Coming to the main features of the bill itself, I shall indicate them as briefly as possible. As at present proposed the bank of Canada is to be a privately-owned institution, the chief officers and directors of which initially are to be appointed by the governor in council. Several provisions have been included which are designed to remove the fear that a privately-owned institution might come under the control of bankers or other financial interests. In other words, the endeavour has been made to retain the advantages of private ownership without its disadvantages. Thus, the Bank of Canada, though privately owned, will operate as a public trust. Profits are definitely limited to 6 per cent upon a small capital. Adequate powers are given to the bank to perform the functions which I have described as appropriate for a central bank. Thus it is to have power to buy and sell gold and silver, bills of exchange and promissory notes, and certain stipulated kinds of securities. It may also rediscount bills and notes, make loans and advances to the banks and to the dominion and provincial governments, and accept non-interest-bearing deposits. In addition, it is intended that the bank shall eventually possess the sole right of note issue. Against its notes and deposits a reserve of at least twenty-five per cent is to be held. The legal reserves of the chartered banks will in future be held, in part at least, with the central institution.

It will be obvious at once to those familiar with the Macmillan report that the suggestions contained therein have been closely followed. That document has provided the foundation and largely the material of the structure. The task of the government has been to implement and where necessary to supplement rather than to create outright. In this the aim has been to provide Canada with a central bank best suited to our own particular needs.

It is proposed that the capital of the bank shall be $5,000,000. This amount was regarded as adequate by the Macmillan commission. In the determination of this figure it was borne in mind that dividend obligations to stockholders should be as light as possible. The management should be free to perform its public functions without regard to the necessity of making profits. Provision is made for increasing the capital from time to time, if occasion should demand it.

Shares, which are to be of $100 par value, may be held only by British subjects ordinarily resident in Canada or by Canadian corporations. The chartered banks are to be strictly prohibited from holding shares directly or indirectly, as are also bank directors, officers and employees.

In order to secure a wide distribution of ownership, not more than fifty shares—$5,000—may be held by or for the benefit of any one person other than the Minister of Finance.

Dividends to shareholders may not exceed six per cent. Profits in excess of this and after reasonable provision has been made for reserve and other purposes are to be paid into the consolidated fund. Thus it is to be noted that, although private ownership is contemplated, the bank is not to be a "profit making" institution. This feature sharply distinguishes the bank from the ordinary business or commercial enterprise and is designed to enable the bank to pursue its legitimate ends, unhampered on the one hand by the urge to make profits and on the other by undue political interference.

The initial appointments of governor, deputy governor, and assistant deputy governor are to be made by the governor in council. The term of office of these executives of the bank is seven years. They are eligible for reappointment. Subsequent appointment of these officers is to be made by the directors with the approval of the governor in council.

Likewise, the first directors are to be appointed by the governor in council. Thereafter they are to be elected by the shareholders and are to be eligible for reappointment for terms of five years. The original directors retire in rotation as follows:

1. After the 3rd annual meeting;
2. After the 4th annual meeting;
2. After the 5th annual meeting;
2. After the 6th annual meeting.

The question of control is important. Broadly stated, the problem in this connection is that of creating an institution which shall be devoted to the public interest but which shall not be subject to the exigencies of politics in the narrower sense of the word. The services of the bank should obviously be at the disposal of the government, particularly in times of severe crisis and emergency. Clearly, however, the bank should not be subject to dictation by the government, for at times the exigencies of public finance might not be wholly in harmony with banking policies that might be considered wise and essential in the general public interest. Clearly, also, the bank should be protected from pressure by particular private interests. It is in view of these demands and possible dangers that the above regulations regarding ownership, appointment of officers, and limitation of profits, etc., have been drawn up. In this light these various features may be explained, for example:

1. Private ownership renders the bank more independent and detached from political controversy than would be the case under direct public ownership.

2. Limitation of profits removes dangers inherent in private ownership, but still offers conservative investment for private capital.

3. Limitation of share holdings, broad diffusion of stock ownership, and the provision that none of the shares may be held by chartered banks or by bankers tend to avoid pressure from particular interests.

4. Initial appointment of officers, including directors, by governor in council with provision for approval of subsequent governor, deputy governor, and assistant deputy governor by the same body affords guarantee of proper expert and disinterested leadership. The features allowing for only gradual retirement of original directors, with eligibility for reappointment, ensures that continuity of sound policy is made possible. This again affords protection against special interests. Sole powers given the minister to cast proxy votes of shareholders absent from annual meetings adds further to this protection as also does the reservation to governor in council of right to approve by-laws.

It is believed that the provisions here outlined will provide a workable organization combining the advantages of private ownership with adequate protection of the public interest.

In defining the powers of the bank, an attempt has been made in the bill to provide ample scope for the exercise of all legitimate central banking functions and yet to restrict the bank's assets to the most liquid and highest grade securities so that it may always be in a sufficiently strong position to assist in tiding the country over periods of strain.

The bank is to be allowed to buy and sell coinage and gold and silver bullion, transfer funds within and to and from Canada, and deal in bills of exchange of specified types and maturities.

It is also permitted to purchase on its own initiative or to rediscount certain types of investments. These are to include short and long term securities issued or guaranteed by the dominion or any province, with strict limitations, however, on the amount of such long-term securities which may be held. The short-term securities of the United Kingdom, other British dominions, the United States, and France, as well as a limited amount of long-term securities of the United Kingdom and the United States, may also be purchased. These provisions have been framed to allow the bank to hold earning assets in a suitably wide range of currencies. The limitations on the holdings of long-term securities are to assure a high degree of liquidity at all times.

The chartered banks are to be given access to central bank credit in a set of provisions which afford them privileges comparable to those which they now enjoy under the Finance Act. Thus, the bank is to be allowed to buy and sell or rediscount a wide range of bills of exchange and promissory notes endorsed by a chartered bank. Loans and advances may also be made to the chartered banks for limited periods on pledge of suitable collateral.

The dominion and provincial governments are also eligible for loans and advances but, in accordance with the suggestions in the Macmillan report, these are subject to appropriate limitations.

Deposits are to be accepted from the dominion and provincial governments and from the chartered banks but such deposits will not bear interest. It is expected that the provisions for chartered bank deposits will greatly facilitate clearing operations.

For the purpose of carrying on open market operations the bank is permitted to buy and sell in the open market securities, cable transfers, bankers' acceptances and bills of exchange of specified kinds and maturities, with or without the endorsement of a chartered bank. Open market operations are recognized as one of the important devices by which central banks maintain control over credit. Ample scope is here provided for the bank's activity in this connection.

The bank is to be required to act as fiscal agent of the Dominion of Canada without charge and may also by agreement act as banker or fiscal agent for the government of any province.

It is obviously unwise for a central bank, owing to the nature of its functions in the community, to engage in or have a direct interest in any industrial or commercial undertaking. Nor should it make loans or advances on real or immovable property. Unsecured loans and renewals of loans and advances should not be allowed except under rigid limitations or in exceptional circumstances. These are among the various kinds of business specifically prohibited in the bill.

It is intended that the bank shall eventually possess the sole right to issue notes in Canada. The Macmillan report's comment on this matter is worth giving. It will be found on page 98 of their report and it reads as follows:

> A central bank is responsible for the control of the volume of credit and the maintenance of the stability of the value of the currency. This responsibility connotes that the bank should be granted the sole right of issuing currency (other than coin) for it would be intolerable that a central bank's policy should be hampered by the action of other issuing authorities in a country. The experience of other countries has shown conclusively that the right of issue is not indispensable in assuring adequate profits to commercial banks.

In accordance with this recommendation the Bank Act is being amended to provide for the gradual retirement of the notes of the chartered banks. The Dominion Notes Act will be amended, and this act, together with the act of 1915 respecting dominion notes, and the Finance Act, will be repealed as of the day on which the Bank of Canada is authorized to commence business. With the opening of the Bank of Canada, the Minister of Finance will transfer to it gold now held against dominion notes, silver bullion to the limited amount necessary to implement the London Agreement, namely, 1,671,802 ounces, and securities of the dominion equal to the balance of dominion notes outstanding, and thereafter the bank will become responsible for the redemption of all such notes.

Bank of Canada notes are to be legal tender in Canada. It is not contemplated that they should be redeemable in gold coin. Provision is made, however, that when suspension of specie payments is not in effect, Bank of Canada notes will be redeemable in gold bars containing approximately 400 ounces of fine gold. This regulation providing for the redemption of notes in gold bars follows the practice adopted by Great Britain when gold payments were resumed in that country in 1925, and subsequently adopted by a great many other countries. The United States, which recently passed the Gold Reserve Act sponsored by President Roosevelt, is the most recent country to provide for the redemption of its currency in the form of gold bars. This arrangement is usually called the gold bullion standard; it accepts the theory that under conditions gold is primarily of use only in the settling of international balances of payments and it is designed to prevent any possible embarrassment to the bank from an internal drain of gold for, say, hoarding purposes.

Against its notes and deposit liabilities the bank is required to hold a minimum reserve of 25 per cent in gold. In addition to this minimum reserve, the bank may hold silver bullion in an amount limited to the obligation assumed by Canada under the International Silver Agreement, signed at London last summer, and foreign exchange in the form of bank balances, short-term treasury bills of the United Kingdom or the United States of America and short-term bills of exchange payable in sterling or United States funds or funds of any country on a gold standard.

In fixing the minimum reserve ratio at 25 per cent in gold and in providing, as above, that notes be redeemable only in gold bullion, the government is meticulously observing the resolutions passed at the London conference last summer. It is going beyond the recommendation of the Macmillan report, which suggested that part of the minimum reserve of 25 per cent might be held in the form of foreign exchange. Such foreign exchange as the Bank of Canada may hold may be regarded as part of the bank's reserve, but it must be in addition to the minimum gold reserve of 25 per cent.

In order that the central bank may be enabled to exercise the necessary control over credit policy in Canada, the chartered banks are to be required to maintain with the bank deposits equal to five per cent of their deposit liabalities within Canada. At present, each bank is free to determine the size, form and location of its cash reserves, except for the requirement that 40 per cent of whatever reserve is held must be in the form of dominion notes. The regulations here proposed will tend to concentrate the banking reserves of Canada and to provide that they shall not fall below a certain limit. It is through this power to influence the volume of chartered bank reserves by various kinds of action that the bank is able to exert its influence over the total volume of credit. These provisions which concentrate reserves and ensure an adequate reserve position should add considerably to the strength of our credit structure.

On the opening of the bank all gold held by the chartered banks is to be transferred to the Bank of Canada. The value of the gold so transferred is to be computed on the basis established by the Currency Act, that is to say, $20.67 per fine ounce. Profits from such gold transferred to the Bank of Canada by the chartered banks, in so far as such gold has been held against their liabilities within Canada, are to accrue to the Dominion government. Similarly, the government will secure any profit that may result from the revaluation of the gold which has been held as security against dominion notes, and which is transferred to the Bank of Canada. From time to time in the future also the governor in council is authorized to require every chartered bank or every other person to transfer to the bank any or all gold coin or bullion held in Canada which is owned by such chartered bank or such other person.

Appropriate provisions will be found in the bill for shareholders' audit of the bank and such further audit and inspection by the Inspector-General of Banks or by outside auditors as the Minister of Finance may deem to be desirable.

Provision is also made for weekly, monthly and annual reports.

The bank is to be required to establish a rest fund and any surplus earnings after meeting charges of management, depreciation of assets, et cetera, and after payment of accumulated dividends at six per cent are to be applied as follows:

One-third of such surplus shall be transferred to the rest fund and the residue to the consolidated revenue fund if the rest fund of the bank is less than the paid-up capital;

One-tenth of the surplus to the rest fund and the balance to the consolidated revenue fund if the rest fund is as large as but less than twice the paid-up capital; and

All the surplus earnings to the consolidated revenue fund when the rest fund is equal to twice the paid-up capital.

In conclusion, I desire to assure the house that the government has given careful thought and study to the drafting of this bill. At the same time, in submitting it to the banking and commerce committee, it invites that committee to give it the most careful examination and scrutiny, and if in its judgment any amendments can be made which will be designed to accomplish more fully the purposes of the measure or to strengthen its provisions, they will be not unwelcome.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the motion which is under consideration is one to enable the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) to introduce a bill establishing a central bank in Canada. As foreshadowed in the speech from the throne, the central bank measure will in all probability be the most important bill to be introduced at this session of parliament and, as the minister himself has just said, one of the most important measures ever introduced into the House of Commons of Canada.

At this preliminary stage of the introduction of the bill, it is not to be expected that any debate whatever will take place. The minister was not only justified but wise in giving, as he has done, at the earliest moment possible, a very full explanation of the main provisions and features of the bill. The country has been waiting, as well as this parliament since it assembled, for the measure to be introduced. From what the minister himself has said this afternoon it will be apparent that the provisions of the bill are so many, so important and so far-reaching that it would be most unwise to attempt any criticism or comment upon them until hon. members of the house have the bill in its entirety before them and are able to weigh the value of the different provisions in relation to each other.

I would like, however, to make perfectly clear the attitude of the official opposition with regard to the measure now being introduced. The bill is one for the establishment of a central bank. I need not repeat that we on this side of the house have for some time past been advocating that a central bank should be established in Canada. We have been urging the government to enact such a measure. I must commend the Minister of Finance and the government on having accepted—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —a suggestion from this side of the house at last. Yes, and may I point out, it is a constructive suggestion that has been acted upon. They are adopting a measure which is recognized now on all sides as being essential in the development of our banking system in this country.

Speaking on the 27th of February last, just a year ago this week, I made very clear in this house the position not only of the official opposition, but of the Liberal party as such on the question of a central bank and I would like now to repeat the words then used. The statement was made at a time when I was presenting the position of the Liberal party with respect to some present day problems. At that time, speaking of banking, credit, and currency, I said:

> Liberalism believes that credit is a public matter, not of interest to bankers only, but of direct concern to the average citizen. It stands for the immediate establishment of a properly constituted national central bank, to perform the functions of rediscount, and the control of currency issue, considered in terms of public need. A central bank is necessary to determine the supply of currency in relation to the domestic, social and industrial requirements of the Canadian people; and also to deal with the problems of international commerce and exchange.

That statement is clear and concise. From our point of view it did not require any royal commission to inform the government as to what was necessary with respect to the establishment of such a bank.

Mr. ERNST: It was all worked out in detail.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: However, we have the report of the royal commission, and I should like to join with the Minister of Finance in expressing appreciation of the services voluntarily given by Lord Macmillan and Sir Charles S. Addis as members of that commission. I refrain from commenting on the complexion of the commission as a whole in not having had included in its personnel representatives of certain classes in the community that I think should have been included. I do so, simply because I do not wish to provoke debate at this stage. But I have pleasure in joining with my hon. friend in expressing appreciation of the services of the two distinguished and eminent authorities whose names I have mentioned.

In so doing I wish to make clear, and I emphasize this more particularly because the resolution before us makes reference to the Macmillan report, that in supporting the resolution we are not to be assumed to be supporting everything that has been recommended by the Macmillan commission. I wish to make equally clear that in supporting the motion to enable the minister to introduce the bill we are not for one moment to be assumed to be endorsing the several provisions of the bill. As a matter of fact we have not seen the bill yet, and therefore notwithstanding the minister's lengthy explanation, could not be expected to express any opinion on its provisions. All we can be said to be doing at this stage is expressing our approval of the introduction of a bill to create a central bank. There are provisions in the bill as announced by the minister which I think will commend themselves to hon. gentlemen on this side. There are some provisions which the minister has mentioned to which I believe exception will be taken. Therefore I want to make it particularly clear that when the minister states that the bank is to be constituted in a certain way, that certain powers are to be given to its officers, that the officers are to be appointed in a certain way, that the stock is to be held by certain persons only these are all features of the measure on which we express no opinion at the moment with respect to and on which we wish to reserve our right to discuss very fully when we have the bill itself before us. At the moment we are simply acquiescing, and acquiescing very cordially, in the introduction of a bill for the purpose of creating a national central bank in Canada.

I do not think I need add more than that. The minister will, I assume, be prepared to answer questions when the resolution is being considered in committee of the whole. I wish to conclude with words, which have reference to the concluding words used by the minister himself, and say that our attitude on this side will be governed very much in the light of the minister's statement that he will invite before the banking and commerce committee to which he intends to refer this measure full consideration of its respective provisions, and that the government is still open-minded and will weigh carefully any suggestions which may be put forth there. We have no desire in any way to delay the measure in its progress to the banking and commerce committee. Indeed we wish the measure might have gone to the committee at an earlier date, recognizing how important that stage will be. I repeat, the attitude of hon. members on this side in permitting the bill to be expedited towards the committee stage is due to the fact that when the bill is before the committee they will then have opportunity to express very fully their opinion with respect to its different provisions, and, if thought advisable, to move amendments to the measure when it comes again before the house.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): The establishment of a central bank in Canada has been urged from this corner of the house for a good many years.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. COOTE: For the information of members who have only been in the house for one term of parliament may I say it has been advocated in the banking and commerce committee for the past ten years by hon. members from this corner. I will not attempt to put on Hansard a record of the various attempts which were made, but perhaps it is worth while to remind the house that in 1931, three years ago, with the approval of members from this corner, I personally moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, there should be established in Canada a nationally owned central bank.

On that occasion the only support which the suggestion received was from the hon. members in this corner. As far as I remember the leader of the opposition did not take any part in the debate. The Prime Minister on that occasion said that he could not agree to the establishment of a central bank at that time. It might be worth while reading to the house the last sentence of his remarks on that occasion. He said:

> But I ask my hon. friend not to press his motion to a vote at this time because this country is not prepared to make the change that his motion involves, and until it is apparent it is, there is no good reason why the action should be taken. But I assure my hon. friend I am sufficiently alive to human progress to realize that time may come, and if when it comes, we are here, as we probably shall be half a century hence, that action will be taken.

When I introduced the motion three years ago, Mr. Speaker, the main reason I gave, which was stressed all through the course of my remarks, was the need to establish some agency to control credit in Canada in order to maintain, so far as it can be done through monetary control, a stable price level. I want to say that if that action had been taken at that time; if we had set up in Canada a nationally owned central bank charged with that duty and given the necessary powers, we would to-day be in a better position as a nation. On that occasion I pointed out that Australia had a nationally owned bank, and I think it worth while to advise the house just what use has been made of that bank in that country. It has assisted materially in bringing about in Australia much better conditions than exist in Canada. I have here a review of an article which was written by Professor Douglas Copeland, of the university of Melbourne, and which appeared in a recent issue of Lloyds Bank Monthly Review. In paragraph 4 the review points out that the expansion of credit in Australia was of great assistance to the government in meeting the depression in that country. The review goes on to say:

> Bank credit was expanded for financing government deficits and public works by the issue of treasury bills through the Commonwealth Bank, Australia's central bank. During the crisis the expansion was at least 40 per cent. The treasury bills held by banks in Australia last June amounted to approximately 48 million pounds. They bear interest at two and a half per cent.

That is worth noting.

> They form a convenient form of investment for banks in a period of low demand for business loans. They may be discounted at the Commonwealth Bank. Various kinds of fears have been expressed regarding the dire consequences which would follow the issue of the bills, but so far nothing has happened to cause Australia to lose sleep over them.

As a result of the joint action of the Commonwealth Bank and of the government—and this action was taken at the request and with the full approval of the government—for eighteen months commencing in January, 1931, Australian wholesale price levels were relatively stable. They fell seven points as a result of the crisis in the United States, which began in October, 1932, and reached bottom in March, 1933. Then they recovered. Taking 1911 as 100, wholesale prices in 1931 were 143 and in 1932, 141. The corresponding figures for Canada are 118 for 1931, 109 for 1932, 100 for last March and 111 for last June. In other words, our wholesale price index in Canada has been approximately 30 points below the level in Australia, and as a result of that our producers and businessmen, and the country as a whole, find themselves infinitely worse off. Four years ago Australia was in a worse position than Canada, or to put it the other way I would say that Canada was in a better position than Australia, but Australia took appropriate action; they had what I consider a more intelligent monetary policy, and one reason why they were able to do so was that they had a central bank. Yet when I introduced the resolution in 1931 asking for a national central bank it received no support outside this corner.

I was discussing the question of the relative position of Canada's currency on the world markets with some professors of economics in Canada in 1931, and they agreed that I was right in my contention that our currency was at too high a level, but they said, "We have no machinery to control it, and we will have to put up with the present position." I asked, "What do you mean by machinery?" and their reply was, "We have no central bank." I came to this house and introduced the resolution asking for the establishment of a central bank, but it was refused by the government. Now the idea has become popular in all quarters. I am very glad of that, but as a citizen of Canada I must express my regret that we did not take action three years ago. I believe I would not be overstating the case if I said that if, during the past three years, we had maintained in Canada the price level that has been maintained in Australia, this country would be better off by a billion dollars. If in 1932 we had maintained a comparative price level with Australia our wheat crop of that year would have been worth a hundred million dollars more in Canadian currency to the farmers of western Canada, and the same difference, in proportion, would apply to all our other exportable products. It is worth while pointing out that while we have strained every effort during the last three years to balance our budget, last year we wound up with a deficit of something like $150,000,000, while the commonwealth government of Australia for their last fiscal year had a surplus of £3,000,000, largely due to a different monetary policy. One reason why Australia was able to have this different monetary policy was that they had a bank of their own, a nationally owned bank if you like.

This is perhaps not the appropriate time, to discuss in detail the proposal as brought in by the Minister of Finance this afternoon; that will come when we have had an opportunity of reading his remarks in full and seeing the bill. I do want to say to-day, however, that I see no reason at all for having any paid-up capital for this bank. The Commonwealth Bank of Australia had no paid-up capital, and it has been an eminently successful institution and has made profits for the government. If I remember correctly it started off with an advance from the government of £10,000 for till money, but I am satisfied that it had no paid-up capital. I see no reason at all for loading up this bank with a paid-up capital of $5,000,000 on which we are going to pay six per cent. That means paying out $300,000 a year to the holders of this stock, and there is no need for that.

Next I want to say that in my humble opinion this should be a nationally owned bank, as was stipulated in my resolution in 1931. This country to-day is facing problems which are very difficult of solution. Almost every problem that you could name, almost every problem that was mentioned in the debate on the speech from the throne which took up three weeks of the time of this house, depends on a national credit policy for its solution. To-day we should have the very closest cooperation between the central bank and the government. That cooperation should be as close as the cooperation that now exists between two departments of the government. This bank is going to have more power than the government has, once we turn over to it the sole right to issue legal tender and credit in Canada. I cannot imagine this house turning over to a privately owned institution the sole right to issue legal tender in this country, in which debts of approximately fifteen billion dollars are expressed. Is a private corporation going to issue enough legal tender or is it not? Apparently this parliament is to have no say in the matter; we are going to turn over that right to a privately owned institution. I simply cannot let this opportunity pass without saying to the Minister of Finance that I do hope that when we come to discuss the bill he will see his way clear to change that part of it so that the bank that is to be set up in Canada, that is to have such wide powers and that might be so useful to us in solving the problems with which we are now confronted, should be nationally owned and controlled.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like, if I may, to endorse and supplement what has been said by my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote). It was with somewhat mixed feelings that I listened to the announcement of the establishment of a central bank in this country. We have been advocating something of the kind for years.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): How many years?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: For some ten years, but I must confess that I am not very well satisfied with the announcement that has actually come to us. It seems to me if I might use an illustration it would be something like this: A sharp knife is preferable to a dull knife; but a sharp knife may be used in the hands of a skilled surgeon to save life. It may be used in the hands of a murderer to take life. I am afraid the central bank may become a means of more effectively scalping the public. The pressure of public opinion undoubtedly has forced the government to take action along this line. This measure may possibly placate the public, but I think it is only fair to warn the Canadian people that the central bank as proposed will not accomplish what some of us, at least, have been urging during these years. As was to be expected, the banks have again won. Even although in some individual measures proposed the banks may not be in full accord, essentially the financial control still remains with the financiers and is not secured for the public.

As I heard the reasons advanced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) for the establishment of a central bank I could almost hear the echoes of what we have said in this corner of the house for some years past. But when he proceeded to give the outlines of the proposed legislation I felt that after all we were being, shall I say, "fooled." I do not wish to use any word which would be offensive, but my belief is that the legislation proposed will be so far from accomplishing the purposes for which the central bank should be established that the public at least ought to be warned of the real situation.

Sometimes hon. members in this corner of the house have been called wild-eyed visionaries. For that reason possibly I might be permitted to take a few minutes to bring to the attention of the house some of the measures which we have urged in the past. The hon. member for Macleod has mentioned several. I can recall very distinctly, when the Bank Act was being revised in 1923, moving in committee for the establishment of the position of inspector general of banks. That was turned down. It required the failure of the Home Bank before the government of that day would permit the appointment of an inspector general of banks. In 1923, while the act was under revision, I can recall very distinctly—and my recollection is borne out at page 4018 of Hansard—urging that some steps should be taken to curb the power of the banks. I pointed out the interlocking directorates which existed and how, by means of this, great power was in the hands of the bank directors, and that virtually in Canada we had a money monopoly.

Further, in 1925, I find this resolution standing in my name:

> That, in the opinion of this house, it is not in the interests of the country at large that the privilege of issuing currency and controlling financial credit should be granted to private corporations.

To-day the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) has claimed that for a long time the Liberals have been in favour of a central bank. May I say that we did not receive any very great assistance from the government of that day when we put forward the proposal I have just mentioned. Hansard will amply indicate that. The hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell) scoffs at the suggestion that we proposed these things.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I did not scoff at anything. It must have been the smiling member for East Hamilton.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Ten years of sunshine has done its work upon the copy of Hansard from which I am quoting. It is now badly faded, but it indicates that that far back we were trying to secure some changes. Further, in 1926 a similar resolution was brought in.

In 1928 I moved, in somewhat more positive form:

> That in the opinion of this house the time has come for the establishment of a national system of banking.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

While I recognized that that could not be brought about at one fell swoop, I did urge these points, which I summarized:

> . . . that we need greater government control than we have at present because we have reached a stage of industrial and financial development when a few men not directly responsible to the people, control the money practically of the whole people of Canada.
> Secondly, the banks still have in their own hands the valuable franchise of issuing currency. This should not be given to any privileged group. The issue of money is essentially a government function.
> Thirdly, I went on to speak of the control of credit. It is necessary to have some central control in order that the weaker portions of the country and the weaker industries can be protected against those strong concerns which now are working in such close cooperation with the banks. Further, as undoubtedly, according to the authorities I have quoted, the amount of money in circulation, including the credit which was given, has a direct bearing on the cost of living. It is all important that this function too, should be controlled by officials who are responsible to the public, and not to irresponsible private corporations.
> There is a fourth point which I have not had time to develop, but which I shall simply mention in closing, and that is that if some plan of this kind could be carried out it would assist materially in government financing.

I would urge to-day that the power of finance in Canada is almost supreme. I think I am not going too far to say that in practice it is greater than that of the government. In recent years some of us have been almost shocked when we learned that the army and the military clique in Japan had never been brought under the control of the parliament of that country. Well, I take it that in Canada the financial powers have never been brought under parliamentary control. Even as far back as the time of Mr. Gladstone I find that there was a dawning recognition of the tremendous power of the banks.

Reading from Morley's Life of Gladstone I find a statement from Mr. Gladstone:

> From the time I took office as Chancellor of the Exchequer I began to learn that the state held, in the face of the bank and the city, an essentially false position as to finance. The hinge of the whole situation was this: The government itself was not to be a substantive power in matters of finance, but was to leave the money power supreme and unquestioned. In the conditions of that situation I was reluctant to acquiesce, and I began to fight against it by financial self-assertion from the first. . . . I was tenaciously opposed by the governor and the deputy governor of the bank, who had seats in parliament, and I had the city for an antagonist on almost every occasion.

I think the only difference between Mr. Gladstone and the ministers of finance we have had in this country in recent years is that at least he fought against the financial power, while our ministers of finance apparently have acquiesced in their policies.

May I emphasize several points which seemed to me to be of importance, but which are not affected by this measure. First of all let us consider the interlocking directorates of our present chartered banks. Although there may be some control of credit in this new body which is to be created, as a matter of fact a very large measure of the control of credit will still be in the hands of the chartered banks. That means that they can throw credit this way or that way. I am glad to note in the outline of the legislation containing proposed changes in the Bank Act that there is some little control over the amount that may be loaned to directors. That will be of assistance. But even with that we may still have the chartered banks very largely in the position to say whether credit shall be given or withheld, and to whom credit shall be given. We in this group still think, that credit ought to be in the nature of a public utility and that it ought not to be placed in the power of private, and may I say, irresponsible individuals.

I am glad to note in this proposed legislation that ultimately the new bank is to have control of the issuance of the currency, but I do not know why the government should treat the banks so leniently. Several years ago we were told that the franchise of issuing currency was of no very great importance, but now the banks have come to the position where they admit that it is of great financial importance to them, and so under the proposed legislation this franchise is to be taken away from them by very gradual steps indeed. It does seem to me that the issuance of currency is a prerogative that ought never to have been surrendered and one that ought immediately to be taken back by the government.

As to the control of credit itself, which in my judgment is a great deal more important than the power to issue currency, may I read two or three very significant sentences from the Macmillan report, which I believe the Minister of Finance has already quoted to-day:

> From a national point of view, the central bank, within the limits imposed by law and by its capacities, should endeavour to regulate credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of the nation and should so far as possible control and defend the external value of the national monetary unit.

Again:

> There are many factors, of varying nature, which combine to influence that level, and a central bank, working as it does purely in the monetary sphere, cannot be expected to have complete control, though it may well have a measure of influence.

Still further:

> It is manifest, however, that the regulation of the volume of credit is an important factor in influencing the level of economic activity and therefore of prices, and this is one of the cardinal tasks of a central bank.

That is the position, Mr. Speaker, that we in this corner of the house have taken for some years. We were laughed at by members of the older parties even though we quoted as our authorities some of the best economists and some of the most experienced bankers in the old land. Only this session someone ridiculed us suggesting that we should confine ourselves to practical matters. But we regard it as a full vindication of our position that the Macmillan report has frankly recognized the influence on the price level of the control of currency and credit.

I am rather sorry, however, that the Macmillan report and the Minister of Finance, following that report, have not gone so far as to advocate the assumption by the central authority of greater powers. There is one little sentence which I omitted from the excerpts which I have given from the Macmillan report:

> If it attempted to exercise any drastic control it would have to wield powers far beyond those which any body other than the sovereign authority would be entitled to exercise.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that unless some body, either the newly appointed bank or the government, itself exercises what is here termed sovereign authority, we are not going to secure the full control of credit, and are not going to be able to control price levels. I think that nothing short of that is going to help us in a material way to solve our present difficulties.

We were told by the present government some years ago that the Finance Act was able to function in this country as a central bank, and that we did not really need a central bank in this country. I recall an amendment which I offered to the Finance Act which if passed would have had the effect of enabling our Finance Act to be of some real service. Possibly I might be permitted to read from that amending bill which I proposed:

> The minister may, subject to the approval of the governor in council, appoint a board of commissioners to exercise, under the supervision of the minister, the powers vested in the minister by this act, and without limiting the powers which are by this act so conferred the board may—
> (a) exercise the powers conferred upon the minister by section five of this act;

(b) buy and sell in the open market any or all of the securities set forth in paragraphs (a) to (e), both inclusive, of section five of this act, and may make all advances of dominion notes necessary for this purpose.

I may say that my bill was ruled out of order on the ground that it involved the expenditure of public money. Thus once again we were thwarted in our efforts to secure some improvement of the situation.

I concur with my hon. friend from Macleod in the idea that we should have some way of maintaining the stability of our exchanges. I hope that it may be possible to do this under the proposed bank, but I am very doubtful whether the bank as organized is likely to be in a position to act effectively.

There is only one other point in this connection that I should like to mention and that is in regard to government financing. For years some of us have thought that the government, if for no other reason, should have a central bank, in order to finance without having to resort to private institutions which always took a very heavy toll.

I regret indeed that the proposed legislation proposes to set up the bank as a privately-owned institution. The Minister of Finance has suggested that he is willing to consider seriously any amendments which may be brought forward by the committee on banking and commerce. I do hope that he will listen to amendments which would change the set-up of the bank and allow it to be a publicly-owned institution. I am quite confident that nothing less will satisfy the Canadian people, and that nothing short of that will enable the bank to function as it should.

I should like also to object to the control as proposed. It is all very well to have the government make the initial appointments, but after that it would seem that the management is to be self-perpetuating, with a certain safeguard, perhaps, that they have to be acceptable to the government. It does seem to me that there should be a closer connection between the proposed bank and the government, and, I do not hesitate to say, a greater control by the government than may be possible under the proposed arrangement.

As I listened to the Minister of Finance it occurred to me that his statement with regard to the fear of political influence was one of the worst indictments of our democratic institutions that could possibly be put forward. Government is so corrupt to-day that we must forsooth set up another body, outside of government, that will not be influenced by government. If that is the case we might as well throw up our hands. Surely the people ought to be sovereign; surely in the long run the people must be depended upon to control the situation. As it is, we set up a body that is virtually independent and will be composed of people who undoubtedly have their own interests at heart. The further arrangement regarding shareholders means that it is the wealthy people who will still be in charge. In this legislation we are doing nothing to take the control from the hands of the financial interests and put it under the power of this parliament.

I note too the minister tells us that the privileges of the chartered banks, under the new arrangements, will be similar to those now enjoyed under the Finance Act. There again, it seems to me, we are perpetuating a system that is inherently evil. I think it was my hon. friend from Battle River (Mr. Spencer) who two years ago introduced an amendment under which the municipalities and the provinces would have the same rights under the Finance Act that the banks now have.

Mr. SPENCER: The provinces only.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I stand corrected. I myself would have gone further and said that not only the provinces but the municipalities as well should have those rights. That amendment was rejected by the government. Apparently there is no provision in the proposed legislation to cover that point. Under the Finance Act, as it has existed in the past, loans may be made on certain securities, in practice at 3 per cent, and the provinces and municipalities may then be charged say 6 per cent. The assessment of values of securities is left in the hands of the trustees of the gold reserve, three banks. If these privileges are to be continued I submit that there is little hope that under the proposed arrangements there will be any great improvement.

I shall suspend further criticism until the details of the legislation are brought down, but I would suggest again that the government would be well advised if it permitted certain amendments which would give to the people of the country greater and more direct control in the management of the new institution, and would make it essentially a publicly-owned utility.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I would make one observation only, consequent upon the remarks of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). There is no great interest as to who at a particular time suggested that there should be a central bank, but I think it might be well to remember that when the Genoa conference was held in 1922 a recommendation for a central bank was passed and this country was represented at that conference by one who had the approval of the then government. I have always been wondering just why, when the Bank Act was revised in 1923, no provision was made for a central bank. That is what I desire to say, and I say frankly that hon. gentlemen who sit opposite and to the right did three years ago argue for a central bank. I think it would have been a little better this afternoon if they had said that it would be quite impossible to create a central bank in this country without revising the Bank Act, and as the Bank Act was for a period of ten years, to have undertaken at the end of seven years to withdraw or to lessen the privileges which parliament had conferred for ten years, to create a central bank at the end of the seven year period, would have brought about great difficulties. I think there is no doubt in the mind of any hon. member that that is so.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the Prime Minister really suggest that there can be no revision of the Bank Act within the ten year period?

Mr. BENNETT: He certainly does not, Mr. Speaker. But he does desire to assure the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that when privileges are granted for a period of ten years the abrogation of those privileges before the end of the period cannot take place unless something in reason is substituted for them.

Now the essential feature of our banking legislation has been that we have conferred certain privileges upon organizations or corporate entities that came into being by the exercise of their powers by parliament. That is, parliament has said that a given number of individuals who will subscribe a given amount of capital shall thereby become organized, not as a trading corporation but as an entity called a bank, with a proper name; and amongst the privileges which we have conferred upon the banks heretofore in the last fifty years was the privilege of issuing paper money. That is, during the period of ten years, from 1923 until 1933, and by appropriate legislation in 1933 until the first of July, 1934, the chartered banks, created by statute of this parliament, had conferred upon them a privilege—the privilege of issuing paper money to the extent of their paid-up capital. And I think it will be common ground with us all that to have deprived the banks of that privilege within the ten years would have been an improper exercise of the powers of parliament. I merely mention that, because I am not going to discuss the various features of the legislation, which have been so fully explained to the house by the Minister of Finance. I merely wish to indicate that as long ago as 1923 this parliament was aware of the fact that the nations of the world had met together at Genoa and had declared that a central bank was desirable for all countries that did not possess one. The present president of the Bank of Montreal was one of the delegates who attended that gathering, and for good reasons the government of the day, when amending the Bank Act, did not make any provision for the establishment of a central bank.

I do not know that any very great purpose is served by wandering around to ascertain who was the putative father of this particular idea in days gone by. It might be sufficient for our purposes to say that this government at the present time is assuming paternity for the measure introduced by the Minister of Finance. That perhaps covers the situation sufficiently for our purposes, and there is no necessity of making further observations with respect thereto. I do not think any useful purpose will be served at this stage by traversing the various observations made by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Woodsworth), nor by traversing the various matters referred to by the leader of the official opposition. All that need be said is that by passing the resolution now standing in the name of the Minister of Finance we are not approving of the details of the measure, for the house is not yet possessed of a knowledge of those details. We are merely pronouncing in favour of a central bank, and when the measure has been introduced and the bill given the first reading the house will have an opportunity to consider later the extent to which it approves of the details as they appear in the measure.

On the other hand it will go to the committee on banking and commerce where I am sure, if it follows the course that similar measures have done in days gone by, it will meet, at the hands of those who sit opposite and to the right, with that warm reception that characterizes all measures that emanate from any government. That their ideas with respect to finance are sometimes extreme is well known, but that many of the suggestions they have made from time to time with respect to credit, banking facilities and so forth are generally recognized as having some merit is but a very commonplace statement to make. One could not expect that every possible suggestion that has ever appeared in any part of the world would all be wrong. I am sure that is the attitude of mind with which the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine), for instance, views this matter. There are some thirty-six central banks in the world. Six of them are owned by their nations; the others are not. The six are Bulgaria, Finland, Russia, Latvia, Sweden and Australia.

The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), with his usual passion for accuracy, is not quite right with respect to the Commonwealth Bank. In 1928 its profits were in part capitalized, the capital being made £4,000,000. The reserve taken out of profits was £303,000 and the savings bank branch had approximately £1,075,000 allotted for its capital. The earnings of that bank have been very large. The Commonwealth Bank of Australia has earned more than £8,000,000 in profits and it has discharged a great and useful function. At the appropriate time one could point out the distinction between Australia and this country with respect to the matters to which the hon. member for MacLeod referred. No good purpose, however, can be served by making a statement so extreme as that made by the hon. gentleman because our country has not seen fit to inflate as he has suggested. To indicate that the loss has been a billion dollars or that any such sum as that has been lost because we have not departed from sound finance in this dominion is something that, I think, will not bear even casual investigation, he having entirely overlooked our geographical position. I had occasion in another place to refer to some of the realities of life and one of them in Canada is that we are on the northern half of the North American continent; that we have a population of 10,500,000 while to the south of us we have a country with a population of more than 120,000,000, and that we are a debtor country. If one remembers just those three facts, that situation, I think, differentiates conditions in the Dominion of Canada from those in the Commonwealth of Australia. The statements that have been made will not bear examination of the most casual type, and I do not think any good purpose is served by making such extreme statements with respect to these matters.

I can only say that in adopting the recommendations contained in the Macmillan report with respect to capitalization and following the practice pursued in regard to thirty of the thirty-six central banks of the world, we believe the step taken, the provisions made, will best afford the Canadian people safety and security; that the credit to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) very properly referred, will be more amply provided for the people of this country than it would be if it were subject to the capricious action of any political party and that, as was said the other day in the editorial utterances of a great western paper, it is highly desirable in the interests of Canada that we should make it abundantly clear that whatever group may be in power, with the establishment of a central bank, it is imperative that we surround it with such safeguards as will make it impossible that the credit facilities of this dominion shall be available for other than wholly legitimate purposes.

I know better perhaps than some, not as well perhaps as others in the house, how great are the expectations that have been held out to the people in some parts of the country as to what would result from the establishment of a central bank. That sort of thing is very injurious because the functions of a central bank, even were it to exercise the widest possible authority and to have conferred upon it the greatest possible jurisdiction to deal with monetary matters, are such that in the very nature of things it cannot confer upon the Canadian people the benefits that some of my hon. friends opposite and to the right have at times suggested—perhaps not the hon. gentlemen themselves so much as some of their supporters, for when I read the papers occasionally as I have to do when I get a moment's leisure, I am appalled at some of the speeches that are made as to what a central bank is to be. No longer were we to worship the golden calf, because that was a matter that was as antiquated as are the days of Aaron, but a new day was to come and this central bank was so to dispense credit that all who needed money had but to apply and all who sought the wherewithal to discharge their obligations had but to seek and they would find. That is not the function of a central bank and unfortunately in a world of realities we have to deal with this situation in a manner that I believe, in every sense, will make the central bank an instrument for the advancement of this country. With the aid of the chartered banks, for they must play a very important part in making a central bank a success, I believe firmly and earnestly it will serve a useful purpose. There are those who sometimes suggest that it is in opposition to the chartered banks it is to appear. That is not so. The central bank cannot accept deposits for interest. It will be the repository of the reserves of the chartered banks. In the very nature of things it will discharge the functions of the financial or fiscal agent of the Dominion of Canada; it will be the note issuing authority of the dominion; it will create and issue legal tender; it will determine the extent to which rediscount shall take place; it will determine the rediscount rate from time to time. If at moments there is the thought that the creation of this institution is intended to destroy the chartered banks of Canada, that is an erroneous view, for the chartered banks will still be the depository of the savings of the people and the central bank is not intended to transact that class of business.

May I point out that in Australia the chartered banks not only flourish, but flourish greatly with a central bank. I suppose most hon. members have from time to time looked at the rates of dividend, for instance, that the chartered banks of Australia pay, and they have reason to do so. The figures I have which are for 1931—the latest year book is I believe in the possession of an hon. gentleman opposite—are 14 per cent; 12½ per cent; 10 per cent; eight per cent; 10 per cent; four per cent for the preference and 15 per cent for the ordinary shares. These are the rates of dividends for the banks that exist in the Commonwealth of Australia. I mention that because there should be no misunderstanding that the true function of a central bank is to coordinate the activities of the chartered banks with its own activities for the purpose of promoting the welfare of the country as a whole. What the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat said with respect to credit is perfectly true within limitations. No one in this chamber, I take it, would suggest that a chartered bank should lend money to everyone who applies for it. What right has the custodian of the deposits of the people to lend where he knows the money will not be repaid? Could anything be more cruel than to do that, for it means in the end the destruction of the bank itself. So with the central bank. It will in the very nature of things release credit, control credit under certain circumstances, create facilities for rediscounting, and fix the rates, transact the exchange business between this country and the other nations of the world, deal with our international financial and monetary relations, if necessary through the bank for International Settlements and otherwise, so that in every sense of the word the true relationship between this country and other countries with respect to monetary matters may be established through the operations and activities of this central financial authority. The large powers conferred upon the bank by the statute presently to be introduced I think will be found ample for every purpose; and as the minister has indicated, to the extent to which this house in committee, that committee representing every section of Canada, concludes that amendments to be made there will enable this bank properly to discharge the functions of a central banking authority, such amendments will be welcome.

I am glad to feel that—apart from questions of paternity—we are a unit in desiring that this measure should be as nearly perfect as our united wisdom can make it. Approaching it with real, bona fide differences of opinion with respect to some features of the measure—I respect the opinions of hon. gentlemen who say its capital stock should be the property of the people and nobody else—I feel perfectly certain that those of us who hold another view will at least have our opinions respected. But no one who sat in this house during the last few years could fail to be impressed with one fact, that is that the wit of man has not yet been able to devise a suitable authority by which the real shareholders of publicly owned enterprises can take their directors, as can the shareholders of a private enterprise at their annual meeting, and examine them and ascertain from them every detail connected with the administration of the business. We know in connection with our railway that we have set up year after year a committee and that sometimes the proceedings in that committee have degenerated into an effort to expose this, or to vindicate that. Very seldom can it be said that any committee thus constituted can be compared to a meeting of shareholders where a man gets up and asks: What about so and so? And the directors have to reply, and if need be, produce the books of the company for that purpose. Some years ago a rather distinguished citizen of Montreal, who had a few shares in the chartered banks, used to attend the annual meetings one after the other of those banks and some will recall the character of the questions he asked and insisted on having answered, as was his right as a shareholder. We have not yet been able to devise, either in this parliament or elsewhere, any institution that takes the place of the annual meeting of shareholders that subjects the operations of the directors to the scrutiny and their conduct to the criticism that is possible at an annual meeting of shareholders with the directors elected for the purpose of giving effect to their wishes in connection with their enterprise. That is one of the reasons why in this bill provision has been made for what is called private ownership. But the limitation upon dividends—and that too might be reviewed by the committee—ensures that the major part of the profits earned by this bank go to the treasury of the Dominion of Canada. The people are ensuring the success of their enterprise by the method best known to them, and making provision to secure the largest profits to relieve the taxpayer of his burdens. That is, all the profits resulting from the operations of this bank, with the exception of the dividend upon the $5,000,000 capital. Mark you, the taxpayer would have to pay interest if the money were borrowed on the open market, but by the proposed plan it is the shareholder, instead of the taxpayer buying the bonds upon which the interest is paid. It may be the rate would be slightly less in one case than the other, but the interest on the capital would in any event have to be paid. In that connection may I remind my hon. friends that the Commonwealth Bank of Australia in its early years was operated at a loss, until its expanding powers enabled it to cope with the situation and make not only profits but build up a reserve which was capitalized in 1924 as I have indicated.

So in taking the steps we have in carrying out the majority opinion of the Macmillan commission I do submit that it was not done merely because it was their opinion, but because the experience of business men throughout the world has been that we have not yet been able to devise any legislative action, any scheme whereby those who are responsible for the conduct of business when publicly owned are subject to the scrutiny and criticism that falls upon the directors of private enterprises at the hands of the shareholders. That is one of the great reasons that has influenced your government in arriving at the conclusions that are expressed in the bill.

I had not intended to deal with so many of these matters as I have. I only trust that the assurance given by the Minister of Finance may be taken to heart by every hon. member of the house and that an earnest effort be made to place upon the statute books, by the collective wisdom of all groups in the house and every individual who has a constructive suggestion to make, a measure that will create for us the Bank of Canada, which will discharge its functions as well as, if not better than, any central bank established in any country of the world.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Lennox in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think the Minister of Finance indicated in his address that the gold reserves of the treasury would be taken over by the central bank and that the profit would go to the dominion government. Has he any computation of what that profit will be?

Mr. RHODES: No, it is not possible to make that computation. When the bill is brought down we will see that provision is made for a computation.

Mr. COOTE: May I ask the minister whether the central bank will take over the gold held by the chartered banks, if so, at what price?

Mr. RHODES: It is proposed that the gold which is taken over shall be gold which is applicable to their business in Canada. It is not proposed to deal with the gold which is earmarked as a reserve against the liabilities of the bank outside of Canada in the same manner as the gold which is held as a reserve for business in Canada.

Mr. COOTE: Am I to understand from that answer that part of the gold held by the banks in Canada is earmarked for business outside of Canada?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, it is, and has been for a very considerable length of time.

Mr. IRVINE: I should like to ask the minister a question having to do with the control of the bank. Supposing the central bank was endeavouring to regulate the control of credit in Canada, and supposing the policy it adopted in order to do so was contrary to the policy of the government of the day, and they clashed, which authority would make the decision?

Mr. RHODES: Unquestionably the authority of the governor and the board of directors of the bank would prevail.

Mr. YOUNG: Now give us an example of that; we do not understand what you have in mind.

Mr. IRVINE: If my hon. friend expects me to give him an example I should be very glad to do so, but I should like to take a week in order to make sure that he understood it.

Mr. YOUNG: Then will the hon. gentleman come back in a week with an example?

Mr. SPENCER: I think in outlining the set up of the bank the minister said there would be seven directors. I should like to ask how these directors are to be appointed. I know they are to be appointed by the governor in council, but is it suggested that they should come from different parts of Canada or that they should represent different callings, or has the government anything in mind with regard to their qualifications?

Mr. RHODES: The directors are to be selected in the first instance by the governor in council and they will retire in rotation in order to make for continuity of policy. As and when they retire their places will be filled by the shareholders, but the bill will provide, as well as can be provided in a statute of this character, that they shall be selected in such manner as to make them representative of the different interests in the country.

Mr. McINTOSH: If the opinion of the governor and the directors of the bank prevails in any difficulty that may be up for solution, then what about responsible government in Canada? Where would that be?

Mr. RHODES: Well, Mr. Chairman, the authority and power of parliament is always supreme, and it is none the less supreme because of the fact that parliament, in its wisdom, may delegate a portion of its authority in this instance, as it has done in numerous other instances.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The minister has stated that no employees or officials of the chartered banks will be allowed to hold shares in the new bank. May I ask if that will apply also to the trust companies, some of which at the present time are more or less subsidiaries of certain banks?

Mr. RHODES: The act is worded as closely as it is possible to make it in order to prevent a bank from holding shares even indirectly, and I would assume in the instance to which my hon. friend refers that it would become a matter of interpretation as to whether that would be an indirect interest on the part of the banks. I can assure my hon. friend that when the bill is considered by the committee on banking and commerce the government will welcome any additional safeguards that can be provided in order to help carry out the intention expressed in the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask if there is any provision in the bill to the effect that the officers shall be Canadians?

Mr. RHODES: I think the term used is "British subjects." The bill provides that they must be British subjects, but it does not say they must be Canadians.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why not "Canadian nationals"?

Mr. RHODES: Well, Mr. Chairman, that is a fair subject for debate, and it is a matter which can be discussed in the banking and commerce committee. I am merely advised that the practice which has been followed in numerous other acts in which limitations are imposed with regard to the nationality of those who shall compose certain bodies has been followed in this case, but that is a matter for discussion. Of course there are other limitations in addition to this matter of residence.

Mr. REID: I should like to ask the minister if the government will control the metal coverage and also define what precious metals will be used as coverage.

Mr. RHODES: I think the answer to that question is that the statute itself provides for the metal coverage, so the statute would control it and not the government.

Mr. SPENCER: May I ask if the Minister of Finance will hold a share in this bank, on behalf of the government?

Mr. RHODES: No. It is provided in the bill that if the stock is not completely taken up by the public the Minister of Finance may do so. There is also a provision that all proxies shall come through the Minister of Finance.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Are members of parliament excluded?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. COOTE: Is the Minister of Finance to be a member of the board?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. MacLEAN: If I understood him correctly the minister said that the issuing of these bills would be gradually taken over by the central bank. How will that be done? I understand that at present the advertising from the bills is quite a factor to the banks, and that if they lose the right to issue bills they will lose the benefit of this advertising.

Mr. RHODES: The bill provides that beginning January 1, 1936, there must be a reduction of 5 per cent in the bills issued by the banks. That reduction continues for a period of five years, and then for a further period of five years the reduction is 10 per cent annually, so that at the end of ten years there will remain only 25 per cent of the total issues by the banks. Then when we come to another decennial revision of the Bank Act we will see what action is advisable in that respect, but certainly the notes of the banks will disappear in the proportion I have mentioned, so that at the end of ten years all the bills, with the exception of 25 per cent, will be those of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister spoke of the right given the chartered banks to issue notes. Do they pay any interest to the government on their note issue or any part of it?

Mr. RHODES: Yes; they pay, and have paid for a number of years, a tax of one per cent on their circulation.

Mr. YOUNG: On their total circulation?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, that is to say, they pay that tax on their regular circulation. Of course there is provision for the additional issue of 15 per cent of their circulation for a certain period, on which they pay a much higher rate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In one of his addresses the Prime Minister intimated that the government's intention to establish a central bank was partly the outcome of a resolution passed at the world economic conference approving one of the resolutions of the monetary and financial commission. I believe that this resolution states that among other purposes the central bank is necessary in order to provide an international gold standard, with the necessary mechanism for its satisfactory working. Would the Minister of Finance be kind enough to indicate whether or not there is a provision in this bill for that purpose and, if so, the nature of the provision?

Mr. RHODES: Yes; I think the bill as drafted is amply wide to take care of all international transactions, including gold. I pointed out that the standard of the bank will be a gold bullion standard, but at the same time the bank may buy and sell gold coins.

Mr. HANBURY: Before this resolution is reported may I say that as I understand it, private ownership is service for a profit. Under this measure I understand the profit is going to be limited and it is a question in my mind whether it would be in the interests of efficient operation of a central bank to give permission to make some small return over and above what has been provided, so that we will at all times be assured of efforts to increase efficiency.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, the profiit above the fixed amount for which there is provision in the bill, namely of six per cent, goes to the consolidated revenue fund. We have endeavoured on the one hand to provide a fair return for the capital which is supplied from private sources but on the other hand have tried to eliminate the urge to make profits, as profits.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no limitation upon the profits, but there is upon the dividends.

Mr. HANBURY: That is the point I have in mind. The time may arrive when a profit has not been earned. If we have a private bank striving to earn profits, but is not successful in that effort, it may be that the service would become less efficient. That is the point I am bringing to the attention of the minister, namely as to whether or not we should not maintain some basis of profit so that we may continue at all times to increase efficiency and the desire for greater profit.

Mr. BOWMAN: Are the dividends to be guaranteed by the government?

Mr. RHODES: No, they are not. As a matter of fact, if the bank does not earn six per cent there will be no dividends paid.

Mr. BOWMAN: They will be cumulative?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, they are cumulative.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister has stated that the provisions in the main are based on the findings of the royal commission. Could the minister indicate whether or not the bill departs in any particular from the findings of the commission?

Mr. RHODES: There may be some details, but in its broad features I think it is fair to say that we have followed the recommendations of the Macmillan commission. I have in mind one instance, for example, where the commission recommend that the reserves of the bank should be twenty-five per cent in gold and foreign exchange. We have provided that it must be twenty-five per cent in gold, and that any foreign exchange must be over and above the twenty-five per cent, which means that we have gone even farther than was recommended by the commission.

Then, of course there are other recommendations. For instance, one major recommendation made by the commission was that the central bank should take over and manage the public debt of Canada. We did not see fit to recommend in this bill that that feature should be mandatory. But, in the main we have followed the broad general recommendations of the commission, departing perhaps here and there in detail.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The wording of the resolution has prompted my question. It might be construed as meaning that all the provisions of the bill are as recommended by the royal commission. But I am quite satisfied with the minister's reply to the effect that there are some provisions which are not in accordance with the recommendations of the commission, and differ from them. I assume that when the bill comes before the committee and there is consideration of any of the provisions the minister has mentioned, a suggestion which may run counter to the recommendations of the commission will not be ruled out because it is a counter recommendation.

Mr. RHODES: I believe the statement I made at an earlier stage, when moving the house into committee, will indicate that the government is prepared to deal sympathetically with any suggestion towards strengthening the bill, and which has in mind the main object of the bill, which may emanate in committee.

Mr. BENNETT: If the right hon. gentleman would look at the measure he will see that the limitation is not such as he indicated. It is not so indicated.

Mr. HANBURY: Is it the intention to charge income tax on the profits of the central bank?

Mr. RHODES: There is no reference in the bill itself to income tax, but certainly the dividends which go to individual shareholders will be subject to income tax.

Mr. HANBURY: You could not say with reference to the corporation itself?

Mr. RHODES: No, because that is the property of the treasury, and goes into the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. YOUNG: The point is this: Does the income tax come off the gross profits before that payment is made to the revenue fund, or will it come off afterwards?

Mr. RHODES: I cannot see that it makes the slightest difference whether it is gross or net. All the shareholders can get is six per cent, and that is all in which he is interested. That six per cent will be subject to income tax.

Mr. YOUNG: Can he get six per cent?

Mr. RHODES: If it is earned; but he must render an account of that six per cent in making out his income tax report, as a portion of his income.

Mr. YOUNG: That is not the point. Here is a corporation which will earn certain profits. All profits over six per cent will go to the government. That corporation will be taxable for its profits.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it is not.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the six per cent left with the corporation for dividend purposes be taxed as income tax against the corporation?

Mr. RHODES: No, there will be no tax against the corporation whatever.

Mr. BOYES: May I ask the minister if the double liability clause which applies to shareholders of chartered banks will apply to shareholders of the central bank?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. SPENCER: I should like to ask whether there will be any maximum with regard to salaries of the officials?

Mr. RHODES: The only limitation imposed in the measure as at present drafted is a maximum amount which will be available as fees for directors. There is a further provision in the bill that the salaries payable to the governor, the deputy governor, and the assistant deputy governor shall in the first instance and thereafter be subject to the approval of the governor in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the minister present a report to parliament and is the report subject to review at each session?

Mr. BENNETT: No, not subject to review; we make a report but it is not subject to review.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But, as a basis for discussion in the house?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it could be discussed.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rhodes thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 19, to incorporate the Bank of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask if copies of the bill in English and French are already available for distribution?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, I will send a copy over to my right hon. friend.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CITY OF OTTAWA AGREEMENT

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works) moved the second reading of Bill No. 8, to authorize an agreement between His Majesty the King and the corporation of the city of Ottawa.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF AUDITORS BY RESOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of Bill No. 17 respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): When this measure was introduced I asked the Minister of Railways to give an explanation, and my recollection of that explanation is that the minister said it was to appoint auditors as provided by the Railways act of last session. Looking however at the bill which has been presented, it appears to be a bill to amend the act of last session and to have the auditors appointed by act of parliament rather than by resolution of the House of Commons. That is hardly in accordance with the explanation given by the minister.

Mr. MANION: As a matter of fact, the leader of the opposition is correct in using the word resolution. On looking into the matter however we find that we could not do it by resolution of parliament. If it is done by parliament, which comprises the King, the Senate and the House of Commons, it must be done by statute. I fancy that there was rather a slip-up last year in this respect. My impression was that it was by resolution of the House of Commons, but unfortunately we made it "resolution of parliament," and I am advised by the legal officers, both of my own department and of the Department of Justice, that the way proposed is the only way of carrying it out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It may be irregular to be debating the measure on the second reading. Perhaps I may be pardoned however, if I say a further word, in view of the explanation given at the outset and the change in the significance of the measure in what is now proposed. My own feeling would be that the intention originally was to have the auditors appointed by resolution of the House of Commons. I believe it would be better to provide in the measure for resolution by the Commons and to proceed along that line rather than to appoint the auditors by act of parliament. There is one other fact I would mention, and that is that the essence of the appointment will lie in the names of the persons to be appointed, and the bill as presented leaves that blank.

Mr. MANION: I will tell the right hon. gentleman who they are.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before agreeing to the second reading of the bill, if we are doing more than agreeing to the appointment of officers, the house ought to know the names. Would not the minister consider the suggestion I have just made of having the auditors appointed by resolution of the House of Commons? I will be perfectly frank as to what I have in mind. The House of Commons is the body that primarily has control over money matters. It has always been of special concern to the House of Commons to deal with all problems of finance, and we ought not to be asked to share that power with another branch of parliament. If there were appointed auditors whom the House of Commons might wish at any time to change, this house should be free to make that change without having to obtain the consent of the Senate.

Mr. MANION: If my right hon. friend will allow the bill to go into committee we can discuss that point afterwards. I have not given any thought to the suggestion he has made, though I do not see any objection to the matter standing as it is, because the appointment is only for one year in any event. The provision adopted last year was that a continuous audit of the accounts of the national railways should be made by independent auditors appointed annually, and so forth. So that it will have to come up next year, though that would not be necessary if the intention were to leave the same auditors; and inasmuch as we intend to appoint the auditors who have been there for a good many years I do not think the house will object.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): I voice my objection to the last statement of the minister. I do not think that one firm of auditors should be continuously auditing the accounts. It might be all right for three or four years, but I think there should be a change every three or four years, in the interests both of the railways and of this parliament. I am glad to note the minister's statement that it is only for one year, because otherwise I should be very much disappointed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

Section 1—Auditors appointed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister explain?

Mr. MANION: We intend to appoint, for this year at any rate, the same auditors who have been carrying on for many years, George A. Touche and Company of the city of Toronto, chartered accountants. In reply to my hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario, there is no reason why these auditors need necessarily remain longer than one year; the provision which I have just cited states that the auditors shall be appointed annually. I said that if we did not desire next year to change the auditors there would be no need to re-appoint them; in other words, they would carry on until their successors were appointed. But that is a matter for discussion next year. It has been decided, after a good deal of consideration, that the auditors who have been doing the work for a good many years—I do not know exactly how long, but eight or ten years at any rate—are so well trained in the work and are so capable that it would be wise to appoint them at least for this year. I am informed by the railway people themselves that it would take quite a long time for any group of auditors to learn the method of auditing such an immense system of books and accounts as are contained in this vast business. For example, I am told that there are no other chartered accountants in Canada who are familiar with the Interstate commerce commission's type of accounting and the accounting of the Canadian National Railways is carried on under the same rules as those of the Interstate Commerce commission for the railways of the United States. If it be true, as I am informed, that there are no other companies of chartered accountants in Canada who are familiar with that type of auditing, it would probably take many months for a new company to assume charge of the auditing and become familiar with it. Therefore, after a good deal of consideration, we felt that it would be wise, at any rate for this year, to appoint George A. Touche and Company, and I intend to move that the name "George A. Touche and Company, chartered accountants of the city of Toronto" be inserted in section one of this bill.

Mr. SPENCER: For how many years have the same auditors been engaged?

Mr. MANION: I believe for eight or ten; they have been doing that work for many years anyway.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Was the minister advised by the law officers as to the necessity for making this appointment by statute rather than by resolution which would confine it to the House of Commons?

Mr. MANION: I was so advised.

Mr. BENNETT: In the main act the resolution is a "resolution of parliament" and a resolution of parliament does not mean a resolution of the House of Commons; that is all. Parliament means the Commons, the Senate and the Sovereign. The only way to meet that condition was to pass a statute or else amend the main act and provide that the resolution should be one of the House of Commons. Rather than amend that act, we are following the course the act indicates—passing a resolution of parliament.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It seems to me that this is making appointments in connection with the operation of the Canadian National Railways very difficult to change. It is all right to say that they can be changed by statute, but a statute requires the consent of both houses. This is a case in which the intention clearly was to leave the matter to the commons itself. If the main act did not make that provision, it appears, to me that it should have done so, because after all the House of Commons is the body that is responsible for the operation of the national railways.

Mr. BENNETT: Not any more than the Senate.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My right hon. friend and I may differ in that regard.

Mr. BENNETT: There cannot be a difference of opinion.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, there can be a difference. There was considerable controversy in the passing of the act last year.

Mr. BENNETT: Not on this point.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not on this particular point because it did not arise, but it arises now and personally I want to protest.

Mr. GRAY: I do not have the act of last year before me, but it appears to me that once the name of George A. Touche and Company is inserted in this bill, they are made permanent auditors of the Canadian National Railways unless the act is repealed.

Mr. MANION: May I read the section to my hon. friend; it is section 13 of the act of last session. It reads:

> A continuous audit of the accounts of National railways shall be made by independent auditors appointed annually by a resolution of parliament and annually reporting to parliament in respect of their audit. Their annual report shall call attention to any matters which in their opinion require consideration or remedial action. They shall be paid by the national company such amounts as the governor in council shall from time to time approve.

The only way we could do this other than the way in which we are doing it would be by changing the act of last year, because it distinctly states, as the Prime Minister pointed out, that the appointment shall be made by a "resolution of parliament" and according to my information that can be done only by a statute of that kind. As the bill says that the appointment is to be made annually, this parliament can change the auditors next year and there is certainly nothing permanent about the appointment.

Mr. GRAY: I agree with the minister that we can change the auditors, but we shall have to do so each year by this particular legislation we are now placing on the statute books. This power is conferred by the act of 1933 and it is that act which the government should amend rather than introduce a separate measure. I ask the minister to consider the matter.

Mr. MANION: I simply reply that I have been informed by the legal officers of the crown that a resolution of parliament means a statute. The only way in which you can pass a resolution of parliament is by passing a statute. Therefore we are carrying out entirely the course laid down last year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What the minister says is quite correct, that if there is to be a resolution of parliament, an act of parliament is what is signified, but I should imagine that in the original draft of the act the emphasis was intended to be placed on the word "resolution" and not on the word "parliament." The fact that the word "resolution" appears, would seem to indicate that what the law officers had in mind was a resolution of the House of Commons; otherwise they would have adopted the customary phraseology by the use of the word "act." I have no suggestion or comment to make as to the auditors; I know nothing about the firm mentioned except what is highly creditable in every way. A larger consideration and very important principle are involved, namely that on these matters which relate to financial operations and appointments of this character which are specially related thereto, the House of Commons should maintain its position of control and, in fact, a more or less exclusive control. I can understand wherein perhaps the minister may have some reluctance to bring the original act before parliament for purpose of amendment, as it might open up a discussion on the matter generally, but even if he is obliged to run that risk, it is much better to take the right course at the outset and preserve to this house the appointment of auditors by resolution of the commons alone, than to pass acts of parliament in connection with matters for which the House of Commons alone should be responsible.

Mr. BENNETT: Now that I think of the matter, I suggest that the provision was placed there with great deliberation; it was to remove the appointment of auditors from mere political control. The House of Commons is a political organization purely and simply. The Senate need not be and very often is not. In the days of Macdonald, it will be recalled, a very important bill of his was defeated by the Senate although he had a majority there. To say that the House of Commons with respect to the appointment of auditors is in a better position to select them than another body which, under our constitution, unless we desire to amend it, has equal powers regarding matters of this kind, is, in my judgment, a wholly erroneous view. I find the argument advanced difficult to follow. I believe a firm of auditors selected by the Senate, if I might mention that body here, would be probably a better selection than could be made by the commons and one more apt to be free from any political consideration or control. There is no question of politics in this appointment for the simple reason that this firm has been employed for several years; but the point made by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) and referred to incidentally by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) is, in my judgment, well taken. It will be recalled that in the Bank Act provision is made that auditors are to hold office for a limited time only and that other auditors have to be appointed as shareholders' auditors. The reason is obvious and I can only say that so far as the government is concerned, it will follow very closely what has been said by the hon. gentlemen, the only difficulty being this, that inasmuch as the auditors will be for the year 1934, continuity in audit might be lacking if the house did not meet until later than January by a whole month, because the appointment would have to be made at once by parliament for the year 1935. But as the matter stands, in order to remove any doubt such as that raised by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray), I suggest that the minister add the words "for the year 1934," although this is not required, for the preamble is the power conferring provision and the section is the exercising of the power; as the power can be exercised only for an annual appointment, it follows that the appointment is for one year and one year only. But if the minister is satisfied that any of the members are in doubt about the matter, it can be removed by adding the words "for the year 1934."

But I think it is unfair that with respect to some matters there should be constant effort made to suggest that this house has a position superior to that of any other part of parliament. Parliament is a composite body, consisting of three elements, the crown, the senate and the commons. And as has been said so often, they must act in cooperation to effect the passing of a statute. A resolution of parliament means a statute, so far as the general legal provisions are concerned; and to provide that auditors shall be selected by a joint resolution of the House of Commons and the Senate in the form of a statute does, I think, remove it from at least some difficulties that might at some time occur; they are not present at the moment, but they might. The very fact that these words were left in after so many revisions indicates to my mind that it was intended always that the selection should be made by joint action of the Senate and the House of Commons acting in their legislative capacity for the purpose of effecting the provisions of the statute.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, I cannot agree with the Prime Minister at all when he says it is unfair to assert a superior right on the part of the commons when it comes to dealing with money matters.

Mr. BENNETT: This is not a money matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend's assertion was a broad one of the superior right of this House of Commons in certain matters or any matters. There is no doubt in the world that the right of the commons is superior to the right of any other branch of parliament with respect to the control of public moneys and public expenditure.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear; we are agreed on that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is part of the obligation of the commons to preserve that right as rigidly as is possible. As the Prime Minister says, the appointment of auditors is not on all fours with a financial measure, but the auditors are appointed to exercise supervision over the expenditures of the national railways, the largest expenditures that this country has to account for under any one particular service. And the analogy as a consequence is close enough to hold as to the special right of the commons in the matter.

Further I should like to draw attention to the fact that this House of Commons has already parted pretty well with its control over the railways. We are being told by no one oftener than the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways that the financial difficulties in this country are accounted for more by the expenditure on the national railways than by anything else. In those circumstances it seems to me that there is every reason why the commons should keep its control over the expenditure of public moneys by the railways and over those who are to audit the expenditure of these particular public moneys.

The Prime Minister speaks about political control, and says that the object was to do away with political control. That observation is to some extent a reflection upon the commons itself. I can speak the more freely in that this measure proposes to leave the matter entirely in the hands of the present government, moreover, there is no pressure from the opposition and no criticism of the government's likelihood to deal in a partisan manner with the appointments they are making. What we are striving for is the maintenance of the broad principle that the government that is in power is responsible to the people for the expenditure of public moneys, and should keep in its control appointments which will have an important bearing on the whole matter of expenditure and taxation. That is a far-reaching and fundamental principle, and I think it should not be departed from. Each time a surrender is made it becomes more difficult to maintain the position. Last session when the bill was before the house the right of any change in the person of the president of the railway was taken away from the government of the day, and by an act of parliament matters were so arranged that another house, not the one elected by the people, would have to sanction any change of the person who was to hold the chief administrative office of the railway. I think that is getting very far away from the control by the people over their public utilities and over the expenditure of public moneys incidental thereto and wherever a situation of that kind arises the commons ought to assert its position very strongly by opposing it. I still hope the minister will not press the matter. If he does, I feel we ought to register our vote against it. We may be voted down, but, nevertheless, the matter involves a fundamental principle which I think ought to be preserved. I have no desire to divide the house on a measure of this kind, but from the way the minister spoke in introducing it, I feel that he himself was not too sure of what the intention of the provision was; the bill is simply intended to amend an act, but is doing so in a roundabout way. I wish the minister would consent to leave the matter over until he has had opportunity for its further consideration.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): The Prime Minister has made a suggestion that seems calculated to remove any difficulty. Would it not help us to get on with the consideration of this matter if the minister were asked what response he feels disposed to make to that?

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman, I am entirely agreeable to that, because as a matter of fact it leaves it exactly where it is, except that it makes it more definite. The Prime Minister is apparently anxious, as I am, that everyone should feel that the matter is being dealt with in a way that is absolutely above board, as is the case. I am quite agreeable to inserting after the word "auditors"—I presume that is where it would be—"for the year 1934," which would make it definitely and distinctly an appointment for this year, until we reappoint them or appoint someone else next year.

I could more easily understand the position taken by the right hon. leader of the opposition if we were changing the auditors, but as a matter of fact the auditors, for whom I have a great deal of respect, were there when we came into power and had been for some years previously; they have had very wide experience, I have personally discussed with them their experience and have come to the conclusion that they are a splendid group of auditors. For those reasons I think we are on such solid ground in reappointing them that I do not feel like withdrawing from the position except to add at the suggestion of the Prime Minister the words "for the year 1934" which definitely and distinctly makes the appointment for one year. The matter should probably have been discussed last year if there was any objection, because the words are distinct enough—I was merely speaking from my own memory when I spoke first—the words are so distinct that had we gone into it it would either have been decided to leave it as it is, which is exactly what we are doing, carrying out the act of last year, or if we had wanted to leave it entirely to the House of Commons we should have changed it. But I repeat, I am advised by the legal advisers of the crown that what it means is that we should pass a statute. I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but I do not see any reason for withdrawing it at the present time. I should like to have it carried. And I feel that my hon. friends should have no real objection, particularly in view of the fact that I think these are the auditors whom they themselves appointed.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Chairman, that is not the point that we are arguing. We are not objecting to the individuals who are being appointed, but we are pointing out again that this is a departure from an important principle. True it was done last year, done against our protest, interjecting the Senate into the control of the expenditure of this money. That is the objection we take. We believe that inasmuch as the House of Commons has full and complete control over expenditure and over the revenues of the country without interference by the Senate, it was a mistake to interject the Senate into the matter of the administration of the railway at all. While this present item is perhaps not very important, yet we do desire to register our protest again against anything that in any way brings the Senate into even seeming control of the public expenditure.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the hon. gentleman has overlooked one fact. The reason this provision is here I take it is that the Auditor General of Canada cannot be removed except on the joint address of both houses of parliament. There is the analogy. My memory is not sufficiently good as to what the causes were that brought about the present legislation, but it must be within the memory of every hon. member in this chamber that the Auditor General cannot be removed from office except on the joint address of both houses of parliament. These auditors are to be appointed by a resolution of parliament, which is the converse of the provision that the Auditor General can be removed only by a joint address of both houses of parliament. So now the auditors of this system are appointed by what amounts to a joint address of both houses of parliament, though a joint address would be an improper method of procedure; it is the resolution of parliament mentioned in the act, which of course means a statute.

It would serve no useful purpose to enter into a discussion as to why joint addresses of both houses of parliament are necessary to bring about certain results, but the question of expenditure as distinguished from the auditing of expenditure is so well known as to not require very much discussion. This is the house in which money bills originate, yet every day the Senate deals with legislation touching on public expenditures, and I suppose it will continue to do so as long as it exists. There is no bill which leaves this chamber which is not passed upon by the Senate. It has been said that it is not competent for the Senate to amend a supply bill. There was a difference of opinion as to that; one eminent authority said the Senate had that power. I have always accepted the view that there was no power in the Senate to amend a supply bill or any bill of that character.

It will be recalled that it was in connection with a subsidy bill that the Senate asserted its authority and destroyed the bill after it had passed the commons, in the days of the late Sir John A. Macdonald. It will be recalled also that after a subsidy bill had passed this commons handing over the Yukon to a well known firm for exploitation the Senate destroyed that legislation. The Senate has exercised this power and in many cases—in fact in most cases, I think—its position has been vindicated. For instance, it was an investigation carried on by the Senate in connection with the expenditures under subsidies granted to a railway that brought about the downfall of the Mercier administration in Quebec, and the Senate has always passed upon legislation enacted by this chamber, though it must take the risk of its own life if it destroys a supply bill, for example. I have given two instances of money bills being destroyed by the Senate, and the third case to which I have referred had to do with the expenditure of public money under a subsidy bill.

I do not think any good purpose would be served by going into the countless examples that might be referred to. To-night we are following the provisions of a statute passed last year, which necessitates the passing of a statute now to appoint for one year a firm of auditors, which firm held office when we came into power. Whether or not they should be appointed for longer than a year or whether or not there should be a change are matters which I am not going to prejudge, but I will say that in large public institutions such as our banks, parliament has accepted the principle that there should be a change of auditors from time to time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With regard to the parallel drawn between the appointment of the Auditor General and the appointment of these auditors, I do not think it can be said that the cases are on all fours. The position of the Auditor General is made what it is with the view of preventing pressure by the administration of the day upon a public servant. The auditors appointed for this purpose would not be subject to the immediate control of the government to at all the same extent that an Auditor General, auditing the general accounts of the government, would be.

The point to be kept clearly to the fore is the right of control by the commons in all money matters. The Prime Minister says that we are not to have any political control. If he uses that word in any other than a very narrow sense, meaning partisan political control he is wholly misrepresenting the position of the commons. The members of the House of Commons are sent here for the purpose of exercising control in money matters and of exercising political control, using the word "political" in the sense of the control which, as members of parliament, they are sent here to exercise. I can see where, arising out of the difficulties of administration, there may be reason for doing away altogether with government owned or government controlled institutions, but so long as you have either —or if you have neither—you have still to preserve the right of the commons to control everything in relation to money matters where public expenditures are involved, if the commons is to perform its functions at all.

I do not wish to make a mountain out of a mole hill in a small measure of this kind. As to the bill itself, we have made it perfectly clear that we have no objection to the auditors that are being named, nor have we any objection to their being appointed for a year. We are seeking simply to preserve the principle of the right of the commons to exercise its control in money matters. And may I point out this further reason. It may become necessary to make a change in the auditors even while parliament is in session, and a resolution of the House of Commons can be much more speedily passed than an act of parliament. If, after all that has been said, the government wish to persist and are determined to put through the measure we will simply register our opposition to it. Beyond that I do not wish to press the matter.

Mr. MANION: I should like to say just one word to emphasize the position taken last year. The recommendation really was the recommendation of the Duff commission, whose recommendations we were carrying out. Section 208 of their report states:

> A continuous audit of the accounts of the system should be made by independent auditors appointed by parliament from a list or panel drawn up by the trustees—

You will perhaps remember, Mr. Chairman, that when we were discussing that point I took the attitude on behalf of the government, which was supported by the house, that it was not wise to have the trustees themselves suggest any auditors, because really the auditors would be checking the work of the trustees. So we left that out, but the suggestion that auditors should be appointed by parliament was made originally in the report of the Duff commission.

My right hon. friend will remember also that this bill was introduced not in this chamber but in the Senate, and was carried through there. I happened to have a copy of Hansard on my desk, and while the discussion was going on I looked through the debate that took place last year. Though the discussion covered a couple of pages of Hansard the only objection made to the appointment by parliament came from the hon. member for West Edmonton, who took the attitude that this should be done by the governor in council. He did not object to the parliament end of it at all, but he thought we were taking out of the hands of the governor in council the right to appoint these auditors, and I presume that my right hon. friend would be better satisfied to have the auditors appointed in this present way. We are merely carrying out the suggestion of the Duff commission in this measure.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Who pays these auditors?

Mr. MANION: The railway.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): How much are they paid a year?

Mr. MANION: I cannot answer that question, but I can give it when we are discussing other railway matters. I did not know this bill was coming up to-night, and there are some facts I have not at hand. The auditors are paid according to the amount of work they do. This is a huge job, and this firm have men scattered east and west from Montreal. I presume they are paid a pretty good sum, but it is in proportion to the work done.

Mr. DUPUIS: I should like to know from the Minister of Railways how he is going to amend section 1 in accordance with the suggestion of the Prime Minister.

Mr. MANION: I accepted the suggestion of the Prime Minister and put in the name of George A. Touche and Company, of Toronto and Montreal. They have offices in both cities, and I think that would be the proper way to describe them. Then the words "for the year 1934," are to be inserted after the word "auditor."

Mr. MANION: I move:

That the words "for the year 1934" be inserted after the word "auditors."

as well as putting in the name of George A. Touche and Company of Toronto and Montreal.

Mr. DUPUIS: A continuous audit means that they work yearly?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. DUPUIS: On every occasion they are called?

Mr. MANION: Yes, that is right.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: On division.

Amendment agreed to on division.

Section agreed to on division.

Bill reported.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Chairman, we will continue with item 113:

British Columbia—Essential undertakings—
Esquimalt—repairs and improvements to R.C.N. barracks and H.M.C. dockyard, $15,000.
Fraser, Skeena and Naas rivers—operation and maintenance of snagboats, $35,000.
Oona river—float, $3,700.
Harbours and rivers generally—for maintenance of services, no new works to be undertaken, $75,000.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): Shall the item carry?

Mr. NEILL: No.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) was not in the house when an item respecting public works in New Brunswick in which he was interested was passed. I promised him that the first item brought up in the estimates would, so far as I was concerned, give him an opportunity to discuss the New Brunswick item. I suggest that we do that at this time.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the Minister of Public Works for giving me this opportunity. A few nights ago when the item concerning New Brunswick came up for consideration I had retired earlier than usual for reasons which I believe are well known to the committee. I felt that a misunderstanding had arisen between the minister and myself as to when the item would come up.

Now that I have an opportunity of discussing it I should like to call the attention of the minister to a vote of $25,000 which passed last year for the extension of Shippigan wharf. The item was passed by the house, tenders were called for, some seven or eight of which were received. One tender was at a reasonable rate, being a few thousand dollars below the estimate of the engineers. After the matter had been considered the work was cancelled. After I have completed my remarks I should like the minister if possible, and if I am not asking for something within the realm of confidential information, to give the reason why that important work was not carried on.

May I call the attention of the minister and the government as a whole to the situation at Shippigan. Up to 1931 the lower section of Gloucester county, where the harbour of Shippigan is situated, had sufficient accommodation for the purposes of fishing. We have some 250 or 300 vessels going through Shippigan harbour twice a week, to and from the fishing grounds, the fishermen leaving their homes on Monday and returning on Saturday. A number of the vessels unload at Shippigan and Lameque, which are five miles distant from each other.

Since the depression fishing has fallen off, so far as the markets are concerned, and in that section agriculture no longer holds the position it held previously. In order to provide themselves with a living the people in the parishes of Saumarez, Inkerman, Shippigan, Paquetville and part of the parish of Caraquet have gone into the pulpwood business. They have undertaken to cut pulpwood on their farms which in the past they had reserved, because in those days they did not need to cut wood to make a living. Today, owing to the depressed condition of trade they are compelled to go into those reserves and cut pulpwood. This pulpwood cannot be shipped by rail, because the cost is too heavy. Pulpwood shipped from that section of the country costs as high as $11 per cord for shipment by rail whereas by water it costs only from $3.50 to $3.75. In 1932 the first shipment of pulpwood was made from the harbour at Shippigan. It was represented at that time that the wharf was not in a condition to accommodate steamers loaded by the four-hatch system. They could load only the two-hatch system at that wharf, with the result that loading cost a great deal more than it would have had the proper accommodation been available. In 1933 we shipped 20,000 cords of pulpwood from that port, giving work to a large number of people in the parishes I have named. When it appeared in the estimates of last session of parliament that $25,000 had been voted, and that an extension would be made to the wharf so that the large steamers could load by the four-hatch system, those engaged in the purchasing of pulpwood tried to push the enterprise to an extent greater than they had done before, in order to give work to the people. When the contract for the work was not awarded the people who were in the business could not undertake to purchase quantities as large as they would have liked to and because of that the work has fallen off. The municipality, the provincial government of New Brunswick and the federal government have continued to give direct aid to a class of people who in the winter of 1932-33 were able to make their own living. What I wish to ask the government to do is to see that this contract will be let. The money has been voted. It is true that the vote will not expire until March 31, the end of the present fiscal year, and I trust that between now and then the government will see its way clear to come to the assistance of these people by seeing that the contract is let so that the work of construction can be carried on during the coming summer.

Let me say to the minister, if he believes the lumber cannot be got out this winter, that he need have no hesitation in awarding the contract on that ground. The lumber can be got out at any season of the year within fifteen miles of the place where the work is to be carried on, and at any season of the year it can be floated down the river to Shippigan harbour. Any other material that is necessary for the construction of this work can be got locally at any season of the year. I think I have taken up sufficient time to show the minister the necessity for going on with this work at Shippigan, and I hope that he will be in a position to inform the house that the contract will be let before the vote runs out at the end of the fiscal year and that the work will be carried on in order to help the people in that vicinity.

Let me say that if this contract is cancelled on the ground of economy it would be poor economy. It would be imposing an extra burden on the municipality, an extra burden on the province, and an extra burden on the dominion exchequer because the dominion government has to pay one-third of the direct relief that will be given to these people. There are at least one thousand people interested in this enterprise. I do not say one thousand workers, but one thousand people including the workers, their families and dependents, and I trust that the work will be gone on with.

While I am on my feet I should like to bring to the attention of the minister another matter which might more properly be brought up when the item for dredging is under consideration, but as I do not know that I shall be in the house at all times, perhaps I might be permitted to refer to it now.

In the harbour of Bathurst the department has a dredge boat. She has been lying idle there for three years. In the 1930 session there was sufficient money voted to enable that boat to continue dredging Bathurst harbour. The fact is, however, that this dredge has remained idle since 1930, and I think I can safely say that it is rotting at the wharf because no repairs have been made, and there is only a man or two looking after the boat as watchmen. Bathurst harbour since that time has partially filled up, to such an extent that the great industry we have there, the pulp mill, is hampered in its work. Bathurst harbour has flowing into it four rivers—the Little river, the Nipisiguit, the Middle and the Tetagouche. The sediment or silt coming down from these four rivers is continually forming a bank about a mile and a quarter within the entrance of the harbour, and to-day there is not sufficient water on that bar to allow a vessel of any large tonnage, such as used to come in in the past, to come in and load or unload. We have quite a lumbering industry in the surrounding districts, and the lumber for the English market is shipped by water through Bathurst harbour. If we are unable to ship to Bathurst harbour we have to ship by rail to St. John, two or three hundred miles by rail, and then by water across the Atlantic. This dredge is lying idle in Bathurst harbour and I would ask the minister to take note of the conditions I have brought to his attention and to see if some part of the general vote for dredging in the province of New Burnswick cannot be utilized to dredge this bar or that part of the harbour that needs to be dredged. Let the minister apply to his colleague the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) who was given a very fine reception last summer by the people of Bathurst. It happened to be my son, Dr. Veniot, who was mayor of the city at that time and received the Minister of Marine. The minister was given a very warm reception and I know that he was well pleased with the reception Bathurst accorded him, but he could not bring his own steamer into the harbour of Bathurst, a port into which a few years ago vessels drawing twenty-two to twenty-four feet of water had no difficulty entering, but to-day you could not bring a boat into that harbour drawing seventeen feet of water. The Minister of Marine at that time obtained information from the business people of Bathurst, and I understand he promised to report his findings to the Minister of Public Works. I hope the Minister of Public Works will take note of this matter.

Let me draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works to another matter. Farming and lumbering in the lower section of Gloucester county, especially in the parish of Saumarez is almost a thing of the past. We have had no lumber mills in operation there for the past five or six years. There is a small mill starting up this winter. The people in that section in the past used to devote their time and energies to lumbering and fishing. Tracadie harbour, in the parish of Saumarez, had fairly good water, but the channel to the harbour was impassable because with every northeast gale or northwest storm the channel would change. Accordingly a recommendation was made to the government to dredge a new channel and build a breakwater to help out the fishermen. The government has spent about $175,000 in the construction of this breakwater preparatory to the opening of the new channel. The money was voted in 1930. I think about $50,000 or $55,000 was voted to enable the contract to be let, and tenders were called for. During the time of the previous government and under the present government about $175,000 has been spent on the contract so far. The work has been carried on and completed, but the channel still remains blocked. There is a dredge in that harbour. They started to dredge from the village side to the opposite beach to the west. The dredge started its operations in 1930 and continued them until the fall, when the work was stopped. That dredge is now tied up to the wharf and is rotting at the wharfside, and here we are paying wharfage, and nothing has been done since. When the general vote for dredging in the province of New Brunswick was up last year I asked the minister if any part of that vote would be devoted to continuing the dredging in Tracadie harbour. It would not take a great sum of money to finish this work. The greater part of the dredging inside has been done unless it has filled in again within the last few years. The greater part of the work now to be done is to cut through to the beach, and the suction dredge which is now in Tracadie harbour could very readily do this. I am sure that it could be accomplished in two months. If this work were done it would give an opportunity to a large number of people who are now on the dole to earn their living, and it would establish in that section of Gloucester county one of the finest fishing industries in the maritimes. I wish the minister to note that.

I will not take up the time of the committee further, but I do wish to point out to the minister once more, and to impress upon him and the government, the great necessity for carrying on these works this year if at all possible.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I think my hon. friend must admit that the government has been impressed by the importance of having something done at Shippigan, from the very fact that an item has appeared in the estimates and that tenders have been invited for the work. He will also recall that after the estimates were brought down, and after the Minister of Finance had introduced his budget, an undertaking was given that the expense covered by the estimates would be reduced by approximately $14,000,000, and that undertaking has been carried out. Each department was asked to review carefully the program of contemplated works and as far as possible to meet the requirements of the situation. That is the reason why, although tenders were invited for this work, it was not undertaken. It is true that the importance of the work has been emphasized by the getting-out of pulpwood recently in that section. There is no doubt that the work is an important one, and if the revenues permitted, it would be undertaken. I shall consider whether it is possible even now to award a contract on the vote that has been passed this year, although the department had undertaken to forego any expenditure in respect of that item.

Mr. VENIOT: I would point out to the minister that the share which the dominion government alone has to pay towards the dole in Tracadie, in Shippigan and in Inkerman, will amount to almost one-quarter if not one-half of the cost of constructing the wharf.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): There is no guarantee that if we did this work we should be relieved of this liability in respect of the dole, because we have not found it to work out that way.

Mr. VENIOT: There is a guarantee; the people selling pulpwood will not get the dole.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It would undoubtedly provide some employment, but I am afraid there would still be some contribution in respect of what the hon. gentleman calls the dole.

Mr. VENIOT: What about dredging?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Now I will take up the second item, dredging at Bathurst. Representations similar to those made by the hon. gentleman to-night have been made in connection with the situation at Bathurst. That also will be considered and it may be provided for out of the general vote or possibly in some supplementary estimate. If it is as urgent as my hon. friend says we will see if something can be done. In regard to Tracadie, considerable expenditure was made under the appropriation made by the former government, but owing to the curtailment of the vote available for government dredges in the maritimes we were unable to continue in operation all the dredges and had to lay up such ones as we thought could with advantage be dispensed with, continuing in operation only the one most useful. I am not sure that we shall be able to do much more at Tracadie this year. However, we will see what can be done.

Mr. VENIOT: Because the new gulley is not opened through to the beach, the work that cost $170,000 odd is being destroyed by the force of the seas, which otherwise would have a vent through the new channel and would not cause as much pressure on the outside work. If that work is left in the condition in which it is now and that channel is not opened, the pressure from the sea will be so great that you will not have any work there inside of two years; it will be all destroyed.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Will the hon. member for Gloucester assist us by telling the committee these two things, if he has them within his knowledge: First, as to when the dredge he speaks of ceased operations, and secondly as to when the trade in pulpwood to which he refers became active.

Mr. VENIOT: Dredging operations ceased in October, 1930, notwithstanding that the money had been voted for that purpose in the session of 1930. Dredging in Shippigan ceased, inside and outside the gulley, and operations provided for by a vote of $10,000 passed in this house in 1930 for dredging at Lameque, were also discontinued. Dredging at Lower Caraquet wharf, which was to be carried on under an appropriation of that year, was discontinued, as was also dredging at St. Simon, another fishing centre. So far as pulpwood is concerned, operations started in 1931, some time in the fall, and reached their highest figure in 1933, last summer, when there were shipped out 20,000 cords of pulpwood from that section of Gloucester. Of course, more wood is shipped from Gloucester off private lands, but the rest was in the upper section of the county where it had to go by rail and could not go by water.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Can the minister tell us where the money was spent last year in connection with dredging in British Columbia?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I have not that information but I will undertake to get it for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I understand that very little if any of the money was spent in the northern part of British Columbia, there are three different places where, as I have been informed on reliable authority, the floats are in such poor shape that neither the fishermen nor anyone else will dare to land boats. Nothing is mentioned here about the floats, and I know that recommendations were made to the department, and to the district engineer, who is familiar with the conditions. There is one at Silver City on the mainland and there are two on Queen Charlotte Islands. A very small amount of money would put these floats into proper shape. These recommendations have been forwarded to the department and I should like to know whether, under the vote for harbours and rivers generally, something will be spent to put these floats into shape.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The dredging to which the hon. gentleman refers would come under item 116.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I think it is 113.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Item 116 would be for dredging, British Columbia, $140,000.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): But the item 113, harbours and rivers.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That is for existing services.

Mr. REID: Regarding item 113, I notice that under the item of harbours and rivers generally there is a reduction this year of some $25,000. I know the minister will tell me that there is a reduction all round in the estimates. Of course I do not know what there might be in the supplementaries, but taking the estimates now before us I protest against this reduction this year. In this regard may I point out that last year New Westminster was the only port in the whole of Canada that showed an increase and it is now the third largest port. In spite of the depression through which we are passing, the number of ships entering that port increased during 1933 to the extent of 409 large vessels of from 8,000 to 10,000 tons. I draw the minister's attention to that considerable increase in business and appeal to him now for greater consideration for that port. On occasions there are as many as six deep sea vessels in the port at one time and they are finding it difficult at times to turn around in going out. They have, I might say, to turn around so as to head downstream in going out down river. Owing to lack of depth of water in various spots ships become stranded, and last year I believe one or two became stuck for the lack of room while endeavouring to turn around and go out. I need hardly draw attention to the seriousness of a ship of 9,000 or 10,000 tons being stuck in the sand because, if it touches bottom, especially if it has a cargo, the consequences may be serious.

I do not believe the government has been entirely seized of the trade outlook from the west. Since confederation the whole development of Canadian ports has been on the Atlantic seaboard and in looking over the estimates I notice that the amount available for Atlantic ports is just ten times as much as that for those on the Pacific. Far be it from me to raise the issue of the east against the west, but I think the time has now come when Canada should look more to her western ports especially as her trade with the orient and other countries is growing and will grow as the years pass by. When, on looking at the estimates, I find a total of $1,131,400 available for Atlantic ports and the total estimate for the western ports of British Columbia is $128,700, it is no wonder that I rise and protest.

To come to the item under discussion, especially with regard to the Fraser river, I should like to point out that 60 per cent of the lumber that left British Columbia last year went out from that river. Well over 218,000,000 feet of lumber left that river for export in addition to many tons of fish and 431 cases of apples, but all told 2,384,000 gross tons went through the port of New Westminster last year. As I say, it is the third largest port in Canada and yet we find for the whole of British Columbia an estimate of only $128,700. The matter of ships not having room to turn due to lack of depth of water should be attended to because, in spite of the difficulties which have beset us in the development of the port due to the irregularity of the Fraser river, New Westminster has shown wonderful growth. I believe I am safe in saying however that the channel there in some parts at least is not any better after twenty-five years of operation. It is true that it has been developed and improved in parts, but there are other parts that I believe should be further considerably improved. While I do not object to what is being spent in the east, I am appealing to the minister in all seriousness that more attention should be paid to ports on the Pacific especially the port of New Westminster.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I think my hon. friend will agree with me when I say that you cannot roughly determine by geography the expenditures which should be made; the matter depends upon existing conditions.

Mr. McINTOSH: Geography would be a factor, would it not?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It might have something to do with the matter. I think the hon. member should also agree with me that special consideration has been given to the requirements of New Westminster and a very large proportion of the money available for expenditure in British Columbia has been expended on the Fraser river. We have done our best to meet conditions as they arise there from time to time and every representation that my hon. friend has made —and he has made many of them, as he has a right to do—have, as conditions warrant, been given prompt attention; just so far as our equipment has permitted and funds are available, the requirements have been met. I think he will agree with that, and that we have made a sincere and honest endeavour to meet the difficult conditions that arise from time to time in the Fraser river. The engineers are in touch with the situation; they are following it from day to day and doing their best to meet the emergencies as they arise.

Mr. HANBURY: I would just like to associate myself with the remarks made by the hon. member for New Westminster. While it is true that much money has been spent on that harbour, I would point out to the minister that large expenditures will probably be necessary there for some time to come. Canada has already a large investment in the Fraser river up to the harbour of New Westminster and with the silting and the shifting of sands in the river it probably will be necessary for some time to come, if we are going to have an efficient port, to make heavy expenditures there.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): There is no doubt about that.

Mr. HANBURY: As the hon. member for New Westminster has pointed out, a very large percentage of the total exports of British Columbia go out through New Westminster harbour. It is therefore of vital interest to industry in Canada and particularly to lumbering that that harbour should be maintained in a condition that will enable the export of lumber to be put on a proper basis. I cannot believe the amount that has been provided in the estimates for the general maintenance of services is sufficient for the requirements of New Westminster harbour and I support the recommendation of the hon. member for that constituency, that the minister should investigate the matter carefully to see that we do not economize to such an extent as to lose a large portion of the investment we have already made there. As I pointed out before, our investment is now large and unless we maintain it on an efficient basis, the time will come probably shortly when it will be necessary to spend an exceptionally large amount to put that harbour into the condition in which it should be maintained. I would inquire of the minister whether the sea wall and other works that have been carried on for many years in the harbour of Vancouver along Stanley park would come under this item. For many years work has been carried on at Stanley park in Vancouver in connection with the sea wall and other projects. I am not sure whether that work would come under this item or some other item.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): A special appropriation would be required, I would say. I would like to ask the hon. member if the work is carried on by the harbour commission?

Mr. HANBURY: No, by the Public Works department. And if there is no other item I would like to mention to the minister that at this time when every effort is being made to create employment for manual labour, possibly the construction of the sea wall in Stanley park, Vancouver, is a work that is nearer to being all manual labour than anything that might be done. This work has been going on, the expenditure running, I think, from $9,000 or $10,000 to $12,000 a year. I think there is considerable work still to be done, and I would suggest to the minister that he investigate it, particularly in relation to the program of works which the government propose to put into force to meet the unemployment situation. I would ask him to investigate that and other work at Stanley park, Vancouver, which would consist very largely of manual labour, to see whether funds could be provided to carry them on now when employment is so vitally needed.

Mr. REID: I would like to ask the minister if he contemplates making any provision in the supplementary estimates for the improvement of some of the jetties, or doing any further work on the jetties?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I can scarcely tell my hon. friend yet what will be in the supplementary estimates, but if he has any suggestions along that line we will give them consideration if he will send them in.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I nearly always agree with my hon. friends from Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury) and New Westminster (Mr. Reid) but in this case I do not. They talk about the government spending money in dredging to develop harbour facilities on the Pacific coast. I wish to remind the government and the members of this house that at Prince Rupert in British Columbia we have a harbour that is second to none on the Pacific coast and needs no dredging. The government railway runs to it, it is 500 miles nearer to the orient than any other Pacific port. So I take exception to the proposal that money should be spent to try to make artificial harbours on that coast when we have natural harbours which are more suitable.

I also wish to ask the minister whether when the supplementary estimates come up he would consider those two places I mentioned in British Columbia. There is one on the mainland, Silver City, and two on Queen Charlotte island, which require a little repair or improvement to enable the fishing fleet and the coastwise shipping to land at the docks; also one in the interior which has not had any assistance in the last four years. Before that they used to have a few dollars each year, and it requires $200 more to complete the work on the White Sail and Ootsa rivers. It used to come within the Nelson district but now it is included in the coast district. I would like the minister to give me an assurance that he will look into that matter. Representations have been made to him by myself and some others.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I will ask the district engineer to make a report on the suggestions of my hon. friend.

Mr. NEILL: I would like to take a minute or two to put on the record a matter that I have taken up with the minister privately, the extension of the lumber assembly wharf at Port Alberni. That wharf is rather a unique undertaking; it was built at a cost of $135,000 some six or seven years ago, and unlike any other work of the character in Canada, I think, it paid from the grass roots, if you can apply that expression to a wharf. We have no harbour commission there, no suggestion of graft, no expensive machinery, no costly overhead officials. It is run by the government itself, run well and economically, and it has paid as I say right from the beginning. Of course there are wharves elsewhere under the auspices of commissions and harbour boards, but this one is run by the government. There is no doubt that it has been the salvation of that thriving little town during the depression, the whole community would have been on relief had it not been for the seaborne trade that was carried on through the instrumentality of that wharf. My hon. friend from New Westminster talks about his port being the third biggest in Canada. Port Alberni is the third biggest lumber shipping port in British Columbia, its export of lumber runs very close to that from New Westminster. Last year 104,000,000 feet of lumber were shipped from there, and this is only one small place on the west coast. I happened to notice in the press that the total shipments of lumber from New Brunswick were only 135,000,000 feet. The lumber business there was very closely run, there is little money in it, it was being run more to keep the men in employment than anything, and that condition still obtains to some extent. To help the industry out the government reduced the wharfage dues by one half, and even at that it is bringing the government in something like $1,000 a month, a condition that I do not think obtains in the case of those ports for which my hon. friends from Vancouver-Burrard and New Westminster speak. Port Alberni, I think, is one of the finest harbours on the Pacific coast. We do not need dredging to make a harbour, all we want is a wharf. We could put the whole British fleet in the Alberni canal and still have room for more. The other day I saw an item in the newspaper stating that a boat had just come in for lumber, I think it said it is the second biggest ship afloat in freight business, but she had no trouble getting in or out, went in under her own steam, did not require to be hauled in. But the wharf is dangerously overcrowded. I was there before I left and every available foot was occupied almost to the extent of being dangerous. Indeed I noticed that there was a little V-shaped place between the approach and the wharf, never intended to be a part of the wharf, but it was planked over to prevent people walking into it in the dark, and because the place was so over-crowded they had some 1,700 ties piled there, and they went down into the water. An extension of 200 feet was recently asked. That certainly would relieve the congestion to some extent, provide space for lumber and so would help a little; but what is being asked now—the minister has had telegrams and letters recently—is that with the increased business, growing every day, there should be an addition of 400 feet, which would provide a berth for another ship. At the present time only one ship at a time can lie at the wharf, and others, sometimes four or five at once, have to lie out in the stream.

That is expensive, and there is danger of us losing our trade, so painfully and laboriously worked up, on account of the boats not being able to get quick service. Demurrage on an ordinary steamer will run from $200 to $700 or $800 a day, and if any lumber merchant has to pay that you will understand it is going to make him very unwilling to come back to that port.

I would like to say further that the government as we know has in contemplation a large program of public works this coming summer. I am certain, as I think many of us must be, that some of that money will be spent for purposes that will not only be unproductive but will be a source of expense for maintenance in the future. This is an outstanding case of a work that will not only provide employment while the work is being done but it will pay, in the wharfage, interest on the expenditure and will provide work for the men, the stevedores and those employed in the lumber business. So the government will not be involved in the expense of maintenance, and it will be substantially helping to relieve the unemployment situation, not only for to-day or for this year but for years to come. I know the engineer, who is a very capable man of wide experience, is in sympathy with this suggestion. He made a personal investigation of the situation; even in the short period since I left home trade has gone ahead, and it is increasing almost day by day. It is proposed to construct another large sawmill at that point; I understand they are to break the ground next month, and certainly this would encourage them to go on with that work. Adjoining the Alberni canal in that neighbourhood is the last large stand of the big Douglas fir on the Pacific coast; I think there is a larger stand there than anywhere else. We have three large sawmills at that point in addition to the new, modern mill which is contemplated, and no doubt that is where the great development is going to take place in the next few years.

I only wish to put these facts on record. I know the minister will do what is right and that he will have the matter investigated. The extension of this wharf would be thoroughly justified from every point of view.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): In reply to my hon. friend I can only say that these estimates were prepared before any representations such as he mentions were made in connection with the extension of the wharf at Alberni. It is true, as he stated, that I have received many telegrams and representations such as he has described, and I may tell him that I have had representations with regard to the extension of a wharf in at least one other locality. All these matters are being studied in connection with any program we may develop, and in connection with our supplementary estimates. The recent development of the lumber business in British Columbia seems to have been very rapid, and in some respects it appears to have outgrown the facilities that were considered ample under the conditions that existed two or three years ago.

Item agreed to.

Dredging—
Maritime provinces, $161,200.
Ontario and Quebec, $215,500.
Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, $50,000.
British Columbia, $140,000.

Mr. MacLEAN: Would the minister give us a little information with regard to the dredging done in Prince Edward Island last year, and what is contemplated this year?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I cannot give my hon. friend particulars of the expenditures made in the past year. This is a general item which will enable us to allocate the amount for such works as appear to be most necessary. The plant that we have in the maritimes will be operated as far as the appropriation will permit, and the work will be done where it is most urgently needed. I am afraid that is all I can say on a vote like this.

Mr. REID: I wonder if the minister has any information as to how much was spent for dredging in British Columbia last year, and where it was spent.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I have not that information, though I can get it.

Mr. REID: I notice a small increase in the dredging vote this year, for which I am very glad, but I would direct the minister's attention to the fact that dredging is needed on the Fraser river in order to provide adequate facilities. A great deal of dredging is required in front of the elevator, which is being operated by a reliable grain firm. Dredging is also required in front of the wharfage facilities of the Pacific cold storage, so that at least two vessels can lie there and be loaded or unloaded at the same time. In addition there is the new cut, which may give a good deal of trouble. I wonder if the minister has any information with regard to the new cut, whether it has been completed and whether or not it is a success.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The last time I discussed the matter with the chief engineer he reported that the results were very satisfactory.

Mr. REID: I speak of the amount to be spent for dredging because I know the requirements that should be met, and I know that once an appropriation passes that is the end of it. In other years when we have come asking for more dredging to be done we have been met with the answer that the appropriation has been exhausted, so this year I am suggesting to the minister that more dredging is required in order to maintain the facilities which are in operation on the Pacific. I would ask the minister seriously to consider this matter when the supplementary estimates are being made up.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Very well.

Mr. RYERSON: I should like to ask the minister if anything is included in this vote for the dredging of Port Dover harbour?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): All I can say to my hon. friend is that the amount has not been allotted as yet. It will be distributed in the way we think most desirable having regard to the most urgent needs.

Mr. RYERSON: I might say to the minister that this work is very important, and is so considered by the fishermen and business men of Port Dover. I have received representations from the Grand Valley Board of Trade calling my attention to the difficulties that are being experienced at Port Dover at present, and I would ask the minister to take this matter into consideration.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I will have it investigated.

Mr. SANDERSON: I should like to ask the minister what proportion of the amount of $215,500 devoted to Ontario and Quebec is to be spent in Ontario, and where the work is contemplated.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I can only give my hon. friend the same answer, that the allocation has not been made as yet. Last year we had many demands for dredging that could not be met, and we just did the work we thought was most urgent as far as the funds would permit. That is why the vote is made up in this way.

Mr. SANDERSON: Then I would like to ask the minister if the total amount is apportioned in any way as between Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No, that is the form in which the vote has been made up for a great many years.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Could the minister tell us how much was spent in Quebec last year under that item, and where the work was done?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend that information.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Has the minister any report from his officers as to the work that will be done this summer, and where it will be done?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Is that work done by government dredges or under contract?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Some of it may be done under contract but most of it will be done by our own dredges.

Mr. SANDERSON: Could the minister say what amount was spent in Ontario for dredging last year?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): As I say, I have not the information here as to the expenditures last year.

Mr. REID: Has the minister any information with regard to the dredging contract that was let for the north arm of the Fraser river last year, and how much was spent?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I have not that information.

Mr. REID: Some time will you get it.?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I shall send that to my hon. friend, if he would like to have it. I will see it is sent to him.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I suppose the minister will tell me that the same applies to the dredging work done last year at Rimouski.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Mr. McINTOSH: There are items here for Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. This year the amount is $50,000 for dredging, last year it was $53,000. The amounts are fairly equal, one year with another. May I ask the minister where that amount of $50,000 for dredging will be spent?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Again the same answer will apply. On the reports of our engineers, as they come in, the money will be allocated.

Mr. McINTOSH: Has not the minister a rough approximation in mind as to how much will be spent in Saskatchewan?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No.

Mr. CASGRAIN: This may not be a serious matter, but it is not fair to the members that the minister should come to this chamber and ask for votes, when he is not able to tell us how much is going to be spent in the province of Quebec, how much in the province of Ontario, or the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta. Upon what information does the minister base his estimate when he puts certain amounts in the estimates? If he has no program or no definite information to go by for each province, how does he fix a figure?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The amounts that were required in previous years to keep our dredges operating—that is the basis of our estimate.

Mr. CASGRAIN: But I understand that the estimates are made on reports of various district engineers. They send reports to the officials at Ottawa in which they state, "We have a request to do dredging at such a place, such a port or the entrance of such river." Surely the minister must have before him the report of those officials, and he must be in a position to tell us where these moneys will be spent. He should be able to tell what is going to be spent in the constituency of the hon. member for Rimouski, or what is to be spent in other counties of the province of Quebec. The same would apply to the other provinces. I do not think it is fair to vote these large amounts of money without knowing where they will be spent, and at whose request and for what purpose the expenditures are being made.

Mr. McINTOSH: Mr. Chairman, I notice in item 116 there is a vote of $161,200 for the maritime provinces, a vote of $215,500 for Ontario and Quebec and one for $140,000 for the province of British Columbia. Far be it from me to say that these amounts are too large. I notice however the minister cannot give any particulars with regard to any one of these amounts. Then when it comes to that stretch of the dominion which lies between Winnipeg and the mountains we have the paltry sum of $50,000. Although the House of Commons has power over revenue and control over expenditures yet the minister cannot explain where this $50,000, this paltry sum, this bit of money as I might say, is to be spent during the coming year.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Chairman, I think my hon. friend will agree that there are not many harbours in Saskatchewan.

Mr. VALLANCE: How about Churchill?

Mr. McINTOSH: I thought the minister would come back with that statement, and I shall refute it inside of the next few minutes.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I was going to state that for the operation of the departmental plant in 1934 and 1935 one dredge is required at an expense of $46,300, and some day labour amounting to $1,500.

Mr. McINTOSH: In what province is that?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The amount of $46,300 covers the operation of more than one dredge.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What province is that?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Lawson): Shall the item carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. VALLANCE: I should like to ask a question. Has it always been customary to vote these sums without any detailed statements from the minister? When we ask him what was done with the vote given last year he does not seem to know. We are asking what he is going to do with this year's vote, and he tells us he does not know. When do we reach the stage at which the minister will know, and will be able to tell the house either what he contemplates doing or what he has done?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): We prepare a tentative program as soon as we know what money is available.

Mr. VALLANCE: What did you do with it last year?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is used to the best possible advantage where work is most needed.

Mr. VALLANCE: Surely the minister can tell us where the money was used before, if he cannot tell us where he is going to use it this year. Where did you use the money last year? Where were the dredges operated?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I find I have expenditures for Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta: for dredge No. 202, at Lockport $96; Lake Bar, $650.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is that a dredge with a shovel?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It goes from place to place and does the little work that is needed. Then, in Winnipeg, Manitoba, there was work at a second wharf costing $320, at Ramsay's Rapid, Springfield, $2,621; Goldeye lake, Manitoba, $4,850; Olafson's bay, Manitoba, $1,040; Selkirk slough, $2,234; marine railway at Selkirk, $500; making a total of $12,375 with some other small items I have omitted?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Well, if the minister can give us the figures for last year in regard to the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, it would be only fair for him to give those of the province of Quebec. Probably he would give the figures in the province of Ontario too. Where was the work done, what money was spent and for what purpose?

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): We willl look after Ontario; stick to Quebec.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): These are some figures for Ontario and Quebec: Rimouski, $26,000; Matane, $26,000. Then we come to dedge No. 117: Port Burwell, Ontario, $15,-148; Rondeau, $354; Kingsville, $3,703; Leamington, $17,186; Port Stanley, $1,736, making a total of about $38,000.

Then, for dredge No. 127, there is an expenditure in Bonaventure county of $1,500. On dredge No. 2 at Amos there is an expenditure of $351; lake De Montigny, $4,881; Heva river, $4,215; and lake Blouin, $5,851.

Mr. McINTOSH: What river is that?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Blouin.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Where is that situated?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): In Pontiac county I believe.

Mr. SANDERSON: I should like the minister to give the total amounts spent last year in the province of Ontario for dredging?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am told that the returns showing total expenditures are not yet compiled. Repairs to dredges, and that sort of thing, have not been allotted; they are still under contract.

Mr. SANDERSON: How long will it take the minister to get that information; when does he expect it?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): When the repairs to the dredges which are laid up are completed, and the accounts rendered.

Mr. SANDERSON: When will that be?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): We do not know that until the end of the fiscal year.

[Mr. Vallance.]

Mr. SANDERSON: I am not asking for the exact expenditure to a dollar, but could he not give us some information which would be fairly close to the amount spent?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I thought I was giving my hon. friend that when I gave him the expenditure in these different places.

Mr. SANDERSON: The minister gave the figures for Ontario and Quebec bunched together. I want the figures for Ontario separate.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The figures are not separated by provinces. The appropriation for Ontario and Quebec was $215,000, and the authorizations that have been given in respect of it are $157,162.25. The items are Baie des Sables, $538.71; Barachois de Malbaie, $100; Bell River, $950; Desjardins, removal of logs at wharf, $63.05; and a long list of small items of work done by day labour in different harbours.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Was any dredging done in the riding of Charlevoix-Saguenay?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I do not notice any.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Would the minister be able to find out by referring to his books? Several requests were made in previous years when I was on the other side of the house and since I have been on this side by myself for dredging in 1930, 1931, 1932 and 1933. No doubt if all the requests that have been made have not been granted, at least some of them that were supported by hon. gentlemen opposite may have been granted and work done. If any work has been done I would like to know if it was done by dredges under the control of the department of the minister or by private companies, and where such work was carried on.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): There does not appear to have been any dredging done in Charlevoix-Saguenay.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Nothing?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That is what I am told.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Did not the minister receive requests last year for certain dredging to be done at the entrance to certain rivers?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): All I can say is that we have had many requests that we have not been able to comply with.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Does the minister anticipate that out of this vote of $215,000 there is any possibility of some of the works that were asked for last year being proceeded with this year?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The more urgent ones will certainly have to be considered.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Does not the minister consider that these works in Charlevoix-Saguenay are just as urgent as works in other counties?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No discrimination is made on county or provincial lines. We are simply doing our best with the limited appropriation to meet the most urgent of the many demands that are made upon this vote.

Mr. SANDERSON: A moment ago I asked the minister what to my mind at least was a very simple question—the total amount of dredging that had been done in the province of Ontario last year. I want the total amount.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): If my hon. friend insists on getting that information, as he is entitled to, I shall have it added up by the officials of the department and checked, and give him the information.

Mr. SANDERSON: Might I ask the minister how long it will take to do that?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I do not know; it should not take very long.

Mr. SANDERSON: I would suggest to the minister in all kindness that he had better let this item stand until he gets the information.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am just told that all the reports are not in yet. Repairs to the dredging plant are not in, and the figures have to be apportioned.

Mr. VALLANCE: Better hold the election off for another year then.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): We must find out about the dredging in Perth.

Mr. HANBURY: Does the dredging at Churchill come under this vote for Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No, that is in the Department of Railways and Canals.

Mr. SANDERSON: The information I desire is rather important and I cannot for the life of me see why the minister cannot or will not give it to me.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It ought to be perfectly plain to my hon. friend that I cannot give him information that is not here and that has not yet been compiled. I have told him that I will have it compiled and will give it to him.

Mr. SANDERSON: I will put it this way. If the minister cannot give me full information as to the full amount spent on dredging for the province of Ontario last year, how much has been spent in the province that he has knowledge of?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I can only tell my hon. friend that the total expenditure out of this vote up to January 31 was $149,736.70.

Mr. SANDERSON: In the province of Ontario?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No, that is the combined expenditure.

Mr. SANDERSON: We are not getting very close together, Mr. Chairman. Out of this $149,000 odd, how much was spent in Ontario?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That is what I have told my hon. friend I will get for him and send to him, or if he insists on the item standing I will let it stand.

Mr. SANDERSON: I would suggest that the minister had better let the item stand for that information.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): All right.

Item stands.

Roads and bridges—

Burlington channel bridge—maintenance and repairs, $15,000.

Dominion roads and bridges—generally, $5,000.

Perley bridge over Ottawa river at Hawkesbury, the Quebec government to contribute one-third of cost of construction only, the Ontario government to contribute one-fourth of cost of construction and to pay annually one-fourth the maintenance costs, $3,000.

Great Bear river rapids—completion of portage road and dock, $12,000.

Kingston—wharves and bridges—maintenance and repairs, $19,000.

Ottawa—maintenance and repairs to bridges and approaches, $8,000.

Mr. VALLANCE: I do not know whether this is the proper item upon which to ask this question. The item is headed "roads and bridges." If and when the government decides to build a bridge, we will say, for unemployment relief purposes, is it the engineers of his department who have charge of the construction of such works undertaken as a measure of relief?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): In the matter of works undertaken for the relief of unemployment, the municipality, the province and the dominion contribute jointly, and the work is carried on under the supervision of the municipality or the province, and not under the supervision of the dominion. The dominion engineers do not prepare the plans nor supervise the work. The dominion makes its contribution to the expenditures made by the province on a report that the expenditures have been made.

Mr. VALLANCE: The department itself has no supervision over any work that is constructed as a relief measure?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): None whatever.

Mr. VALLANCE: Now that the Prime Minister has left the chamber—I notice that the hon. member for Rosetown addressed the Prime Minister—I was just wondering if he had noticed that roads and bridges were coming up. Some two years ago the municipality of Outlook, the provincial government, and I think the federal government entered into a solemn agreement to build a bridge across the southern Saskatchewan river at Outlook. The approaches are built, as the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. MacMillan) will agree with me—

Mr. MacMILLAN: That is all wrong.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is it the intention of the federal government to come through with their contribution so as to make the construction of this bridge possible?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I would suggest that my hon. friend ask the Minister of Labour under whose jurisdiction all these works for the relief of unemployment come. They are not conducted under the Public Works department at all. We have no part or lot in them, unless in respect of a work that is done by the dominion which is wholly of a dominion character.

Mr. VALLANCE: Where it is a three-way split the dominion has nothing to do with it?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Nothing to do with the supervision of the work. The plan is approved by the province and the scheme in general is approved by the dominion government on the recommendation of the Minister of Labour, and when the work is completed and the accounts have been audited the contribution is made.

Mr. VALLANCE: Are we going to have an opportunity at some other time to discuss these matters?

Mr. McINTOSH: Will the minister say that his department has no initiative at all, no responsibility whatever in connection with a public works relief program?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I say that, for reasons which I think the hon. gentleman will understand, other plans have been adopted on the recommendation of the provinces and municipalities, and our part is that of contributor. We do not initiate, we do not supervise, we do not control; we pay our share of the cost.

Mr. VALLANCE: I am in receipt of a resolution passed by the municipality of Eatonia, southern Saskatchewan, soliciting the cooperation of this government in the scheme just outlined by the minister of a one-third contribution each from the province, the municipality and the federal government. Has the minister received a copy of that resolution? I fancy it has been sent to other members; I should think the hon. member for Kindersley has received one.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): We have received a number of resolutions recently and the name is rather familiar.

Mr. VALLANCE: What consideration is it receiving from the government?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The matter would appear to be one that should come through the province with respect to relief of unemployment, rather than on the initiative of the dominion.

Mr. McINTOSH: When the minister receives a resolution of that kind, to what department does he turn it over, if he has no responsibility in the matter?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It goes to the Department of Labour, or a reply is sent suggesting that as it is for the relief of unemployment it be taken up with the municipality and the province and forwarded through the regular channel to the Minister of Labour.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Lawson): I would point out that the questions which hon. members have been asking have no relation to the item under discussion. Hon. members are asking questions with respect to the contribution of the dominion to unemployment relief.

Mr. VALLANCE: This government is responsible to the extent of one-third in connection with these bridges, and there must be some item under which we can discuss this matter. If the minister says, and the chair so rules, that this is not the proper time to discuss it, very well; but there must be some item under which it can be taken up.

Mr. McINTOSH: Will the chairman make the statement that since the Department of Public Works cannot accept responsibility in the matter, and the Department of Labour cannot, there is some other department that assumes the responsibility. If so, what department?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Lawson): It would be futile for the chairman to make such a statement because it would not be binding on the house or on the committee.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This vote relates to roads and bridges built by and under the control of the government; that is all.

Mr. SANDERSON: There is a small amount of $5,000 for dominion roads and bridges generally. Where was this money spent last year, generally, in connection with dominion roads and bridges?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The amount is required for repairs, renewals and painting that may be necessary in connection with various roads and bridges throughout the dominion, under the jurisdiction of the department, and for which no provision has been made by specific items in the estimates.

Mr. SANDERSON: What amount was spent last year under this vote ?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The amount was $1,977.

Mr. SANDERSON: Where was it spent?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I have not the details of that item.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): There is an item for maintenance and repairs to the Burlington channel bridge. What sort of bridge is that?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is at the entrance to the harbour at Hamilton.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): How is the amount divided between maintenance and repairs?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This is a vote of $15,000. For 1934-35, for permanent staff, there was $6,000 less 10 per cent, or $5,400; for seasonal staff, $4,080, less 10 per cent, or $3,672, making a total of $9,072. For supplies and repairs, and electrical power, there was $2,000; telephone, $40; lighting, $164; supplies, such as oil, etc., $2,000; repairs, renewals and unforeseen contingencies, $1,724, making a total of $5,928. This gives a grand total of $15,000.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): When was the bridge built?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I do not know.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Does the minister know the name of the contractor?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I think he has a lawyer already.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): We have heard so much about the Montreal bridge that I want to know something about the Burlington channel bridge.

Mr. CASGRAIN: How many bridges are under the control of the Department of Public Works?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): We have the maintenance of the St. Leonard, New Brunswick international bridge, one at Clair, New Brunswick; one at Edmundston, New Brunswick, and there are general repairs to other bridges, representing $3,300.

Item agreed to.

Telegraph and telephone lines—
Saskatchewan and Alberta telegraph and telephone lines—repairs and improvements, $5,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Just above this item I see for Quebec, "appropriation not required for 1934-35, $10,500." Have the works that were started in the county of Charlevoix-Saguenay from Tadoussac right along the north shore of improving, repairing and remodelling the telegraph line, been discontinued, or are they going to be carried on again this year? As I understand the situation, a few years ago a program was elaborated whereby the department was to build every year certain sections of the line and if my memory serves me well, at the present time the work has stopped at Seven Islands. Is the work going to proceed or is it to be left unfinished?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): There is a general overhauling and repairing of the lines and rebuilding them where that is found to be necessary, but we are not at this time making any extensions that can be avoided.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am not talking about extensions. This line was built many years ago, in 1886, and it was pointed out about four years ago that it would have to be nearly all rebuilt. Of course the government could not do the work all at once and they started to do it piecemeal, section by section. I understand the work was commenced and went on as far as a place called Seven Islands. It would be a pity if the work were not proceeded with, because as soon as business starts up in that area where development is going on, surely the people there will need means of communication and at the present time they have not the type of telegraph service they require on account of the line being old-fashioned and not giving the satisfactory service that would be afforded by a modern line.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I can only say that I shall look into the matter and see whether it is possible to make those extensions.

Mr. McINTOSH: Where is this appropriation of $5,000 for telegraph and telephone lines in Saskatchewan and Alberta to be spent?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The requirements for 1934-35 on the Athabaska-Fort McMurray line are $500 and on the Edmonton-Hudson Hope line, $4,500.

Mr. McINTOSH: No part of that appropriation is to be spent in northern Saskatchewan?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No.

Item agreed to.

British Columbia northern district—repairs and improvements, $8,600.
British Columbia Vancouver island district—repairs and improvements, $4,000.
Telephone line on Langara island, $1,000.
Yukon telegraph system—repairs and improvements, $4,000.

Mr. NEILL: As regards the second item for British Columbia, Vancouver island district, there is a cut of something like 30 per cent. That line is being starved; the work cannot be done for $4,000. What is the explanation?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This is for general repairs and improvements on the Vancouver island district line as requested by the general superintendent in the memorandum which he has filed covering his requirements.

Mr. NEILL: Why is it 30 per cent less than it was last year? Last year's vote certainly was not a large one.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Last year to January 31 we spent only $4,081.

Mr. NEILL: The minister is working on the principle of feeding the horse on a straw a day and presently the horse will die.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I hope not.

Mr. NEILL: I hope not also.

Mr. HANBURY: Would the minister explain the large reduction in connection with the Yukon telegraph system. I have no particular interest there except a general one.

[Mr. Casgrain.]

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The main portion of the work performed in 1933-34 was carried out on the Telegraph creek-Iskoot section with Foreman Edlund in charge, on the Nahlin-Nakina summit section with Foreman W. Blackstock in charge and on the Shesley-Nahlin section with Foreman C. W. Vance in charge. These sections are approximately sixty miles in length and very difficult to work over owing to the fact that materials and provisions had to be brought in by pack horses for a great distance. It is contemplated in 1934-35 to work over as great a mileage as was done this year, but in a territory which will not involve the expense presently encountered. For that reason the amount of money required for 1934-35 will not be as great as that expended in the present year. The territory is different.

Mr. McINTOSH: Has item 112 been carried?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I think that one stood.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—
Architectural branch—salaries of architects, clerks of works, inspectors, draftsmen, clerks and messengers of outside service, $63,700.
Engineering branch—salaries of engineers, clerks, etc. of outside service, $366,000.
For operation and maintenance of inspection boats, $10,000.
Maintenance and operation of water storage dams on Ottawa river and tributaries, $23,100.
National Gallery of Canada, $25,000.
National monument on Connaught place, $100,000.
Surveys and inspections, $55,000.
Balance of expenditure for works already authorized provided amount for any one does not exceed $200, $4,500.
Miscellaneous works not otherwise provided for, not more than $3,000 to be expended upon any one work, $50,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I notice that in this item is included an amount for the national monument on Connaught place, an increase of $25,000 over last year's vote. Will the minister indicate what progress has been made with the monument and at what stage of completion it is at the moment?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This is to provide for the inclusion of three additional figures to the national commemorative monument and also for the transfer to and the setting up of the monument in Ottawa, as follows:

Three additional figures, $10,000.
Drawback on the contract being held pending the erection at Ottawa, $12,050.
Granite base, $60,000.
Concrete foundation, $7,000.
Grading pavements, sidewalks, etc., $10,950—Total, $100,000.

The appropriation for last year was $75,000, so the additonal expenditure contemplated is in connection with setting up the monument after it arrives.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What the minister has just said would indicate that the government evidently expect the monument will be sufficiently advanced to be placed in position possibly this year. In that connection I should like to say just a word to the minister about the location of the monument seeing that there have been some rumours to the effect that what was originally intended as the site for the national war memorial might be changed. A rumour has been circulated—and I imagine that there is no foundation for it—that some place other than the capital, Ottawa, might be chosen; again with respect to the capital, that the original site proposed, namely Connaught place, might be altered to some other site. I just wish to point out in connection with the monument that the site and all that pertains thereto was very carefully considered before any designs were called for. As the minister will recall, the monument was the result of a competition, almost a world competition; it was open to all artists, sculptors and architects of the British Empire and of the allied and associated powers. The terms and conditions of the competition were all carefully set forth in plans and specifications which were distributed at the time of the competition and which contained a description of the site and photographs of the area and surrounding buildings. I have in my hand a small volume issued by the department of public works in 1925 entitled Conditions of Competition for National Commemorative War Monument. In the terms and conditions it is set forth that the government desire to have a monument erected in the capital of Canada and that to quote the exact words: "the site of the monument will be on Connaught place in the city of Ottawa, in approximately the position shown on the accompanying plan." Mention is made of the fact that Connaught place was selected as being the most centrally located spot in the city of Ottawa, the idea of the government of the day being that the wish of the people of Canada generally would be that the monument would be placed where it would be seen most readily by visitors to the capital, and most generally by those who are resident in the capital; in other words where its position would permit of its being most generally and favourably viewed. It was agreed at the time that no other site was quite as appropriate as Connaught place. The designs were made in reference to Connaught place, and without a change of the monument in some particulars it will not be possible to locate it elsewhere. As the minister will see, the volume which was sent out by his department in 1925 contained views of Connaught place which were submitted to the sculptors, and all the designs which were sent in had relation to the immediate environment. The government appointed assessors who appraised the various designs and models sent in. The one that seemed the most appropriate was selected, and the monument selected by the assessors has special relations to the particular site named in this volume of conditions.

To show how important it is to retain the selected site I would draw attention to the fact that at the time those who have been awarded this monument pointed out that something would be lost if the site were changed, in that the monument was symbolical of the response of the new world to the old at the time of war, and that the figures had been arranged so that when the monument was in position the troops would be moving from the west to the east. It is necessary therefore that the monument should be so placed that the movement of the troops passing through the arch, will be from the west to the east and that the Connaught Place site affords in a quite unique way.

I think it is important that that particular site should be kept in mind for the further reason that other large expenditures that have been made by the government were made having in mind the widening of the central area of the city into an open park which would permit of the monument as well as the parliament buildings, being seen from a distance and the former as a central feature as parliament hill is approached from the park. As the minister knows we were discussing the other evening the matter of the central park and the question came up then as to what the city had promised to do with respect to the city hall. I am glad to supplement by this further word, what was said the other night, that while there may not have been a specific and legal agreement as to the site of the city hall becoming part of the park, the understanding was that a time would come when both the city hall and the post office building would have to come down, and what was agreed to was that when the time came that either of those buildings was demolished the space thus created would fall into what would be the Confederation park space. If the government of Canada decided to demolish the present post office that space would become part of the open space belonging to the city; similarly if the city decided to demolish the city hall that site would not be built upon again by the city but would become part of the park.

I want to mention, because I may not have occasion to speak of this again, a further reason for keeping in mind the central position in the capital for the location of this monument. The site was selected, as I have said, in relation to the larger plan of central development of the capital. That plan contemplated a time, which may not be very far distant, when the railways which run into the centre of the city will be electrified, and when the railway tracks themselves will be covered over, as they are in approaches to many large cities. If one were to seek to visualize what was in the mind of the government at the time they were planning the expropriations that have already taken place it was that in course of time the station itself would be enlarged to extend farther in the direction of Laurier avenue. Anyone looking at the station to-day will see that it is constructed only in part, that it contemplates an extension to the east corresponding to the portion constructed at present to the west of the central arch. From there on towards the east the railway tracks would be covered and become in the course of time something in the nature of a plaza which would extend along the east bank of the canal and adjoining Nicholas street from where the station is to beyond Laurier avenue as far as what is known as the Deep Cut near Echo drive. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works is familiar with that portion of the park because up to a certain stage since he has been in office he has himself completed in a very creditable way that park area which lies between the canal and Nicholas street all the way from the Union station to the Deep Cut. He himself has been responsible for the direction of that work, and has added since the old buildings thereon were demolished that portion of the open space as park area to what is already park area or driveway on the east side of the canal and which will be an all important part of the larger scheme when completed.

The decision as to the location of the post office can be settled later, when it may be necessary. A suggestion has been made that the government in putting up other departmental buildings might wish to turn the Langevin block into a post office. Again there has been a suggestion that the front portion of the Union station might become the post office, and the station itself be enlarged. This would appear to have everything to commend it. I mention these matters now because they were in the mind of the previous government at the time the general plan was discussed with those who had to do with the setting out of the terms of the competition for the monument, and they may not be known to members of the present administration or present to the minds of some who are discussing the question at the moment. What I would suggest, if I might be permitted, is that before the monument is put permanently in any place it be erected temporarily in what is regarded as the best site in the capital, and be permitted to stand there until full opportunity has been given to this house to discuss a change of site should that be thought desirable. I believe the monument was erected in Hyde park, in England, temporarily, and there ought to be opportunity of treating it in a similar manner here.

Just one other point. Some suggestion has been made that the monument should be placed on parliament hill. That point too was carefully considered at the time the terms of the competition were arranged. It was pointed out then that already in connection with the parliament buildings there are three memorials which relate to the great war. There is the central column as one comes into the houses of parliament, which carries an inscription commemorative of Canada's participation in the Great war. There is the carillon, symbolical of the service and sacrifice of Canadian men and women in the war, and there is the peace tower. As far as other memorials on parliament hill are concerned I think they have been confined to some association with the political life of the nation as distinct from its other activities.

As to an objection that has been raised by some to a site on or near a thoroughfare, I would point out that in most of the large cities of the world that is precisely where many of the great memorials are located. In London, England, the Nelson monument is located in Trafalgar square a part of London where the traffic is most dense. Similarly the cenotaph is located in Parliament street near Whitehall, in the centre of the thoroughfare there. The Arc de Triomphe in Paris is in the centre of the Champs Elysées where many thoroughfares converge. I cite these instances in order that this aspect of the matter may be before the government when considering the location of the memorial this year.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am grateful to my right hon. friend for the clear and comprehensive summary he has given of the plans and ideas which presented themselves to those who suggested this monument. It is true, as he said, that suggestions have been made not in keeping with those he has outlined to-night and, as has already been intimated, a committee of cabinet has been appointed to consider these matters. We are prepared to discuss the whole situation with the city and with those who may be interested in town planning, and we hope to arrive at the conclusion that will produce the very best results. I can only say that my right hon. friend's suggestions will be brought to the attention of the committee at its first meeting and will be kept prominently before the committee in all conferences and discussions we may have as to these important matters.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to thank the minister for what he has said. May I point out just one further consideration of importance. We are voting this money under the designation "National monument on Connaught place," and whatever has been paid out already has been paid out under appropriations so designated. The designs were for a monument on Connaught place; the moneys have all been appropriated under that heading from 1923 to the present time, and I suggest to the minister that the committee consider whether any alteration of the site at the present time would not involve a breach of the contract both with those who were competitors, and the artists who received the contract. I know that two of the brothers who won the competition came to the capital to view the particular site, and made certain alterations in the original design on the recommendation of the assessors and in order to make the monument, when it was completed, harmonize with the buildings in the immediate environment. I think that is an important consideration to keep in mind.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That is a point I had not noted before. The wording of the vote is exactly the same as it has been in all previous years, and possibly it does irrevocably commit the government to the location of the monument.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to add one further word, because I think all these considerations are important. The portion of the city selected for the monument is known as Connaught place. It will be recalled that the Duke of Connaught, after whom Connaught place is named, was the Governor General of Canada at the commencement of the war. His Royal Highness was resident in Ottawa at that time. This adds a further association which makes that site if suitable in other respects, particularly appropriate for the location of a national commemorative war monument.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): What is the total cost of the monument?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): As far as we can tell the total cost will be $240,672.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Can the minister say when that monument will be completed?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The work has not been completed as yet and we cannot tell when it will be ready for delivery.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Of the $25,000 increase this year I understand that $10,000 is for three additional figures. What are those figures?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): They were suggested as an improvement of the original design of the monument, and were authorized by order in council of April 18, 1933.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I regret to have to draw the minister's attention to the fact that the first two items in this miscellaneous vote concern the salaries of architects, clerks, inspectors, draughtsmen, messengers, engineers and so on. If these involve the ten per cent reduction I think the item had better stand.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The item will have to stand on that account.

Item stands.

Harbours and rivers—Nova Scotia—Under contract—

Cow Bay (Port Morien)—breakwater replacement, $17,000.

Yarmouth harbour—dredging, $41,000.

Essential undertakings—

Blandford—breakwater-wharf replacement, $4,500.

Black Point—harbour protection, $3,600.

Broad Cove marsh—breakwater-wharf replacement, $12,500.

Halifax—repairs to wharfs and replacement of machine shop at R.C.N. barracks and H.M.C. dockyards, $25,000.

Phinneys Green—wharf, $4,900.

Port Dufferin (John Vogler's Shore)—breakwater, $4,900.

Port Mouton—breakwater replacement, $6,900.

Trout Cove (Centreville)—breakwater extension, $4,200.

Harbours and rivers generally—for maintenance of services, no new works to be undertaken, $225,000.

Mr. RALSTON: Is this the item which was being discussed by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Lawson): I am informed that this item was up for discussion on February 16.

Mr. RALSTON: Perhaps I am not in order, but one has to consider this point in connection with public works estimates. Has any policy been arrived at with regard to relief works? For the moment I will confine my question to Nova Scotia.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): None, except such as have been undertaken under the agreement made with the province some months ago by which there is a joint contribution by the municipality, the province and the dominion. If my hon. friend has in mind what he has been reading in the newspapers as to proposed new works, nothing has been decided as yet.

Mr. RALSTON: Can the minister give us any idea as to when we may expect a decision?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am afraid my hon. friend will have to wait and see.

Mr. RALSTON: I mean whether it will be next month or not for two or three months.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I should say it would be before the house rises.

Mr. RALSTON: Thank you very much; that is very informative.

Item agreed to.

Quebec—Under contract—
Matane—repairs to harbour works, $19,800.
New Carlisle—wharf reconstruction, $17,000.
Petit Cap—breakwater reinforcement, $34,000.
Essential undertakings—
Anse au Griffons (river)—improvements to jetties, $12,000.
Anse aux Griffons—to complete wharf improvements, $1,400.
Baie Ste. Catherine—wharf improvement, $10,200.
Bonaventure—widening wharf, $4,600.
Grande Anse—wharf, $5,000.
Harbours and rivers generally—for maintenance of services, no new works to be undertaken, $300,000.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): What work is to be done at Matane? Is that a new wharf or what is it?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This is to complete harbour repairs now under contract and to drive forty-five feet of sheet piling along a 160 foot section of the wharf.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Is it an addition to the wharf?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is only a repair.

Sir EUGENE FISET: When this item was being considered previously the minister agreed to furnish me with certain information. I asked if the contract for the repairs to the Rimouski wharf had been completed and whether it was intended that further repairs, which are badly needed, would be gone on with this year.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The contract has not been completed; $13,000 is to be expended next year, and I suppose my hon. friend suggests that we might continue the work and expend a little more.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I have no doubt the minister has received such numerous requests from the local people and from the engineer in charge that I have no fear but that he will have to go on with the work.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. H. A. Stewart.]

Saskatchewan, Alberta and Northwest Territories—harbours and rivers generally—for maintenance of services, no new works to be undertaken, $10,000.

Mr. GARDINER: How much was spent in these provinces last year?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Up to January 31, $2,001.11. I have not the details of that small item.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): Will some of this money be used to clear the waterways up towards Great Bear lake?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Under roads and bridges we have a special item for Great Bear lake. I cannot say where this money will be applied.

Mr. McINTOSH: Will the minister explain where this $10,000 is to be spent?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The note I have is that this general appropriation is required to provide for the maintenance and repair of existing harbour and river facilities in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta and the Northwest Territories.

Mr. McINTOSH: Cannot the minister specify?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No; it is spent just as the need arises in these places. It is a very small vote, I am sure.

Mr. McINTOSH: I notice that under item No. 100, which we have considered, concerning public buildings and repairs for the province of Saskatchewan there is a vote of over $50,000, of which $30,000 is to be spent in Regina. The remainder of $22,500 is for the rest of the province. If I remember correctly very little of that money is to be spent in northern Saskatchewan, perhaps only a few dollars on improvements and repairs. Practically the whole amount is to be spent in Regina city. To me that looks rather peculiar. Regina city is represented in this house by a government supporter.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I think there are some large buildings in Regina too.

Mr. McINTOSH: Now we come to this item for harbours and rivers, and find that there is a vote of only $10,000 for Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Northwest Territories. If we take the amounts to be spent on harbours and rivers in the eastern provinces and compare them with the amounts to be spent in the western provinces we find that while the figure for the east is about $400,000, that for the west is only about $145,000. In other words the east is getting about two dollars to our one. Out of the $145,000 the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta and the Northwest Territories are getting only $10,000. May I ask the minister how much of this $10,000 is to be spent in northern Saskatchewan. We would not expect any of it to be spent in the south or centre, because we have no harbours or rivers in the centre, and none of consequence in the south. But what about the north? I know the minister knows all about the river and lake system of northern Saskatchewan. How much money are we spending on it?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): As I have already pointed out to the committee this is a general vote to be expended where conditions are such that expenditures must be made. If there are any harbours or rivers in northern Saskatchewan which require expenditures we will have to consider the matter and act accordingly.

Mr. McINTOSH: I hope the minister will do that. Perhaps the minister will remember that I drew his attention last year to an important work, when the votes for harbours and rivers were before the committee. On that occasion I drew his attention to the fact that on the Beaver river, one hundred and fifty miles north of North Battleford there are serious rapids, and that these rapids ought to be cleared of the rocks before navigation can be complete from the Beaver river up to the deepwater system of northern Saskatchewan. I drew his attention also to the fact that a sum of $4,000 or $5,000 had been spent by the late government in clearing out these rocks, and the minister said that he would give the matter his consideration. If I remember correctly, after parliament prorogued a letter came from the department saying that the engineer had looked into the situation and had reported that the matter was not very urgent. That is something like taking the matter into consideration. It is a very easy way of getting over it and, of course last year not a dollar was spent. The rocks and rapids are still there and are still an obstacle to the thousands of settlers and tourists, hunters and miners going from the south to the north. May I ask the minister if at this time he has anything of a more definite nature to say with regard to doing some constructive work on these rapids in the present year? Has the matter received any consideration whatever?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am inclined to think the item to which my hon. friend refers is one of those which fell by the wayside in order to arrive at the $14,000,000 reduction promised by the Minister of Finance, and I do not know that conditions have changed. It is possible we may be able to do something this year.

Mr. McINTOSH: Mr. Chairman, the minister appears to have the idea that there are no rivers, harbours or lakes of any account in northern Saskatchewan. That gives me an opportunity, perhaps a brief one, to call the attention of the committee to the fact that that is an erroneous conception of the water system of northern Saskatchewan. The time is coming when some money will have to be spent.

Mr. GOTT: For canoes?

Mr. McINTOSH: If we take you along we will have to have more than a canoe.

Mr. GOTT: I will go along.

Mr. McINTOSH: The time is coming when more money ought to be spent in clearing the Beaver river rapids of rocks, in order to have a waterway into that northern area. May I say that we now have a first class provincial highway from North Battleford to Meadow Lake, a distance of slightly over one hundred miles. It is one of the best provincial highways in the province. And then from Meadow Lake to Green Lake, another distance of forty-five to fifty miles the highway is not as good. But when we come to Green Lake we come in contact with the river and lake system of northwestern Saskatchewan. As we leave Beaver Lake and follow the Beaver river down to deep water we come in contact with the Beaver river rapids. As I said, there was an expenditure of about $4,000 made in an effort to clear the rapids. Perhaps another $4,000 or $5,000 would completely clear the Beaver river of the rocks I have mentioned. I think that ought to be done. It is not as though a big expenditure was involved, and it will be money well spent. The point I wish to explain is that the playground of western Canada is in northern Alberta, northern Manitoba and northern Saskatchewan. Northwestern Saskatchewan is part of that playground, and when one goes into that new land and sees for himself at first hand he will understand that it is a very favourable part. For instance, from Green Lake to Dore, the point at which deep water begins, is a distance of about fifty miles. There is now a rough motor road constructed from Green lake to deep water at Dore. That means there is a motor road from North Battleford to Meadow Lake, a distance of over one hundred miles, and from Meadow Lake to Green Lake, and from Green Lake to the foot of the deep water,—practically another one hundred miles. And it is possible now to go by water from North Battleford to deep water in a very short time. After getting into deep water one comes into contact with the Beaver river in earnest. It is a magnificent river, in some places as wide as the St. Lawrence, and from fifty-five to seventy-five feet deep. It flows into the river Churchill as do Reindeer Lake, lake Athabaska and Peter Pond Lake all of which of course are connected with lake Churchill, other northern lakes, and Churchill harbour. Into that new land thousands of settlers, miners, tourists and other people are continually coming in the spring, summer and autumn months. The amount of freight going up and down the Beaver river and into lake Churchill and further north and east and west is surprising. As a land for tourists it is indeed hard to surpass.

As this item was before the house I thought it my duty to draw attention to the fine fishing, farming, lumbering and mining potentialities of that great area. If the Beaver river rapids were cleared at the expenditure of a small amount of money the people living in southern Saskatchewan, Alberta, and for that matter Manitoba, who wanted to go north would be able to go north to investigate and get information of that northern area firsthand. They could get to that tourist area cheaper than to many other parts of the dominion. I shall not take up any more of the time of the house but I wanted to bring these facts to the attention of the minister and of the house. I trust the day is not far distant when at the expenditure of a small amount of money these rapids will be cleared. It will be money well spent because it will make more effective a 200 mile motor road, from North Battleford through Meadow Lake and Green Lake to Dore, and thus be instrumental in opening up a lake and river channel three or four hundred miles north of North Battleford extending into the northern hinterland, where there are bound to be great developments in the future.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Thank you.

Graving docks—
Champlain graving dock, $65,000.
Esquimalt graving docks, $80,000.
Lorne graving dock, $36,000.
Selkirk—repair slip, $3,000.

Mr. REID: Has the minister any information as to the number of ships and the names of the companies using the Esquimalt graving dock last year?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This is to provide for the staff, supplies and replacements in connection with the operation of the dock. I have not a report for the current year, but repairs and improvements for 1932-33 amounted to $7,300. I shall be glad to get the information my hon. friend desires as to the number of ships and the companies using the dock and send it to him by letter, if that will satisfy him.

Mr. REID: Yes, thank you.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BENNETT moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: There are second readings standing which it might not be convenient for the opposition to take to-morrow. The Bank Act they would probaly prefer to take at a later date than to-morrow. However, it is printed in English and French and will be ready for second reading, also the bill respecting the central bank, and if hon. gentlemen opposite are willing to proceed with those we shall proceed with either one or the other or both, as my right hon. friend thinks desirable. Then we shall take supply—Railways, Trade and Commerce, Justice. I think perhaps it is not necessary to mention any other department from what I know of the ability of hon. gentlemen opposite to engage the attention of the house. I think that will be sufficient for the day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We have every desire to expedite the two banking measures, but as my right hon. friend knows, each of them is a long one and I doubt if any hon. members have had time thus far even to look at them. I think it would be desirable to let them stand until Tuesday. Apart from that, I think the other business my right hon. friend mentioned might be proceeded with.

Mr. BENNETT: On Tuesday it is desirable that precedence should perhaps be given to the Translation Bureau bill. As the hon. Secretary of State mentioned to-day there are gentlemen who desire to participate in that discussion, and I think it should be taken on Tuesday. That was the reason he mentioned it. Then after that we will proceed with the banking measures.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Friday, February 23, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

CIVIL SERVICE

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO ADMINISTRATION AND OPERATION OF CIVIL SERVICE ACT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That Messieurs Bowman, Chevrier, Ernst, Laurin, Lawson, MacInnis and Pouliot be constituted a select special committee of this house pursuant to a motion adopted on the 16th day of February, 1934, to inquire into and report upon the administration and operations of the Civil Service Act as amended, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses, and to report from time to time to this house.

Motion agreed to.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That, it is expedient to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act to provide for the appointment of detective inspectors, sub-inspectors and assistant veterinary surgeons, and the personnel of the marine section, and to provide for pensions to widows and allowances to children of officers and constables who may be killed while in the performance of duty, and to make further provisions respecting the counting of service of officers and constables with any provincial police force for purposes of pension, and in regard to the duties and offences of the members of the force.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

RAYON YARN DUTY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. C. MATTHEWS (Minister of National Revenue): Yesterday the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) asked a question based on a report appearing in a Toronto evening paper which he read as follows:

Toronto importers were startled yesterday to learn that Courtaulds (Canada) Limited, had applied to the customs house here for a rebate of the duty on two large shipments of rayon yarn on the grounds that these shipments had been specifically exempted by order in council.

The hon. gentleman's question was:

I would like to ask the minister if any such order in council was issued, and if so what was the amount of the rebates, and why were they granted?

My information is that no order in council has been passed respecting rayon yarns imported by Courtaulds (Canada) Limited and no rebates have been paid them on their importations of such materials.

WHEAT AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In the Winnipeg Free Press of February 21, Mr. M. A. MacPherson, Attorney General of Saskatchewan, and a gentleman who along with the Prime Minister signed the international wheat agreement, is reported as follows:

The computation of yield as between the exporting countries, signatory to the international wheat agreement, was always on a ten-year average.

I have in my hand a copy of the agreement itself and it distinctly states that the computation shall be on a three-year average. The difference between these two methods of computing the average yield would amount to about 100,000,000 bushels in our quota. I would like to ask the Prime Minister which of these two statements is correct?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I shall read the hon. gentleman's question in order that there may be no misunderstanding of it. My memory is that the acreage was computed on a three year basis, and the yield per acre on a ten year basis, by the statisticians when the quota was being arrived at. I speak subject to correction; that is my memory, but I will look through the papers carefully and give an answer on Monday.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY CONCERNING RETIREMENT OF ELECTRIC RAILWAY BONDS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, a couple of days ago the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Porteous) asked me a question with respect to the proposed retirement of the Toronto Suburban Railway Company's 4½ per cent debenture stock. I made inquiry of the management of the railway, and they point out that the position is that an agreement has been reached with the British Empire Trust Company, acting on behalf of the holders, for the purchase of the stock by the Canadian National Railways on a basis of 25 per cent of the par value. The arrangement is subject to the necessary financial provision being made in the parliamentary budget of this year.

AGRICULTURAL CREDITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). In view of the fact that legislation for the revision of the Bank Act and the establishment of a central bank has been introduced, can the minister give any information as to whether legislation in regard to agricultural credits will be presented shortly, in order to give farmers the opportunity to avail themselves of its provisions this spring?

Hon. EDGAR N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the matter is under consideration. No announcement can be made at this stage.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

PROPOSED STOPPAGE OF RELIEF TO STRIKING BUSH WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Timiskaming North): Mr. Speaker, I beg to make a request of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon). I received information this morning from Chapleau to the effect that the strikers in that locality who have been maintained on relief by cooperation of the provincial and federal governments have been told that the relief will be stopped on Saturday. As there are still a certain number of strikers in that locality I ask the minister to use his influence to ensure the continuance of the relief for at least some time.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the strike at Chapleau among some of the bush workers as far as my information goes has been organized through a branch of what is known as the Canadian Labour Defence League. I believe the locally active men are Minster, Vatchuk and Soula. I may be wrong about that, but that is my information. Efforts have been made from time to time by the Labour department under the Conciliation Act to get the employers and employees together, but we have found that where a strike is promoted under the auspices of the organization I have mentioned there has always been a studied attempt to keep the employers and employees apart, rendering impossible the application of the provisions of the Conciliation Act.

With respect to the strikers to whom the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette) has referred, I have no specific information, but I would point out that the administration of relief is entirely in the hands of the provincial authorities, and if they believe for any reason that satisfies them that these men should not under the existing circumstances be kept on relief at the expense of their fellow-taxpayers I do not propose to interfere with their judgment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Beaubien.]

HAVRE ST. PIERRE ICE CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last, February 16, the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) drew my attention to a telegram which he had just received from the mayor of Havre St. Pierre with reference to the isolation of this municipality owing to an ice blockade and the shortage of food which resulted. I then stated that I would immediately look into the matter. I wish to inform the house that on the very same day we received a similar dispatch and, since then, we have been in communication with the parties and companies concerned. This morning we were in a position to wire the mayor of Havre St. Pierre, as follows:

If you wish to order the provisions required, so that they may be placed on board the ice-breaker Mikula, at present in the harbour at Louisbourg, Nova Scotia, they will be transported to Havre St. Pierre. Make an immediate decision because the Mikula will leave in a few days.

We have also received a communication from Mr. Clarke, of the Clarke Steamship Company, stating that the latter would also dispatch the very next morning, a vessel, the Sable Isle, in order to relieve the people of that municipality. I wish to state that the Mikula will arrive at about the same time as the Sable Isle and will open a way to the wharf of Havre St. Pierre, for this vessel.

DESTRUCTION OF SALMON

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the other day the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) drew my attention to an article in a paper called The Commonwealth published in Vancouver, to the effect that good edible salmon was taken to sea by the steamship Malaspina and dumped. The report I have from my officers states that:

This salmon was pink canned salmon that had been found by the inspection board as unfit for food. Under the law, canned salmon that is found by the board not to be sound, wholesome and fit for human food must be confiscated and destroyed or used by the fisheries department for purposes other than human food. This last provision was inserted in the regulations to enable the department to use, up to its requirements, such confiscated salmon for fish food at the fish hatchery ponds. The quantity confiscated was largely more than was needed for this purpose and so to save storage charges it was destroyed in the cheapest possible way, that of taking it to sea and dumping it. The total quantity dumped was 1,215 cases, the total quantity confiscated to date as unfit for food is 2,714 cases.

HUDSON BAY ROUTE

HIGH COST OF INSURANCE AND FOOD SUPPLIES FOR SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. BOWMAN (Dauphin): I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) to an editorial appearing in the Winnipeg Free Press of February 21, under the caption Why Bay Rates are High. This editorial refers particularly to the high insurance rates and the high cost of food supply for the ships. Would the minister care to make a statement in regard to these two items.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): I expect to be going on with my estimates shortly, and if my hon. friend will bring up the matter then I will gladly deal with it.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BOARD

APPLICATION OF REMEDIAL LEGISLATION TO SOLDIER SETTLERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Gordon). Has the government under consideration and does it contemplate bringing before parliament at this session any measure further to alleviate the serious conditions affecting soldier settlers, throughout the dominion, especially those of the three western provinces?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Acting Minister of Colonization): Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered that at the last session of parliament remedial legislation was introduced by myself and approved by this house. That legislation was not introduced without most careful investigation by those charged with authority of directing the soldier settlement board. From the best information I had at that time it appeared that the legislation then introduced was deemed to be sufficiently remedial, as far as the soldier settlers are concerned, to take care of their difficulties.

Of course I have had, and I presume every minister administering that department since it was set up has had, from time to time requests and demands from individuals and organizations, some representative and some not, with respect to further consideration that the government might give to the soldier settlers. At the present time I have not under consideration any further remedial legislation.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

BILL TO AUTHORIZE THE APPOINTMENT OF AUDITORS

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the third reading of Bill No. 17, respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I should not like to have third reading given this bill without again protesting against the enactment of an act of parliament simply to appoint for one year a firm of auditors, on whom all parties in the house are agreed. I will not go into the reasons which I mentioned yesterday as to why I think this matter should be kept in the hands of the House of Commons, but I should like to say that an act of parliament is a matter of some importance, and generally a matter to which a good deal of significance is attached. It does seem a bit of an absurdity to necessitate the passage of a bill through all the stages in both houses of parliament and the obtaining of the royal assent simply to make the appointment of a firm of auditors for one year. I think one has only to mention the fact to show how ridiculous this method of procedure is.

Mr. MANION: As we dealt with the matter rather fully yesterday, when my reply was given to the right hon. gentleman, I shall not delay the house at the present moment.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS ACT

CONFISCATION OF CANNED FISH BEARING FALSE OR MISLEADING LABELS

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 6, to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I have no objection to going on with this bill at the moment, but I should like to register a mild protest at the system, from which we suffered last session and which is beginning to be put in practice again this year, of not adhering to the program announced the night before. We were not told last night that we would be going on with this bill to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, we were.

Mr. NEILL: I have no objection to going on with it, but it would be very convenient if the government would adhere more strictly to the program announced the night before.

I was going to ask the minister—and this might save me from giving my views on the bill at the moment—if he could not see his way clear to let this bill go to the committee on fisheries. It is not so simple as appears on the face of it; it would save a great deal of discussion in the house, and I am sure we could readily settle the matter if it were allowed to go to the committee. Could the minister do that?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not think the bill is so important that we should convene the committee in order to study it. This amendment is not of very great importance; we are only asking to be allowed to interfere with the export of canned goods labelled wrongly or falsely. That is all. I think if my hon. friend will study the bill he will come to that conclusion.

Mr. NEILL: It is the fact that I have studied the bill that leads me to ask that it be sent to the committee. Things are not always what they seem. I do not know whether that is Shakespeare or scripture, but it is so. The minister takes the bill as it is handed to him and makes the best presentation he can, but as a matter of fact there is a great deal more to it than he indicated when he was introducing it. I should like to point out—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member will wait until the bill goes into committee he can speak on it at length. He has already spoken on the second reading.

Mr. NEILL: No, I only sat down to allow the minister to speak. I appeal to the minister if that is not so.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is out of order in speaking again on the second reading.

Mr. NEILL: I submit, sir, that the minister interrupted me and in courtesy I sat down to let him answer the question I had asked.

Mr. SPEAKER: And having finished his remarks and sat down, the hon. member concluded his speech. If the hon. gentleman wishes to cross-examine the minister or ask questions he can do so in committee, but not at this stage.

Mr. NEILL: I was within my rights, sir, in sitting down when the minister arose. I am in the judgment of the house; I appeal to the minister himself, or to any other hon. member. What was I to do when he rose; was I to stand? That is against the rules. I asked the minister a question, and he courteously rose to reply. I submit, sir, that this does not deprive me of my right to speak on the second reading.

Mr. SPEAKER: Strictly speaking, the hon. member has exhausted his right to speak, but with—

Mr. NEILL: Then I appeal from your decision, sir; it is too rank for anything.

Mr. SPEAKER: I say that with the consent of the house I am prepared to allow the hon. member to go on.

Mr. NEILL: I thank you, sir. This bill, apart from the ostensible reason for its introduction, really goes further and introduces some rather extraordinary powers. In introducing the bill the minister said that its purpose was merely to prevent the export of canned fish falsely labelled or marked, but the bill goes further than that. I will quote the old section, to which the minister takes objection:

> Any can of fish or shellfish not labelled or marked in accordance with the provisions of this act or of the regulations—

These are the words to which the minister particularly objects:

> —before being offered or exposed for sale by retail.

Then the section goes on:

> —shall be forfeited to His Majesty, and may be seized by any inspector, or by any customs, excise or police officer, or by any constable.

The words to which he objects are those limiting the interference to the period before the goods are offered or exposed for sale by retail. If that is the only purpose of the bill, why not simply strike out those words and let it go at that; so far as I am concerned that would be the end of it. In his remarks, however, and in the explanation given in the bill, the minister goes on to say:

> Under this provision, even if cans are wrongly labelled, they cannot be interferred with until they are offered for sale in a retail way.

That is true under this particular section, but it is not true in a general way, as I will show later on; there are other sections that deal with that point. In addition, this bill goes further than the original act in two respects. In the first place it takes in any other offence, since it says:

> —and not in accordance with the provisions of this act or of the regulations made thereunder—

That opens up a wide field; you might have a man punished under two sections, first under this section and then under some other section to which it refers more specifically. My second objection, and it is a very substantial one, is that this changes the act in a manner not hinted at and quite unnecessary. Under the old section, if the can did not comply with the act it might be seized by any inspector or any customs or police officer, and presumably the process of confiscation would have to be carried out before some court of competent jurisdiction. Now they have gone a great deal further; these cans are to be confiscated on sight by any inspector or any customs, excise or police officer, or by any constable. There is a great difference. In one case the police officer or inspector can seize it but he cannot confiscate it. Under the new section, which is sort of dragged in—I am sure the minister does not appreciate the meaning of it—the cans may be confiscated on view by any inspector.

What is meant by an inspector? According to the definition, an inspector is an inspector appointed under this act, or a police constable. That does not mean a civil servant; it may mean a political appointee, and the same thing in the case of a police constable. In British Columbia we have a very fine police system, but in some places police are appointed by political influence. Certainly in this instance the inspector is so appointed. Who is the inspector, anyhow, under the act? His duty is to deal with abattoirs for the most part, and that does not make him an expert in the labelling of canned salmon. The point I am trying to make is that it is improper to allow a political appointee to have the power, the enormous power, of confiscating and condemning on view, and on no say-so but his own, perhaps a thousand dollars worth of canned salmon. Hon. members know the type of man some political appointees are, and I say that is altogether too much power to put into their hands. That some such idea was in the minds of the people who drew up this bill is evident from the fact that they put the following words in the section:

> Provided that persons aggrieved by any such confiscation may appeal by petition to the minister, who may remit the confiscation on such terms and conditions as he may prescribe.

Quite so. What does that mean? It means that a man who has had his stuff confiscated on view by this constable or inspector has the right of appeal to the minister, and he can look to the minister for help. Does the minister want that? Does he want to be made the final court of appeal in cases like that? In many cases it will be shown that the seizures and confiscations by the local inspectors are so unjust that the minister will be compelled, in the exercise of his judgment, to remit the whole confiscation. What will be the result? There will be, immediately a political howl to say that he was acting under political influence, and that that was his sole reason for so acting. Does he wish to be put in that position? I am sure he does not. It might be quite wrong to say that he was influenced, but it would be said, nevertheless. That shows the drawers of the bill had the idea that they were demanding far too much when they stipulated that a man with no knowledge of law, or even of the subject under discussion, could condemn and confiscate without appeal, except of a political character, to the minister.

Then there is one further point I wish to make, and it is this, that the penalties are far too severe. The penalty does not apply only to this section but applies to the whole act. In the act are forty-eight sections. It is complicated, and in connection with it there are fifteen pages of complicated regulations. Under any one of these sections, and perhaps for an offence of only a trivial character, a man might have his stuff confiscated. May I repeat that confiscation may result from a very, very trivial offence. For instance, if the article is not labelled properly, an offence would be committed. Suppose the wretched cannery man spells the word "Canada" without one of the letters "a". In that respect he would not be complying with the act and would be liable, upon the activity of some maliciously inclined person who wished strictly to adhere to the regulations, to confiscation. Some hon. members may say that I have given a ridiculous example, and that such a thing would never happen. May I remind my hon. friends however that sometimes queer things do happen. I recall on one occasion being in court and seeing a man applying for naturalization. His application was thrown out, causing him much expense, and he was told to come back three months later. Why? Because the judge said that the affidavit had been sworn at such and such a place in "B.C.", and he did not know what "B.C." stood for. So far as he was concerned he said it might stand for "Before Christ," and for that reason he threw out the application. May I point out that the applicant had used a printed form in common use.

Turning again to the severity of the penalty, may I say that confiscation for what might turn out to be a petty offence is much too severe. The time of imposing a huge penalty for a minor offence has gone by and it never did work very successfully. We can remember when they used to hang little children for stealing a loaf of bread, but that sort of punishment did not work, and was not just.

Coming nearer home may I say that I remember an instance in British Columbia—and perhaps the British Columbia members will recall it—which I might bring to the attention of the house. There is a practice in that province called pit lamping, and it was becoming a considerable nuisance. Legislation was passed stating that an offender would go to gaol for not less than a month nor more than six months for the first offence. The intention was to stamp out pit lamping in the real Turkish style. What happened? The local justices of the peace, magistrates and judges were not going to see a decent man sent to gaol for a trivial offence, and the result was that they accepted the most ridiculous defences rather than send offenders to gaol. The legislation did not work out as it was expected.

I may say that often the penalties are too severe in these small pieces of legislation. The minister has stated that this is a matter of no great importance. Had it been a big bill the leader of the opposition would have given it a hair combing and the legal men on both sides of the house would have spoken. I must say however that in these small pieces of legislation the officials run away with themselves, impose the most drastic penalties and it slips through the house without being noticed.

One final objection I have is that this legislation is not needed at all. In the explanation it is stated that the legislation is necessary to prevent incorrect labelling, but they go on to say the following:

> While section 19 of this act makes it illegal to place any false or misleading mark on a can of fish or shellfish, the only penalty involved is a fine; but in order to protect the industry it is necessary to prevent wrongly labelled goods being sold either in the local or foreign markets.

And so on. From this it would seem they want a penalty greater than a fine. But what is the fine? Let us turn to section 44 of the act, which is as follows:

> Every person who violates any provision of this act, or of any regulation made by the governor in council or by the minister under the authority of this act in respect to which no penalty is hereinbefore provided, shall for every such offence, incur a penalty not exceeding five hundred dollars.

So that from a violation of section 19 of the act he is liable to a fine of $500 and, may I say, $500 is a substantial fine for wrong marking. Five hundred dollars is a lot of money. The maximum fine for common assault is $20. You could assault your mother-in-law and get away with a $20 fine, and you could assault her twenty-five times for the same money you would have to pay for the offence of putting a wrong label on your product. Or, conversely you could assault twenty-five mothers-in-law for the same price.

Then there is a penalty for contravention of section 37, which is as follows:

> No article subject to inspection under this act shall be offered or sold for export or import, or exported or imported, under any name intended or calculated to deceive as to its true nature.

Then, it goes on along the same line. Turning to section 31 we find:

> No person shall offer or expose or have in his possession for sale any article subject to inspection under this act unless all the requirements thereof respecting the said article have been complied with.

A breach of any of these sections is punishable by a fine of $500.

Mr. DURANLEAU: That does not apply to falsely labelled canned goods.

Mr. NEILL: The section states:

> No person shall offer or expose or have in his possession for sale any article subject to inspection under this act—

That applies to canned goods. Then the section concludes:

> —unless all the requirements thereof respecting the said article have been complied with.

Now, under section 44 as I have stated an offender is liable to a fine of $500. The explanation in the act says that it is only a fine. Well, that is a careless explanation, and it is careless legislation. I shall show it is not only a fine. There is a liability to imprisonment, and I shall show how. True, section 44 provides for only a fine, and does not stipulate any imprisonment, but let me quote section 48:

> Every penalty imposed by this act shall be recoverable with costs before any two justices of the peace or any magistrate having the powers of two justices of the peace under the provisions of the criminal code relating to summary convictions.

I shall not take time to turn up the section as the minister can do it for himself, but under section 739 of the criminal code, chapter 36 of the statutes of 1927, gaol is provided. It specifically says that in a case where the act provides a penalty of fine and no imprisonment, in the event of the fine not being paid, imprisonment can be imposed. So we have the complete picture. Under one of these other sections a man can be sentenced to pay a fine of $500 or go to gaol. I suggest that what should be done is to leave out entirely this confiscation business because they are already liable to a heavy fine and to gaol. Is not that enough?

Further, I object because it applies not only to the section which the minister was told it refers to but to the whole act and amendments. The matter is covered in other sections anyhow. I do not think that the act as drawn is drawn correctly or drawn in a necessary way. No one realizes better than I do the need for having strict regulations to prevent the false labelling of salmon. That is perfectly right and proper. But just because there is need for doing something desirable, there is no need for doing something that is unjust and unreasonable and imposing restrictions upon the industry generally. The cannery owners are having a hard time, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) said the other day, and while it is the duty of the government to see that the law is complied with, it is no part of its duty to impose unjust restrictions and penalties. It is all very well to say that these officers will use common sense in their judgments. We do not know whether they will or not, and we must protect the cannery man in the due exercise of his business. If the minister had allowed this bill to go to the committee it could have been amended along lines which he and his officers would have approved. My objections are reasonable and would have been paid attention to.

I come back again to what I said before. We are passing a law by which any politically appointed constable or inspector can condemn a whole lot of salmon just because of some trivial thing, and the owner has no redress except to apply to the minister, who would very soon get tired of exercising his judgment. It is not fair to the industry or to the minister. It would be all right to have it so that the constable could seize the salmon on sight and go before some court before which the minister and the accused would be entitled to appear. Even a spy in time of war is allowed a trial. This offender is not allowed any trial at all. The constable can confiscate on sight.

Mr. BENNETT: There is just one matter to which I desire to draw attention. It was complained by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) that we were going on with business that we had not indicated. Last evening I said that there were "second readings standing which it might not be convenient for the opposition to take to-morrow." The leader of the opposition said in reply, referring to the two banking measures, "I think it would be desirable to let them stand until Tuesday. Apart from that, I think the other business my right hon. friend mentioned might be proceeded with," and we are proceeding accordingly.

Mr. NEILL: I took it to read that when the Prime Minister said "There are second readings standing," he was referring to the banking measures, not other second readings.

Mr. BENNETT: And my right hon. friend said that apart from them it was convenient.

Mr. NEILL: No, he did not say it was convenient to take the other second readings.

Mr. BENNETT: All you have to do is read what he said, at page 870 of Hansard, namely, "Apart from that, I think the other business my right hon. friend mentioned might be proceeded with."

Mr. NEILL: If I am wrong I apologize, but I think the Prime Minister will admit that it is not very clear—is it?

Mr. BENNETT: It seemed to have been so clear that the hon. gentleman provided himself with the necessary material for an excellent speech.

Mr. NEILL: Knowing the government as I do, I am always ready.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Stirling in the chair.

On section 1—When liable to seizure.

Mr. NEILL: Just to test the thing, I move, Mr. Chairman, to amend section 1 by striking out in line 11 the word "shall" and substituting therefor the word "may", and striking out all the words after the word "seized" in line 12 and substituting therefor the following:

> and may be confiscated on order of any two justices of the peace or any magistrate having the powers of two justices of the peace under the provisions of the criminal code relating to summary convictions.

The effect of that would be that the fish could be seized by the constable and later confiscated by a summary court of two justices of the peace or a stipendiary magistrate or any magistrate having the powers of two justices of the peace. If the minister would take the trouble to look into it, possibly postponing consideration of the bill for the purpose, I think he would see that that would fully meet the objections that he has in mind.

Mr. RALSTON: I hope that the minister will seriously consider the amendment which has been suggested by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). If I had been doing it, I would have gone further than the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I share with him the view that we are going altogether too far in the way of putting in the hands of officers who are not judicial officers at all the right practically to convict absolutely innocent persons without a hearing of any kind, and not only convict them, but confiscate their property as well. I know that the minister is not doing this intentionally to irritate people, but I assure him that it will be a source of irritation. You have inspectors, constables, customs, excise and police officers, any one of whom may walk into a man's warehouse and seize goods not simply because they bear a false or misleading mark but even a mark which is incorrect. Suppose it is a can of clams, labelled "Port Hebert clams" and it should be labelled "Clark's Harbour clams." That could be confiscated. The mistake might have been perfectly innocent and the public would not be hurt in the slightest. I submit that we are going a long distance in the way of giving officers so much power without any judicial intervention whatsoever. If a man commits murder, you have to seize him and bring him before a court to convict him, but if a man uses a wrong label on a can of salmon or fish of any kind his goods are liable to immediate confiscation by any one of the officers mentioned in the act. I submit that the minister ought to give the committee very strong reasons for imposing upon these people a liability which is not imposed upon the general community with regard to offences against statutory provisions. The minister is a lawyer of distinction and I do not believe that he himself will be keen to introduce this anomaly in the administration of penal statutes.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. Ralston), says the minister is now seeking to impose this, what he calls, drastic penalty. May I point out to him that this provision has been in the act for nearly twenty years, for eighteen years at any rate, in a form which I think is even more drastic than the amendment which the minister is now offering.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the minister explain in what way?

Mr. STEVENS: I was just coming to that. It will be noted that the clause in the present act says:

[Mr. Neill.]

Any can of fish or shellfish not labelled or marked in accordance with the provisions of this act or of the regulations before being offered or exposed for sale by retail, shall be forfeited to His Majesty and may be seized by any inspector, or by any customs, excise or police officer, or by any constable.

On the other hand, the amendment provides:

Any can of fish or shellfish that bears any false or misleading mark or that is incorrectly labelled or marked and not in accordance with the provisions of this act or of the regulations made thereunder, shall be confiscated to His Majesty and may be seized and confiscated, on view, by any inspector, or by any customs, excise or police officer or by any constable, provided that persons aggrieved by any such confiscation may appeal by petition to the minister, who may remit the confiscation on such terms and conditions as he may prescribe.

They have the right of appeal to the minister in case they are aggrieved and to me the terms of seizure do not seem to be made any more arduous than they were before. I think it is only fair to point out that in his amendment the minister is not making the act more rigorous but is really providing a remedial measure.

Mr. RALSTON: I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce has missed the point which appears in the explanatory note on the next page. Whereas previously a seizure could be made if these goods were offered or exposed for sale, under this amendment a seizure can be made in a man's warehouse whether or not he intends to correct the label next day, to offer them for sale or to put them in other cans. They are subject to seizure if they are found on his premises regardless of whether they are being offered for sale or not. This is the first and a very important difference. It is extending a principle which I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Duranleau) will agree should not be extended.

Secondly, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) points out, it is being made imperative that they "shall" be confiscated. This is a duty which devolves upon the officer the minute he sees a can which is incorrectly labelled. Previously they were subject to seizure if they were labelled not in accordance with the regulations but the government is going a step further; the head of the camel was well within the tent but he is now getting in his whole body. The amendment states that they "shall" be seized even though they are only "incorrectly" labelled. I submit that this extension is a serious one and is an inroad upon this industry. It will create a hardship and cause unnecessary irritation. If the minister could give us instances where an amendment such as this were required and absolutely necessary, it would be a different thing but so far we have heard of none.

May I say a further word to the Minister of Trade and Commerce at the risk of being controversial? My hon. friend says that there is an appeal to the minister, but I quite understand that there would have been one in any case. I do not think it is suggested that should an officer seize goods wrongfully there would not be the right of appeal to the minister. I hope the Acting Minister of Fisheries will prove to be more tender hearted than his colleague the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Matthews). Frequently appeals for redress have been made to that department in the case of improper decisions, but redress was not obtained. It is a long distance to Ottawa and once a seizure has been made by an officer it will prove difficult to have things made right. It means a report being made to the central bureau in the province, then a report to Ottawa and perhaps a batting back and forth between the minister and the officers in Halifax or the capital of the province in which the seizure was made. It would be a long time before the man would get back his goods.

Mr. ERNST: In the case of a wrongful seizure there would be a remedy through the civil courts.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is wrong about that. This amendment makes the seizure legal.

Mr. ERNST: The seizure is only legal where the articles are wrongfully marked.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend has missed my point. The amendment covers incorrect markings even if they are only "incorrect." It may not be done knowingly or wilfully; it may not be put up for sale but the officer must confiscate and this amendment makes the seizure legal and there would be no redress through the civil courts.

Mr. STEVENS: May I interrupt to make an observation which I should have made before? My department does not administer this act but in the matter of internal and external trade we find instances cropping up where there is misrepresentation of goods. Those who are inclined to take advantage of the public frequently will adopt very clever and resourceful dodges by which to achieve their ends. In other words, rarely does the honest and straightforward business man find himself interfered with in a matter of this kind. The difficulty in the administration of such acts as this is to clothe the officer with sufficient power to administer the act. Quite frequently we are told that such and such a thing is not done but when we study the act in question we find it is impossible to make them do it. In a very little time I could give many illustrations. This is one of the reasons why the penalties in this type of act are apparently somewhat drastic. We must not pass legislation which is so weak that it cannot be enforced. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni certainly is not disinterested in the canned fish business and I do not think he would desire so to weaken the act that it would lend itself to abuse.

I shall give an illustration. Recently we were confronted with an instance where Canadian British Columbia salmon was offered for sale on a market abroad. This was described as British Columbia salmon but the labels had been made in a foreign country. They were so marked but in wrapping the can the label was turned over just sufficiently to cover up that mark. We were receiving preferential treatment in this particular market through treaty arrangements but we were told that while the fish might be a Canadian product, the wrapping was foreign and, therefore, we were not entitled to the lower rate of duty. We have had a lot of correspondence about this matter and have endeavoured to straighten it out. This is the sort of thing that might be done and there is a definite necessity of having an effective measure. I know the difficulties with which the minister is faced in administering an act of this kind.

Mr. RALSTON: The Minister of Trade and Commerce is very reasonable about the matter. I do not attribute to him or to the Minister of Fisheries the slightest intention of irritating anyone or unduly hampering the industry. But I am pointing out that in the matter of principle, the amendment is wrong. I really think it is wrong to give this right to officers to go around the country and make judicial decisions without a hearing or to convict without a trial. That is my first point. Inroads on this principle have been made from time to time. The former Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) and I had considerable discussion in this house, either last year or the year before, with regard to the same thing. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has said he is ready to accept the principle that that may be done, but that the amendment should read that way rather than it shall be done. The change he suggests would not weaken the amendment in the slightest. This amendment permits the possibility of the seizure of a perfectly innocent article and the necessity of a man having to go to Ottawa for redress whereas, under the change suggested by the hon. member, the officer would have the discretion of saying on the spot, "No, this is a case where I will not make a seizure." That is, I understand, the suggestion of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, and the Acting Minister of Fisheries, who is in charge of the bill, might well take the amendment into consideration.

Let me say one thing more. Perhaps it may be said that it has not much to do with this section, but in this connection I cannot help thinking of the incorrect statements that are made with regard to the issue of stocks and securities in this country with no provision for any officer to make a seizure or to take any summary remedy, although thousands of dollars are taken from people by misleading and incorrect statements and for their remedy they have to go to court, and hon. gentlemen know the long road people have to travel to get any redress in that way. When persons have to go to all that trouble and have no protection whatever; when the individual who attempts to practise that sort of thing on the public is let go scot-free; and when, if a person incorrectly labels a can of salmon, such goods are seized, there is discrimination, perhaps not intentional, but it is there, and I think we should pay greater attention to more weighty questions than this if we are really trying to provide summary remedies for some of the evils that beset this country.

Mr. BENNETT: The Security Frauds Prevention Act deals with the very matter to which the hon. member who has just taken his seat refers. When he says that there is no adequate punishment for those who make misstatements, perhaps he overlooks the fact that the law does the very thing that this measure contemplates: the authorities can raid a man's place, take his books, his papers, examine them all; unlock the door, breaking it if necessary, walk right in and take possession of everything. That is the law of this country in each of the nine provinces, the privy council having sustained the validity of the Alberta act and all the other provinces having passed similar legislation.

Mr. NEILL: What is the act?

Mr. BENNETT: The Security Frauds Prevention Act. The Mayland case went from the province of Alberta to the privy council as to whether it was an abuse of power to take away a man's papers in connection with stock promotion. I put to the hon. gentleman as well as to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni this situation: In this country we have been endeavouring to establish a reputation for our products. This has not been entirely easy for the reason that other people imitate them and give them a name that would seem to indicate that the products in question came from Canada when they actually did not. The most noteworthy example of this was in connection with our flour and the use of the name "No. I Manitoba hard." The second grievance was in connection with localities that developed a reputation for a particular product and a nearby locality—and when I say nearby, I mean within reason, having regard to distances in this country—put up the same sort of thing and put that name on it so that it might derive the benefit of the reputation enjoyed by the products of the first locality. During the war, for instance, it is alleged—I put it as mildly as that—that a certain quality of dogfish was put up in Nova Scotia and canned and labelled "Scotia Whitefish," being then sold in Spain. The result was that if you now tried to sell that sort of thing in Spain, you would not get very far with it. This did a great deal of injury to the business of Canada.

As regards clams, to which the hon. gentleman referred, there would be an offence only if it is alleged that something is other than what it is and the officer, if he finds that it is something other than what it is represented to be will destroy it. That has happened frequently. There is nothing new about the law; as a matter of fact it is very old. This is the right of an officer of the law who used to be called an officer of the peace, a peace officer. Under the old common law he had to destroy certain things. In this case we are introducing legislation that declares it an offence to endeavour to palm off something other than what it is in fraud of the legitimate and proper producer. That is what it is.

Mr. RALSTON: That is not it.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the marking on a box of something which declares the article within is something which it is not.

Mr. RALSTON: But not fraud.

Mr. BENNETT: Then we shall describe it as being eminently honest.

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Then what is it?

Mr. NEILL: An incorrect label.

Mr. BENNETT: An incorrect label placed there purposely.

Mr. NEILL: There might be a mistake.

Mr. BENNETT: It is one of those things in which there cannot be any mistake.

Mr. RALSTON: There is nothing in the statute about fraud.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend knows it means that.

Mr. RALSTON: My right hon. friend knows better than that. He knows what it means.

Mr. BENNETT: I thank the hon. member. That is the usual assertion of the hon. gentleman as to what other people think. If he would confine himself to his own opinions it would be so much better.

Mr. McINTOSH: He does not need to come back any more.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth must be helped by that observation.

This is an endeavour to prevent one class of commodity from being palmed off as something it is not. I admit that this is a very drastic provision, I recall the circumstance when the legislation was being considered and the officers who recommended it did so in the light of the experience they had had. It is so simple, so easy to allege that something is other than it is and this is an effort to stop that sort of thing. My gaze happens to be fixed upon the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) who is a member of the medical profession. He knows the difficulties they have had in connection with proprietary remedies, the passing of them off on the public and the laws they have had to resort to in order to prevent that from being done.

In this case we are speaking of a natural product. These are fish that have acquired certain reputations in certain localities, clams, lobsters, commodities of that kind; they come from certain localities and are known to be better if they come from there than if from elsewhere. If they are incorrectly labelled, this legislation confers upon the peace officer the right to destroy that which has been improperly labelled. That is all; it is drastic.

Mr. HANBURY: It requires him to do it; it does not merely permit him to do it.

Mr. BENNETT: It requires him to do it; it is part of his duty. In other words, if someone endeavours to palm off something as other than it is, he is required to destroy it. The word "incorrect" means just what it says—not correct, not true, therefore false.

Mr. NEILL: Not necessarily.

Mr. BENNETT: A false statement as to fish, resulting in the destruction of that which is falsely branded. That is the law which is proposed. If it is felt that this will work an injustice, I shall ask the minister to let the matter stand over until we can see the officials of the department who asked for this legislation, and secure the instances that have brought about the necessity for it, for no one desires to place upon the statute books cruel or unjust provisions, but in the last few years in particular we have learned that it is not in stock transactions, not in exploitation of the investing community, but in food and other products and in manufactured goods of all kinds that there has been a tendency for people to take advantage of the high reputation that certain products or commodities have secured in markets for their own advantage. This is an effort with respect to fish to stop this sort of thing, and the word "incorrect," I repeat, means just what it says—not correct and therefore false. That is the position.

Mr. RALSTON: That is not intent.

Mr. BENNETT: If by "fraud" we can understand the meaning given to it by courts of law, no one knows better than the hon. member himself how difficult it is in a court of law to establish that same thing.

Mr. HANBURY: To prove intent.

Mr. RALSTON: Or knowledge.

Mr. BENNETT: Well knowledge is another way of putting it, but incorrectness is the word. That is broad enough to make men realize that they must think before they put a brand upon anything they produce. I am bound to say that while I realize the drastic character of the penalty, unless we do something of this sort we cannot stop that practice. I am sorry to say it. Because it is so simple to do it. If those who have had more to do with the production of these things than I will look into it they will find what has happened in several cases in recent years. Very serious things have happened, that have hurt the reputation of this country abroad, made it difficult to sell our goods, I could give you case after case of various kinds of natural products, and this is the essence of it all, saying incorrectness does not mean fraud. Any brand that is put upon a box by a producer incorrectly may be taken to be fraudulent, there cannot be any accident in relation to that. That is why I suggest to the minister that to ascertain what the facts are he ask the officers who have had experience.

Mr. DUFF: Before the committee rises—I presume from what the Prime Minister said he is going to ask that the committee rise—I notice this clause which purports to repeal section 27 of the Meat and Canned Foods Act refers only to canned fish or shellfish. May I ask the minister if there are other clauses in the Meat and Canned Foods Act which use the same language with reference to other canned foods?

Perhaps while he is looking it up I may go on and say that as far as I am concerned, if all goods of this character, that are canned foods, are treated alike then perhaps we are on common ground. The Prime Minister has made a conclusive explanation, it may not be as bad as it appears, but certainly there is no reason in my mind why canned fish should be picked out and treated differently from other canned goods.

Mr. DURANLEAU: As the right hon. Prime Minister stated a few minutes ago, it is in the light of experience that we ascertained that section 27 is absolutely inadequate to maintain the reputation of our canned fish on foreign markets. We think that section 19, even with the fine imposed by section 44, is not sufficient to preserve the quality and reputation of our canned fish.

Mr. NEILL: Did you every try it?

Mr. DURANLEAU: We cannot interfere with canned goods wrongly labelled when sold for export.

Mr. NEILL: Under that section.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We can sue the party and have him fined to the extent of $500, but as stated by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni we cannot interfere with the sale and export of the goods. Experience has shown that section 27 was absolutely inadequate. We do not want to be too harsh on traders or canners, all we want is to protect the reputation of our goods. I have listened to my hon. friends with interest, and there may be something in their contention. I may add that it is not for his pleasure that the minister under the proposed section takes on his shoulders the responsibility of passing upon appeals of aggrieved persons, but sometimes we have to take our responsibilities, the government has sometimes to perform some duties it does not like. The same is true of members of the house; they have to undertake their responsibilities. I thought in this instance that those aggrieved by a confiscation by an officer would perhaps prefer appealing to the minister instead of appealing to the courts. But as I have already stated, we do not want to be too hard. I am prepared to consider the suggestions of my hon. friends, and for that purpose I move that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. DUFF: Before the committee rises would the minister be good enough to answer my question as to whether this is a special clause in regard to canned fish and shellfish, or if with respect to all canned goods the same drastic treatment is meted out?

Mr. DURANLEAU: We will consider the whole matter before we bring it before the committee again.

Mr. DUFF: The proper thing to do is to put them all on the same level.

Mr. MacINNIS: Could not the minister consider referring this bill to the committee on fisheries, where those opposed to it could have the advantage of meeting the officers concerned and possibly get a better point of view than we can in the house where the officers cannot be present?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not think that is necessary for this amendment. Hon. members have ample opportunity to discuss the matter before this committee. It is only a single amendment.

Mr. RALSTON: Before the committee rises let me say I am glad the Prime Minister and the Acting Minister of Fisheries have accepted the suggestion to consider the matter further. The Prime Minister referred to the matter of securities, I only mentioned that as an illustration; but my right hon. friend is not quite correct in the statement he makes with regard to the statute in that respect. When a person in the position of the Prime Minister makes such a statement the house accepts it as authoritative, but it is not quite true that in Alberta or anywhere else the officer has the right to step in and search anyone's premises. The attorney general makes the direction.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. RALSTON: Well that is the point that differentiates it entirely from this case where a police officer or a customs officer makes his decision right on the ground without any direction from a responsible minister of the crown.

Mr. BENNETT: Because he sees it before him.

Mr. RALSTON: But the attorney general, the responsible officer of the crown, is in a very different position from a police officer, who may be only a temporary officer in some outlying district. I do not think the cases are parallel. I think the Securities Act which requires the intervention of the attorney-general before a seizure can be made strengthens my contention that we are taking steps entirely out of proportion to the importance of the matter, when we vest in outside officers the right to step into a man's premises and make a seizure of canned fish which may be incorrectly labelled through a mistake while in connection with much more serious offences we require the intervention of a minister of the crown in the person of the attorney-general of the province before any seizure can be made.

Mr. NEILL: I just want to point out that while the Securities Act allows a man's premises to be raided by a constable, it does not give the constable power to send him to gaol.

Mr. BENNETT: It gives him power to take the stuff away.

Mr. NEILL: But he has a trial. In this case the constable can confiscate on his own volition. The Prime Minister stressed a good deal the words "fraudulent," and "improperly labelled," but skated over the words "incorrectly labelled."

Mr. BENNETT: No, I dwelt upon that.

Mr. NEILL: There is a big difference between a false statement and an incorrect statement. I might say I was a statesman; that would not be fraudulent but it would be incorrect.

Mr. BENNETT: It would not be incorrect. It might be immodest.

Mr. NEILL: The feature of the amendment that I stress is that it takes the power, the excessive power, of confiscation out of the hands of the little constable or officer and vests it in a court. Is there anything wrong in that? After all it is only summary conviction by two justices of the peace or a magistrate having the power of two justices of the peace. I will never be convinced that it is not wrong to put an excessive penalty on an offence. We might as well go back to the days of the feudal system. Was it not King Henry who was bothered by some priest and said: Isn't there some good friend of mine who will rid me of this turbulent fellow? And they went out and murdered Becket or whoever it was. It is on record that in the old days when they got tired of a politician or a courtier, they would say casually: Take him out and behead him, and that was the end? Do we want to go back to that system? In Turkey there was a baker discovered giving short weight, he was put in his oven and baked. The caliph, or whatever you call him, boasted that this one act of severity stopped the giving of short weight bread by bakers. Is that the system we want in Canada? Surely not. Take another instance. If I go on the highway at night with my car on which I have only one light burning I may be stopped by a constable and given a summons and brought up in court, but the analogy would be that the constable could step up to me and say, "your car is confiscated." My car does not cost anything like as much as a thousand cases of salmon. The offence may be merely spelling Canada wrongly, or something equally trivial.

Mr. BENNETT: That would not be wrong.

Mr. NEILL: Any incorrect labelling would bring it under the act. I do wish the minister would let the bill go to the committee, but since he is going to let it stand in order to look into it I hope the matter will be dealt with properly.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 7, to amend the Fisheries Act, 1932.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Railways and canals—surveys and inspections, canals, $6,370.

Mr. HANBURY: I suppose this is just a general item, and nothing specific?

Mr. MANION: That is right.

Item agreed to.

Railway employees provident fund—to supplement pension allowances payable under provisions of Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees Provident Fund Act so as to make the minimum payment during period January 1, 1934, to March 31, 1935, the sum of $30 per month instead of $20 as fixed by the said act, $26,500.

Mr. REID: I should like to ask the minister if this fund only operates in one part of the country.

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: How long since this increase was made?

Mr. MANION: This has been going on now for quite a number of years. It goes back to 1907.

Mr. RALSTON: I mean the increase from $20 to $30.

Mr. MANION: That has been going on since 1921.

Item agreed to.

Hudson Bay railway and terminals—construction and betterments (including E. B. Jost at $2,250) revote $117,500—$550,000.

Mr. GRAY: Will the minister give us a short account of the business done by the Hudson Bay terminals since the last estimates were passed?

Mr. MANION: Does my hon. friend mean the business done or the construction work carried on?

Mr. GRAY: I should like to include the business that has been done at that port.

Mr. MANION: During the last year the work on the railway and at the port was completed to a large extent, though this item includes a certain amount of money for finishing up the work as far as we expect to go, though that depends on the future business at the port. If certain lines of business show a great advance there will be other works in the future, necessarily, but at the moment I can say that with this vote the work will be largely completed.

Mr. McINTOSH: But you look for a continuous development?

Mr. MANION: Yes, of course. The work done last year included dredging, a certain amount of filling and the finishing of certain works in regard to water supply and such things at the port. On the railway, unfortunately, each year subsidences have occurred, sink holes, as they are called, that have had to be filled in, but each year the number of sink holes has decreased, and it is rather hoped that with the work done this year the road may be able to go on an operating basis. This item is partly for construction.

In regard to the business done at the port I will give what I can from memory, and if they wish my hon. friends can ask for other details. In 1931 the first boats went in; there were two. In 1932 ten ships arrived and took out cargoes of wheat; last year ten ships also arrived, and in addition there was one ship of the Hudson Bay Company, the Nascopie, making really eleven cargoes outward. As to cargoes inward, in 1931 two of the ships had small excess cargoes of coal which they wished to get rid of in order to make room for a return cargo of a larger amount of wheat, and we took some five hundred tons of coal off their hands. In the second year one cargo—not a very large one—of mixed freight came in, and last year one cargo came in and one cargo of mixed freight went out. All the outward cargoes, except one, have been wheat. In the second year some rolled oats and other grain products went out. Last year a cargo went out in which there were two hundred head of cattle. Perhaps it would be interesting to have some of the details concerning that cargo. There were nineteen and a half tons of honey, a small amount of egg powder, some hay for the cattle, and 150,000 board feet of lumber. That was on the steamship Brandon.

Mr. HANBURY: How much lumber?

Mr. MANION: 150,000 board feet.

Mr. McINTOSH: Can the minister say where that lumber came from?

Mr. MANION: It came from the neighbourhood of Le Pas, although we have taken a good deal of lumber incidentally, for construction work, from British Columbia, when we required fir or cedar for building purposes.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Can the minister tell the committee whether the rate on cattle shipped to Churchill is advantageous, when compared with the rate to the eastern Atlantic ports?

Mr. STEVENS: The operation was carried on under the direction of my department and I have not an accurate memory of just what the rate was, but I can get it and give it to the hon. member when my estimates come up.

Mr. McGIBBON: As wheat was the chief export from the port last year, can the minister tell us how many million bushels went out?

Mr. MANION: About two and a half million bushels of wheat last year, and about the same the previous year.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): Can the minister tell us what it cost the government to fit up that ship?

Mr. STEVENS: I shall give particulars of that when my estimates are under discussion. A special provision was made to test it out. I believe the same ship is expected to come back to the port this year, for the purpose of carrying cattle. However, I shall give accurate information when my estimates are under consideration.

Mr. GRAY: Has there been—

Mr. MANION: May I answer the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario? He asked concerning the prospects for the coming year. That is difficult to say, but naturally it is expected that more grain will be shipped from that port than has been shipped in the past. As I have said, about two and a half million bushels, in round figures, went out last year. This year it has been arranged, partly through the work of shippers, and partly through the work, I must say in justice, of the Saskatchewan government, to send considerable traffic through the port. The Saskatchewan government has been very active in attempting to work out traffic for the port. Already the Saskatchewan wheat board have chartered two wheat vessels. The Dalgleish people, who were the first people to send in a ship are sending one in early in the season; it may be the Pennyworth. But there is also another ship the Brandon, which went in last year and is chartered to go in early this year, as well.

In addition to that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce who arranged last year for the shipment of two hundred cattle has arranged that the Canadian Britisher shall go to Churchill upon the opening of navigation. On that vessel will be placed from one thousand to twelve hundred tons of general cargo and two hundred head of cattle for discharge at London. So the prospects are somewhat improved at the present time, and arrangements are in better shape than they have been heretofore. This year my department has not done anything towards chartering vessels for that port. In other years vessels were brought in to a great extent through the efforts of my department. But now, when the port is a going concern, so to speak, it does not appear to me to be the duty of the Department of Railways and Canals to charter vessels. That matter is being attended to by shipping agencies themselves and by the Saskatchewan government. Also, as I have mentioned, the Department of Trade and Commerce have arranged for one shipment.

In regard to insurance it may be of interest to mention that the insurance rates on cargoes have been coming down. Each year they have decreased a little. In 1931 they were two per cent; in 1932 one and a half per cent and in 1933 one and a quarter per cent.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: How does that compare with other rates?

Mr. MANION: I would say it is about five times as high as the rate into Montreal.

Mr. McINTOSH: How does that compare with the rates into Montreal years ago when the St. Lawrence route was in a condition far different from that of to-day?

Mr. MANION: I have no doubt the early rates into Montreal were just as high as rates into Churchill. I should like to give the freight rates, as well. In 1931 the freight rates out of Churchill for grain were 3s. 9d., whereas out of Montreal they were 1s. 6d. That is a little over a third. The following year, 1932 the rate was 3s, and 3s. 3d. out of Churchill, and 1s. 6d. out of Montreal. Last year the rate was 2s. 6d. to 2s. 9d. against 1s. 3d. In other words in the year 1933 the rates at Montreal were down to about one-half of the rates at Churchill, but about three years ago they were about one-third.

Mr. REID: What would the total difference be if you were computing the rate on grain?

Mr. MANION: I have not the figures before me, but some time ago I saw a statement, which I am now trying to locate, where rates were figured scientifically, and the figures showed that a ship going into Churchill, and allowing the usual time, and taking into account the shorter haul for grain, and the decrease in that rate as compared with the rate, we will say, from some of the Saskatchewan points right through to Montreal, that the ship could make a better return on its space or on its trips or voyages and that the rates taken, altogether, are lower.

Mr. HANBURY: By Churchill?

Mr. MANION: Yes. But the fact remains of course that the short period of navigation makes operations difficult.

Mr. MARCIL: It is closed for ten months in the year. What has been the average time of navigation from Churchill?

Mr. MANION: That is difficult to say. This is a subject which usually starts disputes in the house which I am not particularly looking for.

Mr. GRAY: You love it.

Mr. MANION: However, I shall try to give the information. There is, roughly, a period of two months with at each end possibly a period of two weeks—and sometimes without doubt that will be extended. My engineer who is familiar with this subject, much more than I am, has said that the usual period is from August 8 to October 8. However at each end of that length of time there are usually a couple of weeks.

Mr. HANBURY: A couple of weeks of good gambling.

Mr. MANION: Yes, good gambling. Of course, during that period, for the time being at any rate, insurance rates will be higher.

Mr. McINTOSH: The navigation period is practically three months?

Mr. MANION: I would not like to say it is three months at the present time although I remember when I made my first trip up there in 1931 I met a delightful old bishop who was and still is up there, Bishop Turquetil. He has canoed the whole north country, and told me he was convinced that the period would be extended to four months.

Mr. McINTOSH: I think he is about right.

Mr. BRADETTE: In some years there has been navigation for more than four months?

Mr. MANION: Yes, but it has to be remembered that the shippers, or ship owners, may not take very much chance. I believe it is still in a stage of experimentation, and some time will be required to know how long actually the season will be. So if my hon. friends opposite wish to state it is open for a longer period, I have no quarrel with them.

Mr. GRAY: Does the government receive revenue from the grain stored in the government terminal at Churchill?

Mr. MANION: Yes; my engineer will look up the figures.

[Mr. Hanbury.]

Mr. HANBURY: I understand the government is absorbing a portion of the insurance charges?

Mr. MANION: No.

Mr. HANBURY: They were, I believe, at one time.

Mr. MANION: No. So far as I can remember—and I think I am right—we did not at any time absorb any of the insurance charges.

Mr. McINTOSH: What are the possibilities for further freight reductions out of Churchill?

Mr. MANION: I think it all depends upon the amount of traffic coming and going. The ships that have come into Churchill so far have come in light, except for two cargoes. Naturally if the ships can get two-way cargoes it will cut down the rates, and as my hon. friends from the west succeed in patronizing the route it will without a doubt cut down the rates. But so far, and I am not saying this in any critical spirit, it has been very difficult to get anybody to ship grain or other commodities through that port. It has been really a struggle. The first two ships received a cargo through my department. The second season we practically had to do the whole thing, and last season we also did a good deal. But this coming season the province of Saskatchewan, and I think I should say this in full justice to the province, is making a really strong effort to get cargoes and I have a statement here from which I quoted a moment or two ago from Mr. Merkley, Minister of Railways, Labour and Industries, who has been taking a very great interest in this route, in which he points out the difficulties that have had to be contended with in getting a boat chartered. In addition, hon. members of this house on both sides, from that section of the country, notably my hon. friend from Nelson (Mr. Stitt) in whose constituency the port of Churchill is, have been doing everything they can. I can assure the committee that, in spite of what is occasionally said in the press which is not too friendly to us, this department and the government has done everything it can to give the port and the road a fair deal.

Mr. McINTOSH: Is the department at present carrying on negotiations with Lloyd's for a reduction in the insurance rates out of Churchill?

Mr. MANION: Oh, my hon. friend was referring to insurance rates? Negotiations are going on continuously. I have already given figures showing the cutting down of the insurance rates. That is a matter that comes under the department of my colleague the Minister of Marine, which carries on all the negotiations in regard to insurance rates. It works in association with the Imperial Shipping Committee and has done much good work in bringing down insurance rates. May I in this connection, without speaking politically at all, but just as a matter of justice, say that the Hon. Howard Feguson has worked continuously to bring down the insurance rates at the request of both my department and that of my colleague the Minister of Marine. He has helped to accomplish what has been accomplished, and as the rate has been cut from 2 to 1¼ per cent, or nearly cut in two, I think it is only fair that credit should be given to those who have worked hard to bring that about. But I thought that my hon. friend was speaking of freight rates in the first place.

Mr. McINTOSH: I was speaking of freight rates at first, but insurance rates subsequently.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Gray) asked as to the revenue from the elevator. Last year the revenue from the elevator was $58,000.

Mr. HEAPS: What are the annual interest charges on the Hudson Bay railway and the port of Churchill?

Mr. MANION: I do not know that I can give the exact figures, but I have them pretty well in my head. The cost of the Churchill developments, including the money lost at Port Nelson, was in round figures $53,000,000. That figure includes the aids to navigation in strait and bay provided by the Department of Marine. My hon. friend, who comes of a race that is very good at figures, can easily see that at five per cent the interest charges would amount to something like $2,500,000.

Mr. GRAY: Exclusive of interest what is the cost of operation at the moment?

Mr. MANION: The estimated operating cost at Churchill this year is $95,000. That does not include the deficit on the railway, which last year amounted to $163,000. In our estimates this year we are only allowing $10,000 for the deficit on the railway. In other words, we are counting on a greater amount of traffic.

Mr. HEAPS: Is that just the operating deficit?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: What are the maintenance charges on the road?

Mr. MANION: This year our vote for the road, including operating deficit and maintenance—part of it this year would really be capital—is a little over $414,000, nearly $415,000. That is for the road alone. We are hoping that next year, with the ballasting, ditching, filling and such like done, we shall not require as large an amount, because the operation then would be confined to ordinary repairs, wear and tear, and whatever else there might be under the head of an operating deficit.

Mr. HOWDEN: I would ask the minister to make a statement following the statement made by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Bowman) with reference to an editorial in a recent issue of the Free Press pointing out that a possible cause of high rates out of Churchill was the excessive cost of stevedoring and of supplies, and contending that as both these were furnished by the government they should have been furnished at reasonable rates, but the contractors were permitted to come in between and take a shaving on the service.

Mr. MANION: I am quite prepared to deal with that because I saw the article myself, and in addition two members on this side of the house, the hon. member for Nelson and the hon. member for Dauphin, drew it to my attention. If somebody has a copy of the editorial available I shall deal with it verbatim because it is full of errors.

Mr. HEAPS: That is the reason you are going to deal with it.

Mr. MANION: Yes, naturally I do not wish to have errors circulated in the west giving a wrong impression. Of course, I do not imply that the Free Press would think of such a thing as that.

The first point made was in regard to stevedoring, and I will deal with that first from memory, as I recollect the circumstances very well. The department has nothing to do with the stevedoring. It is true that the stevedoring was done by a gentleman from Montreal, Louis Wolfe, a very outstanding man in that type of work at the port of Montreal. His arangements were made, not with the government—but with the ships or the shipping agents, and we had no control and have no control whatsoever over this contract. Mr. Wolfe naturally could not afford, in view of the short season of navigation, to take a big staff up there, and so to facilitate things as much as possible, and yet to be fair to ourselves, whenever ships had to be loaded or unloaded we loaned him some of our labourers who are ordinarily employed at other works in the port of Churchill. For these men he paid us the wages that we were paying them, and in addition we charged him 35 per cent. That may seem a little heavy, but we had to bring these men into Churchill from different parts of the country, some from places far outside of Churchill, and pay their fare there and back, and we figured that 35 per cent was a legitimate charge, and very much less than the contractor would have had to pay for bringing the men in from different places himself. My engineer tells me that the 35 per cent was figured out by my officers to be the actual cost to us. That makes it even fairer. If the contractor has made a pretty good profit on the stevedoring, that is entirely a matter between him and the ships or the shipping agents who engaged him. We had no connection with him in any shape or form so far as his charges for the stevedoring were concerned. I assume he has the right to a just profit but as to whether or not that profit was excessive, I do not know. That is a matter for the shipping agents and those who are dealing with him to work out. An estimate of his profits was given to me but I shall not repeat the figures because I do not know if they are really correct. These figures do not show a very heavy profit. If they are correct, I think his profit was only fair considering the time he was there and it certainly would have no great effect on the freight rates. Any effect would be infinitesimal when spread over the number of ships which he handled. I think I have dealt sufficiently with the insurance rates. While these rates are higher than those charged at Montreal, we have been gradually getting them down and are still working to that end. Another statement is made regarding food supplies and this possibly has prompted hon. members opposite in their questioning. The article reads:

[Mr. Manion.]

Regarding food supplies for the ships, these are all provided from the government supplies at Churchill.

That statement is absolutely incorrect because the ships bring in their own supplies. They do buy a little fresh food from the government but they pay for that on the same basis as they pay for labour, cost plus handling charges. Last year the total purchases for the eleven ships amounted to only $646. The engineer points out that there was no intermediary to get a rake-off, if I may use that term, a commission or anything of the sort on the handling of the food.

Mr. HOWDEN: It is sold direct from the government to the ships?

Mr. MANION: Yes, by our staff up there. We have had to buy a considerable quantity of food for the different camps as a great number of men have been fed. We call for tenders which are put in by large companies who deal in a wholesale way and we get a very good rate. Another statement is to the effect that the business is done through a contractor who is well remunerated. I have dealt with that already and I repeat, that statement is incorrect. Without meaning to be anything but gentle with the Free Press, which is a great friend of mine, I say with all due respect that the statements made in this article are about as incorrect as they possibly could be. I believe the Free Press has been given some misinformation by someone who misread the report of Mr. Kydd, and incidentally I should like to know who has been so busy as to hand out this information. Up until the present I have not seen this report, so the Free Press has secured a scoop.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is the minister in position to make a statement as to how far he has gone in the construction of the Mafeking cutoff?

Mr. MANION: A survey was made shortly after the elections and I think a report has been made but no construction has been started. In fact, I can say quite frankly that until the Hudson Bay railway does considerably more business than it has been doing, we cannot expect any great congestion and probably will not build this cutoff until some time in the future. As my hon. friend knows, this is to provide a short-cut to Churchill and at the moment there is not very much necessity for this.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I gather from the minister's remarks that we need not expect this cutoff for a few years.

Mr. MANION: I would not like to prophesy so far ahead but it certainly should not be in expectation this year.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I remind the minister that an election is expected in the near future. He is one of the ministers who is always very anxious to carry out his promises, probably more so than the rest and—

Mr. STEVENS: Order.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I remind the minister that should we have an election this year or even next year he will have to get busy so that he can go back into the northern ridings of Manitoba and tell the people that he has done something with regard to the Mafeking cutoff. The promise made by the minister at Dauphin and that made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) at Brandon were both in very definite language and there could be no doubt as to what was meant. Should the minister go back to Dauphin and the Prime Minister go back to Brandon during the next elections this question will be asked and I am afraid they will be put in a very embarrassing position. I certainly would not like to see the Minister of Railways embarrassed in any way as he is one of the most genial members we have in this house.

Mr. BOWMAN: For the benefit of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Beaubien), I may say that the Minister of Railways will always be very welcome at Dauphin. He has always had a very warm welcome in the past and he need not worry about any promises he made during the last elections.

An hon. MEMBER: It will be warm.

An. hon. MEMBER It will be hot.

Mr. BOWMAN: So far as Dauphin is concerned, the present member, perhaps with the assistance of the Minister of Railways will do his best to look after the constituency.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I inform the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Bowman) that the Minister of Railways is just as welcome in the riding of Provencher as he is in the riding of Dauphin. So far I have not seen him there. He was supposed to appear but he did not show up. The people have read a great deal about him; they have seen his picture in the papers and they would like to meet him personally. I do not say that he would not be welcome in Dauphin, I am simply saying that he may find himself in a difficult position. The promise was made that the Mafeking cutoff would be built as a means of curing unemployment, and I am reminding the minister of this in a kind and not a critical manner. That is the only reason why I brought up the matter.

Mr. MANION: I have no desire to enter into a dispute with regard to the Mafeking cutoff, as that matter has been brought up practically every year. I have been reminded by the hon. member that I made this promise and I have always told him that I did not. I desire to thank my hon. friend for his invitation to visit his constituency and I shall make every effort to do so. For his consolation I may say that during the last elections I visited some ten or twelve constituencies in Manitoba, and we returned nearly ten or twelve members. I hope he will give me a good welcome when I come along to see him.

Mr. BROWN: I hope the minister will carry out his plan and visit my constituency.

Mr. MANION: If I had carried out my plans during the last elections the hon. gentleman would not be here.

Mr. BROWN: That is a reflection on the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) who came in his place.

Mr. MANION: I will let the Minister of Trade and Commerce take care of himself. I might tell the hon. gentleman that the only thing that saved him from a visit from me was a rain storm. He can thank the storm for interfering on his behalf.

Mr. BROWN: The Minister of Trade and Commerce could not say that.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I understand the minister has had some correspondence from the secretary of a comparatively new organization in the west known as the interprovincial traffic conference. Mr. Smith, the secretary who at one time was associated with the Saskatchewan government, has been actively engaged in promoting the cause of the Hudson Bay railway. This organization held a meeting recently at Saskatoon, and I should like to quote from a letter addressed by the secretary to the minister. It reads:

> For the specific purpose of developing export and import trade through Churchill in a businesslike way, the interprovincial trade and traffic conference, with representatives present from western cities, towns, wholesale and retail merchants' associations, boards of trade, and the executive officers of the provincial wheat, live stock, egg and poultry pools, met at Saskatoon on January 12, and carefully reviewed the entire Hudson bay situation to earnestly ascertain what steps are necessary to enable the Hudson Bay railway to handle its proper share of the export traffic originating in, and the import traffic destined to, western Canada.

The object of this body is, I think, to co-operate with my hon. friend and to reciprocate in regard to his invitation to the west to try to make further use of this new outlet, they passed a number of resolutions. As this letter is dated only January 16, I was wondering whether the minister had had time yet to consider the matter. The minister knows one shipment of cattle has gone out via Churchill even with the very poor loading facilities there. I understand there are no modern facilities for bringing coal in by the bay route. A little memorandum attached to the resolution indicates what an interminable time it took to unload coal from the Pennyworth. As regards Churchill coal handling facilities, the resolution reads:

That in order to secure fair and reasonable ocean rates on export grain it is essential that every effort be made to provide coal and all other westbound cargo for ships trading to Churchill.

The attached memorandum reads:

The conference is aware of the time consumed in discharging only 1,000 tons of coal from the Pennyworth last August—five and one-half working days, or less than 200 tons per day—and it is, therefore, obvious that no vessel owner would quote reasonable ocean rates on coal unless assured of proper dispatch, which evidently is not obtainable at present. It is, of course, also a fact that Churchill is the only port in the world without proper coal handling facilities.

I was wondering what the chances were for some of those facilities being provided. Of course, we know Rome was not built in a day, but time is dragging along and it has taken about fifty years to obtain this northern outlet, so that everything in reason should be done to facilitate trade coming in and going out of it. Cattle yards and coal handling facilities are asked for in addition to a request, about which the minister may have heard something, for a storage warehouse to be established at The Pas. The reason given in that connection is that it is to facilitate trade via that route. What hope has my hon. friend held out or has he held out any to Mr. Smith, or can he hold out any hope to us that some of these very necessary facilities will be provided in the reasonably near future?

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. MANION: I am glad to say that I can hold out more than hope, because at least some of the things that Mr. Smith suggests have already been done.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What are they?

Mr. MANION: I shall deal with them seriatim. I have his letter before me and have looked into it pretty thoroughly; I was already aware of some of the requirements.

As regards coal, the resolution which the hon. gentleman read covers that, and Mr. Smith, to put the matter briefly, suggests that we put in a completely up-to-date coal handling plant. To do that would cost about $300,000. At Churchill we have a coal handling plant, a locomotive crane type of machine, which cost us, in round figures, about $50,000. It is true it is not a particularly up-to-date method, but when one remembers that the only coal that has so far come in to Churchill was taken there by ourselves, this does not encourage one to think of spending $300,000 at this time and I cannot say that we are even considering it. I mentioned this in part a few moments ago: The first year when two ships came in there, one or other or both had some coal that the captain of the ship wished to get rid of because he wanted to have more room for outgoing wheat. To help him, we took this coal, amounting to about 500 tons, off his hands. That was in 1931. No coal was taken off in 1932 and last year we again took about 1,100 tons of British coal, the reason being that it was a very high type and one of the two dredges which we had there we were shipping around into the St. Lawrence basin in order to transfer it to the Department of Marine. We have done this because we have no need for two dredges at Churchill at present. Those two shipments of 500 tons in 1931 and about 1,100 tons last year, or 1,600 tons in all, which would make perhaps one-third of a cargo, constitute nearly all the coal that has been unloaded at Churchill and we took it there ourselves. Naturally, my hon. friend who is usually reasonable must realize that we would not be justified on that basis, since we already have a coal handling plant there, in spending at the present time some $300,000 on an up-to-date plant.

Any ships coming in there now can be unloaded by the plant we have. It is true it does not unload as fast as a modern plant would do, but in going into the matter some time ago with my officers I found that the slowness of the unloading was due rather to the construction of the ships that come in there than to the plant itself. The keel of the ship has a shaft tunnel where the coal sits upon it in such a way that the lower part of the coal has to be taken out by hand. It cannot be taken out by the clamshell type of coal handling plant and consequently it has to be shovelled into buckets, so that the slowness is largely due to the construction of the ships themselves and not to the plant. This may be of interest and it may be questioned by some of the people who wish to ship in coal; it may be questioned by Mr. Smith and some of his associates.

As I have already mentioned, we were told by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that 200 head of cattle were handled out of Churchill and they were handled in the ordinary way. It is true we have not any pens at that port, but in this estimate we have a sum of $500 to construct pens there for 200 head. We also have pens at The Pas and Hudson Bay junction, so that we shall be in reasonably good shape to handle any cattle offered for shipment overseas.

Therefore I think, taking Mr. Smith's letter as a whole, we have already attended fairly well to his suggestions and I do not think the government, under present financial conditions, should be asked to move more rapidly than it has already done.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is quite satisfactory as far as it goes. Of course I did not know what answer my hon. friend had made to Mr. Smith or what he was including in the estimates, but the results of the cattle shipments were so satisfactory last year, I understand they netted the producers $10 per head more than they would have got elsewhere. That is very substantial these days when the price of cattle is so low. And they anticipate shipping about 4,000 head by that route, so that would justify this new expenditure.

In regard to coal, we cannot expect much coal to come that way if there is such long delay in handling it. It is true there may be something faulty in the ship, but there would be no traffic at all if there were no port or railway, and if the facilities are lacking that would hinder too. This organization is very active in trying to promote traffic by that route, and of course there is always a certain disposition to make sport of a new route, especially one that is seeking to get some traffic that now goes by other routes. That is the experience of all new routes; they have to hustle for their traffic and against many handicaps.

May I mention another resolution that I have? It was addressed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, if he does not mind my mentioning it on this estimate, lest we forget it on his. It is with respect to the interior terminal elevator at Saskatoon. I understand it is empty, and they are asking for certain storage conditions similar to what they get at Churchill, so that the wheat could be assembled at Saskatoon during the winter and be prepared to forward on to Churchill as soon as possible in the spring.

Mr. STEVENS: I will deal with that when my estimates are up.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The chances are we will forget it.

Mr. STEVENS: I am well acquainted with the point.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I mean I might forget it.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think there is any danger.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: At any rate that is good news about the cattle yards, because with all the disabilities of any new route, if they are helped by proper facilities and proper pens it will be a great encouragement to ship cattle that way, in addition to the $10 extra they get.

Before I sit down might I inquire what the chances are with respect to the insurance rates? That after all is the bugbear there. I do not know the exact rates by the bay route, but they were represented by the minister himself last year as being four or five times higher on grain than by the St. Lawrence route, and the rates on the St. Lawrence are high compared with those for Atlantic ports to the south. So when you consider that these insurance rates are four or five times as high as on the St. Lawrence and the rates on the St. Lawrence higher again than the ports farther south, it is a marvel to me that anything goes out or comes in by the Churchill route at all. Something surely could be done, now that there have been no more Bright Fans looking around for icebergs to nose into, as I think we have lived that down. There is at any rate always lots of deep water by the Hudson bay route; the straits are sixty to one hundred miles wide and not quite that deep, but there is no danger as regards depth of water. The same thing is true in entering Churchill; there is abundance of water even at low tide and abundance of shelter when you are in the harbour. There is no earthly reason that I can see why there should be such ghastly insurance rates by the bay route after at least two years of trial. I fear that until something is done in the way of the government carrying part of that insurance or the establishing of a national marine insurance branch in the marine department, not for that port alone but for all the ports of Canada and doing it at cost, they will all suffer. I do not know about the Pacific coast, but at any rate the St. Lawrence and bay routes are handicapped as compared with the Atlantic ports further south. There is no disability that I know of on the Pacific coast; it is open the whole year round, and like Hudson bay has ample depth of water, and first-class ports. So I urge on my hon. friend that he do not cease from his labours in trying to secure better insurance rates on goods coming into and going out of Churchill. I understand that the provincial government at Regina has succeeded in getting reduced rates from a certain company—I do not know which it is; I got it from the newspapers. I do not know the extent of the reduction, but if a province can succeed in doing something along this line, surely with the larger authority of the federal minister he could do more in the same direction.

Mr. MANION: I think the hon. gentleman was not in his seat when I dealt elaborately with the insurance question. I did point out that a great deal of work has been done and that the rate has been lowered.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I had to go upstairs for this correspondence; I am sorry.

Mr. MANION: I will say it briefly again. A great deal of work has been done. In 1931 the rate was 2 per cent on cargo; last year it was only 1¼ per cent, so that it has been cut nearly fifty per cent, largely through the efforts of the marine department, dealing with the imperial shipping committee, and my own department pressing it upon Hon. Howard Ferguson. Both the government and those associated with the government in that regard have worked energetically to get insurance rates cut, and have succeeded. Without doubt as traffic at Churchill increases the rates will come down; but we are not neglecting it, we are pressing it on every possible occasion. For example I have in my hand figures as to a cargo from Montreal and from Churchill, showing that on a cargo of say 300,000 bushels of grain worth 75 cents a bushel the insurance out of Churchill would be a little over $11,000 whereas out of Montreal it would be just under $2,000. That agrees with the figures I gave a few moments ago, Churchill about five times as high; but of course on the other hand Churchill has a very heavy advantage over Montreal in that the rail haul to Churchill is very much shorter. The matter of marine insurance rates is not in the control of the government, but the government is making every possible effort, both my own department and the Department of Marine, to have these rates, and freight rates too for that matter, reduced, and without doubt they will be reduced gradually, as they have already been, in accordance with the increase of traffic from the port.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. STITT (Nelson): I might take a few minutes to enlighten some hon. members on the situation at Churchill. Some question was raised about the length of the season. May I say that the season at present taken as being the navigation season is that set by the marine insurance underwriters at London, not the actual season prevailing at Churchill. The underwriters say a boat must pass out of the straits before October 15. There has only been one attempt on the part of this government to make any investigation into ice conditions in Hudson bay or straits. That was in 1927 and 1928, when the late government—I give them credit for it—sent a fleet of airplanes there and established three bases in the straits, known as bases A, B and C. Instructions were given to fly the straits every day that was fit for flying and gather data. I think we are justified in accepting their statements as being at least something towards an accurate representation of ice conditions in the straits, and from their observations I take the following particulars:

Ice first reported, 1927

Base "B"	Base "C"	Base "A"
Nov. 16, 1927	Dec. 3, 1927	Nov. 30, 1927

Ice first reported, 1928

Base "B"	Base "C"	Base "A"
Nov. 15, 1928	Nov. 28, 1928	Dec. 9, 1928

In spite of this our friends in the old country tell us that boats must be out of the straits on or before October 15. Many captains and other men who know those northern waters, men who are not making guesses—I name only one, Captain Bernier—do not hesitate to say that the season is much longer than the underwriters allow. The point I want to make is that no real investigation has ever been made in late fall and when anyone says that the navigation season at Churchill is from the 7th of August to the 15th of October he is simply using the dates set by the marine underwriters in England, who do not know much more about it than a lot of hon. gentlemen in this house.

Mr. HOWDEN: May I ask when the ice forms in the bay at Churchill?

Mr. STITT (Nelson): An icebreaker could keep the port of Churchill open for perhaps two or three weeks longer than it is open to-day. That is being done in other parts of Canada; you only have to refer to the estimates to see how much is being spent for icebreakers on the St. Lawrence. I am not going into that, however. I think it is safe to assume that Churchill could operate until December 1, and I hope that further investigations will be undertaken. The department keeps a boat in the straits to aid vessels during the navigation season; it is one of the best boats we have, the N. B. McLean, but as soon as the last boat goes out through the straits the McLean is called back to the St. Lawrence, so no investigation is carried on after that date. The only data the government have is from those two years for November and December, and I hope they will carry on their investigations in the future.

With regard to the insurance rates, the minister covered the situation with regard to the discrepancies between Churchill and Montreal. With regard to the advantages of Churchill, I may say that it is approximately the same distance from Churchill to Liverpool as it is from Halifax to Liverpool, and we all know the difficulties that ships experience in going down that long, tortuous St. Lawrence river. The Pennyworth was mentioned by the minister, who said there was some hope of her coming to Churchill next year. I want to disabuse his mind on that score. The Pennyworth, after making two trips to Churchill, piled up on the Isle of Orleans in the St. Lawrence and was a total loss. When in Churchill the captain made it clear to all that he would very much prefer to go to Churchill than to Montreal. The last boat that carried cattle, the Brandon, made two trips, and the captain stated to me that he could easily make three trips to Churchill in a season, and intended to do so next year if he could get a cargo. That was the last boat out. The Brandon is owned by one of the largest shipping companies in Scotland, but that boat did not carry a penny of insurance on the hull. Yet the captain made two trips and said he hoped to make three trips next year; that is how much he is worrying about the terrors of Hudson bay.

In regard to the cattle I have a statement from the Saskatchewan Co-Operative Livestock Producers Ltd., which may be of interest. It is signed by J. C. Hackney, and states:

> The average net return to the producers around Prince Albert from the "Brandon" shipment was $31 per head. Some of the heavier cattle which were well fleshed brought the higher net returns, in some cases being as high as $36, $37 or $38 per head. Some of the lighter, good quality, feeder cattle brought slightly below $31 per head, no doubt because they were not ready for killing on arrival. Knowing the prices at the Winnipeg market when the cattle were shipped, and also at the time the returns were received for these cattle, we are quite safe in saying that the producers at Prince Albert received $10 per head more than they would have received had the cattle been sold on the Winnipeg market at that time. Some of them would not have realized over $16 or $17 apiece at the Winnipeg market.

So there is quite an advantage in shipping cattle by that route. Just developing that point a little further, someone asked about comparative rates, and I am going to give them. I know my hon. friends from the east do not like it, but they are going to get them anyway. Here are the comparative rates as between Montreal and Churchill on cattle:

From—	To Montreal	To Churchill
Union Stock Yards, St. Boniface	$170	$116
Brandon	176	112
Swan River	202	94
Yorkton	202	96
Prince Albert	227	100
North Battleford	227	108
Saskatoon	225	102
Regina	214	104
Moose Jaw	221	108
Edmonton	229	126
Calgary	229	132

I think those figures speak for themselves.

Mr. MANION: Were those rates for cars of cattle?

Mr. STITT (Nelson): Yes, the rate per car of 20,000 pounds.

Mr. McGIBBON: Just for my own information, could my hon. friend give the rates from these respective points to Liverpool?

Mr. STITT (Nelson): The shipping rate is on the basis of so much per head, and I do not know just how the rates compare out of Montreal. Last year they had distress rates in Montreal, and when steamships are carrying cargoes at less than cost you cannot get a fair comparison. That is what nearly wrecked Churchill last summer. Just when the season opened in Churchill, for some reason the shippers on the great lakes reduced their rate from the head of the lakes to Montreal to 3½ cents per bushel, although some of the presidents and general managers of the shipping companies had stated under oath that the bare cost was 6 cents a bushel and that the average cost of carrying grain from the head of the lakes to Montreal for the last ten years was 8 cents.

Mr. HOWDEN: May I ask how that shipment of cattle stood the journey?

Mr. STITT (Nelson): They arrived in the old country in first class condition and were sold at the dock right off the boat. I do not think anyone in western Canada would be guillible enough to believe that the distress rates now existing in Montreal, which wrecked that route last summer by charging less than cost to carry grain, are going to remain in force. There is no doubt that the rate on the great lakes will go back to 8, 10 or 12 cents, so I hope the farmers of the west will not be misled by the low rates which were in force last year. I notice also that the directors of the Saskatchewan pool have instructed the pool management to use the port of Churchill even if at times it is cheaper to ship via the great lakes, when freight rates on the lakes are very low, as they were in 1933, which condition the pool and other grain firms recognize as extraordinary and unusual. At present the pool, according to Mr. Gibson, one of the officials in Winnipeg, intends to ship at least 4,000,000 bushels through Churchill in 1934. They have 2,000,000 bushels stored at Churchill now. Mr. Brunswick, manager for Dreyfus in Winnipeg, is at present in New York trying to interest the Dreyfus office there in asking the government to build 2,000,000 bushels storage at Churchill, which they would lease for a long term. The Continental Grain Company are equally interested, and these are the two companies that shipped all the grain out of Churchill in the first two years of its existence. Only last year did the Saskatchewan pool become interested. I sincerely hope the pool will continue to use Churchill, because they represent the people who have been shouting for this route for the last fifty years, and if they are not willing to use it I do not know where else we are going to look for traffic. The facilities are there; they are the very best that money can buy. The port is admirably managed; everything possible is done for those who come there, and I am quite sure that this practice will continue. I hope that in the very near future the government will find it necessary to organize a proper port commission or appoint a manager there who will be given full charge of the port.

May I say in conclusion that in my opinion the best way to get the insurance rates lowered is to have the people interested in this route use it. A large volume of traffic and a low loss ratio will do more to bring down the rates than anything else on the face of the earth, and I sincerely hope all the western members will do their part in trying to interest their people in that route, because it means the economic salvation of western Canada.

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to delay my own estimates, but I should like to say a word in reply to my hon. friend. He has been a very enthusiastic supporter of this route; in that I am glad to encourage him and to agree with him, but when he makes the statement that since 1927 or 1928 the government has made no investigation into ice conditions, I must disagree. As a matter of fact, investigations into ice conditions have been going on since 1926, and every year we are spending out of our estimates from $25,000 to $50,000 in connection with the investigation of ice conditions. I have asked my deputy and my engineer to give me some information as to how much the Department of Marine, which operates the N.B. McLean, a very fine icebreaking steamship, spends for the same purpose. They estimate that the Department of Marine spends probably $200,000 per year. So, if the figures for the Department of Marine and my department are correct, it would appear that since 1926 we have spent yearly something like $200,000 or $250,000 investigating ice conditions. I say that to my hon. friend because I wish him to have his information absolutely watertight, as apparently he had not before. I presume his reference was to—

Mr. STITT (Nelson): I referred to late fall and winter investigations.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend is not correct there, because we make a late fall investigation. In fact, in a minute or two I will give him the actual dates when it was considered impossible for ships to go out. We spent from $25,000 to $50,000 upon the Ocean Eagle. The ship of the Marine department is the steamship N.B. McLean. Both ships conduct a very thorough investigation each year. They are endeavouring to get and have been successful in getting data which is of great use to the port. The hon. member was rather severe in his statement concerning my remarks a little while ago as to dates. I knew I would probably get into trouble, but I do not think it is wise to exaggerate in favour of Hudson bay. I certainly am only endeavouring to give the facts, and I suggest, not only to my hon. friend but to any other hon. member in any part of the house, that he will not do any service to Hudson bay, to the port of Churchill or to the Hudson bay route by making statements which are not in accordance with the facts. Of course, I am not attempting to suggest that my hon. friend did so intentionally, but I wish to point out that according to my officers we have had ships stuck in the ice and unable to get out on August 6. So when I gave the dates of August 8 and October 9, I was fair. I gave a date two days later than a date in one season when a ship was stuck in the ice.

One of the important points about the port of Churchill is that it does not matter whether it is Hudson strait, or the harbour itself which freezes up or gets blocked. If you can get through the channel of Hudson strait and cannot get into the harbour your ship is of no use to you. If you can get out of the harbour but cannot get through the strait, again your ship is of no use to you. Your success in navigation depends on the ice condition in both places.

Mr. McINTOSH: An icebreaker could handle the harbour, could it not?

Mr. MANION: To a certain extent, for a few days. But when freezing begins it freezes up rapidly. I have read a number of reports coming down year after year, and I have learned that once it begins to freeze it freezes rapidly. No doubt it could be kept open a certain length of time if we were sure when the season would end. The dates given to me show that the harbour opens about June 15 and closes about October 20, but ice coming down from Fox channel and Hudson strait blocks the other end. The report of George Kydd, the engineer on the ground, states that in 1933 the following was the condition: "On October 22, the river is full of ice." Remember, that is on October 22. Then, on October 10, 1932, he said, "Ice down the river this morning." In 1931, it was October 31 before the ice blocked, and in 1930 it was October 20. I give those figures from the reports the engineer and the deputy have at hand. I had an opportunity to read from them when the hon. member for Nelson was speaking.

I have no desire to give anything but the facts. I do hope the hon. member will bear in mind that between the departments of Marine and Railways and Canals $200,000 to $250,000 is being spent each year in an endeavour to get data. In addition to that it must be remembered that ships are looking for cargoes, and particularly in these days when ships are selling for almost nothing. There is no doubt that men like Mr. Dalgleish, with whom I had the pleasure of crossing the ocean upon my recent trip, are only too anxious to get their ships in there at the earliest possible moment. Mr. Dalgleish is a very fine old ship owner, a man who has handled ships all his life.

Information I have before me shows that last year the Pennyworth was the first ship in on August 13, and that the last ship departed on October 2. I believe that a conservative effort is being made—and I am not speaking politically—by this government, and a conservative effort was made by the late government, to give everything in the shape of a fair deal to the Churchill route. I believe all parts of the country may rest assured that, having in view the pressure from the western provinces, and particularly Manitoba and Saskatchewan, any government will endeavour to give a fair deal to that route. Certainly it is our desire, and I believe it was that of the late government to do likewise. The only point is that I think we should be given a little more credit probably, for what has been done. Certain people, perhaps for political reasons and perhaps for others—certainly not for political reasons in the case of my hon. friend—have belittled the efforts that have been made. I repeat we are making every effort to give the port a very fair deal, and with the improvement in world business, which we all hope has begun, I am sincerely hoping that next year Churchill will have a much greater amount of traffic than it had last year.

Mr. REID: I should like to have a little more information on freight rates. During the course of his remarks I believe the minister gave the rate of 3s. 9d. out of Churchill as against 1s. 6d. out of Montreal. I believe those are the figures he gave. The implication was that wheat was being landed as cheaply in the old country through the port of Churchill as it could be through other ports, particularly Montreal. My point is this: I should like to know the freight rates by rail, and as to whether or not the Dominion government sets that rail rate. It appears to me that rates must be very low if 3s. 9d. is the rate by boat and 1s. 6d. through Montreal.

Mr. MANION: The rate I was giving was the water rate. In quoting 3s. 9d. from Churchill as against 1s. 6d. from Montreal the hon. member was quoting the rate I gave for 1931. The rates through Churchill have gone down since then. In 1933 the rates through Churchill are 2s. 6d. and 2s. 9d. against the rate of 1s. 3d. to 1s. 9d. through Montreal. It is about half. In 1931, the rates from Montreal were just a little less than a third of the rates from Churchill. But last year the rate from Montreal was just half of that from Churchill. It is indicated therefore that Churchill has been gaining.

My hon. friend asked a further question concerning railway rates. Of course, the government has not anything to do with that. Railway rates to Churchill have been put on exactly the same basis as railway rates to other parts, from the grain growing sections of the west. They are the Crowsnest rates established at Churchill, just as they have been established to the head of the lakes and west to Vancouver.

Mr. DONNELLY: Is the rate per hundred pounds?

Mr. MANION: It is per quarter.

Mr. BRADETTE Speaking of a comparison of shipping insurance rates from Churchill and Montreal can the minister tell us if during the last three years there has been a decrease in the shipping navigation rates between Montreal and the head of the lakes. I have in mind an article which appeared in some of the newspapers last fall to the effect that certain interests were trying to paralyze the activities at Churchill by lowering the navigation rates from the head of the lakes to Montreal.

Mr. MANION: Without a doubt the rates during the last couple of years from the head of the lakes to Montreal have been exceedingly low. One cargo in fact went down from the head of the lakes to Montreal for 2¾ cents a bushel, an almost unprecedentedly low rate. But that was only one cargo. Many cargoes, however, went down for 3½ cents. The average for the season last year, as I stated in the debate on tolls for canals the other evening, was something under five cents a bushel from the head of the lakes to Montreal.

Referring to the second portion of my hon. friend's remarks, the low rate last year from the head of the lakes by water to Montreal would undoubtedly cut into Churchill, and into Vancouver to a certain extent because the lake route has advantages certainly over Churchill and possibly over Vancouver in that a shipload of grain coming down from the head of the lakes may stop at Port Colborne or go to Buffalo, continue to Montreal, or stop at Prescott, or be stored at Port Colborne or at Buffalo, and then shipped to New York or Montreal, perhaps get into some of the mills there or be shipped clear across the ocean. It is a route with many outlets, and that is one of the disadvantages that the Churchill route is up against, because once grain goes up to Churchill in the fall, when navigation is closed, it is tied up at Churchill until the following year and cannot get out either by water or by rail, for there would not be a haul back by rail, whereas grain coming down from the head of the lakes to Montreal has many outlets by rail at any season of the year, and many different routes by which it may go by water. I do not think it probable that the low rates of last year from the head of the lakes to Montreal will continue indefinitely because it is not likely that the shipping interests will permit operation at such a low rate, but if those low rates did remain, they would undoubtedly cut into the business going out of Churchill, and out of Vancouver to a certain extent.

Mr. DONNELLY: Does the wheat stored at Churchill during the winter months get a special rate or pay one-thirtieth of a cent per bushel a day?

Mr. MANION: I thought it was a lower rate than Montreal, but my deputy says that it is the same. At any rate it is a very low rate, one-ninetieth of a cent per bushel per day at Churchill, which is the lowest rate at any port in Canada, and a lower rate, as I read it here, than the Montreal rate. At all events it is equal to, if not lower than, the lowest rate in Canada.

Mr. DONNELLY: That is only for the winter months?

Mr. MANION: Yes, although we have been giving very low rates to encourage the port and give it a fair trial.

Mr. McINTOSH: There are three observations that I would like to make to the minister. One is as to giving credit where credit is due. That is a principle that I think is quite correct in public business and in private life. The minister paid tribute to the Hon. Howard Ferguson and to the Saskatchewan government for their services in building up public opinion in favour of the Hudson Bay route and business over that route. It seems to me that the very foundation of the development of traffic over the Hudson Bay railway and route from Saskatchewan to the markets of the old land and Europe has been largely the effective work done by the Saskatchewan traffic council. The council represents the boards of trade of the province, the boards of trade of Regina, Weyburn, Moose Jaw, Saskatoon, Prince Albert. Yorkton, North Battleford, Swift Current and other cities. This council, as I understand it, has organized the business men of Saskatchewan into a solid business unit for developing business for the Hudson Bay route.

This council is cooperating with the Saskatchewan government. As the minister has been handing out parliamentary bouquets this afternoon to Mr. Ferguson and the Saskatchewan government I think we ought also to hand out a parliamentary bouquet to the wheat pool, farmers and the business men of the province of Saskatchewan who are doing their best to develop traffic over the Hudson Bay route to the markets of the old world. Perhaps the minister after making reference to the two parties I have mentioned, will also give his support to the good work that is being done by the Saskatchewan traffic council, under the able leadership of Mr. Smith, who is an organizer of splendid ability.

Mr. MANION: I have no objection. I have no doubt that they have been doing good work. I am, however, not so familiar with their work. I remember that a year or so ago some of them called upon me in my office, and through that call I think Mr. Ireland was ultimately appointed by the government of Saskatchewan as traffic solicitor for the Hudson Bay route. I am very glad indeed to give credit where credit is due, but I did not know so much about the work of the council as I did about the work that Mr. Merkley and the Saskatchewan government were doing, and Mr. Howard Ferguson.

Mr. McINTOSH: I was quite sure that the minister would, as he has explained, give credit to the council and business men of Saskatchewan for the good work already accomplished. At the meeting of the traffic conference at Saskatoon last fall a representative of the Department of Trade and Commerce was present and I could readily see that not only the railway department but the Department of Trade and Commerce was quite anxious to further the work referred to.

There is another observation I wish to make namely, that with regard to the pledge that was made by the present government in 1930. I will quote just a line of it. It ran thus:

> We pledge ourselves to the improvement of the whole scheme of Canadian transportation northward by the completion of the Hudson Bay railway and the construction of such branches as may be necessary to render it most readily available to every part of Canada.

I do not know whether I should take advantage of this opportunity to say a word in connection with branch line development in northwest Saskatchewan as a link in the development of Hudson Bay traffic. I think I shall make a brief contribution on that subject at some other time. What I want to say now is that in reference to that pledge I asked the minister a question in the house on Friday, February 16, just a week ago today, concerning employment at Fort Churchill. My question was this:

> I have a question to direct to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion). It is directly connected with possible port development at Churchill this summer. Many unemployed men in northern Saskatchewan are anxious to obtain work at Churchill. Can the minister make a statement that will clarify the situation regarding employment at Churchill during the next few months?

The minister very kindly answered:

> I will deal with that matter when the estimates are up. I think there will be plenty of time.

I was wondering if the minister was prepared to make any observations on that matter at the present moment.

Mr. MANION: Yes, and I am very glad that my hon. friend has brought it up because frankly I had forgotten. We have had in the past few years a large number of men at Churchill. Two years ago we had about six hundred of our own men, and last year about 350. In the coming year the number will naturally be considerably decreased. My hon. friend was speaking particularly of the North Battleford district?

Mr. McINTOSH: Northern Saskatchewan and especially the North Battleford business and farming area.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend must remember that Churchill is in the riding of the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Stitt). My hon. friend has been a member of this house for quite a number of years and he knows that where works are carried on in a particular riding the employees engaged are taken from that riding as much as possible, especially when there are large numbers of unemployed. I think that at least 300 out of the 340 came from the constituency of Nelson. In the coming year we do not expect to have the same number; last year we had from 300 to 350 while next year we will need only about 150. With the exception of a few trainmen who cannot be obtained in Nelson, the large proportion of employees were from that constituency. I think it is only right that that should be done as this has been the policy of all governments. We had to bring in grain elevator men who could not be supplied at Nelson. We brought in some men to work on the tugboats. A few of these men were brought from Nova Scotia, some from Quebec and some from Niagara Falls and other points on the great lakes. Most of the grain elevator men come from the head of the lakes. This is the largest grain centre in the world and best able to supply such men. Some came from Winnipeg. We have endeavoured to scatter this employment, but I repeat that it is only fair that when work is being carried on in a particular constituency, most of those employed should come from that locality, especially when there are a large number of unemployed.

Mr. McINTOSH: I thank the minister for his statement, but there is another observation I should like to make. This is based on a communication I received from the Hudson Bay Junction board of trade and has to do with a matter brought before this committee this afternoon, namely the building of a warehouse at The Pas. The letter reads in part as follows:

> A few weeks ago the Interprovincial Traffic Conference, meeting in Saskatoon, passed a resolution asking the Hudson Bay railway to build a warehouse at The Pas, Manitoba, for storing such goods as binder twine, wire fencing, et cetera, which would be imported by the bay route during the season and gradually sold throughout the balance of the year.
> There are two reasons why the government should not expend money on the proposed warehouse at The Pas.
> The first is that every pound of freight coming in by way of the bay to consumers on the prairies must pass through Hudson Bay Junction, which is ninety miles nearer the consummer than is The Pas. I need not labour this point, as it will be perfectly obvious to you that the nearer to the consumer the goods can be hauled in carload lots, the shorter distance the consumer will have to pay local freight rates; consequently, the more money he can save. A single instance—taking all factors into consideration, a merchant at Yorkton buying barbed wire in less than carload lots would save eight cents per hundredweight if the distribution were made from Hudson Bay Junction instead of The Pas. In varying degrees, the same thing is true of all commodities.
> The second reason is that there are already private companies interested in building such warehousing facilities in Hudson Bay Junction entirely at their own expense, and who are only deterred from doing so by the possibility that the government may be building in opposition to them at The Pas. Where wholesalers or others are prepared to make this expenditure, it would seem to be both unnecessary and inexcusable for the government to make it.

This letter is written by the secretary of the board of trade and is dated February 19, 1934. I have no desire to enter into any controversy between The Pas and Hudson Bay Junction in connection with the building of such a warehouse, nor do I wish to interfere in any way with the development of activities at The Pas, which is in the riding of the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Stitt), but I thought it would be wise to give the committee these facts in order that it may know any money spent at either place in the future may be spent wisely.

Mr. MANION: The railway is not likely to go into the storage warehouse business. At present there is a shed at Churchill measuring three hundred feet by one hundred and seventy-five feet and having a capacity of about 5,000 tons. Towards the end of the season this could be used for storage. At the present time no railway builds these storage warehouses.

Mr. DONNELLY: I was rather surprised at what the minister said with regard to the bringing in of coal. He stated that coal brought in to Churchill could compete only within 300 miles of that port. I should like to know if he was referring to soft coal or to Welsh anthracite. This latter coal is used in Winnipeg and I cannot see why it could not be brought in through Hudson bay and sent down to Winnipeg just as cheaply as from Montreal.

Mr. MANION: I was referring to old country coal. The figures I gave were not my own but were those compiled by experts. They state that British coal will not compete with Canadian coal beyond 300 to 350 miles south of Churchill. I am informed that coal can be taken up the lakes and shipped to Winnipeg at a rate cheaper than that which would apply to shipments via Churchill. It is a startling fact when one realizes that Winnipeg is about a thousand miles south and east from Churchill. That means a long rail haul, whereas coal being landed at the head of the lakes has a rail haul of only about 425 miles. It can be moved more cheaply from Montreal than it can around by Churchill.

Mr. DONNELLY: Practically all western cities are using American anthracite brought in through Fort William and the people on the prairies cannot understand why coal could not be brought in to Churchill just as cheaply as American coal can be brought in through Fort William.

Mr. MANION: American coal pays only about 17 cents per ton from the coal fields to the head of the lakes.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

SECOND READING

Bill No. 16, respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. Davies.

SUPPLY

RAILWAYS AND CANALS

The house again in committee of supply, Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

Railways and canals—chargeable to capital—Hudson Bay railway and terminals—construction and betterments (including E. B. Jost at $2,250), $550,000.

Mr. RALSTON: Is there at the present time any aerial service on Hudson bay particularly in connection with ice conditions?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): There is none at present and there has been none since 1928 or thereabouts.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister was asked this afternoon with regard to a small quantity of coal that came into Churchill. I understood him to say that this coal was transferred to the Department of Marine.

Mr. MANION: No. The first boat that came in during the first season had about 500 tons of coal which they wanted to get rid of.

Mr. RALSTON: Excess bunker coal.

Mr. MANION: Yes; we took that over from them. It was only 500 tons, and it did not make any particular difference. That was in 1931. Last year the Department of Railways and Canals transferred to the Department of Marine one of the dredges at Churchill and got credit for half its original cost. To transfer that dredge we needed a high B.T.U. coal because of the small space available therefor on the dredge and the tug; accordingly it was decided to use Welsh coal, so we took about 1,100 tons for that purpose. That is the only coal that has been brought in via Churchill.

Mr. RALSTON: The dredge and tug were taken from where to where?

Mr. MANION: From Churchill to the St. Lawrence river, to Gaspé.

Mr. RALSTON: Transferred to the Department of Marine?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: Can the minister give us the difference in price between coal laid down in Churchill and that laid down in Montreal?

Mr. MANION: We have not any prices. I thought my hon. friend meant Welsh as compared with western coal.

Mr. DONNELLY: What is the price of Welsh coal laid down in Churchill?

Mr. MANION: It costs us $6.80 laid down in Churchill.

Mr. RALSTON: Is that the coal which was used on the dredge and tug?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister spoke of the B.T.U. content of the coal; would it be 13,000 or more?

Mr. MANION: I am informed that the Welsh was 13,000 as compared with about 11,000 for western coal.

Mr. RALSTON: What about eastern coal?

Mr. MANION: No eastern coal has been brought up there. I should be very glad to get it; I would rather see eastern than Welsh or British coal. That would be a logical movement for coal, but there is no sign of it coming that way. Of course, ships coming in have been from the other side, from Britain, and if they had a cargo, they would bring it from over there. There is no sign of any maritime province coal being brought in. If we are to have competition with western coal I would rather have it with Canadian than British coal.

Mr. RALSTON: Perhaps I was not listening as I should have done this afternoon. Do I understand that cargoes of coal have come in?

Mr. MANION: None except what I mentioned just now.

Mr. RALSTON: And this Welsh coal that was used for the purpose of taking the dredge to Gaspé was some that had been bunkered?

Mr. MANION: No, it was brought in for this purpose: on account of the lower B.T.U.'s of western coal and the small space available for coal on the tug and dredge, we had to take coal with a high B.T.U. content. Therefore we got the Welsh for that purpose.

Mr. RALSTON: Was a cargo or just a small quantity brought in?

Mr. MANION: It amounted to 1,160 tons or thereabouts. It would not be a cargo, simply a partial cargo.

Mr. RALSTON: Just a small parcel ordered for shipment on some grain boat that was coming over?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. GERSHAW: Where will the men be hired who are to work in Churchill, and can any man who reaches Churchill get a job?

Mr. MANION: This year we shall require only about 150 men. Last year we had about 350 and the previous year, about 600. This year, as so few are required and as there is great unemployment in the town of The Pas, it was decided that in all probability 95 per cent of them would come from that district, the other five per cent being made up of a few trained men for special tugboat or grain elevator work.

Mr. RALSTON: I should like to get an exact idea about the importations of coal via Churchill. Do I understand that the only coal which has been brought in is this 1,100 ton parcel, plus a parcel of about 500 tons left over in Churchill?

Mr. MANION: That is right.

Mr. RALSTON: The rest of the coal used there has been western?

Mr. MANION: That is correct. We use about 5,000 tons a year of coal from the west.

Mr. RALSTON: Lignite or bituminous?

Mr. MANION: Bituminous.

Mr. RALSTON: Has the department looked into the question of cost of bringing maritime coal in there?

Mr. MANION: I am informed that we have no figures. I did not know that we had looked into it at all. It would be a matter of some steamship that might be in the St. Lawrence taking on a load and bringing it around to Churchill.

Mr. RALSTON: Not necessarily the St. Lawrence.

Mr. MANION: No, but in the martimes and the St. Lawrence; in some of our Canadian ports. It is not likely that a British ship would come across and pick up coal there.

Mr. RALSTON: Is there any traffic at all between either the St. Lawrence or Nova Scotia and Churchill?

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. MANION: There has been only the Hudson bay steamer, the Nascopie, which goes around annually. A year or so ago a small boat was taken in by Bishop Turquetil for his own use. There has been no local traffic. There have been one or two ships from Montreal that have come into Churchill, taken a cargo and gone back to Montreal, but there has really been no traffic between the two sections.

Mr. VENIOT: Supplies have also been taken in by water from Halifax.

Mr. MANION: That is quite right, but the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth asked as to the traffic. There have been no cargoes beyond a few taken in at the time of the original construction, some to Port Nelson and the others to Churchill. But at the present time practically everything comes by rail from The Pas.

Mr. RALSTON: Is the situation such that all the supplies necessary can be got from the west, that there is no need of the department bringing up supplies say from the maritime provinces or the St. Lawrence?

Mr. MANION: No, we get everything from the west.

Mr. RALSTON: So there is no prospect at the present time of having any steamers run from the maritimes or the St. Lawrence, as far as the departmental work is concerned?

Mr. MANION: No, not as far as the departmental work is concerned.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): Has any one in the maritime provinces endeavoured to create trade through Churchill from the maritimes?

Mr. MANION: Not that I know of, but I presume that is a matter that would be gladly gone into by maritime province interests if they had the opportunity. The traffic has been very light. The only outward traffic has been grain, with the exception of a cargo and a half of general freight that went in, and one cargo of cattle and a few other commodities that came out.

Mr. VALLANCE: This afternoon there was some discussion on this item regarding the operation of the elevator at Churchill. I would like to ask the minister if he has the information at hand as to how many men were engaged at the elevator last year to handle the volume of grain he mentioned. While the minister's assistant is looking that up I would like to ask if they are affected by the ten per cent cut as government employees?

Mr. MANION: Those employed the year round would be affected.

Mr. VALLANCE: How many would that be?

Mr. MANION: It is being looked up.

Mr. HEENAN: The point that is brought out now takes us back pretty much to where we were the other evening when discussing the principle of the ten per cent cut. I hardly think it is fair that the minister should ask us to vote on an item in which is included salaries or wages. Items involving the ten per cent deduction were allowed to stand the other night, the minister was very decent about it, but now we are asked to pass on an item such as the house and the minister himself previously decided should be allowed to stand.

Mr. MANION: First I will answer the question of the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance). Thirty-seven is the number.

In regard to the statement of my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan), I admit that that was brought up the other night, but none of the other three items that were dealt with to-day included any employees. They were surveys and inspections, printing and stationery, and pensions on the Prince Edward Island Railway. This of course takes in, in addition to the temporary men working there during the summer, some year round men. But I cannot see what difference it makes, because the question of the ten per cent will be decided as a whole, and even if an item carries at the present moment in which there may be a few employees who would be affected, they will be treated exactly the same when the time comes as those who come under the civil government estimates.

Last year when this question arose no item was held up except the civil government estimates. We went on and dealt with all such items as this. With all respect I suggest that we should do exactly the same this year. When the question whether or not there is to be a cut is finally settled, certainly if this item should be carried to-night these men will not be in any different position from others where the item has not been carried. I should not agree to my department being treated differently from any other. I submit with all respect that there is no reason for holding up the business of the house because of this. I will agree that we should do exactly as was done last year—not deal with any item of civil government. I think that is a good precedent.

Mr. HEENAN: Can the minister give us any idea when the government contemplates bringing in some measure on which that matter will be decided? We want to be as accommodating as possible. I think the minister is very reasonable in his request, nevertheless when we pass one item we are passing on a principle. Speaking for myself, as the minister would say, I think we might do as he suggests, but really the house should know something about what is contemplated, rather than just go on promiscuously passing one item and another affecting thirty men here and ten there. These are the items on which I personally detest voting this cut even more than to the civil service generally, because here we have thirty, forty and fifty cents an hour men, and we are passing these items but holding up those that perhaps involve $6,000 or $8,000 a year men. I think the minister will realize the predicament that puts the opposition in. I want to facilitate the business of the house as much as I can—

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, if my colleague does not object, might I say with all deference to my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River that I do not subscribe to his point of view that the situation is such as to place the opposition in a predicament. We have naturally and I think properly yielded to their request not to proceed with civil government items involving the ten per cent cut. Coming to the other items, if you follow that idea in its ramifications there are very few votes that we could pass at all, and very little supply we could deal with. I submit to my hon. friend that in having protested against the ten per cent cut he is fully protected. He is not prejudiced in the slightest degree by these items passing, for example the one under review at the moment. I will ask my hon. friend to believe me when I say that every hon. member on this side of the house is just as anxious that the ten per cent cut should not be made effective this year as is my hon. friend or any of his associates on that side. The sole determining factor as to whether the cut will or will not take place is the question of the revenue, and the longer we defer a decision the better are the chances of the civil service to have that ten per cent restored. I may say this, and I say it not as captious criticism but merely as a statement of fact, that the attitude of the opposition in forcing the government to come to a decision in order to make progress in the passing of the estimates is not serving a helpful purpose as far as assistance to the civil service in the restoration of the ten per cent cut is concerned. When the heads of the various civil service organizations met me last autumn I explained to them that it would be impossible to come to a decision then, and pointed out that inasmuch as we have to have the estimates prepared for parliament before a decision could be arrived at, we would have to set them up on the basis of a ten per cent cut. They quite understood the position and subscribed to it. I was to have a subsequent meeting with them, which will be in the very near future. Let me say this to my hon. friend that whatever action may be taken with respect to the ten per cent cut, it will have to be by specific legislation.

Mr. MANION: And it must be uniform.

Mr. RHODES: His position will not be prejudiced in the slightest degree if this item should pass in its present form.

Mr. HEENAN: I do not propose to cover the ground again with regard to the principle, and so on. After listening to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance and realizing, not only by his words but by the look on his face as well, that there is some hope of the civil service getting their full salaries again, I will let the matter go as long as I can.

Mr. VALLANCE: With all due deference to the Minister of Finance, I do not think it is fair to place on us the responsibility for the civil service not being given back the ten per cent deduction this year. I do not think it is fair for the minister, in spite of the kindly manner in which he has broached the subject, to place us in that position.

Mr. RHODES: I do not wish to place any responsibility upon the opposition other than to indicate that to hasten a decision would lessen the likelihood of that decision being favourable. That was all I said; I did not mention responsibility, and I may say to my hon. friend that I absolve him from any anxiety with respect to any onus he may have to bear in that regard.

Mr. VALLANCE: That is not the point. I object to the fact that the minister suggests that if we hasten the decision it may jeopardize the chances of the civil service of getting back the ten per cent deduction.

Mr. RALSTON: As I understand it, Mr. Chairman, the decision will have to be made by the end of March, will it not?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, or before.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. RALSTON: And even if an adverse decision were reached, if the revenues became so abundant that the minister felt the cut could be withdrawn I think he would be able to do it although the first decision had been adverse. I do not think any decision can be made that cannot be recanted if the treasury allows the change to be made.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend appreciates the point. I think; if we are held up in proceeding with supply certainly that will have the effect of hastening a decision, but as I have already pointed out, we will have to have a bill this year in any event.

Mr. RALSTON: And before March 31.

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Canals—Trent canal—construction and betterments, $39,500.

Mr. MUNN: Would the minister explain this item?

Mr. MANION: This is for the construction of a supply weir and the raising of the head walls at Big Chute in the neighbourhood of the Georgian bay end of the Trent canal. This is an engineering work the details of which I am afraid I cannot go into, but it is necessary in connection with the power scheme on the Trent canal. I will read one little phrase here:

To correct the unsatisfactory conditions explained above it is proposed to construct a supply weir in the raceway of the commission's power house about 200 feet above the head gates, and to raise the existing permanent head walls to elevation 654, and connect them to the new weir.

Mr. MUNN: That is between the Severn river and Georgian bay?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: How much traffic was there on the canal last year?

Mr. MUNN: Would the minister give us the maintenance cost?

Mr. MANION: I will give that in just a moment. My hon. friend from Gloucester asked about the traffic. The only traffic on the Trent canal that amounts to anything consists of pleasure craft. There is very little freight of any kind; the traffic is pleasure craft almost entirely, motor boats and so on.

Mr. VENIOT: The government can afford to spend $39,500 on a canal for pleasure craft but it withdraws a vote of $25,000 which was to have helped the fishermen in my county.

Mr. MANION: In that regard may I suggest that if the Trent canal were something new I would sympathize with my hon. friend a good deal more, because certainly I sympathize with his fishermen. But as my hon. friend well knows the Trent canal has been in course of construction for very many years. It was started, I believe, some time prior to confederation, and now it is a case of either keeping the completed works in sufficiently good condition to permit pleasure craft to operate or of simply letting them fill in. We are in the same position with regard to the Rideau canal and one or two others. If we were thinking of building such a canal at the present time for the use of pleasure craft certainly I would support my hon. friend very strongly, but that is not the case. I must add that we have contractual obligations in regard to the hydro-electric development on the Trent canal, as we have on the Rideau and other canals, and incidentally this department obtains a revenue of almost $1,000,000 from hydraulic and other rentals, which is turned into the consolidated revenue fund. It is not mentioned in these estimates but it is an offset against the cost of operating the canals as a whole, which, including upkeep and repairs, amounts to $2,500,000 a year.

Mr. VENIOT: What part of this $39,500 is necessary to keep up the power system?

Mr. MANION: All this money is for engineering works for that purpose. There is an income from the Trent canal, from power, of about $90,000 a year.

Mr. MUNN: Did I understand the minister to say that the revenue from the Trent canal amounts to $1,000,000 a year?

Mr. MANION: No, that is from all the canals.

Mr. MUNN: How much from the Trent canal?

Mr. MANION: About $96,000 a year, mostly from power leases.

Mr. MUNN: I know the situation there fairly well, and I think the minister would be wise to carefully investigate the matter before this money is spent on capital account. I think it is a mistake to spend another dollar on the Trent canal. As I said two or three years ago, you can sit on the bank for a long time, and you will see no traffic except a pleasure boat going up or down once a week or once a month. I think it would be a mistake, at a time like this, to spend money on capital account in connection with that unfortunate undertaking.

Mr. MANION: May I assure my hon. friend that this will be attended to. The passing of an estimate does not necessarily mean that the money will be spent. Of the estimates that actually passed in this house last year we saved nearly $1,000,000; that amount was not spent. This matter has been thoroughly investigated, and I am informed by my engineers that it is necessary to fulfil our contractual obligations with companies getting the power from that canal, but if there should be any way of avoiding the necessity of spending the money I can assure my hon. friend that it will be done.

Mr. MUNN: To make sure there will be a chance of dodging this expenditure I would move that this item be reduced to $1. This is something we can very well get along without. We have too many irons in the fire now; we need the money for other purposes, and I think this is simply a waste of money.

Mr. MANION: I am sorry I cannot accept the amendment, because we require this work in view of contractual obligations.

Mr. RALSTON: Has the minister at hand what those contractual obligations are?

Mr. MANION: I will read the note that has been given to me. I do not like going into details of an engineering proposal, but here is the information:

The works at Big Chute were comprised in the contract for section No. 1 of the Severn division, and included the construction of a weir with head walls of sufficient height for a controlled navigation level above the weir of elevation 651.00. This elevation was fixed with due regard to the required head water level of the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission's development then in operation at Big Chute. When the work on the contract for section No. 1 was virtually closed down in 1919, nothing had been done on the construction of the supply weir, and head walls, partly permanent and partly temporary with top elevation 651.25 formed the only control of the fluctuating level above the commission's power house. The result has been that, with the varying load on the power plant, the existing head walls are from time to time over-topped with consequent flooding below, and during periods of heavy loads, the upper pool is drawn below the level that should be maintained for vessels approaching the department's Big Chute Marine railway.

I read the remainder of this report a minute ago. That is the explanation of the matter, and we are compelled by our contractual obligation with the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission to keep it in order.

Mr. RALSTON: That obligation was undertaken in 1919 was it not?

Mr. BENNETT: The engineer states it was about 1919.

Mr. RALSTON: Well then, does the minister really think there is any reason why the work should be done this year rather than next year? That is the point about which hon. members are concerned.

Mr. MANION: I do not presume to pass an opinion, but my engineer informs me that there is a danger of a collapse of the engineering work. It might last next year and the year after, but it might not. If one of those dams or other engineering works collapsed a great deal of injury might be done. That is the whole question. Of course, we might be fortunate enough to stave it off for another year or two, but, as a matter of fact, when considering the estimates this was one item which was discussed at length. I considered cutting it out, but my engineers urged it was absolutely necessary that it should remain. I did not like to take the responsibility of overruling their judgment.

Mr. MUNN: If the Hydro Electric are so keenly interested make them a present of the whole Trent canal.

Mr. MANION: They might not take it.

Mr. MUNN: We would be rid of an obligation, and would be doing something for the benefit of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. MANION: There are many things in Canada of which we would like to make presentations, but I am afraid they would not be considered acceptable gifts.

Mr. MUNN: Get rid of it. It is costing over $100,000 a year for maintenance of the Trent canal, and what do we get for it?—nothing.

Mr. LUCAS: Are there any figures to show what has been the total cost to the country of the Trent canal?

Mr. MANION: Yes, I have them. These figures may not be quite fair, but I have the totals added up from a time prior to confederation. From that date to the year 1879 the figure is $309,000. Then, from 1879 to 1931, inclusive, a period of about fifty years, the figure is $19,500,000. Then, there is an estimated cost for completion. Of course that is an estimate for the future; since we came into power we have not done anything towards completion. The estimated sum is $3,000,000 for completion through to the Georgian bay. The uncompleted portion extends about forty miles from Georgian bay, and it is not our intention, under present conditions, to complete the work through to the bay. However, over $19,000,000 has been spent between a date prior to confederation and to-day. At the present time the expenditures for staff and repairs amount to over $200,000 per year, while the revenue is about $96,000.

We must remember, of course, that one of the big industries in Canada to-day is the tourist traffic. Without doubt it has been of great importance. The figures show that last year Canada profited by the tourist trade to the exent of well over $100,000,000, and that even in a depressed year. To be fair, the Trent canal is a very popular tourist route for people coming from the other side particularly, and for many of our own people.

Mr. MUNN: How do they get in from the other side?

Mr. MANION: They leave at Trenton on lake Ontario and travel from there to within forty miles of Georgian bay.

Mr. MUNN: I protested two years ago, and I am protesting again against expenditures on this canal system. Before the capital expenditure is made I do hope the minister will make a careful investigation. If he can come back next session and tell us he has decided it was not necessary to make the expenditure, I shall be very happy.

Mr. MANION: In view of having cut down by nearly $1,000,000 last year it is quite possible we may do that.

Mr. VENIOT: As I understand the minister, the contractual obligations were undertaken in 1919 or thereabouts, and the work for which he is asking this amount is the construction of a weir and the raising of a head wall so as to control the head level. It appears at the present time that level is not controlled. The varying loads forced the water over the head wall, thereby causing some inconvenience below. That condition has existed for the last eight or nine years—

Mr. RALSTON: For fourteen years.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, from 1919, and I cannot see any great necessity for expending this money this year, especially under the conditions existing in Canada to-day and at a time when the government feels compelled to reduce expenditures on undertakings of greater importance to the public in general than this undertaking would be. The minister has said that the canal system is a great tourist highway. I agree with him that the tourist trade in Canada is of great benefit, but there is not one dollar of this item to be expended for the betterment of the canal for tourist purposes. It has now been made known that the expenditure is to meet a contractual obligation agreed upon in 1919. Yet from 1919 to 1934 not one dollar has been expended to meet the condition which has been prevailing through all these years. In face of the fact that the government feels it cannot expend money which has already been voted by parliament for the expansion of industry in Canada, it should not be spending this amount of money on the Trent valley canal towards the betterment of a condition which could exist for a number of years to come.

Mr. MUNN: I do not wish to delay the committee, but there is one further word I should like to say. It is well known that the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission have more power now than they need; they have far more than they know what to do with, and I would suggest to the minister that he should go to the commission and, if possible, get out of this contract. Make them a present of it.

Mr. BLAIR: I wonder if the minister can tell us how many boats were on that canal this year?

Mr. MANION: Although I have not the number of boats, I may tell the hon. member that there were 5,000 lockages.

Mr. RALSTON: What was the total tonnage?

Mr. MANION: They were only pleasure boats; we do not keep track of the tonnage.

Mr. RALSTON: I understand the minister to say that the expenditure of $39,500 will not increase the revenue-gaining capacity of the canal.

Mr. MANION: No.

Mr. RALSTON: Well then, the situation is that we have an expenditure of $200,000 for maintenance, repairs and so on, and a revenue of $96,000. We now have a proposal to make a capital expenditure of $39,500, without any increase in revenue. Could the minister give us a general outline of what the arrangement is with the Hydro Electric?

Mr. MANION: I am very sorry that my officers have not the information and I have not got it in my book. I am informed by the officers, however, as I was before the item was put in, that the matter is a contractual one and the damages that we might be sued for by the hydro might be very much in excess of any costs at the present time. I do not want to pretend that I am any more enthusiastic about this canal than my hon. friend over there or any other hon. gentleman, but Canada in its wisdom, or lack of it, has for the last sixty or seventy years been spending money on this Trent canal, as it has been spending money on the Rideau canal, and while an argument might well be made that neither of them should have been built, certainly from the economic standpoint, nevertheless they were built. I do not wish to use the tu quoque argument, but my hon. friends opposite carried on when they were in power just the same as we are doing. I am not responsible for the agreement.

Mr. MUNN: Why bring that up? We are talking about the future.

Mr. MANION: I bring it up because it happens to suit me to do so. My hon. friend sat over here for a number of years and I never heard him objecting then to this agreement.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: He was not here then.

Mr. MANION: Well, in previous years I do not remember the hon. gentleman making any particular objection to this expenditure.

Mr. REID: He did two years ago.

Mr. MANION: He could not have objected hard enough for me to remember. The late government—I am not saying this to justify our action to-day—carried on exactly the same as we are doing. When we were in opposition we sometimes used to ask why the Rideau canal and the Trent canal were kept going, but they were kept going, and we are keeping them going, and if our hon. friends opposite ever have the luck to get into power they probably will keep them going too. I do not like appealing for support of an item which is very difficult to defend, because I admit that the expenditure on that canal is very difficult to defend, but the canal is there and contractual obligations are in existence, and because it happens to be the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario it is none the less a contractual obligation. I have had a few deals with them, and from the standpoint of getting a settlement in the case of any dispute I have found them as hard a group to deal with as any private corporation. I do not wish to get into any lawsuit with the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario. I ask my hon. friends to let this item pass, and if we do not require to spend the money I shall be very glad indeed to see that it is not spent. I am no more anxious to spend it than any other hon. member. Last year, for instance, we held up the expenditure on nearly $1,000,000 worth of estimates passed by this house, and I shall not hesitate to hold up the expenditure on this if the money is not required to be spent.

Mr. RALSTON: I presume that in the past the expenditures that were made were capital expenditures. But I would point out that we are in a very different position to-day with regard to revenues from what we were a few years ago. Then we were not facing what will probably turn out to be a deficit of from $35,000,000 to $50,000,000 on current account. That makes a big difference, and that is why we should be all the more careful about spending money that we do not absolutely have to spend.

With regard to contractual obligations, as I understand it from the memorandum which the minister read, the obligation was not to the hydro, but the danger was on account of the inconvenience to boats of greater draft than could be accommodated if the water was run off over these head walls. That is different from a lawsuit for damages such as my hon. friend suggests might come from the hydro. My hon. friend has not the contract with him, but I would ask if he would be good enough to bring it down and lay it on the table or present it to the committee when his estimates are up again.

Mr. MANION: Very gladly.

Mr. MUNN: In the meantime let the item stand.

Mr. MANION: I have no particular objection because frankly I did not have as much information as I would wish to have.

Item stands.

Welland ship canal—construction and betterments, $250,000.

Mr. MITCHELL: Why the enormous difference in the expenditure this year as compared with last?

Mr. MANION: The chief reason is that we have built the canal. I did not intend to give my hon. friend a short answer, but the answer in brief is that the canal is finished. This amount of $250,000 is largely for cleaning up purposes, to deal with contractors, for instance, who have claims and may get judgments, and so on. Most of this sum, half of it at all events, is for the purpose of levelling off slopes where there have been landslides, and for trimming up fag ends. The canal was opened two years ago, and the work is practically finished. I shall be glad to give any other information but I think that covers the ground pretty well.

Item agreed to.

Canals—improvements, $211,500.

Mr. RALSTON: Is this an annual vote?

Mr. MANION: Yes, a general vote for improvements on the canals throughout the country. My hon. friend knows we have a very large number of canals, the Murray canal, the Carillon and Grenville canals, the Quebec canal, the Lachine canal, Ste. Anne's lock, the Soulanges canal, the Trent canal, the Welland ship canal—

Mr. RALSTON: And St. Peter's.

Mr. MANION: I forgot that.

Mr. MUNN: And the Rideau.

Mr. MANION: None of this expenditure is for the Rideau canal. It is for ordinary improvements.

Mr. RALSTON: Does it include repairs as well as improvements?

Mr. MANION: I will read the details. It is for the replacement of structures which, in the course of years, have become unstable, obsolete or beyond repair; the replacement of equipment which is worn out; the enlargement or realignment of navigation channels, where such improvements are warranted; the substitution of more permanent construction on works where maintenance of the existing structures involves abnormal costs; general improvements that are necessary for the proper protection of canal property or that will give a reasonable return for the amount expended.

Mr. RALSTON: What proportion of this is to be spent on the realignment and improvement of canal channels?

Mr. MANION: I should say almost none or very little at the present time.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous services—including salaries of experts employed temporarily, $33,500.

Mr. MANION: We dealt with this item the other evening for about an hour and a half—

Mr. RALSTON: Was there not an agreement that it should stand on account of the ten per cent cut?

Mr. MANION: It is in exactly the same position as the item we were dealing with a little while ago. We discussed it very fully the other evening, when I gave all the details down to the last cent, which appear on Hansard, but because of the objection which my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) has just mentioned, and which was made the other evening, the item was held up. But as the item was discussed very fully the other evening, and as I think we should treat all these items uniformly, I trust hon. gentlemen will let it pass so that it will be in exactly the same position as the other items.

Mr. HEENAN: I think I was one of those who took part in the discussion of this principle last week. If we are going to vote any items concerning the outside services, I do not see why we should hold up any particular one. We are passing item after item with regard to wages and then we are attempting to hold up one particular item. Personally, I am inclined to allow this item to go through, especially as the government has placed itself on record as saying that there is a possibility that the ten per cent deduction will be restored. In view of that statement, I am ready to withdraw my opposition.

Mr. MITCHELL: A question was raised the other day in connection with an engineer who was drawing $6,000 per year. I should like to know if he was subject to the ten per cent deduction.

Mr. MANION: He is not. He is hired by the month at a salary of $500 monthly, with an allowance of $800 for living expenses.

Mr. MITCHELL: Are labourers who are hired temporarily, say for 35 cents an hour, subject to the deduction?

Mr. MANION: Yes. An exception was made in the case of this engineer because we could not get him for any other figure. I explained the other evening that he was an outstanding engineer and we required one of that type for this work in connection with Beauharnois.

Mr. MITCHELL: That may be true; on the other hand we may have an outstanding labourer, an outstanding electrician, or even an outstanding minister of railways, but in each case he would be subject to the ten per cent deduction. I do not see why we should differentiate between an engineer and anyone else, regardless of what value his services may be considered to have. If I remember correctly, special legislation was passed to take care of judges and others in the employ of the government who could not be touched by the legislation in connection with the civil service in general.

Mr. MANION: I can assure my hon. friend that there was no discrimination. This gentleman was hired by the month; he is a temporary employee and this was the best arrangement we could make to get him. The man who had been employed previously was not considered capable of doing this work. We felt we had to have an exceptionally good engineer and we were able to get this gentleman. He stands very high in engineering circles and we thought we were doing pretty well to get him. That is the only answer I can make.

Item agreed to.

Canals, elevators and harbours—operation and maintenance, $2,400,000.

Mr. MANION: This is a large item but it covers the whole operation of the canals and elevators, including staff and repairs. There is the Port Colborne elevator, the Prescott elevator and the Churchill elevator and harbour. In this vote is included $1,454,000 for staff, which is largely permanent, and $945,000 for repairs of the canal system and elevators throughout the country.

Mr. RALSTON: This vote would include $200,000 for the Trent canal?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. VALLANCE: How does the minister propose to make this saving of $338,720?

Mr. MANION: If my hon. friend will remember, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) promised a reduction of $12,000,000 or $14,000,000. We all had to scrimp to do our share. For example, we were able to dispense with certain services. The bringing in of the Welland canal caused a temporary rise in expenses but after it is settled down and has completed the transition period from construction to operation, there will be a reduction in expenses. Various savings of this kind have been made.

Mr. VALLANCE: Could the minister give the committee the number of persons employed in the government operated elevators?

Mr. MANION: We operate only the Port Colborne, Prescott and Churchill elevators.

A few minutes ago I gave the number of men employed at Churchill as 37; I should imagine the total for the three elevators would be a little over 100.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Could the minister give us the revenue which would be an offset to this item?

Mr. MANION: In round figures, the revenue is just a little under $1,000,000. This revenue would not show in our figures, as it all goes into consolidated revenue.

Mr. RALSTON: How does that amount compare with the expenditures for the year ended March 31, 1934?

Mr. MANION: Of course there is still part of February and all of March, and it is a little difficult to give figures. If the discussion continues I shall endeavour to get the figures, but I cannot give them at the moment.

Mr. VALLANCE: Are the elevators operated by the government paying their operating costs?

Mr. MANION: The elevator at Port Colborne is, but those at Prescott and Churchill are not.

Mr. VALLANCE: To what extent is the government losing on the three elevators?

Mr. MANION: My officers tell me that they have not the total figures. I know that last year the elevator at Port Colborne was able to do a little better than meet operating expenses. It was one of its poor years, but it did fairly well. The revenue for the last two years was as follows:

1932-33

Churchill	$ 11,000
Port Colborne	201,000
Prescott	28,000

1933-34

Of course the year is not yet completed:

Churchill	$ 58,000
Port Colborne	148,000
Prescott	65,000

It will be seen that the revenues for Churchill and Prescott have risen some and those for Port Colborne have diminished because of the small quantity of grain that was handled last year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I presume the three elevators under my hon. friend's department are still under supervision of the board of grain commissioners?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. RALSTON: I should like to get an approximate idea how the $2,400,000 compares with what will be the expenditure for the year ending March 31, 1934.

Mr. MANION: The expenditure for last year is about $2,500,000, or about $200,000 less than the estimate last year and $100,000 more than the estimate for the coming year.

Mr. HEENAN: Let me ask this question again in order to make it quite clear: In a vote of this kind there must be a great deal for wages. In the event of the government deciding to do away with the ten per cent deduction, will these men get the benefit?

Mr. MANION: I can assure my hon. friend that I would not consider I was doing my duty in the department if that were not done. I would not agree to other departments, simply because they did not happen to have their estimates passed as early as mine, receiving different treatment from this one.

Mr. RALSTON: Is my hon. friend inserting that extra $100,000 in order to take it off later, or is there a prospect of increased business even in spite of the wheat agreement?

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend perhaps misunderstood me. I said that the estimate last year was $2,700,000 and the expenditure, about $2,500,000. This year the estimate is $2,400,000.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is there a possibility that the Prescott elevator will now be a little busier because of the completion of the Welland canal?

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend is quite right. It has been quite busy. The figures I gave showed a better return this last year than previously. We have had at least two or three private companies nibbling around, wishing they might rent it, but none of them has come through with an offer worthy of consideration. If they do, I should be very glad to unload it with some of the other things it has been suggested we might unload.

Mr. HANBURY: What profit was made in the operation of the Port Colborne elevator? The minister said there was a profit, but he did not give the figures.

Mr. MANION: The revenue for the Port Colborne elevator amounted to $148,000, and the expenditure was $95,000; that would be a profit of about $53,000.

Mr. HANBURY: Does the profit include any interest charges?

Mr. MANION: No.

Mr. HANBURY: What would be the investment in that elevator?

Mr. MANION: About $2,000,000 or $2,500,000.

Mr. HANBURY: No depreciation?

Mr. MANION: No; we keep the repairs in good shape. It has been a very active elevator until recently when the traffic has been decreasing throughout the country and a good deal of the grain has gone via the western route, which fact has cut in on the traffic via the east.

May I point out to my hon. friends that I did not touch the item of civil government that was held up last year.

Item agreed to.

TRADE AND COMMERCE

British and foreign news service, $15,000.

Mr. HANBURY: Will the minister please explain?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This is the usual vote to Reuter's news agency for sending, as they do, a regular dispatch service of commercial and public news to British papers. The appropriation has been less in the last two years than it has been over the preceding ten or twelve.

Mr. McINTOSH: What British papers are involved in this?

Mr. STEVENS: About seventy, I should say.

Mr. HANBURY: Is that just news from Canada or is it to Canada as well?

Mr. STEVENS: From Canada.

Item agreed to.

An act to place Canadian coal used in the manufacture of steel or iron on a basis of equality with imported coal, administration of, $600.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the minister tell us the number of tons of coal on which payment was made, or, to put it the other way, the amount that was paid on coal under this item?

Mr. STEVENS: The year is not of course complete, but prior to December 31 the figure was 65,680 tons and $77,000 was paid out.

Mr. RALSTON: For the previous year?

Mr. STEVENS: It was 118,783 tons and $58,797.

Mr. RALSTON: Was the rate higher for this year?

Mr. STEVENS: No; it will be observed that the companies cannot get their returns in promptly at the end of the year, and part of the last year is always carried on to the next, so that there is never an exact balance. The rate is the same, forty-nine and a half cents a ton.

Mr. REID: Do any of the plants in the west receive the benefit of that?

Mr. STEVENS: There are no plants in the west using coal.

Item agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS: The next item I was going to call is the Canada Grain Act, unless hon. members opposite would prefer it to be held over.

Mr. VALLANCE: In view of the question asked by the hon. member for Weyburn yesterday and the reply given by the Prime Minister, and in view of the fact that the whole wheat agreement might be discussed on this item, might I suggest to the minister that it be allowed to stand?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, administration of, $750.

Mr. HEENAN: Has there been any change in policy recently with respect to granting licences for exportation?

Mr. STEVENS: No change in policy.

Mr. HEENAN: I understand the policy is that new licences are not granted except on request of the province in which the electricity is being developed.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not a new policy; we have been following that for several years.

Mr. HEENAN: But that is the policy?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes; we are still observing it.

Mr. HEENAN: Under that policy have any new licences been granted in the last two years?

Mr. STEVENS: I am informed that no new licences have been granted.

Item agreed to.

Exhibitions and fairs, $129,244.

Mr. McINTOSH: Will the minister kindly explain this item?

Mr. STEVENS: This item is for a series of small exhibitions and fairs and exhibits in private shops and so forth scattered all over Great Britain and taking place throughout the year. For instance there is Canada week, carried on in a large number of centres from time to time. We usually try to put on one week a year, in which case the windows of shops are decorated with Canadian goods and Canadian illustrations and advertisements. Then of course there are certain exhibitions in the British Isles generally at which, as a rule, we have regular exhibits.

Mr. McINTOSH: Are the exhibitions and fairs to which this item relates only in the British Isles, or do they extend into the European area?

Mr. STEVENS: Last year, of course, we had the exhibition at Chicago. Occasionally there are exhibitions in other countries that we patronize, but at present there are none in contemplation. It is possible that during the year some exhibition on the continent might look very attractive to us and a small part of the vote be used for it. Usually when there is a large exhibition on the continent or in a foreign country, like that in the Argentine a few years ago for instance, a special vote is provided.

Mr. McINTOSH: May I ask if part of this vote is used for newspaper publicity?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. VALLANCE: How many fairs of this type were there in the past year?

Mr. STEVENS: I have not a list of the fairs. It is handled from London. There was one at Birmingham and one in London.

Mr. VALLANCE: It is all right; never mind.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): This vote involves a considerable sum of money, I was wondering what value it has from an employment standpoint. How many people are employed one way and another under this vote?

Mr. STEVENS: It is a very important vote; I am sorry it is not much larger. I think it would be useful if it were larger. The number of persons employed is about twenty-eight.

Mr. McINTOSH: There seems to be a little difference of opinion on this side as to the reply made by the minister to the question I asked him regarding the expenditure of this amount. Was any part of this expenditure used for the Chicago exhibition?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, $15,000 out of the parallel vote last year was spent in connection with the Chicago fair.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. ILSLEY: The minister said about twenty-eight were employed. Are they employed all the time in just this sort of work?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, they are employed at this sort of work all the time. There are some very able men among them who are artistic in the making up of exhibits, and when the exhibition is not actually on, their task is to keep the exhibits in good shape. Many of the artistic displays that they make or gather together and arrange are sent out for exhibition, or sometimes loaned—used in ways of that kind.

Mr. ILSLEY: These employees of the department are part of the civil service of Canada, some in England and some here; is that correct?

Mr. STEVENS: Correct.

Mr. RALSTON: I remember seeing one of these exhibits in London. Is there cooperation between the department and various producers and manufacturers? Does Canada include in this exhibit the products of private individuals and industries?

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, yes. For instance in the Olympic show we took considerable space and then manufacturers would rent a portion of that space; but the arrangement of the exhibits, the gathering of them together and so forth, would be under the experts of the department. There is very close cooperation between Canadian exhibitors and the exhibition staff; as far as I have known very happy relations exist between them.

Mr. RALSTON: The exhibit is not made up simply of the flora and fauna and natural products of Canada, but includes manufactured products?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, manufactured and natural products, very much so.

Mr. HANBURY: The minister said they rented certain space to manufacturers. Does that mean that there is a certain revenue under this item?

Mr. STEVENS: No, we arrange for the space, probably for a maximum area, and then divide it among exhibitors. They pay the exhibition authorities for it.

Item agreed to.

Motion picture bureau, $50,000.

Mr. RALSTON: What are the activities of the motion picture bureau that the hon. minister contemplates this year?

Mr. STEVENS: They carry on a very useful work, making films of industrial activities in Canada, as of the fish industry, lumbering and mining, or matters generally having to do with the natural resources of the country. Films are made also that are useful from the standpoint of attracting tourists. Of the industrial films, the automobile film that went out and commanded a great deal of attention is an example. These films, I might say, produce a certain amount of revenue. They are distributed chiefly in Europe but also in other parts of the world—some in Australia, South Africa and New Zealand. We think they do very excellent service in a general presentation of Canadian activities and resources.

Mr. RALSTON: I quite agree with that, I was asking if the minister had in mind any program for this year—whether any special industry was to be dealt with by these motion pictures?

Mr. STEVENS: There is nothing special in mind at the present time.

Mr. VALLANCE: Are these pictures or films released to the general picture industry throughout the country and also in foreign countries?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, to theatrical organizations as well as to private persons, groups, societies, educational institutions, and so on.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is there any revenue from it?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, the revenue runs about $26,000 or $27,000. Over a period of years, giving the round figures, the revenue has been $18,000, $26,000, $23,000, $29,000, $26,000 and $9,000. I have not the revenue for the present year.

Mr. VALLANCE: I suppose, coming from the Department of Trade and Commerce, these are pretty much educational, along the line of showing the products of Canada, and are not used for immigration purposes. Is that correct?

Mr. STEVENS: The products of Canada and manufactured articles.

Mr. VALLANCE: But not for immigration purposes?

Mr. STEVENS: No, not now. I imagine they were so used years ago, but not now.

Mr. McINTOSH: Is the distribution trans-Canada in scope or is it confined to the larger centres of population?

Mr. STEVENS: A great deal is outside of Canada, of course, and it would be cross-Canada in scope with certain films. I could not say exactly what the distribution is in Canada, but it is pretty extensive.

Mr. McINTOSH: And as between the natural resources and manufacturing, are the films fairly equally divided?

Mr. STEVENS: I should say so. I should think perhaps the natural resources would predominate, but they are fairly equally divided.

Mr. HANBURY: The minister has told us about the revenue from this distribution. I would ask the minister whether the fact that a charge is made for these films perhaps limits the use to which they are put, and I would advance the suggestion that perhaps if there were no charge the distribution would be greater.

Mr. STEVENS: Our experience is the reverse. The department, over a great many years, has found that they are appreciated more if there is a small charge. The charge is not looked upon as a profit-making matter, but it is a fair remuneration. We expect a certain amount of expense, but the return helps pay the cost.

Mr. GERSHAW: Do the trade commissioners in different countries make use of these films?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, they do, and frequently we have expressions of appreciation of the service.

Mr. HANBURY: Are all these films of a general character or do they sometimes have to do with one particular firm?

Mr. STEVENS: The object, of course, is to make it very general. I recall seing one film having to do with a large logging firm on the coast, and I could not discover what firm it was; it was typical of the industry.

Item agreed to.

The Precious Metals Marking Act, administration of, $4,912.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the minister explain this item?

Mr. STEVENS: This is merely the salary of the officer who administers this act. I am sorry to say that the officer, who had been in the service of the country for a great many years, died. A new man was appointed a short time ago; he starts at the minimum salary of that class, and that accounts for the decrease.

Mr. ILSLEY: What are his duties?

Mr. STEVENS: The other day an amendment to this act went through, and at that time I think I described the act fully. This is a very important act, dealing with the manufacture and sale of goods made of precious metals such as gold, silver or platinum, including plated and filled goods, and so on. The act provides rigid and definite standards which, of course, are of the highest importance when dealing with precious metals. The duty of this officer is to administer that act. He watches with the most scrupulous care advertisements and so on, so as to minimize any attempted misrepresentation of goods, and I think his efforts have been successful. For instance, goods may be offered as sterling silver which are not sterling silver at all, or goods may be offered as plated silver when they are merely washed.

Mr. RALSTON: Or eighteen carat instead of fourteen carat.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, and the various carat weights of gold. All this is carefully and meticulously watched by this officer to minimize the possibility of fraud.

Item agreed to.

Printing of parliamentary and departmental publications, $102,675.

Mr. STEVENS: This is the ordinary printing vote of the department. About $80,000 is for the bureau of statistics, for the printing of the ordinary documents of that branch, while the balance is for the publication of the regular periodicals of the department, such as the grain report, and so on.

Mr. RALSTON: Does this include the annual reports of the departments?

Mr. STEVENS: It includes all such documents.

Mr. RALSTON: Has the minister ever considered whether there could not be some substantial scaling down in the printing of these reports? It strikes me in this way: we come here this session and we get a report for the year ending March 31, 1933, nearly a year late. It does not make any difference what government is in power; that always happens, and it seems to me there might be a great scaling down of those reports, because they cease to be useful for distribution, though of course they are useful as a matter of record. I notice one thing that is being done, and I do not know whether or not it has always been done; cards are sent around and members are asked whether or not they want certain reports. Does that mean that the reports are not printed unless requisitions come in, or is the report printed and supplied to those who ask for it?

Mr. STEVENS: We try our best, by the card system and in other ways, to keep the number printed down to what may be required, and during the last year or two we have very carefully gone over these publications and kept them down to a minimum. I think we have eliminated all that we dare eliminate. I remember talking it over only a few weeks ago with the head of the bureau of statistics. We went over the matter carefully, and I do not think we could safely discard any documents that we are now printing.

With regard to the annual report to which my hon. friend referred, it does come late for the use of the house, but it is very highly valued in all parts of the world to which it is sent, as an official and representative document of the government. As a matter of record, and in an historical sense, of course it has the usual value which is attached to such documents. I do not think there are any other documents we could discard. Certainly I should be very glad to have the views of any hon. gentleman who might feel that some documents are unnecessary, so that we could examine them and come to a conclusion. Occasionally someone will say that a certain document seems to be useless, but upon inquiry it is found that there are many people who make constant use of it. The other day a gentleman in eastern Canada wrote me expressing indignation at what he considered to be a waste of money; a certain document he had got hold of seemed to him to be of no value. I looked it over and could not recognize any particular merit in it, but when I inquired I found that in a certain branch of industry several hundred people made constant use of it. It is difficult, therefore, to gauge the value of a document until one goes carefully into the matter with those who are handling it. I believe we have minimized useless and unnecessary printing, so far as we can possibly do so.

Mr. HANBURY: Would the minister enumerate the publications to which he has just referred, and give us some general idea of the distribution?

Mr. STEVENS: I could give some of the important ones. There is the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce; the catalogue of the motion picture bureau; the Commercial Intelligence Journal, which is a regular issue, and reprints of the Commercial Intelligence Journal. Then we publish calendar-year books for minerals, manufactures (non-metallic) and iron and steel (non-ferrous), and the calendar-year trade report. Then there is a publication on prices; "Canada, 1934," and so on. There is a publication on the chemical industries, a monthly bulletin on agriculture, a quarterly bulletin on coal, the quarterly trade of Canada, the monthly trade of Canada and the monthly business review. There is the electricity and gas annual report and the weights and measures annual report. Then there is the annual publication of vital statistics, and in addition to that there is a preliminary report, which is in fact a rapid survey report.

Mr. HANBURY: Of what?

Mr. STEVENS: Of vital statistics. The same thing applies to many other publications. Then there are publications for fruit and fur farms, fisheries, forestry; the lumbering, pulp and paper, and textile industries, and general manufactures. Then there are statistical reports on transportation, steam railways, electric railways and canals; reports on internal trade prices and price indices; financial statistics, provincial finances, and educational statistics. There is a review of business statistics, and a number of contingencies.

Mr. HANBURY: I understand there is a revenue from many of these publications?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but it does not amount to much. We make a small charge, such as ten cents, or twenty-five cents, and in one or two cases fifty cents. For the year book we charge one dollar. Necessarily, however, many of these documents are sent free of charge to educational institutions, universities, schools and so on.

Mr. McINTOSH: With regard to the belated publication of, say, the annual blue book reports, may I ask the minister if the publications could be issued earlier?

Mr. STEVENS: I confess frankly to my hon. friend that when I laid the annual report on the table the other day I felt a little ashamed. I believe that while I could not present it until the opening of parliament, it was ready last autumn. I must confess that when I did present it and saw that it was dated 1933 I thought at the time I was going through a more or less useless formality.

Mr. McINTOSH: As these reports are very important for reference purposes I think we must have them. If the members could have them as soon as they are published it would be a very great convenience, and the reports would be of greater value to them.

Mr. STEVENS: I think there should be no difficulty about that. In connection with the Canada Grain Act, the report of my department and one or two other reports, there is a statute stating that within fifteen days after the opening of parliament such reports must be laid on the table. That was the formality I went through the other day. I will say this, that if any hon. member desired a report we would certainly send it to him immediately upon its completion, which would be some time I imagine, in the late summer.

Mr. ILSLEY: The list of publications the minister gave in answer to the request of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard is most interesting. I fancy few hon. members knew there were as many publications as are shown in the list. Is the list published or made available in any other way?

Mr. STEVENS: I should be very happy to furnish any hon. member with a list.

Mr. HANBURY: May I suggest to the minister that every member of parliament would be interested in having that list, as would every newspaper in Canada. The preparation of this information obviously costs a great deal, and the purpose of its publication is to educate the people of Canada as to what we have and are capable of doing. I believe every member of parliament and all newspapers should have a list of the publications, with rough details showing the contents of each publication.

Mr. STEVENS: I shall have a complete list sent to hon. members, and a brief statement showing the nature of the publications.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, I believe this is the vote which my right hon. leader criticized somewhat caustically last session.

Mr. STEVENS: No, it is the next one.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Publicity and advertising.

Mr. STEVENS: This is not advertising.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is out of this vote that the handbook, "Canada 1933" is published?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I referred to it incidentally in my remarks on the address in reply, and I believe it is only fair that I should draw the minister's attention to it at this time. I refer to the porcine picture.

Mr. STEVENS: Once again.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, I thought the minister would have embraced the opportunity right off the bat to explain it, but I think I can understand his not seeing the ludicrous mistake himself.

Mr. STEVENS: I can give a complete explanation of it, but I think it is wholly unnecessary.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I referred to it only once, and this is the second time. I assure the hon. minister I should draw his attention to it, because I have been in public life long enough to know that extraordinary things happen in office life for which one might think there was no explanation, and this would seem to be one of them.

Mr. STEVENS: The explanation is very simple, and may I say to the hon. member that it is most annoying.

Mr. GRAY: What is?

Mr. STEVENS: I should prefer not to say much about it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You do not need to.

Mr. STEVENS: When this was compiled—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will not press it.

Mr. STEVENS: When this was compiled we sent to the Department of Agriculture and they in turn sent us photographs bearing the proper legends. The photographs were sent to the bureau, and an official of the bureau, upon his own responsibility, changed the legends into their present ludicrous form. I am not certain that it was not done maliciously. I think perhaps the gentleman has enjoyed very much the embarrassment to which I have been subjected by his ludicrous action, and if I were certain of it there would probably be some wigs on the green. It was a miserable, despicable thing to do, unworthy of any official of the department, and it was wholly unnecessary because the Department of Agriculture gave the perfectly correct technical description. I may say to the hon. gentleman that I never saw it at all. Had I seen it I would have been very prompt to discern the mistake, as I have had a long experience in matters of that kind, much more so than the hon. gentleman thinks, even to the point of extracting them.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend has described this incident quite as graphically as I could have myself. I am sure he never thought we would let this pass without somebody drawing attention to it.

Mr. STEVENS: I should think it is a celebrated case by now.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This gentleman must have been a bad Grit, and he has no doubt been dismissed by this time.

Mr. STEVENS: No, I have not yet inquired what his politics are. I am afraid to.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Do you think he is still in the employ of the government?

Mr. STEVENS: Do you think he ought not to be? I rather think so myself.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I would not like to pass judgment without giving him an opportunity to be heard. Probably he had nothing to do with it.

Mr. STEVENS: I am going to give him an opportunity to be heard some of these days.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: When my hon. friend ventures into the field of agriculture it would be wise to submit anything like this to the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. STEVENS: We got it from him.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Did he proofread it?

Mr. STEVENS: A minister cannot possibly have time to proofread all the documents.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I guarantee that no such rough necked hog was ever raised on the experimental farm here at Ottawa.

Mr. STEVENS: It was supplied by the experimental farm. May I say to my hon. friend that the proofreading must be left to the officials. My hon. friend himself as minister did not proofread his documents.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is a technical matter about which my hon. friend was not expected to know very much.

Mr. STEVENS: I happen to know a good deal about it, more than my hon. friend thinks.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Somebody was lacking in knowledge, anyway. As regards the animal itself, it is a rough necked son of a gun that never saw the experimental farm. On the farm they have as fine a type of Yorkshire, not geldings, but hogs as are to be found in Canada. That does not explain it at all. This gentleman with the sleight of hand accomplishment must have changed the photograph too.

Mr. STEVENS: No, he did not change the photograph too.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They must have gone into the back township for this chap because he looks more like a wild boar from the hills of Hungary than a Yorkshire brood sow.

Mr. NEILL: May I ask the minister if under this vote or the following one comes the expenditure for getting out the typewritten or mimeographed weekly or daily or monthly bulletin under the auspices of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics?

Mr. STEVENS: I am under the impression that it comes under this vote.

Mr. NEILL: I should like to ask if the minister has any idea of what it costs.

Mr. STEVENS: It is not very much. I think I answered a question on the subject in the house not long ago.

Mr. NEILL: I have here the answer which the minister gave, and it is because of that answer that I wish to ask for information. The answer given to the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Raymond) was that there were 383 copies issued and that the average cost per issue was $6.30. If they can get out that stuff for $6.30 it is very remarkable because I have made a rough estimate of the contents and it runs to something like three million words for each issue. If they can get that out for $6.30 with paper, ink and other supplies, and clerical labour, it is indeed remarkable. What about the time of the man concocting all this? You could not send out that stuff—you could not typewrite or mimeograph three million words for $6.30. Surely there is some mistake.

Mr. STEVENS: No, there is no mistake. The answer is correct. It is all mimeographed, of course, but the material from which it is compiled is the material which finds its way into the regular reports of many branches of the bureau of statistics, and the bulletin is a rapid survey and digest of this material which is passing through the bureau, brought into the form of the bulletin for the convenience of the press and those who receive it. The cost is correct, but that does not include the salary of the official who compiles or extracts the information from the general material. This is not all the work he has to do; he has other work.

Mr. NEILL: I congratulate the minister if he can get out three million words, buy the envelopes and put the bulletin into them and send them through the mail for $6.30 an issue.

Mr. STEVENS: We handle that sort of thing very expeditiously down there. It is thoroughly systematized.

Mr. NEILL: Of course the expense of getting the material together must be very much greater. The minister was kind enough to say he would welcome any comments by which the expenditure on advertising could be cut down. These bulletins when they first came out were not unreasonable. They were much fewer in number than now, and while some of the information given was small, going into petty stuff, the bulletin possibly served a useful purpose. I remember reading, for instance, that the export of whisky from Canada to Syria in one year amounted to nine dollars' worth, and it also gave the exports of women's hairnets to Palestine, or something like that. That may be useful to some people, but it is not very likely. The purpose of these bulletins, if they have any purpose at all, is to furnish appropriate and useful and accurate information that may be of assistance to importers and exporters. I do not think I am out of place when I say that those three qualifications are essential —that the information should be appropriate, useful and accurate. Let me give an illustration, one of two picked here and there, glancing over some of the bulletins, of what I think might be eliminated, to put it plainly. I read two sentences:

> The quantity of goods and services exchanged times the prices of these goods and services constitutes one side of the familiar equation of exchange. In its original form the equation was as follows: MV=PT, where M denotes money and deposits and V the velocity or turnover of money and deposits, P represents prices and T the physical volume of business.

I do not know if the average business man gets much information out of that. Here is another example: It says that Three Rivers in Quebec and Sydney in Cape Breton at the 1931 census had a population under twenty years of age of 46 per cent, but not satisfied with that, it works it out fractionally, giving the percentage for Three Rivers at 46·75 and for Sydney at 46·33 of people under twenty years of age. We are paying somebody to work out to the second decimal point fractions of that character. What use is it after they have arrived at the precise figure, unless to incite a competition among other towns to try to have more young people? Here is another example:

> Millions of sausage wrappings sent to Germany from Canada.
> Many millions of sausage skins, not the artificial variety but the old-fashioned sort, went to Germany last month to make frankfurters. Occasionally the smart young Nazi calls them "hot dogs" when he treats his Schatz.

I do not know whether that is a proper word; the responsibility is the minister's. It goes on:

> Give them a size of three inches and they would stretch out to a distance of about 475 miles, pretty nearly one-fifth of the distance between Halifax and Vancouver as the crow flies.

That might be very interesting if it appeared in a school book or something of that kind, but why should we be paying for the dissemination of knowledge of that kind? There is page after page of closely typed matter which looks to me to be very much like propaganda. The exports to different countries are gone into in very great detail. Among some of the countries given is Albania, to which we exported $91 worth of goods in nine months. That is $10 per month. To Lithuania we exported $1,000 in nine months; to Yugoslavia, $393. Some of the imports by countries are given for the nine months' period. In the case of Korea it is $36, or $4 per month. It is stated that in the corresponding nine months in the previous year there were none. In the case of Paraguay it is $15 with nothing in the previous nine months. All this is very interesting, but it lends itself to what I suggest, meanly perhaps, is propaganda. They will be able to say: Look at the enormous increases. What percentage of increase is it when it goes from nothing to $36 in nine months? All this does not seem to me to be very useful.

Unless the information is accurate it is going to do harm, and I should like to point to some instances of inaccuracy. It gives the number of births, deaths and marriages in seventy cities and towns in Canada with populations of 10,000 or over. But it gives the precise number, and then goes on to say that they show a decrease of 7½ per cent in births. 4 per cent in deaths and an increase of one per cent in marriages. These figures do not give any real data. Certain towns may have increased in population; there may have been more births and marriages because of an influx. The figures are absolutely useless as a comparison. They do not compare with any other town or any other country. If there had been a comparison of the percentages it might have meant something, but it does not.

We come now to what may be a more popular item, the difference between nightshirts and pyjamas. We are told in electrifying words that the old-fashioned nightshirt is by no means out of date and that a huge quantity of that commodity is made every year in Canada. They then continue and say that the use of nightdresses is increasing more than pyjamas if factory output is a true indication. Nightdresses are not nightshirts.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. NEILL: Certainly, they are not. The hon. member can look it up in the dictionary if he has not any domestic knowledge. Nightdresses increased 57 per cent while pyjamas increased by only 14 per cent. They got jumbled up between nightshirts and nightdresses.

We come now to something that is of more interest to British Columbia. The information given in this instance is very misleading. The figures given of the export of salmon to the United Kingdom for the quarter consisting of April, May and June, 1933, are 17,665 hundredweight, while the Commercial Intelligence Journal give a figure for the same period of 8,360 hundredweight, or less than half. For the quarter including July, August and September, the bureau gives the export as 55,420 hundredweight while the Commercial Intelligence Journal gives it as 27,180, again less than half. For the month of September the bureau gives it as 18,441 hundredweight, while this typed bulletin gives it as 11,822. For the nine months ending September the bureau gives it as 85,763 hundredweight while this typed bulletin gives it as 53,688. The Commercial Intelligence Journal has the same figure as I checked up as carefully as I could. One can imagine how an exporter or importer would be deceived by figures like that, and it makes one wonder just how accurate the rest of the bulletin is. There is a Methodist hymn which says:

> If such the sweetness of the stream,
> What must the fountain be?

If this is the accuracy of the stream, what can we gauge that of the fountain to be? How accurate is the whole thing? How useful is it? I cannot see the usefulness of information that the number of sausages produced placed end to end would reach so far. If it is not useful and if it is not accurate, what is left? I do not suggest that the minister is to blame, but I think he should look into the matter. This is the sort of thing that people depend upon. We do not care whether the exports of pyjamas and nightshirts have increased but we do want accurate information as to the exports of salmon. The figures in one periodical issued by the government should not be half of those appearing in another. I suggest to the minister that he check these things up. Also perhaps the reduction of the size of this bulletin would prove of value, as people might then take an interest in it. If the minister would like them, I will send over the details.

Mr. STEVENS: I will read them in Hansard.

Item agreed to.

Publicity and advertising in Canada and abroad, $100,000.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the minister give us particulars of this item?

Mr. STEVENS: This is the general vote for advertising. It covers a weekly news service in Latin American countries; a service through the marine department and the Canadian Press for Pacific liners as well as a similar service for Atlantic boats; advertising in newspapers and periodicals, and so forth. There is no special advertising campaign in view at the present time; this is just the normal advertising vote.

Mr. McINTOSH: What proportion of this vote is spent in Canada?

Mr. STEVENS: Last year out of $173,000 there was $75,000 spent in Canada, and about $100,000 in London.

Mr. McINTOSH: Was the $75,000 spent largely in newspaper advertising?

Mr. STEVENS: In Canada, yes. In Great Britain it takes the form of newspaper advertising, special display advertising such as the apple display which is widely known, and other forms of advertising.

Mr. McINTOSH: Could the minister state what proportion of this amount was spent in western Canada?

Mr. STEVENS: It would be hard to state accurately, but I understand it was a substantial portion. I could not make even a fairly accurate estimate.

Mr. McINTOSH: Could the minister indicate the proportion paid to daily newspapers and that paid to the weekly press?

Mr. STEVENS: It is divided up between daily newspapers, trade publications, agricultural periodicals and foreign advertising. Roughly, that is the division of the vote.

Mr. McINTOSH: That means that the money spent in Canada so far as straight newspaper display advertising is concerned was paid entirely to the daily newspapers of the dominion. Is that correct?

Mr. STEVENS: No. I have not the amount spent in connection with weekly newspapers; it is included in the general item of miscellaneous and I could not say just what that is, but I would say that the division would be that perhaps a larger amount is spent in advertising in daily newspapers than in the weeklies.

Mr. REID: Is it under this appropriation that advertising that appears in the press for contracts comes?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. HANBURY: I should like to repeat to the minister under this item a suggestion which I made to the house some time ago, that he take into consideration the exchange of students between other countries and Canada. I have particularly in mind Japan, China and South American countries. As the minister knows, we have in British Columbia, where climatic conditions are suitable to people of those other countries, a very fine university which, he knows, is quite capable of extension, and the industries we have there are such that we could educate these people from other countries in the use of our products. I suggest to the minister that he give this matter serious consideration. Under present world conditions it is of the utmost importance that every effort be made to interest other nationals in the products of our country, and although this may be a long-term method, I know of no other that would accomplish more over a period of years than the encouraging of people of other nations to come here to learn our customs, language and methods of doing business.

With that suggestion I am again going to couple one that an exhibition ship be fitted out and maintained to visit the countries to which I have referred, and perhaps others, to demonstrate to their peoples what we have for sale to them, and at the same time let them demonstrate to us what we can purchase from them in exchange. I am making this suggestion to the minister and I ask him to give it very careful consideration. He will realize that something must be done if the world is to continue along its present economic course, and nothing more effective could be done over a period of years.

Mr. STEVENS: May I briefly state that efforts along the line my hon. friend has mentioned have already been made. In the case of one eastern university students have been brought from South America, an exchange of students having been arranged. In the case of certain industrial firms some student apprentices, I suppose we might call them, were brought here for the purpose of studying Canadian methods of business and carrying Canadian good will back to their countries. I shall be pleased to look into the suggestion further, because it has great merit. One of the difficulties has been to get universities interested. This must be done, of course, through the agency of institutions of learning of that kind.

In regard to the exhibition ship, I should be happy were our finances in such a condition as to warrant a substantial expenditure for advertising abroad in the form either of a ship or exhibits or publicity of some sort, but, frankly, the government has been faced with the very serious obligation of keeping its expenses down to a minimum and I have been forced to reduce my estimates more than I should have liked. I have a good deal of sympathy for the suggestion made and shall keep it in mind. If conditions improve, I shall ask for something more in the supplementaries if my colleagues will be good enough to support that view.

Mr. HANBURY: I am glad to have the assurance of the minister in that regard, and he may be sure that he will receive every measure of support from the Liberal party, which believes in the extension of our markets. We are not necessarily, as the minister knows, only a Canada first party, and while we also have our creed, perhaps it would not be the "my creed" which the minister published some time ago. We believe in the extension of markets, and I say to the minister that if he will insert in the supplementaries a substantial, indeed, a quite substantial amount, there will not be a word of criticism from this side of the house.

Mr. STEVENS: That is very encouraging.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am not entirely satisfied with the far from informative answer given by the minister in regard to the daily papers in which this advertising was placed. There are only a few daily newspapers in each province. Could the minister not give us the names of the daily papers in which this display advertising is placed? I think the house is entitled to that information.

[Mr. Hanbury.]

Mr. STEVENS: The total amount for the daily papers is $4,752. There are about thirty of them, so that it does not really amount to very much. The papers are as follows:

Mr. GRAY: I want to enter a mild protest in respect to what has been done in western Ontario, where I find that the only newspaper listed is the London Free Press.

Mr. STEVENS: Windsor Border Cities Star

Mr. GRAY: The editor of the London Free Press is a past president of the Conservative Association of Western Ontario. The minister is leaving out a very fine paper in the same city as the Free Press—the London Advertiser.

Mr. McINTOSH: I thank the minister for the information with regard to the daily newspapers in Canada. What amount was spent in the leading weeklies of the dominion and in what papers was the advertising placed?

Mr. STEVENS: I have not a list of the weeklies with me.

Mr. McINTOSH: Was any amount of this appropriation spent in the national or larger weeklies of the country?

Mr. STEVENS: I have a miscellaneous item and I cannot tell my hon. friend the amount.

Mr. McINTOSH: Will the minister bring down that information some other day?

Mr. STEVENS: I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. McINTOSH: I want to protest strongly against the amount which is spent in the daily newspapers of Saskatchewan. I understand the only amount stated was paid to the Regina Star. This is an out-and-out Conservative paper. In Regina there is a leading old-time Liberal daily, the Regina Leader, a splendid newspaper. There was no money paid to the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, another leading daily paper of northern Saskatchewan. I think if this appropriation had been spent fairly and judiciously, with the desire to get the best results, a certain amount should have been paid to each one of these papers—I would not say to the Liberal papers as opposed to the Conservative or the Conservative as opposed to the Liberal; but to get the best results for the Canadian people at large it certainly should not all have been paid to one paper, and that —a supporter of the government

Mr. RALSTON: Has any amount been spent under this item, or is any contemplated, for advertising, publicity or propaganda in respect of the wheat agreement?

Mr. STEVENS: I do not want to say that nothing will be spent, but as far as I know there is no suggestion of it at the present moment. There might possibly be some expenditure; frankly that has not been in my mind, but my hon. friend's bringing it up suggests to me that it may possibly come out of this.

Mr. RALSTON: I may say it is suggested to me; I do not know myself.

Mr. STEVENS: It is not at the moment in contemplation under this vote.

Mr. RALSTON: And I suppose the answer stands as my hon. friend has made it with regard to the expenditure for this year. Has any amount been spent?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. RALSTON: Or will any be spent under the vote for the year ending March 31, 1934?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is this advertising distributed on a patronage basis?

Mr. STEVENS: Well, not exclusively.

Mr. ILSLEY: The reason I ask is, following up what my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth has said, that in the city of Halifax the only paper included is the Herald. The Chronicle is left out.

Mr. McINTOSH: If not exclusively it looks as if it were inclusively.

Mr. MUNN: I might enter the same complaint as regards Victoria and Vancouver. In Victoria we have two leading dailies, and the Conservative one is getting the patronage. In Vancouver we have two leading dailies, and the Conservative paper is getting it there. It looks as if there was a little patronage.

Mr. STEVENS: I think we lean a little that way.

Mr. MUNN: You acknowledge it, then?

An hon. MEMBER: It will not be long now!

Item agreed to.

Weights and measures inspection service including the international bureau of weights and measures, $300,000.

Mr. STEVENS: This is the usual item for this branch, which is a self-supporting branch.

Item agreed to.

Dominion Bureau of Statistics, $351,000.

Mr. RALSTON: I have nothing in particular to say on this item, but it is a large and important one, and the committee is pretty sparse. Would the minister mind letting it stand?

Mr. STEVENS: I have no objection to meeting my hon. friend's view in that regard.

Item stands.

Commercial intelligence service, including miscellaneous expenditure in connection with Canada's trade, $639,687.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Is that the item from which the trade commissioners are paid?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Will the minister tell us how many trade commissioners Canada has at the present time and what they are paid?

Mr. STEVENS: I think the number of commissioners is thirty-eight.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): What is the average pay?

Mr. STEVENS: They vary. One is $3,780 with a living allowance of $2,500. One gets $5,760, one of the oldest commissioners we have, and a living allowance of $1,500. Another gets $4,380 and a living allowance of $2,500. Another gets $5,040 with living allowance of $1,500; another $4,980 with a living allowance of $2,500. The living allowance varies according to where they are.

Mr. RALSTON: Where is the last one?

Mr. STEVENS: The last is in Australia. The salary varies according to the time they have been in the service and their standing in the service. Here is another at $3,180 with a living allowance of $3,000—that is the minimum salary for that class; another at $4,980 with a living allowance of $2,500, and another at $4,980.

Mr. VALLANCE: How much of this item is set aside to promote the sale of wheat abroad, if any.

Mr. STEVENS: There is no special amount set aside for the sale of any given article, but all the commissioners are kept constantly informed, and shall I say, stimulated to watch the opportunities for marketing not only wheat and flour but other products. But we have particularly emphasized wheat and flour as a major item for their care and interest.

Mr. HANSON: What number of countries are represented by the trade commissioners?

Mr. STEVENS: Great Britain, Argentine, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, British West Indies, China, Cuba, Egypt, France, Germany, Greece, Hongkong, India and Ceylon, Irish Free State and Northern Ireland, Italy, Japan, Mexico, Netherlands, Netherlands East Indies, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Peru, South Africa; and in the United Kingdom, London, Bristol, Glasgow, Liverpool, Belfast and Dublin; and in the United States we have an office in New York.

Mr. RALSTON: Have there been any reductions in or additions to the number of trade commissioners in the last year?

Mr. STEVENS: There were two retirements, but the assistant commissioners were advanced to take their place. There has been no reduction in number.

Mr. RALSTON: No offices have been closed?

Mr. STEVENS: Not this year.

Mr. RALSTON: Is there any closing in contemplation?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. RALSTON: Or the opening of any new ones?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: We are opening an office in Singapore. We have a trade commissioner at Batavia, Dutch East Indies, but we believe he will do better service if his office is in Singapore. He visits Singapore now. So we contemplate opening that office, but it will not increase the staff because the assistant will look after Batavia and the commissioner himself will be at Singapore. It merely means a division of that territory.

Mr. RALSTON: The Commercial Intelligence Journal was included in the vote we just passed, was it ?

Mr. STEVENS: No, the printing vote. I named it at the time.

Mr. RALSTON: I suppose the salary for the officer who prepares it is in this vote?

Mr. STEVENS: His salary comes under civil government.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the minister permit me to speak of one other matter, in connection with the Commercial Intelligence Journal? I have gone over it carefully, and it seemed to me that the journal might be made even a little more useful than it is if it could indicate something more with regard to our own tariff changes or the changes made as the result of valuations for duty purposes. There is a great deal of information given with regard to changes in other countries, but it seemed to me it would be a more complete compendium for the purpose of reference, and so on, if information could be given with regard to our own tariff adjustments.

Mr. STEVENS: The Commercial Intelligence Journal is chiefly used by exporters; its primary object is to keep Canadian exporters posted as to conditions abroad, and it is organized and systematized pretty thoroughly first with the idea of not making it so voluminous that it cannot be readily absorbed and secondly in order to present the information in a uniform manner. There are certain matters that interest exporters all the time, and we try to keep them posted on those matters. Then there are certain other matters that obtrude themselves unexpectedly, and we try to keep them advised in those matters. We could add the information that my hon. friend mentions, but that would be of very little use to the exporters and would merely add to the expense. While perhaps it would be useful to members of the house or to students of trade matters generally, it is not looked upon as necessary in regard to the function which the journal seeks to discharge.

Mr. RALSTON: I would regard it as of assistance in helping us come to conclusions and helping us size up our external trade both ways.

Mr. STEVENS: I will give the matter consideration.

Mr. RALSTON: May I just emphasize that this is one of the publications that is right up to date. It is not like the annual reports of which we have been speaking, which are like last year's birds' nests. They are not very much good by the time they are published, though I say it with all due respect to the departments.

Mr. BENNETT: They are all the same.

Mr. RALSTON: I realize that, but this is a publication which is up to date, and it seems to me that if we could get the essential information gathered together under one pair of covers it would be very helpful. The Department of National Revenue issues a monthly report which is exceedingly helpful because it is right up to date, and the Department of Trade and Commerce issues a monthly summary of trade which is excellent. It seems to me that if we could get some publication—I do not care what it is—which would contain all the tariff changes up to date, so that we would not learn three months later that a change had been made, it would be very helpful.

Mr. STEVENS: I will take note of my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): When the minister mentioned the countries where our trade commissioners are stationed at the present time it struck me that the Scandinavian countries, with which we deal to a large extent, are not so well served. I took a trip over there last year, and I was told that the business between Canada and Denmark and Sweden would increase greatly if we had a trade commissioner there.

Mr STEVENS: We have one at Oslo, in Norway, who covers Norway, Denmark and Sweden. He visits Denmark regularly.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I have met the trade commissioner, and he tells me it is impossible for him to cover the territory adequately and do justice to the three countries. I think it would be to our advantage if we could open up a new post for Sweden and Denmark.

Mr. STEVENS: We would like very much to extend our service, but we must have regard to the cost. I feel that we are covering the territory pretty well.

Mr. RALSTON: What are the other large items, in addition to the salaries of trade commissioners?

Mr. STEVENS: There is an item for office rents, which of course are substantial, amounting to $54,000 in round figures. Then there are allowances for house rent, totalling $25,000. Communications take up $13,000, which I think is a very modest figure when one has regard to the constant cable service we must maintain, and the great distances that are covered. Then there is the cost of travel and removal, which is estimated at $30,000. Most of that is for travel, for the commissioners covering their territories. Many of these territories are very extensive; in the case mentioned a moment ago, the commissioner at Oslo frequently goes to Denmark and Sweden. The commissioner at Hamburg travels all over Germany, Czechoslovakia, Poland and Austria-Hungary, so he covers quite a territory.

Mr. VALLANCE: A few moments ago I asked the minister how much of this item was spent to promote the sale of wheat abroad I am not objecting to the item at all, but I should like the minister to explain, if he can, why in 1933, countries such as the Argentine, Russia and Australia increased their sales in the British market while, to almost the same extent, Canada's sales decreased. Their collective increase amounted to some $17,000,000, while Canada's decrease was just about the same. Can the minister give any explanation for that condition?

Mr. STEVENS: One of the main reasons why the Argentine increased its sales of wheat and other products, of course, is the depreciation of the Argentine currency in terms of gold. In regard to Russia, their exports are on the basis of simply getting rid of them, no matter what they get for them, so there really is no yardstick by which the value of those exports can be measured. In the case of Australia we have had an Australian pound that has been at a very heavy discount in comparison with the pound sterling and in comparison with Canadian currency in relation to the pound sterling, which of course gave them some advantage in the world market. Then of course you must remember that Argentine and Australian wheat is offered at a lower figure than Canadian wheat is offered at, and in itself is not as good as our wheat. Those are reasons which might be advanced offhand.

Mr. VALLANCE: I do not wish to enter into a discussion of the wheat agreement, but how are we going to meet this competition even when the wheat agreement is brought into operation? Are they going to pay us a higher price because of the quota we are to be permitted to place on those markets?

Mr. STEVENS: The answer is that they are paying a substantially higher price now because of the quality of our wheat. In regard to the wheat agreement, which we hope will work, it is not a simple matter, as anyone knows who has given it any thought. It is perhaps one of the most difficult things to be attempted in the way of international agreements with regard to trade, and there are many difficulties to be overcome. But the quota is fixed; it is conceived to be within the consumptive power of the importing countries, and we believe it is. Within the ambit of that consumptive power we get our quota of 200 million bushels, and I expect that we will get pretty well up to that figure. I am hoping there will be an adjustment in world conditions next year which probably will increase that. When we consider the export of wheat we must bear in mind that in the last eight years conditions in Europe have changed greatly. I believe one might say they have changed permanently; it looks that way. The fear of dependence upon external sources for supplies of food has had a tremendous influence on the people of Europe. I believe it is the condition we must admit is there, and probably will be maintained. On the other hand, if conditions in Europe do materially improve—and there are indications that they will—there may be an enlargement of that market. These are things however which are entirely beyond our control.

Mr. BRADETTE: May I ask the minister if there have been any special activities in regard to the selling of wheat in the orient, particularly China and Japan? I well remember the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce when in the session of 1931 he said we had a big potential market in the orient for the selling of wheat, and that to some extent it was taking the place of rice. Is there any activity in that section of the world?

Mr. STEVENS: Every possible effort has been made in that direction. There is one answer, however, and it is this: If the wheat can be sold to Europe under that fixed quota there is no harm done, even if exports to another section do not increase, provided the hole there is filled by someone else. What has happened in recent years, based on the information I have just given, is this: Australia has greatly increased its exports to China. Australia's wheat is more suitable for the Chinese market than ours is. The Chinese people want a wheat with a high gluten content. They use it chiefly for the pastry type of food which they call noodles, which is one of the main articles of diet made in that country from flour. The use of bread in northern China is increasing, but not to a very great extent. Then, a further consideration is that the Chinese people themselves produce a large quantity of wheat. Sometimes we get the idea that China does not produce wheat. Although it is not known precisely what they do produce, because they have no fixed system of statistics, it is roughly estimated that they produce about 600,000,000 bushels.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They are the fourth or fifth largest producers in the world.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, and it is quite possible they may produce much more than that We do not know just how much is turned out; I have given the figure which is commonly used. The United States made a contract with China, on a credit basis, for the shipment of some of their western wheat. Their wheat grown in the states of California, Oregon and Washington is a soft wheat similar to that grown in Australia; it is not the hard Canadian variety. They do not export any hard wheat from the United States to China. They had a very serious surplus on the Pacific coast, and because of that they made one three-year and another five-year contract with China. They have not filled that contract, I may say. The demand has fallen off, and there has been an equalization in or a lessening of the spread between the depreciated currency of the far east and the American dollar, a factor which has stimulated the export of American wheat, but has materially checked the importation of wheat from other countries. That is the situation at the moment. We have done everything we can do to encourage the disposal of wheat in the orient. We have not however gone to the extent of giving our wheat away, as some people have suggested we should do. The reason we should not do that is, in my view this: The wheat flour business of China is controlled for all of northern China at Shanghai, by wonderfully efficient and comprehensive business organizations. There is no reason to believe that if Canada were to give 10,000,000 or 20,000,000 bushels of wheat to China for its so-called needy people in the interior, the wheat would ever reach them. We have gone into that matter very carefully, having been waited upon by kind hearted people who suggested something of the kind might be done. But there is no use in Canada's giving 10,000,000 or 20,000,000 bushels of wheat to China if that wheat may fall into the hands of persons who, though not necessarily in need, would probably profit by it. Having carefully explored all these possibilities we do not know of anything we could do which would increase our sale of wheat to China. Of course we do a very nice business with Japan, and we are watching it very carefully.

Mr. REID: Is it not a fact that the matter about which the minister has been speaking is really one of currency? He has mentioned the Australian wheat as being very acceptable to China, but if he will look over the record of five years ago he will find that we were selling far more wheat to China than either Australia or New Zealand. I believe the whole situation can be traced to the currency problem.

Mr. STEVENS: The wheat about which the hon. member has been speaking was sold at a time when we had a great deal of cheap wheat. When we had a bad season with resulting tough and rusty wheat we used to send it to the orient, because that was one of the markets that would take it. Hon. members will find, if they check back, that when we had a lot of cheap wheat our exports to China increased.

Mr. VALLANCE: In view of what the minister has just said, namely that China is usually in the market when wheat is cheap, may I say that in February last wheat hit a low mark, as low as it had been in the last forty years. Is the minister prepared to make a statement with regard to an offer which was made to this country by an organization which offered to finance 50,000,000 bushels of wheat into China. Is that true?

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member has asked that question before.

Mr. VALLANCE: But the minister did not answer it before.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend asks it with a look in his eye which would seem to indicate there is something terrible about it.

Mr. VALLANCE: Not at all.

Mr. STEVENS: I remember an individual waiting upon me. The reason I hesitated before, and still hesitate to some extent to make an answer, is that the precise details of the discussion are not very well fixed in my mind. The information I shall give is accurate, but it may be incomplete. A certain gentleman did wait upon me, and we discussed the situation, as I have discussed it with many people, and gladly, on many occasions. He did not disclose that he was representing any organization. I am not saying he was not, but certainly that fact was not left on record, or in my mind. As a matter of fact, what made the whole thing an impossibility was that the price of the wheat was to be twenty-nine cents per bushel.

Mr. VALLANCE: Was the grade stipulated?

Mr. STEVENS: No. 2 grade, at twenty-nine cents per bushel.

Mr. VALLANCE: F.o.b. Vancouver?

Mr. STEVENS: No. There, again, I am speaking subject to correction, but my recollection is that it was a Winnipeg price. Yes, it was a Winnipeg price, because I remember in figuring it out in my mind I decided it was a figure we could not consider. That is substantially the story. In any case, the whole affair was incomplete; there was no definite offer made; and then, of course, there is the further point that we are not selling wheat. The pools and the dealers and the ordinary firms own, control and hold wheat, and can sell it at any time. Of course we invited these people to go to the wheat centre, at Winnipeg, and discuss it with pool authorities, and the exporters and owners of wheat in Canada.

Mr. VALLANCE: To the minister's knowledge did they do that? Did they go to Winnipeg?

Mr. STEVENS: I am again uncertain. So far as I can recollect they went to Winnipeg, and the men in the grain business did not take them seriously. That is my recollection.

Mr. RALSTON: Is there a commercial intelligence officer in Washington?

Mr STEVENS: There is Mr. Mahoney who looks after the commercial attache's office.

Mr. RALSTON: The Department of Trade and Commerce has no one there?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. RALSTON: And in New York?

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Hudd has been there for some years.

Mr. RALSTON: And Tokyo and Paris?

Mr. STEVENS: In Tokyo Mr. Langley is the chief representative of this department, holding the title of commercial secretary; in Paris, Colonel Barrie.

Mr. RALSTON: Both under Trade and Commerce?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Are there commercial attaches at the legations in Tokyo and Paris?

Mr. STEVENS: In Tokyo, Colonel Langley is. Colonel Barrie is not known as a commercial attache, but he is always available to the department through Mr. Roy.

Mr. RALSTON: Both are in a different category from Mr. Mahoney at Washington, who is directly under External Affairs?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Langley is both.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Langley's office is in the legation in Tokyo and he works in close cooperation with the minister.

Mr. RALSTON: But paid by Trade and Commerce?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, and does all our work.

Mr. GERSHAW: Canadian millers are often in a position to supply low-grade flour at a very low rate. Are our trade commissioners in a position to find out when there is a demand for this flour, and if so, do they keep the Canadian millers informed as to the possibilities?

Mr. STEVENS: We certainly keep ourselves advised and pass the information on to all our commissioners in all parts of the world. I do not quite know what my hon. friend has in mind, but I would point out the export abroad of low-grade Canadian flour is of no great advantage to Canada except that it may get rid of a certain amount of material; but as a medium for advertising Canadian wheat and flour it is an injury rather than a help. I say that frankly to my hon. friend because I remember distinctly an instance being brought to my attention some years ago where a lot of low-grade flour was shipped to the orient, and it certainly did the reputation for our flour considerable harm. So I should not think there is much advantage in the suggestion, except that in a year when there is a great deal of tough or frosted wheat, and when we are so short of higher grade wheat that we must mill a certain amount, then, of course, we have simply to do the best we can. Fortunately in not many years lately have we had that type of grain, so that the situation has not often arisen.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): The question I had in mind has been partially answered by the minister's reference to the Commercial Intelligence Journal. I used to think that there should be some reference in the Commercial Intelligence Journal to the promotion of the sale of wheat abroad. I quite understand now that it is probably more for the benefit of industries in this country, but I would ask the minister this question: Does he through his department make particular efforts through the agency of the trade commissioners to popularize the use of Canadian wheat abroad for the making of better bread and everything else that would go towards making people use more Canadian wheat, and a better quality of Canadian wheat in order to get a higher standard of bread?

With reference to Canada carrying out its part in connection with the world wheat agreement, I understand that a certain amount of publicity or propaganda is now being used to promote the wheat agreement in western Canada. I would ask the minister whether or not money is being spent by his department or out of any of these appropriations in that kind of publicity in the prairie provinces.

Mr. STEVENS: I think I answered that a moment ago. We are not spending anything on that at the present time.

May I correct a statement I made a few moments ago when I said that Colonel Barrie was not known as a commercial attache. In his official description I find that he is described as a commercial attache. At the same time I can confirm what I said a moment ago, that he is under this department and his salary is paid out of this vote.

In regard to advertising Canadian wheat and pressing its sale abroad, we have done a great deal in that direction. Shortly after I took office, and on several occasions since, I wrote personal letters to each of our trade commissioners supplementing what is ordinarily done through the department, pointing out to them the necessity of keeping to the very forefront at all times the marketing of our wheat and flour. I did that, not that I wished to disregard other commodities, but rather because it was an item of such supreme importance to Canada that I felt I was justified in doing it. Then in Winnipeg, in a laboratory attached to and under the Board of Grain Commissioners, we had a chemist make a series of scientific tests of our wheat and flour, ascertaining the baking qualities, and so forth. He made a series of comparisons showing that a certain percentage of Canadian flour mixed with flour made from, we will say, French wheat, Italian wheat, English wheat, and wheat of other countries in certain proportions, would give certain results. The scientific data was all set forth and photographs were made of the bread baked at these tests. The whole thing was set out in a very attractive little brochure which was sent to every trade commissioner, and they were specially instructed in the technique of this subject, and also specially instructed that they must give every possible attention to the utilization of the information contained in the brochure for the purpose of encouraging the use of our wheat and flour. I merely mention these things to show that in these ways and otherwise we are doing the utmost we can in that direction.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): The minister is satisfied that that scientific information has been put out to the people?

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, yes.

Mr. BRADETTE: I should like to point out to the minister, who is chairman of the mass buying committee, that a certain anomaly exists in our internal and external trade in regard to flour. In our section of the country, when we buy flour from Winnipeg or the west, we have to pay more for it than people in Montreal, Halifax and Vancouver have to pay; and if my information is correct, people on the European continent, in London, Liverpool, and at Havre in France, can buy our flour more cheaply than we can buy it. Surely that is an anomaly that should be remedied; the Canadian consumer should not be penalized for buying Canadian flour. I thought it well to bring this matter to the attention of the minister, who is chairman of the committee investigating certain matters pertaining to our commerce, with a view to seeing whether we can avoid being penalized by having to pay a higher price than people abroad for our own Canadian production.

Mr. STEVENS: We have already made a partial study of that question and the material we have accumulated has been passed on to the committee.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to follow up the question I asked of the minister a few minutes ago with regard to the relationship between the department and the gentlemen in the capitals where we have legations. I am speaking particularly of Washington. I take it from what the minister says that Mr. Mahoney is under External Affairs altogether.

Mr. STEVENS: Right.

Mr. RALSTON: What I am anxious to see done, and I am sure the government is too, is that there shall be gathered together in one department all the information with regard to external trade, and particularly with regard to what is happening from time to time now in the United States, especially with regard to codes and tariffs. I make no complaint, because I was treated with the greatest courtesy, both by the minister and by Mr. Mahoney when I was in Washington. They put themselves out and gave me the fullest information and have kept me informed since that time. From my experience during the past few days I feel that I ought to be able to go to some department to find out the latest developments in connection with the different codes which might affect Canadian trade, as well as the latest information with regard to legislation and tariffs. The Minister of Trade and Commerce may get this information direct from Mr. Mahoney; I do not know. If he does, it would prove of great benefit to me as I would know where I could get it.

No doubt the Prime Minister, as Minister of External Affairs, and probably the Minister of Trade and Commerce, know that quite recently legislation was introduced into the American congress to provide for an embargo on all fish products into the United States. This is of particular concern to those engaged in the fishing industry. The departmental officials gave me the best information they could, but there does not seem to be any place where such information is concentrated. If I may say so, I think it ought to be concentrated in the Department of Trade and Commerce. Let me give one instance. The lobster code has recently been prepared. In that code is contained provisions with regard to measurement which may seriously affect our industry, although we do not think so. If that information were immediately available in the Department of Trade and Commerce it would prove to be of great assistance. In connection with tariffs, there is a possibility of the application of section 3 (e), I think it is, of the American act, whereby if it is found that importations are taking place under such conditions or in such quantities as to prejudice the commodities dealt with by the code, action may be taken by the president. Information as to what action may be taken or may be threatened to be taken under this section should be easily available to those interested in these industries.

Mr. STEVENS: We are supplied constantly with all this information by Mr. Mahoney and we keep a close check on all legislation, moves, and so on passed or made in the United States, as well as in other countries. All this information is available at any time.

Mr. BENNETT: The difficulty has been that in countries where legations have been set up the governments will deal only through the legations and not through the trade commissioners. Since I have held office difficulty has arisen as to the status of our trade commissioner in Paris. He found it difficult to approach the government about any matter concerning trade except through the legation. I do not know whether there is any international rule governing this, but that is the fact. The rule here is that information as it comes into the Department of External Affairs is sent to the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of Agriculture, or whatever department may be affected. We cannot ask foreign governments to depart from their settled rules of procedure; we have to follow the rules they prescribe.

Mr. RALSTON: I was not thinking of an endeavour to influence governments; I was speaking more along the line of having news and information made available.

Mr. STEVENS: We have it.

Mr. BENNETT: As it comes here it is always available.

Mr. RALSTON: Has the minister received any information during the last two or three days with regard to this legislation putting an embargo on fish?

Mr. STEVENS: It is very difficult for me to express any views on that subject. All I can say is that it is being watched with care and everything consistent with neighbourly relations is being done to protect Canadian interests.

Mr. BENNETT: No item in any code promulgated thus far by the United States has imposed any restriction upon Canadian trade.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not talking about codes that have been promulgated.

Mr. BENNETT: I am just stating that. The discussions which take place between Ottawa and Washington cannot be considered in this house until finality is reached. To do so would violate a fundamental principle of relations between outlying representatives of the government and the government. Once more I repeat, it is a matter of singular satisfaction that not one single item in any code promulgated thus far has imposed restrictions upon Canadian trade. In connection with the trade in alcoholic liquors, we had practically a monopoly as our commodities complied with the regulations while the commodities of other countries did not.

Mr. RALSTON: Every code promulgated so far has preserved carefully the provisions of section 3 (e) which states that if goods are imported under such conditions or in such quantities as injuriously to affect the producers under that code, application may be made to the president to prohibit importations or to provide for licensing restrictions. While the Prime Minister is quite right, there is always the sword of Damocles held over our head. I was not referring to codes but rather to news as to the progress of information.

Mr. BENNETT: Obviously it is such news that could not be supplied.

Mr. RALSTON: We could have news about it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If it is understood that we are to be given an opportunity to discuss the wheat question when the Canada Grain Act is under consideration, I shall have nothing more to say to-night.

Mr. STEVENS: It would come more properly under that bill.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, February 26, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 20, to amend the Immigration Act (definition of public charge).

Mr. GUTHRIE: Explain.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The purpose of this amendment is simply to define public charge in order that people who to-day are forced to accept unemployment relief will be excluded from deportation proceedings.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. WOODSWORTH moved that the said bill be now read the first time.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has this matter not already been dealt with this session? Not this paricular bill, but a similar bill introduced by another hon. member and voted upon?

Mr. BENNETT: It is the same bill in different words.

Mr. SPEAKER: The other bill was to amend another section of the same act. This bill seeks to amend section 2, the other was to amend section 40.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I point out that the bill introduced by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) had to do with the procedure with regard to deportation proceedings; that is that the municipalities to-day are required to report to the minister those coming under unemployment relief. This bill is an entirely different one, and would exclude from the undesirable classes those who come under unemployment relief. It is a different bill altogether from the preceding one. It is in line with the bill I introduced into this house a year ago.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Woodsworth moves that the bill to amend the Immigration Act (definition of public charge) be now read a first time.

Those in favour of the motion will say "aye."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those opposed will say "nay."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion the nays have it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Call in the members.

(The members having been called in).

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Woodsworth moves that the bill to amend the Immigration Act (definition of public charge) be now read the first time. Those in favour will kindly rise.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I rise to a point of order. I understand the motion is that the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill. That was the motion put to the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understood that motion to carry.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. gentleman who has just spoken is quite right. This bill has never been before this house except on one occasion.

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion is not debatable.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This is a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not see how we can intelligently vote on a bill that has never been before the house, and I protest against that method of procedure.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is not a point of order at all. The bill is now before the house and the motion is for first reading.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The bill is not before the house, and has not been printed.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member not wish to introduce the bill?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The bill has not been printed; hence it cannot be before the members of this house. I have had no opportunity of explaining what the bill is about.

Mr. SPEAKER: The practice is to print the bill after it has been given first reading. This bill is being dealt with as other bills before the house are dealt with. What is the hon. member's point of order?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My point of order is that it is customary in this house to have the introduction of a bill, and first reading usually takes place automatically. Then the bill is printed, and as members of the house we have an opportunity of seeing what the bill is. By the procedure now being adopted the members of this house have no opportunity at all of knowing what the bill really is, and I submit that it is not fair to reject the bill before it has been placed in the hands of the members of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member had an opportunity of explaining the bill when the motion was made for leave to introduce it, and to some extent he explained the bill. This bill is being treated as other bills before the house are treated; if it is given first reading all hon. members will have ample opportunity to consider it. If the house does not choose to give the bill first reading, that is the privilege of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I refer Your Honour to rule 746, at page 214:

> Though no amendment or debate is permissible on the question for reading the bill a first time, it is quite regular to divide the house thereon.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is what is being done.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Woodsworth) which was negatived on the following division:

SILVER AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) submitted a question as to those countries which had ratified the London silver agreement. I have no official information to give the house, but I am advised that up to the moment notice of signature has been given by the United States, Australia, India, and Mexico.

RIDING MOUNTAIN PARK

INQUIRY CONCERNING LICENCE FOR THE SALE OF BEER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Murphy). Has the application made to the Manitoba liquor commission for a beer licence in Riding Mountain park received the approval of the minister, or does he intend to give his approval to such application?

Hon. T. J. MURPHY (Minister of the Interior): The application has been made to the provincial government of the province of Manitoba. Any reply would necessarily have to be given by that body.

Mr. BROWN: Not quite a satisfactory answer.

WHEAT AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the other day the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) asked a question with respect to the wheat agreement. I find that the answer which I gave him the other day as to the computation of acreage on the three-year average, and yield on the ten-year average was correct. I propose by the end of the week, if I receive the information I am seeking, to give a more formal statement with respect to the whole matter.

WHEAT MARKETING BOARD

QUESTION AS TO ADVISABILITY OF CONSTITUTING SUCH BODY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. In recent months has the government given consideration to the advisability of setting up a regularly constituted wheat marketing board, and if so when may we expect an announcement thereon? As I failed to extend to my right hon. friend the usual courtesy notice in connection with this question, a reply at a later date will be satisfactory.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I am delighted to think the hon. gentleman has put it that way, because he asks a question and then asks further, as to when an announcement may be expected. Apparently he does not expect it to-day, and I am obliged to him.

SMALL LOAN COMPANY OF CANADA

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto) moved the second reading of Bill No. 15, to incorporate the Small Loan Company of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GEARY: This is a bill which I have introduced at the request of a very reputable set of people. While I know very little about it myself I am advised that it follows in its terms precisely the bill that was passed by this house last year. This bill has to do with the making of small loans on personal security. I am aware that there was some objection made to the bill last year, but as far as I am advised there was no change made therein, and I am also told that the superintendent of insurance approved the principle and thought that such companies as these were of some use in the community as they absorbed the pressure to get small loans rather than large loans, and loans on personal property rather than on real property.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is this bill to be referred to the private bills committee, may I ask?

Mr. GEARY: It will go to that committee, I suppose.

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I would like to make two observations upon the second reading of this bill. My first observation is that we have a bill before the house setting up a central bank, and therefore I do not see the necessity of incorporating the Small Loan Company of Canada.

My second observation is a more serious one. We all remember the Stavisky scandal in France which came about through the bankruptcy of a corporation of this very kind. Parliament should be very careful about incorporating small loan companies in Canada. I have always advised my electors to be prudent in these matters. I do not see why these gentlemen should come to parliament for a bill of this kind because there are loaning facilities in every branch of every chartered bank in Canada. These chartered banks come under the department of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), and there is a very thorough inspection of them, while the small loan companies are not subjected to the same inspection and care. If we give this bill its second reading I am afraid that people might go throughout the country selling shares of this corporation, just as they have done in the case of other companies, stealing the people's money and holding out to them the prospect of making huge profits if they invest in such a scheme. We know these birds of prey who tour the country urging the people to invest their money in such and such a scheme which the promoters say will produce for the people a profit of 25 and sometimes 50 per cent a year. But what happens? If a man subscribes $500 in such a scheme they cash his cheque and give him back $250 the same day and tell him, "Here is your profit, and you are getting it back the same day that you invested your money." Then they decamp with the other $250 and he never sees them again until the police catch them.

There was a finance corporation that failed in Toronto a few years ago. I am not against finance. I am not against the lending of money to poor people, but I do not like what we call in French "prêts à la petite semaine"—that Shylock method of lending money to individuals.

Companies of this sort ask all kinds of guarantees. We do not know anything about any of these people. They may be honest.

We may give them the benefit of the doubt and say that they might be honest but perhaps they are not, and it is my duty, representing not only my county but the Canadian people in this parliament, to advise my colleagues to be very careful about companies of this kind, and also to ask my hon. colleagues in this house not to let this bill pass without first of all scrutinizing it very thoroughly. Otherwise the people will say, "It is you, the House of Commons and the Senate, which passed this legislation giving these people the chance to cut the flesh of our fellow-citizens." I do not see the necessity for this bill. I do not know any of these people. I am always ready to oblige anyone who comes here with decent legislation, and perhaps this is decent legislation, but perhaps it is not. We need more information, and I would ask the hon. gentleman who has moved the second reading of this bill to delay before pressing for a vote on the second reading so that we may get more information.

Mr. R. W. GRAY (West Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose the second reading of this bill. I would call the attention of hon. members of the house to just two or three points before they vote on the second reading.

First of all, I would ask them to read section five of the bill and to note that paragraph (b) of that section provides that—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Read the section.

Mr. GRAY: It is a long section, and the hon. member has the bill before him. Paragraph (b) provides:

> Notwithstanding anything contained in the Interest Act, or in the Money Lenders Act, or in paragraph (c) of section sixty-three of the Loan Companies Act, —this company may do certain things which the section goes on to enumerate. I just wish to point out to the house that these various acts mentioned and section sixty-three of the Loan Companies Act were passed for the very purpose which the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has pointed out, for the protection of the people of this dominion, and that they have been on the statute books for many years. I am of the opinion, regardless of what the promoter of this bill may say, that we have quite enough of these small loan companies acts, and perhaps too many already, and the time has come when we should scrutinize them with a great deal more particularity than we have done in the past.

I would also call attention to subsection (i) of section five which permits the company to lend on various types of securities, and I would particularly ask hon. gentlemen to note that although subsection (i) of section five provides that the interest rate may not be more than seven per cent, this interest is deducted at the time the loan is made, and that the amount loaned is payable weekly, monthly or per annum as it may be provided, and so at the very end of the first month there is an overlapping of interest, and before the loan is finally paid off the party borrowing has paid very much more than seven per cent interest.

The next subsection (ii), marginally noted, Charges for Expenses, provides that two per cent upon the principal of the loan may be charged by the company for expenses. That makes nine per cent, and more as I have already pointed out.

The next subsection (iii) provides that there may be an additional charge. This subsection provides that for the drawing of a chattel mortgage which they take upon the various chattels as security they may charge an additional $10 regardless of the size of the loan. This is exorbitant, and I protest and ask the house, if they decide that this bill shall go to the private bills committee, to see that the whole bill be very carefully scrutinized in order that the general public may be protected.

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to agree with the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, although I am not unmindful of the fact that in days gone by similar charters have been granted by this parliament. In those days I protested against the granting of charters which gave to a company powers of the character mentioned in this bill. Surely the days of usury are past; if the chartered banks of this country are to be limited to six and seven per cent by action of this parliament, this same parliament should not set up a company which can charge forty per cent. Personally, I think it would be fair to have this bill go to the private bills, the banking and commerce or some other appropriate committee but I think this parliament should pause and consider before there is created under the imprimatur of this and the other house a corporation which will be able to do what this bill will permit it to do. I feel like voting against the second reading but if it is the sense of the house that this bill should go to a committee, well and good. Personally, I do not think we have room in this country for this class of company although I am bound to say that the superintendent of insurance has stated before committees of this house that this class of corporation fills a need in the community. I never agreed with him and I propose to vote against the second reading.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, we have on our files a bill to create a central bank of Canada and another one to revise the Bank Act of Canada. These bills are intended to revise the whole financial system of Canada. Under the circumstances, I think this is the proper time for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) and the government to step in and hold up this bill until they have learned from the action taken in connection with the other bills just what is the feeling of this house. I think this should be done before any further legislation of this character is permitted to pass.

Mr. WILFRED HANBURY (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I desire to add my opposition to this bill. The hon. member who introduced it (Mr. Geary) has referred to the fact that already similar companies are in existence. I do not think that is sufficient justification for the creation of this company and, in fact, I think we should give serious consideration to putting some curb upon those already in existence. I have in my office at the present time an illustration of where one of these companies has been receiving until recently one hundred per cent on their investment, mainly through what they call a financing charge. I think the time has come when this type of legislation should be gone into. We should not encourage the people to buy that for which they cannot afford to pay, and that is what this type of financing is supposed to do. I do not think I can agree with the hon. member who has suggested that we should allow this bill to go to committee; I think we should take a vote upon it right now and kill it immediately. If the hon. member wants to reconsider his bill and bring it up in another form which will put some limit upon the financing and other unreasonable charges, perhaps I might change my mind. I do not say that I am against any particular bill but I am against this type of legislation and I think this bill should be killed right now.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on several occasions this house has considered legislation of this character. The bill now before us has been approved by the superintendent of insurance and follows exactly the terms of three previous bills which were passed by this house. Personally I share the view of hon. members who have stated that permitting a company with statutory responsibilities or statutory authority to charge the rates which have been charged on personal loans is a scandal. Nevertheless, it must be remembered that on the second reading we consider the principle and not the details of a bill. The sections to which the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray) has referred are sections which the banking and commerce committee presumably would either strike out or amend. If this bill were destroyed at this stage it would mean that a number of persons who desire to be incorporated with a capital of a substantial sum of money would be deprived of that opportunity.

Mr. HANBURY: Even if they wanted to do business legitimately.

Mr. BENNETT: Even if they wanted to do business legitimately. It is the usual custom, as the hon. gentleman will remember with his bridge bill last year, to permit these bills to go to a committee where changes may be made which will conform to the views of the committee.

Mr. GRAY: I do not suggest that it should not go to a committee.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe the hon. gentleman is a member of that committee and I suggest that the bill should go to the committee for the purpose of eliminating all those objectionable sections to which he has referred. Then, as has been suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury), those who seek incorporation can either take it or leave it. I submit respectfully that these matters are matters to be dealt with by the committee and not by the house because the principle of the bill is the incorporation of a company with capital to make loans.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I submit that there is something more in this bill than simply the principle, to incorporate a company. It is the principle permitting it to do business along the lines indicated in the bill. By deciding as to the second reading we decide as to whether or not we want this kind of principle to prevail. I do not see why we should pass an undesirable principle at this stage and leave it to a committee to revise it afterwards.

Mr. BENNETT: The promoters could be heard.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is only a matter of less than an hour since a public bill was dealt with in a very different way. That bill was killed on the first reading before members had a chance to consider it. That bill could have gone to a committee which committee could have received suggestions from the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon) as to what changes should be made in order to bring it into harmony with the policies of the government. This procedure was not followed in the case of a public bill involving large numbers of our fellow Canadians and I do not see why it should be taken in the case of a company which asks for power to do business by methods which are generally believed to be not in keeping with the welfare of this country. I do not see why this bill should be put forward one stage.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): I oppose this bill for all the reasons which have been put forward and for another one as well. A great number of these small loan companies have received charters from the provincial governments and I do not see why this company should not make application to the government of Ontario for authority to do business in that province. They could then take their chances of being permitted to do business in the other provinces of Canada. They are now endeavouring to get the privilege of doing business in every province of Canada willynilly. I am against the principle of this bill and I intend to oppose it altogether. I know that the government proposes to bring in legislation to exercise some restraint upon these companies but heretofore such restraint has not been imposed and that is why such companies come to the federal government for their charters. For this reason more than any other I am opposing the second reading of this bill.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the reason such companies come to the federal government for charters is not to evade the requirements of any provincial legislation as they cannot operate or do business in any province of Canada without first obtaining a provincial licence under the terms of the provincial act.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Other companies have been doing it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I rise to speak with regard to this bill because I notice that the provvisional directors named in the bill represent a family in the city of Guelph, which is one of the best known families in the Dominion of Canada. The head of their family at the present time is Mr. Arthur Cutten of Chicago. This company will not prove a minor or temporary institution. It will be a most substantial undertaking with a million dollars of capital which will be largely if not altogether under the control of members of the Cutten family. This fact alone should be a sufficient answer to much of the criticism which has been offered upon this motion.

All the promoters ask in this motion is that this bill be read a second time and go to the appropriate committee. It may be sent to the private bills committee or it may be sent to the banking and commerce committee, I care not which; but when it goes to the committee the promoters of the bill are entitled to appear and state their case—they cannot appear in this house. The committee may incorporate in the bill such conditions or stipulations with respect to the operations of the company as it may see fit. But surely, having advertised this bill as required by law, having paid the fee as required by law, having properly brought the bill before parliament, the promoters are entitled to be heard in the fullest manner. That is all that the second reading of the bill involves. The bill will be fully under the control of whatever committee it is referred to, and any amendments the committee deems proper to place in the bill may be embodied in it. Subsequently it will be referred back to the house and the house in committee will again deal with it. I submit that the bill should be read the second time and sent to the appropriate committee so that it may be given the fullest consideration.

Mr. J. L. ILSLEY (Hants-Kings): If the house divides I shall have to vote to send the bill to the committee, because I agree with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) in the observations he has made. But in voting that way I should add a word of explanation, because, with the other hon. members who have spoken with respect to the operation of these companies, I am in thorough agreement. I know that in the part of Canada from which I come there is a great deal of complaint with respect to the operation of these companies that make small loans, and I respectfully suggest to the house and the government that possibly some steps should be taken to bring these companies a little more into line with what the public expects them to be.

It may be said that the provincial companies are incorporated by provincial law, but this parliament has jurisdiction over interest and interest rates, and it is high time that the basis of operation of this particular type of company be looked into. I shall vote to send the bill to the committee, if the house divides, but in doing so I want it understood that I am fully sensible of the objections to the measure.

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): I strongly object to this bill, and one of my chief reasons for objecting is the vote taken a little while ago on the bill that was presented by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). A gentleman presents a bill which affects the lives of many people, those liable to be separated from their families, and,—

Mr. BENNETT: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member is discussing a bill on which the house has already taken action, and further discussion of that bill must surely be out of order in connection with the motion now before us.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am giving my reason for opposing this bill. If I am in order I will go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion is for the second reading of Bill No. 15.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am giving my objections to this bill, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, you did not hear what I said. I said that the hon. gentleman is referring to a vote just taken and, under the motion now before the house, is discussing the previous bill which he says affects the lives of thousands of people. That bill has already been disposed of by the house, and according to the rules of this house, past debate having ended that matter, it cannot now be the subject of further discussion; that is all.

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a point of order, and I want to state my point of order. The rule of the house is this, that a member may not quote from any debate of the same session; but no member is prevented from referring to a previous act of this house, by way of comparison with what is being done now. I respectfully disagree with the member for West Calgary. If the hon. member for Provencher had attempted to read what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had said, while discussing the bill, he would be prevented by the Chair from reading. But he is not doing that at all; he is just referring to an act of this house, and he is perfectly entitled to do so. This is the point of order I want to raise, not only in connection with this debate but with respect to future action by this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Provencher will confine his remarks to the advisability or otherwise of giving the present bill second reading.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My reason for voting against this bill is this. The Minister of Justice said that these people had spent their money and that the custom of the house was to have such bills read the second time and sent to the committee on banking and commerce to be reviewed, so that its promoters might have an opportunity to appear and state their case. But this is my objection—and I think I am in order in the statement I am about to make. How can I vote either for or against a bill I have never seen? Yet this house votes against the principle of allowing bills to be introduced. I do not see any consistency in such action.

Mr. SPEAKER: The present motion is for the second reading of the bill; the first reading was carried.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: No doubt the first reading was carried, Mr. Speaker, but the principle is the same. Now, may I say that in my opinion we have too many of these loan companies who have gone about the country fleecing people who know nothing about finance. We have had such companies in Winnipeg. There was one music company that fleeced everyone it came in contact with; it had no other object than that. If you vote for the second reading of this bill you vote for the principle of it, as far as I understand the rules. If you refer the bill to a committee you are virtually saying, by a majority vote of this house, that you approve of the principle laid down in the bill, and I am opposed to it.

Mr. O. L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse): I will vote against the second reading of this bill, for a reason not yet stated in the house. It seems to me that the purpose of the bill is the creation of a pawnshop—a pawnshop similar to the one that caused so much trouble in France. You will be convinced of that if you read the beginning of section 5 of the bill. I have not my English file before me, but in French it reads:

(1) La compagnie peut, dans tout le Canada:

(a) acheter, vendre et négocier des contrats de vente conditionnelle, des billets de créances priviligiées, des contrats de vente à tempérament, des hypothèques mobilières—

The English version reads:

The company may throughout Canada:
(a) buy, sell, deal in and lend money on the security of conditional sales agreements, lien notes, hire purchase agreements, chattel mortgages—

Chattel mortgages are prohibited in Quebec by the civil code.

—trade paper, bills of lading, warehouse receipts, bills of exchange and choses-in-action; and may receive and accept from the makers, vendors or transferors thereof guarantees or other security for the performance and payment thereof and may enforce such guarantees and realize on such security.

The purpose of the bill is to authorize the company to loan money on chattel mortgages and on movable property pawned with them, and therefore the purpose of the bill is the creation of nothing else but a pawnshop. And we have already too many of these pawnshops.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): It seems to me that the very fact that these gentlemen come before parliament and ask for the powers enumerated in this bill would indicate that they intend to use those powers if they get an opportunity, and the powers asked for include the charging of higher rates than the law allows. Now, when men deliberately declare that this is their intention they should not be encouraged to go into the loaning business.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): I rise to oppose the second reading of this bill. It is true that we have some similar measures on the statute books, but companies have of late years attempted to get similar bills through this house and on two occasions that I know of they have been defeated. Only a year or so ago we had one very similar bill before the banking and commerce committee, and we then thought it was not in the best interests of the country to pass it. I trust this bill will not get second reading.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): While I am opposed to the enactment of any legislation of this kind for the reasons given, I have always believed that a bill should never be killed before it reaches a committee. In my parliamentary experience the attitude I have always assumed is that any bill properly introduced before the house should receive its first and second readings, go to committee and there have its merits threshed out. For that reason, while opposed to the principle of this legislation, I will have to vote for the second reading of the bill.

Mr. GEARY: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. GEARY: I have nothing to add except that I may agree with everything that has been said in opposition to this bill, I am not wedded to its provisions at all, but it is for the incorporation of a company for the purpose of making loans, a sort of business that according to the superintendent of insurance fills a need. I may be among the first to oppose some of the particular provisions of the bill, but as a general principle this bill has its right to go to the committee. My hon. friend, the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) spoke of pawnshops. Fortunately I am not in a position to say much about that class of business, but as far as my information goes this has nothing whatever in common with pawnshops. A pawnshop is a place for depositing certain concrete material, in return for which I understand you get a loan, and if you are lucky you pay the loan and get back your pledge. This is an entirely different proposition, having to do with conditional sales agreements, chattel mortgages, hire purchase agreements and so on, well-known to us in Ontario, perhaps not so well known to my hon. friend from Bellechasse. This bill may come back from the committee in an unrecognizable form. I shall be quite prepared to see it altered in any way that may commend itself to the committee, but that does not interfere I think with the principle that we should give the committee the opportunity to treat it as it pleases. One of my hon. friends reminds me of what I happened to observe before my hon. friend the Minister of Justice mentioned it, that the personnel of the incorporators is all right, there is no objection to be made to them in any way. At the least I think we should allow them their chance to come in person or by counsel before the committee and meet the objections and advocate the measure if they so choose.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Geary) which was agreed to on the following division:

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

*DUNDURN SASK., RELIEF CAMP

Mr. TOTZKE:

1. Were tenders called for the supply of door sets to the Dundurn, Saskatchewan unemployment relief camp?
2. What was the quantity required?
3. Who are the tenderers?
4. What was the price submitted by each tenderer?
5. To whom was the contract awarded and at what price?

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, with respect to questions Nos. 1, 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8, the government is without information. With regard to questions 2 and 3, they come under the well known rule, and are not in the public interest to answer.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does that include question No. 9?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

*CAIRO POSTAL CONGRESS

Mr. POULIOT:

1. What members of the Canadian delegation took part at the opening of the postal congress at Cairo?
2. How many meetings were held each day since the opening of the congress?
3. At how many meetings did each member of the Canadian delegation attend?
4. Are all the members of the Canadian delegation at Cairo at present?
5. If not: (a) who are those at present at Cairo and why did they remain; (b) what members have left Cairo; (c) why; (d) on what date did they leave there; (e) will they return directly from Cairo to Canada; (f) what is their itinerary for the return voyage; (g) where are they at present; (h) when are they expected in Canada?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have considered this question very carefully, and I consider it frivolous; it should not be on the order paper. I make the same ruling with regard to question No. 12; they will both be struck off.

*CAIRO POSTAL DELEGATION—COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Since the beginning of the session has the government communicated by cablegram, wireless, telegraph or wireless telephone, with the members of the Canadian delegation at the postal congress at Cairo?
2. If so, on what dates and in what manner?
3. Since the opening of the session have the members of the Canadian delegation at the postal congress at Cairo communicated with the government by cablegram, wireless telegraph or wireless telephone?
4. If so, on what dates and in what manner?

Mr. BENNETT: This is not in the public interest to answer.

Mr. POULIOT: I wish to explain just one thing in connection with this question, in order to facilitate an answer from the government.

Mr. SPEAKER: When the question has been answered the matter is not subject to debate. The hon. member will have to approach it in some other manner.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir, I will.

*"FORTY DAYS IN CANADA"

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Did the government send His Majesty King George V a copy of the album entitled, "Forty Days in Canada"?
2. If so, who sent it and at what date was it sent?
3. Did the government receive an acknowledgment of its reception?
4. If so, at what date and from whom?

Mr. SPEAKER: I find that this question was sufficiently answered on February 19; the answer will be found in Hansard.

FRENCH CIVIL SERVANTS

Mr. GOULET:

1. What was the total number of full time civil servants bearing French family names, within the salary range of $3,000 to $4,020, connected with any government department, board, commission or bureau, on January 31, 1934?
2. What was the total number of such civil servants within the salary range of $4,020 to $5,040, on January 31, 1934?
3. What was the total number of such civil servants of a class or grade calling for a minimum annual salary in excess of $5,040, on January 31, 1934?

Mr. CAHAN: Inasmuch as appointments to the civil service are made under the provisions of the Civil Service Act on the basis of the ascertained qualifications of the respective applicants and not on the basis of the racial affinities of the appointees, the information sought is not available.

OTTAWA-HAWKESBURY ROAD

Mr. GOULET:

1. Has the government assumed the road from Ottawa to Hawkesbury as part of the trans-Canada route?
2. If so, will the county continue to pay 20 per cent to the government as in the past?

Mr. GORDON:

1. Public highways in the various provinces of the dominion are wholly under provincial jurisdiction and the dominion has not assumed any responsibility in regard to provincial roads either in part or in whole. Under the various relief acts the federal government has, however, been contributing to the amounts expended by the provinces on provincial highways, including the so called trans-Canada highway.

2. See answer to No. 1.

MONTREAL PARCEL POST TRANSPORTATION

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Has Mr. Ernest Laurent the contract for the transportation of parcel post in the city of Montreal?

2. If so: (a) since when; (b) for a temporary or a fixed period; (c) for what period; (d) at what terms; (e) for what considerations; (f) what amount has he received under the terms of this contract up to the 1st of February, 1934; (g) was this contract awarded after tenders were called; (h) if so, was his original tender the lowest; (i) who were the other tenderers and the amount of their respective tenders; (j) was he recommended to the Post Office Department; (k) if so, by whom?

Mr. DUPRE (for Mr. Sauve):

1. Yes.

2. (a) October 28, 1930; (b) temporary period; (c) at Postmaster General's pleasure; (d) and (e) 70 cents per hour from October 28, 1930, to September 30, 1931, and 80 cents per hour from October 1, 1931, to date; (f) $90,450.95; (g), (h), (i), (j) and (k) no. Service is operated under a temporary agreement by order of the Postmaster General.

*MONEY HELD BY CHARTERED BANKS

Mr. SPENCER:

1. What was the total amount of money held by the chartered banks on the 31st day of December, 1933: (a) in gold; (b) subsidiary coin; (c) dominion notes; (d) bank notes?

2. What was the amount of deposits on the same date: (a) on demand; (b) after notice?

Mr. RHODES: The information sought in this question is a matter of official record, and will be found in the monthly statement of the Canadian chartered banks, the last copy of which appeared in the Canada Gazette of January 27. I am sending a copy to my hon. friend.

UNEMPLOYMENT—DISRAELI, WOLFE COUNTY

Mr. LAFLECHE:

What were the amounts paid in connection with Unemployment Relief Act to the village and parish of Disraeli, Wolfe county, from 1930 to February 1, 1934?

Mr. GORDON: The following contributions have been made to the province of Quebec with respect to unemployment relief in the village and parish of Disraeli, Wolfe county: village of Disraeli, $5,997.96; parish of Disraeli, $1,436.41.

PICTOU, N.S., MARINE AGENT

Mr. DUFF:

1. Has any appointment been made to fill the office of agent of the Marine and Fisheries department at Pictou, Nova Scotia, since the death of J. R. Davies?

2. If not, is it intended to fill the vacancy?

3. If so, when?

Mr. DURANLEAU:

1. No.

2. No.

3. Answered by No. 2.

CREAM SEPARATORS—REVENUE COLLECTED

Mr. SPENCER:

What was the amount of revenue collected on cream separators by the Customs department during 1932 and 1933, respectively?

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. MATTHEWS:

Customs duty collected on imports of cream separators entered for consumption in Canada during the fiscal years ended March 31st, 1932 and 1933:

	Fiscal year 1931-1932	Fiscal year 1932-1933

County of Restigouche
Public works	5,464 63	2,004 57	Nil

IMMIGRATION TO CANADA

Mr. ROBERGE:

How many immigrants entered this country from 1930 to 1934?

Mr. GORDON:

Calendar year 1930	104,806
" " 1931	27,530
" " 1932	20,591
" " 1933	14,382

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY TREATY—TRANSLATION

Mr. BOUCHARD:

Referring to the declaration made by the government in sessional paper No. 137, tabled February 6, 1934, to the effect that:

"The treaty between Canada and the United States relative to the St. Lawrence waterways was translated, at the request of the Department of the Secretary of State, by one who was not then and is not in the public service of Canada, but his services were rendered gratuitously."

Under what authority was the following mention "Edition Française du Service de la Traduction Générale (Chambre des Communes)" printed on the cover page of the blue book containing the French translation of the St. Lawrence deep waterway treaty?

Mr. CAHAN:

The translation into the French language of the treaty respecting the St. Lawrence waterways, to which the Secretary of State referred, was made and published on July 18, 1932.

On September 29, 1932, a translation of the same treaty into the French language was received at the printing bureau from the translation service of the House of Commons, which was subsequently printed and published in the blue book mentioned.

PELAGIC SEALING TREATY

Mr. PLUNKETT:

1. Under the terms of the Pelagic sealing treaty of 1911, has Canada received any money or returns from Japan or Russia?
2. What was the total amount received from Japan under the terms of said treaty from 1911 to the last returns?
3. What is the total amount received from Russia under the terms of said treaty from 1911 to last returns?
4. On what date does the Pelagic sealing treaty between the United States, Canada, and Great Britain expire?

Mr. DURANLEAU:

1. Yes.
2. $11,805.17.
3. $5,308.97.
4. It remains in force until twelve months after written notice is given by one or more of the parties to all the others of desire to terminate it. It is also provided that following such notice, on the request of any one of the high contracting parties, a conference shall be held to consider, and if possible, agree, upon a further extension of the convention with such additions or modifications, if any, as may be found desirable.

ASHMONT, ALTA., MAIL DELIVERY

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. What was amount of contract of Roman Filyvich, of Ashmont, Alberta, for delivery of mail between Ashmont and Saddle lake?
2. What amount is now being paid to the present contractor?
3. Were tenders called for such mail contract, if so, who tendered and what is amount of each tender?

Mr. DUPRE (for Mr. Sauve):

1. Tenders were invited for a new contract and were due in the department on the 23rd June, 1933.

2. The following tenders were received: Ramon Filewich, Ashmont, $245; John Hackman, Ashmont, $280; W. J. Draper, Ashmont, $300; Zae Ingram, Cork, $301.60; Lisle A. Lawrence, Ashmont, $325; Walter Elliott, Ashmont, $350, reduced to $275; Percy W Pruden, Ashmont, $350; A. E. Adams, Ashmont, $400.

3. The contract was awarded to Mr. Ramon Filewich on the 28th June, 1933. Representations were subsequently received that Ramon Filewich was a communist and a report was secured from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police stating that he, as well as his father and brothers were active communists. Instructions were issued to cancel the contract on three months' notice and a new contract was authorized with Mr. Walter Elliott, a returned soldier, at $275 per annum.

DALHOUSIE, N.B., POST OFFICE

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Is the government paying any rent for post office quarters at Dalhousie, New Brunswick?
2. If so, what monthly or yearly rent is being paid?
3. Has the government since September 1, 1930, purchased any land in the town of Dalhousie, for a post office site?
4. If so, when was such land purchased, from whom, what price was paid, and when?
5. Has a post office or a building of any kind been erected on such land purchased for a post office site?
6. If not, will a post office be built in the town of Dalhousie?
7. Has it been called to the attention of the government that the land purchased for a site for a public building in the town of Dalhousie, if any, is undesirably located?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Yes.
4. (a) August 14, 1931; (b) James Wallace; (c) $4,500.
5. No.
6. Matter under consideration.
7. No.

2. If so, what is the nature and what is the annual amount of these subsidies, for each service?
3. How much does this company receive from the government of Canada for the transportation of the Canadian mail for each of its navigation lines in the Pacific ocean?
4. Does this company give preference to the citizens of Canada in the employment of its officers, engineers, stokers, waiters, sailors, and other employees, of its navigation services in the Pacific ocean?
5. If not, what will be the attitude of the government in connection with the payment of the above mentioned subsidies?

Mr. CAHAN: Return tabled herewith.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

WHEAT AGREEMENT

Mr. MOTHERWELL:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents, that may have been received from any member of the Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta governments, respectively, by any member of the Federal government, during the past twelve months, with respect to the international wheat agreement, or the advisability or otherwise of coming to such an agreement.

ST. SIMEON DE BONAVENTURE WHARF

Mr. MARCIL:

For a copy of pay list and accounts for material, in connection with work done at Augustin Poirier wharf at St. Simeon de Bonaventure, under supervision of Jean Bugold, in 1933.

CAIRO POSTAL CONGRESS

Mr. POULIOT

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Post Office Department and the travelling agency or agencies who arranged the trip of the Canadian delegation to the postal congress at Cairo.

Mr. DUPRE (for Mr. Sauve): In reference to this motion, I am informed that there is no correspondence on this subject on the files of the Post Office Department.

Mr. SPEAKER: I ask the hon. member to withdraw the motion.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Mr. POULIOT: I cannot withdraw anything. If you wish to strike it off, it is all right, but I cannot withdraw it.

Mr. SPEAKER: No. 5 will be dropped.

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Post Office Department and different newspapers, in connection with the sending of various journals to the members of the Canadian delegation to the postal congress at Cairo during their trip overseas.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion this is a frivolous motion, and cannot properly be moved in this House of Commons. I will order it to be stricken off.

TRANSLATION SERVICES

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of all correspondence, summaries, files, suggestions, recommendations made by the Clerk of the House of Commons to the members of government and to the members of the Civil Service Commission, in connection with the translation in the federal administration, since 1930.

Mr. BENNETT: This would be an improper return. There are no communications with the clerk of the house. He has sometimes been asked questions from time to time with respect to matters of this kind, such as translation, but there is no correspondence with him. What there is is in the nature of privileged communications, between one office and another, which the government should not produce.

Mr. SPEAKER. No. 7 is not in order. It will be dropped.

ST. JEAN-DE-MATHA, QUE., POSTMASTER

Mr. FERLAND:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, inquiries, affidavits and official reports, in the possession of the Post Office Department, in connection with the resignation of notary Amédée Dugas as postmaster of St. Jean-de-Matha in the county of Joliette, and the appointment of his successor Léopold Marcil, since the month of August, 1930.

WEST BACCARO, N.S., BREAKWATER

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver), for Mr. Ralston:

For a copy of all pay lists, bills, vouchers and other documents in respect of work done, material supplied or money paid out, in connection with the work during 1933 and 1934, on the breakwater at West Baccaro, Shelburne county, Nova Scotia, with a statement showing the work actually done in 1933 and 1934, and the sum expended and/or incurred therefor up to the time the work stopped on or about January 20, 1934, and the work remaining to be done and the estimated cost thereof.

PORT LA TOUR, N.S., BREAKWATER

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver), for Mr. Ralston:

For a copy of all pay lists, bills, vouchers and other documents in respect of work done, material supplied or money paid out, in connection with the work done during 1933 on the breakwater at Port La Tour, Shelburne county, Nova Scotia, with a statement showing the work actually done in 1933, and the sum expended and/or incurred therefor, and the work remaining to be done and the estimated cost thereof.

CANADIAN LEGATION AT TOKYO

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver), for Mr. Casgrain:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the government of Canada or any of its officers and the Minister Plenipotentiary in Tokyo, regarding the construction of a public building for the Canadian Legation at Tokyo, as well as a copy of the order in council authorizing the construction of said building, plans, specifications and contracts, and any documents in possession of the government having any reference to the construction of said public building for the Canadian Legation at Tokyo.

OLD AGE PENSIONS, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. MacLEAN:

For a copy of all correspondence which passed between the government of Prince Edward Island and the federal government, in connection with old age pensions, including a copy of the agreement entered into by the province and the federal government with respect to this matter.

RIVIERE DES ILOTS—MATERIALS USED

Mr. BRASSET:

(1) For a copy of all pay lists and statements of stone and wood used on work done at la rivière des Ilots, Gaspé county, for the year 1932-33, Foreman Alphonse Boucher; (2) for a copy of all pay lists in connection with work done by the Public Works department at la rivière des Ilots, Gaspé county, for the year 1933, Foreman Baptiste Grenier; (3) for a copy of all pay lists and statements showing amount of stone and wood used in connection with work done by the Public Works department at la rivière des Ilots, Gaspé county, for the year 1933, Foreman B. Grenier.

WYCOCOMAGH, N.S., MAIL ROUTE

Mr. DUFF:

For a copy of all correspondence, documents, tenders, and any other papers, on file in the Post Office Department, for the years 1932 and 1933, concerning the calling for new tenders, or the awarding of same, with the names of the tenderers and the amounts of the tenders, for the mail route between Wycocomagh and South West Margaree, Nova Scotia.

CAPE BAULD, N.B., BREAKWATER

Mr. VENIOT:

For a copy of pay rolls, statement of material supplied, showing the names of persons supplying such material and prices paid for same, in connection with work done in 1933 on the Cape Bauld breakwater, Westmorland county, New Brunswick.

BIMETALLIC CURRENCY

MOTION PROPOSING ISSUANCE OF PAPER MONEY AGAINST SILVER AT FIXED RATIO TO GOLD

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved:

Whereas, goods or services between nations or people can only be paid for either by other goods or services, or by some unit of value acceptable to those desiring such goods or services, and which unit of value has for ages been the precious metals, silver and gold;

And whereas, for centuries past, silver was the only precious metal used, both as currency and as the unit of value for the interchange of goods and services;

And whereas, latterly, gold was alone used by the leading nations of the world as the one unit of value for the exchange of goods and services and for the issuing of paper currency;

And whereas, the adoption of trade barriers and restrictions by many nations coupled with the very limited amount of gold available in the world for the interchange of goods and services has in large measure contributed to, if not brought about the unemployment of millions of people with its consequent untold misery and suffering;

And whereas, due to economic and existing monetary conditions many thousands of Canadian citizens have had to be sustained or given employment by the state;

And whereas, Canada has been borrowing large sums to provide for the relief of the unemployed and destitute;

And whereas, the issuing of currency in Canada has been based on certain coverage of gold, thereby restricting the amount of currency issued;

Therefore be it resolved,—That, in the opinion of this house, the government take immediate steps to adopt silver in addition to that of gold for the issuance of currency either in the form of paper certificates or as coinage, and that silver be again recognized and accepted as legal tender by the Dominion of Canada at a fixed ratio to that of gold.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in offering this resolution to the house I should like at the outset to say that I am doing so, not with the idea that its adoption will bring any panacea for the impasse, economic and monetary, existing throughout the world to-day, but rather that it would go a long way towards the stabilization of currency which I think will be generally agreed is more necessary to-day than at any other time in our history. To put into effect the proposal contained in the resolution would at least be a step in the right direction.

I realize, of course, that the worshippers of gold, those who advocate the single standard of gold, are in the majority and that those who have advocated and are advocating that silver be used in addition to gold are much fewer in number. However, their numbers are gradually growing, not only in the United States but in all other countries as well. In this country we have quite a few advocates of silver. Some hon. members of this house, including the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), have at various times advocated the rehabilitation of silver. The Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, as far back as 1931, also made this statement:

> I can assure you that I am more and more convinced, as time goes on, that the fundamental cause of our present difficulty is really monetary, and that it is the penalty for a long-pursued and very stupid policy of unduly forcing the gold standard and driving silver—the medium of exchange of half the world—into such low price levels as to paralyze the buying powers of hundreds of millions of humanity. There seems to be no leadership in the present situation at all, and it will have to soon develop or troubles political will follow on troubles commercial.

There is also another prominent advocate of silver in the person of Father Coughlin of the United States, who according to press dispatches, has, it is estimated, more than a million followers who believe that silver should be recognized and accepted as a legal base with gold.

In the limited time at my disposal I cannot go very fully into all the "whereases" of my resolution, but I think it is a fair statement that each "whereas" clause is a statement of fact, and I believe of actual history.

Take the first "whereas":

> Whereas, goods or services between nations or people can only be paid for either by other goods or services, or by some unit of value acceptable to those desiring such goods or services, and which unit of value has for ages been the precious metals, silver and gold;

I do not think any hon. member will disagree with that statement. Then I come to the second clause:

> And whereas, for centuries past, silver was the only precious metal used, both as currency and as the unit of value for the interchange of goods and services;

In regard to that I think everyone in the house who has given the matter even a casual examination must realize that in the early stages of mankind's history barter, the exchange of goods for goods, was the first medium of exchange. But early in the history of the world barter was discarded, and man adopted one or other of the precious metals, particularly silver. The history of silver goes away back to Bible times. In Genesis, chapter 23, it is recorded that Abraham bought a field for burying his people, and in the sixteenth verse of that chapter we are told that he paid four hundred shekels of silver in current money for that field. That is going a long way back and I mention it to show that silver has been used from the very earliest times. Right on down through the ages, through Anglo-Saxon times and down to the eighteenth century, silver has been used. It is true that gold was also used, but silver was the chief medium of exchange and it had its price to gold; in other words, it was a case of gold to silver, not silver to gold. In fact, the pound sterling was based on the price of one pound of silver. One pound of silver was recognized as one pound sterling, and hence we have the term sterling silver.

We come to the year 1717, when Great Britain was the first nation to adopt what we call to-day bimetallism. In that year Great Britain added gold as primary currency to silver. In 1816 a change was however made. Great Britain for the first time in its history, and for the first time in the history of the world, I believe, went on the gold standard. That change was made not because silver had failed or was inadequate but for this reason, as given by those who have delved into such matters: The bankers, especially the Rothschilds, controlled the debt after the Napoleonic wars and so benefited by the change to gold. At that time Great Britain was starting in upon her industrial era, and she could therefore purchase more goods abroad in silver countries by purchasing on the single standard of gold. After the act of 1816 she had what is known as a bimetallic standard.

In 1870, after the Franco-Prussian war, Germany compelled France to pay her debts in gold, Germany reaping thereby a great benefit by adopting gold as the single standard.

In 1873 we have the United States discontinuing her silver currency and going on to the gold standard.

I have touched very briefly on these periods, Mr. Speaker, as they are outstanding in any discussion of this subject. I would ask the house to take note that those three periods I have mentioned, 1816, 1870 and 1873, when the bankers of the world compelled the different countries to go on the gold standard and discard silver as the prime metal, were periods of great distress.

We come along to the year 1920, in our own times. Gold has always been an obsession with the Bank of England. In 1920 international bankers met at Berne and there decided to go on gold and to discard silver entirely. As a matter of fact, Germany in that year was offered gold by international bankers so that she also could go on the gold standard. The price of silver in that year was a little over one dollar an ounce. Gold was at a discount. From 1920-1921 the demonetization of silver started. Great Britain I believe was the first country to demonetize silver, although there is some doubt regarding that, some authorities stating that the United States first started it by demonetizing her silver. These authorities say that Great Britain was the first. Great Britain and the United States, either jointly or following one another, started to debase or demonetize their silver coinage and it was not long before other countries of the world followed suit. In 1925 Great Britain purchased from the United States 260,000,000 silver dollars. These were taken to the old country and melted down. There were added 200,000,000 ounces of copper and from this mixture was fabricated a counterfeit or false coin containing 50 per cent silver and 50 per cent copper. The purer silver coins had been gradually called in and these were melted down and the resultant silver dumped on the Chinese market. It was during this year that the break took place in the price of silver.

Great Britain then went a little further. Two years later she issued a makeshift paper currency for the 350,000,000 people of India. She melted down one billion rupees and issued one billion rupees in paper. When this amount of silver was thrown on the world's markets the price broke to the lowest it had even been. Not only did Great Britain do this but she compelled the Indian government to place a tax of 11 cents per ounce against silver in an effort to stop an influx of silver into that country. I should like to quote from a United States Department of Commerce bulletin, issued in 1933 and referring to a committee which investigated this matter of debasement. One paragraph reads as follows:

> According to the sixty-first annual report of the deputy master and comptroller of the Royal Mint for 1930, the weight of the silver coinage withdrawn during the ten years was about 6,000 tons. One can estimate the approximate weight of silver in this amount, which would be about 5,550 tons, or 181,258,560 ounces. The weight of the new coins minted is given in the above-mentioned report as about 4,800 tons. Estimating from this figure, it would appear that the silver content, which would be about 2,400 tons, represents about 78,382,080 ounces. Thus there appears to have been, during the ten years, a surplus balance of about 3,150 tons, or about 102,876,480 ounces.

It is estimated that in the world to-day there is over $6,000,000,000 of debased silver coinage. Like other countries, Canada followed the lead of Great Britain. It might be interesting to the house to know that until 1920 the silver coins issued by Canada were what is known as ·925 fine or, in other words, 9¼ tenths pure. In 1920 a change was made and from then on the silver content was reduced to ·800 which is 8 tenths fine. To-day an ounce of silver minted into Canadian coins produces $1.60 of coinage. Taking silver as being worth forty cents an ounce, for forty cents worth of silver the government issues $1.60 in Canadian coins. I give this illustration as I want to put before the house a clear picture of this matter and endeavour if possible to make my resolution more plain.

The short time at my disposal does not permit me to give the full details of the manipulations of the bankers but in these few remarks I hope I have shown that the monetary system now existing in the world has not been brought about by chance but by straight manipulation by the bankers of the world. It is the worship of the golden calf, and each monetary manipulation has been followed by long periods of low prices, distress and extreme poverty. Clause 4 of the resolution reads:

> And whereas, the adoption of trade barriers and restrictions by many nations coupled with the very limited amount of gold available in the world for the interchange of goods and services has in large measure contributed to, if not brought about the unemployment of millions of people with its consequent untold misery and suffering;

I do not think any hon. member will deny the assertion that the adoption of trade barriers and restrictions by many nations coupled with the very limited amount of gold has in a large measure brought about the economic distress which prevails throughout the entire world. I should like to give a few figures with regard to the limitation of gold. It is estimated that in the world to-day there is a total of $12,000,000,000 in gold. This is held by practically three nations, the United States, France and Great Britain; 250,000,000 people own practically all the gold while 1,600,000,000 people have none. As someone has said, this is just like a poker game where all the chips are held by three players. The world's current debt is estimated at $750,000,000,000 which is a ratio of seventy-five to one to the gold held. The interest on this debt at five per cent amounts to $37,500,000,000. The debt of the world to the United States alone is $12,500,000,000. Why delude ourselves about the so-called gold standard when forty nations have abandoned it? Can anyone favour a return of that standard without a redistribution of gold? A few years ago the trade of the world was estimated at $68,000,000,000 although it has now dropped to somethink like $28,000,000,000. Trade cannot be carried on against the present tariff barriers which exist plus the shortage which there now is of the one unit of value in use to-day, namely, gold. It has been said that modern engineers cannot conceive of the methods by which the pyramids were erected, but I think we have surpassed even that great feat. We are attempting to balance a pyramid of debt and trade on its apex instead of on its base. I do not think there is any doubt that trade restrictions and lack of gold have contributed to the unemployment and misery which we now have. Clause 5 reads:

> And whereas, due to economic and existing monetary conditions many thousands of Canadian citizens have had to be sustained or given employment by the state;

I need hardly dwell on this phase of the matter because it has been brought out amply that there is in Canada over half a million people who are unemployed and well over a million who are being kept by the state. Clause 6 reads:

> And whereas, Canada has been borrowing large sums to provide for the relief of the unemployed and destitute;

I think it was the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) who stated that $173,000,000 has been expended by the dominion government on relief. A return was tabled the other day by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) in which it is stated that the province of Manitoba owes over $6,000,000, the province of British Columbia over $7,000,000 and the province of Alberta over $8,000,000, all borrowed for the relief of unemployment or the borrowings made necessary by the lack of employment.

Clause 7 reads:

> And whereas the issuing of currency in Canada has been based on certain coverage of gold, thereby restricting the amount of currency issued—

I do not think anyone will refute that assertion, nor is it necessary for me to say a great deal regarding it. I am sure that everyone has seen the figures in this connection and knows that the total amount of gold in the country is roughly $70,000,000, whereas the notes outstanding against it amount to $184,427,058, or a coverage of gold of 40 per cent. In fact, I think the banking and commerce committee puts the coverage at exactly 38 per cent.

I come now to the resolution itself, which I will read:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government take immediate steps to adopt silver in addition to that of gold for the issuance of currency either in the form of paper certificates or as coinage, and that silver be again recognized and accepted as legal tender by the Dominion of Canada at a fixed ratio to that of gold.

In dealing with this proposed resolution I wish to make my position clear with regard to the suggestion that Canada should adopt silver. Personally I am one of those who fear uncontrolled inflation. Those who have read history must realize that no nation can turn on the printing presses and survive, at least without great distress to the people, and especially the common people. I realize that as a cure the printing press cannot be turned on. But if the world must use precious metals I maintain that we should have silver in addition to gold. Certain efforts are being made in the great country to the south of us in connection with gold, but I believe that gold alone will not raise prices, and what is just as desirable to-day is the stabilization of currency. I claim that both these are impossible without the use of silver and especially in order to retain confidence and stability.

Before proceeding very far with the resolution itself I want to dicuss arguments that are sometimes made against the use of silver. One argument frequently heard is that if a country adopted silver as currency that country would be flooded with silver. That this is unfounded and grossly exaggerated I will show by certain figures which I am going to put on Hansard relative to the amount of silver in some countries of the world to-day. Some historians, especially those who have gone into the question of silver, have totalled up the amount produced in the world since the fourteenth century and it is estimated that a total of 14 billion ounces of silver has been produced. But the average world production of silver has run, between the years 1914 and 1930, at around 250 million ounces. In 1914 it was 178,331,433 ounces and in 1930 it was 245,788,030. But taking the average for a span of years it is safe to say that the average world production runs between 225 million and 250 million ounces of silver. The ratio has often been quoted as 16 to 1; this is the proportion which the total world production of silver bears to that of gold. Over long periods, taking the amount of gold that has been produced in the world each year in comparison with the amount of silver produced, the ratio has been all the way from 10 to 18 per cent; but over an average of years the output of silver has had a ratio to gold of 16 to 1. That explains why rulers in days gone by adopted that ratio, and that is where we have got it.

Canada produces a considerable amount of silver, and in passing I might give the figures for 1932-33. In 1932 we produced 18,347,907 ounces and last year we produced 15,360,764 ounces; and it is carefully estimated that 66 per cent of the silver produced in Canada comes from copper, lead and zinc. Now, regarding the ordinary consumption, if one can use that word with respect to silver, that has also been carefully compiled by those who have given the subject consideration, and it is found that the consumption of silver by various countries has averaged between 200 million and 250 million ounces. But what has brought about the flood of silver during the past few years has been the fact that many countries have not only debased their coinage but have sold the resulting fine silver in the world's markets, thereby bringing down the price. Not only has the throwing of this silver on the market had its effect on price, but there was also the fact that governments were persisting in this practice, and there was no telling how long they would continue to do so. That also had its effect on the price. With respect to the debasement of coinage, it has been estimated by some authorities that Great Britain alone, in ten years, had thrown upon the world's markets 541 million ounces of fine silver—silver taken from her coinage, not silver bought from mines.

During the past number of years, it may interest the house to know, and especially since 1920, there has been an average amount of 200 million ounces of silver thrown on the markets of the world by various countries, all the result of the melting-up of silver coinage. That, on top of world mine production, has demoralized the whole industry and, as I have stated, brought down the price of silver to the lowest point it has been in many years.

Another argument in regard to silver has been that the silver mines would benefit. One man said to me, "You must be boosting for the silver mines." I said to him, "My friend, you have not said anything about the gold mines, though they have had a little Klondyke to themselves this past year; for during 1933 they received over $23,000,000 extra for the gold they produced." I am speaking of course of gold produced in Canada. I commented on this not many days ago, and I repeat to-day, that the government should have taken this profit instead of allowing the mine owners to get away with $23,000,000 extra, because I have figures to show that some mines in Canada are producing gold around $15 an ounce, and with the price of gold at $20.67 they were making a fair return on their investment. But when gold went up to $34 and they were allowed to ship it out of this country at that figure they made fabulous fortunes out of gold in one year's transactions. As I have stated, the figures given by the department show the extra money obtained as some $23,380,000. Those profits I believe, during these times especially, should have gone into the exchequer of this country. Others argue that metals are useless. I realize that the ideal system would be one in which the unit of value would remain constant, that a dollar to-day would have the same purchasing value as five or ten years hence. That is something that has been sought for many centuries, but has not yet been attained. I realize also that paper money is not sound money. People still have confidence in metallic coinage. I believe it was the Prime Minister who pointed out in a speech here last year that until the majority of people of the world would confidently accept paper money from other nations, the precious metals, especially gold, if not silver, will have to be used. But one must realize that sixty per cent of the population of the world, 1,600,000,000 people, still use silver; in countries like China, where few banks exist and there it little or no paper money in circulation, every money transaction is carried out with silver or metallic coinage. In India, with its teeming millions, where wealth is reckoned in silver, where dowries given on the marriage of daughters are paid in silver, where money is hoarded as the wealth of the people whether silver is dear or cheap, the accumulated hoards of the people are in the form of silver the value of which is greatly affected by changing values. I am not dealing with a theory; if I were I would probably advocate doing away with all metallic backing for currency, but I realize, as most hon. members do, that most civilized countries—I will not say all civilized, but countries like Great Britain, the United Sates and our own—have built up a monetary system whereby paper has become the instrument of transactions, and in effect the money of the nation.

A change in currency values affects the lives of all, but this power is not held by the government to-day, the money changers own and control the yardstick and can contract or stretch it as they see fit, making the changes to suit themselves, and so in large measure they control the economic life of the people. It has been the bankers and financiers of the world who have forced all countries on to the single standard of gold. As I will endeavour to show, they robbed over 1,600,000,000 people when they forced them to use gold alone as the yardstick or measure of value. Take for instance China; in 1929 the tael was worth.

I believe, 64 cents. To-day it is only worth 34 cents in gold, because the bankers say; We do not want your silver, we are all on the gold standard now—or they said so until recently. So the value of China's silver coinage fell, with the result that China and countries on the silver standard were able to buy much less, as they had to put up so much more silver to buy from countries on the gold standard.

The other night I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question regarding wheat going to China from Australia. I believe the reason Australia has done this greater business in wheat with China is not that Australian wheat is any better than ours for the purposes of the Chinese, but it is due entirely to the exchange factor. Australian currency has a lower exchange value than ours. I will place on Hansard some figures in support of that contention, just giving round figures. In 1929 we imported from Australia over $3,000,000 worth of goods. In 1933 we were importing a little more; it had gone up to over $5,000,000, but our exports to Australia in 1929 were over $19,000,000, whereas last year they had dropped to just a little over $10,000,000 worth. Take Canada's trade with China and see how the figures compare. In 1929 we imported from China almost $3,000,000 worth of goods. In 1933 we were importing a little less, but the startling figures are those in regard to our exports to China. In 1929 they were over $27,000,000, whereas last year we exported to that country only a trifle over $6,500,000. Looking at Australia's trade with China you find that it has greatly increased in the last few years, due to the fact that the currency of Australia was lower even than that of the old country, and also the fact that China, being on a silver basis, could therefore purchase more in Australia than she could in Canada.

One striking fact that I think should be placed on record is that our loss of trade with China is not entirely due to poverty there, as in the case of our own countries, for internally there has been an industrial boom in China during the past three years. The loss of trade between Canada and China has been due not to the poverty of the Chinese but to the fact that we in this country have refused to accept their standard of value, which is silver, and are demanding that they use ours, namely gold.

There are one or two authorities that I would like to quote in support of this resolution, or the idea that countries should adopt silver as a currency basis. The first is Sir George Paish, the distinguished English economist, who in his recent very interesting and very illuminating book, The Way to Recovery, says:

> In considering the possibilities of trade development in China, one has to realize that one is dealing with the second largest country in the world with an area of four millions of square miles and with a population of no less than four hundred millions of souls (approximately one-fifth of the world's entire population) which is considerably greater than India's, two and a half times greater than Russia's and nearly three and a half times greater than America's. This immense population at present is supplied with less than 8,000 miles of railway and with very few good roads suitable for motor traffic. Were China to build the 100,000 miles of railway contemplated and designed by Sun Yat Sen, and were she to be assisted to accomplish this work in the not distant future by means of loans supplied from abroad, a great stimulus would be given, both to Chinese trade and to the trade of all countries.

As my time is short I shall have to shorten the quotation; I want to get to his last remark:

> Furthermore, more active trade in China and the influx of large amounts of foreign capital for many years would necessitate a much greater supply of silver currency, and by raising the price of silver would enhance the value of China's present immense stock of silver taels. In this way there would be created a renewed spirit of confidence in China and her obligations could be met with much greater ease than is now possible with the price of silver and the value of the tael at the present abnormally and disastrously low levels.

Again take Mr. Kann's report—I haven't time to read it all, but he states in his report of last year:

> The sale by governments had a doubly harmful consequence: first, because large extra quantities of silver were thrown on the market, irrespective of whether, when and where these were wanted; and second, the baneful psychological effect caused by the uncertainty, or rather the certainty, of more coming, in the near future. This has been a huge black cloud overshadowing the silver market like the angel of death.

Then I have another authority, Mr. Montagu Norman, governor, and Sir Charles Addis, a member of the board, of the Bank of England, and certainly among the greatest authorities in the world to-day on currency questions, who in their joint report following an inquiry authorized by the British government in 1931, said:

> I think that one has to bear in mind the interaction between gold and silver prices. There is a reaction upon gold when an extreme fall or rise takes place in the value of silver, which is none the less serious, because it is indirect and not very apparent on the surface. The consequential changes in the price generally and in trade conditions which would be produced, the disturbance to the world's peace and confidence, the interference with the long established social habits of the people of India in the use of silver, the shock to the reliance of a great country like China upon silver as a medium of currency and a common store of value could not fail to have important effects upon the gold prices of countries in Europe and, indeed, in America.

Then we had the British economic mission to the far east appointed March 18, 1930, to inquire into the present condition of British trade with China and Japan and to report what action should be taken to develop and increase that trade. Mr. Ernest Thompson was appointed chairman of the mission, which left London in September, 1930, and returned in April of 1931. During that time they made an exhaustive investigation of the trade situation in both Japan and China at a cost of some $300,000.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Gagnon): The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. REID: I am sorry. I have not come to the gist of my resolution, but I shall have to abide by the rules of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. REID: If it is the wish of the house I will take up my resolution.

Mr. RHODES: I would have no objection, by unanimous consent, though I must say that I would like to be not too crowded in the time allotted to me for reply before six o'clock.

Mr. REID: I will take only a few moments. Speaking of the silver question, this mission reported:

> There exists in China to-day one outstanding problem which faces all nations desirous of selling their goods in the China market. The deplorably low silver values and the consequently much reduced buying of the vast populace are factors contributing to restrict the increase of imports into China from foreign countries. Finding it increasingly difficult to buy (for payment in gold) goods from abroad, China will be driven to discover ways and means of producing her own requirements. Should she continue to remain on a greatly depreciated silver basis for some years it is obvious that she will of necessity not only quickly enlarge her industrial capacity and manufacture goods now made in foreign countries but will be able to export many of such goods to markets abroad now being served by Great Britain.

Might I say in passing, Mr. Speaker, that this has actually taken place. A great industrial movement is under way in China, financed by outside capital, and they are determined to produce much of the goods which hitherto they have purchased abroad. That will be quite a factor in the trade of the world in the not too far distant future.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to the silver agreement itself and before concluding I will touch lightly on the central bank. I am glad that at last Canada has joined in what I would call the first step towards the recognition of silver, and in that regard might I just read paragraph (b) of the agreement which was signed by the Minister of Finance on behalf of Canada:

> The governments, parties to this conference, shall refrain from new legislative measures which would entail further debasing of their silver coinage below a fineness of 800/1000.

I am glad that clause has been adopted, but just the same I think it would be far better to give the people an honest coin instead of defrauding them with a base coin which to-day is only 80 per cent pure. I suppose the minister will tell us why this change was made in 1921, although I know he was not a member of the government in that year. Then in paragraph (c) it is proposed to substitute silver coins for low paper currency. Perhaps it is too early to ask the minister what the government intend to do, but I hope they will mint silver dollars. I know the statement will be made that people will not carry those large cartwheels around, but in these days I think people would be very glad to pack around a few cartwheels of silver, because they are unable to get the paper money. If they are going to substitute silver coins for low paper currency I hope they will do away with the twenty-five cent bill. If ever anything was foolishly put out as currency it was the twenty-five cent paper bill; that was more foolish than it would be to mint silver dollars.

I am glad also that India and Spain have signed this agreement to limit the sale of silver, because limitation of the sale by India and Spain will have quite an effect in stabilizing the price of silver, and so raising it. Canada is the third largest producer, but we are only taking about ten per cent of the output of our mines. I know some hon. members get a little wrathy when we say they should follow the lead of President Roosevelt, but may I point out that the United States is purchasing practically the whole output of the mines for 1933. Under the agreement the 35,000,000 ounces is allocated as follows:

	Ounces
United States	24,421,410
Canada	1,671,862
Australia	652,355
Mexico	7,159,108
Peru	1,095,325

Personally I should have liked to have Canada go further than that. Not only is the United States purchasing all the gold possible.

as we see by the press, but she is endeavouring to purchase all the silver as well, which is very commendable indeed. The United States has agreed also to accept up to $100,000,000 in silver from those countries owing her money, and I think that is very commendable also. If that is a forerunner of what is going to happen, in my opinion silver must rise in price under that stimulus, and I think this government has been lax in not buying more silver, because in the event of the price rising it may cost the government more. Perhaps I am refuting in advance the argument I am about to make, that it will cost the government nothing to buy the silver, but in view of the fact that we are the third largest producer in the world I think the government should have gone much further and accepted at least fifty per cent of the production of the mines in Canada.

To-day there are some thirteen countries using silver, and practically all those countries issue silver certificates. I see nothing in the new legislation setting up the central bank—and perhaps the minister will correct me if I am wrong—with regard to the issuing of silver certificates. I hope the government will take that matter under advisement; I should like to see silver certificates issued. I realize that it is hard to determine the ratio, in view of the fact that probably gold has not reached its highest point as yet, but to-day currencies cannot be stabilized unless silver is used. I am going to put on Hansard a few figures to show what it would cost Canada in regard to silver—

Mr. RHODES: You are not allowing me forty minutes.

Mr. REID: In courtesy to my hon. friend I think I will reserve the rest of my remarks until later.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I hope my hon. friend will appreciate that naturally I desire to conclude anything I have to say before six o'clock rather than to break it into two parts. I hope he realizes that while I should like to extend him the courtesy of a longer period, he has had six minutes additional, and in the circumstances perhaps he will not object.

In the second recital of his resolution the hon. member states:

> And whereas for centuries past, silver was the only precious metal used, both as currency and as the unit of value for the interchange of goods and services.

I call the attention of the house to the expression "for centuries past, silver was the only precious metal used." In that statement he has hardly conformed to the past, because as a matter of fact gold coins were in existence in the days of the ancient Greeks and Romans; in the year 1660 there was gold coinage in Great Britain, and there has been gold coinage from that time down to the present. It is true that prior to that for a period, particularly in the dark ages, silver was the predominant metal, but dating from the year 1660 gold was in the ascendant, until at the beginning of the nineteenth century it had entirely excluded silver as a basis of the monetary standard, and left it to be used as subsidiary coinage. That condition obtained down to the period when, for reasons which one need not discuss at this time, Great Britain in the year 1931 was driven off the gold standard.

In the fourth recital of his resolution the hon. member uses the following expression:

> Coupled with the very limited amount of gold available in the world for the interchange of goods and services.

I have no doubt the hon. member has inadvertently fallen into the same error under which so many seem to labour, namely that a shortage of gold was responsible in part at least for the debacle which overtook the world in the year 1929. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, that statement cannot be substantiated. The most that can be said is that there was a maldistribution of gold, which is an entirely different thing from saying that there was not sufficient gold. In that connection may I point out that the gold delegation of the League of Nations went into this matter very thoroughly in the year 1932, and in the preliminary data prepared for the meeting of that delegation there was some suggestion in keeping with the idea under which the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) seems to be labouring, namely that there is a shortage of world gold. I quote from page 32 of the League of Nations report for the year 1932.

> Before proceeding further in our analysis of the problem of gold supply we wish at this point to record our opinion that the world's total stock of monetary gold, apart from any considerations as to its distribution among different countries, has at all times in recent years been adequate to support the credit structure legitimately required by world trade, and that the rapid decline in prices which began in 1929 cannot be attributed to any deficiency in the gold supply considered in this sense. During the six years from the end of 1925 to the end of 1931 the world's central gold reserves increased from about $9,150,000,000 to about $11,350,000,000, or at an average rate of 3⅝ per cent per annum. Since this rate is not lower than the generally accepted normal rate of growth of production and trade in the gold using countries as a whole, and since, in addition, certain economies were made in the use of gold, at any rate in the earlier part of the period considered, there seems to be little ground for believing that the total supplies of gold available for monetary use have not been sufficient to meet all reasonable demands.

In that regard may I point out that I do not think it can be established there was not ample credit in 1929. As a matter of fact I think we may very well argue that one of our difficulties at that time was that there was too much credit, and that being so, that credit was based, so far as gold is a base for credit, upon the then existing supply of gold in the world.

What do we find since that time? In 1930, 20,160,355 ounces of gold were produced which, not at $35 an ounce, but at the old value of $20.67 per ounce, represented an increase in the monetary gold of that year of $416,751,523. In 1931 there was the largest amount of gold produced up to that time in a single year, in the history of the world, so far as history is available on the point. In that year the production was 21,300,000 ounces, at a value of $440,200,000. In 1932 there was a still further increase to 24,163,000 ounces of gold, at a value of $499,444,000. In 1933, on an estimated figure, the amount of production was 24,282,000 ounces, at a total value of $501,908,940, or a total production in those four years of $1,858,309,463, and these figures represent a yearly increase in the world's gold supply at a percentage greater than was ever known before.

Mr. REID: What year is that?

Mr. RHODES: The last year for which there is an estimated figure is the year 1933.

Mr. McINTOSH: Has the minister an estimate for 1934?

Mr. RHODES: No, it is too early yet to have that figure, but I would anticipate it would be still larger than for the year 1933. It is true that some of this gold will be required for manufacturing purposes, but allowing a generous figure of $200,000,000 for that purpose it will be seen that over $1,000,000,000 have been added to the world's store of monetary gold during those four years.

Mr. YOUNG: Has the minister any figure as to the amount of gold melted down and used for monetary purposes?

Mr. RHODES: Yes. As a matter of fact, the question asked by the hon. member for Weyburn raises the age old question which gave rise to the maxim that men dig gold in Africa and bury it in India, because as a matter of fact down through the centuries, until England went off the gold standard in 1931, that very condition did obtain, and millions upon millions of dollars worth of gold were poured into India to remain there, some to be buried, some to go into the form of ornaments and some to be used in the arts. But, as a matter of fact, that flow into India ceased. In fact, in September 1931 there was an outflow, with the result that the bullion brokers in London estimate that from September, 1931, to the end of 1933 approximately $565,000,000 worth of gold has come out of India. That is the valuation placed upon the basis of $20.67 per ounce and not upon the world price.

So far as the value of gold is concerned I might make reference to the fact that wholesale prices are in a far different status from what they were in 1929. Although I do not think for the purpose of my argument it is necessary to enter into that matter, it is interesting to note, taking the year 1913 as an average of one hundred, that in the year 1929 wholesale prices stood at 135; in 1930 at 114; in 1931; at 92; in 1932 at 81; in 1933 at 81. So it will be seen that while there is not an absolute equation between the value of gold and commodity prices, because the reserves against bank deposits and liabilities have a bearing on the case so that the ratio will not be exact, nevertheless it is certainly fair to say that a given amount of gold will go much further in the purchase of commodities on the lower commodity price scale.

So I would say this, that not only has there been a normal world increase in the supply of gold, but a greatly accelerated increase, and there are four factors which should be considered by my hon. friend from New Westminster in regard to the amount of gold in the world. First, there is the question of increased production. Second, there is the return for currency use of gold hitherto hoarded or stored away in India. Third, there is the question of the revaluation of gold, which has had the effect so far as the United States is concerned, when it increased the price of gold from $20.67 to $35 per ounce, of increasing its value by nearly 70 per cent, or, to be exact, 69·3 per cent. Fourth, there is the factor that while hitherto the accepted amount of gold as an appropriate basis for currency has been in the neighbourhood of 40 per cent, it will be within the recollection of the house that at the recent world monetary and economic conference it was agreed that 25 per cent would be sufficient. Upon that point perhaps I should read from the appendix to the report of the world monetary and economic conference, where at page 13 are set out the resolutions that were adopted, and I find these:

(c) That under modern conditions monetary gold is required not for internal circulation but as a reserve against central bank liabilities and primarily to meet external demands for payments caused by some disequilibrium on the foreign account. It is consequently undesirable to put gold coins or gold certificates into internal circulation.

(d) That in order to improve the working of a future gold standard greater elasticity should be given to central bank legal cover provisions; for instance, in so far as the system of percentage gold cover is applied a minimum ratio of not more than twenty-five per cent should be considered as sufficient; similar elasticity should be achieved by appropriate measures where other systems are applied. However, such changes must not be taken as an excuse for unduly building up a larger superstructure of notes and credits; in other words, the effect of this resolution should be to increase the free reserve of central banks and thereby to strengthen their position.

My hon. friend at the outset of his remarks said that his resolution was not put forward as suggesting a panacea. To quote his exact words, which I took down at the time, he said that the effect of his resolution, if adopted, would go a long way towards stabilization, or at least it would be a step in that direction. May I say to my hon. friend, with all deference, that the effect of this resolution, if it could be put into effect, would be precisely the opposite, and I will give the reasons why in my judgment that is so.

In his resolution my hon. friend calls for silver to have a fixed ratio to gold. Now assume that we did that. We would have to fix the ratio—a difficult thing at best, but suppose we used our best judgment in respect to it. This is what would happen. If we fixed the ratio to gold at a point where silver became higher than its present market value we would then have silver flowing to this country from the four corners of the earth, and the principle of Gresham's law would apply. The result would be that our gold would disappear and we would in effect find ourselves on a silver basis, which I think even my hon. friend from New Westminster will agree would be a very unstable basis; for whatever may be said of the respective merits of gold and silver, the fact remains that gold has been far more constant, and in the very nature of things must be far more constant, in its value than silver.

Now let us put the argument the other way. Let us assume that we put the price of silver at a lower figure than its present market price. In that event we would get no silver. We would then be confined to one metal base, and that would be gold.

Again, you might say fix the ratio of silver to gold upon a basis which represents the metallic value of silver to-day. But then what would happen? We would have fluctuations in the price of the metal. If a new mine were discovered and silver became cheap we would have disequilibrium at once. While on that point let me indicate that from the period 1866 to 1885 the average market ratio of gold to silver was 17 to 1. My hon. friend in the course of his remarks quoted the ratio 16 to 1, but as a matter of fact from 1866 down to the present time there has not been anything approaching a ratio of 16 to 1. I am taking it at its lowest point from a list of the percentages during past years which I shall now give:

Commercial Ratio of Gold to Silver

Period	Average ratio	Period	Average ratio
1866-1885	17.0	1930	53.7
1886-1895	24.1	1931	71.3
1896-1905	34.9	1932	73.3
1906-1915	36.2	1933	82.5
1916-1925	27.0	1934	80.1
1926-1929	35.9	Jan. 1-17

Let me make it clear at once that I quite sympathize with my hon. friend from New Westminster in the object he has in mind in moving this resolution, but as I have already indicated, if we attempted to fix our currency on a fixed ratio of silver to gold the effect would be to make for disequilibrium, not for stabilization. In other words, it would have the very opposite effect to that my hon. friend desires.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

I do not propose—I would not, even if I felt myself the most competent authority in the world—to enter into an argument in principle as to whether there should or should not be bimetallism, whether we should have our currency based on a fixed ratio of silver to gold. But for the purposes of this discussion we do not need to enter into that phase of the subject at all. Let us, for the purposes of discussion, admit that that is the ideal situation. I make mention of that for this reason: If we are to have bimetallism, its only chance of survival is through international agreement. As I have pointed out, otherwise there would be a flow of gold and silver back and forth to the absolute confusion of currencies.

I made note of one or two remarks by the hon. member which show how easily we can be led astray even with the best of intentions. I understand that my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), who has made a great study of this important subject, will refer more particularly to the trade features. I must say that I got some mild amusement from the arguments used by the hon. member with respect to the trade with China. He referred to the fact that because silver was cheap, in order to purchase goods from a gold country the Chinaman had to use more silver. Strange as it may appear, the argument is just the other way. China never purchases goods with silver; she purchases silver with goods. Down through all the years China has been an importer of silver. The fact of the matter is that the cheaper silver is, the less goods it takes to buy it. Possibly this may have something to do with the remarks of my hon. friend concerning the great industrial boom in China. I have no doubt my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce will refer to this at greater length.

The hon. member referred to the silver dollar. I am speaking from memory but I think it is since 1916 that we have had upon our statute books legislation to enable us to mint a silver dollar. Possibly the circumstance that we have allowed that statute to remain unused for some eighteen years is an indication that perhaps the people of this country do not want to carry around a cumbersome silver dollar or, as it is known colloquially in the United States, a cart-wheel. I have an open mind upon the subject and I am sure that no one would be more delighted than this government if the people of this country deemed it wise to take kindly to silver dollars. On that point we have an absolutely open mind and it is a fair subject for discussion. Possibly it might be discussed in the committee on banking and commerce. What holds good with respect to silver dollars, holds equally good with respect to silver certificates which would be covered by an equal metal coverage.

The hon. member commended us for the silver agreement arrived at at the monetary and economic conference, but he said that we should have gone further. May I point out to the hon. member for New Westminster and to the house that some forty-six nations of the world sat around the table and studied closely this matter. This agreement represents in cold type the maximum distance which they felt they could go. The hon. member referred to certain provisions of this agreement. Provision (c) reads:

> That they shall substitute silver coins for low-value paper currency in so far as the budgetary and local conditions of each country will permit.

That provision has no reference to Canada but it does refer to the inordinate use of small denomination paper currency by many continental countries. I may say to my hon. friend that that provision, harmless as it may seem, was the result of a great deal of discussion and it was regarded as a real concession on the part of those countries that they should be prepared to substitute silver coins for their notes of small denomination.

The hon. member referred to what he regarded as the disparity in the proportionate amount of silver which Canada must produce as the result of being a party to the London agreement. Let me point out to him that that agreement provides for the removal from the world's markets over a period of four years of 35,000,000 ounces of silver per year. The proportion as allocated to Canada has no reference to-day to its proper proportion as a silver producer of the total amount of 35,000,000 ounces, but it did more nearly when the agreement was originally drafted. There were one or two smaller countries, whose names I need not mention, who were expected to become parties to the agreement, but they did not do so. For reasons which I need not discuss here, the United States, being very anxious that this silver agreement should go through, agreed to add the share which these countries failed to take up to their own share. Barring that contingency, the original setup provided for the purchase on the part of Canada of 1,671,802 fine ounces of silver. That amount represented our fair proportion as a producing country of silver over a period of years. Under these circumstances I submit that no fault can properly be found for our not having fallen into the terms and spirit of the agreement. I may say to my hon. friend that no exception was taken; on the contrary, the signatories to the agreement were eminently satisfied with the amount which Canada agreed to take.

Mr. MORAND: Has the minister the figures of the total amount of silver produced per year?

Mr. RHODES: I do not have them before me, but it is something under 200,000,000 ounces.

Mr. STEVENS: In 1931 it was 240,000,000 ounces.

Mr. RHODES: I ask my hon. friend and the house to note that there was a very marked concession in this agreement on the part of, not the silver producing but the silver purchasing countries. Clause 4 reads:

That the government of China shall not sell silver resulting from demonetized coins for a period of four calendar years commencing January 1, 1934.

I submit that that was a very marked concession. Again, clause 5 reads:

That the government of Spain shall not dispose by sale of more than twenty million fine ounces of silver during a period of four years commencing January 1, 1934.

And again, clause 1 (a) reads:

That the government of India shall not dispose by sale of more than one hundred and forty million fine ounces of silver during a period of four years commencing with January 1, 1934.

There is a provision that in the case of India that may be enlarged in the event that the government of India should, after the date of the agreement, sell silver to any other government for the purpose of being transferred to the United States in payment of war debts. The agreement provides that such silver shall be excluded from the scope of the clause.

Mr. YOUNG: Is there anything said about the price to be paid?

Mr. RHODES: The market price. We can discuss gold and silver as much as we like, but I submit that the main factor which we must keep before us is that portion of the resolution which provides that Canada shall fix immediately silver at a given ratio to gold.

For the reasons I have indicated, I submit that instead of having the beneficial effects which my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has suggested, it would have precisely the opposite effect, and would be perhaps one of the most damaging things we could possibly do to our currency.

My time is almost up, and as I have an amendment to submit I will present it at once. It is moved by myself and seconded by Mr. Stevens:

That all the words after the word "whereas" in the first line thereof be struck out, and the following substituted therefor:

"at the world monetary and economic conference held in London, England, in the year 1933, attended by the representatives of sixty-four nations, the subject of the use of silver in the world's monetary systems was taken under consideration;

And whereas the following resoluton was unanimously passed—

Be it resolved to recommend to all the governments parties to this conference

V. (a) That an agreement be sought between the chief silver producing countries and those countries which are the largest holders or users of silver, with a view to mitigating fluctuations in the price of silver; and that the other nations not parties to such agreement should refrain from measures which could appreciably affect the silver market;

(b) That governments parties to this conference shall refrain from new legislative measures which would involve further debasement of their silver coinage below a fineness of 800/1000;

(c) That they shall substitute silver coins for low value paper currency in so far as the budgetary and local conditions of each country will permit;

(d) That all of the provisions of this resolution are subject to the following exceptions and limitations:

The requirements of such provisions shall lapse on April 1, 1934, if the agreement recommended in paragraph (a) does not come into force by that date, and in no case shall extend beyond January 1, 1938;

Governments may take any action relative to their silver coinage that they may deem necessary to prevent the flight or destruction of their silver coinage by reason of a rise in the bullion price of the silver content of their coin above the nominal or parity value of such silver coin;

And whereas on the 22nd day of July, 1933, Canada signed a memorandum of agreement regarding silver, together with Australia, China, United States of America, India, Mexico, Peru and Spain, which agreement has ben laid on the table of the house;

And whereas bimetallism is only practicable if adopted by substantially all the leading nations of the world;

And whereas the above resolution and agreement represented the greatest measure of international agreement which it was possible to obtain;

Therefore be it resolved that the action of the delegate of Canada in signing said agreement is hereby approved."

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Before the amendment is put I should like to say a few words. I was hoping some hon. members might have given expression to their views on this important matter.

The amendment is a simple one; it suggests that, inasmuch as certain steps were taken and certain decisions arrived at at the world economic conference, the house recognize what was done at that conference and endorse the action of the delegates from Canada. I think this is a perfectly sound thing to do. The matter is in a sense of a dual nature; there is the academic side, simply a general study in economics, and there is the other phase, the practical or administrative aspect. I am speaking now of the general question of bimetallism, if you like, or the remonetization of silver, or the problem of currency generally. In the amendment we do not pass judgment one way or the other on the academic question, but welcome measures that were taken at the world economic conference as at least a practical step in the right direction. It is with that view that I have seconded the amendment and given support to the views of my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes).

I should like, however, to take the opportunity of saying a few words on the question in a general way. As I said a moment ago, it divides itself naturally into two sections, the academic and the practical or administrative. The success of the latter depends upon the acceptance of the former in a world wide sense. In other words it is not much use in Canada taking steps for the remonetization of silver unless there is some acceptance of the policy by other influential countries. I would not say that all countries must fall into line, but certainly one must recognize that the leaders in exchange and in control of international monetary affairs are perhaps three countries, Great Britain, the United States and France—London, New York and Paris. One of course can add other European countries having tremendous influence, such as Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, and so on, but the three great centres I have mentioned have long been recognized as the dominating centres of international exchange. So if those countries at least are not adopting an international exchange policy similar to that proposed by any resolution we may adopt, obviously we could have little success with it. Recognition of that situation caused me to realize long ago that, attractive though bimetallism—and I use the term in its broad general sense—may be, it is impractical and useless for Canada to attempt it alone. But inasmuch as the subject has been brought before parliament, perhaps I may take a short time to discuss the problem from an academic or an economic standpoint. No harm can be done by that, and certainly I welcome the opportunity.

My hon. friend the member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), who introduced the resolution, brings it forward at this time in perfect good faith, I have no doubt; but some of us who brought the question up three, four, or five years ago received little support then; until last year very little interest was evidenced in the matter by others in the house or out of it. During the last year it became a much more popular idea and therefore of course attractive from the point of view of its being a matter for discussion in the House of Commons. Perhaps if we had been giving more attention to it during the years of the depression we might have been able to observe a larger measure of progress at this time than we do find in this or other countries. Statesmen throughout the world, during the past four years particularly, have been looking for some measure for stabilizing prices, something that would be satisfactory to all countries. They have also been looking for a better foundation for currency, because it must be admitted that the basis of currency in many countries has been sadly dislocated; there has been loss of confidence not only in the currency of some countries but in the credit of the countries themselves. World statesmen and economists of note have been looking for these stabilizing factors, for some measure acceptable to all for the control of international exchange. But nothing has been found that is generally acceptable to the nations of the world.

A few of us—speaking in a general sense—in different countries have held the view that had silver been joined with gold it would have formed a suitable background for currency; that it would have led to the stabilizing of international exchange and a wider degree of confidence in the currencies of the world, and perhaps would have materially helped towards the stabilizing of prices. That is a view that has been held by many. However, as I have intimated, it has not found acceptance among the nations of the world. It may be recalled that in 1921 John Maynard Keynes, one of the most widely known economists—I suppose one can scarcely say that any one economist is an authority, but certainly Mr. Keynes is widely known—suggested that wheat or butter or iron might be used as a basis for currency. Then another school of thought held the view that currency should be issued against commodities produced, the currency being retired as the commodities went into consumption. But in respect of all these suggestions, and they have been numerous, it immediately became clear that currency resting upon such a basis would be as variable as the quantity of the product upon which it was founded. For instance, Keynes for some time rather emphasized wheat, a commodity of world-wide use, as a stable basis for currency, but when in 1928 nearly the whole world had a bumper crop and there was a huge surplus of wheat on the markets of the world, he realized then if not before that currency based upon a commodity of that kind would be extremely variable in its character. So these suggestions have not met with favour. But they are indications that thinkers the world over have been trying to find some way in which the currencies of the world might be more firmly founded upon some basis commonly acceptable to all.

Now I should like to say a few words, Mr. Speaker, referring to the subject in a general way and discussing it, shall I say, from an academic standpoint. Silver, as the hon. member who introduced the resolution said, has been used as a background for currency from time immemorial. It might be well to remember that it served in a very satisfactory way all through the centuries until it was demonetized by legislative action in the last century; I think 1873 was the main year of departure. In other words, silver was recognized as a sound and safe background for currency, being used in some countries in conjunction with gold but in most countries as the sole background until it was demonetized. Demonetization of silver took the form of simply closing the mints of the world to silver, and I refer to that for this reason: there are many who contend that because silver has fallen in value, that is evidence that it has no higher value, but the reason silver has fallen to the exent it has in recent years is that it lost its power or its usefulness as money or currency and became a commodity like tin, zinc, lead or iron, and now silver is a commodity and only a commodity. Previously it was a money factor and was also used in the arts and sciences, but having been denied entry to the mints as a material out of which money was made, it lost that value and became merely an ordinary commodity on the market, and of course it fell in value.

An interesting thing to note, Mr. Speaker, is the historic ratio of silver, to which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) referred this afternoon, as did the hon. member who introduced the resolution. There was a consistency about the ratio of silver to gold as long as it was used as a currency which is rather striking and, to my mind, a bit startling. In the Roman period it was twelve to one and stood at that ratio for many years, in fact for many centuries, I think. Then for several centuries France and England had it fixed by law at fifteen and a half to one. and I think this ratio was accepted by the United States as well as by the Latin union, that is, France, Italy, Spain and Portugal, if I remember rightly. This ratio obtained for several hundred years. It is interesting also to note that for a period of at least one hundred years prior to 1873 silver did not vary in value more than one point; the variation was very slight indeed. As as matter of fact in 1717 an investigation was conducted by Sir Isaac Newton and a very interesting report on this subject which can be found in the library here, was made to the British government. Sir Isaac Newton confirmed the ratio of fifteen and a half to one and, as I say. that ratio obtained during the centuries with apparent satisfaction.

We have had figures given to-day in regard to the production of silver. I have a few figures that are slightly different, but they largely confirm what has been stated previously. In a period of approximately four hundred years, from 1493 to 1931, there have been produced about 14,500,000,000 ounces of silver. I am referring to this because I think it is important to keep in mind the question of the production of silver. There is a fear in the minds of some that the production of silver would increase so rapidly as literally to swamp the market should silver be remonetized. The ratio of production, as I have already intimated, has been about fourteen and a half to one over a period of five hundred years. In the last fifty years, however, the ratio has been about 14·4 to one. The latter figure is accurate; the former figure is accepted the world over as a fair figure. But the significant point is that eighty per cent of the world's silver is produced as a by-product, and I think this constitutes a safeguard to the overproduction of silver. For instance, if there was a tendency to speed up the production of silver to an unwarranted degree it would result in an increased production of lead, zinc and copper, the three metals with which silver is usually associated, to an extent that would constitute a great overproduction of these other metals and result in a disastrous drop in the prices of such metals. So where there might be a tendency to increase the production of silver unduly there would be that natural brake in the tendency to reduce the production of these other commodities. I do not share the view at all that necessarily there would be an overproduction of silver. The sources of supply are well known; in 1930 Mexico produced 105,000,000 ounces, the United States, 49,000,000 ounces, Canada, 26,000,000 ounces, South America, 25,000,000 ounces, and miscellaneous countries, 35,000,000 ounces.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But is not that overproduction always a possibility?

Mr. STEVENS: No, I think not. My own view is that there is not a likelihood of any overproduction. Mexico, of course, is overwhelmingly the greatest producer of silver. I do not think there is any danger of overproduction in Canada or the United States.

Now I should like to say just a word as to the use of silver in the arts and industries, which must not be lost sight of. About thirty-five per cent of the silver produced is used in the arts and industries. For instance, the United States uses 25,000,000 ounces annually; the United Kingdom uses 6,000,000 ounces, and the miscellaneous other countries use about 20,000,000 ounces.

Then there is the question of the market for silver. As the Minister of Finance very properly pointed out this afternoon, India and China have been the great consuming markets for silver; they are importers to a very large extent. As a matter of fact, in 1929 China and India between them imported about 220,000,000 ounces of silver. In 1932, however, they imported much less, China about 80,000,000 ounces and India about 12,000,000 ounces. No doubt this falling off was due to the drop in the price of silver in the world market and also to the adoption in India of the definite gold policy and the offering for sale of large quantities of silver. For instance, as a result of going on the gold standard in 1925, I think, India had about 300,000,000 ounces of silver placed in the treasury which they felt they had to feed out to the market. That was over and above the requirements of the country for coinage, and in a few years about 90,000,000 ounces were sold. It was the sale of this large amount of silver, plus the debasing of the coinage of Europe, that really created the catastrophe to the silver market of the world. For instance France, by turning to aluminum, to paper francs and so on, released 60,000,000 ounces of silver in the six or eight years between 1924 and 1930 or thereabouts, and India released 300,000,000 ounces. Then in Great Britain, where coinage was debased from ·925 fine to ·500, they released some 82,000,000 ounces. This gives an indication of the amount of silver which came on to the market, not from production, but from the abandonment of a high standard of silver in coinage, and in the case of India the abandonment of the silver basis for all its coinage and the adoption of the gold standard. It is estimated that as a result of the debasing of the silver coinage of the world during a ten year period 408,000,000 ounces were released on the markets of the world. That is one of the reasons why I consider that the international conference of last summer in its agreement regarding silver did something that was very useful in this connection, because it bound certain countries to cease the debasing of currency and as early as possible to restore the high standard; and, on the other hand, it provided that certain producing countries should absorb a portion of their production within their own boundaries.

For instance, Belgium has already issued a new silver coinage. One of the first coins minted I received the other day from the International Chamber of Commerce. They have restored a ·825 fine standard. That is a practical and useful contribution to the solution of the silver problem of the world.

Mr. REID: Are you sure it is not ·925 fine?

Mr. STEVENS: No, I am not quite sure on that point.

Mr. BENNETT: It provides for ·800.

Mr. STEVENS: It is ·800 in the agreement. I should like to have seen it ·925, because that is the full silver content of the recognized silver coinage of the world, ·925 being looked upon as as much silver as one dares to put into a coin and still have it usable. These are interesting facts, Mr. Speaker.

I wish now to turn briefly to a reference to China made by the hon. member. If he will permit me to say so, the mistake he made in referring to Chinese or oriental trade and its relation to silver is this: The business of China, as we understand it, is done largely at Shanghai; it is centred at Shanghai. At that point you have the great banks of China, and may I say there are some very powerful banking institutions. In Shanghai there are located to a large degree the industrial and commercial activities of northern China. Of course, Canton in the south is the other great centre. But while it is true in the back country of China silver is still used as the currency, and while in those parts they prefer to have silver in some form, yet in the Shanghai centre the bankers are against the readoption of silver as the background for currency in other countries of the world, because, as the Minister of Finance quite properly pointed out, it would mean the raising of the price of silver, and therefore they would have to ship out more goods for the same quantity of silver. They take the position that the low silver market is helpful to the dealer in goods manufactured or otherwise in the exporting centre of Shanghai, and so they are opposed to the remonetization of silver. On the other hand may I give my own opinion, for what it is worth. I am of the view that if silver were remonetized and raised in value so that in the older trading countries of the world it would have a higher purchasing value, the people in the back country of China, those parts away from the trading centres of Shanghai and Canton, would experience an increased purchasing power and there would be a stimulus to trade. However, there is a distinct cleavage of opinion on that point. There are those who argue strongly that it is much better that silver should be low so that dealers in goods, and manufacturers, exporters and importers in the great centres of Canton and Shanghai can get silver as cheaply as possible, rather than have it at a higher price to increase purchasing power in the country behind.

Furthermore, it is interesting to note in regard to China that Shanghai is one of the few places, if not the only one, in the world where gold is sold purely as a commodity. In the great royal gold exchange in Shanghai they have a huge building devoted to this purpose alone, where gold is traded in every day just the same as in this country wheat is traded at Winnipeg, or as in the United States corn is traded in Chicago or the metals in New York.

An hon. MEMBER: In what form?

Mr. STEVENS: It is in bars, the exact weight of which I have not in mind. Each bar consists of a certain number of ounces, but I shall not risk saying what size they are. However it is a certain gold bar, stamped by the Chinese authorities, and traded in the royal gold exchange just the same as other commodities are traded in exchanges. That is a most interesting point. Furthermore it is not correct to assume that in China there is no understanding of a gold currency, because in that country gold has been used as a currency for some five thousand years. If any hon. member wishes to study the matter he will find in the library a very interesting work on the subject written by a gentleman whose name for the moment escapes me, but who is one of the most outstanding authorities. The book was only recently published and is most interesting reading. I make this reference only because it is well to have the facts before us when we are dealing with these subjects. The question, therefore, of the trade with China does not enter into the matter in quite as aggravated a form as at first it would appear, but it is possible, quite possible—and I do not wish too strongly to contradict the hon. member who introduced the resolution—it is quite possible if, and I must use capital letters for that word, "if" silver were readopted by the leading nations of the world, that ultimately it would be a benefit to those people living in the oriental countries and away from the great centres to which I have referred.

A word more regarding the position silver has held for centuries in the trading markets of the world. I have intimated there was not very much variation in its price until the year 1873. As indicated by the Minister of Finance, from 1873 onward there has been a constant fluctuation in the price of silver, but there is a very definite and distinct reason for that. Up to 1873 silver was recognized in all the great trading nations of the world as a monetary medium. The mints of these countries were open to silver. Then, following the Franco-German war and the acquisition by Germany of huge quantities of gold, Germany closed her mints to silver, and Great Britain, which had been following a bimetallic system from 1816 onward under which gold and silver were both recognized, closed its mints to silver. Shortly afterwards France and the Latin union were forced to close their mints to silver, and then the price of silver fell off very rapidly.

The Minister of Finance gave prices in percentages, but I have here some prices which I believe to be accurate, and are given in a way different from that adopted this afternoon by the Minister of Finance. In 1873 the price of silver in New York was $1.29; in France it was $1.31; in England it was $1.30, but the average was $1.30. That had been the general price over a long period of years. In 1883 it had fallen to $1.11; in 1893 it was 78 cents; in 1894, 60 cents, and it remained at 60 or 55 cents or thereabouts until the great war. During the great war there was a very large demand for silver to pay for the goods taken from the orient, and silver rose to $1.30 and, at one time I think, to $1.80 an ounce. But immediately after the war the price fell again to $1.01 in 1920, and in 1930 the lowest price was 26 cents. The decline over that long period of years carried silver down to 50 cents, where it remained for a number of years, and then it fell subsequent to the depression to as low as 26 cents. The fluctuation in the price of silver after 1873 was due to the closing of the mints to silver. If anyone is interested in getting a view of that particular period when the mints of Great Britain and Germany, and later of France, were closed to silver, they will find in the debates of the British House of Commons of 1889 a debate on a resolution introduced by Mr. W. H. Smith, of Yorkshire. I am speaking from memory but I think I have the facts correctly. Mr. Smith introduced a resolution indicating that by 1889 there had resulted such an interference with trade because of the demonetization of silver that it threatened the welfare of the nation, or something to that effect. Sir Edward Goschen was Chancellor of the Exchequer at the time and he took part in the debate. I remember reading his argument, and in a word it was this: To interfere in 1889, the time at which he was speaking, with the decision of 1873 would result in such a dislocation of financial arrangements in the money market of London that he did not contemplate the results with equanimity. In his speech however he expressed a degree of acquiescence in the views of Mr. Smith, and the most interesting feature of all of that debate was an address by the late Lord Balfour, then Mr. Arthur Balfour. He was then a young man and on that occasion he made a speech which would repay the time given to a reading of it because in it he indicated what in his opinion would be the ultimate effect of this demonetization of silver in the leading countries of the world. If you will read his utterances of that day, in 1889, in the light of what has happened since, you can only conclude that he had a prophetic vision. I may say that Mr. Balfour, afterwards Lord Balfour, held that opinion to the day of his death, because only a few months before he died he gave expression to a similar view.

But the point that we are concerned with at the present moment is not the theory of bimetallism, which I frankly state to the house is one that I hold, bimetallism constituting a suitable backing for international currency if acceptable to the leading countries of the world; but we are dealing to-night with what this country and this government should do. I should like to see this country in a position where it could again accept silver into its mints as freely as gold. I should like to see the larger countries of the world do it; but the world thinks differently. The world monetary and economic conference of last summer went into this matter with great care and came to the decision which we have before us as a parliament.

I submit to the house that whatever may be the view we as individuals may have on the theory of this subject is not necessarily the view which we should ask parliament to act upon, but rather we should act in conformity with the most progressive steps taken by the leading countries of the world, and that we have before us in the form of the agreement to which reference has been made by the Minister of Finance to-day. It is for that reason, recognizing that we can only go as far as it is practicable for us to go, that I have seconded the minister's amendment, which virtually declares that this house accepts the decision so taken, not necessarily as indicating final action or the final step, but being for the moment all that we can practically do towards the restoration of silver to its old position as copartner with gold as a backing for the currency of the world.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, both the resolution and the amendment are in my opinion based on the belief so commonly held in these days that you can increase the wealth of the world in some way or other by juggling with the yardstick by which it is measured. We are told that the present depression came upon us because of an artificial increase in the value of gold. Gold is the standard of value of the western countries. Silver is the standard of value of the eastern countries. We are told that by artificially increasing our standard of value disaster has been brought upon the western world; then we are asked by the same persons to do the very same thing with the standard of value of the eastern countries. We are asked to do with silver what was done with gold. Would not the same results follow? If artificially increasing the value of gold brought disaster to us, would not artificially increasing the value of silver, the standard of China, bring disaster to China? China produces no silver; she buys her silver. Does China buy silver with goods or goods with silver? If she buys goods with silver and we artificially increase the price of silver, then when we sell wheat to China we shall have to give her more wheat for the same quantity of silver; in other words, we shall have to accept a lower price for our wheat. If, on the other hand, China buys silver with goods, and you artificially increase the price of silver, you compel China to pay more for the silver she requires. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) had a very clear understanding of this when he spoke this afternoon. I took down his words. He said "China never purchases goods with silver; she purchases silver with goods. Down through all the years China has been an importer of silver. The fact of the matter is that the cheaper silver is, the less goods it takes to buy it. This may have something to do with the remarks of my hon. friend concerning the great industrial boom in China." In other words, China is prosperous because silver is of low value. The Minister of Finance showed a clear understanding of the matter when he uttered those words. Then I take the agreement that he signed as Minister of Finance at the world monetary and economic conference, in which I find this:

> Whereas, it is to the advantage of China that sales from monetary stocks of silver be offset by purchases as herein provided, with a view to its effective stabilization,

And so on. In other words, the Minister of Finance proved in his speech this afternoon that a low price for silver was an advantage to China, and then he asks us to support an agreement that seeks to bring back prosperity to China by artificially increasing the price of silver. The minister this afternoon made a conclusive answer, an unanswerable answer, to the agreement which he himself signed as minister.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) told us a few moments ago that the big bankers and business men of Shanghai and other seaports of China are opposed to the remonetization of silver. But, he said, when you go into the interior where silver is still the only medium of exchange, to artificially increase the price of silver would increase the purchasing power of the people who live there. A Chinaman with an ounce of silver in his possession, if you suddenly doubled the value of silver, would undoubtedly have his purchasing power increased, but how long would that increased purchasing power last? It would last for only one transaction. The Chinaman with an ounce of silver which he has earned goes into a store, and if you have doubled the value of silver by some such measure as this he can buy twice as much of the things he needs, but then in order to get his next ounce of silver he will have to give twice as much labour or twice as much of the goods he has to sell. So this increased purchasing power that would go to the Chinaman would last only one day.

The Minister of Finance proved conclusively this afternoon that there was sufficient gold in the world to serve as a standard for all monetary purposes. Why then should we go out of our way and pledge this and all other governments to buy silver at more than its value and take it off the market? There is no necessity for it, as it is not needed as a standard. The minister has proved this.

It is the most amazing thing of anything that has happened in public life for many years, to find that a small group of men from the different countries that produce silver were able to influence not only their own governments but all governments of the world to buy their commodity at more than its worth and take it off the market. This applied not only to the countries that were going to benefit, that is, the countries that had silver to sell, but even to China which had silver to buy. I think it is the most amazing thing that ever happened in the history of lobbying. This group of lobbyists were able to convince not only those members who represented mining districts, not only the governments of the countries that produced silver, but the governments of the countries that had to buy silver. These governments were influenced to increase artificially the price of silver, to buy it and take it off the market. For example, they influenced countries like India which had vast quantities of silver to sell; that country needed the money but they were persuaded to hold their silver off the market in order that the silver producers could dig more silver out of the ground and get a good price for it. When we see such phenomena as that, we almost despair of the power of the human race to govern itself.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, before the amendment is put I should like to make a few remarks regarding what has been said in this debate and to conclude some that I had not time to make before six o'clock. I do not intend to take up the time of the house in endeavouring to answer everything that has been said by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) and by the last speaker, the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young). However, I shall take the last first and attempt to answer one or two of the statements made by the hon. member.

First of all, it is not the Indian people that are selling silver. To-day the Indian people are buying all the silver they can get; it is the Indian government that is selling silver. That is quite a different thing from the Indian people. To-day the Indian people are still valuing their wealth in silver and with the low price of silver at present prevailing they are turning in their paper rupees to purchase bar silver for trading and hoarding. It is not correct to say that the Indians are selling silver; the Indian government is but not the Indian people. They are still large purchasers.

The hon. member for Weyburn spoke about the price of silver increasing and the benefits accruing to the mine owners. He did not say anything about the gold mine owners in this country. I am of the opinion that this country will have to follow the example of President Roosevelt of the United States and revalue her gold. To-day, gold is valued at something like $35 an ounce while only a short time ago it was valued at only $20.67. If those who are advocating bimetallism or the adoption of silver are crazy, the same remarks could be applied to President Roosevelt. Although Lloyd George has not always been right in his day, he maintains that President Roosevelt is to be likened to Christopher Columbus, with this difference: President Roosevelt knows where he is going and where he will land, while Christopher Columbus did not.

An hon. MEMBER: But he got there.

Mr. REID: I have not the time at my disposal to develop the argument made regarding the buying power of the people as fully as I should like, but I would like the hon. member for Weyburn to look at the trade figures of the countries with depreciated currencies. He needs to go back only a year and a half to find that when the people of this country were selling their wheat to England with the pound valued at only $3.50 we were getting very little for our goods in Great Britain compared with what we are getting to-day, when the pound sterling is worth some $5.60. This takes some answering.

Regarding the boom in China, I desire to repeat what I said previously, and I looked up my remarks during the recess. I stated that the industrial boom in China was due to the influx of capital which had taken place principally from the financiers in the United States who were helping China to build up her industries. This is an influx of capital just the same as if these financiers came to Canada with millions of dollars to build up our factories.

The Minister of Finance spoke about the maladministration of gold. If the rules of the house would permit him to reply I should like him to answer this question: Who will fix maladministration of gold? Mr. Winston Churchill has stated that the road back to gold is not going to be easy, in fact it is going to be very difficult. Three countries own practically all the gold supply of the world and it is going to be a difficult matter to redistribute that commodity. An attempt is being made to do this by revaluation.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the Minister of Finance who gave figures with reference to the ratio of gold supply to output. I am afraid he and I will have to agree to differ. The figures which I gave before and which I intend to give now were obtained from what I believe to be an authentic source. I believe the United States bureau of metal statistics is a very reliable source of information. They state that from 1906 to the present time gold production has not increased; in fact the production in 1932 was away below the production in other years between 1906 and 1932. These are the figures given by the bureau of metal statistics and I take them to be fairly authentic.

In connection with the ratio of gold to silver, the Minister of Finance quoted figures to show that silver had depreciated or had a ratio ranging from 12 to 1 to as high as 80 to 1. According to the figures of the American bureau of statistics, the ratios ranged from 7·61 to 13·83 in the period from 1906 to 1932. I have the complete table before me and I am afraid in this instance we will have to agree to differ. According also to these figures, gold production has been decreasing.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the hon. member the figures for 1932 and 1933?

Mr. REID: The gold production for 1932 is given as 23,884,000 ounces and silver as 166,454,000 ounces.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Finance was giving the ratios of the values per ounce.

Mr. REID: It puts a different aspect on the whole matter when he takes the revalued price of gold.

I listened also very attentively to the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The last time he spoke in this house he took me to task about what he thought were some veiled remarks I had made regarding himself. Now it is my turn to take him to task about some veiled remarks I believe he has made about me. I think he was throwing out the inference that since 1925 no one on this side of the house has said anything about silver. Unfortunately I was not in the house from 1925 to 1930, but since I have been here I have made a speech on silver every year. The minister stated that silver was a popular move now, but I do not think it can be said that the member for New Westminster is taking up this matter simply because it seems to be a popular move. If the minister's remarks were intended to be personal, I resent them very much. While I do not claim to be an expert, I have made some little study of this matter, both before coming to this house and afterwards, and I have spoken every year on the rehabilitation of silver. Since I have been here I have spoken every year on the subject, but certainly in 1931 and 1932 no one could forecast that steps would be taken in 1934 with regard to the remonetization of silver.

With regard to the amendment offered, I think it is a little unfair, if I may say so, for the government to ask this house, in connection with the motion now before the chair, to endorse the steps taken by them in signing the agreement; I do not think they should have added that as an amendment to the resolution. Speaking for myself, I am in favour of the step taken by the government and for that reason therefore I will support the amendment. I should not be on very firm ground if I did not support the move that has been taken in that regard, but just the same I feel that the agreement on silver ought to have been brought down to the house for discussion in detail, standing on its own merits, instead of being added in the form in which it has been to the resolution introduced by myself.

Before the resolution was brought forward I was under the impression that the government, if they did not adopt it, might agree to refer my resolution to the banking and commerce committee so that of those who are interested in the whole subject could appear before that committee and advocate the adoption of silver.

As regards the advantages that would accrue to this country if we adopted silver, I would leave these figures with the house. In 1929 there were 4,153 employed in silver lead mining in Canada, and of that number 3,220 were employed in silver lead mining in British Columbia. I have not gone back further, but I believe that the figures were even higher than that in years prior to 1929. In 1932 however that figure had dropped to a total of 1,082 employed in silver lead mining throughout Canada, of which number 555 only were engaged in British Columbia, a very considerable decline. I was up through the interior during the fall of last year and was informed on many occasions and by reliable authority that if the price of silver rose to 50 cents an ounce there would not be an idle man in the interior of British Columbia. I still say that if President Roosevelt revalues silver, as he will most likely do, we shall have to do the same, and that will increase the base for our monetary coverage.

I should like the minister to have intimated to the house whether or not it was the intention of the government to issue silver certificates for the buying of silver, because I was going to point out that by the issue of silver certificates, which could not be termed inflation as we know it; by the purchase of silver and minting it into silver dollars, the country would not be put to any further expense than would be involved in the issuing of paper certificates. I know the argument might be advanced that if the price of silver rose those holding silver certificates might demand silver. But I would point out to the Minister of Finance that there could be a proviso in the act to the effect that silver would be rated as to value and not as to weight. Of the amount which Canada is going to purchase, 1,671,802 ounces, by the issue of silver certificates, at 40 cents per ounce, there would be 668,720 silver certificates of the value of $1 each.

Mr. BENNETT: How many?

Mr. REID: 668,720.

Mr. BENNETT: The total number outstanding?

Mr. REID: That would be the total at 40 cents an ounce; for 1,671,802 ounces, under the agreement, that would be the total number of certificates that would have to be issued; and as a reserve against that there could be placed in the treasury that amount of silver dollars. But it would not take that number of ounces for coverage by silver dollars, because under our present 800/1000 fine it would take only 420,000 ounces of fine silver to make 668,720 silver dollars. I have worked it out carefully.

Mr. BENNETT: That is, 480 grains of silver to the dollar?

Mr. REID: Yes, and according to present day mintage, one ounce of fine silver produces $1.60 in coins.

Mr. BENNETT: At what price?

Mr. REID: Forty cents an ounce. Those were the figures given me by the mint: one ounce of fine silver produces 1.60 in coinage at the present time.

Mr. BENNETT: But that is not at 800/1000 of purity.

Mr. REID: I am told it is.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a little high.

Mr. REID: I went into the subject carefully with the master of the mint, who informs me that it is so. So that with silver at 40 cents an ounce this country is making a profit at the present time of $1.20 on the coinage issued. I think that should be known to members of the house; a profit of 1.20 is made on every ounce of silver minted into coinage. Now, if silver certificates could be issued in connection with Canada's recent silver agreement, it would not cost this country any more than the cost of issuing the paper, and against that there could be on deposit in the mint 668,720 silver dollars. To make those silver dollars, as I say, it would take only 420,000 ounces of fine silver. There would still be a balance on hand of 1,252,802 ounces which the government could issue in the same way in silver certificates to the extent of 2,002,083. It would be all profit.

I have worked this out carefully and I was going to urge the government to take note of it. I might point out there are thirteen countries to-day issuing silver certificates. There are also many millions of silver certificates in the United States and many more will no doubt be issued on the silver that is being purchased by the treasury there.

In conclusion, may I assure the house that I am not pleading for the silver mines alone, and I might say I have no personal interest in them; I am simply interested in the welfare of the people of this country and those engaged in that business. I have been making a plea on humanitarian grounds, and this is not the first time in this house that I have advocated the rehabilitation of silver. I should like to have seen the subject referred to the appropriate committee on banking, because if the government would consider the advisability of issuing silver certificates it would add to the base of the precious metal gold, which would act as a brake so to speak, on uncontrolled inflation. I am going to support the amendment; but, I repeat, I think that the subject matter of that amendment should have been presented to the house in a more appropriate form, such as by bringing down the agreement itself, so that the house might consider that agreement on its merits. Certainly, the silver agreement should not have been introduced into the amendment to my resolution.

Amendment (Mr. Rhodes) agreed to.

Main motion (Mr. Reid) as amended, agreed to.

CURRENCY, STATE NOTES AND BONDS

STAMPED AND PRINTED IN THE TWO OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. J. A. BARRETTE (Berthier-Maskinonge) (Translation): moved:—

That, in the opinion of this house, the question of issuing bilingual state currency, notes and bonds should be referred to a special committee consisting of Messrs. Hackett, Gobeil, Bourgeois, Bell (St. Antoine), Nicholson, Gott, Plunkett, Price, Malcolm, Ralston, Lapointe, Cardin, Casgrain, Rinfret, and Lucas, with power to send for papers, summon witnesses and report from time to time.

Mr. Speaker, the present question is certainly worthy of the consideration of the House. I, therefore, immediately put the following question: Have not Canadian members an interest in placing the problem of bilingual currency on a basis of "bonne entente," so as to better study it in the light of what is right and just and so that the French Canadian element would derive some benefit?

The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger), stated, last year, in nicely couched and worthy terms, when he discussed his resolution, that bilingual currency is not a new question to the house. I note, in the debates of this house, that, at the 1906-07 session, the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne), questioned Mr. Fielding, then Minister of Finance, with reference to the stamping of currency and printing of government notes in the two official languages of this country. Mr. Fielding replied that this innovation did not seem to him widely requested. The house will observe that ever since that date the answer has not varied. You will find the questions and answers at page 6015, volume IV of Hansard, session 1906-07.

I shall not attempt to give an account of the debate which took place on this delicate subject. I am aware that the hon. member for Bellechasse is sincere and I also have no doubt about the sincerity of the seconder; to both I extend my congratulations for their zeal in promoting the success of this cause.

The hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré), when the resolution of the hon. member for Bellechasse was discussed, proved beyond all doubt, according to the evidence, that bilingual currency should have its place in this country, by virtue of our rights and after proving that it was so stipulated in our statutes, he added:

Is the principle of bilingual state currency, notes and bonds, a sound principle? My answer is yes.

What is the status of the French language at the present time? To answer that question I must go back to 1840. At that time, during the third and fourth years of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, there was passed an act, which in 3 and 4 Victoria, chapter 35, to reunite the provinces of lower and upper Canada. By this act the French language was prohibited, but this prohibition was lifted on August 14, 1848, by 11 and 12 Victoria, chapter 56. I should like to direct the attention of the house to that chapter. It is entitled:

"An act to repeal so much of an act of the third and fourth years of her present majesty, to reconcile the provinces of upper and lower Canada, and for the government of Canada, as related to the use of the English language in instruments relating to the legislative council and legislative assembly of the provinces of Canada. This is how the statute reads:

Whereas by an act passed in the session of parliament held in the third and fourth years of her present majesty, intituled an act to reunite the provinces of upper and lower Canada, and for the government of Canada, it is amongst other things enacted, that from and after the said reunion of the said two provinces, all writs, proclamations, instruments for summoning and calling together the legislative council and legislative assembly of the province of Canada, and for proroguing and dissolving the same, and all writs of summons and elections—

I should like to direct attention to the following words:

—and all writs and public instruments whatsoever relating to the said legislative council and legislative assembly, or either of them, and all returns to such writs and instruments, and all journals—

I should like to direct particular attention to the next words:

—entries and written or printed proceedings of what nature soever, of the said legislative council and legislative assembly, and of each of them respectively, and all written and printed proceedings and reports of committees of the said legislative council and legislative assembly respectively, shall be in the English language only: Provided always, that the said enactment should not be construed to prevent translated copies of any such documents being made, but no such copy should be kept among the records of the legislative council or legislative assembly, or be deemed in any case to have the force of an original record:

And whereas it is expedient to alter the law in this respect, in order that the legislature of the province of Canada, or the said legislative council and legislative assembly respectively, may have power to make such regulations herein as to them may seem advisable; be it therefore enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that from and after the passing of this act, so much of the said recited act as is hereinbefore recited shall be repealed."

In constitutional law does not the repeal of a prohibition render the thing prohibited permissible, permitted, legal and constitutional? Therefore may I not conclude that bilingual currency, having been prohibited by 3 and 4 Victoria, chapter 35, became permissible, permitted, legal and constitutional when 3 and 4 Victoria was repealed?

Among parliamentarians, who, years ago, shone in the House of Commons and later became distinguished statesmen, I note in the foremost ranks the names of Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Georges E. Cartier. Why have these men played such an important part in history? It is because they always recognized and respected the rights of the minority. May I recall to your memory a splendid speech delivered in the house by Sir John A. Macdonald, in which he stated:

I have no accord with the desire expressed in some quarters that by any mode whatever there should be an attempt made to oppress the one language or to render it inferior to the other; I believe that would be impossible if it were tried and it would be foolish and wicked if it were possible. The statement that has been made so often that this is a conquered country is "à propos de rien." Whether it was conquered or ceded we have a constitution under which all British subjects are in a position of absolute equality, having rights of every kind, of language, of religion, of property and of person. There is no paramount race in this country, there is no conquered race in this country, we are British subjects and those who are not English are none the less British subjects on that account.

I do not wish to rouse any racial prejudices; however, I put the question to the house, whether this right is embodied in our constitution. Why then not apply it to help the "bonne entente" in all the provinces of confederation.

I recall that, in 1916, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) raised an interesting discussion in the house. The resolution he introduced became known as the "Lapointe motion." I should like to see the former Minister of Justice in his seat so as to remind him that, on that occasion, I had the privilege of voting in favour of his resolution. This motion created quite a stir at the time and even brought fame to him.

Hon. gentlemen may perhaps contend that those in favour of bilingualism last year, wanted the house to vote on the merit of this question; unfortunately, unforeseen events prevented the house from doing so. That is why I wished to remove from party strife, the question of bilingual currency, I was therefore in favour of a committee composed of fifteen members chosen among the leading members of the house. Hon. gentlemen will note that the opposition is represented by five former ministers. One cannot cast any doubt on the good intentions of the former Minister of Justice, no more than on those of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett). They are legal lights, known for their moral and social probity, which is an assurance that this question will be fairly dealt with and do full justice to the French Canadian element of this country. Thus will disappear all friction which may exist between majority and minority groups.

If one inquires why the question is left to a committee, it is because each time the house was called upon to consider resolutions of that kind, the various groups in the house always made political capital by appealing each time to race prejudice and thus preventing the success of our cause. The committee will be authorized to take down the evidence of persons not connected with the house; such as bank managers, officials of the Finance department, etc.

These are reasons which certainly favoured the appointment of a committee.

Furthermore, I wish to point out to the house that never has a political party been able to hoist itself into office by appealing to racial prejudices, and that never will a party hold office by bringing up such questions. I would like to see all my friends present here so as to warn them well, that never a political party will assume power without having the support of the province of Quebec. In 1911, that province gave 27 seats to the Conservative party. In 1921, the Liberal party took office with 65 seats from Quebec, and in 1930, the Conservative party returned to power with 25 members from Quebec. This goes to prove that Quebec is closely linked with smooth and good government. Each time a party takes office, Quebec will greatly be interested, because she will always be the province that has placed that party in office.

If I had a suggestion to make to members on the committee, it would be the following: Let them bear in mind the prayer which they repeat together every day before each sitting of the house, when they implore the Almighty for peace and harmony. I trust that this idea of the "bonne entente" will bear abundant fruit and thus contribute to the welfare of the Canadian people.

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé (Mr. Barrette) on his comments generally replete with common sense. I must also thank him for his kind references to me. His kindness makes me regret more so that I find it impossible to entirely approve the measure he has submitted to the house. I would be inclined to vote in favour of this resolution if it could bring some result. I may say further: I would even support the measure were I convinced that it would do no harm. Unfortunately, in spite of all the eloquence of my hon. friend, the member for Berthier-Maskinongé, he has not convinced me that his motion would not be harmful.

He requests the appointment of a committee to consider the question whether we should have in this county bilingual currency. I think that this question is no longer debatable. It has been settled. French Canadians, at all events, consider that the question has been definitely settled long ago. By his resolution, my hon. friend from Berthier Maskinongé brings up again the whole question and re-opens the discussion. May I point out, sir, that the question the hon. member wishes a committee to examine is purely and simply a question of law, it is not one of fact. There is no need of witnesses to establish whether we are entitled or not to speak French in Canada or whether we are entitled to have public documents published in the French language. There is nothing to establish, nothing to prove, the question is purely and simply a constitutional one. I even think that it would even be, so to speak, humiliating to have a committee of the house consider whether we are entitled to speak the French language or whether public documents should be published in French. As far as I am concerned and that includes many, the question was settled long ago, ever since we have a constitution and even long before, because the latter only sanctioned—and badly at that, in my opinion—the natural right of one-third of the population of Canada to read in its own language the public documents of this nation

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): If there be a public document which expresses the character of a nation, it is certainly currency. There should be no opposition against the language of one-third of the population—especially when it is that of the pioneers of this country, of those who discovered Canada, civilized and defended it against the invader—being placed on our currency.

My hon. friend stated a moment ago: This is not a new question, for ever so long has it been threshed out in parliament. He mentioned the name of my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne), whom I regret not to see in the house because he is unable to leave his room owing to illness. Then, if the question has been discussed so much in parliament, if it has been the topic for so many years, it is futile to further study it, to appoint a committee so as to again consider and inquire into a matter which is so well known, since it has been before the house for a score of years. No good result will ensue from the appointment of this committee and the question would remain unsettled.

I am quite aware that my hon. friend, the member for Berthier-Maskinongé is sincere in his endeavours; I do not question his good intentions. However, I fully know that the fact of referring a question to a committee is the usual way of side tracking it. I quite understand that if a first-class funeral is contemplated for an embarrassing question, a committee of the house is appointed to study the matter. I am aware of my hon. friend's intentions and the object he has in mind, nevertheless the only practical result of his motion, if adopted, will be to postpone the question; it will once more be sidetracked and buried. What we want, is not the study of a question already under consideration for a score of years, it is not more light on a subject which has often been discussed in the house, what we want is action, the settling of this question, once for all, so that nothing more will be heard about it. We demand the acknowledgment of the principle that Canada is a bilingual country, and that the act which governs our metal currency and notes being, by virtue of our constitution, printed and promulgated in both languages, our currency must necessarily also be stamped or printed in the two languages.

When this question is settled, once for all, nothing further will be heard about it, we shall have peace and harmony which my hon. friend mentioned just now. The best way of obtaining peace, order and harmony in this country, is by respecting the rights and privileges of all citizens. To my mind, it is not requesting too much to claim that the French language, one of the two official languages of this country, should appear on such an official document as our currency. Therefore, sir, so as to prevent that this motion be adjourned or again side-tracked, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Laurier-Outremont (Mr. Mercier) the following amendment to the resolution of the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé:

> That the resolution be amended by striking out all the words after "be" in the third line and substituting in place thereof: "settled once for all and that the government should immediately take the necessary steps to conform itself to our constitution in this respect."

I have but little to add to what the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé has stated just now as to the merit of the question, or to what was said last year in the house by my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré).

Bilingual currency is not an extraordinary departure, it exists in half the countries of the world. In Switzerland the money is struck in the three official languages of the country, in Italian, French and German; the currency is bilingual in Belgium, while in India, Ceylon, the Dutch Indies, Tunis, Indo China, Nigeria, in short, I might say, in half the countries of the world they have bilingual currencies. Even in Japan and certain provinces of China, currency is bilingual, not because those countries are bilingual, but in order to accommodate every one. Money is stamped both in English and Japanese, in Japan, and in Chinese and English in certain provinces of China.

For all these reasons, I move the amendment I have just read.

Mr. SAMUEL GOBEIL (Compton): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks may I say that it is my intention to make them as dispassionate and to remain as cool headed as I possibly can. In my opinion, however, there are some truths that must be told, and I intend to tell them.

When my hon. friend from Berthier-Maskinonge (Mr. Barrette) prepared this motion, and I think before he sent it to the clerk of the house, he was kind enough to write and ask me if I would like my name to appear as the mover. I declined, but when he asked me to second the resolution I gladly accepted. May I say that one of my principal reasons for refusing to move the resolution was that I have lived long enough to have a certain knowledge of human nature, and I knew full well that if I moved the resolution my motives and intentions would be misinterpreted. On the other hand, due to what has taken place in the house since I made my remarks on this question last year, and due also to what has happened outside of this chamber, I was very glad to have the opportunity to say a word or two in this connection.

I said just a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, that I knew that if I moved the resolution my intentions would be misinterpreted. I may add that in a great many cases the intentions of public men are more or less suspected, and in my opinion there are many reasons for that state of affairs. To my mind there is no doubt that the deeds of a few public men in the past have had something to do with the spread of this sentiment among the people, and it may very well be that the party press have had a good deal to do with it also. I do believe, however, that the politicians themselves have had a great deal to do with it. I do not mean to say that they have been deceiving the public, but they have brought about that attitude by their lack of sincerity on public matters. I hold in my hand a newspaper containing a letter or an article written by an hon. member of this house.

Mr. BOULANGER: What newspaper is that?

Mr. GOBEIL: It was copied by several newspapers; the one I have is Le Devoir of November 9. The article was written by the deputy speaker of this house, the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne), and is entitled Le Rouge et le Bleu, or the Red and the Blue. Time will not permit me to read this article, but anyone reading it must arrive at the conclusion that since confederation French Canadian public men in the province of Quebec have betrayed their nationality and their race. I want to protest against this suggestion, because I do not think it is borne out by the facts. I do not believe our public men coming from the province of Quebec have been traitors to their race; I believe they have done their best. I know they have not been able to attain their desires in all ways, but it is very regrettable that such statements as are made in this article should be made by a public man of our province.

Mr. VENIOT: What is the statement? Would the hon. gentleman read it?

Mr. GOBEIL: No, it is too long. Anyone can read it. I am not blaming the newspaper; the article appeared in several newspapers in the province of Quebec.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but having referred to that article I think he should read the statement which he says was made by an hon. member of this house.

Mr. GOBEIL: I want to illustrate what I have just said, Mr. Speaker, by a quotation I gave last year when I spoke on the bilingual resolution. I reminded the house of the remarks made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1907. Speaking on February 27 of last year I quoted Sir Wilfrid Laurier as follows:

> But I must protest against the idea that because bank notes are not printed in French as well as English, one can state that the French language is not on a footing of equality with the English.
> We have our rights and we should exercise them when it is our interest to do so, but I do not think we should be pedantic and insist that on every occasion the French language should be spoken.

Permit me, Mr. Speaker, to add to this another paragraph of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's speech.

Mr. DUPUIS: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Morand): Order.

Mr. DUPUIS: Would the hon. member allow me just a question?

Mr. GOBEIL: I am sorry, but I have not time. If the hon. member wishes to speak he will have an opportunity.

Mr. DUPUIS: What is that quotation from?

Mr. GOBEIL: It is a quotation from a speech by Sir Wilfrid Laurier delivered in the House of Commons on February 25, 1907. He continued:

> But to affirm, as he does—
> Referring to the hon. member for Montmagny.
> —that the French language should be used upon every occasion, and that every public document should be printed on one side in French and the other side in English, is, I think, going a little too far. For instance, I understand that my hon. friend wants bank notes to be printed either in French or in English. For my part I never yet saw an occasion where a bank note printed in English was not properly understood by the French people; and I am quite sure that a bank note printed in French would be understood by the English people to be exactly what it means. But I see no reason why a bank note should not be printed in French.

At the end of his remarks, Sir Wilfrid Laurier moved the following amendment:

> That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following be substituted in place thereof:
> "The French language is, in fact, as well as by the constitution, on a footing of equality with the English language."

When last year I quoted these words from Sir Wilfrid Laurier I asked hon. members opposite to rise from their seats and tell this House of Commons, tell the province of Quebec and tell the country, whether Sir Wilfrid Laurier was a traitor to his nationality when he used those words. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, what would have happened last year to the humble member for Compton, or, for that matter, to any hon. member on this side of the house, if we had made a declaration of that kind. If I am to judge by what the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) said, when he spoke after me last year, I think I should probably have been lynched, had I made such a declaration, I well remember what I said; I pronounced myself in favour of the motion. I did not believe that at the time it was wise for this chamber to vote on the matter, and I have not changed my opinion. I still believe it is not a wise move to have a vote on this matter.

Referring to me the hon. member for Ottawa said:

> It would have been better for this gentleman if he had never seen light.

Mr. Speaker, what would have been my fate if I had made a declaration such as Sir Wilfrid Laurier made in 1907? Was Sir Wilfrid Laurier a traitor? I am sorry to say that not one member opposite had courage to rise and vindicate the memory of his leader—not one of them, not even the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) who is not in his seat to-day. I say he should be in the house because he knew this motion was coming up for consideration. Not even the hon. member for Quebec East had the courage to rise and state in this chamber whether or not he believed Sir Wilfrid Laurier was or was not a traitor.

Let me tell the house what I think—and I am doing this to illustrate a point I made a few minutes ago: I consider Sir Wilfrid Laurier was not a traitor to his nationality when he made that declaration. But, knowing what he knew and knowing that it was not possible for him to give bilingual currency at the time, he had the courage to get up and to state, not the reasons why he could not do it —because he was then Prime Minister—but to make the declaration to which I have referred. I think we as French Canadians should not consider that man a traitor to his nationality and to his race who, while leader of his party, made this declaration.

Let us come a little nearer to the year 1933, which we have been discussing. May I remind hon. members of what happened in 1929? In 1929 the contract for the printing of Canadian currency, Canadian bank notes, had to be renewed. Every hon. member in this chamber knows the party which at that time held office. Accidentally or otherwise,— I am not in a position to say—during the six months preceding the renewal of the contract 348 petitions were sent from every corner of this dominion to the Minister of Finance asking for bilingual currency. What happened, Mr. Speaker? The contract was renewed. At that time hon. members from the province of Quebec were on this side of the house, but not one of them said a word; not one raised his voice. Even the hon. member for Quebec East, who was the leader of the members from that province, and acted as their tactician, did not see fit to raise his voice in answer to those petitions.

Mr. GOTT: Not even the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. GOBEIL: No, not one of them. I want to be fair to hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not even blame them; I do not blame them because they did not give this country bilingual currency. I feel certain they did not do it because they could not do it. I know my hon. friends opposite well enough to know that they love their nationality and their language, and if it had been possible to convince the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) the then Prime Minister, to give bilingual currency to Canada, they would have done it. But they could not do it, and I could not blame them for that. What I do blame them for, however, is their lack of sincerity when, in 1933, they came to this House of Commons and moved a resolution such as that which stood in the name of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger). The position hon. members opposite took last year has given the public the impression that they cannot rely upon their representatives in the House of Commons.

As I said at the beginning I do not wish to be unfair. I do believe however that there are some truths which should be told, and I intend to tell them. I wish to make a very definite statement, or accusation, if you choose to use that word—I will use the word statement. I want to say that the Liberal party of the province of Quebec, headed by the hon. member for Quebec East, last year induced the hon. member for Bellechasse to move his resolution for no other purpose than to derive political advantage.

Mr. BOULANGER: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is a very well known rule of the house that an hon. member has no right to impute motives to another hon. member, and I would ask that the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) withdraw the statement he has just made.

Mr. GOBEIL: I have no objection at all, Mr. Speaker, I will put it in another way.

Mr. BOULANGER: No, Mr. Speaker. He must withdraw it entirely.

Mr. GOBEIL: I withdraw it with pleasure. Let me give the house an example of the sincerity of hon. gentlemen opposite. Did they know or did they not know that the contract was going to be renewed in 1929? Did they know that a central bank was coming sooner or later? I accuse the Liberal party of the province of Quebec, and more particularly the hon. member for Quebec East, because he is their leader, of moving the resolution last year for no other purpose than to place the government of the day in the position of having to face an adverse vote of the house so that the government could not put into effect what they failed to do in 1929.

Mr. BOULANGER: Mr. Speaker, I make the same objection to that remark.

Mr. GOBEIL: Mr. Speaker, I had this information from a very reliable source when I spoke last year, but I did not want to use it because I wanted to give hon. gentlemen opposite a chance to vindicate their position and to vindicate their leader. Does the house want additional proof? All that hon. members have to do is to read the speech made by the hon. member for Bellechasse. Here is an hon. member of this house who comes before this chamber and asks its members to support his motion, and he cannot finish his speech without insulting them.

Mr. BOULANGER: My speech is in Hansard and it speaks for itself, and the hon. member for Compton has no right to put any such construction upon my words. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to ask him to withdraw.

Mr. GOBEIL: My hon. friend from Bellechasse is not the one to decide whether his speech was offensive. I say that every member on this side or on the other side of the house who did not believe as he did and who did not belong to the same race as he did felt himself insulted, whether the hon. member for Bellechasse meant it or not. As he very well said, his speech speaks for itself.

My hon. friends opposite like very much to pose as champions of the rights of the French race and of the French language, and sometimes even of the Catholic church. Let me suggest to them that if they have at heart, as they claim, the interests of the French race, there are other fields of activity where they can exercise their energy to much better advantage for their race than on this question of whether or not we shall have bilingual currency in 1933, 1934 or 1940. When I say 1933 or 1940, I say it for a purpose.

May I address myself for a moment more particularly to my English speaking colleagues of this house? It is hardly necessary for me to say to the house that I am no lawyer. We have had lots of talk this year and last year about the British North America Act in connection with this matter. Some people claim that according to that act we have the legal right to have bilingual currency in this country, while others claim that we have not. I do not care that about the British North America Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GOBEIL: I simply appeal to common sense. I look at this question in a common sense way. Here we are a country of ten million people, over three million of whom are of the French Canadian race. Those are the facts whether we have a right to bilingualism or not. I do not suspect for one minute that my English speaking friends are going to start a crusade and have all French Canadians slaughtered to get rid of them—not for one minute—and I am equally sure that the French Canadians have not the slightest thought of doing that to their English speaking compatriots. I am simply saying that, whether we like it or not, in this country of ten million people, over three million are of the French Canadian race, and in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this is a bilingual country and will remain a bilingual country for years to come. We have, it seems to me, certain rights over other minorities that might exist in this country because we are the first inhabitants of its soil. So why not make this country a real bilingual country? I think it would be to the advantage of all of us to have this country recognized as a bilingual country. As Sir Wilfrid Laurier so well said, where is the French Canadian who objects to an English two-dollar bill? And where is the English speaking Canadian in this chamber or outside who would object to a Dominion of Canada bill printed in French? There is not one I am sure, and so I appeal to our English speaking friends on both sides of the house, and ask them to accede to the wish of one-third of the population of this country and give the French Canadians bilingual bills, if you like, although I do not care to mention bilingual bills particularly. Rather I say let us make this country a real bilingual country because it is bound to remain so for generations and generations to come.

My time is flying, Mr. Speaker, and as I can speak faster in French I will conclude my remarks in that language.

(Translation): I was stating, sir, that if hon. members opposite have truly at heart the interest of their race or nationality, there are for them matters of greater importance than this question of bilingual currency which will come up and is bound to come up in the near future.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): If this question is of minor importance why do you second the motion.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): I would suggest to them, sir, if they are so anxious to work in the interest of their race, to travel down in groups to Quebec, so as to request the government of that province to see that the chairman of the two most important committees of the Legislative Assembly be French Canadians instead of being Jews; in the only Catholic province of Canada, as the Hon. Mr. Taschereau delights in calling it.

Mr. DUMAINE (Translation): That has nothing to do with the question.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): I would request them to use their influence with the Quebec government so that the latter may set aside for the citizens of that province what is left of our natural resources.

Mr. DUMAINE (Translation): That is irrelevant.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): —instead of continuing to alienate them to give them away for a pottage of lentils.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Who is the lunatic (aliéné)?

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): If the Quebec government, sir, had had at heart the interests of the Quebec people, if our friends had at heart the interests of their fellow-citizens, what good work they could have accomplished! Instead of allowing the names of cabinet ministers of that province to appear on the prospectus of fraudulent companies which exploit the farming class, making use as they do of the names of these ministers to palm off worthless shares, the government of my province should have directed the small savings of our people towards such sound investments as our natural resources. If these hon. gentlemen are so anxious, let them show it by working in the interest of their race; I would advise them to go to Montreal—

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): We shall pay a visit to the people of Compton at the next election.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): —in order to interview the administrators of the university of Montreal—I mean the lay administrators, not the church authorities, who were made ushers, but the lay administrators themselves, or liberal laymen in charge—so as to use their influence to induce them to expel from the university the anti-jewish element which is contaminating our young men.

Mr. BOURASSA (Translation): The anti-jewish element, hear, hear!

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Let them expel from the university the professors who are atheists, those who have no god and who take upon themselves to educate and form the minds of our youth.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): You are an expert on jam, but when it comes to poetry you are a failure!

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): My hon. friend, reminds me—

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): You had better not speak about it. You will get all muddled up.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): My hon. friend reminds me of a fable of Lafontaine: An old cunning fox having had the misfortune of losing his tail in a trap, gathered all the foxes of the surrounding country and, with his back turned to the wall, made them a splendid speech so as to persuade them to dispense with that appendix which, in his opinion, only served to sweep the dust of roads.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): You do not like foxes because they do not feed on jam, they are not clients of your brother.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): The hon. member has never expressed his views on the bilingual question and he would like to see his fellow-citizens do likewise.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): He never speaks!

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): We were ready to vote and you have prevented us.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Had I a suggestion to make to the hon. member, it would be that he should study this fable of Lafontaine and ponder over the fate of this poor fox when his congeners noticed that he had lost his tail.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Oh! Oh!

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): I would request you, sir, to maintain order, if you please.

(Text) The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Morand): Order!

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): I am aware, sir, that I have shocked a few in my remarks. I heard certain comments, made by my hon. friends opposite, that this had nothing to do with the question. I beg to differ. I contend that the reason set forth by our hon. friends toward proceeding with last year's motion, was the interest they display on behalf of the people of their province; however, I can show that there are other problems than that of bilingual currency in which they can be of more service to their fellow citizens. I appeal to the educated class, to professional men, on both sides of the house, and I ask them if, frankly, they have well fulfilled their duty as citizens, they that have the task, as the elite of the people, to guide public opinion in Quebec.

May I quote, sir, a small excerpt from Cardinal Villeneuve's speech delivered a few days ago in Montreal.

It is as follows:

Gentlemen, our universities must raise the level of their religious teaching. The various faculties should be replete with it for the sake of Catholic dignity and elementary logic. Have we Catholic universities where students may graduate as lawyers or physicians, just as they would graduate elsewhere, yes or no?

I think, what I request, sir, from professional men in this house, is only rational. I state that it is incumbent on our universities, on the university of Montreal to prepare our young men for their future callings, and if our country is to emerge from this crisis without the convulsions experienced by other countries, it will be due to the Christian spirit, religious spirit and common sense taught to our youth. Is it rational, reasonable and fair to send our young men of 14, 15, to 20 years, to an institution where they are contaminated by anti-Christian, and anti-French Canadian surroundings—

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Where?

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): In what institution?

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): At the university of Montreal—and where professors, I repeat it, atheist professors, anti-religious professors are permitted to give their lectures.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): Are there professors who are atheists in the university of Montreal?

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Yes, there are.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): Name them.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): It is unnecessary to name them, they are well known.

This bilingual question is very interesting, indeed, to us French Canadians, however, there are other spheres where we can be more useful and render better services, because bilingual currency will come sooner or later, but better soon than later.

I have myself a son who attended lectures at the university; I also have another who will probably attend them in a few years.

Mr. FERLAND (Translation): Has he come out contaminated?

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): No he did not, because I did not send him to the university of Montreal. I would not care to send him there nor shall I send him there, unless things change.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri), (Translation): Where did you send him to the Swiss school?

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Laval university, in Quebec.

This, sir, practically closes the remarks that I intended to make on the motion of the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé (Mr. Barrette). I did not dwell very much on the merit of the motion itself, as to whether it will settle the problem or not. I must frankly confess that I am not fully convinced that this resolution will be the means of establishing a bilingual currency or preventing it.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Is that why you seconded the motion?

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): I seconded the motion, sir, because I wished to show to my province—

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Dirt thrown on the university of Montreal!

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): —the insincerity of the position taken by members of the opposition on this question.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): It is a pity if you are in earnest.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): I stated that I was not fully convinced that this resolution would give the country a bilingual currency. I am convinced, however, that we shall have it without this motion; I moreover think that this bilingual currency would come even if the motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse had not been introduced last year.

So as not to question, sir, the sincerity of the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé—and I neither question it—I shall support this resolution if a vote is asked, although as I have just stated, I am not quite convinced that it will improve matters. As an hon. member opposite has just asked why I spoke on this motion, I shall state that I wanted to make clear the attitude I took last year, when a vote was taken on this question; furthermore, that I have not since changed my views and that I think, as I then thought, that the house should not be called upon to vote on this question.

Mr. J. A. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of taking part in this debate but when the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) put my name to his amendment, it necessarily fell to my lot to say a word or two. After the remarks of the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) it became more incumbent on me or some hon. member on this side of the house to say something. The hon. gentleman who preceded me stated his remarks in a very benign manner and although he did not make himself absolutely clear as to his intentions in connection with the motion before the house, I think we can take it that he is in favour of a bilingual currency in this country. We on this side are in favour of such a currency, not as a matter of begging but as a matter of right.

There is a certain fact which is so self-evident that I hardly think I need mention it to hon. members, but for the sake of my argument I refer hon. members to section 133 of the British North America Act. This section recognizes the fact that there are two languages in this country and states that either the English or the French language may be used in the debates of the houses of parliament as well as in the houses of the legislature of the province of Quebec. This section likewise recognizes the right to the use of both official languages in the records and journals of parliament. Under this section it is also given to the people of Canada to plead before the courts of the country in the language in which they are accustomed to express themselves.

The hon. member for Compton sidestepped the issue when he went back to that state of mind for which he is well known and attempted to abuse hon. members on this side for certain happenings last year. If the house will remember, the hon. member for Bellechasse moved a motion asking this house to decide that it was the right of a certain section of the Canadian population to have a bilingual currency. After a protracted discussion the hon. member for Compton moved a motion to give the resolution of the hon. member for Bellechasse the six months' hoist.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): I stand corrected. His motion was that the debate be adjourned, and later the debate went on and the question was talked out. Now this year the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge, whether he recognizes the principle of the resolution or not, comes forward with a resolution to the effect that this question should be submitted to a special committee consisting of certain hon. members. Well, we say that either this question is worthy of consideration or it is not. I have just said that the French language is recognized under the British North America Act, and we well remember that under the previous administration the same difficulties arose that are arising here to-night. When the hon. gentleman who occupied the portfolio of Postmaster General at that time brought down a resolution to have the stamps of Canada printed in both languages, there was a great deal of talk over this resolution but it went through, and I ask any hon. member in this chamber whether anyone was done any harm by the fact that the stamps of the country were printed in both languages. In asking Canada to accept stamps and currency in both languages, I would say to you, Mr. Speaker, that if it took away a right from any individual in Canada, or called upon any individual in Canada to do something that might be detrimental to him, then a resolution along those lines should not be supported. But the bilingualism of the stamps in this country has done no harm to anyone. The hue and cry raised at that time has died down; the good sense of the Canadian people recognizes that no harm was done anyone, and no one objects now to having the stamps of the country printed in both official languages. The same question comes up at this time. What harm could be done anyone? Where will anyone be deprived of a right inherent in him as a Canadian citizen if our currency is stamped or printed in both languages? No difficulty was found in adapting the new issue of stamps to the needs of the country, and there will be no difficulty in adapting the currency on the lines of the resolution presented by the hon. member for Bellechasse last year, and on the lines as will be approved by the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge, because I am sure he is in favour of that, and on the lines approved by the hon. member for Compton in what he said.

If the hon. member for Compton had stopped when he said that he could not see why anyone should object to having the currency of the country made bilingual, he would have met with the approval of the house. But he went off at a tangent that was not worthy of a member of the house, when he brought up—

Mr. BENNETT: That must be withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member to withdraw those words with reference to the hon. member for Compton.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): I necessarily bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I say that it was with the greatest surprise and the greatest sorrow that we listened to the last remarks made by the hon. member for Compton, who got away from the issue and brought up matters absolutely foreign to the debate, without being called upon by the chair to stick to the question. I think that the remarks of the hon. gentleman—and I am speaking of those remarks he made in French at the end of his speech—should be brought to the attention of the house and of the country. The hon. member, leaving aside the merits of the resolution, said that we on this side could have used our activities for more meritorious purposes than asking that this right which is ours should be recognized by the house. He said we could find a better use for our activities by going into the province of Quebec and blaming the Quebec government for the fact that the legislature of that province named as chairmen on some of its most important committees persons who were of Jewish nationality. I have no mandate to defend the government of the province of Quebec, but the members of the legislature of Quebec, the same as the members of this House of Commons, have rights there whatever their nationality may be, and if the government and the legislature of the province of Quebec see fit to name as chairmen of their committees people who are not of the two great nationalities of this country, it is no affair of ours and it is no affair of the hon member for Compton. The hon. gentleman went further and said that if we wanted to use our activities in the proper channel we should blame the Quebec government for having allowed ministers of that government to have their names appear on the prospectuses of fraudulent companies.

I repeat, I have no mandate to defend the government of the province of Quebec. It has been at the head of the administration of that province for thirty-four years. Election after election has taken place in that province and time after time the people have given their stamp of approval to the existence and the acts of that government.

The hon. gentleman goes further. He comes into this house to wash linen that may not be clean in the eyes of some, and to discuss matters that should not have been brought before the house. He spoke to us about the university of Montreal. We citizens of Montreal and of the province of Quebec regret the situation that exists there, but we say that the hon. member was absolutely wrong in his statement when he said that it was wrong for the people of Quebec to send their children to that university and put them in a milieu which was anti-Christian in its nature, where professors of atheistic views teach the youth of this country. I ask what has that to do with the resolution under consideration? I say the hon. member should have been called to order.

Mr. GOBEIL: It has a lot to do with it.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): The question is whether or not the house is going to adopt a resolution asking that our currency be stamped or printed in both languages; it does not matter what happened in the university of Montreal or what happened in the legislature of the province of Quebec. I say with all due respect that this resolution asks only for a right to which the minority in this country is entitled. Granting that right will do harm to no one, will deprive no one of any of his privileges. So when the hon. member for Bellechasse asked me to second his motion, Mr. Speaker, I did so with the greatest of pleasure.

Mr. J. FERNAND FAFARD (L'Islet) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I had prepared a few notes with reference to the resolution of the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé (Mr. Barrette); however, as I notice it is 10.25 p.m., I think the best thing I can do so as not to delay the vote on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger), is to sit down and thus allow enough time for the house to decide the issue.

Mr. POULIOT: Regina will come next.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what prescience my hon. friend who has just spoken possesses, but he probably is aware of some arrangement of which I know nothing.

My attention was attracted by the speech of the hon. member (Mr. Mercier) who has just sat down. He has said that this resolution is asking for what is a matter of right under the British North America Act. It is quite true that section 91 of that act commits to the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada the subject of currency and coinage. But turning to section 133, to which my hon. friend was referring, one sees that if from the first section I have named any deduction were to be drawn as to the resolution now before the house, the matter in question is governed by section 133, which clearly and expressly sets forth the position in regard to language in this country. Section 133, which my hon. friend did not read, is as follows:

> Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the houses of the parliament of Canada and of the houses of the legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this act, and in or from all or any of the courts of Quebec.
> The acts of the parliament of Canada and of the legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both those languages.

I do not ask the house to accept my opinion as one on which the subject is to be decided; but it does seem to me that you have in that section a clear definition of the occasions on which the different languages may be used. It is directed to the use of the two languages not only in the courts and houses of parliament of Canada and legislature of Quebec but also in the respective records and journals of those houses and in pleading or process in the courts. And lest it be thought that perhaps printing might include something in the nature of coinage, I draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the second paragraph of the section I have just read:

> The acts of the parliament of Canada and of the legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both those languages.

That is, it is confined, as far as printing is mentioned, to the acts of the legislature of the province of Quebec and the parliament of Canada.

That act, Mr. Speaker, is almost a legislative bargain; it was at all events the result of an agreement arrived at in the year 1867 between elements that perhaps at times were rather in conflict. It is not an act with which all the people in my province are satisfied. But it is an act under which people in my province have lived and acted and carried on their business and affairs, political or otherwise, not because they liked it in some instances, but because they had said they would do it, and they proposed to stick with their bargain and follow the provisions of this act.

I must say that last year the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) did not approach this subject in a way calculated to induce that friendly feeling which we think should obtain amongst us, because at the beginning of his address and at the end of it he used language of a highly provocative nature, language which I resented at the time but of which I did not think I should take notice. It seemed to me that I should almost lower myself by taking advantage of the opportunity then afforded to me and expressing resentment of it in words. The hon. gentleman, opening his speech at that time—the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) referred to it, and I have here a copy of the speech—said he had hopes of convincing people whom he described in very laudatory terms but he had no hope of convincing ignorant or bigoted or silly people. Surely, Mr. Speaker, there is room in all kindliness, in all confraternity, for differences of opinion; but to describe those who venture to differ from the hon. gentleman by such words as those was, as I say, provocative rather than conciliatory, and did not tend, had we chosen to take it that way, to promote the good feeling of the debate. Then he ended by addressing hon. members of this house, if you please, as "hare brained people of the Orange Order, who have brought into this free and peaceful country the narrow and ignorant fanaticism of foreign countries." I took no notice of it; neither did any other hon. member of the house that I know of, but I draw attention to it now because the hon. gentleman spoke of it, and I say it is not conciliatory language, not the kind of language to address to any hon. member of this house. Yet the hon. member closed his speech upon the resolution by using just those words.

The hon. member for Laurier-Outremont (Mr. Mercier) says it is provided in the British North America Act that there should be this use of the two languages. If it were so I would not be one to raise a finger against it. I might dislike it intensely—I do not as a matter of fact—but I would not raise my hand or my voice in gesture or whisper against what is the law, much as I or as anyone might feel that he was opposed to it. But then my friends say: "Be agreeable; give us a concession". They treat it as though it were something we should agree to and hand to them. But, Mr. Speaker, I am not warranted in doing that. I respect the opinions of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this resolution on the other side of the house; as far as I understood them I respect entirely the views they express. I acknowledge that they are held in all sincerity and that they are entitled to express them; to their love of race credit is to be given. But I say to them: Give me credit also for the same thing; give me credit for honesty and sincerity in holding my view; do not ascribe to me fanaticism or improper motives. Let us agree with one another that no concession outside of the act is warranted. The people I represent do not want and have not authorized me to give a concession, to go outside the terms of the bargain that was entered into in 1867 and under which we have lived. I do not think my hon. friend should ascribe to any desire to be disagreeable my inability to enter into such concession-giving. God knows I like to be agreeable as well as any man in the world, but the people who have sent me here are entitled to have me represent their views as best I can, so I do not believe I am warranted in going outside the act or in giving concessions. It is not my privilege it is not my duty.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to interrupt a moment? The French people are not asking for concessions. Deal with it on the ground that we are asking it as a matter of right.

Mr. GEARY: If that is the point at issue, well and good, but I did not understand that to be the view of all hon. members. Certainly it was not the view of the hon. member who introduced the resolution last year, and it was not the view expressed by different speakers this evening or when the matter last came up for discussion. So I feel that I must carry out my duty, despite the cries of my hon. friends opposite who derided me when I rose to speak. Perhaps that was only a natural ebullition of spirit, and perhaps I should not pay too much attention to it, but whether one likes it or not that is the feeling one has. That is why I am bound to take the position I have expressed.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscuoata): Mr. Speaker, I have just one question to ask some hon. gentlemen. I will ask my good friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré), my good friend the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau), the hon. member for Three Rivers-St. Maurice (Mr. Bourgeois), the hon. member for Lake St. John (Mr. Duguay), the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon), the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Laurin), the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe (Mr. Laflèche), the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé (Mr. Barrette), my hon. friend from Shefford (Mr. Tétreault), my hon. friend from Champlain (Mr. Baribeau), my hon. friend from St. Ann (Mr. Sullivan)—

Mr. SULLIVAN: I am going to vote for the amendment.

Mr. POULIOT: That is not my question; let me finish. I will ask my hon. friend from Mount Royal (Mr. White), that dear old gentleman whom we all like; I ask them all if they approve of the speech delivered this evening by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil), in which he said that one of his children had been contaminated in the university of Montreal.

Mr. GOBEIL: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I never said that.

Mr. POULIOT: It was said in French, and I repeat it now in English in order to secure an explanation.

Mr. GOBEIL: I never said it.

Mr. POULIOT: He said he had not been contaminated because he had not been sent to Montreal university.

Mr. GOBEIL: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: That is what he said; there may be a little difference in the words but the meaning is the same. I ask all the hon. gentlemen I have named to be courageous enough to answer my question yes or no.

Mr. GOBEIL: I spoke for myself.

Mr. POULIOT: I ask the hon. member for Long Lake (Mr. Cowan); I ask the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull), who prevented a vote last year by his speech at the last moment—and he a member of the Ku Klux Klan—when we on this side of the house asked for a chance to vote. I ask them if they support the words of the hon. member for Compton. Sir, this is political propaganda which is brought once more to the House of Commons in order to create prejudice among the different races in this country.

Now, sir, I shall conclude my speech. I know that none of these hon. gentlemen will answer my question. No member from the province of Quebec and no member belonging to the Ku Klux Klan will answer my question, though I give them an opportunity to state their position.

Mr. JOHN A. SULLIVAN (St. Ann): Mr. Speaker, I have not spoken in this house very often. I am a graduate of Montreal university; my son, a lawyer, graduated from the same university, and I am quite sure my hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Gobeil) went beyond what he intended to say when he stated that he would not send his son to the university of Montreal. I am sure that was not his meaning, because we on this side of the house believe that the university of Montreal is certainly worthy of the French Canadian race, of the province of Quebec and of Canada.

I want to add just a few words. My hon. friend from South Toronto (Mr. Geary) said the British North America Act did not give us the right to have bilingual currency in Canada. Possibly this is true in the strict letter of the law, but at the present time everyone is asking for an amendment to the British North America Act. This government can do anything it wishes except change a man into a woman. If this right does not exist under the British North America Act, I ask the house to pass a resolution asking for an amendment of that act so that we may have bilingual currency in this country.

In order to understand the situation we must study the history of Canada, which was ceded to Great Britain in 1763. The battle of the Plains of Abraham took place in 1759; Canada was surrended in 1760, and finally the Treaty of Paris was signed in 1763. At that time there were sixty thousand French Canadians living in this country; in 1774 there were about one hundred thousand, while there were only five or six hundred English people in Canada. Sir Guy Carleton, later Lord Dorchester, one of the greatest men in history, certainly understood the situation. Sir Guy Carleton, governor of Canada, went to England and explained the situation in this country to the British parliament. It is one of the miracles of history that the British people, after having failed to keep in one community those of their own race who had settled in what is now the United States, were given the rare chance, the great advantage, of establishing a foothold in this territory. I say without fear of contradiction, and history will prove my contention, that Lord Dorchester, by obtaining for Canada the Quebec Act of 1774, performed the greatest service that could have been performed for this country and the British Empire. That act gave to the French Canadians the right to follow their own religion and to be governed by their own civil laws; it gave the priests the right to exercise their ministry; and that act kept the French Canadians together when Canada was attacked by the United States. But for the Quebec Act of 1774 this country would belong to the United States, and there would be no British Empire.

I will conclude my remarks, sir, by addressing myself to every element in this chamber, French or English speaking Canadians, Roman Catholics and all other denominations. I ask only one thing: I ask every member of this house to read history and be inspired by it. If we want to keep this country united let us forget our differences; let us see that all races profit by our good and proper administration of the affairs of our country.

Mr. ONESIME GAGNON (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, I beg the indulgence of the house for a few moments. First let me say, however, that in view of the fact that my hearing is not as good as it might be I did not hear everything said by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil). Nevertheless, whatever his expression of opinion might have been, I feel I must dissociate myself from any criticism against the distinguished personnel of the university of Montreal for whom, in Quebec, irrespective of any party affiliations, we have nothing but the greatest admiration and respect.

Sometimes it is sickening and discouraging when, on occasions when French Canadians on both sides of the house ought to present a united front in order to appeal to the sense of justice of the majority of Canadians, we lose our time and discredit ourselves by hurling insults at each other and indulging in personalities which, on occasions, call for action by Mr. Speaker. We ought not to resurrect old party quarrels; as I have said, we ought to be united in asking from the majority in this House of Commons a recognition of the letter of the British North America Act and, if not the letter at least the spirit. Because, as has been said, sometimes when the letter is not clear the spirit vivifies.

[Mr. Sullivan.]

I must disapprove of the expression of opinion voiced to-night by the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) who stated that he is not ready to make concessions. I think we ought to rise to higher ground. Listening to such statements from him I remembered that only on Saturday last, the day before yesterday, there was invited to the city of Quebec a distinguished educationalist from the university of Toronto, Mr. Dunlop, director of public relations, who appeared before the Canadian Club on Saturday afternoon and pleaded for cooperation between the Canadian races, and the recognition of the French language in Canada. He stated that in the university of Toronto lessons are given in the French language not only by distinguished French speaking professors from Canada but by professors from Paris. He stated that over the radio inter-university debates are being held in the French language between the university of Toronto and universities in the province of Quebec. He stated, further, that this week there would be a bilingual debate between the students of the university of Winnipeg, Manitoba, and those of Laval university at Quebec.

If we were basing our contentions only on the letter of the British North America Act, would we be on safe ground? I say yes, but I understand some people might say no. I repeat we ought not only to look at the letter of the contract, but we must also look at the spirit of it. Let us take inspiration from the eloquent words expressed in the Canadian House of Commons in 1890 by one of the greatest of the men who have led the Conservative party, Sir John A. Macdonald. His words are as follows:

> I have no accord with the desire expressed in certain quarters that by any mode whatever there should be an attempt made to oppress the one language or to make it inferior to the other.
> I believe that would be impossible if it were tried, and it would be foolish and wicked if it were possible. The statement that has been made so often that this is a conquered country is "a propose de rien." Whether it was conquered or ceded we have a constitution under which all British subjects are in a position of absolute equality, having equal rights of every kind, of language, of religion, of property, of person.
> There is no paramount race in this country. There is no conquered race in this country, we are all British subjects and those who are not English are none the less British subjects on that account.

Let us be inspired by the words of Sir John A. Macdonald; let us discuss and study the rights of the French language on a broad and higher plane. In that respect, Mr.

Speaker, I have no hesitation in saying that I shall gladly vote for the amendment moved by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: The same as last year.

Mr. F. W. TURNBULL (Regina): Mr. Speaker, some comment has been made regarding the fact that I spoke on a similar motion a year ago. If I remember the circumstances correctly, we have spent at least ninety-five per cent of the time allotted to this debate in listening to hon. members from the province of Quebec, and it does seem strange if one English speaking person from the rest of Canada should not be allowed five or ten minutes to express his views, without being subjected to criticism. My hon. friends opposite say: Why should this matter have been talked out—as they call it—in 1933, when they were anxious to have a vote? Why was it necessary to wait until 1933 to have their great anxiety satisfied? Where were those hon. gentlemen between the years 1905 and 1911? Where were they and their predecessors in this house? Where were hon. gentlemen opposite and their predecessors between 1922 and 1929, if they were so anxious to have this legislation passed? Why did they wait until 1933 to bring the matter up?

If I have time I shall refer to some of the remarks made by their leaders, with respect to action hon. gentlemen have taken in the debate this evening and in that of last year. I want to say this, that so far as I could judge the debate this evening, with my limited knowledge of the French language—I shall read it to-morrow morning and get it more clearly—it seemed to me more like a political fight among members from the province of Quebec as to who would get the most kudos from the province of Quebec for raising this question. If there had been any great desire to have this legislation passed in days gone by, it would have been shown by the action of hon. members. I should like to place on record the action taken in 1905 by the Liberal party with respect to this very question. I am sorry the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) is not in his seat. It is a matter of comment that he has not been here this evening to listen to the debate. I am sorry also that the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) who is said to be the champion of the French speaking people, is not in his seat to-night.

The matter was formally raised on May 21, 1905, and is reported at page 6826 of Hansard for that year. Further reference to the matter was made by the hon. member for Montmagny in the debate which took place in the session of 1906-7. I wish to place on record questions asked of the government of which Sir Wilfrid Laurier was leader, and which had his approval, or they would not have been placed on Hansard. The answers were given by Mr. W. S. Fielding, the then Minister of Finance. The questions are in these terms:

1. Do any grave reasons of state exist that might prevent the Minister of Finance from having the dominion one dollar and two dollar notes or all other bank notes printed simultaneously in English and French?

2. Are they unaware in the Finance department that the two languages are official in Canada?

3. Is it the intention of the Minister of Finance to rectify in the future this state of things by ordering that those bank notes be printed in both languages, English and French?

The answer by Mr. Fielding is as follows:

There is nothing in the British North America Act or in any act of the parliament of Canada which requires or contemplates the printing of dominion notes in two languages.

The Finance department has not contemplated the advisability of any departure from the practice which has existed under all governments from the beginning of confederation down to the present time.

That was the official statement of the Liberal party on this question in 1905. That position has not been departed from by the Liberal party in this house since then. No matter what hon. gentleman opposite may say in this debate here to-night, they cannot convince their own party that the answer given in 1905 was wrong. They cannot get the support of their own members on this question and they probably owe me a debt of gratitude for talking till eleven o'clock so that the rest of the party will not be put on record on this question to-night.

There is only one solution of this question, Mr. Speaker, and that is the solution that I think was suggested by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) to-night, the resolution he might have suggested last year, and that is that the government of this country in the printing of bills, notes, currency and all these other departmental forms follow the constitution of this country and the British North America Act. If it is necessary to find out what the British North America Act means, there are ways and means of doing so. I maintain that whatever rights the French language has in this dominion there is not the right to have pieces of paper printed by this government with both French and English on it. There is the right to have the statutes printed in French; there is the right to have the statutes printed in English, but there is no right to have a bilingual set of statutes. There may be a right under the act to have bills printed in French; there may be a right under the act to have bills printed in English; but there can be no two questions about it that there is no right under the act to have bills printed in both English and French—that is bilingual bills. I am prepared to go further and say with regard to postage stamps, to which my hon. friend referred, and other departmental forms, that there is no legal right under the act to have them printed in the two languages. You may have French stamps; you may have English stamps; you may have French post office forms, or you may have English post office forms; but you have no right under the act to have them printed in both the English and the French language.

Whatever the British North America Act says, whatever the rights are under that, when they are decided upon I am prepared to abide by them. If they say we are to have bilingual currency, well and good. I do not wish to take from the French people one single jot or tittle of what was given them by the British North America Act. There is my hon. friend from Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) who says: We want concessions if the British North America Act does not give us enough. Then there is my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) who says: No, we do not want any concessions; we only want what the act says. What are we to believe, Mr. Speaker, in regard to what they desire? Those are the two opinions that I heard expressed here during this debate.

Let me say that in speaking as I do tonight I am not one of those who were referred to in the debate a year ago by the hon. member for Bellechasse; I am not one of the bigoted class. I do not belong to the Orange order; I do not belong to the Ku Klux Klan; I do not belong to the Knights of Columbus, and I am not speaking as the representative of any one of them, I have the greatest admiration for them all, but I do not belong to any of them. I am speaking here as the member for the constituency of Regina, and expressing the views which the people of Regina would wish to have me express on this question which is before the house.

I have heard it said that the French language has rights in this country derived from treaties. I have looked at the Peace of Paris and at the terms of capitulation of Quebec and at the terms of capitulation of Montreal, and there is not one word in any of those three documents with regard to the use by the French speaking people of the French language in this country. So whatever rights the language might have in this country do not depend at all upon the terms of treaties or the terms of capitulation, but must rest upon statutory laws subsequently created by competent authority. As I say, in standing by the terms of the constitution, in standing by the terms of the British North America Act, I am in good company.

And may I say that the feeling that exists in certain parts of Canada is not a feeling of resentment against the French language. In the province of Saskatchewan there is no person who would prohibit the use of the French language anywhere in the province by anyone who wants to use it. As a matter of fact, the provincial government is teaching the French language both by correspondence and by lessons over the radio in the province of Saskatchewan, and yet Saskatchewan has been represented as the enemy of the French people. We do object to being made to use the French language, and we do object, owing to acts of administration by the government of this country, not this government, but previous governments, and this government as well, I might add, to being compelled to use the French language when we desire to use the English. With regard to post office forms in Saskatchewan, for instance, a French postmaster may send into the central office and get post office forms printed wholly in French. An English postmaster cannot send into the central office and get forms printed wholly in English. He has to take them in the two languages. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite from Quebec if they think that is fair. Then they ask us for further concessions. I say it is not fair. I say along with the leaders of both parties for many years that I stand by the constitution, and I think that is the only solution of this question we will ever get that will be a reasonable solution.

I want to refer in the few moments that are left to me to a resolution which was passed by the government of Canada and the opposition combined on the eighteenth day of February, 1890, which will be found in Hansard of that year at pages 881 and 882. Part of the resolution is in these words:

That, on the contrary, this house declares its adherence to the said covenants—

That is, the covenants of the British North America Act:

—and its determination to resist any attempt to impair the same.

I stand in my place and say, as Sir John A. Macdonald said, as Sir Wilfrid Laurier said, as Sir John Thompson said, as the Hon. Edward Blake said, and as other great leaders of the Liberal party have said, that I adhere to the covenants of the British North America Act and to my determination to resist any attempt to impair them. That is the position I take here this evening.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, February 27, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

PRICE SPREADS AND MASS BUYING

Mr. Stevens presented the second report of the special committee appointed to inquire into price spreads and mass buying and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 21, to amend the Railway Act (rates on grain).

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANNED SALMON EXPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity of replying to a question put to me the other day by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) in which he called into question the figures published in the Commercial Intelligence Journal and in the report of the bureau of statistics. The hon. member pointed out that in his opinion there were certain discrepancies as between those two sets of figures, and at page 916 of Hansard he said:

One can imagine how an exporter or importer would be deceived by figures like that,—

And further he states:

If it is not useful and if it is not accurate, what is left?

He invited me to look into the matter, which I have done, and in justice to the importance of the matter and the desirability that the public should be assured of the accuracy of published figures I desire to make a brief explanation which I think will clear up the whole matter to his entire satisfaction.

Briefly, the complaint was that in connection with the exports of canned salmon from Canada over quarterly periods, the figures of the dominion's exports did not agree with the figures of the British imports for the same period. The reasons are as follows: Exports to Great Britain going from the Pacific coast would take nearly a month to arrive in Great Britain, and it is quite understandable that a very substantial portion might be shipped from the Pacific coast in one quarter and not reach the British Isles until the next quarter. In the second place the imports in Great Britain are set forth in hundredweights of 112 pounds while exports from Canada are set forth in the Canadian standard of 100 pounds. If one will take the year 1933 it shows the following: Exports of canned salmon from Canada to Great Britain amounted to 11,151,800 pounds. Imports into Great Britain from Canada amounted to 11,397,680 pounds, almost exactly the same; the slight variation might be accounted for by the possible non-arrival of a shipment within the year period.

I have another statement which I will hand to Hansard which shows in detail the monthly, quarterly and annual exports in hundredweights and the imports into the United Kingdom, from the United Kingdom figures. In explanation of the statement I might say that it shows 111,518 hundredweights of 100 pounds exported from Canada, while the imports into the United Kingdom are shown at 101,765 hundredweights of 112 pounds. The total figures, as I said a moment ago, are very close in actual pounds. This statement, which shows the monthly, quarterly and annual exports from Canada and imports into the United Kingdom will give to the hon. gentleman the assurance he requires that the figures are quite accurate, and that the importer or exporter may have no fear or alarm as to the accuracy of the figures published in the government publications.

The figures are as follows:

CANADIAN LEGATION AT TOKYO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, some nine months ago, I think it was on May 24, 1933, an order of this house was passed authorizing the tabling of some orders in council and some other documents in respect of the Tokyo legation. I do not wish to hurry the government—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): —but I should like to have those documents tabled at the earliest possible moment.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): My memory is that only yesterday upon the motion of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) an order for return was passed, and papers are being prepared.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The order to which I refer was passed on May 24, 1933, and my information obtained from the office is that these documents have not yet been tabled.

CAIRO POSTAL CONGRESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have two questions to ask the government, and they will be the two last ones I shall ask. I should like to know if the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) is travelling at the expense of the Canadian exchequer or at his own expense, and if at the expense of the Canadian exchequer, the government positively refuses to give any information to the house as to how that money has been spent.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster General did not desire to go personally to attend at Cairo, but inasmuch as the conference held there is a world conference, and the preparation took place in the Dominion of Canada, he spoke to me about the matter and, as Postmaster General, he attended the conference. His expenditures are covered by order in council, as is usual in such cases, and he is receiving exactly the same compensation as did his predecessors when they attended similar conferences.

In addition to that I think it is only fair to say that the questioning to which he has been subjected in his absence I am sure he will endeavour to answer personally on his return. I was going to make this further observation in regard to the question which has been asked, and it is this: As far as the accountability for moneys received for travelling or for other expenses is concerned, there need be no fear in any sense that the Postmaster General will not afford such returns as the auditor general in the exercise of his powers will require.

That covers the questions which have been asked, but I might say that abroad it does not help to have it thought that one who represents all parties in this House of Commons, and the whole of this dominion, at a world conference, in his capacity as Postmaster General, and not in his political capacity should be in his home parliament, and in his absence, subjected to the type of questions which have been asked here with respect to our Postmaster General.

Mr. POULIOT: I have another question.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member said that was the last one.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member asked two questions, and they have been answered.

Mr. POULIOT: I have two further questions.

An hon. MEMBER: Put them on the order paper.

Mr. POULIOT: What I want to know is this: Is or is not the postal congress at Cairo concluded? In the event of it being concluded, when did that conclusion take place, and if it is not concluded—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: —is the Postmaster General at Cairo or in any other country or continent—not in Africa or Europe—and I want to know why?

74726—62½

Mr. BENNETT: I am not aware as to whether or not the conference is concluded. My advice is that it has not been. Wherever the Postmaster General may be I am sure that upon his return he will satisfy the very laudable curiosity of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. POULIOT: Is he with Ambrose Small?

PRIVILEGE—Mr. LAPOINTE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I wish also to satisfy the laudable curiosity of the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull). It now comes to my notice that last night he commented on and was worrying about my absence from the house while a certain resolution was being discussed. I have much pleasure in informing him that I was engaged in Quebec city, speaking in favour of the League of Nations, the promotion of peace and justice to minorities.

BUREAU FOR TRANSLATIONS

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 4, respecting the bureau for translations.

He said: This bill has been the subject of rather violent criticism in certain sections of the public press. These criticisms, I believe, are due to lack of information as to the provisions of the bill, or an entire misapprehension as to its purpose. The government, let me asure you, is not endeavouring to destroy the confederation pact, or to preclude the use of the French language in the debates of parliament, in the reports of proceedings of parliament, or in the administration of the several departments and agencies of the government of Canada. I am hoping I may be able to remove some of these misunderstandings, and for that reason I beg the indulgence of the house while briefly I review the circumstances which convinced the government that the public interest demanded the moderate measures of reform embodied in this bill.

As soon as I became Secretary of State in 1930 I was informed, as the minister responsible for the administration of the Department of Public Printing and Stationery, that the publications of French translations of public documents were frequently so long delayed as to impair, if not to destroy, their usefulness to the government and to the public. A cursory review at that time showed that a very considerable number of the documents translated into and published in French were not published until at least six months after the English edition had been issued, and later the treasury board in making an investigation through an investigator appointed by them ascertained that a considerable number were not published and distributed until one year, at least, after the issue of the English edition to the public. These delays, it was urged, destroy the usefulness, to the people who were most interested, of these documents published in the French language. Oftentimes the documents could not be used in the French language until six months or more after the English edition had appeared. In a province, such as ours, and a city such as Montreal, which is now doing a very considerable business with European countries in which the French language prevails, it was reported to me that their business operations were hampered by the fact that the French editions were not available at an early date for transmission to their correspondents in France, Switzerland, Belgium and other countries.

I also received complaints from the heads of various departments that the cost of printing at the Department of Public Printing and Stationery was frequently in excess of the estimates obtained by them independently from printing establishments in Toronto, Montreal and also in Ottawa.

Such personal investigations as I was able to make into the conditions prevailing in the printing bureau convinced me that its overhead expenses were excessive, due I think chiefly to the fact that for many years under successive governments important appointments had been made to the printing bureau on the ground of political services rendered, rather than that such appointments were absolutely necessary for the efficient administration of that branch of the public service. Other important matters absorbed my attention, particularly matters dealing with reparations and matters relating to my ministerial duties as custodian of enemy property, and as you all know, in 1930 I had to proceed to Berlin where I was engaged for some time in making a settlement and an adjustment with the German government as to the respective liabilities of the two governments arising out of the war.

Again, after I returned, the matter came up and I was informed that the cost of printing, particularly the cost of printing translations into French, was frequently increased by the carelessness, if not incompetence in the preparation of the copy which was submitted by translators to the printing bureau for printing. After the type had been set up in the French language in accordance with the typewritten copy received by the King's Printer, such excessive alterations were frequently made in the printed text as in some cases to double the cost of typesetting by way of corrections. I then ascertained that little if any governmental or administrative control was exercised over the preparation of translators' copy for the printers.

These matters, coming up from time to time, were brought to the attention of council by my colleagues and discussions were invited, I having to assume responsibility largely for the delays and excessive costs as minister in charge of the printing bureau. But the obvious remedy then seemed to be entirely beyond my official control. Nevertheless in the summers of 1932 and 1933 it was found impossible to give full-time employment at the printing bureau, especially to those who were employed by the month at prevailing rates. Out of the five hundred employees of that bureau I think four-fifths are temporary employees who have been so employed on monthly prevailing rates for ten, fifteen and even twenty years.

To meet the lack of employment we were compelled during those two summers to reduce the hours of labour at the bureau. We reduced the number of working days a week. Then we reduced the monthly employment by one week's compulsory vacation out of four, and finally it came down to two week's compulsory leisure or vacation in each month. This reduction bore heavily, in fact most severely, on compositors and others whose maternal language is French because, as is natural, they are largely engaged upon compositions in the French language at the printing bureau. The customary delays in the delivery of French copy for the printers, due largely to delays in furnishing the translations into the French language, prevented the bureau from working continuously on French composition during June, July, August and September.

Hon. members will recognize that the printing bureau is an absolute necessity during the session of parliament in order to carry on the printing and publishing of debates and of the proceedings in parliament, but the summer time is the time when, to keep the printing bureau employed, it should have available for printing blue books, parliamentary returns, and other documents which are not immediately related to the work of the session. The delays in the delivery of the copy for these blue books, so called, gave rise to very considerable hardship, and especially to those employed at the bureau whose maternal language is French.

The printing work of the bureau, exclusive of cost of material, has been somewhat curtailed by a restriction of the activities of the administration in various departments. Although the public printing done outside the bureau in the printing houses in this and in other cities has been reduced from $462,000 a year in 1930-31 to $140,000 a year in 1932-33, a decrease of over $320,000 a year, nevertheless the printing done at the printing bureau has been reduced from $1,211,000 in 1930-31 to $1,056,500 in 1932-33, a reduction of $154,500; that is, a reduction in the cost of wages at the bureau. That is to say, that of the receipts of the bureau $154,500 less was available for the payment of salaries and wages of the people so employed. As a result of this in less than five months it became necessary to reduce the number of employees by 77, including 5 deaths, and these 77 were receiving aggregate annual salaries of $155,286. That was done in order to balance the account at the bureau. A few were retired by death but nearly all because they had reached the age of sixty-five or over. Many of those who were retired were under the Superannuation Act, and in the case of those who were not under that act an effort was made to give them a reasonable solatium. Of that entire 77 only six were hand compositors who had reached the age limit. There still remain in the bureau for hand composition alone 87 compositors and 36 linotype operators out of a total staff of 595, of whom 415 are temporary employees, so called. That is, they are employed on monthly wages at the prevailing rates in printing houses in Toronto and Montreal; but they are not under the Superannuation Act, and if they receive a month's notice they have to go out under the law without any compensation. Nevertheless I assure the house that I made every effort to keep these printers engaged by the month at the prevailing rate. The situation was somewhat relieved by a reduction in the large overhead expenses to which I have referred, an overhead which was greatly in excess of the reasonable needs of the establishment.

In October last, the copy, especially for the French copies of the so-called parliamentary returns and bluebooks, was not coming in. Notice was given in that month to forty employees who were on prevailing rates at a monthly wage that their services would be no longer required although the working hours and the days in the week worked had been reduced. These employees were notified of their retirement on December 31. On November 27 I went away for a month's holidays and returned on the day following Christmas. I was reliably informed that some of the employees under notice of dismissal had been unable, through lack of employment, to save up sufficient during the summer to provide their families with fuel and food during the month of January. Hon. gentlemen who sometimes discuss in boards of trade throughout the country the necessity of reducing employment in the public service cannot realize the sense of personal responsibility which lies upon a minister when he approves of forcible retirements under such circumstances. These representations were made to me by clerical gentlemen and others who knew the condition of these families, and, when I reflected upon the hardship which would be imposed upon them by retirement, I found I could not sleep the Saturday night before New Year's day. In the morning I got in touch with the King's Printer and asked him to notify these forty employees to return to work on the Tuesday following. We decided to make some division of labour which would enable these men to keep their families warm and provide them with food during the succeeding winter months. These employees were brought back but there had to be a sharing of work by other employees with the result that they and others in the establishment could be given work for only two weeks during the month.

These facts have been before the government for nearly two years. I say deliberately that after giving conscientious supervision to the work of that department I find it impossible to give a continuous and fair measure of employment unless all departmental reports both in English and French are furnished as soon after the close of the session as possible in order to provide work for the intervening months before the opening of the next session.

I was absent from this country from the autumn of 1932 until the first week of February, 1933. During my absence complaints with respect to the furnishing of French translations from the printed translations by the printing bureau became so acute and other complaints as to the cost of operating the printing bureau under these circumstances became so numerous that the matter was brought up for careful investigation and reconsideration. On March 3, 1932, some rumours with regard to the condition which then prevailed must have got abroad because I was asked in this house a question as to what recommendations had been made for a reduction in or the centralization of the translation services in the government departments and in parliament. I replied that an arrangement had been made for the appointment of an official in the Department of the Secretary of State who was to take charge of the translation of languages other than

French and English into English and French as might be required by the several departments of government. I stated also that the suggestion had been made and the government was considering the possibility of the organization of a bureau to take charge of translations other than those usually made in the different departments by the regular staffs. This bureau for the translation of foreign languages for all departments was attached to my department and proved to be entirely satisfactory. I am prepared to lay on the table of the house a statement which will show that some fifteen or sixteen departments and agencies of government have made use of this department from week to week throughout the year.

Later on, during my absence in France, an investigation was made by the treasury board with regard to matters relating to the administration of the Department of Public Printing and Stationery. This investigation disclosed that careful preliminary revisions by authors and expert translators of all typewritten copy, which is prepared by authors and translators for the printer, would save large expenditures now made in resetting the type when revisions are made after the text has been printed in galley form at the printing bureau or after the printed galley forms have been divided into printed pages.

I would have preferred that this matter should have gone directly to a committee where it might have been inquired into, but in order that hon. gentlemen may see the sort of complaint that is made to me, I show them a proof which has been printed, set in type, read by the proofreaders at the printing bureau to see that the printed text is in accordance with the typewritten copy, and then sent back for further correction. These corrections which were made in this printed text necessitated practically a complete reprinting of the entire text. These corrections would be entirely unnecessary if the French copy were revised by one of the experts, of which there are many in the employ of the government. I show the house one example of a translation of a report in the Senate from English into French. The French copy is sent to the printing bureau where it is set up in type. It is then read by the proofreaders to ascertain that the type so set is in accord with the copy received. It then comes back with all these corrections. This is a photograph and the white marks show the red ink corrections. Such examples are brought up week after week and month after month to show how impossible it is, even after the French proof has been obtained, speedily to print and issue the final revised French text.

Mr. MARCIL: Are those Hansard speeches the minister is showing ?

Mr. CAHAN: One of them happens to be Hansard, but the others are departmental. It does not make any difference for the present, and I do not wish to make special reference to particular translators. Here for instance is a report made by one of the departments. It is not only set up in galley proof, but the galley proof has been read; then the galley proof was sent back to the translator, who has also read it and revised it, and the translator's changes have been made and set up in the printed text in page proof and after that this page proof comes back with all these corrections made.

Now it was ascertained by one of the committee under the control of the treasury that the setting up in type of these corrections made in the text after it had been set up in type and sent for revision—not all French, but a great deal of it, some of it being in English—over a series of years, in wages in respect of the resetting of that type after it had been first set up in the printed text varied in cost from $75,000 to $80,000 a year during a number of years preceding 1933; and in the first ten months of 1933 the setting up of such changes as those I have mentioned cost $52,000.

It is improper, I think, to hold a minister of the crown responsible for these expenditures unless he has some control or supervision over the work. I am responsible as a minister of the crown for the work of five hundred men engaged in the printing bureau. I keep, when I am in Canada, very close contact with them; I do not think that any predecessor ever kept closer contact with them, because large reductions had to be made in the public service, and I was anxious that such reductions if made should cause, to persons employed in the printing bureau, as little hardship as was possible under the circumstances. These expenditures would have been reduced very largely if the typewritten copy of translations for the printer were at first carefully prepared and then subsequently revised by the more expert translators before being sent to the printing bureau.

The investigations made in my absence in Paris in the early part of 1933 disclosed that the inefficiency of the translation service is due largely to the fact that it has developed in a haphazard way and has never been organized with a view to distributing the work, so that no translator would be idle, apart from a reasonably long holiday for rest and recreation during the summer months, and that no translator should be underworked or overworked, underpaid or overpaid.

In the House of Commons staff, in addition to the translators of debates, there are ten bluebook translators who are engaged in translating departmental reports, which have no direct connection with or relation to the work of the House of Commons and its proceedings. These translators engaged on bluebooks are not translators of the Hansard, but they are under the sole direction of the Speaker of the house. I contend, and the government contend, that they should be under the direction of the government or of that minister of the crown who is responsible for the translating and the printing of these departmental reports.

This bluebook branch of the House of Commons staff was organized as a temporary expedient in 1913, with a view to abolish, or at least curtail, the practice of sending departmental reports for translation outside of Ottawa to political friends as a means of political patronage. Both parties did it and successive governments were responsible for farming out that sort of patronage. Then there were added to the Hansard staff, as a bluebook section, translators from time to time, and bluebooks have been sent to them for translation. But they are not under the supervision or direction of any government authority except the Speaker of this house, and I contend that the independent position of the Speaker of the house really precludes him from being responsible for the efficient translation of governmental or of departmental reports. His Honour should not be exposed to criticism or reprimand for neglect of duties which are by law assigned to ministers of the crown as the executive heads of the several departments over which they preside.

It was under these circumstances that this government bill was prepared, and as Secretary of State I was instructed by council to introduce it to parliament.

It is contemplated that the Bureau for Translations, which will be created by this bill, may be divided into two branches. One of the two branches would be known as the Parliamentary Translators Branch, whose first duty would be to translate the debates and proceedings of the Senate and of the House of Commons, and the second, that is, the Departmental Translators Branch, whose first duty would be to translate departmental reports, documents and despatches as required.

It is also suggested that the organization of the departmental branch might well follow the plan of organization recently adopted when, pursuant to the provisions of section 36 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, the accountants of all departments were placed under the supervision and direction of the Comptroller of the Treasury.

Any translator really required by the officers of any department for the efficient, independent work of that department would continue to be attached to that department; and it is proposed, if it is possible so to arrange, that the translators required for the work of all departments located in the east block shall be located in that block under one supervising head, and in the west block and in each of the other government buildings in like manner under similar supervision, all of whom will be under one superintendent.

I remember that when this act of 1931 was put into force I had in the Department of Public Printing and Stationery twenty-one accountants, and in my own office of Secretary of State we had three or four. Many of these accountants thought that this reform for them was the end of all things and they were very anxious and apprehensive with respect to the proposed reorganization. It was carried out in a most systematic way under the supervision of the Comptroller of the Treasury and of the Civil Service Commission. For instance, in the west block, the accountants, who were general accountants who had formerly attended to the work of the Department of the Secretary of State, the Department of Railways and Canals, the Department of Trade and Commerce and some minor branches located there, were simply segregated in the same building and continued under the general direction of the Comptroller of the Treasury, their oversight and supervision of the accounting of all departments located there. The same occurred in the east block and in certain other departments. The result was that these three or four accountants in the Department of Secretary of State, where there was no opportunity for advancement except as one of them died or retired, found themselves in a larger branch with scores of other accountants, where the path of advancement was freely open to those who had ability and who were assiduous in their employment, the result being, I am confident, that to-day not one of the accountants who was so transferred would revert to the old system.

The superintendent of the proposed translation bureau, which will consist of these two branches, will be under the direction of the minister who administers the proposed act and the minister will be responsible to parliament for the effective cooperation of all officers and employees in each translation branch, and, subject to the Civil Service Commission, for promoting efficiency and removing existing discrimination in working hours and conditions. The superintendent will have general supervision and control of the bureau and branch officers under him will be responsible for such careful preparation of the typewritten copy for the printers as to avoid very largely the wholly unnecessary annual expenditures, which I have just mentioned, in resetting the type of printed proofs and pages before binding and distributing the printed documents to the public. All these translators will be eligible for promotion in and throughout the whole translation service of the government and not as now, in one department only, and their respective positions in the civil service will be determined from time to time by the Civil Service Commission just as in the case of all other civil service employees. The commission will determine the relative value of the services performed by the respective officers and employees and their qualifications for promotion in the service.

The government, I assure hon. members, has not the intention of using the proposed Bureau for Translations as an indirect means of procuring the dismissal of individual translators from the public service, but will use it rather as a means of distributing evenly the work of translating and of supervising translations so that all departments and agencies of government may be satisfactorily served, and that the work of translation so speedily and efficiently performed as to avoid all unnecessary delays.

I notice in a certain section of the public press that there has been a discussion of a return which I brought down showing that a number and, indeed, a very small one, of translators had been retired in recent years, particularly from the Department of the Interior. But we must remember that there were no less than 1,794 retirements, transfers, resignations and deaths causing vacancies in the staff of the Interior department, and those retirements and resignations were due chiefly to the transfer by the dominion of certain natural resources to the prairie provinces. Therefore it is not surprising that out of, in round figures, 1,800 retirements and resignations, the translation staff of that department was reduced by five. I know we in each of our departments did all we could to make places for those retired from the Department of the Interior; many of us have not under any consideration appointed any other applicants to positions in our respective departments. I remember my department took two of those who were retired, one of them coming to me as librarian and the other in some other service, I have forgotten which. Again it is complained that five temporary employees of the House of Commons translation service were released on February 1, 1932, but these employees were not under the direct control of the government, and of all other retirements there were only three vacancies which occurred by death and three by retirements which have not been filled simply because the various departments are waiting to ascertain whether this proposed central bureau shall be organized.

No one can underestimate the competency and efficiency of the translators of the first-class from French into English and English into French, but it is evident that there has not been careful, responsible supervision and direction of their work. I find that in the House of Commons staff at the present time there are ten translators and a chief translator, or eleven in all, who are translating blue books which have no connection whatever with any work of the Commons. This work, which is part of the ordinary administration of government should, we think, be under the direction of a minister of the crown and not, as at present, under the Speaker of this house. The government is held responsible to the public for the speedy and efficient performance of this work, but at present it has no direction or control over this branch of its own administration. The Speaker should certainly be relieved of responsibility in such matters as these, as he has no more interest or concern in the work of translating such blue books than he has in the administration of the patent office or the copyright office or any other branch of the public service.

There are at present fourteen translators of commons debates and a chief translator, or fifteen in all. It is suggested that it would be an infringement of the privileges of this house to organize the translators of debates into a parliamentary translators' branch of the proposed Bureau for Translations. The organization of such a branch, when authorized by parliamentary action, can hardly be deemed to be an infringement of parliamentary privileges, and this matter is brought up by the terms of the bill now submitted in the hope that the Commons will give it second reading and send it to a special committee where these matters may be inquired into and where it may be ascertained whether it is for the convenience of the Commons and in the public interest that such a parliamentary translators' branch should be so organized.

I recall to the attention of the house that time and again parliament has deemed it expedient to vest certain of its own powers in judicial and administrative offices of government. The trial of election petitions, which was formerly one of the privileges of this house, was long ago relegated to the courts. The furnishing, cleaning, heating and lighting of the House of Commons, which, in earlier days, was the function of a committee of this house, was later placed under the direction of the Minister of Public Works, who is directly responsible therefor to parliament. In the earlier days a committee of the house controlled the printing of Commons debates, bills, votes and proceedings and even acts of parliament, and such printing was farmed out to privileged private printing houses in this and other cities. But scandals arose in connection with the distribution of such printing and the payment of private concerns therefor, and parliament decided to enact a statute creating a department of public printing and stationery, to be charged with the performance of all work relating to printing, lithographing and the like. Parliament also decided that this new department should be placed under the direction and supervision of a minister of the crown, who would be directly responsible to the government of the day and to parliament for the efficient administration of that department.

We are therefore proposing this measure for the consideration of the house. There is no desire to force an innovation upon the House of Commons against its wishes, but we are asking that the facts be elicited before a special committee and duly considered, and that those who are employed in the translation of the debates of the Senate and the House of Commons should be organized into this parliamentary translators' branch of a general bureau for translations, under a minister of the crown with the responsibility I have stated.

It is suggested in the press that these translators of the debates of the Senate and the House of Commons, who receive annually about $60,000 a year in salaries, are so busily employed during the four or five months of the session of parliament that they require rest and recreation during the remainder of the year. The Hansard translators of this house are a very efficient body, and I will not say one word in disparagement of the services which they daily perform. The House of Commons staff dealing with the translation of Hansard are busily employed during the sessions of parliament, but inquiry will show, I think, that they are not overworked as compared with other employees of parliament, and certainly not as compared with the officials of many of the departments of the government. The Senate translators of Hansard are not, I am told, so busily employed; in fact it is alleged that they are the least busily employed body of men in the public service of Canada. Undoubtedly those who perform an excess of work during the parliamentary session should be granted longer periods of holidays for rest and recreation, and those who are engaged day by day in translating Hansard should have accorded to them under the civil service rules a longer term of holidays than the ordinary employees in the public service are granted, but there seems to me no valid reason why, during two, three or four months of the recess of parliament, they should not be available on special occasions for the translation of special documents such as the reports and proceedings of government commissions, inquiries and the like, and for the translation of special documents which require extreme care and supervision.

I merely desire to place these facts fairly before the house as I see them. If this bill receives second reading, full inquiry then may be made into all relevant facts and considerations, and I am confident that the special select committee on the civil service will do full justice to all parties concerned. I think it is in the interests of good government that those who have any representations to make should appear before that committee where their representations will be received. In regard to those translators who are not now employed in special departments, I think they should be organized in like manner as I have already stated the accountants were organized. I am confident that the position and the prospects of translators in the proposed organization will be very greatly improved and I am assured, though I cannot vouch for the reports that come to me, that a great number of the translators who are employed in the public service, upon a review of the bill and of the facts relating thereto, are very favourably impressed with this proposed change in their employment. As I have already stated to some of them, it is the opinion of the government that a reorganization such as that proposed in this bill will place translators from French into English and from English into French on a higher plane in the public service. It will avoid duplication of translation services and research work in relation thereto. It will ensure the effective cooperation of all officers and employees in the existing translation services. It will establish coordination and uniformity in the proper use of technical terms. It will improve the means of acquiring expert knowledge and competency and will promote the advancement of those employed in this very essential branch of the public service. It will tend to remove all discriminations in working hours and working conditions, and it will promote—and this is essential—the contemporaneous publication of public documents in both English and French for the use of parliament and of the public.

During the recess the government might have appointed a commission under the Inquiries Act to inquire into these matters and report, but, as this does affect to a rather slight extent the privileges and powers which this house now exercises, it was deemed rather an impropriety to make that investigation when parliament was not in session. Therefore this bill was drafted with a view to placing it before a committee of the house for consideration, by which committee all relevant facts may be ascertained.

I should like to add one personal word, because I have attended conscientiously, as best I could, to the administration of the duties imposed upon me as a minister of the crown. It is true that my maternal language is English and that I am of the Protestant faith, but I confess that during the past few weeks I have felt somewhat embarrassed and even humiliated in reading the charges made in certain sections of the public press that I am now attempting to destroy the confederation pact and to relegate the French language to an inferior place in the federal administration of this country. I should have thought—and I say it with modesty—that my past public life and my consistent conduct in matters relating to race, language and religion, should have protected me from such personal assaults as those I have sustained. This bill is not a Cahan bill; it is a government bill, which the members of the government deem to be detrimental to no particular interest, but a measure the terms of which will tend to conserve public interests and ensure more efficient administration of the public services of the country. It is a bill which we trust will be given second reading and sent to a special committee, which will have full liberty to inquire into every interest which may be thought to be prejudicially affected by the terms thereof.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Mr. Speaker, I entertain the most kindly sentiments of friendship for the hon. minister who has just taken his seat, and he knows it. For that reason I believe he will excuse me and not consider me in any way discourteous if I do not traverse the whole of the speech he has just delivered. At the outset may I thank him for the kindly disposition which he has shown towards those unfortunates in the printing bureau during a very crucial time last year. But the hon. gentleman is a past master in the art of preparing a case, and he has set up a wonderful stage, he has prepared a wonderful picture, and has shown but one side of the situation. He has brought into this House of Commons a big sheaf of something about which we know nothing. Had I had the same opportunity as he had I might show as great a sheaf as the one he has shown where corrections are made on the printed copy and sent back to the prining bureau, and charged to translation.

As I have said, the hon. gentleman has given a wonderful exhibition of window dressing. He knows the French language quite well and will take no offence if I refer him to this particular fable, namely that he has forgotten to light the light of his lantern. He has not in any way attempted to show what this bill would mean in the way of economy. He has shown only the dark side of the picture. I do not intend to follow him through the various points he has raised, except to do so as I go along in the ordinary course of my speech.

The question is as to whether or not this bill will be read a second time. When I shall have finished my observations I shall move, seconded by the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette):

That the word "now" be left out and that the words "this day six months" be added at the end of the question.

Under our practice and our rules it is a well established principle that the proper time to discuss a bill is when it comes up for second reading. I am not here to lecture nor am I competent to lecture upon the interpretation of the rules of the house. Nevertheless I may be permitted to remind hon. members and, more particularly, sir, those hon. members of the province of Quebec who for the time being happen to sit to your right, that when an hon. member votes for the second reading of the bill he inescapably votes for the principle of the bill, and that it is no defence to say that all he intended to do was to vote for the second reading so that it might be sent to a committee. On this occasion I leave hon. members coming from that great province with these words, "Let duty be their law and conscience their rule."

At this stage I believe the easiest way out for the minister would have been to withdraw from his difficulty, and simply and graciously to withdraw the bill. In all friendship and sincerity I say to him that he has needlessly got himself into a whirlpool of trouble. In all frankness, sir, I say to him through you: Why not admit it now? In one's public career—and the career of the hon. gentleman has been long, honest and honourable—one can make mistakes. This is the mistake of his career. I say that if the minister will withdraw this bill we will forget it, as we would a bad nightmare. At this stage I cannot nor shall I go into the merits or, rather, demerits of the proposed legislation. The minister has done so at considerable length. Unfortunately however I have not the same latitude to follow him to any great extent. I find that the principle of the bill is contained in clauses 3, 4 and 5, and I shall confine my remarks to those sections. To some extent, also, I shall refer to the explanatory notes accompanying the bill.

The reading of those sections indicate, notwithstanding what the minister has said, that it is intended to abolish the existing classes and categories of translation services, in whatever departments they may be, and to blend them into one—the minister now says two, but that is not shown in the bill—into one huge bureau of translation or, as the minister now says, into two bureaus, under a superintendent. Sir, this bill should not be called the Translation Bureau Act, but because of its effects it ought to be called, "A bill for the translation of the remains of the translators, and of translation."

There are two very distinct spheres of activities in which translators take part. One is in the two houses of parliament and the other outside in the various departments of the ministers. The translating staff of the House of Commons is fourfold. There is the law translating branch, where there are three translators; the journals, where there are two; the debates, where there are sixteen, and the parliamentary, where there are twelve. In all there are thirty-three translators. In the other house there used to be three, but as one has now left the service there are only two. In the translating services under the various ministers, to which I have alluded, there are forty-one. It is now desired, under sections 3, 4 and 5 to bring all of these translators into what I now call, because I find no better word, a hotchpotch to operate under a superintendent and under a minister. This superintendent has to supervise the work of ninety-one translators, engaged in all of the most diversified activities of government.

Sir, there was born in the year 1463 a genius named Pic de la Mirandôle, possessed of what one might describe as universal knowledge. His knowledge of things was phenomenal, and particularly his knowledge of the foreign languages. Upon reaching the age of thirty-one we are told there was no language he had not mastered. But in that year, sir, he died. Has the minister in mind a distant relative of Pic de la Mirandole as the genius who will supervise these ninety-one translators engaged, as I say, in most diversified activities. Under this plan, and under the direction of this superman would be translated references to paleontology, recipes for making maple syrup, geology, laws passed by the House of Commons, entomology, the science of bugs, and probably the translation of the speeches of eminent statesmen. This to anyone who has any knowledge of the practical work of a translation bureau is seen to be not feasible and impracticable. For instance, at present if a translator of Hansard is not sure of the meaning of a particular sentence in an hon. member's speech, and there need be no wonder at that, he can at once get in contact with the member and find out what the meaning is; and in the departments, if some expression heretofore unused crops up, the translator in the department has the benefit of immediate contact with the one who made the report and can tell him what is required in the way of interpretation.

The minister says that this bill would remove the existing discrimination in working hours and working conditions. At present I say there is no discrimination as to working hours. There are several staffs that work from nine to five and are paid for that amount of work. There are others who work after five and are paid no more. But there are others who work during the night and are paid the same yearly statutory salary. On the translating staff of the houses of parliament there are many who work during a session of four or five or six or seven months just as many hours, and under much more difficult conditions, than others who work simply from nine to five throughout the year.

How does the minister think that he will manage this new organization? Of necessity he must retain shifts of translators when the house is sitting. Then he must devise some way of having these translations sent back and forth. He would need to have a continuous army of messengers to enable the work to be carried on. The minister knows the meaning of the proverb, "Tot caput tot sensu," so many heads, so many opinions. He desires to bring into this hotchpotch a large number of men who have specialized in their own particular departments. He would have as many ideas of translation as there are men who would be engaged in that particular translation. Instead of having but one revising officer there would have to be quite a number to take care of the work of the shifts as they come and go.

The minister says that there has been a centralization of accounting. That is perfectly true. That was a wise move. Figures and numbers are not susceptible of translation. That is elementary; so why talk about it? There is no reason at all why there should not be a uniform system of accounting of all the government's activities. After all a ledger is a ledger, a credit balance is a credit balance, and a debit balance is a debit balance. That is so true that I do not know that up to the present any of these accountants has been changed from his own particular department, and that is well because the accountants in the various departments may refer their statements to one central office, no matter where they themselves may be located, in which central office the final auditing may be done.

But the minister must realize that that cannot be done with translation bureaux, if the staffs are as he says to remain in their present offices. If they stay where they are, how will the superintendent be able to supervise? How will he be able to allocate the work to the various departments? Will the minister create a special office to which all the translations will be sent as they come to the superintendent so that they may be sorted out and distributed among the most efficient translators for that particular work? If so, how will he quickly get the allocated parts of different work to those who are to do that work? He may hire a fleet of baby Austins and messengers to distribute the work around to the different departments, but will the cost of administration thereby be reduced?

If the translators are not left in their respective bureaux and I apprehend that that will be the effect of the bill, the work will be distributed amongst all the translators to keep everyone working, and a translator who has been accustomed to translate works on chemistry may be called upon to translate something about aeronautics, while the translator on geology may be called upon to translate the report on the milk investigation.

When these French experts of to-day are superannuated or die they will be replaced by juniors from this hotchpotch. It will not be a case of one expert translator replacing another, but of a junior being assigned to the work of the expert in order to keep the number in that particular bureau even; but certainly there will not be the same level of efficiency, and that is where the evil will be twofold. The quality of the translation will be impaired and the number of efficient French clerks will be reduced, and the status of the French language will to that extent thereby suffer. It cannot be contradicted that if a head clerk at $3,800 retires and is replaced by a junior at $1,800, the efficiency of the translation will suffer and the status of the French language thereby also suffer.

On the other hand, if there is no centralization, if the translators are left where they are to continue to specialize in their own departments, the junior translators will come into daily contact with the work they have to perform and will of necessity familiarize themselves with it, and in that way will one day be able to secure promotion.

Judging by the experience of other bilingual countries which have at some time or another tried centralization, I ask why are we dropping the substance for the shadow?

There is another aspect of the matter. One may think it is very easy to translate. Well, we may say in French, "Le Secretaire d'Etat est un grand homme," meaning that the Secretary of State is a famous man. But if we say, "Le Secretaire d'Etat est un homme grand," it means that the Secretary of State is a tall man. The words are the same but they appear in a different order, and make the meaning very different.

Everyone who possesses the knowledge of two or three languages knows that the difficulties in adhering to a precise translation appear sometimes to be insuperable, and that is why it is always with the greatest diffidence and a sense of apprehension that I address the house, fearful as I am lest at some time I should innocently misplace or still worse misuse some expression.

But why labour the point any further? It must be obvious to you, sir, and to hon. members of this house that translation is a science, and a science of a very particular nature. Translation is not the mere substitution of words or the mechanical interchange of idioms. It implies a subtle interpretation of analogies, and a delicate appraisal of terms and expressions so as to render even the finer shades of meaning. The Italians, in their own picturesque language say, "il tradittore il trahittore": a translation is very often a treason.

Would the Secretary of State be content to send one of his speeches upon constitutional law, pronounced in the masterful command of the English language which he has, to one of the translators in this hotch-potch, one perhaps who had been a specialist in translating reports on diseased potatoes, the fertility of the malaria mosquito or the physical structure of the tsetse fly? Would he be content to have such a translation in French circulated through the European universities where his name is not unknown? A translator is not made in a day. His science is the result of years of labour and special study. By reason of those labours and studies he acquires a special knowledge of the subjects, the expressions and the shades of meaning in a language not his own. I am sure hon. members would be astonished if they were brought into contact with the accumulated experience of the translators as it concerns words, expressions and sentences and which has been acquired by diligent study and comparison of other idioms.

This is a trial of centralization or specialization. In 1910 the government of the day desired to know what was being done in the bilingual countries of Europe. Mr. Achille Frechette, former law translator and chief of the translation branch of the House of Commons of Canada was appointed to visit Belgium and Switzerland to investigate this matter. I think some extracts from his report should appear on Hansard. He states first:

> My inquiry has been directed to the translation of the debates, of the sessional papers and of the laws.
> As is the case in Canada, the debates may be carried on in Belgium and in Switzerland in either or any of the official languages of the country.

At that time the House of Commons and the Senate were operating under a system of centralization but that has since been changed to one of specialization. The report continues:

> In Belgium each of the different departments has its own translation staff.

And he continues:

> In Switzerland the various departments have their own translators.
> Thus it is seen that nowhere in these two countries is translation centralized. And in both countries satisfaction is expressed with the system in use.
> Let us now consider the system that obtains in the Canadian House of Commons. The service, there, is centralized in an office recruited—may I be permitted to say—independently of any idea of specialization in the work.

And again:

> It is evident that so many various translations, for which the most extensive dictionaries and the usual language are altogether inadequate, must require from the translator vast erudition, constantly supplemented through long hours of research and tireless application. Would it not be too optimistic to expect great success from the anomaly of an organization where it is required of each man to be a universal specialist in order to be fit for expert work in all directions?

That is what one would find in this hotchpotch. The report continues:

> All the efforts that the chief translator—
> Under this bill, the superintendent—
> —may make towards specializing the abilities of his staff are rendered vain by the manner in which the documents come from the printing office and by the necessity of having the work done quickly. Without entering into more details, I will say that constantly a given work has to be divided among several translators, either in the office or outside.

Here again is a comparison with the bureau which it is sought to be created by this bill. The reports goes on:

> And what is the consequence? If each man, although he feels no personal responsibility for the work, makes the study it requires, no time will have been gained. If such studies are not made, that part of the work which is improperly done will swamp that done by the conscientious translator who knows his subject and its terminology.

This gives an exact picture of the bureau for translation which the minister is seeking to create. The report continues:

> The tendency of all this is towards the demoralization of the service. And the French version of the documents suffers in quality, although, in spite of all efforts, it still reaches the public much later than the English version, for the main reason that the latter is received too late by the translators.
> The present system, established some seventy years ago, may have answered the needs of the time, when the public documents were very far from being as voluminous, as numerous and as specialized as they are to-day, and when the greater part of them, being already in French, had not to go through the French office. But now that the publications of the public service deal with so many activities unknown to the primitive country that we were then; now that all the human interests, more and more specialized find their expression in the papers presented to the Canadian parliament, a centralized translation office can no longer do justice to so much work that calls for specialists. The experience I have acquired during thirty-six years of service in the Commons has convinced me that in centralization rests the vice of our system.

Just a word in passing as to what the hon. minister has said with reference to the general translation branch. He knows that that branch of the House of Commons, although on a few occasions it has translated outside reports, translates a long series of documents and reports from this house, such as the grain investigation, the imperial conference and the innumerable reports which emanate from committees like the milk inquiry committee, the civil service committee, the banking committee, the shipping committee. The report continues:

> Therefore, and from my observations in Belgium and Switzerland, where I everywhere found specialization carried as far as possible by the establishment of provisions for translation in the various administrative branches, and where there is thorough satisfaction with the system in existence, I conclude that it is desirable to extend in Canada to all the departments, the practice already intelligently introduced in some of them, as, for instance, the Department of Agriculture.

That was the first department to start specialization and up to the present time I do not think there has been any difficulty or any complaint in connection with the work done there. The report concludes:

> The departmental translator having a narrower field of work could comparatively soon master the two languages in the specialties dealt with every year in the documents issued by his department. He could do his work much quicker and much better, all other things being equal.

I do not want to quarrel with the minister as to the diversified statements he has made, though I find it very difficult to reconcile many of them. Taking the bill as it stands however, while perhaps not in the immediate future, at any rate at some later date, the various translating branches will be brought into this Bureau for Translations. The minister has stated the move contemplated will result in a saving of public funds. How that can be accomplished he has failed to show, and one can only anticipate the future by what has happened in the past. The minister has indicated that since 1930 some eighteen translators have been let out. It is quite true that in the Department of the Interior there were five; I think that is a fair statement.

Mr. CAHAN: There have not been eighteen translators dismissed or retired by this government since 1930.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I ask then how many there were? It does not matter however how many there were; I am quite prepared to say, in all fairness to the minister, that the five that were let out in the Interior department should not be taken into account. At any rate, there were some seventeen altogether—

Mr. CAHAN: No.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Or fifteen; the minister can reply later on. No matter however how many were let out, none has been replaced, and the fact is that there are many heads of departments, French Canadians, holding important positions who have not been replaced. The minister goes on to say that this bill will improve the standing of translators of the French language in the department. Here may I make a special point. If this bill ever becomes law the translators will ultimately leave the Houses of Parliament and all departments and with them such junior clerks and stenographers as are associated with translation work. Not only will so many translators be removed from the departments, but probably double and treble the number of clerks will go with them.

Mr. CAHAN: There are to-day, or there were yesterday, eighty-six translators with twenty-nine clerical assistants, making one hundred and fifteen in all employed in translation work, and I am sure that there has been no time since 1930 when there have been fifteen dismissals.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I submit then that the minister will have to explain this return which has been brought down to the house, wherein I count nine translators, and there are five or six others whom the minister is overlooking.

Mr. CAHAN: The statement which the hon. gentleman is taking from Le Droit is not reliable. Moreover, if he will leave out the translators retired by the Senate temporarily, and the temporaries retired by this house, over whom this government has no control, he will find that the five from the Interior department are the larger number. There are three others who died and three others retired who have not been replaced, and I have stated the reason why: we were waiting to see what would take place under the reorganization.

Mr. CHEVRIER: However, there was no replacement of the one retired from the Civil Service Commission, nor was there any replacement of the one retired from the Finance department. In all the different translating branches there have been seventeen or eighteen translators who have been retired; otherwise, why did the minister bring down this return which appears in Hansard?

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentleman says that the government is responsible. The government is not responsible for the retirement of temporary employees of this house, over whom it had no control. It is not responsible for the retirement by the Senate of three or four temporary men on weekly wage. Events were responsible for the retirement of five from the Department of the Interior, and when you consider that 5,800 members of the civil service have been retired since 1930, it is not surprising that there were three of four translators among the number.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I will not labour the point, but the minister will have to admit that there was one retired from the Civil Service Commission, one from Finance, one from Immigration and Colonization, one from Marine, one from Trade and Commerce—all the way through. The minister himself submitted that report and it appears in Hansard.

Now, these events have taken place lately and they are likely to occur again; and notwithstanding the minister's professed desire for the maintenance of the present status of the French language, I am very much afraid that higher positions now filled will meet with the same fate. I am not asking for more than we have. There are some who say that what they want they get, but all that we Canadians of French origin say is, what we have we hold. We are not asking for anything more at present. In the discussion of this unfortunate measure we are asking for no new rights; nor does this measure, notwithstanding what the minister says, give us any greater rights than we have presently.

The Secretary of State tabled sessional paper 137, wherein he is reported as having said, among other things:

> Speaking generally, I may say that it has been orally represented to me that such a reorganization as that proposed in Bill No. 4 would place translators on a higher plane in the public service.

It would be most interesting to know who has orally represented to the minister that the proposed reorganization would place the translators on a higher plane, and it would also be quite interesting to know who started all this discussion. One wonders whether the minister wishes to copy the Arthur Young classification and have another Griffenhagen disruption in the service.

Who wants this legislation? The minister says that it will improve the standing of the translators. Judging from what I have seen and heard, however, it is certainly not the translators themselves who are asking for it, because every one of them seems to be in a high state of excitement and apprehension. Surely they are intelligent enough to know better than anyone else whether this legislation will place them on a higher plane in the public service. Place the translators in a better position! Well, the French Canadian press of the country is in deadly opposition to the bill, and surely they could not have come to that conclusion without having given the matter some consideration. The following French Canadian daily newspapers have editorially opposed the measure: La Presse, La Patrie, Le Devoir, all of Montreal; Le Droit, of Ottawa; Le Soleil, L'Action Catholique, of Quebec; La Tribune, of Sherbrooke; Le Bien Public and Le Nouvelliste, of Three Rivers; L'Action Populaire, of Joliette.

Then I ask the minister: How is it, if this bill is to elevate the standard of the French language and improve the efficiency of the translators, the following French Canadian societies are all opposed to it and have sent resolutions protesting against it:

La Société Saint Jean Baptiste.
L'Association Canadienne de la Jeunesse Catholique.
L'Association Catholique des Voyageurs de Commerce.
L'Activité Nationale.
L'Union des Cultivateurs de la Province de Québec.
La Fédération des Clubs Ouvriers.
L'Association de Jeune Canada.

If this bill is to produce all these wonderful changes for the betterment of the translators and the improvement of the status of the French language in Canada, how is it that the select committee reported to the house in 1932 as follows:

> No complaints as to the quality of the translated texts were made to the committee. It was found that throughout the departments a general policy of decentralization is in effect. The adoption of such policy was the result of the question being explored in 1910 after a report was made by Mr. Achille Frechette who, under instructions from the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons, visited Belgium and Switzerland to observe the practice in effect in those countries. From the information before the committee, the general consensus of opinion in the departments is in favour of the statu quo.

How is it, if this bill is to promote efficiency in the service, to effect economies in public expenditure, that in 1932 all of the deputy ministers, when they were asked to give their views upon a scheme of centralization, declared themselves against it because it was harmful to the good administration of the departments, and because of the necessity of having in each department a translation service where correspondence and confidential documents would continue to be translated without delay and without fear of indiscretion.

Who wants this bill? No one who can understand its pernicious effect, who can visualize the disastrous results it will have in lowering the present standing of the French language will vote for it. But there is certainly one thing that the minister cannot do, even if he desires to press this matter to the bitter end, and that is to include both houses of parliament in so far as translation is concerned. I am quite sure voices will be heard in another place protesting vigorously against any encroachment on the rights and prerogatives of both houses.

This bill provides by clause 3:

> There shall be a bureau under the minister, to be called the Bureau of Translations, the duties and function of which shall be to collaborate with and act for all departments of the public service, and both houses of the parliament of Canada.

No one will deny and I hope the Secretary of State will be the last to deny that both houses of parliament have had and always will have certain rights and prerogatives and they should have untrammelled authority to discipline and control the servants of their respective houses. It is quite true that for some years in the past, officials of the house, so far as their appointments have been concerned, have been removed from the control of the house and placed under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. Whether that is a good move or not, I am not going to say at the moment, nevertheless I can say this: It was undoubtedly an unwarranted encroachment on the rights and prerogatives of both houses, and apparently it was consented to. By that I mean that by the 1919 Civil Service Act all staff positions, including that of the assistant clerk and sergeant at arms, in the House of Commons were taken away from the jurisdiction of this house, and were placed under the Civil Service Act, but this house did not take long to find the mistake it had made and in 1925 the Civil Service Commission returned to the House of Commons the appointment of the assistant clerk and the sergeant at arms.

It is quite true that parliament is supreme, and can at any time it so desires, divest itself of all its rights and prerogatives. It is also quite true that if the members of the house desire to divest themselves of any or all of their rights and prerogatives which under the constitution they have, they may do so, but I am one of those who believe that that should be the last step to be taken.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

I am one of those who believe in the spirit of the constitution and, moreover, I believe any attempt, however small it may be, which attacks or takes away from the constitution should not be allowed. I am one of those who believe the spirit of the law and the fabric of the British constitution and parliamentary system, under which it is our privilege to live, should be preserved. But if the members of this house and of another place continue to let go their rights and prerogatives, some day we may find ourselves no longer in control but under the jurisdiction of some irresponsible body.

Bourinot says:

> The control and management of the officers of this house are as completely within the privileges of the house as necessary to the conservation of dignity and the efficient conduct of public business by a legislative body as any regulation of its own proceedings within its own walls. These officers are under the guidance of certain rules and standing orders of the house, which are among the regulation of its proceedings and are as essentially matters of privilege as the appointment of committees, the conduct of public business and the procedure of the house generally, including the acts of the speaker himself in the chair.

The minister cannot take away from the houses of parliament its employees. In 1908 it was sought to bring the staffs under the Civil Service Act which was then being framed. The commissioners said this in their report, as it appears in the sessional papers of the house, No. 15, 29-A, at page 10:

> The commissioners considered that it would probably be beyond their powers to ask that members of the staffs of the Senate and House of Commons and of the Supreme and Exchequer courts should come before them, seeing that in 1892, the civil service commissioners were authorized to extend their inquiries to the staffs of the Senate and House of Commons, but on constitutional grounds the clerks of the two houses objected thereto.

The quotation may be found in the sessional papers of this house for 1892, volume 25, No. 11, at page 14. I shall not trouble the house by reading it.

In 1902 an attempt was made to interfere with the salaries of the debates translators of the House of Commons, and I take this extract from the debates of May 6 of that year as reported at page 4244. The Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

> This is a matter which is more in the hands of the house than it is in the hands of the government. The house has thought proper, and with good reason, to keep in its own hands, everything in connection with the reporting of the debates of the house. The reporting is not done under the supervision of the government; it is done directly under the supervision of the house through a committee which is appointed every year for that purpose.

Then another attempt was made in 1908 to remove from the jurisdiction of the house a certain portion of its staff; that was when Mr. Fisher, on June 29, 1908, introduced an act to amend the Civil Service Act. At that time Sir Robert Borden said:

I do not desire to withdraw the permanent official staff of the House of Commons from the operation of the Civil Service Act, but I do suggest that the proper constitutional way would be to have the object of the bill accomplished by a resolution of the house and not by an act of parliament.

Mr. Lennox said:

I feel very strongly that we should aim at keeping a very effective control over the staff of the House of Commons in the hands of the members of the house.

Sir George Foster said:

I think the house should retain full control of its officers in every way.

Mr. Fisher then at the last said:

I will not insist, I thought that was a point on which the government should be guided by the judgment of the House of Commons and of the Senate.

Mr. Sproule added:

Does the minister think the Senate will give up its right to appoint and to supervise its own employees?

Then Sir George Foster said:

Neither would we like to have the Senate interfere with our rights and privileges. Nor would we like to have the cabinet interfere with them. I do not think the house proposes to consent to either.

It must be clear that at least the staffs of the houses of parliament cannot be included in this bill.

There is a final point that I wish to make. There are some who say that the passing of this bill will be the official recognition of the French language. The official character of the French language is clearly recognized and established by section 133 of the British North America Act and nowhere else. It is indeed a poor section, and I know it is, because I am one of those who in the ranks were privileged to follow and to fight side by side with such leaders as Hon. Senator Landry and Hon. Senator Belcourt, who have crossed to the great beyond but whose memory will linger long in the hearts of men of goodwill who struggle for the recognition of the French language in Ontario. Both these gentlemen many times rested their case with those men of goodwill upon section 133 of the British North America Act. Yes, indeed, the official status of the French language is contained in that section like the maple seed in its shell. Place the seed in hospitable ground; place it in soil adapted for fermentation and development, and that seed will develop into one of the mighty maples of which we are so proud. Place that seed among stones or in the arid soil, and nothing will come of it. In other words, that section must be fairly interpreted.

My forefathers, in their gallantry, placed their confidence and trust in section 133. Your forefathers, sir, accepted it like the loyal men they were. The few written words given by the French were accepted by the English; they were gentlemen and men of honour. In those days it was needless for our forbears to call for a notary or for a man learned in the law to write a long document in order to express what they put in three words. So it came to pass that section 133 became the scabbard of the French language on Canadian soil. True, the letter of the law is not there for hair-splitting demagogues and fomenters of disunion; but breathes there a man with soul so dead who would dare say that section 133 does not establish the official status of the French language in Canada? It is there in all its naked truth, and it is up to those with clean minds to understand it.

There will be those who will say that the present bill is the crowning piece of legislation that will at last and forever, in the most unmistakable manner, establish the official character of the French language; but who will believe that? A statute passed by this parliament has about as much stability or permanency as a permanent position has in the civil service these days. We are told that by this bill this parliament will proclaim the official character of the French language in matters not mentioned in section 133. Who will believe that? A subsequent parliament can repeal this statute just as easily as the present parliament can pass it, and the French language, if it depended upon this bill becoming law, would be about as official in stability as the loves of Ninon de Lenclos. At this moment I defy the Secretary of State to affirm in this house that this bill will be the official recognition of the French language. I am not surprised that the hon. gentleman does not answer.

Mr. CAHAN: You do not expect me to answer, surely.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I know my hon. friend will not answer, because he never has been placed on the horns of such a dilemma, and he knows what I mean. I feel great commiseration for the minister, because he has been forced to bring this adopted child into this chamber. If he desires further to establish the official character of the French language let him do so in the way he knows it can be done, by a proper amendment to section 133. If he is so solicitous of the interests of those of whom he has spoken; if he wants to put them on a higher plane, let him take the means at his disposal in a constitutional way. The French language is one of the two official languages of Canada; that is not by virtue of a statute of this parliament, but by virtue of section 133 of the British North America Act. I quote Bourinot, fourth edition, page 208:

> When the two provinces of Canada were united under one parliament, it was provided by the 41st section of the Act of Union, that the journals, the legislative records, of what nature soever, shall be in the English language only, although translations of them could be kept among the records, or be deemed in any case to have the force of an original record. This law naturally created great dissatisfaction among the French Canadians, and it was finally repealed by the Imperial parliament after an address to the Queen had been passed by both houses.

From that time to the present, by virtue of section 133 of the British North America Act, the acts of parliament, the journals of this house, the orders of the day and the votes and proceedings, as they appear daily in French, are not translations but are originals just as much as these documents are originals when printed in English. Both languages are official. If an hon. member speaks in this house in French, the French which he uses is just as official as though he spoke in English, and any record or entry that is made in the journals or that may find its way into the orders of the day or the votes and proceedings in the French language is in the original official language. There is no translation, so called, into the French language of any of these documents I have mentioned. All acts of this parliament are printed and published in both languages, according to the provisions of the British North America Act. That act contains nothing which says there must be a translation from one language into another, because any act is official in either language.

Therefore the question resolves itself into one of interpreting what is an act of parliament. I am one of those who believe that anything which results from a deliberation, recommendation, statute or anything else of this house, which may be called an act of parliament, must be in French and in English; there is no translation about it at all. So it is my contention that when parliament decides that bonds or money, whether printed or coined, should be issued, that is an act of parliament, and the bonds or money should be printed or published in both languages.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

In a speech delivered on May 19, 1915, on the subject of the French language in Canada, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) said:

> Article 133, the legal expression of the beautiful thought voiced by Sir John A. Macdonald, establishes the equality of status of both languages in all spheres of governmental activities and in the administration of national affairs. Any French Canadian taxpayer of Toronto or of Montreal, of Winnipeg, of Halifax or of Vancouver, has the right to exact that all documents of state be printed in his own tongue. He has the right to speak and to write in French to all and any of those in the federal employ.

That is the status of the French language to-day, sir, and to that status this bill does not add one iota. I am not complaining, because I understand that it cannot be done in that way. There is nothing in the bill that in any way heightens the official character of the French language, but on the other hand it does considerable harm to the status of that language. There is nothing in the bill, either explicitly or implicitly, that may be construed to give the French language in the houses of parliament or elsewhere any greater official status than it has at present under the constitution. Section 3 states simply that there shall be a bureau under the minister whose duties will be to collaborate with all departments of the public service in making a translation from one language into another. Further than that there is nothing. There is no direction or no order to the effect that all the reports and documents produced shall be translated into the French language. Moreover, under his direction and with the approval of the governor in council, the minister may make all regulations which by him are deemed necessary or expedient for carrying into effect the provisions of this legislation. The minister will have absolute control over what may or may not be translated. If any minister does not wish to have a translation made he simply need not order it or an easier way, he may ask for no appropriation with which to have the translation made. The select standing committee on printing may order that certain reports be printed. But there is nothing in this bill which places upon them the obligation to see that the reports for which there is an order for printing in English should also be translated into French.

Finally, this bill does not add one bit to the status of the French language, and in many ways decreases its present status. For these reasons, and for many others which, because I do not wish to take up too much of the time of the house, I have not mentioned, I now move, seconded by the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette):

That the word "now" be left out, and that the words "this day six months" be added at the end of the question.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry for once to have to speak in, may I say, flat contradiction of the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) for whom I have the greatest esteem, and whose zeal for the people he represents, as well as for the broader rights of French people in general, I know full well. I do not propose to discuss now what I might term the constitutional principle of this measure. Without any disparagement of my friend I shall wait to see if some of the more authoritative members of his party take the same attitude, and reserve to myself the right, if necessary, to prolong the discussion on the second reading of the bill itself. I am now speaking to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Ottawa. For that reason I propose to deal exclusively with what I may call the administrative principle of the bill, and the practical results which will likely arise out of its application. As this is of special interest to the French members of this House of Commons, to the French press and to the French people at large, I shall take the liberty of presenting my views on that aspect of the question in the French language.

Translation: For at least forty years, sir, have I taken a great interest in the use of the French language in all that concerns the administration of public affairs: Parliament, the various departments, court of justice, etc. I think I can state in all seriousness that, owing to my age, I am somewhat entitled to discuss the French language, its rights and application.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. BOURASSA (Translation): I may even say that there was a time when it was not as fashionable and as popular to speak the French language as it is today. I often stood alone, in parliament or elsewhere, in vindicating its rights. However, let us proceed.

This question of translation is most interesting. May I add, without slipping into the rut where old people often tumble, personal reminiscences, that, among all the members of this house, I am, perhaps, the one who has done more translations either from English into French or French into English. I began fifty years ago and have kept it up. I have translated public documents, parliamentary speeches—first, my own—from English into French and vice versa; and a hundred perhaps two hundred times have I realized in practice how true is what the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) stated, just now: that a translator's task is not an easy one.

An hon. member (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. BOURASSA (Translation): Indeed, it is not a question of picking out the words which a bilingual dictionary places at your disposal to translate a French expression into English or reciprocally; one must possess the genius of the two languages and convey in appropriate French—or vice versa—the thought of the author whether it is a written document or a speech, and the exact meaning of an act or legislative measure, when it refers to a public document. Again, do I state it is not an easy task. I have often worked on texts when, after translating readily four or five pages from one language to another, I had to pause over a sentence or word which required an hour or two of pondering before being certain that I had translated the English expression by the exact and technically corresponding French expression. It is precisely on this ground where not only I disagree with the hon. member for Ottawa but where I also find that the measure brought down by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) is apropos and beneficial.

I have visited, more or less, all governmental departments for nearly forty years. I have read numerous public documents. I have, in the old Parliament building, the one that burnt alas! Why were not more of the microbes we left burnt!—I have, myself, drawn the attention of departments and ministers, sometimes Liberal, sometimes Conservative, to the defects existing in translations, in the terms used, in the sense conveyed by the expression and, consequently, to the defect in the translation mechanism—namely the practical distribution of translation work among the various departments and the placing of translated documents within the reach of the French speaking public. After, all, that is what we want. It is not simply a triumph of national pride, the desire, legitimate no doubt but childish, to contemplate on shelves of public libraries a mass of books, blue, gray, yellow, whatever colour they may be and which are useless to the public because their publication was too long delayed. For fifteen, twenty years—even more, because I had done so previous to founding the "Devoir"—the Devoir, a newspaper which I founded and for more than twenty years had the management, had persistently, in season, or out of season, so to speak, requested the publication, without delay, of annual statistics, trade bulletins and all documents which the public, professors, libraries and trade people—this is more pressing—require when such documents are useful to them. What happened and what is happening to-day? People require a trade bulletin, which is of interest to commerce, industry, dealing with a question of immediate interest upon which merchants, traders and importers wish to be posted. They write to Ottawa. The English copy is published, the French version is not. It is urgent, they request the English bulletin; so that when the French version is published, it remains in the cellars of departments. I came across such bundles, thirty, twenty years ago, also last year, in every department, here in the basement of the library and at the Government Printing Bureau; there are bundles and bundles of French documents which have cost hundreds of thousands of dollars to the country, yet were never useful to the French speaking public, because of the defect existing in the organization of the translation system.

The hon. member for Ottawa will permit me to state that here is an aspect of the question which is as interesting as that of discussing whether the number of men living at the government's expense shall be cut down by ten or fifteen. We shall recur later on to this question of organization.

To have a good translation, of course, competent translators are required. Here again, I agree with the hon. member for Ottawa, that qualification for the work cannot be acquired in one day. It is clear that a translator who has worked—providing he is somewhat intelligent and knows his business—ten or fifteen years in translating documents and reports of the Department of Agriculture, will necessarily be more competent in this task than he would be at translating diplomatic despatches in the office of the Secretary of State or External Affairs. That is a fact. But, just so, this bill the enactment of which I have personally been looking to for the last twenty-five years, in the interest of the French speaking public, French Canadian trade dealers and farmers—has for its further purpose to organize a translation bureau independent of all departments, so that a half-witted, blunt or ignorant deputy minister, such as were to be found under various governments and even to this day—will not prevent the translation of a document or will not deliver to the public a document which hardly holds together or is poorly translated, simply so as to have the satisfaction of saying: "Why complain? I had it translated into French, it has been issued." Yes, but if it is Iroquois French, or again, if it arrives six months too late? At present, it is left to any deputy minister's whim to first hand over to the Printing Bureau and then to the public a poorly translated document which comes too late. I do not state that they are numerous but there are some. It is high time, for the honour of the French language, for the honour of the French Canadian nationality throughout the Dominion of Canada, not only for the French Canadians of Ottawa whom I esteem and respect, but for all French Canadians, it is high time that we should have a bureau for translations which will do honour to French culture, and, at the same time, remove the translation of documents from the whiffs and whims of a crowd of officials, of whom some are capable and may have knowledge of agriculture, but for the reasons set forth by the hon. member for Ottawa and myself, are not competent to revise translation.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit to ask this question: Would he be kind enough to point out where is to be found such provision in the bill.

Mr. BOURASSA (Translation): Do not take too much of my time, if you please. I have but forty minutes at my disposal. The bill, to my mind, embodies such provision sufficiently in paragraph 2, clause 3; in paragraph 2, clause 4; in clause 5 itself; in clause 6, with the regulations which it authorizes and, still more by the economy which the act contemplates. I have not the privilege of being a lawyer—

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): It is even better.

Mr. BOURASSA (Translation): Don't be sarcastic! —however, I have had the opportunity of studying many acts, judgments and law-suits, and one thing always struck me, especially a good advice that I was given in my youth by a lawyer almost as competent as those who sit in this house, Lord Herschell, with whom I came in touch at Washington. Young man, he said to me, be very careful, in the course of your studies, not to linger too long over the particulars of an act, while failing to grasp its principle. It is of more importance that the law maker and the magistrate should first master the guiding principle of the law in order to be in a better position to interpret its various provisions.

If we wish to provide for an excellent knowledge of the French language, which we can display with pride before the eyes of those speaking the French language, throughout the world, we must have a bureau of translation organized from top to bottom, with a chief whose legal and administrative status would correspond to that of a deputy minister, in whatsoever department. That is the first consideration.

Let us now examine the service in connection with our international relations. In this matter I am pleased to give due credit to my old friend, the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). Thanks to others, but especially thanks to him, let us recognize the fact, Canada, to-day, holds, in the international world, a position unknown to it previous to 1923, or 1926; Canada, to-day, is in touch with the various foreign governments and the League of Nations, at Geneva; this was unheard of twenty years ago. I travelled in the past quite a good deal in Europe, and I recall the time when out of one hundred Europeans I met, ninety-nine would say to me: How is it you come to Europe without adorning your head with feathers? That was the way we became acquainted. I do not find fault with these Europeans; because many of our Canadians, although they have dispensed with their feathers, they still convey the impression of having a mentality of the Hurons of days gone by, and even of the Iroquois.

The hon. Secretary of State has just found out just as my friend the former Minister of Justice had done so, Sir Robert Borden and Senator Dandurand as well, that most of the documents forwarded from Canada to foreign governments or to Geneva, are drawn up in English owing to the lack of organization which the Secretary of State pointed out and because a translation bureau was not organized. It was impossible to obtain, when required, documents translated into French which the government could forward to Europe. For, although we boast of speaking French as it is spoken in Europe, the best French, we, however, speak a French somewhat tainted with anglicisms—and sometimes with quite a number—with some loose and improper terms. Especially in the legal and official terminology, or in the civil code of Canada, the sense or the notion of the proper expression is lost, this applies to administration, scientific subjects, agriculture, geology or whatever it may be, but especially in what pertains to international law.

I need not go beyond this bill to find an example. There is a line where it is stated in English. "It shall be the duty of all departments of public... etc." How did our translators, whom the hon. member for Ottawa wishes to place above the French Academy, because of their superfine knowledge, translate this expression? "Il incombe à tous les département"...

Many words have various meanings in numerous languages. "Il incombe" has various meanings. In the common parlance, it designates a duty of some sort incumbent on one. In the legal terminology it is something entirely different. To say "Il incombe" in translating "it shall be the duty" is not correct. In the legal phraseology: I have met with the expression, such a document of the file "incombe" (pertains) to such a case, such an exhibit "incombe" (pertains) to such a file. It is not in the sense of a compulsory duty which an act enforces on the head of a department.

Take for instance the translation in connection with this parliament. For forty years have I been fighting my good friends, the translators on the ground floor, so as to have them cease making us say, in their translations, when we address in English the "chair," "à la chaise", as they call it at the Quebec legislative assembly, the only French speaking legislature in America,—"Monsieur l'Orateur" to the only person, out of the 245 members of this house, who has not the privilege of speaking. It is fortunate that there is one at least who upholds the honour of the house by holding his tongue. In order to translate English parliamentary phraseology, the first thing one must be acquainted with, is British history. Why say "Monsieur l'Orateur", Mr. Speaker, to the only person who has not the right to speak, but who is there simply to render decisions which, at times, are not worth much? It is because in London, when the house wished to protest against the encroachments of the crown or the aristocracy, the Speaker of the House of Commons proceeded to the House of Lords, his three-cornered hat on his head, and addressed the King, on behalf of the members of the Commons. He was "the spokesman of the Commons" which later became "the speaker"; and the translators of the house designate him as "Monsieur l'Orateur."

On many occasions I have personally translated my own speeches when, long ago, I attached some importance to what I said.

That is no longer the case. Why did I do so? It was not because I judged myself more scholarly than the translators; than some of them, yes; than others, no. I ranked myself as one of the average. It was because I felt that when I dealt with a constitutional question and spoke on subjects—precisely subjects which have interested me most in the course of my forty years of public life—when I discussed the conflicts between the people and the crown, or between the dominions and Great Britain, I drew from my knowledge acquired in the history of England, while these gentlemen, who, perhaps, are well acquainted with the textbooks on history which they studied with their a, b, c, at the primary schools in the province of Quebec, but who, nevertheless were ignorant of British history, and especially of its spirit, translated my speeches with words drawn from French dictionaries and distorted my thoughts. I have already stated in the house that I do not like to see my speeches slashed or otherwise distorted. I could give further instances, by referring to the Department of Agriculture. That would afford me the pleasure of doing justice to an old friend of mine, a true friend of the province of Quebec, of French Canadians and of Canada at large; I refer to Sydney Fisher, Minister of Agriculture in the Laurier cabinet. Sydney Fisher, as old parliamentarians will recall, was a highly cultured man. He belonged to that class of people, unfortunately now too few, English by birth, education and intellectual culture. He was a graduate of Oxford. He resided in the province of Quebec, where he unceasingly sought, in his humble way, which made him too little appreciated by his contemporaries, he unceasingly sought to bring the two races on grounds of mutual good will. The day he was appointed Minister of Agriculture or a few days later, he said to me: "Bourassa, my ambition is to avail myself of the Department of Agriculture so as to raise the intellectual, social and technical level of the "habitants" of Quebec. I have lived among them and like them, but they have not kept pace with the age, either as farmers or citizens, owing, perhaps, to the conquest or domination by an aggressive minority during so many years; or whatever may be the reason, they have not acquired the pride, but especially, this acumen of mind more necessary to-day than ever, even more so to farmers so as to maintain their position and economic condition, etc. Well, what did Mr. Fisher do? He gathered here all the most competent men whom he could find in the various branches of agriculture in Quebec. He placed some at the experimental farm, in his department, and I think I am right in stating that the chief translator of that department is one of these employees he brought here, a Frenchman from France, but very much a Canadian, just as a number of our colleagues in the house who were born in England, Scotland, Germany or elsewhere, and who have become excellent Canadians.

Let us now take up the Trade and Commerce department. This is one of the departments of which we complained for years, and not without cause, about the delay in the publication of documents, at times, about the defective translation, but especially, about the delay. I wish to-day to give due credit to the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) for having accomplished so much within the last two years. The trade bulletin now is issued in French almost at the same time as the English version. The preparation of the Year Book is quite advanced, and numerous other documents from that department are issued to the French Canadian population with much less delay than in the past. However, there is still room for much improvement.

Well, for all these reasons, I rely on the enforcement of this act to harmonize the work of translation, so that a chief not connected with other departments, relying simply on his conscience and attainments, may say: Here are all the translators, I am keeping track of them; there are three here, two there, five to the right and one to the left. I bring them under the same roof and endeavour to judge of their qualifications; moreover, bearing in mind their years of service, each in their own work, I confirm them in their post and promote them according to their abilities.

The hon. member for Ottawa states that it would take a Pic de la Mirandole! I have somewhat studied history. The Pics de la Mirandole, people who have become too learned, at seven or eight years are generally poor administrators. Do not talk to me of brains that have been crammed too early in life. As Richelieu, the greatest statesman that France has had, and one of the ablest statesmen known throughout the world, as Richelieu said to Louis XIII: The qualifications required for one at the head of a state—and I would apply this to all heads of departments—is not the fact of being a book worm in each and every department placed under one's charge; but to be sufficiently acquainted with them so as to judge whether the men he employs are, each of them, competent in their department. A chief must not be a book worm, because the latter are generally short sighted, and as they require powerful glasses to examine a small text, they lose sight of the general perspective.

A chief of translation who would assemble his whole staff, distribute the work fairly and with circumspection—one cannot take for granted that the minister who is responsible will intentionally choose an imbecile, that is what a number of ministers have done in many departments; however, we must take a chance.

The whole question is whether or not, for the reasons I have pointed out, speed and efficiency in the performance of the work, a bureau for translation would be desirable.

Let us step down to the level where the hon. member for Ottawa has placed himself. I understand his position and sympathize with him. I recall the time when our old mutual friend Belcourt, had a weekly fit of bile, because people in Ottawa were ever seeking positions and promotions. The hon. member is obliged to take that stand, that is part of his parliamentary duties.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): No.

Mr. BOURASSA (Translation): Yes.

The hon. member for Ottawa should not say no. He carries out his task diligently and conscientiously, which permits me to state that he is one of the most efficient members that Ottawa has ever had. I shall not say that he is either a great man or a tall man. A tall man, he would be the first to deny it. A great man, time will tell, fifty years hence. Let us leave to posterity the care of erecting the moral stature of all and each of us. But, as a matter of justice towards employees, does he think that it is common sense, do my French Canadian colleagues think it common sense that, in one department, Agriculture, seven translators, in the course of the year, translate each 568 pages; that in another department, Immigration, two translators translate each 46 pages, in a whole year; that in the Labour department, two translators translate each 548 pages; that in the Public Works department, three translators translate each 108 pages; that in the Trade and Commerce department, four translators translate each 1719 pages; that in the department of Mines, three translators, the same number—no, one less—translate each 148 pages.

As the present system works out, it is most unfair to translators. So long as this system is in force, there will always be a number of parasites and lazy persons who will live at the public's expense and at the sacrifice of a colleague who does the work of two persons and—I place this consideration before you, my colleagues speaking the French language—live at the expense of the good name of our race.

The hon. Secretary of State stated that it was not his intention to dismiss any translator. So much the better, if he can find work for them all. However, on behalf of French Canadians, I request the Secretary of State that when he finds a lazy, good for nothing fellow or a drunkard, whether he is a French Canadian or not, let him put him out.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. BOURASSA (Translation): There are too many good people, heads of families who are starving in our respective counties, so that we have no right of taking to task a minister whose intentions are of the best, in order to force him to keep lazy men, when, every day, poor people knock at our doors.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): Will the hon. member allow me?

Mr. BOURASSA (Translation): No. I do not wish to be personal however, the hon. member is aware that there are some.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): No, I am not.

Mr. BOURASSA (Translation): First, I shall put a restriction and objection to the hon. Secretary of State. He limits himself, by section 5, to the appointments made by the Civil Service Commission. As a general principle, that is right, I opposed the bill introduced, two or three years ago, by my good friend, the member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon), so as to return to the political patronage system. I have always had and still have the patronage system in horror; however, once again, the rule is not without an exception. Owing to the unique character of translation, the difficulty of securing competent translators in agricultural matters or in other technical subjects, I think that—this will be considered by the committee—the minister should not be restricted by the Civil Service Act, in the appointment of the superintendent or technical translators, because he could find persons more competent, who, owing to their age or other matters of detail, would not be eligible according to the Civil Service Act and who, nevertheless, would be much more qualified to fill such posts than young men who might have successfully passed the examination. It is quite right that the act should be adhered to, but under the control of a superintendent not connected with the other departments; but nevertheless, responsible to the minister.

Let us now pass to the question of parliamentary debates. The hon. Secretary of State gave us to understand, to-day, that there will be some change made to the bill, in order that this new department may be divided into branches. I think he is right.

I may even add that such are my views expressed more than once, in an intimate way, to a few persons who may have had some hand in the draughting of this act. I think that owing to the considerable difference between the work of the translators of the house and that of the translators of the various departments—always under one sole supervisor—it is quite proper that there should be two branches.

I repeat it, there is no constitutional question to be raised, on the second reading of the bill. One could prolong the debate on this question. Parliament, under the rule of Alexander Mackenzie, and having as sponsors Edward Blake, Mr. Fournier, later on a judge of the supreme court, Laurier, who was to be the future leader of the Liberal party, enacted two of the most beneficial measures that have ever been adopted in Canada: the act relieving the house of its jurisdiction over the mandates of its members, one of the fundamental principles of the liberty of the Commons; the other relieving the house of the daily and efficient control of the disposal of funds which it votes, by creating the Auditor General's office which our translators designate as "auditeur général"—a man who is listening, that is the translation given to designate the Auditor General's office. We have at present an auditor general's office over which parliament has no authority; and parliament, indirectly, has to bear up with this control over the funds we vote. This was found necessary for reasons of a political order. I need not go into details, the reason for such legislation may be found in the debates of that period; and I think that no Liberal can feel ashamed of these two acts, draughted by the most respected and eminent men of their party. I do not think that the Liberal party in Canada has ever produced two more eminent men than Edward Blake and Laurier.

Therefore, the question of parliamentary control does not strike me as being very important. However, I think that the two branches should be separate. Does this mean that about fifteen employees who work four months each year should, with the conditions that prevail at present in this country, remain inactive during eight months or earn some money elsewhere? We are paying them from $3,000 to $4,000 per year in round figures, to only work four months, or let us say five or six months. I ask the hon. member for Ottawa, but in particular the hon. members for the city of Montreal: When this measure is explained to their constituents, what figure will they cut? When their constituents are starving, fathers have no bread to give to their family, will they boast of having voted in the house to allow fifteen gentlemen, some of them bachelors, to earn $4,000, in five or six months, so that they may rest seven months? They will soon find out what French Canadians think of this so-called claim of race rights. This also applies to the house stenographers. Here are employees that I have known for thirty years, and I have always considered a number of them as intimate friends. However, my duty to my country and social justice takes precedence over my friends; I therefore state that it is unprincipled at the present time, when we cut off 10 per cent of the salaries of all public employees, fathers of families who earn $1,000 per year, working the year around, and having to sacrifice $100; I say it is unprincipled not to make about thirty employees, whether stenographers or translators, work two or three months more, when commissions are sitting such as the ones investigating bank affairs, tariff or others which are not connected with parliament, but which, however, were appointed by parliament. Will hon. members contend that it is divesting ourselves of our privileges to force these gentlemen to work or must we allow them to loaf as we do? There are enough of us!

My dear friends—pardon my familiarity—a few weeks ago I told you: Feel the public's pulse. It is not a question of coming here and contending that to be in the good grace of our friends we must comply with the "Droit" or "Devoir," so as to draw their praise or avoid their abuse. I have been aware of this fact for forty years. We hold a mandate from all classes of people; I therefore, contend that we should, first preoccupy ourselves with the common welfare, especially that of the average.

I do not wish to prolong the debate, you will allow me, sir, to apply the five or ten minutes which remain of my time to discuss the question of the rights of the French language. The hon. member for Ottawa spoke with much skill and wit, as to the value of this bill in guaranteeing the rights of the French language. He contends that it adds nothing and even may lessen this guarantee. Again, I do not claim to be a lawyer, however, I have devoted much time to the study of constitutional law. I once heard Sir Charles Tupper, with the energy which characterized him and his powerful voice, state that if, to become a lawyer, one must learn how to split hairs in four and lose one's common sense; he preferred not to be a lawyer.

I thought I heard the hon. member, while quietly smoking my pipe behind the curtains so as to seek some inspiration—because it is usually while smoking a pipe that I find such inspiration—I thought I heard the hon. member quote one of my speeches, I do not exactly remember the year, in which I quoted Article 133 of the Constitution as a basis for our rights I have not the quotation here. May I immediately confess: I have said a lot of nonsense in my life; that may be one, however, from where I stood, I think I caught the sense of this quotation ten years old or more. I then spoke, often, of the "right" of the French Canadians to their language in all spheres of our national administration; but then, as to-day, I was aware of the chasm existing between right and law.

According to the spirit, article 133 recognizes, in principle, equal rights for the two languages; however, in practice, in the words of the act, it restricts the compulsory use of French—compulsory, remember—to the printing of documents of the house and the printing of the statutes; that is all, then a period. Even as regards to the debates of Hansard, instituted four or five years after confederation, I have strong doubts, if from a strictly legal angle, this privilege of taking down stenographic notes, each in turn, of the French and English speeches, and after having both texts translated, I have strong doubts, I state, that such a privilege is covered by article 133. Let us suppose that it is a moral right. Since when in history, have you seen a moral right recognized when it is not backed by the wording of the act? What I find in this case—that is why I approve of this bill—is that, for the first time, in legislation introduced by the government, bearing the seal of government responsibility, and adopted by the house, the French language, both in fact and right, in law as well as in the spirit of the constitution, shall in the future be on an equal footing in the administration of all departments, and that it will no more be left to the whims of a minister or deputy minister, however narrow-minded or dull he may be, to restrict this right by a narrow and pharisaical interpretation, because he will then have before him the wording of the act.

The hon. member for Ottawa states this act may be abolished next year. No doubt Such may be the case with all laws. We can do so to-morrow, if we are silly enough—if the session lasts long, anything may happen—we can enact a measure, to-morrow, to abrogate the criminal code and give "carte blanche" to all our criminals; we can enact a measure to do away with hon. gentlemen, the minister, and proclaim that the country will govern its ownself—perhaps, it might not be worse off. It is hard to tell, we can abrogate any statute. Since the Westminster statute has come into force, we can, if we wish, amend any article of our constitution, including article 133. But that we should add to the incomplete and embryonic article 133, an act adopted by this house so as to give effect, in practice, to the principle embodied in that article, I contend that we raise the wall which protects our rights in all the administrative spheres of Canada. I maintain that we give a legal form, a term no more restricted to the Imperial parliament—because we must remember that, in its original form, the British North America Act is an imperial one, if we wish to look at it from a strict legal interpretation—however, by a measure enacted by ourselves, we give our sanction, we spread it, we make its enforcement practical in all departments. And I stated that, in my opinion, the measure introduced by the Secretary of State is an excellent one and is well deserving that we should overlook certain questions of detail.

In the study of acts as in all other measures, let us beware of this tendency of the French character to peer into, as I stated just now, details with a magnifying glass and lose sight of the fundamental principle and the general economy of legislative measures.

It is with both hands that I welcome this bill, as a crowning event of forty years of conflict carried on in defence of the French language, when three quarters of the French Canadian Liberals fired in my back and called me a traitor to Laurier, a struggle which I carried on in agreement with the Liberals and Conservatives of goodwill—there were always some not only among the Canadians speaking French, but also among the Canadians speaking English, in the other provinces. When a rational question is placed before them, supported by arguments not drawn by pinches from such and such a text of law, but arguments which appeal to common sense, to the sense of fair play, I state we always obtain results; not always immediately and such as we expect, because an Englishman is slow, deliberate in his movements, it is hard for him to cast aside his prejudices; but once his thick skin has been pierced, when he has become convinced that a measure has common sense, that it is practical and just, one has sometimes to knock hard to pierce that skin, but once that is done, we usually find among most of them, an upright conscience, a well placed heart; and they apply the act in a broadminded way.

I shall therefore support the bill, leaving to the committee which will be appointed the care of examining it in its details, improve on it if necessary and send it back to the house so that we may give it a final sanction, to which, I feel certain, after studying and thinking it over, the large majority of French Canadians will support it, in spite of the beclouding of the question by newspapers and patriotic associations which have been handing to one and other scraps of papers without, I feel sure, having closely studied the question.

At six o'clock the house recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. JOSEPH A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, we had, this afternoon, the good fortune of listening to the splendid speech delivered by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) as well as that of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). It brought back my happy boyhood days, when I resided in Montreal, where, on many occasions, I was fortunate enough to hear these two gentlemen discussing national questions which interested the whole country. Useless to state that I was in no way disappointed in listening to their speeches. One thing struck me; the hon. member for Labelle thought fit to confess that in the past, on various occasions, he had talked nonsense. I accepted his statement in the way he intended it to be understood, because the hon. member was then replying to a question of the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) with reference to the question which at present interests us, and which was threshed out to a certain extent, in a masterly way by the hon. member for Labelle. No doubt had the Bill No. 4 been introduced by the hon. member for Labelle, that would have been sufficient for me to endorse its second reading. However, to a question put by the hon. member for Ottawa, the hon. member for Labelle refused to reply, namely, would not this bill do away, to some extent with the practical establishment of the French language in Canada, basing such an argument on article 133?

To another question, sir, put by the hon. member for Ottawa, the hon. member replied very discourteously. He stated, however, that certain statements he had made in the past were purely and simply nonsense. In fact, the hon. member for Labelle, in the past, did make statements which smacked of nonsense on certain questions which interested the country at large. Does the same principle apply to the speech which the hon. member has delivered in the house on the present debate?

What also amazed me, was the hon. member's little reliance in the press of this country. When the author of the present amendment pointed out that the French Canadian press feared that the bill under consideration might be a blow to the French language, the hon. member for Labelle asserted that the press had no reason to protest as it did. The hon. member, therefore, proved that he placed little reliance in the press of this country. Nevertheless he was a director of the excellent French Canadian newspaper "Le Devoir"; he was its manager for years, if not the proprietor and editor. He fails to uphold the press when he states that he places no reliance in it, moreover, the hon. member gives the impression that he is against the entire press of the country. If he places no reliance in editorials he wrote in the past, and in the editorials which will again be written by him, what will the people of Quebec and Canada think, whether they be French or English speaking when they read articles, editorials penned by the hon. member for Labelle, on various occasions, with reference to our great political problems? His references to the press of this country, implies also a newspaper of Ottawa the "Droit." The hon. member for Labelle, this afternoon, without making a solemn declaration, gave us to understand that he also, in the past, worked to have justice done to all classes of this country. I have, sir, no direct or indirect interest in any newspaper. However, I am strongly of the opinion that the press should inform the public on questions in which they have an interest at stake. The "Droit" for fifteen consecutive years has considered it a duty to put clearly all facts before the people of Ontario. Hon. gentlemen are aware as to what happened, when in 1912, the famous regulation XVII was placed in the statutes of Ontario. Under the direction of this independent newspaper, interested in this question, the cooperation of not only the whole of Ontario but of Canada was asked, all were called upon to do their duty and to inform the people of the facts in this respect.

Thanks to the hon. gentlemen that we elected to the Ontario Legislative Assembly and thanks especially to the work accomplished by this excellent newspaper, the "Droit", peace reigns in Ontario and there is a complete understanding between the various classes in the community, between French and English Canadians. This result is due for the major part to the campaign waged by this newspaper. That is why I rise to protest against such a statement made in the house. I could point to a long list of distinguished persons who also did their utmost to solve the problem to which I have just referred. I may say that I also did my bit to improve conditions and help those who had to suffer on that account. That is why I feel quite at liberty to deny certain statements made this afternoon.

The hon. member for Labelle alluded to the conduct of certain officials in the house, of certain public employees, and particularly to certain translators. When he was asked and pressed to name them, he refused. He called them lazy fellows, drunkards, etc. Remember that such a statement falls from the lips of a distinguished and able man. The hon. member for Labelle attacks all public employees outside this house when he makes such a statement. When an hon. member makes a charge, he should, at least be very sure of his ground.

Other assertions were also made in the house by the hon. member for Labelle. He stated that certain translators in such and such departments translated so many pages—however, he mentioned no names. In one instance, a translator only translated 44 pages per year. When the hon. member refers to such translators he should give their names and not hide behind the immunity he enjoys in the house to make such charges.

I repeat that if the object of the bill was really what the hon. member for Labelle endeavours to make us believe, I, myself, would endorse the measure. Certainly, the hon. Secretary of State was not so clear in his remarks. In fact, he spoke of uniformity and economy, but he did not go so far as the hon. member for Labelle who stated that the object of the bill was to increase French influence, to ensure greater recognition of the French language in all dominon government matters. I shall not endeavour to further reply to the statements of the hon. member for Labelle. However, there is one thing that hon. members of this house must have noted, it is the fact that the discussion has carried on outside the field of politics. The hon. Secretary of State, for whom I have the greatest esteem, must have noted that the hon. member for Ottawa made out a strong case from the viewpoint of translation, the efficiency of the service and even from an economic angle; he also found it possible to discuss this question without entering the field of politics. However, I greatly regretted to see that the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) thought fit again to make insinuations stating that he could understand the sympathy displayed by the hon. member for Ottawa towards the civil service employees and that it might be to his interest to act thus. Such charges cannot be levelled against me because I do not think I have ten public employees in the constituency which I have the privilege of representing. However, it is recognized that the hon. member for Ottawa has proved himself greatly competent in discussing all questions which pertain to the civil service and those having a national issue. He again proved this fact, this afternoon. That is why I took this opportunity to refute the charges which the hon. member for Labelle thought fit to level against the hon. member for Ottawa.

(Text) Mr. Speaker, I fully realize the importance of the problem under discussion today, and I am sure it must have been gratifying to the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) as well as to others who followed him, to find this debate lifted entirely out of the realm of politics. The Secretary of State certainly put his case wonderfully well before the house, and he approached it to some extent from a different angle than he did on the first reading. At the time of the first reading of the bill the impression was created that the intention was primarily to promote efficiency and economy; this afternoon the minister enlarged upon his former explanation. We had the gratifying spectacle of one of his old colleagues—I refer to the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa)—supporting this legislation. Speaking for myself, in view of all that was said this afternoon by the hon. member for Labelle, in view of what he propounded, if he had himself introduced this bill I do not think that any member of the house could find it possible to vote against it. In reply to a direct question asked by the senior member for Ottawa

(Mr. Chevrier) this afternoon, however, the Secretary of State did not discuss the subject from the same angle as did the hon. member for Labelle. As for the two reasons advanced by the minister when he first introduced the bill, the reasons of efficiency and of economy, I do not think that the members of parliament can find fault with it. Everyone wants efficiency, not only in the matter of translation but in every department of government; and while undoubtedly there are times when it is rather dangerous to go too far in the direction of economy, I do not think that on that score it can be complained that we shall not obtain greater efficiency.

If my recollection is correct, when the bill was originally introduced, the Secretary of State tried to build up his case for the centralization of the translation services on the fact that his own department had found it impossible to have a translation of the speech from the throne. Well, I know enough about the administrative powers of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to feel assured that if the Secretary of State had brought to his attention the fact that there was any difficulty about obtaining any translation in his department because of an insufficiency of money for the purpose, the Prime Minister would have seen to it that an adequate number of translators were provided for the purpose; because after all the Prime Minister would never sacrifice efficiency to economy.

On the question of the centralization of translators, a good deal can be said both for and against it. Personally, as a layman not very well versed in civil service matters, I think I could point out several departments that could be brought under a centralization scheme. But, as was pointed out this afternoon by the senior member for Ottawa, in the work of translating reports and so forth there are a certain number of experts, technicians, in the various departments, men who have spent long years of training to equip themselves for a particular type of translation. The question might be asked, for instance, as to what the Secretary of State would do with regard to centralizing chemistry. We know that throughout the activities of the government there are several departments in which chemistry plays an important part; we find this in the mint, in the mines branch, in the Department of National Revenue and in several other departments in each of which there are chemists working on the same kind of formula and each has had special training for that particular work. I know the Minister of Agriculture would certainly criticize anyone who would dare to transfer to the National Research Council the chemists under his own supervision.

While it can be easily proved that certain departments could be centralized, it could also be easily proved that so far as ability and efficiency are concerned, there are certain other government departments which it would be impossible to centralize. What I have said in regard to chemists could apply as forcibly to other specialized type of employees. I have in my hand a memorandum by the Civil Service Commission under date of April 15, 1924, reading as follows:

> Most departments have a small but expensive translating staff, not only to handle French correspondence, but also departmental publications and general translations. . . . A central unit would handle translation other than departmental correspondence. . . .
> Under proper organization there would be a saving, not only by the elimination of positions which would naturally become surplus on amalgamation, but also by reduction in the classification of others, for example, eleven head translators would scarcely be required in the new branch.

From reading that part of their report one can readily see that it is not in conformity with the statement made by the Secretary of State this afternoon. Speaking of centralization he presented a picture that, if I understood him correctly, would lead one to believe that while this is called centralization, it is really decentralization because he will maintain as an entity the translating staffs of the House of Commons and of the Senate and in addition a certain amount of liberty in all the departments. He almost implied that in all the other departments they would maintain practically the same staffs. The only difference I can see is that over and above all the translators there will be a deputy minister or a man having the qualifications necessary to be at the head of the branch who will have complete control of all the translating. That is the inference I drew from the speech of the Secretary of State. If my inference is correct, we are not going to have centralization. It means simply that the Secretary of State now recognizes that centralization of translation is impossible of application.

This afternoon the hon. member for Labelle spoke of the superman, the man under whom we could centralize all the different translators and under whom the translating work would be perfect. He made allusion to certain words: he mentioned, for instance, the fact that "the Speaker of the house" is always wrongly translated in the French language. He should not be called "speaker" because as a member of parliament he never says a word. This afternoon the hon. member for Labelle mentioned the word "sottise." In English it means "silliness, foolishness, folly; silly thing, foolish trick, nonsense, indecency, insult; abusive language," and in French it means "défaut d'esprit et de jugement, action sotte." This simple illustration will make us realize that even if we have only one man at the head of all the translators, we would find some anomalies; we would not have perfect service.

The Secretary of State this afternoon made out a great case by exhibiting in the house a number of documents that were printed at the printing bureau and that were returned with a large number of corrections to be made. If those were all the corrections that would have to be made in a year, surely he could not say that that was too much, because even in the best organized printing bureau in Canada or any other country, there would always be corrections to be made and surely we could never expect that under a new head the work would be so perfect that there would be no need for correction in work sent back from the printing bureau.

Personally I do not contend that some improvement could not be made in all departments, including translating. While the translation service is loyal and has given good work, no doubt it could be improved in some respects, but surely no one can tolerate the reflection cast this afternoon on the translating staff as well as on the whole civil service.

As regards the matter of centralization, why has the government singled out the one branch of translation? A great case is being made at the present time of the fact that the accountants are under one branch. This matter was well explained this afternoon by previous speakers, the senior member for Ottawa, and the hon. member for Labelle. Accountancy is practically the same the world over; an accountant is recognized in Montreal, in Vancouver; ledger entries are practically the same everywhere. Expert men are not required; those that are needed are men who have certain qualifications, who go through a specific course and who prove by passing a civil service examination that they have the qualifications for filling the position. The Secretary of State made a great point of the fact that government accounting work had been centralized. In the same memorandum that I mentioned a few moments ago the Civil Service Commission also recommended the establishment of:

1. An engineering and scientific service to assume the work for the Departments of Public Works, Railways and Canals, Marine and Fisheries, water power branch.

At the present moment, so far as those departments are concerned, there is no mention of amalgamation or centralization.

2. A central accounting service for all government departments.

So far as I can see this is the only service that has been centralized and again we do not need in that work the same measure of expertness as in the translation service.

3. A central purchasing service for all government departments.

Everyone knows that there is an overlapping in the purchasing branches of the government, and again I do not see any sign of any measure to bring about centralization of this work.

4. A central multigraphing and duplicating service.

Again there has been no discussion on this matter and there are no signs of centralizing it.

5. A central photostat, blue-printing, photolithographic and photographic service.

No one has heard of centralizing those activities.

6. Amalgamation of income tax service and Department of Customs and Excise.

Instead of these two departments being centralized, they have been put apart. For instance, the income tax branch has been placed under the Civil Service Commission and instead of centralization of these two departments, for the last three years there has been decentralization.

7. Amalgamation of Surveys branches.

This has not been accomplished so far as I know.

8. Possible amalgamation of Departments of the Secretary of State and External Affairs.

This amalgamation has not been brought about, although it was suggested in the memorandum.

9. Transfer of all legal officers to the Department of Justice.

I am not so much in favour of the centralization of that service because the principle applying to translators and chemists applies just as forcibly to the law branches of the different government departments.

10. Consolidation of departmental libraries and establishment of a central reference library.

So far as I know, there has been no centralization along those lines. Therefore, when the Secretary of State to some extent decried the campaign that has been going on for the last two months in the French speaking section of the press of this country, he should not be surprised because the question is: Why was the translation service singled out from all the other recommendations that were made a few years ago? There is also the fact that when the deputy ministers were asked to give their views in regard to centralization of the translation staffs in their various departments, they unanimously declared that the system in vogue was giving satisfaction to all persons concerned. I agree with the hon. member for Labelle that if the present bill will assure us better translation service, certainly we would all be in favour of it, but the Secretary of State this afternoon mentioned the fact of delays of months in the printing bureau. Will he place the blame wholly on the translation staffs of the different departments? He was not very clear when he made that statement. Nevertheless the impression was given in the house that the blame should be placed entirely on the translators in the different departments. I do not believe the condition is so bad as has been stated, and surely the translators should not be expected to take all the blame.

Then there is the matter of more efficient service; as I said a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, everyone wants efficiency. This afternoon the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) made some reference to the wonderful improvement that had been made in the Department of Trade and Commerce. That is absolutely true. Some documents which were not printed simultaneously in both languages a few years ago are printed in that way now. I remember that last year I directed the attention of the House of Commons to the fact that a certain document dealing with statistics was being issued in the English language only, and a few days later we had that document translated into French. Surely the same improvement could be made in all the departments of the government. I know enough of the present Prime Minister, the Secretary of State and the government in general to be sure that they will never sacrifice efficiency for the sake of economy.

I hope the Secretary of State realizes that the criticism expressed this afternoon was not directed at him personally. We all know his personality and his true Canadianism; we all know that he always has been fairminded and just. The criticism was directed to the bill which he brought into the house, and the criticism was to the effect that he has been ill advised. We think this bill is illtimed; that it did not originate with the Secretary of State but with some of his advisers, for some unknown reasons. Last fall I was fortunate enough to assist at a banquet given by the university of Ottawa at which the Prime Minister made a wonderful address. At that time he demonstrated his knowledge of the different elements which make up the population of this country, and their aspirations; and at the conclusion of his remarks he received great, spontaneous applause. That is why we do not direct our criticism against the Secretary of State personally; we know he wants to be fair to every section of the population.

With regard to the question of economy, I could enlarge on that subject at great length, but I believe it has been shown that no real economy will be brought about by this measure. According to the minister the present staff will be retained, at least, and presumably there will be some superior officers appointed. If the idea of centralization is carried out to the full, it will mean that the present translators in the different departments will have to be housed in one large office, and a staff will have to be engaged. I ask hon. gentlemen to visualize the number of messengers who will have to be employed if this central office is to keep in hourly contact with every department of the government. I should think a staff of at least sixty messengers would be required for that purpose, so I do not see where this measure will bring about any economy.

This afternoon the hon. member for Labelle made out a wonderful case against the translators and reporters of the Senate and House of Commons. I know something about stenography, and I can tell you that those people earn every cent they get for their work in this house. It is always possible to single out certain people in the civil service and say that they earn $4,000 per year while other men are out of employment at the present time; that is what the hon. member for Labelle did. Surely it is not to the credit of the hon. member for Labelle to reflect on the civil servants employed in this house in order to build up a case; as I say, I know something about stenography and something about the work the reporters are called upon to perform, and they earn every cent they get. The same statement applies just as forcibly to the translators. They do not work in shifts; they work very long hours, but they are just as loyal as are any other civil servants. The senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) demonstrated this afternoon that these translators cannot work in shifts; you will not have efficient service if you try to adopt that method of procedure. So I believe I have shown that under the present bill there will be no economies brought about, and I am sincere in my statement, because I believe in the sincerity of every hon. member of this house. It would never enter my mind to cast any reflection on the sincerity of any hon. gentleman, no matter in what corner of the house he has his seat.

It may be said that it is impossible for the Secretary of State to withdraw this bill gracefully, but if a faux pas has been committed surely a way can be found to withdraw without dishonour. I have in mind a condition which existed for many years in the province of Ontario; I refer to a certain rule that was put on the statutes of Ontario in 1912 by the then Minister of Education. In all sincerity the French speaking minority in Ontario thought they were being done an injustice; we felt that we were being treated like the poor relation in the household. Through our press and our representatives in the Ontario legislature we created a feeling in Ontario which ultimately resulted in the withdrawal of the rule. We were not violent in our campaign, but we knew we had justice on our side. In 1927, fifteen years later, the gentleman who in 1912 had been Minister of Education was premier of the province of Ontario. I did not always agree with his political opinions; on a great many occasions I found it possible to criticize his administrative actions, but after that gentleman visited every section of Ontario, understanding our viewpoint, he realized that we only wanted to play our part in the development and advancement of the province, and eventually that rule was withdrawn from the statute. Do you think the then premier of the province of Ontario decreased in political stature in the least as a result of that action? No; he became not only a provincial but eventually a national statesman. Certainly he was not dishonoured, and I do not believe the Secretary of State will bring any dishonour on himself in withdrawing this measure. In his own speech this afternoon he practically admitted that there has been criticism of the bill from many organizations in all sections of Canada.

This afternoon the hon. member for Labelle said that you should not listen to the press. I was astonished at that statement, because I read with almost religious ardour several of the articles which I found on the editorial page of the newspaper of which he was the founder and, until recently, the owner and editor. The motto on the front page of that publication, in which I understand he has no interest at the present time, is: Fais ce que dois. So I think we must believe in the sincerity of the things that are done both in and out of this house; I give all credit to the Secretary of State for being sincere, but I am afraid he has been badly advised in this connection. Should he find it possible to withdraw the bill he will not be disgraced because, as I have said, there was almost a parallel case in the province of Ontario.

Again I want to remind the Secretary of State that the criticism he has read in the newspapers and to which he has listened in this house was not directed at him personally. No one, I think, could cast any doubt on his sincerity, because we all know what he has done for every section of the population in Canada. He typifies to every citizen, and most particularly to French Canadians, the Anglo Canadian, the man who is naturally broadminded, and who speaks bilingually, and thinks and acts nationally. I believe, the same as he does, in our great British institutions, in the purpose of our parliaments. I am perfectly at ease making an appeal to him, knowing that my message will be received in the spirit in which it is given.

This afternoon the hon. member for Ottawa made allusion to the Frechette report. I was going to answer the hon. member for Labelle on the statements he made this afternoon, but I find that for a very good reason I am not in a position to do so. He built up a strong case in favour of centralization, stating that for the last ten, twenty or thirty years in the several visits he had made, almost weekly, to several government departments he had found great masses of documents in English which had not been translated into French. I thought we had had centralization prior to 1910, but the information I have received since is to the effect that in fact we have never had centralization in Canada.

This afternoon the senior member for Ottawa read almost the whole of the Frechette report into the record, so that at this time it is not my intention to go into it at length. This report was made after inquiry into the conditions in some bilingual countries. It was made by a man who did not belong to the civil service and who, because of that fact, was in a position to give an impartial and a just report of what he found. Upon returning he expressed himself as absolutely opposed to the centralization of the translation services, so far as efficiency was concerned.

I wish at this time to quote an article which appeared in Le Devoir in the month of February this year. No doubt this is the article to which the minister referred this afternoon when he mentioned the campaign in the press which he had had to face for the last few months. This article will give an idea to the House of Commons of the constructive criticism which was levelled at the Secretary of State, and the respect which was shown, even in the criticism, for his personality. I have made the following translation:

In the first place, whatever be the intrinsic merit of the proposal, whatever peril it may conceal, we are one of those who, being cognizant of Mr. Cahan's early activities and of the heavy sacrifices—much heavier than one is apt to surmise—toward vindicating the rights of minorities, find it impossible to consider him in the light of an enemy of our ethnic group, and are unwilling to do anything towards diminishing the share of influence which rightly belongs to him in the sphere of dominion affairs.

In the second place, it may be—while we are ignorant of it—that the present organization, either through a defect inherent in the system, or through individual failings, does not give complete satisfaction.

But that being granted, and this is our third argument, it seems clear to any one who takes time to go into the details of the scheme that this measure making for the centralization of translations would neither answer the purpose of efficiency, nor even that of economy, which it purports to procure.

It seems also—and that is a fourth point to note—its outcome might quite possibly be to result, without appreciable economy, in a lower standard of efficiency, as regards both the quality and quantity of the translation turned out, and thus would the standard and importance of French, even as matters now stand, insufficiently recognized in the dominion government service, be further reduced.

To all these points and a few others we shall recur in the near future, with facts and illustrations in support.

Improvements may be in order; but the remedy is quite of a different nature from that proposed in the bill. And we believe that it would be comparatively an easy matter to prove our contention to the satisfaction even of the Secretary of State.

I believe in the sincerity of this article, and I know the Secretary of State also believes in it. It is not my intention to deal at greater length with this matter, because I believe the house is seized of the sincerity of the objections we have made to the bill, and I know that no ulterior motives are behind this discussion. In a discussion of this nature everyone must naturally and necessarily be within the bounds of logic, and be honest in his motives. On the coat of arms of the royal family of Great Britain are the words "Honi soit qui mal y pense." All we want is perfect coordination and understanding of every branch of this great Canadian family.

I believe that to a certain measure I have proven that this so-called centralization would not give us the measure of efficiency which, at first glance, it might seem to offer. Secondly, I say that no economy would be accomplished by centralization. There are several other bureaus, several other governmental departments to which that principle could be applied. I can see where there would be objections from different ministers through the fact that they would lose some of the prerogatives they enjoy in their own departments.

I was not quite satisfied with the statements made this afternoon by the Secretary of State when he mentioned that the Speaker of the house should be satisfied by being Speaker alone. Surely we have enough faith and confidence in our Speakers, men who are honoured with that high office on account of their great training, on account of their understanding and personal knowledge, to believe that they can look after at least the administration of the House of Commons and its services.

Again may I say I know the Secretary of State will realize that hon. members on this side of the house are sincere in their appeal, and we are confident we shall receive the hearing to which we are entitled and which we expect from such a person as he is.

Mr. E. C. ST-PERE (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, the bill introduced by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) has many features deserving of most careful attention. In fact, after the recital delivered by the hon. member in explanation of this measure the bill leaves us somewhat in confusion as to the true reason for submitting to parliament such a drastic and revolutionary piece of legislation. First of all, centralization of translation services is not a matter which is being studied for the first time. It has been discussed in the past. As far back as 1909 the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons of Canada sent Mr. Achille Frechette to Belgium and Switzerland to inquire into and report upon the system of translation obtaining in those countries. At that time there was more or less a system of centralization for the translation of departmental and parliamentary reports and documents.

Let us see what this investigator had to say in regard to centralization. Quoting from page 7 of the official report of Mr. Frechette, dated at Paris, September, 1910, I find the following:

But now that the publications of the public service deal with so many activities unknown to the primitive country that we were then; now that all the human interests, more and more specialized, find their expression in the papers presented to the Canadian parliament, a centralized translation office can no longer do justice to so much work that calls for specialists.

And further:

The experience I have acquired during thirty-six years of service in the Commons have convinced me that in centralization rests the vice of our system.

And among the conclusions arrived at by Mr. Frechette we find one to the effect that translation services should be established in the departments. He does not say to do away with the existing services, as is proposed in the present bill, but to maintain them and to establish similar services in all the other departments. Let us quote again from the original report:

Therefore . . . I conclude that it is desirable to extend in Canada to all the departments, the practice already intelligently introduced in some of them, as, for instance, the Department of Agriculture, and very recently, that of Marine and Fisheries; . . . and that department officers be given the duties of translating the annual reports of their departments and, among the other papers furnished by them to parliament, those which the printing committee would recommend to be printed.

And further on he insists that as a result time would be gained and the quality of work improved.

We have thus on record a man of high standing, of long experience in the Commons, eminently qualified and competent to offer judgment and advice in the matter, who is unequivocally against centralization.

But we may add to this testimonial. Later, in 1919, the Union government brought from the United States the Griffenhagen people, and the Arthur Young Company, efficiency experts, giving them the task of classifying and reorganizing the public service of Canada. The least we can say is that these experts had a certain reputation for high-class achievement. At all events, they were chosen by the Union government supposedly on their good record in that class of work. They were consequently given a free hand. Their work was tremendous, and they made a good job of it as a whole. They did some reorganization in various departments but, although familiar with the diverse needs of government services, they ignored or were not impressed by the alleged necessity of centralizing the translation services of all the departments. About the year 1913, the Hon. Mr. Blondin organized a central bureau of translation with a staff of twenty-one translators whose work covered the annual reports and documents from almost every department, including reports from royal commissions and parliamentary committees. This staff was gradually decreased as the years went on because various departments found it more convenient to appoint their own translators: the work was done more rapidly and with more accuracy. Thus we find that after only a few years' trial, centralization was being abandoned and translators were being appointed to the Mines branch, to the departments of Public Works, Finance, Secretary of State, Post Office and Customs, and to the railway commission, the Auditor General's office, and so forth, leaving a staff of only ten or eleven translators in the bluebooks branch which is now functioning under the name of the general translation branch. Thus we have had a regular, a fair and extended trial of centralization, and it has been found wanting, unsatisfactory, cumbersome and totally inadequate to the needs of the administration.

Not so very long ago the government appointed a committee to inquire into the cost of printing and stationery, and, incidentally, into the cost of publishing, printing and distributing public documents. The question of translation naturally came under discussion as a contributing factor. This committee, known as the Sellar committee, was composed of members highly qualified to deal with such an important subject and these men had to study a great number of reports, some of which were strongly in favour of centralization of translation services. Others were equally forceful and pronounced against such a plan. No doubt the pros and cons were conscientiously considered, and I am credibly informed that the unanimous conclusion arrived at by the committee was to recommend to the government to make no change so far as a central bureau for translations was concerned, but to leave well enough alone.

So we have centralization condemned by a special investigator who made a strong report against it; it was also ignored by the Griffenhagen people and the Arthur Young Company; it was abandoned after the test of actual experience and thrown overboard by a recently appointed committee. Therefore the hon. Secretary of State had very little to fall back upon in introducing the bill now before the house. The minister says that he received a report from the Civil Service Commission. But what kind of report did he receive? Who was the author of this recommendation? From what I have heard, the report comes from a third rate man who is not competent to pass judgment on such an important matter—a man who has no standing as a literary critic, as an organizer, or even as a translator; and further, this report was written at a time when there was no French commissioner to approve of such a report. In fact, I am sure that if the present French commissioner had been in office, that report would never have left the Civil Service Commission, at least in its original form. It was speeded up in the absence of one of the recognized representatives of the French Canadian minority in the cabinet.

Now let us see what the minister has to say in reference to this bill. I quote from Hansard, pages 7 and 8, of January 29:

> In January last it was ascertained that there were employed in the public service 91 translators. . . .
> The salaries of these 91 translators amount to $252,000.

And further:

> Yet some time ago, when a treaty dealing with the waterways was signed between the government of Canada and the government of the United States, there was not a single translator to whom I could apply or to whom I had the right to apply to make a translation of that document from English into French for circulation as required. In respect of private, confidential documents such as that, I had to enlist the services of a personal friend to make the translation. There were other documents such as the convention between Ontario and Quebec in regard to the same waterways, and in connection with them there was no one in the public service to whom I could apply for a translation. I had to go outside to procure the services of a friend to make such translation. And so it is that the different departments are from time to time called upon to prepare in both English and French very important state documents.

These remarks, to say the least, are confusing and may leave the house under a false impression. We would think that the minister has no translator available in his own department. The truth is that at least three translators are listed as being under the authority of the Secretary of State. One of them is even a graduate of the Sorbonne in France.

Mr. CAHAN: Who is he?

Mr. ST-PERE: He is connected with the Archives department, Mr. Marion. His services were very easily available to the minister. If we follow the same process of reasoning used by those who made up the return in answer to the question of the hon. member for Three Rivers-St. Maurice last year, we will find five of them, namely: One principal translator in the patent office, one principal translator in the Archives branch, one editor-translator for the Canada Gazette, and Mr. Van Veen, and Mr. Emond, a remission officer who was also listed as a translator. Perhaps the hon. minister did not at the time realize that he had so many. At all events, why complain that he had no translator to whom he could apply for making the translation desired?

Mr. CAHAN: Because it is the truth. I have none.

Mr. ST-PERE: All right. I am sure the hon. gentleman did not want deliberately to deceive the house, but his statement would have us believe he had no one available. The minister says he must go outside or ask other departments to get his translation done. It is strange that such would be the case after what we now know about the number of translators under his own jurisdiction. At any rate, it proves that translation services are essential for the proper administration of his own department—we have his own words for it—and if they are essential in his department, they are just as essential in all other departments. The hon. minister's recital is simply an implied condemnation of the government's policy in regard to translators in general. The present government has abolished nearly a score of translators in the interior and finance departments and the civil service commission. They even dismissed a translator actually on duty and who had just been appointed to the railway board. If these services are essential, why abolish these positions? Why could not the Secretary of State appoint a few more translators for his own work? Instead of doing the practical thing, he brings down this bill to rectify a personal grievance, according to his own statement. By withdrawing the translation personnel from other departments to merge them in a central bureau, he is putting the other ministers or heads of departments in the same position as that about which he so bitterly complains. If the hon. minister finds fault in having to call upon outsiders to have his translation done, why should the House of Commons, for example, have to call upon the Secretary of State to have its parliamentary papers and official documents translated? The reason given by the hon. gentleman is not very convincing. Passing the difficulty to others is not a solution and I submit that the only and proper remedy is to add to his own staff according to his needs.

I should like to say a word as to the number of translators in the public service. The hon. gentleman says that ninety-one are employed by the government. No doubt he took this figure from the return made last year in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Three Rivers-St. Maurice (Mr. Bourgeois). This return shows that outside of the House of Commons and the Senate, fifty-eight translators were employed. With those employed in the House of Commons and the Senate we have, all told, ninety-one translators. But at the time of introducing this bill one more position had been abolished, that of chief translator of the Senate debates. So there are now only ninety. The return to which I have referred included many stenographers, clerks and interpreters, so in reality there are not ninety or ninety-one translators in the service. The return included even the name of a remission officer who is not actually a translator. To prove my point, I ask hon. members to refer to the estimates of last year and those of the current year. In both cases we find only seventy-three or seventy-four translators classified as such. Why should bilingual clerks or stenographers be included among the translators? Why include interpreters and other officers having a completely different classification? The reason is obvious. It is to show that these services are overmanned and although the axe of the guillotine has been operating to the extent of decapitating five thousand civil servants in the short time hon. friends opposite have been in office, it is still sharp enough to cut off a few more heads at the expense of the due and rightful representation which a minority should receive in the public service.

This bill is a direct attack against the privileges of this house. We should have independent control over all officials, officers and employees of the House of Commons. This bill provides further for the abolition of the position of chief of French journals. It does not say so in so many words, but the inference is obvious. Why this attack against the constitution which established the French and English languages as official? Proceedings in this house can be carried on either in the French or in the English language. Let us see what some of the accepted authorities have to say about the House of Commons. Giving his evidence before the select special committee on the civil service and the Civil Service Act on April 13, 1932, as reported on pages 465 and 466 of the evidence, Mr. Beauchesne quoted Mr. Bourinot, who he stated was one of the most distinguished clerks, as follows:

> The control and management of the officers of the houses are as completely within the privileges of the houses as are necessary to the conservation of dignity and the efficient conduct of public business.

Mr. Beauchesne also quoted the late Sydney Fisher, whose opinion on this matter will be found in Hansard of June 29, 1928, as follows:

> The House of Commons is not a department of government. There are no departments of the service in which the duties are similar to those in the House of Commons.

In placing certain officers and employees of this house under a responsible minister of the crown, the government is acting in direct contradiction to the opinions of the well known authorities quoted by Mr. Beauchesne.

The duty of the chief of English journals is to record the proceedings of this house. The position which this gentleman occupies is one of the utmost importance. He has charge of the drafting of the votes and proceedings and his work forms part of the regular routine of parliament. Therefore, he cannot be removed and placed under a minister of the crown. I submit that the same can be said of the chief of French journals, because the proceedings of the house can be carried on either in French or in English and the French journals hold the same important place in the regular routine of this house as do the English journals. Any attack or any measure tending to remove this official or to abolish the position of chief of French journals is a direct attack against the privileges and authority of this house as well as an attack against the principle of equality between the French and English languages as guaranteed by the constitution.

This change is said to have been inspired for reasons of economy and through a sincere desire to increase efficiency in the services concerned. In this connection I should like to refer to the Beatty report, dated February, 1930. I did not refer before to this report because I wanted to do so at this stage. This report makes no mention of centralization of the translation services as a means of improving this important branch of the public service. I do not doubt that a more competent body has never been called upon to report on matters pertaining to translation and its related subjects. After a careful and complete study of the situation in general and of every aspect of this complex problem, the Beatty commission did not recommend centralization and its report says nothing about it. I contend that had this plan appealed to these investigators as being proper, advantageous and practical, both as to efficiency and to economy, they certainly would have made a recommendation to that effect. One of the most striking recommendations contained in this report is to be found on page 16. It is that a higher rate of salaries should be provided in order to ensure greater efficiency. Therefore, the closer you get to efficiency the further you are from her twin sister, economy. The hon. minister would have us believe that they are like the Siamese twins, but I am afraid that when the real test comes they will be due for a rude separation.

The minister speaks of economy, of efficiency, of improving the lot of these translators and so on; in fact, he says anything and everything. There is nothing but contradiction in the different assertions of the minister, both in his explanatory notes to the bill and in his statements made in and outside the house. How in the world is it possible to have greater efficiency with a reduced staff? How can we realize any economy by increasing the work? Taking the hon. gentleman at his word, how can he increase the number of translators and reduce it at the same time? How can he save by spending more? I am asking hon. members whom they will believe. Will they believe the minister when he says that a greater number of translators may be appointed later on, or believe the minister when he says that there is no need for any more translators if the work is properly divided amongst those now in the public service? Will they believe the minister when he says that translators will be placed on a higher plane, or believe the minister who says that the bill will result in a considerable saving which cannot of course be realized otherwise than by a downward revision of salaries or a drastic reduction of personnel?

Economy and efficiency are just empty words, meaning nothing. They are no indication of the real reason behind this bill. "Ce bloc enfarine ne me dit rien qui vaille." I am giving my hon. friends this timely warning lest it be too late to repent. Study this bill; compare the notes, the statements and the contradictory claims of the Secretary of State, and tell me sincerely if one can depend on such flimsy promises, vague assurances and problematical results. No, no; for my part I will not be a dupe to such a bargain.

This afternoon the Secretary of State assured this house that the translators of the various departments would be left in those departments though coming under the new centralized bureau. I will ask the hon. gentleman one question. He knows that according to the Civil Service Act the translators in all departments can be promoted to higher positions and can even be appointed deputy ministers. Will my hon. friend tell me whether the transference of translators to this new bureau will deprive them of such promotion?

Mr. CAHAN: I am not answering questions now. When the bill is in committee of the whole house I will answer questions, but I say this, that under this bill the translators will be under the Civil Service Act and there will be open to them the highest positions possible in the service.

Mr. ST-PERE: But not in the departments to which they formerly belonged. I would be the last to deprive any English speaking citizen of this country of rights he is entitled to in the civil service, but at the same time, as one representing the minority in Canada, I will be the last one to accept anything that will deprive any French Canadian of promotions and rights he is entitled to in the public service of Canada.

Mr. CAHAN: There is no position in the public service to which he will be deprived of promotion under this regime.

Mr. ST.-PERE: He will belong to a new bureau; he will be taken away from his old position.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentleman is making a speech without even having instructed himself as to the contents of the bill.

Mr. ST.-PERE: The hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) inquired of the Secretary of State as to the day on which the investigation mentioned by him on January 29 had taken place, and by whom, and the hon. member received the following answer, which is not an answer at all but only an evasion of the question. The Secretary of State said:

> The said committee, in March, 1933, reported to the treasury board on the matters submitted to it, including a report upon "Translations."
> The Secretary of State, at the request of the Prime Minister, also interviewed Mr. Beauchesne, Clerk of the House of Commons, and Mr. C. H. Bland, of the Civil Service Commission, and certain statements were prepared by them, which they probably deemed confidential, for the information of the government.

The Secretary of State is very careful to say that these gentlemen made certain statements which they deemed confidential, and he refuses this house a positive answer with regard to those statements made to his department. Are we not entitled to receive real answers to questions we ask on different matters? Once more we realize that this government does not want the House of Commons to be clearly informed about what took place during this inquiry. If those documents were deemed confidential, will not the Secretary of State tell me and this house where the hon. member for Labelle this afternoon got all those documents with regard to the number of pages translated in every department? I am refraining from accusing the Secretary of State of giving documents to the hon. member for Labelle—

Mr. CAHAN: I have certainly not, directly or indirectly, given documents to the hon. member for Labelle.

Mr. ST.-PERE: I cannot therefore subscribe to this bill and I will certainly vote against it, hoping that our friends on the right will realize that the principle at stake is one going far beyond political considerations. It is not a proper time, I submit, Mr. Speaker, to shake the foundations of our constitutional structure and to enact a measure such as the one sponsored by the hon. gentleman, which cannot but aggravate the general situation in this country. This is a time for constructive policies and the hour has come to put an end to this reign of terror which has a demoralizing effect on the whole civil service. There is no more permanence, no more security in office; therefore the government should withdraw this bill and work towards binding all elements in this country in a common feeling of faith and confidence in the future and towards uniting all the energies in order to overcome our present difficulties; but instead of doing this, they add to the unrest and increase the people's misery. Instead of giving work to every man willing to work, as they pledged themselves to do, they throw out of their jobs five thousand civil servants and boast of it as the Secretary of State did in his radio broadcast of last November. At the rate at which these dismissals and retirements have been progressing, the government need not go ahead with the project of building another governmental block; they will not need it. All I suggest that they do is to clean up a large square and build therein a high platform where they can put their guillotine and publicly execute a few more thousands of civil servants whenever they feel like making any retrenchment. So far the only retrenchment accomplished has been at the expense of the civil service.

In conclusion, may I appeal to all those hon. members who uphold the principle of equality as between the French and English languages as the official languages of parliament and stand by the constitution, to vote against this bill. We must have courage; we must be above all party interest. Let us stand against this bill as contrary to the general interest of the country, as impractical, and above all, as a direct violation of the rights and privileges of this house.

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, like all my colleagues of the House of Commons, it was with some apprehension that I listened to the statement made by the hon. Secretary of State, when introducing this bill in the house. As I stated in the speech I have just delivered in English, I place no reliance in the advantages expected from this bill, considered either from the efficiency or economic viewpoint. I regret that the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa, this afternoon, by a process of reasoning peculiar to himself endeavoured to justify this bill, leaving this house under the impression that among our translators, as well as in other departments of the service, there were to be found lazy fellows and drunkards, etc, etc. I never took upon myself to champion the cause of civil servants; however, I have among the translators a large number of former colleagues in journalism and I cannot find one member of the debate staff who has not fulfilled his duty or who has not, quite the opposite to what the hon. member for Labelle endeavoured to convey, worked on an average of ten to twelve hours and even fifteen hours per day in translating from French to English or vice versa the numerous speeches delivered in this house.

No intelligent person would establish a basis of comparison between the work performed by a highly educated man and that of an ordinary worker in our mills or a city-labourer. I have for these workers all the sympathy which is due to them. On many occasions, in this house, I have requested on their behalf higher wages; however this is not a reason for me, to-day, to be unfair by endorsing the statement which the hon. member for Labelle made this afternoon, when he said that among the translators there were to be found lazy fellows and drunkards whose work was out of proportion with the salary they received from the government.

The hon. member for Labelle is always full of compassion for his colleagues in the house. This afternoon, he warned us, we the members for the city of Montreal, to be on guard because, at the next election, these workmen who, at present, are out of jobs or those artisans who are not drawing a salary equal to that of translators of the House of Commons, will be the first to make them give an account of their mandate. Personally, I have no fear to appear before my constituents to prove to them—they are intelligent persons, and hardly need proofs—that the employees of the House of Commons, those intellectual workers who have passed part of their life in our classical colleges and another part in such an important work as the translation of our public documents, are entitled to the fair salary they receive. My constituents, may it please the hon. member for Labelle, understand what is meant by distributive justice and a man is appreciated according to his real merit.

The hon. member for Labelle gave us to understand that the translators of debates were very fortunate; once the session is over, these gentlemen could take a three or four months' holiday. But the hon. member for Labelle, who claims to be an expert in translations, a connoisseur, a purist of the French language, must not ignore all the work pertaining to translation: such as scientific researches, the exact terms to be used, etc., and that they are entitled to a rest after such strenuous work.

Would the hon. Secretary of State be kind enough to inform the house whether all documents prepared in his department—namely type-written copies of bills, etc., have been always sent early enough so as to be translated by the House of Commons staff? I am informed from a reliable source that many of these typewritten copies, these documents the translation of which is required immediately in order to issue them without delay to the public, as the hon. member for Labelle stated this afternoon, are sometimes handed in at the last minute to the translators of the house, even after they have been issued in English.

Most of the complaints which were made to-day, were not on account of the delay in the publication of official documents in French, but that too small a number of reports and department documents were not translated and printed in one of the official languages. Must we place the blame on the translators?

My hon. friend may pound his desk. I do not mind being interrupted, but I prefer to be interrupted by an intelligent man.

Mr. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I have listened very attentively to the speeches made pro and con this bill this afternoon and during the evening. The Secretary of State, (Mr. Cahan) and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) have given all the reasons available in favour of this measure, and the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier), the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette) and the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. St-Pere), have given their reasons for voting against it. May I summarize the reasons given by the hon. member for Labelle and then state why I am going to oppose this motion and vote in favour of the amendment moved by the senior member for Ottawa.

The hon. member for Labelle stated that under the present system there were delays in the translation and printing of documents and on this account they became useless so far as public interest was concerned. He mentioned that forty, thirty-five, twenty-five years ago he had found under different ministries bundles of documents which had been translated and printed after a long delay and which had not been distributed to the public, but which had cost enormous sums of money and had become absolutely useless. He stated that the same thing occurred fifteen years ago, ten years ago and again last year. This was one of the main reasons for his favouring the bill presented by the Secretary of State.

A further reason given was that among the translators many did not possess the qualifications required to occupy the position; that some were lazy and that others were drunkards and did not fulfil their duties. Another reason given was the limited time during which the translators worked; that after four or five months of work they had a vacation for the remainder of the year, and were paid an annual salary of $3,000 or $4,000. From these facts he deduced that the quality of the translations suffered, and he referred to many cases in which translations were not well made. Furthermore he pretends that having all the translators united under the direction of one superintendent would be preferable to the system of having translators in different departments under the various deputy ministers. This comprised the first part of his speech, and he concluded his remarks by referring to the constitutional aspect of the question, stating that by the passing of this bill there would be a further recognition of the French language in the different departments of the government.

The reasons given by the hon. member were all mentioned in 1909 and 1910 when the committee of the House of Commons, after receiving numerous complaints, appointed a former translator of the House of Commons to investigate the situation in European countries where duality and plurality of languages existed. This former clerk made his report to the committee and to the house in 1910, and in his report he mentioned that during the previous seventy years in this country we had a centralized bureau for translations. During the course of his report he gave the same reasons that were advanced this afternoon by the hon. member for Labelle in recommending a change in the system. This report was adopted by the House of Commons and the change went into effect in 1911. Before 1910 it was complained that delays were occasioned in the translating and printing of proceedings of the Commons and the different departments; that the French versions were prepared too late to be of much use and that large sums of money were spent because of this faulty system. At that time there were also translators who did not possess the necessary qualifications to fulfil the position. The report also mentioned that the system of having translators in each department would be far more efficient than the system of centralization.

I particularly refer to this interesting report which was made by Mr. Frechette. He visited Switzerland and Belgium, in which countries duality of languages exists as it does in our country, and after explaining that in Canada the service was centralized in an office he went on to say:

—recruited—may I be permitted to say—independently of any idea of specialization in the work. Of course, the great variety of different technical matters which find their place in the sessional papers is too well known to the members of the board for their enumeration being otherwise than superfluous here; however, it is proper for me to say that all the arts, the sciences, the industries, the interests with which the government of the country is concerned, in turn call for the earnest labour of the House of Commons translator. It is evident that so many various translations, for which the most extensive dictionaries and the usual language are altogether inadequate, must require from the translator vast erudition, constantly supplemented through long hours of research and tireless application. Would it not be too optimistic to expect great success from the anomaly of an organization where it is required of each man to be a universal specialist in order to be fit for expert work in all directions?

All the efforts that the chief translator may make towards specializing the abilities of his staff are rendered vain by the manner in which the documents come from the printing office and by the necessity of having the work done quickly.

The main argument advanced by the Secretary of State this afternoon seemed to be that large amounts of money were spent because of the delay in making the translations in the different departments. Let us ask ourselves whether, by centralizing this staff of translators, the translations will be made more quickly and whether they will be of better quality. In section 3 the bill states:

(1) There shall be a bureau under the Minister, to be called the bureau for translations, the duties and function of which shall be to collaborate with and act for all departments of the public service, and both houses of the parliament of Canada and all bureaus, branches, commissions and agencies created or appointed by act of parliament, or by order of the governor in council, in making and revising all translations from one language into another of all departmental and other reports, documents, debates, bills, acts, proceedings and correspondence.

(2) It shall be the duty of all departments of the public service and all such branches, commissions and agencies as aforesaid to collaborate with the bureau in carrying into effect the provisions of this act and the regulations made thereunder.

Actually there is a staff of translators in each department, who are under the supervision of the deputy minister. The minister and his deputy decide which documents, reports and correspondence shall be translated. In every department we have efficient deputy ministers; they are men of ability and men who know their work, and they have this work done by translators under their immediate control. If all these translators are sent to a central bureau under the superintendence of one man, every department will have to communicate with this man as to translations. Certainly time will be lost in sending work from the different departments to this head office; it will require more messengers and a greater staff of assistants, and the technical officers of the departments will not be at hand to advise the translators during the progress of the work. Under the present system the translators can communicate every day and, if necessary, every hour with the technical officers of the different departments; they can receive advice and work accordingly. At page 5 of the report of 1910 I find the following:

The present system, established some seventy years ago, may have answered the needs of the time when the public documents were very far from being as voluminous, as numerous and as specialized as they are to-day, and when the greater part of them, being already in French, had not to go through the French office. But now that the publications of the public service deal with so many activities unknown to the primitive country that we were then; now that all the human interests, more and more specialized, find their expression in the papers presented to the Canadian parliament, a centralized translation office can no longer do justice to so much work that calls for specialists. The experience I have acquired during thirty-six years of service in the Commons has convinced me that in centralization rests the vice of our system

I understand that this gentleman had occupied the position of chief translator of the commons for quite a number of years, and he was supposed to be an expert in matters pertaining to translation. At all events he had the confidence of the committee of the house which sent him to Belgium and Switzerland. What did he find in those two countries? Mind you, I do not believe we should copy everything that is done in other countries, but we should take from those other countries the best that is in their policies and their methods of administration. This gentleman found that each department in Belgium had its own translation staff.

Thus it is seen that nowhere in those two countries—

Speaking of Belgium and Switzerland.

—is translation centralized. And in both countries satisfaction is expressed with the system in use.

For these reasons he concluded his report to the committee of the House of Commons in this way:

I conclude that it is desirable to extend in Canada to all the departments the practice already intelligently introduced in some of them, as, for instance, the Department of Agriculture, and very recently, if I am not mistaken, that of marine and fisheries;

I believe that at the time Hon. Sydney Fisher was Minister of Agriculture. This afternoon the hon. member for Labelle spoke at length about Hon. Sydney Fisher and related certain conversations he had with the hon. member in connection with his wish to do the best he could for the French element of this country. It was under his administration that the Department of Agriculture appointed translators for that department, and this gentleman stated that the work done by this staff was far better than the work done by the translators under the control of the centralized bureau. From 1911 up to date we have had the system of having these translators in each department. We do not pretend that their work has been perfect, but we say that if under the centralized system there were delays in the translating and printing of documents there were also delays under the system which succeeded it, and we have no assurance that these defects will disappear under the system introduced by the present bill. We have no guarantee that under any system unqualified persons will not occupy positions to which they are not entitled. There will always be some lazy members of any department; human nature is not perfect and mistakes will be made under whatever system you may introduce.

[Mr. Fournier.]

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that in my opinion it was not necessary to introduce this bill simply because translators of the House of Commons and of the Senate have long vacations. Surely some means could have been easily devised, without changing the whole system, to give further work to those people. Will this superintendence give more efficient service than is given at the present time under the deputy ministers of the various departments? I am sure whoever may be put in charge will not be acquainted with all the documents, reports, correspondence and other papers which will have to be translated. He will have to rely on what the deputy minister sends him for translation. The work will only pass under another hand, and that will not increase efficiency. So the reasons given by the hon. member for Labelle are contradicted by the report made in 1910, and the actual facts do not bear out his contentions.

In the last part of his speech the hon. member dealt with the constitutional aspect of the question; he stated that a further recognition of the French language was made by this bill. The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier), however, told us that the rights of the French language in Canada were to be found in section 133 of the British North America Act, wherein they are clearly defined and restricted. Section 133 of the British North America Act reads as follows:

Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the houses of the parliament of Canada and of the houses of the legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those houses; . . . The acts of the parliament of Canada and of the legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both those languages.

This is the only section which gives any legal right. I am not speaking of moral rights, or of privileges granted or given, or concessions made. I am saying that the only legal right for the use of the French language seems to be in this section of the British North America Act.

What does the bill state further, or add to this section? Part of section 3 of the bill contains the words:

In making and revising all translations from one language into another of all departmental and other reports, documents, debates, bills, acts, proceedings and correspondence.

This bill does not add to any rights in regard to the French language, and I believe it comes down to a matter of administration.

The reasons for opposing the bill may be summarized as follows: that there will be loss of time in the translation in going from every department to the central bureau; that the translation will take more time, and that there will be no economy, owing to the slowness with which the work will be done.

At the end of the bill there is a provision stating that every translator must take an oath of secrecy. This means that the work they are doing is of a confidential nature, and should not be reported to the public. How can there be secrecy in confidential matters if the documents and papers are to be transported from the several departments to the central bureau, passing into the hands of messengers and into those of other people before they reach the translators?

Then, speaking as to specialization may I say that we do not expect any translator to be efficient in every branch of knowledge. Actually, they do specialize, and become specialists. Although they may make mistakes and have difficulties, and although they may not always do their work properly, they have more chance of doing it properly under the present system than they would under the new one. The fact that they will not be in a position to see the technical officers of the departments for which the translations are made will not help in the work of translation; perhaps it will hamper, and the work may lack in quality.

I shall not discuss at length the fact that there are from 91 to 115 translators operating. They work under the Civil Service Commission and, if I am well informed, have been doing so since 1919. Their appointment is made by the Civil Service Commission. If they have not the proper qualifications, who is to blame? Most certainly it would be the Civil Service Commission. If they are appointed by the minister, the man to blame is the deputy or the minister who would make the appointment. Under the new system they would still be appointed by the Civil Service Commission. The hon. member for Labelle has suggested that the minister should make the nominations. Certainly in the appointment of translators mistakes will be made. It is human to err and there will always be some of these people who will not be up to standard and will not possess the qualifications necessary for the position. Such would be the case even if this bill passed the house. If they remain under the supervision of the Civil Service Commission I understand that they will not lose their chance for promotion. If they are to be placed in a single bureau, having a superintendent as their chief, it seems to bar them from opportunities of getting promotions to other departments of government. In that way they are deprived of a right which they now enjoy.

I have summarized my remarks, and wish to take no further time of the house in explaining my reasons for opposing the motion and supporting the amendment of the hon. member for Ottawa.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I could not see this bill receive second reading without taking this opportunity of making a few remarks. What I have to say may be of a somewhat rambling nature and will be based on arguments which have been adduced this afternoon and this evening.

One of the grounds urged by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) was that of economy, and in that connection he spoke of the tremendous cost occasioned by corrections having to be made to galley and page proofs of translations. Is the Secretary of State reasonable when he places this extra cost upon the shoulders of the translators? I would also ask him who wrote the proofs. Were those proofs read and the corrections made by the authors of the articles translated, or the authors of the speeches made, or the persons responsible for the reports in English? This afternoon the Secretary of State did show us a sample of a speech made in another chamber. After being translated and the galley proofs made it was subjected to considerable changes. Who made those changes? Were they made by a specialized translator, a superintendent of translators, or—

Mr. CAHAN: May I say to the hon. gentleman that I would refrain from mentioning names; I do not think it is proper to do so.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not asking for names.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member is asking who made the changes. I will show him the document, with the name of the man who made it.

Mr. VENIOT: I am asking whether the corrections were made by the person who made the speech in the Senate. I am not asking for the name of the person.

Mr. CAHAN: It was made in English by a gentleman who I do not think knows the French language.

Mr. VENIOT: But who corrected the translation?

Mr. CAHAN: An officer of the Senate.

Mr. VENIOT: Who?

Mr. CAHAN: A translator of the Senate who ostensibly prepared the report.

Mr. VENIOT: Why did not the translator of the Senate translate the speech in the first instance?

Mr. CAHAN: That is what he did, possibly.

Mr. VENIOT: Why did he correct his own translation afterwards?

Mr. CAHAN: Because he found it so imperfect, probably.

Mr. VENIOT: Which goes to show that it is not centralization which is needed, but specialization in a particular work, to bring about the economy to which the Secretary of State has referred.

Mr. CAHAN: I would suggest that proper supervision is needed.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not interrupt the Secretary of State when he was speaking, and I hope he will not do so with me.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member asked a question.

Mr. VENIOT: The minister is not answering any questions just now, when he is interrupting. He has no right to do that. In these few rambling remarks I will not be interrupted by the Secretary of State except when I ask him a question which, if he wishes, he may answer. He may do that.

As I have said, if anything was needed to prove that specialization is required, most certainly the Secretary of State furnished an example to the house this afternoon when he said he had to go outside the departmental translators to get someone to translate a paper in connection with the St. Lawrence waterways treaty between Canada and the United States. If we had the system of specialization carried to a greater degree than it is to-day, there would have been no need for the Secretary of State to go outside for special men to do that translation. Let me point out to the Secretary of State, and I know whereof I speak because in my public career I have had considerable to do with translators, interpreters, and so forth, that it is one thing to be able to get a man to translate a speech, and it is an entirely different thing to get a man to translate technical subjects. A speech can only be well translated from English into French or from French into English by one individual. You cannot distribute the speech over a period of hours and to a number of different translators, giving one man fifteen pages of the speech to translate and another the following fifteen; the chances are that if you do it in that way the translation made by the second translator is not going to fit in with the idiom of the language used by the first. There you have the reason for specialization for efficient translation.

Take another case. Take a translator in the Department of National Health and place him in the centralized bureau which the Secretary of State wishes to establish. The Department of National Health has some medical subject to be translated and passes it over to the bureau. It is likely to be handed to the first translator who is idle, and that translator, not having any technical knowledge of medicine, cannot possibly do justice to his subject. Let me further point out, and I am sure that hon. gentlemen of the medical profession will agree with me, especially the French medical gentlemen in this house, that when you undertake to translate English medical subjects into French you very soon find that the technical expressions used in the one language do not correspond with the technical expressions used in the other. There is an entire difference between the technical expressions used in the English study of medicine and the technical expressions used in the French study of medicine. That again shows the necessity for specialization.

Or take the engineering branch of the Department of Public Works or of the Department of Railways. Take your translators out of those departments and place them in this centralized bureau, and what will you find? You will not have a man to do your technical translation of engineering subjects correctly unless you get hold of the very man who has been almost brought up in that particular department and has been accustomed to handling the translation of that technical work. There is another reason why specialization should be encouraged rather than centralization.

I also wish to refer to some of the remarks which the hon. Secretary of State made. He said that if one would read the bill, and he rather threw a slur at the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. St-Pere) because he had not studied the bill, he would find that the translators coming into the central bureau would be protected in the matter of promotion. I would point out to the Secretary of State that the only clause of this bill which touches on the question of these translators coming under the Civil Service Act is clause 4, at the end of which I read that these men "may be transferred to the bureau as herein provided, and such officers and employees shall thereafter be subject to the provisions of the Civil Service Act." There is not a line in the whole bill which protects the principle of promotion as it applies to these men who are to-day translators in various departments of the government. When they are taken out of the respective departments in which they are at present employed and are placed in the central bureau, they become subject to the jurisdiction of the minister who will be in charge of the bureau, probably the Secretary of State, and when they come into the bureau they come under the Civil Service Act. They are eligible for promotion under the Civil Service Act but only in so far as that promotion pertains to the central bureau for translation, and not otherwise. On the other hand, if these translators are left in their respective departments, the French translator, for instance, in the Post Office Department is eligible for promotion to any branch within that department; but once he is placed in the central bureau he is eligible for promotion only to such positions as fall within the jurisdiction of the bureau, and they are mighty few. So far then as promotion is concerned there is absolutely nothing in this bill that gives to the translators placed in the central bureau any chance—in fact, it takes away the great opportunity which they have to-day—for promotion in the department from which they are being transferred.

There are two other points, Mr. Speaker, which I should like to make. I am convinced from the experience I have had in the past twenty-five or thirty years with the system of translation we have in this country that the Secretary of State, no matter how sincere he may be in his advocacy of this bill, and I give him credit for being sincere, has been ill advised in placing this measure before the house in the form in which we now have it. If he would bring in a bill looking towards specialization to a greater degree than it exists to-day in the translation services I would be wholeheartedly in favour of it, but I cannot see from the experience that I myself have had that efficiency will be attained in translation by adopting the principle laid down in this bill. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I feel that I should not only oppose the bill in committee on particular sections of which I have made a study, but oppose the principle of the bill as it is now before the house.

The Secretary of State has also told us that one of the main reasons why French publications have not been issued as rapidly as they should have been was the fact that French translations could not be made in time to allow the publications to come out any earlier. In making that statement he left the inference that the fault lay entirely with the translator. But let me point out, and this is a fact which I think cannot be gainsaid, that the delay in translation is not caused by the fact that the French translators do not do the work early enough, but in the majority of cases it is caused by the fact that the English matter is not handed over to the French translators in time. You will find, for instance, a report of perhaps four or five hundred pages being prepared as English matter, and the whole preparation of that report must be completed in English before a French translator can lay his finger upon a single page of it. As progress is made in the preparation of an English report; as a chapter or so or a certain portion of it is completed, say fifteen, twenty or thirty pages, why should not that portion be handed over immediately to the French translator? He would be able to keep up with the English preparation and when that preparation is ready for the press, the French translation would be completed within a very few days. The Secretary of State should direct his attention to this phase of the matter in order to bring about a more speedy issuing of these different reports and parliamentary papers.

As I said at the opening of my remarks, I could not allow this bill to go through without expressing my opinion. I appeal to the Secretary of State to consider carefully, before this bill gets too far, whether some amendment cannot be made along the lines of specialization instead of centralization, as is the present intention of the bill. I desire to say that I have the warmest feeling for the Secretary of State; I am not attempting to criticize him personally, but I think I have the right to criticize the method adopted to reach the object he has in view. I believe he is sincere in trying to effect an amelioration of existing conditions in his department in the system of translation as carried on to-day. So far as I am concerned, I do not think any question of race or nationality should be raised in this matter. I need no guarantee that this thought is not entertained in the mind of the hon. gentleman who introduced this bill, as I know what stand the Secretary of State has taken in the past in matters religious and national. I have every confidence in his feeling of fair play along these lines, but I do criticize the method he has adopted to bring about the changes which he thinks are necessary in the operation of his department.

Mr. CHARLES B. HOWARD (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I think it is only right that I should express my opinion on this bill and tell the house why I oppose it and intend to vote for the amendment moved this afternoon by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier). In the first place I consider the translators as being a highly specialized department of government, and there should be no centralization. I think the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) will agree with me when I say that centralization is against the trend of the times.

For instance, take our banking situation. One of the greatest troubles the banks have is caused by complaints they receive from certain sections of Canada that the people of those districts cannot obtain satisfaction from the head offices. These head offices are not closely in touch with local conditions in the outlying districts. Take our railway situation. One of the main reasons advanced by many for the non-success of our railways is centralization; they are not receiving the support they should from people in the outlying districts. The centralized management is not alive to the situation which exists in the different parts of the country. Take the Gibb report, for instance: The government brought a gentleman from another country to investigate our harbours. A committee was formed which visited the harbours of this country. Its report has been brought in, but so far no legislation has been submitted to this house to bring about the centralization of control mentioned in that report. Why? It is because public opinion in Canada is against centralization. I state publicly that no control from Ottawa could know the wants of Vancouver, Montreal, Quebec, Chicoutimi, St. John and Halifax.

If this department were an ordinary department of government, the same argument would hold, but it is something different. It is a specialized department and those in it require training of an entirely different kind. Canada is not the only country having translators; they are found to be necessary by all the bilingual countries of the world and even by the unilingual countries. Translators are found to be necessary in unilingual countries not only to translate from other languages into their own, but because they are depended upon to know the mentality of the country from which a document is received. They are able to translate not only the words of a document but the attitude, the feelings and the sentiments of the nation from which the document comes. These translators keep in touch with the translations made of the literature of the different countries in order that they may know the sentiments of those countries. The translators in our service translate foreign languages into English and French but their most important work is the translating of French into English or English into French. In order to translate from English into French or from French into English the translator must know the mentality of the two peoples. He must have studied the histories of the different nationalities and must be able not only to translate a document word for word but to translate the sentiment behind those words. Hon. members should realize how difficult it is to translate from English, a severe, concise and business-like language, into French, a beautiful, sentimental, poetical and flowery language; and vice versa. As I have said, it is not only a matter of translating words into words; it is a matter of translating the sentiment behind those words.

Something has been said as to the correctness of the translations, and in this connection I should like to quote from an authority on the subject and then refer to two other items of translation. Pierre Daviault says:

(Translation)

> To translate is not to substitute words for other words. To the translator the text is merely the author's thought in its raw state, that he must fashion into words. It in incumbent upon him to shape it into a form which will make it convey its full meaning. The translator's task is nothing short of a literary essay, and to translate, presents all the difficulties inherent to the essay, but is even more difficult. Translation is not the expression of one's thought, which is familiar and always present to one's mind. The translator must assimilate a thought that is not his own, a frame of mind and the shades of thought of another. Besides, he has to be imbued with the author's style, because the translation must preserve the original tone.

That is written by an authority on the subject. Now let me show how easy it is to transform certain expressions. By way of illustration I will give three quotations, indicating that an entirely wrong sense may be conveyed by the translation. For example, this phrase was given in English—and it is a common one: "The general realized the enemy's intentions." This was translated into French: "Le général a réalisé les intentions de l'ennemi." I know that those who are acquainted with both languages will realize how wrong that translation is; yet in many ways it is a fair rendering. Let me cite another one that nearly got certain people into trouble at one time: "Le gouvernement français demande." This was translated:

"The French government demands", which entirely changes the sense of the expression.

In several remarks this afternoon I think the Secretary of State and the hon. member for Labelle intimated that it was difficult to get certain translations made which they wanted to have. That seems to me most extraordinary. I hold in my hand a book written by J. Lucien Hudon, of the Département des brevets, entitled L'Automobilisme et Radio. He is evidently an authority on the subject. I want also to quote another authority in the employ of the department. I have, too, a book by M. Daviault, from whom I have already quoted, and at page 21 of this work, entitled Questions de Langage, I find the following:

(Translation)

No one can appreciate Francis I, unless he transports himself in thought to his period.

This shows how specialized these translators must be in the particular work they perform. I have also a book by S. Marion, who as everyone knows has written several works on this subject and who is also a docteur de la Sorbonne. He is, I think, a fair authority on this subject and is also employed by the department. Now, there is no dictionary intended especially for translations; for as I have already said the translator must know the mentality of the peoples from whom he is translating. Let me give another example that possibly will come even closer home to us. Many hon. members have no doubt read a book written by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Bouchard), Vieilles Choses et Vieilles Gens. The title of that book, in English, is Other Days, Other Ways. I give these two to show how very different they are, and yet the mental idiom expresses the same pensée. I have read this book both in English and in French, and I can tell you that if you want to appreciate its sentiments you must read it in French, the language in which it was written.

Nobody wants a mechanical translation. Moreover, there is this fact that impresses me very much: I cannot see how any member of the government could support this bill. The ministers are responsible not only to their constituencies but to Canada for the translations that come from their departments. Every cabinet minister has his own personal peculiarities, and if he wants a translation made properly in his department he must call upon a man who knows the minister, who knows the department, and who is familiar with the subjects he has to deal with. Suppose this department is organized and a head is appointed to supervise all translations coming therefrom. The Secretary of State has a document to be translated and he calls up the Bureau for Translations and asks for a man. Possibly the subject relates to agriculture, and of course the bureau, following railroad rules, first in first out, in order to divide up the work, so that no one will be overloaded and everyone will have the same proportion, sends out a man who probably has taken two years at university in the study of medicine. This man knows all the medical terms, and he is called upon to translate something relating entirely to agriculture. There will certainly be a good many technical terms quite unknown to him, and he accordingly produces an erroneous translation. What will be the state of affairs if the minister happens to be a gentleman who is acquainted with one language only? Vice versa, suppose the Minister of Health calls for a translator to give him a translation of something dealing with medical questions. He calls up the bureau and as translators 5, 6 and 7 are out, No. 8 is assigned to this work. He is quite familiar with agricultural terms but he knows nothing whatever about the terms used in medicine. Could anything be more ridiculous?

I will go a step further. Let us take mining, for instance. We are talking a good deal about mining development in this country, and if there is one subject more than another in which a thorough knowledge of technical terms is called for on the part of the translator, if an accurate translation is to be produced, that subject is mining. But if you happen to get a translator who is expert in rendering medical terms and put him to work on the translation of a document in which there are all sorts of mining technicalities, I do not know what sort of translation you can expect. Or take the House of Commons. Just imagine the difference between the work of a man translating a speech made by the Prime Minister of Canada and the work of a translator giving us in French a quiet speech made by the Minister of Pensions and National Health. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in order to produce an accurate translation a man must know the speaker whom he is translating; he must know the type of speech that man is going to deliver. Then he can give a fairly accurate translation and one which will, while not changing the sense, convey to our French Canadian citizens an exact replica of the speech made in English, or, on the other hand, an exact reproduction of a speech delivered in French.

I submit therefore that this subject is most serious—I think—more serious than was contemplated when the bill was drafted. In reply to the hon. member for Hochelaga a few minutes ago, I believe the Secretary of State said that the hon. gentleman had not read the bill. Well, I have read it several times. I have a marked copy of it with certain words underlined, and there are in the bill many points which I am sure have not had due consideration by the cabinet. I will not take them up in detail, because the subject will be studied in committee unless, as I hope, the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Ottawa carries. For instance, in section 3 there appears these words: "for all departments of the public service." This means, just as I have said, that a minister of the crown, in his own specialized department, with his own particular method of doing things and in regard to a subject of which he has most intimate knowledge, will have to call in a man by number—7, 8 or 9—who knows nothing about the minister's idiosyncrasies or the subject concerning which he must do translation.

May I direct the attention of the house to a few more words in this bill. In clause 4 it does not say that all these men "shall" be transferred to this bureau; it says that they "may" be transferred. In this I think the bill is wrong. If the house passes this legislation, what right have we to say that employees may be appointed or may be left out according to who they are?

Clause 5 says nothing about "may," but it states:

> An officer to be called the Superintendent of the Bureau for Translations shall be appointed.

It does not say that he may be appointed; it says that he shall be appointed. In this way in certain parts of the bill it says "may" and in other parts "shall." If we are going to have a bill to centralize, to which principle I am entirely opposed, we should have uniformity.

I am one of those who believe in two official languages, English and French, and I am pleased that most of the French Canadians in Quebec can speak the English language. I should like to suggest that every hon. member take the trouble to do what was done by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) and the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin) who, when they first came into the house, could not speak a single word of English, and who to-day can make speeches in English to which not only this house but the people generally throughout the country are pleased to listen. Not from a political standpoint or from any other consideration in connection with this bill, but from an educational point of view, I hope every person in Canada will try to learn as much as he can of the two official languages. I am also one of those who believe in treating in exactly the same way the people who use these two languages. This bill cuts off from ultimate promotion, or, to put it more mildly, restricts the promotion of, our French Canadian fellow citizens. I am entirely opposed to that, just as I would be against restriction in regard to any promotion our English speaking fellow citizens might merit.

Having regard to the present situation in the country, to the demands that the Canadian people make of this parliament to-day, and to the expectancy with which our distressed citizens are looking for legislation, after going over the bills that have so far been introduced I feel there are other types of legislation much more important than a bill to put expert translators into a specialized, centralized bureau.

To go a step further, I would say that if this bill is to be put through I should like to have this added to it: When I was sitting on the other side of the house behind a government, I suggested that if any change were to be made I would favour giving a preference to French or English speaking citizens who had a knowledge of both languages. The Civil Service Act should be amended so as to carry at least a five per cent preference for bilingualism.

I hope the Secretary of State will either give some genuine reasons for introducing this bill or withdraw it. Before the bill passes, he should at least consult with the three authorities whom I have already quoted, who have written books and who are men of standing in literary matters, and get their candid opinion as to the translators.

If I may be pardoned a personal reference, I put in twenty-two years of my life among French Canadians in order to learn their language and their mentality, and I would not attempt to translate any document from English into French. While the Secretary of State is a citizen of the largest French Canadian city, with all his sympathies, which I admit, towards the French people, he cannot speak their language. I do not consider he is sufficient authority on the floor of the house to introduce such a bill as this, which is calculated to deprive our French Canadian fellow citizens of a right which belongs to them. This right to promotion is not a favour; it is their right. Therefore I trust the Secretary of State will reconsider his decision and withdraw the bill.

Mr. GEORGES BOUCHARD (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, the bill before the house invites the earnest cooperation and consideration of every member having at heart the maintenance of a high standard of perfection for both the official languages of this country. If we were to vote on pious wishes and good intentions, and if the bill could incorporate them and all the kindly sentiments so beautifully expressed by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) and particularly by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), I would not hesitate for a moment to support it. But we have to deal with the cold letter of the bill itself, and the fact that no one on the other side rises to support it makes me think there is something suspicious. I might quote a French proverb: "Ce bloc enfariné ne me dit rien qui vaille."

This afternoon the Secretary of State took pains to explain in full detail the functioning of the printing bureau. His observations were very interesting, but in listening to him I rather gathered the impression that the printing bureau was the main thing and that the translation work must accommodate itself to that. While fully conscious of the necessity of still further improving our translation system, I fail to see how this measure can accomplish that end. I must admit at the outset that the measure is likely to lead the unwary observer to the belief that it is a decided step towards the improvement of official translations. In a century like ours, characterized by a rushing tide of activity towards centralization and rationalization even beyond the bounds of reason, any industrially minded man is apt to welcome this measure for the sake of economy and efficiency. The promoter of this bill does not seem to be immune to the tendency of our age when he takes comfort in the fact that the accounting system has been centralized. Let us read what he said at page 8 of Hansard for Monday, January 29, 1934:

On review of the matter it was recommended, first by the Civil Service Commission, that to avoid the appointment of a number of translators in addition to the number I have mentioned, and in view of the fact that a consolidation had been made under the Minister of Finance of the accounting systems of the different departments, a bureau might be created to which the existing translators would be attached, subject to the Civil Service Commission in every respect—

This comparison, I am sorry to say, has shaken my faith in the competence of the minister to deal with such a delicate matter. While I fully appreciate the high functions of an accountant I fail to see any similarity between the functions of an accountant and those of a translator. Accountants have to deal with figures, which are not to be influenced by circumstances of place, time or persons. Unlike the accountant the translator has to adapt his subtle art to environment and to the various conditions so ably expressed by my hon. friend who just resumed his seat. The temperament not only of the author but of the reader cannot be neglected in a good translation. As an instance of that, if I were using in English the expression "my constituents" the proper French word perhaps would be "mes commettants," while our French Canadians are accustomed to "mes electeurs," or perhaps more particularly to "chers electeurs." So a translator must keep in mind the character of those who will read his translation, while accounting is not so temperamental.

I will endeavour to show a little later, Mr. Speaker, that a translator is a writer, and even something more than a writer. Looking over the country I may say that I could more easily point to a score of good authors than to a good translator. One readily admits that accountants can be transferred with efficiency from one department to another, but such is not the case with translators. There is no such marvel as a general translator. I would quote from an article which appeared in L'Action Catholique of February 5, 1934, under the signature of Thomas Poulin:

(Translation)

To unify, things of like nature must be put together so that they may blend. The translation work of the various departments cannot be thrown in the same bag. A translator who excels in his own specialty would fail in the work of another department. No doubt with perseverance and time he might become quite efficient; but we believe that the day he becomes an expert in the work covering all departments, it will be his last day.

A man cannot be an encyclopedia. That is the conclusion arrived at when it was decided, after close study, to specialize translation. Such a translator will be designated to such a department and will thus be able to master the terminology of the technical subjects to be translated in that department. This applies to all departments.

Because this was done, to-day, we have French blue books which are quite presentable; well translated, even very well so.

I would suggest, for instance, that the translator in agricultural matters should not be entrusted with legal work, and vice versa. In order to do justice to his subject and to himself the minister should have the services of competent translators for professional work such as chemistry, engineering and legal work. Has anyone ever thought of pooling those professional activities? The world cannot move in the right direction unless people cease basing their actions on dreams and theories of that nature.

Let us proceed a step farther and ask ourselves the purpose for which this measure was introduced. Who asked for the change? What body of public opinion is behind this proposal? The minister would have been very kind had he told us. Has the sponsor of the bill taken only the gratuitous advice of his personal friends who caused to be translated the two documents which were found to be full of mistakes and which do not honour the French language? I refer to the last speech from the throne and to the St. Lawrence deep waterways treaty. Those are two good models of very poor translation.

Before dealing with the reasons put forward by the minister let me for a moment consider the views of a few authorities in the matter. I am told that in 1909 the translation service was more or less centralized, but in view of the inconvenience of the system a very learned and experienced translator, Mr. Frechette, was asked to visit a few European countries, among others Belgium, where there are two official languages, and Switzerland, where there are three. In his report Mr. Frechette said:

To the Honourable the Speaker and Members of the Board of Internal Economy, House of Commons, Ottawa, Gentlemen: In compliance with the minute of your board of December 17, 1909, I proceeded in May last to Brussels and Berne, to inquire into the organization and working of the systems of translation obtaining in those capitals in consequence of the duality of official languages in Belgium and of their plurality in Switzerland.

On page 5 of the same report we read:

It is evident that so many various translations, for which the most extensive dictionaries and the usual language are altogether inadequate, must require from the translator vast erudition, constantly supplemented through long hours of research and tireless application. Would it not be too optimistic to expect great success from the anomaly of an organization where it is required of each man to be a universal specialist in order to be fit for expert work in all directions.

I quote again:

The present system established some seventy years ago may have answered the needs of the time, when the public documents were very far from being as voluminous, as numerous and as specialized as they are to-day, and when the greater part of them, being already in French, had not to go through the French office. But now that the publications of the public service deal with so many activities unknown to the primitive country that we were then; now that all the human interest, more and more specialized, find their expression in the papers presented to the Canadian parliament, a centralized translation office can no longer do justice to so much work that calls for specialists. The experience I have acquired during thirty-six years of service in the commons has convinced me that in centralization rests the vice of our system.

And so on. Then, quoting again:

The departmental translator having a narrower field of work could comparatively soon master the two languages in the specialties dealt with every year in the documents issued by his department. He could do his work much quicker and much better, all other things being equal. His direct responsibility for the French version of the departmental publications would also naturally have a tendency to secure his best efforts.

The first intimation that we have concerning an amalgamation is contained in a memorandum from the Civil Service Commission dated April 15, 1924. It purports to be an extract from the report of the special committee of the Senate on the civil service. Then, from sessional paper No. 15, 29A, page 10, I quote the following:

The commissioners considered that it would probably be beyond their powers to ask that members of the staffs of the Senate and House of Commons and of the Supreme and Exchequer courts should come before them, seeing that in 1892 the Civil Service Commissioners were authorized to extend their inquiries to the staffs of the Senate and the House of Commons, but on constitutional grounds the clerks of the two houses objected thereto.

The memorandum in its provision for a central translating service excluded the Senate and House of Commons staffs. While the special committee made several suggestions regarding various services of the government, they apparently did not see fit to mention the translation services.

A more recent step was the appointment of a committee headed by Mr. Watson Sellar, as I read in a return brought down by the Secretary of State, sessional paper 27, on February 6, 1934. This committee was composed of Watson Sellar, B. J. Roberts, Fred Cook, P. T. Coolican, E. Chamberlain, F. C. C. Lynch, L. L. Bolton, L. Beaudry, Dr. A. T. Charron, C. H. Bland and the secretary, Mr. James. What was the conclusion of that committee? The report, a copy of which I hold in my hand, says:

No complaints as to the quality of the translated texts were made to the committee.

Mr. CAHAN: From what is the hon. gentleman reading?

Mr. BOUCHARD: I am reading from a copy of the Sellar report; if it does not suit the minister perhaps he will tell me. The committee reported as follows:

No complaints as to the quality of the translated texts were made to the committee. It was found that throughout the departments a general policy of decentralization is in effect. The adoption of such policy was the result of the question being explored in 1910 after a report was made by Mr. Achille Frechette, who, under instructions of the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons, visited Belgium and Switzerland to observe the practice in effect in those countries. From the information before the committee the general consensus of opinion in the departments is in favour of the status quo.

I ask the minister, is that a reliable report? Anyhow the committee did not approve of centralization. I fail to see much in favour of amalgamation in any of these reports. I fail to see on what ground the minister bases his policy. Is it the result of deep thinking or of intense dreaming? Perhaps some have been moved by the complaints made by the minister in his own case. Let us read what he said in introducing his bill into this house on January 29 last at page 8 of Hansard:

The situation is such that the department of the Secretary of State either must have a number of translators attached to it or must be able to avail itself of the services of some one or more of these ninety-one translators. For instance, the Department of the Secretary of State has to procure a translation of the address of His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of parliament, but there is no translator to whom I can apply to have that work done, so I have been dependent upon the gratuitous service of personal friends, or to pay others to make that translation from time to time. In addition we have a very considerable number of important state documents of which the Secretary of State, as Registrar General, is the conservator or keeper or guardian. Yet some time ago, when a treaty dealing with the waterways was signed between the government of Canada and the government of the United States, there was not a single translator to whom I could apply or to whom I had the right to apply to make a translation of that document from English into French for circulation as required.

I take strong exception to that statement, Mr. Speaker. If as a result of the dismissal by the government of over a dozen translators the minister is unable to get proper service, then, if it is not his own fault, it is the fault of the government. Secondly, I have only to submit that had the minister entrusted the work to a translator in the Archives branch, such as the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) mentioned, for instance, to Dr. Marion, a distinguished author, we would not have witnessed the spectacle of His Excellency being obliged to read a document with threescore or more inaccuracies, false sense, grammatical errors, and so on.

Mr. CAHAN: Would the hon. gentleman suggest to me what right I have as Secretary of State to take a gentleman in the Archives and appropriate his services for general business? He is appointed to the Archives for certain special work which requires his attention from time to time. Why should I transfer him to another department? What authority have I to do so?

Mr. BOUCHARD: Unless I am mistaken the Archives comes under the jurisdiction of the minister.

Mr. CAHAN: No, it is not a part of the department of the Secretary of State. It is a separate and distinct department created for a special service of its own.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Then would the minister state what department the Archives does belong to?

Mr. CAHAN: It is the Department of Public Archives, with its own deputy minister.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Who is the Deputy Minister of Public Archives, may I ask?

Mr. CAHAN: My hon. friend can look into the record for himself.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the attention of hon. members to the fact that the house is not in committee.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Anyhow, there are too many good translators around the house here and elsewhere in this city of Ottawa for it to have been at all difficult for the minister to have secured one.

Mr. CAHAN: But there is not a translator around this building or in Ottawa whose services I have the right to demand as a translator in the public service.

Mr. CARDIN: You could have appointed one, just as there are translators in other departments.

Mr. CAHAN: Why appoint them when a score who have been appointed are away on five or six months' holidays during the summer and the public service is suffering?

Mr. CARDIN: Force them to work.

Mr. CAHAN: I have no authority to force them to work.

Mr. CARDIN: The government has the power.

An hon. MEMBER: That is the reason for the bill.

Mr. CARDIN: Not at all. It is for a different purpose.

Mr. BOUCHARD: If what the minister understands by economy is this petty little saving, and if what he understands by efficiency is the translation of the speech from the throne and of the St. Lawrence deep waterway treaty, which I hold in my hand,

I must entirely disagree with him. The government should have seen to it at any cost that these two documents which I hold in my hand were properly translated.

Let me say further that I cannot subscribe to the idea that confidential documents should be entrusted to personal friends rather than to translators who have taken the oath of office.

Mr. CAHAN: There were no translators available.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Before undertaking such a responsibility the minister should have demonstrated at least that he was very anxious to have the translation done in his own department. And now he comes down with a bill to take care of the translation services for the whole of this dominion. So far, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to say that we have seen no great indication of the minister's ability to grasp the significance of so huge a problem. I do not question his motive, but I am entitled to question his competence in the matter. It would have been so easy in a matter of the kind to confer with people or bodies or associations more likely to give him sound advice so that he could come before this house with a bill which was clear and self-explanatory.

The question now before the house, I submit, Mr. Speaker, is one that transcends in importance the expenditures that are involved in the proposal. Let us come to the crux of the whole matter and ask this question: What is translation? I am sorry the minister did not refer to this phase of the matter to any great extent; he referred more particularly to the printing bureau. Before I deal with this aspect of the matter I should like to make a statement or two as to the nature of the French language in Canada in order to dissipate some of the die-hard misconceptions which exist. It is to our farmers and their educators that we owe the fact that the French language in Canada has been kept in a condition of pristine purity which invites not the pity but the envy of our visitors, not excepting even Frenchmen themselves. In making this assertion I refer more particularly to the country people here and in our country of origin. I would even take issue with such a learned gentleman as Professor De Champs, professor of French at Toronto university. In the Evening Citizen of February 17 appears the following:

> Professor De Champs denies that the French of the French Canadian farmer is better than that spoken in the provinces of France.

Should any hon. member entertain any doubts as to the quality of our language I would refer him to a series of articles which have been appearing in Le Canada Français under the title Le français des Canadiens est-il un patois? These articles are by Professor Martin of the university of France and the university of Dalhousie at Halifax, Nova Scotia. Instalments have appeared in the issues of September, October, November and December, 1933, and January, 1934, the series being still uncompleted. Professor Martin is a gentleman of great linguistic experience both in Canada and in France. From what has appeared so far in these articles the conclusion would seem to be that our language has nothing of the patois in it but is fundamentally French, and French of the best quality.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, February 28, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

BATTLEFORD, SASK., MAIL CONTRACT

Mr. VALLANCE:

1. What are the names of the persons who submitted tenders for mail contract rural route No. 1, Battleford, Saskatchewan?
2. What is the amount of each tender submitted for that contract?
3. What is the name of the person to whom the contract was awarded?

Mr. DUPRE (for Mr. Sauve):

1 and 2. Geo. W. French, Battleford, $475 per annum; James Savard, Battleford, $480 per annum; Geo. Laycock, Battleford, $489 per annum; W. H. Chapman, Battleford, $494 per annum; Fred G. Light, Battleford, $500 per annum; Victor Davies, Battleford, $600 per annum; Geo. W. French, Battleford, $600 per annum; Alex. Pritchard, Battleford, $720 per annum.

3. Geo. W. French, who was the lowest tenderer.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—LIQUOR SEIZURES

Mr. LAFLECHE:

1. What number of seizures was carried out by the officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Canada, at Sherbrooke and Thetford Mines from January, 1933, to this day?
2. What quantity of liquor was seized in each case?
3. What number of automobiles was seized?
4. How many were sold by auction?

5. How many were returned to owners, by whose order, and why?
6. What is the number of automobiles that will be sold at the next auction?
7. What are the makes of these automobiles, and who are the owners?

Mr. MATTHEWS:

1. 26.

2. Amount of liquor seized in 12 cases—Nil; amount of liquor seized in 14 cases—as follows: 128 ounces alcohol; 3 gallons alcohol; 40 ounces alcohol; 25 ounces alcohol; 60 ounces alcohol; 48 quarts beer; 4 quarts alcohol; 2½ gallons alcohol; 1 quart alcohol; 12 ounces alcohol; 2 gallons alcohol; 17 ounces alcohol; 120 ounces alcohol; 4 gallons mash and 3 bottles spirits.

3. 9.

4. Automobiles not sold by auction, but by tender after due advertising. Four sold by tender.

5. Three cars released on payment of voluntary penalties collected by members of R.C.M.P. subject to decision of the Minister of National Revenue. One car sold by tender to former owner.

6. None—no cars sold by auction but April 1, 1934, tenders will be asked for one car.

7. Oldsmobile coach seized from David Metivier at Thetford Mines, Quebec.

PICTOU COUNTY, WHARF REPAIRS

Mr. DUFF:

1. Did the Department of Public Works spend any money either by way of construction or repair of wharves in the county of Pictou, in the calendar year of 1933?
2. If so, at what places were such expenditures made respectively?
3. Who were the foremen, in each case, and at what times were such amounts spent and amount of each expenditure respectively?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. Yes.

2. Pictou, Pictou Island, Bailey's Brook and Skinner's Cove.

3. Pictou: (a) Isaac T. Arbuckle; (b) July 22 to November 1, 1933; (c) $5,804.49. Pictou Island: (a) Allan MacFarlane; (b) August 21 to November 10, 1933; (c) $1,609.71. Bailey's Brook: (a) H. Scott Patton; (b) August 1 to November 18, 1933; (c) $864.73. Skinner's Cove: (a) Fred Shannon; (b) October 21 to December 31, 1933; (c) $1,895.85.

EDUCATION OF INDIANS

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo):

1. What is the distribution by provinces of the amounts spent on Indian education as reported in the Auditor General's report for the year ending March 31, 1933?

2. What is the Indian population of each of the provinces of Canada?

Mr. MURPHY:

1.

Indian Education Vote—Expenditure for year 1932-33

Prince Edward Island	$ 1,235 26
Nova Scotia	37,007 94
New Brunswick	17,073 74
Quebec	59,908 17

SUMMERSIDE, P.E.I.—CUSTOMS COLLECTIONS

Mr. MacLEAN:

What amounts of customs were collected at Summerside, P.E.I., during the years 1926 to 1934, inclusive, giving yearly amount separately in each case?

Mr. MATTHEWS:

Import Duties

1925-26	$21,364 62
1926-27	21,491 25
1927-28	36,865 62
1928-29	33,786 20
1929-30	42,275 49
1930-31	29,224 75
1931-32	16,537 29
1932-33	8,768 41
1933-34 (10 months)	7,842 80

AIR MAIL SERVICE

Mr. VENIOT:

1. What air mail routes were carried on during the year ending March 31, 1933?
2. What routes are now being carried on?

3. What was the revenue from air mail service during the year ending March 31, 1933?
4. What is the cost to date for the year ending March 31, 1934?
5. What is the estimated cost for the balance of the year?

Mr. DUPRE (for Mr. Sauvé):

1. Amos-Siscoe; Big River-Ile a la Crosse; Buffalo-London-Detroit; Fort McMurray-Aklavik; Fort Resolution-Cameron Bay via Rae; Lac du Bonnet-Bissett; Leamington-Pelee Island; Moncton-Charlottetown; Montreal-Albany; Montreal-Rimouski; Narrow Lake-Sioux Lookout; Peace River-North Vermilion; Prince Albert-Lac la Ronge; Quebec-Seven Islands; Seven Islands-Anticosti; Charlottetown-Magdalen Islands; Siscoe-Pascalis; Toronto-Detroit (discontinued April, 1932); Vancouver-Victoria; Winnipeg-Pembina.

2. Amos-Siscoe; Big River-Ile a la Crosse; Buffalo-London-Detroit (discontinued May, 1933); Fort McMurray-Aklavik; Fort Resolution-Cameron Bay via Rae and Camsell River; Lac du Bonnet-Bisset; Leamington-Pelee Island; Moncton-Charlottetown; Montreal-Albany; Montreal-Rimouski; Narrow Lake-Sioux Lookout; Peace River-North Vermilion; Prince Albert-Lac la Ronge; Quebec-Sept Iles; Havre St. Pierre-Port Menier; Charlottetown-Magdalen Islands; Siscoe-Pascalis (discontinued July, 1933); Vancouver-Victoria; Winnipeg-Pembina; Sept Iles-Natashquan; Cameron Bay-Coppermine.

3. $290,301.69 (estimated).

4. Cost for present fiscal year up to January 31, 1934—$166,015.47.

5. $42,312.77.

RURAL MAIL BOX CONTRACTS

Mr. VENIOT:

1. What was the price paid under contract for rural mail boxes in 1927-28?
2. What was the price paid per box for the 10,000 boxes purchased by the present government?

Mr. DUPRE (for Mr. Sauvé):

1. $2.80 per box—plus sales tax of 10 cents each. Freight extra f.o.b. to various destinations.

2. $2.75 per box—plus 6 per cent sales tax —f.o.b. destination.

OTTAWA IMPERIAL CONFERENCE—REPRESENTATIVES OF CANADIAN LUMBERMEN

Mr. GUTHRIE: At the request of the Prime Minister I beg to lay on the table the answer to the following questions asked on February 26, by the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance). These questions are not on to-day's order paper.

[Mr. Venoit.]

1. Who were the representatives of the Canadian lumbermen at the Ottawa Imperial conference of August, 1932?
2. What was the status of G. B. Nicholson at that conference?
3. Are there any authentic records obtainable regarding the discussion of the lumber industry in general, also in particular, the national and inter-imperial viewpoint or any brief on that question?

The answers are as follows:

1. No representatives of the Canadian lumbermen took part in the Imperial Economic Conference, 1932, which was a conference between governments.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. The records of the discussions of the conference are confidential and, in accordance with custom, could not be made public without the consent of the governments represented. The report of the conference was laid on the table of the house on October 7, 1932.

GERMAN CONSUL-GENERAL IN CANADA

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and at his request I beg to make answer to the following question asked by the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs):

In view of the fact that Dr. L. Kempff, German consul general in Canada, has issued from his office in Montreal, publications grossly offensive to people of the Jewish race and likely to stir up enmity and strife in this country against Jews, will the government take appropriate measures for the suppression and confiscation of the anti-Jewish and pro-Nazi literature now being circulated by the German consul general in Montreal, and also for the recall of Dr. Kempff and other officials of the consulate who are responsible for such acts?

The hon. member for Cartier has not given any particulars of the publications which he states have been circulated by the German consul-general, and which he describes as anti-Jewish and pro-Nazi. I am, however, informed that the consul-general states that the publication issued from his office is one entitled Germany's Fight for Western Civilization, and that between two and three hundred copies of this pamphlet have been mailed to representative men in public and business life. We are assured that no further copies will be circulated.

It is not necessary to remind members of this house at any length of the privileges and responsibilities of the representatives of a foreign country abroad. It is clearly established that a diplomatic representative must abstain from intervention in the internal affairs of the country to which he is accredited. It is equally clear that in the performance of his task of advancing and protecting the interests of his country, he is entitled to make representations to the government to which he is accredited on any development that may affect the interests of his own country. It is also recognized that within limits set more by custom than by any definite rule, he may give public addresses designed to increase the friendly feeling towards his own country, as Lord Bryce did so notably while ambassador at Washington, and that he may on occasion communicate to the press to correct what he considers a misstatement of fact on an important matter affecting his country, without, however, entering into a prolonged or acrimonious public controversy. In appropriate measure, the same rules may be taken to apply to consular representatives.

Ordinarily there is a clear line of demarcation between the internal affairs of the country to which a representative is accredited and the affairs of his own state. Issues may arise, however, of such broad and almost universal interest as to present aspects of concern to the people of all countries. I might refer to such issues as have arisen of late in more than one country in Europe, involving discussion regarding the merits of freedom of speech, the democratic form of government or pacific ideals in international policy—issues which of course are a matter of interest and concern in Canada as well. Naturally, in the discussion of any such issues, there is double necessity for caution.

I can say to the hon. member for Cartier that I do not think any occasion has arisen for suggesting the withdrawal from Canada of Doctor Kempff, or other officers of the consulate. The consul-general is a man of long experience in the dominion and of proved friendliness to this country. I am sure he had no intention of intervening in Canadian affairs, and that no further circulation may be anticipated of documents which, while intended to support the attitude of his government, contained material objectionable to large sections of Canadian opinion.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

EXPROPRIATION OF BUILDINGS, MONTREAL

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri):

1. Has the government completed the expropriation of the buildings erected in the square composed of St. James, Windsor, St. Antoine, and Cathedral streets, in the city of Montreal, province of Quebec?
2. What are the names of the proprietors of the buildings expropriated in said square and the amount paid to each one of them?
3. Have all the buildings acquired by the government, to date, been demolished?
4. If any of the buildings were not demolished, were these properties rented by the government to a third party?
5. If so, to whom, for what period of time, at what rent or on what terms?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Return tabled herewith.

SOREL TIMBER YARDS—EMPLOYEES

Mr. DUBOIS:

1. What are the names of the supernumerary employees who have worked in the maritime timber yards of Sorel during the months of September, October, and November, respectively, 1933?
2. From what county is each one of them?
3. Who recommended each one of them?

CIVIL SERVANTS—DISCHARGED AND SUPERANNUATED

Mr. REID:

1. What was the total number of civil servants and government employees discharged and superannuated under the ruling regarding all employees 65 years and over?
2. What were the numbers discharged and superannuated respectively, in each department of the public service since the order came into effect?
3. How many persons 65 years of age or over, are still in the employ of the government?
4. What are the names of the said persons, and in what respective departments of the public service are they engaged?

SUNBURY, N.B., UNEMPLOYMENT CAMP

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. What supplies, if any, for the unemployment relief camp at Sunbury, New Brunswick, were purchased in New Brunswick?
2. From whom were they purchased?
3. Have tenders been called or invited for such supplies?
4. If so, who tendered, and what was the amount of each tender?

REVENUE FROM QUEBEC POST OFFICES

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo):

What is the total revenue derived from the 658 post offices in the province of Quebec, specified in sessional paper No. 95, dated January 26, 1934?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

BAGOTVILLE, QUE., POSTMASTER

Mr. CASGRAIN:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports and documents, in connection with the appointment and dismissal of Mr. J. C. Levesque, postmaster at Bagotville, and also for a copy of all correspondence, reports and other documents relating to an inquiry held in connection with charges made against said J. C. Levesque, including the proof and evidence of all the witnesses heard at said inquiry together with the decision arrived at by the commissioner who held said inquiry.

Mr. DUPRE: It may be stated in reference to this motion that there is no correspondence concerning Joseph C. Levesque, because he was never postmaster at Bagotville. I am informed that this man acted as assistant to his mother, who was the former postmistress at Bagotville and was dismissed on August 22, 1931, on account of old age and inattention to duty.

Mr. CASGRAIN: With the permission of the minister may I ask if he has any information or documents relative to an inquiry held concerning this same person, Mr. Joseph C. Levesque, when he was acting as postmaster for his mother?

Mr. DUPRE: I am not ready to say that he acted as postmaster, but I may tell my hon. friend that the copy of all correspondence, including reports of investigations, and so on, was tabled in the house by the Postmaster General on April 11, 1932, in compliance with an order of the house passed at the request of my hon. friend, himself, on March 7, 1932. If there is any report on Mr. Levesque himself, my hon. friend would find it in the documents then tabled. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the motion might be dropped if my hon. friend is willing.

Motion withdrawn.

PASPEBIAC, QUE., WHARF

Mr. MARCIL:

For a copy of pay lists and accounts for material in connection with work done on the Portage wharf at Paspébiac, Quebec, in 1933 and 1934.

PEACE RIVER OUTLET

PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF RAILWAY FROM DISTRICT TO PACIFIC COAST

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the Peace River country should be connected by a direct railway outlet to the Pacific coast.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take up a great deal of the time of the house this afternoon, possibly not the whole of my forty minutes, in going over some of the arguments which time and again have been presented in this house for the last ten years. But as the representative of the Peace River country I think it is my duty to bring this matter again to the attention of the house and the government. The whole program of railway development in a new country is a very important matter not only for that particular part of the country but for the dominion as a whole. While we have not yet got an outlet to the Pacific coast, certain developments with regard to railways have taken place in the last ten years which have been of importance to the more thickly settled portion of the Peace River country, and our efforts in that direction and the developments that have taken place for the assistance of the settlers have been of some consequence. However, due to the dry weather in the more southerly sections of Saskatchewan and Alberta and to the difficulties they have experienced in those sections with regard to grain growing, there has been a large influx of settlers from those sections into the newer district of Peace River. Anyone who will study the population of those western provinces will be very much struck with the thinning out of the population in the southern sections that has taken place over a period of years and with the movement to the northern portions of the province of a large number of settlers from the southern sections. The population of the Peace River country has in the last ten years increased from about twenty thousand to something like fifty thousand, and of course that is one reason why there has been a constant demand for new railways, new roads and new schools in that district. But notwithstanding the depression, and that we have, or think we have, a great deal of difficulty in providing new facilities, there is a constant need and a constant demand for these new facilities regardless of what may be happening in the country generally. We still have settlers trying to establish themselves at a distance of sixty, seventy-five, eighty and a hundred miles from a railway, and that is not just in a few isolated cases. I will mention Battle River prairie, located eighty miles north of the town of Grimshaw and about a hundred miles by road from the town of Peace River. There we have a large territory, possibly twenty miles square, which is thickly settled and is being developed in spite of the present handicap of low prices, so low in fact that in some cases grain will hardly pay for its cost of transportation to the railway, and in other cases it actually does not pay the cost of transportation. In that settlement we have people who have moved in there from older settled districts where some of them were well established. They have come into this newer country in an effort to reestablish themselves notwithstanding the handicaps and difficulties of the situation because, so far as they can see, it is the very best thing they can do. The only alternative for them would be to go into town or into some other district where they would be able to do practically nothing for themselves and would have to accept direct relief.

Then we have the Hines Creek and Clear Lake prairie country lying north of the Peace river, and passing through to Hudson Hope through the constituency of my hon. friend from Cariboo (Mr. Fraser). There is a settlement there in a section about eighty miles long and possibly ten to twenty or thirty miles deep. Driving through it you would hardly notice that there were any settlers, but if there was anything to draw them together you would soon find large groups of settlers gathering together from the timber and park sections of that district where they are trying to hew out for themselves new homes amongst the timber and the bush.

We have also settlements on the south side of the Peace river extending back right to the Rocky mountains. They are mostly new settlers who have come in there from the older districts to make a new start and reestablish themselves so that they may be independent of relief so far as that lies within their power. They have a tremendously difficult task before them, difficult enough for young bachelors, but much more difficult for older men who have families, some of whom have been well off in other days but have come up there to start the battle all over again and provide for their families. Many of them are enduring tremendous hardships and are forced sometimes to ask for relief. But they are doing their very best to reach independence by their own efforts.

It seems to me a tragedy that we have to say in the face of such conditions that we will not go ahead and spend any more money for railways because, forsooth, we are having certain financial difficulties in this country. Over a long period of years in the history of railway development in this country we have made mistakes, and we are now trying to do something to consolidate the railways of Canada and to provide for more cooperation and the elimination of duplication. But, Mr. Speaker, I submit that there is no question of duplication in this instance.

How are these people going to be able to establish themselves,—and I think that would be a good thing in the interests of the whole country,—if they are not able to earn money; if there is no new government money, if you like, coming into the district so that they may earn something by their own efforts to pay their expenses and help reestablish themselves? How are they going to be able to establish themselves with the low prices that prevail to-day? It seems to me that the government must assume some responsibility in the matter of enabling these people to establish themselves. The situation calls for something more than direct relief, if they are to be given any encouragement in their efforts to establish themselves and get some satisfaction out of their lives. We have throughout that whole country a type of people generally who hate to take relief, and will only take it as a last resort when they are absolutely forced to it, and because of that fact I am very anxious to see the government undertake to do something in their behalf.

I mentioned a little while ago the question of duplication, but I submit that there is no real question of duplication here. That whole country has been surveyed, and surveyed in such a way that it is possible to lay out a plan of development of the Peace River country, covering ten times the amount of land that is now under cultivation, and without a single mile of duplication in the whole thing. We know exactly where the branch lines ought to be and where the main outlet ought to be, and where the branch lines and the outlet should be fitted into one another so that we will have one harmonious whole when the railway project is completed.

This afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to say that we ought to vote in this house a sum of money to carry through the whole railway program at once, but I am asking for a gradual development looking towards the completion of that outlet so as to give the settlers who are there an opportunity to establish themselves under reasonable conditions. The financial argument crops up at once but I submit that this is not as serious to-day as it was a year ago. There is talk everyhere of a general recovery. The speech from the throne stated that there was evidence of a return to permanent prosperity. While that statement may be a little strong, there is certainly evidence of a return of something better than we had a year ago. Because this is true not only of Canada but of countries like Great Britain and the United States we have reason to believe that this recovery will continue. I hold in my hand the monthly review of the Midland bank, and I should like to quote from a speech of the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna. Among other things he says:

> World trade may still be disorganized, the exchanges chaotic, international dealings hampered by prohibitive tariffs, quotas and other restrictions; yet, notwithstanding all these obstacles, often described as insuperable, the trade of this country by universal acknowledgment has for many months been making steady and gratifying progress.

And again:

> The supply of an adequate quantity of money is now seen to be as certain in restoring trade and employment as the curtailment of the required supply is certain to restrict them.

And again:

> The word inflation is in constant use as a term of reproach; but just as deflation may be good or bad according to the conditions at the time it is put into operation, so also with inflation.

He continues:

> We have seen a revival of business and a return to employment, accomplished by a comparatively slight rise in the price level;

He was dealing with the matter from the standpoint of monetary operations but the point I desire to make is that he stated that there had been a general recovery and improvement in prices. It is acknowledged everywhere that if we can get an improvement in prices we shall be able to start out of this depression. I think it is generally acknowledged that recovery is on the way in the United States. Prices have risen there as well as in Canada. We have seen a rise in the prices of farm products, hogs and wheat as compared with those prevailing a year ago. I think the legislation before this house as well as other things that have happened in connection with the monetary policy give a definite indication that the financial question is on the way to a solution and that to some extent we are leaving the depression behind. This being so, I hope that we shall be able to arrive at a partial solution of the great problem of an outlet for the Peace River country. It seems to me that keeping people unemployed when they are willing to work is a great waste which should be eliminated in the near future.

In connection with the question of the duplication of railway mileage, I desire to say again what I have said before. The survey made of the Peace River country by the engineers shows that when this outlet is completed there will be an average of 6,000 acres of economic land to a mile of railway as compared with the average of 5,000 acres for the three prairie provinces. I think this answers any argument as to duplication. I think on the whole our yields of grain and other commodities have been a little higher than those of the three prairie provinces. This indicates that the construction of this railway should prove to be a reasonably economic proposition. A survey has been made of 2,000,000 acres along one of the proposed routes of this outlet and this shows that the land is suitable for agricultural purposes. I do not know of any instance in Canada where a development has been so well planned and where the results have been predicted with such certainty. There has been a careful study made of the cost of construction, the relation of branch lines to one another and the value of the land.

There has been developed to-day in the Peace River country about 1,000,000 acres of land out of a total of about 10,000,000 acres of economic land. Five engineers, Fairbairn, Gzowski, Hill, James and Sullivan, surveyed this route in 1925, and their report shows a total of about 8,500,000 acres of economic land. Some years ago the Department of the Interior issued a pamphlet on the Peace River country and this showed the total number of economic acres as 10,000,000. I think the latter figure is just about right, but whether it is 8,500,000 or 10,000,000 acres does not matter. The fact is that 1,000,000 acres have been developed.

I should like to deal with some of the arguments advanced in the report of the engineers against the construction of this line. I do this because I submit that the arguments advanced at that time can be shown to be not entirely sound to-day. It is impossible for anyone to sit down and state what will happen in the future. These engineers did their best but I do not think their arguments apply to-day. They stated that there would not be a sufficient density of traffic to make the railway pay at anything like the then existing rates, which were 39 cents per hundred pounds. Another argument was advanced to the effect that grain traffic does not pay. They stated that as the traffic from the Peace River country would be mostly grain there was every reason to expect that the railway would not pay very well. I should like to submit a few figures to the house in this connection. At pages 66 and 67 of the steam railway statistics of Canada for 1932 is given the total gross earnings of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian Northern Railway, the Northern Alberta Railway and other railways of Canada. The mileage and so on appears on page 54. I have worked out a table showing that the total gross earnings per mile of line on the Canadian National Railways is $6,377. These are the earnings for the year covered by the 1932 report. The Canadian Pacific earned $7,246 per mile of line, while the Northern Alberta lines earned $1,812 per mile.

In regard to the operating ratio I find that the Canadian National, with earnings of about $6,000 per mile of line, had an operating ratio of 95·96, while the Canadian Pacific had a ratio of 80·70. The Northern Alberta lines, with gross earnings of only $1,812 per mile, just about one-third the earnings of the other two lines, had an operating ratio of 79·13. I know none of these lines is doing very well to-day in the way of earnings, but I am saying that notwithstanding the argument with regard to the density of traffic; notwithstanding the argument with regard to the unprofitableness of the grain traffic, as set out in the report of 1927, the Northern Alberta lines showed a better result from the standpoint of the operating ratio than either the Canadian National or the Canadian Pacific.

I am not going into the question of why this should be so. There may be certain matters of grades which would account for it, or it may be due to other factors, but notwithstanding the fact that all the railways are having difficulty in connection with earnings the Northern Alberta railways, a large portion of which are operating in the Peace River district, showed a better result from the standpoint of the operating ratio than did either the Canadian Pacific or the Canadian National.

Mr. REID: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? He spoke of the development of wheat acreage. Is the hon. member in favour of the agreement to curtail the wheat acreage?

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): That is another question, but I will say that I am in favour of the wheat agreement. I distinctly said so the other day, and I do not know why I should be asked that question again. The problem of settlement on the land does not involve the question of wheat. I am giving the results of the operation of the Northern Alberta railways with the traffic that is available. The problem of settlement in the Peace River country to-day is a problem of the development of homes in that country, and that will be the problem for years to come as far as new settlers are concerned. Unless something happens with regard to the world demand for wheat there must be a change in the development of new countries from what we have had for the last twenty years or so in western Canada.

My hon. friend has brought up the question of whether there is room for the development of this new country. One argument is that some settlers are moving from districts where they were farming large acreages into a country where they are going to farm small acreages under different conditions. Another argument is that we have a first-class country for producing hogs, and there is plenty of room for the development of this industry in Canada in connection with our export quota.

One of the reasons why I mentioned grain, and one reason why I said the railway was paying, is that grain constitutes about four-fifths of the total traffic on the Northern Alberta railways. It is not the same year by year but that is about the figure. For instance, in 1932 the grain traffic amounted to about 350,000 tons, while the grand total was 525,000 tons. On the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National grain constitutes about one-fifth or one-sixth of the total tonnage.

Years ago it was said that railways built north of Edmonton would never pay for their axle grease. A survey of the Peace River country was made by a man who has since passed away, I believe, James M. Macoun. In his report—which I believe was suppressed—he informed the people of Canada that the Peace River country never would be fit for white men unless they were ready to accept very low standards of living. Then we had the report of the five engineers, which threw cold water on the railway development for which we were asking in 1925. In spite of everything, however, the Peace River country has developed, and it has justified the construction of the railways which some people did not expect to pay for the axle grease they used. To-day, in spite of the difficulties encountered in a new country, they are making as good a showing, so far as the operating ratio goes, as are the two main lines of railway in Canada. I believe it is going to take a number of years to work out the solution, and by the time that is done and the outlet is completed probably we will have a general improvement in conditions. We have people in there who are anxious to establish themselves in homes in that new country, people who wish to be independent of relief, who wish to be self-supporting, and who have sacrificed everything people should be expected to sacrifice in order to be in a position to settle in that country.

In spite of the difficulties that may exist I would like to see the government take hold of this matter and begin construction; extend branch lines, if necessary, in order to give railway service to those who have settled along the probable route, and complete the outlet as soon as it is financially possible and economically wise to do so, which I think will be in the not far distant future. I say that not a single statement, discouraging though many of them appeared at the time, that has been made against this development has been borne out by the facts in a reasonable way, and I submit that this construction is absolutely justified.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I desire to occupy the attention of the house for only a few moments in order to lend my personal support to the resolution that has been moved, with commendable fairness, by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy).

On looking over the debates of former years I find that the situation in the Peace River territory was very carefully discussed in this house in May, 1932, when the hon. member for Peace River submitted a resolution very similar indeed to the one moved this afternoon. At that time the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) made what I thought was a very fair reply. Again last year I believe the hon. member for Peace River introduced another resolution in this house which went to a division and was lost by a considerable majority.

I must congratulate the hon. member for Peace River for being at least consistent on one point since he took his place in this house. I find, on looking up the records, in 1922 in the first place he brought this whole question to the attention of this chamber and as a result of his representations at that time I find that a sum of $50,000 was voted for a reconnaissance survey of the Peace River area, this sum being increased to $75,000 in 1923. I find also from the records that in 1924 a meeting was held in the office of the then Minister of Railways, the Right Hon. George P. Graham, at which meeting there were present to discuss this whole question of the Peace River development the late Sir Henry Thornton; Mr. E. W. Beatty, K.C., president of the Canadian Pacific Railway; the Hon. Mr. Greenfield, at that time Premier of Alberta; the late Hon. Verner Smith, at that time Minister of Railways of Alberta; the late Mr. W. F. Maclean, then one of the members for Toronto; the present member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) who has just sponsored the resolution, and the late Hon. John Oliver, then Premier of British Columbia. It was agreed at that time that certain surveys should be made and as a result of the agreement arrived at a report was made in 1925 which was, I believe, tabled in this chamber early in 1926. This report was signed by five engineers and, as the house is aware, it recommended the Obed route.

Very briefly I wish to reiterate what I said on this whole question in 1932, and that is that an obligation of honour rests upon all parties represented in this house in regard to the construction of an outlet from the Peace River area to the Pacific coast. I desire again to place upon Hansard the declarations made, first, by my own right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King), second, by the then leader of the Conservative party, now leader of the Senate, and, third, by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in his Winnipeg speech in 1930. Speaking in Edmonton in 1924 my leader said this:

> I pledge myself that as soon as it is humanly possible the great Peace River country will be given that measure of railway relief that will bring to the pioneers of that country the outlet they have been so long denied, and will open up the country for prospective settlers.

I find that about the same time the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen speaking also in Edmonton, on October 1, 1924, made the following statement:

> I have always urged that the north country should have railway relief. I cannot be accused of making futile promises, such as the Hon. Mackenzie King promised in the speech from the throne, at the opening of the last session of parliament, when he stated he was going to give railway relief to the north country, but nothing has been done.

Then the present Prime Minister, speaking in Winnipeg in 1930, used these words:

> We pledge ourselves to the improvement of the whole scheme of Canadian transportation northward by the completion of the Hudson Bay route, and the construction of such branches as may be necessary to render it most readily available to every part of Canada; to the Pacific slope by a Peace River outlet, and east and west by the development of the St. Lawrence waterways, and we pledge ourselves to aid existing traffic channels and to increase port facilities.

Since that time, as the house is aware, comprehensive surveys have been made of the entire project, as a result of which there has been unfortunately a lack of unanimity among the engineers in regard to the best route to be followed; but I agree entirely with the representations made by the hon. member for Peace River, in the first place in regard to the great value and the richness of the soil of what is a veritable empire itself, in the second place in regard to the necessity of doing something constructive to assist the settlers who are in that territory. I think the minister will agree with me that those settlers, of whom there are now 40,000 or 50,000, are in that area to-day as a result of representations made to them by various governments, some being made by both governments of British Columbia, some by both governments of Alberta and some by both governments of the dominion. I believe to-day, when we are going to consider entering upon gigantic projects of public works in the near future, there is, regardless altogether, first, of partisan considerations and, second, of the various reports that have been made by railway engineers, an obligation of honour resting upon this chamber to carry out the promises that were made, as long ago, I believe, as 1924, ten years ago. If the government is to consider in the near future a system of public works, I would make this recommendation to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), and I said this two years ago. I believe the line from Prince George to Finlay Forks could, according to the report of Major Crysdale, be constructed for $6,000,000 and construction costs will be lighter to-day than they probably will be at any time in the future. I appreciate the fact that the wheat policy of Canada is being changed by the wheat agreement, and at the present moment I do not want to be critical of that agreement, for I quite realize the significance of the question asked by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), because in the old days those who believed in the Peace River development believed in it essentially on account of the wheat growing possibilities of that area, but I agree with the hon. member for Peace River that it has great potentialities in addition to wheat growing. Therefore I recommend to the government that they take into serious consideration the advisability of including in the public works project they are about to undertake, the construction of a Pacific coast outlet.

I do not see how members from eastern Canada can ask us from the west to support any scheme for the development of the St. Lawrence waterway when they refuse to lend their support to the building up of what, to my mind, is of far greater importance to the dominion and contains far greater possibilities for the enrichment of our Canadian nation. Therefore I trust that in the same constructive way as that in which I have endeavoured to support the resolution of my hon. friend, the Minister of Railways will join all parties in this chamber and the government will take steps as soon as possible to build the very much needed outlet from the Peace River country to the sea.

Mr. J. A. FRASER (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in support of the motion of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy). First, it is rather surprising to me, in looking over the records of last year, that after all the splendid arguments that have been brought to bear upon this question, not only by the hon. member for Peace River but by others, a similar resolution moved last year received the support of only thirty-nine members of the House of Commons. That being so, I think there must be something wrong or something lacking in the arguments that are being adduced in support of this resolution. I am wondering whether we are not looking at the question from too limited a viewpoint. The general support of the question has been from an agricultural viewpoint, or probably not so much that, but, to be more specific, from the point of view of raising wheat and other grains in that district. Probably too much stress has been laid upon that angle, and I propose to say a few words on some of the other potentialities of that important area.

In the first place, I am not surprised that under present conditions the government should find it hard to justify itself in providing probably $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 for the purpose of increasing the production of wheat in the Peace River area when they have already on their hands something like 140,000,000 or 150,000,000 bushels of wheat that they cannot dispose of. Such an attitude is not very strange and, as I say, I am not surprised that there should be a certain amount of hesitation and cogitation in regard to this project before they put more of this country's money into the construction of a Peace River railway. And that is not the whole trouble that this government may have in considering this question, because after all every member of this house knows, and nearly every person in the Dominion of Canada should know by this time, that the railway problem is the largest and most serious single problem facing the dominion, so I can readily understand that there should be a certain amount of hesitation. At the same time I admit that we are probably looking at this question from too limited a viewpoint. I want to assure the house in the first place that there are immense opportunities in the Peace River country for the development of the live stock industry. That is important for the dominion; it is particularly important as far as the province of British Columbia is concerned. Let me call the attention of the house to the situation with regard to the production of live stock there. British Columbia is a very large importer of live stock products. At the present time we produce about 50 per cent of the amount of beef that we consume in British Columbia, and that notwithstanding the fact that in the central area, which I represent, we have the largest stock producing range area in the Dominion of Canada. With regard to hogs, you do not have to go to London to find a market for Peace River hogs, because British Columbia raises only ten per cent of the hogs she consumes. A similar situation exists as to butter; there are immense possibilities for the production of butter in the Peace River country. British Columbia consumes 20,000,000 pounds of butter a year, and we are actually producing at the present time about 5,000,000 pounds. So there are enormous opportunities for agricultural expansion apart from the production of wheat. By the way, in referring to the Peace River country I am speaking of the British Columbia area. The hon. member for Peace River is better qualified to speak of the Alberta area than I am, and perhaps is as well qualified as I am to talk about the Peace River area in British Columbia, because he lives closer to it and comes in contact with it oftener than I do.

With regard to the production of hogs, I want to submit a clipping from the Peace River Block News, the only paper published in the British Columbia area of the Peace River country. Let me say first that I have seen these hogs being shipped. I want the house to understand that the Peace River country is a new country, and there are very few diseases amongst the live stock in there. The stock that has been brought in has been well and carefully selected; it is well bred and well fed. I never looked at a prettier line of hogs than I have seen coming out of that country, and I am sure you would find they grade very high in Edmonton. Here is the latest information I have with regard to hogs produced in that country, taken from the Peace River Block News, published in Dawson Creek, the issue of February 7 of this year:

> On January 30, the day the Peace River hogs were sold, $8.85 was paid for bacons. Dawson Creek Cooperative Live Stock shipping association shipped out 123 hogs which averaged $16.10 per hog net.

Then it goes on to say:

> The Peace River district shipped 1,756 hogs on this train which sold for about $25,000 or an average of roughly $14.25 gross.

[Mr. J. A. Fraser.]

That is in Edmonton. Then it goes on:

> In December, bacons were selling at $4.75 on the Edmonton yards so that the last shipment realized over double as much as a month previously. When the price of $2.75 paid 13 months ago is compared with returns of January 30, 1934, the benefit of the British quota is still more apparent. The price paid 13 months ago for a 220 pound bacon hog was $2.75 per one hundred pounds, less 80 cents per hundred pounds freight and commission which would net the shipper $4.38. The same hog at $8.85 would give $17.71.

Note the difference in price, just four times as much as it was a year ago. I submit that there will be a tremendous expansion of all branches of the live stock industry as soon as proper railway facilities are provided for this country. Not only that, but that industry will afford a splendid market for the grain that grows so luxuriantly there. In the Peace River country they do not consider they have had a crop of wheat at all unless it averages forty bushels to the acre, and of oats 125 bushels to the acre is not uncommon. They have plenty of feed; the country is healthy and with proper care can be kept healthy; the stock that is in there at the present time is of first-class quality, and I have no doubt that the people in there who are raising live stock are intelligent enough to see that diseases are kept out. Let the members of this house never forget that they should not confine their thoughts to wheat when thinking about the development of the Peace River country.

There are other things besides live stock along the route of the proposed railway—and let me say that I never talk about the Obed route; there must have been something wrong with the engineers when they indicated that as a proper route by which to tap the Peace River country. I have always believed that the Peace River country should be opened up only along the Peace river itself.

The house should not overlook the fact that in the valley of the Peace river there are almost unlimited quantities of timber awaiting some means of transportation.

In the area will be found all the water power necessary for the manufacture of the timber.

But in my opinion wheat and live stock and forestry are comparatively only side issues in the development of the Peace River country. Coming as I do from a district which is vitally interested in the development of the mining industry, I consider that the mining possibilities of the Peace River country offer magnificent opportunities for the investment of money and the employment of labour.

Let no man forget that the mining industry when it is active and prosperous, when minerals are at a fair price, is the largest employer of labour of any industry and is also the largest consumer of all kinds of goods. From that point of view the mineral resources of the Peace River country are entitled to attention. What is the extent of the mineralized part of that area? It must be remembered that it is largely an unexplored country and it is difficult to give an accurate idea of just what the mineralized zone may be, but as nearly as I can judge it is 50 miles north and south and 150 miles east and west, or 7,500 square miles. This zone is very highly mineralized, and might produce any kind of mineral, particularly gold. What other commodity in the world to-day commands the attention that gold does? All through the Peace River area—and I am not speaking of the agricultural area but of that portion tributary to the Peace River and through which all these streams run—there is a highly mineralized section, capable of immense mineral development. In that area there are at least 7,500 square miles. So far as mines are concerned that is a tremendous area. Not only are there lode mines, but there are placer mines as well. In the area to which I have referred there are probably 500 miles of gold producing rivers and streams. If they would produce gold a few years ago sufficient to give a man a living, what will they do to-day?

I could give an illustration of the difference that the price of gold has made in the production of that commodity in my own community, because I am surrounded on all sides by exactly the same kind of gold bearing streams. Twenty or twenty-five years ago we had 400 or 500 prospectors working up and down our rivers. Those men made their living entirely by rocking or sluicing the banks and benches of the gold bearing streams in that area. They did not make a great deal of money, probably only a dollar or a dollar and a half a day, but they were able to eke out an existence because living was quite cheap. During the years of high wages those prospectors drifted away from their occupation because they could get better wages doing other work. To-day, however, on account of the depression these prospectors are coming back, and I want to tell you that in my own business, last year, I bought from just these small producers something pretty close to 1,000 ounces of gold. I do not purchase gold in large quantities at all. If a man has forty or fifty ounces he will never come to me with it, but he will send it right straight through to the assay office. All my purchases are made in quantities valued from $5 to $50. Despite the small purchases however I obtained an amount approaching 1,000 ounces. That is all new money. The activity is due partly to the depression, because these men, who are active enough to undertake the work, are doing the very best they can to keep off relief. I have known dozens of them, personally, who have come to me and told me that they were tickled to death to be able to make enough money to buy grub for themselves for another couple of weeks.

That is the condition which might be duplicated in the Peace River country, because there are just as many gold bearing streams in that country as there are in my own community. That is not all the placer prospects there are in the Peace River district by any means, because there is the Omineca section in which placer operations are going on at the present time. Large sums of money are being expended there in opening up placer mining properties. They are providing labour, and they have to haul their stuff with tractors through woods, where there are no roads at all, both in winter and summer for a distance of about two hundred and seventy-five miles. If the railway were put through the Peace River country transportation would be brought almost to their doors at least, that is the way they would feel, because they would have to travel a distance of only fifteen or twenty miles to reach a railway. One can imagine the difference it would make to the work of the placer miners. But that is not all.

In addition to the placer miners there are the lode miners. When one surveys the possibilities for lode mining he is simply staggered. I want to say that the whole 7,500 square miles is just as capable of production as the particular section about which I am now going to speak. It is just as capable of producing large quantities of gold and providing employment for many men. By the way, in passing let me say that in British Columbia we have, as hon. members from British Columbia know, what for the last ten or fifteen years has been described as a white elephant. I am referring to the Pacific Great Eastern railway. The year 1933 was the first year since the construction of the railway that it has paid operating expenses. This year on the operation of the railway we had a profit of $73,000. That is a very satisfactory result when we remember what has been happening since the road was first built.

What is the reason for the change? What made it possible for the Pacific Great Eastern to make a profit?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Gold.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): Nothing else but gold. Only one thing has been responsible, and that has been the activity in the gold mining portion of that district. Just to show hon. members what a little change it takes in industry to take a railway out of the red and put it on a paying basis may I say that in Barkerville, one of the most active areas, probably an area of ten square miles—not more than that—is the one which is under investigation at the present time. I do not think there is much more than double that amount under investigation in the Bridge river country. On account of the activity in the mining industry these two small areas have brought that railway from a non-paying proposition to a paying proposition. Is it not well that this house should be reminded of conditions of that kind when we are talking about the Peace River railway. I think we should have our attention directed to the possibilities for mining in the Peace River country. Do not forget what 7,500 square miles of area means in a placer mining country. There are good rivers which will produce employment on their benches and bars for placer mining. We have the Finlay, the Parsnip, the Peace and fifteen or twenty of their tributaries throughout the whole of their length.

The one particular prospect to which I shall direct the attention of hon. members in connection with lode mining, is that located at Mount Selwyn, at the junction of the Parsnip and the Finlay rivers. Mount Selwyn is one of those large, barren looking mountains that anyone may see in British Columbia in almost any quarter he may travel. But the fact that it contains minerals makes considerable difference. What are the prospects or possibilities for that little section at the junction of the two rivers I have mentioned? I refer to the point where the Parsnip and the Finlay rivers meet, and from that point run together as the Peace river.

I shall now direct my attention to statements made by mining engineers who for the last twenty or thirty years have been examining the property. At this point I shall outline some of the results of their investigations. These men are men of good standing, and men whose opinions should be respected. They are men who have nothing to gain by giving out information which is more or less unreliable. The estimated tonnage in the one property at the junction of the two rivers I have mentioned is 1,384,000,000 tons of ore above the level of the Peace river. Some hon. members have heard of Canadian mines which go down three or four thousand feet below the level of the present stream. There is no reason why the ore in Mount Selwyn would not go to any conceivable depth. It might just as well go six or seven thousand feet below the rivers as it towers four or five thousand feet above the river. One engineer has made the statement that if the ore averaged $2 a ton, it would be the largest mine in the world. A number of assays have been taken, and of 63 assays the ore averaged $4.28 on the old valuation of gold. Also four hundred samples of that same ore ran from $4.70 to as high as $12 a ton.

I could elaborate, Mr. Speaker, on the possibilities of mineral production in the Peace River country and in the territory contiguous to this proposed railway at much greater length than I have done. Probably I could write such a good prospectus that many hon. gentlemen listening to me would wish to subscribe and take shares in some of these properties; but I do not propose to go any further. All I can say is that I am amazed that this situation should remain as it has done before this parliament, where it has been under continuous discussion for the last ten or twelve years, with nothing done. After the house has had the advantage of listening to the case presented year after year by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) the situation still remains as it was ten years ago. It is amazing. The biggest surprise I got out of it all was when I turned up the records to-day and found that on a proposition of this kind only thirty-nine members of the house were found supporting it and all the rest opposing it.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the development of the Peace River country does not rest only upon the production of wheat. It is time that greater attention was paid to the other possibilities of the Peace River country and that we forget about wheat. I would not be at all alarmed over the possibility of an extra production of wheat because the people in the Peace River country are all intelligent—they would not be there if they were not—and they know just as well as we do what the situation is regarding wheat. They are not going to grow wheat when they cannot sell it. Do not believe for one minute that they are going to grow a lot of wheat when they know perfectly well that the market cannot absorb it. They will turn their attention to other kinds of production, and there are all kinds of things that can be produced in that country in addition to wheat. I have very much pleasure, Mr. Speaker, in supporting the motion of the hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Laprairie-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to say a few words in favour of the resolution which has been moved by my hon. friend from Peace River (Mr. Kennedy). Sometimes it may be thought in this house that the people of the east and their representatives are not interested in the problems of other parts of this country. That certainly is not the case, and if my humble voice can destroy any prejudices in that regard I shall feel that I have not spoken in vain.

This year I had the advantage of making my first trip to the west. En passant, may I say that I shall always remember that trip and the kindly way in which I was received by my fellow-citizens of French and English origin and by those of Liberal and Conservative belief. I might add that the Progressives also were kind enough to facilitate my trip through the west.

I went to the Peace River district, where I have quite a number of relatives and friends who have gone out there from my own district. It is undoubtedly true that to make such a trip gives one a far better knowledge of the actual situation than one can acquire by reading books, historical and geographical, on any country. I was surprised to find that the district of Peace River is a real country by itself, rich in soil and natural resources, in mines and in timber, and possessing also many other resources which hon. members who live in that part of the country are better able to enumerate than I can. Of all the places that I had the pleasure of passing through I can truly say that none seemed to me more fertile, if I except the Red river valley, than the Peace River district itself. To judge by the way the farmers there are going in for mixed farming, it is a real province of Quebec. But as the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) said a moment ago, though Providence has blessed that country with a fertile soil and great natural resources, what advantage can the people derive from their production when prices are so low? During my trip I noticed that eggs, for instance, were given to the village store for five cents a dozen in exchange for goods. Butter, when they could sell it at all, was sold at from six to ten cents a pound. They produce not only wheat but a large quantity of oats, but they could not sell their grain at a reasonable price last summer, and one of the reasons for the poor return to the farmer was the cost of transportation. If I am well informed, it cost from five to six cents a bushel to carry the grain from the Peace River district only as far as Edmonton. At that time oats was selling at 24 cents a bushel. When you deduct the cost of transportation and the cost of production, the farmers might just as well do as some of our labouring men do—declare a strike, and just produce for themselves. That reminds me, Mr. Speaker, of a little story that I heard when I was out there. I was talking on this very subject of the prices of farm products when a farmer told me that just before I arrived all the hens of the district had met together and declared a strike. The rooster decided that with the prices being received for eggs it was useless for the hens to go to so much trouble to lay them, and so the hens decided not to lay any more. Perhaps, when he speaks again, the hon. member for Peace River will tell us just what occurred. With the prices these farmers are receiving for their products they might just as well follow the decision reached by the hens.

It is a pity that any district with so many possibilities for future development, with such interest for the newcomer should be cut off from civilization simply because this government refuses to spend sufficient money to construct this outlet. I know the government consider this matter from the financial point of view; their purse is empty after having spent so much for the construction of the Hudson Bay railway which did not bring the desired results. They have been forced to cancel a contract already entered into for the expenditure of $50,000,000 to develop the Canadian National Railways terminal in Montreal. I know the government will say that they cannot spend money at this time but I think there should be at least a vote of sympathy. I do not think I need be a prophet to say what the government will decide to do. I am afraid they will vote against this resolution. As the hon. member for Cariboo said a moment ago, only thirty-nine members supported a similar resolution moved last year. At least the government should give a vote of sympathy to this resolution. They should admit that the principle of this resolution is sound, that an outlet should be built in the near future. I am afraid the building of such an outlet will not be in the hands of the present government, but the matter would be there for the next government to take into immediate consideration. Even though the government decide that this thing is impossible at the present time, they should look to the future. An administration should not build just for the present, it should build for the future. The future of the Peace River valley is one which should not be overlooked or discarded by an inconsiderate vote. I should like to see this resolution pass unanimously so that when the time comes when the government feels that this outlet can be built, the construction will be started immediately to enable the development of the natural resources of this district. The citizens of this particular section should be afforded the opportunities to which all citizens are entitled, no matter where they live or what may be their race, religion or party.

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) upon introducing this resolution once more. Even before I came to this house I was a supporter of the building of an outlet from the Peace river. I desire also to congratulate the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) who has introduced a new light into this discussion. I hope more hon. members from the east will follow the lead of the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) and make a trip into this country. Once they do that I think they will take a different view of the whole matter. It is not my intention to take up much time; I desire only to go on record as being in favour of the building of this outlet just as soon as finances will permit. I appreciate the fact that it is not likely the government will attempt to put through a vote to build the Peace River outlet this year, but they should give the matter sympathetic consideration. It should be put on the agenda so that at some time in the future either they or their successors will construct the promised outlet to the Pacific coast.

The hon. member for Cariboo referred to gold. The Pacific Great Eastern Railway runs through his and my ridings, and I can confirm every statement he made in this regard. This railway made an operating profit in 1933. It has been referred to as a white elephant, but that term is now out of date. With the help of the miners, I think it is going to get itself out of its difficulty. In the Bridge River district two new mines were opened during 1933 and I think I am safe in prophesying that there will be three or four, and perhaps five new mines opened up during this and next year. They have not even started in that district, and the same applies to Quesnel, near where my hon. friend lives, where they have hardly scratched the surface.

The hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville referred to the fertility of this district. It might be interesting to the house to know that in British Columbia there are more fertile acres than in the whole of Japan. In addition we have unlimited natural resources such as gold, silver, copper and timber. The largest copper mine under the British flag is in my riding. In addition, there is the wonderful climate. We ask those from eastern Canada to give us support in this move. I ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) not to turn down this resolution but to give a promise that this outlet will be built just as soon as we are out of the woods financially.

Mr. OLOF HANSON (Skeena): In rising to support this motion, Mr. Speaker, as I have supported similar resolutions ever since I have been in this house and long before I came here, I wish to associate myself with what the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) said with regard to the resources of the Peace River country. I was one of the first to go into the Peace River country; there were very few settlers when I was there in 1905. I saw the possibilities then, and since that time, with railway facilities promised by all political parties in Canada, settlers have been pouring in. The hon. member for Cariboo has ably described the development that has taken place. I shall not take up any further time in adding to what has been said already; I simply wish to associate myself with the resolution.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I intend to make only a few remarks on the resolution now before the house, which reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the Peace River country should be connected by a direct railway outlet to the Pacific coast.

I think this is an important resolution; it was before the house last year and we have it up for consideration again this year. Last year the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) received a certain amount of support, but that support was not very strong or very encouraging. The fact that the resolution is introduced again this year proves that the hon. member has a good deal of courage, of persistence and of fidelity to duty, and any member of parliament who does not possess these qualities would be better off back home or doing something else. It seems to be the experience of many members of the house that though we debate a matter for years, though a question may be brought up in parliament many times, no matter what government is in power action is delayed. I congratulate the hon. member for Peace River on bringing in this resolution once more, and I also congratulate those who supported the resolution last year. I do not know how many will support it this year. I hope it will be supported by a good many hon. members, and I hope that many hon. gentlemen to the right of the Speaker will lend their support also.

May I say also, Mr. Speaker, that I really do not think hon. members should be afraid to rise in their seats and support a resolution of this kind, because it has a direct connection with their own pledges which were given in 1930. All these pledges have been read to the house time and again, but there is no reason why they should not be brought up every day of every session until there is an election, because it only brings hon. gentlemen opposite face to face with what they said they would do or would honourably try to do not only for the Peace River country but for other parts of northern Canada as well. I find, Mr. Speaker, in the pledge presented to Canada in 1930 by the Conservative party, when they appealed to the country and won the day on the ballots cast in the election, the promise to improve the whole scheme of Canadian transportation northward by the completion of the Hudson Bay route, and the pledge to construct also such branches as might be necessary to render that route most readily available to every part of Canada. In that same pledge they promised to build a Peace River outlet to the coast.

So we have a pledge dealing with this Peace River outlet, with the Hudson Bay railway and with branch line development in northern Saskatchewan, in order to make those areas more productive and more settled. But no action was taken by the government following the debate last year; no action has been taken, despite its pledge and the statements that were made in the house a year ago when this resolution was being considered. It would appear that the main reason for this lack of action is the general railway situation in Canada. No doubt the government will repeat the statement that the railway situation is not hopeful, that the tonnage is not large, that the railways are going behind, and that trade is not heavy enough to warrant any future construction of rail facilities. We find the government taking cover behind this general statement of rail policy, with the result that during the past twelve months nothing has been done by way of rail extension.

May I submit, Mr. Speaker, that apart from the mineral, timber, water power and other resources of that huge area, we must not forget the human element, which is perhaps of the greatest importance. There are thousands of settlers in that area who have come from different parts of Canada, and of course if they lack rail facilities they lack any connection worth speaking of with the outside world. In my opinion the government ought to do something to alleviate the distress of those settlers, and that is why I have risen this afternoon to say a word in connection with this resolution, as I did last year. I was one of the thirty-nine who supported the resolution then introduced, and I am quite ready to support it again.

After all, the constituency of North Battleford which I represent in this house is in very much the same position as the Peace River district. I think perhaps the railway problem in this constituency, upon which I have touched time and again in this house, is just as acute as the problem of the Peace River outlet, if not more so. In 1930 hon. members opposite made the pledge that if their party came into power there would be railway development carried on in northern Saskatchewan, northern Manitoba and northern Alberta. The government have been in power for four years now, but there has been no railway construction undertaken and no branch lines built. As a consequence men and women who have trekked from southern Alberta, southern Saskatchewan and southern Manitoba into the upper part of northwestern Saskatchewan are to-day without adequate transportation facilities. They are in the north hewing out homes for themselves, keeping off relief, trying to raise families and to do their duty by the state, and looking for rail development which has not come. Personally I think if anything at all can be done to help these people, it ought to be done.

The problem in North Battleford riding is a part of the Peace River problem; there is no doubt about that. When I touched upon that problem in the house in my speech on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I referred merely to a petition numbering 500 names, from the North Battleford constituency. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) was in his seat that day and apparently he thought I was going to read the 500 names. I had not any such intention; I wanted merely to read the preamble of the petition and to refer to its importance, when the Prime Minister rose and objected to a member reading a petition. It was not the kind of petition he thought it was; apparently he jumped to the conclusion that it was a petition to the House of Commons. It was not a petition to the House of Commons; the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) if I remember correctly, has a copy of it, as I have, and it was quite legitimate for me to mention the petition before the hon. members of this chamber and, if necessary, to read parts of it without any objection coming from the Prime Minister or any supporter of the government or of the party opposite. I was prevented, however, by a humbug argument, as it were, from referring to that petition, and that is why I think the matter should not be entirely dropped and why I take advantage of the present opportunity not only to say something in favour of the resolution, but also to deal with a counterpart of it concerning the "Northland" in northern Saskatchewan.

The Minister of Railways on a later occasion answered a question with regard to more railway accommodation in the northern part of the constituency of North Battleford by making a statement which will be found at page 643 of Hansard of February 16. I believe it is the kind of general statement which the Minister of Railways usually makes to a question of this kind. I do not know whether he can make any other answer or not. Perhaps he is in earnest and really cannot make any other answer, and if so we shall have to abide by that decision. But his answer was that I knew quite well the position of this railway north of the North Saskatchewan and in between North Battleford and Edmonton. I certainly know it quite well, but that is no reason I should not bring it up again in parliament to find out whether the government had any new policy on it. My reason for bringing it up was to discover whether the government or the Department of Railways had during the summer formulated any new policy with regard to the construction of that line, and I was quite sincere in the question I asked at that time. The minister went on to say that he had written me because I had brought the matter up time and again in the house and had also written him time and again about it. That was quite right. Then he went on further to say:

> He knows that the matter has to be submitted to the management of the railway, and when the management are deciding to recommend to the government and parliament the building of branch lines the railway he is supporting will be given consideration along with others.

That is tantamount to an admission that this branch line railway connecting the country north of the North Saskatchewan river and between North Battleford and Edmonton will not be built until there is a general program of branch line building throughout the dominion. I do not think that is fair; I believe there is such a thing as making a special case of a particular railway problem, and I believe this is just as much a particular railway problem as is the Peace River outlet.

Mr. MANION: Which of them is the hon. member supporting at the moment?

Mr. McINTOSH: I am supporting both of them. I believe the Peace River outlet is a particular problem and ought to be given special attention, and perhaps if it were, something might be done. The unfinished part of what is practically equal to a main line between North Battleford and Edmonton, north of the North Saskatchewan river, is also a particular railway problem and ought to be given special attention.

May I say again that although seventy miles of that railway line has been graded, during the last four years not a tap of work has been done on it and the grading is falling to pieces. Although 10,000 settlers from southern Saskatchewan, southern Alberta, southern Manitoba, indeed, from all parts of western Canada and many from the east, have gone into that very productive area and have been trying to hew out homes for themselves, not a thing has been done in the last four years to finish the sixty-nine or seventy miles of road that could be completed without difficulty or much cost to the country. In 1930 we had relief camps in that part of northern Saskatchewan and with seven or eight experts in laying steel, all the government would have had to do would have been to hire a few of those men and there was enough labour there to have those seventy miles steeled, yet it was not done. The steel that could have been used to complete that line has, I understand, been taken out of that district entirely; the ties are there, rotting by the wayside, and the grading is falling to pieces; yet 10,000 settlers are calling out for railway relief and for four years a policy of vacillation has been pursued with nothing accomplished. That is not fair; it is not playing the game; it is not doing what could be done, because that road, when built, will return to the exchequer of Canada every cent that is required for the building of it. There is no question about that road being a paying one. Not a single official of the Canadian National Railways can produce in the House of Commons facts to prove that any line of railways that has been built in northern Saskatchewan has not been a paying road during normal years. Those branch lines have also helped to make a paying proposition of the main line of the Canadian National between Winnipeg, Saskatoon, North Battleford and Edmonton. There is no argument that the road would not be a paying one. Not only have we seventy miles of grade ready for the steel —and it will not be in that condition very much longer if it is allowed to remain as it is for many more years; in fact, a great deal of work will have to be done on it now to put the roadbed into proper shape—but about forty miles of that road have not been graded. I would like to see those forty miles graded and the seventy miles that are graded, steeled. When those jobs are done, we shall have railway facilities for the people in that part of northern Saskatchewan and they will be encouraged to go ahead and open up more fully that splendid, productive area out of which will come a great deal of trade. The best class of hogs and of cattle are raised there; there are lumber and timber, fish and fur, and further north there are mineral areas. All in all, the districts tributary to this road have a great future and the people who have settled in them could make that future still brighter if they had the necessary railway accommodation.

In conclusion, may I say that I believe we have been told in the house time and again by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), who is also Acting Minister of Immigration, and other members of the cabinet, that the government has a wonderful back to the land policy. They want the people to go back to the land. Where were the people to go in western Canada but largely into these northern areas? Much of the land there had not been taken up, they took the government at its word, they went north, they have started their settlement duties, they have a prodigious job on their hands, and the least the government can do would be to come to the rescue of those who have taken them at their word with regard to this land policy and have settled in these northern areas, and who must have railway accommodation if they are to make the best of life in that part of Canada. So I hope many hon. members will give this resolution their support; and that the government will find it possible in the coming months to take some of the money that they propose to make use of perhaps in building public works, and apply it to railway construction in northern Alberta and northern Saskatchewan. I think it would be the worst kind of folly for the government of the day to spend fifty or a hundred million dollars in building bridges and roads and public works all over Canada where many of them would not need to be built and have in the northern parts of western Canada thousands of settlers crying out for railway relief and nothing be done in the way of railway construction. I would say that the construction of branch line facilities opening up these new areas is the question of the hour, and if any money is to be spent on public works during the summer months it should be spent on railway construction.

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton): I do not intend, Mr. Speaker, to trespass on the time of the house to any extent. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) was very properly congratulated by previous speakers on his courage and persistence in bringing this question of the Peace River outlet year after year to the attention of the government and of the house. I trust that some time or other, and we hope in the not too distant future, he will reap the reward of his persistence and realize the hopes which he has expressed in this house.

The hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) rising to support the motion gave an excellent exhibition of the way in which a man can make one point for the motion and two points for something else; one point for the problem of the Peace River outlet, and two points for the railway problems of his own constituency. Were I to follow the same line and take my hon. friend as a precedent for what I do I should occupy the time of the chamber in dealing with problems relating to my own constituency. I purpose, however, to confine myself entirely to the motion of the hon. member for Peace River. May I say in that connection, however, that it is very wonderful the way in which the memories of some hon. gentlemen operate. They are so keen and so quick to perceive and recall pledges that were given by their political opponents and so absolutely oblivious of the equally strong and clear and emphatic pledges which were given by their own leader and members of their own party.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is not correct. I said all the pledges given by the leaders of all the parties.

Mr. BURY: I said some members, I did not say all the members of the opposition. My hon. friend has not yet attained that position of preeminence in his party that when I speak of some members of the Liberal party or the opposition he must necessarily be referred to.

They are so quick to see the mote in their neighbour's eye notwithstanding the disadvantage of the lumber yards that occupy their own. I have supported the proposal of the Peace River outlet from my first connection with this house in 1926. I also supported it in 1932, and in refreshing my memory on the debate of that year I found such an excellent speech delivered by myself at that time that I was very strongly tempted to bring Hansard to the house and read the same speech on this occasion. I do not kuow whether the rules of the house would permit that or not, but I find it very difficult to amplify to any great extent what I then said.

The people of the Peace River are entitled to this concession; entitled to it for a great many reasons. One reason is the size and wealth of the area which they occupy, in veritable truth a new empire in the north. They are entitled to it by reason of the rapid growth of the population of that district and the very considerable numbers to which that population has now grown. They are entitled to it above all by reason of the unambiguous and unequivocal pledges that have been made by both parties in this house, the right hon. leader of the opposition having taken the Peace River outlet as the spearhead, whatever that means, of his policy; so fine a spearhead that when you come to see what has been done you cannot find it at all. It is like a point in Euclid—has no parts and no magnitude. We have been twitted with the fact that since this government came into power nothing has been done in the direction of a Peace River outlet. Of course everyone knows the conditions through which the country has been going and the financial and economic stress and strain and burden that has been imposed upon the government, rendering it absolutely impossible for any government, however strong its wish might be, to implement so important a promise as the construction of a Peace River outlet. But nothing is said by hon. gentlemen opposite of the years of office of the right hon. leader of the opposition when, notwithstanding his unequivocal promise, absolutely no step in this direction was taken.

It has now been suggested that we should rather encourage a rival policy to the Peace River outlet in the construction of branch lines feeding the country and connecting the outlying districts with the existing Alberta railway. I cannot say that I agree to that. I think our settlement policy was wrong from the beginning. I think the settlement policy of this country should have been as far as possible to confine settlement to the immediate neighbourhood of the railways or where railways were projected and intended to be constructed. That policy, however, was not pursued. I understand it is one of the major principles of the settlement policy of the present Alberta government, that the principle to be followed by that government is to circumscribe settlement so far as possible and keep it from going too far away from existing or projected railway lines. That is a policy that should have been instituted and rigorously observed from the very commencement. But now we have to deal with an accomplished fact, a condition that has come into existence, and it is impossible to wait for an outlet until connecting branches of railway have ramified into the far distant parts of that great territory. Moreover if any settlement is to be encouraged it can only be by making it profitable, and it can only be made profitable by providing an outlet to the Pacific coast. Where that outlet shall come is a matter entirely for engineers, I am not going to deal with that question. I wish merely to say that my whole and hearty support is given to the motion of the hon. member for Peace River, though I am quite aware and keenly alive to the present financial and economic conditions in Canada, and the other great burdens resting upon the government. I very much feel on that account that any action which can be taken certainly could not be taken this year.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, for an hour and a half I have listened to a very interesting debate on the question of a railway to connect the Peace River section with the Pacific ocean. At once I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) and the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) both of whom are directly interested in this question, on the consistence and persistence with which they have brought it before the house during many years past. The other day I made it my business to check up on the number of speeches made by the hon. member for Peace River in regard to this matter, and I find that from the years 1922 to 1934, inclusive, he has made at least one speech a year. This, therefore, is his thirteenth annual pilgrimage to the shrine, and I hope it will meet at least with as good luck as did the others. The number thirteen is supposed to be unlucky, but on this occasion I hope we shall be as generous in our promises as we have been in other years.

I might express a further opinion, sir, that the addresses delivered this afternoon from all sides of the house and all sections of the country have been, with one exception—and it was not a very great exception—absolutely moderate and non-political. The exception I fear I shall have to point out was that of the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh)—

Mr. McINTOSH: I thought that was coming.

Mr. MANION: —who finds it difficult to get away from politics at any time, even on an occasion like this, when two-thirds of his time was used in speaking for his own constituency, and one-third for the Peace River outlet. He permitted himself to get into the political field rather extensively.

Mr. McINTOSH: Killing two birds with one stone is pretty good work, isn't it?

Mr. MANION: Attempting to kill a number of birds with one stone was what the hon. member was trying to do. The hon. members for Peace River and Vancouver Centre have pointed out that in the past all parties have promised some relief to this new land or last empire of northwestern Canada. On a number of occasions the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) stated that this is an obligation of honour upon both parties, and in his statement I think there is a good deal of truth. After all, however, it must not be forgotten that during the last four years conditions in this country have been of such a character, due to general world conditions, as to bring us to the realization that circumstances alter cases and, therefore, may sometimes be permitted even to alter promises. While it is true that in that northwestern section of our country my right hon. leader made promises—at least, it is so stated, and I have not found anything to justify a contradiction—I must draw to the attention of the house the fact that conditions have been such that I doubt if any government would have been justified, heretofore, in spending money upon the construction of the road.

I was particularly interested in the speech of the hon. member for Cariboo. I am not saying this simply because he spoke from this side of the house, because it is a fact that members from all quarters of the house have supported the project. But the hon. member did bring into the picture a number of very interesting new points, and described vividly and in most interesting fashion the north country of British Columbia, leaving the description of northern Alberta to the hon. member for Peace River. In my view the hon. member for Cariboo delivered a most inspiring address, from the standpoint of that section of the country, in support of the resolution of the hon. member for Peace River. The hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) did what so many hon. members from Quebec do to inspire the rest of us—although, not always with success—when he delivered in English an excellent speech in support of the resolution. He did say in his remarks that he did not suppose we would give even sympathetic consideration to the resolution. Well, I shall at once dispose of that by saying that the hon. member for Peace River has always had my sympathy, coming as I do from a section of Canada sparsely provided with railways and, like the Peace River country, in proportion to area not well supplied with population. I feel that I am particularly qualified to sympathize with the hon. member in his desire to have these 40,000 people served by a railway.

Of course in a country of such vast proportions as Canada railways are very necessary. The fact remains however that the money required to build them reaches such large amounts that even a few miles of railway constructed through a section of the country such as would have to be traversed in building this outlet runs into huge sums of money. The various estimates as to the cost of building the outlet run all the way from $13,000,000 to $80,000,000, according to the number of branch lines constructed. Various investigations have been made into the proposal now before us. References have been made to some of them this afternoon. Four routes have been mentioned as possible methods of getting out of the Peace River territory into other parts of Canada. One, which was more or less generally condemned by at least two or three hon. members, was the so-called Aggie-Obed route, where there would be a back haul of some considerable distance. But the routings which were recommended in some of the earlier investigations made by the Canadian National Railways—although I do not think the Aggie-Obed route was supported in the earlier investigations by the Canadian Pacific Railway—were the Monkman pass route, the Pine pass route and the Peace pass route. The latter, I believe, is the one which has received the greatest amount of support from hon. members this afternoon. In connection with that outlet it is only fair to say that the late Sir Henry Thornton and Mr. Beatty discussed the matter with me on various occasions. They took the attitude that now would not be an appropriate time to spend a large sum of money upon this project, because—at least some of them took this attitude—it would take at least ten times the traffic now offering in that district to enable the road to pay its way. That was the summing up of their correspondence with me, and also the summing up of some of the reports made in regard to the project.

Four different reports have been made. The last one was in 1932, when a committee of engineers was appointed partly, if not altogether, at the request of myself. The commission was composed of Mr. Gzowski, of the Canadian National Railways, Mr. Fairbairn, of the Canadian Pacific Railway and Mr. Crysdale, as the third man, not appointed by the province of British Columbia, but whose appointment was agreed to by that province. Although the commissioners did not visit the section in connection with the making of the report, all had previously visited the section, on various occasions and were familiar with the problem. Their report was tabled in this House of Commons and on a number of occasions has been referred to in debate. These gentlemen took the attitude that they could not make a recommendation. While their findings have already been placed on record, although not in this debate, for the sake of the present record perhaps I might be permitted to read a brief synopsis of their report. They say:

> At the time the 1925 report was made, local interests were mainly concerned in obtaining a western outlet to cheapen their freight cost to the Pacific, and supply further railway mileage in the district. Since that time, a reduction of freight rates has been accorded them, now substantially equalling rates which would obtain if a western outlet were in use.

Further on they say:

> In view of the above, our conclusions are:
> 1. No western outlet is justified for the present, as the existing railway furnishes the most economical route. It will take many times the present traffic to justify another railway outlet.
> 2. The Obed route for a western outlet is the most favourable from a railway economic standpoint, considering the present phase of the railway situation.
> 3. We recommend that the matter of a final route be decided when the question is a practical one, believing that by the time the volume of traffic has reached a point where a western outlet is justified, general and possible local conditions may have materially changed. When the decision is imperative, the whole situation should be reviewed, in order to appraise all the contributing factors, including the potential traffic which may accrue from the lands beyond the definite areas included in this report.

That in brief was the report of the Crysdale committee, if I may term it such, signed by J. M. R. Fairbairn, chief engineer of the Canadian Pacific; C. S. Gzowski, chief engineer of construction, Canadian National Railways, and C. R. Crysdale, consulting engineer. I am quoting it from the unrevised Hansard of March 14, 1932, when I put it on Hansard during the discussion that then took place.

After that report was made public both Sir Henry Thornton and Mr. Beatty informed me that they agreed with it. They took the attitude, as has been taken by others, that what was needed more than a direct outlet was more branch lines in that territory. In that regard I have noticed that Mr. Brownlee, the premier of Alberta, appearing not very long ago before the royal commission on transportation, generally known as the Duff commission, which was investigating the whole railway problem of this country, gave some opinions which I think it is well to put on Hansard, Mr. Brownlee being a particularly able statesman and a man who does speak to a large extent for a considerable portion of the province of Alberta. He is quoted as follows:

> All I will say is this: So far as our provincial government is concerned we would not say that there is such a necessity for that outlet—

He was speaking of the Peace River outlet:

> —that in a time of financial difficulty the matter should become an urgent one. We do believe that what is far more urgent is that there should be a moderate expansion of branch lines in order that the railways may secure the full benefit of the potential development that is there and the settlement that has gone in. Settlement has gone into the Peace River country to a very large extent in districts fifty or sixty miles from any railway, and as a provincial government we urge very strongly that the small expenditure necessary to provide branch lines to enable those who have gone in to develop their holdings and to make a contribution will be far wiser at the moment than any coast outlet.

He also referred to a telegram from Grande Prairie to the Duff commission with reference to this outlet, and said:

> I have not read it, but I assume you will find that that telegram differs somewhat from the opinion that we have expressed. We have not so far been able to bring ourselves in line with the views either of the people of Vancouver or of the people immediately at Grande Prairie that the expenditure on another line of railway through to the Pacific coast, so far as this province is concerned, is a necessity. It may be that the development in the northern part of British Columbia would seem to justify a line of that kind, but we would certainly emphasize strongly that what we conceive to be the needs of the Peace River country will best be served by branch lines rather than by such an extension.

I quote that merely to show that there is a difference of opinion in regard to the matter, and for that reason I cannot help but feel that it is a little difficult for a government to promise immediately, under present financial conditions, to undertake such a task as the building of a road from the Peace River territory whether by one route or the other, at a cost of from ten to perhaps fifty million dollars. The two great transcontinental railways still take the attitude that they cannot afford to make any heavy capital expenditures, nor can they permit themselves, they still submit, to go into any branch line construction. They are quite willing—naturally they would have no objection—that the dominion government itself, if it wishes, as a government should construct this line, whether by the Peace pass outlet or any other. By the way, on the last occasion on which I discussed this question with the two then heads of the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National, they both did favour the Peace pass route along the Peace river and then cutting down to join with the Pacific Great Eastern which, as has been pointed out here this afternoon, last year made a profit on operating for the first time in many years. But they do not admit that they would agree to making the railways in any way responsible for the expenditure of one dollar to make that connection. Therefore, if anything were done, it would be entirely a problem to be faced by the government and the people of Canada at this time and perhaps for some time to come.

It is worth remembering that during the years that have gone the railway rates from the Peace River area, both to Vancouver and to Fort William, have been lowered considerably. My hon. friend from Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) and my hon. friend from Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) know that very well, but as some others in the house may not know the facts I shall place the rates on Hansard in order to keep the record full enough so that the question may be fairly well understood:

Rate on Grain from Grande Prairie to Fort William (Per 100 pounds)

	Cents
1921	63½
1922	45
1924	43
1925	35½

In other words, the rate in 1925 and since that time has been a little over one-half the rate existing in 1921. Here are the rates from Grande Prairie to Vancouver for the same quantity of wheat:

Rate on Grain from Grande Prairie to Vancouver
(Per 100 pounds)

	Cents
1921	58½
1922	45
1923	43
1924	39½
1925	28

In other words, the rate in 1925 was considerably less than half the rate in existence in 1921. The rates which I have just given, namely, 35½ cents per 100 pounds from Grande Prairie to Fort William, and 28 cents per 100 pounds from Grande Prairie to Vancouver for 1925 are still the rates in existence between those points.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Is the rate the same to Prince Rupert as to Vancouver?

Mr. MANION: I imagine it is.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): Yes.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend from Peace River confirms my own understanding.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Has my hon. friend quoted the rate from Edmonton to the coast?

Mr. MANION: I have it here, having sent out during the debate to get it. I hoped that it would show that the rate from Edmonton to the coast was about the same, but I find that the rate from Edmonton to Vancouver at the present time is 20 cents as against the rate from Grande Prairie to Vancouver of 28 cents; and that the rate from Edmonton to Fort William is 26 cents, as against the rate from Grande Prairie to Fort William of 35½ cents. I have also here the rates per 100 pounds from Saskatoon to Vancouver and to Fort William, and I might as well give those. From Saskatoon to Vancouver the rate is 24 cents, as against the rate from Grande Prairie to Vancouver of 28 cents; and from Saskatoon to Fort William the rate is 22 cents, as against the rate from Grande Prairie to Fort William of 35½ cents.

So there is no doubt that the people of Grande Prairie and of the Peace River country generally are up against pretty heavy rates in the shipment of their products. Of course, we cannot forget that Canada in the past has built too many railways. We built three where two would have been ample. We have had so much duplication and unnecessary competition from coast to coast in Canada that, as someone expressed it here this afternoon, the railway question is, as this house knows, the greatest problem without exception that Canada has to face at the present time. He would be a courageous man who would take the attitude that Canada has not too many railways, too many canals and too much duplication of various other kinds of facilities and utilities.

It must be admitted that world conditions in general and Canadian conditions in particular have been improving during the last few months. To my mind there is no doubt that conditions are on the upgrade. It is my belief that within a few short years, perhaps in one or two, conditions will be back practically to normal. But at the moment I should not like to take it upon myself to say that conditions have approached so nearly to normal that as a member of this government I could promise to start forthwith the building of this railway.

I took a briefer part in the debate last year than I have done to-day. At that time I was perhaps more frank than polite in replying to my hon. friend; I told him that we could not give this matter any consideration. I did not mean that as a short answer, although, and perhaps quite rightly, my hon. friend was annoyed. I thought it better to say just what I thought on the matter, that it was beyond the realm of possibility at the time. I believe that conditions to-day have improved so much that, without promising immediate construction or anything of that sort, I can promise that the matter will be given fair and honest consideration.

During the past few months both the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific Railway have been able to show better earnings than they have shown for some time. From about 1928 the returns for these railways started to go down and down until we began to think there was no bottom to the pit into which they seemed to be descending. But six months ago, for the first time in two or three years, railway earnings started to increase; that is, the earnings for each week of this year began to show an improvement over the earnings of the corresponding week last year. This improvement has continued for almost six months without interruption, and this in spite of the fact that our grain has not been selling very well throughout the world during the past year. Our wheat sales have not been such as to satisfy most of us, whether from the west or from the east. The earnings of the Canadian National Railways for the month of January and the first three weeks of February show an increase of something over $3,000,000 compared with the corresponding seven weeks of the previous year. I am sure that all members, from whatever portion of the country they may come or to whatever party they belong, will be pleased to know that our railway situation has somewhat improved. Whether we or some other party is in power, the fact remains that the people of Canada have been placed in the unfortunate position of having to pay the deficits on that great system. In the past these deficits have amounted to huge sums and I am very happy to be able to state to the house and to the country that the railway situation appears to be steadily improving.

Last year the hon. member moved a motion similar to the one he now moves, and it was voted down. In 1932 the hon. member moved a motion which was slightly different in its terms. His motion of 1932 read as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, in the best interests of Canada, it is desirable that the construction of the Peace River outlet should be commenced at the earliest possible date.

I believe I am correct in stating that the resolutions of this and last year are the same.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): Yes.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman confirms that statement. His resolution this year reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the Peace River country should be connected by a direct railway outlet to the Pacific coast.

I intend to move in amendment, seconded by the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) that three words be added to this resolution. There may be some question as to whether they alter the meaning, but I think they would make the resolution more acceptable to myself, to the members of the government and to hon. members on this side. I hope my hon. friend will accept this amendment and that the house will give it unanimous support. My amendment is:

> That the resolution be amended by adding the following words: "when circumstances permit."

The resolution will then read:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the Peace River country should be connected by a direct railway outlet to the Pacific coast when circumstances permit.

This amendment is not moved with any desire of blocking the resolution, but rather to call attention to the necessities of the present financial situation. May I point out that a resolution which was voted down last year by a vote of 133 to 39, I believe it was,

is not in a much better position to be accepted by the house this year. The opposition last year came from all sections of the house just as did the support, in lesser degree. I have the greatest sympathy for the hon. member for Peace River and I desire to give some encouragement to him and to the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser). I suggest therefore that the hon. gentleman accept the amendment on the understanding that it means exactly what it says; that when circumstances permit, which we trust will be in the very near future, every consideration will be given this project.

Mr. McINTOSH: Is the minister's conclusion with regard to the Peace River outlet the same as his conclusion with regard to all branch line facilities?

Mr. MANION: I have no desire to enter into a discussion of my hon. friend's project. If the hon. gentleman will ask me again on some suitable occasion, I will answer him. I do not think we should muddy the waters, so to speak, by drawing the Saskatchewan river into the Peace.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Peace at any price.

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I think I should reply to one or two of the arguments which have been put forward and also indicate my position with regard to the amendment. During the course of the debate it was stated that we should forget all about wheat. I believe that the best type of railway is one near to agricultural, mining and lumbering activities.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): Was my hon. friend referring to me?

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): No, I think it was some other hon. member. I should like to remind the house that the Peace River district is likely to be producing wheat even at a time when great difficulty might face other wheat producing parts of the world. Herman Trelle won the prize at Chicago three years in succession. His exhibit was such that a special order was passed preventing him from exhibiting for a period of three years. He was classed as a super-crop man and was not permitted to exhibit for three years as other exhibitors were becoming discouraged when they were forced to exhibit against him. It would seem, therefore, that we will be producing wheat just as long as the world requires that commodity. But I realize how much stronger our case is when we produce other commodities, and this argument applies more particularly to that section of British Columbia referred to by the hon. member for Cariboo. When the minister says that certain steps will be taken as soon as circumstances permit, I am not quite willing to accept that on the basis laid down by the engineers. In all their reports they make the point that until the present lines pay and leave enough over and above to make this outlet pay, the road will not be built. There never was a railway built in Canada on that basis and I do not think we should be asked to comply with such conditions, in order to justify our request for a railway, which never had to be complied by any pioneering settlement in any part of Canada. In 1927, notwithstanding the discouraging report of the engineers, the northern Alberta railways actually paid their operating expenses and had enough money left to pay their fixed charges of about $800,000. Yet that was the year in which they brought down this report which said there was no hope, even with the freight rate of 39 cents—and it was on the 30 cent basis that this surplus was acquired—of the lines paying even operating expenses with the immediate traffic or with many times the immediate traffic.

Something was made of the statement by Mr. Brownlee, and I have this to say to the minister: I am not asking for a vote of $13,000,000 or $10,000,000 this year or next year, but there are at least 300 miles of line in that country that will be either part of the main line or branch lines and that will serve settlements now actually in existence. So there is no real conflict at all between the man who says we need branch lines and the man who says we should build the outlet. I do not think I need elaborate that point; in the one case, if you construct this 300 miles of road and take the Peace pass route, it will be part of the main line serving the settlements, but if any other line is built it will be a branch line that will be necessary in any event.

I am disposed, Mr. Speaker, to accept the amendment, always remembering that we can discuss the matter again, and also in view of the financial situation of the country, but I do submit that if we are going to undertake a program of public works in this country certainly we ought to consider whether or not some portion of that money should be spent in the development of a line that will be part of any Peace River outlet that is built. So, Mr. Speaker, while the motion and the amendment are in the hands of the house, I am disposed to accept the motion as amended if the other hon. members are willing to do so; if they are not of course I shall have to vote for the motion.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion as amended agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROPOSED CONSIDERATION OF CAPITAL STRUCTURE BY BOARD OF TRUSTEES

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North) moved:

Whereas, the attention of this house has been drawn by the Royal Commission to inquire into railways and transportation in Canada to the urgent necessity which exists for an early consideration of the capital structure of the Canadian railways (vide section 84-87 of that report), and

Whereas, that commission recognized that a very substantial part of the money invested in the railways comprised within the Canadian National System must be regarded as lost and that its capital liabilities should be heavily written down although the said royal commission did not deem the time opportune when making the said royal report to deal with this important matter but suggested that the same receive early consideration by the board of trustees, and

Whereas, a board of trustees has been appointed by the government:

Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, it is of vital importance that the attention of the board of trustees of the Canadian National Railways be directed to this matter and that this house deems it highly desirable that the said board of trustees shall consider this question and report thereon with the least possible delay as being of vital and primary importance in the interests of all concerned.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take up very much of the time of the house; the resolution speaks for itself. This is purely a matter of business and has nothing to do with politics. As hon. gentlemen have said already this afternoon, this railway situation is one of our big problems. Now we have a new board of directors, and when you, Mr. Speaker, or any other business man, put a board of directors in charge of that business your ambition is to see that they make it pay. If the new trustees are business men, as I think they are, in my opinion they would want this capital structure remoulded. A great deal of money has been lost, and it is not fair to ask this new board of directors to make provision for that money. It must be written off some time, and while perhaps it should have been done before this, in my opinion there is no excuse for further delay. I realize that this is a huge undertaking; we will be told that there are so many subsidiary companies that it is not possible to carry out this suggestion, but this is a practical proposition, and in my opinion this resolution should be accepted by the government.

This resolution has as its object the early stabilization of what may be properly called one of the most important public utilities in Canada, the Canadian National Railways, in which we are all interested because it is owned by the government of Canada. It is not my intention to dwell on how, when or why we became possessed of this great system of transportation; we now own it and, in my humble opinion, should control it and show an interest in its welfare, and in my judgment the first step in proper and intelligent control is to reduce the capitalization as soon as possible to its true present-day value. Such a step as is proposed in the resolution is essential if we are to expect that considerable measure of relief for the taxpayers of Canada to which the Duff report refers. I should like to refer to section 86, which is found at page 30 of that report:

It has been suggested that in view of the excessive capital liabilities in relation to the earning power of the system they should be reduced to an amount which would more nearly approximate the earning power of the railway. The net operating income (i.e., the amount available for interest and dividends) of the Canadian National System for the period 1923 to 1931 inclusive averaged $24,414,447 per annum. This figure would require adjustment if adequate provision were made for depreciation.

It is obvious that on this basis of earnings the capital liabilities would require a very drastic writing down. And while this commission is of opinion that it must be frankly recognized that a very substantial part of the money invested in the railways comprised within the Canadian National System must be regarded as lost and that its capital liabilities should be heavily written down, they do not consider that the time is opportune to deal with this important matter.

That was their opinion at the time this report was made, but they go on in the next section, 87;

This question as well as that previously referred to, dealing with the present involved financial structure of the Canadian National System, should, in the opinion of the commission, have the early attention of the board of trustees, which it is recommended should be entrusted with the control and management of the System.

That the problem is a great one, there can be no two opinions, and it is worthy of serious consideration. I would remind the house that the demands of the Canadian National Railways upon the federal treasury have been an important factor in disastrously impairing international credits, so much so that there is difficulty in securing immediate relief in an acute situation through fresh borrowings from Great Britain and the United States. I would refer hon. members to the report, paragraph XII, page 31 in regard to this matter. This situation, so graphically described by the commission, is in itself sufficient justification for our beginning at once a wise stock taking.

But there are other reasons. It is a well known fact that the demands of the Canadian National Railways upon the federal treasury have created a financial problem which have been the cause of an increase in taxation.

The resolution, in my opinion, is a step in the right direction and will permit of a better solution of present difficulties. By way of further justification of the resolution I would again refer to the report, for it clearly indicates "the excessive capital liabilities in relation to the earning power of the system should be to an amount which would nearly approximate the earning power of the railway."

Without labouring the question by quoting facts and figures, I would direct the attention of hon. members to paragraphs VIII, IX and X, pages 27 to 30 of the report, wherein will be found facts the seriousness of which will convince the reader that now is the opportune time to direct the attention of the board of trustees to the fact that now is not too soon to take stock and put into operation a rigid course of assessment by revaluation of what, in my humble opinion, is a national asset which, if properly and judiciously managed, may become of infinite worth to the people of this far-flung dominion. To the members of this house as representatives of the people, as custodians of the system, in fairness to all concerned, the board of trustees, the bondholders and employees, but above all to the people as taxpayers and owners, this resolution is submitted in the hope that it may receive favourable consideration.

I do not know just what attitude the government intends taking in connection with this matter. As I said before, it is purely a business proposition and not by any means a political move, and some action should be taken in the very near future. I move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): Mr. Speaker, with the general principle of revising the capitalization of the Canadian National Railways I am in complete accord and have been from the time the railways were absorbed by the Canadian people and consolidated into the national system. But the basis upon which the majority of the advocates of recapitalization base their argument is fair neither to the Canadian people nor to the railway system of this country. As a rule the argument advanced—and I was not quite able to follow my hon. friend in the plan that he would suggest—is that the capitalization of all the railways as they stand to-day is attributable to the moneys that were spent on them before the Canadian people became the actual owners and operators of them. It is with that view that I entirely disagree. I maintain and have maintained, as a matter of fact I urged at the time the bill to consolidate the railways was before the house in the first instance, that the capitalization as it then existed of all the several lines should have been written down to the place where the actual value of the lines as they stood at that time would represent the amount of capital on which we expected them to earn a return. But to take the capitalization as it is to-day after the Canadian people have been responsible for spending on that railway enormous sums of money from which no return can ever be expected, is not presenting to our people a fair picture of the railway situation.

It might be interesting again to put into the records of the house what the capitalization was when the railways were taken over. Beginning with the original government railway, the Intercolonial, as it stood in 1919 when the bill was passed, the capital charge was $137,000,000 odd. Having regard to the character of the line, its physical condition and equipment, this was a fair and reasonable valuation; anything that has been added since has been added by the deliberate action of the parliament of Canada and is properly applicable as a charge against the railway line, because the Canadian parliament has been and still is responsible for the manner in which the line has been operated.

We come next to the National Transcontinental which was built from Moncton to Winnipeg by the people of Canada themselves at a cost of around $173,000,000. Properly, that is itself a charge against the railways. But the money that was wasted by the people of Canada in the construction of that line is not a proper charge, and before I conclude I shall give the amount that should have been written off at the time in order that the Transcontinental in its physical condition would represent a proper ratio of capital charge in proportion to the value of the property.

The next is the Canadian Northern Railway, the 10,000 odd miles that were taken over in 1919 at a capital cost to Canada of $386,000,000. The water, whatever there was in it, was squeezed out of the Canadian Northern, and no cheaper railroad mileage in its physical condition, no better asset from a railway standpoint, was ever produced in this country than the Canadian people secured in the Canadian Northern lines at a cost of $386,000,000 when they were taken over in 1919.

Then we come to the Grank Trunk. The capital charge and present liabilities of the National railways on account of the Grand Trunk Railway when it was taken over by arbitration was $216,000,000, making a total for these four sections of the national system of around $913,000,000. It is frequently stated that the people of Canada were loaded with a lot of deadwood obligations because of the Grand Trunk Railway. But what are the facts? The stockholders of the Grand Trunk, the English people who put their money into it, are the people out of whom that money was squeezed.

Mr. MUNN: May I ask the hon. member a question? Is he speaking in favour of the resolution or against it?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am speaking in favour of the resolution. I am speaking in favour of having the capitalization of these roads fixed, and fixed on a proper basis, so that the people will know exactly what the roads cost them, and why, and what the roads must earn if they are to compete on a proper basis with other railways. As I have said, the Grand Trunk, the best planned railway system in eastern Canada, second to but few comparable systems in the United States, came into the possession of the Canadian people for the sum of $216,000,000, in round figures.

Now we come to the fifth section, the Grand Trunk Pacific, built in association with the National Transcontinental under terms by which the Canadian people were responsible in the same degree for the money spent on it as they were for the money spent on the transcontinental in the east. Why? Because under the terms of the contract entered into with the Grand Trunk the Canadian engineers, or the officials of the transcontinental east of Winnipeg, were responsible for checking the expenditures on the Grand Trunk Pacific west of Winnipeg. Likewise the officers of the Grand Trunk Pacific, in reality of the Grand Trunk, were responsible for checking the expenditures on the transcontinental. The figure for the Grand Trunk Pacific was $124,826,000. If I wanted to take the time I think I could find where I have said in this house that it always seemed to me that these two groups of men vied with each other to see which would waste the most money, all chargeable to the Canadian people; for in reality that is what happened—it was a campaign of extravagance equalled only by what has taken place since the lines were taken over by the people themselves.

The gross total of charges against all these lines at the time they were taken over was $1,106,000,000 odd. To put them on a proper basis and show what should have been charged up to them at that time, there should have been written off from the cost of the transcontinental east of Winnipeg and the Grand Trunk Pacific west of Winnipeg the sum of $265,000,000. That is the total sum that should be written off, because the management of the Canadian National Railways has been responsible for every dollar that has gone into them from that day to this. That would have made the total at the time they were taken over, $841,000,000 odd.

At the time the railways were taken over and consolidated into the Canadian National system an accurate estimate was made of what it would require to bring this whole system into such a condition that it could be rated as a class one road as that term is used in reference to railway lines all over North America. Had that been followed out it would have resulted in a basis of approximately $60,000 a mile for the whole Canadian National railway system, including the roadbed and everything that goes with it, and equipment. It may be interesting to the house to know that we secured the Canadian Northern with everything it possessed on a basis of $33,000 odd per mile. But to bring it up to standard would require further expending. I have the figures under my hand but will not take the time to put them into the record, showing what would have been required to bring that line up to a class one basis or $60,000 a mile covering the whole system. The old Grand Trunk, as it is commonly termed, which forms the main connecting link through eastern Canada for the Canadian National system, was a double track line and properly should carry a higher capitalization than the single track lines that constituted the major portion of the system all across Canada. The point is that meanwhile the Canadian people, through the management of the national system, have added something like $1,500,000,000 to the capitalization of the whole. Some say that should all be written off and the lines left with a capital of $840,000,000. But if the Canadian people are to have a proper understanding of what the Canadian National railway system means to them and has meant to them and will mean to them, the proper thing is to begin where we started and squeeze out the water that was in the lines at the time they were taken over. But the water we have ourselves pumped in should properly remain so that the people will realize what they are doing.

I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 1, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMITTEE

Mr. J. EARL LAWSON (West York) presented the first report of the special committee on the Civil Service Act and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

SCOTSBURN, PICTOU COUNTY, MAIL CONTRACT

Mr. URQUHART:

1. What are the names of the parties who tendered for the mail contract for Scotsburn No. 3 rural mail route, Pictou county, when the last contract was awarded?
2. What was the amount of each tender?
3. To whom was the contract awarded and at what price?

Mr. DUPRE:

1 and 2. Kenneth Matheson, $600 (minor); Hugh McL. Munro, $780; Daniel M. McKay, $786; Albert Gordon Blackie, $790.

3. Hugh McL. Munro at $780 per annum.

NEW ZEALAND BUTTER

Mr. McPHEE:

1. How many pounds of New Zealand butter came to Canada in the calendar year 1933?
2. How many pounds of New Zealand butter are at present on consignment in Canada?
3. How many pounds of New Zealand butter have been released for sale in Canada since January 1, 1934?

Mr. MATTHEWS:

1. Imports of New Zealand butter entered for consumption in Canada, calendar year 1933, 1,321,208 pounds.

2. New Zealand butter in customs custody February 28, 1934, 320,146 pounds.

3. Imports of New Zealand butter entered for consumption in Canada since January 1, 1934, as recorded from entries received in Ottawa to February 28, 1934, 376,992 pounds.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT DRAFTING

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. Did the government, Marine department, or any other department, procure any assistance outside the public service of Canada to draft, edit or otherwise prepare for printing the text of the Canada Shipping Act which was introduced in the Senate as Bill J, on March 8, 1933?
2. If so, who is the person or who are the persons who have been required for such assistance, stating their names, professions and addresses?
3. What amount, remuneration or gratuity, if any, was paid to any such person for that assistance, as well as for any travelling expenses, living allowance or extra costs, if any?
4. What was the cost of printing the English and French versions of said bill?
5. Has the government, the Marine department or any other department, procured any assistance outside the public service of Canada to have the said bill corrected or otherwise redrafted for introduction during the present session?

Mr. CAHAN:

1. Yes.

2. Martin Griffin, K.C., barrister, of Vancouver, B.C.

3. Fees, $4,250 (January 13 to March 7, 1933); travelling expenses, $327.70; living allowance, $564; extra costs, $52.56, Total $5,194.26.

4. English version (603 copies), $1,494.20; French version (200 copies), $2,168.93.

5. No.

CANADIAN LEGATION BUILDING, TOKYO

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. On what date was the order in council adopted in connection with the erection of a public building for the Canadian legation at Tokyo?
2. Was the said order in council made public?
3. If so, when?

Mr. BENNETT:

1. August 31, 1932.

2. No; but the substance was included in a statement given to the press by the Acting Prime Minister on August 31, 1933.

3. Answered by No. 2.

PROVINCIAL SUBSIDIES

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Will there be an increase in the subsidies to the provinces, and particularly to the province of New Brunswick, during the present fiscal year?

2. If so, by what additional amount and on what ground?

Mr. BENNETT: I think upon reflection the hon. gentleman will realize that this question, asking the government what its purposes are, is an improper form of question.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

MAIL SUBSIDIES

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

What amounts were paid for the carrying of mails, by way of subsidies, contracts, grants or otherwise to: (a) the Canadian Pacific Railway; (b) the Canadian National Railways; (c) the Canadian Pacific Steamships; (d) the Canadian National Steamships, during the last calendar year?

Mr. CAHAN: Return tabled herewith.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE FOR GOVERNMENT BUSINESS AFTER MONDAY, MARCH 5

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Monday the 5th of March, 1934, and every Monday thereafter until the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence over all other business except questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

He said: This means that Monday last was the last Monday for private members. I think that perhaps we have gone longer than on some other occasions before taking Monday as a government day. This will still leave Wednesdays for private members, together with the usual provisions for private bills. I do not know that I can usefully add anything to what the motion itself indicates.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there is still on the order paper a number of notices of motions, and I wonder if the government could allow one other Monday before taking Mondays for government business.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, the government extended the period one Monday beyond the usual Monday. We did not ask that last Monday should be taken. There has been an opportunity I think to discuss every motion that has been on the order paper. They were called, but the hon. members in whose names they stood were not prepared to go on. Wednesday will still be available for private members, and I see no reason why there should be another Monday taken, but if later on it should develop that that is desirable we shall try to make arrangements accordingly.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I point out to the Prime Minister that the government, contrary to its usual custom, took up several Thursdays in connection with the debate on the address. I would also point out that there are some motions on the order paper which have not yet been reached.

Mr. BENNETT: I only desire to point out that taking the course we did was a distinct advantage to private members, for the order that gives precedence to the address involves that every Thursday that is a private member's day shall be taken up with the debate on the address. But in this instance that was not the case, and there were Thursdays when hon. members were afforded an opportunity for the discussion of private members' resolutions.

Motion agreed to.

HARD SURFACE ROADS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. ILSLEY (Hants-Kings): I would direct a question to the Minister of Labour, based upon a passage in the speech from the throne in the province of New Brunswick, reading:

My government intends with the assistance of the Dominion government to commence during the present year the laying of some hard surface roads.

Has this government agreed with the New Brunswick government to assist in the laying of hard surface roads, and if so, upon what terms? Has it refused similar assistance to the province of Nova Scotia?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): I have not before me the agreement with the province of New Brunswick, and details of the extent to which this sort of work is being carried on are not presently within my knowledge. I shall look into the matter and give an answer to-morrow or Monday.

THE POTATO MOTH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), based on a telegram I have received from the Hon. K. C. MacDonald, Minister of Agriculture in the province of British Columbia, in which he states that in a shipment of potatoes from Bermuda landed in Vancouver there has been discovered the potato moth, which is destructive alike to tobacco and potatoes. In view of the fact that local entomologists and growers view with alarm the prospect of this moth entering Canada, I would ask if the minister would take steps to have this shipment held up with a view to ascertaining just how serious the situation is.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Every precaution will be taken, if such is the case, to prevent the shipment being landed. I understand that the dominion entomologists have the matter in hand.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. DUGUAY (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) if the statement contained in a telegram which I received is correct. This telegram is in French, the translation being:

Has Ottawa authorized Quebec to reduce allocation for wood of seventy-five cents per week. Answer immediately.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): The administration of relief is entirely in the hands of the provincial government, and the answer to the hon. gentleman's question is, no.

DISTRIBUTION OF MILK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) whether his attention has been drawn to the milk situation in the city of Hamilton. At present, serious conflict exists in the distribution of milk between the Borden Company and a cooperative organization. Will the minister look into this situation with a view to protecting the interests of the producers and the consumers?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): The answer is, yes.

RAILWAY SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. MICHAUD (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) if his attention has been directed to the fact that the business of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway in the city of Fredericton is being amalgamated with the idea of closing the station of the Canadian National Railways?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): This matter has not been drawn to my attention. I might mention that no station can be closed or any action taken as to united operations or the closing of branch lines without first being submitted to the Board of Railway Commissioners. Such action is open to appeal by interested parties.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT

CONDITIONS GOVERNING TEN YEAR EXTENSION OF BANK CHARTERS

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 18, respecting banks and banking.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it was originally the intention to proceed to-day with the second reading of this bill and, if time permitted, with the second reading of Bill No. 19, to incorporate the Bank of Canada. However, in deference to the views expressed last evening by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), it is not proposed that we shall proceed with the latter bill. There is nothing that I care to add to the observations I made on the introduction of this bill. My purpose in rising to-day is to express the hope that the second reading of this bill may be expedited in order that it may be sooner available for the consideration of the committee on banking and commerce.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, I am entirely in agreement with the wishes of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) with regard to the expediting of the second reading of this bill and I assure him that as far as we on this side are concerned there is no desire to delay it at all. We are anxious to get down to what might be regarded as the work of the session.

As I understand it, this bill arises not only out of the fact that the Bank Act provides for a decennial renewal of bank charters but also because certain recommendations have been made in the report of the Macmillan commission, referred to the other evening by the minister. As I understand it, the terms of reference to this commission did not specifically charge it with the obligation of recommending amendments to the Bank Act, but there is a provision in the reference, quoted by the chairman in the introductory portion of the report, which reads:

. . . . to study the entire monetary system of Canada, particularly in relation to commodity price movements and international exchange fluctuations, to consider whether the monetary system of Canada may be so modified and developed as to facilitate intra-imperial and international cooperation in policies designed to promote the revival of trade, the increase and stability of employment and the raising of the level of commodity prices, and generally to make such recommendations as we may deem proper for revising or supplementing existing legislation or for the adoption of other measures calculated to promote the economic and financial welfare of Canada.

In other words, the reference provides for what I regard as a complete overhaul of the machinery of our monetary system. It is a matter of some regret that the commission did not, during the course of its review of conditions in Canada, find it possible to deal with matters which are to some extent outside the banking situation. In this connection, the chairman says:

We have taken a more moderate view of the duty entrusted to us and have considered it rather to be our task to enter upon the field of these large topics only in so far as they affect and are affected by the more specific subject of our study, namely, the banking and currency systems of Canada.

The result has been that the only concrete recommendation made by this commission is for the establishment of a central bank along with certain suggestions as to the constitution of that bank and other recommendations with regard to amendments to the Bank Act. These latter recommendations are included in the chapter of the report which gives the general review of the banking situation in Canada. Another recommendation is made that the government should apply itself to an investigation of the subject of rural credits, which indicates that at that time the commission did not feel itself to be in a position to deal with this important matter.

I am not one of those who consider that our examination of the monetary system of Canada has been completely exhausted by the examination of our banking legislation or by the proposal to create a central bank. I feel that the monetary system is probably the most important bit of machinery in our economic life. There were other matters which this commission could have dealt with and discussed in an effort to improve conditions in Canada. I am not complaining in the slightest. I appreciate the fact that the commission was charged with a very heavy task and that the services of the chairman and of Sir Charles Addis were given at a time most inconvenient to themselves, but given with a desire to benefit this country if at all possible. I am sure that the services of the other members also were devoted to the task in the same spirit. Nevertheless it seems to me that the fact that the recommendation is confined to banking legislation, both with regard to private banks and with regard to the central bank, indicates how important they consider these institutions are in the light of conditions in this dominion.

When we speak of the monetary system of Canada we mean of course the system whereby cash and credit are provided by those who deal in cash and credit for the use of those who may want to purchase goods or services but who find themselves in the position that those who have such goods and services to sell do not want to take goods and services in exchange. Obviously a matter which is so vital to our economic situation and the problems that confront us must call for the most careful attention and the most thoughtful study of this house.

I felt that the commission might have explored some suggestions which were put forward by the Macmillan committee in England. That committee suggested that the existing banking system and the financial institutions in operation there did not cater as effectively as they might to a certain class of enterprise which was most useful in the life of the community and which at the same time was too small to be able to provide its capital by public issues. It was suggested in the report of that committee that it might be possible to establish some sort of central body which would have to do with the financing of enterprises of that kind. It seemed to me also that there might have been some study with regard to the provision of capital, under proper circumstances, for those engaged in the primary industries who have to make outlays for capital purposes, and who therefore may not be able to obtain from the existing financial institutions the facilities they desire, but who might be able to come to some central body of the kind suggested by Lord Macmillan's committee. There was a suggestion there as well for a board of national investment which might exercise these functions, which might be in a position in proper cases to provide capital for small enterprises or industries, primary or secondary, and which at the same time might be in a position to go even so far as to regulate issues on the stock exchange, so that not only might the person who wanted capital be protected, but the investor as well.

These matters are not dealt with in the report. It is a matter of regret that something of that kind was not studied, but we quite understand the circumstances under which the report was made. I feel therefore, Mr. Speaker, with respect to this bill, that it is most important, as I suggested at the outset, that this house should at the earliest possible moment grapple with the problems presented in the amendments which are already indicated in the bill, and also with the general problem as to whether any further improvement or even possible replacement can be effected in our existing financial machinery for the good of production industry and commerce in this dominion.

May I assure the Minister of Finance that he will have the fullest cooperation in the study of this measure, because from the report I regard it as a major question for the consideration of this house. The private banking system of Canada touches directly the people of the country. A central bank is one step removed from them, but in a banking system equipped to meet the needs of our Canadian people, and particularly of our export trade, we shall find the greatest measure of success in the things we are trying to do in this country.

I yield to no one in my admiration for the way in which our banking system has stood up under the strain, and I also join with many in the view that this does not necessarily prove that the system is perfect at the present time. I take it therefore to be one of our major tasks at this session to give our wholehearted attention to this bill in an endeavour to improve the banking system in every way possible.

I know that the minister will quite readily appreciate the intimation that we are accepting this as a second reading of the bill to renew the bank charters; further than that we do not go at this stage. We do not commit ourselves in connection with the details of the amendments proposed nor with respect to the provisions which are in the act at the present time. We wish to have full scope in the banking and commerce committee to examine the banking situation from stem to stern, if I may use that expression, and to overhaul the financial machinery which plays such an important part in the business of the country. With those reservations I think I can say that those on this side of the house will readily accept the motion.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): I do not wish to delay the passage of this measure, which in my opinion is the most important that has been before parliament in the last ten years. I say that because the bulk of the money used in this country is created by the chartered banks. Under the British North America Act, banking, currency, credit and the issuing of paper money are under the jurisdiction of the federal authority. Under the monetary system which has been set up by legislation in the past there have been up to the present time two money-issuing authorities in Canada—the Department of Finance and the banks incorporated under this act. While the Department of Finance does issue dominion notes and coins, none of these is paid out by them, so far as I am aware, except to the chartered banks. On September 30, 1933, the amount of dominion notes outstanding was $173,147,000, odd, and gold and specie amounted to $49,000,000. Any money reaching the public for circulation or for the transaction of business must be put out by the banks, and in addition to the small amount of dominion notes and coins I have mentioned this money is either bank notes or credit. As the total of bank deposits on September 30, 1933, was $2,260,000,000 odd, it will be readily seen that the banks are the chief issuing bodies; and inasmuch as money is the most important factor in the whole economic system—it is sometimes referred to as the hub of the wheel—it cannot be doubted that this should be considered the most important bill that has been before parliament in the last ten years.

I know that there are many people, including even prominent bankers, who do not admit that the banks create credit money in addition to issuing bank notes. In this regard I should like to quote from a speech delivered by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) in Toronto on November 13, before the Canadian Club. I do so because I think that the hon. gentleman has covered the situation admirably, and perhaps in fewer words than I might use myself. In speaking of this practice of the banks in creating their own deposits, he said:

> The result is that, in modern practice, 70 to 80 per cent of the aggregate of all deposits, shown in the Canadian bank returns, represents in reality the amount of loans made by the banks and then outstanding. In consequence bank deposits consist largely of credit money which has been created by the banks. When a loan is repaid by the customer to the bank which made the loan, the deposit created by the loan is wiped out, and the aggregate of all bank deposits is thereby reduced by the sum so paid.

I think it will make it clear if I give the figures as presented by the Secretary of State on that occasion:

September 30, 1933
Deposits by the public in Canadian chartered banks payable on demand in Canada.. .. ..$	491,000,000
Deposits payable after notice or on a fixed day in Canada.. ..	1,372,000,000
Deposits elsewhere than in Canada.	296,000,000
Balances due provincial and dominion governments.	99,000,000

Or a total, in round figures, of $2,260,000,000 in the chartered banks of Canada. This aggregate amount on deposit on September 30 last, he points out, was $436,000,000 less than the average amount of deposits during the year 1929. Then he goes on to show that the balance on deposit in customers' accounts "represents a sum of money which the customer owns, but nevertheless this money does not exist except in the accounts of the customer's bank." He continues:

What is paid out of one bank account is paid into another bank account by entries in books of account. A relatively small quantity of metallic coins or paper currency suffices for owners who require cash for their petty expenses.

Then he says:

The cheque system, which has been developed, enables the banks to create money without the issue of their printed notes. On September 30 last, all the Canadian banks had $141,000,000 of their own notes in circulation, while the aggregate of bank deposits was $2,260,000,000.

He says later:

But the cheque system, which now prevails, enables the banks, as I have stated, to create credit money at will for many hundreds of millions of dollars in excess of their note issues. $1,428,000,000 of such credit money was issued and outstanding on September 30 last. In comparison with this bank credit money, the amount of all other money in circulation is quite insignificant.

To be quite fair to the Secretary of State I want to say that in the following paragraph he states that of course the power to create credit by the banks is not unlimited. I think it would be clear from his words that the importance of the act which is now before us might be underestimated by members of the house and people in the country who have not been giving to the monetary system as much study as has been given by the Secretary of State.

The next point I should like to deal with is that under our banking system we have built up what amounts to a monopoly of credit in Canada and a control exercised over our whole economic life through this control of credit. There have been general bank acts passed in this house in the years 1867, 1870, 1880, 1890, 1900, 1913 and 1923 and I think it would be fair to say that practically on every occasion the act was pretty much as the bankers wanted. Prior to 1900 there was no provision in the Bank Act for the purchase of the assets of one bank by any other, and in that year the change was made providing for this. Also in 1900 the Canadian Bankers' Association was incorporated by act of parliament, chapter 93 of the statutes of that year. In the Bank Act of 1900, sections 24 to 29 inclusive, provided that the Canadian Bankers' Association should appoint a curator for any bank that suspended payment in specie of any of its liabilities, gave the association power to make by-laws, rules and regulations respecting all matters relating to the curator and making of bank notes, and this in addition to the provision which I have already mentioned, under which one bank was allowed to purchase the assets of another, subject to the approval of the governor in council through the recommendation of the Minister of Finance.

In this way there was built up a fine machine for centralizing control in a few hands and bank mergers began that year. I shall not take time to read a list of those bank mergers; they are to be found by anyone who is interested, on page 19 of the recent banking commission's report. The following table shows how the number of banks in Canada was reduced:

Year	Number of banks
1900	36
1910	28
1923	17
1933	10

In that time the following banks absorbed:

Name of bank	Number of banks absorbed
Royal Bank	8
Bank of Montreal	6
Bank of Commerce	8
Bank of Nova Scotia	4

Altogether thirty-five banks were purchased by other banks during that period and as a result of the mergers which have been going on for the past thirty-three years, we now have a situation where one bank controls approximately 28 per cent of the banking assets of Canada and three banks together, sometimes called the "big three," control approximately 70 per cent of the banking business. The policy of those three banks may be said to set the pace for the smaller banks and I think it is not stretching the case too much to say that ten banks have what amounts to a monopoly of credit in Canada. Not only do the large banks practically control the banking business of the country, but their directors control trust companies, mortgage and loan companies, bond and investment houses, insurance companies, railways, public utilities, flour mills, bakeries, packing plants, steel mills, textile plants, tobacco factories, agricultural implement factories, pulp and paper plants, and so forth, in fact, almost everything that would seem to be worth controlling.

I have in my hand a statement showing some of the corporations controlled by directors of the three largest banks and the great number of directorships held by individual directors. The list is necessarily incomplete; it is not easy to secure the complete information. The list has been taken mainly from the Canadian Annual Financial Review and many corporations are not shown there. A few have been added from Who's Who and other sources. I should like to place this list on Hansard, but under the rules I suppose I shall be compelled to read it. It is as follows:

As I said before, this is not a complete list but I think it is a pretty good sample of the corporations which the directors of three banks control, and this is only three out of ten. Through interlocking directorates these men control the bulk of the industry of the country. Through industry they largely control advertising, and through advertising they can if they wish control most of the press. Credit is necessary in every business to-day. Bankers can put any company or organization out of business by refusing credit at a critical time.

They may refuse credit to competitors of companies in which they are personally interested. The giving or withholding of credit largely governs the volume of business done to-day. Through their control of finance and industry the group of men already referred to exercise more power over the economic life of the people than does any government. They have power without responsibility, which is generally attended with unfortunate results for someone. Pages could be written showing the unsatisfactory features of this centralization of control in private hands. Corrective measures should be stipulated by the new Bank Act. I am not at the moment going to suggest the measures that might be taken. Various suggestions might be made but I will offer only one now, that is that the governor in council should have power to appoint one half of the directors of the chartered banks, and these men should be representative of various economic interests. In passing may I point out that although agriculture is Canada's major industry, and as we are told time after time, the basic industry of this country and the backbone of Canada, there is not as far as I have been able to gather one agriculturist on any of our bank directorates. Regardless of whether the suggestion I have made is acted upon, the fact that so much power now rests in the hands of directors of a few banks is a very good reason for the creation in Canada of a national bank. The present situation is not in the best interests of Canada. Sir John Aird, who is now president of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, when he appeared before our banking committee in 1923, referring to the aid given to certain railroads by that bank said if it had not been for the credit extended by the banks to these railways the west would now be in the hands of that great octopus, the Canadian Pacific Railway. If the Canadian Pacific Railway at that time could be so described I do not know what term would properly describe the present banking combination. There is a great deal of talk going on in parliament and throughout the country at present as to who is going to win the next election. In other words they say: Who is going to be in power? Regardless of who wins the next election it seems clear to me that those who are going to be in power after the next election are Canada's kings of finance. I have in my hand a copy of the Grain Growers' Guide of October 15, 1928, containing an article written by Grattan O'Leary, a very capable writer of Ottawa. Mr. O'Leary in this article is dealing with Sir Herbert Holt; it is headed "Canada's Kings of Finance" Number One, Sir Herbert Holt. Mr. O'Leary says in part:

In parliament, Mr. King and Mr. Bennett and the others sit framing our laws; and the national spotlight is upon them. Their lightest word is telegraphed across the continent; their speeches read by hundreds of thousands; their careers followed with almost pathetic interest. We think of them as the arbiters of our destiny. It is all a divorcement from reality. In an unpretentious room in Montreal sits a man who, unobserved, almost unnoticed, has become a colossus of finance, a demigod in our industrial ledgers, master of the mightiest commercial pageant that this dominion has seen, more potent in shaping the everyday economic lives of the Canadian people than all our politicians put together.

That man is Sir Herbert Holt.

He says that Sir Herbert Holt is a splendid organizer, and he mentions the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company, which he says is probably Holt's outstanding achievement. Over a thirty year period its shareholders have received an enormous return, the original shares of $100 now being worth $1,140. Then he proceeds to deal with another organization with which Sir Herbert Holt was connected. In 1927 Holt in cooperation with J. H. Gundy purchased Canada Cement, putting up the staggering sum of $40,000,000 in hard cash. I wonder where they got that much money.

The old company was extinguished; a new one formed, with new capital; preferred stock and bonds were issued for $41,000,000. In addition, two shares of common stock were given with every five preferred shares purchased: 84,000 shares of common stock being thus given away. Holt and Gundy still hold 516,000 shares of common, and at the present day price of $34 per share, could sell their remaining interest in the company for $17,544,000.

The question I should like to ask, Mr. Speaker, is whether that was of any advantage to the people of Canada. Then the writer goes on to tell how many corporations are directed by this man; he says:

How can a man keep in touch with the operations of 145 companies, embracing hotels, water powers,—

And so on; I am not going to take time to read the list. Then Mr. O'Leary winds up by referring to the power exercised by this man; he says:

—the influence which he exercises over the economic life of the Dominion of Canada. Whether that influence is for good or evil, it is not for this article to say. But when men speak of economic policies and of economic government in Canada, it is well, perhaps, that they turn sometimes from political parties and give a thought to this king of finance, who, without trumpetings of any kind, has become the richest and the mightiest man in this Dominion, a veritable field marshal of industry whose power for good or ill is unquestionably of the greatest.

If we add to the power of Sir Herbert Holt which Mr. Grattan O'Leary has so well described, the power wielded by the other kings of finance in Canada, we will have a better idea of who really are in control of the destinies of this country. I am not criticizing these men who happen to be in that position, I am trying to describe the existing situation. If I were to indulge in any criticism I should like to make it constructive, and I should like to see that situation corrected.

While I am on that point might I say that from 1930 to 1932, I think the date is March in each year, there was a shrinkage of $100,000,000 in call loans in Canada. Other current loans fell by $267,000,000, but loans made to directors and firms in which they were partners actually show a slight increase. Such loans amounted to $20,400,000 in 1930 and to $20,800,000 in 1932. I do not make any particular objections to these loans being continued during those years; all I do object to is the fact that a different policy seems to have been carried out in connection with some of the other debtors of the banks. The large industries in Canada that are not controlled by the banks appear to be controlled from the United States. The large industries in the United States seem to be controlled by the banks, in fact the process seems to be going on in every country. I have here an excerpt from the evidence given by Mr. Frey before a sub-committee of the judiciary of the United States senate on January 27, 1932, on bill No, S5267. It is pointed out that the sixteen leading private bankers in New York city held 996 directorships in miscellaneous corporations, and that the eight leading banks in New York city, through their directors, held 3,741 directorships in other banks, public utilities, insurance companies, manufacturing, transportation and miscellaneous corporations. Among the big three in New York is the National City Bank. I do not know whether or not there is very much connection between the big three in the United States and the big three in Canada, but I do find that the National City Bank of New York controls the National City Company of Canada. The chairman of the board last year, when this statement was made out, was Mr. Charles Mitchell, president of the National City Bank, who obtained so much notoriety last year through the investigation carried on in Washington. The following bank directors were members of the advisory board of the company, whose head office is at 360 St. James street, Montreal. Sir Charles Gordon, W. A. Black, F. E. Meredith, Lieutenant-Colonel Herbert Molson of the Bank of Montreal; Sir John Aird, president of the Canadian Bank of Commerce; W. L. Matthews, director of the Dominion Bank, and Hon. J. M. Wilson of the Banque Canadienne Nationale.

I am informed, Mr. Speaker, that the directors of the three big banks in Canada and their affiliated trust companies hold 832 directorships in the principal business concerns of Canada, and no one can study the list which I have placed on Hansard without being impressed with the power vested in this group of men. They really hold the power of a dictatorship, if you like, over our economic life, and the building up of this powerful trust has been facilitated by bank mergers. I think some provision should be inserted in the act to prevent any more of these mergers taking place in future.

I do not believe the power held by these men has always been used wisely. I think they, in the exercise of their power, have disregarded national needs. They expanded credit unwisely and unnecessarily between the years 1926 and 1929, but since the fall of 1929 they have cancelled that credit to a vast extent. In four years, as the Secretary of State pointed out, it was brought down by $932,000,000. The hon. gentleman stated that current loans and discounts of the Canadian chartered banks had been reduced by $932,000,000 in the four years from September 30, 1929, to September 30, 1933. This would indicate that industrial and commercial activities in Canada have been reduced by forty per cent since September, 1929. It is worth pointing out that the holdings of government bonds by the banks during the same period has increased by eighty per cent. On October 31, 1929, the current loans and discounts, which I should think would be the commercial loans in Canada, amounted to $912,000,000, and on the same date the bonds held by these banks amounted to $881,000,000. In other words, the current loans and discounts exceeded the bonds held by only $31,000,000. It would appear that the banks are becoming investment trusts instead of commercial banks; that is the way I interpret that evidence. As we know, banks have practically ceased to finance agriculture and it would seem that the government must set up some other institution to finance our farmers, and possibly to finance industry as well, when you take into consideration the great reduction in loans to industry.

The situation in regard to municipal financing is almost as bad. In a submission made to the banking commission by the city of Calgary it is pointed out that the banks are charging interest at the rate of from 5½ per cent to 6 per cent to our larger municipalities, and they hold as security all the resources of the people of those municipalities. In the case of the city of Calgary, at one time the bankers practically refused to finance the city. The submission states:

> The city's banks have declined to finance the city for the year 1933 except on a month to month basis notwithstanding the fact that at the present time the 1932 current carry-over of $750,000 has been reduced by tax arrears payments to approximately $270,000 and that the total debt to the city's bank on current borrowings is approximately $70,000.
> At the present time we have received no assurance of our ability to carry on until the end of the year, and the school board, which depends upon the city for its finances, is in a similar quandary.

It would seem, Mr. Speaker, that it should be the duty of the government, either in connection with the revision of this act or in connection with the act to establish a bank of Canada, or perhaps by a separate act, to set up some body that will finance municipalities in Canada.

I should like to point out that the burden of unemployment relief has made financing by our municipalities in many cases almost impossible, and the municipalities are not in any way responsible for the fact that unemployment occurred. It is the financial policy of this country more than anything else that has created and is responsible for this unemployment, and I have heard that some financial institutions have in certain cases practically dictated to the cities the amount that could be spent on relief. In the year 1932, not much over a year ago, there was an apparent attempt by the Bank of Montreal to dictate to the city of Calgary as to whether or not they should pay the interest on the city's bonds in New York funds. The city of Calgary resisted, and at one time the Bank of Montreal virtually told the city that if they would not pay the premium on exchange the bank could not extend the credit facilities which the city had been led to understand it would receive. Those administering the affairs of the city of Calgary have saved the city considerable money by refusing to pay the premium on exchange, and I believe most of the bond-holders of the city of Calgary have been glad since that time, to take Canadian currency. The submission of the city of Calgary to the Royal Commission on Banking and Currency recommends:

> That in conjunction with the establishment of a central bank in Canada or under the direct control of the Finance department a subsidiary corporation be formed for the purpose of providing credit or financial assistance to the cities and provinces of Canada. . . . The present situation where the capital credit of cities can be determined by the manipulation of bankers and brokers should be terminated.

I absolutely agree with that. I see, Mr. Speaker, that my time is almost exhausted, but I should like to emphasize that one point before I go any further. The banks should really share a large part of the responsibility for the condition that now exists in regard to unemployment. They are in control of the big institutions which furnish most of the employment. They control the corporations who laid off these workmen in many cases. Their financial policy has been one of deflation. Canadian bankers almost universally when they have discussed the question of monetary policy during the last three years have been absolutely opposed to inflation. Further, they appear to have been supporters of a policy of deflation, which certainly has been going on, and the fact that the bank loans were depressed by $932,000,000 is a clear proof of this deflation, which has caused, if not the bulk, at all events a large amount of the unemployment in Canada. But to-day the banks will not accept any of this responsibility. I think they should accept some of it. Either that or they should be prepared to see some national body set up that will assume responsibility in connection with financial matters.

In the few minutes left to me I want to make just a few suggestions as to amendments that I think should be considered when this new Bank Act is before the banking and commerce committee.

First, in regard to the returns which are made by the banks to the government. In addition to the information which is now required I believe that the banks should be required to show their total gross earnings from interest charges, exchange and other operations, and give a detailed statement covering the disposition of such earnings, including wages and salaries paid, and the amount written off for bad loans. If the bankers are as efficient as they would lead the public to believe, and I have no doubt on that score, they need have no hesitation in giving this information. Their depositors are entitled to it, and we are told repeatedly in this house that it is the depositors' money which they loan. Almost any other concern in Canada gives such details of its gross earnings and what is done with those earnings.

Secondly, I would like the banks to give in their annual or monthly statements the amount of deposits and loans by provinces; and in their yearly statement they should give the distribution of loans for various purposes—agriculture and other industries, loans against stocks and bonds, and so forth. This was given by the Bank of Commerce about a year ago, and published in their monthly letter, and I think the practice is recommended in the report of the Macmillan committee in England. The banks should also give the number of their branches and where they are located; also the names, addresses and occupations of all the directors, and a list of the firms and corporations of which they are directors or partners.

I should also like to see them asked to make a classification of deposits in various groups according to the amount of the deposit. I notice that in the United States less than one per cent of the depositors own sixty per cent of bank deposits. A classification has been made showing the deposits in different classes. I think the same should be required of our banks in Canada for the information of the government, to give them a better idea of the economic condition of the people.

Loans by banks to stockbrokers against the collateral of stocks and bonds I think should be practically prohibited. Legislation dealing with that matter has been passed by the United States congress recently, and I think that similar legislation should be passed in Canada.

Section 138 of the present Bank Act should be struck out. That is the section which prohibits anyone except the banks issuing money or anything that might be considered as a substitute for money. Some municipalities in Canada have issued scrip for a part of their annual tax levy, and some of them in western Canada have been taken into court and sued for the penalty of $400. I do not see that there is any reason why a municipality should not be allowed to exercise that right.

I also think that our banks should be compelled to confine their operations to Canada. The bank statement for May, 1933, shows that one of our banks had thirty-six per cent of its loans outside of Canada. With a paid-up capital of $35,000,000, it had outside loans of $144,000,000. From the standpoint of the safety of depositors' funds this is dangerous. A collapse of sugar prices, or a foreign revolution such as took place recently in Cuba, and which might take place in any South American country, might conceivably place some of our banks in a very bad position. What I suggest is that if the banks want to carry on a foreign business, they should form a separate corporation to transact that foreign business so that the money of the Canadian depositors will not be endangered by what may take place abroad.

There are other matters which I think ought to be discussed, and which certainly will be discussed in the committee, but as my time is up those are all the suggestions I can make to the minister and the house to-day. I do hope that some of the matters which I have brought to the attention of the house to-day will be given careful consideration by the minister and by the committee.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, it is scarcely necessary to emphasize the importance of the Bank Act to the national life of Canada at this time. At the last revision of the act I think it was necessary to emphasize it, and there seemed to be difficulty in getting a great many people to believe that it had any such importance. Since that time, however, something has happened in the world, and the information that people have to-day on banking and credit and currency and similar subjects is very much greater than it was ten years ago.

Perhaps it is true to say that the general public to-day fully realize that the national life of Canada is practically in the hands of bankers. The general public know to-day that those who control currency and credit, control the industrial life of the nation, and the depression through which we have been passing, and through which we have not yet passed, has been one great means of education, particularly on the question of money.

There is perhaps no advantage in dealing with detailed amendments on the second reading of a bill which covers a tremendous field of detailed legislation. The previous speaker referred to certain amendments, and I have no doubt that they will be put forward by him at the proper time. I am glad to notice from the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) that some of the amendments proposed are those proposed and advocated by this corner of the house some ten years ago. For instance take the amendment to fix the rate of interest. Not only did we move such an amendment in committee at the last revision—I think it was moved six or eight times, beginning with three per cent and moving up one-half per cent until we reached eight per cent—but we also introduced a bill several years ago providing for the fixing of the rate of interest at the rate now proposed. We are glad that these amendments are being brought forward even at this late date. But these are very insignificant things. Other fundamental amendments which we proposed have not been included in this bill and we shall endeavour to bring these forward, as we did when the last revision was made, in the hope that with the new conviction which has become general among the public as to the importance of banks and their direct effect upon the industrial life of the people, we may perhaps make a little more headway this time than we did previously.

Although the amendments to this act have an importance in relation to policy, they are not the most important thing. The important thing about the Bank Act is the monetary policy which it embodies. So far as I know, the monetary policy of this country has not been altered materially by this bill. It is true that the central bank proposal will affect the Bank Act somewhat since a good deal of power which was exercised at one time by the chartered banks or not exercised by anyone will now be entrusted to it. No doubt the general monetary policy of the nation can be more appropriately discussed when we take up the Bank of Canada Act. I think in this legislation it should be made clear and unmistakable to the chartered banks what is to be the policy to be followed by them in the handling of our internal credit. This bill ought to tell us whether these banks will have to trim down their handling of currency and credit during the next ten years to a preconceived, antiquated and unscientific stupidity known as the gold basis, or whether they are to be allowed to let out the credit of the country upon the basis of the aggregate wealth producing capacity of the nation. To my mind this is a very important feature of the Bank Act. So far as I am concerned I intend to press for these matters both on this bill and on the central bank proposal.

I desire to follow the example of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) and place on Hansard certain data to indicate the actual forces which control the financial life, the industrial life and the government of Canada. I do not think it can be said too often that the power that controls our monetary policy, controls the national policy of the state. I desire to put on Hansard certain data to make this fact a little more clear. If we cannot secure any alteration in our financial policy, at least we can place before the people of Canada some of the facts concerning the institutions in question. I intend to make a general survey of the relationship which exists between the Canadian banking system and the business of the country, and in doing this I have followed the example of the previous speaker and have taken three of the larger banks as examples. I hope it will not be taken that we in this corner have any particular hatred or malice against the banks we are mentioning, because this is not so. It is impossible to deal with all of them and we take these three as an example of what all banks are doing.

The Bank of Montreal, the Bank of Commerce and the Royal Bank with their allied trust companies, the Royal Trust, the National Trust and the Montreal Trust have 832 directorships in most of the principal business concerns in Canada. One hundred and eighty-three companies have their presidents or chairmen of the board acting as directors on the board of one of the big three. All the banks and trust companies are interlocked to a greater or lesser degree, although the Bank of Montreal appears to show a somewhat greater inclination to maintain its own individuality. The Bank of Montreal has one director on the board of the Montreal Trust Company, which is practically the Royal Bank. The Royal Bank has eleven directors on the board of the Montreal Trust Company, three in the National Trust Company, which is controlled by the Canadian Bank of Commerce, and two in the Eastern Trust Company, under the control of the Bank of Nova Scotia. The Bank of Commerce has ten directors in the National Trust and two in the Toronto General Trusts. This latter trust company, with assets of $226,000,000 seems to afford a meeting place for the Ontario system, for it has on its board two directors of the Bank of Commerce, two of the Bank of Nova Scotia, two of the Bank of Toronto, three of the Dominion Bank and two of the Imperial Bank. The Bank of Nova Scotia has three directors in the National Trust Company, three in the Toronto General Trusts and three in the Eastern Trust. The National Trust Company has nine Bank of Commerce directors, two Bank of Nova Scotia and three Royal Bank. None of the banks are represented directly on their boards by directors of other banks but the relationship through their trust companies is close and effective. Through the Montreal Trust, the National Trust, the Eastern Trust and the Toronto General Trusts, the Royal Bank, the Bank of Commerce, the Bank of Nova Scotia, the Imperial Bank, the Bank of Toronto and the Dominion Bank are closely interconnected. There is one exception; with a lone director on the board of the Montreal Trust, the Bank of Montreal stands practically alone.

The following information which was obtained from the Directory of Directors for 1933 and the Annual Financial Review for 1932 has to do with the Bank of Montreal and the Royal Trust Company. These two companies should be considered as one, there being fourteen directors common to both, including the president, Sir Charles Blair Gordon. The capital and reserve of the Bank of Montreal is $76,000,000 and of the Royal Trust Company, $5,750,000. The combined assets of the two organizations total $1,324,000,000. The combined boards total forty-five members who hold 217 directorships in 135 other companies. In forty-six companies the president is on the board of either the Bank of Montreal or the Royal Trust Company. There are also twelve vice-presidents. Sir Charles Blair Gordon is also a governor of McGill university and of the Royal Victoria hospital. Of the 135 companies represented, 69 are commercial, 16 insurance, 19 finance companies—investment and trust—11 power and paper companies, 4 mining and smelting, 8 companies dealing in food products, 2 universities and 2 hospitals. On the boards of the aforementioned 69 companies, the Bank of Montreal, including the Royal Trust Company, is the only bank represented in the directorship of 45 companies, while in 24 companies there are directors of other banks in addition. The Canadian Pacific Railway, for instance, has 14 bank directors, representing 6 banks and trust companies; the Dominion Bridge Company has 11 bank directors, and the Canadian General Electric, 8.

The list of insurance companies shows that there is a large representation of the banks, especially in regard to the large companies. The Mutual Life has 7 bank directors, divided among 7 banks and trust companies; the Sun Life has 11 bank directors; the Canada Life, 7, and the Imperial Life, 10. The banks seem to have agreed to divide up the insurance companies fairly evenly, with the exception of the Liverpool, London & Globe, which controls the Globe Indemnity Company, the Central Insurance Company, the Liverpool, Manitoba Assurance Company, and the National Liverpool Insurance Company; the Bank of Montreal and Royal Trust Company having 10 directors, no other bank being represented.

An examination of the data in this regard will show clearly the manner in which the various banks are interlocked on the boards of the more important business concerns of the country. Now I propose to put on Hansard the actual details in that regard. The following data will show the relation between principal banks and trust companies:

This, of course, is not complete. These are only samples of the interlocking directorates. I turn now to deal with a survey of bank presidents and directors in their personal relations with other companies, and I shall continue as long as my forty minutes last. I begin with the bank of Montreal, its president, vice presidents, directors and so forth, and show that they have similar positions on the boards of other important companies in Canada. This information was obtained from the Annual Financial Review of July, 1932, and the Directory of Directors, of 1933. I may say that the capital and reserve of the bank of Montreal amount to $76,900,000 and the assets, to $748,000,000. The list is as follows:

That deals with only a few of the directors of one bank. I have not time to put on the record the directors of the other banks which I have here we shall have to be content with these as a fair sample. Surely, Mr. Speaker, the time has come for the government of Canada to arrange that the consumers of Canada, the general public, have some representation on the directorates of the financial institutions of this country. Attention has already been drawn by a previous speaker to the fact that the farmers have no such representation, and I should add the fact that neither have the labouring people of this country.

I hope that the government in this revision of the Bank Act will take account of the data that I have placed on Hansard indicating who are in control of our financial and commercial institutions, and will take whatever steps may be necessary to give representation to the general public, that they may take part in directing the financial policy of Canada.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Before this bill receives second reading I would like in a few words to indicate something of its importance. The two previous speakers have outlined very clearly to the house the tremendous hold on our whole financial machinery of a small group of men through interlocking directorates. I think from the information already given to the house one can readily see that, when all is said and done, unless the government is very strong indeed and is prepared to take a very definite stand in the interests of the public it will in all probability play second fiddle in comparison with the enormous power of organized finance. The issue of money in Canada is a government prerogative, but we must recognize at present our money, although comprising coin and currency is to the extent of 96 per cent simply a matter of bookkeeping; and that the control of this credit has practically been turned over to the banking fraternity, which can create money in large volume by making loans and can take money out of existence in large volume through the cancellation of loans. Therefore we can see the power they have in increasing or decreasing prices and to that extent affecting the entire economic life of the country. Under the Bank Act the banks have certain definite privileges given them. They have for instance the privilege of making money to the extent of issuing in the form of notes an amount equal to their paid up capital. Also for six months in the year they can issue an additional amount equal to 15 per cent of their paid up capital and reserve. They have also the privilege under the Finance Act of taking a variety of securities to the treasury board depositing them as collateral, and getting dominion notes for a certain charge. These dominion notes can either be put into circulation or they can be kept in the bank's safes as most of them are, in the shape of large legals to be used in settling balances between themselves. Or if they wish, they can take these dominion notes and deposit them in the central gold reserve in lieu of gold and issue their own notes or promises to pay against them. These are the definite privileges given to the banks as far as putting money into circulation is concerned. but there is nothing said in the Bank Act, as far as I can find, with regard to putting money into circulation other than by those three methods. We know, however, that a great deal more of so-called money is put into circulation, largely by the extension of credit by the banks, secured on the assets of their clients, which means new money written into existence. I have in my hand a statement showing the total amount of all money, that is notes and subsidiary coin, in Canada on December 31, 1933. It amounts to $349,594,078. At the same time there was on deposit in the banks of Canada, $2,242,222,079. Deducting the total cash from the total deposits leaves a difference of $1,892,628,001. Now if any one is caught increasing the amount of money in existence by counterfeit note or turning out fictitious coin, he is severely punished. But at the same time we find that banks are allowed by the issue of credit against collateral to increase the amount of money, up to nine or ten times the amount of the actual ordinary money in existence. I can find nothing in the Bank Act that gives them this privilege. They have just taken it and been allowed to carry it on.

But although in most cases the money thus written into existence is only bookkeeping entries, at the same time interest is charged to the clients of the bank for it just as if the bank had lent actual money belonging to the bank. The credit that is extended really belongs to the individual or the community but borrowers have to pay interest on it just as if it were money belonging to someone else. The banks really are credit agencies, and the sooner we recognize that fact the easier it will be to understand our financial system. I have before me a brief statement by a very eminent banker who is often quoted in this house, in support of the statement I just made. Right Hon. Reginald McKenna said:

> The amount of financial credit in circulation in any country depends entirely upon the actions of its bankers in creating and issuing it and in retiring and destroying it.

Mr. McKenna is one of the great bankers of the world, and he speaks very freely indeed with regard to what is done and what can be done in regard to our monetary system.

Section 75 of the Bank Act, which allows banks to put notes into circulation, makes no reference at all to the development of the credit structure. It is easy to see, therefore, that with the power the banks have of increasing the amount of money in circulation at any time or in other ways bringing on boom times or inflation, or at another time withdrawing money from circulation, they play an extremely important part in regard to credit and therefore prices. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) quoted some figures that were given by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) in Toronto some months ago; he said that between September, 1929, and September, 1933, the banks made a reduction in the total money in circulation in Canada amounting to some $932,000,000. I did not think it was quite that much, but I will accept the figures given by such an eminent witness. It is easy to see, therefore, that the banks, with the power they have, can increase or decrease business much more than can be done by a government. They can make business or they can break business. They can bring on inflation or they can intensify a slump. I bring to my support another eminent banker; I delight to bring men who are prominent in the banking world to support my statements on some of these occasions. This time I am going to quote from Sir Basil Blackett's interesting book Planned Money, in which he says:

> Is twentieth century Britain content to make continued use of a monetary system which has so conspicuously failed her in the past and is admittedly liable in the future to present her again and again with the disastrous sequence of boom, slump, boom, slump?

It is with the idea of trying to get away from this sequence of boom, slump, boom, slump, that to-day we are advocating that greater care be taken in revising this Bank Act so that it will be made impossible in future for Canada to be put through the difficulties that she has been put through in the past. When all is said and done the banking business, being a private business, naturally has as its first aim the making of profits for shareholders. The second interest probably would be the encouraging of the business of their interlocking directorates, many of which have been mentioned in the house to-day. I was quite interested the other day to hear the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) support this statement as to the natural aim of the banking fraternities. At page 826 of Hansard the minister said:

> No purely profit making institution operating in a competitive system can afford to place social interests before its own in regard to credit policy. This, I think, is obvious. Nor can the management of such a body be expected to regard the maintenance of the monetary standard, for example, as a duty prior to its obligations to its stockholders.

It seems to me that puts the whole thing in a nutshell. How can we expect the banking fraternities, built up entirely as private corporations with the incentive of profit for their shareholders, to take a real interest in the public welfare as a first consideration? To show that we are supported in these contentions by people other than farmers I should like to place before the house some statements sent me the other day by a very eminent man who for many years was employed in a bank. Here is what he says:

1. There is no law restricting the amount which may be loaned to directors.
2. There is no minimum amount fixed which may be loaned to any one customer.
3. There is no distinction made between shareholders' funds, commercial deposits and the savings of the thrifty.
4. There is no legal requirement as to the amount of cash reserves a bank shall carry.
5. There is no law to prevent any bank from wrecking itself by over-expansion or by permitting the bank's funds to be used in the speculations of a favoured clique.

Such statements as these, coming from a man who was inside of a bank for many years, should be worthy of consideration, and these matters should be and I hope will be taken up when this bill is considered by the banking and commerce committee.

We often hear the bankers tell us that they have to be so very careful indeed with regard to their investments and loans because all the money that is placed with them, largely by widows and orphans, is held in trust. This amuses me, because when all is said and done these poor widows and orphans certainly do not receive first consideration when a bank goes into liquidation. This is what happens in such a case: The first call on the assets of the bank is the private notes of that bank, or in other words their "promises to pay," that may be outstanding in the hands of the public. The second call is the balance due the Dominion government. The third call is advances under the Finance Act. The fourth call is the balance due to provincial governments. Fifth call is the deposits by the public payable on demand, and those are not usually the deposits of widows and orphans. The sixth call, under which the money deposited by widows and orphans would come, is the deposits of the public payable after notice. There are various other calls coming after that, but I just want to point out that the statement that the deposits are so well looked after because in many cases they belong to widows and orphans does not seem to be borne out by the facts, since those deposits must take sixth place with regard to the assets of the banks in case of liquidation.

I notice, Mr. Speaker, that under the proposed legislation having to do with the central bank, five per cent of the deposits of the chartered banks must be kept with the Bank of Canada, and the Dominion government guarantee these deposits of the banks in case the central bank is closed. After reading it I have wondered why the banks themselves have opposed so strenuously the guaranteeing of the deposits placed with them. It seems to me, however, that deposits, savings deposits particularly, are not of great interest to the banking fraternity. At least they are a liability, and I can never understand why the banks advertise for deposits from one dollar and upwards. It seems to me that they must use it as a smoke screen to cover up their greater activities, because far the greater part of the banks' business is distinctly writing money into existence through loans; in other words, a bookkeeping business, and just so long as the people can be led to continue to think that the money the banks lend is the money that was left with them by depositors, just so long can the banks get away with that sort of thing.

I should like to say a word with regard to the relationship between agriculture and the banking system. Whether we like it or not, agriculture is our most important basic industry. For many years, probably ever since Canada has been a country, agriculture has had no easy row to hoe, and it has been made a great deal harder because, unlike many other businesses, it has not been able to make use of credit through our banking system to the extent it would have had we really been in earnest about the development of agriculture. Anyone who has taken any interest at all in agriculture for the last twenty years knows full well that even when farmers could get loans from the banks they were very unsatisfactory. For instance, it has been a crying shame for years past that the banks have charged the farmers such a very high rate of interest. We were told in 1923 that the average rate which the banks were charging farmers at that time was eight per cent. That was one per cent more than the legal rate, and the bankers were getting away with it because there was no penalty clause in the Bank Act to penalize them if they charged more than seven per cent.

I hold in my hand a copy of a note due to the Imperial Bank of Canada for the sum of $270.10, payable by a man named Hutt, and it calls for interest at the rate of nine per cent both before and after maturity until paid. The man who wrote to me from a lawyer's office says:

The Imperial Bank did their utmost to secure a renewal of this said note at the same rate of interest. Failing this they brought suit for the amount at seven per cent interest, no doubt knowing full well by virtue of the privy council decision that they could only collect interest at the rate of five per cent.

I notice that during the last year it has been general throughout Canada for banks to cut down the interest rate to farmers to seven per cent. The reason for this, I take it, is quite simple. The government took action a year ago, and I congratulate them upon what they did, in cutting down the interest on post office savings half of one per cent with the idea of making money cheaper throughout Canada and encouraging the banks to lower their rate of interest. The banks followed suit by reducing the interest rate on their deposits by half of one per cent, and passing that reduction on to some of the people to whom they made loans. This meant that where they had been charging eight per cent the rate became seven and a half per cent. As sufficient interest was being taken throughout Canada in the matter to encourage the government to appoint a royal commission to investigate our whole banking system, and to travel from one end of the country to the other to inquire into all phases of banking, the banks apparently reasoned along this line:

Here we have cut down the interest rate to seven and a half per cent. The legal rate is seven per cent. So we are only losing half of one per cent for the time being if we cut the rate down to seven per cent, to come within the law.

So just before the commission started travelling through the country it was given out by the banks that so far as agricultural loans were concerned only seven per cent would be charged. I feel perfectly sure that had the government not taken action, in the first place, cutting down interest on post office savings deposits half of one per cent, and encouraging the banks to do the same, and secondly, by appointing the royal commission to travel throughout the country investigating the whole system of banking, our farmers would still be paying eight and probably nine per cent interest as they had done in the past.

Anyone who understands the history of agriculture in this country knows very well that even seven per cent is far too high a rate for agricultural loans. Not only that, but the terms are too short. The farmer needs three sorts of credit—short term, intermediate and long term credits. It may be taken for granted that we do not expect banking business to take care of long term credits, but at least they could take care of short term and intermediate credits. They have to a certain extent taken care of short term credits, but at too high a rate of interest, and there has always been great uncertainty in the farmer's mind as to whether he would get his note renewed. A three months' note might be absolutely useless to the farmer, but if it was renewed twice he would probably be all right. If, however, he is not sure that it is going to be renewed and takes the risk of getting a loan for a short term and then gets it cancelled at the end of the three months, his whole business is thrown into chaos and he had far better never have gone to the bank at all. Because interest rates have been too high in the past and because the terms of the loans have been too short, agriculture has been handicapped, and in addition there has been the uncertainty as to renewals, all of which has brought about a relationship between banking business in Canada and agriculture which certainly is not in the best interests of this country.

I am very glad indeed that the government has seen fit to bring down legislation to set up a central bank, and at another time I hope to congratulate them on doing so. I do hope that the central bank will be given authority over our present banking institutions, which in turn will see that every sort of industry in this country gets fair consideration in the matter of the use of credit. If the bank fails in that, it will fail indeed.

In the new Bank Act as presented to us I notice that section 91 has been amended and imposes a very severe penalty on the banks if they charge more than the legal rate of interest. I would like to remind the house that this suggestion was brought forward in 1923 but was turned down by the house by a majority of 91. A bill along the same lines was introduced by myself in 1931 and again in 1932, and in both cases the bill was refused. I congratulate the government of the day and those responsible for bringing in this amendment to the Bank Act which does exactly what we asked for, first of all, eleven years ago.

In expressing the hope that a very careful study will be given to this Bank Act, I would like to point out that we should recognize the proper function of money. If the money system is going to do its work properly, there must be enough at all times to enable goods and services to be transferred from producer to consumer. Just to the extent that we are short at any time or that we have too much at any time, just to the extent that we have to reduce prices or increase prices unnecessarily, to that extent we fail in our banking legislation.

[Mr. Spencer.]

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, nothing less than the tremendous importance of this subject would warrant my attempting to add anything to what has been said already by my colleagues in this corner. One of the most difficult things which a member of this house can do is to attempt to bring before the house and the country his conviction with regard to matters of this kind. I notice that there are about thirty hon. members present in the house at this moment; there are two newspaper reporters in the gallery and a few odd visitors. Under such circumstances one might be inclined to say: What is the use? The government has a majority and has made up its mind with regard to this matter; all that a private member can do is to talk, and it would not seem as if our talk had much prospect of reaching a wide public. But notwithstanding all this, I do not think we should be performing our duty as representatives of the people unless we did our utmost to call attention to what we believe to be the real facts of the situation.

As I understand this bill, it is an attempt to maintain the status quo of the banks. There may be some slight modification of the existing legislation, but the whole purpose of the bill is to give to the banks for another ten years the powers which they now enjoy. Ten years is a long period in the history of a nation, and I should like to warn the government that as far as some of us are concerned, if we are given an opportunity we will refuse to continue these privileges for another ten years. We will take advantage of the first opportunity to curtail those privileges which have been given unwarrantedly to the banking fraternity. While I have frequent occasion to attack the banking institutions, I have no animus against the men who are engaged in that business. There are some who rather imagine that if the C.C.F. ever had the powers of government we would take all bank managers and string them up to lamp posts or something of that kind. I can assure my banking friends that we have no such ideas. If we ever succeed, as I think we shall some day, in establishing a national banking system, we will need a great many of the present bank managers to conduct that system. I think I can go further and say that under a national banking system the bank clerks will receive a little more remuneration than they do at the present time from the private institutions.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): And the right of free association.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) says, we shall be glad to give them the right of association. We fought for this at the last revision of the Bank Act, and I hope it will be granted at this revision.

It seems to me that we are making a last desperate stand for the maintenance of what remains of democracy. Most of us have been taught, and perhaps are accustomed to think, that we in British countries have gradually attained a very large measure of self-government. We have been told that the absolute right of kingship was curtailed at the time of the magna charta. We were told that later on responsible government was secured. Many of us in our innocence have had the idea that to-day we are living in a democracy. Unfortunately we may have the form of a democracy, but to a large extent we are losing all that which makes a democracy worth while. It is a curious thing but as one studies the development of social institutions one cannot but note that the form persists long after life has fled. For example, at the beginning of our sessions we have what is known as the king's speech, or, in Canada, the governor general's speech. In the old days the king was a very powerful individual. Richard Cœur de Lion was a great warrior who rode at the head of his hosts. In those days when a king called his parliament together he told them how he intended to tax them. That was the king's speech which has been perpetuated in the governor general's speech. But we all know that the king himself, or in the case of Canada, the governor general, does not decide the policy of the country. He has his advisers and we recognize, as we put it so often, that the speech is put into his mouth. The man responsible for the speech is the prime minister. We keep up the old form but we all know that there has been a shifting of power away from the king or his representative to the prime minister and his cabinet who are theoretically responsible to the house.

I submit that there has been another shifting of power. In recent years there has grown up behind the political power, a financial and economic power. To-day the financial power is much stronger than the political. We in this house decide on certain political matters, but they amount to very little in view of the real power resident in the banks and the large transportation and industrial offices of this country. It is quite true that parliament must still register legislation, that parliament must still formally grant charters, that parliament must still formally confer privileges, but we are becoming mere automatic registers of these things. Theoretically the banks would have no power unless they came to this house to obtain that power but we all know perfectly well that in practice they simply come here and demand it. We give it to them and legalize what is actually already in effect. For one, I do not propose to have the position of the banks legalized without my making a protest.

I believe that gradually throughout the country the realization is growing that we are not in reality a democracy but are controlled by a very small oligarchy. Any one who listened to the reading of the long lists of interlocking directorates given by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) and the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) must realize that the small group of men who control our banks—there are only ten banks in this country—also control correlated financial institutions. They also control the main industrial and commercial concerns of this country. A great many of these selfsame men are on our leading educational institutions, our universities; they control our press, and so on. So that a situation has developed in which a comparatively small clique of people practically control the industrial, commercial and educational life of the country. Further than that, in my judgment—and I think that anyone who has sat here for a number of years will reach this conclusion by watching the legislation—these same men to a very large degree control the policies of this house. We have therefore what is coming to be an impossible situation. We in this house go through the forms of granting power already held, and the banks will go on feeling quite sure in their position of deciding the destinies of this country.

It was only the other day that members of the C.C.F. were accused of being materialistic in their point of view. Well, I recall in that connection some words of the late Sir Edmund Walker uttered, if I remember rightly, at the time of the last revision of the Bank Act. He said:

> The chief duty of the executive officers of a bank is to make dividends for the shareholders. All industrial efforts of men are based on self-interest, and not on any recognized or intended plan of cooperation. In discussing the relations of banking to other industries, I recognize selfishness as the basis of those relations.

It is very well I think to remember that this is the basis on which to-day our oligarchy runs the affairs of this country. But while undoubtedly the banks have made a good deal of money out of the country, I would not allow this opportunity to pass without calling attention to the fact that they have suffered enormous losses as well, which losses could be covered up only by their enormous profits. The main consideration however is not so much the money actually made for the shareholders of the banks; it is rather the power of control that is vested in the directors. Take the question of loans made to the directors. I have in my hand a newspaper clipping which I shall quote, and I fancy the situation is practically the same as it was on October 31 of last year. The bank returns at that time showed:

Under the heading: "Aggregate amount of loans to directors and firms of which they are partners, and loans for which they are guarantors," appear the following amounts credited to or charged against the banks cited. The figures are given in the ascending order:

Banque Canadienne Nationale..	$ 331,803
Imperial Bank of Canada.. ..	414,255
Banque Provinciale du Canada.	642,416
Bank of Toronto..	805,965
Dominion Bank..	1,158,830
Bank of Montreal..	1,302,949
Royal Bank of Canada..	2,458,215
Bank of Nova Scotia..	3,017,986
Canadian Bank of Commerce..	4,615,328
Total..	$14,747,607

The only bank reporting no such loans is Barclay's Bank, a British institution. The average amount of such loans per bank is $1,638,623, and the average paid-up capital is $16,000,000, so that approximately 10 per cent of the average capital has been loaned to directors, and firms to which they are partners and upon the strength of their guarantees.

It is not much wonder therefore that the article is headed "It is good to be a Bank Director." Perhaps it will be said that it is only a few disgruntled people who have any quarrel with the present banking system. I would point out that the difficulty is to have the majority of the people present their point of view in any way that would make it effective. At the last revision of the Bank Act, it will be remembered, the bankers' association spent no less than $100,000 in lobbying. That fact came out at the time of the failure of the Home bank, and those of us who were on the banking and commerce committee will recall that a number of the very best lawyers in Canada were there day after day, week after week, acting in any way that might seem of service to their clients. While they were not permitted to participate in the actual discussions, they were there to advise. I am not suggesting that there was anything that might be called illegitimate in the work they carried on, but I point out that it is difficult for the people, unrepresented by counsel, the great mass of the producers and consumers of the country, to face a lobby of that sort. But even had we succeeded in getting anything worth while embodied in the bill, the bill had to go to the Senate and there it would have received I am afraid rather rough handling. I remember meeting one of the bank lobbyists just after the bill had passed the Commons and I said, "I thought you had gone home." He replied laughingly, "Oh no; we have gone to the Senate now." There is the situation as it exists in practice—a group of people, many of whom are directors on these various institutions, in a position to veto whatever is done by the elected representatives of the people.

Under these circumstances it is no use closing our eyes to the fact that it is difficult to get enacted any legislation that would be of service to the great masses of the people. In the various investigations held either at the time of the Bank Act revision or in the next year or two my eyes were opened to the fact that very few people were free to come out in criticism of the banks. Again and again business men, some of them of fairly high standing, would come to me and represent the situation in which they found themselves with regard to the securing of credit from the banks. I said to them, "Will you come and tell that to the committee?" The reply would be, "Not on your life; the banks would immediately cut off our credit." I am not prepared to say whether that statement is correct or not, but I do say that these business men felt that to be the situation; and in those circumstances, to put it frankly, they dared not imperil their business by coming forward and giving evidence before the committee. So that it is extremely difficult to get the point of view of the great majority of the people adequately placed before this house, or placed in such a way as to receive any great consideration.

Moreover, we must remember that our banking system operates frankly in the interests of the commercial classes, and of certain of the commercial classes at that. Mention has already been made to-day of the fact that there is not adequate provision for the granting of credit to farmers. In fact, the present commission, after it had discussed the need of a central bank, contented itself by saying that it would be a good thing for another commission to be appointed to look into the question of agricultural credits. That is as far as we have got. So far as the great mass of the labour people of the country are concerned there is no hope of their getting consideration from the banks. If a labour man or a small business man wishes to build a house there is no chance of his getting anything from a bank. Under our system we have no other provision by which a building loan may be advanced. If a poor man wants even to buy a little furniture and has not the ready cash, he has now to resort to one of the small loan companies which charge him an exorbitant rate of interest. I did not speak at length on the bill that was before us the other day in regard to a small loan company which was trying to secure a charter, but may I say now that when we are asked to give a charter to such a company, it is an indication how inadequate present arrangements are for helping out the small people who so much need assistance at the present time.

If the policies for which the banks are so very largely responsible had actually resulted in prosperity in this country, I suppose the great majority of the people would be comparatively content. But the present depression in Canada, as, of course, in other countries, is to no small extent the result of the wrong, the fatal policies of the banks, and so an increasing number of people are coming to believe that the only possible way of getting out of this depression and keeping out of another is through the people themselves in some form or another taking over the control of currency and credit.

This brings us to the whole question of money, and here again I think most of us are confused, because years ago we were accustomed to thinking in terms of metallic money. Nearly all of us have come to think in terms of either metallic money or bank notes; few of us have realized the importance of the new types of money which have been used so extensively in more recent years. There is a great deal of talk about the gold standard, and many of us still think currency is based on gold. Surely some of the statements that have been made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) in recent months have convinced most Canadians that currency is not directly related to gold. Still the old ideas keep reasserting themselves and give rise to a dangerous fallacy. Our present currency is not directly related to gold. For years the total issue of currency has not been related to gold because we have the Finance Act under which currency has been issued quite independently of gold reserves. Further, we think in terms of bank notes and we seem to believe credit can be given only as there is a big supply either of gold or of bank notes. Again that is a misrepresentation of the real position. The Prime Minister himself is very fond of talking about the banks as being "custodians of the deposits of the people"; that is one of his pet phrases, and he has left the impression that the banks lend out only the depositors' money. Although that matter has been touched upon once or twice this afternoon, it is worth while emphasizing that that is not the case. Hon members opposite have ridiculed us because very often we quote such authorities as the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna. I shall not quote him again, although I have under my hand a volume of his writings. But I should like to quote a paper from my own city, the Winnipeg Free Press, which sometimes has criticized me and my colleagues very severely for having woolly ideas about money. This is what the Free Press itself said on March 7, 1933:

> The little preachment of the bankers, with which the world is so familiar, that they can only lend the money that is given them to take care of, and therefore they must be very, very careful, no longer fits the facts in any country. . . . The outstanding development of modern banking has been the enlargement of the functions of the banks from being curators of money to creators of it, through the granting of credits which take the form in the banking books of deposits indistinguishable from deposits made in real money, but which are in fact merely the documentary record of a speculation upon which the bank has embarked.

This is such an important matter that I should like to read once more from that very interesting statement made a few weeks ago by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) in his address before the Canadian Club of Toronto. I shall not say that there is anything new in what he said, but it is rather extraordinary that this should come from a gentleman on the government benches. I am going to take the liberty of reading again a few paragraphs from his excellent address and to comment upon them as I go along. He said:

> The prevalent conception that bank deposits may only be created by actual deposits of specie, or its equivalent in dominion notes or foreign exchange, is quite erroneous.

But that has been precisely the impression left by many a speech of the Prime Minister. The Secretary of State points out that that is an entirely erroneous impression and he goes on to give his reasons for so saying:

> The bank returns for September 30 last disclose that the banks held only $49,000,000 in specie and $127,200,000 in dominion notes, or a total of approximately $176,000,000 in specie and notes, while their current loans and discounts were $1,428,000,000—

If that is all they held, how could they give out so much more? I recall that one of the witnesses before the banking and commerce committee ten years ago, dealing with this point, said: "It is a very good thing that a little money goes into the banks, or people would wonder how so much comes out". The Secretary of State continues:

—which was a reduction of $932,000,000 in the amount of current loans and discounts on September 30, 1929. Such a large reduction in outstanding current credits would seem to indicate that the industrial and commercial activities of Canada have been reduced or restricted by nearly 40 per cent since September, 1929.

The reduction of those activities is indissolubly bound up with the financial policy of the banks and over that financial policy this government has no control and will have less under the legislation proposed with regard to the central bank. I go on to quote what I think was quoted by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote):

The aggregate of these loans, by which the bulk of all deposits are created, largely represents advances of credit made by the banks to their customers.

Again:

The credit extended by the Canadian banks is secured in less than one-fourth part by the capital and surplus of the banks, but largely by the good faith, property, administrative efficiency and business capacity of the customers to whom such loans are made.

Many of us, if we have occasion to go into a bank to borrow money, have the idea that there must be a great deal of gold in the vaults and a large stack of bank notes in the tills, or else we would never be able to get any money out. As a matter of fact if a farmer goes to borrow money from a bank the first question asked him is: What is your security, what is your collateral? And the farmer has to deposit certain security. Then he is handed a pass book and given a line of credit, and he may write cheques to the extent of the line of credit granted to him by the bank. Every time he signs a cheque for $10 he thereby creates $10 of new money; not the bank's money but money that the bank permits him to create. In practice it may be necessary for the bank to have a little till money to cash odd cheques that come in, but if we did our business wholly by the cheque system—and it was said in the banking and commerce committee eleven years ago that ninety-six per cent of the business of this country is done by the cheque system—if we did it all in that way I submit that that transaction of the farmer borrowing money from the bank could be done in an empty room; there need be no deposit of gold or bills. The bank does perform a valuable function, that of making investigation into the standing of the farmer and the possibility of his repaying the loan.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. NICHOLSON: Why should he repay it at all?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will go on with my argument. The bank performs a valuable function in assessing his customer's ability and in underwriting him; there is no doubt of that. But my point is that the money is not necessarily money deposited in the bank by someone; it is credit based on securities. I want to say very clearly that I am not suggesting that the banks can carry on that process to an unlimited extent; I know they cannot or they would court failure. But I say that such transactions are commonly misunderstood, even by members of this house. Hence let me read the clearcut statement of the Secretary of State.

The creation and issue of money was in former times the prerogative of the sovereign. In a more primitive society money consisted exclusively of metallic coins. Later governments began the issue of paper notes, redeemable in metallic currency, and these notes were declared by decree or by statute law to be legal tender in payment of all liabilities.

In more modern times the invention and adoption of the cheque system has effected a radical revolution in monetary policy. The cheque has now largely usurped the function of metallic coins and government notes as currency.

Under the modern banking practice a bank customer, instead of withdrawing his loan in bank notes and metallic currency, receives a credit entry in the books of the bank for the amount of the bank's loan, as if it were a deposit made by him in his account with the bank.

I call attention to that phrase. He receives a loan and he is credited with that amount as if it were a deposit. The bank regards it as such, publishes it as such; but in reality it is a loan.

Against this credit in the bank's books of account the customer draws his cheques. The customer's cheque, which is an order on the bank for the payment of money to the payee of the cheque, merely results in the transference of the credit, which has previously been granted by the bank, from this customer's name to the name of another customer in the same or another bank's books of account. In case the payee of the cheque so drawn keeps his banking account in another bank, the two banks, in the larger cities and towns, daily adjust their balances through the clearing house.

The result is that, in modern practice, 70 to 80 per cent of the aggregate of all deposits, shown in the Canadian bank returns—

Note that.

—represent in reality the amount of loans made by the banks and then outstanding.

A few deposits are cash deposits made with the bank, but seventy or eighty per cent of the so-called deposits consist in reality of loans.

Then there follow these figures, already given by my friend the hon. member for Macleod:

On September 30 last the Canadian chartered banks held deposits by the public, payable on demand in Canada.. .. ..$	491,783,798
Deposits payable after notice or on a fixed day in Canada.. ..	1,372,184,120
Deposits elsewhere than in Canada..	296,878,318
Balances due dominion and provincial governments.. .. .	99,506,094
Total deposits in the chartered banks of Canada.. .. .. ..$	2,260,352,330

This aggregate of deposits on September 30 last was $436.500,000 less than the average amount of deposits during the year 1929.

Since the cheque system has been adopted, the difference between the amount of cheques paid into a customer's account at his bank and the cheques drawn by the customer and paid out by the bank, represents a sum of money which the customer owns, but nevertheless this money does not exist except in the accounts of the customer's bank.

Let me repeat that—it is well put:

. . . this money does not exist except in the accounts of the customer's bank.

Then a little further on he continues:

The cheque system, which has been developed, enables the banks to create money without the issue of their printed notes. On September 30 last all the Canadian banks had $141,000,000 of their own notes in circulation, while the aggregate of bank deposits was $2,260,000,000.

I wonder how long in this house we will have to endure having prominent members of the house talk to us as if we were fools enough still to believe that the banks lend out only what are called deposits.

One other quotation:

But the cheque system, which now prevails, enables the banks, as I have stated, to create credit money at will for many hundreds of millions of dollars in excess of their note issues. $1.428,000,000 of such credit money was issued and outstanding on September 30 last. In comparison with this bank credit money, the amount of all other money in circulation is quite insignificant.

My point is this; that being the situation, the banks have a tremendous power in their hands. They can practically create money, give that money to their directors or to their friends, and withhold it from their competitors; they can lend it where it may bring the largest return to the shareholders of the bank, and withhold it when it is asked for undertakings that are of most advantage to the public. The control of credit ought not to be allowed to remain any longer in the hands of private corporations, but rather should be regarded as a public utility.

There is one other and perhaps even more serious aspect of the situation. According to all economists the amount of money in circulation has a very real relationship to the price level. I will not say that the price level is wholly dependent on the amount of money in circulation and its velocity of circulation, but I do say there is a very close connection. My contention in that regard is borne out by the report of the Canadian Macmillan commission, which I need not take time to read. It is not merely a question of the amount of gold we have, or of the amount of bank notes in circulation; much more is it a question of the amount of these so-called deposits or loans which are in existence, because these three put together practically determine the sum total of money in circulation. It is true that directly or indirectly the government has control over the issue of bank notes, but the government has no control whatever of the extension or the restriction of credits, and it is credits that constitute the most important factor in this question.

Perhaps one may say: What does the price level mean? It means in practice the measure by which we determine the value of everything. May I use an illustration? Our ordinary yardstick is very carefully preserved at Greenwich, so that it may not shrink or expand by the smallest fraction of an inch; it is an unvarying standard. Our financial yardstick is the dollar, but as someone has said, that yardstick is a rubber dollar. It may expand or it may contract, and to a very large extent it is the amount of money in circulation that leads to its expansion or its contraction.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In relation to the quantity of goods.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes; my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) puts in what I took for granted. It is the relation of the amount of money to the task the money has to perform that determines the value of money. But other things being equal, as the text book people say, supposing the amount of work to be done remains constant, it is the amount of money of all kinds in circulation that to a very large extent determines the purchasing power of the dollar. I submit—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken for over forty minutes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will conclude. I submit that the power of largely determining the buying power of the dollar and of practically determining the price level is too important a function in our economy to be entrusted to the hands of private individuals. We all can see what a tremendous influence that has on our life especially when we remember that our debts have to be paid in terms of a rubber dollar. This may mean that the debts are doubled or that the debts are halved, without any statutory change but simply because of the changing value of the dollar or of the price level, over which the government has no control but which is entirely in the hands of the banks.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, before the bill receives second reading I desire to make a suggestion to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), and I am sure he will welcome it because I propose to show him a method by which he can acquire for his government something in the neighbourhood of three millions of dollars. In the present condition of the finances of Canada and the still very sluggish state of the revenues, I am quite satisfied that even the Minister of Finance in a Conservative government will welcome from one in this corner the suggestion of a method by which he may acquire three million dollars.

Mr. MANION: That is something new.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): And by the way he might use it for railway construction in Peace River country or some other good work.

If the Minister of Finance will turn to section 114 of the Bank Act he will find that it provides:

> The bank shall, within thirty days after the close of each calendar year, transmit or deliver to the minister a return as at the end of such calendar year
> (a) of all dividends which have remained unpaid for more than five years; and
> (b) of all amounts or balances in respect of which no transactions have taken place, or upon which no interest has been paid, during the five years prior to the date of such return:
> Provided that, in the case of moneys deposited for a fixed period, the said term of five years shall be reckoned from the date of the termination of such fixed period.

Then section 115 provides:

> (1) If, in the event of the winding-up of the business of the bank in insolvency, or under any general winding-up act, or otherwise, any moneys payable by the liquidator, either to shareholders or depositors, remain unclaimed,
>
> (a) for the period of three years from the date of suspension of payment by the bank;
> (b) for a like period from the commencement of the winding-up of such business; or
> (c) until the final winding-up of such business, if the business is finally wound up before the expiration of the said three years,
> such moneys and all interest thereon shall, notwithstanding any statute of limitations or other act relating to prescription, be paid to the minister, to be held by him subject to all rightful claims on behalf of any person other than the bank.

I happened to look up the figures recently in respect of unclaimed bank balances, and I find that they run something over three and a quarter million dollars. The annua! calls made on these unclaimed balances do not amount to more than twenty per cent of the total amount at any time, I am informed; in fact, in recent years it has not approximated twenty per cent. It would therefore be quite safe for the government to make provision for an amendment to the act by which it could either tax the eighty per cent of the unpaid balances into the treasury or expropriate them by an amendment to the act taking, of course, full responsibility for meeting any such claims if and when they arise. The thing has been running for so many years now that there is no danger of any risk or loss in connection with the matter, and if the government desired to do so it could permit the banks to retain the twenty per cent to meet possible claims and also to carry on a full accounting of the other unpaid balances. There would doubtless have to be a service fee paid to the banks for services of that nature, but I do in all seriousness submit that it is possible to acquire a healthy fund of very useful credit or currency in this fashion.

There is another point to which the attention of the government might be directed. So far as I can ascertain, at the end of the five year period, five years after the owner of an unpaid balance in the bank has failed to make application for it, the interest does not appear to be computed. In other words, in the returns made to the government I find no indication that the interest on the unpaid balance is maintained and reported upon once the five year period has expired. Frankly I do not think that is quite proper, and the government would be entitled in my opinion on taking over these balances to the full amount of the accrued interest. The sum doubtless would be a very substantial one. I make that suggestion in the hope that it may help the government slightly, and in the way of constructive proposals in respect of amendments that might be made to the act. I do so because frankly I think it is going to be impossible for hon. members of this house who have drastic but realistic views with regard to banking, to have brought into effect in the present constitution of this parliament what they regard as best in the general interests of the Dominion of Canada. I must, however, before the passage of the second reading of this bill state my position in connection therewith.

First of all, I am definitely opposed to a continuation of the concentration of power in the hands of fewer and fewer persons in this country—a concentration of power that to-day has reached an amazing state. This house listened this afternoon to statement after statement by hon. members in this corner, notably those contributed by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) and the member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine), with regard to interlocking directorates. I now submit to the house a statement of the holdings of three of these directors.

Sir Herbert Holt influences as director or managing director, and sometimes as president, the following:

General Canadian companies ..	$1,136,400,000
Insurance companies..	688,700,000
Royal bank (president)..	825,700,000
Canadian Pacific Railway.	1,380,900,000
Canadian companies operating abroad..	505,600,000
	$4,537,300,000

Mr. BOURASSA: What about the Montreal Tramways?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have not given all of them. He is president of the Montreal Trust, in connection with which I cannot secure accurate information as to its capital assets, but it involves a large number of interlocking investment and banking houses and corporations.

I take next Sir Charles Gordon:

General holdings.	$ 454,000,000
Bank of Montreal (President).	794,000,000
Canadian Pacific Railway.. ..	1,380,900,000
	$2,628,900,000

Sir Charles Gordon, apart altogether from the Royal Trust, of which, like the Montreal Trust, the capital assets are difficult to discover, holds $2,628,900,000, and by the way that is quite conservative.

I take next W. A. Black:

General holdings..	$ 345,000,000
Bank of Montreal..	794,000,000
Canadian Pacific Railway.	1,380,900,000
	$2,519,900,000

These three sums make a total of $9,686,100,000. It would, however, be quite unfair to leave that figure in its present form because it includes three times the figure for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and twice the figure for other institutions. So I now deduct all duplications, and I find that the net capital assets controlled by these three men amount to $5,835,300,000 in the hands of three men—three men only in this dominion. That sum represents approximately one-fifth of the total estimated wealth of the dominion at this moment. I wonder if hon. gentlemen realize the implication of that, the extent of power vested in the hands of these men.

Mr. BENNETT: May I point out to my hon. friend that his statement is wholly incorrect? These three men are three of many. These three men do not control that amount of money as stated. Surely the hon. gentleman does not want to make a statement such as that to this house.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The right hon. gentleman is quite right. They do not absolutely control outright, but my right hon. friend knows as well as I do the tremendous and powerful dominating force of these three men on boards of directors of every one of these corporations.

Mr. BENNETT: I know the opposite. I know that they very rarely attend the meetings, except in two or three cases—the Bank of Montreal and one or two others. Take, for instance, two of these men. They do dominate because they are presidents and control the institutions, but in the case of the other institutions they rarely attend the meetings. It is well to be fair about these things. To create prejudice is one thing; to be fair is another.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I propose to be fair without creating prejudice. The tremendous power to dominate possessed by these men involves a form of economic dictatorship which the right hon. gentleman is well aware of. I should like to know of specific instances of the real plans or desires of men like Sir Herbert Holt having been thwarted even by the government.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member should read the Bank of Canada bill.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The Bank of Canada bill is a matter with which we are not dealing at the present time; we are dealing with the commercial banks. May I observe at this stage that while the Bank of Canada bill does provide for some control over the volume of credit within the country, it does not purport to control the allocation or direction of that volume. This tremendous and powerful weapon is still left in the hands of men like these to whom I am referring.

For about seven thousand years our forefathers secured from the earth what sustenance they could by means of their own muscular energy and with the aid of domesticated animals. During that period the tempo of human production hardly changed at all. The only machines in existence were very primitive in nature. Here and there waterwheels supplied a little "direct" power, but that was all. Then man discovered steam, almost accidentally, and instantly the divine spark that is in him burst into flame. Scientific devices increased by multitudes. Great Britain was the first of all nations to adapt her production to mechanized processes. It is only a little over eighty years ago that this great change reached its first harvest. A great many people, and even some hon. members in this chamber, are still unaware of the economic impact of the changes brought about, even in their own short period of life, by the modern process of production of human requirements. By 1851 England's industrial output had reached such a stage that in spite of the fact she was then at the very height of her colonial glory, with vast markets to exploit, under the system then existing and which still exists she was unable to consume within her own borders the vast production of her machines. In order partly to meet this difficulty the first world exhibition was held in London. The world came to England's shore and the world placed orders for goods. England's greatness as a creditor and trading nation grew by leaps and bounds. But the world did something else. It undertook to study England's method and it placed orders, not only for "consumption" goods but for what the economists call "capital" goods, that is, plant, equipment and machinery. I venture to suggest that the year 1851 might well go down in history as the year which saw the transformation of the method of production of the needs of the human race from a non-mechanical to an almost purely mechanical process. From then on it was simply a race between nations to improve the technique of production and we have now reached the stage where such orthodox economists as Sir Arthur Salter and Sir Basil Blackett state that there is no reason why any man, woman or child should suffer a single moment of anxiety regarding food, clothing and housing, and indeed many comforts as well. There are sufficient energy resources to provide the entire population with the adequate necessities and indeed, in many cases, with many of the comforts. I commend to this parliament the consideration of improvement in economic conditions, so that the spiritual and the cultural may advance. Until we do that we shall never get rid of the degrading conditions in which we find such a large and increasing mass of our people to-day.

Many hon. members around me are manufacturers, and they have had greater opportunities than I to examine the modern technique of production. However, during my various trips throughout this country I have taken the opportunity to visit every factory in any town I might be in. I have seen them weaving woven wire fencing; I have seen them putting heads on nails, something I had wondered about before; I have seen them making chocolates; I have seen them making underwear and spinning cotton on the great looms of Sir Charles Gordon's plant. So on all through the gamut of modern production. Since the introduction of the new form of power known as electricity, of which we know very little other than that we can use it, modern mechanization has been again revolutionized. I have heard of one steel mill which was rebuilt in the spring of 1930. The old mill used to employ some 600 men, but the new mill, which is equipped throughout with semi-automatic electrical machinery, can produce more of a better product and yet gives employment to only six men. Mr. John Davis, formerly Secretary of Labour of the United States of America, pointed out in a pamphlet issued not long ago that the shoe plants of the United States, if working at capacity, could produce the requirements of the country for a whole year in seventeen and a half days. In Canada, we need to realize the potential output of our steel mills in Sydney, in Hamilton and in Sault Ste. Marie. These mills have not for long worked to anything like capacity. The machines of Canada have never been worked to full capacity. The war was the nearest approach to full time use.

The increase of technologic production has been so great that even if the production activity of 1929 were restored, people are estimating future reemployment on the basis of one-half the present unemployed; that is the most that industry can absorb even under the most favourable conditions. I believe that to be a sound contention. I believe that to-day we could produce as much as, if not more than in 1929 and yet absorb only half of those who are now out of work. In addition we have the growing number of young men and women who are leaving our schools and colleges every year and for whom there is neither hope nor work under present conditions. There is nothing ahead of them but despair and disaster. Canada can be happy in the fact that materially no nation is more satisfactorily situated. We have the vast resources which hon. gentlemen are very proud to discuss during elections and even at other times. We have a vast heritage of artificial energy which is almost untouched. In addition we have a population who have to their credit the desire to produce the services and goods required by the nation. The charge against the Canadian people of general idleness cannot be sustained by anyone in the world. As a matter of fact, there are only two indolent classes to-day: there is one per cent at the top who do not have to provide any services and less than one-half per cent at the very bottom who are for pathological reasons unwilling to render services.

I have not the time to paint a complete picture of the possibilities of this country. I have mentioned mechanization but hon. gentlemen know as much about that as I do. Mechanization would never have come into being nor could it continue without the extension and progressive development of artificial energy. We can almost forget steam it is now being superseded by electrical power. A new form of energy infinitely more important, more powerful, more easily concentrated, immensely cheaper and terrifically more efficient. A few years ago I read an estimate by Lord Rothermere, I think in the Daily Mail. He stated that at that time the United States was using some 29,000,000 horsepower of electrical energy in industry. It was estimated that this meant the equivalent of 290,000,000 human workers represented by this one form of energy. I hope hon. gentlemen get the import of that fact. A population of 126,000,000 men, women and children have in electrical power the equivalent of 290,000,000 human workers. This is on the engineering basis of one horse-power equalling ten adult human work units.

I was so much interested in that estimate that I asked our own Dominion Statistician, Mr. Coats, than whom there is no better, to tell me what had happened in Canada and in the world in general along these lines. The last year for which world figures could be obtained was 1931, and by that year the use of electrical energy in the world had increased to a point where it equalled 1,500,000,000 men. The total population of the world is estimated at roughly 2,000,000,000. Among vast and varied resources, Canada is the happy possessor of what I think is the second greatest essential in modern commercial life. The first essential is purchasing power and the second is this form of power known as hydro-electric energy. We have so far but scratched the surface of the possibilities of power development in Canada. We stand in the row of nations second in the potential production of electricity; for at this day we have approximately 7,330,000 horse power developed and ready for production or, and hon. gentlemen will note this, the equivalent of 73,000,000 human workers. And this in a population of less than 11,000,000. Every man, woman and child in Canada, under a decently ordered state of society, might have as an electrical ally the equivalent of the power of 7 men, ready to do their work and their bidding for them, tirelessly, ceaselessly, day after day, night after night, at the pressing of a button or the pulling of a lever. And this is not something that can be exhausted; it is not something like a gold mine or any other sort of mine; nor can it be depleted like the fertility of the soil. It is as permanent as the lakes and rivers in our land. It is the most valuable of all the resources we have at the present time, and we have it to a superabundant degree.

I need not dwell on the introduction of the third chief form of artificial power, the internal combustion engine; but hon. gentlemen who come from the west no doubt know the tremendous effect it has in extending the area of cultivation and in increasing the capacity of the individual farmer not only to handle a far greater acreage than before but to produce far greater quantities of all field crops.

We have in Canada everything necessary for human life, almost everything necessary for our comforts; we have these vast resources in the form of electrical and other artificial power; we have a splendid population, people anxious to do any work required; yet we have misery and hunger, approaching absolute destitution, despair, creeping old age of penury, relying on a form of state charity. I do not think that this sort of thing can be called Christian. A system that condemns the people, in the midst of plenty, to a condition of penury and utter poverty is not a Christian system, and no one dare make that argument for it. And here we are engaged in the gentle and delightful practice of committing what I am bound to term sacrilege; for after the bountifulness of the Almighty has blessed the nation with an abundance of all the things that people need, the only answer of our statesman to Him is to throw His bounty back in His face by destroying it—that appears to be the only method by which the nations to-day propose to get rid of the problem facing them, the problem of distributing the enormous production of industry. That is the supreme problem of all. But instead of applying themselves to experimental economics with courage and vision, we find leaders everywhere shrinking back from the task, or flying to the fossil room of the British Museum, having for their object apparently the discovery of the quickest and easiest method by which they may destroy the wealth that has been produced by man in cooperation with the Almighty. There were people in the old days who would have said that we should deserve to be visited by a famine. It may be true still; we still deserve it, for the stupidity of the actions and the attitude of statesmen and leaders throughout the world justifies the punishment. If the people have confidence in such leaders, and countenance the continuance of policies of this sort, then the people will deserve what their leaders already deserve.

And so we find this strange comment in a newspaper in the United States. The Cleveland Press carried the following item:

> The most striking evidence that has come to our attention of a popular realization of a change in the old order is the following item, which appeared in this newspaper's columns of church news:
>
> "Prayer for more bountiful crops for the farmer, usual to Episcopal services on Rogation Sunday, was modified throughout the Ohio diocese. Officials felt the appeal would not be in accord with the government policy of limiting crop production. So prayer was offered instead for improved means of produce distribution."

That last at least was intelligent. Commenting on this dispatch, the Cleveland Press observed editorially:

> Are we going to see the time when the President of the United States—
>
> Or, for that matter, the Prime Minister of Canada.
> —will call on us to give thanks the last Thursday in November because the harvests were not so bountiful as usual?

As a matter of fact, I did hear some whispering about the sigh of relief that went up when a news dispatch to London intimated the fact that the grasshopper menace was an exceedingly serious matter in western Canada and that the crop was not likely to be as large as had been anticipated. On top of that, turn to other parts of the world and what do you see? You find Egypt, by law, trying to limit the cotton crop in 1926—why? Was it because the people of Egypt and the people of the world at large had then enough cotton? Not at all. It was because, under the present system of overcapitalization, it was impossible for them to sell their products at a profit, and unless they were sold at a profit production would not continue. In the state of Texas an attempt was also made to limit production—an attempt which the authorities sought to enforce with the aid of the state militia, and which failed. And why was that attempt made there, to limit production? Was it because the people in that state had a sufficiency of cotton goods? No. Is industry concerned with the supplying of goods? Is that the motive anywhere? That is not the motive under the present system. Ask any manufacturer what his motive is and you will find that the sole question is as to what can be made out of production; it is not a question of supplying human needs.

Again, turn to Brazil, and the classical example given the world a year ago when they destroyed a million sacks of coffee. Was it because there was enough coffee in the world? Ask the farmers of western Canada; ask the unemployed throughout this dominion and the United States, who at that time numbered some twelve or thirteen millions. The world had not then enough coffee; yet one million sacks of coffee was destroyed. And the same is true of sugar and of rubber. Indeed, we find some of the natives being sent out to chop down the rubber plantations which a few years ago they had laboriously cultivated. Imagine the insanity of the system. On top of this coffee destruction that occurred a year ago the world conference received a recommendation from France with regard to the limitation of the production of certain commodities. That world conference was sitting in what I am told is the fossil room of the British Museum—whoever decided that that should be the place for the world conference had a fine sense of humour—and it was the day following the dispatch, on the 16th of June last, with regard to the destruction of coffee in Brazil that a recommendation was made by France for the artificial limitation of the production of a long list of basic commodities. Was not that an intelligent contribution to the problem?

And now for the following dispatch from Sao Paulo, Brazil, through the Associated Press:

> The Sao Paulo State Coffee Institute urged the government Thursday to sanction the burning quickly of nearly six million sacks of retained coffee—

What for? Was it because people had more coffee than they could possibly consume? No, but——to provide space in warehouses for the new crop in July. A 20,000,000 sack crop is expected.

And so you have throughout the entire world to-day this condition of vast potential abundance on the one hand, machines and equipment, artificial power, the energy of ambitious, virile people, more highly educated than those of any previous generation, all ready to produce everything needed, and on the other hand vast hordes of unemployed, with destitution and broken hearts, people crying to heaven for justice and for at least some reasonable solution of the problem. It is only a few years ago that Arthur Kitson, manufacturer and authority on financial questions, president of the British Banking Reform League, directed the attention of the British people to the machine problem, when referring to England's position—and, remember, we are not behind her in our tremendous per capita capacity for production. Arthur Kitson at that time said:

It is quite certain that the need for labour must become less and less with the growth of inventions and the increase in industrial efficiency. Indeed the real problem we have to solve is not so much that of finding constant employment for our people as our supplying them with life's necessities and comforts out of the abundance of goods created. Even to-day the labour of less than 10 per cent of the population will readily suffice to maintain the entire inhabitants of this country in a high state of comfort. Suppose discoveries and inventions during the next half century result in the displacement of all manual labour by machinery, must the bulk of the world's inhabitants then perish?

Yet under the present system that would be their lot—either to perish or to be forced to a low degree of degradation under state charity. Why, Mr. Speaker a man has not even the "right" under our present peculiar social order to a job, and without a decent job he cannot maintain his family and his home. Yet I say our fellow citizens may not demand, as a right, a job. Let a man try to get one even if he does demand it! Even Mr. Roosevelt, for whose courage, whose willingness to experiment and whose intelligence in surrounding himself with experts I offer my sincere admiration, when dealing with the same problem, fell into the same trap into which others fell. One of his first acts was to arrange for the ploughing under of nearly 11,000,000 acres already sown to cotton. Hon. members will recollect that towards the close of last summer or in the early fall arrangements were made for the killing and burning of several thousands of hogs. Why? Because the people of the United States had enough pork or bacon or hams or the people of the world had enough? No. There were at that time in the United States about 10,000,000 or 11,000,000 unemployed, who with their dependents made a vast army in that country who, I venture to say, had no opportunity to eat a pork chop or had a chance to get nearer one than the passing smell of it.

We have reached this stage of the vast production of which we are potentially capable. There is not an hon. gentleman in the house who can refute that statement. We have the capacity within Canada to supply our people with most of their needs and with many comforts. Out of the vast resources we have in artificial and human power, we can do this. What are we going to do about the matter? The first great essential of modern commercial life is the medium of exchange, and that is why I venture to discuss this problem on the Bank Act. Yet we have continued through years of operation and bitter lessons to delegate to an inferior authority the right and power to determine not only the quantity of credit within limits, but the allocation of the credit of this country. As long as you leave to private individuals the power to determine both the volume and the allocation of credit—and the two go together and are most important in that relationship—you place in their hands a power, greater than that of the government itself, a power to determine whether men shall be employed, whether industry shall operate, whether commerce shall continue, whether production shall be in a buoyant or in a depressed condition. That power is vested in a group of men growing fewer in number every decade. It is a power which supersedes that of the state, which determines the economic lives of the inhabitants of a country, and I say to the house that we shall be recreant in our duty as trustees of the rights of the people of Canada if we return once more to those private interests this vast power. I would gladly socialize the financial institutions, but I am afraid the house would not go that far.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Even my hon. friends the Liberals say: "hear, hear."

Mr. JACOBS: Not all.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I thank the hon. member; not all, says one of them. What the committee should do, if they are not willing to undertake the socialization of the currency and credit of the country, is to make the necessary amendments to the act so that the state may be able to determine the allocation of the credit as it is now proposed through a central bank to determine the volume.

That this is important is readily recognized if any hon. member will follow the records of the last few years. From 1926 to 1929 the banks in Canada went on a splurge, with all their wisdom, with all the sound intelligence and common sense they were supposed to possess, they inflated; they inflated with their eyes wide open; they increased the volume of call loans abroad and at home, of domestic loans, of bank notes, and they were assisted in doing so by the Department of Finance through the Finance Act. They deliberately assisted a speculative market to a greater degree than any other enterprise in the country. Then they became frightened at the balloon they had sent up, instead of letting a little of the inflation out of it and allowing it to come back to earth in decent fashion, they plunged the knife of deflationary despair into the balloon, bringing the whole economic structure in collapse around us. If that is not an accurate picture of what happened, I shall ask any hon. member to describe it better than that. One of our best economists, Professor Curtis, in his pamphlet entitled Credit Control in Canada, had this to say at page 107:

> Such a condition was precisely what developed in 1929, with the result that Canada, extra-legally but effectively, abandoned the gold standard.

Further on he deals with inflation of currency and credit, but I have not time to give that to the house. I may be called upon to justify further my contention, if that is really necessary with intelligent men, that this vast power to dominate the very life of the community should again be taken by the sovereign power of the state itself. I do not wish to go into too elaborate details in that connection. I am willing to take my common sense and experience in life with the reading I have done for many years, but I am enormously supported and encouraged in my view when I read the following:

> In the first place, then, it is patent that in our days not alone is wealth accumulated, but immense power and despotic economic domination is concentrated in the hands of a few, and that those few are frequently not the owners, but only the trustees and directors of invested funds, who administer them at their good pleasure.

I pause there because the next passage is even more important to this particular question:

> This pawer becomes particularly irresistible when exercised by those who, because they hold and control money, are able also to govern credit and determine its allotment, for that reason supplying so to speak, the life blood to the entire economic body, and grasping, as it were, in the hands the very soul of production, so that no one dare breathe against their will.

That is the position to-day, not only in Canada but in every so-called modern civilized nation on earth, yes, in every nation; those who control the credit and its allotment hold us in the hollow of their hand.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the quotation from?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The encyclical letter of His Holiness Pope Pius XI, entitled Social Justice and Charity. I continue:

> This accumulation of power, the characteristic note of the modern economic order, is a natural result of limitless free competition which permits the survival of those only who are the strongest, which often means those who fight most relentlessly, who pay least heed to the dictates of conscience.

I pause just to make this comment on that passage. I doubt if it is really right to refer to the strongest. If the reference had been to the slickest, the cleverest, the greediest, the most unconscionable, I would agree with it, because to-day it is not the creator, the constructor or things, the builder in the nation, that is of this rank; it is the man who sits around the mahogany table and plots, plans and schemes the best and quickest methods of skinning the public. Those are the men to-day who are the dominant force in the community. I continue the quotation:

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): With the permission of the house I continue the quotation:

> Unbridled ambition for domination has succeeded the desire for gain; the whole economic life has become hard, cruel and relentless in a ghastly measure.

We in this corner hold views that differ from those of other hon. members. I now conclude with this point; we urge in connection with this matter that the first and prime essential of a just social condition is state control and operation of the social credit of the state. This is our firm belief, and it is strongly supported by this remark found at page 33 of the same encyclical:

> For it is rightly contended that certain forms of property must be reserved to the state, since they carry with them an opportunity of domination too great to be left to private individuals without injury to the community at large.

I submit that the private control of credit gives opportunity of domination too great to be left to private individuals, and that it has been exercised to the detriment of the community at large.

Motion (Mr. Rhodes) agreed to; bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INSPECTION, VETERINARY AND MARINE PERSONNEL —PENSIONS—DUTIES AND OFFENCES OF MEMBERS OF FORCE

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved,—that, it is expedient to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act to provide for the appointment of detective inspectors, sub-inspectors and assistant veterinary surgeons, and the personnel of the marine section, and to provide for pensions to widows and allowances to children of officers and constables who may be killed while in the performance of duty, and to make further provisions respecting the counting of service of officers and constables with any provincial police force for purposes of pension, and in regard to the duties and offences of the members of the force.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Perhaps I had better offer a word of explanation upon this resolution. This resolution and the bill founded upon it relate to the interior organization and discipline of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Let me say at the outset that there is little or no increase in the annual expenditure involved. There is some rearrangement, and I should add that in respect to the last clause of the resolution there may be a slight expenditure involved, and for that reason the resolution was duly submitted to His Excellency.

In the first place it is proposed to create a new classification to be known as detective inspectors. There is a detective force in connection with the police, and men who have served in it for a considerable time think they are entitled to a step in rank; they will be called detective inspectors. Then there is another class, subinspectors, and another, assistant veterinary surgeons. When the act was drawn, through an oversight the rank of assistant veterinary surgeon was omitted. There are only two assistant veterinary surgeons in Canada, one in Regina and one in Ottawa, and they desire to have their rank recognized.

Next is a provision in regard to the marine section. That section is of considerable importance in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. There are in the marine section now, of officers, 34, and of other ratings, 169. Some 30 vessels are operated and 77 power boats. These are scattered in the Arctic, east and west, in police work and on the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards, chiefly in the preventive service of the customs. There has not heretofore been an establishment laid down for the marine section.

The next provision is in regard to payment to the dependents of officers and constables who may be killed while in the performance of duty in the force. Heretofore it has been customary when such misfortunes have occurred to vote a sum in the estimates and carry it on for subsequent years. The proposal in the resolution is that where an officer or constable is killed on active service his widow or dependents will be entitled to one half the sum he would have been entitled to by way of pension, instead of the annual vote which we have heretofore made in the House of Commons.

Mr. HOWDEN: How long will that continue?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It will continue during the lifetime of his widow and until his children reach the age of, I think, sixteen—I am not sure of the age.

The last clause is to cover the case of a few men who at one time served in the various provincial police forces. If my memory serves me aright there are only seven, or perhaps it is eleven, involved. When agreements were made between the various provinces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police under which the policing of the provinces was taken over by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, it was arranged that members of provincial forces who were taken in, should for the purposes of pension come under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension system. But there was a small number of men who had been taken in before the amalgamation, who had served previously in provincial police forces; the last clause makes provision to include that small number of men in the pension scheme of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. In that respect there will be a little increase in expense, but it is very slight indeed. These matters are all elaborated in the bill which I propose to introduce if the resolution is carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In regard to the marine section, is this the first time that that section has been included in the estimates of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police? If so what are the proportions on the Atlantic and Pacific coast respectively?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is not the first time; they have always been included in the vote. There is no change in the vote under this resolution, but the personnel will now be entitled to be classified, whether as ships' officers or other ratings, in the marine section. There is skipper, assistant skipper, mate, and then the various ratings of the marine section. I cannot say just how the marine service is at present divided, but the larger portion is in northern waters in the east and west Arctic; and those in British Columbia and Atlantic coast waters are engaged very largely in the preventive service work, while in northern waters it is police work.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Is there anyone specially charged with the administration of the section in the province of Quebec?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The whole service is under the administration of Major General MacBrien, commissioner of the force.

Mr. CASGRAIN: But as regards the province of Quebec and that marine service, is there any special officer in charge, a deputy, or whatever is his title?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not believe I can tell his title, but when the bill is introduced I will have that information.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How many provinces are directly policed by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Mr. GUTHRIE: All the provinces except British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Are any negotiations now in progress in regard to any of these three provinces?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There was some informal discussion with members of the government of British Columbia when they were here at the recent conference, but nothing developed. I think the British Columbia government may have the matter under consideration but I have not heard from them since.

Mr. JACOBS: Could the minister tell us the strength of the force throughout the country?

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: In all branches, 2,517, of whom 350 are in the preventive service.

Mr. JACOBS: And is it considered necessary to have only two veterinary inspectors?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There are a number of veterinary surgeons, but the rank of assistant veterinary surgeon was never recognized in the act. There are two assistants, one at Regina and the other here at Ottawa. We have horses at only one or two points; I think the total number of horses is only 293 now, though it is still called the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. We have more motor cars for police work than horses, but at these two points there are assistants veterinary surgeons whose rank never has been recognized under the act.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Would the minister tell us how the personnel has increased in number for the last three years? What was the strength three years ago?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Three years ago we did not have the preventive service. I think the force would number about 1,600 or 1,700. I can get the exact figures when the bill is in committee.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Could the minister tell us how many of these vessels are in service in the province of Quebec?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, I cannot.

Mr. HEENAN: Did I understand the minister to say that the provision for pensions to widows and dependents would be fifty per cent of the salary?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, fifty per cent of the retiring allowance to which a man would be entitled if he retired from the force. If a man is killed in the performance of his duties half the amount of his pension would go to his dependents. I may say that the former system of voting the amounts annually in this house was a little inconvenient in some cases. A constable was killed in northern Saskatchewan last year; two hold-up men shot him. He was killed in the performance of his duty and the widow was left entirely without means. She continued without means until the money was voted by parliament, and was dependent upon her friends for her support for six or seven months. If this amendment be passed, should a case of that kind arise again the widow would probably receive assistance within two or three weeks.

Mr. HEENAN: I quite agree with the minister in what he proposes to do, but I was wondering if fifty per cent of the retiring allowance would be an equitable way of dealing with the matter. Can the minister tell us if this allowance will average anywhere near what a widow receives under the Workmen's Compensation Act in Ontario?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know what the Ontario act would provide, but I know this principle has been recognized in the permanent force and in the mounted police for a very long period of time. In the bill it is stated that the amount payable in respect of each child is $60 a year, I think, and the widow would get probably $400 or $500 in addition.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Apart from the possibility of taking over police work in other provinces is it contemplated that any other functions will be taken over in addition to the preventive service?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Not at the present moment. Some suggestions have been made in regard to the police in attendance in this house, for instance; they are not under the mounted police, but that matter has not been seriously considered.

Mr. SANDERSON: I should like to ask the minister if the strength of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is being kept up by recruits and, if so, how many recruits were taken on last year.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I believe fifty were taken on last autumn, but none have been taken on since, and the commissioner informs me that he will not be able to take on any more recruits before June or July. There is a natural wastage in the force, as there is in all forces of the kind, and the commissioner happened to tell me to-day that it would be June or July before he could take on any more recruits.

Mr. HOWDEN: With respect to these pensions, could the minister tell us what the average retiring allowance of a constable would be?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Somewhere around $800 or $900 after twenty years of service.

Mr. HEENAN: I hope that before the minister drafts his bill he will give consideration to this matter, because from the answer he has just given this seems hardly a fair or equitable distribution. Under the Workmen's Compensation Act in Ontario the widow of a man killed receives $40 a month as long as she lives, while for children up to sixteen years of age there is an additional allowance of $120 a year. The minister said the allowance under this act was $60 a year for children.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think it is $60 under this act.

Mr. HEENAN: I think if an officer or constable is killed in the discharge of his duty his dependents should be cared for as well as the dependents of those killed in industry.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This pension fund was formed on an actuarial basis, and the men contribute to the cost of keeping it up. The provision in favour of the widow and children is fixed on the basis of the contribution to the fund. When a man joins the force he knows what he will have to contribute to the fund and the pension he will get after he serves twenty years. If this amendment passes he will also know what his widow and children will get if unfortunately he meets with death during service.

Mr. HEENAN: I am not quarrelling with the system that has obtained up to now. Evidently we have not paid very much attention to these matters, since we have just voted the money each year, but now that we are going to pass an act the very fact that the constables and officers contribute to this fund surely is another reason why their widows and dependents should receive as much as the widows and dependents of men killed in industry.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the widow will get as much as $40 a month.

Mr. EULER: When the preventive force was absorbed by the mounted police I think the salaries of the members of that force were very substantially reduced. I should like to ask the minister whether the pensions of these men are based on their pay as members of the mounted police or on the amount they were receiving under the old organization, or both, with the former higher salary being taken into consideration in the granting of pension?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will have to ask the commissioner when the bill is brought in. My impression is that some consideration is given to the former higher salaries and that an average is taken, but I am not positive of that. I will give the information definitely.

Mr. CASGRAIN: If we are to understand that these pensions are paid out of the money contributed by the officers and constables, I presume the widow will be entitled to that amount for the rest of her life.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Guthrie thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 22, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Salaries and contingent expenses of the several ports of the dominion, including pay for overtime of officers, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act and temporary buildings and rentals, $6,113,000.

Salaries and travelling expenses of officers of the inspection, investigation, audit, and the preventive service undervaluation services, $916,698.

Miscellaneous, including printing and stationery; subscriptions to commercial papers; flags; dating stamps; locks; instruments; express charges on samples; legal forms; legal expenses; premiums on guarantee bonds; uniforms for customs-excise officers; laboratory equipment and supplies, etc., $500,000.

Amount to be paid to the Department of Justice to be disbursed by and accounted for to it for Customs-Excise Secret Investigation Service, $15,000.

To provide for the administration of the Income War Tax Act 1917 and amendments thereof, and authority for this purpose to create positions and make appointments notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act and the said positions and staff so appointed are hereby wholly excluded from the operation of the said act, and salary of $8,000 (less statutory deduction of ten per cent) for the Commissioner of Income Tax, $2,000,000.

Amount to be paid to the Department of Justice, to be disbursed by and accounted for to it for the Income Tax Secret Investigation Service, $15,000—Total, $9,559,698.

Mr. EULER: This appropriation, of course, is for the maintenance of ports throughout the country. I would ask the minister whether any substantial number of ports has been closed during the present year, and if it is the policy of the government to continue with the closing of ports as it may be found advisable.

Hon. R. C. MATTHEWS (Minister of National Revenue): While my officials are looking up the exact number of ports that have been closed, I may say that it is the policy of the government to close ports where conditions demand it.

Mr. EULER: Does that mean that any substantial number will be closed? I have reference to the report of the Royal Commission on Customs and Excise which some years ago recommended that a very considerable number of the ports be closed. That policy was followed to a considerable extent under the former government, and I am curious to know whether a similar policy is being carried out now. It would be interesting to know how many ports are still open throughout the country.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I shall be glad to get the information for my hon. friend. As I have already said, it is the policy of the government to close ports as conditions demand it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Are any salary reductions involved in this vote?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Yes. The ten per cent cut amounts approximately to $600,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is that for the inside or the outside staff?

Mr. MATTHEWS: The outside.

Mr. HEENAN: The other night when the railway estimates were under consideration, after the Minister of Finance had given us some hope—I say hope—that later the government might bring in a measure to restore the ten per cent cut, or a portion of it, we agreed to let the items for the outside service go through and the Minister of Railways promised that if later the ten per cent or any portion of it was restored, the employees of his department would have their salaries restored notwithstanding that we might have passed items covering their services and involving the ten per cent cut. I suppose the Minister of National Revenue will give a similar undertaking as to his department.

Mr. RHODES: If I might be permitted by my colleague, the same answer which I gave the other evening obtains with respect to this vote as well. My hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) puts his own interpretation upon my remarks the other evening; in fact, he went so far as to make a deduction from the appearance of my countenance. I may say to my hon. friends that if it suits the purposes of the opposition to permit these votes outside of civil government to pass, it is distinctly understood that the statement I made the other evening holds good with respect to this and other items of a similar character.

Mr. HEENAN: I notice from the minister's face that there is still more hope.

Mr. JACOBS: He knows a poker face when he sees it.

Mr. HEENAN: This item provides for the payment of overtime to certain officers. Are these officers on the eight hour day and is the overtime for time worked beyond the eight hours?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Yes, it is.

Mr. EULER: I take it that the only branch of what was formerly the preventive service now remaining with the Department of National Revenue is that which has to do with the investigation of undervaluations. How large a staff has the minister concerned with that work, and where are the men located, if it is possible to give that information?

Mr. MATTHEWS: The staff numbers about thirty in all, located at Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver.

Mr. BOTHWELL: May I ask how many ports of entry have been closed in the last three years?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I have not that information with me but I shall be very glad to get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Where ports of entry have been closed on highways running from the United States into Canada—I am speaking particularly of the prairies—would it not be possible to put up signs on the main highways directing people to the nearest port of entry? Many complaints have been made by people that they cannot find a place to report, and there are claims, I understand, now before the department.

Mr. MATTHEWS: My officials inform me that we have signs directing people to the ports of entry.

Mr. REID: I notice that this item provides for overtime of officers. Looking over the Auditor General's report I find that overtime amounts in some cases to as much as $675 a year extra. I also understand that last year many of the temporary men were let go on the Pacific coast, and that the overtime was given to men who were working seven days a week. I think in these times of stress it is about time that overtime amounting to as much as $675 a year be looked into. If a man is getting a salary the year round it should pretty well take care of him especially when there is not work enough to keep all employed. I wonder if the minister would mind looking into that question.

Mr. MATTHEWS: All right.

Mr. HEAPS: There is a little matter I should like to draw to the attention of the committee and the minister in connection with the administration of the income tax. I have had this matter up with the minister but I do not regard as satisfactory the replies I have received. Deductions in income tax returns are allowed to those who donate to charity. It has been brought to my attention that members of certain unions have been giving part of their earnings towards relief of the unemployed membership of their organizations. I know of instances where members of a union have given as much as $454 towards relief of their unemployed membership. This matter was brought to the attention of the income tax officials, but these men who had been giving a fairly considerable part of their earnings each year to the relief of the unemployed were taxed for that portion which they had voluntarily donated. If these men had not voluntarily assessed themselves to the extent of fifteen or twenty per cent of their earnings in order to maintain their own unemployed membership, those unemployed individuals would have become a charge upon the state. It is unfair that these men should be assessed on these donations for income tax purposes. Perhaps a strict interpretation of the law as it exists leaves open to the officials no other course than to assess such donations. If the law is inflexible I should like to know whether the minister will give an undertaking to bring down an amendment to the act to provide that when a member of a union or any other person donates part of his salary or wages to the maintenance of unemployed, that donation shall be treated in exactly the same way as gifts to churches, the Y.M.C.A. or similar organizations.

Mr. MATTHEWS: This department simply carries out the laws and statutes enacted by parliament. What he is suggesting is something which should be referred to parliament or to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). This department is simply administrative.

Mr. RALSTON: Following that up I should like to ask the minister if his department has carried out the law with regard to the decision given by the tariff board in the jute twine case?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I would say that we have carried out the law. An appeal has been entered, and until it is decided, this department is not in a position to act.

Mr. RALSTON: Does the minister suggest that there has been an appeal from the decision of the tariff board?

Mr. MATTHEWS: We are advised that there is an appeal.

Mr. RALSTON: Why has it not been proceeded with?

Mr. MATTHEWS: That is not within the jurisdiction of this department; we are merely administrative.

Mr. RALSTON: Did the department launch the appeal?

Mr. MATTHEWS: No.

Mr. RALSTON: Who did?

Mr. MATTHEWS: The appeal was launched by interested parties, not by the department.

Mr. RALSTON: Who were the interested parties?

Mr. MATTHEWS: The interested parties were Doon Twines Limited, I think of Kitchener. The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) could tell the committee where they are situated.

Mr. EULER: I believe that Doon Twines Limited were the first firm to appeal against the decision of the tariff board. I fancy my hon. friend refers to an appeal on the part of the department against the decision of the tariff board. Was there an appeal by the department?

Mr. MATTHEWS: There was no appeal on the part of the department.

Mr. EULER: There is one question I should like to ask, not only with regard to this particular concern but with regard to other companies. These companies felt that dumping duty should not be applied on their importations from Great Britain. The law passed last session stated that the dumping duty provision should not apply under the empire agreements. I should like to know whether the department is accepting the ruling of the tariff board with regard to these matters and, if so, whether it has made refunds in accordance with that ruling.

Mr. MATTHEWS: It is quite evident that that cannot be done until the appeal is heard.

Mr. EULER: Then the department is making the appeal?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Who is making the appeal?

Mr. MATTHEWS: The department is not making an appeal.

Mr. EULER: The tariff board has made a decision. If the department accepts that decision, refunds will have to be made. If the department is not making those refunds, then it must be appealing against the decision of the tariff board. I should like to know whether any such appeal has been made by the department and, if not, whether the department intends to make refunds according to the decision.

[Mr. Matthews.]

Mr. CASGRAIN: Call for Mr. Breadner.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I can only repeat that no appeal has been made by this department against the decision of the tariff board.

Mr. EULER: I have no desire to embarrass the minister, as I realize he has not been very long in his present position.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Ask the Minister of Finance.

Mr. EULER: I think we should know whether the department is accepting the decision of the tariff board. If it is, then of necessity it must make a refund of the duty improperly collected.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Not while the case is sub judice; not while an appeal is pending.

Mr. EULER: What appeal?

Mr. CASGRAIN: In what court has it been launched?

Mr. MATTHEWS: It is an appeal by Doon Twines Limited.

Mr. EULER: A decision has been given by the tariff board in the case of Doon Twines Limited.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is correct, and an appeal was launched by that company to the president of the privy council. The appeal has not yet been heard. My recollection is that section 58 of the Customs Act provides that until an appeal is disposed of, a decision does not become operative.

Mr. EULER: And there is no refund until that time?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know whether there is a refund, but I know that is the provision of the section.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Did Doon Twines Limited succeed before the tariff board and obtain a reduction of duty?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They did not succeed; the decision was against them and they appealed. The act provides that any party interested may appeal and they appealed as an interested party.

Mr. RALSTON: What entry was it that was carried before the tariff board? Who was the importer?

Mr. MATTHEWS: It was made on the entry of an importer in Montreal.

Mr. RALSTON: Who?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I think there were two entries; one by Thomas Bonar and Company.

Mr. RALSTON: I should like to know. We will be some time on this item and I should like to know if the Thomas Bonar case was the first jute twine case.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Yes, it is known as the Bonar case. That was the first case.

Mr. RALSTON: The department assessed these importers the full dumping duty, claiming that a fixed valuation for duty purposes, which had been made by the minister, was applicable to that particular importation. Is that correct?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Yes, I think that is correct.

Mr. RALSTON: What was the date of the entry?

Mr. MATTHEWS: It was long before my time and I am not as familiar with the matter as I might othewise be, but I think it was some time last summer.

Mr. RALSTON: Was that entry based on a ministerial order which had increased the original order that the minister had made fixing the value for duty purposes?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am informed that it was based on a value fixed by the then minister under the authority of an order in council.

Mr. RALSTON: Was it the second order which had been made by the minister? There were two orders. He made an order in the first place fixing the value for duty purposes, soon after the order in council was passed authorizing the minister to make an order of that kind; and later, I understand, the minister made another order which in effect increased the value for duty purposes.

Mr. MATTHEWS: That was long before my time; I have not the papers.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not expect the minister to have personal knowledge of it at all.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am afraid I cannot answer the question.

Mr. RALSTON: Could the minister get the information from the officers?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Yes; I shall be glad to.

Mr. RALSTON: Can the minister get it to-night for us, on the floor?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am afraid I cannot get it to-night.

Mr. EULER: What is the total number of appeals made against the imposition of the dumping duty in that connection?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am informed that that does not come under our department.

Mr. RALSTON: In order that the minister may understand what I have in mind,—probably he has been in the department long enough to know the general setting of the case—may I give an outline of it? As I understand, in 1931 an order in council was passed, P.C. 2874, which authorized the minister—not this minister but his predecessor—to fix a value for duty purposes of jute twine under section 43, and I understand that following that, on November 30, 1931, an order was made by the minister fixing the value for duty purposes of jute twine. So that it may be on the record, I will read that order:

Section 43, Customs Act
Jute Twine
Order in Council (P.C. 2874)
30th November, 1931
Minimum Value for Duty

Under authority granted by order in council (P.C. 2874) dated 30th November, 1931, I hereby fix the minimum value for duty of Jute Twine as follows:—

	Sterling per lb.	U.S. currency per lb.
Twines made from 1 lea yarns sometimes known as No. 48 yarns from coarser yarns yarns such as ¾ lea (72 lb.) or ½ lea (96 lb.)	4·1d	7·0c
Twines made from 2 lea (24 lb.) yarns..	5·3d	9·0c
Twines made from 3 lea (16 lb.) or 4 lea yarns (12 lb.) or finer yarns.. F.O.B. factory.	7d	11·8c

The above values not to apply to importations bona fide purchased on or before date of issuance of the bulletin and imported and entered at Customs within one month thereafter.

Dated at Ottawa, this 3rd day of December, 1931.

Sgd. E. B. Ryckman,
Minister of National Revenue.

Following that order there appeared appraiser's bulletin, No. 3783, which was sent to me by Mr. Blair, the assistant commissioner, recently. That bulletin contained the values for duty purposes set out in the minister's order of November 30, 1931. Now here is the point. That order which was made in 1931 applied to all importations of jute twine. On November 25, 1932, this house passed an act which amended section 43 and provided in effect that that section should not apply to goods entitled to come in under the British preferential tariff. As I say, that was in November, 1932. My information is that notwithstanding that that new act had been passed, the minister in 1933 issued a further order altering the price upwards for duty purposes of jute twine. This was done after the previous act had been repealed and a new act had been passed which did not permit the fixing of value for duty purposes of goods coming under the British preferential tariff. In spite of that new act the minister issued a new order purporting to be under section 43 of the Customs Act. Although section 43 of the Customs Act contained no provision permitting the fixing of value for duty purposes of goods coming under the British preferential tariff, this new order was issued by the minister increasing prices, and so that it may be on the record I will read it:

Department of National Revenue, Canada
Ottawa, 20th May, 1933.

File No. 176762

Supplement to be attached to Appraisers' Bulletin No. 3783.

Note that it is a supplement to the appraiser's bulletin issued in 1931 under the old act, although the old act had been repealed and a new act had been passed, providing that the fixing of value for duty purposes was not to apply to British preference goods.

Jute Twines

It having become apparent that certain importers are circumventing the spirit and intention of Appraisers' Bulletin No. 3783, the Minister of National Revenue, under the authority of section 43 of the Customs Act and Order in Council P.C. 2874, dated the 30th day of November, 1931, has fixed the following minimum values for duty:

	Sterling per lb.	U.S. currency per lb.
Twines made from yarns sometimes known as 1 lea-48 lb. (to include all twines made from 43 lb. yarns and coarser)	4·1d	7·0c
Twines made from yarns sometimes known as 2 lea-24 lb. (to include all twines made from yarns finer than 43 lb. but not finer than 21 lb.)	5·3d	9·0c
Twines made from yarns sometimes known as 3 lea-16 lb. or 4 lea 12 lb. (to include all twines made from yarns finer than 21 lb.)	7d	11·8c

The provisions of section 6 of the Customs Tariff Act to apply, and importations of such twines shipped on consignment, without sale prior to shipment, so as to evade the payment of special duty, to be subject to the same special duty as if the goods had been sold prior to shipment.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Values in accordance with the foregoing are not to apply to importations bona fide purchased on or before this date and in transit to Canada within two weeks thereafter.

Sgd. E.B.R.

On May 20, 1933, Bulletin No. 176762 was issued containing exactly the same value for duty purposes, and signed by R. W. Breadner, commissioner of customs. As I understand the matter, about that time or soon after this firm imported jute twine into Canada and notwithstanding the fact that, under the British preference, under section 43, the goods did not come within the provision permitting the minister to fix a value for duty purposes, a value was placed on those goods, the value provided in the minister's order, after the act had been repealed, and the firm was compelled to pay that duty. Then I understand the firm appealed; they went to the tariff board and the board rendered a decision on November 4, 1933. This decision, which appears in the Canada Gazette, is as follows:

The tariff board sitting on appeals, on the 30th October, 1933, under the provisions of part II of the Tariff Board Act, ruled, on the same date, as hereunder:—

In the matter of appeal No. 19 by Thomas Bonar and Company (Canada) Limited, Montreal, respecting the value for duty purposes of jute twines, that the appeal must be allowed, on the ground that appraiser's bulletin No. 3783 of 3rd December, 1931, ceased to be in effect upon 23-24 George V, chapter VII coming into effect, and, that appraiser's bulletin (supplement A to 3783), dated May 20, 1933, was without jurisdiction and never had any force or effect.

Edgar Bournival,
Registrar of Appeals.

Ottawa, 31st October, 1933.

The minister, I understand, says that Doon Twines Limited appealed from that decision.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: When was that appeal made?

Mr. MATTHEWS: It was made shortly after the decision and well within the statutory limit of the time for an appeal.

Mr. RALSTON: Why has that appeal not been heard?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I cannot answer that.

Mr. RALSTON: Can the minister not give me an idea how long it has been before the privy council or how long the appeal has been launched?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I cannot give the date, but it is not long ago; it is some weeks ago.

Mr. RALSTON: Perhaps the Minister of Justice could tell us.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The appeal was put in some time in November. The way in which it came to my knowledge was that it was asked whether the Canadian Manufacturers' Association were parties interested under the section and had a right to appeal, and it was decided that they had not. I think it was at that time the twine company itself appealed; it would be in November.

Mr. RALSTON: Can the Minister of Justice tell us why it has not been heard?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know.

Mr. RALSTON: Can he tell us whether his department has advised that under the statute there is no appeal in the case?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is no argument on that; I do not think we have advised anybody on the question.

Mr. RALSTON: Has the department been asked to advise anybody?

Mr. GUTHRIE: We would not advise a private applicant. As I understand the matter, the Department of Justice is there for advising the various departments of the government and not individuals.

Mr. RALSTON: Has the minister advised the Department of National Revenue?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No; I have not been asked to do so.

Mr. RALSTON: Does the minister mean to tell me that because a private individual has simply filed a notice of appeal under a section which, to say the least, is questionable —and I do not think the minister for a single instant will as a lawyer suggest here that there is an appeal—the Department of National Revenue have not made the refund although it was awarded by the tariff board, and have kept on charging the duty, notwithstanding the fact that there is no appeal and the Department of National Revenue have not even asked the Department of Justice for a ruling? Will the Minister of National Revenue tell me whether his department have ever asked the Department of Justice whether the appeal to the privy council is worth the paper it is written on?

Mr. MATTHEWS: We have not asked the Department of Justice.

Mr. CAHAN: The appeal is lodged and it is for the privy council to decide.

Mr. RALSTON: I would think the Department of National Revenue, which has been given an order by the tariff board which, we were told last year, was an extremely august body, would pay some attention to a decision of that board and would not permit a frivolous appeal of an individual to prevent it from doing its duty in obeying the order of that board.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I certainly did not understand that it was a frivolous appeal. I would ask the hon. member for North Waterloo whether he regards it as a frivolous appeal.

Mr. RALSTON: Did my hon. friend take any action in connection with the appeal? Did he send out any notices or give any instructions having regard to the fact that the tariff board had given a decision and ordered a refund? He must have told somebody not to make the refund.

Mr. MATTHEWS: We were advised that, an appeal having been made to the privy council—

Mr. RALSTON: By whom was the minister advised?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I think the appeal was made before I took office.

Mr. RALSTON: I know that, but the minister can find out from his officers. My hon. friend tells me he knew the appeal was made. He must have known in some official way or he would surely have followed the plain order of the tariff board on an appeal made from a decision of his officers, overruling that decision. He certainly would have obeyed that order unless he had some official notice of an appeal and some advice that the appeal was substantial.

Mr. MATTHEWS: All I can say at the moment to the hon. member is that when I came into the department I was advised that there was an appeal. It was known in the department, but just who advised me or how I was advised, I cannot recall.

Mr. RALSTON: What instructions did the minister give with regard to the ruling that had been made by the tariff board ordering a refund to those importers?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I cannot say what the former minister did in the matter.

Mr. RALSTON: Then I will deal with the case which I think the minister himself was dealing with. I have before me section 54 of the act under which this appeal is supposed to have been launched:

Whenever any difference arises or whenever any doubt exists as to whether any or what rate of duty is payable on any class of goods,—

Not what value for duty purposes.

—and there is no previous decision upon the question by any competent tribunal, binding throughout Canada, the board of customs—

Which is now the tariff board.

—may declare the rate of duty payable on the class of goods in question, or that such goods are exempt from duty, subject in each case to an appeal within sixty days from date of such declaration, by any person interested, to the governor in council; and any such declaration of the board of customs when approved by the minister after the expiration of sixty days from the date thereof, or any such declaration when made by any order in council upon appeal, shall have force and effect as if the same had been sanctioned by statute.

I presume the minister has looked at the section by this time. I ask him quite frankly, and not as a lawyer: has he the slightest idea that there is an appeal to the privy council from the decision of the tariff board in this Bonar case?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am informed that there is an appeal.

Mr. RALSTON: I mean that in law there is ground for appeal.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am not a lawyer.

Mr. RALSTON: Is my hon. friend informed that there is? If so will he tell me who informs him? What law officer of his or of the government informs him that that appeal which is alleged to have been launched by Doon Twines is any good?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I cannot answer as to whether the appeal is any good.

Mr. RALSTON: I am asking if any law officers have advised him that any appeal lies from the tariff board in that case.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the hon. member is assuming a very equivocal position. If an appeal is launched to the privy council then it certainly is not for the department to determine whether or not that appeal is valid. It is a question for the privy council to decide, whether on the advice of the law officers of the crown or of itself, as to whether that appeal is valid. If an appeal is made, and that appeal is valid, then sixty days must elapse in which that refund could not legally be made. It is for the privy council to decide the question whether it has jurisdiction or not.

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend really argue seriously that an appeal court is to decide whether there is an appeal to it?

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly. I know of no appeal court that has not to decide time and time again whether an appeal to it is properly launched.

Mr. RALSTON: Suppose some decision were made by the tariff board or some other body and an appeal were launched to the privy council as to whether or not they had jurisdiction under the statute, so long as notice is given to the privy council then everyone would have to stand still until privy council decide?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Stalling for years.

Mr. RALSTON: Surely my hon. friend does not mean it.

Mr. CAHAN: If an appeal has been asserted, I certainly do. Any suggestion to the contrary seems to me to be frivolous.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not going to argue with my hon. friend, who is a much more experienced lawyer than I am. But I put it as a simple proposition that if someone takes a notion to give notice of the launching of an appeal to the privy council on something which is not within the statute at all—

Mr. CAHAN: Who is to say? Are we to take the opinion of the hon. gentleman?

Mr. RALSTON: No, I suggest a method.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentleman is basing his whole argument on his individual opinion as to whether or not the appeal is within the statute.

Mr. RALSTON: I am basing my argument on the fact that this government seems to have taken particular care not to ask the law officers of the crown. I would think that would be the source to which they would go, and the fact that they have not done so plainly shows they know perfectly well that there is no appeal.

Mr. CAHAN: When the appeal comes up they probably will.

Mr. RALSTON: I assure my hon. friend that the appeal will never come up. I will come to the next case to show that. It is simply a case of bluffing and stalling.

Mr. CAHAN: My hon. friend is carried away by his own imagination.

Mr. RALSTON: That will not get me off the track. I am talking about one simple situation; I want to know why the department stood stock still because Doon Twines wrote a letter to the privy council and said: "We want to appeal from that decision", although he himself never even took the trouble to find out whether an appeal lay or whether that letter was worth the paper it was written on. Will my hon. friend tell me that?

Mr. CAHAN: That is an absolutely unfair question.

Mr. JACOBS: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to rush in where angels fear to tread, but it seems to me there is a misconception here. When the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) refers to the privy council I understand he is referring to the governor general in council, in other words the cabinet, not to the judicial committee of the privy council. So the question is, has an appeal been taken to the cabinet?

Mr. CAHAN: It has, yes.

Mr. JACOBS: Then it is for the cabinet to decide whether they have jurisdiction or not; that is another matter for the authorities to deal with when they come to it.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, that decision is pending.

Mr. JACOBS: The difference is between the judicial committee of the privy council, for which I have the greatest respect, and the governor general in council, for whom I also have some respect. But there is a difference. The question then is, can Doon Twines appeal to the cabinet or can they not. I suppose there will be a decision one way or the other by the cabinet. My hon. friend the Minister of National Revenue is a member of that body. So that Doon Twines will be appealing to the governor in council from the decision of the tariff board, that is all there is to it; and it is for the government to say whether they will grant that appeal or not. I think I know pretty well by now what the decision is going to be.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The question will then be decided whether there is an appeal. It is not such an easy question to decide. The wording of the clause cited by my hon. friend, on which he says there is no appeal in this case, is: "as to whether any or what rate of duty is payable." Dumping duty is defined in the interpretation clause as a rate of duty. It is not just as clear as my hon. friend would have us believe, that there is no appeal. I do not say it is clear either way; it is a very doubtful matter, but when the matter does come before the privy council the question whether or not there is an appeal will certainly be decided. If there is an appeal the matter will be heard on its merits. If there is no appeal, that is the end of it.

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend suggest that the customs appraisers are going to keep on fixing value for duty purposes in accordance with the minister's order until the privy council—

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, and I do not think there will be any unreasonable delay. Sixty days are allowed and there have been about ninety.

Mr. RALSTON: Sixty days allowed for notice.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, for the notice alone, and there have been about ninety.

Mr. RALSTON: But the notice does not hold things up. I do not see the section my hon. friend refers to which prevents the Minister of National Revenue from acting.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think the minister could act until that appeal is decided.

Mr. RALSTON: Is it so that notwithstanding the fact that the tariff board has given a decision the minister will not act on it until some doubtful appeal to the privy council is decided?

Mr. GUTHRIE: If blame is to be attached to anyone, I think the privy council might have acted a little sooner; I grant that, but the facts are as I have stated.

Mr. RALSTON: Well, Mr. Chairman, that is one case. We have it that up to the moment the department has not asked any legal adviser as to whether the Doon Twines appeal is good or not.

Mr. JACOBS: They have asked the tariff board.

Mr. RALSTON: What is the use of the tariff board? Apparently the department are still imposing and insisting upon that fixed value for duty purposes on jute twine.

That was followed by another case, that of the Commercial Twine Company, I think they were the importers. That was brought before the tariff board and heard on January 9, 1934. Will the hon. minister tell me if he had any communication with the tariff board in regard to that case?

Mr. MATTHEWS: We had advice of their decision, and the same point was involved.

Mr. RALSTON: Then I ask the minister if he had any communication with the tariff board with regard to that case before the decision was made.

Mr. MATTHEWS: No.

Mr. RALSTON: Was he represented?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Perhaps I can answer that question. There was a communication arising, I think, through certain statements reported to have been made by Judge Sedgewick complaining that no one had appeared before him on behalf of the department, and that he had not had the advice of the law officers of the crown. This was reported in the newspapers as a complaint, and I asked my deputy minister to communicate with Judge Sedgewick and ascertain just what his language implied, because I did not know that I was to be considered the adviser of an independent body such as the tariff board. My deputy minister did communicate with Judge Sedgewick and he said he had made no reference whatever to the law officers of the crown; the newspapers had published that statement but there was no authority for it. But Judge Sedgewick did say that he had not had the benefit of the view of counsel on behalf of the Department of National Revenue, and it was suggested, I think by my deputy minister, that if the Department of National Revenue desired to be represented we would place at their disposal Mr. Varcoe of the Department of Justice, and I think Mr. Varcoe subsequently did appear to represent the Department of National Revenue upon some of these applications.

Mr. RALSTON: Then I take it that what the Minister of Justice has just said applies to this case of the Commercial Twine Company, that Mr. Varcoe did appear as representing the Department of National Revenue. Is that correct?

Mr. GUTHRIE: He did appear in one case subsequent to that intimation from Judge Sedgewick, but I cannot recall the particular case.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to be clear about this, because I thought the minister did have somebody representing him in the Commercial Twine Company case.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am advised not.

Mr. RALSTON: That case was heard on January 9, 1934. It was in respect, so I am informed, of an entry made on November 7, 1933, and an amended entry made on November 13, 1933. There again, as I understand it, the amended entry was demanded by the department on the ground that the minister had made an order in May, 1933, six months after section 43 had been repealed, fixing a special value for duty purposes. The board, notwithstanding the outstanding appeal to the privy council, made a decision. They did not seem to regard that appeal very seriously; they did not wait, as the Department of National Revenue did, because the Doon Twine Company happened to appeal. They rendered their decision on January 20, as follows:

In the matter of entry No. 29165A, bearing date of November 13, 1933, in respect of an entry for home consumption of goods exported to Canada direct from Great Britain via Montreal, imported by the Commercial Twine Company, Limited.

Upon the application of the Commercial Twine Company, Limited, made the ninth day of January, 1934, at a hearing called for the purpose of considering the application, in the presence of L. A. Wilmot, representing the Commercial Twine Company, Limited—

My hon. friend is right; no one appeared for the department.

—no one appearing for the Department of National Revenue, although duly notified—

Notice that.

—and, it appearing to the tariff board that the goods described in said entry number 29165A have been allowed entry at an erroneous valuation and that the provisions of the Customs Act requiring the appraisal of the said goods at the true and fair market value thereof have not been complied with in that the appraiser or collector erroneously acted under the provisions of section 43 of The Customs Act, which section does not apply to goods entitled to entry under the British preferential tariff, the goods described in the said entry number 29165A being goods entitled to entry under the British preferential tariff,—

1. The board hereby appraises and values the said goods, being 10 bales jute twist wholly or in part of vegetable fibre generally used for packaging, not containing silk or wool, at the invoice value thereof in currency of invoice namely, £29.9.10, the value for duty of the same in dollars being $129, and the rate of duty being 20 per cent ad valorem less 10 per cent, and, the board declares that the total customs duty properly payable upon the said importation was and is $23.22, and that the duty paid value of the said goods is $152.22.

2. And the board hereby directs an amended entry giving effect to the appraisal and valuation hereinbefore set forth and that the Department of National Revenue do forthwith refund to the Commercial Twine Company, Limited, the sum of $16.57, being the difference between $39.79, and amount of customs duty paid in respect of said entry number 29165A, and $23.29, the amount of customs duty properly payable in respect of the goods covered by the said entry.

By order of the Tariff Board,
Edgar Bournival,
Registrar of Appeals.

Certified a true copy.
Edgar Bournival,
Registrar of Appeals.

That decision was given January 20, and the minister was not represented. I want to ask the minister if he had any communication with the tariff board, advising them that he was not attending or that an appeal had been launched, or giving any reason why he paid no attention to the previous ruling of the tariff board.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am informed that we filed a brief in the ordinary way in connection with this case.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the minister bring down the brief?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I shall be very glad to get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the minister tell me whether or not the brief referred to the appeal having been launched?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am informed that it dealt with the appraisal.

Mr. RALSTON: And the minister does not know whether or not it dealt with the appeal?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am informed not.

Mr. RALSTON: By whom was the brief prepared?

Mr. MATTHEWS: The brief was prepared by departmental officers.

Mr. RALSTON: Can the minister tell me by whom? I want to know whether or not it was one of the law officers.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am informed that it was by an appraiser, not a law officer.

Mr. RALSTON: Then the fact is that the minister had a decision given against him by the tariff board and an appeal was launched by somebody else, but the minister allowed another case to go before the tariff board without having anyone appear in his behalf and without taking any advice as to whether or not the appeal was valid; he just had somebody send down a memorandum to the tariff board. That was the only respect, courtesy or attention paid by the department to the decision by the tariff board. Is that so?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Pending the decision of the privy council the department felt that it could not move in the matter.

Mr. RALSTON: Then I will ask the minister this: Was he advised by any law officer that there was anything to prevent him from moving in the matter and making the refund which had been ordered?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I do not recall being advised in that regard.

Mr. RALSTON: Does the minister recall asking for advice?

Mr. MATTHEWS: No.

Mr. CAHAN: Evidently the hon. gentleman thinks he is indulging in a little police court practice, with some witness before him of whom he can ask petty and frivolous questions. The minister has already explained the situation; he had nothing to do with the second case being brought before the tariff board. It was not brought before the board at his instance, but, the tariff board having again decided as in the first case, that later decision certainly was not to be acted upon when a similar decision had been appealed from and was then pending before the privy council. It is within the jurisdiction of the privy council to decide whether the appeal was properly lodged or, if properly lodged, as to what decision should be given thereon. It seems to me altogether unfair, when the minister is not a lawyer and makes no pretensions to professional experience, that he should be asked these frivolous questions when all the papers can be brought down at a later date.

Mr. RALSTON: I expected that somebody would come to the rescue, not of the minister, but of the department and the government in this connection, but I did not expect that I should receive the sort of abuse I have received from the Secretary of State, because he is not accustomed to doing that sort of thing.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not, but the hon. gentleman provokes it with these frivolous questions.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is provoked by the absolute stupidity which has been displayed by the department, and I think he is just about as much ashamed of it as any man in Canada who knows the circumstances. I do not think there ever has been a case of more gross flouting of a body which has been set up by this government, and which we were told last year was going to be the finest tribunal that one could possibly imagine. There has been no respect of any kind shown towards the tariff board. Instead, flouting has been done that could only be done to try to bring the board into disrepute because the high tariff policies of some members of the government have been affected by some of the decisions of the board.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the hon. gentleman allow me one moment?

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentleman knows that the jurisdiction which the tariff board exercises in this case is the jurisdiction, or is alleged to be the jurisdiction, which the old customs board exercised, and it is an entirely different jurisdiction from that which the tariff board usually exercises under the statute constituting it. If it is a case of rates, and if it came within the jurisdiction of the old board, then the decision of the tariff board is in fact the decision of the customs board, or rather it is the decision of the tariff board acting as a customs board, from which an appeal lies. Therefore, if my hon. friend will look at the circumstances under which this appeal was lodged, and if he will refer to the questions raised in the hearing now pending before the privy council, he will notice that this is an entirely different jurisdiction from the jurisdiction usually exercised by the tariff board as a tariff board. That case led to a decision by the tariff board with regard to its own jurisdiction which may be right or may be wrong. But this appeal having been lodged to the privy council, the minister as the head of his department certainly had no jurisdiction while that appeal is outstanding to order any return of the excess duty alleged to have been collected. If my hon. friend wishes to direct his criticisms to the proper place, certainly let him direct them to the privy council, and not to the minister who only within the last few weeks has entered into a new office presenting very many complicated details with which no man could familiarize himself in the short time during which these matters have been committed to his care.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sure that my hon. friend's tone in his last remarks was quite different from the tone in which he previously addressed this house. I sat down because he asked me to allow him one moment, and I listened to him courteously. I do not think there is any difference between the Secretary of State and those of us on this side of the house who are dealing with this matter so far as consideration for the Minister of National Revenue is concerned. The minister knows perfectly well that there is no desire to take advantage of him because he happens to be new in his department. The desire simply is to endeavour to get this information from the minister who is in charge of the department, assuming that he will get it from his officers, and I can assure him that we do not think he needs the assistance of the hon. Secretary of State.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Better without it.

Mr. RALSTON: I just want to deal with what the Secretary of State said. I do not quite see the relevancy of his remarks as to the different jurisdiction of the tariff board. The jurisdiction of the tariff board is the jurisdiction exercised by the board of customs, and as I have pointed out it did not seem as if there was any appeal from the board of customs in connection with an appraisement under a ministerial order fixing the value for duty purposes.

Mr. CAHAN: As to whether the value fixed for duty is a rate or not, that is a very nice question.

Mr. RALSTON: All I am saying is that the evidence that there is not a scintilla of a nice question in this case is the fact that this government have studiously refrained from asking any of the responsible law officers about it. The Minister of Justice has not yet offered his opinion in regard to it. There is the appeal outstanding. I take issue very respectfully and very deferentially with the Secretary of State because of his great legal knowledge and capacity and experience, but I do take issue with him nevertheless when he suggests that the appeal in any way binds the department from acting on the decision which has been made by the tariff board making the appraisement after that time illegal.

Mr. CAHAN: My hon. friend will admit that nobody will be prejudiced by waiting.

Mr. RALSTON: Nobody except the importers and the people in this country who will be charged just that much higher duty in the meantime, and will find it just that much more difficult to get a refund. It means that the jute twine industry will be enjoying its protection just that much longer. The only people who are being hurt by waiting are the consumers on the one side; and on the other hand, the manufacturers in Canada are benefiting from the protection because of the delay. Outside of that the appeal might just as well stand for years. Why hear the appeal at all? Why not go on assessing the higher duties if it is perfectly all right, on the ground that the appeal is there and that some day we may come to it? My hon. friend knows, or we will guess, that that appeal will never be heard.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the hon. gentleman allow me a moment? I took an interest in the matter because for many months during the very serious illness of the late Minister of National Revenue I was acting minister, and although none of these matters are matters of decision by me I know of the question which the hon. gentleman is discussing. I have heard it discussed in the department and I have considered it myself. I think there is a very nice legal question involved.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Police court question.

Mr. CAHAN: It is a question so very substantial under the circumstances that ordinary police court discussion is out of place. I think it is only fair to allow the new minister ample time to have access to the documents and ascertain the facts which are not necessarily within his knowledge because of the very recent date on which he assumed office.

Mr. RALSTON: Surely the hon. Secretary of State did not expect the estimates of the National Revenue department to go through, after all there has been in the newspapers and all that everybody has known about this case, without the matter coming up.

Mr. CAHAN: No, but the hon. gentleman might give the minister time to look into the matter.

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly. The only time we asked the minister for documents he said that he would get them later, and that is perfectly satisfactory to me. It is his colleagues who have put him into estimates tonight. I have no doubt that he is personally glad that this matter has come up so that he can get all the documents and familiarize himself with them as much as he can in the time at his disposal. It was for that purpose that I got up in the first place, to outline the case as I saw it, so that the minister might have the opportunity, as I told him at the time, of getting his documents together and checking up the statements I was making so as to be able to give to the committee whatever explanation he thought he could give.

Now I want to refer to the third case. The third case is a case, not of jute twine, but of felt hats, which was just decided yesterday, I understand. Here again I shall have to ask the minister for information. Probably he has not got it now, but he can get it later. As I understand it, a ministerial order was made under section 43 fixing the value for duty purposes. Does the minister know whether that ministerial order was made after the act had been repealed?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am informed it was made before.

Mr. RALSTON: Was there any amendment to that order?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I think not.

Mr. RALSTON: As I understand it, an order was made by the governor in council authorizing the minister to fix values for duty purposes. The minister fixed values for duty purposes before the act was repealed, and the customs officer continued to follow that order and to fix values after the repeal of the act which was the foundation for the minister's order. Is that the correct situation?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am informed that that is substantially correct.

Mr. RALSTON: I understand that an appeal was launched. Was that launched by an importer, by a manufacturer of by the department?

Mr. MATTHEWS: It was launched by an importer.

Mr. RALSTON: I think the minister is wrong about that.

Mr. CAHAN: There was an appeal to the tariff board by an importer.

Mr. RALSTON: A decision was made originally by the customs appraiser. Then someone must have gone to the tariff board; who was that, an importer?

Mr. MATTHEWS: An importer.

Mr. RALSTON: He claiming that, since these goods were imported from Great Britain, the ministerial order did not apply under section 43 as amended in November, 1932; was that it?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: I notice in the Montreal Gazette of this morning that the tariff board has decided for the third time that the department was not justified in appraising British goods on the basis of the ministerial order fixing values for duty purposes. I understand that is the effect of the decision.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I have not seen an official copy of the decision of the tariff board.

Mr. RALSTON: I take the minister's statement just as he makes it. I have not seen the official decision; it is simply a report in the Montreal Gazette. Can the minister tell me if an appeal has been launched in the second case, that of the Commercial Twine Company, decided on January 20?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I do not know whether any appeal has been launched, but the same point is involved.

Mr. RALSTON: No appeal has been taken to the privy council?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Not that I am aware of.

Mr. RALSTON: The department has not taken an appeal, and so far as the minister knows, no producer has taken an appeal. Could the minister tell me upon how many articles coming in from Great Britain this fixing of values for duty purposes applies? To how many articles does section 43 as amended in November, 1932, apply?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I think to about ten or twelve.

Mr. RALSTON: Could the minister tell us what they are? If he has not that information at the present time, could he bring it down when his estimates are again under consideration?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: I understand that notwithstanding the decision of the tariff board in the jute twine case given in November last and again in January, the department is still fixing values for duty purposes on goods coming from Great Britain at the rate authorized by the ministerial order issued before the amendment to the act.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Yes, pending the decision referred to.

Mr. RALSTON: That refers to only one thing, jute twine.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I believe the same point is involved.

Mr. RALSTON: Notwithstanding that the same point is involved and that the department has three decisions of the government's own tariff board against it, it is still imposing that duty on fourteen different articles. I should like to refer to tinplate. As I understand it, the question in this case was whether the goods imported were goods of a class or kind made in Canada; is that correct?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Notwithstanding the fact that the plant at Ojibway had been closed, the appraisers gave a decision that this tinplate was of a class or kind made in Canada and therefore the dumping duty and an extra five per cent was imposed.

Mr. MATTHEWS: There were still unsold stocks on hand.

Mr. RALSTON: Stocks unsold?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Yes.

[Mr. Matthews.]

Mr. RALSTON: Where were they? We desire these particulars, but perhaps I should not ask the minister at this time.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I cannot give that information.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the minister bring down the records of his department with regard to stocks on hand in Canada?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Has the minister received any advice to the effect that stocks on hand in Canada qualify under the tariff item as goods of a class or kind made in Canada?

Mr. CAHAN: I should like to ask a question of the hon. gentleman. If a factory has been manufacturing a particular class of commodity and closes down temporarily with a large stock on hand, would not that be a case in which there were goods for sale of a class or kind made in Canada?

Mr. RALSTON: I refer my hon. friend to the decision of the tariff board which I understand has finally been reluctantly accepted by the government, that they are not goods of a class or kind made in Canada. I ask the minister if he will give us whatever information he has in support of the decision of the appraisers that these goods were of a class or kind made in Canada and therefore the dumping duty and the extra five per cent should be imposed?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I will do that.

Mr. RALSTON: Has the minister before him any reports in connection with the plant at Sarnia which was supposed to be manufacturing tinplate? I should like to know the number of employees and the production, say for October and November, 1933.

Mr. MATTHEWS: We have been getting information but it is not complete.

Mr. RALSTON: Can the minister give me the information upon which his appraisers arrived at the decision that these goods were of a class or kind made in Canada? I understand these goods were imported in June.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I was not the head of the department in June.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister has been long enough in this house to know that a minister does not answer things personally, I am asking him for the information his appraisers had with regard to the activities of any plant then producing in Canada.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am sorry but I have not the data.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister will furnish it?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I shall be very glad to get any information I can for the hon. member.

Mr. RALSTON: Since he has been in the department has the minister made any investigation himself as to the activities and the amount of production of the plant now alleged to be operating in Sarnia in the manufacture of tinplate?

Mr. MATTHEWS: That matter is now under investigation.

Mr. RALSTON: But has the minister any information about it? There must be tinplate coming in now.

Mr. MATTHEWS: The investigation is not complete.

Mr. RALSTON: But in the meantime what ruling has been made by the department? Is it ruled that tinplate is of a class or kind of goods made in Canada?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I understand it is ruled that tinplate is of a class or kind made in Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: And what information has the minister regarding the Sarnia plant—the number of employees and the amount produced?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am sorry I have not that information.

Mr. RALSTON: Could the minister give me an idea, through his officers, of the amount of tinplate that has been imported from, let us say, June until December?

Mr. MATTHEWS: No, I have not the information.

Mr. RALSTON: I understand it is a very large amount; I won't talk about tons myself. I submit to the minister, very respectfully and kindly, that in connection with the importation of a product which affects as many primary producers as does tinplate, we might be entitled to a little more information than he has given us with regard to the inquiries made, since he has been in office, touching this important commodity. I understand that a newspaper sent up a reporter there and it was found that no one could get into the Sarnia plant; guards were posted and no one was allowed to get in to see how little they were producing and to what extent they were in the preliminary stage. Did the minister see that report?

Mr. MATTHEWS: No, I did not.

Mr. RALSTON: And he cannot tell us whether there are ten or fifty men there?

Mr. MATTHEWS: We have no information.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the minister try to get the information for us, starting with the letter from the Ojibway Company intimating the cessation of operations in Canada?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Could the hon. member give me an idea of the date of the letter?

Mr. RALSTON: I understand that a letter was produced at the tariff board hearing.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I will look it up.

Mr. RALSTON: If the minister would bring down the whole file with regard to the Mundet Cork and Insulation Company of Toronto, it would assist us.

Mr. SANDERSON: This discussion has almost confirmed the rumour that has been abroad for several months that there has not been the utmost harmony between the Department of National Revenue and the new tariff board. I have here a report of some remarks made by the Prime Minister in the city of Toronto on the night of February 21. The news item is headed:

Denies friction with tariff body.

It reads:

Toronto, Feb. 21.—The attitude of the government toward the Tariff Board has been to offer every assistance and co-operation possible, and he has never received a complaint that it had been otherwise, Prime Minister R. B. Bennett declared in the course of the debate on empire preferences, held at Hart House by students of the University of Toronto, here to-night.

Mr. Bennett was replying to the remarks of S. F. Rae, one of the undergraduates opposing the resolution that "Canada retain her present preferred position in empire markets."

Mr. Rae had said there had been "constant friction" between the Tariff Board—"child of the empire agreements," and the British government. He charged that Canada had not been living up to the agreement with respect to the Tariff Board, had not stopped the practice of fixing values for duty purposes, and had disregarded the orders of the board with respect to duty values on jute twine.

The young debater referred to press reports of remarks attributed to former Justice George Sedgewick, chairman of the board, and the board was entitled to assistance from the law officers of the crown and was not getting it.

"We believe it to be an excellent board and it is entirely wrong to say that we are in variance," Mr. Bennett declared. "A question was raised but it was purely a point of law. I do not believe Mr. Justice Sedgewick ever made those observations attributed to him. Certainly he has never communicated them to me nor suggested we had not done anything we should have done. The British authorities are entirely satisfied with the board."

The Minister of Justice said to-night, about half an hour ago, that there had not been any friction, if I too may use that word, between the law officers of the crown and the new tariff board, and that what Mr. Justice Sedgewick is reported in the press to have said was not what he did say. I have read the report and so have many hon. gentlemen in this house and most of the people of Canada; we have all read the remarks attributed to that gentleman, as reported in the next day's press, and I have never seen any correction. Certainly there is a feeling abroad that there has been friction with the tariff board, which was set up by this government last year as a tariff board that was to be different in every way from, and superior to, any other tariff body we have ever had in this country. There is a rumour, and this discussion to-night has confirmed it, judging by the remarks of the Secretary of State and the Minister of Justice. I am not criticizing at all the Minister of National Revenue, because I quite appreciate the fact that he has not been very long in the department, and many of the things criticized to-night happened before he assumed the administration of the department. But as minister of the department he must now bear the responsibility. Now, the tariff board set up under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Sedgewick should not be interfered with by the law officers of the crown or by the Department of National Revenue or any officer of that department. We were told by the Prime Minister last year, and by other members of the government as well, that this board would be above reproach, and I believe that the setup of the board in its chairman was good—I will not go further than that. He should have a free hand to administer the affairs of the board and should not be interfered with. If there is to be friction between the Department of National Revenue or the law officers of the crown and the tariff board, then the board will be useless in functioning for the benefit of the people of this country, and the sooner this question is cleared up the better.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I hope my hon. friend will allow me to say that there has been no friction whatever at any time between the tariff board and the Department of National Revenue. I wish to emphasize that and to make it clear to the house that since I assumed office there has been no friction whatever between the Department of National Revenue and the tariff board. I consider Mr. Justice Sedgewick one of my best personal friends and our relations have been most harmonious in every respect.

Mr. SANDERSON: When the minister says that to his knowledge there has been no friction between the Department of National Revenue and the tariff board, is he speaking altogether of the time since he became minister of that department? Is he confining his remarks to that time?

Mr. MATTHEWS: How could I speak of the time before I took office?

Mr. SANDERSON: Surely the incoming minister has to assume the responsibilities of the office as it was left to him by the former minister. Is there nothing on record of any friction, if we want to continue to use that word, with the tariff board?

Mr. MATTHEWS: There is nothing on record, and so far as I know, my statement of my relations with the chairman of the tariff board and the board itself applies to my predecessor as well.

Mr. SANDERSON: It has been suggested by one of my colleagues that perhaps "disagreement" is better than "friction", and perhaps it is. Has there been any disagreement?

Mr. MATTHEWS: None whatever.

Mr. SANDERSON: I want to ask the minister another question. In his opinion, as the new Minister of National Revenue, are all the newspaper reports and rumours as to disagreement between the department and the tariff board absolutely incorrect?

Mr. MATTHEWS: The impression given by the statements in the press to which my hon. friend has alluded is entirely wrong.

Mr. SANDERSON: And absolutely without foundation?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Without foundation. On one occasion I tried to correct that in the press; I said something that I thought would create the proper impression, but certainly there has been no friction at all between the tariff board and the department.

Mr. VALLANCE: There is a condition that I would like to draw to the attention of the minister. First of all let me ask him a question: How long a time is an importer allowed from the date of importation of goods, to ask for a rebate of duty, for instance, if the goods are spoiled? Let me give a case. I have in my constituency a nursery which at the present time is importing bulbs from Holland.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Three months.

Mr. VALLANCE: I have in my office a file in which there are two letters from an official of the department giving the time as three days. This is an importation of bulbs from Holland. The nearest customs office is in the city of Moose Jaw; the goods are destined for the town of Luseland and it is impossible for any firm in that community, importing goods of a perishable nature such as bulbs, to inspect them and get word back to the customs office in that length of time. The importer to whom I refer has asked the department for a refund of duty and so far he has been denied it. I got the file just the other day and I intend taking the matter up with the department. If the time limit is three days, as suggested by one of the officials of the department, it should be extended a little longer to give such importers an opportunity to have their customs duty refunded.

Mr. MATTHEWS: When I said "three months", I was referring to goods returned as not being according to order. If my hon. friend will come to my department, I shall give the matter personal attention.

Mr. VALLANCE: I appreciate that, but I want to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that in my opinion and, I believe, in that of the house, a period of three days is not long enough to allow an importer to make an appeal.

Mr. MATTHEWS: That is a matter on which I cannot give an opinion at present, but if the hon. member will come to my department, he will receive courteous and prompt attention.

Mr. VALLANCE: I appreciate what the minister says, but the regulation states "three days." If I go to the department with a case in point indicating that a period of three days is not long enough for lodging an appeal, will the regulation be changed to give importers six or ten days instead of three?

Mr. MATTHEWS: When my hon. friend comes to the department, he will receive the same generous treatment that is accorded to anyone who comes.

Mr. GERSHAW: I would like to draw to the attention of the minister a situation which obtains in southern Alberta and perhaps in other places. Close to the international boundary line there are a number of farmers, small ranchers and so forth in rather poor circumstances. It just happens that there are no stores close to them on the Canadian side and naturally they deal with nearby stores on the United States side. It also happens that the roads are bad and the customs offices are often twelve or fifteen miles apart. That means a long trip for those people in order to report any of their purchases. Occasionally an inspector will come along, march into their homes, inspect their pantries, go down into their cellars and hunt around their premises. Perhaps he may find a tin can or something bearing a United States label, and in that case the unfortunate homesteader is in real trouble and up against a great deal of expense. I understand it is an offence to issue a false invoice, and I have wondered whether the department would in such cases allow a farmer to mail the invoice to the customs office and pay his duty in that way. If he did not have the invoice and smuggled extra goods, of course he would be liable. But is there no regulation by which that man can pay his customs duty by mail by forwarding an invoice, or is there any way by which he can avoid making long trips to report to the customs office?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I think not.

Mr. BOTHWELL: A little while ago, before all this discussion on jute twine began, I asked the minister certain questions about signs at the boundary line; I am speaking particularly of the prairies. Following the remarks made by the last speaker, I think it might be well to bring this matter to the minister's attention. The main highway out there, one of the graded highways running out of Saskatchewan and going south right through into the United States, in fact one of the best highways we have, is No. 4 highway, Saskatchewan. A gentleman in that district went across the line on business and came back with certain goods. He looked and inquired for a customs office, but he could not find out where it was, and he saw no signs on the road. He went out of the country not knowing he had to report; he reported at the United States customs office just across the line and inquired there on his way back where he would find a customs office on the Canadian side. He could not find out there, and he came into Canada again. In his letter he tells me that in addition to having to pay duty, sales tax and so forth on the goods he had purchased, he was also assessed $50 as a penalty for not reporting going both ways, although he informs me there is not a sign anywhere that he could see directing this to be done or indicating where to do it. What I want to bring to the attention of the minister is that on those well travelled main highways at least there should be signs indicating where there is an office at which a man can report.

Mr. MATTHEWS: If my hon. friend will give me the particulars of this case I shall be very glad to investigate.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I know there are many districts there without a sign at all. In places there are distances of sixty miles between customs houses, with well travelled roads crossing the border and no sign anywhere to indicate where there is a customs house.

Mr. GOTT: The hon. member surely does not believe in signs.

Mr. BOTHWELL: It is not I, but this government, although the signs are plain as to what will happen.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It was written on the wall long, long ago.

Mr. GOTT: You will never live long enough to see it happen.

Mr. CASGRAIN: You will see it, and very quickly.

Mr. MATTHEWS: In spite of my hon. friend's last remark I shall be glad to look into the matter, and get a report from the inspector.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to ask the minister in regard to a complaint I have received from those interested in the butter business in Nova Scotia as to the release of some 8,000 boxes of New Zealand butter on February 22. The complaint was that the dairymen's association and the men in the creamery business down there were not consulted, but word seemed to have gotten out in some way to the packing houses that this butter was to be released, with the result that on the twentieth the packing houses began to sell and consequently cut the price from one to two cents. I have here a copy of the newspaper of February 23 announcing it; I presume the order was made on February 22. The Nova Scotia creameries have lost one to two cents a pound on butter on account of the drop in price, due, they feel, to some leak whereby the release of this New Zealand butter got to the ears of the packers. Was the minister concerned in that himself?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Not primarily concerned, but I happen to know something about it. But in the period the hon. member speaks of, when it was known that this butter was in Halifax, the price did not drop; it advanced from 26½ cents to 30 cents in Montreal.

[Mr. Bothwell.]

Mr. RALSTON: I am speaking about Nova Scotia.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I think there was a general advance in price. If the suggestion is that notice was released to any individual or large importer before others, that is not so; there is nothing in that.

Mr. RALSTON: I assure my hon. friend —I need not say it, he knows it,—that I do not suggest for an instant that the release could have taken place with his knowledge. But I have received a letter to-night from a responsible creamery operator in Nova Scotia, expressing very keen feeling about the situation which developed there. I understand the Nova Scotia Dairymen's Association wired the minister protesting against the release of the butter for at least four or six weeks. Similar wires sent by farmers' organizations. Notwithstanding these protests I understand the butter was released on February 22, and there was a fall in the price of butter that week of two cents a pound. Those are the facts given to me.

Mr. MATTHEWS: If the hon. member will allow me to suggest it, I should like to go into that with him privately. I cannot see how any loss has taken place, for we have information that from the time this butter was landed in Halifax until to-day or yesterday there has been a continual advance in the price of butter both in Toronto and Montreal, and I presume in the maritimes.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall be very glad indeed to go into it with the minister.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I think I can assure the hon. member that the matter was so handled that there was no flooding of the market and no fall in price.

Mr. RALSTON: Let me read one expression from the letter:

> As a result of this release and the apparent advance information Nova Scotia creameries have lost two cents per pound on butter sold this week. The buyer is now using New Zealand butter as an argument to buy at still lower prices.
> It is quite obvious that the dairy industry was not considered in this matter. No doubt this industry as a whole will protest the action at this time.

They did protest. I have no doubt the minister has had wires from them.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Yes, I have had wires. Just what do they protest against.

Mr. RALSTON: Against the release of the butter for from four to six weeks.

Mr. MATTHEWS: The market was advancing all the time when the butter was released. Certainly I cannot see any disadvantage to the butter market through the small amount that came.

Mr. RALSTON: I merely point it out to the minister. I suppose he will agree that neither he nor I would understand the situation in regard to the market as well as the dairymen's association and the farmers' associations.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Well, I think my hon. friend and I are both capable of reading the quotations in the press and seeing what the price is.

Mr. RALSTON: I am pointing out that there must be some mistake, because this is a responsible gentleman and he says the creameries have lost two cents a pound on butter sold this week. I am quite willing to accept my hon. friend's invitation and discuss the matter with him privately, and I do not mind showing him the letter.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I think Nova Scotia produces perhaps one third of the butter it uses?

Mr. RALSTON: I would think so.

Mr. GOTT: Will the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), the jumping jack of the house—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GOTT: —repeat the remark he made a while ago?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Order.

Mr. GOTT: He made a remark and then ran to cover.

Mr. REID: I think the hon. member made a very insulting remark to me, and I have always been able to take care of myself.

Mr. GOTT: I made no remark to the hon. member whatsoever.

Mr. REID: Then if I made any remark I am glad to withdraw it.

The case I wish to discuss is in connection with a fishing boat registered part time in the United States, and then coming into Canada. Taking it up after complaint had been made to me, customs officials in Vancouver said the boat could come in at any time without duty being paid. It had paid duty a number of years ago, but for the past few years it has been coming in without paying any duty. One of the owners, who lives in the United States, is registered as a United States citizen; the other owner is a Canadian, though I understand that both owners were born in Canada.

I should like to ask the minister, and perhaps his officers can give me the information, whether a ship going back and forth is allowed to do so without paying the customs dues. One officer claims that a ship registered in Canada which leaves its port and becomes registered in a foreign country ceases to be of Canadian registry, and that on reentering for fishing purposes it must pay the dues over again. This has been going on for a number of years.

Mr. MATTHEWS: It must be quite obvious to the hon. member that I would not have the information as to a certain ship on the Pacific, but if he will be good enough to give me full particulars I shall be glad to go into the matter for him.

Mr. RALSTON: I think this is the answer to what my hon. friend the minister said with regard to butter prices, and he can have this information to aid him when he is looking into the matter. All last year butter fat prices averaged only about 21 cents. Only during the last couple of months have fat prices reached a point where the farmers can break even. Last month's cream price was 25 cents, while this month the price has been 28 cents. They were hoping to maintain prices at from 28 cents to 30 cents until the grass season started. Summing that up, I take it that what happened was that when prices started to advance to where the farmer could break even he found the New Zealand butter coming in on him. That is the complaint.

Mr. MATTHEWS: That may be so, but after the fact became known that the New Zealand butter was coming in the price went up in Montreal from 26½ cents to 30 cents. The price was not depressed.

Mr. BENNETT: It is 29 cents now.

Mr. RALSTON: They say it did depress the price.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Shall the item carry?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I think the information that has been requested by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth and the other hon. members on this side should be furnished before this item passes. This is the big item for the whole department, and I think that information should be supplied before it is passed.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I have still another item.

Mr. CASGRAIN: But this is a large item of over $9,000,000, and I do not think it should pass in this way.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.57 p.m.

END OF VOLUME I.
