So far as public works are concerned the estimates for the province of Prince Edward Island have been cut out almost entirely. I need not tell the committee that of all the provinces of Canada perhaps Prince Edward Island has a coast line which involves the greatest number of public works, but these have been allowed to fall into decay very rapidly in the past few years. As the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough said, we need assistance for our fishermen, and the only assistance we can give is to provide them with facilities in the way of harbours and landings.

There is one matter to which I would like to direct the attention of the committee. The estimates presented by my good friend the Minister of Finance the second day of the session are no more the estimates for this dominion than that telephone directory is out in the lobby. We have had the information, perhaps by way of accident, from a good many hon. gentlemen opposite as to what is the situation. We know that two or three months before the session opened there were demands from every city and town across the country asking this government to cut down on expenditures, and when the estimates were tabled great headlines appeared in the press from coast to coast saying the estimates had been reduced by $17,000,000. But our friends from Nova Scotia say: "Wait until the supplementary estimates are brought down; then we will be floating on top of the ocean." They say these do not begin to be the estimates for 1934.

I want to point out that the Minister of Finance has not played fair with the country. If we are to have supplementary estimates that will wipe out the $17,000,000 which he said he was saving, it is absolutely unfair to the people of Canada. I think the estimates should have contained every item of expenditure contemplated by the government so that each item could be brought down in the house and passed in the regular way. We do not know how this tremendous amount of new money is to be expended. Some say it is to be a blank cheque; some say it is to be expended under the peace, order and good government legislation, while some say it will be in the supplementary estimates. At all events there is nothing in the estimates for the county I represent, and very little for the counties represented by my hon. friends opposite.

The question I want to ask the minister is whether any representations have been made to him with regard to the warehouses on the wharf at Summerside, Prince Edward Island, and whether a request has been made for the construction of a heated warehouse at that point for the handling of potatoes and other products.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I think some representations were made in connection with the government taking over the Canadian National Railways warehouse. As to the amount in the estimates for Prince Edward Island, of course it is small but I think my hon. friend will find that it is only in keeping with the estimates for the other provinces. With regard to his fears as to the supplementary estimates and further expenditures, I can only invite him to be patient and wait and see. If any action is taken along that line, he will have an opportunity, as all others will have, to set forth his views and express his claims. We have always had supplementary estimates since I have been in this house, and there may be some this year; I cannot say.

Mr. MacLEAN: A portion of that wharf has been taken over and maintained by your department, but on that wharf we have a couple of potato warehouses. This year, however, a great deal of trouble was experienced in loading and housing the potatoes in those buildings, because of frost. A request has been made by the board of trade and other organizations of Summerside asking that some improvements be made there in order that these buildings might be heated so that potatoes could be shipped in colder weather than is possible at present. I hope that if there are supplementary estimates, as we have been led to believe, a sufficient amount will be included to take care of these very necessary repairs.

There are other repairs all around the county that I could enumerate by the score; I could point out many places where money should have been expended this year, and I hope that when the supplementary estimates are brought down these very much needed repairs will not be overlooked.

Item agreed to.

Mr. VENIOT: Before the committee rises I should like to remind the minister that I submitted a request, by way of a motion, for the production of certain papers in connection with the Shippigan wharf. If that report has been submitted I have had no knowledge of it. I wish the minister would have it ready when his estimates come up again.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I will inquire and see that it is brought down as soon as possible.

Mr. VENIOT: I cannot discuss the matter intelligently unless I have that information.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Rhodes the house adjourned at 10.10 p.m.

Monday, February 19, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 14, to amend the Immigration Act (public charge).

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill seeks to amend section 40 of the Immigration Act dealing with the question of public charge. It does not attempt to define the term "public charge," but deals with that section of the act which at the present time makes it obligatory upon local authorities to notify the federal government when a person becomes a public charge. The intention of the measure now before the house is that instead of it being obligatory upon local authorities, it shall be optional with them as to whether or not they will notify federal authorities.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WESTMINSTER HOSPITAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. GRAY (West Lambton): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren). Can he inform the house when the report of the committee investigating conditions in Westminster hospital will be made public?

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Mr. Speaker, that report has been received, but no decision has been made as to when it will be made public. The matter is now under consideration.

DESTRUCTION OF SALMON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct the attention of the Acting Minister of Fisheries to a news item appearing in a Vancouver paper called The Commonwealth. This item which appeared in the publication of the 14th instant, states there is a rumour to the effect that the Fisheries Patrol boat the Malaspina arrived in Vancouver on Thursday, the 8th instant, for the purpose of loading salmon to dump in the gulf. The article goes on to say:

> Good salmon too, not spoiled stuff . . . but perfectly edible salmon.

I think that is unlikely, but suggest the matter should be looked into.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I shall be pleased to look into the matter.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY CONCERNING RETIREMENT OF ELECTRIC RAILWAY BONDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. V. C. PORTEOUS (North Grey): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) based on a communication I have received from one of my constituents. Is there any recent development in connection with the retirement of Canadian National electric railway bonds?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I assume the hon. member is referring to the Guelph suburban about which he spoke to me. I shall make an answer in regard to that in a few days.

ANNUAL REPORT AND APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): While I am on my feet may I say that the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) asked a question on Friday about the tabling of the annual report of the Canadian National Railways. I have made inquiries and I am informed that the report will not be ready until about March 15, which is about the usual time, after they have received the report of the auditors for the year.

KING ALBERT OF BELGIUM

TRIBUTES TO HIS MEMORY—EXPRESSIONS OF REGRET AND SYMPATHY

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be the sense of this house that we should place on record our very deep sympathy with the Belgian people in the loss they have suffered through the sudden and unexpected death of their sovereign, and that we should extend also our deepest sympathy to the bereaved family.

In the end of July and the beginning of August, 1914, the late King of the Belgians was the well-beloved monarch of a small nation with a relatively limited population. Within a month he had become one of the great figures of the world. If one were to ask how this came about, the answer, I think, would be found in the character of the man who at that moment was sovereign of the Belgian people. The neutrality of his country had been guaranteed by treaty. When Germany determined to march against France the plan of campaign, as prepared by her military leaders, contemplated crossing Belgian soil. That was a violation of neutrality. It is difficult at this time to determine just what discussions took place and to what extent conciliatory efforts were used for the purpose of inducing those in authority in Belgium to consent to such action. But out of all the confusion and doubt on that question there emerges one clear-cut fact, and that is that the King of the Belgians was prepared to sacrifice everything except honour in defence of his people and of the integrity of his kingdom. From that moment on he became a world figure. He must have realized, as everyone did, that that small nation could not resist the onslaught of the great moving millions of Germany, and when his cities fell one after the other, when his country became almost a dependency of a foreign country and governed by a foe, as it was for so many years, he still pursued his course at the head of his army, sharing in their vicissitudes their losses and their gains. In the end he was privileged as the head not only of his own armies but of the armies of the north of France and of some British troops, the cavalry brigade of Canada and some detached engineering and railway units, to march back into his kingdom and repossess it.

His place in history is assured. The suddenness of his death and the circumstances attending it will add lustre to the glory of his name. We, far-removed from his kindgom, perhaps do not realize the extent to which he had become beloved by his people. Democratic, and yet in every sense a king, he and his queen had so endeared themselves to their people that I fancy few more popular sovereigns ever sat upon a throne. We Canadians were not closely in contact with the operations which he directed until the end when he repossessed himself of his kingdom, but I think we can share, as our troops shared under the command which he had over his own and the British and Canadian forces at the end, the sorrow of his people and extend the sympathy which Canadians have for those who have lost a heroic sovereign, one whose courage and determination have given him a place among the heroic figures of the world. In that sense I am sure that this House of Commons and the parliament of Canada will join with all the peoples of the world who honour and respect courage, bravery and the qualities that make for enduring fame among the citizens of the world, in extending our sympathy to the bereaved royal family and people of Belgium in the great loss which they have sustained.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): As leader of the official opposition in this House of Commons, I deem it a privilege to join with the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in the sentiments which he has expressed on behalf of the Canadian people in appreciation of the truly great and noble life of the late King Albert I of Belgium; and of the loss which Belgium and the world has sustained in the late king's sudden and tragic death.

I join as well, on behalf of hon. members on this side of the house, with the Prime Minister and hon. members on the government side, in the sympathy which the Prime Minister has expressed with Her Majesty the Queen of Belgium, and the members of the Belgian royal family, in their personal bereavement, and with the people of Belgium in their national loss.

Character, and the circumstances of his time, combined to give to the late king most of the attributes of the mythical hero of legendary days. It is in no way due to convention that in all parts of the world to-day, King Albert of Belgium's many virtues as a sovereign and as a man are being extolled. He, if ever monarch was, will be remembered as a Knight of the Holy Grail; a man who found the joy and fullness of life in high and noble adventure. The manner of his death portrayed the quest of his soul.

The world, in these days of anxiety and uncertainty, will greatly mourn the loss of one whose personality and patriotism did so much to unite the crown and the people in bonds of mutual confidence and affection. It will, however, recognize as a legacy to all mankind, what it now recalls of Albert's kingly and heroic leadership of his country in time of peril; his rigid regard at all times, as a sovereign, for constitutional practice and procedure; his never-failing solicitude for the well-being of his subjects; his democratic sympathies and behaviour; and his exemplary personal life.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, King Albert of Belgium whose death we mourn to-day was beloved by his subjects and revered the world over for his great and sterling qualities. May I be permitted to join with the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in expressing to the royal family and the people of Belgium our sincere sympathy in their irreparable loss.

AUSTRIAN SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. It is perhaps hardly fair that I should expect an answer to-day, but I think it perhaps is right that we should ask the question because many are deeply interested in the whole problem. What is the policy of the government, if any, towards the situation existing at the present time in Austria?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I think I should answer the question at once. The government of the day is advised from time to time of what is transpiring in Austria. So far as policy is concerned, I know of no policy that we can adopt that would warrant us either in interfering in the domestic difficulties of Austria or in endeavouring to preserve the sanctity of treaties when the nations directly affected, Great Britain, France and Italy, have already directed a note to Germany in the sense of maintaining the integrity of Austria and maintaining unviolated the conditions and terms of treaties.

WHEAT AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): I should like to direct a question to the government. Is it the intention of the government to ask for concurrence by the House of Commons in the recent agreement entered into regarding wheat?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): As I am at present advised, it is unnecessary to do so. The legislation dealing with marketing will afford ample powers so far as the government is concerned, but the provinces have certain responsibilities, as the hon. gentleman knows, with respect to cultivation, over which there is grave doubt as to the power of this parliament in the absence of what has been designated as a treaty within the provisions of the British North America Act.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister if three provinces can bind nine provinces with respect to what is to be the agricultural policy of the country?

Mr. BENNETT: No. The three provinces have to deal with the question of production within their borders, and to the extent to which that may affect the interests of the other six or of the nine, of course they are affected. It is not a question of binding them or anything of that sort, it is a question of taking such action as will bring about what they conceive will be in the best interests of their producers and to ensure them higher prices than they are now receiving for their products.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My point is that all the provinces of Canada are affected by this agreement. There is no other place except this House of Commons in which expression can be given by at least six out of the nine provinces as to the degree to which they are affected and whether they approve or disapprove. I think it is imperative not only that this matter should receive full discussion but, before its provisions become operative, approval of the treaty as well should be voted by this house.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to make another observation, having spoken already, I have no doubt that there will be an item in the estimates which will provide ample opportunity for a discussion of this matter. I should like to point out that section 92 of the British North America Act states that in each and every province the legislature has exclusive jurisdiction. Exclusive jurisdiction means just what it says, the power to deal with the quantity of production within the provinces.

8. During the past five years, has the government or the railway company called for or received other tenders for the rebuilding of this station?

9. If so, who were the persons or corporations who submitted tenders and for what amount?

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I should like the hon. gentleman to look at this question with some care. It involves the examination of the internal business of the Canadian National Railways. For reasons which this house has asserted and reasserted, it simply means that we would send a letter to the company and ask them to give us this information. As happens in nine out of ten cases of this kind, they would reply that it is not desirable in the public interest or in the conduct of the business of the railway that this question should be answered. We would be in the difficult position of trying to insist that a company functioning as a national railway should be asked to do something which a company functioning as a privately owned railway would not be compelled to do. Under the circumstances, I suggest that the question be dropped.

Mr. GORDON: This same question was asked in substance but in another form by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) on February 15. The report of the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization which went into this question last session will be drawn to the attention of the select committee set up by this house a few days ago to be under the chairmanship of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) for such review, investigation and action as is deemed desirable. BUREAU FOR TRANSLATIONS

Mr. DESROCHERS:

Mr. CAHAN: As this question was answered last week, the hon. gentleman agreed that it should be dropped.

Question dropped.

Mr. FOURNIER:

1. Will the project of centralization of the translation service presented by the Secretary of State include the dismissal of certain translators?

2. Will all the translators included in the central bureau of translation, the chief excepted, have the same status?

3. If so, is the government now considering a revision upwards of the salaries of the translators less remunerated who will be called upon to perform the same work as their colleagues?

4. If so, in what proportion?

Mr. CAHAN: The object of the government is to place the several translation services of parliament and of the government on a permanent statutory basis as an organized branch of the administration of the federal government of Canada, and to provide that all official documents may be efficiently and speedily translated either into the French or into the English language, as required, and that such translations may, thereafter, be dispatched or printed and distributed without unnecessary delay.

The organization of the proposed bureau for translations, as provided in Bill No. 4, will be effected by the Civil Service Commission in consultation with the deputy ministers of the several departments of the public service which are affected thereby or interested therein. To maintain the proposed higher status of this service and improve its efficiency and usefulness, it is desirable that the services of all expert translators, who are now in the public service, should be utilized in the organization of the proposed bureau, and that a minister of the crown should, thereafter, assume responsibility to the government and to parliament for the due administration of this branch of the public service.

VAUDRIN UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF PLAN

Mr. DENIS:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the right hon. R. B. Bennett, Prime Minister, and Mr. Geo. C. Vaudrin, in connection with the Vaudrin plan and the means to solve the crisis of unemployment, from the first of January, 1933, to the present day.

NOVA SCOTIA POST OFFICES

Mr. DUFF:

For a return giving a list of post offices in Nova Scotia whose net revenue is between $200 and $3,000. Also the gross revenue of the same classes of offices, with names of post offices and the figures set opposite each.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Mr. MICHAUD:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, contracts, agreements and pay lists, statements of payments and other documents, exchanged between the Minister of Labour, or any minister of the government, and the government of the province of New Brunswick or any member or employee thereof, regarding unemployment relief, and showing what amount contributed by Dominion government to province of New Brunswick from September 1, 1930, to February 1, 1934, for relief of unemployment.

Mr. GORDON: It will be noted that this motion contemplates copies of all correspondence, telegrams, contracts, agreements, pay lists, statements and so forth, from September 1, 1930 to February 1, 1934. There is no objection to having this motion pass the house, but I can frankly state that there is no possible hope, with the available staff, of having the return ready for this session of parliament. It will entail a very long statement with copies of the documents themselves. I have seen what is contemplated and I feel certain that during this session of parliament it could not possibly be prepared with the present staff. If the hon. member has in mind any particular activity in the province of New Brunswick, which was carried on with respect to unemployment, and in which he is interested, if he cares to see me I shall be very glad to have prepared for him those portions of the documents which are asked for in this motion, and have it supplied with the least possible delay. I believe that on reflection the hon. member will drop the motion and follow my suggestion. If he comes and sees me I think I can give him within a reasonable time copies of all records he requires.

Mr. MICHAUD: I must thank the minister for the valuable information he has just submitted. I regret if, by moving this motion, I have obliged him to go to a great deal of trouble. Before placing the motion on the order paper I had been given to understand, from sources in New Brunswick, that with regard to these matters there was very little correspondence and documentary evidence exchanged between the two departments. However, I am pleased to accept the minister's invitation. I will try to obtain the information in the way he has suggested, and if not successful then I shall be at liberty to come again.

Motion dropped.

BAGOTVILLE, QUE., POST OFFICE

Mr. HEENAN (for Mr. Casgrain):

For a copy of all correspondence, reports and documents, in connection with the appointment and dismissal of Mr. Jos. C. Levesque, postmaster at Bagotville, and also for a copy of all correspondence, reports and other documents relating to an inquiry held in connection with charges made against said J. C. Levesque, including the proof and evidence of all the witnesses heard at said inquiry together with the decision arrived at by the commissioner who held said inquiry.

Mr. DUPRE: Apparently there is some misunderstanding about this question and I will ask you to let the matter stand, Mr. Speaker, until the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) is present.

Motion stands.

AIR MAIL SERVICES

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): With the consent of the house I should like to answer the inquiry made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury) a few days ago. He inquired as to the policy of the government with respect to the transportation of mail by air. I can only say to him that the matter rests entirely upon financial considerations, and if, as and when financial conditions warrant, the government will announce its policy in the matter.

WATER TRANSPORTATION

PROPOSED IMPOSITION OF TOLLS ON TRAFFIC THROUGH CANADIAN CANALS

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, it is expedient, in view of the large amounts of money invested by the dominion in canals and railroads, that all goods shipped through the canals owned and operated by the Government of Canada be subject to taxation.

He said: The motion standing on the order paper in my name, which you have just read, Mr. Speaker, is one I shall discuss for a few minutes this afternoon from the standpoint of finance and present-day business and transportation. It is not my intention to ask this country or this government to do anything contrary to the usual practice of the nations of the world to-day; that, I think, would be impossible. The seas are the common highway of mankind; on them there are no preferred claims, no prescriptive rights. And what pertains to the seas pertains also, to a lesser degree, to the navigable streams of this or any other country. When nature has placed impediments that have to be circumvented or removed by man and these obstructions are overcome it is a recognized fact that countries incurring that expense are entitled to collect tolls to reimburse them for their outlay. But I think it is also a generally recognized international practice that there must be no discrimination between countries. That was first laid down, in a treaty between Great Britain and the United States in 1850, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It was reiterated in the Washington treaty of 1870 and again in the convention of Constantinople which regulated tolls on the Suez canal. The principle was again recognized in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 and lastly in the treaty signed at Washington in 1910 between Canada and the United States. Nearly all these treaties carry similar clauses. As the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was superseded by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we can pass that over. But we find in the convention of Constantinople, which was signed by Great Britain, Russia, France, Spain, Italy and Germany, the following clause regarding the Suez canal:

> The Suez maritime canal shall always be free and open in time of war as in time of peace to every vessel of commerce or war without distinction of flag.

That again was copied almost word for word in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 and a similar idea is expressed in the Washington treaty and the treaty of 1910 in connection with the international boundary waters of Canada and the United States. Consequently, I do not think it would be wise, as so many journals and some individuals in Canada are suggesting to-day, to discriminate either for or against any other country, but rather, we should exercise our rights as they are being exercised by other nations and levy on the tonnage going through our canals a sufficient tax to recompense us, at least in part, for the great expenditures we have made.

In this day and generation it is a fair maxim that every service which is costing the country a considerable sum of money should bring us some return. If we stop for a moment to look at the vast sums of money that we have tied up in our water transportation systems I think the house and the country will agree with me that the dominion should get some return. We have some $245,000,000 invested in canals, $280,000,000 invested in wharves and harbours and, as nearly as I can find out, something over $100,000,000 invested in elevators through harbour commissions and such-like. In addition to that, we have spent some $30,000,000 or $35,000,000 in dredging the St. Lawrence river. It may be a surprise to the house to know that the return to the public treasury on this vast sum of $600,000,000 or $700,000,000 is practically nothing. If you take this sum and compound the interest at, say four per cent from the time of the investment, the total amount involved would simply stagger the country.

The time has come when we should levy on the tonnage passing through these waterways a tax that would bring at least some revenue back to the public treasury. It seems almost incomprehensible that a country owning a railway in which we have invested some $2,600,000,000, would build a water transportation system in competition with it for some 1,426 miles and run it absolutely free to every nation in the world. But that is what we have done. We make the railways build their tracks, buy their equipment, construct their terminals and operate them; then in competition we put a free waterway transportation system costing us the gross sum of $600,000,000 or $700,000,000. More than that, incredible as it may seem, every province is spending hundreds of millions of dollars on highways in competition with our railways. Ontario alone has spent $406,000,000 on highways and gravelled roads; Quebec has spent $158,000,000 in the same way, and as I have said, we have invested between $600,000,000 and $700.000,000 on a waterway system which we have made free; the highways are practically free and yet we expect our two great railway systems to meet competition of that kind and earn their expenses and some return on their investment. The whole thing is incredible.

What has been the result? Let me give just a few instances. I was raised in the county of Lambton and ore from Duluth used to come down to Point Edward in that county, being reshipped from there over the national railways to Hamilton where it was used. During the two years preceding the opening of the Welland canal more than 1,000,000 tons of ore were carried to Point Edward and on that carriage the railway received more than half a million dollars. To-day every ton of that business is lost to the railroad; the ore is now carried by United States vessels from Duluth to Hamilton. The net result is that Canada is simply bonusing United States ships to come in and take business away from our own railway.

Flour transportation from Port Arthur and Fort William is in the same position. Previously, that flour was ground and shipped to Port McNicoll and Point Edward. Since the Welland canal has been opened I am informed that the railways have lost business amounting to $1,250,000 per annum, that tonnage being nearly all carried by boats and one-third of those being foreign. Last year tonnage to the amount of 9,000,000 tons went through the Welland canal and over one-third of it was carried by ships built in foreign countries by foreign workmen and manned by foreign sailors. We build a waterway transportation system and give it to them free, asking them to come in and compete against our own railway transportation systems.

Take the coal that comes into Toronto. For many years that came in over our railway systems. To-day it comes in by water and the two railways are now losing more than $1,000,000 of business per annum. That has also gone partly to foreign ships. Two years ago 90,000 tons of pulpwood from Norway was carried in free through our canals, thus helping to depress the product of our own industries in the markets of Canada and the United States. That is part of the result of allowing free transportation over our waterways.

There is no doubt that the government has power to impose tolls. I could refer the house to the different treaties which I have read and which give us that power. There is a Canadian statute in which that is set out, but the greatest proof of all is that we did impose tolls and they were not abolished until 1905. I have under my hand the order in council passed in June, 1905, but as no reasons are given for the abolition of tolls, we must assume what those reasons were. But whatever the reasons were in 1905, they no longer exist. A great deal of water has gone under the bridge since then. At that time Canada had an interest bill of only $7,000,000 on its funded debt; to-day we have an interest bill of $134,000,000. The national debt was then somewhere under $300,000,000, whereas to-day it is $2,600,000,000 or $2,700,000,000. At that time we did not have a great railway system on our hands with a debt of $2,600,000,000 and this is costing and going to cost us from $75,000,000 to $100,000,000 per annum for at least the lifetime of any person in this house. We then did not have to pay $42,000,000 annually in pensions as a result of the great war, nor did we have $130,000,000 invested in the Welland canal. This colossal debt has all been piled up since that time and yet we continue to give free transportation over our inland waterways to all the ships in the world. Every other major canal that I have read anything about has tolls. Tolls are charged on the Panama canal, I saw this morning that last year they amounted to $23,000,000. That is over five per cent of the cost, which was $400,000,000. Last year one third as much tonnage went from Canada through the Panama canal as went through the Welland canal, and on goods going from and coming to Canada we paid over $3,000,000 in tolls to the Panama canal. Yet on the northern side of the United States we let an equal quantity of goods go through our canals for nothing. It is an asinine policy in my opinion, especially for a young country so loaded with debt as we are.

[Mr. McGibbon.]

Some may differ from me, but I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to this house, that the greatest transportation systems that we ever had and must have in the future are our railways. Confederation would not have been possible had we not been able to carry out the agreement to join the provinces by railway. The railways have been the great instrument of colonization, and we must preserve them. When the Duff commission made its report the railways of Canada gave employment to 163,000 people. They pay in taxes to the different treasuries of this country something over $8,000,000 per year. The canals pay nothing; there are no fees outside of the elevator charges, practically everything that is represented in the total investment is free.

Besides that, sir, this country is spending hundreds of millions on roads, and they are practically free. And now we have started in the air, and have spent some $3,000,000 on that. I think it is only fair that all the services of this country should pay a fair return on the capital invested. We have on the Welland canal alone a loss of about $14,000,000 a year, including interest and amortization. We are spending in actual services and wages over $3,000,000 a year and not charging even that to the traffic.

Mr. HANBURY: Is that for all over Canada ?

Mr. McGIBBON: Yes, all over Canada. We are not even charging that to the traffic, why I do not know. But I do think the time has come when this house should seriously consider the matter. With the great debt we have at the present time and the heavy taxation placed upon this country we cannot afford to go on giving for nothing services of this kind costing $14,000,000 to $15,000,000 a year in cash. Take the budget presented to this house, some $343,000,000 I think in the main estimates, and the supplementary estimates yet to come. Then we have our railway deficits, and when you go into the provincial sphere you have the provinces spending $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 each, and besides that the municipal taxes. In my opinion, sir, this country has got a load that it simply cannot carry. The taxation on the people to-day is grinding them down; I know it cannot be helped but it is shackling the nation. It is up to this parliament and this government to get every dollar they legitimately can get, and I think the canals are one source to which they should look. I would suggest with all humility to the Minister of Finance that he can raise in this way $10,000,000 a year, basing that estimate on last year's traffic. I see the Prime Minister disagrees—

Mr. MANION: What rate?

Mr. McGIBBON: Same rate as the Panama canal.

Mr. COOTE: It would kill the traffic.

Mr. McGIBBON: Well let me read something that the Coolidge commission said about that. I cannot put my hand on it for the moment, but it is to the effect that traffic that will not bear a reasonable charge for the services entailed should be let go. The late President Coolidge appointed a committee to investigate the question and their report stated that traffic that could not bear a reasonable rate of return on the cost and upkeep of the facilities involved and meet competition should be disbanded. I think that is a fair statement of business facts. Why do the people of this country bonus Norwegian ships to come here and take business away from our own people, ships built in foreign countries and manned by foreigners? If there is any reason I do not know it. The only reason I have seen in print or heard of any place is that free tolls help some classes of business; the pulp and paper business was mentioned. I do not see why one business should be selected and given special favours by a country, allowing its hands to be put in the treasury and money taken out to help that particular industry.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McGIBBON: Someone says "hear, hear." It has been done for a good many years, but that is another point. I am not saying what the rate should be. If there are any industries that are specially dependent on favours in this country the rates could be set accordingly, but to make everything free for the whole world is to my mind absolutely ridiculous. I am going to ask the Minister of Finance to get his government to put this tax on and take it off sugar.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McGIBBON: I know we have got to have the revenue, Mr. Speaker, but I come from a part of the country where the people are very, very poor, and where they are dependent for practically all their fruit on picking and preserving the wild fruit, and I am stating nothing more than the fact when I tell this house that many of them last summer could not preserve their fruit because they could not buy the sugar. Yet at the same time we are bonusing the shipping interests of this country to the extent of $10,000,000 or $11,000,000 a year. I am going to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals to give this question his serious consideration. I think it is a fair business proposition. This country has poured out between $600,000,000 and $700,000,000 on these waterways, and we have an annual expense for upkeep of $3,000,000 or $4,000,000, now likely to increase to $5,000,000, and no returns. I am going to ask the minister not to turn this resolution down, but at least, as one famous statesman in the province of Ontario used to say, "to take it into his favourable consideration."

Mr. HEAPS: Before the hon. member sits down might I ask a question? Does the hon. gentleman know the amount of the annual maintenance charges of these canals, and the annual interest charges on the capital invested?

Mr. McGIBBON: Maintenance charges on the canals amount to $3,000,000 about a year.

Mr. MANION: Does my hon. friend include the interest?

Mr. McGIBBON: No.

Mr. MANION: The maintenance charge is not anything like $3,000,000 on the Welland canal.

Mr. McGIBBON: Well I got my information from the department. "I take my time from the minister's clock." I do not know what the interest charges are, but they are easy to calculate, taking, say, 4½ per cent on the $245,000,000 spent on canals alone. That would come to between $9,000,000 and $10,000,000 wouldn't it? And the revenue is only about $1,000,000 half from the elevator at Prescott and half from the water powers on the Welland canal?

Mr. HEAPS: Is that $1,000,000 the total revenue from all the canal systems in the country?

Mr. McGIBBON: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: I should like to ask a question. As the hon. member has studied the facts concerning other canals such as the Panama and Suez could he tell the house as to how the tonnage is charged? Is it gross, net, or how is it charged?

Mr. McGIBBON: There is a charge of seventy-five cents a ton for ballast and $1.20 a ton for loaded. Those figures are for the Panama and Suez canal. The Manchester ship canal is very cheap, the rate being only twenty-six cents per ton.

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I think it is generally conceded that agricultural interests in Canada, during these years of depression have been the hardest hit. The resolution of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) is apparently designed to exact some further toll from agricultural interests. Looking at the report of the royal commission on railways and transportation in Canada we find that in 1931 about half of the freight which passed through our Canadian canals consisted of agricultural products and about two-thirds of those products consisted of wheat. This government found it necessary only a few years ago to grant a bonus on wheat. Also at the Imperial economic conference they thought it desirable to obtain a preference of six cents a bushel for wheat in the British market. If tolls are imposed on tonnage passing through Canadian canals wheat must bear a considerable part of the taxation. Canada is a rather difficult country to govern.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Our greatest exports are produced so far from the sea that competition in the world market is rendered more difficult. In looking up the rates between the Argentine and Great Britain and between Australia and Great Britain and comparing them with Canadian rates, I was interested to find that the Argentine has what might be termed a preference in the matter of transportation rates of from eight cents to ten cents per bushel in the world's markets, with which our wheat has to compete. Australia is in very much the same position. She has a greater ocean mileage, but her wheat fields are located comparatively close to the ocean and to the ports from which her commodities are exported. The same applies to the Argentine.

When we consider those facts and consider the necessity of the Canadian farmer getting his product to the sea as cheaply as possible it seems to me that at this time we should not impose tolls. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario has stated that in 1905 when tolls were abolished there may have been some justification for such action, but he states the argument used in those days would not apply to-day. I submit the very opposite is the fact, so far as Canadian canals are concerned. In 1905 the bulk of freight passing through Canadian canals was of American origin. At the present time the bulk is largely Canadian, and the hon. member would now be penalizing Canadians. On at least a part of our canal system we are not allowed to impose tolls.

Section 26 of the treaty of Washington of 1871 is as follows:

> The navigation of the river St. Lawrence ascending and descending from the 45th parallel of north latitude, where it ceases to form the boundary between the two countries, from, to, and into the sea, shall forever remain free and open for the purposes of commerce to the citizens of the United States, subject to any laws and regulations of Great Britain or of the Dominion of Canada, not inconsistent with such privileges of free navigation.

Then, in section 27 I find:

> The government of Her Britannic Majesty engages to urge upon the government of the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence and other canals in the dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the dominion; and the government of the United States engages that the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty shall enjoy the use of the St. Clair flats canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States, and further engages to urge upon the state governments to secure to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty the use of the several state canals connected with the navigation of the lakes or rivers traversed by or contiguous to the boundary line between the possessions of the high contracting parties on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the hon. member observed the modifications of that treaty in the Boundary Waters treaty of 1909.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Yes. However it does not alter the intention of the parties, if I read the subsequent modifications correctly.

Mr. BENNETT: But there is a great change.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Yes.

Mr. McGIBBON: May I ask the hon. member a question. After the time about which he is speaking did we not impose and collect tolls?

Mr. BOTHWELL: Quite true; we did. But in 1905 we found it necessary or advisable to abolish tolls, and since that time there has been no idea in the minds either of the people of the United States or of Canada to exercise any discrimination as between the two countries in the use of the canal system.

In speaking of production in Canada and the movement through our canal system I believe I should place on record a few sections of the report of the royal commission on railways and transportation in Canada. From section 177 of that report I read:

The arterial pulse of the movement of commerce through the great lakes navigation system is to be found in the Canadian and United States locks at Sault Ste. Marie. It is not generally appreciated that the traffic through the St. Mary's river connecting lakes Superior and Huron is, in a normal season, in excess of the combined annual traffic through the Panama, the Suez, the Kiel and the Manchester ship canals. In 1929 the total traffic passed at Sault Ste. Marie (Canadian and United States locks) was 92,616,808 tons; for the Panama it was 30,663,006; for the Suez, 33,466,014; for the Kiel, 21,613,088; and for the Manchester, 6,558,598, a total, for the four salt-water canals of 92,300,000, or a slightly less tonnage than that of the fresh-water system as registered at the principal tally point for our international inland waters.

In order to have on record the class of freight moved through our canal system I shall read section 180 of the report of the commission, which is as follows:

In 1931, by no means a representative year, the total traffic through the purely Canadian canals along this route amounted to 16,189,074 tons. This figure would necessarily include duplications of cargoes carried through two or more canals. To this movement 27,651 vessels contributed.

The classes of commodities carried included:

	Tons
Agricultural products	7,757,307
Animal products	15,830
Manufactures	2,976,780
Products of forests	748,419
Products of mines	4,690,738
Total	16,189,074

In the following section the commission say:

Two-thirds of the movement of agricultural products, as listed above, consisted of grain, principally wheat.

Further on in the report the commission say, in section 183:

Railway transportation in so far as the movement of grain and bulk commodities is concerned has been largely adjusted to the problem presented by competition from the great inland waterway. The railways carry to and from the head of the lakes and to and from the lower lake ports. The movement of grain in particular is dependent on low inland water transport and the fortunes of the railways themselves in western Canada are dependent upon the ability of the grain grower to place his product at low cost at ocean ports.

Further on, in section 185, of the report I find this:

While on first consideration it might appear that the construction of canals which are free of all tolls to water carriers is in effect a form of state subsidy to a rival transport agency, yet in so far at least as bulk traffic in grain and heavy commodities is concerned, complaint is not made by the railways on this score. The imposition of tolls would not help and would probably hinder the railways as tending to discourage production.

And section 187:

Water-borne traffic will continue to be a factor of major importance in Canadian transportation both on the inland waterways and coastwise, through the Panama canal, but rail traffic has in the main been adjusted to the conditions now existing, and it does not seem probable that the developments now under way and in contemplation in connection with the Hudson's bay route, and the deepening of the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes canals, will seriously prejudice the position of the railways in the future. The competition of water-borne traffic has not been an important factor in bringing about the present difficulties of the railways.

That is the report of the commission that we appointed to endeavour to solve our transportation difficulties in Canada, and there is no suggestion from that commission that tolls should be levied. As a matter of fact they intimate that the imposition of tolls would work a further hardship or be further detrimental to the railway situation.

I want to say a further word in connection with wheat and what the imposition of these tolls would mean. I wish to refer to the competition which we have from the Argentine and Australia, but particularly the Argentine. We have a preference under the empire agreements in the British markets, and we were hopeful that this would result in an increased export of our wheat to Great Britain; that we would to a large extent, at least, shut out the Argentine until Britain had received whatever we were able to ship to her. But in the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce dated January 30 of this year I find that our exports of wheat to Great Britain have fallen in 1933 as compared with 1932, while the exports of the Argentine republic to Great Britain have increased. I quote from page seven of that report:

The following table shows imports of wheat into the United Kingdom during August, September, October, November and December, 1933 and 1932.

The figures are rather startling. They are as follows:

From:	1933 Aug.-Dec. (Bushels)	1932 Aug.-Dec.
Canada	31,716,174	49,324,078

This shows a decrease of 17,607,904 bushels.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose that the hon. gentleman knows that in the meantime England bonused the production of wheat, and the production was eight million quarters or over 60,000,000 bushels.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Canada nevertheless is supposed to have a preference—

Mr. BENNETT: Not supposed to; she has.

Mr. BOTHWELL: —a preference of six cents a bushel on our wheat entering Great Britain, but Canada has not been able to meet the competition of the Argentine. I am therefore arguing against the imposition of tolls that will make our position worse instead of better. In 1932 the Argentine exported to Great Britain from August to December inclusive 4,207,452 bushels, and for the same months in 1933 17,073,198 bushels, or an increase of 12,865,746. Australia increased her exports of wheat to Great Britain for the same months from 13,643,593 in 1932, to 18,192,892 in 1933, an increase of 4,549,299 bushels. Australia is in the same position as Canada with respect to the trade agreement with Great Britain, but Australia has increased her exports. While Canada has reduced her exports for the same months in 1933 as compared with 1932 by 17,607,904 bushels, Australia increased hers by 4,549,299 bushels.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman knows that it is a question of the quality of the wheat.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Russia also increased her exports for the same months from 3,960,235 in 1932 to 10,763,357 bushels in 1933. Other nations also increased their exports to Great Britain for the same months from 9,069,789 in 1932 to 10,501,570 bushels in 1933.

Having regard to the condition that agriculture in Canada finds itself in during this depression, and to the fact that the government has found it necessary to find a preference for Canadian products in the British market, and also found it necessary to bonus wheat a few years ago; having regard also to the difficulties that were recognized at the world wheat congress at Regina in regard to Canada getting her wheat on the world market as is outlined in the report of the Grain Exhibition and Congress last year, starting at page 291, I submit that to-day of all times in the history of Canada is the least opportune for the imposition of tolls and a further levy upon the agriculturists of Canada who are no now able to live and pay their taxes under the conditions that exist.

Mr. J. F. WHITE (London): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a good deal of interest to the presentation of his case by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon). While he gave us a great deal of information I find that I cannot come to the conclusion that I should support his motion.

[Mr. Bennett.]

The tolls on Canadian canals were abolished I understand in 1904 or 1905, and as far as I can gather, it was done for the purpose of increasing traffic through our canals, and also because of the preponderance of American tonnage that was passing through them. That condition has been corrected in time, as was stated by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. The Canadian tonnage is now much ahead of the American, and the tonnage passing through the canals has increased very materially.

As far as I can gather there is nothing in the treaties that have been made with the United States to prevent tolls being levied. The hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) has quoted the treaty of 1871. I should like to quote article 1 of the waterways treaty of 1909, approved by this house in 1911. It reads:

> The high contracting parties agree that the navigation of all navigable boundary waters shall for ever continue free and open for the purposes of commerce to the inhabitants and to the ships, vessels, and boats of both countries equally, subject, however, to any laws and regulations of either country, within its own territory, not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation, and applying equally and without discrimination to the inhabitants, ships, vessels, and boats of both countries.
> It is further agreed that so long as this treaty shall remain in force this same right of navigation shall extend to the waters of lake Michigan, and to all canals connecting boundary waters and now existing or which may hereafter be constructed on either side of the line. Either of the high contracting parties may adopt rules and regulations governing the use of such canals within its own territory, and may charge tolls for the use thereof; but all such rules and regulations and all tolls charged shall apply alike to the subjects or citizens of the high contracting parties and the ships, vessels, and boats of both of the high contracting parties, and they shall be placed on terms of equality in the use thereof.

That treaty was to exist for five years, after which it was to be subject to termination upon twelve months' notice. In the St. Lawrence deep waterway treaty which was negotiated in 1932, subject to approval by the United States governing bodies and by this parliament, there is a clause which deals with the matter to which I have just referred. Article 7 reads:

> The high contracting parties agree that the rights of navigation accorded under the provisions of existing treaties between His Majesty and the United States of America shall be maintained, notwithstanding the provisions for termination contained in any of such treaties, and declare that these treaties confer upon the subjects or citizens and upon the ships, vessels and boats of each high contracting party, rights of navigation in the St. Lawrence river, and the great lakes system, including the canals now existing or which may hereafter be constructed.

That article has the effect of making the arrangement perpetual in character. In view of the fact that this treaty is now being discussed in the United States, I think that this resolution is rather ill-timed. I do not think we should do anything either to promote or hinder the passage of this measure in the United States. If it should pass there, well and good, it will then come to us.

Equality of treatment for the people and shipping of the United States and the people of Canada is insisted upon in the treaties of 1871, 1909 and the one now under discussion. Should Canada levy tolls without coming to an arrangement with the United States, I think it would have the effect of driving tonnage away from the Canadian canals. If that should occur the estimated revenue from these tolls will be much smaller. It will have the additional effect of increasing the cost of transportation. Hitherto our efforts have been in the direction of cheapening transportation as much as possible, especially through the canals of the St. Lawrence and the great lakes where so much wheat is transported. It is my opinion that this added cost of transportation ultimately will find its way back to the producers of wheat. If tolls are levied it will have the effect of driving business to other channels. There would be the competition of the Hudson Bay railway, the Vancouver outlet to Europe through the Panama canal and the Buffalo and Albany which is used to some extent. There would be also the Mississippi route to the gulf. These would all affect the amount of tonnage which would pass through our canals.

The speaker referred to the railroads but he did not tell the house the amount of land grants which have been made nor the subsidies paid for construction. I cannot see that the railroads have much complaint with regard to their treatment. It seems to me that in view of the fact that transportation charges will be increased on a vital product of central Canada, the best thing we can do is to leave our canals free of tolls.

Mr. F. W. TURNBULL (Regina): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of taking up much time in discussing this interesting and important motion but I desire merely to place on record my concurrence in the views of the hon. members who have just spoken, that it would not be a proper step to take to impose an additional tax upon the water borne traffic of our internal canals. As far as western wheat is concerned the effect would be to force more wheat through Vancouver and the Panama canal. This wheat would pay tolls to the Panama canal rather than to the Canadian canals, and much of our wheat now moves in that direction.

Wheat is not the only product involved. There are large cargoes moving through our canals both east and west of lumber, ore, steel and manufactured products. Central Canada is unfortunately situated as far as access to ocean ports is concerned. It is situated far inland and produces a particular commodity in large quantities. In order that this commodity may meet the competition on the markets of the world it is necessary that transportation rates to those markets shall be as low as possible. This applies not only to the outgoing traffic consisting of wheat, cattle, meat, butter and eggs but also to the incoming traffic from eastern Canada. It is desirable that central Canada should have cheap transportation to the markets of the world as well as cheap freight rates on those things which are required to maintain production.

If a tax upon canal tolls were to favour the railroads it would have to be very high indeed. The rail rate on wheat from Fort William to Montreal is something over thirty cents per hundredweight while in normal years the water rate is something like seven or eight cents per hundredweight. In order to be of any benefit to the railroads, a tremendous tax would have to be imposed. This would be necessary before there could be anything like competition with the canals in the carriage of this particular product. Perhaps not so great a tax would be necessary in the case of other commodities, but the life of the country depends upon its ability to sell sufficient goods in order to meet its obligations in other lands and its ability to export depends upon transportation as much as upon anything else.

A tax of even one cent per bushel upon western wheat would reduce to that extent the purchasing power of the people of the prairies. To the extent that their purchasing power was reduced, the industries of eastern Canada would suffer. There would be a slowing up of the whole internal trade between the east and the west.

I do not think the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) was really in earnest when he suggested that with the $10,000,000 to be derived by this tax on canals we could afford to abolish the sugar tax. Perhaps this tax is not the most popular one in the world and I do not know of any other tax that I would be as willing to abolish. But there is this about it. The necessities of the case, relief and matters of that kind, made essential the gathering of revenue from new sources, and I am rather of the opinion that the amount gathered from the people in the sugar tax was more than paid back to them by extraordinary government assistance. But to place a toll on canal traffic as a substitute for the sugar tax would, to my mind, transfer the tax which is now spread over the whole of Canada to a very large extent to the two million people who reside between the Rocky mountains and the head of the great lakes, and for that reason if for no other I would oppose it.

I do not think that the imposition of such a tax as is proposed would be of any assistance to the railways. It would work a great injury to the primary products of the country, not only wheat, but lumber, ore and mineral products, in the search for markets east and west, and would also be injurious to the manufacturing industries of Canada which have to find markets, to a certain extent at least, in western Canada, over long distances of transportation. So that the whole effect of the ten millions which would be gained by that tax would be lost through the reduction in business which it would cause, and by reducing business it would thereby reduce the tax basis of our whole system. For that reason, as well as for the reasons advanced by other hon. members, I shall have to oppose it.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): I am not entirely in accord with the resolution, but at the same time there are a great many people in Canada who feel that they have been taxed to an inordinate degree for the support and maintenance of our canal system. I believe that the proper solution would be perhaps to place a very small tax, say a cent a ton, upon the vessels passing through these canals, or a graduated tax as the case may be, which could be worked out satisfactorily, and which would pay for the maintenance and operation of the canal system. The canal system in Canada has been largely paid for in the past. It has been written off the books of Canada, and is regarded as an asset, but we continue to pay large sums every year for the upkeep of the canals. I do not know the exact amount, but a reference to the public accounts will show how much we pay annually. It is the custom at the present time for the United States to charge a toll for vessels passing through the Panama canal, either loaded or empty.

I agree with the last speaker (Mr. Turnbull) that no tax should be placed upon the commodities raised in the west for export purposes. But I also believe that any canal, such as the Trent canal, which has cost the country millions of dollars and which at the present time entails a very large upkeep cost, being almost entirely, if not entirely used by tourists, should make a charge on these vessels to recompense Canada for the expense involved in the maintenance of the canal. This would apply to all canals.

A tax such as I suggest, one cent a ton on vessels passing through, let us say the Welland canal, which runs through the home of my hon. friend to my left, would not embarrass the vessels. It would not increase the cost of transportation, but in a marked degree would relieve Canada of the expense of upkeep and the incidental expenses of operating these canals. I do not know that I have anything further to add. I simply wish to convey my impression to other members of the house, but I believe that something of this kind should be done. I might also add that we are not breaking any treaty with the United States. We have a treaty with that country signed in 1871, which guaranteed equal rights to American vessels passing through our canals, and providing that any tolls placed on the vessels of either country should be paid by both—that is to say, no discrimination should be made as between vessels of the United States and ours. But when we find tramp vessels coming from Norway or from other foreign countries and passing through our canals, it is perfectly right that they should pay the same tolls as they would pay in their own countries in similar circumstances.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): The proposition made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) and the arguments he has used in support of his motion might seem at first glance to be entirely fair and reasonable, but one has to take into account not only the situation as it appears from a theoretical point of view but the actual facts that confront us to-day. The statement which has been made by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) sets forth clearly the situation as it appears to us from the point of view of the western provinces. Certainly the time is most inopportune to place any extra burden on the producers of wheat. Any increase in the freight rate even by the fraction of a cent must of necessity be reflected back to the producer of wheat.

Perhaps the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario has over-estimated the effect upon the revenue. Let us take this fact into consideration. At the present time large quantities of wheat go via British Columbia ports and the Panama canal. There is a line drawn somewhere north and south through the western prairies which would determine the route taken by the wheat. It will take the cheapest route, whatever that may be. Might I suggest that the possible effect of making the eastern route more expensive would be simply to draw that line further east and send a larger quantity of wheat via Vancouver and Prince Rupert—that I would not object to—but also via the Panama canal, to the increase of the revenues of the Panama canal and the decrease in the revenues of the transportation systems here that carry our wheat east. That is a point of view that was not considered by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario.

When a tax, even a small tax, is imposed, it often has effects that are entirely unintended and unforeseen. That is one of the things we frequently meet in our tariff taxation, and the same is true of any tax—the effect is very often different from what was intended.

I do not know that it is necessary for me at further length to register my objections to this resolution. The hon. member for Swift Current seems to me to have placed the matter before us quite adequately. Certainly the time is very inopportune to impose any extra burden upon the wheat producers of the prairie provinces.

Mr. GEARY: It occurred to me that, after all, the deepening of the St. Lawrence river east of Montreal is in the same category as the canals. Does the hon. gentleman intend to impose a tax for the use of that?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): I have listened with a good deal of interest to the whole discussion here this afternoon, but I have noticed that from all sides of the house and from all sections of the country opposition has come to the proposal of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon), whom I should like to congratulate on the careful and reasonable manner in which he dealt with this question. At the same time I am, to a large extent at any rate, in a similar position to those from various sections who have spoken before me in opposition to the imposition of tolls, without at least a great deal more consideration than I have been able to give to the question or without more cogent reasons being put forward than have so far been advanced by various writers and speakers. There is no doubt that the whole proposition appears attractive to some who give it more or less superficial thought, but as a matter of fact, when the question is studied there enters into it matters of international differences, injury to the grain trade of the west and complications of various kinds that make it not so attractive as it at first appears.

May I review briefly—and in this regard I shall follow the example of the other hon. members who have spoken—the whole question as it appears to me? I had intended to quote a few of the treaties that have been referred to, but as they have already been quoted from, I shall quote merely one of them, namely, the treaty of 1909, and I do this, not because it has not already been quoted—the hon. member for London (Mr. White) quoted it a few minutes ago—but simply in order to utilize it in my remarks as part of my argument. I am quoting from article one of the treaty of 1909 between Great Britain and the United States:

> It is further agreed that so long as this treaty shall remain in force, this same right of navigation shall extend to the waters of lake Michigan and to all canals connecting boundary waters, and now existing or which may hereafter be constructed on either side of the line. Either of the high contracting parties may adopt rules and regulations governing the use of such canals within its own territory, and may charge tolls for the use thereof, but all such rules and regulations and all tolls charged shall apply alike to the subjects or citizens of the high contracting parties and the ships, vessels, and boats of both of the high contracting parties, and they shall be placed on terms of equality in the use thereof.

That, without doubt, confirms the other treaties such as the Webster-Ashburton treaty and the treaty of Washington of 1871, in making the imposition of tolls, if they should be imposed, uniform as to the United States and Canada. The hon. member for Muskoka, in his remarks, agreed with that. The question, however, is deeper than that, because if you undertook to impose tolls on merely some of what are called foreign vessels, that is vessels outside the British Empire and, if you like, outside the United States, you would obtain so little in return that it would be of no importance to the revenues. It is apparent that if you do anything, you must do it without discrimination of any kind; you must do it towards all the different countries that make use of the canals. I believe that principle is generally accepted, unless you wish to stir up a spirit of antagonism or economic reprisals of one kind or another, and it seems to me there is enough economic nationalism throughout the world to-day without trying to increase it.

May I give very briefly the history of canal tolls? They were established in 1873 on Canadian canals, although the United states canal at Sault Ste. Marie remained free as did, so far as tolls were concerned, the Erie canal at that time. Therefore, as a result of the establishment of tolls on Canadian canals, Canadian grain was at that time diverted to United States ports and in 1892 the government of the day passed an order in council reducing the tolls on grain from the then rate of twenty cents to two cents per ton provided the grain went out via Canadian ports. The United States retaliated by imposing a toll of twenty cents a ton on our Canadian grain passing through the United States canal at the Soo. At that time there was no Canadian canal at Sault Ste. Marie. In consequence, in 1893, Canada did away with the preferential toll and imposed a reduced uniform toll of ten cents a ton on traffic through the Welland and St. Lawrence canals, regardless of destination. This toll was in force for the next ten years when as a result of petitions from all over Canada to the government of the day serious consideration was given the question of abolishing tolls altogether. I have under my hand a list of the organizations and public bodies which sent in petitions and for the sake of the record it might be well to name some of the different organizations that sent them. I have before me a copy of one dated March 30, 1903, from Kingston, but among those sending in petitions at that time to do away with the tolls were such bodies as these:

Montreal Corn Exchange Association.
Harbour Commissioners of Montreal.
Montreal Board of Trade.
Kingston Board of Trade.
Council of the Corporation of the City of Kingston.
Canadian Merchant Marine Association.
Toronto Board of Trade.
Calgary Board of Trade.
Kaslo Board of Trade.
Sorel Board of Trade.
Owen Sound Board of Trade.
National Association of Marine Engineers of Canada.
Board of Trade of City of Ottawa.
Winnipeg Board of Trade.
Winnipeg Grain and Produce Association.

That is a list of some of the bodies which sent in petitions against the continuance of tolls. As a result, on April 27, 1903, the tolls were suspended temporarily by order in council and two years later, in 1905, the tolls were definitely abandoned. In 1902, the last year in which tolls existed, the Welland ship canal carried 646,000 tons of traffic, whereas in the next year when the tolls were abandoned, the the traffic increased to 979,000 tons, or an increase of about 50 per cent. I may add, without giving the figures, that the traffic on the St. Lawrence canals at that time also increased by 50 per cent. It is understood of course that traffic passing through both the Welland and St. Lawrence canals paid tolls on only one canal and that would be the case if tolls were again instituted. A boat that went through the Welland canal could not be charged tolls again on going through the St. Lawrence and vice versa. To demonstrate the increase in traffic in past years I may say that in 1933 on the Welland canal the traffic carried amounted to 9,194,000 tons.

As to the earnings from those tolls, at the time they were charged, the rate on grain was ten cents a ton whether it went through the Welland or the St. Lawrence canals. Between 1893 and 1902 when tolls were being charged, the annual revenue amounted in round figures to $230,000. I had some officials in my department take the tolls as they were in force between 1893 and 1902 and apply them to the traffic of 1932. The figures are taken not for last year but for the year before because we had more complete returns. Instead of $230,000, the return for 1932, had we charged on the same basis as in the period from 1893 to 1902, when tolls were in force, would have been $1,480,000. Against that is the cost of operation and repairs of the canals on the through route which, in the same year, 1932, amounted to $1,634,000. Therefore I must confess that the hon. member for Muskoka was in error so far as I can find out—and I think my figures are correct—in regard to his statement that the annual charges on the Welland canal were $14,000,000. I sent out to get them in order to check myself up and I find that the charges on the Welland canal in 1932 were $738,000 or, with a few extras, nearly $739,000, about half being operation and the other half repairs. Of course, if you added the interest on the investment you would still have only about one half the figure which I think was given by my hon. friend, because the interest on the investment in the Welland canal of, as he said, $130,000,000, would probably amount to something like $7,000,000, and the cost of operation and upkeep $738,000.

In regard to the capital investment, it is true we use immense figures in speaking of the cost of the different canals in this country. If you go back perhaps one hundred years to the building of the first canal in Canada and add all the expenditures together since then, without interest, it does come to a figure of $245,000,000. But as a matter of fact that is hardly a fair computation, because certain of the canals have been superseded or replaced.

Suppose tolls were put on the Canadian canals, the result to my mind would be merely to drive the traffic to other routes. It would injure the eastern Canadian ports to the advantage of other parts; it would drive the traffic from Montreal, Quebec and Sorel to Churchill, if you will, or to Vancouver and the Panama canal, or by the Erie canal to New York. And as over 70 per cent of the traffic through the port of Montreal is grain it would certainly injure the port of Montreal. The average rate on grain from Port Colborne to Montreal between 1925 and 1931 was just under 6 cents, or 5·66 cents a bushel. From Buffalo to New York it was 4·84 cents a bushel. So you would merely add to that differential and drive some of the grain traffic probably through the Erie canal, some to the Panama canal, and, as my hon. friend who just sat down said, move further east the line beyond which the grain goes west. The result would be to divert the grain; otherwise as far as I can see it would not have any particular effect. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario said that at the present time one-third of the traffic of Canada goes by way of the Panama canal, I presume he means the grain traffic. So that you would merely increase the proportion of grain traffic going by the Panama canal if tolls were put on our canals; you would prevent the grain coming east and would drive it west. The statement that we could raise $10,000,000 per annum by tolls on the canals I think is extreme, in that to produce any such sum you would have to have a rate of something over $1 a ton.

Mr. McGIBBON: If I may correct that, it has been misquoted two or three times. I said that on last year's tonnage at Panama canal rates it would amount to that.

Mr. MANION: I do not dispute that. But I point out that it would require a rate of over $1 a ton. I believe the Panama canal rates are about $1.20. One dollar a ton would mean an extra charge of 3 or 4 cents a bushel on wheat. Notwithstanding anything I have heard or read I believe that impost would be against the farmers of western Canada, and I entirely agree with those from the west who say that the western Canadian grain grower cannot stand that toll added to his present cost, because the price of grain is fixed in the Liverpool market, and the cost of delivering it there is a factor affecting the Canadian farmer.

Concerning the railways, a great deal has been written in the press and stated by some speakers about the advantage that would result to the railways from charging tolls on the canals. Someone I think quoted what the Duff commission said on that point. I am going to quote one clause at any rate. The Duff commission made this statement about the canals competing with the railways:

> While on first consideration it might appear that the construction of canals which are free of all tolls to water carriers is in effect a form of state subsidy to a rival transport agency, yet in so far at least as bulk traffic in grain and heavy commodities is concerned, complaint is not made by the railways on this score. The imposition of tolls would not help and would probably hinder the railways as tending to discourage production.

And further on:

> Water-borne traffic will continue to be a factor of major importance in Canadian transportation both on the inland waterways and coastwise through the Panama canal, but rail traffic in the main has been adjusted to the conditions now existing and it does not seem probable that the developments now under way and in contemplation in connection with the Hudson's Bay route, and the deepening of the St. Lawrence-great lakes canals, will seriously prejudice the position of the railways in the future. The competition of water-borne traffic has not been an important factor in bringing about the present difficulties of the railways.

I could if I took the time quote from some railwaymen, notably the late Sir Henry Thornton, and I think Mr. Beatty also, statements showing that they were not very strongly, at any rate, of the opinion that the canals were interfering with the railways.

Mr. GRAY: If the minister will permit a question, he mentioned the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway. Does he seriously contend that that would not affect the railways?

Mr. MANION: If I said that I did not mean to. I was speaking of the canals.

Speaking further of the railways, I wish to submit that it is not fair to say the canals have been built at public expense and the railways at private expense, as some writers have, because the railways of Canada have been very heavily subsidized. The Canadian National Railways last year required from this house $61,000,000, and it costs to operate the canals as a whole about $1,500,000 a year. We have given to the Canadian National at various times loans amounting to nearly $700,000,000, that is three times the cost of the canals, and in addition there is the interest on that money, none of which has ever been paid, and which has amounted to nearly $400,000,000. Besides that you have the cost of building the Intercolonial, the Prince Edward Island railway and the National transcontinental, amounting to another $400,000,000, upon which again nothing has ever been paid in the way of interest. And still further, you have the Maritime Freight Rates Act, by which a 20 per cent reduction in freight that is granted and reimbursed to both the Canadian National and the private railway system. There is also the deficit in operation of the eastern lines, and the $7,000,000 expended on the Prince Edward Island car ferry service. I point these things out merely to emphasize the fact that any tolls that could be collected on the canals would be a very small contribution towards meeting the railway deficits. The railways have cost the Dominion of Canada many times more than the canals.

May I refer to one suggestion made by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs), which would be worthy of consideration if it would give a real return; he said that perhaps we could impose a charge of one cent a ton. But taking the 1933 traffic through the Welland canal I found that it would yield at one cent a ton about $90,000. So it would not produce enough really to be worth putting on the grain or other traffic that goes through the canals.

Mr. ARTHURS: Say two cents or three cents then.

Mr. MANION: Two or three cents would still produce a relatively small amount, not of very much use to Canada in the present economic conditions. Without doubt the commodity that would be chiefly affected by these tolls would be grain, because grain and coal constitute two-thirds of the traffic of the canals; without doubt it would raise costs to the farmer and at the same time give a black eye to the city of Montreal and our other eastern ports by diverting traffic through the other ports that I have already mentioned. Incidentally, may I mention that the grain rate from Fort William to Montreal last year by water averaged about 3·71 cents per bushel while the all-rail rate was 34½ cents per hundredweight. My hon. friend from Regina (Mr. Turnbull) brought out something to this effect. If all that grain that moved by water to Montreal last season had been carried by rail to Montreal from the head of the lakes at rail rates—which of course would be entirely out of the question—but if it could have been done it would have meant an extra expenditure of about $10,000,000. In regard to the Panama, Suez and Manchester canals it is true, as the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario has said, that they collect tolls. We must realize however that the conditions under which those canals are operated are altogether different from those exisitng in connection with Canadian canals. The Manchester canal is a private commercial enterprise, whereas in Canada our canals are national. Then, the Suez canal is operated by a privately owned company. True the Panama canal is publicly owned and operated, but we must remember this important point; the difference between the Suez, the Panama and our Canadian canals is that no vessel owner is forced to use either the Suez or the Panama because, if the shipper wishes, he may ignore either of them and take a longer route, thereby arriving at the same point on the globe. However, to do that would require a longer time, and because of that fact, and because through using the Panama or Suez canals he may secure a greater number of cargoes for his ship, he finds that it pays him to take the shorter route offered through using the Panama or Suez canals. Time saving is the important factor, because were it not for these canals it would be necessary to navigate around the southern end of South America or of the African continent. On the other hand, in Canada we have no alternative water route from the western grain fields, unless one wished to use the railways from the head of the lakes. As has already been pointed out, however, the rail rate would be so much higher that it would not be feasible in the marketing of grain. A number of speakers have said that, because of our distance from the seaboard it is important that we should have the lowest possible rates in order that we may compete with countries whose grain fields are closer to the seaboard than are the fields of Canada.

In view of these facts, and in view of statements which have been made by hon. members on both sides of the house I submit to my hon. friend, with the best of intention, that having brought this matter before the House of Commons—and I believe in that he has done very good service, because it is a question which should be discussed in order that it may be threshed out properly—and in view of the very excellent discussion which has taken place, for the time being at any rate he would be doing well to withdraw the resolution and allow further consideration to be given the matter by all classes in the community as well as by hon. members of this house and the government.

Mr. GRAY: I did not like to interrupt the minister when he was giving figures showing the total tonnage through the Welland canal, but now that he has completed his remarks I should like to know if he can tell us what percentage of that total tonnage is carried by Canadian vessels?

Mr. MANION: I should not like to guess at those figures, because—

Mr. McGIBBON: Roughly speaking it is two-thirds.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member concludes the debate I should like to make only a few observations. I make them because of the statements made by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) and in order to remove any misapprehension there may be as to the exact position at the present time with respect to the use of canals and boundary waters. The Boundary Waters treaty of 1909 has a preliminary article reading as follows:

For the purpose of this treaty boundary waters are defined as the waters from main shore to main shore of the lakes and rivers and connecting waterways, or the portions thereof, along which the international boundary between the United States and the Dominion of Canada passes, including all bays, arms and inlets thereof, but not including tributary waters which in their natural channels would flow into such lakes, rivers, and waterways, or waters flowing from such lakes, rivers, and waterways, or the waters of rivers flowing across the boundary.

Article 1 of the 1909 treaty, which is somewhat different from the old treaty of 1871, is as follows:

The high contracting parties agree that the navigation of all navigable boundary waters shall for ever continue free and open for the purposes of commerce to the inhabitants and to the ships, vessels, and boats of both countries equally, subject, however, to any laws and regulations of either country within its own territory, not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation, and applying equally and without discrimination to the inhabitants, ships, vessels, and boats of both countries.

That, it will be observed, refers to boundary waters, and in article XXVI the treaty of 1871, to which reference was made by the hon. member, refers to other than boundary waters in these words:

The navigation of the river St. Lawrence, ascending and descending from the 45th parallel of north latitude, where it ceases to form the boundary between the two countries, from, to, and into the sea, shall forever remain free and open for the purposes of commerce to the citizens of the United States, subject to any laws and regulations of Great Britain or of the Dominion of Canada, not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation.

The navigation of the rivers Yukon, Porcupine and Stikine, ascending and descending from, to, and into the sea, shall forever remain free and open for the purposes of commerce to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty and to the citizens of the United States, subject to any laws and regulations of either country within its own territory, not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation.

So that in article XXVI of the Treaty of Washington of 1871, which I have just read, we have a declaration with respect to navigation of the St. Lawrence, other than through boundary waters. And in the article I have read with respect to boundary waters you have the same declaration as that contained in the treaty of 1871 with respect to other than boundary waters of the St. Lawrence.

But article 1 of the treaty of 1909 specifically deals with the question of tolls. Perhaps I had better read the article so that there may be no misunderstanding.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Would the right hon. gentleman allow a question? Does the treaty of 1909 determine the question of imposition of tolls on the lower St. Lawrence?

Mr. BENNETT: I shall come to that. I was going to read to the house the whole of article 1 of the treaty of 1909. It is as follows:

The high contracting parties agree that the navigation of all navigable boundary waters shall for ever continue free and open for the purposes of commerce to the inhabitants and to the ships, vessels, and boats of both countries equally, subject, however, to any laws and regulations of either country, within its own territory, not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation, and applying equally and without discrimination to the inhabitants, ships, vessels and boats of both countries.

It is further agreed that so long as this treaty shall remain in force, this same right of navigation shall extend to the waters of lake Michigan and to all canals connecting boundary waters, and now existing or which may hereafter be constructed on either side of the line. Either of the high contracting parties may adopt rules and regulations governing the use of such canals within its own territory, and may charge tolls for the use thereof, but all such rules and regulations and all tolls charged shall apply alike to the subjects or citizens of the high contracting parties and the ships, vessels, and boats of both of the high contracting parties, and they shall be placed on terms of equality in the use thereof.

That is to be found in the treaty of 1909. The net effect of it is to expand the treaty of 1871 so that the provisions of the treaty with respect to other than boundary waters applies to boundary waters, and further to provide that canals on either side and boundary waters constructed by either party may be subject to such rules and regulations and tolls as the national owning the canal may think desirable, but that, in any event, such tolls shall not discriminate against the ships of either country. So that if any of the canals we have constructed in boundary territories connecting boundary waters are to be subject to tolls, the tolls must apply equally to our own ships and the ships of the United States.

Then, there is one other question—and I desire only to place myself on record so that there may be no misapprehension in the matter—

Mr. BOTHWELL: Would the right hon. gentleman allow a question? Is not the net effect of the treaty of 1909 to leave the lower St. Lawrence, from the 45th parallel, always free of tolls, and to restrict the imposition of tolls on boundary waters so that there shall be no discrimination?

Mr. BENNETT: I should not care to express an opinion at this particular moment with respect to a matter of that kind, when a treaty between these two countries is under consideration, for fear the construction I should place upon it would be misconstrued. I therefore limit my observations—and the hon. member can understand why—to mere statements of extracts from the treaties themselves.

Just one word more and I shall have concluded all I wish to say. There are, of course, certain most favoured nation treaties outstanding, and they are old treaties in the main. Undoubtedly under the provisions of these treaties some countries are entitled to the same privileges as the United States. I do not desire to do more than make that simple statement at the moment because this question of most favoured nation treatment is one surrounded by so many difficulties that I content myself merely by stating what the conditions are. There is no reason why the Canadian people might not desire to impose tolls upon their canals. There is no reason why they could not if they thought it desirable to do so, but, in my judgment, under the present conditions it would not only be practically impossible to raise any revenue by so doing, but it would create a situation which we in this country are not desirous at this moment of creating.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I just wish to say a few words in reply. First I wish to correct a few interpretations that have been placed on my remarks. I stated that if the tonnage that went through the Welland canal last year had been charged at the Panama canal rates it would have brought in a revenue of between nine and ten million dollars. That is simply a matter of arithmetic. Nearly nine million tons went through the Welland canal, and the Panama rate is $1.20 a ton, and so I submit that my statement was accurate.

I also stated that we had $245,000,000 invested in canals. When you take into account the interest on that sum, and any reasonable amortization rate, together with the annual cost of upkeep of our canals, I submit that I am still within the mark when I say that this country is losing $14,000,000 a year. I turn up the report of the Department of Railways and Canals and I find that last year there was spent on the canals of this country $2,511,515.81. So I was not very far out when I said that they were costing us about three million dollars in upkeep.

What are the arguments against this resolution? First there was the argument that our railways are losing money. Well, they are losing money because we are helping them to lose money by taking trade away from them. As I stated in my previous remarks, we have bonused American ships to take business away from our railways at Point Edward and at Port McNicoll, and that business has gone from our railways—that is all. We have also bonused them to take business away from our railways in the hauling of coal to the city of Toronto and to central Ontario. It is no wonder that the railways are losing money.

I also stated that the railways are losing money on account of the action of the provinces. These things may be inevitable; I am not quarrelling about that.

The Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) and others say that the effect of this motion would be to force our wheat to go by the Panama canal. But it would not go any cheaper that way. The tolls there are $1.20 a ton now. So I contend that it would not have that effect. As the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) has said, there will be a line of demarcation, and that will settle the rate and the routing of the wheat.

There is only one argument against this resolution that I have heard. Everybody has admitted that we have the necessary power, but the one argument that has been made against the motion is that it would impose a heavier tax upon the products of the west. Why should everyone in this country have to continue forever to put his hand in his pocket and pay for the transportation of the products of the west of one kind and another? Why should Ontario have to do it, or the maritimes or Quebec? Is there any argument in that? But even if there were, I thought I had made it quite plain that the rate on wheat could be graduated, at first starting at a very low point, so as not to have the effect complained of, and there would still be revenue from the transportation of other commodities east and west. Excluding wheat, I wonder if hon. gentlemen know what percentage of the business of Canada is transported through our canal system. Not more than five per cent, I am told, and look what it costs us! Look at the millions and millions of dollars that we have poured into it. President Roosevelt of the United States the other day made the statement that in future all the internal canals of that country would have to earn interest on the investment, upkeep and service charges. That is the policy of the United States for the future, as outlined by their president, and that policy is sound, especially in this day and generation. As I said in my previous remarks, the Coolidge commission also reported to the same effect.

Boiled down, there is no disputing the principle. I have not heard a member here this afternoon dispute the principle that any investment in this country for service should bring a reasonable return, whether it is one or two per cent or more—at all events it should bring some return on the money invested. But our investment in our canal system is bringing practically no return.

It would appear, however, that the house is against me—the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), and I guess everyone else who spoke on the motion. Apparently I am a John the Baptist standing in a political wilderness trying to get this service put on a proper business basis so that it will be fair to the business interests of this country and to the railways. Why should we differentiate and discriminate between those who can ship their goods by water and those who are back in the country and have to ship their products by rail? The Minister of Railways says that they do not have to go through the Panama or the Suez canal. Nor does the wheat grower. He does not have to bring his wheat down the lakes. He can bring it by rail.

I am surprised that there have been no arguments on the principle. The rate is one thing, and if wheat requires a very low rate, that could be set by the government but I do not see why we should continue to let everything go through free, one-third of which is carried by foreign vessels, manned by foreigners, taking business away from our own ships and our own seamen, and bringing into this country goods that are competing with the products made in Canada. I am sorry that the Minister of Railways has taken that attitude. I know he is wrong, and some day, and before very long, tolls will be placed on boats passing through the canals of this country. I shall withdraw the motion, Mr. Speaker, in deference to the Prime Minister.

Motion withdrawn.

A CANADIAN FLAG

Mr. C. H. DICKIE (Nanaimo) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, a national flag representing the Dominion of Canada should be adopted.

He said: I have been a little surprised, Mr. Speaker, to learn that considerable opposition to this resolution would be manifested in this house. Perhaps a greater proportion of the people of the constituency that sends me here were born in the British isles than are to be found in any other constituency in Canada. When it came out in the press that I intended to introduce a resolution of this kind, there was not one single criticism nor did I hear one single word against it from those in the constituency from which I come. It was a surprise to me when I suggested to some hon. members that they should assist me with this resolution to hear them say: Hands off the flag; we will have nothing to do with the resolution; the good old union jack is good enough for us—"the flag that braved a thousand years the battle and the breeze." There is no doubt that that flag is good enough for anyone and I wish to say right here that I yield to no organization, sect, society or individual in my regard for the British flag and all that it symbolizes. It is a wonderful flag, but we desire a flag to indicate that Canada has a right to a part in that flag. The British union jack is a composite flag composed of the crosses of St. Andrew, St. George, and St. Patrick, representing the three great divisions of the British isles. It is considered as the flag of the British Empire and we, as a composite part of that empire, consider it as our flag. But we desire some emblem to designate and indicate that it is our flag. That is all I am asking for. We want a flag that will indicate that Canada has a right to a part in that great British flag.

We are the only important dominion in the British Empire that has not a flag. South Africa has a flag; India has a flag and New Zealand and Australia each have beautiful flags. As is well known, the flag of New Zealand is a blue ensign upon which are four stars of the southern cross. A conspicuous part of that flag is the union jack, and it would be inconceivable to me that the proposed Canadian flag should not have the union jack in a predominant position. In the New Zealand flag the union jack is in the top corner next the flagstaff, the commanding or dominating position. This blue flag with its starry design is very beautiful. No one has ever suggested that New Zealand has weakened the ties of empire by adopting a flag of that kind. The flag of Australia is somewhat similar. It is an ensign of a slightly different tint of blue. There is a cluster of five stars with another large star to the left. This distinguishes it from the New Zealand flag. This is a beautiful flag of which Australia is very proud.

It may seem premature and presumptuous on my part to suggest a design at this time for a Canadian flag as this doubtless will be left to a committee to decide should this resolution meet with the approval of the house. However, in order to disarm opposition to this resolution perhaps I may be allowed to suggest a design. This would be along the same lines as the New Zealand and Australian flags. I would put the union jack in the same dominant corner it occupies in these flags. I would have the ensign of delphinium, cerulean or azure blue and upon that I would put a glorious autumnal maple leaf, one of that deep, golden, red tint which you see so frequently in the fall of the year. The contour or outline of the maple leaf lends itself very readily to banner purposes. As the house knows, upon the maple leaf are nine distinct points. These could be considered to represent the nine provinces of Canada. The maple leaf design would be easily distinguished upon a blue field and we would have what I consider would be one of the most artistic flags in the world. This flag could be recognized at great distances.

All that we have in the way of a Canadian flag at the present time is the red ensign. This flag has upon it the coat of arms of Canada and is used by our merchant service. It is sometimes flown ashore but I do not know that we have the right to do that. But the coat of arms is indistinguishable at a distance of two or three hundred yards. It appears simply as a blotch upon an otherwise beautiful banner. The details of any coat of arms are too minute to lend themselves readily to banner purposes. The flag of South Africa also contains a coat of arms and I have no doubt that you could place the Canadian red ensign and the South African flag at one end of this chamber and find it impossible to tell them apart from the other end.

There can be no objection to the use of the maple leaf as an emblem of Canada. Let us put it upon a blue blackground, and with the union jack we will have a flag of which we can be proud. Let us have a flag of that kind to signalize our emergence from the dull, drab, gray and anxious years through which we have just passed. Let us have such a flag to signalize what we hope will be our steady progress towards the sunlit plateau of prosperity. Let us have such a flag flying upon this and all other public buildings in Canada. We say that the union jack is our flag, but let us look at the absurdity of such a statement. Suppose an English and Canadian embassy are located side by side, say in Tokyo. They would both be flying the same union jack. What would there be to distinguish one of those embassies as being Canadian?

As I say, I am all for the union jack but I am also for a cheerful, artistic and beautiful flag for Canada. I hope this resolution will pass.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) who has moved a resolution supporting the adoption of a distinctive flag for Canada. The hon. member's resolution reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, a national flag representing the Dominion of Canada should be adopted.

This resolution has been moved in this year of grace, 1934, but we had another resolution brought before this house a few years ago dealing with the same subject. Everything in the hon. member's resolution was in the resolution brought before this house on two other occasions—Monday, May 25, 1931, and Monday, February 6, 1933, by myself. On Empire day, 1931, I moved the following resolution:

That, in the opinion of this house, a special committee be appointed for the purpose of considering the advisability of adopting a Canadian flag, representing Canada as a whole, and in which the British flag shall occupy the position of honour, thus symbolizing the Dominion as an equality partner in the commonwealth of British nations.

That resolution was debated by myself and one or two other members in the House of Commons on Empire day, May 25th., 1931, and the same resolution was brought up again —I have the exact date before me, namely, Feb. 6th., 1933. On the latter occasion a short debate took place. Now we have a resolution introduced by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie), practically the same in context. It does not differ one iota from those two resolutions, in so far as substance is concerned, though it is not nearly so complete as the resolution brought before this house on the two former occasions.

May I say that I was rather surprised that the hon. member for Nanaimo should bring up this resolution without intimating to myself that he was going to bring it before the house. On the two other occasions when I had the honour of introducing the resolution the member for Nanaimo was as dumb as the proverbial oyster; he never opened his mouth on behalf of a national flag for Canada; he did not say one thing either for or against it. I did not know where he stood, nor do I know where he stands now except from what he has said to-day. Further, when the resolution was before the house on the two occasions mentioned hon. members on the opposite side never rose to support it—hardly one of them. If they were in favour of the resolution, if they wanted to support it, they should have risen in their places and so showed their colours. But no support was forthcoming from the opposite side. That, however, is neither here nor there, because I am really quite pleased to think that at least one hon. member to the right of Mr. Speaker is not ashamed to stand up in the House of Commons and identify his name with a distinctive flag for Canada. May his following increase. On the other occasions I sensed the idea that hon. gentlemen opposite were afraid of the issue and were backing up or running away from it.

Mr. ROBINSON: Not on your life.

Mr. McINTOSH: The hon. gentleman is a little late with his "life" statement. Instead of courageously coming out in support of the resolution on those former occasions, it seemed to be quite satisfactory to my hon. friends opposite to have the issue thrown into the discard—to have it buried as it were. Now, however, one hon. gentleman opposite, after the battle for a national flag has proceeded for years brings up the question, and for my part I will lend him my support.

Mr. ROBINSON: That will kill it.

Mr. McINTOSH: If anyone can kill himself quicker by wild words than the hon. gentleman who has just exploded I do not know his name. He has made speeches in the house which have had the effect of killing him not only in his own riding but throughout his province. He is the last man to talk about killing anything. We all know where he stands on this question.

On Empire day when my resolution was brought up for the first time, after I had spoken for perhaps thirty-five or forty minutes on the subject, what do you suppose happened? Hon. gentlemen opposite will recall quite well what happened. As I say, it was on Empire day and I do not think there was a better day in the year to have such a question discussed. Now, there was no intimation until practically six o'clock that the house was to be adjourned, and when the resolution was before the house and everything was set for a first-class debate on this national flag question, along came the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and adjourned the house abruptly at six o'clock, with the result of course that no further debate on the question took place that year. In other words, the question was not allowed to be placed before the people of the country as it should have been. In 1933 when the same resolution was up for discussion, I again spoke on it, taking the stand that if hon. members opposite and the house as a body were not then favourable to the consideration of a distinctive flag for Canada, because of emergency economic conditions, then I was quite willing not to interject at such a time the question of a national flag into the discussion of economic and financial matters, for the reason that it seemed to me important for this house to devote all its time to industrial and commercial subjects, such as the matter of trade, unemployment, and so forth with a view to relieving forthwith the distress of the people. Under these circumstances I took the ground that I would not then urge upon the house a discussion of the question of a distinctive flag for Canada. For that reason and that reason alone I spoke only briefly in 1933; and for that reason I did not place a resolution on the order paper for the session of 1934.

Now it seems to me that we have before us to-day what is very much like a case of trying to steal the other man's thunder, but I say to the hon. member for Nanaimo and to others opposite that that cannot be done by the Conservative party of Canada, nor can it be done by the hon. member for Nanaimo, because the spade work has already been done, and no matter what takes place with respect to the hon. gentleman's resolution at this time he will come second rather than first in the movement for a national flag. But even if he does come second I will lend him my support in order to help the movement along. I want to make it quite plain, once more, not only to the hon. gentleman but to the people of Canada, just where I stand on this question. The people of this country know quite well who put on the order paper of the House of Commons a resolution on behalf of a flag for Canada; they know exactly who first introduced that resolution, and when. They know also that it has already been introduced on more than one occasion.

The hon. member speaks now about opposition. Well, there is no opposition now of any account. The only opposition to a distinctive flag for Canada comes from the other side of the house—from his own party. There is no opposition on this side, and this question has been kept in the background up to the present time only because of the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite. Everyone in Canada who has read anything on this question knows that. But the opposition at the present time is nothing compared to the opposition that was very apparent a year ago when I had the honour of placing on the order paper a resolution sponsoring a national flag for this country. I had correspondence from every province in Canada, from almost every municipality, town and city, practically from one ocean to the other, and the opposition to a national flag at that time was quite apparent. But I never left one of these letters unanswered; I never let anyone who wrote me opposing a national flag get away with any baseless argument put forward along that line. The result is that to-day after years of hard work, after espousing this cause and doing the cultivating work on behalf of a national flag, after keeping the subject before the people of Canada, in all the provinces, I find that the opposition has now to a very large extent petered out or broken down. I believe that the feeling throughout Canada in the best informed circles is very strongly in favour of a distinctive flag for the dominion.

That being the case, may I direct the attention of the house to the subject matter of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Nanaimo. For instance, he says he stands for a distinctive Canadian flag. That as a matter of fact is an old question now; it has been before the house for years and I believe there is at the moment a pronounced opinion in favour of it throughout Canada.

Then he goes on to say that it must be a national flag. How could it be anything else. He also says that the union jack must be in it. He says too that we have an empire flag and that Australia, New Zealand and South Africa each has a national flag. Again, he speaks about the Southern Cross as the symbol on the national flag of New Zealand and also Australia. Then, in a news item I read in the Ottawa Journal this afternoon, he has the Journal make the pronouncement that he lives in the most British riding in Canada. Well that is news to me.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Mr. DICKIE: Is the hon. member talking against the resolution?

Mr. McINTOSH: No, I am talking in favour of it. I am just taking up some of the statements I consider debatable with regard to the hon. member's speech. As to the statement made by the hon. member that he thinks he lives in the most British riding in Canada, I hope he does, but I do not believe he does. In this country there are other ridings just as British as that which the hon. member represents in the house. If he has the idea that his riding can by any stretch of the imagination be classified as the most British in Canada on account of the fact that a great number of the people there were born overseas, in England, Scotland, Ireland or Wales, then he has another guess coming, because I repudiate any such statement. If any person born in Canada, born in Quebec or any other province, is loyal to his king, his flag, his country, he is just as good a Britisher as anyone else. I make no apology for a statement of that kind; I do not care what his creed or his national extraction may be; he can be just as British as those who are born overseas or those directly descended from citizens born in the British Isles. That is self evident.

Another point advanced by the hon. member is that we should have on the fly of the flag a maple leaf. I do not think I ever made an address on the flag question in any part of Canada that I did not say I thought the maple leaf would make a very suitable design, but I did not think I had any right to come before parliament and say what the design on a Canadian flag should be. I thought then and I think so now a special committee of the house should be convened, consider the question thoroughly and adopt a resolution thereon. It might take a year or two to decide upon the design for a Dominion flag. If a special committee were convened and evidence adduced from well defined parts of Canada by having representatives of many of our national organizations appear before the committee and if parliament were to offer a prize of $1,000 or so for the best design, we would get not only one but hundreds and thousands of artistic designs, just as in Australia, and from these designs guided by the good sense of the committee and the House of Commons, we could certainly pick a flag that would best symbolize Canada among the nations of the world. The job is no small one; it is big; it cannot be done in a day or a week or a month, and it is something to which any party attempting to deal with it should give its very best attention. Therefore, one of the strongest committees that can be got together in the house ought to be appointed and it should go into the flag question thoroughly and report to the house. Then the government of the day could very properly act on that report.

Prior to the first resolution being put on the order paper in 1929 and again in 1931—when I had the honour of speaking to it—the movement in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag did not amount to very much. I believe the war veterans of Canada passed a resolution practically favouring a distinctive flag for the dominion; at least they went so far as to put themselves on record that they were not opposed to it. In my address to the house on Empire day, Monday, May 25, 1931, I incorporated their resolution, because I thought it was very important to put the War Veterans of Canada on record with regard to a national flag. Hon. members who wish to turn up my address can read for themselves what the members of the Canadian Legion thought then of the question now before the house.

Further than that, members of the Canadian Weekly Newspaper Association, a national organization, went on record at London in 1929, favouring a distinctive flag. Since then literally hundreds and thousands of resolutions have been passed by organizations, clubs and gatherings of one nature or another in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag. The Kiwanians in convention assembled at Windsor, September 15, 1931, where representative business men from the Atlantic coast attended, went on record in favour of a distinctive national flag. From that day to this the sentiment in favour of a national flag has been growing—gathering splendid momentum.

May I put on record some statements made by leading Canadian newspapers with regard to this resolution? I believe the daily and the weekly press of the country, when a question of this kind arises, can size up the situation just about as well if not better than parliament, and the essence of these news items and editorials in favour of a national flag for the dominion is well worthy of our attention. For instance, the London Advertiser on June 19, 1931, three years ago, when this question was up, discussed the stand taken by Mr. T. A. Kidd, who was at that time the head of the Orange Grand Lodge of British North America, and who spoke in Hamilton. I believe Mr. Kidd is speaker of the Ontario legislature. He is a gentleman who occupies a high position and we ought to have a great regard for what he says. Let us listen to what he said at Hamilton:

> Canada has the Canadian ensign which serves the purpose for her merchant marine at sea and I have yet to see a strong argument that any Canadian is embarrassed by the union jack flying over the Canada House in London, Washington, Tokyo or Paris.

The hon. gentleman was under the impression that we are flying the union jack in Tokyo, Paris, London and Washington. He goes on record at that great gathering as opposing a distinctive flag for Canada because, as he says, the union jack is flying in those capitals and we should not disturb it there or as the official land flag at home. Therefore, he says, there is no necessity of having a distinctive flag for our country. Well the opposite is the case. The union jack does not fly over Canada House in London, it does not fly on Canada's building in Paris, it does not fly over the Tokyo embassy nor over that at Washington.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It flies in Ottawa.

Mr. McINTOSH: That would be ridiculous, because it would not have any significance. The only flag that flies over these embassies is the red ensign, the sea flag of our country, not the union jack or land flag at all. So apparently we can use outside of Canada, in the capitals of the world, the red ensign with the coat of arms of Canada in the fly, but we cannot use it on land in Canada. Did you ever hear of a more ridiculous position for a young nation to be in? So the London Advertiser, dealing with this aspect of the question, goes on to say that this is rather a peculiar position in which to find ourselves as Canadians and it makes this statement:

> The proposal of Mr. Cameron McIntosh, M.P., in the House of Commons over which some colonials who have not read his speech are making a fuss—

And those colonials are mostly of the Tory party—

> —is merely to replace this hodge-podge by a more pleasing design, such as the maple leaf, which would be common to all the provinces. Australia has such a flag, New Zealand has such a flag. Only Canada, among the Dominions, has no distinctive Canadian emblem except—and this is the ridiculous paradox—one which is flown only overseas, or on the high seas. If all Canadians knew this the opposition to the movement for a Canadian flag would be dissolved in laughter. But when even the Speaker of the Ontario legislature is ignorant of the fact it is not surprising that misunderstanding is widespread and that prejudice can be aroused.

There is a very true picture of the situation as it exists right now in Canada, and when men talk about a distinctive flag for Canada and oppose it without knowing the facts it is no wonder that we have not made any more progress than we have in this country in regard to that important question. May I just quote another statement? This is from the Ottawa Citizen, taken from the Manitoba Free Press, in 1932:

> But while it is not correctly used on land—
> That is the red ensign.
> —it serves the purpose for it is a distinctive emblem.

I do not agree with that. It is not a distinctive emblem; you cannot see it plainly ten feet away, and in my opinion it will never make a suitable flag for Canada. We might just as well face the issue as the Winnipeg Free Press has so often explained and realize that a distinctive flag for Canada is coming in the near future. I do not think the flag question should be made a political or a party question; I think we should show a united front upon it, and if we do the problem can be solved without arousing very much opposition. Then this quotation from the Free Press goes on to say:

> With the numerous flags, officially recognized, of the various parts of the British commonwealth now being seen at Ottawa—
> That is during 1932 when the imperial conference was on.
> —the absurdity of opposition in Canada to the adoption of a flag of our own is very plain. Canada, which led the movement for constitutional freedom and whose government has been enamoured of a "Canada first" policy, is the only member of the commonwealth which cannot use its official emblem on this occasion, and, for the sake of practical convenience, resorts to an irregularity.
> Surely, after this conference, the desire for a new Canadian flag will be unanimous.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. McINTOSH: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was outlining the statements in a news and editorial way of many of the leading newspapers across Canada, on behalf of a national flag. May I, before continuing some further readings of certain editorials and news statements just read the resolution to which I have referred and which was passed in London in 1929 by the national weekly newspaper organization of Canada. The resolution was as follows:

> Whereas we believe it is desirable to adopt a distinctive dominion flag for Canada, the design of which should include the union jack, resolved that we appeal to the parliament of Canada to treat this matter on a non-party basis, and we further appeal to all Canadians, irrespective of race, creed or origin, to co-operate towards the solution of this vital national question.

Then I referred briefly to the resolution of the Canadian Legion in Regina a few years ago, the conclusion of which was as follows:

> Therefore be it resolved that this convention instruct the Dominion council that in the event of any concrete proposition for the adoption of a distinctively Canadian flag being presented to parliament, that parliament be advised that no device will be acceptable to the ex-service men of Canada in which the union jack is not the predominant figure, and if the question is to be decided that we strongly recommend the retention of the union jack, with some device such as the maple leaf or the Canadian coat of arms, superimposed thereon.

Further may I say that the national sentiment on behalf of a distinctive flag and the ideals of nationhood which that flag will represent is very nicely brought out in more ways than one. I have before me a poem written by Henry Holcomb Bennett, a poet of repute in the United States. This poem is penned on the flag, and the words are as follows:

> Hats off! along the street there comes
> A blare of bugles, a ruffle of drums,
> A flash of colour beneath the sky;
> Hats off! the flag is passing by!
> Blue and crimson and white it shines
> Over the steel-tipped ordered lines,
> Hats off! the colours before us fly;
> But more than the flag is passing by.
> Sign of a nation, great and strong
> To ward her people from foreign wrong;
> Pride and glory, honour all
> Live in the colours to stand or fall.

Then the last verse of it is:

> Hats off! along the street there comes
> A blare of bugles a ruffle of drums;
> And loyal hearts are beating high:
> Hats off! the flag is passing by!

That depicts splendidly what a national flag stands for. Then we have Kipling on the union jack, one or two verses of which are as follows:

> It's only a small bit of bunting,
> It's only an old coloured rag,
> Yet thousands have died for the honour
> And shed their best blood for the flag.
> We hoist it to show our devotion
> To our King, to our country, and laws;
> It's the outward and visible emblem
> Of advancement and liberty's cause.

Then the last verse:

> You may say it's an old bit of bunting,
> You may call it an old coloured rag;
> But freedom has made it majestic,
> And time has ennobled the flag.

May I continue my argument by referring to the fact that His Excellency the Governor General of Canada has a new flag, and I think it dates from the time the Earl of Bessborough took office in Canada. The old Governor General's flag was simply the union jack. It was no longer suitable—distinctive.

Mr. BENNETT: I just wish to correct that statement; it is the king's flag.

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes, His Excellency represents the king. Naturally it would be the king's flag.

Mr. BENNETT: Just a minute; it is the king's flag which is flown by all governors general in all parts of the king's dominions.

Mr. McINTOSH: Is it not only flown in the dominions of the empire?

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I said.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is what I also said. The old flag flown by governors general of Canada was simply the union jack with a shield superimposed upon it carrying the old arms of Canada surrounded by maple leaves and capped by the crown. The Earl of Bessborough, speaking before the Canadian Club of Ottawa about this new flag of the governor general, said:

To some, I believe in Canada a negligible majority, this new flag may seem a thing of small import; a mere piece of decorative heraldry, a relic of things that are old and out of date. Such a view of it, if held, springs to my mind from a dangerous illusion; the illusion, only too common to-day, that those two words "old" and "out of date" necessarily mean the same thing. That the idea of a flag is an old one is unquestionably true; it is so old that it makes its appearance in the very dawn of civilization. The human race, ever since it began to march at all, has never been able to march without the guidance of some symbol; and the function of such symbols has been two fold—they point out to mankind a better way for the future and they remind them of good that has been achieved in the past.

Then at a later point His Excellency said:

It is in some such light, I believe, that most of us see this new flag; we see it as the outward sign of a very important and wholesome step in the political evolution, not only of Canada, but of the entire British empire; we see it as a picture in miniature of that empire itself. You have no doubt looked at it carefully. Have you observed its detail closely? It contains in the centre a crown surmounted by a lion on a deep blue ground—let your imagination play upon it. It is the crown of England set in the middle of the seas of the wide world, guarded by the lion, that has always been the totem of the British race; we are perpetually reminded by the single word "Canada" written beneath the Imperial crown, of Canada's age long and historical association with that crown; and it symbolizes for us—if I may play upon the word—the proud standard of the history and tradition of our race set up high for all of us to follow.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have a new flag for the representative of the king in Canada, and our endeavour is to have a new flag for Canada as a nation. I have here the reproduction of a flag that has been sponsored by the Native Sons of Canada. I would say I am opposed to that flag for one reason—the union jack is not in it. The resolution sponsored by myself in the House of Commons years ago provided for the union jack in the upper left hand corner. Personally I want to say in parliament to-day that my name will not be identified with a distinctive flag for Canada unless the union jack is incorporated in that national flag.

Had I time I might go on to quote many important passages from the press of Canada supporting this stand. For instance, here is a line or two from the Orillia Packet and Times:

But for our part we have never seen any reason why Canada should not have such a flag; and there are many reasons why, when inter-empire gatherings such as that at Ottawa are held, there should be some method of distinguishing the Canadian colours.

Then from the Toronto Daily Star of July 28, 1932, I read the following:

The flag issue was not raised; it raised itself, and nothing could be more absurd than to suggest that under these circumstances the newspapers should say nothing about it. It is easily understood, however, that those newspapers which oppose a Canadian flag do not want it talked about on an occasion which so vividly illustrates the need of one.

Then we have the Stratford Beacon-Herald, which really opposes a national flag for Canada, making this statement at the conclusion of an editorial:

If the Canadian people did decide to have a new flag it would mean doing away with the union jack as we have it now, and there are many pepole in this country who would not care to do that; in fact, many of them would not do it, and there would be no way to force unanimity of opinion and action.

A national flag for Canada would not necessarily interfere with the union jack at all. I want to make it plain, Mr. Speaker, that it would not in any way interfere with our empire flag, which would still fly and symbolize the empire whenever we desired. A distinctive flag for Canada would only supplement, not supplant, the union jack; that is fundamental. We could fly Canada's distinctive flag, and fly the union jack as well on occasions definitely settled by parliament. So there could be no opposition to the union jack by authorizing a distinctive flag for Canada—none whatever.

We have this statement made by the Winchester press:

Candidly, we do not see why Canada should not have a flag that is at once British as well as Canadian. The governments of the dominions have adopted national flags. Why there should be any fuss about Canada having a flag that would be pronounced Canadian as well as British we cannot understand. This opposition to a "Canadian Flag" is silly sentiment and should not stand in the way of our government adopting a Canadian flag.

The Brockville Recorder and Times says:

If opponents of a Canadian national flag, in which the union jack could be embodied, were consistent, they would instantly demand that Canada abandon its red ensign and return to the flag of the British merchant marine. There is, however, no demand for such abandonment. Why should there not be equal approval of the institution of a Canadian national flag to fly on land? Mr. Chamberlain probably wonders. So do a great many others, who are quite unable to fathom the reasoning of those who object to such a proceeding.

The Perth Courier, a leading weekly, says:

There is no thought either in any Liberal's or Conservative's brain to do away with the time-honoured union jack in our national flag. We all love the old flag and its christian three-cross design too well to abandon it for any other. No other flag has so wonderful a history or has earned so loving a tribute from its far-flung peoples as this emblem of the empire; and so we in Canada must honour this feeling and all the sentiments involved by retaining in the most prominent corner of any flag that may be adopted this old union jack with its historical and fond memories.

The Hamilton Herald makes this statement:

If prejudice could be put aside and reason were allowed to rule, it would be easy to make a compromise arrangement satisfactory to all parties.

The Brantford Expositor thinks that if an agreement could be reached whereby a Canadian device would appear on the union jack it would promote an intenser feeling of patriotism and citizenship not only for the dominion but for the empire. Canadians, it says, are surely not afraid of an emblem that would characterize the flag as their own.

The Kingston Whig-Standard, in concluding an editorial, makes this statement:

There is no reason why Canada should not have its own distinctive flag. It will make us no less loyal and no less a part of the British Empire. Now that the idea of a distinctive Canadian flag has been publicly adopted by the Kiwanians of Ontario, Quebec and the maritime districts, it is quite possible that the matter will receive wider attention than it has received heretofore, and that something tangible will result therefrom.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I believe it would be only right for the house to have a clear-cut and complete debate on this question, and not merely a clear-cut debate but a recorded vote, so that we will know exactly where every member representing a Canadian constituency stands on this question of a distinctively Canadian flag. My opinion is that if that were done the house would carry this resolution, and if it did, the next step would be to set up a parliamentary committee which would investigate this question from every angle, and have the report endorsed by parliament and thereafter at the opportune time have it decided what flag design should be adopted. The success of the whole undertaking would depend upon the committee established as well as upon the direction of parliament. Of course, time would be required to settle all the details. I believe that not only the house if allowed a free hand but Canada as a nation and our empire's king are all in favour of every dominion having a distinctive flag of its own, and any opposition trumped up in this house or out of it is merely shortsighted opposition. So far as I am concerned as an hon. member of this house I would like to see parliamentary action taken on this resolution immediately so that in the very near future we can have the flag problem worked out in such a way that Canada will have a truly national flag that will take its place proudly among the most beautiful, the most honoured and the most beloved of the many national symbols floating on high the earth around.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the speech of the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh), if the mover of the resolution (Mr. Dickie) will not mind my saying so, I would suggest that he walk across the floor with this baby which the hon. member for North Battleford accuses him of having stolen and place it on that hon. gentleman's desk, and then I hope that this side of the house will be rid of it altogether.

I admire the sincerity of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) in bringing this resolution before the house. The member for North Battleford placed a similar resolution before us on two former occasions, in 1931 and in 1932. I listened to both debates in those former years and I have listened to the debate to-day, and now more than ever I am convinced that we Canadians have a priceless heritage in having the right to fly from the flagpole of this building the union jack, and I for my part in the few words I am going to say will do my best to maintain it there.

As I understand it, Canada at the present time has an official flag for every occasion. In 1865 the Colonial Defence Act decreed that the blue ensign, with the Canadian coat of arms on the fly, should be the official flag for Canadian government ships. In 1892 an admiralty warrant was issued that the red ensign, with the Canadian coat of arms on the fly, should be the official flag for the Canadian merchant marine. On May 21, 1912, the Secretary of State for the Colonies sent a dispatch to the Governor General of Canada that the union jack should be the official flag for Canada. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, as we have official flags for all occasions, I do not see why we need to change the flag we have.

I quite understand why on water a Canadian ship should have some emblem on the fly of the flag to distinguish that it is a Canadian ship and not one of Great Britain registry, and I can quite see why on our legations in Tokyo, Washington, Paris and elsewhere we should fly the red ensign, with the Canadian coat of arms, which I am informed by the office of the Secretary of State is the official flag for these legations. I cannot see any reason why we should change from the use of the union jack because there is no international competition on land on the north half of this continent.

Mr. ERNST: If the red ensign is the official flag for Canada abroad, why should we not have a Canadian flag for use at home? Why should we have a different flag abroad from that used at home?

Mr. McINTOSH: That is the essence of the problem.

Mr. MacNICOL: We are particularly favoured by having three flags. We have an official flag on land; another on sea for merchant ships; and the admiralty has granted a special flag for our government ships. The British government also has three different flags. The only difference between our flags and theirs is that we have a Canadian coat of arms on the red ensign flying at the masts of our merchant ships. The same flag is used for the legations while the blue ensign with our coat of arms is used on ships in our government service.

Mr. ERNST: Why should there be a distinction?

Mr. MacNICOL: There is not any.

Mr. ERNST: There is.

Mr. MacNICOL: Except that the coat of arms is on our flags. There have been many discussions in this house, some of them more or less educational—

Mr. McINTOSH: Might I ask the hon. member a question? According to what he has said—

Mr. MacNICOL: If the hon. member is going to ask the same question, he had better read the answer I have just given to the other hon. member.

Mr. McINTOSH: I did not intend to ask the same one.

Mr. MacNICOL: As I say, there have been many discussions of an educational and academic nature in this house. Some folks think that such discussions are a waste of time, but I do not agree. I believe there is much to be learned from such discussions. However, I am convinced that there is a proper time for the discussion of resolutions similar to this one and perhaps there are other times when such discussions are a waste of time. When I go home and find so many men in need of employment I know that they are more interested in measures to relieve unemployment than in discussions of an educational nature.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is the stand I took a year ago.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member took up forty minutes but I do not propose to take up so long as I do not think the matter requires so much answering. In every depression we have such discussions. Since this depression commenced we have had a resolution to change our system of finance, to inflate, deflate and reflate our money, and resolutions covering other subjects. As the hon. member has said, he was the first to introduce this matter.

We are still in the depression and another resolution to change our flag is brought forward. Is there anything that is inviolable? Is there anything that is safe? Is there anything in which we can put our faith? Is there anything that is not going to change? I recall the twenty-eighth verse of the twenty-second chapter of Proverbs, which reads: Remove not the ancient landmark, which thy fathers have set. Of all the ancient landmarks in the world to-day, in my humble opinion the union jack is the most sacred. I remember being up in the county of Grey where I go quite frequently and visiting the son of a pioneer who had settled on a farm in 1850. He was repairing a line fence and his man was going along the fence and taking down some rotten rails. He came across an old, roughly hewn stake which had some roughly carved marks upon it. Like so many young men—I do not mean this to apply to all young men as I am a great admirer of the youth of this generation—he was about to destroy that stake when the son of the pioneer stopped him and said: Hands off, that is the stake placed by my father and the surveyor in 1850; I want it to remain there.

In the union jack we have three very ancient landmarks, all going back into mythology. They go farther back than any other landmark of which I know. We have the landmark of the cross of St. Patrick. That was the cross carried by St. Patrick into the Emerald Isle where he taught the words of the Nazarene. Then we have the cross of St. Andrew. Mythology tells us that St. Andrew was martyred in Greece and his body transported miraculously to bonnie Scotland. Then we have the cross of St. George. Mythology tells us that this was the cross which was on the white banner of St. George when he appeared before the English armies and saved them from the Saracens. These are ancient landmarks and I say to those who would support this resolution: Remember the landmarks that our fathers have set and remove them not.

It has been stated that other dominions have a distinctive flag. That is true, but Canada is the greatest of all dominions, and are we to be leaders or merely followers? Simply because another dominion has a distinctive flag is not a conclusive reason why Canada should adopt one. I read very carefully the debate which took place in the South African house on this question, and if I do not miss my guess, there will be millions in South Africa, Australia and New Zealand who will be very happy if this house does not follow in their footsteps. I hope this house rejects this resolution and decides not to pull down the union jack and erect some other flag in its place. The union jack has tradition behind it; it is the official flag of this country and it should not be pulled down. I hope this resolution will be rejected by a large majority.

The hon. member who has just sat down gave a number of quotations from newspapers which supported the resolution he had moved along similar lines, but I could quote thousands of quotations from newspapers condemning his resolution.

Mr. McINTOSH: Quote some of them.

Mr. MacNICOL: The time of the house will not permit. He referred to various associations and so forth that had supported his resolution, but I could refer to scores that opposed it. After reading the debates which took place in the legislatures of the other dominions I came to the conclusion that some educated and gifted orator like my hon. friend across the aisle and like my good friend on this side was able to present an argument which for sheer lack of defenders of the union jack was agreed to and the union jack was pulled down. I hope defenders will not be lacking in this house. If they are, I shall be very much surprised.

A few moments ago I said that perhaps some good comes out of an educational debate even in times like this, and I believe that some good may come out of this one. The mover of the resolution has suggested the maple leaf in place of the arms of Canada. Well, if he had proposed a resolution to put the maple leaf on the fly of the flag which is flown over the legations, or on the ships of the Canadian merchant or government marine, I should have no particular objection, because in each of those spheres there is competition, and if the people of Canada desire to have one emblem or another, that is their business. But on land, on the north half of this continent, there is no competition. I have a recollection of coming here on the first day of the imperial conference, and as I walked up past the post office, where all the flags of the dominions were flying outside the walls, I saw various stripes and bars and colours. But when I passed by that building and came up the main walk in front of this building and saw the flag that was flying at the mast of the memorial tower, I was never so proud of any flag as I was then of the union jack. It was to me the finest of flags and its colours stood out more beautifully than any I had ever seen except the colours on the battleship Hood, in Victoria harbour a few years ago, where I had gone with a committee to receive the admiral. The colours of our flag, displayed on that opening day of the imperial conference, were more brilliant than any other such colours I had seen before—the blue, the red and the white. The blue recalled to my mind the crest of the waves as one crosses the ocean, a beautiful blue. The red suggested the sacrifice of the British people down through the ages, marking the pathways for the ships of commerce, leading to every harbour throughout the world—not for military glory alone but for the glories of peace as well. And the white stood for the honour of our nation, standing like a beacon light before the world.

The union jack, with its three colours, its three crosses, is complete. You cannot add anything to it. If you attempt to add to it you add not, and if you take away from it you take from its completeness. There might be some reason for enacting legislation, if there is not at present such legislation, to make necessary the flying of one flag on land in this country. I have in mind what the late Mr. Justice Logie said when he opened court at Welland on October 20, 1931. When he arrived he observed flying on the flagstaff of the courthouse a flag other than the union jack. He knew that the official flag in Canada is the union jack, and that this flag should be on the flagstaff of all government buildings, and he made the following remarks to the grand jury, at that time, as reported by the Mail and Empire:

> Gentlemen,—when I arrived for this session I observed a monstrosity at the head of the court flagstaff, a cross between an admiralty flag and a patchwork quilt. I have ordered the sheriff to take that thing down. It is important and proper that the union jack be flown here, especially as there are so many foreigners in this district. That thing at the head of the mast now is not the flag to be flown over His Majesty's courthouse. I hope you will bring in a recommendation that a new flag be purchased. In the meantime, the proper union jack will be flown, even if it is in tatters.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that our highways are to-day cluttered up with all sorts of monstrosities in the way of flags, and the time has come when there should be a rebirth of patriotic spirit in this country, such as there is across the line, where they fly only the stars and stripes. I give that nation to the south of us credit for teaching their people to be loyal to their flag and to fly it and it alone on all public occasions, and I say that we should not have the highways of Canada cluttered up with a regiment of monstrosities. If, therefore, the resolution before the house to-night does nothing more than to direct the attention of the Canadian people to the fact that the time has come for a proper realization once more that on land the union jack is the official flag of this country, then the resolution serves a good purpose. The people might learn further that when that flag is flown it must be attached to the mast with the wide part of the cross of St. Andrew along the top. Quite often we see it upside down, and perhaps Judge Logie witnessed something of the sort. The flag should be flown properly, and on land the official flag is the union jack. I do not see why this is not taught in the schools; I contend that this should be done, so that we might not have all this discussion about changing flags and getting a new flag. All such discussion should be a thing of the past, and the boys and girls of this country should be taught the full meaning of the flag with the triple cross which flies over land inhabited by a quarter of the world's population.

I yield to no one in my love for Canada. I am a Canadian of the fourth generation, the first generation of which was a Scottish veteran of a Scottish regiment that took part in Quatre Bras and Waterloo. I glory in the achievements of Canadians, and I respect and admire the achievements of all creeds and races and colours; I have nothing to say against any race, because I realize that we are all God's creatures and should do our best. Canadians have every reason to be proud of what this country has accomplished, and when I hear this talk about pulling down the flag I think of the regiments that left the shores of Canada between the years 1914 and 1918. Many of the men that went overseas failed to come back, but the flags came back and to-day right across Canada you will see those flags hanging in our churches and in our great cathedrals and public halls. Those flags should remain there, a perpetual memorial to those who did not come back; and to those who are willing to see them pulled down, I say that if the union jack is to fly over the peace tower where the names of our fallen heroes are to be inscribed until they say "pull it down," it will fly until the crack of doom.

Mr. R. S. WHITE (Mount Royal): I regret greatly that I was not in my seat this afternoon to second the resolution of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) because I had promised to do so. Now, the subject of a flag always lends itself to heroics, mock or otherwise, but I do not intend to indulge in anything of that kind. I cannot understand, it is incomprehensible to me how any member of this house or anybody out of it can suggest a change, a displacement of the union jack, and retain his self respect. For I am certain that he cannot retain the self respect of the people of this country if he attempts to lay unholy hands upon the union jack. But the proposal before the house is not to remove the union jack in any way whatsoever; it asks merely that upon the fly there be placed an emblem significant of Canada. We have that now in our merchant marine flag—the matter has been referred to frequently during this discussion—the Canadian coat of arms. I could almost defy anybody to determine from a look at the merchant marine flag what that particular emblem means.

This is not a new subject. I can well remember more than forty years ago when I had the honour of a seat in this house, that the then member for St. Antoine, the late Lord Strathcona, devoted a large part of a sitting to an endeavour to persuade the members to adopt what might be called, if you will, the national flag of Canada. I forget whether the design he favoured was such as is suggested by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) a maple leaf, or a spray of maple leaves. Lord Strathcona did not succeed in his effort at that time but I shall be greatly surprised if the hon. member for Nanaimo, myself and others who may think with him, fail in our effort to-day. But let this be well understood, that it is not proposed to displace or mutilate in any way the union jack. Are the people of the Commonwealth of Australia less loyal because they have upon the fly an emblem significant of that commonwealth?

Mr. McINTOSH: No, they are not.

Mr. WHITE (Mount Royal): Are the people of New Zealand less loyal because they have followed the same course?

Mr. McINTOSH: No.

Mr. WHITE (Mount Royal): Are the people of Canada lacking in loyalty because they place the dominion coat of arms on the merchant marine flag? Certainly not. Years ago the emblem of the old province of Canada was the beaver and I can recall suggestions made that the beaver might well be placed upon the fly as indicating that the flag was a Canadian one. But while the beaver is a very industrious animal with a good deal of ingenuity and skill, placed upon a flag it too much resembles a rat. No such objection, however, can be made to what I venture to say is the most beautiful leaf to be found on any tree that grows.

I want to read to the house just a few words in respect of the union jack. The late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, whom few hon. members will have known as I had the pleasure of knowing in his lifetime, once Prime Minister of Canada, I think in 1876 was attending a banquet given by the Board of Trade of Saint John, New Brunswick, on which occasion the United States consul at Saint John and the late James G. Blaine, one time candidate for the presidency of the United States, and a very distinguished United States public man, were present, Mr. Mackenzie, in the course of his speech, said this:

> I hope that the people of the United States and of Great Britain will always remain true to those principles on which their institutions are founded and that their flags may wave together in beauty and harmony in many a distant land,—the one bearing on it the emblem of the might of the Creator, the starry heavens, which express His infinite power, and the other emblazoned with the emblem of God's greatest work—the redemption of man.

I yield to no man in Canada in my loyalty to the British flag, the union jack, and I would be last to lay the hand of desecration upon it. The resolution proposes to perpetuate that flag. We are a British commonwealth of nations, or I think it is a commonwealth of British nations, of equal status under the statute of Westminster, and to place an insignia upon the fly means merely that that flag represents the Canadian dominion within the British commonwealth and nothing more. I have pleasure in supporting a resolution which does not go one iota further than to place upon the fly of the union jack something emblematic of the Canadian dominion.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): Mr. Speaker, if the house is to vote on this question, I feel I should state my position in regard to it. My constituency is situated in a city where the opposition to a motion such as this or the motion of two years ago of my hon. friend the member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh), is strong indeed. There may be bodies in that municipality which would strongly endorse the resolution, but the general opinion and feeling of the whole city is, I take it, against any such thing.

I do not desire to indulge in any heroics about the flag. The hon. member for North Battleford recited to us an American poem which, so far as I remember, began, continued and ended with the words "hats off." It had to do with the feelings and emotions stirred by a flag being carried past, and the sense of it, according to my hon. friend, was that that flag embodied within its folds the traditions, aspirations and ideals of the nation. If that be an argument, it is one for retaining here the union jack as it is to-day; for from my boyhood days I have followed that flag in one way and another; I have admired and reverenced it, as have all hon. members of this house. The traditions of my country, as far as a flag can embody them, are embodied in the union jack. So if we are to exchange that for something of another kind we should have to build up around that new flag a host of traditions which now belong to the one we have used for so many years.

My hon. friend's argument if it be an argument, is I think sufficiently answered by this: Why seek a change? The union jack is the official flag of this country. I have listened, with pleasure and profit in one or two instances, to the speeches that have been made in support of the resolution, and when the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. White) added his voice of authority to the discussion, if anything could have convinced me that this is a proper motion for this house to pass I should have been convinced by him. His speech was moderate and well-reasoned. He does not seek to replace the union jack, but does he not seek by this motion to relegate it to a position of inferiority as compared with the position which it occupies now? Now it is the whole; by that proposal it merely becomes one corner of the field. Is there any confusion in this country because we have the union jack for our flag? With what would it be confused? Is there any one who would suppose that in this country when the union jack flies it flies as the emblem of Great Britain? In Canada it flies as the emblem of Canada.

An hon. member addressed a question to the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol) as to the use of the red ensign on the legations. He asked a very proper question: Why should we not have our national flag there? To me the answer is perfectly clear; if we had our official flag flying there it would be in a place where it might be confused with that of the British Empire. But we have seen that difficulty and presumably by order of the council the legations are permitted or probably directed to fly a flag that is distinctive because it is in a place where it needs to be distinctive. But here in this country I would have to be given a better reason for displacing the union jack than any that has been given. I accuse no hon. member of anything when I ask: is it because they want to assert this so-called new-found nationality of ours, to emphasize the fact that we have in a way departed from our old status and acquired a new, that they call for a new flag? Are we not trying unduly to emphasize our nationhood by this suggested new flag? I submit that if that is the object there is no necessity for our doing anything of the sort. We are as strong a people within the British Empire as one could wish. No one is denying us our place in the empire; no one is seeking to detract from our authority and position there in the slightest degree. If that be the reason for the proposal then it seems to me it is not compelling. If it is not going to confuse anyone, if it is not required to assert our nationhood which presumably we have recently found, what other reason can there be? What is the desirability of it?

My friends have said in a general way that it would be nice if we had a flag of our own. We have such a flag. If it is satisfactory to us as a flag to fly on land, then why change it? The hon. member for Mount Royal has indicated a special flag that he would support, but there is nothing in this motion to ensure that that is the flag that we would have. The flag proposed by this resolution is a flag yet to be designed, and whether it will have the maple leaf so dear to my hon. friend's heart on it or not who can tell? But despite what the hon. member for North Battleford said, I believe there is no preponderance of opinion in this country that wishes to remove from its official place the union jack, the flag of this country. It has done us no harm and has brought us great glory; we have learned to love it, and there is something in me that makes me view with the greatest possible apprehension and sorrow the suggestion that we should change this flag under which we have lived all our lives. If there is a reason that I have not grasped I should like to hear it, but the reasons that have been given are not sufficient; neither is the demand of a certain number of people who pass a resolution sufficient. I think this is a thing that a man has to decide for himself, and if he feels within himself something that causes him to be in strenuous opposition to such a proposal I think he should express it. That is my personal feeling; it is very deep rooted, and I should regret very much to see this motion pass and shall oppose it if it comes to a vote.

Mr. ARTHURS moved the adjournment of the debate.

PRODUCTION AND DISTRIBUTION

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF SPREAD BETWEEN PRICES OF RAW PRODUCTS AND MANUFACTURED GOODS

Mr. ROBERT McKENZIE (Assiniboia) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, an immediate inquiry should be made under the provisions of the Research Council Act, Chapter 177, R.S.C., 1927, or by other means, into the causes underlying the wide spread between the prices of raw products and the prices of goods manufactured from such products.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in presenting this resolution to the house hon. members will note that I have followed the form of my resolution presented on February 6, of last year, upon which occasion I was supported by some of my friends. Later the resolution went to the bottom of the order paper and was not reached again during the session.

At the time I introduced my resolution of a year ago I drew attention to a number of anomalies in prices, particularly those anomalies in the prices of farm products in the raw state, and the prices of the same products after processing. Upon that occasion I desired, as indicated in my resolution, to have the research council during the recess period go into the matter of these anomalies in prices, in order that legislation could have been presented at this session based on their report. This evening it is not my intention to deal, as I did last year, with particular items, but rather to speak in general terms. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) introduced his motion of February 2, dealing with some of the matters contained in my resolution my inclination was to withdraw from the order paper the resolution standing in my name, in the hope that the committee to be set up would deal effectively with the questions I had in mind. Since then, however, I have given considerable thought to the matter and have come to the conclusion that the committee which has been set up, sitting as it will be for only a few hours a day, a few days each week, cannot by any means meet the situation I have in mind. Its efforts will be entirely inadequate to deal with the great volume of business which will come before it, and for that reason I believe the work of that committee might well be supplemented by the investigation I propose.

After the committee was set up about a week ago I noticed headlines in the newspapers referring to it as a committee on mass buying, and those newspaper articles prompted me to proceed with my resolution. The question of mass buying does not in any sense enter into the resolution standing in my name. The people with whom I am concerned do not consider mass buying an evil. As I view it, mass buying is only a system which has grown up during the last few years which has for its purpose the overcoming of an evil, and cannot be considered an evil in itself from the consumer's viewpoint. Further, I have proceeded with the resolution because I believe the method adopted by the government, namely that of appointing a special committee, is altogether too cumbersome, and it will take too long to accomplish anything. On account of the urgency of this matter I believe the suggestion I have offered should be accepted, so as to supplement the work of the committee, in the hope that some remedial legislation may be effected while the depression exists. If we go through this depression without doing something along the lines I have indicated I am afraid that, in the event of another depression in a few years conditions would be found to be worse than those now prevailing. Particularly would this apply to those who are suffering most in these days, namely the poor people.

There is another reason why I desire to present this resolution, and that is in relation to the personnel of the committee that has been appointed. I am going to ask the Prime Minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, if he thinks it is just and right that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) should be permitted to sit in judgment on that committee. I am going to read a letter written by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to a gentleman by the name of Hermiston, and which was published in a paper called the Parliamentary Critic, Ottawa. The letter, dated Ottawa, January 19, is as follows:

Dear Mr. Hermiston,—

I have your letter of the 17th and thank you very much for the illustrations attached to show the evil influence of the department and chain store system.

We are now continuing the investigation and hope to build up a pretty strong case. The information you have given will be useful.

Yours very truly,

H. H. Stevens.

In view of that letter I say in all seriousness that as the Minister of Trade and Commerce has prejudged the question he ought not be allowed to sit in judgment on a committee of that kind, and I am bringing it to the attention of the government in the hope that they will take my objection into their very serious consideration.

Last year when I presented this resolution I dealt largely with the question of wool and woollen clothing, for the reason that woollen clothing is so necessary in the part of the country from which I come, and also because there are so many people, even those who are raising wool, who are not able to buy it back in its manufactured form, and are therefore suffering from the want of it. I believe that the resolution I am presenting strikes at the very root of this depression, and that if the matter complained of were remedied it would go a long way towards our recovery from this depression. Certainly when another depression comes along, as they appear to do periodically, it will bear much more heavily upon the people if action along this line is not taken in the meantime.

The outstanding feature of the present depression so far as the farming community is concerned has been the unprecedented decline in the prices of commodities, more particularly farm products, without a corresponding fall in the prices of manufactured goods. Our trouble is due not only to the fact that farm prices have depreciated enormously, but also to the disparity between the decrease in farm prices and the decline in the prices of manufactured products. While manufactured products are lower in price, as we will all admit, they have not dropped to the low levels reached by the prices of raw materials and natural products generally. I repeat, as I have stated before in this house as well as elsewhere, that a depressed agriculture, such as we have in Canada to-day, is one of the main reasons why we have falling revenues, unemployment, the railway problem and a good many of our other major problems. Let me give a few figures which will prove what I have said, that the prices of farm products have fallen to a greater extent than the prices of manufactured products.

Taking 1926 as a normal year, with the index figure of prices of that year for both manufactured and farm products at 100, we find that the prices of farm and manufactured products stood as follows in the years from 1927 to 1933:

	Index price
	Farm products	Manufactured products
1927	102.1	96.5
1928	100.7	95
1929	100.8	93
1930	80.6	85.2
1931	56.3	74.9
1932	48	70
1933 (eight months ending August)	50	69.5

In other words, from 1926 to 1930 the prices of farm products fell 19·4 per cent and of manufactured products 14·8 per cent, while from 1930 to 1933 farm products fell 30·6 per cent and manufactured products only 15·7 per cent. To put it in another way, in 1926 one dollar's worth of farm products would buy one dollar's worth of manufactured goods; in 1927, ninety-five cents' worth of farm products would buy one dollars' worth of manufactured goods on the basis of 1926 prices. For succeeding years, still on the basis of 1926 prices, the values of farm products required to buy one dollars' worth of manufactured goods were: in 1928, ninety-four cents' worth; in 1929, ninety-two cents' worth; in 1930, $1.09 worth; in 1931, $1.33 worth; in 1932, $1.44 worth, and in 1933, $1.49 worth. By this it may be seen that the manufacturing industries did not suffer to anything like the same extent as the farming industry. I contend, and these figures go to prove, that if farm products were on the same basis as other products, if one dollar's worth of farm products would buy one dollar's worth of manufactured products, we would still be able to buy and sell, and the country would not be in the condition it is in to-day. But when we have to give almost $1.50 worth of farm products to buy one dollar's worth of manufactured goods, recovery is almost impossible so far as the farming industry is concerned.

On the second day of this month the Prime Minister introduced a resolution appointing a committee to inquire into some of the matters which are mentioned in my resolution. At that time, speaking to that resolution, I stated that I believed that combines, the high tariffs and special duties and other regulations of the National Revenue department were largely responsible for the wide spread in prices between natural products and the same products in a manufactured state. The question has often been asked why it is that this depression appears to bear so much more heavily upon the farmers and the labouring classes than former depressions did, and particular reference is made when the question is asked to the depression of 1920-1922. The answer that I have given, and I believe it is the best answer available, is that tariffs are higher in Canada to-day than they have ever been before in the history of this country, and the manufacturers in Canada, in spite of what may be said, are taking advantage of those high tariffs. The labouring men and the farmers cannot obtain by any stretch of the imagination any benefit from these high tariffs. This is largely the reason why the depression is bearing so much more heavily to-day upon the farming community than it did previously. The very fact that the manufacturers are taking advantage of the high tariff compels the farmers and labouring people to pay higher prices for the products they need than otherwise would be the case. This has been denied many times from the other side of the house; hon. members opposite try to make out that the tariff is not responsible for increases in prices, but I remember last year when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) brought down his budget he stated that many manufacturing industries were operating in the red because they were able to operate only twenty-five, fifty or sixty per cent of their capacity. He stated that that was why they required higher tariff protection. To my mind that is an admission that these manufacturing industries are taking advantage of the tariff. If they are not, and this is something I should like investigated, it is because there are too many industries in certain lines attempting to operate in Canada.

Business in all lines is calling out for some relief. The resolution of the Prime Minister and the setting up of a committee has met with a good deal of favour, but so did the resolution which I presented a year ago. I contend that had that resolution been adopted last year we could have been in a fair way to having some legislation to remedy the conditions of which I complained. Even now it is not too late. I cannot see how this committee, which will sit only a few hours a day for a few days each week, can do any more than touch the fringe of this big question. The president of the United States has been given wide powers to deal with just such matters as were mentioned in my resolution, and he is making a determined effort to deal with the problem. He is dealing with it in a big way, and I believe that if there has been an improvement in conditions in Canada it is because of what is being done in the United States. I believe that that country is an indispensable factor in the world recovery which we all hope will come very soon. It will be noticed that the United States is beginning to deal with reality and is now tackling the tariff problem with a view to reducing duties and bringing about greater trade with other nations of the world. That country realizes, as must every country sooner or later, that economic exclusiveness, as it has been termed here, tends to make the problem harder to solve.

I have always been at a loss to know why our representatives at the conference held at Ottawa in 1932 did not endeavour to have some provision made whereby the better quality clothing manufactured in Great Britain, which could be sold here at a price lower than the poorer quality manufactured in Canada, could continue to be brought into the country Such a measure would have increased the market in Great Britain for some of our products. I know the answer is that the government wanted to give employment to people engaged in the textile industry, but I know that people in my part of the country are not buying simply because they have no purchasing power. Quite often I hear men say that they have not had a suit of clothes for the last five years. If the retail stores throughout the country were doing the business they would be doing if conditions were right, many of the men in the textile industry who might be laid off could be engaged in selling goods over the counter and be just as profitably employed.

Surely the time has come when we should do something more than just appoint a committee to investigate a few things. As I said, this committee will be sitting a few hours a day in an attempt to deal with this great problem. There is a need of some drastic measure when the people who produce raw materials are not able to buy them back after they are processed. I hope this government will soon realize that there are other people who should be considered besides the manufacturers. In tackling this problem we are tackling a problem too large to be handled in the way that this government is attempting to handle it. During the last two years when I have had this resolution in mind and when it has appeared upon the order paper I have received many letters from all across Canada. I think the people of Canada would be solidly behind the government if they would take hold of this problem in a big way but from what I have seen in some of the papers I am afraid that to a certain extent the people are of the same opinion as myself, namely, that the government is not going after it in a big enough way. I should like to quote part of a long editorial which appeared in the Times-Herald of Moose Jaw. This editorial deals with this very matter, and the concluding words are these:

> The problem that was shelved a year ago has suddenly become urgent for political reasons, and in order to forestall a demand on the part of the opposition for a far-reaching inquiry under the Research Council Act, the government prefers the longer and roundabout way of a parliamentary inquiry, which it can always hold well in hand, and which a "steering committee" of the protected manufacturers can guide along the lines desired.

I am not prepared to go quite as far as that editorial. I hope the government is in earnest, but there are others besides the Moose Jaw Times-Herald who do not believe that the government is in earnest in trying to solve this problem. This is the conclusion I have reached from the many letters I have received. One man said to me that this was a Liberal policy and he wondered how the government could go ahead with anything like that. He then quoted the words of the Prime Minister who said on one occasion: Converts always can be depended upon to make a failure of anything they undertake to do. My final word is this: Let us adopt the best method possible; if it is the intention of the government that this committee should deal with the mass buying problem, all well and good, but let us have some earnest endeavour to do something in connection with these price spreads.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member kindly state who seconded his motion?

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown).

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): I really had not thought of saying anything in regard to this resolution, but while the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McKenzie) was speaking a few thoughts came to my mind. I would point out to the house, as we have had occasion to point out many times before, that in the question of spread in prices as between the producer and the consumer there is no one who suffers more than the farmer, and I would discuss this question from the standpoint of the farmers, since I am a representative of farmers. No one suffers more than the farmer, for this reason, that he gets it both ways, whether it is on what he produces or on what he buys. If it is a question of wheat, then the price we receive for our wheat is based upon the world price, and that takes into account all costs that have to be paid between the time the commodity leaves the farmer's wagon and the time it gets to the consumer. The farmer pays all the freight, all the commission charges, everything that has to be paid between the time it leaves his waggon and the time it reaches the consumer. And similarly with the things he buys; the price he has to pay for what he buys is the price the manufacturer gets plus the price that the distributors, however many they may be, have to be paid for their services, and the freight rates. The farmer has to pay for all that, and therefore the farmer more than any other class suffers by this spread in prices. To put it another way, the farmer sells everything at wholesale prices and buys back everything at retail prices.

A committee has now been set up to study the question of mass buying by the department and the chain stores, and so on, but here is something which that committee will be faced with when it comes to investigate this matter. If the committee tries to regulate this spread between what the producer gets and what the consumer pays it will find that it has a conflict on its hands, because the mass buying on the part of the department and chain stores is an attempt to lower this difference between what the producer gets and what the consumer pays. I do not see therefore how the committee will solve the problem with these two conflicting interests to be considered; at any rate it cannot solve both at the same time.

The ordinary consumer in the city suffers of course, but he does not suffer the double burden that the farmer has to bear. The consumer has to pay all the cost, and I think we may as well turn our attention to the fact that so much of this cost is taken up in distribution. There is the problem that confronts us. We have solved the question of production; we have not solved the question of economical distribution. I remember that at one of our United Farmer's meetings a good many years ago an old farmer from a small town in northern Manitoba gave this illustration. He said that in his town of Foxwarren there were one day four commercial travellers, one selling soap, another candies, another tobacco and, I think, the fourth one was selling matches—it does not matter what it was; maybe it was Eddy matches.

Mr. BENNETT: I hope so; they are good matches.

Mr. BROWN: Anyhow, there were four men, each drawing a big salary and piling up the expense accounts which commercial travellers are said to pile up, yet each one was only engaged in the trivial business of selling one or other of these little commodities. Can anyone doubt for a moment that that system must add tremendously to the cost of distributing goods?

I am not disposed to blame the manufacturer for all these things. I think something came out in discussion some years ago when we were speaking of some articles of hardware which the hon. member for Lincoln makes. He was reported to have said that for a particular kind of stable fork the manufacturer got about 80 cents. That may be right or wrong; I am only telling the story as it came to me. Well, we have to pay about $2.50 or $3 for the same fork. I am second to nobody in my antagonism to protective tariffs, but that particular situation is not brought about entirely by protective tariffs. I do not know what it costs to manufacture the common four-toed potato fork with the wide prongs; perhaps the hon. member for Lincoln could tell us. But I do know that two years ago I paid $2 for it. I imagine that between the price which the hon. member for Lincoln gets for such a fork and what I had to pay there is a wide spread. What the spread is I do not know, but I hope that the committee, of which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) is to be chairman, will investigate that situation and see whether he will solve that problem by attacking mass buying in the department and chain stores, because these methods have been introduced to help to solve the problem of the spread between the price that the producer receives and the price the consumer pays. I think he will have to do a little bit of running with the hare and hunting with the hounds when he deals with this matter.

Undoubtedly there is a problem that confronts us, and I emphasize again the fact that the farmer gets it both ways, both on what he produces and on what he buys. I happen to know that a certain man sold twenty ducks, dressed—and ducks are not the easiest thing in the world to dress and clean—and the return to this producer was less than 20 cents apiece; the whole net return was $3.95. I presume the people in the city who consumed those ducks paid 10 or 12 cents a pound at least, and perhaps a good deal more. Illustrations might be multiplied indefinitely to show the very wide spread that exists. I think it was brought out in the milk inquiry that was held in Winnipeg that the man who drove the milk wagon distributing the milk received more than twice as much for his work as the farmer who produced the milk. While this question of labour is an important one; while the question of unemployment is important and the remedy suggested of shorter hours and bigger pay to the man who is labouring in the city is one that undoubtedly must receive consideration, what I fail to see yet is how that solution of the problem can be made to fit in with the farmers' interests. If that can be done and if any person is able to show us just how it can be done, I shall be only too glad to listen to him.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I should like to say just a word or two, addressing my remarks more directly to the resolution before us than to the affairs of the committee that has been set up by the house. I feel myself precluded from discussing that if I desire to obey the rules, which I think are clear that we are not permitted to discuss in this chamber the activities of a committee.

The resolution that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McKenzie) proposes is that under the provisions of the Research Council Act, or by other means, an inquiry should be made into the causes underlying the wide spread between the prices of raw products and the prices of goods manufactured from such products. May I suggest to the mover of the resolution—and to this degree I shall have to transgress what I know to be the rules—that the first action of the committee set up was to invite the bureau of statistics and the president of the national research council, together with the official in charge of the Combines Act, to make an immediate study of all the material, documents, data and so forth at present in the hands of government departments and to correlate all this information in preparation for treatment by the committee. In other words, the very thing he is now asking is actually under way at the present moment. As I say, it is quite contrary to the rules for me or any other hon. member to enter into a discussion, first, of the activities of a committee, and, second, of a debate that has already been closed by the action of this house, namely in passing a resolution and appointing a committee based upon it. Therefore I am precluded by the rules from carrying that further. I have, as I say, transgressed them to the extent of conveying that information to the hon. member.

I might perhaps invite the house for a moment to consider the Research Council Act. To speak now of that act which is specifically referred to in the resolution before us, the question is whether under that act this matter is properly covered. I merely mention that; I think the act has more to do with scientific and industrial research and standardization. One of the reasons why the research council was invited to join with the bureau of statistics in a study of this matter was the scientific knowledge possessed by the expert officials of the council and particularly the possible assistance that might be secured by further standardization. But I might say to the hon. member that in the bureau of statistics there are some highly skilled and competent officials, economists we would be well justified in terming them, who can give and are now giving close study to the very matters to which he refers. In the light of what I have said to the hon. member, I do not see that there would be anything gained by pressing this motion to a vote.

I am sure both my hon. friends who have spoken will excuse me if I do not follow them in a discussion of the matters to which they have referred, because, as I say, they are all matters which I think are more or less out of order under this particular resolution, having been dealt with in connection with the committee that has been set up. But I would be unfair to myself and other hon. gentlemen on this side of the house if I were not to say that we fully appreciate, just as keenly as do hon. members opposite, the tremendous importance of the welfare of the agriculturists of this country. Speaking for myself, I am profoundly impressed with that. I know full well what the prosperity of the agriculturists means to Canada and am just as keenly anxious as it is possible to be to do everything we can to find a solution for the problems with which they are confronted.

I should like, however, to say to my hon. friends that perhaps more progress may be made in the interests of the agriculturists and other producers of primary products if we could approach the question with some degree of unanimity of purpose. I assure them that I have no desire to make the fate of the agriculturists a question of political view, and if they will, I certainly will approach the question with one desire and that is to do the best we can to find a solution for these problems. I do not think there is any need for me to say more at the moment. In the light of the facts that I have indicated, I would suggest to the hon. member that the resolution might be allowed to drop or to be withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the hon. member prepared to withdraw the resolution?

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): In view of what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) has said, I may say that the main object I had in moving the resolution at this time was that I feel, as I said before, that the time will go along and this session will be over; that there will not be time to do very much and that somebody will have to carry on the work. That is why I thought the resolution should be presented.

There is just one other matter. I was in hopes that the minister would give us some explanation of the letter I read that he was supposed to have written, according to the newspaper I quoted, to a gentleman in Ottawa, in which letter it appeared that he had his mind already made up on certain points and I questioned the advisability of his sitting in judgment. Except for that I have nothing further to say.

Mr. STEVENS: I was not in the chamber when the hon. gentleman read the letter, but I presume, speaking to a point of privilege, if I may, Mr. Speaker, it is the same letter which one of my hon. friend's colleagues read to the committee the other day.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): It was a letter published in a paper called the Parliamentary Critic.

Mr. STEVENS: I know the letter. One of his colleagues read it to the committee the other day. It is a very brief one written in reply to one of several thousand letters that I have received. Hon. gentlemen will appreciate that when one is flooded with letters of this kind, he cannot sit down and in every individual case carefully consider the nature of the answer. I am not blaming anyone; I will quite frankly take full responsibility for the letter. It went out as one of many many hundreds. The expression in it which I suppose could be taken as an indication of one's mind being made up was not so intended. I think this house has known me long enough to know that I will perform my duties on that committee as fairly and impartially as it is possible to do. Probably there are few of us who have not rather strong views on many matters. My hon. friend is sitting over there, and I am sitting here, because he has strong views on certain policies and I have opposite views, and I presume we hold these views honestly; at least I accord to him quite sincerely that credit. I do not think, therefore, there is any particular need for me to explain that letter, other than to say just what I have said. The house can rest assured that anything dealt with in that committee will be dealt with fairly. But I will say that as chairman of it, and having some sense of responsibility as a member of this house and of my duty to the country, it is my purpose to pursue certain things vigorously and earnestly; I shall pursue them to their ultimate end with the one object of bringing out impartially the whole truth in regard to these matters.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member who moved the resolution withdraw it? With the unanimous consent of the house the resolution is withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

TRADE WITH UNITED STATES

PROPOSED RECIPROCAL ARRANGEMENT FOR EXCHANGE OF NATURAL PRODUCTS

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that the government of Canada reopen negotiations with the government of the United States of America with a view of bringing about a satisfactory reciprocal trade agreement between Canada and the United States, whereby the natural products of Canada, that is, the products of the sea, the farm, the mines and the forests, and including fish, lumber, wheat, cattle, etc., should have free entry into the United States in exchange for the admission of certain goods from the United States of America, which in the interests of both countries may be admitted into Canada, free from customs tariffs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to support this resolution I would say that it is worded in exactly the same terms as one which I moved in this house last year. I think it will be agreed that on that occasion there was a fair and perhaps full discussion of this very important matter. At that time certain objections were made because I introduced the resolution in the manner in which I did and at the time I did. If I remember correctly objection was also made to the fact that I used the word "expedient," that in the opinion of this house it is expedient that the government of Canada reopen negotiations with the government of the United States. After the discussion I looked it up in the dictionary and found that after all is said and done the word "expedient" is not such a harsh or unsuitable one; it means "desirable." So I could just as well have used the word "desirable"; it would have meant the same thing.

Further in regard to the wording of the resolution, may I say that as long as the government and this house will accept the resolution I am willing to amend it as far as possible so as to meet the wishes of the government and the house; I am not committed to any particular form of resolution regarding this very important matter. I do say, however, as to my reason for reintroducing it at this session, that I am sincere in the matter. I am not introducing it in any partisan spirit, but I feel, as I have felt for a great many years and did feel long before the reciprocity agreement was introduced in this house in the session of 1911, that it is in the interests of this country and the United States as well that these two countries, situated side by side, should do a greater volume of trade one with another on a reciprocal basis. Therefore I say that if it is necessary that the motion be amended in some slight degree I have no particular objection to that being done.

I said a moment ago that there were other objections raised last year. One was that when I introduced the motion it was premature. That might be, because at that time, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) pointed out, the government of the United States had only recently been changed, and the president-elect had not yet taken charge of the affairs of the government. Another reason given by the Prime Minister was that there was to be a world economic conference held in London, at which among other things the subject of tariffs was to be discussed. In his speech on that occasion the Prime Minister said:

> But there is another reason, and I put it to the house as being, I submit, a conclusive reason why at this time, after this discussion, which cannot be helpful, we should not adopt any resolution that would involve the possibility of being taken as an indication of a division of opinion. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) the other day directed attention to the fact that a draft annotated agenda for the monetary and economic conference had been issued. I indicated that while that is a draft agenda only, it is now published, and any person who so desired might avail himself of the opportunity to read it. Among the items on that agenda for consideration you will perhaps recall that after some difficulty this was added:
> 5. Tariff and treaty policy.
> A. Tariff policy:
> (1) Cessation of tariff increases.
> (2) Reduction of tariffs.
> (3) Special aspects of the tariff problem.
> (4) Method of procedure.

Now, sir, since the Prime Minister knew at that time what the agenda of the world economic conference was to be, I can understand his reason for asking me then that my resolution should stand. As will be remembered, I had no opportunity either to withdraw it or to ask that a vote be taken on it. However, that conference met, and although the United States was represented there no action was taken in regard to tariffs. I think in view of that fact, and view of the serious situation in certain parts of this country, that I am justified to-night in raising my voice in this house in order to try again to impress on this parliament and the government the necessity of arranging some reciprocal treaty with our great neighbour to the south.

I was pleased to-night when the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. White), speaking in regard to the flag, referred to a meeting in Saint John, New Brunswick, some fifty or sixty years ago at which meeting there were present James G. Blaine, a candidate for the presidency of the United States, and Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, who was then Prime Minister of Canada. The hon. member for Mount Royal told us that at that meeting, in their speeches, referring to the flag, they both said there was no reason why the two flags should not fly side by side. If the United States flag and the union jack can fly side by side, is there any reason why this great country and the great country to the south should not be able to trade with each another more freely than they do? Look at the map of the northern part of this continent; if it were not for the fact that the two parts are in different colours most of us would not know where the United Stated ends on the north and where Canada begins; we would not know that Canada's territory ends at the forty-ninth parallel and that the United States begins there. Since Canada is divided from the United States only by the forty-ninth parallel, an imaginary line, and the great lakes, is there any reason why New Brunswick should not trade with the state of Maine just as freely as New Brunswick trades with Nova Scotia? Is there any reason why New York state should not trade with the province of Quebec as easily as Quebec trades with Ontario? We might say the same of adjoining points along the border until we reach the Pacific coast and come to Point Roberts and the Fraser river dividing Canada from the United States. God and nature never intended that the United States and Canada should not have a fair and equitable arrangement whereby one could trade with the other.

There is no doubt in my mind that because of tariffs and restrictions existing between Canada and the United States, conditions in Canada are not as good as they might be. Since for the last fifty or sixty years we have had certain policies in Canada I can understand that it would be difficult immediately to do away entirely with those restrictions and barriers, yet I am fully convinced that the adoption of better trade relations between these two contiguous countries would be in the best interests of Canada and the Canadian people and the people of the United States.

Although the rules will not permit me to quote, may I say that in this chamber a speech was made only a few days ago in which this question was discussed. Answering some speeches which have been made by hon. members on this side of the house the Prime Minister stated that he would not sign a lopsided pact of reciprocity. May I say to him I am with him heart and soul in that statement. I do not want to see nor is there any need of any lopsided treaty. To my mind there is no reason why the peoples of the United States and Canada cannot get together and make a treaty or agreement which would be satisfactory to both countries. The argument was used that the reciprocal trade arrangement suggested in 1911 was not a treaty, but was only an agreement. I believe it was the Prime Minister who said that he would not agree to an agreement and that if anything was done it would have to be in the shape of a treaty. It is immaterial to me whether it is an agreement or a treaty because I am convinced that if an arrangement was made if only for a few months it would benefit a great many people in the Dominion of Canada.

Speaking on that point, let me say that I should like to give credit to this government for what it has done in connection with an arrangement for which I have argued, talked and fought for the last twenty years. I refer to the modus vivendi arrangement with the United States. For years I have tried to get that into effect. I urged the late government, the present one and the department to let United States vessels come into this country and do business so that they might buy bait and ice supplies, and land their fish in bond and send it to the United States. Last year, quite properly, this government decided that they would allow the United States vessels to do those very things I have mentioned. The government agreed to make that arrangement for a period of six months. If it was good business to make a modus vivendi arrangement for six months why would it not be just as good to have a reciprocity treaty for six months, a year, two years or as long as both contracting parties could agree?

My only objection to the modus vivendi is that in my opinion, so far as the maritime provinces are concerned—and they are most affected—from a business standpoint there is no reason why the government could not send word to-morrow to the government of the United States saying, "Come in as often as you like, stay as long as you like, and do as much business as you like with us." There is no reason why the government of Canada should not say to the government of the United States, "We will let you bring your fish into Nova Scotia ports; we will let you land those fish and buy ice and boxes from those who make ice and boxes, and we will let you hire labourers to pack the fish and use our trains to carry them to their destination." Surely there could be no objection to that. And if it is good business to do that for six months, there is no reason why we should quibble as to whether or not a reciprocal trade arrangement is an agreement or a treaty.

I notice in the speech from the throne the following expression:

> The temporary trade arrangements made with Germany and Austria have been further extended. Canadian products are now receiving most favoured tariff treatment in those countries in exchange for the grant of our intermediate tariff on their products.

Then if hon. members will turn to the estimates they will find that a vote of $200,000 is asked from this parliament to expand trade in European countries. Surely if it is good business to make an arrangement with Austria and Germany, if it is good business to vote $200,000 to extend our trade with those countries, is it not even more in the interests of the Canadian people to arrange to spend money, if necessary—and I do not think it would be necessary—to make an arrangement with the United States so that we may do business with the people on the other side of the boundary line?

If we could make an arrangement with the United States I can see no reason why our cattle should have to be shipped from Alberta to Quebec or Montreal and from those points overseas to the English market when, within three or four hundred miles of this country, we have a market. I cannot understand why other Canadian products should have to be sent long distances when we should be able to buy and sell in the United States market.

In discussing a resolution introduced to-day by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon), the statement was made that the United States had taken retaliatory action because of a certain agreement or treaty which was made a couple of years ago within the British Empire. I said two years ago, when the Ottawa conference was being discussed in this House of Commons and an arrangement had been made whereby if certain goods from the western prairies did not go entirely through Canadian channels they would have to pay a duty of six cents per bushel, that I was very much afraid the United States might adopt a similar measure under which they would retaliate against us for taking that action. I noticed the other day there was an effort in the United States to have the president put a ten per cent duty on all goods going through Canadian channels destined to the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: May I correct the hon. gentleman? That referred to the item which was passed in the first budget of Mr. Robb by which a ten per cent further preference was given if the imports came through Canadian ports, and the United States had some years ago introduced a measure to meet that situation. It was introduced again by a senator from Maine and had nothing at all to do with the Ottawa conference.

Mr. DUFF: I beg my right hon. friend's pardon; this is a different matter. In this instance the shipping board and shipping interests of the United States appealed not long ago to President Roosevelt.

Mr. BENNETT: Arising out of Mr. Robb's first budget.

Mr. DUFF: They represented to the president that in view of the fact that Canadian goods could not go through American ports without being subject to this duty on the other side, the United States government should compel all goods coming through Canada in bond and bound for the United States to pay a ten per cent duty. Let me give one instance of the effect that would have if by any means the United States decided to do that. Take, for instance, the silk trade. Train loads of silk which have entered Vancouver from Japan travel mostly across Canadian territory on their way to New York. It would mean that we should lose all that business if our government did not take action to make a satisfactory trade arrangement with the United States. That is what might happen.

I hold in my hand an interview which was given by the United States Secretary of State, Mr. Cordell Hull, to the Montreal Star, and which appeared in its issue of the seventeenth instant. The interview says:

> Then the secretary launched into a general discussion of world trade in which he declared emphatically that any special agreements between nations or groups of nations, large or small, cause the total volume of world trade to drop, however much they may increase business between the particular countries concerned.

It continues:

> In one part of the discussion, Secretary Hull as much as admitted that this nationalistic trend is a movement in the wrong direction when he said that the people of the United States are turning towards greater foreign trade as a way out of the depression, adding that "they have tried everything else and it has failed."

There is no question, sir, that in the last number of years, and I think this is perhaps one of the reasons why we in this country have not been able to make a reciprocal trade arrangement with the United States, the government of that country under President Hoover and President Coolidge were in favour of very high tariffs for their own country and so stated. They felt that their resources were so great in the United States that they did not have to bother with any other country, and that they could live within themselves. I shall never forget listening to President Hoover's addresses over the radio during the 1928 election when he promised the farmers higher protection, and the fishermen higher protection, and the lumbermen and the manufacturers and everyone else. But Mr. Hoover woke up to find that his policy was wrong, and I believe in my soul that the United States to-day realizes that the policy of high protection will not get them anywhere and that they are willing, as Mr. Cordell Hull says in this interview, to make a fair trade arrangement with any other country in the world. He says further:

> The world has been twelve years getting into its present difficulties, and it must be several more years getting out. At present we cannot find any considerable number of statesmen in the world who admit and are ready to meet the actualities.
> They don't realize that any special agreements for preference rights between any particular countries, no matter how much they increase trade between those nations, decrease the total of world trade. But our own people are growing to recognize this. They have tried everything else and it has failed.

That is my own humble opinion, Mr. Speaker. We should not have these restrictions upon trade and tariffs especially against a great country like the United States where if we had a reciprocal arrangement we would have most to gain by dealing with them. I also feel that their market is so great that they can take everything that we want to sell to them on a fair basis, and consequently I say that this government and this parliament should do everything possible to make a satisfactory trade arrangement with that great country.

The other day when another subject was under discussion in this house, it was mentioned that due to certain conditions in this country there were certain agricultural products higher in price in Canada than in the United States to-day. Of course, that may happen in any country, but why has it happened in Canada? In my opinion the reason there are a few articles higher in price in Canada to-day than in the United States is just because of the high tariffs between the two countries. In other words, because of the high tariffs and restrictions on trade the people of this country have not raised as much of these goods as they otherwise would have done, and consequently the price has gone up, but just as soon as the people of this country produce more butter or raise more hogs the price must come down because we have a very limited market.

Let me go a step further. I was very much interested in reading the addresses made by the managers and presidents of Canadian banks at their annual meetings at the end of the fiscal year. Let us see what they say.

Mr. Jackson Dodds, the general manager of the Bank of Montreal, made this statement in his annual address:

> Natural correctives are working toward world recovery but many artificial barriers still impede progress. Economic and financial disruption have been brought about to no small extent by the operations of central banks under political influence, by excessive tariffs and quotas, by exaggerated nationalism bordering on ancient tribalism, the stoppage of free immigration of peoples, distrust and selfishness, by impatience, a loss of individualism on the part of citizens and their surrender of independence in many former democratic countries.

What does Mr. McLeod, the president of the Bank of Nova Scotia, say?

> But to quite a considerable extent it is also due to the restrictions on trade which have been imposed artificially, by means of high tariffs and exchange regulations.

He does not blame Canada alone. He says:

> The nations have been vying with one another in a disastrous competition to safeguard their own markets; and measures which, had they been undertaken only by one or two countries individually, might have been defensible, when imposed by dozens of countries simultaneously with the same nationalistic objects in view, have inevitably been productive of suicidal consequences for all.
> No phenomenon connected with the present depression is of more sinister significance than this. No measure is more pressingly needed at the present time than a sweeping reciprocal reduction in the tariffs of all the principal trading countries, which will release the now thwarted productive energies of their citizens, and permit of an expansion of their commerce. In this matter the world is awaiting for bold leadership.

Those are the words of the president of the Bank of Nova Scotia, a man born in Prince Edward Island and one who enjoys the respect of practically all the business people of this country.

Let me quote what Mr. Moore, the retiring president of the Bank of Nova Scotia, says:

> In respect of such international cooperation for the revival of the sorely stricken trade of the world, subsequent events have merely served to reemphasize the failure of the world conference. At the time when this conference assembled last June a "tariff truce" was in force. Since then a number of countries have resumed their freedom of action—freedom to narrow still further the trading oportunities of their neighbours.
> In the meantime such bargaining as there has been between individual countries seems to have resulted in an even more rigid imposition of the quota system than before. Not by such means will world-wide recovery be brought about.

When we see men of such standing and prominence in business in this country making statements of that kind, it seems to me that legislatures and parliament should sit up and take notice.

I have already referred to the statement made in this house the other evening that perhaps it was not good business at the present time to make a reciprocal trade arrangement with our great neighbour to the south because hogs and a few other commodities are higher in price in Canada than they are in the United States. In addition to that, an hon. member last year referred to the fact that certain interests in this country would not be favourable to a reciprocal arrangement with the United States; he said he did not think it would be a good thing for the fishermen of this country if we had free or freer trade with the United States. He also said that it was quite possible if the tariffs on fish were taken off both in Canada and in the United States, the people of the United States would send their fish to this country. There is no need to worry about that for one moment. I admit that there are certain selfish interests in the fish business who do not want to see the duty taken off this commodity coming in from Boston or Portland, but these people are the very ones whom my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. McKenzie) is anxious to have investigated and in connection with whom the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) and the government have set up a committee. I have been an importer and exporter of fish all my life, and I say that the fishermen of this country are strongly in favour of a reciprocal trade agreement with the United States. We have nothing to fear.

I remember when the late Mr. Fielding brought down his reciprocal trade arrangement in 1911. At that time I was telephoned from Halifax and asked if I would come and discuss this matter with the fish people there. I was green in the business at that time, or they must have thought that I was green. However, I went there and we met solemnly in the board of trade rooms. I thought I was attending a funeral. After a time they asked me what I thought about Mr. Fielding's treaty with the United States. I said that I would rather hear what the other gentlemen had to say as I felt they had had more experience. They said it would be a terrible thing if it went through, that they would have to get out of the fish business as the Yankees would come in with more money. I told them that as far as I was concerned I was ready to go out of the fish business and do something else if the Yankees could pay more for fish. I say to-day that if there are people in the fish business who cannot hold their own against those from Gloucester, Boston or Portland, then they had better go and do something else. I am for the producer and consumer every day in the week.

But such an argument is a foolish one, and let me tell the house why. There is no comparison between the prices paid for fish in this country and those paid in Boston, New York or Portland. I am not in the fresh fish business myself but I should like to quote some Boston and Halifax prices on this commodity. I think these figures will show that no one is going to be hurt by taking the duty of a cent per pound off fish coming in from Portland. Some of the prices quoted in Boston on January 23 are as follows:

	Cents per pound
Large cod	12 to 14½
Markets	7½ to 8½
Haddock	12 to 14

I need not go any further. The prices quoted on February 16 were 7½ to 8½ cents per pound for large cod and 8 to 9 cents per pound for haddock. The fishermen on the Atlantic coast had one of their hardest winters this year. Some men have been lost and vessels have been coming in with ice almost up to their foremast heads. All they can get for their fish in Halifax and elsewhere is 2½ cents per pound for haddock. The fish buyers in the maritime provinces who can buy fish at 2½ cents per pound to compete with the Boston men who have to pay 8 and 9 cents a pound should have no fears as to Boston interfering with their markets in Montreal and Toronto.

It may be that when this investigation takes place we shall find out where this great spread occurs. As far as the fish business is concerned it is time something was done. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) knows without my telling him that during the last two years conditions in Nova Scotia have not been at all desirable. Last year salt mackerel was selling at $2 per barrel. Some of this fish was shipped to Puerto Rico and sold for $6. There was a spread of $4 per barrel but the shippers lost 53 cents per barrel. Why? Because on every barrel of fish going into Puerto Rico, into Cuba or into New York, there is a duty of $2 per barrel. The fishermen in Richmond, Lunenburg and Halifax counties receive only $2 per barrel for this fish. If this duty were removed it would be possible for the shippers to pay the fishermen $1 per barrel more and yet be able to make a profit of 50 to 75 cents per barrel. Surely there is no one in this house or anywhere else who is going to say that something should not be done for these fishermen.

I think my remarks apply equally well to the fishermen in Prince Edward Island and on the Pacific coast. I am told that last year during a short season from February to August some 46,000,000 pounds of haddock were landed at Prince Rupert. Practically all that fish went to United States markets, to places like Chicago, St. Paul, New York and other great centres. In spite of this large catch, the fishermen fishing out of Prince Rupert lost almost a million dollars. This loss was occasioned by the duty on fresh fish going into the United States. Some may say that the fishermen did not lose this, that it was lost by the people in Chicago or New York who had bought this fish, but such is not the case. This fish must enter into competition with fresh fish caught in the United States which has the advantage of the duty. It is the fishermen who lose every time. I am not going to quote figures, as I gave some last year, but if hon. members desire to look up the statistics they will find what duties are applied against the products of the fishermen of the maritime provinces, the Pacific coast, the great lakes and even those in Manitoba. Most of this fish is shipped to the great markets of the United States and it all must pay duty. If an arrangement could be made whereby certain goods from the United States were permitted to enter this country free of duty while the fish from lake Winnipeg, the great lakes and the Atlantic and the Pacific could enter that country free of duty, the fishermen of Canada would be in a much better position than they are to-day. In my opinion, this government should do everything possible to see that this is done.

I was interested the other day when listening to the speech of the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull). He and other hon. members have been discussing the seriousness of the wheat situation. Last year the hon. member for Regina was not very favourably inclined to my resolution with regard to reciprocity, but I notice he suggested that in order to sell more wheat the 130,000,000 people in the United States might be induced to eat one more slice of bread. His contention was that if that were done they would have to buy Canadian wheat. I am glad to know that my hon. friend has been converted and is beginning to believe in reciprocal trade resolutions. If those people would each eat one more smelt or one more tail of the cod, we would soon be clear of all our cod and other fish. There is no question but that that great market of 130,000,000 people could take our fish, our wheat and other commodities while we could take certain things from them under a reciprocal arrangement. I say it is the duty of this country to see that this is done.

While I do not deprecate what was done, I notice that when the British Empire trade agreements were entered into it was thought, and perhaps it is true, that the people in Nova Scotia, Ontario and British Columbia who raise potatoes and fruit would benefit thereby. At that time they thought it was all right and they did not want any reciprocal trade arrangement with the United States. But I notice that to-day in Nova Scotia there is a feeling that the government should try to make an arrangement with Cuba whereby potatoes and so on would be permitted to enter that country free of duty instead of having to pay $2 per barrel. If we are going to place a high duty against sugar entering this country from Cuba, if the British Empire trade agreements prevent the people of Cuba from selling their sugar or other commodities in Great Britain without paying a high duty, how can we in Canada expect the people in Cuba to buy our goods?

With regard to the question of high tariffs and the restriction of trade, while I do not ask for free trade, I want to say here and now that I am a free trader. I do not suppose that I shall live long enough to see the day, but I hope nevertheless that the day will come when there will be free trade between this country and the United States. I cannot understand why for example, with this country lying side by side with the United States, the potato grower in New Brunswick should be receiving 75 cents a bushel for his potatoes, while only half a mile away the farmer in the state of Maine gets $1.50. Is that fair? Is it right? Is there any good reason for it? Again, is there any reason why the maple sugar producer in the province of Quebec should receive 6 cents per pound less for his commodity than is enjoyed by the man in the state of Vermont, the two farms lying practically side by side with a picket fence between them? The people of these two great countries should enter into an arrangement in this matter. Indeed, there should not be two countries on this continent. It is owing to the foolishness of politicians in Great Britain in the reign of George III that we have two countries on the North American continent—politicians who wanted to tax the people of the colonies without representation, with the result that those colonies seceded from the motherland. I agree that there should be only one flag on this continent, the union jack, for both the United States and Canada, and it is only because of the stupidity of English politicians in a bygone day that we have two separate countries. Be that as it may, as Mr. Blaine and Mr. Mackenzie said at St. John, there is no reason why the two flags should not be side by side, nor is there any good reason why these two great countries should have high tariffs, one against the other.

I do not think I need say any more. My views are well known in regard to this important subject. I said I would not ask for entire free trade, because in the last sixty years this country has had a protective tariff, in some cases high and in others not so high, and I realize that it would be impossible to tear down the tariff walls immediately. But I do say that there is no good reason why the tariff should not be lowered in view of what Mr. Cordell Hull said, throwing out the suggestion to this country for a lower tariff and a reciprocal trade arrangement.

Current propaganda as purveyed through the news channels and otherwise seems to suggest that there is a crying need of greater freedom of trade, while a great bugaboo known as economic nationalism stands in the way of its fruition. Personally I do not know exactly what this nationalism is. If there is a desire on the part of the world's people that their comfort and happiness should be the chief concern of their various governments, and at the same time it is generally admitted that freedom of trade would enure to the common good of all, then there is a contradictory confusion which sooner or later must give way to the truth. No country can ever get away from its domestic problems and proper concern for the welfare of its inhabitants. And no people would consent to the fallacy that they should be compelled by tariffs to do business with none but themselves. The interdependence of the world is too transparent, as is the truth of Carlyle's saying, in effect, that there can be no catastrophe among the natives of Borneo without its repercussion among the marts of Europe. As civilization and knowledge advance and we come to know each other better throughout the globe, the advantages of trade are followed by the intermingling of general friendliness and a more common desire for each other's welfare in every respect.

That this philosophy should be accepted as applied to faraway and scarcely known peoples and the truth of it debated as applied to a great nation alongside whom we have grown smacks of prejudice gone mad. Well may Lord Snowden, in his reference to the tariff laws of this country directed against the United States, have used the term "suicide." Such a policy directed against our neighbours is an unnatural revolt against what is best in ourselves. Greater understanding and eventual cooperation for good must eventually come throughout the world. What of a people in this age, who insisted on a policy leading away from this conception by erecting bars against its fruition in seeking to demoralize traffic with their neighbours, a traffic which, by the way, had come to be the greatest in its exchange!

In the motion I have had the honour to propose, my mind has naturally not been impervious to considerations such as these. For the most part, however, I have been actuated by the persuasions of mere common sense as they appeal to the consciousness of a blunt business man. Throughout the course of my commercial contacts extending over a good many years, I have seen the advantages of good commercial understanding with the United States, and I believe that still greater good will come the less artificial interference there is with its progress.

That any essay toward the right, no matter if it springs from a humble member of this assembly, may be able to accomplish something towards this end, is evident I think in what has already passed into the records since the matter was introduced. When I approached this subject, as I have it in mind, there was no promising pathway prepared for such an endeavour. In the press of the country reciprocity was scarcely mentioned or in the main dismissed as an issue long since dead and buried. Nobody seemed to be inclined to have anything serious to do with it. The sunlight, however, cannot be interred, and the truth cannot forever be disregarded.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I am led to conclude, after listening to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Duff), who for nine years sat on this side of the house and found tariffs at the end of those nine years raised by the United States much higher than they were when he first came here, that after all there is a great difference between the hon. gentleman's advocacy to-night and what it was some time ago. He might be good enough to explain how, after his distinguished leader had laboured so sedulously to bring about an agreement with the United States, at the end of nine years the tariff that was then high had been raised twice as high as it was when he came into power, and that notwithstanding the fact that the League of Nations reported, as was admitted in this house, that this is one country on the globe that twice reduced its tariffs.

Mr. DUFF: Because there was a high tariff government in the United States during those nine years.

Mr. BENNETT: And there has been no change in the tariff since. On the first day of May last it was my privilege in this house to read a communication that had been agreed to between the President of the United States and myself. The last paragraph of that communication reads:

> We have also discussed the problems peculiar to the United States and Canada. We have agreed to begin a search for means to increase the exchange of commodities between our two countries, and thereby promote not only economic betterment on the North American continent, but also the general improvement of world conditions.

In July the world economic conference met, and on the last day, namely, the fourteenth of July, the Hon. Mr. Cordell Hull, Secretary of State of the United States, who was the ranking head of the delegation from that country at the conference, laid upon the table the following communication:

> Although the chief portion of its work is uncompleted, the conference is about to enter upon a recess. During and following this recess, it is hoped that the interested governments will bring forward, through diplomatic or other channels, substantial proposals aimed to carry out ultimately the fundamental purpose for which the conference was called. I herewith forward a document which I hope will, along with others of a similar character that may come from other sources, receive the attention of those who have the duty of planning the continuation of the work of the conference.
> This document contains the outline of a possible agreement for a protracted truce against measures restrictive of international trade. I contemplate that this truce agreement might be carried into effect when and as the conference truce—which, I understand, remains in effect among the adhering states during the recess—may end. This further truce may carry through the longer period required for the carrying out of the general aim of reducing existing barriers. The terms suggested are more precise than those of the conference truce. Other governments may quite possibly feel that their national necessities would require them to add various points even to the substantial list of reservations and exceptions proposed. A continuing truce should serve to restrict new barriers to such instances of evident and unusual necessity as may arise, even while general governmental policy was aimed in the other direction.

It will be seen that in this document the American government indicates the precise test of necessity which it expects to observe before introducing any new restrictions that may seem imperative for the success of the domestic program of recovery upon which it is engaged. American policy will in general seek to further international commerce to the fullest possible extent compatible with the essential aims of this program.

The document advocates, furthermore, the immediate undertaking of reductions of the existing barriers by the encouragement of bilateral and of practical multilateral agreements. It does not attempt to put into legal form of agreement the terms of possible action; the difficulties of this require further discussion among governments.

But it does attempt to limit with some degree of precision the exceptions and reservations which may be necessary.

It also sets forth the present American attitude towards other matters involved in commercial treaty negotiations, such as the most favoured nation principle and the possible special exceptions from that principle that might be allowed by governments to facilitate agreements for the lowering of trade barriers

I trust that these proposals will turn out to be a useful contribution to the long term plan of attack upon existing trade obstacles. Despite their limitations and imperfections, I am confident that their acceptance in substance would mark an important advance towards the restoration of international commerce.

The American government reserves the liberty in the course of any future discussion that may take place of modifying its attitude on details. Other governments will no doubt find that their approach to this question, as dictated by their own national situations, is somewhat different and may have modifications and additions to present. However, it is my hope that the governments will be able to adjust their national interests and necessities and devise means for achieving the general purpose upon which we have all agreed.

The sub-appendix which is to be found on page 52 of the printed document which I laid on the table the other day, contains the following:

American suggestion for the further development, during the recess and later stages of the conference, of a program on commercial policy.

Section 1. Are resolved, as a first step in carrying out this program, to endeavour to reach agreement, at the earliest moment favourable to such action, along the following lines.

Then follows a statement of what is to be agreed upon:

The participating governments agree not to introduce any new obstacles, direct or indirect, to the movements of international commerce, whether such obstacles are embodied in new legislation or brought into existence by the exercise of administrative or executive power under existing legislation. The truce against new barriers is to become effective as between the countries participating in it but will not, subject to treaty obligations, bind participating governments towards those governments which do not participate.

Then follow exceptions (a), (b), (c), (d), (e) and (f), to which the preceding agreement shall be subject. Section 2, however, provides:

Are further resolved forthwith to initiate bilateral or (plurilateral) negotiations for the removal of prohibitions and restrictions and for reduction of tariff rates; and they declare that their aim in these treaties is substantial reduction of basic trade barriers, and not merely the removal of temporary and abnormal restrictions and increments imposed for bargaining purposes.

In shaping its policy and in executing its obligations under any agreements, each government should direct its first and greatest efforts towards eliminating restrictions and reducing duties which most clearly lack economic justification, particularly:

(a) Duties or restrictions which now completely or almost completely exclude foreign competition, such as those which restrict importation of particular commodities to less than five per cent of the domestic consumption thereof;

(b) Duties or restrictions on articles the imports of which have been substantially curtailed since 1929 as compared with domestic consumption;

(c) Protective duties or restrictions which have been in effect a considerable period of time without bringing about a substantial domestic production of the protected commodities (say equal to 15 per cent of the total domestic consumption thereof).

Without following that in detail, as my time is limited, I desire to point out that in the language which was used in this house in the document which was communicated to the United States after my visit to Washington, we did not use idle phrases. In the nine months which have elapsed since that statement was made, informal conversations with Washington have been continued and several methods of improving trade relations between Canada and the United States have been carefully examined. I need hardly refer to what took place when the prohibition amendment of the United States was eliminated by popular action. One difficulty has been that President Roosevelt did not secure from congress at the special session which ended last June, new tariff bargaining machinery to facilitate the negotiation of trade agreements with foreign countries. At the time of my visit the early enactment of this legislation was expected. There are indications that legislation looking to the creation of that machinery will be sought at the present session of congress and, if it is enacted, I hope negotiations for a trade agreement with Canada will be undertaken forthwith. Alternative means of improving trade under the existing procedure have also been under consideration. This government is ready to accept any reasonable opportunity which may offer of trade on an equitable basis.

Further, it is a matter of common knowledge that the progress of President Roosevelt's domestic policies for the development of industry and agriculture have caused him to postpone the working out of his plan for the stimulation of international trade by trade agreements. Therefore, having regard to present conditions, having regard to what has taken place during the past nine months, having regard to the action now pending in the congress of the United States and having regard to what took place at the world economic conference and the attitude of the United States as dictated by the Secretary of State of that country, I move, seconded by the Minister Finance (Mr. Rhodes):

That all the words after the word "that" in the said resolution be struck out and the following substituted therefor:—

"on the 1st day of May, 1933, the Prime Minister informed this house that the governments of Canada and the United States of America had agreed to begin a search for means to increase the exchange of commodities between the two countries and thereby promote not only economic betterment on the North American continent but also the general improvement of world conditions, and while no trade agreement between the two countries has yet been arrived at, this house approves of the government continuing their efforts to that end."

That amendment embodies a record of the situation since my visit to Washington in 1933 and carries transactions down to the present moment, including the discussion, which I have not amplified to-night because of lack of time, of what took place at the world economic conference. I suggest to hon. members that it might be well to read the conditions which Mr. Secretary Hull indicated should be laid down in the making of any trade agreement. I can only add that any trade agreement that is arrived at between the United States and Canada must be based upon a fair and equitable understanding of conditions in one country by the other, and might I remind the hon. gentleman who has moved this resolution (Mr. Duff) that this is the parliament of Canada and not the congress of the United States of America.

Mr. DUFF: I do not think that is fair.

Mr. BENNETT: Judging from what he has said and the way in which he has said it, one would think he was merely indicating to this chamber that this parliament for some reasons unknown had prevented the United States from buying its requirements from Canada. In view of what took place under my predecessor and his efforts to negotiate a lower tariff trade agreement with the United States and of what has taken place since this government came into power, I can only once more remind this chamber that this is the parliament of Canada and not the congress of the United States; that the congress of the United States has to do with its tariffs and its duties, and the parliament of Canada, although the hon. gentleman has spoken as he has with respect to the causes that brought about the creation of two countries, has not yet the authority or power to legislate on tariff matters for the United States of America.

It is now eleven o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the Prime Minister what the document is he quoted from a moment ago?

Mr. BENNETT: The document which I laid on the table the other day, the report approved by the conference on July 27, 1933, reading at page 51, Mr. Cordell Hull's letter, and pages 52 and 53, the subappendix indicating what in his judgment should be the principles governing in matters of this kind.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, February 20, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 15, to incorporate the Small Loan Company of Canada.—Mr. Geary.

HAVRE ST. PIERRE ICE CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau). I received to-day a telegram from Mr. Héliodore Boudreault, mayor of Havre St. Pierre, on the north shore of the St. Lawrence informing me that the vessel which carries on the service in that locality has not been able to land these last days and, that the population is short of food. Could the hon. minister dispatch an icebreaker to that locality in order to relieve the situation of these people? I am aware that this was done within the last years, under similar circumstances.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time that I have heard of the facts as stated by my hon. friend. We have, in the past, always endeavoured to give the best service possible to the people settled along the north shore, when they were in distress and, I shall look into this matter, no later than this afternoon.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LUCIEN DUBOIS (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau). On February 5, last, I asked for returns of documents correspondence and telegrams in connection with the breaking up of the ice bridge between St. Angile de Laval and Three Rivers. Documents were furnished to me; but, at page 19 of the report, it appears that the hon. Minister of Marine, received requests from the authorities of the city of Three Rivers, through their member, requesting the help of ice breakers to facilitate the service between St. Angile and Three Rivers. This document, however, is not included in the returns. Would the hon. minister lay on the table said document?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I laid on the table of the house all the documents supplied by the department. I can make inquiries, and if there exists further correspondence, I shall be pleased to either lay it on the table or communicate it to my hon. friend.

PETITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CHARLES FERLAND (Joliette) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the table of the house petitions addressed to hon. members of the government and the house, on behalf of many ratepayers from the county of Joliette, protesting against the proposal emanating from certain interested people, requesting that an excise tax be levied on leaf tobacco. These petitions come from the following parishes, and are signed by 290 people in St. Thomas; 457 in St. Paul; 255 in St. Ambroise de Kildare; 55 in Ste Marcelline; 30 in Ste Mélanie; 57 in Crabtree mills; 106 in Notre Dame de Lourdes. From St. Cléophas, I have received resolutions only. I also wish to state that beside these petitions, I am forwarding to the government a large number of resolutions from the county of Joliette and other counties in Quebec, which were adopted by municipal councils, protesting against such a tax.

PRECIOUS METALS MARKING ACT

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the third reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Precious Metals Marking Act, 1928.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS ACT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the third reading of Bill No. 3, to amend the Importation of Intoxicating Liquors Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS ACT

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 6 to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish so much to participate in the proceedings as to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) if it was his intention to go on today with bills. I understood last evening that it was his intention to go into supply. I imagine that some hon. members who may wish to discuss certain bills may not even be prepared to do so.

Mr. BENNETT: These were regarded as purely formal matters, third readings.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is a second reading.

Mr. BENNETT: That is true, but it is only a formal amendment to the act as the minister explained when the bill was introduced. If there are any members who desire to participate in a discussion of this matter we will proceed with order number 3 and allow the bills to stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no objection to going on. I was just speaking on behalf of others.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not intend to leave the impression that the formal business would be left on the order paper but if there is any feeling that we should proceed with supply, we can do so and allow matters to stand as they are.

Motion stands.

SUPPLY—B.C. SALMON FISHERY

STATEMENT OF MR. REID ON MOTION FOR SUPPLY RESPECTING PURSE SEINE FISHING

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair there is a matter I should like to lay before the house. This matter affects over two thousand men engaged in the fishing industry on the Fraser river. For the information of the house I might say that on February 10, 1933, an order in council was passed by the present government at a time when the house was in session. This order in council permitted seine boats to operate in the mouth of the Fraser river. I protested against this order in council as did the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), but in spite of our protests it was put into effect in the fall of 1933. I rise to-day to air the grievances of over two thousand fishermen on the Fraser river who are affected by this order in council. The order in council changed the boundaries which had hitherto precluded seine boats from operating in the mouth of the Fraser river and permitted them to go in and fish in that area. I also wrote to the minister last fall in connection with this matter and perhaps if I read my letter it would explain the whole situation very fully. This letter was dated September 23, 1933, and reads:

The Hon. Alfred Duranleau,
Acting Minister of Fisheries,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Mr. Duranleau:

I am writing you in connection with the matter of allowing seine boats to operate at the mouth of the Fraser river, which action, done by order in council, you will remember, was opposed by me at the time on the floor of the house.

The chief argument advanced by you and also by the deputy minister of fisheries was that it was desirable to use seines in order that only the best salmon be procured for canning purposes, so as to enable the canners to put up the best grade possible in order to enable them to compete with other countries on world markets, particularly the market in Great Britain.

As you will know, I was particularly interested in the effect of this drastic regulation, and what the effect would be on the individual gill net fishermen. I have made further investigations into this, and believe it might be of interest for you to know what has actually happened by allowing seine boats to operate right outside the mouth of the Fraser river.

I understand over 60 seine boats have been operating in the new area, and to the positive detriment of individual gill net fishermen. In fact, if seine boats are going to be allowed to operate permanently, then thousands of men are going to be thrown out of employment and the government might as well face this serious responsibility right now.

In other years, and before the seiners were permitted there, the daily catch of individual fishermen ran all the way from 100 to 800 pinks, or humpbacks per day's operations. This year the seiners have scooped them up by the thousands with this result, the catch of the gill netters has dropped from 800 to next to nothing. Some seine boats scooped up eight or nine thousand pinks in one day's operations, whilst fishermen from the mouth of the river up, were only catching from 20 to 60, and in some instances only 10, and when you consider the low price offered, namely 3 cents for male, and 1 to 2 cents for each female humpback, you will realize just how serious the outlook is for the fishermen depending on this for a livelihood on the river.

I informed the house during the time of the debate that gill netters could operate in the area where seiners are now allowed to fish. In support of this, I will quote you one day's operations in the gulf of Georgia.

On the 19th of September, 80 gill netters landed 1,985 pink salmon, an average of 24 fish each, whilst 7 seine boats operating there landed between 7,000 and 8,000 pinks, an average of over 1,000 each seine boat. Both gill netters and seiners were paid the same price, the fish caught being of equal quality, so that you will have to advance some other argument other than that of better fish coming from the seine boats.

It may be that seine boats operating far out in the gulf, and in clear sea water, catch pinks that have a somewhat better colour, but I would again draw your attention to the fact, that the area where seine boats have been operating at the entrance to the Fraser river, the waters there being brackish and muddy with silt. You must go a considerable distance out before the line of demarcation commences, and the point where the clear sea waters meet the fresh muddy waters of the Fraser river is plain to be seen by the naked eye, but let me again repeat, the new area allotted to seining is all brackish waters.

To sum up, hundreds of fishermen are being deprived of their legitimate livelihood and many will be forced on relief. I maintain this is a terrible state of affairs, and very bewildering indeed. Here is the government endeavouring on the one hand to give employment to the unemployed and the destitute, whilst on the other hand we have a department of the government helping to create by its own actions, more unemployment.

I again appeal to you to rescind the order in council for if it is not done, and further seining is allowed to continue, all individual gill net fishermen will be thrown out of employment, and in closing, I ask you to note carefully that according to the new regulations laid down, whilst the seiners are allowed to catch this year pinks of humpbacks, next year it will be the sockeye salmon.

I remain,

Yours respectfully,

I received an answer dated September 29, which reads as follows:

I am much obliged for your letter of the 23rd instant, with regard to purse-seining operations in the lower portion of the gulf of Georgia, which were permitted this year for pink salmon.

The operations in this area have been carefully followed. The outcome was not far different from what was anticipated.

You urge that the quality of fish taken by the seiners was no better than that of the fish caught by the gill-netters, so that the regulation is not resulting in a better quality product, but, if persisted in, will have the effect of throwing thousands of men out of employment.

My information is that there were times when sets were by some of the seiners in the shallow water over the mud flats when the tide was high and that the fish caught in these nets were no better than those taken by the gill-netters, but that these catches totalled a very small portion of the fish caught. The one fact that for most of the fish taken by the seiners prices as high as seven, eight and nine cents were paid, while the catches of the gill-netters brought only four cents at the same time, and some as low as three, speaks for itself. While final figures are not before me, the information available indicates that between 75,000 and 100,000 cases of good pinks will have been put up this year in the Fraser river district, as a result of this regulation. Two years ago, when the last big run was on, and when there was no seining allowed, nor was the inspection of canned salmon in operation, only 21,534 cases of these fish were put up in the Fraser area. While the fish were passing through United States waters 705,580 cases were put up. This year the pack on the United States side was approximately 465,000 cases.

You are surely overlooking some facts regarding employment when you say that if this regulation operates permanently thousands of men are going to be thrown out of employment. As a matter of fact, up to the end of October of last year there were 760 white gill-net fishermen on the Fraser. These had twenty-four assistants, making 784 in all. I have not yet the figures for this year, but they would not likely be very different. Also, the pink fishery is by no means the main factor in the Fraser river gill-net fishermen's operations. On the other hand, the employment given the seiners must not be entirely overlooked. On the sixty boats that operated in the district this year there would likely be an average of eight men each and these would all be whites.

As you will know, the time the pinks remain in the area south of the Fraser, after they have reached it, before they make for the Fraser depends on weather conditions. This year my information is that the runs did not start until the 13th instant and shortly afterwards the pinks began to ascend the Fraser in large numbers, then reasonable catches could be made by the gill-netters. The regulation in no way prevented earlier fishing by the gill-netters, the fact being the fish were not in their area at that time. The inevitable happened when the fish struck the fresh water. Their quality rapidly deteriorated so that they no longer would make a good quality pack and it obviously is in the best permanent interests of the salmon fishery of British Columbia as a whole, and consequently of the fishermen engaging in it, that the quality of our pack should be assured.

While the seining operations were very carefully patrolled this year, it may be that in the light of experience some additional marking of the seining area will be desirable. The whole matter will be gone into carefully.

I wish to point out some inaccuracies that occur in this letter in reply to mine. No doubt the minister received the information from his deputy or from the department; nevertheless I maintain that there are in that letter some inaccuracies of which he may not be aware. He mentions, I will not exactly say cunningly, but he mentions that there were 760 white gill netters. That is not the exact number and I wonder why he did not mention the whole of the gill net licences issued and in operation on the Fraser river, because my information is that some 1,707 gill net fishing licences had been issued for operation on the river, and that there was also a total of 348 boat pullers, making altogether 2,055 who were affected by this regulation. The minister says that the regulation in no way prevented fishing by gill netters, and he states the fact that the fish were not in this area at that time. Well, how could the gill netters or anyone else catch fish there if the fish were not there? That is not a sound argument, because there were times when the fish were in that neighbourhood. He speaks of the fish striking fresh water. Well, I pointed out last year, and I point out again to-day, that the whole area allotted to seiners last year consists of brackish waters, and any of those who understand anything about these waters, those who are in the habit of passing between Victoria and Vancouver, must have seen in daylight at least the line of demarcation between the fresh waters and the brackish waters from the Fraser river. That line is many miles out from the mouth of the Fraser river, so that when he says that the fish struck fresh water and were picked up by the seines, I maintain that such is not the case, because the seines operated entirely in brackish water. The fresh waters of the Fraser river go for miles into the gulf before being completely absorbed by the salt water.

I wish to show that the fishermen have been deprived this year of their livelihood. I pointed out in my letter to the minister that 80 gill netters had picked up in one day's operation some 1,985 fish, or an average of about 26 fish for each individual boat, and I also pointed out that seven seines had taken between 7,000 and 8,000 fish on the same day, averaging 1,000 fish to the boat. That is only one day's operation, but there were days when the seine boats scooped up 8,000 and 9,000 fish; and I have it on the best authority that there was one day when the seine boats scooped up so many fish that the canneries could not use the fish and many were dumped overboard. That information I believe was given at a meeting of representatives held in New Westminster, and Mr. Found, the acting deputy, was present when that statement was made. However, the interesting and I think serious point is that in 1932 before the seine boats were allowed to operate the daily catch of the fishermen ran all the way from 100 to 500 fish per day. It is true that these fish caught in that period were low priced fish, but the fishermen have to take all that they can get as every little helps. But when the seines came in last fall and were allowed to operate in the mouth of the Fraser river the catch dropped to as low a figure as I have mentioned, about 10 fish per day. Not only so, but there were some varieties of fish that did not go up the reaches of the Fraser river—different varieties from the pink. There is a variety known as the white spring salmon which fetches a price of from 1 to 2 cents per pound, and in 1933 after the seines started to operate not one white spring salmon went up the Fraser river. The seines scooped up not only the pink salmon but every other variety, and this helped in large measure to deplete the earnings that would otherwise have been gained by the individual gill net fishermen.

Let me now discuss prices for a moment; I will come to the question of quality afterwards. I am taking the different points in sequence so that a proper picture may be presented to the government. The minister is not correct when he states in his letter that the seine boats got a higher price for their fish than did the gill netters. If he had said that the seine boats got a higher price for their fish than the gill netters who were operating right up the Fraser river, I think he would have been accurate. But it is not true to say that the price was the same to all gill netters, because those gill netters who went out on the gulf to fish received exactly the same price as the seiners received. The price started at about 9 cents and dropped, as the season went on, to 4 cents, but all gill net fishboats that went out in that area to fish received exactly the same price from the canners as was given to the seiners. It is therefore not correct to state that the seine boats received a better price for their fish, the inference being, I suppose, that they received that better price because the fish they caught were of better quality. On September 21 the price of salmon had dropped to 4 cents, and that was given to both the gill netters and the seine boats. The price dropped to two cents for the fish caught up the river.

But there is another variety of fish called cohoe salmon for which a price of four cents a pound was being paid, and that was paid to all boats irrespective of whether they were gill netters or seine boats and irrespective of whether the fish were caught in the mouth of the Fraser river or up in the Fraser river itself.

At one period of the fishing season last year there was a glut of fish and when the canneries were offering our fishermen one and a half to two cents, not per pound but apiece, but for whole salmon weighing ten to fourteen pounds, the fishing interests just across the line in the United States were paying fifteen cents apiece for pinks, and some of our fishermen took their catches across the line and received from the canning interests in the state of Washington, in some instances, four times the price they were being offered in British Columbia and in particular prices in the Fraser river area.

Coming, now, to quality, I maintain that there is no difference in the fish caught in the mouth of the river whether by gill netters or by seiners. The mouth of the Fraser river is brackish water. If the fish were caught away out in the open, such as around the gulf islands, there might be some difference. In the gulf islands and the surrounding area the salmon would be caught in pure salt water, but in the area allotted to the seiners last year, the waters were very entirely brackish and the price paid as I have stated for fish caught by gill netters in that area was the same as that paid to the seine fishermen.

I should like now to quote prices paid in the United States and those paid in British Columbia, and I took note that when the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) was quoting various commodities produced in this country by Canadians, for which we received more for, he omitted to mention the product of one of our greatest industries, that is fish, because the price given to the fishermen in the state of Washington just across the border from us was far greater than that given to the fishermen on the Fraser river. For instance, the price of spring salmon was six cents a pound; this year the price of sockeye salmon was fifty cents apiece, the first year I suppose that sockeye salmon have been just a little lower in the United States. In other years United States fishermen received from five to fifteen cents a fish more than Canadian fishermen, but in that regard and while I am on that, let me point out that this year the canneries had no compunction about going across the line and buying that fish because it was a few cents cheaper, although our poor fishermen are debarred in years when prices are higher in the United States or, in fact, in any year, from shipping their sockeye salmon to the canneries just across the line. But for the pink salmon for which our fishermen this year received prices ranging from one to as high as nine cents, United States interests were paying fifteen cents each. That is quite a difference in price and when the question is one of competing in the world market, it will be interesting to know how the United States can supersede and compete with us in many markets and continue to be quite an important factor in competition with our Canadian fishermen in the British market.

Last fall, during the fishing season, many fishermen who live in the vicinity of Ladner and on the south side of the Fraser river were compelled to appeal to the various reeves of the different municipal councils for relief. They were depending upon obtaining quite a proportion of the pink salmon that came up, but when the run was cut down from 500 to ten per day, with a price of one and a half to two cents each, the house can see just how disastrous such a price with such a low number caught, would be to them. Further, they were depending also upon the white spring salmon and last fall not one white spring salmon came up the Fraser river. Not only have the seine boats taken the major part of the pink salmon, but as I have stated, the white spring salmon and other fish were also picked up by them.

It is just as well that the Acting Minister of Fisheries and the house should take note of the operation of seines, because in connection with their operation the same thing may arise that has arisen in the old land. I have under my hand an article from an old country paper speaking of the destruction of spawning beds in the Moray firth. It is true that seine boats in deep water cannot let their nets down to the bottom, but in the area of the Fraser river this year, especially at the mouth, the seine boats did drop their nets down to the bed of the river and in that way irreparable damage may have been done to the feeding beds. As is pointed out in this article from the old land, it has been severely brought home to them that by seine boats being allowed to operate in those shallow waters, feeding grounds and, in some instances, spawning beds have been completely destroyed. I ask the Acting Minister of Fisheries to take serious note of that phase of the situation. Not only may the seine deplete the spawning beds but, as I have stated, they have put great numbers of our fishermen out of business, and if seining is permitted to be carried on in the mouth of the Fraser, I am safe in saying that the fish will be depleted, because the mouth of the Fraser river, with seines operating in it, becomes practically a trap.

This year, the situation presents another serious aspect. An order in council was passed last year by the government allowing seining for pink salmon, but this year if the seiners are permitted to fish there, they are going to pick up the late sockeye run. That is very serious, and if this is allowed, it is the thin end of the wedge to drive the fishermen completely off the Fraser river, because if the seiners are allowed this year to pick the late run of sockeye salmon, it will not be long until we have no salmon left. I know the minister might say: Oh, but the gill netters are also going to be permitted to operate. I would point this out, speaking of the habits of fish, that they come in schools to the mouth of the Fraser river before they attempt to go up the stream, so the seine boats have the first chance at those schools, because they go up in the morning and separate these schools and scatter them. The gill net fishermen cannot operate in the daytime nor can they operate among the seine boats, and when it comes to night time and the gill netters go out to fish they find that the fish have been scattered by the seine boats and it is very difficult for the gill netters to catch any fish.

I note that this year some changes are being made in the order in council. I believe a change in the boundary has been suggested, moving it a little farther out. Another change to be made this year relates to another order in council passed almost at the same time, regarding the landing of fish within twenty-four hours of being caught. In that regard it is very interesting to refer to the arguments both of the Acting Minister of Fisheries and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) who so strenuously supported the twenty-four hour regulation. In my opinion the fact is that that regulation was a move on behalf of the canners of British Columbia to try to corral for themselves areas where fishing was taking place. They thought that by having a regulation that fish had to be landed within twenty-four hours of being caught, unless gutted and iced, many of the small gill net fishermen would not be able to take fish from one area to another. But what happened? The gill net fishermen and others just conformed to the act, they took on supplies of ice, gutted the fish and packed them in ice, and in some instances such fish were carried for five days in perfect condition. As soon as the cannery interests saw that that move did not chase off the gill net fishermen or the independent fishermen, I understand that representations were made either to the Minister of Trade and Commerce or to the Acting Minister of Fisheries or his deputy, asking that the twenty-four hour regulation be rescinded, and I would like to hear the Acting Minister of Fisheries explain why this change has been made this year, when he so strongly advocated the necessity of the former regulation last year.

I would also make again the same appeal I made last year regarding the practice that has grown up of passing orders in council affecting fisheries, some of them very drastic indeed, at a time when the house is in session. We have a fisheries committee, but to the best of my knowledge and as a member of it we have only met on one or two occasions, they being in the year 1931. I would like the minister to tell the house why proposed regulations cannot be put before that committee to deliberate on. What is the use of having a committee on fisheries if everything connected with that department is going to be done by order in council? As I said, some of these orders in council were very drastic, especially the one I am now dealing with, which affects over 2,000 men, and will affect them further if it is allowed to be carried into operation this year. In my opinion it is a pity that we have not a Minister of Fisheries. I think the fishing industry is important enough to warrant a minister being appointed. It is more important at the present time, in my opinion, than having a Minister of Railways, especially since the railways have been put under the new board. I note that the acting minister has to rely a great deal on the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In that connection I am not going to make any severe comments, but I would like to tell the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the feeling in British Columbia is that the cannery men are being looked after to the detriment of the individual fishermen, with the result of reducing them, shall I say, to slavery. The opinion out there is that we have reached a situation where the fishing industry exists entirely for the cannery interests and not for those engaged in the industry.

Another complaint I have to make is that last year no meetings were held when the deputy minister came to British Columbia. It is true that he intimated to those engaged in the fishing industry that he was willing to hear one or two representatives. But the open meetings that we had before when the fishermen met in a body, and the late minister, now the Minister of Finance, met them, were all to the good of the industry. It would, however, have been a further improvement if the cannery men also had met at the same time. But when the meeting was held last fall the deputy minister was endeavouring to bolster up this idea of the seine, no doubt he came prepared for it, but his information was not very correct. He made such a glaringly incorrect statement that the fishermen took it up, and I attended the meeting at which the whole matter was discussed. I think the minister should know of that statement. I am drawing this to the attention of the house in an endeavour to show that the one idea of the deputy minister was to bolster up the order in council passed last year which allowed seines in the mouth of the Fraser river. He stated to the meeting that 100,000 cases of first class pinks valued at $500,000 were packed as a result of seining operations in the gulf. Yet on December 16, when a statement was asked of the superintendent out there, Mr. Motherwell, he gave it, saying that a total of 910,383 pinks were caught by the seines. For the information of the house I would point out that some sixteen pink salmon are required to make one case, so it would take 1,600,000 pink salmon to make 100,000 cases. The deputy minister at that time was only 700,000 pink salmon shy. I suppose that is a mere detail, but when he comes to these meetings he should be better informed. He was so eager, perhaps under instructions, to bolster up the interests who control the seining that his figures were a little elastic. They were in fact outrageously erroneous. Then he quoted a value of $500,000. Now the opening price for pinks started at $3.50 per case and went to $4. Multiplying that you will find it far short of the $500,000 spoken of by the deputy minister.

Then it is interesting to note the letters that were sent out by the department, cunningly worded—I say it advisedly—with the idea again of bolstering up the canning interests and being prepared in this house for any criticism we might offer against seine boats being allowed to operate in the mouth of the Fraser river. One canning interest down there had some cases of salmon rejected. The letter they received from this department asked whether the cases rejected had been caught by gill nets or by seine boats, a very leading question indeed. It was evident, at least to those of us who know the situation out there, that this meant, "Well, we hope that these fish that were turned down were caught by gill netters, so that we can circumvent the arguments that probably will be used by the hon. member for New Westminster against the order in council which we passed allowing seine boats to operate in the mouth of the river."

To get down to it, Mr. Speaker, I am asking that the order in council be rescinded. I am asking that seine boats be not allowed in the mouth of the Fraser river, that they be entirely removed. Seine boats I might say move from one area to another; they are just like birds of prey, if one could use that expression in connection with fish, because immediately they fish out one area they move to another, and when that is scooped out they are off to still another. If this is allowed to go on they will not only destroy all the fish in the Fraser river but also will throw over 2,000 men out of employment.

Now let us consider the question of quality. If it is a question of quality why not allow the men on the Fraser river to put up a pack and call it the Fraser river pack? Above the Fraser river bridge we have some 228 fishermen operating, many of whom put up small smokehouses this year, gutted and smoked these pink salmon and peddled them around the country, thereby picking up quite a few dollars. If the seiners are allowed to operate these 228 fishermen will have no pink salmon in future and, as I said before, if they are allowed to go on there will be no sockeye salmon either, because the late run of the sockeye salmon is going to be picked up this year by the 50 or 60 seine boats operating in British Columbia waters.

If it is a question of catching the fish a little more cheaply I would ask the minister why not allow the gill net fishermen to have a longer net. That could be allowed out in the mouth of the Fraser river, if not in the river itself. In Puget sound the gill net fishermen are allowed nets up to 1,800 feet in length, but in this country they are limited to 900 feet. Why not allow the fishermen nets as long as they care to use? Let them go out in the gulf with the longer nets, if it is a case of trying to lower the cost of getting the fish.

There is another point. The fishermen should be allowed to sell their fish in the highest market. I think earnest attention should be paid to the fact that last fall some of our cannerymen went to the United States and brought in one hundred thousand sockeye salmon. When prices are a little lower apparently it is all right for the cannery men to go across the line and bring in the somewhat cheaper fish in order to hammer down the Canadian fishermen, but when prices are higher—and in fact every year—our fishermen are precluded by our laws and regulations from exporting fresh sockeye salmon. The whole concern seems to be for the cannerymen and not for the fishermen. We are paying out money for relief; we are endeavouring to encourage employment, but at the same time this government is passing regulations which put hundreds of men out of employment. If it is a case of the greatest good for the greatest number look at the figures I have quoted. Even allowing eight men to a boat the seine boats will employ at most 500 men, as against 2,058 individual fishermen who are endeavouring to earn their livelihood on the Fraser river. If Canada cannot compete with the United States interests—and I say this frankly—it is because the cannery interests in British Columbia have too much overhead; the industry is overloaded or over capitalized, if I may use that word. The result, as I have endeavoured to show, is the lowest possible price they can give the fishermen.

I am appealing to the government and to the minister to repeal this order in council. I appeal to him also, especially when the house is in session, to have the committee deal with any further regulations that may be proposed. All matters affecting agriculture are referred to the agriculture committee, but when it comes to our fisheries, one of our most important industries, these regulations are approved and passed by order in council. Yet we have the committee on fisheries which would be only too glad to be given an opportunity to discuss these matters. I appeal to the house on behalf of more than 2,000 men whose living has been interfered with by the action of this government, and I trust that my appeal will not be in vain. If some remedy is not applied I am sure the reults will be very disastrous indeed. Not only will they deplete our fisheries but all these men will be thrown out of employment and will have their means of livelihood taken away from them. Having made these representations I ask that the government give serious consideration to the matter.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Reid) did not give notice that he intended to bring this matter before the house; had he done so I might have been in a position to give the house more details and information.

My hon. friend has brought up this matter almost every session since we have been in power, and I was particularly interested last year when he raised this question. I then promised my hon. friend then that I would study the matter and would direct my deputy and my officials on the west coast to do the same, in order that no injury might be done the gill net fishermen of the Fraser river. I can tell my hon. friend that when my deputy started west last fall, I think it was in November, I gave special instructions that he should inquire into the matter from all angles and should ascertain from interested parties whether or not the fishermen of the Fraser river were really affected by the regulation which allows purse seining in the gulf of Georgia. My deputy went west gathered all the information possible, and met the fishermen of the Fraser river; my hon. friend has said that he was present at one or two meetings.

Mr. REID: One.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think the best answer I can give my hon. friend at the moment is the report which was made by my deputy upon his return. I have also a letter from the board of inspection for British Columbia canned salmon, which gives an entirely different view from that expressed to-day by my hon. friend as to the quality of the fish caught after they leave the sea and enter the Fraser river. These reports state very clearly that the fish caught in the river has lost its quality and become of second or third grade, and if the regulation had not been adopted there would have been a real loss to the country, because the purse seining in the gulf of Georgia has shown the best results for the industry in general. I think the report of my deputy minister should be placed before the house:

Purse-Seining for Pink and Late Run Sockeye Salmon in the Gulf of Georgia

Two species of salmon—pinks and late run sockeye—deteriorate in quality speedily as soon as they come into contact with fresh-water. Every second year there is a large run of pinks and every fourth year of late run sockeyes to the Fraser river. These fish come in mainly through the United States waters of Juan de Fuca strait and the gulf of Georgia. They are in prime condition when there and there is a large fishery for them on the United States side.

The Fraser river waters follow a well-defined course almost across the gulf of Georgia and the fish begin to go off quality as soon as they enter these waters and become speedily worse as they ascend the river. The Fraser river gill-net fishermen operate not only in the river, but out into the gulf in the Fraser river waters there.

There is a comparatively small area south of these waters and north of the boundary line in which there has been practically no gill-netting, and in which these salmon are still in prime condition.

Particularly since the canned salmon inspection regulations became effective two years ago there has been little demand for these fish for canning purposes after they enter the Fraser. Hence the position was that if they were not allowed to be taken in seines in the small area north of the boundary line and south of the Fraser river waters, they would not be caught on the Canadian side to any large extent and so we would be giving additional protection to a run of fish that was being utilized mainly by the United States. Hence, last year it was decided to allow purse-seining in this small area. This did not prevent gill-netting where it was previously conducted, and only interfered with it to the extent that the fish would be caught before entering that area. The regulation has worked pretty much as we expected as is evidenced by the attached copy of a report of November 2, 1933, by the Canned Salmon Inspection Board, on the subject.

Last fall, when the undersigned was in British Columbia, he met a large delegation representing the Fraser river fishermen. He read to them the attached report and stated the case as frankly and clearly as he could. He explained that there was really no departure from the department's policy of encouraging gill-nets where that method of fishing was practicable, but we were faced here with the fact that if fishing were restricted to gill-nets we would get little advantage from it. Hence the Fraser river gill-netters could not be hurt so much by the regulation owing to the small demand for this fish when taken in the river, and they might fish for them, if they wished, as they did in the past.

The undersigned did use the figures that were given to him at the time as to the total pack of seine caught fish from this area that was put up, which he stated was approximately 100,000 cases. It has since been developed that these figures included the whole pack put up in district No. 1, no matter where the fish were caught. The figures were, therefore, too large. This does not change the validity of the argument itself as to the propriety in the public interest of this regulation. The fact that last season there were 524,369 cases of pink salmon packed in British Columbia, that of these 13,930 were classed by the inspection board as "Second Quality" and that 11,142 of these "Second Quality" fish were from Fraser river gill-net caught pinks, while only 185 cases of fish taken in purse-seines in the southern area were so classed, speaks for itself.

1933 Canned Pink Salmon Pack
District No. 1

	Cases
From seine caught fish	60,404
From gill-net caught fish	32,432
Total Fraser fish	92,746
Brought from other areas for canning in district No. 1	50,289
Total district No. 1 pack of pinks	143,035

I should like also to put on record the report made by the board of inspection for British Columbia canned salmon. It is dated November 2, 1933, and is contained in a letter addressed to Mr. Motherwell, chief supervisor of fisheries, at Vancouver:

Dear Sir,

Replying to your letter of the 28th ultimo regarding pinks in the Fraser river district.

The opening of waters off the Fraser to seining would appear to have led to a much improved quality in respect to a large portion of the pack at Fraser river canneries and canneries in the Vancouver area packing so-called Fraser river pinks. The individual experience of each member of the board over a long period of years has been that the great bulk of the Fraser pink pack has been of such a character that under the inspection now in force it would have to be classed as second quality for lack of firmness. It was only the very early portion of the pack that would have been approved. This season it has been evident that a large part of the catch came from outside waters having firmness and colour never evident in pinks gill-netted in the fresh water of the river.

The board had no information regarding each parcel as to whether packed from seined or gill-netted pinks and so can deal with the question in only a general way but is of opinion that the regulations for inspection acted as a deterrent on the packing of gill-netted pinks, and that in the case of those that were packed there was more care in most cases to cull out males and other defective fish, so that while the parcels which failed of approval were soft, there was not much of the "soupy" fish that will pour out of a can which has been much in evidence in previous pink packs on the Fraser.

The published figures of the pack of pinks in the Fraser river area at time of writing are 142,948 cases. While these have not yet all been submitted for inspection and include some fish brought in from Johnston straits which may or may not have been heading for the Fraser, there have been of those examined only 11,000 cases relegated to second quality.

The pack of Fraser pinks in 1929 which was the last year when they were packed in quantity consisted of 161,529 cases. The result of the packing of that fish was a demoralization of the market and a loss of prestige for British Columbia pink salmon, one of the results being that in 1931, which was the next cycle year when pinks come into the Fraser, there were packed only 20,000. If the pack of 1929, consisting of 161,529 cases had been submitted to the inspection system now in vogue the board considers it safe to say there would have been at least 100,000 cases degraded to second quality.

The board considers that seining the fish in the gulf before they suffer from contact with the brackish water, has resulted in the production of at least 100,000 cases of creditable fish which if not caught in the gulf but allowed to enter the river would, if taken, have been unfit to pack or have resulted in the same quantity of a low grade product.

The bulk of the pinks packed in British Columbia this season has already been sold, there being a good market demand, and what is being delivered instead of besmirching the reputation of Canadian salmon as did the Fraser pack of 1929, will raise it and the consuming centres will be in a receptive mood for subsequent packs.

Yours truly,
Board of Inspection for British Columbia Canned Salmon,
E. O. Cornish,
Chairman.

I do not think I need add very much to the statement of my deputy minister and the one made by this board. All I can say is that this government desires, just as much as my hon. friend does, to help the fishermen of the Fraser river, providing no harm is done to the industry in general. I think the regulation which was passed has proved itself to be beneficial to the industry on the Pacific coast without injuring the interests of the fishermen on the Fraser river. As is proved by these reports, the fish taken is of second quality. The catches in the river fell down considerably from 1929 to 1931. My hon. friend is representing the fishermen and I understand the position he takes in this house. But he sees only one side of the question while the government has to look to the best interests of the industry as a whole. We consider that what has been done is in the best interests of the industry.

Mr. REID: Is the minister aware that the fish caught in the upper reaches of the Fraser river and which were refused, were taken across the line and sold to the canneries in Washington at four times the price?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am aware of the facts brought to my attention by the officials, and that fact was not brought to my attention.

Mr. REID: I am stating it now.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I assure my hon. friend that this regulation was put in force only after the question had been thoroughly studied. In view of the report and letters we have received from the Pacific coast, it is not at the moment the intention of the government to modify or repeal this regulation.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate but the Acting Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Duranleau) has referred to the report of the inspection board. My suggestion is that he should tear up that report or put it in the fire. When writing to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) the hon. minister made the statement that the results of the investigation were not far different from what was anticipated. Of course they were not far different, they were made to fit the circumstances. What does the report of this board of inspection amount to? It is simply if and when and perhaps and maybe; it is simply an attempt to justify the policy laid down by the department. They admit that they cannot distinguish between fish caught in the one place and those caught in another; the whole thing is an ex parte statement of the most ridiculous character. They refer to the last big catch in 1929 and suggest that it was the quality of the catch that demoralized the whole market. Was it the quality of that local catch that demoralized the world trade in salmon? We all know that such a thing is ridiculous and such a statement is unworthy of being included in a report of that kind. In 1929 there was a demand for fish of any kind, as long as it had a fin on it it was good enough to go into a can. But then the world debacle took place and you could not sell salmon of any quality at any price. The following year there was a very small catch, practically no chums. But had that anything to do with the quality? I did not catch the whole of the report, but as I understood it it was simply made on request and intended merely to support an announced and agreed on policy. The figures collected by the board and furnished to Major Motherwell and passed on by him to Doctor Found were not the same as Doctor Found presented to the meeting at New Westminster. Yet he should have had the report before him.

I think the minister would have been well advised not to have said that the policy of the department is to curtail seining wherever possible. I know that has been the announced policy of the department but the department has given little indication of carrying it out of late years. It is very unfortunate that this particular local policy should be adopted in these days of unemployment. Wrap it up, go around it, evade the issue as you like, there is no question that it has resulted in a very serious curtailment of employment of fishermen. That result will continue in the future.

We do not seem to be able to agree as to whether there was 100,000 or 500,000 cases put up, but the board of inspection says that they were of real good quality. If that is the case, why is it that there have been so many pinks condemned in the last few months? Let the minister go and check up the reports which have been made recently. If he does that, I think he will receive quite a surprise.

This board of inspection made an ex parte statement in the month of October, but how many salmon had been inspected at that time? They seemed to have the whole thing cut and dried and knew just what the quality was going to be. I think I am safe in suggesting that they had not inspected a third of the catch at that time.

The statement made quite frequently by the hon. member for New Westminster would seem to be the crux of the whole matter. He stated that seiners were allowed to fish right in the mouth of the Fraser river. The minister has said that a small area had been set aside right down on the boundary line where the gill-netters do not penetrate and where the water was not muddy. He stated that the seiners could operate there quite successfully. I believe there is a certain amount of truth in that, but this area is small and right down on the American fishing borderline. Had the seining been confined to that area there might have been some justification for the argument advanced by the department that a better quality of fish could be caught by being taken earlier in seines, but they made a mistake when they threw open the whole mouth of the river to the seiners. This is the area of muddy water and the gill-netters operate there and as far out as the muddy water extends. I do not suppose they went down as far as this small area, but the mistake was in not confining the seiners to that small area. The minister refers to this existing district as a small area but it is not small and the seiners were given access to a territory contiguous or belonging to the gill-netters, so to speak. The minister has suggested in his letter to the hon. member that there is a possibility of changing the area boundary this year, but why should not this have been done in the beginning? It is just like the 24-hour rule which was found to be impracticable. If our advice had been listened to last year this matter would have been brought before the fishing committee where representations could have been made. The mistake made in this instance was in giving the seiners certain territory which came within the jurisdiction of the gill-netters. The minister has said that the gill-netters could go down there and operate but if he were one he would know what kind of a chance he would have operating among seiners.

I wish to endorse the representations made by the hon. member for New Westminster as regards the deputy minister not having meetings out there. That policy was inaugurated nearly ten years ago; I never heard anyone complain about it, except those who wanted to protect special interests. It was a fair thing and there were no objections. The present Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) went out there, and there was a sort of understanding that he should hear the representations of one class only; it was understood that he would be dined by the canners and would hear their side of the matter. But very much to his credit he insisted on staying over a couple of days in order to hear the point of view of the fishermen themselves. He did so and listened to them as attentively as he had listened to the other side, and he got a very much better perspective of the situation by hearing both sides than he would have got if he had listened to the representations of the canners alone, listening to what they had to say and then going home and acting upon it. And when the deputy came out from year to year he also gave a fair hearing to all sides. A better arrangement could not be conceived. Of course, big interests can always send delegations here, just as they did last January when the twenty-four hour rule was put into effect overnight. But the fishermen cannot do this. We can voice their grievance after it has become a grievance, or we can voice their views privately to the deputy. But that is a very different thing from the deputy going out and getting the consensus of opinion from all concerned. I do not know why the deputy was instructed not to have meetings this year. I venture to suggest that he was ashamed to have any meetings. I suggest that these meetings should be continued in the future.

There is another thing I might suggest. It is beside the point, but I have been thinking somewhat of it of late. Perhaps with the good offices of the minister, whose name would go down in history so far as the fishing industry in British Columbia is concerned, would it not be a good thing, would not this be the appropriate time, to inaugurate in connection with that industry a policy such as has been adopted in the United States and which is indicated by the letters N.I.R.A. Instead of the canners believing that the only way they can achieve success is to put something over the fishermen, by cutting down their prices unfairly, by compelling them to deal with local interests, and so on, and instead of the fishermen having a determined prejudice against anything that the cannery men might suggest, merely because it comes from them, would this not be a favourable moment, with the assistance of the minister, if he were impartial in the matter, to try to get together rather than to have the different parties concerned pulling in opposite directions? Why not have a proper basis of prices? The United States has a wage code. Suppose we could arrange a code with regard to the price of fish and then cooperate along these lines. Above all, let the cannery men do what they are best fitted for, what is essentially their business, namely, the canning of fish, and let the fishermen attend to their business, let them do what they are best fitted for, which is the catching of the fish. That arrangement was carried out a number of years ago in connection with halibut. I have only a vague understanding of it, but I believe that at one time the buying interests, those who buy halibut and ship it to the New York market, were in the business of fishing, and their boats were competing with what I would call the independent fishermen. This led to all kinds of trouble, jealousy and ill will, until finally the practice was abandoned and the buyers confined themselves to their legitimate business of buying and selling halibut, leaving the fishermen to do the fishing. That system has worked well, neither side having tried to hold up the other. If we could adopt something like N.I.R.A. in connection with the fishing industry on the Pacific coast it would be a monument to the minister and to everyone connected with it, and it would be very much to the benefit of all classes. No one class would benefit unduly and there would be a fair deal all round. The fishermen would realize the troubles of the cannery men and the cannery men would understand that it was in the best interests of the industry to deal fairly with the fishermen, so that it would not be a question of cutting each other's throats. The minister might seriously consider this proposal, and anything I can do to assist him I should be glad to do. I shall be happy to devote my time and energies to helping him to carry out something of this sort on the coast, if he will give it his endorsement and see to it that some active measures are adopted to have it inaugurated.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I would not intervene but for the fact that, in the first place, I come from British Columbia and have a fairly good knowledge of the situation and secondly because as Minister of Trade and Commerce I am interested in this matter, which in a measure affects the work of the department over which I preside.

The two hon. members opposite who have spoken on the subject have quite earnestly, and certainly very vigorously, advanced what they believe to be the interests of the fishermen. I submit however that there has been rather a disregard of certain facts which are beyond the control of government or of man, for that matter. Let me say at once that as far as I am concerned—and I know the view of the Acting Minister of Fisheries and of the government generally—we are just as much interested in the welfare and prosperity of the fishermen on the Fraser river or in any other section of Canada as are the hon. gentlemen opposite. But the government, in the administration of this matter, like their predecessors in office, both the preceding government and other governments for the last thirty years, have always been confronted with certain stubborn facts, which I will refer to in the course of my remarks.

The hon. member for New Westminster made certain comparisons indicating a diminution of catch by fishermen on the Fraser river. That the house may be better seized of the tremendous changes that have taken place on the Fraser river, let me give some of my own recollections. I can recall when, long before the hon. member for New Westminster came to that district, one could go out to Steveston on a Sunday evening after the weekend holiday—the fishermen laid up for twenty-four hours in those days—and see from 6,000 to 7,000 fishing boats leaving Steveston alone, going to the sand flats at the mouth of the river to fish. Furthermore, in those days, especially in every fourth year when the large run occurred, most of these fishermen would make a very profitable catch. I think I am correct in saying that for many years in the early stages of the industry the canneries in the Fraser river area put up by long odds the largest portion of the catch.

Mr. HANBURY: In British Columbia.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. Gradually that pack diminished and the northern areas, which are of a different character, became the predominant locality in which salmon was packed. Now, what brought about the change? I think we ought to get this clearly before the house, and if hon. members will bear with me I will make one or two references to some of the facts relating to this matter.

In the first place, it must be remembered that the Fraser river is one of the large rivers flowing into the Pacific, on the upper reaches of which salmon are spawned. I suppose the Fraser river, the Columbia river, the Stikine, and some of the northern rivers as well as some of the smaller streams, the Skagit river and others, are the sources which maintain the supply of salmon. Salmon on the Fraser river are peculiar in this respect that the sockeyes usually have what is known as the heavy run once every four years. One of the phenomena of the world is the way in which the sockeye salmon have an extraordinary run every four years; that is a much larger number come up the river to spawn. Then of course the spawn goes out to sea and it is a peculiar characteristic of our salmon that they go out, nobody knows where, remain there for a certain time and then return to the stream where they were spawned Nature in a most extraordinary manner provides the instinct which brings this about. It has been one of the duties and cares of all governments to maintain the spawning grounds in as good shape as possible, very frequently, by the installation of hatcheries, taking eggs where available from the fish when in proper condition and depositing them in hatcheries, supplementing the efforts of nature in maintaining the run of salmon in the Fraser river.

During the construction of the Canadian National a huge blast was set off in the Fraser canyon throwing into the river, I suppose, millions of tons of rock from the side of the mountain. This for several years caused an interference with the run of the fish up the river. It was soon discovered and not this particular government, but preceding governments spent very large sums of money, I have forgotten the amount, in clearing away this barrier in the Fraser so that the fish might run up. It did, however, have the most damaging effect upon the fishing industry in the Fraser river, as became apparent in the recurring four-year periods by the fact that there was a rapid diminution owing, experts said, to a sufficient number of fish not being able to get up the river to spawn during a certain period. That difficulty was overcome and then efforts were made to obtain spawn and thus maintain the fisheries, but there was a serious falling off in the supply of salmon on the Fraser. So much for nature.

But another factor entered into the situation. It must be borne in mind that when the salmon go out to sea to their habitat wherever that may be, and return to the place where they were spawned, in this case the Fraser river, they come round the gulf of Georgia, round the southern end of Vancouver island—a number go north—through the strait of Juan de Fuca; then they strike the mainland coast and come up the coast from the state of Washington into the area of British Columbia and up the Fraser. The Fraser is a huge river, over a thousand miles in length; it constantly pours into the gulf of Georgia a muddy water that carries in suspension a fine silt. When the river empties into the gulf of Georgia, the working of tides up and down the gulf carries the fresh water to a certain extent up the coast, but chiefly down, so I would suppose—and I am speaking just from memory—for probably forty miles down the coast will be found silt deposits of the Fraser. This in centuries and millenniums has built up wide flats, what we call tidal flats or shallow areas. I am informed that the fish go out into very deep sea and when they come in they are hard, firm and of very fine quality, but again obeying the dictates of nature, they hover around river mouths in that brackish water of which the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has spoken. There they remain for a certain period until their physical condition is suitable, shall I say, to the necessities of spawning. After hovering there for a certain period, they go up the river to the spawning beds, very many of them going long distances up the main river and its tributaries. I can recall in the early days when the Fraser river would be almost choked with the numbers of salmon ascending, and they may still be seen in large numbers going up the river and its tributaries. But during the period, which may be a few days or longer, they are lying in the brackish waters, they gradually soften; their flesh becomes soft and they deteriorate from the standpoint of edibility. Therefore the sooner the fish can be caught after they arrive from the deep sea water in the shallow areas along the coast, the better their condition will be.

Mr. REID: The statement was made at a meeting that the fish caught long ago, that is when there were six or seven thousand millions at the mouth of the Fraser, were just as good as they are to-day.

Mr. STEVENS: I am coming to an explanation of that point. In part my hon. friend is correct, but not wholly so. The point I am making for the moment is that the sooner the fish are caught after they come into shallow water, the better, and the longer they remain there, the softer they become. No one will dispute that fact.

Another factor enters into the matter. During the years our United States friends—and in saying what I am about to say, I am not criticizing them; that is their business—knowing these fish come right by their door to enter the Fraser and not having very much interest in that river, simply set themselves to catch as many salmon as they could while they were in waters adjacent to their own territory. I think I am correct in saying that 90 per cent of the fish that run up the Canadian waters of the Fraser would for many miles pass United States territory contiguous to British Columbia. What is the result? Huge canneries developed at Bellingham, Blaine and other places just south of the boundary and the United States authorize not only gill net fishing, which is done in a comparatively small way, but the installation of fish traps and seines. A fish trap is one of the most murderous contrivances ever invented so far as catching fish is concerned. It consists of long reaches of piling with nets stretched along. My hon. friends will correct me if I am stating this inaccurately. I think in some cases a mile or perhaps more of this will be stretched out crossing the known pathway of the fish. As the fish sweep up the coast and strike one of these barriers which are placed at an angle across the pathway they are following, they are guided into what is known as a trap, a trap being quite a huge area of piling with nets down quite deep so that there is no possibility of the fish escaping once they are in it. When they are in the trap, they are lifted out of it by machinery and literally hundreds of tons of fish are taken out of traps in that way. I have seen this and have no doubt hon. members have seen pictures of it. It is a most murderous system of fishing, but it is followed quite commonly and has been to my knowledge for the last ten years.

That is as far as trap fishing is concerned. Then they have another system of fishing with purse seines, a huge net, the dimensions of which are obtainable from the department,—I do not carry them in my mind. This net is thrown out in deep water. When they sight a shoal or when they know that fish are running,—and the men become very skilful at that,—they throw out one of these nets. It is very long, a boat will run in a circle and when a large section of this net is out it is gradually drawn together and pulled tight at the bottom and the whole net drawn into the boat; and fish are taken out by the ton, not individual fish as in gill net and similar forms of fishing. This purse seine fishing is carried on very extensively by our American friends. That again is not a point I am criticizing, it is just a statement of fact. It is done by them before the fish reach Canadian waters at all, before they get near the Fraser river.

A few years ago the government of Canada, largely at the instigation of the government of British Columbia and the fishing interests generally there, worked out what is known as the Sockeye Salmon treaty. This treaty has been discussed pro and con. In any case it was signed and passed this parliament, but it has never been ratified by the United States congress, and therefore is not in effect. The object of the treaty was to deal with this situation, which in British Columbia was felt to be unfair, because we were spending thousands of dollars to maintain the quantity of fish spawned in the Fraser by supplementing nature with hatcheries, we were restricting our own fishermen so that a certain number of fish could escape up the river for spawning, but while we were doing that our American friends by a system of trap and purse seine fishing were taking unlimited quantities of fish. Had the Sockeye Salmon treaty become effective it would to a substantial degree have rectified this condition, but it has not been ratified and we are faced with the stubborn facts. The catch on the Fraser river fell off year by year until in 1931 it was, I think, only 20,000 cases. My hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Reid) knows these figures probably more accurately than I. At any rate the catch had fallen to a lamentable degree.

Then the suggestion was made that, inasmuch as there was apparently no possibility of a modus vivendi with the United States, this treaty which we had passed in good faith not having been ratified by the American senate, why should not Canadian interests be permitted to seine in the parallel area on the Canadian side? I admit very frankly that it is a matter for debate whether purse seining should or should not be allowed. I ask my hon. friends to accept that as a fair statement, but not an admission that the whole thing is wrong, I do not want to be so interpreted. However I can see their side of the question. I submit that if the facts as I have stated them are accurate—and I think no one will question them—then it stands to reason that the Canadians might just as well catch a certain amount of fish with seines in the same manner as the Americans do and thus increase the quantity of fish that we can put up. That is on the one hand. On the other hand I think it is demonstrated beyond any question that the fish so caught are of a superior quality to those caught in the river. I will admit with my hon. friend from New Westminster that such gill net boats or individual fishermen as go out of the mouth of the river and fish on the sand heads may catch fish practically equal in quality to those caught by the seiners, but I think generally speaking those caught by the seiners are superior. As my hon. friend knows, you will see fishermen fishing with their gill nets above the Fraser river bridge, twenty miles from the mouth of the river, but in that area from the mouth of the river to as high as the gill net fishermen operate, there will be a larger proportion of soft or inferior fish than would be caught outside the mouth of the river. Therefore I think it cannot be questioned that the fish caught by the seine fishermen in the area referred to in this order in council are of a firmer and superior quality.

Another thing I want to say—and which to my mind is of greater importance than almost any other point—is that we have in British Columbia salmon fisheries a very fine industry. Perhaps I should say we had, because it was better years ago than it is to-day. But we still have in the salmon fisheries an important industry. However, the competition that we are now confronted with is much keener than it was ten or twenty or thirty years ago. Some years ago our only competition came from the Americans, and at first they competed with us only on Puget Sound. I remember very well when there were very few American canneries in the north. But gradually the American interests extended their canneries in Alaska, where they catch a very fine type of sockeye as well as other kinds of salmon, sockeye being the most attractive for the market. One of my hon. friends said a moment ago that he could not see why Canadian packers could not compete successfully with the American, but my hon. friend must at least do the Canadian packers this justice, that the salmon packed in Alaska, as well as in northern British Columbia, are generally speaking in better condition when caught, owing to the water being colder and clearer, than those caught at the mouth of the Fraser or of the Columbia. Inasmuch as the American pack is largely an Alaska pack we are therefore faced with keener competition from Americans to-day than we were twenty or twenty-five years ago. That is one point. Then in the last ten years the Japanese have come on the world market, they now catch salmon on the Siberian coast and the Asiatic coast quite similar, and quite as good, I am told by those competent to judge, as the Alaska and northern British Columbia salmon. In fact they are the same general type of fish.

Mr. HANBURY: By what method do they kill them?

Mr. STEVENS: I think methods very similar to ours.

Mr. HANBURY: By traps or purse seines?

Mr. STEVENS: They use the traps the same as we do, I do not know whether they are precisely the same, but I think in effect they are the same. I omitted to say that traps are used very freely in Alaska, and they are used in British Columbia waters in one or two cases. The Japanese came on the market, and they have been our keenest competitors in the European markets. Then within the last five years the Russians have come into the picture, with very extensive government owned and established canneries, and to-day they are amongst our keenest factors in the world market for salmon.

Mr. REID: If I might interrupt, my contention was that price is the predominant factor in Great Britain.

Mr. STEVENS: Quite so. I am glad my hon. friend mentioned that. I was saying that the Japanese and Russians being now in the picture are tremendously keen competitors not only in respect of quality but of quantity. The price competition is accentuated by the presence of these two additional competitors, particularly the Russians. They have made it extremely difficult to sell our fish in the world markets. These facts are inescapable, they are factors beyond our control, and they cannot be lightly brushed aside. We must face them; we must recognize them. What the government of the day are trying to do is this: We are trying to maintain the high standard of Canadian salmon, and we dare not allow the conditions that obtained in 1930 or 1931 to return. In those years quite a substantial quantity of very inferior fish were packed and placed on the market, and I know that as Minister of Trade and Commerce I received some very very strong protests. Speaking from memory I recall one large distributor who said that he would never take any more British Columbia salmon. In any case we know that it did injure our reputation, and it is with the desire to win back and maintain the excellent reputation we have had on the world market in years gone by that these regulations were brought into force.

Let me say first—and I say this to my hon. friend from New Westminster very courteously—that I do not think any further diminution of the catch by gill net fishermen has resulted from the use of purse seines in the area to which the order in council refers than would have obtained if we had done nothing and simply allowed matters to take their course. I would go further. If there has been a slight diminution—and I do not think there has been very much—we are making up for it in the better condition of the fish and in being able to meet the keener competition I have just mentioned.

Then I was going to say a further word with reference to the other order in council which was passed and later repealed. My hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) spoke in rather scathing terms of that order in council. I recall that he protested at the time, but I want to say that it was an effort to meet a condition which I think is inimical to the best interests of the canned salmon industry. I will give an illustration of that. A certain individual had a cannery in the harbour of Vancouver, which obviously is not the place for a cannery except to take fish locally. Not being able to get fish locally, he encouraged men to go away into the north—and we had abundant evidence that they went for several hundred miles—and there buy up fish and bring them down to Vancouver to this cannery, so that when the fish reached the cannery they were several days old. I am sure that neither of my hon. friends will assert for a moment that fish handled under those conditions are calculated to give the best results in our canning operations; indeed, sir, it is a menace to the canning industry. I do not want to say that the man who builds a cannery in the harbour of Vancouver should not be given a chance to live, but there is reason in all these things. A man who will build his cannery there and expect to get his fish from around Rivers inlet or the Skeena river, is foolish. He should not be encouraged, and it is obvious that he has no claim on any government for protection or assistance. If he were getting his fish at his pier certainly he should be entitled to every consideration, but the effort should be to get the fish to the cannery as quickly as possible after they are caught.

Let me remind my hon. friend of another matter, and I do not refer to this because I am a Conservative and the government to which I am going to refer was Liberal, but rather in order to give the point of view that was taken by a government in which undoubtedly he would have confidence, and in order to disabuse his mind of any thought that the action was taken by a government whose whole outlook was out of sympathy with his own. During the entire period Sir Wilfrid Laurier was in power there was a very strict boat rating system in operation in British Columbia, and what was the boat rating system? It was a most arbitrary system. In the light of all that has passed I am not prepared to say that it was not the best system, although I fought it when I first came to parliament nearly twenty-three years ago. Under that system the Department of Marine and Fisheries, as it was then, without any particular rule but in an arbitrary fashion allocated to each cannery a certain number of boats. I think it ran from about twenty-five boats to fifty or sixty, and the average would be about forty. The cannery secured the allocation of boats, and then it allowed certain individual fishermen to take the cannery boats and fish, but no one could fish in the area contiguous to that cannery and allocated to it but the boats of the cannery itself. In other words, under the regulations that obtained for about a score of years, the cannery had an absolute monopoly of the fishing in the area in which the cannery was located. I am not prepared to say that this was wrong; after seeing free fishing in operation all over the coast, with the grief, the trials, the tribulations and losses that have occurred, I am inclined to think that some such system in operation to-day might have a better result. For instance, a moment ago the hon. member for Comox-Alberni asked why the acting minister did not adopt something along the line of the N.R.A. in the United States. That is precisely what the N.R.A. is doing to-day; they are simply restricting the competition in business, shall I say, insisting upon an arrangement between business and workers, and arbitrarily controlling it.

Mr. NEILL: But not on one end only; on both ends.

Mr. STEVENS: Of course, but the N.R.A., applied to the canning industry on the Pacific coast, would result substantially in something such as I have mentioned. I must say, however, that looking back over the years I am not now prepared wholly to condemn that system, but certainly that system was condemned by those who held the view now held by my hon. friend. I condemned it; I argued for open fishing along the Pacific coast long before my hon. friend came to the house. We achieved that change, but the intricacies of the business and the factors entering into it, which I mentioned a moment ago—the competition from the United States the use by United States fishermen of traps and purse seines, the fact that they had the first chance at the fish before they get into Canadian waters, the fact that competition from Russia and Japan must be faced in the world market, the gradual diminution due to heavy fishing on the Fraser river and so on—all have tended to make the industry less profitable than it was twenty-five, thirty or thirty-five years ago, as I saw it in the early days when I first went to British Columbia.

I think the only quarrel I would have with the two hon. members who have spoken is with regard to their attack upon the Acting Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Duranleau) because they allege that he is not interested in the fishermen and is disregarding their interests. Speaking for the government I think I can say that we are just as keenly interested in the welfare of the fishermen as my hon. friends are, but we cannot ignore those factors to which I have referred, which undoubtedly play an important part in connection with the industry as a whole.

I have just one word in conclusion. My hon. friend from New Westminster rather taunted me, I thought. It was rather cleverly done and nicely placed upon Hansard, so that he can read it to his friends on the Fraser river and say how he told the Minister of Trade and Commerce, on the floor of the house, that he was the friend of the big interests and the packers and therefore was not a friend of the fishermen. I would like to ask my hon. friend, as a good sportsman, whether he thinks that is quite fair.

Mr. HANBURY: May I point out that he did not say anything about the miners of East Kootenay.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not quite see what the miners of East Kootenay have to do with the fishermen. I appeal to my hon. friend at least to give those of us who may differ with him credit for honestly differing. I want to tell him very candidly that I have not the slightest interest in any way—I am not talking financially but sympathetically—with the canners of British Columbia other than my interest in them as ordinary business men of the community. Here in this house, in our efforts to meet this difficult problem, and while extremely anxious to assist, in this instance, the fishermen, we must not simply escape by saying to the fishermen that the fellow who does not succeed in helping to solve their problems is failing because he is a friend of the employer or the packer or the business man. As a matter of fact, everyone from British Columbia knows perfectly well that the canning industry has had an exceedingly difficult time during the last ten years. I question if there has been any profit, or very much profit, of any kind made out of the canning industry, and certainly there has been a great deal of money lost in it.

Mr. MUNN: Too much watered stock.

Mr. STEVENS: There is. I say to my hon. friend very frankly that I have not an atom of sympathy with watered stock, for instance, in Canadian Canneries, and I would not have a bit of hesitancy if he brought the matter forward, to help him wring it out. While the operations of many canneries may not be paying, there are some operators in British Columbia I can assure my hon. friend who are just as honest as he is or myself, or at least as we think we are.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The lady doth protest too much.

Mr. STEVENS: No, you will acquit me of that. We cannot make rascals out of everybody unheard, and I am not going to be a party to it. If my hon. friend (Mr. Reid) really takes any comfort out of these insinuations I shall not quarrel with him a particle, but I say that a government must take cognizance of all the facts of the case, and while we are just as anxious as he is to protect the interests of the fishermen on the Fraser river, we cannot interfere with the American operations south of the line to which I have referred, and which undoubtedly get the major portion of the fish originating in the Fraser river. Nor can we combat with nature or overcome the depletion of the fisheries due to man's operations and the falling off of production, except to the extent that we impose regulations that will protect the fish.

My hon. friend asked a moment ago why we did not allow longer gill nets, and he suggested very skilfully that these should be allowed only outside. He knows very well that with the drift net system—he knows, as well as a few others who have had the experience—that you could send half a dozen or a dozen or fifty fishermen out of Steveston with a net twice as long as the present regulations allow. They go out into the gulf, and with the ordinary drift of the incoming tide it would not be long before the nets would be across the mouth of the river, and they would block the river.

Mr. REID: But if the tide was going out.

Mr. STEVENS: I am pointing out what could happen, and my hon. friend knows that the fishermen are just cute enough to do that, and I would not blame them for trying. But my hon. friend knows, and I as a member of the government and the minister, must remember that there must be permitted a certain amount of escape up the river.

Mr. HANBURY: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend from Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury) recognizes that. How do we give that escape? By saying that the mesh shall be of a certain size so that the smaller fish can get through. We also give them a way of escape by limiting the size of the gill net so that it will not block the river, and also by saying that they shall fish only six days in the week. We have always reserved Sunday.

Mr. REID: What about seine fishing?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: I am talking about gill nets. I say there must be a way of escape. The seine fishing is out in the open waters. I am not saying that there is not room for dispute regarding seine fishing but the seine fishermen are operating in open waters, and not across the mouth of a river. Take the dragnet system, for instance, which used to be used in my hon. friend's territory. He knows as I know, or as I did up to a few years ago when I was more closely acquainted with it, that we had constantly to watch against a man stretching his dragnet clean across the entrance to a river. It was a common trick if they could get away with it. The officers of the department are constantly on the watch for these little evasions of the regulations. Now the duty of this government, as it has been the duty of the government that preceded us and of governments in this country for the last thirty years, during which this question has come up constantly, is to see that there is a reasonable escape of fish, a reasonable chance for the fish to get into the spawning ground, and secondly to see that as far as possible there is a fair opportunity given to those in the industry to fish. Our further duty, of course, is to do everything we can to maintain our market abroad so that the standard of our fish may be such that it will compete with the catch of other countries. I submit to the hon. gentleman that, joining with my colleague the minister, we will do everything we can to protect the interests of the industry as a whole. It is a difficult question.

My hon. friend says that the fisheries committee has not been called together. I know of no reason why a few members of the fisheries committee should not call it together and discuss these matters. I am not a member of that committee; I used to be years ago, but I do not know of any reason why it could not be called, and certainly there will be no desire to put anything in the way of any useful and intelligent discussion of the industry for the benefit of all those affected.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If I may ask the minister a question before he sits down, I understood him to say that the canneries, or many of them, were not paying the cost of their operations. Does he mean the actual cost of operating the individual cannery or does he take into account that a large number of the canneries have many branches which are not actually operating at the moment but on which they have to pay dividends?

Mr. STEVENS: I mean both. My hon. friend will not ask me to demonstrate with actual cases, but I am speaking from pretty general knowledge when I say that there have been seasons in the last ten years, and particularly in the last seven years, when many canneries did not pay the cost of their operations. Individual canneries and canneries which were part of a larger system of canneries did not in many cases pay the cost of their operations, and many firms actually lost on the season's operations, apart altogether from paying anything on capital investment. There has been a very serious and a very unhealthy condition in the business. Personally I think an industry that is healthy is more likely to pay better rewards to those who are working for it than an industry that is crowded and cramped even in meeting its operating expenses.

Mr. NEILL: The same is true of the fishermen. Is not that an argument for some scheme like the N.R.A.?

Mr. STEVENS: There is a good deal in the suggestion of my hon. friend, and it would be interesting if he and a few others would work out a suggested scheme.

Mr. NEILL: It is up to the government.

Mr. STEVENS: Perhaps that is right too.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

Public archives—salaries and to provide for the continuance in office of J. B. Noble, senior bookbinder, from April 1, 1934, to March 31, 1935, $84,312; contingencies, $9,200.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): In this vote for the public archives there is a reduction as compared with last year of $3,564 in salaries and $2,800 in contingencies. The reduction in salaries is due to the death of two employees—Miss M. Casey, a librarian, who died on April 16, 1933, and Mr. W. J. Webber, who died on August 20, 1933. Those positions have not been filled up to the present time in view of the financial stringency. No permanent appointments have been made in the department of public archives since 1930, although a number of vacancies have been caused by death. The reduction of $2,000 in the contingency vote is merely a net reduction.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In connection with the two vacancies to which the minister has referred, I assume that under easier financial circumstances they will be filled, as I understand there is a need of these services.

Mr. CAHAN: If our revenues should increase to the standard of a few years ago I believe this parliament should give every reasonable financial support to the maintenance of the public archives. I believe we are laying there a foundation for the future which should not be undermined or weakened.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is covered by the vote for contingencies?

Mr. CAHAN: We receive many bequests from time to time. We received a very valuable one from the estate of the late William Molson Macpherson, of Quebec. In connection with this bequest I am glad to state that the premier of that province has undertaken to relieve us of the payment of the succession duties. This bequest has added very materially to the value of the archives. If I remember correctly the cost of transportation from Quebec was something like $200. During the past year we have made some most valuable additions to the archives. If I may use his name, Doctor Webster was speaking to me yesterday after having gone through the archives and he stated that he considered a recent acquisition as being one of the most valuable ever made. This particular lot happened to be in the market at a very low price and we bought it. This vote is for such purchases and other incidental expenses as I have mentioned.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Salaries, $372,636; contingencies, $32,500.
Inspector general of banks—
Salaries and contingencies, $22,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I suppose the minister does not contemplate any change in the inspection of private banks due to the setting up of a central bank?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): The hon. member will realize that the banks will be in existence until the central bank is established and even afterwards. The same amount of inspectorial work will be required.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Certain items appear in the bank statements with regard to certain amounts being transferred from or to hidden reserves. Are such reserves brought to the attention of the inspector general of banks?

Mr. RHODES: I think I am quite correct in stating that the inspector general has full cognizance of all reserves held by the banks.

Mr. COOTE: I notice in the details of civil government which appear on page 70 an item of tariff adviser, $12,000. Is this a new officer in the department?

Mr. RHODES: He has been there for a number of years.

Mr. YOUNG: Is it a new office?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Was there not a new office created in the department?

Mr. RHODES: I had Mr. McKinnon in mine. This is a transfer of Mr. Breadner, the former commissioner of customs.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What has he to do with the banks?

Mr. RHODES: He has nothing to do with the banks.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I beg your pardon, this is finance.

Mr. RHODES: His experience will be available for the benefit of not only the Department of Finance but all other departments of government. Through the years he has accumulated a remarkable knowledge of tariff structures and his services are being made available to the government. I regret that I did not anticipate the details of the discussion under this item and I have not full information before me. This item was called merely for the purpose of qualifying the Department of Finance to go into supply on Thursday and Friday. I might state that Mr. Breadner is qualified for full pension which would amount to between one and two thousand dollars less than the salary he now receives. In other words, he could retire tomorrow and we would be obligated to pay his full pension.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I say that we over here would not mourn his retirement.

Mr. RHODES: I believe that the experience of Mr. Breadner is worth the difference between what he is receiving as salary and what he would receive as superannuation. While there appears to be an increase in the estimates, it is really a transfer.

Mr. YOUNG: May I ask who has been advising the government in the past in these matters?

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Breadner's services have always been available to the government.

Mr. YOUNG: He is doing the same work he was doing?

Mr. RHODES: He was in an administrative capacity in the Department of National Revenue.

[Mr. Coote.]

Mr. YOUNG: He was also advising.

Mr. RHODES: His experience with respect to tariff matters will be made available to all departments of government.

Mr. YOUNG: Is it not a fact that this gentleman has been acting for many years as an adviser on tariff matters and has been responsible for many of the blunders the government has made?

Mr. RHODES: I do not propose to accept the statement of my hon. friend just as he has made it. In his estimation everything that this government does is a blunder. I am willing to go as far as saying that no doubt the government will make mistakes.

Mr. YOUNG: With certain advisers they are bound to.

Mr. RHODES: I do not think there ever will be a perfect government. Mr. Breadner was previously the commissioner of customs and we have in the department Mr. McKinnon, who has been acting as adviser in matters of tariff and taxation. But Mr. Breadner's ripe experience has always been drawn upon by this government and I think by preceding governments.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What is Mr. Breadner's age?

Mr. POULIOT: He is rejuvenated.

Mr. RHODES: I think he is between seventy and seventy-one.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): He will be in receipt of a very fine pension, having enjoyed a fairly large salary in the past number of years, upon which of course he will be retired. I ask this question because I am rather curious. The government have been retiring men of sixty-five, and have been doing so pretty generally throughout the country. I have no complaint to offer in that regard, but I am curious to know why this gentleman has been transferred from the position he is in to that of adviser to the Department of Finance. With all due respect to Mr. Breadner, I submit that his qualifications must have related largely to matters affecting the tariff in the department from which he has been transferred. Just why Mr. Breadner, who is long past the age of retirement, should be transferred to another department is to me rather curious. I am going to say very frankly that Mr. Breadner and I never agreed very much on the question of tariffs. I am not complaining about that, though I should not be at all disappointed if he were removed from any connection with the tariff. I fail to see however where he will be of great value to my hon. friend in the finance department. When so many civil servants are being retired for the purpose of effecting greater economy, it seems to me only reasonable that this gentleman should receive the same treatment. I cannot see that he will be of very much service to the Department of Finance in the capacity of adviser.

Mr. RHODES: As regards those who have been retired at the age of sixty-five, my hon. friend must bear in mind that those only have been retired whose services can be entirely dispensed with and whose positions need not be filled again. There have been hundreds of such cases, where men have been retired at the age of sixty-five and their positions abolished.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is not the case here.

Mr. RHODES: I am coming to that. Mr. Breadner is not standing in the way of anyone's promotion in the civil service. He might have gone out with his superannuation, but whether my hon. friend agrees with Mr. Breadner's point of view regarding the incidence of the tariff is beside the point; the fact is that Mr. Breadner has accumulated through the years a vast knowledge not only of the operation of indivdual tariff items but of their repercussion upon numerous other items. The tariff structure, whether one agrees with the policy of tariffs or not, has been in existence for years and will continue for many years longer. Certainly if one is to judge by the world trend, whether it be higher or lower tariffs, we shall continue to have a tariff structure; and when you touch a tariff item, though it may look perfectly innocent, and attempt either a reduction or an increase, it is amazing to find the ramifications, in the effect on numerous other tariff items, which a slight change in one item may bring about. It is therefore to make available to the government the knowledge which Mr. Breadner has in that respect that his services can be of peculiar value, especially when it is borne in mind that his services cost the country a very small sum. We thought it in the public interest that it was far wiser, considering the trifling sum involved, to make his experience available to the government.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then my hon. friend must admit, if that argument is correct, that Mr. Breadner's successor has not the necessary qualifications and cannot be as valuable as Mr. Breadner. Would it not have been better, if that is so, to keep him where he was if he was so valuable in that regard?

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend is unconsciously confusing two things. The Commissioner of Customs is an administrative officer. Assume for the sake of argument that Mr. Breadner was the best man on earth for the position—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We shall have a difference of opinion on that point.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so; but assuming that he was the best man on earth for the position, eventually he must be replaced. It is therefore far better that he should be replaced by a younger man who can have the benefit of the advice and experience of Mr. Breadner while Mr. Breadner is in a position to give such advice, even though he is not in the Department of National Revenue. So that to that extent it is wise to effect the change. That was the opinion of the government, and I think that their decision was wise in the circumstances. I think it is just such action as my hon. friend would have taken, notwithstanding that his views may differ from Mr Breadner's.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Perhaps I do not hold all the views that Mr. Breadner holds with regard to the tariff, though I may say that in all my dealings with him he was always fair and I was always satisfied with him. What I cannot understand however is why he should have been transferred to his present position. Did the Minister of Finance ask to have him transferred? Who recommended that he should be put in the position he now occupies?

Mr. RHODES: The committee will appreciate the fact that it would be unfair to his successor to have Mr. Breadner remain in the department where he was—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Agreed at once.

Mr. RHODES: —and the only logical place for him was the Department of Finance. I would not say that any one individual I could name was responsible for his transfer, but the minister is prepared to assume the responsibility for it.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Do you approve of it?

Mr. RHODES: I think that on the whole it was a wise decision; I believe it was the proper course under the circumstances.

Mr. CASGRAIN: As a member of the government the minister had to accept it.

Mr. YOUNG: As I understand the situation, Mr. Breadner in the past has been administering a certain department—the Department of Customs—and we know that during his administration he demonstrated a wonderful capacity for interfering with business in this country; there is no calculating how much damage he has done to the trade of the country in that position. Now he is transferred from the position, not of administering the act, but to the finance department where he will make the tariff.

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. YOUNG: Is he not to be consulted in framing the tariff, when the budget is drawn up?

Mr. RHODES: Not necessarily.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the minister give an example of some of the questions that will be submitted to him for advice?

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is his work?

Mr. RHODES: I can give an example that has no reference at all to the finance department. In drawing up a treaty—

Mr. YOUNG: A treaty; precisely. He will be making the tariff.

Mr. RHODES: —the Department of External Affairs can call in Mr. Breadner and ask him, "What effect will the lowering or the raising of duties, or a change in the duties on a certain commodity or list of commodities have on trade in Canada?" And he can be asked to prepare a memorandum for the guidance of the government.

Mr. YOUNG: He will always give you the same answer.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend must not get into a discussion of the relative merits of protection and free trade and that sort of thing. That is not the point. It matters not what Mr. Breadner's views or those of the government of the day may be; the information which is asked from Mr. Breadner is what the result will be if a certain action is taken. His advice whether the tariff should be raised or lowered is not sought at all. That is beside the point. So far as the budget is concerned, I may say to my hon. friend that I am prepared to assume full responsibility for any changes which I may introduce. I would not for one moment try to hide behind Mr. Breadner or anybody else, but I will consult him from time to time as to what effect certain proposed changes in the tariff may have.

Mr. YOUNG: Is that not the work of the tariff board?

[Mr. Casgrain.]

Mr. RHODES: The tariff board will not be called into conference with respect to the carpentry work of preparing the budget. Certainly we shall have to deal with recommendations that may come from them, but it by no means follows that the minister will not have to have assistance in his office; that will always be the case.

Mr. YOUNG: Is this not the position, that the tariff board will make recommendations, but before the government puts them into effect, they will call in Mr. Breadner and get his advice?

Mr. RHODES: That is not a necessary condition at all. Mr. Breadner may or may not be called in on a given occasion.

Mr. EULER: I happen to have known Mr. Breadner pretty well for a number of years and it is not necessary for me to pay any particular tribute to his qualifications for the office he held. That he had a knowledge of the tariff and of the work of the customs department greater probably than that of any other man in Canada, is entirely without question. I do not think it is quite fair to criticize him in the way he has been criticized. If he has enforced a law which was perhaps wrongly made by the present government, the government and not Mr. Breadner ought to be held responsible. If he has interpreted the Customs Act and the tariff in such a way as to give offence to the hon. member for Weyburn and some others, they should hold not him but the government responsible. As to his appointment to his present position, I have not a great deal to say, although it is probably quite true that out of the wealth of his experience he can be of material assistance by way of giving advice in the technical effects that any changes in the tariff may bring about.

Mr. RHODES: That is the situation.

Mr. EULER: I do not think the government would be doing the right thing if they called Mr. Breadner in now any more than they did before to function in the matter of framing policy with regard to the tariff. When I happened to be in charge of the Department of National Revenue and he was commissioner of customs—and I think he was appointed by the government of which I was then a member—his salary was $10,000 and his superannuation, had he cared to resign, would have been something like $7,000. In the last two years his salary has been $12,000. I question whether the sum given by the minister, I believe quite sincerely, of $2,000 as the difference between his superannuation and salary, is correct; I think it would probably be nearer $3,000 or $4,000.

Mr. RHODES: At a later stage in the committee I shall give the exact figure, but I can assure my hon. friend that from memory I am fairly well satisfied it is less than $2,000.

Mr. EULER: I am not in any case particularly quarrelling with that; it is quite possible Mr. Breadner could be worth at least $3,000 or $4,000, to put the situation mildly, in the way of giving advice to the government with regard to tariff matters, what effect a change in one item may have upon others. Those who have had some experience with the customs department know that a very real factor in the situation is that one who is not familiar with tariffs and the way in which the department is conducted does not realize how, by making one change, you may upset several schedules and cause a great deal of trouble. Mr. Breadner's advice in that respect may be very valuable. But I say again that I do not think it should be the duty of an administrator to enunciate and put into force policies. That is the duty of the government and of no one else, and the government should take the responsibility as the minister says he is quite willing to do.

Mr. POULIOT: I strongly protest against the first part of the remarks of the Minister of Finance about Mr. Breadner. The reason is this, that he spoke in the tone of one delivering a funeral oration in regard to a man who is alive, who is only seventy-one years old and who is still very active. I know Mr. Breadner personally and I admit he is a very clever, active man and one always well disposed to give information when he is asked for it. But on the other hand it is most curious that this government is asking for an adviser in financial matters after all changes are made in them. All the changes were made without advice; they were all made in 1930 and the former tariff board was thrown out at that time. The same thing applies to 1931 and 1932. Then we come to 1933 when a tariff board is established after all the changes have been made and the government asks for advice—advice after the milk is spilled. That is the situation. I have nothing to say against Mr. Breadner; I would not offend him; I believe he is a good civil servant who may hold wrong views in certain respects, but his views can be discussed in the house only after they have been accepted by the government and therefore I do not see the necessity of the government having an adviser in financial matters after all the wrong has been done. If he drafts a treaty, I wonder why he does not draft one between the hon. member for Weyburn and the Minister of Finance.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Or the tariff board.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes. He would show his skill by drafting such instruments of peace and he could also submit them to the League of Nations. I admit that Mr. Breadner is a very clever man and has rendered good service to the state, but I do not understand why the Minister of Finance and the government should have an adviser in financial matters when they refuse the very sound advice which is offered by all the members of the opposition. Our advice is not so expensive; we give it free and we give it in all candour for the benefit of the government. My point is this: We give them sound advice; it is free to them and they can accept or reject it. They reject it all the time. The hon. member for Weyburn at times gives very sound advice to the government and if the government followed it, Canadian trade would be much better. I understood the Minister of Finance to say that he does not always ask for Mr. Breadner's advice. The minister has a button on his desk. Sometimes he presses it and says "I need Mr. Breadner." Sometimes he does not. But when Mr. Breadner gives his advice, does the minister follow it? If he does not follow it, why? Is he free to accept or reject Mr. Breadner's advice? I believe not. I think, if my hon. friend were free to accept or reject Mr. Breadner's views, this would be much better, but probably, as all of us understand, it is not the views of Mr. Breadner, who knows something, that are imposed upon the government; it is the views of one who knows nothing and decides, with blind eyes and without asking for sound information from anyone, all questions that are submitted to the government.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I understand that while this discussion is taking place, down at the Connaught building a presentation is being made to Mr. Breadner. The words that are being said here and the presentation being made to him there scarcely blend. But I suppose it is the way of the world—sic transit gloria mundi. As to the wisdom of the appointment of Mr. Breadner, opinions may differ. Mr. Breadner has been many years in the service. He is a civil servant and must serve under the law, and if he has made errors in interpretation of the law he has nevertheless given long years of faithful service. This is another instance where it is fearfully hard for a large proportion of those in the service of the government to reconcile certain attitudes taken and certain situations created in the last year or two by the dismissal of employees, the abolition of positions, by superannuation and by many other means of a similar nature. It is extremely hard for some who have laboured hard for many years, just as industriously as Mr. Breadner has, but who have not reached a standard of salary comparable to Mr. Breadner's and that of a few others yet in the public service, to understand why they should be let out and others taken on at salaries four or five times as great, and this is done under the guise—I do not use the word in any unkind way—of economy. People hardly understand that. When the government wants to practise economy it effects a sort of right-and-left, hit-and-miss decrease in the number of employees; some who might well be retired under superannuation, thus saving by their salaries the present salaries of three or four other clerks, are maintained in their positions. These are just suggestions that I want to place before the minister. If he would kindly let the people understand why these things are done it might alleviate the sentiment of, shall I say, hostility that exists towards the retention in the service of certain employees while others are retired.

Mr. RHODES: I have no fault to find with the remarks of my hon. friend, and I hope he will not misunderstand me when I say that the question he raises is an age old question. I have no doubt in the world that the sectionman labouring on the Canadian National Railways at the lowest wage rate, exposed to all weathers and to hazardous conditions, might find it difficult to understand why he should work for $1,000 a year or less, when the president of the railway who rides by in his private car receives a salary of $75,000 a year.

Mr. HANBURY: Or more.

Mr. RHODES: Or more. But there you are. My hon. friend may think that Mr. Breadner is worth the sum he is receiving, or he may not; that is a debatable question. The fact is that that is the salary he receives and has received for a number of years. Furthermore I think in fairness to Mr. Breadner I should say that it is not out of line with the salary which he received and which he could have continued to receive had he stayed in private employment. The only point I wish to make which I did not make before is that we are not establishing a position here. When in the natural course of events Mr. Breadner is no longer with us the post ceases.

We are merely trying to make available to the state, at the small sum involved, representing the difference between his superannuation and the salary which is given, his accumulated wisdom and experience which can be of service to the various departments of the government.

Mr. YOUNG: Since this government took office certain changes have been made in the customs tariff, which comes under the department of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. Certain changes also have been made in the Customs Act, which comes under the Department of National Revenue. Everyone who has had anything to do with the importation of goods knows that those changes in the customs act have had a more mischievous effect on the trade of the country than even the changes in the tariff. And those changes in the Customs Act were made when the same Mr. Breadner was adviser to the Minister of Customs. After those changes were made and the disastrous effects on our trade were seen, in accordance with promises made at the time of the Ottawa agreements a tariff board was to be set up, and was set up by the government. They chose as chairman of the board a very capable and fair-minded man, and that man said to the commissioner of customs: "Some of the things you are doing are against the law, the law you yourself have made; and you must stop it." What answer does the government make? They take that same man and put him into an advisory position in a department where he can pass judgment on the decisions of the tariff board. I think it is a shameful thing to do.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear; that is what has been done.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, I hope that the heat engendered by my hon. friend from Weyburn will not unduly affect his system. I assure him it is quite unwarranted by the circumstances. I am quite prepared to discuss tariff matters and the iniquities of this government when we come to deal with tariff items, as we shall at a later stage.

Mr. YOUNG: This is one of them now.

Mr. RHODES: No, this is not a tariff item. I can say to my hon. friend that the governments which he has supported and which I have opposed have taken certain action in regard to tariffs to which I have strenuously objected. That may seem strange to him, yet it is so. But I never for one moment thought of attributing the blame for those things to one of the officials of the department. May I say to my hon. friend that I would be equally just in blaming Mr. Breadner for the tariff attitude of preceding administrations as he is now in blaming him for any action we may have taken because Mr. Breadner, if I mistake not, was an employee of the government during the whole time it was headed by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition. I know my hon. friend's opinion of this government is not very high—

Mr. CASGRAIN: No, it is not.

Mr. RHODES: —but he should realize that we are at least capable of making our own mistakes. I may say to my hon. friend, if it is any comfort to him, that the mistakes of this government are made by the government.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Decidedly.

Mr. RHODES: We assume full responsibility for them, and do not think it is fair that any official, of whom there are many hundreds serving this country loyally, should be blamed for the decisions of the government.

Mr. HOWARD: A question was put a minute ago to the Minister of Finance to which he gave an answer. I should like to repeat the question. It is this: does the inspector general of banks know the hidden reserves of the banks and how they are handled?

Mr. RHODES: I can only answer as I did before. I have discussed this matter with the inspector general of banks on different occasions and my information is that he has full cognizance of all the reserves of all the banks. I do not think I can make my answer any more complete.

Mr. COOTE: Before the item carries, in regard to the transfer of Mr. Breadner from the Department of Customs to the Department of Finance, I think it is fair to say that the administrative record of the Department of Customs for the last couple of years certainly justifies the retirement of Mr. Breadner. If it is necessary to keep him in the service I think it is far better to have him in the Department of Finance than administering the Department of Customs. To put the matter briefly, I think Mr. Breadner has influenced the tariff policy of Canada long enough, and for my part I should like to see him superannuated.

Mr. HANBURY: I should like to ask the minister whether under this item we may discuss the salary deduction or reduction in regard to the civil servants?

Mr. RHODES: There will be ample opportunity to discuss that matter at a later stage. If my hon. friend would do so I would prefer that he defer his discussion, because I may say to him that the matter has not been discussed as yet.

Mr. JACOBS: I should like to point out to this committee that if Mr. Breadner was the sinner that he is said to have been, we on this side of the house must share part of that sin. It was the Liberal party that appointed Mr. Breadner, and from the discussion to-day I cannot find that any complaint was made against him during the time he was in charge of the department under the Liberal regime. I think it is unfair, now that he is passing out of the picture, to have criticisms made as to the work which he did. It is quite true, as the Minister of Finance says, that the government is at least capable of making its own mistakes. We all agree with that, but we must never forget that an official is acting under the instructions of the government. The voice is always the voice of Jacob but the hands may be the hands of Esau. In that respect I would say that the hands of Mr. Breadner, under both the Liberal and Conservative regimes always have been the willing hands of Esau.

Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that I have had relations with Mr. Breadner for very many years, and as an administrator I have always found him efficient, and an affable gentleman as well. He was able to establish very pleasant contacts with the public. I do not think any man ever left his presence without feeling that he had been treated in a most gentlemanly way, not that he got by any means what he wanted, but at least he felt that he was getting a square deal and fair play. I think that is the general consensus of opinion, and I would say that Mr. Breadner, with all his experience covering a period of thirty-five or forty years, is worth the couple of thousand dollars he is now receiving from the department and the government. In fact I feel that if the union found that he was getting a mere pittance of $2,000 the government might be brought before the proper tribunal for employing people at what we might call Chinese cheap wages. Either he is worth what he ought to get or he should be retired altogether. For $2,000 you cannot expect a man to give you $12,000 worth of work. I am rather against the principle of employing a man at less than a decent salary; either he is worth $10,000 or $12,000, as the case may be, or he should be retired. I think it may be generally said, however, that everyone will think of Mr. Breadner in the most pleasant way. I do not say that I agree with his policies, if they can be called policies, because after all he was merely carrying out the wishes of the administrations which employed him. I think it would have come with better grace from those on this side of the house who have criticized him if they had criticized him also for the period during which he was employed under the Liberal regime.

An hon. MEMBER: We held him down.

Mr. JACOBS: I do not think we held him down. Those of us who know Mr. Breadner will admit that he could not be held down; he had strong views to express and he expressed them to all and sundry. During his term of office it is well known that he organized the income tax department as well as the excise department, with everything which that entailed during the wild liquor orgies which were going on across the border during the so called prohibition days, and there was no man who was busier with his duties than Mr. Breadner was. There has not been a word of complaint with regard to Mr. Breadner during the time the Liberal regime employed him, so he could not have become such a terrible person immediately he was taken over by the Conservative administration. Either he is a good man now or he was not a good man then. I do not like to see these distinctions made between parties when it comes to the retirement of an official who has been in the employ of the government for well nigh forty years.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): Shall the item carry?

Mr. COOTE: I was just going to ask the minister whether there will be another item under which we can secure some further information, because I wanted to ask about the gold that has been exported by the banks in the last year.

Mr. RHODES: Yes, there are a number of other items, and there will be the supplementaries as well. I do not press the item if the committee does not wish to pass it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think the item should stand, because I have some remarks to make.

Mr. RHODES: Very well.

Item stands.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

IMMIGRATION ACT

PROPOSED AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO DEPORTATION OF IMMIGRANTS CLASSIFIED AS PUBLIC CHARGES

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg) moved the second reading of Bill No. 14, to amend the Immigration Act.

He said: I have just a word or two to add to the remarks I made yesterday on the introduction of this bill. As I then stated, the main purpose of this amendment is to make it optional, instead of obligatory as it is at present, for the local authorities to notify the federal government when a person becomes a public charge. The proposed change does not seek to amend in any way the definition of a "public charge." As a result of the unusual conditions and the amount of unemployment prevalent throughout this country there has arisen a situation which I do not think was anticipated at the time the act was drafted. There is a vast number of men at the present time who are compelled to seek public relief, and, who thereby become a public charge absolutely through no fault of their own but mainly because of economic conditions. It appears from what I understand of the situation that many of the municipalities do not seem to be anxious to notify the federal government of such persons who have become a public charge by being in receipt of unemployment relief, but they claim that in view of the present wording of the act they are compelled to notify the federal authorities. I also understand that in most cases in which they have been so notified that persons have become a public charge by the acceptance of unemployment relief, the federal government has taken no action. There is no doubt that great hardship may be inflicted on many of these individuals, many of whom have come to this country in good faith in the hope of obtaining work, but who unfortunately now find themselves in the ranks of the unemployed. Some of them have come here with fairly large sums of money, and now that their own savings have vanished they are compelled to seek assistance from the public authorities, and in many cases the threat has been held over them that if they accept unemployment relief they will be subject to deportation by the federal authorities. I think one of the most cruel things in connection with these cases is that this threat of deportation is held over the heads of many persons who are really of excellent character. The change which I am proposing and asking the house to accept would make it optional for the local authorities to notify the federal authorities as to a person becoming a public charge.

I think that this change is desirable for another reason, and that is that our local authorities are the best judges of who should be subject to deportation. They are in a much better position to understand the local situation than the federal authorities at Ottawa, and if the change I am proposing is accepted it would relieve the local authorities of a great deal of the trouble to which they are now put in notifying the federal government, and relieve also the federal government from taking action in the matter. I think that the minister will realize that it is a very reasonable request I am making at this time, and he must also be aware of the vast amount of trouble that is caused by making it obligatory upon the local authority to notify the federal Department of Immigration of these cases. I therefore trust that the minister and the house will accept the amendment I am proposing to section 40 of the Immigration Act.

Mr. BRADETTE: How is it proposed to deal with persons in the unorganized districts such as in our part of the country?

Mr. HEAPS: The recipient of public relief in an unorganized district will be in exactly the same position under this amendment as he is now.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this bill seeks to amend section 40 of the Immigration Act by striking from the section the words "public charge or" in order to remove from the operation of the section those who now are liable to be returned to their country of origin by reason of becoming public charges.

It must be borne in mind that every country in the western world, because those are the countries where migrants in any numbers go, has laws very similar to the laws of this country, bringing within what are called the undesirable classes the same sort of persons as are described in section 40 of our Immigration Act. Under that section as it stands at present, when a person who has been in this country less than five years, becomes a public charge, that is, when he has to be kept by his fellow taxpayer, it becomes the duty "of any officer cognizant thereof, and the duty of the clerk, secretary or other official of any municipality in Canada wherein such person may be, to forthwith send a written complaint thereof to the minister, giving full particulars." Then upon the minister receiving the complaint the situation is reviewed, and if it appears in the judgment of the minister that the alien who is here, let us say, on probation, because that is really what it means, is undesirable by reason of his being a public charge, deportation may be ordered. I have some sympathy with the hon. member who sponsors this resolution (Mr. Heaps), perhaps because of the local situation in the city which he represents, but the change that is sought would remove a person who becomes a public charge from the operation of this section, and it would then no longer become the duty, under the statute, of the clerk of the municipality or other officer cognizant of the facts to report the situation to the federal department. It would be left to the discretion of the clerk of the municipality or other official whether to do it or not. In other words, a different sort of law might prevail in every municipality in Canada because I think no one will disagree with me when I say that the clerks of the municipalities throughout Canada are not likely to adopt a uniformity of view. It is left to their discretion, perhaps on the assumption that they are discreet. The exercise of discretion placed in the hands of municipal officials in the various municipalities throughout Canada in a matter of this kind, I greatly fear would take away any possibility of uniform application of the provisions of the Immigration Act.

The hon. member said that the threat of deportation is held over the heads of those who are public charges. That statement has been made before and on a number of occasions I have investigated to see whether it is a fact. My investigations did not reveal that that position has been established.

I appreciate that there may be desirable people from other lands who have not yet acquired Canadian domicile and who may be at present unemployed through misadventure or other causes. It is possible that such people may have to seek relief but I can assure hon. members that if on review of the facts—it is my duty to review the facts in such cases, and I do it—it is found that there is even a possibility of the alien being absorbed into gainful occupation, this section will not be invoked. I recognize the difficulty which certain people have in procuring employment in certain sections and at times I have had our officers endeavour to find employment for those who are unable to take advantage of opportunities which might present themselves to others more active. It is possible that a clerk of a municipality, exercising the discretion with which he is invested under the terms of this proposed measure, might come to the conclusion that for certain reasons an alien should not be reported. He might even go further and make it known that his particular viewpoint was that none of these people should be reported, not even the malingerers. It must be remembered that the discretion would lie solely in the clerk of the municipality. Even his own council would not be able to advise or point out the direction in which his discretion should go. If it became known that there was a municipality with a clerk of that turn of mind and the clerk in an adjoining municipality was of a different turn of mind, the whole purpose of the act could be defeated by merely moving to the favourable locality.

Mr. NEILL: How long would a man last as clerk if he did not carry out the wishes of the council?

Mr. GORDON: I do not know. I can only answer the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) that there would be confusion. I have no doubt that mistakes have been made; I am as liable as any hon. member to make mistakes, probably more so, but I would be glad to have any injustices drawn to my attention. Under the present law when an alien who has been legally admitted has been in this country for a period of five years he is beyond the reach of this section of the act.

Mr. FACTOR: After he is naturalized?

Mr. GORDON: Not at all, after he has acquired Canadian domicile. If I pursue the course which I hope to be able to pursue for a considerable time, this situation will correct itself. In another year those who have not been returned to the land of their nativity will have been here long enough to acquire Canadian domicile. I am against this measure as it would remove from federal authority all control over those aliens who are at present a burden upon the shoulders of the Canadian taxpayer. I am sure there are many municipalities which would not welcome a departure from the act as it is now framed. Therefore, I move, seconded by the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré):

That this bill be not now read a second time but be read a second time this day six months hence.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) has taken the stand he has in connection with this bill, as it means its end. I cannot agree that it would have all the ill effects which he claims it would. The fact that the reporting of these men is optional would, under ordinary circumstances, suffice. We must remember that men who are on relief are on relief at the expense of the municipality. I have never heard yet of a municipality that was anxious to pay relief. If a clerk in defiance of his council insisted upon not reporting these men, the council would have authority to deal with him. It is not as if it were suggested that there should be no reporting, because it would be found that whenever necessary and advisable cases would be reported. But the fact that it is made compulsory leads to unfair conditions. The minister speaks about the alien and rather plays on that word, and we have the picture of someone perhaps from Jugoslavia. But we must remember that people born in Britain come under the section, and they are alien in the sense that they have not been here five years.

The minister defies anyone to cite an instance of injustice having been done as a result of the act being invoked. I think he used the wrong word; if he had said being enforced, I think he would have been right. His discretion has been admirable, and I have no complaint in that regard. I have in mind a particular case where I myself brought the circumstances to his attention and his officials acted with promptitude and fairness. It is true that he will use his discretion wisely, but the point is that the clerk is compelled to denounce this man, so to speak, and this leads to a great deal of trouble and anxiety. I have in mind an instance in my own district of a very decent man and his family who were going to be deported because he had received relief to a trivial extent—it did not exceed $20. He had been four and a half years in Canada and was therefore liable to deportation. He was a mechanic and a good mechanic, and had worked at his trade, but owing to the depression he had lost his job, and he was doing his utmost, as I was able to verify, to make a living somehow. He was not insisting upon working at nothing but his trade, because he was anxious to get a job of any sort; he showed a disposition to take anything, however small the wage, in order to help matters along. There was no disposition on the part of the clerk of the council or of his neighbours or of anyone else to have the man deported; yet according to the law which it is now sought to amend he had to be denounced to the government. He was not familiar with the law; he did not know that if he appealed to the minister he would eventually be dealt with fairly. The result was a great deal of anxiety for him and his family. There were special circumstances that rendered deportation very harsh and not only the man himself but other people as well were put to a great deal of trouble bringing the real circumstances to the attention of the minister, whose action then was all that could be desired. There was no suggestion of complaint in that regard, but the fact remains that there was a good deal of unnecessary trouble, inconvenience and anxiety. The danger which the minister seems to apprehend is that habitual loafers and undesirable people generally will not be reported. But as I said at the beginning there is no danger of that, because the people out of whose pockets the money comes to keep such men on relief will see to it that if the clerk does not report the circumstances he will be made to do so. I am simply expressing my regret that the minister takes the view he does. I do not think that the hon. member responsible for the bill before us suggests that there was any harsh dealing on the part of the minister, but it does create a lot of trouble for people when a man is denounced, so to speak, although no one has any wish or desire to deport him.

Mr. SAMUEL FACTOR (Toronto West Centre): The difficulty about the present act is that the term "public charge" is not defined, and the result is that a newcomer to the country, whether from foreign lands or from the British Isles, if he has not acquired domicile, and receives unemployment relief, is subject to be reported by the officer of the municipality to the Minister of Immigration. Now, no one quarrels with the minister's administration of this law; indeed, I want to commend him for the humane way in which he has administered it. But why should it be incumbent on the clerk or officer of the municipality to report every case in which a man is receiving relief by reason of the present economic conditions, thus burdening the minister with the review of all these cases? The bill suggested by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) relieves the minister of a certain burden. It places the burden on the municipality, which is more thoroughly acquainted with each individual case, to see whether a man who is in receipt of relief is a law-abiding citizen, conscious of his duties and responsibilities; and if his only sin is the receipt of unemployment relief, surely the municipality, the clerk or the officer, is in a better position to judge whether or not he should be reported. It leaves this discretion with the municipality.

In my humble opinion, it is our duty even under present conditions not to decrease the population of the country. On the contrary, I think the time is coming when some constructive policy of immigration will have to be put forward. If we expect ever to carry the tremendous burden of taxation which we have in this country, and to solve the railway problem, we must see that Canada has a greater population than at present. I think that the bill is a move in the right direction. It will not help the malingerer; it will not help the man who runs counter to the laws of the country, but will meet the legitimate case of either the Britisher who has not acquired domicile or the foreigner who under present abnormal conditions is in receipt of unemployment relief, and who will be given an opportunity to be judged by an officer of the municipality, a man thoroughly acquainted with the conditions in the place, and who knows whether the person affected should be reported to the minister. I am really surprised that the government are opposing the bill, and I trust that the matter will receive their very careful consideration.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): It seems to me very regrettable that the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon) is apparently determined to keep this law in its present form, for there is not the slightest doubt that it is a harsh piece of legislation. It may be true that the minister is now called upon to undo some of the blunders of an earlier administration. We remember that for a great many years this country spent millions of dollars in inducing immigrants to come here. Millions of people came, and generally the policy of the wide-open door was accepted by our people. Immigrants came in very large numbers from the British Isles and the continent of Europe. Only those of us who have been closely in contact with individual immigrants can form any idea of what it meant even for one family to break up home in the old land, to sever the ties that had bound them to their home for so many years, and to migrate to this country where they thought they would have an opportunity of earning a living. Fifteen years ago, even ten years ago, large numbers of them believed that this was the land of hope and that there was every opportunity here for a man at least to earn a livelihood, if not to make a fortune. But times have changed. To-day we have 1,220,000 persons on relief in Canada. We all recognize the seriousness of that situation. This large number includes many who are comparatively newcomers; indeed, the proportion of newcomers on relief is greater than that of old-time residents. This is not to be wondered at because the newcomer finds it more difficult to establish himself. In hard times he has not the reserves that the older Canadians have acquired, and so among this huge number of persons on relief are many who have come here in comparatively recent years and who have not been able to establish themselves.

The minister perhaps was not quite fair when he used the term "alien." As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has suggested, that word carries with it certain implications that are not very generally acceptable. It may be that within this group there are some from continental Europe, but I would remind the house that those people came here on our solicitation; they came with our full consent and they ought not now to be treated unfairly when they, together with many others in the country, are suffering. But in addition to those who have come from continental Europe, there are very large numbers of our own flesh and blood who have come from the British Isles; indeed, the larger proportion of those who have been deported have been British born. It may be true that they ought never to have come to this country, but we asked and permitted them to come. They are here, and now, with the depression, they are suffering and suffering more keenly than the rest of the population.

Last year, in an effort to reach some sort of justice in this situation I introduced a bill. My bill provided for a definition of the term "public charge." It may be all very well that people who have come to this country who are paralytic or insane and in some way have managed to get by the immigration officials ought not to be permitted to become a permanent charge upon our public institutions. In my bill of last year I made an effort to define "public charge" in such a way that those who would come under public assistance merely on account of lack of employment would not be regarded as public charges and so would not come under the provisions of this act. My bill was not acceptable to the minister. I know there are difficulties in the way of defining the term "public charge." This year my colleague has sought to obtain some redress, not by defining "public charge," but rather by a little change, what we thought was a very slight one, by which the initial responsibility for action that might lead to deportation would rest with the municipality in which the man resided. Surely the officials of the municipality are in the best position to know whether a man is likely to become a good citizen; they know the whole of the circumstances connected with his having to receive assistance, and so this bill would provide simply that report would be optional.

Again let me say that the minister was hardly fair when he insisted so much upon the officials of the municipality doing all this, and upon the discretion of the officials. It is really the discretion of the municipality, and when, in the judgment of the municipality itself, it is thought that the man should be carried by the municipality and would ultimately make good, then it is not necessary that he be reported. I would point out to the minister that when the municipality is not satisfied or cannot any longer carry the man, the final decision as to deportation still rests with the minister. But the whole question is this: Is the man likely to make good? The minister, if I caught him aright, has said that nobody is deported simply because he has come on relief. The minister may be of that opinion, but I doubt very much if that is in accord with the fact. If I recall aright, only a few weeks ago, from our own city of Winnipeg there was a case where there was a reversal of the opinion of the department with regard to certain people slated for deportation. I think representations were made by the mayor of the city; I know there was a good deal of public indignation as to the law as it exists to-day and both of our daily papers urged very strongly that some changes along the line that we suggest should be made in the law.

If the minister says his general policy is that a man is not to be deported solely on the ground of his receiving relief, the question is: Who is and how is anyone to determine whether the man can be reabsorbed in our industrial life? Such absorption might be comparatively easy under normal circumstances, but it is not easy to-day when we have tens of thousands of our young people going out of our schools and universities unable to find a place in our industrial and commercial life. How can anyone say that men now liable to deportation would not under normal circumstances be capable of being absorbed into our industrial life? I can understand, in the case of men having criminal records or being malingerers, it might be a good thing to get rid of them, but there are thousands of others who, if we had normal times, would become as good citizens as any of us in the house, and under such circumstances it is not fair to deny to those whom we have invited to come here, an opportunity of making good. It is not generous or fair for us as Canadians, as soon as we get into a jam, to throw back those people who have come to us in all good faith. I hope the minister will see his way to reconsider his position in the matter.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, as I read Bill No. 14 introduced by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), it contains two provisions, the first being section 40, subsection (1), which eliminates the words "public charge of", and the second being subsection (2) where specific provision is made, as I understand the matter, for discretion being given to the municipality to notify the Minister of Immigration in regard to those who are public charges. I quite agree with the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Factor) that one of the fundamental weaknesses of the situation is that the term "public charge" is not defined. I recall very well a year ago when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) endeavoured to define "public charge", it was not exactly a successful experiment. Personally, I am entirely in favour of the bill as introduced. I do not wish to make the slightest criticism of the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon), but I suggest that the municipality, the officers of the township or community in which the man who is on relief resides should be in the best position to judge as to his character, ability and qualifications generally for Canadian citizenship. I think this house should endorse with unanimity the proposal that humanitarian discretion may be exercised by the municipality, as against the possible arbitrary action of the Minister. I am not suggesting the slightest condemnation of the minister, but I happen to know personally of certain cases of men who just by accident were on relief in Vancouver, though having very good prospects of gainful occupations in the not distant future; but when under the mandatory nature of the existing legislation complaint is made by the municipality to the minister he or his departmental officials immediately act, as the present law requires them to do.

Mr. BENNETT: Does not the municipality thereby exercise the very discretion that this bill seeks?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Certainly not.

Mr. BENNETT: Why not?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My suggestion is this, and I shall be glad to be corrected by my right hon. friend if I am wrong; that under the act as it now stands it is mandatory under section 40 as long as you put the words "public charge" or "under section 40" that the municipal officials shall report. Thousands of my own compatriots from the highlands of Scotland have been deported under the phraseology of this most iniquitous statute.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Shame.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Look at the figures of last year and you will find that what I say is true. I agree for once in my life with my hon. friend the leader of the C.C.F. Give these men a chance and they will become some of the finest citizens—

Mr. YOUNG: Give them a change of government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The change of government will come anyhow.

Mr. GOTT: Your time in the government will not be long.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I wonder if the house really appreciates the significance of this amendment.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No. I suppose many over there do not want to. But my right hon. friend said, and I believe in perfect good faith, that under the present legislation the municipal officers have the discretion.

Mr. BENNETT: No, that is not what I said. The fact that they report the matter is in itself an exercise of discretion.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, Mr. Speaker, there is no man in this house knows better than the right hon. Prime Minister, because he is a very distinguished legal gentleman, the difference between the words "shall" and "may." The municipality has no discretion. They report to my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization, that so-and-so, whether he comes from the highlands of Scotland or Lancashire or wherever it be, is an alien, that he is a public charge, is on temporary relief. What does the minister do? His officials immediately act and examination of that man is ordered. Sometimes for weeks and weeks on end these deportation proceedings are held over his head; the man is kept in suspense—I know this of my own knowledge; he does not know what his fate is going to be, whether he is to be privileged to live in this dominion or is to be sent back to Scotland or England or any country in Europe. All that the mover of this resolution asks, and wisely asks is: Why not give this discretion to the city of Vancouver, or the city of Regina, or the city of Winnipeg? They know the man and his character through their community organizations, through the Red Cross or the charitable institutions; give them the discretion to report if they see fit that this man may be a permanent public charge on the Canadian people, and then let the minister and his myrmidons carry out the decrees of the Immigration Act. But I say, sir, that the bill proposed by the hon. member for North Winnipeg is a humanitarian amendment to the present immigration law, and I trust that all who want to see good decent citizens from Scotland or Ireland or England or Europe allowed to stay to build up this Canada of ours will support the bill of my hon. friend.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Hackett in the chair.

External Affairs—publications of league of nations for distribution to members of parliament and a grant to the league of nations society in Canada, $3,000.

Mr. BENNETT: This is merely one item in order that the estimates of the department may be before the committee. It is an incontrovertible item.

Item agreed to.

International Customs Tariffs Bureau, $2,700.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Why is there a reduction in this item?

Mr. STEVENS: This is the fee that we pay to the international bureau. It varies slightly but is approximately the same from year to year.

Item agreed to.

Board of Railway Commissioners—maintennace and operation, $232,172.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Would the minister explain the reduction of $17,000 odd?

Mr. MANION: We asked that the board of railway commissioners carry out, if possible, economies, just as different departments of the government were trying to bring about a general reduction in expenses, and the board has been successful in cutting down its expenses by about $17,000.

Mr. EULER: Is the board subject to the deduction of ten per cent of salaries?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Mr. GARDINER: May I make inquiry, Mr. Chairman, how many departments we have entered already?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hackett): Three.

Mr. GARDINER: More than that, I think.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I think so.

Mr. GARDINER: Might I have an answer before you proceed further, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hackett): Secretary of State, Finance, External Affairs, Justice, Public Works, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. GARDINER: That is six departments. I think that is enough for one day. May I suggest that the Prime Minister be satisfied?

Mr. BENNETT: We said that we were going to take supply to-day. We can take an item in one department and then continue to the next.

National Revenue—salaries, $820,395; contingencies, $50,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I think we are taking too many departments to-night. I would like to know where we are going and where we are at, Mr. Chairman. We hear one department called after another, and pretty soon all the departments will have been in to-night.

Mr. BENNETT: I intimated, Mr. Chairman, last evening, that we would commence at the extreme left and take the various departments until we had exhausted them. We have now taken the Secretary of State, Finance, External Affairs, Justice, Trade and Commerce, Public Works, National Revenue, and presently we will take one or two more.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Was it agreed to go into all the departments to-night?

Mr. BENNETT: What I said was that we would proceed from the extreme left down to the end. It may well be that we shall not finish them all, but we will discuss them.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is certainly unusual, to select a non-contentious item in each department and put all the departments into supply to-night. It means that on any future day any department can be discussed on any day of the week.

Mr. BENNETT: Why not?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have no particular objection, but I do want to call attention to the fact that the method which is being pursued to-night is quite unusual.

Mr. BENNETT: I think not. I think on a moment's reflection my hon. friend will see that this is quite in order. We cannot go into supply except on Thursdays and Fridays without a motion being made. Therefore the opposition is deprived of no right to move any amendment they desire to move on the motion being made to go into supply. Any grievance can be discussed on the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair for the house to go into supply. What we are doing to-night is merely to prevent the possibility of there being any difficulties in connection with the transaction of public business. I think if the hon. gentleman will look at it he will agree that that is the proper course to take, for no effort is being made to pass highly controversial items. An item is being selected in each department about which there should be no controversy, and taking the departments in this way, if it should be more convenient for the opposition on any day in the future to have one department called rather than another, it will enable us to suit their convenience as well as our own in taking that particular department.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I quite agree, but it is entirely departing from the usual custom. I have never known it to be done before in all the thirteen years I have been here. I have known four or five different departments being put into supply on the one evening, but not all the departments. I do not say that there is anything particularly wrong about it, but I do maintain that it is quite unusual, and it is giving the government the opportunity to take any department in the future on any day in the week. That is the difference. So far as I am concerned I am perfectly willing not to be too critical about the departments being entered, but I do want to draw attention to the fact that it has never been done before to my knowledge.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I, with the permission of the house, recall what the Prime Minister said last evening? Questioned by my right hon. leader he said:

> Mr. Bennett: For the purpose of getting several of the departments into supply, while an item may not be passed it was concluded that we would discuss two or three or four departments if possible, so that the business of the house might be expedited. We will start at the extreme left, take the Department of State, the Department of National Revenue, the Department of Finance and the Department of Justice, Public Works now being before the committee, for the purpose of getting sufficient before the house to expedite the business.

I think all those departments have been taken now.

Mr. BENNETT: That is all we are doing now, taking up the business of the country.

An hon. MEMBER: Seven departments have been taken now.

Mr. BENNETT: What difference does that make? We have items to be discussed, and if hon. gentlemen desire they can discuss them from now until eleven o'clock. The remedy is in hon. gentlemen's hands.

Mr. VENIOT: May I ask the Prime Minister this question? Suppose all the departments are gone into to-night, and next Tuesday you do not choose to take up supply. On Thursdays and Fridays you can go into supply without a motion, and we would be prevented from moving an amendment. If we go into supply only on the days when no motion is necessary those who have a grievance to present are prevented from doing so. The government may choose to have no supply on Tuesdays during the whole session, and members who have a grievance would be deprived of bringing it before the house.

Mr. BENNETT: I cannot conceive of that happening.

Mr. VENIOT: It may happen.

Mr. BENNETT: It always might have happened.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Certainly not.

Mr. BENNETT: Might I put it this way? Perhaps the committee will accept the view of so eminent an authority as Mr. Gladstone, who said that you must never take an extreme case as a test of what might be done. You must look upon it reasonably. No one has suggested that we go into supply on the Post Office Department to-night, or Agriculture or National Defence.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I understood the right hon. gentleman to say that we were going to take up two or three more departments to-night.

Mr. BENNETT: Since the rules were changed to permit the house to go into committee of supply on Thursdays and Fridays without motion put, there has never been any dispute. If all the departments have previously been considered by the committee, the government can deal with them all on Thursdays and Fridays. That has always been the case. There is nothing new in what my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) says. The rule has been there always since we had the new rules, but no one has suggested that because the rule might be used in that way, that it therefore would be. Hon. gentlemen opposite can prevent it; all they have to do is talk, and from what I have seen, there should be no difficulty on that score. All they have to do is to follow their usual tactics and all will be well. The situation at the moment is that we are going on with an item in one of the departments already in; the item has been called and the committee proceeds with it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Would the minister explain the details of the increase and decrease in this vote?

Mr. GARDINER: Before the minister replies, would he mind telling us just what item we are considering so we will know what we are talking about?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hackett): It is item 18, page 8, and the details will be found on page 85.

Mr. MATTHEWS: The hon. member will observe that there is a decrease in salaries of $46,593 and an increase in contingencies of $10,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): As this is the first item submitted in which civil service salaries are concerned, may I inquire if it is the intention of the government to continue the ten per cent deduction?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I think I can say that no decision has been arrived at.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The question of the deduction of ten per cent is involved in this particular vote.

Mr. RHODES: Inasmuch as the estimates had to be prepared prior to an opportunity being afforded for the consideration of salary deductions, it was understood that they would be set up on the basis of the ten per cent deduction being effective. But that does not preclude consideration of the restoration of the ten per cent deduction at a later stage in the session if that should be so determined. I think that is generally understood.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The ten per cent deduction is made in the case of the estimates now submitted.

Mr. RHODES: They are set up on the basis of a ten per cent deduction.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is still open for consideration?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. YOUNG: Could the minister tell us what reduction there has been in receipts from customs duties and whether the cost of collecting those duties has been correspondingly reduced?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am sorry but I have not the information before me.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the minister get it for us?

Mr. VENIOT: I notice that the commmissioner of customs is now receiving $9,000 whereas the salary last year was $12,000. Is that reduction made on the grounds of economy or on the ability and efficiency to fill the position?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. MATTHEWS: The commissioner generally starts at a lower salary.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not think the minister gets my point. The former commissioner received $12,000 while the present one is receiving only $9,000. Is that reduction being made on the grounds of economy or on the ground of ability to do the work?

Mr. MATTHEWS: A new commissioner always starts at a lower salary.

Mr. VENIOT: No, he does not.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): When we had the various items involving a ten per cent salary reduction under consideration last year the government was asked to postpone all such items until their resolution with regard to the deduction was before the house. I think the Minister of Finance will agree with me when I say that the discussion on all such items was held up until the government's policy in connection with the ten per cent deduction was declared. I wonder if the Minister of Finance has any pronouncement to make this evening with regard to the intention of the government as to salary deductions? I think we should know that before we vote this item.

Mr. RHODES: The matter is under consideration, but it will be some little time before it will be determined as to what action will be taken with respect to salary deductions. I am sorry I cannot go beyond that and give my hon. friend the information he desires.

Mr. HEENAN: The minister will appreciate that if we pass one of these items we are practically voting a ten per cent deduction.

Mr. RHODES: I do not agree with my hon. friend. He can protect himself by stating that he is voting without prejudice to his right to object to the salary deductions.

Mr. HEENAN: There would be no use in having made a reservation when all the items had been passed before the government announced its decision.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I think the point raised by the hon. members for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) and Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) is a good one. The committee will recall that last year the discussion of similar items was held up until the government made known its decision in the matter. As the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River points out, it would be no use reserving our rights after we had passed these items. Items will be coming up to-night, to-morrow and on Friday and before passing any items involving salaries we should have a statement from the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister. We should know where we stand. It is all right for the minister to say that the matter is under consideration and he will tell us later on, but it may be two or three weeks before we know. In the meantime we will be called upon to pass a number of items and when we object the same answer will be given, that we can reserve our rights. I do not think it is fair to put hon. members in that position.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We are being asked to support in theory the principle of a salary deduction for the civil service. Before we do that I think we should be given an opportunity of saying whether we approve or disapprove of such a principle. Once the house supports such a policy, then we can go on to vote these items. I recall that last year all the items involving a deduction from civil service salaries were held up until the resolution was brought down by the administration. I think we would be on safe ground in advocating that the same course be pursued this year.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman forgets that last year the deduction of ten per cent was provided at the end of each item while in this instance the committee is being asked to pass an item based upon a ten per cent deduction. Last year the estimates were not so based and the ten per cent was deducted afterwards. In this instance, the committee is dealing with the granting of supply on the basis of a ten per cent deduction.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That makes my point even stronger. Last year, if I correctly interpret the remarks of the Prime Minister, there was left a discretion as to whether the ten per cent deduction should be made or not. This year there is no discretion left to the committee. The ten per cent deduction is embraced in the amount we are voting, so that if we pass this item we are supporting the principle of the ten per cent deduction.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am obliged to those who have started this discussion. I do not think we should be called upon to vote any amount of money for salaries unless and until the government makes some declaration as to what its policy will be. I regret that the Prime Minister has taken the stand that he has. Last year, by making it clear in the estimates that the items were subject to a ten per cent deduction, there was no difficulty. I cannot construe these estimates otherwise than that, in voting for any one of these items in the form in which it is submitted, we are endorsing the principle of the ten per cent deduction. I think the government would be well advised to recede from its present position and allow the matter of salaries to stand until there has been some definite declaration of policy on its part.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I fail to see that the estimates are brought down in any different shape from the estimates of last year. The full salaries are voted, as last year, less ten per cent. That is a partial intimation by the government that as soon as they can do so they intend to restore the salary list, and that being so I do not see that any hardship will be incurred by allowing the salary list to stand, taking up some other item in this department in order to get it in. We did that last year until the government made up its mind.

Mr. BENNETT: The estimates this year are framed on the basis of the ten per cent being taken before they are presented, and as regards the government's mind being made up, it is made up, qua the estimates, on the basis of the ten per cent deduction. That is clear, but the Minister of Finance has already said that there might be conditions that might warrant the restoration of the ten per cent, which of course would be done by appropriate measures.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): These estimates are based on the full salaries less ten per cent?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But we vote ten per cent off every one of the salaries at the end.

Mr. BENNETT: As the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) has pointed out, that was so last year. In order that there might be no misunderstanding on this occasion, the estimates are the statutory salary list less ten per cent, and the vote is for ninety per cent of the statutory salaries, in the vote itself, not at the end of the vote.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not at the end of the vote?

Mr. BENNETT: No; it is right in the vote.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): And it was last year.

Mr. BENNETT: No; last year it was at the end.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am inclined to agree with the Prime Minister's construction of the estimates. On page 85, the second item is commissioner of excise, $8,000. That was last year's vote with the ten per cent deduction, repeated this year. There is no specific ten per cent deduction in the general vote, but I suggest that the principle is the same; if we vote for these items this year we are still supporting the principle of the ten per cent deduction, before the administration introduces legislation, or has intimated whether it wants to revise these estimates or not.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): If the Prime Minister will look at page 84, giving the details of civil government, he will find at the bottom of the page the words "less ten per cent."

Sir EUGENE FISET: On page 85 provision is made for the salary of the commissioner of customs at $9,000, compared with $12,000 last year, but the commissioner of excise receives $8,000 this year and last year his salary was $8,000. Therefore there is no deduction of ten per cent, and the same applies all along the line.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for West Edmonton is correct in saying that with respect to those items to which he has directed attention the deduction of ten per cent is at the end. The estimates as passed, if they are passed, are framed on the basis of ten per cent less than the statutory rate. The year before last, when the suggestion of the ten per cent cut was made, the hon. gentleman from Ottawa said, "We must have a vote on the question whether or not there shall be a deduction of ten per cent"; and it will be recalled that on going into supply—that at any rate is my memory—the matter was raised and a vote was taken, and the statutory provisions were reduced by ten per cent when the estimates were passed. Now, so far as what is taking place to-night is concerned, it is the passing of estimates which are reduced by ten per cent at the end of the salary list, as stated. But the basis of the estimates, as the Minister of Finance has said, is the ten per cent deduction.

Mr. DUPUIS: But the law reducing salaries by ten per cent is not yet passed. How can you deduct ten per cent from the estimates before knowing whether that law will be passed by the House of Commons? The government is going ahead of its power. Of course, in the light of what we have seen in the past three years, we on this side are not surprised that none of our friends opposite are with us, although I have no doubt that at heart they think we are right. We do not expect that they will come with us, though they would like very much to be with us, seeing what is coming. At any rate, the law has not been passed reducing the salaries ten per cent, and before that law is passed I do not see how we can reduce the estimates by ten per cent.

Mr. HEENAN: Will the Minister of Finance look at page 85? The second item is for commissioner of excise, $8,000, and last year the salary for this position was $8,000, including the ten per cent.

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend will look at the bottom of the next page, he will note that the total of those salaries is subject to a deduction of ten per cent.

Mr. HEENAN: I am afraid when my hon. friend answered before the Prime Minister spoke, he gave us a wrong steer.

Mr. RHODES: If I did, I did not do so intentionally. Last year it is true that items affecting salaries, which were subject to a deduction of ten per cent, were held up by hon. gentlemen opposite. That is their privilege; they may do so now if they wish. That is for them to determine and the government will have to bow to their will. I have nothing to add to the statement which I made previously, namely, that if we were to have the estimates prepared for parliament in time for the work of the session to be conducted in an orderly fashion, we had to set them up on a basis similar to the one we used last year. I have only to repeat that the question whether the ten per cent deduction will, in the final analysis, be made, will have to be determined subsequently.

While I am on my feet, may I say to my hon. friend that I can only repeat what I said so many times last session and the session before, that nobody will be more delighted than I when the country is in a position to let salaries return to their normal basis.

Mr. HEENAN: I think we shall all be delighted when that time arrives.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It will not be under this government.

An hon. MEMBER: Sure, it will.

Mr. HEENAN: I assure the Minister of Finance that the matter is not one of holding up the item, but of knowing what we are voting. The minister himself says that the question has not yet been determined by the government; that it is under consideration. If I did not misunderstand the Prime Minister, he said that the government had already determined it.

Mr. RHODES: No, only on the basis of the estimates. It is determined only so far as the estimates are concerned. The Prime Minister's statement coincides with mine except as to a difference in language. He said that qua estimates it was determined, but the question whether, in the final analysis, the ten per cent deduction will actually be made, will have to be determined subsequently.

Mr. HEENAN: Then my contention holds good that if we pass these estimates, we are voting for a ten per cent deduction.

Mr. RHODES: There is no question as to that except that it is understood, if my hon. friend does so without prejudice to his right to object so far as he is concerned to the ten per cent deduction, he is absolved. The government has not yet finally determined whether the ten per cent deduction will be made.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The total estimate for salaries for 1934-35 is $911,550 and for 1933-34 it was $963,320. The former amount less ten per cent or $91,155 comes to $820,395, and the latter less ten per cent, or $96,332, comes to $866,988. Therefore we are called upon now to vote $820,395 which is the result of a deduction of ten per cent. I certainly shall not vote for that, because I am not going to admit that the ten per cent deduction ought to be made again this year. If I vote this amount for salaries, not only implicitly but by the brutal fact I am condemned; I cannot go back; I am estopped, because I have voted for the total amount of salaries required this year less ten per cent. That I certainly do not want to do because I am not in favour of the deduction and therefore I hope the matter of salaries will be left over for the present.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): I do not see any use for a bill being introduced to restore the amount taken off by the ten per cent deduction.

Mr. VENIOT: If the minister will look at the estimates for 1933-34, he will find that the same situation prevailed then as does now. The estimates were submitted in the same way and we took then the same objection as we are taking now. I understood the Prime Minister this evening to say that the situation this year was different from that of last. It is not. Last year we voted and we deducted ten per cent from the aggregate vote. We are doing the same thing this year. Last year we objected to the deduction and it was held over until such time as the government made their decision. The situation is the same this year. Why ask us to accept the principle this year when the government acquiesced in our objection last year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does the salary deduction bill not expire on March 31?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think my hon. friend will agree that last year we raised the question that we could not do anything by voting for items and the government introduced legislation to cover the general principle. This year they are asking us to endorse, by voting for items, the principle of a salary deduction, but the only way in which they can do this is by introducing legislation. The point raised a few minutes ago is quite correct; we should not be forced into the position of supporting a general principle on a detailed item until we have an opportunity of voting as to the general policy of the government as indicated by its legislation.

Mr. RHODES: I can see that we are not going to make much progress because hon. gentlemen opposite have made up their minds that these items are not going to go through in their present form until the question of deduction has been disposed of. Therefore I think we are simply wasting time. The senior member for Ottawa has taken the responsibility of saying that because civil servants are not securing one hundred per cent of their salaries, they shall not receive the ninety per cent. I move therefore that the consideration of this item be deferred, and for the remainder of the evening we shall take up items having no reference to salaries.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): After the remarks of the Minister of Finance, I think it would be well to ask whether the information we get from the government is authentic. Until I secured last year's estimates I was not quite sure whether the estimates of this year were identical with those of last. The Prime Minister said that they were not and in saying so had the support of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. Now I find that they are identical. We are not seeking to prevent the civil servants from getting their salaries, but rather we want to have the same procedure followed as was followed last year. If the civil servants are denied their salaries, it will be because the government has not made up its mind whether it intends to revoke the ten per cent deduction.

Mr. RHODES: The motion to postpone discussion is not subject to debate, but as my hon. friend has spoken, I may be permitted to say that the Prime Minister is quite competent to discuss his attitude with the hon. member for West Edmonton, and unless I am required to do so, I do not propose to take up the cudgels in his behalf. But I maintain that a reference to Hansard to-morrow will sustain me in the position I have taken with respect to the set-up of the estimates.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On a question of privilege I disagree entirely with the Minister of Finance in regard to the observations he made in connection with the hon. member for Ottawa. After all is said and done, the government is making a deduction from a statutory salary and the only way in which this can be done properly is by an act of parliament. The senior member for Ottawa is quite correct in the position he has taken.

Mr. RHODES: I am sure that the hon. the senior member for Ottawa will appreciate that my remarks were a mere pleasantry. I am sure he quite understands and the civil service, which is a highly intelligent body, will not be deceived by anything said by my hon. friend or by me. They know full well the character and tenor of my remarks.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am pleased with the remarks of the minister. I know he did not mean them in the way they could be taken. The government has until the first of April to decide upon its policy. There is ample time between now and then for the government to make up its mind what it is going to do, and if by that time it has not made up its mind whether the services are to be deprived of ten per cent or not, the responsibility will be upon the administration. But until the government declares its policy, I refuse to let these items go as they are. I do not think it is fair for the minister to put it up to us in that way. There is no reason why the civil service should suffer simply because the government has not made up its mind.

Motion agreed to.

Item stands.

Railways and Canals—miscellaneous services —including salaries of experts employed temporarily, $33,500.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Are those salaries subject to the ten per cent reduction?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hackett): No, they are not in the civil service.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. DUPUIS: The members of parliament are not in the civil service but they are subject to the ten per cent cut.

Mr. HOWARD: Do these experts include those who have been retained to study the question of deepening to forty feet the channel below the city of Montreal?

Mr. MANION: No, that is under the Department of Marine.

Mr. HOWARD: Who are those experts?

Mr. MANION: This is miscellaneous services. This vote is in continuance of the annual vote formerly provided under the title "services and inspection of railways". It is provided in order that funds may be available for any special surveys, investigations or examinations that may be required in connection with railway matters or matters related thereto, to pay the salaries of official car porters, and repairs and incidental expenses in connection with the maintenance of official cars under the jurisdiction of the department, including the Governor General's cars.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Is their pay less the ten per cent?

Mr. MANION: That is true at the present time of all civil servants. We are not dealing here with civil government salaries; this is the ordinary staff. Of course all of them are being paid at the present time less ten per cent, including my hon. friend and myself.

Mr. DUPUIS: I was told a moment ago that there was no ten per cent reduction in this item.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hackett): There is not.

Mr. MANION: No, we were speaking of another item. I am not dealing with the civil government item of my department at present. All of these votes include a certain amount of salaries, so if my hon. friends insist on holding up everything that includes salaries they should have held up everything to-night, because every item passed to-night includes a certain amount of salaries. For instance the item for the Board of Railway Commissioners included salaries, and they are all cut ten per cent.

Mr. SANDERSON: How many experts are included under this item?

Mr. DUPUIS: Who are these experts anyhow?

Mr. MANION: In this item there are no experts included. This merely deals with the miscellaneous items involved in carrying on the administration. I can give the details if my hon. friend wants them.

Mr. DUPUIS: No, but in all good faith I would like to know why the government before presenting all these items which the Minister of Railways said a moment ago were all concerning salaries—

Mr. MANION: No, I did not say that.

Mr. DUPUIS: —why they did not pass the general legislation reducing by ten per cent all these salaries, so that we would know what the position is. It is surprising to me to see the government playing the role of the squirrel, jumping from one item and one department to another. I suggest that it is not a proper thing for the government to do; some time they might find themselves short of a tree.

Mr. CASGRAIN: They might fall in the ditch.

Mr. DUPUIS: I think in all good faith they should pass that general legislation before asking this committee to vote all these items relating to salaries.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend is wrong. These items do not relate specially to salaries. Let me explain. The Minister of National Revenue did bring in an item dealing entirely with salaries, that item of civil government. The Minister of Finance, after listening to the discussion for the last half hour or so in which my hon. friend—quite legitimately—opposed the carrying of that item, suggested that it stand over. Now I am dealing with another item, which of course includes a certain amount of salaries but is not civil government. I have the civil government item in my department also, but am not dealing with that. The item now in question deals with a lot of miscellaneous things; for example, telephone and telegraph tolls and things of that sort. It is not all salaries, but I repeat that there are few items that do not contain something in the shape of salaries, because they all have officers administering at any rate. So without doubt salaries are involved in all the items that have passed and to which my hon. friends had no objection until the Minister of National Revenue took up the question of civil government, and then they rightly protested. That is the item, my friends will remember, that was held up last year. But this item has nothing to do with salaries except as incidental salaries are comprised in it, as in almost every item.

Mr. SANDERSON: The item is quite clear. It says:

Miscellaneous services—including salaries of experts employed temporarily.

I would like to ask the minister to give us some detail in regard to that vote.

Mr. MANION: I had not noticed that wording; I was looking at my notes. The only expert employed under that vote, if he can be called an expert—I had not thought of him as such—is Mr. Lazier, the engineer in my department who checks up the Beauharnois work, representing the government, and sees that the Beauharnois company keeps within the regulations of the agreement with the government.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is his salary?

Mr. MANION: $6,000 a year.

Mr. SANDERSON: What services does this expert perform?

Mr. MANION: I have just explained.

Mr. SANDERSON: Not very clearly.

Mr. MANION: It may not be clear to my hon. friend. I will repeat. Mr. Lazier is the representative of the government, or of my department acting for the government, checking up Beauharnois on their plans and the execution of their works to see that they do nothing outside of the agreement with the government.

Mr. DUPUIS: Is that the only one who receives salary under that item?

Mr. MANION: No, there are others.

Mr. DUPUIS: We want to know about them.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend who asked the former question was dealing with experts.

Mr. SANDERSON: The minister has mentioned only one.

Mr. MANION: He is the only one I know under that item.

Mr. DUPUIS: It says "experts."

Mr. MANION: That is bad grammar; that is all.

Mr. SANDERSON: As a rule the minister is very clear in his explanation, but to-night he is not clear. I should like some further particulars with regard to this vote, which reads:

Miscellaneous services—including salaries of experts employed temporarily, $33,500.

This speaks of experts employed temporarily, not of an expert, and with all due respect to the minister his explanation has not been very clear.

Mr. MANION: I am sorry, but I have given the explanation. I am not responsible because the word is plural where it should have been singular; I think that must have been a slip on the part of the man who made up the item, because according to the information I have here, and I am quite sure it is correct because I have all the details of the item, the only person to whom the word expert might be applied—and I had overlooked it when my hon. friend asked his question at first—is Mr. Lazier, who as I have already said, is our engineer on the Beauharnois works. He is an expert engineer, though I do not know that the word expert should be applied to him. The rest of the salaries are for the men who work on the different cars of the Governor General and the government. Outside of those there are no other salaries in this item, and Mr. Lazier is the only one to whom the word "expert" could be applied. So I am quite sincere, and I am endeavouring to give the information to my hon. friend as well as I can.

Mr. SANDERSON: I do not doubt that the minister is endeavouring to give all the information he has, but as yet he has not made it very clear to me. Apparently there is one expert. What salary is he getting?

Mr. MANION: Mr. Lazier? $6,000.

Mr. SANDERSON: Where does the balance come in?

Mr. MANION: I offered to give my hon. friend the balance if he wanted it.

Mr. SANDERSON: We would like the names.

Mr. MANION: I will give the information. The first item is general office expenses, including telegraph, telephone, express, travelling expenses, printing and stationery, $1,000. Miscellaneous unforeseen, $1,500; that would be such things as I have just read, if our telegraph or telephone accounts ran a little higher, perhaps. Government official cars, operation and maintenance, $15,978.50. I have the names of the porters, but as they are exactly the same gentlemen who were in charge of the cars under my hon. friends, so far as I know, I suppose there is no need to give them, although I have no objection if my hon. friend wants me to do so.

Mr. SANDERSON: Please.

Mr. MANION: There is a Mr. Perryman, in charge of car 100; he receives $1,740. Then there is H. Giles, also with car 100; he receives $1,215. Mr. W. R. Brown, in charge of car 101, receives $1,740, and Mr. W. I. Nevin, also with car 101, receives $1,215. Mr. R. E. Warwick, in charge of car 104, receives $1,740 and Mr. K. Dawson, also with car 104, receives $1,215. Those salaries total $8,865. Then there is an item for repairs and alterations to the Governor General's cars, of which I think there are three, and that item amounts to $3,500. There is an item for repairs and maintenance of the government cars; they are all old cars which I think have been in service since the days of Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Mr. SANDERSON: How many official cars are included?

Mr. MANION: There are three. The item for repairs and maintenance amounts to $8,000. Then the Beauharnois surveys and inspections amount to $10,000, which includes the salary of $6,000 to Mr. Lazier. In addition we provide him with board and quarters, which cost $800. The company have a camp there, and we pay this amount to the company. There is an item of $1,600 for flow measurements carried out by the head office, including casual labour, and an item of $1,600 for general expenses. The last item amounts to $1,521.50, and it is to cover unforeseen expenses. These different items give a total of $33,500, so my hon. friend will see that there are no experts hidden anywhere in this vote. I have given every detail, which is more than I have ever been asked to do before, though I have no objection to doing so.

Mr. MITCHELL: I understood the minister to say that these employees were not subject to the ten per cent deduction; is that correct?

Mr. MANION: No, I said they were. My hon. friend and myself, he as a member and I as a member and a minister, are subject to the ten per cent deduction, and every employee in the civil service is subject to the same deduction so far as I know. The only point of difference, as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has explained to the committee, is that the question of our future policy has not been definitely decided. My hon. friends question the propriety of dealing with the civil government, which was the item brought up by the Minister of National Revenue, before that policy has been decided upon. These items do not deal particularly with salaries, but practically each item contains some salaries.

Mr. MITCHELL: What is the salary of Mr. Lazier?

Mr. MANION: He receives $6,000, and I had overlooked the item which followed, of $800 for board.

Mr. MITCHELL: Less ten per cent?

Mr. MANION: Yes, I think so. It does not give the details here, but that is my understanding. I would have no objection to giving all that information even on another item, if my hon. friend will remind me. I did not know I was going on with my estimates to-night, and my deputy is not here. I am rather filling in, so I may not be able to give all the details my hon. friends may desire, but I will give everything I have. I have nothing to hide.

Mr. VENIOT: Perhaps it would clarify matters if the minister would distinguish between the civil service as we understand it and government employees outside of the service. If that were done it might be easier to understand these items. The items to which we have objected were those dealing exclusively with statutory, fixed salaries paid the civil service. I do not think we would object to salaries such as those now mentioned by the minister.

Mr. MANION: I may be wrong; I have not had the question brought up in just that way, but this is how I would make the distinction. The item brought up by the Minister of National Revenue dealt with what we call the civil government item, which covered his staff in the city of Ottawa. In addition there is, as no one knows better than the hon. gentleman, a staff throughout the country which is not ordinarily included in the civil vote.

Mr. VENIOT: We are not objecting to those salaries on the ten per cent basis.

Mr. MANION: That is the difference; civil government takes in the whole civil service in the city of Ottawa whereas the other parts of the service are dealt with in these other items such as the one now before the committee.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Do I understand that they are not subject to the deduction of ten per cent?

Mr. MANION: I say that so far as I know, and I think I am correct, everyone has had that deduction imposed.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Not according to this item; it does not say that these people are subject to a ten per cent deduction. I should like to know from the minister if Mr. Lazier, who is an engineer of repute, has the ten per cent deducted from his salary?

Mr. MANION: I cannot give my hon. friend any further information than I gave the hon. member for East Hamilton. It does not show in the details before me, but I believe the ten per cent applies in his case also. Possibly I may be mistaken, due to the fact that Mr. Lazier is only a temporary employee, and as I speak it comes back to me that when Mr. Lazier was employed, which I believe was only about a year ago, an exception was made. Mr. Lazier is a very well known engineer who I think was doing some work on the Welland canal, not for us but for a private corporation. As my hon. friend will remember, the whole Beauharnois deal was in the hands of the Department of Public Works for quite a long time. Then it was transferred to the Department of Railways, and we felt that we must have an engineer of outstanding ability who would check up the Beauharnois company in all their engineering works. I am not saying that as any criticism of Beauharnois, but Mr. Lazier was hired on that basis. I have told my hon. friend that I will give definite information on some other item that comes up after to-night, but I have it hazily in my mind that when Mr. Lazier was hired it may be that we did not insist upon his taking the ten per cent deduction or he may have refused to take it because he is only temporary, and is a good engineer. A salary of $6,000 is not excessive for an outstanding engineer of his type. But in general the whole civil service is subject to the ten per cent deduction. There may be an occasional exception, and Mr. Lazier may be one. I cannot say at the moment, but I will give definite information on that point on any other item when I have my deputy here at some future time.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Are there any other private cars covered by this item besides those the minister has mentioned?

Mr. MANION: No, I have given every private car which the government has. It is the same number as were operated by the late government and by the government before that. The number of cars has been exactly the same for twenty or more years, and I think the cars are the same with the exception of one or two.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Was there not one rebuilt some time ago? Is that covered by this item?

Mr. MANION: There were two rebuilt some time ago, and I can give my hon. friend the details if he wishes. The cars are covered by this item. One car was rebuilt under the late government and one under this.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Are the cars known by numbers?

Mr. MANION: Yes, most of them, 100, 101, 104—

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Why the jump in numbers? Were some of the cars abolished?

Mr. MANION: Maybe some of my hon. friends stole some of them when they were in power. But seriously, so far as I know these are the only ones that we took over.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Is a particular car placed at the disposal of a particular minister? Who has the choice of these cars?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The Minister of Railways has one.

Mr. MANION: My modesty forbids me to tell my hon. friends much about that except that the Minister of Railways by virtue of his position, has the right to one car. May I add that I often lend it to my colleagues? It is 104, the highest number. Then there is one for the Prime Minister, and he often lends it to his colleagues.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is the number?

Mr. MANION: The number is 100, and car 101 is used when they cannot get the Prime Minister's or the Minister of Railways' car.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is a car for the National Defence department.

Mr. MANION: Yes, but that is not under my department.

Mr. RALSTON: That is lent more than any of the others.

Mr. MANION: I think that is true.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Have the cars names as well as numbers?

Mr. MANION: I do not know anything about the names.

Mr. HEENAN: I think the Minister of Railways was quite right when he said that in voting these items we are passing on the principle of the ten per cent deduction. That is the reason I rose, to ask where we are heading, and I still think I got more of an explanation from the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister. We are trying to help the government out by passing items in the different departments so that the government can go into supply on other days, and because we are doing that we have the Minister of Railways telling us that we did not object to any items that have already been passed. That is just an indication of how under this government, when we try to facilitate the business of the house, the first thing we know we are jockeyed into a position from which we can hardly recede. This item does provide for salaries, and while it is true they may be salaries for the outside service, there are many of us on this side of the house—I do not know if we are all of the same opinion, but I for one am certainly much more against a deduction in the salaries of the outside service, the low paid men on the canals, than I am against a deduction in the salaries of the higher paid civil servants. Consequently, Mr. Chairman, I do not see how we can pass any of these items until the government brings in a measure announcing its policy.

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to get into a dispute because I feel goodnatured and I am sure my hon. friends opposite are, but my hon. friend is not quite right when he says that I said we were dealing with the principle of the ten per cent cut. I did not say anything of the sort. We are not, in dealing with any of these items, dealing with the principle of the ten per cent cut. We are dealing with the ordinary items of government. The principle of the ten per cent cut, I think it was decided last year, should be dealt with in connection with the civil government estimates, and the mistake, if mistake there was, was in going into civil government items at all. That happened quite unintentionally just because the Minister of National Revenue probably called the first item under his hand. I repeat, we are not dealing with the principle of the ten per cent cut in any of these items. We are simply taking a noncontentious item in each of the departments. Further I do not think it is fair to make the statement that the government attempted to put anything over, because we have done exactly what the Prime Minister said we were going to do. He said that we were going to go into a few of the departments so that the business of the country would not be held up. In other words, if we are through with ordinary government business on Thursday or Friday we shall have something with which to deal once these items have been called. It has always been the custom for us to take up estimates about Friday, when many hon. gentlemen want to get away to Toronto or Montreal.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We have taken up two more departments than the Prime Minister mentioned last night.

Mr. MANION: I have no objection to this item being held up, but I think after all the discussion we have had upon it, a good deal more than we usually have, with all due respect my hon. friends might allow the item to pass on the understanding that the one piece of information I have not given them.

that is the full details of Mr. Lazier's salary, I shall gladly give as I promised my hon. friend from East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell), my hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. Sanderson), and my hon. friend from Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain), on some other item. There is nothing to hide in connection with this item, and after all the discussion we have had upon it, perhaps hon. gentlemen opposite will be as courteous to me as I have attempted to be to them and allow the item to go through.

Mr. HEENAN: The minister is very nice and I believe he will give us all the information we want, but I want to make it clear that we are voting on a principle. We have held up an item for a man with a salary of $9,000 a year because we refused to vote on the principle of the ten per cent deduction, and here we have an item covering the salary of a man getting about $1,200 or $1,500 a year, and we are asked to vote a ten per cent reduction for that man after we have refused to vote a similar reduction for the $9,000 man. I do not think we can possibly let the item pass, although I would have been the first to accommodate the minister, especially when he is in such a nice humour.

Mr. MANION: I am quite agreeable to having this item stand.

Item stands.

Miscellaneous—loan to harbour commissioners of Montreal with interest at a rate to be fixed by the governor in council, for such period and upon such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine, and to be applied in payment of deficits resulting from the operations of the Montreal harbour bridge, $497,000.

Mr. DUPUIS: As this is a large amount, we will pass it.

Mr. RHODES: This is to implement an undertaking made by the government some years ago, in fact before we came into power. It is a guarantee of the interest upon the issue of bonds for the construction of the Montreal harbour bridge, the issue outstanding being $19,000,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): How much was paid last year?

Mr. RHODES: Last year we paid $488,825.

Mr. HEAPS: Was that paid from the federal exchequer?

Mr. RHODES: That is the portion that came from the federal exchequer; both the city of Montreal and the province of Quebec pay a portion.

Mr. REID: What is the total paid out by the dominion?

Mr. RHODES: In 1930-31 it was $170,000; in 1931-32, $533,850, and in 1932-33, $395,000. I have a note that in those years no charge was made for the cost of furnishing money in New York which at prevailing rates amounted to $60,973.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Exchange?

Mr. RHODES: Exchange. In 1933-34 and in the estimates for this year provision is made for the New York exchange. The total amount paid out including the sum to be voted is $2,084,675.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I notice the first year was much lower than the others; was that a full year?

Mr. RHODES: That was only a portion of a year.

Mr. HEAPS: Could the minister give us a resumé of the annual operations of this bridge, say for last year? This would give us some idea of the loss and profit account on the structure.

Mr. RHODES: Here is the statement of operations for the year 1933:

Revenue		$ 377,341 21
Operating expenses	$ 99,332 62
Fixed charges	950,000 00
Replacement reserve	15,000 00
Bond discount	8,846 16
Premium on bond interest	96,355 86
Interest on government advances	64,169 58
Depreciation	166,164 00
		1,399,868 22
Loss for year		$1,022,527 01

Mr. SANDERSON: What proportions do the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal pay?

Mr. RHODES: One-third each, but the amounts payable by the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal are limited to $150,000 each per year. Whatever the deficit may be, the difference between that sum and the deficit has to be met out of the federal treasury.

Mr. HEAPS: All over $150,000 would be a federal obligation?

Mr. RHODES: My understanding is that both the city of Montreal and the province of Quebec have taken care of their obligations.

Mr. HEAPS: I am trying to find out what is really the obligation.

Mr. RHODES: I thought I had explained that, but I will try to use the best and simplest English I know. The loss is divided three ways. The obligation of the province is limited to a maximum of $150,000 per year, and that same limit is placed upon the amount to be paid by the city. If those two sums do not equal two-thirds of the total deficit, whatever the excess may be it must be met from the dominion treasury.

Mr. HEAPS: If the deficit is over $450,000 a year, the whole of the deficit is borne by the federal exchequer?

Mr. RHODES: All above $300,000.

Mr. HEAPS: That makes it still worse. I wonder what the prospects of the bridge are for the immediate future.

Mr. DUPUIS: Let us settle the present; the future will take care of itself.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like to look ahead a little and see what is to be done. It appears that the deficit is something in the neighbourhood of a million dollars on one year's operation, of which deficit the federal government pay $700,000, according to the figures just given by the minister. How long will the government be called upon to meet such deficits?

Mr. RHODES: I would have to be a seer to answer that question. With improving conditions and with the growth of the great city of Montreal, I am in hopes that eventually the bridge will become self-sustaining. Whether it does or not, we have an obligation which we must meet. It is idle for us to speculate now as we have committed ourselves to the bargain.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. SPENCER: The minister will remember that last year considerable discussion took place on this item because it was first estimated that the cost of this bridge would be about $6,000,000 when in fact it eventually cost about $19,000,000. The minister excused himself by stating that he was new to his post and did not have the details at his finger tips. I am sure by now he knows every detail and I should like to have some information on why a bridge which was supposed to cost $6,000,000 should cost $19,000,000.

Mr. RHODES: My recollection is that I gave all the information I had last year. If what I gave was not ample I can assure my hon. friend it was all that was available in the department. So far as the Department of Finance is concerned, our sole association with this bridge is to implement a contract which was entered into by the government. That is all we know about it; we have no further information. If there is any detail of the information which hon. gentlemen wish I will endeavour to secure it from the harbour commissioners in Montreal, but so far as this department is concerned, we have no other information than that which was given last year.

Mr. SPENCER: Is the Minister of Finance satisfied with the enhanced expense in connection with this bridge, considering that the Dominion government has to carry such a liability on account of the increase?

Mr. RHODES: I do not know that it would be proper for me to give an expression of opinion on that point. I know there is a popular assumption that the bridge cost a great deal more than it should have, and certainly it cost a great deal more than was estimated, but I cannot accept street gossip and current suspicion with respect to a bridge of this kind; I can only give such information as I have. The fact is that the obligation exists.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is a complete audit.

Mr. CARDIN: There was never any real complete estimate at the time the bridge was under consideration. The amount ranging from $6,000,000 to $10,000,000 which was mentioned was merely a guess, because the plans were not all drawn. The government decided that a bridge should be built between the south shore and the island of Montreal and it was declared in the House of Commons at that time that the plans were not ready and that no accurate estimate had been made. The whole matter was then explained by the minister and other members to the house, and during the course of construction the plans have been altered very materially by the engineers who had discovered in the bed of the river certain conditions that had not been suspected when it was decided to build a bridge. But no definite amount was ever mentioned, based on any final estimate made by the engineers as to the cost of the bridge.

Mr. SPENCER: That is really the worst excuse I have ever heard put forward by a public man, to say it was merely a guess for the voting of public money in connection with such a large undertaking, involving a sum of between $6,000,000 and $10,000,000. If it was found that the cost was above the estimate, surely those responsible should have come back to the house and said that they had been in error and asked the consent of the house. I do not think the commons have had sufficient information in regard to this bridge.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Has the hon. member not had an opportunity of examining the auditor's report which was ordered by this government after they took office? That report is available and it gives the details of the expenditure.

Mr. SPENCER: The bridge might cost a a good deal more than it should cost and yet the auditor's report might be perfectly in order. Everyone knows that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then the question is one of engineering opinion; that is all. I recall a speech covering the whole construction of the bridge, delivered by the Secretary of State, in which he pointed out that very material changes had been made in the construction. I refer to the auditor's report because it gives a detailed statement of the expenditure.

Mr. DUPUIS: I wish to say a few words in answer to our good friend from Battle River. I want to be broadminded in discussing questions of this sort, without any prejudices. I agree with the hon. member when he says that it is regrettable that a construction of this kind should exceed by two or three times the amount which it was originally expected it would cost. But in his studies of Canadian history has he not come across many other undertakings which were on the same footing?

An hon. MEMBER: The Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. DUPUIS: Yes. Take the Canadian Pacific Railway, or, getting nearer to my good friend's province, take the Hudson Bay railway.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hackett): I must ask the hon. member to confine himself to the item.

Mr. DUPUIS: I am merely making a comparison, and I think the chairman will be good enough to allow me to express my views on this question. No doubt the bridge has been expensive, but I think that my hon. friend should be generous in his view of the matter and not be scandalized by the fact that the cost has exceeded expectations.

Mr. SPENCER: I cannot allow the hon. gentleman's statement to pass without refuting it. I do not criticize the expense of building this bridge on the ground that it has been built in Montreal, because I should be just as critical if it were in Alberta. I am not criticizing the undertaking from the point of view of locality; not at all.

Item agreed to.

Unforeseen expenses, expenditure thereof to be subject to the approval of the treasury board, and a detailed statement to be laid before parliament within fifteen days of next session, $80,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: May we have an explanation of this?

Mr. RHODES: This is an item that has been in the estimates since confederation. I will not give all the years, but in 1927-28 the expenditure was, in round figures, $131,000; in 1928-29 it was only $7,000; in 1929-30 it was $52,000.

Mr. RALSTON: The items in connection with the Prince of Wales and the Baldwin trip were in 1927-28.

Mr. RHODES: I am not criticizing the amount; it varies from year to year. In 1930-31 it was $57,000; in 1931-32, $73,000; in 1932-33, $62,000, and to January 24 of this year, $58,000. I will mention one or two individual items to indicate how the expenditures are made up. For example, the first item is $3,178.42, which we paid for the taxes on the British legation in Ottawa. That is an arrangement that exists between countries. For instance, on our legation in Washington the taxes are paid by the United States government, and the same is true of our legation in Paris. The next item is for taxes on the French legation, $2,498.49, and the next is city taxes on the United States legation, $11,770. Then there are such items as, for instance, a gratuity paid to the widow of Judge Richard D. Ponton, $833.33. There are a number of these gratuities, two months' pay of the retiring judge. There is one large item, payment of loss due to exchange to employees in the Department of External Affairs outside Canada in countries where the Canadian dollar is at a premium, $22,606.17. That is to make up the shrinkage in the Canadian dollar in terms of the currencies of the countries in which these public servants happen to be stationed. Then there is an item to the Windsor District Trades and Labour Council to assist in defraying expenses in connection with the annual convention of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, $500. This vote comprises a miscellaneous collection of items which could not possibly have been foreseen.

Mr. MITCHELL: With regard to the item for compensation of currencies, does that work both ways?

Mr. RHODES: There are some instances where the civil servant gets the benefit of the premium.

Item agreed to.

PUBLIC WORKS

Public works—chargeable to income—
Harbours and rivers—New Brunswick—
Under contract—
Chatham—extension to railway wharf, $9,000.
Essential undertakings—
Campbellton—cribwork block, $2,500.
Harshman's Brook—continuation of harbour improvements, $4,000.
Harbours and rivers generally—for maintenance of services, no new works to be undertaken, $75,000.

Mr. MICHAUD: I notice that the Minister of Public Works has been very modest in preparing his public works estimates in relation to the item of $2,500 for Campbellton. Possibly the minister does not know the town, but it is no small one; it is indeed a large town and besides it is a big shipping point in the maritimes. As a matter of fact last summer I believe more than forty-one ships loaded and cleared from that port with lumber for export. I understand that very strong representations have been made to the department regarding necessary material improvements at the port of Campbellton, because it is the home of one of the largest industries of the maritimes, a subsidiary or branch of the Fraser Pulp company, called Restigouche Pulp. It is also a shipping point for lumber for not only the northern part of New Brunswick, but also a considerable part of Quebec in the Matapedia valley. It is admitted that for some years repairs have been greatly needed and demanded. The public wharf is absolutely out of order and I am informed by engineers that the paltry sum of $2,500 will be sufficient only to keep together what is left there. I understand the board of trade and all those interested are asking for a larger amount in order to put that port into proper condition. If their demands are heeded and their plans carried out, I am informed that the estimated cost is between $30,000 and $35,000. Not only would this enable that port to be placed in a first class condition and encourage the traffic which is sadly needed in that part of the country, but it would indirectly relieve the unemployment situation in that district, not only through the employment of labour, and those lumbering towns are places where unemployment is prevalent in these days, but through the purchase of the timber required, which can be cut right on the spot, and the steelwork, which can be manufactured about a hundred feet from the wharf, where there are good steel works and where good friends of the government could provide what was needed. It is the government's own friends who are insisting that this work should proceed; all the material necessary for making the repairs can be secured locally.

This work would be in the interests of economy, because last summer difficulties were encountered on account of the bad state of those wharves and their inability to be used as they should have been. This summer there will be great need for the use of that port, because during the winter there has been an increase in lumbering operations, and while this may not be known generally, Campbellton is to-day the centre of lumbering operations on a large scale in the maritimes. Outside Saint John, which is a national port, this is one of the local ports where a great deal of shipping is carried on for export overseas and to the United States. With the high rates of rail transportation the reason for these demands for repairs can be readily understood, because lumber exporters and manufacturers in that district cannot at present successfully compete with other exporters centrally located who have a short rail haul. I submit that the cost of not only ordinary repairs but material improvements at the wharf at Cambellton would be a wise expenditure. The unemployment situation in that district would be relieved by the provision of work early in the spring, and also by the manufacture right on the spot of the special dimension lumber that would be required as well as the work for the steel fabricated locally at Campbellton. I hope the minister will take not only my recommendation but the recommendations of the boards of trade and the captains of industry of that district who have made insistent demands for such repairs. Notwithstanding that it may appear as a demand on the treasury in times when economy and retrenchment are being preached, I repeat that it would be practical economy, because it is economy to spend money to preserve what is there and to make the facilities meet the needs of the case.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): The representations that have been made by my hon. friend in connection with this wharf are quite in keeping with those made by boards of trade and chambers of commerce in other directions. Unfortunately we have thought that the revenues at this time do not justify the expenditure, although perhaps the business there would justify it if conditions were better. This vote of $2,500 is just to make some repairs to facilitate ferry traffic, and does not in any way touch the larger question which my hon. friend has mentioned. Unemployment relief works, as my hon. friend knows, have been conducted in cooperation with the province and the municipality; these estimates are not framed for the purpose of unemployment relief, although of course any work carried on does help to relieve unemployment. I can only say that in connection with any program of public works that may be determined upon, my hon. friend's representations will be taken into consideration.

Item agreed to.

QUEBEC

Under contract—
Matane—repairs to harbour works, $19,800.
New Carlisle—wharf reconstruction, $17,000.
Petit Cap—breakwater reinforcement, $34,000.
Essential undertakings—
Anse au Griffons (river)—improvements to jetties, $12,000.
Anse aux Griffons—to complete wharf improvements, $1,400.
Baie Ste. Catherine—wharf improvement, $10,200.
Bonaventure—widening wharf, $4,600.
Grande Anse—wharf, $5,000.
Harbours and rivers generally—for maintenance, of services, no new works to be undertaken, $300,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: This is a very large item. I would like to ask a few questions about it, and I think other members of the opposition will also wish to speak on it. One particular item that interests me is the item concerning the Baie Ste. Catherine wharf improvement, $10,200. I would like the minister to give the details of that work. It is under the heading of essential undertakings. Is it going to be given under contract, or not? I understood last year that the work was to be proceeded with, that an arrangement had been made with Price Brothers whereby the government would get control of the wharf. Some minor or temporary repairs were made, but it never came to my knowledge that the government had purchased the wharf. Therefore I ask how the government can spend $10,200 on a wharf that is not public property. I do not object to works being done in my county, but I myself when I was on the government side, and also since I have been in the opposition, have tried many times to have the government come to a decision on the matter, but always the stumbling block apparently was that no arrangement had been arrived at or satisfactory conclusion come to with this company.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): My hon. friend is quite right; the transfer from Price Brothers has not been completed. As he knows, there is some complication in connection with their financial affairs. It is not proposed to spend this money until the transfer is complete. The money is required to repair the head block, which was damaged by ice in March, 1933, and was repaired temporarily in April, 1933. The only effective way to repair this structure is to straighten the outer end by widening the head block. The traffic involved is the ferry service for passengers and the royal mail.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What repairs were made last year on that wharf? The repairs then made were supposed to be what was necessary under the circumstances; why is this big amount being asked for; especially for a wharf that is not as yet a public wharf?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I have not the particulars, but my official tells me it was simply repairing the flooring of the wharf.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Was there not a staircase or something additional next to the wharf to help the people embark or disembark?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): A movable slip.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Was this work done under contract? If not, who was the supervisor, and who did the work?

M. STEWART (Leeds): I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend the information, but I shall get it. The item will stand.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Before we leave this would the minister inform me if the repair work undertaken on the Rimouski wharf has been completed, and if it is intended to carry on further repairs on the wharf itself out of the general vote?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That information also is not available, but it will be procured and given at the same time.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Do I understand that item 109 stands, the whole item?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Item stands.

ONTARIO

Under contract—
Blind River—dredging, $27,700.
Essential undertakings—
Byng inlet—dredging, $40,000.
Cloud bay—wharf, $5,000.
Fort William—dredging, $28,000.
Owen Sound—harbour improvements, $13,000.
Port Hope—harbour improvements, $9,000.
Toronto—harbour improvements, $12,000.
Harbours and rivers generally—for maintenance of services, no new works to be undertaken, $100,000.

Mr. GOLDING: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister if he has taken into consideration my request in regard to the situation at Bayfield, Ontario. The pier and the dock there are in very bad shape, and two lives were almost lost last fall as a result of the condition. I am not asking the department to spend any money unnecessarily, but I would be grateful if the minister would take that into consideration.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): My hon. friend has made representations. I do not know exactly the extent of the repairs required or whether the work can be done out of this general vote. If it can be done in that way it will be done, but there is no special provision for it here.

Mr. GOLDING: I want to thank the minister; I know he will look into the matter.

Item agreed to.

Saskatchewan, Alberta and Northwest Territories — harbours and rivers generally — for maintenance of services, no new works to be undertaken, $10,000.

Mr. GERSHAW: I should like to direct the attention of the minister to the fact that a bridge is very badly needed across a river near the town of Empress at the junction of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. The people of that district have had three or four bad crops, and the construction of this bridge and the building of the approaches would provide work for many farmers with their teams and many day labourers as well. This bridge is on a main highway; it would be of great service to tourists and would be of particular help to the farmers in that district. The river is crossed by a ferry at that point, which is very unsatisfactory. This matter has been before the various departments for two or three years, and I should be very glad if the minister could give some indication as to whether such a work could be considered and the steps that should be taken in order to have the department undertake it.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): A bridge wholly within a province—

Mr. GERSHAW: This is between two provinces.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): —or between two provinces is not in the first instance a dominion matter. The only contribution the dominion ever makes is when the two provinces get together and agree as to the necessity for the construction of the bridge. They agree to contribute to the cost; they approach the dominion and in some instances, where the traffic is heavy and circumstances warrant, some contribution is made by the dominion. This is never done on the initiative of the dominion; it must be started by the provinces concerned, who must agree as to the need for the work and as to their contribution to the cost, and in some instances the dominion makes a contribution.

Motion stands.

PRIVILEGE—MR. YOUNG

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): I wish to speak to a question of privilege. On Thursday last, February 15, at page 602 of Hansard, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) is reported as follows:

The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) is reported by the Weyburn Review, of November 2, to have stated:

Then he quotes the newspaper:

Referring to the Beauharnois case, Mr. Young said money had been sent by this corporation to Winnipeg to help the C.C.F.

Then the hon. member made this comment on that quotation:

I hope the hon. member for Weyburn made no such statement, as it is absolutely untrue.

That is not exactly what I said. What I said was that the Progressive party did not get very much money from Beauharnois but that a small amount had been sent to Winnipeg for certain members of the party, and those members are to-day going around the country denouncing other people for doing the same thing they did. If my hon. friend had read a little further in the press report he would have seen that I also said that these gentlemen did not do anything wrong in taking the money.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): As a matter of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I absolutely deny that either of the Labour men from Winnipeg received any money whatever—

Mr. YOUNG: I did not say so.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —or the C.C.F. in Winnipeg. It received nothing whatever and the statement now made on the floor of the house is untrue. I ask therefore that the hon. member retract.

Mr. YOUNG: I am afraid the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre did not hear me correctly. I did not say that the Labour members for Winnipeg got any money, I said, certain Progressive members now calling themselves the C.C.F.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: To the best of my knowledge, there are no Progressive members in Winnipeg. I ask, as president of the C.C.F., that that statement which has been made, and which is untrue, be withdrawn.

Mr. YOUNG: In answer to what my hon. friend has said, I think that all he can do is to speak for himself and the party he leads. If he wants confirmation of my statement I would refer him to page 828 of the evidence taken before the Beauharnois committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Weyburn has made a sufficient explanation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There are only two members of the C.C.F. in Winnipeg. The statement has been definitely made that members of the C.C.F. received money—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —and I ask that that statement be withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) made no statement concerning the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre personally. If he chooses to say that certain political parties did or did not do certain things there is no question of privilege about that. He has a right to make such a statement, whether correct or not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I hope that ruling will not be altered the slightest in Hansard.

PUBLIC WORKS ESTIMATES

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): When the estimates for the Department of Public Works were under consideration on the 16th instant, just as we were closing that evening's session, I made certain remarks which are reported in Hansard, at page 686, as follows:

> Mr. Veniot: Before the committee rises I should like to remind the minister that I submitted a request, by way of a motion, for the production of certain papers in connection with the Shippigan wharf. If that report has been submitted I have had no knowledge of it. I wish the minister would have it ready when his estimates come up again.
> Mr. Stewart (Leeds): I will inquire and see that it is brought down as soon as possible.
> Mr. Veniot: I cannot discuss the matter intelligently unless I have that information.

I remained in the house last night until after ten o'clock. Not feeling very well, I retired earlier than it has been usual for me to retire, believing that, the minister not having submitted that report, the estimates for New Brunswick would not be taken up or, if called, would be allowed to stand until the report had been presented to the house. I understand that report has been laid on the table to-day but I have not had an opportunity of discussing the estimates. Owing perhaps to a misunderstanding between the minister and myself, and inasmuch as I was under the impression that the estimates for New Brunswick would not be dealt with until that report had been submitted, I have had no opportunity of discussing the estimates for that province. I now claim the right as a member, when the supplementaries come up, not to be debarred by the rules of the house from discussing the general estimates of the province.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): In reply to my hon. friend from Gloucester, I do not ask him to wait until the supplementary estimates come up. I shall be very pleased to give him an opportunity to present his views on any item that may come up in the estimates the next time. I am sorry if there has been a misunderstanding.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PROPOSAL TO ADOPT SYSTEM NATIONAL IN SCOPE

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the most effective way to ensure protection during periods of unemployment, which unemployment insurance should provide, is to make such legislation national in its scope.

He said: I do not propose to do more than just outline this important matter, because I am advised that there are quite a number of members on both sides of the house who wish to debate it. Therefore I will shorten my remarks to give them an opportunity, with their superior eloquence, to press home various points in connection with it. To anyone outside the house it might appear that the wording of this resolution is somewhat weak inasmuch as it makes no specific request or demand on the government to evolve a system of unemployment insurance, but those of us who are in the house know that had the resolution been more specifically worded, there might have been a danger of its being ruled out of order under the rule which prohibits private members from bringing forward any resolution involving any large expenditure of public money.

When this subject of unemployment insurance was first brought up in the house, its sponsors were regarded more or less as fanatics and we were threatened with the terrible consequences that might happen and were pointed to Great Britain where they had that thing which was regarded as so horrible, the dole, which was represented as a sort of mixture of anarchy and nihilism. But times have changed; we have seen money spent even in Canada for the worst form of dole, not by millions but by the hundreds of millions, and without any safeguard for preserving the morale of the recipient, such as they have at least to some extent in Britain where the man knows when he does work, he contributes somewhat to the support of the system by daily payments. Britain, of course, fell into the error of not recognizing that she had a national emergency to deal with and she tried to unload upon what was a quite solvent but limited system of unemployment insurance, almost a national catastrophe which the system was totally unable and never was intended to carry.

The illustration would be something like this: Supposing an insurance company doing a good business in a province and with a strong reserve thoroughly capable of paying all its obligations out of the premiums collected, suddenly decided that in future it would make payments to everybody who died in the province whether they had paid premiums or not. The inevitable result would be almost immediate bankruptcy and that was what took place in Britain, but she has since recognized that and has reorganized her unemployment insurance system, drawing a line of demarcation between the normal ebb and flow of unemployment and what might be called a national condition. The system she now has of unemployment insurance is thoroughly solvent and likely to continue so. It is such a system that we ask. We do not expect or suggest that the government can at the present time produce a scheme that will attempt to cover a national emergency such as we have had in Canada during the last two or three years. I emphasize this because I know that will be an objection raised against the proposal. We shall be told it is now impossible to do anything of the kind because it would mean such an enormous expenditure. I might quote the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) as an illustration. Speaking with his usual airy nonchalance on February 13, of this year, he said:

> I say to the hon. gentleman that unemployment insurance could not be proceeded with in any country in the midst of a depression such as we have been passing through; at a time like this it would be impossible to create such a scheme. A time will come without doubt when this subject will have to be considered, and either insurance or something to take its place instituted in order to look after unemployed people in times such as these.

At the time he made that remark, there immediately occurred to me the illustration which was used by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) a day or two later, of the Irishman who could not repair his roof when it was raining because he would get wet and when the weather was fine, what was the use of repairing the roof, because the wet was not coming in? If anyone would not be galvanized by the experiences we have had during the past two or three years into taking steps dealing with unemployment insurance, there would not be much hope or likelihood of his taking any measures when conditions improve, because just like the Irishman he would say: We do not need to do anything just now. But as the hon. member, being a doctor, knows, when a man is taken seriously sick, it is wise and proper for him to call in medical help, but pending the arrival of the medical man, it is also wise and sensible for him to employ methods of first aid of which the medical profession is the first to acknowledge the benefit, and unemployment insurance is an excellent palliative of the ordinary, normal amount of unemployment. When the national catastrophe came along it would certainly ease the strain to no inconsiderable extent if a well organized system of unemployment insurance were in existence capable of taking up to the full the normal unemployment and it would possibly be the basis of an organization that might be very useful in extending its operations.

I have not been interested in this subject to any extent prior to the last seven years. Prior to that time I considered that the introduction of the old age pension was of more immediate importance and I did not give this subject very much thought, but since then times have been moving and we have received much more support for the idea than formerly. For one thing, we have experience behind us. In 1919 only one country in the world, Britain, had any really national unemployment insurance system; now there are nine countries covering some 42,000,000 people and there is no evidence that any of those countries are prepared or anxious to take or are looking towards taking retrograde steps. Some of them have increased the scope and they seem to be satisfied with the system as it exists.

The idea has been endorsed from time to time by many public bodies. I am not going to quote them, but shall instance one or two. I have here a resolution from a Conservative association on Vancouver island; another from the city council of Vancouver; another from a large gathering of ex-service men from all parts of British Columbia; another from the Synod of the Toronto Diocese of the Church of England; another from the Canadian Congress Journal.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the hon. gentleman kindly read one of those resolutions?

Mr. NEILL: This is one:

The Synod of the Toronto Diocese of the Church of England meeting in Toronto during the past month, passed a resolution calling on the Ontario government to take the lead in reopening discussions between the federal and provincial government on the question of contributory unemployment insurance with a view to establishing the same in Canada.

The others were along the same lines. I think most of them suggest a contributory system and the Canadian Congress Journal did the same. While I have not positive proof, I believe the departmental officers of the Minister of Justice some years ago gave their opinion that such a system should be national in its scope to be effective to any profitable extent. In addition I forgot to mention that there was a representation from the Winnipeg and District Labour Unions Unemployment conference. It would appear this is a body that comprises representatives from forty-eight different labour unions and eleven unemployment associations in municipalities adjacent to Winnipeg, so that it covers a very large number of men. We have as the last and perhaps the most important, the endorsation of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). On April 29, 1931, the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), as reported on page 1099 of Hansard, introduced a resolution asking for the immediate inauguration of a system of that kind and the Prime Minister spoke very fully on the subject, giving a careful analysis of the situation. He indicated a willingness to allow the resolution of my hon. friend to go through at that time if he would make certain amendments, and these are the amendments he suggested: he wanted the word "immediate" struck out of the resolution, and he wanted the word "contributory" put in to indicate that it would be on a contributory basis. Further, he wanted it dependent on satisfactory arrangements being made with the provinces. On that basis he indicated his willingness to let the resolution go through, although I think it was ultimately talked out without coming to a vote. Also on page 1103 he expressed his view that anything of the kind would need to be federal in its scope. He then gave a pledge, which I want to quote in full. He said:

[Mr. Neill.]

I propose, if we are spared as a government and as individuals, that the information we will have before our term of office is ended shall be crystallized into the form of legislative proposals to be submitted to this house.

Further on he said:

—I say to him on behalf of the administration that, at the earliest possible moment consistent with obtaining information that is essential to make any measure of social insurance worth while, we will use that information for the purpose of preparing and submitting to this house a measure embodying the views I have expressed.

Then in the fall session of 1932, on November 22, at page 1453, the subject came up again, and the Prime Minister again reviewed the situation. He recalled the remarks he had made on the occasion to which I referred; he spoke of the difficulty due to provincial jurisdiction, and he said:

But that difficulty is one that can be overcome.

And further:

It has been the purpose of this government to call an interprovincial conference between now and the date of the reassembling of this house, to discuss with the representatives of the provinces of Canada this and other problems.

Then he commented on the fact that the information gathered in the census was not yet available and said that he desired to have that information before taking action. He closed by saying, "this was my statement," and he repeated the statement he had made on the prior occasion. He ended by saying, "I merely rise at this moment to reiterate and restate it." So he was carrying along the same position. That was the fall of 1932.

The next day I took the opportunity to congratulate the Prime Minister on his action, and I said that—

I receive the intimation with hope and gratitude, tempered with the assumption that the bill will be a workable and equitable one. I also agree with him that it would not be practicable unless it were on the basis of a contributory system.

That hope and gratitude is beginning to wear a little thin; hope deferred maketh the heart sick. However, I still have hope although in a modified degree.

At the next session, in the spring of 1933, on the orders of the day I asked if any statement could be made of the government's policy, and I was told that in a matter of such importance it would have to be put as a formal question. I did so; on the 27th of February I made formal inquiry whether the government was prepared to make any announcement of its policy along the lines of the declaration made on the 29th of April.

1931, and I was told the answer was, no. This is found at page 2486. A little later, on the 20th of March, 1933, at page 3166 I brought the matter up again and pressed for further information, and recited some of the matters I have already alluded to. The Minister of Labour answered me—at least gave an ostensible answer—he told me, at page 3266:

> The hon. member for Comox-Alberni, I take it, would like to know whether a measure of that kind will be brought before the house this session. I can tell him it will not.

He went on to say that the government would not be justified in taking hurried action, and fell back on that grand old stand-by, honoured by repetition ever since we have had parliamentary government, that "the matter is under consideration by the government." I was not satisfied with that and pressed for further information, but did not get it. A day or two later I brought the matter up again and pressed for some information. I pointed out that they had had this interprovincial conference, in fact, had had two, and I wanted to get some information; I said we were entitled to it, that we were not required to trust to political gossip in the corridors but were entitled to know what the conference had done. I asked, what had taken place? Did some provinces prove belligerent and say: We will not do anything—? If so, we might hesitate in giving them large sums for relief. Or was a reasonable proposal put up, and did eight out of the nine agree? Did just one or two of them hold out? Were they unwilling to subordinate their jurisdiction without any quid pro quo, or was any reasonable scheme suggested? At that stage the chairman found that I was out of order, although there had been ample scope allowed to the minister.

Still later in the debate the Minister of Labour spoke again and said that the matter had been discussed at the conference but that they had agreed not to show their hands, not to tell what each province thought about it. He said the subject was seriously discussed from many angles and the matter was still under the consideration of the government; that being very much the position we started from. I think that was about all the discussion in the house. We got no definite information.

As far as we know, that is the situation. We can only go by what we are told in the house. We hear rumours, but we are not entitled to give them credence. There was no mention of any legislation of this character in the speech from the throne, which as we all know is supposed to declare and announce the legislative program to be brought down by the government. I think this year it amplified more than is usually the case the subjects to be dealt with, but there was no mention whatever of this, which would be an important piece of legislation, so I think we are justified in concluding that it is not in the mind of the government at the present time to bring it down at this session. If so, what becomes of the pledge given in April, 1931, three years ago?

> —that the information we will have before our term of office is ended shall be crystallized into the form of legislative proposals to be submitted to this house.

There might be a play on words, though I think it would be unworthy of the government; they might say; Our term of office may continue for twenty years, and there is lots of time. But of course in the ordinary acceptation of the words, "term of office" means the existing term, the only one concerning which the Prime Minister was in a position to speak with authority; to-day is ours, to-morrow is not. So when he said "before our term of office is ended" he must in all fairness be considered to have meant the existing term of office. He may enjoy many more terms, but those will be different terms from this term. We are asking to see this legislation crystallized, not into resolutions or expressions of opinion, but into legislative proposals, as the Prime Minister said. Now this is the last session of this term of office.

An hon. MEMBER: How do you know that?

Mr. NEILL: Did an hon. gentleman say "no"? Do they not know that? Perhaps they do not want it to be the last term, but I assert without any fear of contradiction that my prophecy will prove correct that this will be the last term. If hon. gentlemen differ from that opinion, I refer them to, I think, the sixteenth chapter of Matthew where the Pharisees were told:

> Ye can discern the face of the sky; but can ye not discern the signs of the times?

From an observation of the signs of the times I venture to make the prediction I have just made. Apart from that there was also the pledge to bring in a measure at the earliest opportunity. That was three years ago. Since then we have had a conference every year, and there was even a special conference in the fall of 1932 or early in 1933 to consider this one matter.

Now I am just about to finish, Mr. Speaker. We want a national system, and above all we want action with a great big A. We want something definite and effective. I might quote the Canadian Congress Journal, which says what they do not want:

> It may be considered good politics to enact federal legislation that is not likely to be made effective for years to come, but the workers of Canada will emphatically refuse to accept as satisfactory any measure not administered equally, on an equal basis throughout the dominion, and which affords to unemployed workers the same protection whatever part of the dominion they may reside in.

The suggestion has been made that the government may bring in a sort of tentative proposal; that is to say, they might offer to contribute a certain sum, perhaps 25 per cent, towards the cost of any legislation enacted by the provinces, leaving the matter entirely up in the air, entirely ineffective and only the merest gesture. I do not say the government has that in view; I am only deprecating the idea if it should be proposed by anyone.

In my view, Mr. Speaker, if the blame lies with the provinces it is the duty and the privilege of this government to tell us who is the guilty party, so that in our respective provinces we may bring the necessary pressure to bear. Which government is opposing it, and why? Were the provinces asked to surrender their jurisdiction with no equivalent return at all? If that is the case you cannot blame them for refusing. Or was there a reasonable, well-thought-out scheme of dominion-wide unemployment insurance submitted to them, to which they were asked to subscribe? If that is so, what was the offer and why did they not accept it?

There are ways of carrying out this scheme other than those I have indicated. We know the system must be federal, but the government can take other methods. I read in the press that an unemployment insurance bill designed to fit the United States system of government has been introduced by Robert F. Wagner, who is chairman of the N.R.A. national labour board. In a strict sense it does not provide unemployment insurance, but it makes it very desirable for the different states to institute such a scheme. Under this act it is proposed that the federal government will place a federal tax on the payrolls of all employers throughout the United States, but if the employers contribute anything to a state system of unemployment insurance they will not have to pay the tax. You see what the effect will be; pressure will be brought to bear in each state to have such a law enacted, because the employers will say to themselves, "We are paying this sum, so we might as well have a state system instead of paying to the federal government." That scheme also has the great advantage that it does away with the strong and reasonable objection that it would not do to have one state put in such a system while the next state did not do so, because that might increase the cost to industry and interfere with interstate traffic. If this law is passed in the United States that objection will be met. I do not say that is the way the dominion should act, but this illustrates the fact that where there is a will sometimes a way can be found.

The other day the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stitt), during the course of some remarks on another subject, said he did not want any pious platitudes. Certainly we do not want any in this case. Shakespeare says there are seven stages of man, and as a rule there are seven stages in any legislative reform coming up from the people, so to speak. First of all there is a speech in the house by someone who is written down as a crank. In a year or two a little more strength is developed and a resolution is brought in, which is voted down; perhaps it is given the six months' hoist. Then it gathers still more strength and goes to a committee, which jollies along for a couple of years, making namby-pamby reports, but finally recommending it to the house. Then it comes to the house and there is a conference or two, which take up another year or so, while the government tell us that the idea is being considered. Then there is a pledge that legislation will be introduced and finally, at long last, the legislation itself is brought down. We have passed through all these prior stages of incarnation; now we want to reach the final stage of creation, of being born, not again, but for the first time.

Before I sit down I should like to add just one word. I hope the government and the Prime Minister—if he were here—will not suppose for a moment that I am making any sort of attack on them. After they have been in power for a number of years governments sometimes get the idea that any comment and almost any inquiry about anything they are doing or have not done is instigated by some desire to make a political attack on them. This subject is far too big for that. I recall that I was the first member in the house to applaud the right hon. Prime Minister when he announced his intention of bringing in this legislation, and I would be only too happy to be the first not only joyfully to applaud but to proclaim in the district which I represent that this was his action, and to give him the fullest credit if he will bring in such a measure so long as it is practical and sound and meets the purposes for which this resolution is put forward.

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to support every word uttered by the hon. gentleman who introduced this motion. I was struck by his observation that a few years ago this was considered a radical move. I think up to four years ago the English dole was a by-word in this country; the general observation was, "We do not pay our men to be idle; we pay them to work." If your memory goes back, Mr. Speaker, you will remember the commissions that were sent from Great Britain to the United States to analyze what they considered was the solution of the golden age. They thought that they had reached the stage where they could manage men and control machines, but in their practical experience they found that their analyses were not sound. To-day in the United States we hear language almost akin to the pre-insurance age language in Great Britain.

It is quite true that many still consider legislation of this description paternalistic; in fact some go so far as to say that it is even socialistic, but in the practical problems arising out of this depression I think it has been borne out by experience elsewhere that a sound system of unemployment insurance, worked out in conformity with the problems confronting the various countries, is not a palliative but an absolute essential in the life of any industrial nation. We regret very much the oft-repeated observation that this is a palliative. Every legislative action we have ever taken might be termed a palliative, but I believe this to be an essential. If a great many of those people who advocate this form of legislation would forget the word "palliative" and call it an essential and an absolute necessity, the progress in this country would be much greater than it has been in the past. I should like to say, also, that in the midst of this depression we have forgotten some of the very real problems which existed in Canada even in the so-called prosperous years of 1928 and 1929, problems of a type which face every country of the world which has adopted a policy of dense agricultural and industrial production. We are apt to forget those things, and in the event of our getting back to days equivalent in normalcy to those of 1928, it will be necessary to have legislation of the description now before us to meet the situations which inevitably arise. I have no patience with those who say that this is not the time to introduce a scheme of this description. In my judgment this is the psychological moment to institute such a scheme, possibly on a comparatively small scale, so that we may build up through the practical experience which we would gain in its operation. I believe that is the best policy which could be pursued.

The men and women engaged in Canadian industry are tired of the promises which have been made that this kind of legislation would be introduced. Every once in a while a statement is made by those who have the power to implement promises to the effect that consideration is being given to the introduction of legislation of this description. I remember that in the election campaign of 1930, in which I took part, my opponent had cards printed on which was the statement that he would be in a better position, if elected, to implement his promise of unemployment insurance, than I would be. I believe it is well nigh time the government brought down legislation having for its purpose the establishment of such a scheme.

I am not unmindful of the fact that the scheme has been bandied from one responsible authority to another, and that there is a suggestion that it does not come within the jurisdiction of the British North America Act or the federal government. But we should remember that at the time of the drawing up of the British North America Act, which governs the relationships between the various governments of Canada, insurance of this type was not contemplated. I do not believe the framers of the act ever dreamed that this country would have such extensive industrial development, and that it would be confronted with the unemployment problem with which we are faced to-day.

I have before me a report of the select standing committee on industrial and international relations. I find that in the year 1921, in an order in council, No. 2722, it was definitely stated that legislation of the type we are now considering comes within the province of the federal government. Recommendation (b) dealing with unemployment insurance is as follows:

> The minister observes that the experience of other countries has demonstrated that a system of unemployment insurance, in order to be effective and successful, must be merely ancillary or complementary to a system of labour exchanges, the whole being adapted to the principal function of finding work for unemployed insured workmen. In this view, unemployment insurance has a pronounced federal aspect, and on the whole, the minister thinks the establishment of a system of unemployment insurance is competent to the dominion in the exercise of its residuary legislative power with relation to the peace, order and good government of Canada.

I think that position is a sound one. This type of legislation differs, fundamentally, from workmen's compensation legislation, and from other laws of a social character which can be operated by provincial legislatures. I mean simply this, that there is the problem of the workman going from one province to the other in search of work. We have the problem of working out benefits of a type which will be the same in every province of the dominion. If legislation of the kind here suggested were developed on the same basis as workmen's compensation legislation or legislation for old age pensions we would greatly impede the mobility of men and women who go from one end of this dominion to the other in search of work. I object strenuously to the British North America Act being used as a brake in regard to legislation affecting the working people of Canada. If we had a war I do not think we would bother very much about the British North America Act, and in my view conditions arising out of unemployment are just as serious if not more so, than those which would be brought about by a war. I think, so far as this country is concerned, the question is moving towards clarification in the minds of those who would otherwise oppose the introduction of a scheme of this description. In my judgment we have not been told enough in this House of Commons about those who are the culprits, if I may use the term, or those who are really responsible for obstructing the progress of such a proposed measure.

I have in my hand a clipping from the Ottawa Journal of to-day which carries a news item concerning a delegation from the Alberta Federation of Labour, which met the government of that province yesterday. The news item states that Premier J. E. Brownlee told a delegation that waited upon the cabinet to-day from the Alberta Federation of Labour that the government has consistently favoured the idea of an unemployment insurance scheme. The news item reads in part as follows:

> All the western provinces have agreed to give up their constitutional rights, he remarked, in order to make the legislation possible, and he understood the dominion government is now working on an act along that line.

I hope the sentiments contained in that newspaper item will bear fruit this afternoon when the minister rises to speak in this debate, and I hope, further, that he will be able to say that the government of Canada has at last reached the conclusion that legislation of this description should be brought before the House of Commons at this session.

The argument has often been used that the cost of social insurance would be of such magnitude that it would entail too great a burden on Canadian industry. I should like to outline to the house the experience the British government has had in this connection. The 1929 Balfour committee, appointed by a Conservative government, went thoroughly into this contention. They considered very carefully the average cost to industry of social insurance in that country. They concluded their report with the following:

> The annual payments of employers in respect of other social services (unemployment and health insurance, workmen's compensation and contributory pensions) amounted to about £50,000,000. The resulting charge which enters into the cost accounts of productive enterprise may be estimated as being on the average rather less than one per cent of the value of gross output.

The question was studied in Belgium, and in that instance Professor Cardyn of the University of Louvain found a similar low percentage of cost in respect to Belgian industry. The total expenses of family allowances, pensions and social insurance in Belgium, although they amounted to about 5·5 per cent of the direct wages, involve an additional cost of only 0·9 per cent on all commodities produced in that country. I think this is a fair indication of the cost which would be apportioned to industry should such an insurance scheme be instituted in this country. There is an added feature in connection with a scheme of this description in the stabilization of costs and wages which follow therefrom.

I was in England last year for the first time since I left there as a boy, except during the war, and I was struck by the tremendous improvement in the living standards of the working people. I was one of nine children; my father was a mechanic and I have a vivid recollection of the terrific struggle put up in those days by a working class family. They did not have the advantage of the social insurance which exists to-day. One of the most significant factors in connection with the introduction of these insurances in England has been the redistribution of wealth which has occurred. There has been a maintenance of spending power in and out of depressions. There are millions of pounds in circulation in Great Britain to-day which under normal conditions would be in the banks and strongboxes of the country. In effect there has been a revolution in the redistribution of wealth but without the loss and bloodshed and suffering which has occurred in other countries when similar changes have been brought about. I think in these insurances we have an exemplification of the genius of the British to meet practical problems through the instrumentality of democratic institutions. I believe that their approach to this problem was a sound one; I believe it is fair to say that they never could have passed through this depression as they have without machinery of this description. Notwithstanding what might be said of conditions in other countries, all advanced thinkers, irrespective of their economic philosophy, have preached the soundness of insurances of this character.

Much has been said about the malingerer, to which I referred in the early part of my speech. It has been said that should a scheme of this description be brought into operation in this country there would be a good deal of malingering. It has been said that moral decay would occur should legislation of this character be introduced, but I should like the records to speak for themselves. It is very seldom that I quote in this house; when I have something to say, I like to say it and sit down, but there are certain findings of governmental commissions appointed in Great Britain which I think are of sufficient importance to appear on the records of this house. I should like to refer to the report of a committee appointed in 1925 by the Conservative government, under the chairmanship of Lord Blanesburgh. This report reads:

> Throughout the inquiry we have constantly had brought to our notice the conviction held by many that the system of unemployment insurance is subject to widespread abuses. It has accordingly been one of our principal preoccupations to ascertain how far this belief is justified. It is convenient to state at once the conclusion we have reached in this matter. It is true that a certain number out of the eleven and three-quarter millions of insured persons have received relief to which they had no claim. But it is equally true that these cases are relatively few.
> We have found in all quarters a general agreement that the risk of unemployment should be insured. Nobody has suggested to us that the principle of unemployment insurance should be abandoned. It has been recognized by all who have appeared before us, and we ourselves share the view, that an unemployment insurance scheme must now be regarded as a permanent feature of our code of social legislation.

Another commission was appointed in 1931 and its findings bear out the soundness of the report of the Blanesburgh commission. In part, the report reads as follows:

> We desire to say that in spite of the difficulties and in spite of criticism that may be fairly made against the present position and against some of the features of the unemployment insurance scheme, it has prevented serious distress in a period of unprecedented unemployment. We are convinced that the principle of insurance against industrial unemployment has an important part to play in the adaptation of our industrial structure to changing needs.

I could go on and on. Objection has been raised by agriculturists to the introduction of a scheme of this description and I am not unmindful of the practical difficulties which stand in the way of an extension of such a scheme to those employed in agriculture. However, I should like to point out that had such a scheme been in operation in this country it would have proved a driving force in sustaining consumption on the part of industrial workers. In my judgment, it would have provided a force which would have had a great effect upon meeting the fall in price levels which occurred. There would have been maintained some equilibrium in the home market in connection with the consumption of agricultural products.

A commission was appointed in Ohio to study this matter. Conditions in that state are somewhat akin to our own, and this is what that commission reported:

> What would this sum of nearly $180,000,000 (accumulated under its plan) have meant in terms of purchasing power to the farmers of the state, to the merchants who cannot sell their goods because large numbers of their former customers are unemployed and have no income with which to buy? What, to the manufacturers who normally supply these merchants with products of their industries? It unquestionably would have had some effect in stimulating business or at least in keeping the decline within normal bounds. It would have provided employment and prevented the continual reduction of working forces, wages and income which has taken place month after month since the summer of 1929. If these results are possible at the modest cost of three per cent of payrolls, a cost jointly borne by employers and employees, it seems to us to outweigh all the considerations that are commonly urged against unemployment insurance.

Such a scheme would be far superior to the dole system which we now have in this country. I think all shades of opinion are frank in admitting that we have the worst system of doles possible. This government could well move in the direction of substituting a sound unemployment measure for the present system of doles. This problem is as old as history itself. An outstanding consideration in the life of all of us is the fear of insecurity. Since the inception of organized group life it has been the aim of civilized society to take away that fear from the mind of those who go to make up the various nations of the world. With the advancement of so-called civilization many of these earlier dangers have been eliminated. We have insured ourselves as far as we can against the whims of rulers, against the invasions of wild beasts and against natural hazards such as fire, pestilence, famine, floods and so forth. The rights of private property have been protected from force and violence, and in my judgment the real test of civilization is the security which it provides its members against the fear of unemployment, ill health and destitution in old age. I think it is fair to say that the cry of mankind right through the ages has been for liberty and security, and a wonderful opportunity offers itself in this resolution to the government, at least to move in the direction towards a provision of security.

We are living in an age in which we witness for the first time in history the possibility of abundance. Every man in this house has lived through that change, the change from comparative scarcity to abundance. Every man dreams, I think, of the potentialities of this abundance and in my judgment it is the challenge of the twentieth century, a challenge which I think must be met.

I believe that this proposed scheme of unemployment insurance rests upon a sound basis in that it actually creates work. That is exemplified when you compare the intensity of the depression in Great Britain with that on the North American continent. It has the power to stabilize purchasing power, and it has the power which opens the avenue in this country to tackle the very real problem of seasonal work and activities. It would be a driving force that would tend to the creation of opportunities for work throughout the twelve months rather than, as at present, on a seasonal basis. More important still, it would permit the unemployed to maintain their self-respect and their pride in their family life and in their ability to meet their obligations without the necessity of going through those channels which at the present time they must go through at the various relief offices in the dominion.

Those people who talk about the abolition of unemployment do so without a knowledge of the facts. I do not think that we shall ever see the day, in the lifetime of any of us at any rate, when unemployment will have been abolished. This has not been possible in any country in the world and it will not be possible in this country. Change in its very essence creates an unemployment problem; change in the methods of production, in this or in any other country, inevitably leaves in its trail a real problem of unemployment, and I would urge the government to bring down the necessary legislation which would be a realization of the statements that have been made over the past four years by the leaders of this government.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. G. D. STANLEY (East Calgary): Before I discuss the question before us, may I read the resolution:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the most effective way to insure protection during periods of unemployment, which unemployment insurance would provide, is to make such legislation national in its scope.

I presume that the point which the resolution seeks to emphasize is that the system of legislation when it is introduced will insist upon its being national. Let me first discuss that phase of the question of unemployment insurance.

The causes of unemployment are not local; generally speaking they cannot be confined to any particular locality. The causes of unemployment are certainly nationwide. As a matter of fact, the unemployment which exists to-day can be said to be international, and history shows us that in the depressions through which we have passed in years gone by the causes of unemployment have very seldom been found to be confined to a single country, let alone a single locality. Hence it is quite easy to realize the difficulty in which we should be placed should individual provinces undertake to introduce varying systems of legislation. It appears therefore that when legislation is introduced in this country it must be legislation controlled entirely by the federal government or, on the other hand, if the provinces are factors, as in fact they are local factors, in connection with an unemployment insurance scheme, the legislation of the various provinces must be uniform in character and must be uniform as to time of introduction. Otherwise, if one province should introduce legislation at one time and the neighbouring province or provinces failed to do so, then the province which we might regard as progressive in outlook and action would be penalized while the neighbouring province, which might be said to be backward in its action, would benefit by reason of the progressive action of the other. What I mean is this. For industry and employees of industry to undertake their share of the contributions necessary to the introduction of unemployment insurance would certainly mean in the long run some increase in the cost of production. Consequently, the province concerned would be at a disadvantage in its competition with the backward one. Not only that, the first province would be an attraction for workmen living in the second, and therefore the difficulties of the first province would be again multiplied and the cost of producing its products in industry further increased. That seems quite obvious; so that we cannot get away from the fact that whatever is done must be done either in a broad national way by the federal parliament or, on the other hand, by the individual provincial parliaments acting with the utmost cooperation and in unison as to both time and character of their legislation.

The matter of the British North America Act has come up. Far be it from me to undertake to discuss that act, but as a citizen and as one who has read at least the ordinary news of the day, I know many difficulties must be faced in regard to the conflicting interests of federal and provincial jurisdictions. It is the easiest thing in the world for a critic to ignore the existence of a constitution, throw it aside and then proceed as if by a mere wave of the hand the constitution had been dealt with, set aside and the legislation placed in a position to go full-steam ahead. Hon. gentlemen know that cannot be done, hence it is that from time to time the federal authorities and the provincial representatives have held conferences dealing with various matters in respect to jurisdiction, amongst them being this very question of unemployment insurance. I do not and I presume other hon. members do not yet know exactly how far those conferences have gone or what conclusions they have reached. I presume many difficulties arose and we are advised, by rumour at least, that those difficulties have not yet all been cleared away. So that, in our calculations as to what steps should be taken nationally in respect to unemployment insurance, we must take account of the position in which those conferences have placed us. Finding fault with this or that province in its attitude on this or other questions regarding which there is conflicting jurisdiction, will not get us anywhere. We are brought to the point where the representatives of this parliament and those of the provincial legislatures are placed in the position that at least for the time being they must arrive at what is the most advanced point to which the various provincial authorities and the federal government can go. That may not be the ideal, but I hope, when the various acts are introduced, we shall attain as nearly the ideal as possible. For the time being this is not a problem of going through the British North America Act, but rather one of going around it, of arriving at a point where we may be convinced that the best position, so far as the various parts of Canada are concerned, has been reached. We must not overlook the fact that in Canada there are many industries; that the same industry conducted in one part is perhaps conducted on a different basis from that in another part of the country; that different sections of our people have differing outlooks in regard to the conduct of those industries and consequently, we must assume that in the dominion-provincial conferences the rights of all the people in the various districts of Canada must be considered and that no offence is extended to any. Therefore we are confronted with the situation that cooperation is the first essential in arriving at a safe basis in legislating for unemployment insurance. Personally, I am in favour of such insurance and shall be glad to see the legislation introduced whether in this house or in the provincial legislatures or in all at the earliest feasible date. When that time comes those who have been in conference with the provinces and who have been most closely in touch with what has been proceeding will be best informed as to what steps are the most advisable to take so far as this federal parliament is concerned.

Passing on to the general consideration of unemployment insurance and leaving aside the chief point of the resolution itself, may we consider for a moment in rapid review the historical background leading up to the advisability of introducing an unemployment insurance scheme in this country. Going back exactly 100 years to 1834, to the Poor Laws of the old country and the principles which were included in those laws and following along during all the years, we find a slow, sure but steady progress in conditions of the workmen in the old land and in this new country. Following along from 1834, if one had time to consider the living, working and housing conditions, the matter of child labour, woman labour and so forth, one would have to review what legislation was introduced during the years to improve all those conditions of which I have spoken, and one would be able to show that from 1834 onwards there was a gradual upward step taken on behalf of those who labour in industry. One could go further and show the development of labour unions and what they meant for labour people, the inauguration of collective bargaining, the question of strikes and lock-outs and so forth. All these have to do with the steps that have led up to the point at which we find our country to-day. Then we should consider the legislation that has been introduced by which the state has stepped in and interfered with the laissez-faire system that prevailed in the early days, along the lines of which I have already fully spoken. We have the various factory acts, the Workmen's Compensation acts, the fair wages acts, the minimum wages acts, and so on. Coming right down to more recent days we have the Versailles treaty itself and the advance which was made by the spirit behind the provisions included in that treaty. Then we have the introduction over the years of the unemployment benefits of the brotherhoods and unions and their extension throughout the various labour unions of the old country and our own country. Then the logical step that followed was the demand for national unemployment insurance, already introduced in the old country and included in the activities of some industries in this country on a voluntary basis. So we have come step by step to the point where to-day there is on the part of the general public, both employers and employees, a readiness to demand some system of unemployment insurance.

One hon. gentleman deplored the use of the word "palliative," and perhaps it is not well for me to repeat it. Yet we must remember that when unemployment insurance is introduced those representing labour should be the first to insist that it is a palliative, that it is not an absolute cure for unemployment. I think it is well for our people in general to recognize that this is one step further forward on behalf of labour. What is the ideal towards which all these movements have been progressing? I would say it is that workmen shall be placed, by means of their earnings during their years of work, in a position to be self-supporting when they have to quit work. Unemployment insurance is one step towards that ideal. It is easily seen that it is a demand upon industry, and is not a light demand. There is no question in my mind that unemployment remains as a problem for industry in our country. As I see it, industry step by step will have to organize and adjust itself to face its responsibility in respect of unemployment, and I am sure that steps will be taken by industry without complaint to contribute to the solution of this great problem.

In general, then, what are the requisites of a good unemployment insurance system? I shall hurry along without going into the matter at length. My first thought is that it should be insurance. Anything that includes the relief problem of our country as part of unemployment insurance legislation will be a mistake. There must be a clear-cut division between the problem of relief for those who require help, and the problem of those employed in industry who pay their contribution on an insurance basis. Unemployment insurance is the insurance of benefits to be granted to those who come under insurance contracts.

My second thought is that it must be a contributory system. Occasionally I read addresses on unemployment insurance, in fact some addresses given in this house, in which there is a tendency to dodge the question whether one is in favour of the contributory system or the non-contributory system. It must be one or the other; it cannot be both and be a success. As far as I see it, it must be a contributory system whereby employers and employees will each contribute their share.

The next thought that occurs to me is that when it is organized and when classifications are taken under the scheme it must be all-embracing and compulsory as far as those engaged in those classifications are concerned. It can readily be seen that if it be left optional on the part of the workman as to whether he shall or shall not be included, the scheme would secure too many bad risks and not enough good risks; consequently its purpose would be defeated.

The next point is that the scheme should be national; I dealt with that at the beginning of my remarks and shall not enlarge upon it.

Next it should be as nearly universal as possible in regard to the various classifications. No one realizes better than those hon. members who are directly connected with the labour interests of this country that in its initial stages an unemployment insurance scheme cannot take in more than a certain number of classifications. In England there has been a gradual development of the scheme until to-day almost all the various classifications have been included. Canada is a different country; it is widespread; the workmen are not so fixed in their locations; they are more mobile, and consequently many difficulties are presented. Of course I need not enlarge upon those.

Then I would say that the scheme should be one that will take every precaution against encouraging indolence. I have marked here in my notes "anti-indolent" and as far as I can see that is one of the most important points which a government or governments introducing legislation of this kind will have to consider. If a contributory system of unemployment insurance is so lax that it allows men who are not properly entitled to benefits to receive them, as soon as that starts we begin to tax employment for the relief of those who are not entitled to unemployment benefits, and of course that would spell disaster to the whole project. Further, the organization of a system of labour exchanges is a point of very great importance in the proper administration of the legislation when it is introduced.

Before I conclude I should like to refer to one or two dangers. The first is that to which I have just referred, the danger of taxing employment for the benefit of those who are not entitled to assistance under the insurance scheme. The second danger is one which I am sure has been considered by every hon. member of the house; that is, the insinuation of political influences into the framing of the legislation or into its administration after it has been introduced. When a government, this year, next year, this decade or decades hereafter, begins to offer a dollar for fifty cents, or when one political party comes along and offers twice as much for half the contribution, disaster will follow sooner or later, and that is one of the dangers which must be avoided. Then there is the thought which so often permeates the public mind in the consideration of anything that has to do with the federal treasury, namely that down here in Ottawa in the treasury department there is a bottomless purse, and that all they have to do is dip down in it and pull out an unlimited amount of money and that it cannot play out. One of the dangers in regard to the working of this unemployment insurance is right there, and the persons who are going to suffer by reason of that sentiment becoming too strong are the workmen themselves.

Unemployment insurance is one further step towards the ideal. Unemployment is a problem which cannot be overcome simply by the spending of money. I said it was a problem, and I am satisfied that we as members of this house, and workmen and employers as component parts of industry, as well as the public who make their contribution through the purchase of products, must appreciate the fact that it is a problem, and that its solution cannot be brought about merely by the spending of money, whether it be public money, the money of industry or the money of the workmen, but that the problem will be solved in the long run only by thought, organization and gradual progress towards the ideal.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, as the representative of a riding in which there are large mining, industrial and agricultural developments, I believe it my duty to say a few words on this resolution. It must be very pleasing indeed to the mover of the resolution (Mr. Neill) to observe the high tenor of the discussion that has taken place this afternoon, and apparently the principle of unemployment insurance is well accepted not only throughout the country but also by every member of this parliament.

When one first reads the resolution he is inclined to believe that it recognizes the fact that the principle of unemployment insurance has been accepted, but personally I am convinced that the principle with which we are dealing this afternoon is one of primary importance if we wish to have unemployment insurance apply to the whole of Canada. It was well said, in the very fine speech to which we have just listened, that because of the British North America Act we find many anomalies so far as the application of unemployment insurance is concerned. No doubt there are some obstacles in the way which will have to be surmounted if unemployment insurance is made national, but undoubtedly that can be done.

I have in mind more particularly the situation which exists in the section of the country which I have the honour to represent. No doubt the country and the house are aware that we have had strikes of lumbermen in the north, and in some sections of Ontario and Quebec some of the men are still on strike. When I spoke during the debate on the address I mentioned certain anomalies which existed with regard to the federal and provincial departments of labour, and no doubt the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) is aware of those anomalies as well. I have found, as he must have found, that although I was willing and ready to give my services, at times I found myself persona non grata; nobody wanted me, because they thought I had no business there as a federal representative. I suppose the same situation applies in every province to a certain extent. The other day I read with a great deal of interest and joy that Hon. Mr. Finlayson, minister of lands and forests of Ontario, was in Quebec working with Hon. Mr. Mercier of that province in regard to legislation having to do with the strikes in northern Quebec and northern Ontario last fall, and also certain labour legislation.

It has been said on different occasions during the last few months that we could easily do away with the British North America Act. The thing is not so easy as it looks, but surely in connection with a matter of such national importance, a matter affecting every section of the population whether industrial, professional or labouring, there should be a way by which the heads of the provinces could get together and deal with the matter in a national way. I will go farther and say that if it is impossible to have legislation on a national scale there should be an amendment to the British North America Act, because some of its features should be amended. This is a very important matter, and one which takes in a lot of ground. As I said, the mover of this resolution apparently had in mind, when he brought this discussion before the house, that the principle of unemployment insurance was accepted in every section of Canada. I believe this is true, so far as the people are concerned. However I sympathize to some extent with the government in some of the difficulties it must necessarily face in the inauguration and operation of such legislation, and in connection with placing it on the statute books of the country.

One of the first obstacles the federal authorities will have to meet will be the smoothing out of difficulties which may arise among the nine provinces. As to how well the principle is accepted in every section of the country is illustrated in an article which appeared in Saturday Night of February 3, 1934. One paragraph of the article, which was written by E. J. Soulsby, is as follows:

To the principle of unemployment insurance all parties have long subscribed, though perhaps in some quarters with little enthusiasm. It was recommended to the dominion parliament as long ago as 1919 by a royal commission on industrial relations, and in Ontario by a provincial commission three years before that. During all the years since then the subject has presumably been relevant to Canadian politics, since the assumption has always been present that sooner or later some action would be taken to introduce unemployment insurance; yet there has been little preparatory discussion of the matter and as a result it will be something of a miracle if satisfactory legislation is produced at the first attempt. There is real danger of a defective measure proving so unpopular and vulnerable to reactionary criticism that at the first favourable opportunity it would be amended in quite the wrong direction.

Then the article goes on to deal very fully with this important question. As for a number of years I belonged to a labour union I can agree with the statement made by the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) that the idea of unemployment insurance only a few years ago was thought to be a radical one. The previous speaker expressed the view that in the near future, perhaps within one decade, we may have unemployment insurance in Canada. I do not dare to be a prophet, but I am familiar with the state of public opinion concerning unemployment insurance. Without trying to prophesy may I say that I am positive that within three or four years at the most we will have unemployment insurance in Canada. As are other hon. members, I am fully aware of the difficulties in connection with the introduction of an unemployment insurance scheme. We know that to-day in Europe, for instance, over 45,000,000 workers are operating under unemployment insurance. Europe has the most highly developed scheme of this description in the world. The same practice has been followed to some extent in Australia, but the principle has not been so readily adopted or accepted on the American continent.

There are several factors existing to-day which, even by labour unions, could not be foreseen a few years ago. Let us, for example, consider the mechanization of industry. When machinery was first used to help man it was accepted simply as a servant, but during the last ten years it has become the master of the civilized world. No one would seek a curtailment of this creative power; nevertheless the fact remains that new machines created by the power of the human mind are taking great numbers of men out of employment, and as time goes on that process is going to be more and more pronounced. I say, therefore, that the one solution to the problem we are facing is to some extent to insure the men engaged in labour and in industry so that they will have some protection at times they are out of employment.

Some people are afraid to tackle certain problems, including this one, because of the cost. Well, let us consider that factor for a few moments. Apparently the last speaker was of the opinion that the cost would be prohibitive and a burden on industry.

Mr. STANLEY: I made no such statement.

Mr. BRADETTE: I accept the correction. At the present time we have established a system which may be described as relief, or a system of dole. There is no doubt that the great amount of that expenditure—

Mr. ST-PERE: It is not the dole.

Mr. BRADETTE: It is a kind of dole. Some of the burden is placed on the shoulders of the industries, and some has to fall on those of the consumers and labourers. Some people are not quite agreed as to whether unemployment insurance should be contributory or non-contributory. So far as I am concerned I believe the insurance should be paid by the three parties directly interested, namely, the industrialists, the working men and the central government. Then, what would be the amount involved? To-day, of a total of about 2,000,000 working men exclusive of the rural population, about thirteen per cent are unemployed. The contributions which they would receive under an unemployment insurance scheme at, say, an average rate of one dollar per day would amount to $92,000,000. Under that scheme $23,000,000 would be contributed by working men, $23,000,000 by industry and $46,000,000 by the federal government. I am of the opinion that because of the high point of mechanization of our industry, and because of the fact that more and more of our working men are being replaced in industry by machinery, there should be a scale established whereby the more highly mechanized an industry may be, the greater contribution it would have to make to the federal treasury under an unemployment insurance scheme. I think in this suggestion I am quite fair. Those who study the labour situation and the industrial life of Canada will readily agree that in some industries there is greater mechanization than there is in others.

I have in mind the great mining industry of northern Ontario. It is true that in our section of the country, for instance, we have no placer gold. Without the highly industrialized mechanization we have at the present time it would be impossible to develop the gold, copper and nickel of northern Ontario. It is true, however, that one can use only a certain amount of machinery in mining operations. Let us consider some other industries where machines have replaced forty or fifty per cent of the men. If I read correctly the reports concerning some industries in Canada it will appear that one machine in some instances has taken the place of 400 men. It must be readily understood by everyone that in considering a system of contributory unemployment insurance the machine will have to be considered as one factor, so that there may be balance, equilization and equilibrium between industries which are highly mechanized and others in which the machine is not so largely used.

Agriculture is becoming more and more highly mechanized. That statement applies more forcibly to the western provinces than it does to some other sections of Canada. The western farmer is more of an industrialist than a farmer, in any sense of the word. Everyone will readily agree that it is almost impossible to use machinery during the pioneering stages such as have been experienced in northern Ontario and Quebec, and this also represents a problem that I expect to deal with during the present session.

So far as the matter of contributions is concerned may I say at this time I shall not go into detail because no doubt further opportunities will be given to all hon. members of the House of Commons and to everyone interested in this great problem. I have placed the grand total of a contributory insurance scheme at $92,000,000. It would be necessary to expend from six to eleven per cent of that amount for administrative purposes. In some countries this cost is as low as five per cent while in others it runs as high as twelve, but I believe in Canada ten per cent would be a fair estimate of what would be needed for administrative purposes. This would make a grand total of $104,000,000, $26,000,000 of which would be contributed by the industries, $26,000,000 by the working classes and $52,000,000 by the central government. During the past three or four years the government has dealt with this unemployment problem in the only manner possible; large sums of money have been expended and I think it will be admitted that a yearly contribution of $104,000,000 would not be such a burden upon industry and the people as a whole. During this session we are to be called upon to vote $50,000,000 for a program of public works to relieve unemployment. I think every hon. member could visualize the benefit of each person in this country at present unemployed receiving an average of one dollar per day. Such a distribution would put millions into operation and give an incentive to business throughout the whole of Canada.

It is not my intention to deal at great length with this all-important question. I believe the hon. member who moved this resolution deserves much credit for bringing it forward and presenting an opportunity for a full discussion of this matter. I think the principle has been accepted by the people of Canada as a whole. We must realize that things that looked radical a few years or a few months ago are the logical things for the present day. We need only to look to the south of us. Who would have dared to prophecy two or three years ago that the administration in the United States would be putting into effect the policies that they are at the present time? No one would have dared to say that such policies could be put into force, and what has happened in the United States is happening in certain sections of this country. The people are becoming seized of this situation and its problems; everyone realizes the problems we have to face, and once we are able to get our legislatures and this House of Commons to deal with national problems in a national way, we will be nearer to a solution of this great question.

The obstacles, constitutional, financial and otherwise, have been put forward quite clearly by the previous speaker. It must be remembered that the primary producers of this country are suffering just as much as if not more than other classes. Any unemployment scheme of a national nature must be considered from this angle also. Those who live in rural districts are suffering just as much as those who reside in industrial centres, and in dealing with the question of unemployment insurance we must consider some means of compensating the farmers for their losses during the last three or four years. Some people say that this problem is absolutely impossible of solution and in my opinion the inauguration of such a national scheme would be impossible unless consideration is given to the agricultural viewpoint. Such a scheme should include the farmers and the habitants of this country. They have suffered and will continue to suffer unless this government puts through legislation of a social order.

I am thankful for the attention which hon. members have given to this all-important matter. We must deal with it at the earliest possible moment. The members of this parliament should have the vision to realize that the people appreciate the situation. They should have the courage to admit that millions of people are suffering and need relief. I am not a sob-sister; I am not inclined to pessimism; I have always practised optimism, but we must face the future and consider this question as true Canadians. It is one of the most important matters with which we have to deal at the present time, and the attempt to arrive at a solution should not be delayed for another decade or two, or even another year or two. We should try to arrive at some solution at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (South Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words in support of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). Apparently the hon. member had two ideas in mind in proposing this resolution. I believe the first one was to impress upon the government the necessity or need for the setting up of a scheme of unemployment insurance. Although he did not put it in that way in his resolution, I believe that is what he had in mind. The next thing that he had in mind was that such legislation should be national in scope. I do not believe there can be any difference of opinion as to this latter point. I think we are all agreed that the time is ripe or even over-ripe for the bringing into being of some form of unemployment insurance national in scope.

I agree with the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Stanley), who took such pains to point out that unemployment insurance would not prove to be a solution of the unemployment problem, that in the nature of things it could be only a palliative. But palliatives are not to be despised when we are facing a condition of this kind. If there is anything in the resolution to which I could take exception, although I do not take exception to any of it, it would be the phrase, "during periods of unemployment." This would seem to indicate that the mover of the resolution believed that we would have unemployment only at certain periods. As a matter of fact unemployment is inseparable from the system of production which we have. That system cannot be carried on without a certain amount of unemployment. With the increase in the use of automatic machinery which has occurred, unemployment is here to stay just as long as we continue the present system of production. By this I mean that the causes of unempolyment have their roots in the the capitalist system. I do not think it is necessary to go into this very extensively to prove to anyone with an open mind that such is the case. Unemployment, like cancer, is a disease; it is a disease of civilization and of the particular kind of civilization we have —a machine civilization. To prove that, all we need do is to go back to former stages of society and we shall find that unemployment, under the conditions then prevailing, was not the curse that it is to-day but something that was looked forward to, as a time when those concerned could really enjoy life. When the savage was engaged in getting his livelihood, when Nature was kind and brought forth abundantly, he did not feel concerned about the fact that he would not have to work so hard nor so long in order to make a living. He did not fear unemployment. Under chattel slavery, even when the slave was not actually employed by his master, he was at least provided with the necessities of life just as when he worked. Similarly under feudalism, the serf was not concerned greatly with the question of unemployment. It is only under capitalism, when wealth of the community is greatest and the necessity for labour disappears, that those who have no other means of earning a livelihood except by the sale of their labour are confronted with the serious problem of unemployment.

When we discuss this question of unemployment, when it is brought forward in this house, there are two stock arguments advanced as to why an insurance scheme cannot be introduced. The first argument, of course, is as to the difficulties arising because of the British North America Act. Perhaps it is just as well to admit at the outset that there are certain difficulties in this regard, but I do contend that there are no difficulties that cannot be overcome if this government or any other dominion government is prepared to accept the principle and to take whatever steps may be necessary to give effect to it. Let us consider another problem that has been facing the country during the last three or four years. The British North America Act applies only as to jurisdiction between the dominion government and the governments of the provinces. We have had another question under consideration in the last few years and that is the matter of our surplus wheat. That was not a matter between different parts of the dominion but one that concerned various other countries in the world; yet, when the government set its mind to it, it was able to come to an agreement with other countries tending towards the solution of that problem. Surely what we could do with a score of countries we can do when there are only the nine provinces of Canada to be considered. I do not believe therefore that there is any valid excuse or any reason, because of the British North America Act, why we cannot put an unemployment insurance scheme into effect.

Again, the point was raised by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) the other day that, while he was in favour of an unemployment insurance policy, this was not the time to bring it into being. Of course, it is never the time to do something that you are opposed to doing. I believe that this is just as good a time to begin as any other. We have no greater difficulties here than there are in Great Britain; yet, instead of dispensing with their unemployment insurance legislation, they are extending it at the present time. In a news dispatch of two or three months ago it was said that the British government was bringing down legislation to increase the benefits of unemployment insurance and to increase the number of those who would receive those benefits. Those who are receiving the benefits of unemployment insurance there at present number about two millions, and it is intended to increase that number by approximately another four millions, making six millions altogether. The minimum age for entering the scheme will also be lowered to the school-leaving age of sixteen.

It seems to me that when the people of Great Britain, who have realized fully the benefits of unemployment insurance in these difficult times, will now take steps to extend that policy, it is time that this government did something to bring into effect in this country a similar scheme, which could afterwards be extended as conditions might require.

The question arises whether an unemployment insurance scheme should be contributory or non-contributory. I can see difficulties in coming to a conclusion on that point. If we are to have a scheme that will cover those who are at present unemployed, the great mass of the unemployed whom we have at the present time, we cannot have it on a contributory basis. That, however, is no reason why we should not start a scheme on a contributory basis. The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada has gone on record for many years as favouring an unemployment insurance scheme on a contributory basis. I believe that in the proposals they put before the government a few days ago this was one; and while the executive is convinced that it would be quite impossible at the present time to cover the great number of unemployed on a contributory basis, yet it believes that the government could start on that basis a scheme which would take care of those who will be unemployed six months, or a year or two years from now, and that the number of those who would come under the scheme might be increased as time went on. I would direct that to the attention of the government. If they cannot begin on a grand scale they can begin modestly and extend the scheme as experience and circumstances demand.

I do not wish to take up the time of the house discussing this question, because I believe the principle is now accepted by nearly everyone, so that all that is necessary is to come to some agreement as to how the legislation can be put into effect, and as to the time at which it should be brought in. Personally, I believe that the time is now, and I believe further that the scheme must be on a national basis to be effective. I favour this, not as a solution for unemployment, because I am convinced that unemployment will remain so long as the present social relationship exists between the producers of wealth and the owners of the means of wealth production. However, we cannot solve that now; but we can and should take steps that will make easier the lives of the unemployed until such time as we can organize a better social system than we have to-day.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the mover of this resolution, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), whose speech in introducing the subject showed close study and a great deal of thought. Since I have known him in this chamber, he has been in the forefront in regard to all legislation pertaining to the elimination of social injustices as well as to labour matters. I can well remember, when we were considering the old pension bill, the great assistance rendered by the hon. member in framing that humane piece of legislation and I was glad to have the honour of signing an agreement with the first province to adopt the scheme, British Columbia, in which the hon. member resides. I can also well remember the great assistance rendered by him in the way of advice to the committee on industrial and international relations.

I am sure it must have been rather a disappointment to him that when he introduced the resolution, it received from the government benches a little different treatment from that accorded any other resolution introduced by a private member this session. Generally speaking, when a private resolution is introduced, after the speech of the member introducing it, some member of the government states its position in regard to the subject matter involved. This resolution is one pertaining to the welfare of the labour men of this country and though we have been discussing it all afternoon, not a single member of the administration has gone on record even as accepting the motion which simply declares that the legislation, when it is introduced, should be national in its scope. Instead of that, they have left the task to one of the back benchers, the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Stanley), who made an excellent speech, favouring the resolution, but in his argument pointing out every obstacle that he could imagine that would be in the way of the government enacting such legislation. Therefore I say that it must have been a great disappointment to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and all those who so far have supported him to see the government sitting idly by, or, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) used to say, lolling in their seats, not taking any position in the matter, but leaving it to a lone back bencher to state the government's position.

Mr. LAWSON: If my hon. friend will not take too long, he will give some of the rest of us an opportunity of expressing our views in favour of the resolution.

Mr. HEENAN: I did not know my hon. friend had yet joined the government.

Mr. LAWSON: The hon. member was referring to back benchers.

Mr. HEENAN: This is the government whose members are hiding themselves behind the British North America Act. They asked for and received a mandate from the Canadian people to deal with unemployment and employment on a national scale. At that time the British North America Act offered no obstacles. Anyone who, during the 1930 election, would say a word about that act, was ridiculed off the platform. They said: Elect us; we will do it on a national scale; if King can give you 50 per cent old age pension, there is no obstacle constitutionally in the way of our giving you 100 per cent. This government, as I say, are hiding behind the skirts of the British North America Act and any other excuse they can find. This government received a mandate from the people to deal with unemployment and employment on a national scale; they have not hesitated to take authority from parliament to deal with it nationally; they have taken a blank cheque to deal with such matters on a national scale; they have taken authority to deal with matters of this kind under peace, order and good government legislation and they can break the bones of any interests they think fit. But when the question is one of whether they can deal with an unemployment insurance scheme, the British North America Act stands in the way. I know it will be said by speakers who will follow me, if we can get any of them roused out of their seats, that the Liberal government also used to discuss the question of the British North America Act and point out the obstacles that lay in the way. If they say that, it will be true, because we never yet tried to deceive the people of this country; we never went out to an election to try to tell them that there were no obstacles in the way of social legislation. We were honest with the Canadian people and the gentlemen who deceived them in 1930 are now betraying them, because they are going diametrically opposite to the things they promised the people in 1930. We never said that we could deal with unemployment insurance or old age pensions or anything of that kind except in cooperation with the provinces and I say that the hon. member for East Essex (Mr. Morand) the other evening, unconsciously or unintentionally I hope, but as a matter of fact placed a wrong interpretation upon the platform of the Liberal party. The hon. member, in reading the Liberal platform of the 1919 convention, stated it in this way:

That in so far as may be practicable, having regard for Canada's financial position, an adequate system of insurance against unemployment, sickness, dependence in old age, and other disability, which would include old age pensions, widows' pensions, and maternity benefits, should be instituted by the federal government—

The hon. member stopped there. That is not even the end of the sentence, because it goes on to say:

—in conjunction with the governments of the several provinces.

Mr. MORAND: Why did my hon. friend not do it?

Mr. HEENAN: We did.

Mr. GOBEIL: What did the hon. gentleman do?

Mr. HEENAN: There is no reason that the hon. gentleman should have stopped there; he had the book in his hand. I am inclined to think, knowing him as I do, he did that unintentionally, but whether he did it unintentionally or unconsciously or otherwise, it is a misconstruction or misinterpretation and there was no need for it. As I say again, not only has this government a mandate to deal with this matter on a national scale, but the present Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), when they were in opposition, declared that they had the power. At that time we were discussing the question of what we could do with industries that were not conforming to fair hours of work. I think we were dealing with the steel industry in Nova Scotia. They said to the government of the day: Parliament has the power; shall we use it? This parliament ought not to go a step further until we say to those industries that are deriving the benefit from our tariff measures: You shall provide thus and so, hours of work, wages, a fair standard of living, or we shall not give you tariff protection. So that if the Prime Minister and the members of this government had the power then, or thought they had, they have it to an even greater extent now, because they have had a mandate from the people in addition. Does this government mean to say that if it wanted to do as it promised, deal with unemployment relief on a national scale without the assistance of the provinces or the municipalities, either the municipalities or the provinces would object? Does it mean to say that if it wished to pay old age pensions one hundred per cent from the federal treasury, as it promised, any of the provinces would object? Does it mean to say that if it wanted to construct a national highway from coast to coast and pay for it from the federal treasury, as it promised to do in 1930, any of the provinces would object? Of course they would not. Neither would they object if this government instituted an unemployment insurance scheme. There would not be the slightest objection so long as it was an adequate and workable scheme. And I may say in support of the resolution that the way it proposes is the only way that unemployment insurance can possibly work, either in Canada or anywhere else, but more particularly in a country like Canada where workers are going to and fro among the various provinces.

So this government has two ways in which to institute this much-needed reform; it has the way that the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Stanley) advocates, that is in cooperation with the provinces, which is the proper way. I am satisfied that if that method were followed every province in this country would be satisfied to participate in an unemployment insurance scheme headed by the national government. And there is the other way, advocated by my hon. friends themselves when they were in opposition. They told us that we could say to the industries of this country; We will give you tariff protection sufficient to enable you to maintain a fair standard of living, to reduce hours of work and increase wages to provide for that standard of living, but if you do not fulfil these conditions you will not be protected by the customs tariff. I am in favour of the former system, but at all hazards I am in favour of one or the other, and I am satisfied that this government can put such a scheme into effect.

We talk about being a progressive nation, but in this respect we have not followed the mother country, which adopted a scheme of this kind twenty-three years ago. Of course the scheme made provision for old age, sickness, and many other matters in addition to unemployment. That scheme was introduced in Great Britain in 1911. Since then Italy, Australia, Bulgaria, Germany, Poland and Switzerland have followed, while within the British Empire itself we have several schemes of unemployment insurance, for instance in the Irish Free State, New Zealand and Queensland. How, then, can we say that Canada is a progressive country with respect to its provision for unemployed workers? I believe that public opinion to-day is favourable to an unemployment insurance scheme in this country. This house approved of it in 1929. The Liberal government, of which I had the honour of being a member, canvassed the provinces with respect to it and we had replies, which should be on the files of the department, some of them favourable. I discussed the matter with some of the leaders of the provincial governments, and after discussing it they became even more favourable. On the 11th of May, 1932, I ventured to place on Hansard a suggested scheme, which though not complete in detail would have served at least as a basis for a scheme of unemployment insurance for this country, and I was very glad to read that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) did me the honour of referring in some of his speeches to some things I had advocated in that speech. I pointed out that in periods of severe depression this fund undoubtedly would be drawn upon to such an extent that it probably could not stand the strain, and to cope with that situation I proposed that governments should refrain from going ahead with very large public works in times of prosperity but should reserve such works and the funds for them to relieve unemployment in times of depression. That suggested scheme provided for allowances of $55 a month for married men and $30 a month for single men, and if I remember correctly it called for something like 15 cents to 30 cents a week contribution from the employee. That was only a suggestion to assist the government in a small way in working out some kind of satisfactory scheme.

On November 22, 1931, the Prime Minister made a direct promise that he would institute such a scheme in this country. He said:

> Under those circumstances, with a census about to be taken and the necessary figures to become available, with our actuarial force willing and ready to tackle the problem from the angles that I have suggested, does any hon. gentleman think that we would be doing justice to the Dominion of Canada or to ourselves if we now passed a resolution asking the government inmmediately to do something which it is not equipped to do?
> I propose, if we are spared as a government and as individuals, that the information we will have before our term of office is ended shall be crystallized into the form of legislative proposals to be submitted to this house.

[Mr. Heenan.]

I am inclined to think it was then safe for the Prime Minister to make that statement when he included the words:

> I propose, if we are spared as a government . . .

I do not believe that the people of this country will tolerate this government very much longer, even though it is a promising government. Their time is limited. But I would like to see them actually try to crystallize something before the people send them into oblivion. In 1933, two years later, the hon. member who introduced this resolution asked this question:

> Will the government be in a position at this session to bring down legislation dealing with unemployment insurance, as referred to by the right hon. the premier, in debate in this house on November 22nd last?
> Mr. Bennett: The answer is no.

It seemed to me at the time that the government, after blowing hot, had started to blow cold again, as usual. They had cooled off very perceptibly a couple of days ago, when the Minister of Railways deprecated the idea that this was the time to introduce an unemployment insurance scheme. I remember him appealing for cooperation from all sides of the house in that well-known red-blooded manner in which he speaks, and in concluding his remarks he said:

> This is not a time for demagogism but a time for leadership, and after the leadership of this government carries Canada back, as it will, to normal conditions, then we will correct other evils. We will deal with such questions as unemployment insurnace and planned economy, for I personally believe that we shall have to deal with these matters. But when your house is on fire you do not stop to argue about loans or taxes. The first thing you do is to put out the fire, leaving other matters to be dealt with later.

So the Minister of Railways, speaking for the government, apparently had cooled off; evidently he was trying to put out the fire that had been started by the government itself.

Mr. MANION: May I just inform my hon. friend that so far as my remarks in connection with unemployment insurance were concerned I was speaking for myself only. I was giving not the government's opinion, but my own opinion.

Mr. HEENAN: Well, Mr. Speaker, that is the essence of the solidarity of a government. Not so long ago the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) said that undoubtedly under certain conditions the railways of Canada will be or ought to be amalgamated. We had the Minister of Railways say that there was no thought of amalgamation, and the Prime Minister said that if there was any thought or hint of amalgamation he and his colleagues would resign. Well, in the remarks of the Secretary of State were both the hint and the thought, and I do not know that any member of this government has any right to speak other than as a minister.

Mr. MANION: Might I ask a question?

Mr. HEENAN: I would rather you did not.

Mr. MANION: I thought my hon. friend would not like it.

An hon. MEMBER: Talk insurance, not railways.

Mr. HEENAN: I would sooner talk sense than sit over there and talk nonsense. I do not know why, when we appeal to the government for unemployment insurance, they should loll in their seats and take no definite stand in the matter. Not one minister has spoken, though this same government has put sixty-five thousand railway men out of work since they came into office.

An hon. MEMBER: You put one out of work every summer.

Mr. HEENAN: I did that for a purpose; I did it to be unique. I wanted to be known as the only man that the Bennett government ever put into overalls.

An hon. MEMBER: You are unique all right.

Mr. HEENAN: What does my hon. friend do between sessions? Does he just loll in his seat as he is doing at the present time, and do nothing; does he go back into a law office or a doctor's office; does he go on the farm or into the factory; does he just clip coupons, or what does he do? That same suggestion has been made here once or twice before. It is a peculiar thing that our doctors, lawyers, merchants and coupon clippers who go back into their offices between sessions pick on the only man who goes back into overalls. It must be wrong for me to do that, but I am not a bit ashamed. I am proud, and I thank God I am able to do it. It is honest toil, and because of it I am more able to speak for the labouring men of this country than are my hon. friends who sit lolling in their seats and will not take part in these debates.

Mr. BROWN: I want to protest against the hon. member's statement, that he is the only member who goes back into overalls.

Mr. HEENAN: I said the only member who went back into overalls to make an honest living.

While I am discussing the question, Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out the importance of this kind of legislation. At page 42 of the Labour Gazette I find the following:

> The number of man-days worked on state-aided projects on a wage basis numbered 1,157,559 during the first eleven months of 1933, while to those employed on useful works in return for subsistence and a small cash allowance 8,494,212 man-days' work were given. This was a total of 9,651,771 man-days of employment afforded in 1933 up to November 30. During 1932, the man-days worked on a wage basis numbered 7,700,709.

There is something wrong here; these figures have not been completed, or if they are complete there is only one thing we can deduce from them. It is that the men who performed the 7,700,709 man-days of work on a wage basis in 1932 were put on a subsistence basis in 1933. I am sure the government must be proud of that record; in 1933 they gave 8,494,212 man-days of work for subsistence and a small cash payment. In the government returns these men are counted as employed; this government does not hesitate to include these men in the aggregate as employed persons, yet they give this note here, which is not sufficiently complete to assist in analyzing the situation from one year to another, in which they say the men are working for their subsistence and a small cash allowance. I am sorry they had the nerve to include in a government report the statement that this government provides for 8,000,000 days'-work in a year, on a subsistence basis. In the summer time in northern Ontario they pay $5 a month, and their board. Of that $5 this government contributes $2.50. If one were to analyze these figures and direct them to the number of days worked, I do not know where he would come out. Hon. gentlemen across the way talk about the five cent speech. They throw remarks across the house about five cents which was mentioned one day in this House of Commons. But they are not giving even five cents; they are giving only one cent. I have in my pocket at the moment a cheque for one cent paid out to a man in the province of Ontario—and he is a white man at that. It appears to be the pay for a month's work, evidently after he had paid for small pieces of tobacco, and supplies of that type. When he had made these payments he had one cent left. The only redeeming feature about it, as I said before, is that the cheque was made out to a man called Caesar. Evidently the government have been reading the holy book and have come across the passage directing them to render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's. So they gave to this working man not five cents but one cent.

Mr. McINTOSH: Did he get the cheque cashed?

Mr. HEENAN: No, I have it, and I have not got it cashed. I am going to take it with me and use it during the next campaign.

Then, I have another one for seventy cents. The person involved in this instance is a young man who went through university. All this government can offer him is a pick and shovel so that he may work in a camp in nothern Ontario. At the end of the month after he had paid for a few knick-knacks which he required around the camp he had only seventy cents left. Then, I have another one for nine cents. In this instance I know the boy very well. His father equipped him with new boots, a new suit of overalls and new gloves, and he went out ready to work for the great and glorious Tory government which we have in the province of Ontario. At the end of the month's work he had nine cents coming to him.

Mr. MORAND: How much did he spend on knick-knacks?

Mr. HEENAN: All that he got, with the exception of nine cents.

Mr. BURY: What was the balance left after paying for the knick-knacks?

Mr. HEENAN: It was $4.91, if my figures are correct. That is about the price of a visit to a doctor's office. If anything had happened him he could not have been taken to an undertaker. Coming home at the end of the month he had the soles out of his boots from walking on the rocks. So he got nine cents and lost his "sole" working for the Ontario government. Any man who would vote for a government which would treat a Canadian in that way ought to lose his "sole." It is sad to think that that is all this government has done for the young men of Canada, after three and a half years in office. It is even sadder to think that some of the ministers smile and laugh at the misery of these young men.

Mr. MORAND: That is cheap.

Mr. HEENAN: It is cheap to smile; of course it is.

[Mr. Heenan.]

Mr. MORAND: No, it is cheap for you to say that.

Mr. HEENAN: That is all they do, smile and laugh and humbug. This government has been in office for more than three years and it is destroying the youth of this country.

Mr. MORAND: I am surprised at you, Peter.

Mr. HEENAN: They have gone on deceiving the people for over three years by bluffing, blundering and blasting. They were going to do something at the economic conference, yet to-day our railroads are rusting. Sixty-five thousand railway men are out of work. In 1931 the railway men of Canada earned $74,000,000 less than they did in the last year of the Liberal regime. In 1932 they earned $120,000,000 less than the last year we were in office, and in 1933, $130,000,000 less. I want to tell this House of Commons that the railway men of Canada have paid an awful price for having a Tory government in power. Instead of a scheme for unemployment insurance we have provisions which will bring about greater unemployment. We have a wheat agreement which will provide for the sale and export of only half of the wheat crop of Canada. If the government makes any more agreements we will not need our railways. They talk about building deep waterways, despite the bad condition in which our railroads are to-day. That is all we are getting from this government.

I am sorry it is about six o'clock because there were further points I should have liked to have made in regard to this subject. If I have spoken with greater warmth than is my custom it is because I feel the government is carrying on a humbug of continual promises; it is playing hot one day and cold the next. We have one minister saying one thing in one part of the country, and another minister saying another thing in another part. But when they face this House of Commons they say, "I was speaking only for myself." One good feature I see is that some of the ministers are at last able to speak for themselves. They have sat for more than three long years, none of them daring to utter a word, except on occasions when they have received a nod or a wink from the gentleman who is the whole government of the country.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 22, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

TERMINAL FACILITIES AND OTHER WORKS IN MONTREAL

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): I beg to lay on the table of the house a report of the work performed and the expenditures made, as of December 31, 1933, together with the estimated expenditures for 1934, under authority of chapter 12, statutes of Canada 1929, of construction by the Canadian National Railway Company of certain terminal facilities, with grade separation and other works at and in the vicinity of the city of Montreal.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT

CONDITIONS GOVERNING TEN YEAR EXTENSION OF BANK CHARTERS

Hon. EDGAR N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 18, respecting banks and banking.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister explain?

Mr. RHODES: The occasion which calls for the introduction of this bill is well known to the house and to the country, inasmuch as the charters of the existing banks expire on the 1st day of July of this year. It is some eleven years since a similar measure was introduced in this house—to be exact, on the 20th day of March, 1923—by the then Minister of Finance, the Right Hon. W. S. Fielding, and I think it might not be amiss if I quoted from one or two paragraphs of his introductory remarks on bringing down that legislation on that occasion. These remarks will be found at page 1310 of Hansard of that year. He said:

> I think, perhaps, the house will be convenienced if I proceed at once, on the motion before us, to state the nature of the bill which I shall have the pleasure of introducing shortly. In that measure the government will bring the best possible judgment they can to bear upon a question of the highest importance, and one of widespread interest. I cannot venture the hope that the conclusions we have reached will be received with unanimity. I am well aware that the question is one concerning which there will be differences of opinion, but I am going to ask, and I think it reasonable to do so, that hon. gentlemen reserve their judgment in the matter, until they have had an opportunity of examining the bill, and, what perhaps is of more importance, an opportunity of participating in or observing the inquiry which will take place before the committee on banking and commerce. So soon as the early stages of this bill are disposed of, it is my intention to ask the house to refer the bill to the committee on banking and commerce, where there will be abundant opportunity for raising every question in relation to it, and the fullest possible opportunity for inquiry and discussion.
> The Bank Act is the fruit of the study of a long line of ministers of finance, of governments and parliaments, and I feel that in the main it has served a good purpose; it has proved itself adapted to the needs of Canada; and I venture the opinion—which, possibly, will not be shared by everybody—that any radical change in the act at present would have a disturbing effect upon the business of the country; it is a class of question upon which we shall do well, I think, to go slowly.

The first provision is of course the one which proposes to extend the charters of the banks for a further period of ten years. Perhaps the most important of the earlier changes is that which will be necessitated by the creation of the central bank, and it arises in connection with the note issue. Section 60 of the present bill continues in force until the day on which the Bank of Canada is authorized to commence business the provisions which presently govern the issue of notes by the chartered banks.

Briefly stated, these provisions limit the total amount of the notes of a bank in circulation at any time to the aggregate of—(a) the amount of the unimpaired paid-up capital of the bank; and (b) the amount of current gold coin and of dominion notes held by the bank in the central gold reserves.

In addition during the crop moving season, it is possible for a bank to issue additional notes to an amount not exceeding 15 per cent of the combined unimpaired paid-up capital and rest or reserve fund of the bank.

Section 61 contains the provisions that will govern note issue after the central bank has been authorized to commence business. On that day, subsections 3 to 18 of section 60 are repealed and thereafter the maximum amount of notes which a bank may have in circulation at any time shall not exceed the amount of its unimpaired paid-up capital. Moreover, beginning with the first day of January, 1936, this maximum is reduced by 5 per cent per year for a period of 5 years and then by 10 per cent per year for another period of 5 years. Thereafter, until parliament further enacts, the amount of notes of a bank in circulation shall not exceed 25 per cent of the amount of its unimpaired paid-up capital. These provisions, however, do not operate to limit the right of a bank to issue its notes outside of Canada in British possessions or colonies as authorized by section 62 of the Bank Act. Under no circumstances, however, may the total amount of notes outstanding both within Canada and elsewhere exceed the amount of the bank's unimpaired paid-up capital.

The general purpose of these provisions is gradually to eliminate the note issue privileges of the chartered banks and to secure for the Bank of Canada the sole right to issue notes intended for public circulation in Canada. It is in conformity with the general theory that the right to issue currency is a prerogative of the sovereign and should not be delegated to any private profit seeking institution. Despite the acceptance of this general principle, however, it has been realized that the too sudden withdrawal of the circulation privileges of the chartered banks would undoubtedly result in the closing up of many branches and the consequent loss of banking facilities by many pioneer and small or remote communities.

The next important provision is that having to do with the rate of interest. Section 91, subsection 1, provides that no bank may charge a higher rate of interest than seven per cent, and that every bank which violates the provisions of this subsection shall be guilty of an offence. For each such offence, the bank shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding $500, and every officer of the bank who violates the said provision shall be guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding $100. Provision, however, is made for a minimum charge of one dollar.

It will be recalled that much controversy has recently waged over the precise effect and the wisdom of the provision in the present Bank Act stipulating a maximum rate of interest. Experience in other countries has shown that the attempt to restrict interest rates is usually ineffective and inexpedient in the public interest. In Great Britain, for instance, after several methods had been tried, an act was finally passed in 1854 repealing all the usury statutes.

The question in its Canadian application was given careful consideration by the Macmillan Commission on Banking and Currency, and their comments will be found in paragraphs 249 to 253 on pages 72 and 73 of their report.

In paragraph 251 of their report they make the following statement:

> As regards the future we are of opinion that the choice lies betwen either repealing the subsection altogether or so recasting it as to put it beyond doubt that it is illegal to stipulate for more than seven per cent interest or discount; if the latter course is adopted a penalty for contravention should be imposed.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

After weighing the considerations pro and con, the commission was unable to reach a unanimous agreement, although it might be well to point out that four members of the commission were of the opinion that we should adopt the method that had been found most effective in Great Britain of removing the limitation altogether. The fifth commissioner, however, contended that the statutory maximum still serves a useful purpose; that adequate reasons for repealing the section had not been adduced and that it ought to be retained. The present draft of section 91 retains the statutory maximum, but provides for what we believe will be appropriate penalties in case of contravention.

The next change is that which arises out of the recommendations contained in paragraph 291 of the report of the Macmillan Commission on Banking and Currency, reading as follows:

> As, under the law of the province of Quebec, a married woman could not, apart from section 95, deposit or withdraw money without her husband's consent, the effect of the subsection just quoted is that in this province a married woman cannot without her husband's consent deposit more than $2,000 in a bank. Apparently under the Dominion Post Office legislation a married woman is under no disability as regards the amount which she may deposit in the Post Office Savings department, and may make deposits up to the limit of $5,000 which applies generally. We were asked to recommend that in the case of married women in the province of Quebec the limitation on deposits in the banks to $2,000 should be removed and an unlimited right of deposit conferred, without the requirement of the husband's consent. We think that this is a reasonable request and we recommend that section 95 (3) be amended accordingly.

This recommendation of the commission has been accepted and implemented by eliminating subsection 3 of section 95 of the present Bank Act. This subsection reads as follows:

> (3) If the person making any such deposit could not, under the law of the province where the deposit is made, deposit and withdraw money in and from a bank without this section, the total amount to be received from such person on deposit shall not, at any time, exceed the sum of $2,000.

The next change has to do with the yearly and monthly returns. Various changes have been made in sections 53 and 112 and in schedule G of the act. These sections and this schedule provide for the form of the annual and monthly statements to be made by the chartered banks to the Minister of Finance. The changes made are designed primarily to secure more uniformity between the annual and the monthly return, to clarify previous wording, and in some cases to give a more detailed classification of assets or liabilities in order to make possible a clearer appreciation of the position of the bank.

The next important amendment occurs in section 75 having to do with the business and powers of a bank. Paragraph (f) of subsection 2 is changed by lowering from ten per cent to five per cent of its paid-up capital the amount of a loan or advance which can be made by a bank to a director or to any firm or corporation in which the president, general manager or director of the bank is a partner or shareholder, without the approval of two-thirds of the directors present at a meeting of the board.

A new subsection 3 is added providing that in no case shall a director of the bank be present or vote at a meeting of the board during the time when loans or advances to himself or any firm or corporation of which he is a partner or director are under consideration. This implements a recommendation made by the Macmillan commission.

Certain changes or additions are made, particularly in section 90, concerning the relations between the bank and its customers, the type of security that can be taken, and so forth. These changes are designed to facilitate the granting of banking credit in certain cases.

A new subsection has been added to section 125 providing for a reduction in the double liability of shareholders pari passu with the withdrawal of the note circulation privilege of the banks.

These are the principal provisions of the bill. There are a number of minor changes which involve clarification of wording, uniformity in phrasing, improved definitions and so forth.

In submitting the bill to the house, I do so with the assurance that the government invites the closest and most careful scrutiny of the committee on banking and commerce, and while it cannot be expected that the measure will meet with universal accord, I express the hope that on the whole it will be found acceptable. As a concluding word may I suggest that, in the interest of public business as well as for the convenience of hon. members, its passage on its way to the banking and commerce committee might be expedited.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall said bill be read a second time.

Mr. RHODES: Would there be any objection to its being read now a second time for the purpose of facilitating its passage to the banking and commerce committee?

74726—52½

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to expedite the measure, but we would like to see it before having it pass its second reading.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: I will wait until the hon. members listen to me. I stand by the rules of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member proceed with the point of order?

Mr. POULIOT: I hold in my hand the standing orders of the House of Commons, coming from the table of the Clerk of the House. Chapter IV relates to questions. Standing order 44, paragraph one reads as follows:

Questions may be placed on the order paper seeking information from the ministers of the crown relating to public affairs; and from other members relating to any bill, motion, or other public matter connected with the business of the house, in which such members may be concerned; but in putting any such question or in replying to the same no argument or opinion is to be offered, nor any facts stated, except so far as may be necessary to explain the same.

The Prime Minister now is no more than the hon. member for West Calgary, and I am the member for Temiscouata. I ask for your decision, and I expect to receive a decision in all fairness, because all members are on the same footing in the House of Commons.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I was about to suggest that these questions are not in order, and to indicate that they might properly be and should be stricken off the list by the Speaker. In doing so I was about to make certain observations as to bringing into discredit this parliament or this country or the Postmaster General among foreign countries.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BENNETT: I had not proposed to proceed further with the discussion.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has stated his point of order.

Mr. POULIOT: I wish to state a new one.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): One at a time.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point of order that has been raised first may be discussed.

Mr. POULIOT: I would like the right hon. gentleman to stop.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member take his seat.

It is not intended to proceed with this project as a relief work.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION ACT

BILL TO EXTEND AVAILABILITY OF BALANCE OF APPROPRIATION

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That the Technical Education Act be amended to provide that any balance of the ten million dollars appropriated under the act, unexpended on the 31st March, 1934, shall remain available during any one or more of the five succeeding fiscal years, but no portion thereof shall be paid to any province after the 31st day of March, 1939.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the motion carries may I ask the minister what Technical Education Act is referred to?

Mr. GORDON: This is the original act under which the $10,000,000 was appropriated, part of which has not been expended.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What year?

Mr. GORDON: I do not remember the year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The act of 1919?

TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in view of the interest that this house has manifested in the discussions that have taken place as to trade relations between the United States of America and Canada, and as to which dispatches that may have appeared in the press are not quite uniform, I desire to indicate to the house the text of the statement given out by the State department of the United States:

Trade between the United States and Canada is larger in normal times than that between any other countries in the world, and it is natural that both countries should desire to restore the reciprocal flow of commodities to normal proportions. We hope to be in a position at an early date to take steps looking to the completion of a trade agreement with Canada which will further the interests of both countries. We hope first to bring into practical application the "good neighbour" policy between these two great countries which have so much in common.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the Prime Minister the date of the communication which he has just read to the house?

Mr. BENNETT: Yesterday.

RAYON YARN DUTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Matthews). In the Toronto Star of January 27, 1934, the following appears:

Toronto importers were startled yesterday to learn that Courtaulds (Canada) Limited, had applied to the customs house here for a rebate of the duty on two large shipments of rayon yarn on the grounds that these shipments had been specifically exempted by order in council.

I would like to ask the minister if any such order in council was issued, and if so what was the amount of the rebates, and why were they granted?

Hon. R. C. MATTHEWS (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to get the information.

SILVER AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) if he can tell the house what countries, by their governments, have ratified the agreement on silver, and what countries have not yet done so.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I am unable to answer that question offhand, but I will take this as a notice.

DISCONTINUED PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I have to advise the house that the Board of Pension Commissioners, with respect to all cases in which the legality of the marriage status of a pensioner was under dispute, will send cheques to such persons as may be affected as from the day of the discontinuance or reduction of the pension, and that the board proposes to refer to the Justice department, for an opinion, the legal questions involved in the determinations at which they had arrived. The matter is under consideration by the Minister of Justice for the purpose of determining whether or not he has authority to refer typical cases from the several categories affected to the Exchequer Court for an opinion or judgment.

With respect to the cases in which the pension or allowance has been reduced or cancelled the board is forwarding cheques to all those who have been thus dealt with without having an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I ask the Prime Minister if that includes all cases?

Mr. BENNETT: It refers to all cases which have been dealt with since February 1, 1933. The statute now provides that the cases can only be dealt with after an opportunity has been accorded to the person concerned to be heard, so it puts all the cases that have been dealt with since that date in the category of cases provided for by the statute.

Mr. VENIOT: Irrespective of the class in which those cancelled pensions are to be found?

Mr. BENNETT: I said all cases in which, under the statute, it is now provided that the person concerned shall have an opportunity to be heard. They will be treated as though the statute applied as from February 1.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CLOSING OF RAILWAY STATION AT AULAC, WESTMORLAND COUNTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. MICHAUD (Restigouche-Madawaska): I should like to ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) if he has received a protest from the government of the province of New Brunswick with regard to the closing of the railway station at Aulac in the county of Westmorland, and, if such protest has been received, what action has been taken?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): I receive so many protests of this kind that from memory I cannot say whether or not I have received the one referred to. I have received from someone a protest along that line; I cannot remember at the moment from whom it came, but all I can do is to pass such protests on to the management of the railway, and that I have done. I might just add that of course those interested can appeal to the board of railway commissioners as well.

TOBACCO TAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GOTT (South Essex): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). I have received one or two telegrams from the tobacco growers of western Ontario protesting against a proposed tax of 20 cents per pound on raw leaf tobacco. I should like to ask if any representations have been made to the government by the growers of raw leaf tobacco in Canada with regard to this tax; if so, when they were made and if they are likely to receive favourable consideration.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I may say that a deputation waited upon me making representations along the lines indicated, but I am sure my hon. friend will be the first to appreciate that any announcement on behalf of the government with respect to tariff or taxation can be made only in the orthodox way, when the budget is brought down.

BUREAU FOR TRANSLATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): I may say for the information of those members of the house who may be interested that when government orders are reached on Tuesday next I propose to move the second reading of Bill No. 4, respecting the bureau for translations.

BANK OF CANADA

MOTION BY MINISTER OF FINANCE TO INTRODUCE BILL INCORPORATING BANK OF CANADA

Hon. EDGAR N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved:

That, it is expedient to introduce a measure to incorporate a central bank in Canada, and to provide for the appointment and salaries of the officers and staff of the bank and the appointment and fees of the directors, and to make such further provisions in respect to the functions, powers and administration of the bank as recommended by the Royal Commission on Banking and Currency in Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill which is founded upon this resolution is one of unusual importance and significance. It marks an advanced stage in our economic and financial development as a nation. The proposed central bank should not, I submit, be regarded as a break with the past; we are not departing from the system which has served us so well. Rather the central bank should be regarded as another stage in the natural evolution of our banking system.

It has long been an accepted principle in Canada, and I think wisely so, that banking legislation should recognize and closely follow changing conditions in the business and financial world. In recognition of this fact our Bank Act has provided for a decennial revision. The ten-year period since the last revision expired last year, but it will be remembered that at that time, in recognition of the importance of the changes contemplated, this house agreed to postpone the revision for one year in order that the situation might be thoroughly explored. To ensure that the highly technical questions inherent in such a comprehensive investigation should have the benefit of unbiassed, expert consideration, the budget speech of last year promised the appointment of a royal commission. From that speech I quote the following paragraph:

> —to study the organization and working of our entire banking and monetary system, to consider the arguments for and against a central banking institution and to make recommendations for revising or supplementing our existing banking and monetary legislation.

In the meantime this proposal has been carried out, and it now becomes my duty, on behalf of the government, to submit the results to the house in the form of a bill.

The royal commission was appointed on July 31, 1933, by order in council P.C. 1562, naming the following commissioners: Right Hon. Lord Macmillan, P.C., K.C., of London, chairman; Sir Charles Stewart Addis, K.C.M.G., of London, England; Right Hon. Sir William Thomas White, P.C., K.C.M.G., of Toronto; Hon. John Edward Brownlee, K.C., M.L.A., of Edmonton and Beaudry Leman B.Sc., C.E., of Montreal.

It is unnecessary for me to dwell upon the calibre of that board and the work they accomplished. other than to say that I think the banks and the country are especially indebted to Lord Macmillan and Sir Charles Addis for giving to Canada the benefit of their wide knowledge and experience at considerable personal inconvenience to themselves. The inquiry took up a considerable portion of their time, which they gave gladly and willingly, and without remuneration. I do not propose to refer to the terms of reference at length, but I should like to set out the last two paragraphs of the order in council. They are as follows:

> 2. That, without limiting the general scope of their inquiry into the operation of the banking and monetary systems of Canada, the said commissioners shall in particular examine the provisions and working of the Bank Act, the Dominion Notes Act, the Finance Act and the Currency Act, and the advisability of establishing a central banking institution; and
> 3. That said commissioners shall report their recommendations for revising or supplementing the above mentioned acts and for the adoption of such other measures as they may deem desirable to promote the revival of trade and enterprise and to facilitate intra-imperial and international cooperation for the purpose of raising the level of commodity prices and for the purpose of ensuring increased domestic employment and the stability of the economic, financial and social institutions of this country.

The terms of reference, broadly stated, provided for a study of the entire monetary and banking system of Canada, with recommendations for revising or supplementing this system. The first public hearings were held at Ottawa, and from this centre the commission undertook a dominion-wide itinerary which included important cities in every province. Sessions were held in Victoria, Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, Saskatoon, Regina, Winnipeg, Halifax, Charlottetown, Saint John, Quebec, Montreal and Toronto. Representations were invited from provincial and local governments, public bodies, associations and individuals. The commission made every effort to secure the widest possible range of information and expert opinion. The list of those who appeared before the commission in the course of its inquiry included sixteen government representatives, twenty-eight officials of Canadian banks, eighty-one officials of public bodies, organizations and associations, and ninety-six personal representatives, making a total of two hundred and twenty-one. The record of the testimony and examinations in these public hearings covers no less than seven volumes containing over thirty-seven hundred pages. In addition the commission received written submissions from no less than one hundred and ninety-six individuals and organizations. These also received the careful attention of the commission. On the basis of this exhaustive and comprehensive study of our entire monetary and currency system the commission made several important recommendations with which all hon. members are doubtless familiar.

Among the recommendations, and overshadowing all others is the majority recommendation for the immediate establishment of a central bank in Canada. In addition to this the report contained valuable suggestions for the constitution of such an institution. After careful analysis of the entire range of arguments submitted by the commission in support of its recommendations, the government submits to the house this measure to incorporate the Bank of Canada.

It is perhaps worth while to point out the extent to which the principle of central banking has been adopted by important countries of the world. In most of the leading countries the present central banks have, as the Macmillan commission pointed out, reached their present positions of national and international importance by a long process of growth. But particularly since the war the spread of this type of institution to other countries has been very rapid. In fact, Canada is almost in an unique position in being one of the few countries of the world which up to the present time has not had a central bank. Among other British dominions Australia and South Africa have had such institutions for several years, while New Zealand and India have, during the last few months, passed legislation providing for the establishment of central banking institutions. Post-war world conferences repeatedly have pressed for the further establishment of central banks.

We find the following at page 62 of the Macmillan report:

> The International Financial Conference held at Brussels in 1920 unanimously recommended that:
> 'The conference is of the opinion that in countries where there is no central bank of issue, one should be established."
>
> Again, at Genoa in 1922, the International Economic Conference resolved that:
> "Banks, and especially banks of issue, should be free from political pressure, and should be conducted solely on lines of prudent finance. In countries where there is no central bank of issue, one should be established."
>
> At the World Monetary and Economic Conference of 1933, resolutions, to which Canada was a party, were adopted that:
>
> "The conference considers it to be essential in order to provide an international gold standard with the necessary mechanism for satisfactory working, that independent central banks, with the requisite powers and freedom to carry out an appropriate currency and credit policy, should be created in such developed countries as have not at present an adequate central banking institution.
> "The conference wish to reaffirm the declarations of previous conferences with regard to the great utility of close and continuous cooperation between Central Banks."

The question naturally arises: Why has Canada not hitherto had a central bank? I think perhaps the answer is rather flattering to us as a people, and certainly it is a tribute to the character of the services which our existing banks have rendered up to the present time, because it has been due largely to the operation—and successful operation—of our existing system that we could afford, for the time being, to postpone supplementing it with a central bank.

Admitting this fact however, is not to be taken as implying that our banking structure has deteriorated in recent years, making it necessary to supplement it. Rather, the changes which have rendered such action at present desirable are largely external. The complex post-war world conditions within which our banking and currency mechanism must operate have engendered forces which are not amenable to the highly simplified statutory control over our financial structure such as has sufficed up until now. Changed and changing conditions demand constant supervision and an active, rather than passive mechanism of control. To meet these demands is the main purpose for which the central bank is to be created. Perhaps no better statement is available of the chief functions of a central bank than that which is contained in the Macmillan report, and which is to be found at page 63 as follows:

> In the first place, from a national point of view, the central bank, within the limits imposed by law and by its capacities, should endeavour to regulate credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of the nation and should so far as possible control and defend the external value of the national monetary unit. In the second place, from the international point of view, the central bank by wise and timely cooperation with similar institutions in other countries, should seek, so far as may lie within the scope of monetary action, to mitigate by its influence fluctuations in the general level of economic activity. These functions do not, of course, exhaust the tasks of a central bank. Within a state the central bank should, in addition, be a ready source of skilled and impartial financial advice at the disposal of the administration of the day. In return for the privileges which the state confers upon it, the bank should use its store of experience in the service of the community without the desire or the need to make profit a primary consideration.

In simpler form these functions may be stated as:

1. To regulate internal credit;
2. To regulate the foreign exchanges;
3. To mitigate fluctuations in the level of production, trade, employment and prices as far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action and;

4. To give expert and impartial financial advice to the government of the day.

It cannot be too strongly emphasized that the exercise of these functions lies outside the power of any single commercial institution or group of commercial institutions. No purely profit-making institution operating in a competitive system can afford to place social interests before its own in regard to credit policy. This, I think, is obvious. Nor can the management of such a body be expected to regard the maintenance of the monetary standard, for example, as a duty prior to its obligations to the stockholders. Clearly it is impossible to visualize any effective international cooperation to the end of mitigating world fluctuations in business unless predicated on a high degree of internal unity and control. This latter feature we certainly lack in Canada.

At this point we are now able to see in proper perspective the role which some have claimed should be filled by the Finance Act. The Finance Act, it may be said, has served us in the manner of providing a "halfway house" in a period of transition from the stage of passive statutory control over our banking and currency system to one of active centralized regulation. In providing an elasticity in our credit structure, and particularly in emergency use, the Finance Act has fulfilled a useful function. It is clear now that while in a position to offer some of the advantages which follow from a central bank it lacked the powers of control ordinarily associated with such an institution. To make provision in the Finance Act for the powers necessary to perform adequately the functions outlined above would, in effect, mean the creation of just such an institution as is proposed in this bill.

It is important that the nature of the contemplated regulation over credit policy be clearly understood. It is not proposed that the Bank of Canada shall be directly responsible for the general level of prices within Canada. Certainly, prices of particular commodities are not to be its direct concern. It is believed desirable, however, and it is intended that the bank shall have a definite measure of control over the total volume of credit and thus be in a position indirectly to exert an influence over the general price level. The ability of central banks to maintain any monetary standard, indeed, largely depends upon its control over internal credit policy, as also does its ability to cooperate with other nations in financial programs of mutual benefit.

Just here I think I should recite in full the whole of paragraph 207 of the Macmillan report, which says:

207. It is easily possible to expect either too much or too little of central bank action. A central bank is at the same time an instrument and a force. As an instrument it is the means by which the state—which must necessarily retain ultimate sovereignty in matters affecting the currency—can give effect to the national policy. As a force the central bank has certain powers in its keeping which can be used to achieve the ends of national policy. Clearly these powers are of differing efficacy according to the aim of the policy. A central bank cannot be expected to influence directly the price of a particular commodity. It is even not desirable that a central bank should be specifically charged with any responsibility for the general price level of a country. There are many factors, of varying nature, which combine to influence that level, and a central bank, working as it does purely in the monetary sphere, cannot be expected to have complete control, though it may well have a measure of influence. If it attempted to exercise any drastic control it would have to wield powers far beyond those which any body other than the sovereign authority would be entitled to exercise. It is manifest, however, that the regulation of the volume of credit is an important factor in influencing the level of economic activity and therefore of prices and this is one of the cardinal tasks of a central bank. In the absence of a central bank it is a task the fulfilment of which is either left to chance, or performed inadequately by other agencies. The regulation of the quantity of credit is effected by the action of the central bank on the reserves of the commercial banks. By increasing or diminishing these reserves, or by increasing the cost of securing them, there is set in motion a process of expansion or contraction through the ordinary channels of banking. A central bank is thus not a competitor with the commercial banks. Its functions are regulatory and indirect.

In some quarters, there has been apprehension that the creation of this institution would injuriously affect the chartered banks.

It is our belief that there is no ground for this apprehension. On the contrary, experience in other countries has demonstrated the fact that the whole banking structure has been strengthened to the benefit and not the detriment of other banking institutions.

The Bank of Canada is not to be regarded as a competitor with our chartered banks. Its functions are intended to be supplementary and regulatory.

The Macmillan report refers to the introduction of a central bank in South Africa and in Australia, and I quote one paragraph of the report in reference thereto:

It is perhaps worth observing that in South Africa and Australia the commercial banks viewed the advent of central banking with considerable mistrust, possibly owing to a failure to appreciate the part which a central bank is designed to play, and to apprehensions as to the extent of its disturbance of the existing banking system. The first years of its operation were thus rendered more difficult by the lack to some extent of cooperation on the part of the commercial banks but in recent years there has been a growing appreciation of the advantages of central banking leadership and control, and the central banks in these two countries have now obtained both the goodwill and the cooperation of the commercial banks.
