House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Thursday, January 25, 1934

FIFTH SESSION—SEVENTEENTH PARLIAMENT—OPENING

The parliament which had been prorogued from time to time to the 25th day of January, 1934, met this day at Ottawa, for the dispatch of business.

The house met at three o'clock, the Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the Governor General's secretary, announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at three p.m. on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the Dominion parliament.

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And the house being returned to the Commons chamber.

VACANCY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that during the recess I received communications from two members, notifying me that the following vacancy had occurred in the representation, viz:

Of Thomas Merritt Cayley, member for the electoral district of South Oxford, by decease.

I accordingly issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out new writs of election for the said electoral district.

NEW MEMBERS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that the clerk of the house has received from the chief electoral officer certificates of the election and return of the following members, viz:

Of Aimé Boucher, for the electoral district of Yamaska.

Of Joseph Enoil Michaud, for the electoral district of Restigouche-Madawaska.

Of John Angus MacMillan, for the electoral district of Mackenzie.

NEW MEMBERS INTRODUCED

Aimé Boucher, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Yamaska, introduced by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. Ernest Lapointe.

Joseph Enoil Michaud, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Restigouche-Madawaska, introduced by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. P. J. Veniot.

John Angus MacMillan, Esquire, for the electoral district of Mackenzie, introduced by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. W. R. Motherwell.

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 1, respecting the administration of oaths of office.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Explain.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, the bill refers to oaths of office, and usually has remained in the first stage for the last half century. I move that it be now read a first time.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister if the purpose of the introduction of the bill is not to assert the right of the Commons to deal with affairs of concern to its members before taking up any matters which may be of concern to the crown?

Mr. BENNETT: I believe that is the theory, Mr. Speaker, but I should judge that one who has occupied the high office of Prime Minister is quite as conversant with that subject as I am.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

You are summoned for the dispatch of public business at a time when there are sound reasons for believing that the world is gradually returning to economic stability. I congratulate you that such improved world conditions are reflected in Canada by expanding trade, improving revenues, increasing employment, and a more confident outlook upon the future. Canada occupies a leading position amongst those countries where the evidence of a return to permanent prosperity is most convincing.

Since I have been associated with you as the representative of His Majesty in Canada, I have visited every province of the dominion. I have been greatly impressed by the loyalty, devotion and friendliness of the people, as well as the high courage with which men and women were meeting and overcoming abnormal difficulties in their daily lives.

The Ottawa trade agreements have now been in operation for a full year and the results indicate substantial expansion of Canadian-Empire trade over the preceding year. It is worthy of note that the agreements are proving beneficial to all empire countries. The trading position of the empire in the world has steadily improved. Canada has again resumed her place as the fifth exporting nation. Our favourable trade balances have enabled us to discharge our international obligations and have greatly lessened the difficulties of the international exchange situation.

The temporary trade arrangements made with Germany and Austria have been further extended. Canadian products are now receiving most favoured tariff treatment in those countries in exchange for the grant of our intermediate tariff on their products.

The prices of agricultural products, which have fallen in recent years to the lowest level in history, have shown substantial improvement in the last few months. My government realize, however, that further increases in price levels are necessary to ensure success to those engaged in agriculture. You will be invited to consider legislation designed to facilitate the efficient and profitable marketing of live stock and agricultural products.

Members of my government participated in the World Monetary and Economic conference convened in London in June of last year. The reports approved by the conference and the resolutions adopted by the bureau and the executive committee as well as certain agreements entered into by my government designed to mitigate fluctuations in the price of silver will be laid before you. The conference adjourned without dealing with many important subjects, but arrived at conclusions of especial interest and concern to Canada in respect to central banks, the gold standard, and the percentage of metallic coverage essential to the successful functioning of gold as a medium of international exchange. During the conference, my ministers informally met the representatives of the United Kingdom and other countries of the British commonwealth of nations, with a view to the further development of empire cooperation; and adopted certain resolutions with respect to monetary and financial policies, which will be laid before you.

In July of last year, my government appointed a royal commission to inquire into and report upon the operation of the banking and monetary system of Canada, with particular reference to the provisions and working of the Bank Act, the Dominion Notes Act, the Finance Act and the Currency Act, and the advisability of establishing a central banking institution. You will be invited to consider legislation for the establishment of a central bank, the extension and revision of bank charters, which were extended at the last session of parliament to the first day of July, 1934, and to consider further appropriate additions and amendments to our banking and monetary legislation.

My government, acting with representatives of other wheat exporting countries, as well as representatives of wheat importing countries, have entered into an agreement for relieving the world market from the disastrous price-depressing influence of abnormal surplus wheat stocks. It is a matter of satisfaction that the parties to this agreement are co-operating with a degree of effectiveness which is already reflected in improved prices. The agreement will be laid before you.

Since prorogation, my government made a public offering of Canadian securities in the United Kingdom. This was the first time in over fifteen years that Canada had negotiated a loan in the British market. The reception of the loan was gratifying in the extreme, indicating the high standing of Canadian credit.

My government have been giving careful consideration to measures that might be adopted for the establishment of agricultural short term and intermediate credits; and have invited representatives of the provinces to study the means by which practical effect may be given to the recommendations in this respect made by the royal commission on Monetary and Banking Problems.

Since prorogation, my government, under the authority of The Relief Act, 1933, have continued to assist financially the provinces in the discharge of their constitutional obligations.

My government have recently concluded a conference with the representatives of all the provinces, when, after the fullest discussion, it was agreed that it was desirable, in the national interest, that assistance to the provinces should not be wholly discontinued until the return of more normal conditions. The extent and method of affording such assistance were left for negotiation between my government and the governments of the several provinces.

The representatives of the various provinces strongly approved of the arrangements made by my government to care for single, unemployed, homeless men in camps until such time as they could be absorbed in industry, by providing them with employment on undertakings for the national good; and of the provision made in 1932 for settlement of families on the land, which has been extended with satisfactory results. My government propose further to promote employment by expenditures on essential public works and undertakings throughout the dominion.

You will be invited to consider, amongst others, measures relating to the Excise Act, the Companies Act, the Judges Act, and the Elections Act.

Members of the House of Commons:

The accounts of the last year will be laid before you. The estimates for the coming year will be submitted at an early date. They have been prepared with a regard for rigid economy consistent with the requirements of the public service.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I invoke the divine blessing upon your deliberations, confident that the measures submitted for your consideration will receive your earnest attention.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Monday next.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the select standing committees of this house under standing order 63, said committee to be composed of Messrs. Rhodes, Dupré, Simpson (West Algoma), Stewart (West Edmonton) and Casgrain.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved minute of council, appointing the Right Honourable Sir George H. Perley, Minister without portfolio; the Honourable D. M. Sutherland, Minister of National Defence; the Honourable T. G. Murphy, Minister of the Interior and Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, and the Honourable M. Dupré, Solicitor General, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of chapter 145 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, intituled, "An Act respecting the House of Commons."

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to lay before the house the report of the joint librarians of parliament.

TRIBUTES TO DECEASED MEMBERS

THE LATE THOMAS MERRITT CAYLEY—THE LATE HON. EDMOND BAIRD RYCKMAN

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, once more it is my melancholy duty to record the passing of two of our members during the recess. We had barely separated after prorogation when death called one of our not very well known but very well beloved members, Mr. Thomas Merritt Cayley, member for South Oxford.

I sometimes wonder whether or not a recess has ever passed without death claiming one of the members of this house. Mr. Cayley's death was not unexpected; I think he himself realized that his days were numbered. He had lived for many years in the county which he represented; he was a representative of the very finest type of citizenship of the old province of Ontario. In his younger days he had been a teacher, and it is a matter of comment that during the last contest in the county which he represented he was supported very warmly and enthusiastically by large numbers of young men and women who had received instruction at his hands.

He was not very active in the business of this house, yet his fine business sense and his wide knowledge of insurance matters always gave singular importance to any observations he was pleased to make in this chamber. We will mourn his passing as a loss to that membership in the house which is represented by those who have passed through various stages of political life in the counties which they represent, and who in my judgment are the finest representatives of the finest type of Canadian citizenship. I offer to the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the members of his party my sincere sympathy in the loss of a very excellent hard working and distinguished member of parliament.

The other death that I have to record today is that of a colleague to whom I was warmly attached, and I find it difficult to express in adequate terms my sense of loss at his passing. The late Hon. Edmond Baird Ryckman was a son of the parsonage. He was born in Quebec, but in his early youth lived in Ontario, and I recall very vividly a conversation with him in which he indicated his early struggles in the city of Guelph, represented by my friend and colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie).

Mr. Ryckman was an extraordinarily good student. His career at the university was one of high achievement, he having been a gold medallist in classics. Strange as it may appear in a chamber such as this, he retained in his later days a lively affection for the classics. He was a distinguished member of the bar, being a gold medallist when he was called, and a considerable authority on all matters pertaining to commercial transactions.

In his very early days he attracted the attention of leading business men in the city of Toronto, and from that time onward his career was one of increasing success. He was a man of exceedingly sound judgment; I think perhaps he had as sound judgment on matters concerning business affairs as any man with whom I have had contact. He had a wide outlook; he had travelled; and he had strong convictions. He believed in party government, and in his early youth he made sacrifices for his party that perhaps very few people know and probably would not understand if they did. He was devoted to the party of which he was a member, and in failing health continued to pursue his ministerial duties when under normal circumstances he should have retired. He realized the difficulties of administration of the department over which he presided, and, notwithstanding the fact that it was sometimes thought the administration of his department lacked sympathy with the public, there was no business man who had a keener appreciation of the difficulties other business men had to meet in connection with that same administration. In council his judgment was invaluable. His wide knowledge and his great capacity enabled him to assist very greatly in arriving at conclusions having to do with business transactions.

We on this side of the house mourn not only a beloved and distinguished colleague, but one who for a long period of years had been closely identified with the fortunes of the party which I have the honour to lead. If ever any man served the state without regard to his own personal health or comfort or happiness, that man was Edmond Baird Ryckman. He passed away, as hon. members know, a few short weeks after he had surrendered his portfolio. We parted with him with regret; we mourn his passing beyond words of mine to express. I am sure hon. members, whatever may be their political associations, who were privileged to know him and who were familiar with his wide knowledge of literature and of everything which in conversation and in social contacts endears one man to another, will join with me in asking you, Mr. Speaker, to extend to his family and to the family of the hon. member who sat opposite, our deepest sympathy in their great sorrow.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to express to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) my thanks, and those of the official opposition, for the sympathy he has extended to us in the loss of our late colleague, Mr. T. M. Cayley, the former member for South Oxford, and for the tribute he has paid Mr. Cayley's memory.

I desire to express to him, and to members of the Conservative party, more particularly to the members of the government, the sympathy of the official opposition, and the expression of my personal sympathy, in the loss they have sustained in the death of Mr. Ryckman, who, until quite recently, was a member of the present administration, and who was also a member of a previous Conservative administration.

The late member for South Oxford and the late member for Toronto East were both in ill health during the last session, and while we naturally hoped that their health in some measure might be restored, it cannot be said that in the case of either the end was wholly unexpected when it came.

Mr. Cayley was considerably the younger of the two, being only in his fifty-fifth year at the time of his death. He had, too, been in public life and a member of the House of Commons for a much shorter time, having entered in 1926 as the member for South Oxford, for which constituency he was again returned in 1930. His public career, though brief, was full of promise.

He was a native son of Oxford county, and his election as member for South Oxford was due in the main to recognition on the part of the electorate of the extent to which his life had been bound up in furthering the interests of the district, which was the home of himself and his parents. In all community movements, whether these related to politics, religion, or education; to furthering the interests of agriculture, or business, or the needs and activities of ex-service men, or fraternal organizations, he was foremost, over the greater part of his life.

Though a member of the House of Commons during two parliaments only, Mr. Cayley, as the Prime Minister has just said, made for himself a real place in its deliberations. He was a clear thinker and a good speaker, with something more than a touch of humour in what he had to say. Experience gained as a teacher over many years, and special knowledge of insurance and other business matters, already referred to, lent a note of authority to his contributions to the debates in which he participated, a contribution always marked by a never-failing moderation and toleration in the expression of his views. He was one of the most dependable and conscientious of men in the discharge of his duties as a member of parliament, and one of the most loyal to his party and its leader. He was of a very kindly disposition and was well liked, and enjoyed the friendship and very sincere regard of many of his political opponents, as well as of all the members of his own party. We who knew him best will long cherish his memory.

The late Minister of National Revenue, Hon. Mr. Ryckman, was also fortunate in enjoying the friendship of not a few of his political opponents, as well as of all members on his own side of the house.

Quite apart from any differences of political opinion, which are well known, but of which I should not wish to speak at this time, I would say that I think it would be doing an injustice to Mr. Ryckman's memory to attempt to gauge his services to the country or to his party by the years during which he held the office of Minister of National Revenue which for him were years of greatly impaired health. His resignation from the cabinet some weeks ago was due to recognition on his part, as well as that of the Prime Minister, that, because of the very serious condition of his health, he was unable to discharge the duties of his office. He had been, in fact, far from well for a long time past. This was known to the Prime Minister, and I can say for myself and for the members of my party, that it was a fact ever present to our minds. I know it was a painful duty to the Prime Minister to feel obliged to accept Mr. Ryckman's resignation, just as I believe it was a feeling of loyalty which caused him to retain his colleague at his side as long as he did. There is nothing in public life, as there is nothing perhaps in private life, quite so difficult as to hold the scales evenly between our personal loyalties and our official duties.

What I think we can now see more clearly, and what was most admirable, and what we shall wish always to recall, is the tenacity with which the minister sought to discharge the duties of his office, greatly handicapped as he was, and the gallant fight he made to conquer an unconquerable foe.

While Mr. Ryckman's name will always have its association with parliament, the late minister's achievements were more largely without, than within, its halls. Those who, like myself, remember him in his university and law school days, are pleased to recall, as the Prime Minister has recalled, his early intellectual attainments, evidenced as a gold medallist both in arts and in law, and the success which a gifted nature helped to bring him in his profession and in business. The country is not likely to forget his patriotism, or the sacrifice occasioned his family circle by the great war.

Personally, I am inclined to place foremost, as deserving of highest remembrance, Mr. Ryckman's readiness in years such as those which have followed the great war, to continue to share in the public life of his country. It won for him the distinction of being a minister of the crown in two administrations, but even more worthy of remembrance, it seems to me, is the fact that he shared as well and with great loyalty, as the Prime Minister has said, the fortunes of his party when in opposition, and that for over twelve years he was a member of this House of Commons.

I join most sincerely, as do all hon. members of the opposition, in the expression of deepest sympathy in their bereavement, which you, Mr. Speaker, have been asked by the Prime Minister to convey on behalf of the house to Mrs. Cayley and to Mrs. Ryckman and to the members of their respective families.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) have paid well deserved tributes to the memory of two former members of this house who have passed to the great beyond since the prorogation of the last session of parliament. May we in this part of the house be permitted, sir, to join in expressing to the families and relatives of those former members and colleagues our deep sympathy in their sorrow.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BENNETT: In moving that the house do now adjourn, I suppose it is realized by all who are familiar with our practice that we shall meet to-morrow at three o'clock, and

I then hope to table a number of the documents referred to in the speech from the throne so that they may be available to those who may wish to participate in the debate on Monday. We hope also that we may be able to table to-morrow the estimates.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the Prime Minister if a report of the recent dominion-provincial conference will be tabled?

Mr. BENNETT: There is no report of that conference except such as is contained in the resolutions that were adopted and which will be laid upon the table. It was understood at the last three such conferences that no minutes were to be kept and that the discussions were not to be the subject matter of comment afterwards, in order that those who attended might express themselves with that freedom which they might feel was denied them if there was to be a report of what was said. I may say that that was the unanimous expression of the members representing the provinces, and in practice it has been found that they were able to speak with much more freedom and to criticize much more keenly various matters that affected perhaps their own interests than they otherwise could have done if a report had been taken of the discussions. For that reason no report was made of the recent conference and no report was made last year, as the right hon. gentleman will remember, other than that contained in the resolutions which were adopted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Might I ask the Prime Minister if there will be a report with respect to the world economic conference?

Mr. BENNETT: As perhaps the right hon. gentleman may have observed from the speech from the throne, though possibly he has not yet had time to read it, the documents it mentions are to be laid on the table, and I propose to table them to-morrow.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 4.25 p.m.

Friday, January 26, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

VACANCY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received communications from two members notifying me that the following vacancy had occurred in the representation, viz.:

[Mr. Bennett.]

Of Hon. Edmond Baird Ryckman, member for the electoral district of East Toronto, by decease.

I accordingly issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out new writs of election for the said electoral district.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I desire to lay on the table two copies of the recommendations with regard to unemployment relief measures for 1934, adopted at the Dominion-Provincial conference last week. The French copy is not yet translated, but I have handed a copy of this document to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leader of the group to the left of the official opposition (Mr. Gardiner).

BANKING COMMISSION

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am laying on the table the report of the royal commission on Banking and Currency in Canada, together with a copy of the evidence presented to that commission. It will be observed that this evidence is contained in seven volumes and is voluminous. We have had six copies placed in the library which will be available immediately for the benefit of hon. members of the house. I am informed, further, that copies have been prepared for the use of the committee on banking and commerce.

MAIN ESTIMATES 1934-35

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1935 was presented by Hon. E. N. Rhodes (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house and referred to the committee of supply.

SUPPLY

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved:

That this house will on Monday next resolve itself into a committee to consider of a supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved:

That this house will on Monday next resolve itself into a committee to consider of the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BENNETT moved the adjournment of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it the intention of the government to proceed with the debate on the address until it is concluded?

Mr. BENNETT: We will follow the practice which for many years has been adopted in the House of Commons in London, and one which we have followed for the last two years. We will proceed with it in its course upon the order paper.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 3.28 p.m.

Monday, January 29, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

THE LATE HON. E. B. RYCKMAN

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on November 28 last Hon. E. B. Ryckman tendered his resignation as Minister of National Revenue, which resignation was submitted to His Excellency the Governor General and accepted. A letter to that effect was written to the retiring minister on November 30, 1933. His successor, Hon. R. C. Matthews, was appointed on December 6, 1933. I lay on the table the correspondence in connection with the resignation because of ill health of the retiring minister.

PRECIOUS METALS MARKING ACT

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2 to amend the Precious Metals Marking Act, 1928.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, this is merely a consolidation and revision of the act as it stands at present for the purpose of bringing it into harmony with the changed conditions obtaining in the businesses affected by this act. It does not introduce any radical or new measures; it is merely a general revision of the act. We will explain it in detail, of course, when the committee stage is reached.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS ACT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 3 to amend the Importation of Intoxicating Liquors Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Speaker, the amendment which is sought to the Importation of Intoxicating Liquors Act, commonly known as the Doherty Act, is rather technical, and is introduced at the instance of the Attorney General of Ontario. It seems that it has been the custom during past years for brewers in Ontario to ship direct to consignees in the province of Quebec who are authorized by the Quebec Liquor Commission, but the Doherty Act provides that shipments may be made only to the Liquor commission itself. The proposal now is to insert the word "or," so that the act will read that shipments may be made to the liquor commission, "or to an agency which by the law of the province is vested with the right of selling intoxicating liquors." The practice has been going on for a long time, but it is a technical contravention of the present law.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUREAU FOR TRANSLATIONS

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 4 respecting the Bureau for Translations.

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Will the hon. minister kindly explain this bill?

Mr. CAHAN: This bill is for the purpose of creating a Bureau for Translations, which shall include translators of various departments exclusive of those engaged in the ordinary secretarial and stenographic services of the several departments.

An examination shows that in January last there were in the public service ninety-one such translators from English to French and from French into English, and one other translator, attached to the Department of the Secretary of State, who does translations into all European languages other than French and who performs services for all departments, including the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of Immigration and the Department of Justice, which includes the Dominion police. These ninety-one translators receive salaries aggregating $252,000 annually and that amount is paid in addition to the amount paid for typewriting, stenographic and secretarial work which appertain to the same translations.

The situation is such that the department of the Secretary of State either must have a number of translators attached to it or must be able to avail itself of the services of some one or more of these ninety-one translators. For instance, the Department of the Secretary of State has to procure a translation of the address of His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of parliament, but there is no translator to whom I can apply to have that work done, so I have been dependent upon the gratuitous service of personal friends, or to pay others to make that translation from time to time. In addition we have a very considerable number of important state documents of which the Secretary of State, as Registrar General, is the conservator or keeper or guardian. Yet some time ago, when a treaty dealing with the waterways was signed between the government of Canada and the government of the United States, there was not a single translator to whom I could apply or to whom I had the right to apply to make a translation of that document from English into French for circulation as required. In respect of private, confidential documents such as that, I had to enlist the services of a personal friend to make the translation. There were other documents such as the convention between Ontario and Quebec in regard to the same waterways, and in connection with them there was no one in the public service to whom I could apply for a translation. I had to go outside to procure the services of a friend to make such translation. And so it is that the different departments are from time to time called upon to prepare in both English and French very important state documents.

On review of the matter it was recommended, first by the civil service commission that, to avoid the appointment of a number of translators in addition to the number I have mentioned, and in view of the fact that a consolidation had been made under the Minister of Finance of the accounting systems of the different departments, a bureau might be created to which the existing translators would be attached, subject to the civil service commission in every respect, which could be called upon authoritatively to translate state documents as from time to time throughout the year they may be required.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Would that bureau be under the minister?

Mr. CAHAN: It was suggested that it should be under such minister as might from time to time be appointed by the governor in council to administer the act, and that a superintendent of the bureau should be appointed by the Civil Service Commission, from among the existing translators, who would superintend the actual work and such distribution of work as might be deemed necessary. For the present the word "minister" where it appears in the bill means the Secretary of State for Canada, or such other minister of the crown as may from time to time be appointed by order in council to administer this legislation. However I prefer to discuss the matter when the bill is actually before the house upon second reading, at which time all members will have access to it.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE RESPECTING CONSIDERATION OF GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister if the house was not to understand from his motion of a few days ago that the speech from the throne would be considered to-day, and that this order would receive precedence over all others? It has been customary on former occasions to proceed in that manner.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it was my intention that consideration of the Governor General's speech should appear on the order paper following questions. However I understand from the clerk of the house that having regard to the terms of the motion the order paper should be as it is. I propose, with the consent of the house, that the order for notices of motions might stand, without losing their position on the order paper, that government notices of motions also should stand, and that the house should proceed to the consideration of the Governor General's speech, as appearing at page eleven of the order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: The understanding is that the motions under the heading of notices of motions will stand, without losing their position on the order paper, and without to-day being affected by standing order 52 which provides:

When a private member's notice of motion shall have been twice called from the chair and not proceeded with, it shall be dropped.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) a question with respect to certain dispatches which have appeared in the press. Has the resignation of the Vancouver board of harbour commissioners been asked for, received or accepted?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): Mr. Speaker, to this day I have personally received no resignation from the harbour commissioners of Vancouver. I may be in a better position to-morrow to state the situation exactly.

NEWFOUNDLAND

ROYAL COMMISSION TO INQUIRE INTO FINANCIAL SITUATION AND PROSPECTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government if it is their intention to table the Amulree report on Newfoundland, and if so, when?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it was not proposed to table it. The report was not in any sense connected with the operations of this government. The government of Canada was asked to name a commissioner to sit with commissioners from Great Britain and Newfoundland. With that in mind Mr. Magrath was selected.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

MEDICAL SERVICES IN CITY OF WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, is the government aware of the action taken recently by the medical profession of the city of Winnipeg with respect to medical services formerly afforded families on relief? If so, in the event of other means failing, will they intercede on behalf of these people and see that they are afforded proper medical services.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, representatives of the medical profession met me in Ottawa some weeks ago, and later a communication was sent to them indicating that there was no reason to believe that the provinces would not discharge their constitutional duties with respect to the health of their citizens. That point has been stated and restated so often it is difficult to understand why a question should be asked with respect to it.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) if it is his intention this year to proceed with the amendments to the Canada Shipping Act?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): Mr. Speaker, the matter is under consideration

Mr. MacINNIS: When will we have an answer?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Within a few days. We are waiting for more information from other parts of the empire so that as far as practicable the legislation may be uniform.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY MOVED BY MR. GOBEIL AND SECONDED BY MR. BARBER

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. SAMUEL GOBEIL (Compton) moved:

That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, to offer the humble thanks of this house to His Excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both houses of parliament.

He said: Mr. Speaker, representing a constituency where the English speaking element makes up an important proportion of the community, may I, at the outset, take a few minutes to express to them, in their own mother tongue, my heartfelt pride in having been designated, I their humble representative, to move the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

However, I harbour no illusion for I am well aware that it is not my humble person which has made me worthy of this honour, but my claim as rural representative of this little Canadian Switzerland, known as the eastern townships of the province of Quebec, and which, in 1930, returned six members to carry out the policy of our illustrious Leader of whom the present government feels so proud.

The eastern townships, and more particularly the county of Compton first, were settled by British stock, of English, Scotch and Irish origin.

When the declaration of American Independence took place, many loyalists desirous of living under the protection of the Union Jack transferred their home to the eastern part of our province.

Among them there shone a true leader, one inspired by lofty views, who contributed more than any to give to this corner of our province a special character of bilingualism. This man whose memory still is cherished in the annals of our history, bore the name of John Henry Pope. He took an active part in the affairs of our country, became first member for the constituency of Compton in 1857 when the provinces of Ontario and Quebec were joined together, and later joined the cabinet of Sir John A. Macdonald. He was the first to conceive the idea of settling French Canadian parishes in the county of Compton, along the United States border. Greatly encouraged by the clergy of the time, he took advantage of the repatriation movement, then in full swing, from 1870 to 1880, so as to bring back from the United States a large number of French Canadian families.

In this, the untiring co-operation of the colonization society of the county of Bagot, proved to be a precious help and attracted to our section of the country numerous families from the older parishes of the Richelieu and Yamaska valleys.

On many an occasion he publicly proclaimed that the settlement of these French Canadian parishes along the United States border was our strongest bulwark against American invasion.

Such was the spirit which gave birth to the settlement of these bilingual parishes. It is, therefore, not astonishing that the two races have always lived together in an unbroken harmony.

(Translation) Now, Mr. Speaker, the fifth session of the present parliament begins, I think, most auspiciously. Canada seems to have definitely reached the stage of readjustment, a forerunner of prosperity, the only one compatible with a young country endowed by Providence with an unparalleled wealth of resources. The Imperial conference agreements, in force for over twelve months, have given most satisfactory results, and the government under the leadership of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has cause to rejoice.

May I, sir, quote a few figures gathered from our official statistics, they refer to the increase of our agricultural products exported to England, without, however, including the other component parts of the British Empire. I note that from October, 1932, to October, 1933, these agreements have greatly benefited the Canadian fruit industry, and it is noteworthy that these products are of the utmost interest to all the provinces of Canada, with the exception, perhaps, of the three prairie provinces. In the course of those twelve months, we exported to the United Kingdom 1,753,601 barrels of apples, compared with 1,407,047 barrels for the previous twelve months, thus showing an increase of 25 per cent. During the same period we exported, in 1932, 136,975 pounds of dried apples, while in 1933, we exported 511,025 pounds or an increase of 275 per cent.

In 1932, always during the same period, our exports of various preserved fruits amounted to 7,184,063 pounds, while in 1933, the figures reached 16,479,000 pounds, or an increase of 129 per cent. As to canned vegetables, our exports which amounted to 7,570,295 pounds in 1932, reached in 1933, 10,263,802 pounds or an increase of 36 per cent.

In 1932, we exported to the United Kingdom 172,462,000 feet of planks and boards; in 1933, 450,000,000 feet, and it is to be noted that the price of this lumber has been increasing within the last six months. Meat exports show interesting figures. Poultry exports—this item is of interest to all the provinces, including the western provinces—increased from 338,094 pounds in 1932, to 1,026,513 pounds in 1933, or an increase of more than 200 per cent. Bacon from 317,022 cwts to 605,088 cwts. or an increase of 91 per cent, and the price of pork has more than doubled within the last twelve months, moreover, the Canadian farmer has an opportunity of considerably increasing his output of bacon, since the quota of our exports is still far under the one agreed upon.

As to cattle the prices have not been as satisfactory as those of pork, although there has been of late an improvement, especially as regards those which meet the British market requirements, and the difference in prices should induce the Canadian farmer to improve his herds by all possible means. I, here, sir, put a question to the Canadian farmer: What would have been the cattle situation of this country, during the year just ended, if the 53,000 head of cattle which we exported to the United Kingdom during 1933 had been thrown on the Canadian market? I leave the answer to our farmers; however, I beg to remind them that this government has done for them in a few months, what no government for the last 35 years was able to carry out; moreover under the regime of our opponents, not only were we debarred from the British market, but our neighbours to the south, to whom we sold for more than $21,000,000 worth of live stock when the Liberals assumed power in 1921, had, during these nine years, so highly increased their tariff on Canadian cattle, that, in 1930, the last year of our opponents' regime under the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), we only sold to them about three quarters of a million dollars worth; and the government of that day, apparently did not bestir itself to remedy this disastrous situation. Since I have broached the subject of cattle, may I comment briefly with reference to the tuberculin test of our cattle. Immediately after this government assumed power, the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) adopted the policy of indemnifying the owners of steers found to be tuberculous, this put an end to an injustice and was greatly appreciated by the farming community. However, according to the regulations in force, the cattle which react remain the property of the farmer, but he must dispose of them immediately, so as not to contaminate those that are healthy, and he must furthermore disinfect his stables. He must, therefore, sell them for what he can get, the sale price varying between three and five dollars per head. These diseased cattle are sent to the slaughterhouse, and, I think, I am well within the mark in stating that 75 per cent are sold for human consumption. I shall not discuss the hygienic viewpoint, which is outside of my sphere; however, I have no doubt that the cheap sale of these cattle has a disastrous effect on our meat markets. I would suggest that there be added to the indemnity paid to the farmer for his contaminated cattle, the price which he receives to-day for the carcass of these animals and that the latter instead of finding their way to our markets, be used as fertilizers. I feel confident that it would practically cost the country nothing and would considerably enhance the prices of meat on our markets.

I could, sir, enumerate many more products for which we have obtained considerable advantages through these Imperial agreements, without going outside of agriculture where I wish to remain; however, lest I should be reproached for taking advantage of the patience of this hon. house, I shall simply consider them from the viewpoint of the dairy products and more particularly of butter. Hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to have derived much satisfaction from the fact that price levels of butter within the last four years had dropped; the pleasure which they derive interests them more than the loss sustained by the Canadian farmer. In their oratorical flights they taunted the right hon. Prime Minister; the latter, if we are to believe them, ensnared the people by false promises as regards the price of butter. May I remind these hon. gentlemen that there are statistics which speak more eloquently and especially more truly than their denunciations.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): During the last two years of the Liberal regime, the Canadian producer received for his butter, in 1929, an average price of 39·27 cents per pound, and of 31·07, in 1930. I take as a basis of comparison the wholesale prices of the Montreal and New York markets. The United States farmer received as an average price 45·01 cents per pound in 1929, and 36·53, in 1930, or 5·74 cents, in 1929, and 5·46 in 1930, more per pound than the Canadian farmer. During the last two years these prices were 19·98 cents, in 1932, and 20·57 in 1933, in Canada, and 20.99 cents in 1932, and 21·33, in 1933, in the United States showing only a difference of 1·01 cent for last year and 0·76 for this year, in favour of the United States market.

However, one must consider, and our friends opposite should remember in their oratorical flights, that, under their regime, from 1921 to 1930, the United States increased their tariff on Canadian butter from 2½ cents to 14 cents per pound and as much as fifty and some odd cents on cream, which had the effect of completely closing the market of our neighbours to the south to our farmers and the latter are quite aware of this; they have also found out that the only market opened to their products is not the United States, but London. Now, sir, what have been the prices of butter on the London market, compared to those of Canada, within the last two years? In 1932, the average price on the English market was 17·42 cents per pound, and, in 1933, 16·46 cents; or 2½ cents and 4 cents per pound less than on the Canadian market, and these prices are for New Zealand's best butter. All know that the butter of that country has an advantage of ½ a cent on Canadian butter; here, again, I ask the Canadian farmer what would have been the price of Canadian butter, if this government had not taken the necessary means to curtail the imports of foreign butter imported under the Liberal regime. There is but one answer to this, sir, and the farmer knows it well: this year, he would have received 4 cents less for his butter than what he actually received.

Sir, there still remains to find out whether the Canadian citizen fully realizes the great endeavours made by this government in order to help him to weather the crisis which has held the world in its clutches for more than four years; whether he appreciates to its full value the advantages that this government obtained for his products, thanks especially to these Imperial agreements.

I think, I can answer without hesitation in the affirmative and I desire no further proof than the event which took place in the Canadian capital, in June last, at the congress held by the young Liberals of Canada, and which was designated under the pompous name of the "Liberal Association of the twentieth century." In order to better understand the significance of this event, it is well to somewhat examine the past. All are aware that these imperial agreements were repudiated by the opposition. The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), with whom the right hon. leader of the opposition has sometimes mysterious dealings, but who, however, at times shows independence of the Liberal party, made, with reference to this opposition to the Imperial Conference agreements, the following statement which I find at page 291 of Hansard, session 1932-33:

> We have had to-day, Mr. Speaker, a very important pronouncement on the part of the Liberal party. If I am to interpret what the right hon. leader of the opposition stated, I would infer that at the first opportunity, when the Liberal party crosses the floor of the house and becomes the government of the country, they will abrogate the treaties that are now really in effect. I think I am not doing them an injustice by putting that interpretation on the remarks of the leader of the opposition.

Such an interpretation of his statement was never repudiated by the right hon. leader of the opposition. It is therefore an explicit statement which should be looked upon as the motto of the opposition. Do you think this to be a fact and that all the factions of the Liberal party look upon these agreements unfavourably? No, Mr. Speaker, and I wonder what feelings of deep sorrow and at the same time of anger must have filled the soul of the right hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), when they found out that the youths of the Liberal party repudiated and brushed aside the resolution of the Liberal party which was to do all in its power to abrogate the agreements concluded at the Ottawa Imperial Conference. Naturally, we on this side of the house, were too far away to hear the grinding of teeth; however, does not this disavowal furnish the best evidence of approbation given by political opponents in favour of this government's policy with reference to the imperial agreements? The legislation on agriculture which will be brought down this session, will no doubt comprise certain changes, permitting our farmers to still benefit in a greater measure by the advantages granted to our country. Together with the cooperation of the provinces, these advantages will considerably increase in the future.

The outlook, at the beginning of this year, is most encouraging which permits us to state that the crisis is almost at an end, and that the upward trend of business is being greatly felt. No doubt that the dawn of this prosperous era is very welcome to all citizens of this Dominion which is on the eve of brilliantly celebrating the fourth centenary of the discovery of our dear Canada. If the great St. Malo navigator, Jacques Cartier, returned to this land where he sowed the benevolent seeds of civilization he would acknowledge that those to whom he left the arduous task of continuing his work have not failed in the task. With a legitimate pride, he would see this country still young, giving to the whole world the example of a sound, honest and progressive administration. In spite of numerous obstacles, our dear Canada has remained one of the few countries in the world respectful of order, liberty and peace existing among the various sections of our people.

The illustrious French discoverer would feel a legitimate pride in hearing the language of the most civilized kingdom of his day, spoken so fluently by the most distinguished representatives of His Majesty King George V, and he would also rejoice to hear the gracious consort of our illustrious Governor reechoing as in the rhythm of an entrancing lullaby:

> "Ce langage aux douceurs souveraines,
> Le plus beau qui soit né sur des lèvres humaines."

With this thought of remembrance of our glorious past and a hope in our no less glorious future, I have the honour to move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber), that an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, to humbly thank His Excellency for the gracious speech he was pleased to make to the two houses of parliament.

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, upon rising to second the motion of the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) may I be permitted to express to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and his colleagues my appreciation of their recognition of the Pacific coast province and the honour they have done the Fraser Valley constituency by inviting their representative to second this important motion. I have been told that in making this choice the qualifications taken into consideration by governments are youth and inexperience and no doubt these applied in choosing a member from British Columbia.

The task which I have been asked to undertake to-day is a pleasant one compared with that of last year and the year before. During the last two years the most one could do was to express a somewhat pious hope that conditions might improve, but to-day we are entering a new year with something more than hope. We have before us definite evidence that the clouds are lifting, that the downward spiral of the depression has been checked and that the upward movement has been in progress in Canada for the last eight or ten months. The speech draws to our attention the improved world conditions and the fact that these have been reflected in Canada by expanding trade, increased revenues and increased employment. The optimism which prevails to-day throughout the whole dominion has been reflected in the speech. It would perhaps be difficult to find any one year since the war that has been so crowded with climaxes as the year 1933. We had the American crisis and the measures with which it was met; we had the world conference; we had the German revolution; we had the disarmament deadlock and the wild dance of world currencies, some of which have been wholesome while others have been very disconcerting. But the underlying fact remains that in the midst of the lashing surf the tide has turned.

The world is gradually returning to economic stability. In Great Britain a higher level of prosperity has been manifest and the British people regard the depression as a thing of the past. This condition is reflected in other parts of the empire. In European and leading Asiatic countries there is, in the main, a marked improvement. Upon this continent and elsewhere the forward march has resumed; world trade which had sunk to one-third of its normal volume is expanding again. To no country in the world is this more important than to Canada, as normally we export one-third of our total production, and to that extent our economic destiny is bound up with that of our neighbour nations.

The development of trade is a function of government, and although the general improvement in world conditions has been reflected in this country, at the same time I believe that the great mass of the Canadian people realize that the return to better conditions in this country must be credited to the untiring efforts and the policy of the present administration. In 1930 the leader of the Conservative party, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), gave to the people of this dominion a pledge that if he were placed at the head of government in this country he would see to it that Canadians were afforded an equal opportunity with their competitors to carry on the development of Canada. That pledge has been fulfilled to the letter.

In order to give that opportunity the tariff was increased; the Customs Act was amended to prevent the dumping of surplus products of foreign countries on the Canadian market, and this action alone saved many producers in Canada from complete ruin. We have been told that the tariff is high, and there is no doubt that we shall be told again this session that the tariff is high. We admit that it is high. But, as the Prime Minister has pointed out on more than one occasion, the tariff is simply an instrument, and under present conditions it has been applied in cases of emergency. Other instruments have been used, instruments perhaps more painful than the tariff—the dumping duty and even the embargo—have been applied in order to save Canadian industry.

Those of us who come from fruit districts, and from districts where other lines of farm produce are grown, fully realize the great benefit that has been derived from the imposition of these dumping duties. In my own district, where large quantities of small fruits and vegetables are produced, had it not been for the dumping duty against surplus American products, these producers would have been out of business two years ago. This applies not only to districts in British Columbia, but to other districts throughout Canada.

At the same time this government has directed its efforts, and with considerable success, towards selling Canadian products. Through trade commissioners, through treaties and through agreements we have been successful in increasing Canadian exports. To this end, agreements have been entered into with empire countries, treaties have been made with foreign nations, and there is not the least doubt that, so far as Canada is concerned, the recovery commenced with the family agreement entered into at the imperial conference in 1932.

Although we completed just a few months ago the first year under these agreements, a wonderful development has taken place in empire trade. The first nine months of the present fiscal year saw our exports to empire countries increased by 18 per cent, while our imports advanced 13 per cent. There were 22 empire countries to which increased exports went and 17 from which increased imports came. In the nine months we increased exports to the United Kingdom by $26,000,000 and increased imports from Great Britain by $11,000,000.

We all remember quite well the opposition to these agreements. I believe the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) even went so far as to say that if his party were returned to power they would not consider the agreements binding. But one argument which has been used in this house has been repeated throughout the whole country, namely, that by entering into these agreements we were putting an iron band around the nation and that we would not be in a position to enter into agreements or to do business with foreign countries. That contention was exploded very shortly after the passing of the treaty, in the case of Great Britain.

I would point out that during the first nine months of the present fiscal year our exports to foreign countries increased by 12 per cent while our imports from these countries decreased by 7 per cent. We increased exports to 51 foreign countries, and from 41 foreign countries increased imports came. We made a new treaty with France and renewed the agreements with Germany and Austria. As a result of the new treaty with France we increased exports to that country by 50 per cent in a period of five months. We sold to Germany 5½ per cent more; to Italy 3 per cent more; to the Netherlands 16 per cent more; to Colombia 7 per cent more; to Peru 3 per cent more, and to Mexico 16 per cent more. We even sold to the United States 22 per cent more of agricultural products than we did the year before.

In the extension of trade, in the widening of markets, the record of this government over a period of two years will compare quite favourably with that of the previous government over a period of eight years. Under the most trying conditions, Canada once more has stepped forward into fifth place among the exporting nations of the world—a record which, I think, Canada might well be proud of. At the same time the government has directed its efforts successfully to restoring equilibrium between sales and purchases. Indeed, not only has equilibrium been restored, but we have done a little better, so that an unfavourable trade balance of $110,000,000 in 1930 has been turned into a favourable balance of $134,000,000, or a betterment of $244,000,000, which has meant a great deal to us in discharging our international obligations.

I wish now to direct the attention of the house to the increased trade that has resulted from empire agreements, as reflected in British Columbia. It is particularly noticeable in the all-year-round ports of that province. I say all-year-round ports, and I should like some hon. gentlemen from eastern Canada to appreciate the fact that to-day pleasure yachts, coastal steamers and great liners are passing in and out of the ports on the Pacific coast. In the great fresh water port of New Westminster, according to the figures compiled by the secretary of the harbour board, nearly every commodity passing over Fraser river docks has been handled in greater quantity than during the previous year. Deep sea ships calling at that port increased from 311 to 409; lumber exports went up 30 per cent, over 216,000,000 feet; bar metal exports increased nearly 60 per cent; exports of wheat ,from less than 200,000 bushels in 1932, increased to over 1,500,000 bushels in 1933.

Then we come to Vancouver, the greatest shipping port on the Pacific. The harbour commission reports show that in spite of a great drop in the export of grain there was an increase in the export of almost every other commodity. You will see the colours of half a dozen nations in this harbour in one day. You will find British ships loading for Britain and Australia, the orient and the continent, ships flying the Rising Sun of Japan, stowing logs, grain and scrap iron for the far east. There will be seen a Danish vessel taking on wheat, apples, lead and fish for Holland and Germany; the Cross of Norway flying from a ship laden with wheat, pulp and tallow for France and Britain; Dutch and American vessels loading zinc, flour and salmon. You will find there the tricolour of France, Hitler's swastika, the banner of Italy and even the flag of Jugoslavia. From this harbour last year ships carried our products to a dozen empire and ten foreign countries. The chief impetus of this trade was empire reciprocity. Preference for all the natural products of the dominion has offset the tariffs that locked to us the markets of foreign lands.

The year 1933 brought general improvement to the industries of British Columbia. The latest information available shows a general increase of over $7,000,000 in value of products as follows:

Commodity—	Increase in value
Lumber	$4,000,000
Mines	2,000,000
Fisheries	1,000,000
Agriculture	100,000

Industrial pay-rolls compiled from returns comprising some 3,500 firms amounted to over $110,000,000 for the year, or an increase of $7,000,000 over the previous year. There was also a gain in the peak volume of employment as indicated by an increase in the numbers of men and women at work. A gain was marked by the addition of more than 3,000 men to the logging camps during the year, while active mining development caused a considerable upturn in employment. Those in the logging trades shared a pay increase averaging around 12 per cent.

Not mentioned in any record are the secondary benefits coming from the improved conditions in the major industries throughout the province. For instance, new towns are springing up in mining centres; small sawmills, long closed, are now opening, increased mining activity having placed many of these back into production during the year. Another secondary benefit is evidenced in transportation, in connection with the development of mining in British Columbia, we find increased business done by air transportation, truck and motor and the railways.

Under the empire trade agreements perhaps no industry has benefited as much as that of lumber. Lumber exports from British Columbia to points outside North America have reached the highest level in the history of the industry, exceeding, by 110,000,000 feet, or 35 per cent, the previous record established in 1930. Instead of one-quarter, British Columbia is now shipping almost three-quarters of its sawn lumber to overseas destinations and it is now the leading lumber exporting area of North America. Shipments to Great Britain, Australia, China and South Africa are all higher than in the previous year, exports to Great Britain showing an increase of more than 100 per cent over 1932. Of the lumber shipped from the Pacific coast to Great Britain during 1933, British Columbia shipped 70 per cent as compared with only 45 per cent during 1932. The Australian market is becoming of extreme importance to my province. In 1933 Canadian shipments to Australia, due to the preference granted the Canadian product under the Ottawa agreement, accounted for over 90 per cent of the total orders for lumber from the Pacific coast.

Perhaps one of the brightest features is the improved condition of the municipalities of the province. Almost every muncipality, according to its annual report, in spite of loss of revenue due to reduced government grants and increased social service costs, ended the year with a surplus.

I think we should pay a compliment to the city of Vancouver for the manner in which it has looked after unemployment; perhaps no other city of its size on the continent has had such a problem. Principally owing to its mild climate people from the prairies and from the northern sections have drifted to Vancouver and increased that problem, but in spite of all that Vancouver enjoys the distinction of being one of the very few cities of Canada that has met its cost of relief out of ordinary revenue. So much for the definite improvement in conditions not only in British Columbia but throughout the country.

Another industry which is mentioned in the speech from the throne and to which I should like to refer, is agriculture. As has been pointed out agricultural products have been low in price. That condition exists not only in Canada but in every country throughout the world and it is a problem with which every nation is struggling at the present time. When we turn to agriculture, the basic industry of Canada, the picture, in spots, is not so bright. The bright part of the picture is that in Canada many agricultural products are higher in price than in many other countries. I am just reminded that when hogs were selling here the other day at $8.50, they were selling at $4 in Buffalo. Eggs, butter, lamb and a few other products are higher in Canada than in the United States. This can fairly be credited to the present administration, particularly to the efforts of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). The empire agreements provided the outlet; increased prices followed.

But, as I have said, conditions are not what we desire in the agricultural industry. It is still extremely difficult for Canadian farmers to find profitable outlet for a number of their surplus products. If the proposed legislation provides for the setting up of something in the nature of a marketing board, I am sure this will be welcomed by the agricultural industry. But in Canada to-day we are faced with something more than that; we are confronted with the problem of orderly marketing within our own country. It is, I think, generally believed that co-operative marketing, while it has effected many improvements, has failed to accomplish all that it was expected to do. The failure of cooperative marketing has been due to a tendency on the part of a comparatively few producers to refuse to cooperate, and to such producers seeking to take advantage of the better conditions generally brought about by the co-operative organizations. In other words, 100 per cent of voluntary cooperation amongst farmers has proved to be impossible. The breaking down of orderly marketing within our province has been disastrous to the dairy and fruit industries. The dairy industry in the Fraser valley, to put it mildly, is in a demoralized condition. Milk is being produced at less than cost of production and this situation naturally cannot continue much longer or many farmers will be forced off their farms, compelled to sacrifice their stock and seek relief. Engaged in this industry there are 4,000 farmers with 60,000 head of dairy stock representing an investment at present day prices of $25,000,000. These men are now looking for government action to save the industry from ruin. Such conditions are not confined to British Columbia. Those of us who last year sat on a committee which investigated the dairy industry are quite aware of this fact. The demand now comes from, not 50 per cent, but 90 per cent of the producers of our province for compulsory legislation. Canadian farmers, speaking through their respective organizations, point out that such legislation has been granted by the British parliament to the farmers of Great Britain; it has also been provided for the farmers of the United States and our farmers believe that they should be granted similar legislation and powers. It has been pointed out that the compulsory legislation in British Columbia was successful until declared ultra vires in 1931 by the privy council. It is claimed that if it were in force to-day in that province it would increase the purchasing power of the Fraser valley dairymen by at least $500,000 a year without raising the price to the consuming public.

I want to make it quite clear that these producers fully realize that legislation such as the British Marketing Act does not come under the jurisdiction of the federal parliament, but that owing to our set-up of government comes under the jurisdiction of the legislatures of the various provinces. Owing to the ruling of the privy council, however, it is felt that in order to make such legislation sound it will be necessary that something in the nature of enabling legislation be passed by the federal parliament. It is to be hoped, following the conference with the provinces and while the present legislation is under consideration, that some satisfactory arrangement may be made between the governments in order to afford relief to these industries.

There is one other matter on which I should like to touch, but before proceeding to do so may I say that I have just noticed in the speech from the throne some mention of relief camps. During past sessions we heard considerable criticism of the camps operated in the province of British Columbia. I have made it my business to visit these camps occasionally, and I wish to say that I have heard many compliments from different parts of the district with regard to the manner in which the Department of National Defence has conducted these camps. I have discussed matters with the men in the camps. They appeared satisfied and they paid many compliments to those in charge.

We are pleased to note in the speech from the throne the suggestion that some program of public works be undertaken. I do not believe the people of Canada expect this country to launch a very extensive scheme, certainly nothing to compare with that undertaken in the nation to the south. We do believe, however, that this is the opportune time to introduce something of this nature in order that private industry may be stimulated and more and more people brought back to employment.

One other matter which remains to be dealt with is the question of the central bank. Those of us who have been here during the past two or three sessions will remember that there have been demands from practically every corner of the house for legislation of this nature. The world economic conference decreed that every developed country should have a central bank to facilitate international credit and currency action. Since last session the government has had the project examined by a body of experts, and I think all will agree that the royal commission which was constituted last fall was well chosen. Their sittings in all parts of the country were notable for the freedom with which all possible evidence was received and for the patience and tact displayed in dealing with the material submitted. As a result of this inquiry it is believed that a properly constituted central bank can be developed as a useful adjunct to our banking system.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that there is one charge that cannot be made against this government. It cannot be said that they refused responsibility or that they lacked courage. During these most difficult times, under sane leadership our great institutions have weathered the storm. We have met our contracts on the terms laid down both at home and abroad, with the result that Canada's credit stands high in the markets of the world. This was evidenced by the loan which was floated in London during the past year, and which was over-subscribed about four times. We have been able to cope with conditions caused by drought. We have met the problem of unemployment as successfully as any other country. Trade and commerce has gradually improved, and the future is bright. Under these conditions Canada's record is one of which every Canadian citizen might well feel proud.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when the leader of the opposition rises to speak on the address it is customary for him to open his remarks by extending his compliments and congratulations to the mover and seconder of the motion which your honour has just read. That custom has arisen from the circumstance that usually the honour of moving and seconding the address is accorded to newly elected members of the House of Commons. Unfortunately for hon. gentlemen opposite all the newly elected members of the house are on this side, and the government have been obliged to fall back on two of their stalwarts to support the policies of the administration and to make the best of those policies from the government's point of view.

I congratulate the hon. gentlemen who respectively have moved and seconded the address, not on what they have said, because I am afraid I shall have to disagree with most of their statements, but upon having discharged their duty in a manner which I am sure has commended itself to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and to their fellow members. I should like to extend also my very cordial congratulations to the hon. member for Toronto East Centre (Mr. Matthews) upon his elevation to the ministry, and in doing so I would extend, as has been done by their applause already, the very cordial greetings of all hon. members on this side. On behalf of our party I extend to him our best wishes for his success in the administration of his department and in the discharge of his ministerial duties.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having congratulated my right hon. friend and the government on the latest acquisition to the ranks of the cabinet, may I congratulate the house on the latest acquisition to its membership, in the three new members who have just been seated. As hon. members know, we had in October last elections on the same day in three different constituencies in parts of Canada which are widely separated. It was generally recognized before the elections took place that the results would be of exceptional significance, and in each of the constituencies the policies of the government were very fully discussed. The promises made by the Prime Minister at the time he assumed office and the extent to which those promises were performed, as well as the present position of the country and other matters were very fully reviewed, and I think the results may be taken as being of exceptional significance.

That is so for two reasons. One is that the constituencies were as I have already said, widely separated; they were in different parts of Canada, broadly representative of the varied interests of our country. One constituency, that of Restigouche-Madawaska, was in the maritime provinces; another, Yamaska, was in the central portion of Canada, in the province of Quebec, and the third, Mackenzie, was in the middle west. If either one or two of these constituencies had supported the Liberal party and the third had supported hon. gentlemen opposite we would probably have heard hon. members opposite saying that, after all, the results, considering the times, were not too bad. But when we see all three constituencies situated in different parts of Canada registering their verdict against the administration and in support of the Liberal party I doubt if better evidence could be found of the views held throughout the country, and of the opinion of the Canadian people concerning the administration. Those results are equally significant as showing approval of the Liberal party.

When one considers the majorities registered in the by-elections one finds the results even more significant. In the constituency of Yamaska the Liberal candidate—and I am figuring the way hon. gentlemen opposite have figured, namely by percentages—increased his majority by eighty-four per cent. Down in the maritime provinces, in the constituency of Restigouche-Madawaska, in the province of New Brunswick, which was considered to be more or less of a Conservative stronghold, the majority of 548 which was given hon. members opposite in the election of 1930 was changed to a Liberal majority of 6,460. In the constituency of Mackenzie, where the former Conservative-C.C.F. candidate, Mr. Campbell, received a majority of 3,076, the results disclosed a Liberal majority of 1,614.

A still more interesting circumstance is that in two of these constituencies, the one in the maritimes and the other in the west, there were third party candidates as well as candidates representing the Conservative party. In both cases the third party and government candidates were defeated. Another significant feature is that in each of these constituencies the Conservative candidate lost his deposit. If anything could be more significant of the view taken by the electors concerning the policies of hon. members opposite I wish the Prime Minister would tell us when he rises to speak.

I should like to extend congratulations to the three new members who have come to the house. Each one has already had considerable experience in public life. The hon. member for Yamaska (Mr. Boucher) had sat in this house more than ten years, up to the time of the last general election. The hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Michaud) had been in the legislature of the province of New Brunswick for seventeen years, and had occupied a position in the government of that province as minister without portfolio. The hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. MacMillan), was formerly a member of the legislature of the province of Saskatchewan. Not only is the house and country to be congratulated on the result of the by-elections, but as well upon what in the way of additional parliamentary experience and power in debate has been secured to this house.

These three by-elections, however, are not the only evidence of the extent to which hon. gentlemen opposite and the government in particular, have been losing the confidence of the public. It will be recalled that in the by-election held in the autumn of 1932, the one immediately preceding the three to which I have referred, the result was a verdict for the Liberal candidate, which also disclosed a very considerable increase over the majority which had been obtained by the present member's predecessor. The constituency of South Huron which in a previous election had given the late Mr. McMillan a majority of 349 gave in 1932 a majority of 1,989 to the Liberal candidate. Those are records of recent by-elections. They show what Canada thinks of the policies of economic nationalism and economic imperialism which have been the main objectives of the present administration since it came into office.

However, if still further evidence is required to show not only the manner in which the public has lost confidence in this administration but the manner in which the government has lost confidence in itself, it will be found in the fact that at the present time, and since May last, there has been a vacancy in the representation in the constituency of South Oxford. I ask the administration this question: When the writs were issued for the constituencies of Yamaska, Restigouche-Madawaska and Mackenzie, why was not a writ issued for the constituency of South Oxford? Certainly South Oxford should be represented in this house at this time. Why are its electors to all intents and purposes, disfranchised; without representation, so far as this session of parliament is concerned or at least that part of it upon which we have now begun our deliberations? Why is it that not until after the Easter recess will we have any representation in this house from South Oxford?

I noticed that in paying an eloquent and deserved tribute to the late member for South Oxford, the Prime Minister stated that in that part of Canada was to be found the finest type of Canadian citizenship. He repeated the statement that the finest type of Canadian citizenship was to be found in the constituency of South Oxford. Having that fact in mind, I now ask the Prime Minister why that finest type of citizenship is not now represented in parliament. The Prime Minister has power to say that representation should be given, but up to this time the constituency of South Oxford has been denied that representation. So the evidence from every side goes to prove that not only has the government lost the confidence of the country but it has lost confidence in itself. May I state further that no matter what majority it may have as a result of the number of hon. members returned at the time the government came into office, that majority no longer represents the opinion of the Canadian people. By-elections have expressed in no uncertain voice the opinion of our people. This government has lost the moral authority to govern.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I repeat the statement. I say that having lost by-election after by-election in all parts of Canada during the last two or three years, and the people having spoken so positively and so emphatically, it has been made perfectly plain that the government has lost the moral authority to govern, and if it followed its duty it would resign, go to the people and allow them to speak. The Canadian people as a whole should be given an opportunity at a general election to express their view upon policies which up to the present they have been able to do only in part in by-elections.

Let me now turn to the speech His Excellency the Governor General delivered from the throne to this house at the opening of the session. As is known, the speech almost in its entirety is prepared by the government, and His Excellency in delivering it is expressing the government's views. However there is one paragraph which refers directly to His Excellency and for which no doubt His Excellency is immediately responsible. It seems to me it appears very properly in the address. I refer to the paragraph in which it is stated that during the course of his stay in Canada His Excellency as the representative of His Majesty has visited all the provinces. I am sure the references His Excellency has made to the friendliness and great courage which he observed, and to the capacity of the people to overcome difficulties with which they are confronted will be very much appreciated by the people in the different parts of Canada visited, just as I am sure His Excellency's visits themselves to different parts of Canada have been very much appreciated.

There are some paragraphs, Mr. Speaker, that in language more or less the same appear in every speech from the throne. We are accustomed to find a paragraph, for instance, which tells us that the public accounts will be submitted, and another paragraph which tells us that the estimates will be submitted, and that it will be seen that due economy has been exercised in their preparation. There is one other paragraph which has crept into every speech from the throne since the present administration has come into office, and which has now become as commonplace as the two to which I have referred, and that is the paragraph which tells us that conditions are improving and that prosperity is just around the corner. If that paragraph did not appear so often, if it had not been in every speech from the throne since this administration came into office, possibly the paragraph which appears in the speech from the throne this year might carry more in the way of conviction with those to whom it is addressed. When, however, one reads what is said in this speech and compares it with what was said in previous speeches, the parallel is so striking that one will have difficulty in believing that the ministry actually appreciated in the past or appreciate at present the true position of the country when they advised His Excellency to use the following language:

> You are summoned for the dispatch of public business at a time when there are sound reasons for believing that the world is gradually returning to economic stability. I congratulate you that such improved world conditions are reflected in Canada by expanding trade, improving revenues, increasing employment, and a more confident outlook upon the future. Canada occupies a leading position amongst those countries where the evidence of a return to permanent prosperity is most convincing.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, that we could obtain from the ministry the sound reasons it has for believing that the world is gradually returning to economic stability. I would be the last to seek to question a statement of that kind, and I wish with all my heart that it could be supported, but when one looks at conditions as they are to-day, in the orient, as was described this very day in the press, with respect to the relations of Russia to Japan, when one looks at Germany and at conditions as they are in some of the other countries in Europe at the present time, when one looks at the unrest that there is in other parts of the world, and above all when one sees what is resulting from the economic nationalism of different countries, I fail to discover where there is evidence for believing that there is anything in the nature of a gradual return to economic stability. However, that is a matter of conjecture, and I do no more than simply say that it strikes me as an unnecessary statement in the speech having regard to conditions as we all know them to be throughout the world.

But the next paragraph is one of special significance so far as Canada is concerned. In previous speeches His Excellency has evidently been permitted simply to state the fact that conditions are improving, but in the present speech he has evidently been told to go somewhat further and actually to congratulate us upon the improvement.

For comparison with other years, let me give the house the statement as it appeared at the opening of the second session of parliament. These were the words used in March, 1931:

> A marked improvement in the domestic situation. . . . The firm belief of my government that this country is soon to enter upon a new era of prosperity.

At the opening of the third session of this parliament in February, 1932, there was the assertion that > "conditions are gradually improving."

At the prorogation in May, 1932, there was this assertion:

My government's policy . . . has already achieved an amelioration of conditions and forecasts steady and continued improvement.

Then referring to the Imperial Economic Conference it is stated:

Canada believes that the closer economic association of the British Empire will herald the dawn of a new and greater era of prosperity both for ourselves and for all the nations of the earth.

Hon. members will recall that the session in 1932 was adjourned over Christmas and that parliament reassembled on January 30, 1933, but even away back in October, 1932, we were told in the speech from the throne:

There are at last definite signs that the acuteness of the depression is passing.

Then addressing hon. members of both houses His Excellency was asked to say:

I rejoice that the wisdom of your steadfast policy . . . is still more fully manifest with approaching prosperity.

"Approaching prosperity" in October, 1932! There was a reference again to the improved conditions, and then something in the nature of a peroration as follows:

. . . we will build a Canada greater than we have yet known.

Leaving aside the evident effect upon some hon. members opposite of the rhetorical language which I have just quoted, and coming down to what is set forth in the present speech from the throne as indices of improving conditions, we find this statement:

I congratulate you that such improved world conditions are reflected in Canada by expanding trade, improving revenues, increasing employment, and a more confident outlook upon the future. . . . The evidence of a return to permanent prosperity is most convincing—in certain countries.

When the speech refers to "permanent prosperity" and when it invites us to look at certain specific data for evidence of that prosperity, then it seems to me that we are obliged to consider absolute amounts over considerable periods, not merely as hon. gentlemen opposite have been doing, percentages of slight improvement which have arisen from the fact that while at the outset trade in some directions was practically obliterated by the passing of their legislation, it may have increased a little here and there as some of the barriers have been lowered, making a certain percentage of improvement inevitable.

Let me take first, the figures which have to do with the so-called "increasing employment." I want to say at once that it is an amazing fact that notwithstanding that these times are what they are, and that public money is being spent to the extent that it is for the relief of unemployment, it is impossible to get from any of the government departments reliable information, or indeed any information with regard to the extent of unemployment in Canada at the present time. For some reason best known to the ministry these facts are not being given to the public; they are not appearing in any government reports. The Department of Labour ought to have a record or a substantial record, but it apparently has nothing to give which will throw light on the extent of unemployment at the present time. I believe that is entirely wrong, and the only explanation I think there can be, is that the ministry does not wish the country to know how many unemployed there are.

I want to go a step further and say that a much more serious fact is the circumstance that in the government reports on employment the government is including with employment arising from private enterprise employment which grows out of unemployment relief. They are bulking the two together with the result that in their reports which are given to the public it appears that employment in Canada, as that phrase is understood, is greater than it has been in previous months, as if that were the evidence of some increased prosperity, whereas it is none other than evidence of increased unemployment relief which means increased taxation of the people of the country. Apart from this, however, the government's own figures do not give the evidence which will substantiate the statement made in the speech from the throne. "Increasing employment" is the phrase that is used in His Excellency's address. The Department of Trade and Commerce publishes an annual review of employment in Canada. The figures are given, first, upon the basis of index numbers, and, second, upon the basis of the number of persons actually employed. Whether there has been an increase in employment will be best seen when we make a comparison between employment as it was when the present administration took over office, and as it has been since they came into office. In giving the figures from the government's own records, I shall leave out the year 1930 because that was a year in which the members of one party held office part of the time, and hon. members opposite held office the other part of the time. The index figure for 1926 is fixed at 100, and the index figures for other years are as follows:

1929	119.0
1931	102.5

The index figure for the calendar year of 1933 was lower than it has been at any time since 1920. Yet this is described as being evidence of increasing employment.

Let me come now to the numbers of persons employed. The Bureau of Statistics issued a bulletin on employment dated September 1, 1930, and another dated December 1, 1933. In making my next comparison I have taken September, 1930, as it was the earliest date upon which information was compiled since the present government came into office. At that date the government received returns from 7,334 firms, and those returns indicated a combined working force of 1,023,033. What are the latest figures for December 1, 1933, the last month under the present administration for which figures are available? We find that the number of firms from which the government has been collecting information has increased to 8,428. In collecting their statistics they are now gathering information from more firms than they did in 1930. In 1930 they were collecting information from 7,334 firms, while now they receive returns from 8,428. But what is the combined working force as reported by this larger number of firms? It is 850,486 as against 1,023,033 in 1930. In other words, there are 172,547 less persons employed by a larger number of reporting firms. Yet His Excellency is told to tell this house and the country that there are evidences of increasing employment in Canada. These are the government's own figures.

Hon. gentlemen know that during periods of distress it is the larger firms that are able to carry on the longest. The smaller concerns go to the wall first. Unquestionably there are a number of the smaller firms which have not reported and, if information could be received from them, the showing would be much worse than appears here.

The government has been compiling statistics upon employment and this information has been given out to the public. I have in my hand a bulletin issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce, Dominion Bureau of Statistics, general statistics branch, giving the employment situation in December, 1933. Before quoting from this record, may I assert that to go by the figures as set forth here as they have been quoted in the press makes the whole question of the present position of employment entirely illusory. It makes the prosperity of the country, not a prosperity as borne out by facts, but a prosperity that is borne out by a manipulation of statistics. Statistics which makes possible such action are not worthy of any department of government, and I think every department should be very careful to avoid possibilities of the kind.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the right hon. gentleman indicate from what he is reading?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have indicated it already, and I am sorry my hon. friend was not listening. This is a publication of the Department of Trade and Commerce, issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, general statistics branch, giving the employment situation for December, 1933.

Mr. STEVENS: Which statistics are the official product of the bureau of statistics and not revised by the government or any officer of the government other than by the bureau itself.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: Absolutely. The right hon. gentleman is arguing otherwise.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. minister is responsible for the bureau and he must accept that responsibility. I am now directing his attention to circumstances into which I think he ought to look very carefully and see that the right thing is done and that there is no further possibility of the manipulation of figures as is the case in the form in which they are given here.

Mr. STEVENS: The right hon. gentleman has indicated that the department over which I preside has manipulated figures. I am merely stating to him that these are the figures of the bureau.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am going to show my hon. friend the ends which these figures have been made to serve and the manner in which the bureau has functioned. I have said already that in this statement the bureau does not distinguish, in a manner which serves to make the matter clear, between employment arising out of moneys paid out of the public treasury for relief, and employment as provided by private firms. I say that, unless that distinction is made absolutely clear, the whole statistical table is illusory. There is an indication that there has been an increase as of December 1 over November 1. I read from page 1 of the bulletin as follows:

Reflecting this gain, the index (1926 average =100), arose from 91.3 on the former date to 91.8 on December 1. This is the highest figure in two years.

A paragraph or two below this contains the following:

The improvement on the date under review occurred largely in logging and retail trade and on highway construction, where the personnel of unemployment relief camps increased with the advent of cold weather. The gains in logging and trade are seasonal.

This statement goes out to the press as disclosing an increase in employment in the month of December over the month of November, and the contention is that employment was higher in the month of December than it had been at any time during the past two years. Those are the headlines that appeared in the press, but, embedded in this first paragraph, are words which disclose that these figures are arrived at by taking into account the persons employed on highway construction, the pick and shovel work which is given to a large number of men who are paid from the public treasury. This money is obtained through taxation.

Let me go a step further. On page 4 is given the detailed operations, and there appears the following:

Seasonal declines on a large scale were registered in railway construction, and building was also seasonally slacker, but there were considerable gains in the highway division, largely representing unemployment relief works; the result was practically no change in the group as a whole.

Then we find this remarkable statement:

The number of persons employed in projects for the relief of unemployment this year is greater than in 1932.

But these all important statements are all lost sight of in the general headings and figures of employment as a whole. In other words, this report which is being quoted throughout the country as evidence that there is more in the way of employment, when analyzed will be found to have embedded in it the statement that the number of persons employed upon projects for the relief of unemployment has been greater in 1933 than it was in 1932. Why is that number greater? Because there is more employment? No, it is greater because there is less employment and because more persons have been thrown out of private industry and have had to be taken over by the state.

Let me go a step further and quote the index numbers as given in the record. Construction figures afford a very good index of industrial prosperity, and the figure for December 1 is 94·6. But on page 8, the following page, one gets figures of comparison as between December 1, 1932, and December 1, 1933, on construction and maintenance, and what does one discover? Construction and maintenance are made up of three groups—building, highways and railways. When you analyze building and railways—which should indicate any appreciable increase in the use of commodities that mean business to the railways and the distributing houses, as well as employment for labour in factories and elsewhere—these figures actually show that the situation was worse in 1933 than in the previous year, and that in reality two-thirds of the gain came from an increase in work on highways, for which practically all the money came out of the public treasury.

I say that the lumping together of relief projects with the other figures, the whole being reduced to one index figure, is productive of a distinct illusion as to the actual employment situation in Canada. Next spring, judging by what we are told in the speech, the government contemplates starting a great construction program. For what purpose? For the purpose of giving work to the unemployed, thus helping along the work of relief. If this method of compiling statistics is to be continued, if we are to be told that all those who will be engaged in work provided by money coming out of the public treasury, will be indicative of employment in Canada, of a character which is to suggest permanent prosperity, then I submit that the whole country will be completely deceived. And, if in addition to that we are to have an inflated currency, as one would gather from some of the speeches which the Prime Minister has recently made, why, this country, under these two methods of furnishing employment will assume the appearance of a boom, whereas, as a matter of fact, the whole business will simply represent a condition in which unemployment has been so great—unemployment arising from the fact that men cannot find work in private industry—that the government of the day has found it necessary, to a greater extent than ever, to come to the relief of those who are out of work.

I say that where statistics are put forth in that form it is impossible for this House of Commons to deal intelligently with the situation with which the country is faced. But there is something worse than that. This same report sets forth what purports to be comparative figures of employment in the United States. Now, one would assume that in comparative figures exactly the same method would be followed in compiling the information in one country as in the other. But, when you study the unemployment figures in the United States, you find that this bulletin has not taken account of those who in the United States have been employed under such schemes as the reforestation program which the administration has put into force, nor in unemployment relief work, but has been confined to employment in factories and industry. Those are the figures that we should have in regard to this country; only such figures can have any meaning at all in a comparison between the two countries.

I take exception to this sort of statistical prosperity behind which the government is seeking to shelter itself, but which is wholly illusory and will only make for more in the way of trouble and distress as the years go by. To show the effect of statistics put out in this form, I might quote from two statements which I have in my hand. I take them because they were the first that happened to come to my attention. I have a copy of what appeared in the Montreal Star, and also a copy of a statement that appeared in the Ottawa Citizen,—reports with reference to a recent bulletin. The Montreal Star of January 17, 1934, has the following heading:

Employment gain proof of upswing; 146,900 returned to work between April-November last year.

It goes on to cite figures as evidence of an upward trend. But what is the truth? It is the direct opposite of what appears in these headlines. The employment gain here indicated is not, as a matter of fact, proof of any upswing; rather, it is proof of the very opposite, when you study the figures carefully. It is proof of there being more unemployed in private industry and a larger number receiving unemployment relief through government funds—the very opposite of the impression conveyed by the press to the public. We are told that 146,900 men have returned to work. Anyone reading that statement would conclude that these men had gone back to some gainful employment in private firms which were extending employment. The fact is that these men have not returned to such work at all; they have simply been given unemployment relief until they can get genuine work. And the government now uses the material as indicating an increase in permanent prosperity.

The Ottawa Citizen carried this headline:

Added 146,900 names to wage earners in 1933. Distinct upward trend from April 1 shown in figures given in Dominion Bureau's review.

But these are not wage earners in the sense in which that term is understood either by workmen in the country or by employers; they are in large part relief workers, so that to that extent the figures are wholly illusory, as I have said. Rather than a distinct upward trend in employment in the true sense of the word, there is, as I have indicated, a trend the very opposite.

Now these are government official records of employment, but when one seeks to obtain from the Department of Labour or from any other department figures with reference to the number of unemployed, one is unable to get them. These particular figures are available and are sent out in this form, but the figures which are really required to give the true situation have either not been collected or, if they have been collected, they have not been given to the public or to this House of Commons.

When the present government came into office, according to a statement of the Prime Minister in September, 1930, there were 117,000 unemployed in Canada. That was the highest figure at which the Prime Minister felt he could dare to put the number of unemployed. I imagine it was considerably below that at that particular time, but 117,000 was the figure we were given to show the terrible situation he had taken over as a legacy from the previous administration. What was the official estimate of the census bureau as of June 1, 1931? No longer 117,000 but 392,809. Since that time other estimates have been given. An estimate at the present time which I think is well within the mark would place the unemployed at 500,000. The Minister of Labour last session gave figures as to the total number of persons receiving relief, and the number of families on relief. These figures indicated that in January, 1933, the total number of men, women and children receiving relief was 1,357,562—heads of families receiving relief, 252,000. The Prime Minister has recently been speaking in Winnipeg. He said there that at the end of April, 1933, the numbers receiving relief amounted to 1,522,000, but at the end of September, 1933, the number would be 1,000,000 or less. He gave additional figures out on the Pacific coast; they were to the effect that the present government had spent, since taking office, as much as $131,462,000 on relief during the depression.

Mr. BENNETT: Including new loans to provinces.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: New loans to provinces, yes. I venture to make the statement that these figures and others that I might give from indices of employment and the like, may be used as a basis for calculation and they will show that at the present time there are at least 500,000 unemployed. In a nutshell, the situation is just about this—and I use these figures in relation to what we are told as reasons for congratulation on "increasing employment"—there are at the present time 500,000 or half a million unemployed; there are 1,000,000 or more on relief, and, prior to the time the Prime Minister spoke in the west, the government had spent $131,462,000, all of which represents additional taxation, on relief of unemployment in this country. In the light of these figures, how can anyone accept a statement such as appears in the speech from the throne, that there is reason for congratulation on "increasing employment" and particularly on our country being among the number where there is evidence of a return to permanent prosperity? Were the public to accept that statement, it would have very little conception of what those figures really meant.

Let us consider the amount that has been spent on unemployment relief in the time that the present government has been in office. It is equivalent to the total amount it took to meet the expenses of the government of Canada for an entire year in the last year of the Liberal administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. It is greater than the gross debt of the Dominion government for the fiscal year 1872-73. It would be strange if, with all that amount of public money being spent for relief purposes and the like, there were not evidences of some increase in employment, but to call employment brought about in that way evidence of prosperity, or "increasing employment" in the sense in which that word is understood by the public generally, is entirely wrong and false, and it should not be countenanced.

I believe, if we were to get figures from different municipalities, we would find that far from conditions having improved at all in the last year, the facts would be entirely to the contrary. Let me give the figures just for this city of Ottawa, which are the ones most easily verified. I obtained them from the office of the organization that deals with these matters. What are the figures? They are as follows:

Date—	Families on relief
November, 1932	3,525
November, 1933	4,714
December, 1932	4,316
December, 1933	4,949

This shows that even at the present time, in Ottawa, which is more favourably situated than other cities, instead of the numbers on relief lessening, they are materially increasing.

The comparative amounts spent by Ottawa on relief are as follows:

Date—	Amount
November, 1933	156,000

These are figures from the social service department of the city of Ottawa, and I venture to say that figures showing similar or larger increases will be obtainable from almost any city in this country. So much for the statement in regard to "increasing employment."

The speech from the throne refers to "improving revenues." How have the revenues improved? Let me give the revenues as they were three years before the present administration took office, and the revenues as they have been since. I am discussing the statements in regard to the evidences of approaching permanent prosperity.

The figures are as follows:

Fiscal Year Ending March 31

	Total revenue
1928	$430,000,000
1929	460,000,000
1930	446,000,000
1932	337,000,000
1933	311,000,000
Nine months ending Dec. 31, 31, 1933	245,000,000

This last figure should be set off against an amount of $351,000,000 for the nine months ending December 31, 1929. When revenues are cited to show improving conditions in relation to permanent prosperity, it is the total amounts rather than the small percentages to which it is desirable to look. But even here the revenues afford no grounds for what is said in the speech.

But yet another statement is made. We are told not only that there is "increasing employment" and "increasing revenue," but that there is "expanding trade." What are the figures in regard to expanding trade? Let me take the three years before the present administration came in and the three years since. These are calendar years:

Calendar Year

	Total trade
1927	$2,306,000,000
1928	2,572,000,000
1929	2,481,000,000
1931	1,233,000,000
1932	946,000,000
1933	933,000,000

Or a continuous drop, showing that the trade of the country in 1931 was less than half of what it had been the year before the present government came into office, and in 1933 about one-third.

I heard the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) say that he thought comparisons ought to be made between conditions as they were under the old and under the present administration. Let me give him one. In the last fiscal year in which Conservative policies were in effect before the Liberal administration came into office, that is to say, the fiscal year 1921-22, the total imports for home consumption and the total exports of merchandise amounted to $1,501,700,000, while in the last fiscal year in which Liberal policies were in effect, that is to say, 1929-30, the total was $2,393,000,000. For the last fiscal year in which Conservative policies have been in effect and for which we have record, that is to say, 1932-33, the total amount of imports and exports was $887,000,000. These comparisons taken from the Canada Year Book indicate pretty clearly how the policies of the different administrations have affected the trade of this country.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Has the leader of the opposition figures relative to the physical volume of trade?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry I do not happen to have them with me. I have no doubt they are obtainable.

I come now to the next paragraph in the speech from the throne referring to trade. This is the one in regard to the Ottawa trade agreements I noticed that both the mover and seconder of the motion spent most of their time in endeavouring to have it appear that trade had materially increased as a result of the Ottawa trade agreements. This is the paragraph of the speech from the throne referring to these agreements and their alleged results:

> The Ottawa trade agreements have now been in operation for a full year and the results indicate substantial expansion of Canadian-Empire trade over the preceding year. It is worthy of note that the agreements are proving beneficial to all empire countries. The trading position of the empire in the world has steadily improved. Canada has again resumed her place as the fifth exporting nation. Our favourable trade balances have enabled us to discharge our international obligations and have greatly lessened the difficulties of the international exchange situation.

In that statement there are two sentences with which I wish to take direct issue:

> It is worthy of note that the agreements are proving beneficial to all empire countries.

I do not think that is true. I think the opposite is true.

> The trading position of the empire in the world has steadily improved.

I think the trading position of the empire in the world, instead of improving, has, in consequence of these agreements been tending in the opposite direction. The mere assertion of these things in the speech from the throne does not help to convince anyone of the truth of what is there put forth. Let me take, however, the concrete part that relates to our own country:

> The Ottawa trade agreements have now been in operation for a full year and the results indicate substantial expansion of Canadian-Empire trade over the preceding year.

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I seem to have mislaid my notes. I cannot quote the figures I thought I had at hand.

Mr. MANION: It doesn't matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: For the moment I have mislaid the figures I wished to give with regard to the expansion of trade, but I have here the figures which relate to the statement that Canada has again resumed her place as the fifth exporting nation. May I point out that what is really of importance is not merely a relative place, as far as the business of the country is concerned, but the absolute amount that is represented in its trade. At the time Canada held fifth place under a previous administration, her domestic exports totalled $1,182,400,000. Coming to the fifth place which she has regained and which is referred to in the speech from the throne, instead of her total domestic exports amounting to $1,182,400,000, they amount to only $493,800,000.

That is a bad enough showing so far as exports alone are concerned, but let me indicate something far more significant; which is the total trade. The speech from the throne says nothing about Canada's position with respect to her total trade; it does not say that she has regained her position with regard to total trade. It is total trade that means prosperity, that means employment, that means business for the railways and factories, for distribution houses, wholesalers and retailers, and those who serve them. Instead of being in fifth place with regard to total trade Canada since the present government assumed office has dropped to seventh place. Here are the figures. For the calendar year 1929, the last full year during which the late Liberal administration was in office, Canada's total trade amounted to $2,455,500,000. Today, instead of that, our total trade amounts to $938,400,000. Those are the figures that are really significant. They show that Canada has dropped in rank from fifth to seventh place in total trade, and that instead of $2,455,500,000 our total trade amounts to only $938,400,000.

The government draws attention to the increase in empire trade. I have found the figures for which I was looking a moment ago. Let us take the figures of empire trade for the fiscal year 1929-30 and compare them with those of the fiscal year 1932-33. There is a decrease shown amounting to $157,500,000. For the fiscal year 1932-33 Canadian exports to empire countries exceeded those for the fiscal year 1931-32 by $3,000,000, but the exports to foreign countries—and that is what has to be taken into account when you are looking into trade matters, not only the exports to other parts of the empire but the exports to foreign countries as well—declined during the same period by $105,700,000. So we have over a given year an increase in our exports to empire countries of $3,000,000 and a decrease in our exports to foreign countries of $105,700,000. Since the present administration came into office the reduction in exports to foreign countries is practically equivalent to the total volume of our exports during the fiscal year 1932-33.

I come now to the figures in regard to the direction of Canada's export trade as between empire and foreign countries. The government is fond of indicating an improvement in the direction of trade, as though to say, if we increase our trade a little towards empire countries, it does not matter how much our trade falls off with the world in general. Here are the figures. For the fiscal year ending 1932, Canadian exports to empire countries comprised 38 per cent of our total exports, while Canadian exports to foreign countries made up 62 per cent of the total. In 1933 Canadian exports to empire countries totalled 46·9 per cent, while exports to foreign countries amounted to only 53·1 per cent. But it is the total trade, not the direction of trade, that matters. Suppose you destroy our entire foreign trade; then you can make your showing, so far as empire trade is concerned, even more spectacular, and that is exactly what hon. gentlemen opposite have been doing. In order to attempt to make some showing under the United Kingdom-Canada agreement they have been prepared to sacrifice foreign trade. Let us take the figures and analyze them. I venture to say that the very opposite to what is claimed in the speech from the throne is the case. In the nine months ending December 31, 1932, Canadian exports to empire countries totalled $176,800,000. In the nine months ending December 31, 1933, they totalled $209,700,000, an increase of almost $33,000,000. Those are the figures on which the government bases its statement that trade is improving between Canada and empire countries. But, if you consider the value of the Canadian dollar in terms of gold in the one year and contrast it with the value of the Canadian dollar in terms of gold in the following year, you will find that, instead of an expansion of trade, there has been a contraction of trade.

The only way in which a fair estimate can be made at all, is to have the same measuring stick for both periods. In November, 1932, the Canadian dollar in terms of gold approximated 87 cents. In November, 1933, the Canadian dollar in terms of gold approximated 63 cents. This is not a weighted average, but it does give some indication of value. If these values of the dollar were taken as approximately correct, in terms of uniform measurement the figures would be as follows: For the nine months ending December 31, 1932, Canadian exports to empire countries totalled $153,800,000; for the nine months ending December 31, 1933, Canadian exports to empire countries totalled $132,100,000, or a decrease of almost $22,000,000. So the so-called substantial expansion of Canadian-Empire trade over the preceding year proves, upon analysis, to be a substantial contraction.

Those are the figures, Mr. Speaker, that I think ought to be read in connection with the statements that appear with regard to empire trade.

There is one other statement, however, to which hon. gentlemen opposite have been referring; that is with reference to the favourable balance of trade. A favourable balance of trade may mean one thing or another, according to conditions. At one time the Prime Minister himself said that he did not think it was a fair index, but I notice that with the small favourable balance in the greatly contracted trade that has occurred in the last year or two, hon. gentlemen opposite are quoting the favourable balance as evidence of the prosperity we are said to be gradually approaching if indeed it has not already been reached. When considering trade figures and ascertaining favourable balances, to get a correct impression of how they bear on a country's condition we must take into account the amount of the total trade as well as the amount of the favourable balance. In eight of the eight and a half years during which the Liberal administration held office, there were favourable balances, but those balances were not small, and what is more important they were not shown on the small amount of trade of the present day. Here are some figures in this connection:

Fiscal year	Favourable balance	Total trade
1922..	6,000,000	1,502,000,000
1923..	143,000,000	1,748,000,000
1924..	165,000,000	1,952,000,000
1925..	284,000,000	1,878,000,000
1926..	401,000,000	2,256,000,000
1927..	237,000,000	2,298,000,000
1928..	142,000,000	2,360,000,000
1929..	123,000,000	2,655,000,000
1932..	9,000,000	1,166,000,000
1933..	74,000,000	887,000,000

Coming to the favourable balances in the period in which hon. gentlemen opposite have held office, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1932, there was a favourable balance, not of $123,000,000 but of $9,000,000, out of a total trade, not of $2,655,000,000, but of $1,166,000,000. Then, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1933, there was a favourable balance of $74,000,000 and a total trade which had shrunk to $887,000,000. The less hon. gentlemen opposite quote figures of favourable balances, in an endeavour to indicate improved conditions, the better it will be for their position. In all these matters we must consider absolute and not relative amounts, if we are to indicate the true position.

I come now to the part of the speech from the throne which refers to trade agreements. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and I ask the house, what criticism would have been made by hon. members opposite had a Liberal administration been in office and offered such a statement in regard to trade agreements, particularly had it previously boasted it would blast a way into the markets of the world and would see that there were favourable trade agreements with all countries. In the speech this is the paragraph we find:

> The temporary trade arrangements made with Germany and Austria have been further extended. Canadian products are now receiving most favoured tariff treatment in those countries in exchange for the grant of our intermediate tariff on their products.

In the speech from the throne there is not another reference to trade agreements. There is no statement with regard to any permanent agreement, merely this paragraph concerning an extension of a temporary trade arrangement with Germany and Austria. That is all the present administration has to offer this country as a result of the last year in the negotiation of trade agreements. Why is there nothing in the speech from the throne with respect to a trade agreement with the United States? Why is there no mention of a reciprocal agreement between Canada and the United States? Last session we heard much from the Prime Minister and hon. members opposite about the United States being a natural market for Canadian products. The Prime Minister paid a visit to Washington and while there held a lengthy and pleasant interview with the president of the United States. The press of Canada was inspired with the belief that at last we were on the verge of a reciprocal trade agreement with the United States in respect to at least some articles of commerce. But nothing has been done. So far as any agreement with the great country to the south of us is concerned, that country which one of the speakers to-day described as affording our natural market, no further headway has been made. What has been happening so far as the United States itself is concerned? What has been happening in Great Britain and in other countries? We read in the press that Great Britain has made an agreement with the Argentine and with other countries. Why has not Canada made similar agreements? The president of the United States has said over and over again that he is prepared to enter into trade agreements with other countries, if they are prepared to consider the matter with him. Within the last year in Canada several prominent persons from the United States have mentioned that the administration in Washington is ready to make agreements with this country. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite have done nothing; they have not moved in the matter. The result is that this great market, which would mean so much to western agriculture and that of other parts of Canada as well, and which would greatly improve many branches of Canadian industry, is left exactly where it has been since this government came into office. We had reason to expect something more from the ministry than appears to have been done during the past year.

What else has the government to offer agriculture in addition to the extension of the temporary arrangements with Germany and Austria? Certainly it has offered nothing further in the way of trade agreements. The speech from the throne, however, contains the following:

> The prices of agricultural products, which have fallen in recent years to the lowest level in history, have shown substantial improvement in the last few months.

That must be gratifying news to the agriculturists. While it may serve to disclose the result of the government policies, it certainly does not indicate any action on the part of the government which has helped to improve the situation. Then, further:

> My government realize, however, that further increases in price levels are necessary to insure success to those engaged in agriculture. You will be invited to consider legislation designed to facilitate the efficient and profitable marketing of live stock and agricultural products.

We have reached the fifth session of this parliament and the fourth year in which the present administration have held office, and up to the present apparently all the government has been able to do for agriculture is contained in the following:

You will be invited to consider legislation designed to facilitate the efficient and profitable marketing of live stock and agricultural products.

Why, if it is to be of any value at all, was not legislation of that kind introduced two or three years ago? Why have we had to wait until what may possibly be the last session of this parliament before being told we shall be invited to consider such legislation? I say the government has not done for agriculture a thing worthy of mention. Of course I shall wait until the legislation here mentioned is introduced before commenting upon its value.

During last summer, in the course of a visit to western Canada, I spent considerable time gathering first hand information with respect to agricultural conditions in the rural sections and smaller urban centres, not in the cities. I saw at first hand the conditions prevailing with respect to agriculture throughout the west, and, as a result of that visit, came to appreciate more than would have been possible in any other way the very serious plight in which the people of that part of our dominion find themselves. I doubt if it is possible to exaggerate the extremely difficult conditions under which people in certain of the agricultural areas in western Canada are labouring. One point which was definitely impressed upon my mind in the course of my journey was that, instead of lifting the burden of agriculture, this government has placed an additional burden on the backs of the agriculturists. By the increase of tariffs it has added to their burden to a shocking degree. The cost of living to this great portion of our population, which is bearing the burden of hard times to a degree greater than that borne by any other class, has been greatly increased. The cost of their clothing, boots and shoes, housing material, farm implements and the like, in fact the cost of everything which enters into production, has been increased.

An hon. MEMBER: And sugar.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, sugar, and many another necessity of life, costs very much more, and this at a time when the farmers through low prices and crop failures are having the most bitter struggle in all their experience. A sound policy for agriculture in Canada should be directed to cheapening the processes of production to the greatest possible degree to enable the Canadian farmers to compete successfully in the markets in which they must sell their products. On the other hand, nothing has been accomplished by way of securing better and wider markets. As a matter of fact, it has been made more difficult to get into the markets of the world because of retaliatory measures taken by other nations against the high tariffs of this country. The policies of the present administration have been a real factor in destroying our markets. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the seriousness of the plight of western agriculture cannot be exaggerated, and the government, if it wishes to help agriculture at all, will very speedily have to change the tariffs that are in force in this country at the present time.

In one of the reports which the Prime Minister laid on the table, there is reference to a discussion with delegates from other parts of the empire, and the statement is made that trade has improved within the empire through the lowering of the tariff which was agreed upon at the Ottawa conference. Well, if it be true that for what little improvement there may be in empire trade, according to the statement of those who claim that there is improved trade, we are indebted to a lowering of the tariff, why could we not improve the trade of Canada as a whole by lowering the tariff all round? Why can we not thus relieve the burden upon agriculture, a burden being borne by those who have been suffering most of all from present conditions?

Another thing, Mr. Speaker, that I observed throughout the west was this: no matter whether or not a man was solvent, if he happened to be a farmer it was almost impossible for him to obtain money anywhere at a reasonable rate of interest; in fact in some cases it was impossible to obtain money at all. Certainly a demand that one felt was paramount throughout western Canada was more reasonable rates of interest, and something in the nature of agricultural short term and intermediate credits. I should have thought that the government would have been fully apprised of that situation long ago, but all we have in the speech from the throne with reference to the relief that is to be given in that direction is that the government has been discussing with the governments of the different provinces this question of agricultural credits, and that something will be done as a result of their conference. Let me read the statement in the speech from the throne:

> My government have been giving careful consideration to measures that might be adopted for the establishment of agricultural short term and intermediate credits; and have invited representatives of the provinces to study the means by which practical effect may be given to the recommendations in this respect made by the Royal Commission on Monetary and Banking Problems.

What is the recommendation that was made by the Macmillan commission? The recommendation of the commission was simply that the government should seek to take up with the provinces the question of rural credits. That does not help us very much. Let me read the exact recommendation of the commission:

> We unanimously recommend that an inquiry be instituted by the Dominion government, preferably with the cooperation of the provincial governments, to investigate the existing organizations for the provision of rural credit with a view to the preparation of a scheme for the consideration of parliament.

All of that, so far as it relates to anything in the nature of action, is a long way off. If the farmers of western Canada have to wait until this government has instituted an inquiry into the question of rural credits or until a conference with the provincial governments has matured some scheme that will be satisfactory, I doubt very much whether anything that happens in this particular parliament will effect a final enactment with respect to rural credits. Again I say that, instead of waiting until the fifth session of this parliament, to make a promise which is in the nature of a further postponement of any immediate action, the government ought to have taken at previous sessions some steps to provide short term and intermediate agricultural credits.

But that is not all. The speech has reference to one other measure by which the government proposes to help agriculture. It is spoken of as the wheat agreement. It refers to the wheat agreement in the following language:

> My government, acting with representatives of other wheat exporting countries, as well as representatives of wheat importing countries, have entered into an agreement for relieving the world market from the disastrous price-depressing influence of abnormal surplus wheat stocks. It is a matter of satisfaction that the parties to this agreement are cooperating with a degree of effectiveness which is already reflected in improved prices. The agreement will be laid before you.

What is this so-called wheat agreement, Mr. Speaker, and how is it going to help the agriculturists of this country? I think I am right when I say that first of all it is in effect, an agreement to reduce the acreage of wheat production. There is no mistake about that. In other words, the government, having destroyed trade, is now seeking to destroy production as a means of solving the problem with which the country is faced at the present time. They propose to relieve the unemployment problem by reducing the areas of employment—

Mr. POULIOT: And now they propose to sterilize wheat.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I ask, Mr. Speaker, was there ever an agreement which, in a situation such as faces western Canada at the present time, could mean less of service to the agriculturists, or if you like more in the way of irony. What is this agreement? Apparently representatives of four or five of the wheat exporting countries met with the Prime Minister of Canada at the office of the High Commissioner for Canada in London, and along with them were representatives of a considerable number of wheat importing countries. They discussed the wheat situation throughout the world and drew up an agreement to the effect that certain of the exporting countries would limit their exports of wheat. Canada, as one realizes when one begins to study the figures, has to make the largest sacrifice because we have the largest amount of exportable wheat. We have to cut down our exports very considerably. We have to do something further. For the next year or two we have to keep down our export of wheat, in the only possible way we can do it, unless the government itself is to purchase it—by reducing the total area of wheat production. What is Canada going to get in return? The wheat agreement says that the wheat importing countries have undertaken that they will encourage the consumption of wheat. They will not encourage increased production in their own countries, and once the wheat produced by these exporting countries has risen to a certain figure, which comes to about ninety-eight cents or one dollar in terms of Canadian money at the present time, and remains at that figure for several weeks the wheat importing countries will consider lowering their tariffs to admit more wheat from the wheat exporting countries. Is there any guarantee that wheat is ever going to rise to that figure? And if it does, is there any guarantee that these other countries will carry out what they have undertaken?

May I point out this in connection with the wheat agreement? Some who signed the agreement have reserved the right to have the matter settled in the first instance by their respective parliaments. They draw attention to the fact that they cannot speak for their parliaments, that legislation may be required to implement the agreement, and that, therefore, they cannot undertake to carry out a promise they have given conditionally. But suppose they could make a promise; can anyone say how they are going to control intensiveness of cultivation even if the areas are kept the same? And suppose these wheat importing countries were to reduce their tariffs, the tariff being excessively high, 180 per cent in one case, they might bring down their tariffs by a very large percentage, say 50 per cent, without its having much effect so far as Canada's wheat exports are concerned. It is for that kind of bargain we are to undertake to limit wheat acreage in Canada, and up to the present time wheat has been regarded as the very gold of our country, as its most essential product. All our efforts in past years have been towards helping to settle the prairies with those who will grow grain, because Canada grows the best wheat in the world.

I want to ask the Prime Minister a question which is being asked throughout the three western provinces. I know that this question is being asked because I happened to be there at the time the wheat agreement was being discussed. By what authority does he bind this country in the matter of any agricultural policy without allowing the House of Commons to have a single word to say in regard to it? That is the question western farmers are asking themselves, and which Canadians generally are asking themselves. What is the good of having a House of Commons if a prime minister is to be free while abroad to call together the representatives of different countries and enter into an agreement on behalf of Canada which alters our whole agricultural policy and without the House of Commons of Canada having any say in the matter one way or the other? We hear about emergency measures and the government having been given authority to deal with emergent conditions. How long is this emergency going to last? It started in 1930 and everything done in that year was along emergency lines. The government had to be given exceptional powers because there was an emergency. The same thing occurred again in 1931, again in 1932, and again in 1933. Now, in 1934, we are to have more emergency measures proposed by the government. They are proceeding as though they were an executive endowed with special authority because of an emergency equivalent to war. It is time we should realize that what there is of an emergency in Canada has arisen because of the government's own policies. We have this emergent condition because of the policies the government has been putting in force. Before new policies are decided upon, this House of Commons should have the right to discuss them to the fullest possible extent.

I want to go a step further. How is the agreement to be carried out? As I have pointed out, its terms are absurd enough in themselves. Some of the countries which have signed have not entered into any real obligation. There is one country which has refused to be bound in the matter of its exports. What country is that? It is the country from which we have been told we have the most to fear, namely, Russia. Russia is to be free to export to any other country, but Canada is not. Russia is to be free to develop her wheat lands while the people who have settled upon our western plains have to cut down their cultivation. I ask if this is the way in which Canada is to hold her place among the nations of the world? I ask is Canadian agriculture to be handicapped to the advantage of agriculture in Russia, of which we have heard so much from hon. gentlemen opposite?

Where did this idea come from? It is an imitation of legislation which has been enacted by the country to the south. The United States has had a policy of restricting production.

Mr. McINTOSH: Copying Washington.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Copying Washington—imitating them, however, in regard to the worst features, and carefully avoiding what to the agriculturists in the United States is the best feature. What is the position in the United States? In that country something like eighty per cent of the wheat grown is consumed within the country itself. It is possible to regulate conditions in the United States. Eighty per cent of our grain is exported. What has the United States done? It has placed a tax upon wheat milled in the United States and is giving the proceeds of that tax to the farmers as compensation for their losses through a reduction in their areas of production. Is anything of the kind proposed by the present administration? Are our farmers to be compensated? Is the administration going to levy a tax in some direction and give the proceeds to the farmers of western Canada or of other parts of the country whose production areas are being reduced? Are they going to compensate the farmers out of such a tax, or are they going to compensate them at all? If they do not compensate them, then they are confiscating; it is either compensation or confiscation. Confiscation of the products of a man's labour is the last word that should be suggested to those who are struggling with conditions as they are in this country to-day. I should like to know from the Prime Minister when he rises to speak —I think the farmers of this country want to know—whether he is going to compensate the farmer and, if not, how he can justify the policy he is proposing.

May I ask this further question which I consider is pertinent? What has been the justification for the great agencies of transportation and communication which we have in this country, for the moneys which have been spent upon railways, canals and other facilities for transportation and distribution, if it has not been to make possible in very large measure the export of this one particular commodity above all others? At this very moment this country is committed by the government to a St. Lawrence waterways treaty. Why are we going to be put to the expense of developing a great waterway to permit ocean liners to come from the sea to the head of the lakes when the policy of the government is to cut down the area of production of the very commodity which above all we want to export? May I draw attention to this circumstance: At the present time the members of congress in the United States are debating the merits of this agreement. They are to have the opportunity of deciding the question in the light of all the conditions set forth in the agreement. They will be able to carry on their discussions quite freely and in the knowledge of how this agreement will serve their ends at the present time. If the agreement is not acceded to, no one will suffer politically so far as that aspect of things is concerned. The administration will still retain office, meanwhile members of congress are free to debate the question and to have its merits fully disclosed. Has this House of Commons been given any opportunity to discuss this agreement? Will it be given any chance to discuss its provisions except upon the basis that the fate of the ministry is bound up with the acceptance of an agreement which it has already signed? Since the present government came into office there has been no discussion of the waterways question in this House of Commons. The government signed the agreement without presenting even a resolution to parliament along lines which might have furnished the basis of a treaty. After the agreement has been signed—we will be bound by it in the event of the United States agreeing to it—the strongest argument of all for the deep waterways will have been taken away, by the new policy on agriculture which hon. gentlemen opposite are putting into force, a policy of restriction rather than encouragement of production.

I venture to say that, so far as western Canada is concerned, there will not be much approval of this wheat agreement. May I point out the manner in which my right hon. friend proposes to have the agreement carried out? If I were to state to the house what has actually taken place and to show the means by which it is proposed a great measure of this kind is to be carried out, I think I would be laughed out of the house. I wish, therefore, to put on record exactly what has appeared thus far in the press as to what the government purposes to do with respect to the carrying out of the wheat agreement. I quote from the Ottawa Citizen of January 20, as follows:

> Immediate steps towards fulfilment of Canada's obligation to reduce wheat acreage under the world wheat agreement were agreed upon at a conference between Premier R. B. Bennett and the premiers of the three prairie provinces last night.
> The meeting was held just after the close of the dominion-provincial conference and questions of wheat acreage were thoroughly discussed.
> In the next few weeks the wheat-growing provinces will supply the dominion government with estimates of the acreage likely to be sown to wheat next spring and also an estimate of the amount of damage likely to be caused by grasshoppers.
> During the winter the governments will carry on propaganda among wheat farmers to induce them to cut down their wheat production.
> On its part the dominion government, when it gets the estimates, will draw up legislation to meet the problem and submit it to the provinces for approval.
> Owing to low prices and lack of machinery on the part of hard-pressed farmers it is expected somewhat less wheat would be sown on the prairies this year in any case. By means of a propaganda compaign it is hoped to induce the farmers to make a further curtailment voluntarily.
> The propaganda will likely stress the advantage of a higher price and the possibility of attaining it through a slight reduction in production.
> Under the world wheat agreement concluded last summer at the time of the world economic conference in London, Canada agreed to reduce acreage by 15 per cent.

What is to be done? This government proposes to get from the provincial governments estimates with respect to the extent of the acreage likely to be sown and the extent to which grasshoppers are likely to operate in the course of the next year. Well, that may be one means of furnishing employment to a large number of persons; I have no doubt that a good many investigators will be engaged. But, if it is necessary to obtain estimates with respect to grasshoppers, are not estimates equally necessary with respect to other factors which contribute to reduce the total crop that will be produced? Why are not estimates equally necessary with respect to cutworms, estimates with respect to caterpillars? Why are there not estimates with regard to all insect pests? Why not estimates with regard to the possibility of drought, which is one factor that affects total production? Why not estimates with regard to hail and frost? All these latter are determining factors and equally as important as grasshoppers.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, could anything more absurd be conceived? But my hon. friends opposite go a step further. They are going to send out an army of propagandists, and what will these propagandists do? They will preach the doctrine of the rise in price through the reduction of acreage—good Tory protectionist doctrine; increase price by limiting supply. They are to go abroad throughout the west preaching a new creed, I suppose, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) will no doubt furnish something in that connection. It will be all along the line of Tory propaganda to show the importance of restricting supply as a means of obtaining high prices; it will be to show what tariffs have done with respect to increasing the price of manufactured goods, in the hope that in some way this tariff protectionist propaganda may gain a foothold also among the farmers of the west.

It seems to me that a policy of that kind, in the light of what a bountiful Providence may provide, and what people have been accustomed to understand as the duty of a government, namely, to further the prosperity of the country, is little short of blasphemy itself—a policy of scarcity instead of a policy of abundance.

What are the words that appear in the Book of Common Prayer used in the Church of England in this country?

> O most merciful Father, Who of Thy gracious goodness has heard the devout prayers of Thy Church, and turned our dearth and scarcity into cheapness and plenty; we give Thee humble thanks for this Thy special bounty; beseeching Thee to continue Thy loving kindness unto us, that our land may yield us her fruits of increase, to Thy glory and our comfort.

That is the prayer that hitherto has been going up from homes all over the country, but it is to be changed, and the very opposite is what we are now apparently to ask of Providence. The very opposite is what the government in office would seek to bring about. I suppose that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in getting out the new creed, will have the prayer worded somewhat as follows:

> O most merciful Father, Who of Thy gracious goodness has heard the devout prayers of Thy government, and turned our cheapness and plenty into dearth and scarcity; we give Thee humble thanks for this Thy special affliction; beseeching Thee to continue Thy loving scarcity unto us, that our land may yield us ever less of her fruits of increase, to Thy glory and our discomfort.

That is the policy of the government.

Mr. BENNETT: That is as near blasphemy as this house has ever heard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister need not get excited. This, he says, is as near blasphemy as this house has ever heard. I wish the Prime Minister would try to be a little more composed—there, that is nicer. I venture to say that when the propagandists get busy with this policy they will find they are unable to make much headway in persuading western farmers it will serve their interests. But has a government any right to engage in propaganda of the kind? The Prime Minister speaks of using the tariff as an instrument of national policy. He has done so to raise the prices of manufactured goods in order to help the manufacturing interests. May I suggest that a most effective way to help agriculture in this country would be to use the tariff as an instrument of national policy, but to use it to serve the interests of agriculturists as well as those of manufacturers—use it as an instrument to reduce production costs and the cost of living by lowering the tariff in regard to some of those things which will enable the western farmer to reduce his costs of production and to obtain the necessaries of life at less cost, thus assisting him in finding a way into the markets of the world with the products which he is best capable of producing. Anything more in the nature of a defeatist policy than the policy here indicated it would be impossible to imagine—the policy expressed in the wheat agreement. Can anyone imagine a business house that found it had a large quantity of merchandise available suggesting, through its head, that what should be done would be to begin destroying what hitherto had been its main source of wealth? Should not an effort be made, no matter what it might involve by way of endeavour, to search for markets in all parts of the world and so to shape our policies that other nations, instead of trying to exclude our commodities, would be persuaded to trade with us and make exchange possible?

The next subject referred to in the speech from the throne is that which relates to banking and currency. I shall not take the time of the house to read through the paragraph which appears in the speech in this connection. The essence of it is obtained in the assertion that legislation will be introduced to create a central bank in Canada. Here we find on the part of the administration a very different attitude from that taken in previous sessions. As I recollect the subject of a central bank and banking reform has been under discussion in this house every session since the present government came into office. The attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite, and of the Prime Minister in particular, has been that a central bank could serve no useful purpose, that the purpose to be served by a central bank was already being served by the Department of Finance under the Finance Act. I believe that almost the last words the Prime Minister used in reference to this matter were to the effect that something might be said for a central bank and a great deal against it. But so far as this house has discussed the matter on previous occasions, the government's attitude has been, if anything, one of opposition to a central bank; and, where it expressed any real opinion it was to the effect that it was a very debatable question indeed. Now apparently the view of the government has changed, and there is to be a central bank.

By way of contrast with the position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite may I assert the position taken by the Liberal party? There was no equivocal note in the statement of our position; the position of the Liberal party was made quite plain session after session. Speaking in the South Huron by-election in September 1932, I stated that the time had come when a central bank should be established in Canada; that credit should be viewed as a social matter and not one purely of concern to the chartered banks; that there was need for social control of credit, and that this could be effected only through the machinery of a properly established central bank. That position was repeated in the house in the debate on the address in October of that year; it was repeated again in the house in very emphatic words in a speech that I made on February 27, 1933, setting forth the position of the Liberal party on certain immediate problems. I then stated that the Liberal party believed that credit was a public matter, not of interest to members only, but of direct concern to the average citizen; that the party stood for the immediate establishment of a properly constituted national central bank to perform the functions of rediscount, and the control of currency issue, considered in terms of public need; also that a central bank was necessary to determine the supply of currency in relation to the domestic, social and industrial requirements of the Canadian people, and also to deal with problems of international commerce and exchange. Other leaders of prominence in the party have made similar assertions of our policy at different places throughout the country, so that there has never been any doubt about our position.

But hon. gentlemen opposite, evidently seeing that once again they were behind the times, are now trying in this as in some other matters to take what was part of the policy of their opponents and to make it their own. I shall not at the moment say anything about the legislation proposed with respect to a central bank, because we shall have to wait until the legislation comes in to see exactly what is proposed. What I know hon. members will wish to be assured of is that whatever bank is established as a central bank is a one hundred per cent Canadian bank, that it is Canadian controlled; they will be anxious to ascertain by whom the shares of this bank are to be owned, by whom the directors are to be appointed, in other words what the real control is to be. All these are matters which will be no doubt fully discussed when we come to study the legislation.

What I wish to speak of at the moment is this: last session we were told that a commission was to be appointed for the purpose of deciding upon the advisability of creating a central bank.

Mr. BENNETT: Not for the purpose of deciding that. That is not what was said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have under my hand the speech made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) at the time he announced the decision of the government. In the house on March 21, 1933, the minister said:

> Speaking in this house more than a year ago, the right hon. the Prime Minister raised the question as to whether or not a central bank should be established in Canada. In recent months the question has been widely discussed, but it must be recognized that it is a highly technical matter, upon which conclusions should be reached only in the light of the fullest enquiry into all aspects of the problem. The government proposes, therefore, to appoint a royal commission to study the organization and working of our entire banking and monetary system, to consider the arguments for and against a central banking institution—

Mr. BENNETT: Not deciding.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

—and to make recommendations for revising or supplementing our existing banking and monetary legislation.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was speaking with reference to the paragraph in the speech from the throne which refers to the proposal of the government to establish a central bank. I stated that I thought the government had announced, near the close of last session, that it intended to appoint a royal commission for the purpose of considering the advisability of establishing a central bank.

Mr. BENNETT: The word the right hon. gentleman used was "decided." I took objection to that word.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That the government had decided to appoint a commission?

Mr. BENNETT: No, that the commission was to decide.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what my right hon. friend said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend is quite wrong. I am sorry if he misunderstood me, and I am sorry if I was not quite clear. There would be no sense in my saying that the government appointed a commission that was to make a particular decision. What I said was that the government decided to appoint a commission to consider the advisability of establishing a central bank. That such was the intention of the government, I think, is quite plain from the order in council which appointed the commission, a copy of which appears in the report of the Royal Commission on Banking and Currency, which was tabled in the house by the Prime Minister on Friday last. I will read just a paragraph or two from the order in council, which is dated July 31, 1933:

That it is desirable that the approaching periodic revision of the Bank Act, which will precede the enactment of a measure to continue the charters of the existing banks, to which said act applies, and which expire on July 1, 1934, shall be based on a complete and detailed examination of the provisions of said act and of the functions and operations thereunder of the banking system thereby established;

That it is also desirable that such examination should include a study of the facilities now afforded by the Finance Act and a careful consideration of the advisability of establishing in Canada a central banking institution, and, if so established, of the relation of such central banking institution to existing banks and its proper authority and function in the operation of the banking system of Canada;

I direct the attention of the house particularly to these words:

—and a careful consideration of the advisability of establishing in Canada a central banking institution—and the further words:

—if so established, of the relation of such central banking institution to existing banks and its proper authority and function in the operation of the banking system of Canada;

The order goes on to mention other subjects that might be included, and in the second paragraph it again stresses the words:

—the advisability of establishing a central banking institution—

As I have said, the order in council was passed on July 31, 1933. The commission itself reported on September 27, 1933, and in a conclusion the commission set forth its recommendations, of which there are only two. Therefore it is pretty clear what the commission considered to be its main function. I shall read the two important conclusions. They appear at page 81 of the report:

Our operative recommendations are consequently few in number.

By a majority . . . we recommend that a central bank for Canada be forthwith established.

We unanimously recommend that an inquiry be instituted by the Dominion government, preferably with the cooperation of the provincial governments, to investigate the existing organizations for the provision of rural credit with a view to the preparation of a scheme for the consideration of parliament.

These are our two recommendations with regard to the improvement of the Canadian financial structure.

I wish now to direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, and the attention of the house to what was said by the Prime Minister after his return from the economic conference and before the report of the commission was made public. The Prime Minister made a trip to western Canada and in Winnipeg on October 10 delivered an address to the Winnipeg Board of Trade, in the course of which he expressed some views in regard to the necessity of establishing a central bank in Canada. I will read the dispatch as it appeared in all the Canadian newspapers, as sent out by the Canadian Press from Winnipeg on October 11:

The Winnipeg Free Press, in its report of Premier Bennett's speech last night, quotes Mr. Bennett as follows:

"The resolution at the London economic conference regarding the establishment of a central bank was made from the standpoint of this country. I voted to make it unanimous and it was unanimous, so that undeveloped countries need not be dependent on any foreign money power. A central bank is the only means by which we can accomplish certain undertakings in the future and extend our credit in keeping with conditions. While our banks have given admirable service in the past and have emerged from this great crisis better than the banks of any other country, nevertheless the fact remains that an undeveloped country such as Canada will reap a tremendous advantage from the establishment of a central bank in London."

"In London" was the way the dispatch went out, and there was some confusion in the public mind as to just what the Prime Minister meant. He was interviewed as to whether he really meant a central bank in London and the information he gave the press, as I gathered it, was that he did not think it quite proper to say anything about a central bank until the royal commission had made its report and the report had been made public, but that as far as London was concerned that, of course, was an error, that it was a central bank in Canada to which he had reference. The point which is very apparent, however, is that, in informing the country as to the basis upon which a central bank was to be instituted in Canada, the Prime Minister made it quite clear that it was upon a resolution passed by the monetary committee of the economic conference that the action of the government was to be based. Also that, he said, he had been responsible at least for that resolution being made unanimous; that it had been drafted with special reference to Canada; and that, if we were to have a central bank, it would be on the basis of that resolution.

That was the position as stated at Winnipeg. But the Prime Minister made other speeches, one of them in London, Ontario, on December 7, when he addressed the Conservative association of western Ontario. At that time he was even more pronounced in his advocacy of a central bank. He even went the length of saying—and here perhaps he will not mind if I use the word—that the matter was "decided" in his own mind as long ago as 1931.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And the Prime Minister now says "hear, hear." The Canadian Press despatch, which gives an account of the Prime Minister's speech, is as follows:

London, Ontario, December 7.—In September, 1931, Premier R. B. Bennett decided Canada should have a central bank. The conviction arrived at when the United Kingdom went off the gold standard would bear fruit at the coming session of parliament, when legislation to establish a central bank would be introduced.

Mr. Bennett revealed this as he addressed the annual dinner of the Western Ontario Conservative Association here to-night. The dinner, attended by 1,500 people, was also addressed by Hon. George S. Henry, Premier of Ontario.

When the United Kingdom left the gold standard and the exchange and money markets of the world were thrown into confusion, Mr. Bennett said he summoned the bankers of Canada to meet him in Ottawa.

And it will be remembered that at that time, September, 1931, the Prime Minister was Minister of Finance as well. The Prime Minister continues, as quoted:

Then I learned to my surprise that there was no direct means of settling international balances between Canada and London, that the only medium was New York, and the value of the Canadian dollar would have to be determined in Wall street. I made up my mind then and there that this country was going to have a central bank because there must be some financial institution that can with authority do business for the whole of the Dominion with the other nations of the world. If Canada was to be finally independent there had to be a means of determining balances, of settling international accounts, and a central bank would provide this.

Mr. BENNETT: "Financially independent" was the expression.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The word "financially" is not here, but I have no doubt my right hon. friend used it.

There is one section of that paragraph to which I should like to refer before dealing with the main feature of the Prime Minister's remarks. I turn to what he said as to having learned for the first time that there was no direct means of settling international balances between Canada and London. He said that the only medium was New York, and that the value of the Canadian dollar would have to be determined in Wall street. Surely the Prime Minister, who for over a year had held the portfolio of Minister of Finance, must have had a knowledge of the situation wider than that which he led the young Conservatives of London, Ontario, to believe; if he had not, it is a very great surprise. At any rate, one point is clear, namely that while Minister of Finance in the year 1931 he had decided that this country was to have a central bank.

Mr. BENNETT: Should have.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If that was the decision of the Prime Minister why was he not frank with this House of Commons? After all, he is the leader of the House of Commons, and derives his position from the confidence the house reposes in him. Why was he not frank with hon. members when in 1931, 1932 and 1933, we were discussing the question of a central bank? Further than that, why was it necessary to appoint a royal commission to consider the advisability of the establishment of a central bank if, as a matter of fact, the Prime Minister had already decided there was to be one? But, more extraordinary than that, if the Prime Minister had not only decided in 1931 that there was to be a central bank, but, while at the economic conference in London, was able to bring about the passing of a resolution dealing particularly with Canada and giving reasons why a central bank should be established, why was it necessary, after the passing of such resolution, to appoint a royal commission for the purpose of finding out whether or not a central bank in Canada was advisable?

I should like to draw the attention of the house to the dates of the various statements concerning the consideration of the advisability of establishing a central bank, because these dates are of importance. It was on July 27, 1933, that the world economic conference approved the resolution embodied in the report of the monetary and financial commission. Let me read the resolution, because the reasons for the establishment of a central bank, from the point of view of the Prime Minister, do not appear to be the same as those set forth in the royal commission. I read from page 13 of the conference report:

> The conference considers it to be essential, in order to provide an international gold standard with the necessary mechanism for satisfactory working, that independent central banks, with the requisite powers and freedom to carry out an appropriate currency and credit policy, should be created in such developed countries as have not at present an adequate central banking institution.

So it would appear from what the Prime Minister has said, that the purpose of forming a central bank in Canada is that of restoring the gold standard, and that it is not so much the purpose of providing the necessary means for controlling credit, from a social point of view, which, I imagine, is the point of view from which most of the people in Canada would expect to see a central banking institution established.

That resolution was adopted on July 27. It was on July 31, some days after the passing of the resolution by the world economic conference, that the order in council establishing a royal commission in Canada to consider the advisability of establishing a central banking institution, from which I have quoted, was passed. The report of the royal commission was signed on September 27, and was not made public until November 13, though, I assume, its recommendations were made immediately known to the Prime Minister and his colleagues. Between those two dates the Prime Minister announced in Winnipeg that the London conference had passed a resolution, for which he was responsible and as a result of which we were to have a central banking institution. I confess I find great difficulty in ascertaining what the Prime Minister had in mind when he made that statement, unless it was to make perfectly sure that the royal commission would not receive the credit for the establishment of a central bank, and to make certain that no other political party or parties which had advocated such establishment would receive credit, but that the credit should go to the decision he himself had made in 1931, though not made known to others at the time Great Britain went off the gold standard, to have a central banking institution established in Canada. I repeat that if the Prime Minister, while he was Minister of Finance, had determined that such was to be the government's policy, he should have taken the house into his confidence. More than that, I suggest a very different order in council should have been passed with respect to the commission which was appointed. If the matter of the advisability of establishing a central bank was settled then, it seems to me, if a commission were appointed, it should not have had to consider the advisability of establishing a central bank but should have directed its attention to the particular functions such an institution would have to perform and kindred subjects. I submit that the parties who appeared before the commission were misled by the action of the government. The commission itself was misled. At the end of the report of the royal commission there is a list of institutions and individuals who made submissions to the commission. Most of those representations related to the advisability of establishing a central bank, and not to the particular manner in which a bank might carry on its business when established. These individuals and institutions went to a great deal of trouble and expense in their submissions; different communities retained solicitors to prepare their briefs. All these efforts would have been wholly unnecessary had it been known that the government had already decided to establish a central bank. This is only one more instance of the extent to which the present Prime Minister takes the House of Commons into his confidence, or regards himself as responsible to the house and through the House of Commons, to the people. I do not wish to dwell unduly on the matter, but I do submit his action constituted a discourtesy to the commission, to the House of Commons and to the public of Canada. It was a matter of grave discourtesy, I believe I am using a very mild term, for the government to appoint a commission, to spend the public money on the work of that commission, and money for the printing of the report, in connection with a matter which, in the mind of the Prime Minister, had been decided long ago.

I shall now refer to the one remaining subject in the speech from the throne, namely, the one which might be called the government's policy with respect to labour and unemployment, if, indeed, it can be said the government on these has any policy. The government's position has changed so often that we find it difficult to know its position; one year it has taken one stand, and another year another. We have in this speech from the throne a statement of the government's present intention of the coming year. From the beginning the government has not had what could be called a labour policy, a policy for dealing with the unemployment situation in the period of distressful conditions which have prevailed ever since this administration came into office. In the United States the president, I think everyone will say, has been courageous and emphatic with regard to the policy which he has put forward for dealing with industrial recovery. The National Industrial Recovery Act of the United States is only part of a large scheme of national recovery which has been put forward in that country. One feature of the N.I.R.A., as it is called, is that which relates to wages and hours, a rather important factor to labour—the hours of labour and the wages to be paid for labour. That policy is well known so far as it has been in practice in the United States. It is a policy which aims at effecting certain standards for labour throughout all parts of the country. Advantage is being taken of the fact that the government in dealing more or less with an emergency has been clothed with quite exceptional powers and is in a position to do things which at another time it might not be able to do, just as our government here is in a position to do them. In the United States the president has evidently proceeded on the theory that, given very wide powers to deal with an emergency, in view of the large sums of public money to be spent, that at least some effort should be made simultaneously to improve the conditions of labour in a way which will result in their permanent improvement. So in the United States an effort has been made to establish certain definite standards for labour. The abolition of child labour and the abolition of sweating—getting rid of paying wages that are too low, and of working labour excessive hours, these are means being taken to bring about a condition in industry whereby competition as between different firms will be regulated on some uniform basis in a way which it is hoped will prove to be to the advantage alike of employers and employees. There being many hundreds of thousands out of employment, the government of the United States has thought it advisable to make regulations with respect both to hours and to wages, which have had the effect of raising wages in some of the trades where labour was more poorly paid, and of shortening hours of labour where it has been necessary to spread the available employment over a larger number of persons.

After the Prime Minister and the government had done about all it was possible to do by way of destroying the export trade of this country by raising tariffs so high that in many articles trade with other countries became almost impossible—trade cannot be carried on indefinitely in a one-sided way; there has to be a willingness and possibility to exchange commodities—a change in point of view seemed to come about. After as I have said, the government had impaired so greatly our export trade, and our trade generally had fallen to the figures which I gave the house this afternoon, the Prime Minister, returned from England, where for a time he had been moving in a world atmosphere. He delivered an address at Montreal, the first address I think he made to any public body after his arrival in Canada from the world economic conference the first address in which he seemed to have discovered that export trade was an all important factor for Canada. I had the pleasure, as I think many here had, of hearing him speak over the radio. I do not know the impression that his speech made on others; I certainly was amazed, however, when I heard, as his first pronouncement on reaching Canada, that, so far as this country was concerned, this new discovery meant that at least, we were not going to have any experimenting with higher wages or shorter hours of labour. I want to be exact in my quotation, and so I will read the Canadian Press despatch as it found its way into most of the papers. I am quoting from the Ottawa Journal of September 1, 1933, and giving the Canadian Press report of the Prime Minister's board of trade address on August 31:

> Continuance of Canada's national life depends upon maintenance of her position as a great exporting nation, and therefore this country cannot experiment with shorter hours of work and higher rates of pay.

In other words, the Prime Minister seemed for the first time to have wakened up to the fact that Canada's real basis of prosperity was her export trade—something that apparently he had not in all his policies heretofore recognized. But the remarkable fact in regard to that discovery was, not that it seemed to supply him with a reason for the lowering of tariffs which would help to reduce the costs of production of our exports, and thereby help to make possible a wider exportation of the merchandise of Canada, but that it afforded him a reason why Canada was not to experiment with shorter hours of work or higher rates of pay that might increase the costs of production and so impair our export trade, and Canada's position as a consequence. The despatch goes on to say that this declaration was interpreted by his hearers as indicating how far Canada might go in following the recovery plan of the United States.

I just wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that while the government has failed in most, if not in all, of its policies to achieve even in a slight measure what it said it was going to achieve, it has failed more lamentably in what it promised to do for labour than in any other field excepting agriculture. Coming at a time when we have half a million men unemployed and over a million people on relief, the pronouncement to the effect that we were not going to experiment with anything that meant higher wages, even when people were getting no wages at all, and that we were not going to experiment with anything that meant shorter hours, even when there was great need for distribution of work among as large numbers as possible—this pronouncement came as a shock to many who heard it. It disclosed how completely the government has failed to grasp what is the essential feature of the unemployment situation in Canada at the present time, and shows how completely it is out of touch, if it ever was in touch at all, with the labour point of view on industrial problems.

What does the government propose in the way of dealing with the situation this year? We are told in the speech from the throne that, as a result of the conference which was held between the provinces and the dominion, the government is going to continue a little longer the system of giving money to the provinces to spend as direct relief. Speaking at Vancouver before the conference, the Prime Minister said he thought the time had come when the federal government would have to look after its own moneys and supervise their expenditure, that we had about come to the end of direct relief. So the position which the ministry had taken a few months or a few weeks before the conference met was evidently changed at the conference. Whether what was agreed to at the conference will be changed in a few weeks or not, no one can say until the time passes. But now the policy of the dole, as we said would be the case if it ever were started, is to be continued. Hon. gentlemen opposite, when they began to deal with the problem of unemployment, were told time and again from this side of the house that the only policy that would really be of effective service to the unemployed in this country and which would help to relieve distress in a way at all satisfactory was one which would help to provide work, and that under conditions where public expenditures would be carefully controlled and supervised both in the matter of their appropriation by parliament and in the close supervision of all expenditures of public moneys.

In its first year of office the ministry began the assistance of the provinces and municipalities in their construction of public works. It did so from what it claimed to be an understanding of the situation very similar to that which is now being put forward as the reason why the government itself should undertake an extensive program of public construction work. The reason given by the Prime Minister when he made the announcement of the government's present policy was that the government believed that very shortly conditions were going to begin to improve and that we should soon be on the way to better times, and having reached that period we could well go in for a system of public works on a large scale.

I do not know whether hon. gentlemen recall what was said in the speech from the throne delivered on March 12, 1931. If they do not, when they read what was said in that speech they will be struck by the similarity of the policy of the government based upon what the government believed conditions to be in 1931 with what it is to be to-day based upon conditions as they are believed to be in 1934. In the interval this old policy, the one to which we are returning at the present time, was for a considerable period abandoned. Quoting from the speech from the throne delivered at the opening of the second session on March 12, 1931, I read in a reference to the government's policy that it:

> . . . has resulted in the institution of a nation wide program of public undertakings, each one a unit in the scheme of national development, which have collectively provided work for the greatest number of men who have ever been employed through the direct efforts of the federal government.

Immediately following this paragraph, there appears the following:

> The policies and measures I have outlined are based upon the firm belief of my government that this country is soon to enter upon a new era of prosperity.

On March 12, 1931, we were told that the government believed that the country was soon to enter upon a new era of prosperity and therefore had established a great national scheme of public works with the different provinces as units but working together as one great whole. What faith can we put in the government's present intentions and present policies when viewed in the light of a statement of that kind and what the government has since done? The statement which has been given to this country to-day is to all intents and purposes identical to that given in March, 1931, with this one additional fact: In 1931 the government had not as yet introduced the policy of the dole. We told them at the time that if they started that policy they would not be able to give it up. We now have two policies, the policy of the dole which is to run side by side with a policy of national public works to be constructed on a vast scale.

There would appear to be something significant in the time at which the government proposes to end one policy and to begin the other. We are told that this great scheme of public works is not to go into effect until late in the spring. In other words, some time before the end of the session we are to have introduced into this house another bill or estimate which will oblige the house to vote a large sum of money for a scheme of construction of public works. Let me say that if these public works are necessary it is essential that they be started now when there are large numbers of unemployed, rather than four, five or six months from now, when, according to the government's own statement, the number of unemployed will not be so large. Why is this not being done, if the primary aim is to help to solve unemployment? When one stops to consider the matter one finds oneself inevitably driven to look for some other explanation. What does one find? In regard to unemployment relief the government says, "We will continue this for a certain length of time subject to negotiations with the provinces." They do not say how long, but it will be until they begin to put this larger scheme into effect. I do not know whether the circumstance that there is to be a general election in Ontario some time this spring, that there is probably to be an election in Saskatchewan this year, and possibly one in New Brunswick, which with Prince Edward Island are the only provinces in which there remain Conservative governments, has anything to do with the proposal of the government to continue to give direct relief to these provincial governments, at least to a time which would seem to synchronize with that at which their elections are to be held, but it would appear to be so. I make no charges but I do say that apart from some such explanation there is nothing to account for the government selecting the time it has for the ending of one policy and the beginning of the other.

What about the great expenditures to be made on public works? I suppose toward the end of this session the government will have pretty well made up its mind whether it is worth while trying to hold on any longer, and whether it will have a general election in the summer or in the fall of this year. At any rate, it would look very much as though this program of public works were being fashioned with relation to what might come in the course of the year in the way of a general election. From one end of Canada to the other large amounts of public moneys will be spent on public works at a time just prior to or during a general election. Everyone who knows what has taken place with respect to relief moneys in the provincial elections which have been held is aware of the manner in which public moneys have been used by the governments of these provinces or of the dominion in order to give employment to large numbers of men during the period of the elections. The day after the elections the work in large part has been stopped; it had served its particular purpose. That kind of thing has happened all over the dominion where there have been political contests with Conservative governments in or seeking office. I do not think it is creditable to any administration to permit that sort of thing. I do not think it is going to help in the public life of our country, and it is certainly not going to save the life of this government.

May I say this with regard to a program of the kind? If large sums of public moneys are to be spent for public works, this House of Commons should have the same control over these expenditures as it has over the ordinary expenditures of government. We should not be asked to vote to the government a lump sum of money for the purpose of carrying out public works wherever and whenever it pleases during any portion of this year or next. The government have submitted to the House of Commons the estimates for the coming year—I congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) upon having his estimates down at the time he has—and the claim is made that there have been certain reductions in the estimates. In such a claim the government is not playing wholly fair with the house or with the country, because these estimates do not include any considerable amounts for public works which amounts would otherwise be included but for this large sum which is to be voted later for the alleged purposes of industrial relief. We should know whether the moneys are being used for the purpose of relief, or for the purposes of furthering the general service of the country. If we need public buildings to serve public purposes they ought to be voted in the estimates in the way in which we are accustomed to vote the items for the various public works. If that method had been followed in the past the government and the country would have been saved a very large sum of money indeed. This question can be further discussed when we have the government's program before us.

May I draw the attention of the house to the fact that little by little the government is giving evidence of having begun to see that the measures advocated from this side of the house are the ones which they ought to have accepted at the outset. If they had been accepted three years ago a very great deal of money would have been saved the country.

I have said that the government has not had any labour policy. The Prime Minister, speaking in Toronto the other evening, said that the Liberal party had offered nothing of a constructive character.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: "Hear, hear," hon. gentlemen say. Let me remind hon. gentlemen opposite of some of the things that have been consistently and persistently advocated from this side of the house. In the first place, when the special session was called to deal with the problem of unemployment, the opposition stressed emphatically the necessity first of all of a dominion-provincial conference to consider the financial relations of the provinces and the dominion. We pointed out that in all probability, inasmuch as the depression would extend over a lengthy period, large sums of money would have to be granted and guaranteed to the provinces by the federal government and that it was desirable therefore to have at once a dominion-provincial conference to deal with the question of finances. More than that, the attention of the government was drawn to the fact that the previous Liberal administration had placed in the estimates a sum of money for precisely such a conference. The money had been voted and the conference could have been called immediately, and we directed the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the inadvisability meanwhile of continuing grants in aid to the different provinces, because they were forcing many of the provinces and many of the municipalities to make expenditures which otherwise they would not undertake. We said that these grants in aid should be discontinued until the suggested conference had met and some agreement had been arrived at between the provinces and the dominion.

Hon. gentlemen opposite paid no attention to that suggestion, but to-day they are beginning to regret it. They are seeing that there should even now be taken steps which should have been taken four years ago. What has happened in the interval as a result of the government's failure to adopt that proposal put forward by the opposition? The dominion-provincial financial conference was not held but the government proceeded instead with legislation increasing grants for example in connection with technical education. They found later they had to regard the statute as a dead letter. The law stands as evidence of what they were determined to do. On the other hand, increases of public debt stand in the Dominion, in the provinces and in the municipalities as evidences of the wrong course which the government has pursued.

Moreover, the opposition asserted that unemployment was Canada's most urgent national problem and advocated very strongly that there should be a representative national commission to have charge of the superintendance of all work relating to unemployment relief, a commission that would be able to coordinate effort from the Atlantic to the Pacific, to cooperate with the different provinces and municipalities in the administration of unemployment relief, in an endeavour to find work for the unemployed and to see to it that federal moneys were spent in the most economical manner possible. We also advocated that there should be an audit by the federal government of all expenditure of federal moneys, a step which was denounced by the Prime Minister at the time as an insult to the provinces. I notice however that he himself has since been saying that he will not give further grants to some of the provinces unless they allow his auditors to satisfy themselves on many matters of expenditure. He is beginning to take the position to-day—I hope he will carry it out—that there is necessity for auditing public funds going to the different provinces from the federal treasury—a very obvious thing.

Another course we of the official opposition advocated was that all moneys for relief purposes should be voted in parliament, subject to the control which well known parliamentary methods of procedure and practice have thrown around the appropriation and expenditure of public moneys. We contended that the moneys should be voted for specific purposes and that the government should discuss in detail on the floor of the house, with its own members and with the opposition the advisability of such expenditures as it proposed to make.

Again, we took exception to the voting of public moneys in lump sums, and above all we took exception to giving to the administration a blank cheque—something which they were determined to have and which has resulted in colossal waste of public money. More than that, we opposed giving to the executive the power of legislating by order in council with respect to matters relating to peace, order and good government, which power they took to themselves by use of the closure. Under this power they have been giving guarantees of public moneys, or special privileges of one kind or another, to banks, railway companies, insurance companies and other corporations, using the moneys intended for relief purposes, not to relieve the unemployed but to help large corporations to meet some of the obligations with which they are faced. I do not say that these corporations should not have been assisted, but I do say that they should not have been assisted out of unemployment relief moneys, and I say that parliament should have been apprised in advance of what was proposed. We contend, if there were to be assistance given, parliament should have been informed, and such assistance given as the result of a direct appropriation by the House of Commons.

In all that the government has done in dealing with the problem of unemployment relief, there has been complete indifference to the relationship that should exist between the House of Commons and its obligation with respect to the control of public moneys.

Another measure we advocated from the outset was a national system of unemployment insurance. Certain measures we proposed to deal with existing emergent conditions, but we stressed a national system of unemployment insurance as something that was necessary as a measure of a permanent character. Nearly four years have gone by—we are nearing the end of the fourth year—and notwithstanding the hundreds of millions spent nothing as yet has been done to accumulate information that would be of service to the House of Commons in dealing with this great question. Among the various statements in the speech from the throne you will find no reference to an unemployment insurance measure. I think the working men of the country were expecting at least that much as a result of the conference between the dominion and the provinces last year and again this year; they have been expecting a pronouncement that the government would begin at any rate to pave the way for an inquiry into or study of a permanent scheme of unemployment insurance. But there is not a word in the speech from the throne in this regard.

These were all concrete measures which the Liberal party put forward as part of a recovery policy. In addition, we advocated as the only real basis on which recovery could be hoped for, the introduction of policies which would serve to provide employment by reviving industry and trade, and which would make for the liberation of trade, both external and internal. In addition, we advocated very strongly the development of the basic industries as another way of furnishing employment. Along with all that, there were advocated measures for the control of credit and the democratization of industry. If these proposals are gathered together the government will find that they constitute a fairly comprehensive constructive program for the relief of unemployment and for the recovery of industry in the country. Had that program been put into effect step by step, as it might have been in the last three years, we should have had a very different condition in Canada to-day; we should not now be in the position of having over a million persons on relief and over half a million or more unemployed.

The government has failed absolutely to deal with the question of unemployment; it has failed completely in effectively improving conditions, notwithstanding that it has had a perfectly free hand, having been given all the powers asked for, powers greater than those which any government anywhere at any time has ever received from a House of Commons

Notwithstanding all this, however, we find to-day a situation which is not even comparable to that which existed a year or two ago, but which is very much worse.

The government's indifference to the House of Commons in respect to unemployment relief and other matters is only characteristic of the attitude of the present Prime Minister.

I have concluded for the moment all that I wish to say with respect to the speech from the throne, but before I resume my seat I should like to say a word or two with respect to one or two matters that are in the minds of hon. members and which are conspicuous by the absence of any reference to them in the speech from the throne. It will be realized that in what I said this afternoon there has been constant reference to the fact that the government has proceeded, in practically everything it has done, as if it were an executive wholly independent of the House of Commons, rather than an executive which derives its powers from and is responsible to the House of Commons. Indeed, the House of Commons has come to be, in the phrase used by the Prime Minister himself not so long ago, a sort of rubber stamp for what the ministry may choose to do, regardless of how its own wishes and desires may be expressed, and regardless of how much those wishes and desires may represent the wishes and desires of the people at large.

In 1919 this House of Commons approved of an address to His Majesty the King praying that His Majesty should thereafter refrain from conferring titles and titular distinctions upon Canadians or persons ordinarily resident in Canada, and in accordance with this expressed wish of the house an address was presented to His Majesty. The resolution approving that address has stood upon the records unamended, unqualified, unchanged in any particular, it has not been rescinded; it is there to-day, and I believe from the time it was passed until practically the concluding hours of last session, every government, every parliament, every hon. member of both houses of parliament believed that resolution to be binding upon the ministry of the day. But at the conclusion of last session, the Prime Minister made in the house a surprise announcement with respect to the resolution which gave, not the opinion of the law officers of the crown or of the House of Commons, but his own opinion on the matter, which was to the effect that the resolution was not valid, and had no legal effect. Since that time the Prime Minister himself has recommended to His Majesty the conferring of certain titular distinctions and titles upon certain Canadians, and he has done so in defiance of the resolution as passed by the House of Commons.

In speaking on this subject I wish in the first instance, to make clear that I am not at this time going to discuss the merits of titles in themselves. This is not the time to discuss that phase of the subject. There is on the order paper a resolution which relates to the question of titles, and when that resolution comes to be discussed will be the time to debate the merits of the question. But this is the proper time to discuss the rights of and privileges of this House of Commons in respect to resolutions which it may pass and the extent to which such resolution may be binding upon the ministry.

Let me make clear one other point. In what I am about to say in this debate, I have no intention of in any way discussing the royal prerogative, beyond considering how the prerogative with respect to honours is to be exercised in the conferring of titles on His Majesty's subjects in this country. The question of the prerogative is not at issue at all. The royal prerogative is unquestioned. The question at issue is the conditions under which and the advice upon which the royal prerogative is to be exercised in this dominion, and that is the essence of the resolution which was passed by this house. It was in reality a direction to the ministry of the day as to how the commons, as representing the people of this country, believed it should exercise its power with respect to the advice to be tendered to His Majesty in the exercise of the royal prerogative as respects the conferring of titles on Canadians.

Perhaps it will facilitate debate on the matter and help to make clear just how definite and strong the trend of opinion has been, if I say a word or two about the way in which the prerogative with respect to titles has been exercised in Canada in the last fifty or sixty years. From the time of confederation down to 1902, I think one may say, the question of how titles were to be conferred, by whom the recommendation was to be made to His Majesty, was one that was more or less undefined. That I think is the simplest way in which to state the matter. There were at all events two points of view. One which I think I may say has since been wholly discarded, but which was held by the British government, was that, with respect to titles, it was the duty of the Colonial Secretary to make the recommendation to His Majesty. The Colonial Secretary in making his recommendation might do so entirely on his own initiative, getting his information from such sources as he thought best, or he might do so more directly on the recommendation of the Governor General sometimes in consultation with, sometimes without consultation with, the Prime Minister. So far however, as the Prime Minister or the ministry of the day was concerned, until 1902 neither figured very largely in the mind of the British Government as having any real control in the granting of titles.

In 1902 the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier passed an order in council which was communicated to Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, then Secretary of State for the Colonies, and in which the government set out what it believed to be the correct practice with respect to conferring titles upon Canadians domiciled in Canada. For the purpose of accuracy I shall quote from the communication two or three paragraphs which I think are of special significance. Before doing so however, there is one other point which at the moment I should like to make clear in connection with this discussion.

In speaking of titles in this debate, I am referring only to such titles as were taken cognizance of by the resolution of 1919. That is the only resolution which is before us for consideration; it is the one instruction binding upon the ministry in addition to the orders in council that bear upon the subject. The resolution of 1919 was quite specific in certain directions. It did not touch certain classes of recognition at all; in fact certain classes of recognition were specially exempted. It made no reference whatever to titles that appertain to an office, titles in the nature of professional or vocational appellations; it left those to one side. The committee which dealt with the matter and which made to the house the recommendation upon which the resolution was based, had considered, for example, the question of the title of "right honourable" as applied to a member of the Imperial Privy Council, and the title of "honourable" as applied to members of the government. It decided that those particular titles or designations should not be included in the address to be sent to His Majesty, and they, therefore, do not enter into the present discussion at all. So far as decorations are concerned, I have not any desire to bring into this debate the question of what are commonly called decorations.

The feeling against titles in this country is I think directed against one particular style of title, namely, that which carries with it the prefix "Sir" before the Christian name of the person on whom the title is conferred, and, by courtesy, the title "Lady" before the name of the wife of the recipient of such an honour, thereby serving to set up in this country an exclusive social class. There is where the main, in the case of many the whole, objection to titles in Canada arises: it helps to create a class which, in virtue of the manner in which its members are to be addressed by their fellow citizens, are set apart in the dominion, as a separate, exclusive class of knights and ladies. The feeling in a democratic country like Canada is very strong against that sort of thing, and that feeling has found expression in this House of Commons many years in succession, and concretely in the resolution to which I have referred. It is to that class of title I am referring. There is no necessity to refer to hereditary titles; I think that matter has been definitely settled, but the survival here of the old feudal order of knighthood, given to certain chosen individuals nominated at the instance of the Prime Minister, and which cannot be ordinarily supported without a certain amount of wealth is the kind of thing of which the people of this country want as little as possible.

I should now like to read part of the text of the order in council passed by the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier on February 19, 1902. The paragraphs that are significant are as follows:

> On a report dated February 15, 1902, from the Right Honourable the Prime Minister submitting that the exercise of the royal prerogative conferring honours and titular distinctions upon His Majesty's subjects in Canada is one which has not hitherto been brought into harmony with the principles of parliamentary government, of which it is an important part.
> The Prime Minister further submits that the great development of Canada, and the high position which she has now obtained, render it advisable that upon this subject, as upon all others, the exercise of the royal prerogative shall conform to the well understood principles of ministerial responsibility.

There, as long ago as 1902, in an order in council which is still of record and in the files of the council, emphasis was laid upon bringing this whole matter into harmony with the principles of parliamentary government. Do the principles of parliamentary government permit of a ministry doing what it pleases notwithstanding the known will of the members of the House of Commons, as expressed by them, no matter what justification it may find or seek to find from other sources? Is there conformity with the well understood principles of ministerial responsibility when the ministry, at a time when parliament is not in session, does a thing which without the House of Commons altering a decision which it had previously reached by way of instructions to the ministry it would hesitate to do and could not and would not do, were parliament in session? I mention these points because they have stood from 1902 to the present time. This is 1934; we are talking about custom and tradition and the rights of the commons. This affects every hon. member who has a seat in this house; it affects his right and privilege as a member of parliament whose constituents have strong feelings on these matters, to have his rights and privileges protected against any ministry or any prime minister. The order in council goes on to say:

The Prime Minister states that in practice, since the establishment of confederation the granting of honours and titular distinctions upon the subjects of the crown in Canada has been the result of correspondence between His Excellency the Governor General and the colonial office, and of recommendations made by the former, usually yet not invariably after consultation with the Prime Minister but not in conformity with any settled principle and without constitutional responsibility.

The practice is not in harmony with the principles of our constitutional system.

There again the same note is being emphasized. Then a little further down the order goes on:

The Prime Minister submits that while His Majesty may take the initiative in respect to the bestowal of honours and titular distinctions the minister should be none the less responsible for what may be done. To the ministers of His Majesty at Westminster responsibility attaches for every reward conferred for public service within their sphere of action. In Canada a government similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom has been established, and the advisers of His Majesty in Canada are the proper advisers of His Majesty for every kind of reward bestowed upon His Majesty's subjects for services performed within the legal and constitutional sphere of Canadian jurisdiction.

I direct attention to those words because the Prime Minister himself, speaking to this House of Commons towards the close of last session, presented the view that His Majesty was free to confer honours on his own initiative, that such was a part of his prerogative. I say that while that may be a part of the prerogative of His Majesty in the old country, thought that I do not admit for a minute so long as this, and another order in council to which I shall refer a little later stand, in Canada the prerogative cannot be exercised by His Majesty on his own initiative. His Majesty's prerogative with respect to the granting of titles in Canada is restricted by this order in council, which is part of the law of the land, and which sets forth the necessity of that prerogative being exercised on the advice of his ministers. Let me read the words again, because I think probably we will find that the leader of the government may take issue with them:

The Prime Minister submits that while His Majesty may take the initiative in respect to the bestowal of honours and titular distinctions the minister should be none the less responsible for what may be done.

It can only be on the responsibility of a ministry, and of the Prime Minister in particular, that so far as Canada is concerned, the prerogative may be exercised. The concluding portion of the order is as follows:

—and respectfully ask that the royal instructions be modified to the effect that the same rules which apply for the exercise of the royal prerogative in granting honours and titular distinctions to subjects of the king in the United Kingdom be made likewise to apply to all recommendations by the Governor General for the exercise of the prerogative to the king's subjects in the colonies, and that all such recommendations by the Governor General to the sovereign in such matters be made upon the advice of his responsible ministers.

One would have thought that the order in council would have met with immediate acceptance in the old land, but that was not so. The British government of that day and particularly Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, took the position that it was not for the Canadian government to say what should be done, but that, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, with respect to imperial orders such as that of St. Michael and St. George should make recommendations to His Majesty; that with respect to distinctions which concerned science, literature and the like, the Governor General should form his opinion and communicate with the Secretary of State for the Colonies; but that, in regard to political honours, the Prime Minister or the government of the day might of course take the responsibility of making recommendations.

I need not stop to read further from the despatch from Mr. Chamberlain, as I have outlined its main features. To some extent the matter rested at that point for a number of years. Evidently, Sir Wilfrid Laurier did not wish to be involved in a controversy; I think he was fortunate in being associated with governors general who were very like himself in their desire to work in harmony in all matters, and I believe he had no difficulty on the score of agreeing with the Governor General of the day in the matter of such recommendations as were made.

The next important stage in the consideration of this subject was in 1918. In that year the question came up because His Majesty did confer certain distinctions which proved to be most unpopular, whether or not on the advice of the Canadian government, I am not in a position to say. At any rate honours were conferred which served to arouse feeling, particularly as they were of a hereditary character; and the House of Commons concerned itself with the matter.

I want to direct the attention of the house immediately to this point, that, whenever in these discussions the question has come up for consideration in parliament it has come up in the House of Commons. It is not a matter which has greatly concerned the other house of parliament, it is one which is primarily the concern of the House of Commons. This House of Commons is the body to which the ministry is responsible, and in all matters relating to the exercise of the prerogatives of the crown it is the House of Commons which asserts its rights in terms of how the prerogative is to be exercised.

In 1918 Mr. Nickle of Kingston introduced a resolution, seconded by Mr. McMaster, to the effect that all hereditary titles should be abolished. An amendment to the resolution was moved by Mr. Richardson of Lisgar to the effect that no titles should be granted. Sir Robert Borden, who was leading the Conservative party and the government of the day, stated to the house that a short time previously the government had considered the matter and had passed an order in council in connection therewith, which had been transmitted to the British government. He said that, inasmuch as his government had set forth its position with respect to titles, he felt that the House of Commons should take no further action in the matter at that session, especially in view of the fact that there was to be a conference in England that year which he, Sir Robert, would attend and upon which occasion the whole matter would be discussed with the British government. He gave the assurance to the House of Commons that, if the matter were allowed to stand over for another year, he would see to it that at least in that year no titles of any kind would be conferred. He carried out his promise to the extent of declining even to recommend decorations during that time, although there was nothing in the resolution or in the discussion which had touched that phase of the matter.

The order in council which Sir Robert brought down is a very important document. From it I should like to quote two or three paragraphs, because I believe they make very clear Sir Robert Borden's views. He indicated that he was dealing with a matter of concern not merely to the House of Commons but to the whole country, and that the purpose was to direct the ministry with respect to the exercise of the prerogative and not in any way to seek to restrict the prerogative of the crown, as such. The order in council is dated March 25, 1918, and is as follows:

> The committee of the privy council have had under consideration a report dated March 9, 1918, from the right hon. Prime Minister touching the procedure for conferring titles of honour upon subjects of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada.
> Submitting that the subject demands consideration and attention, the Prime Minister observes that the royal prerogative of conferring honours and titular distinctions for important public services is unquestioned, but that it is necessary to consider the conditions under which and the advice upon which it should be exercised within this dominion.

I ask hon. members to note those words. That is in the order in council which remains and governs the present ministry. The order is to-day part of the law of this country.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What gives it authority of law?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I regard an order in council which has not been repealed—

Mr. BENNETT: No, it has to have authority.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is merely an expression of opinion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe hon. members in this chamber will feel that a statement of authority which is set forth in an order in council by a prime minister in office is something which unless the order which contains it is repealed ought to bind all subsequent ministers.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But that has not authority of law. The right hon. gentleman said it had authority of law. I took exception to that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This whole business of titles apparently has hereafter to be dealt with in a quibbling manner. Whatever has to be done, is to be done on a technicality. I shall not use the expression "authority of law"; I shall say authority of government.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Of the government of that day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And binding the government of the day until it is rescinded. I have just been reminded that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), who has been interrupting me, was a member of the government which passed the order to which I am referring, and apparently shared its views.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is an expression of opinion by a government; I have said that.

My right hon. friend stated it had authority of law, and I asked him how it got that authority, because unless it is contained in a statute it has no such authority.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It has the authority of a government of which the minister was a member. It is a policy which he endorsed and approved. I am directing the attention of the house to the view as expressed by the leader of the then Conservative party, who was in office at the time, and I am outlining its contention as to how titular distinctions should be dealt with. Let me continue:

It is necessary to consider discussions under which and advice upon which it should be exercised within this dominion. He submits that the bestowal of honours is a matter of concern to the whole community and has a direct relation to the orderly government of the state.

There, Mr. Speaker, is a clause to which I wish to direct the attention of the house. The government of Sir Robert Borden solemnly declared, and the Prime Minister speaking for the government and for himself declared, that the bestowal of honours is a matter of concern to the whole community. I wonder if the Prime Minister of to-day will deny that such is the case. He certainly denied it when parliament was not in session; in the face of the resolution which was passed in 1919, he recommended to His Majesty the creation of certain titles. I submit that this House of Commons, representing the community, is entitled to very special consideration of any matter which a Conservative Prime Minister has said he regards as a matter of concern to the whole community. To continue reading:

Having regard to the firmly established principles of self-government in Canada the Prime Minister is of opinion that no title of honour or titular distinction should hereafter be conferred upon any subject of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada except upon the direct advice and responsibility of His Majesty's Canadian government. Such an assumption of control by the government of Canada follows the natural course of constitutional development in this country as the tendency has invariably been in the direction of complete control of every function of government.

In the light of the Prime Minister's apparent belief that such is not the case and that, so far as Canada is concerned, His Majesty is free, on his own initiative, to make recommendations or appointment, I submit that, from the point of view of constitutional practice and procedure and of methods which have governed in the past and still govern in connection with the exercise of this prerogative, it can be exercised in Canada only in the manner indicated in the passage I have read from Sir Robert Borden's order. Let me read one further statement:

The Prime Minister is not aware of any other prerogative of the crown which in its relation to Canada is not exercised on the advice of His Majesty's Canadian ministers and he is unable to agree that a different principle should be maintained in the exercise of the prerogative of conferring honours.

There is the following statement in the substantive part of the order:

No honour or titular distinction saving those granted in recognition of military services during the present war or ordinarily bestowed by the sovereign proprio motu shall be conferred upon a subject of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada except with the approval or upon the advice of the Prime Minister of Canada. The government of the United Kingdom shall exercise the same authority as heretofore in determining the character and number of titles or honours to be allocated to Canada from time to time.

I believe the last clause will be regarded as out of date now, in view of the fact that we have the statute of Westminster governing in matters of this kind. The point I wish to make clear, however, is that at the time the matter was under discussion, Sir Robert Borden and his ministry made it perfectly clear that the question of titles is one affecting the whole community and for that reason one of special concern to the House of Commons; and that the ministry could constitutionally and properly make recommendations only in the light of what it knew distinctly to be the expressed wish of the House of Commons.

That was the position in 1918. In 1919 the subject was again discussed. In the meantime Sir Robert Borden had visited England; in fact, he was in England at the time. In 1919, a new resolution was brought in, again by Mr. Nickle, this time recommending that no titles of any kind should be recommended. An amendment was proposed to that resolution to the effect that some provision should be made with respect to hereditary titles in this country which would prevent their being continued upon the death of the then holder. In the absence of Sir Robert Borden, Sir Thomas White, who was then leading the government, suggested the appointment of a special committee of the House of Commons to inquire into the whole matter and to make a recommendation to the house. A special committee was appointed which made its recommendation and it was the recommendation of that committee which was endorsed by the resolution passed in 1919. I shall read just a paragraph from that resolution:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that Your Majesty may be graciously pleased:—

(a) To refrain hereafter from conferring any title of honour or titular distinction upon any of your subjects domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada save such appellations as are of a professional or vocational character or which appertain to an office.

(b) To provide that appropriate action be taken by legislation or otherwise to ensure the extinction of an hereditary title.

The committee in its report says:

A suggestion was made that the titles of "right honourable" and "honourable" be discontinued, but the suggestion did not meet with the approval of the committee.

The committee in its report also went on to say:

Your committee, however, do not recommend the discontinuance of the practice of awarding military or naval decorations, such as the Victoria Cross, Military Medal, Military Cross, Conspicuous Service Cross, and similar decorations to persons in military or naval services of Canada for exceptional valour and devotion to duty.

That is the substance of the resolution of 1919. That resolution clearly was taken by the government of the day and by all subsequent governments to bind the ministry. As I have said, that resolution was not a resolution which could affect the prerogative of the crown as such. The prerogative remained as it was, and as it is to-day, and as it will continue; but what it did affect was the powers of the ministry in advising His Majesty how that prerogative should be exercised.

Just to show the house how completely public opinion as expressed in this House of Commons has been opposed to any restoration of titles, I might recall that in 1923, on March 19, Mr. Ladner, one of the Conservative members in the house of that day, introduced a resolution which would have permitted decorations—not titles, but simply decorations—to be given in recognition of services in literature, art or science. That resolution was negatived by a vote of 121 to 14, indicating very clearly what the House of Commons of that day felt about any attempt to reintroduce titles even by this seemingly innocent means.

In 1929 the present hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) introduced a resolution in the house which showed very clearly, so far as he was concerned, that he believed the government of the day to be bound by the 1919 resolution of the House of Commons, and he sought to have that resolution qualified or amended or rescinded. I think those words were carefully chosen, and I must say that I like very much the form in which my hon. friend introduced his motion. I think he went the right way about it. That was in 1929, ten years after the resolution of 1919 had been passed. My hon. friend the present Secretary of State, at that time sitting on this side, asked the house to appoint a committee to consider whether the resolution of 1919 should not be qualified, amended or rescinded. As Prime Minister of the day I had to take a position with regard to my hon. friend's resolution. I tried to give him as open a door as I could to get the matter considered. I believed that any committee that dealt with the matter would reach the decision that the resolution of 1919 should stand, but, nevertheless, I was glad to have a committee appointed, if the house were willing to appoint it, and I so stated. I said that I did not think the matter should be made a party issue in any sense of the word, but that members should be free to vote as they pleased, and I supported my hon. friend's motion. True enough the hon. member from North Huron (Mr. Spotton) sought to have the impression conveyed that, in even allowing a motion for a committee to investigate the matter as Prime Minister at the time, I was favourable to titles. However, Mr. Dunning, the then Minister of Railways, made quite clear that the government itself, if it had to take a stand in the matter, would oppose titles, but that some of its members were prepared to have a committee of the house consider the matter if the house itself was willing to have its own committee look into it. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) says to me not to include him, that he voted against the appointment of that committee.

Let me now read the resolution of the present Secretary of State as it was moved in this House on February 12, 1929:

That a special committee of this house consisting of eleven members be appointed forthwith, to investigate and report upon the advisability of qualifying, amending or rescinding the address to His Majesty the King, which was adopted by this house in May, 1919, dealing with the conferring by His Majesty of titles of honour or titular distinctions upon His Majesty's subjects domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada; and also to consider and report upon the appropriate action, if any, which the parliament of Canada should take with respect to the acceptance, enjoyment or use by persons domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada of titles of honour or titular distinctions or decorations conferred by any foreign government, governmental authority, potentate or power; and also to consider and report upon the advisability of instituting orders of merit, distinctions or decorations, which may be conferred by His Majesty upon persons domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada, on the advice of the government of Canada, in recognition of distinguished public services; and that such committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time to this house.

That was the resolution of my hon. friend (Mr. Cahan), a very modest and, as I have said, an excellently drawn resolution. How did the house receive that motion? It negatived the motion by 114 to 60. The house would not even permit the consideration of the question of qualifying or amending the resolution of 1919. My hon. friend the Secretary of State to-day is a member of the government which is responsible for having recommended to His Majesty the giving of titles to one or two gentlemen, notwithstanding that his belief in 1929 clearly was that the resolution of 1919 was binding upon the government of the day.

Mr. CAHAN: I fail to see any inconsistency whatever.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: More than that, the Prime Minister himself was in the house at that time, and if one reads the debates one will not find in anything the Prime Minister then said the ground he is alleging to-day for recommendation being made by the ministry to the sovereign. He himself accepted the view of the house as it was held at that time. So it is quite clear that, from the time that resolution of 1919 was passed, right down until the last session of parliament everyone believed that the resolution of 1919 was binding upon the ministry.

Now what took place last session? It is interesting to note that this matter was not brought up in the first session, or the second or the third or in the fourth session of this parliament until its very end; the government waited until almost its last chance had arrived, to take any action in the matter. What was done in the last session? As will be recalled, my right hon. friend from Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) had received a promotion in the honours list of the previous New Year. He had been a Knight Commander of the Order of St. Michael and St. George, and he was made a Knight Grand Commander. That was an innocent sort of thing, and I must say that all of us who are so fond of him were pleased to see him get the promotion. But I think it would have been much finer if he had waited to receive it until after the House of Commons had rescinded the old resolution and then to have obtained it by going in through the front door instead of by one at the back.

Shortly after the house resumed in the New Year, a question was put upon the order paper by the hon. member for Laurier-Outremont (Mr. Mercier) asking, among other things, whether this promotion meant that we were to have titles restored.

Mr. BENNETT: There was another one associated with it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my right hon. friend says, some reference was made also to other honours which had been conferred upon certain individuals, I think by His Holiness, the Pope. As far as this country is concerned we have no state church, and, so far as honours conferred by any church are concerned, they lie altogether outside the control of the House of Commons or the ministry. There is no established church and the country does not receive nuncios.

Mr. POULIOT: Might I remind my hon. leader of one thing? If these promotions came through the back door they were put at the front door by being published on the first page of the statute book of last year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The exact date the question was asked is of small importance, but my recollection is that it was some time in January or February. However, it was well on in the month of May—right at the end of the session—before the question was answered. To the surprise of everyone, the Prime Minister in making reply made the statement that he did not regard the resolution of 1919 as binding upon the ministry in any way, that it was a resolution of a House of Commons in one parliament and did not bind subsequent parliaments. That is at best questionable. I notice that May, speaking of resolutions, says that some resolutions are held to bind subsequent parliaments although passed by one only; that the matter is more or less one of custom. So far as custom is concerned, it certainly had become the custom here to hold that the resolution was binding. The Prime Minister knew that hon. members felt strongly on the subject either one way or the other, and I think he must have known that they would wish to express themselves with respect to the matter in an open and straightforward way before any action should be taken by the ministry. He made that statement, and as was my duty in following parliamentary practice, I asked the Prime Minister if in view of the lateness of the session, he would not see to it that the government did not make any recommendations to His Majesty between the close of that session and the opening of the present session. It is perfectly true that the Prime Minister replied that he would give no such assurance. That was characteristic of the sort of reply which he makes to most of the questions I put to him; I took it as such and I think most hon. members thought the same. I was not speaking for the opposition alone; I was speaking for hon. members on his side as well as hon. members on this side who wished to be given an assurance in this regard. I do not think any hon. member thought that before parliament re-assembled the Prime Minister would take action contrary to the letter and spirit of the resolution. At that time he told us that the time was too short to hope to discuss the matter at that session. If that was the case, surely there was good reason to wait until this session before taking any action. There the matter rested.

Mr. BENNETT: The Prime Minister did not object to any motion of censure or otherwise being moved by the opposition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That sounds very well.

Mr. BENNETT: No, he did not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my right hon. friend well knows, it was only ten days before the close of the session and at that time we of the opposition were doing what we could to help to shorten the session.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We were doing what we could to shorten the session in order that my right hon. friend and his colleagues might be free to go to the world economic conference. But that is the extent to which courtesies from this side of the house are appreciated by hon. gentlemen opposite. The Prime Minister knows very well that, when he waited until the very end of the session to answer that question, and when he gave the answer he did, he was taking a step which made impossible any discussion. However, I say to my right hon. friend that if he thinks that a question which affects so largely the feelings of the people can be solved by such manoeuvres, to use a mild expression, I believe he will find he is greatly mistaken. If he really had desired to put an end for all time to titles in Canada, he could have adopted no more effective means than to flout as he has the opinion of this House of Commons which expresses the opinion of the country generally.

As I say, that was the position when parliament adjourned. What was the next thing that happened? To the surprise, I think of everyone, on the Friday night before New Year's, an announcement was made that the government or the Prime Minister had decided to recommend titles. I will read the statement which was given out to the country at that time by the Prime Minister. It is an important statement and I think it should appear fully upon the records. Having been asked by the press for a statement, the following was given by the Prime Minister on the evening of December 30:

> As I intimated at the last session of parliament, the resolution passed in 1919 by the House of Commons, being one branch of parliament, is without validity in either restricting the royal prerogative or amending or repealing the existing law. It will readily be recalled that proceedings were taken many years ago against the publisher of the debates of the House of Commons in England, in which it was alleged that a well known citizen was libelled.
> The publisher sought to justify his action on the authority of a resolution passed by the House of Commons, but the courts decided that "the House of Commons is not the parliament, but only a coordinate and component part of parliament. The sovereign power can make and unmake laws; but the concurrence of the three legislative estates is necessary; the resolution of any one of them cannot alter the law or place anyone beyond its control. The proposition is therefore wholly untenable and abhorrent to the first principles of the constitution of England."
> The resolution passed by the Canadian House of Commons in 1919 was transmitted to the Sovereign with great formality, but that could not give it validity, and I believe it is now generally realized that the resolution was invalid for the purposes indicated by those who promoted and supported it.
> Since that date Canadians have accepted honours from the heads of foreign states, and the government is of the opinion that the traditional custom of submitting recommendations to His Majesty for the bestowal of honours and awards should be resumed, and the Prime Minister has acted accordingly.

Mr. BENNETT: May I direct the right hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that that part of the quotation with respect to the constitution should be in quotation marks. I was quoting the words of Lord Chief Justice Denman. I do not know whether the quotation marks appear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Which part is that?

Mr. BENNETT: The reference to the constitution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad the Prime Minister has indicated that because the whole four paragraphs are in quotations. That part is not singled out as a quotation within the quotation. There, for the first time, the Prime Minister gives any reasons to substantiate the action of his government. Four reasons are mentioned. The first is that the resolution passed in 1919 by the House of Commons, being one branch of parliament, is without validity in either restricting the royal prerogative or amending or repealing the existing law. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the House of Commons and the House of Commons alone should direct the ministry with respect to all matters appertaining to the royal prerogative. It is not for the other house to direct the ministry regarding the prerogative. That is the duty of the House of Commons. It has always been so, or at any rate, for many years, it has been regarded by the House of Commons as one of its rights and privileges, and the House of Commons in Great Britain has been unwilling to admit that a statute is necessary to control the prerogative.

Mr. BENNETT: On the contrary, it was so declared in the House of Lords within this last month.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I had not intended going into the matter, but seeing that the Prime Minister has raised the point I may as well go somewhat farther. In 1870, the government of Mr. Gladstone had endeavoured to abolish by statute the system of purchase of commissions in the army, but the bill was obstructed or defeated in the House of Lords. Mr. Gladstone thereupon advised the sovereign to cancel the royal warrant regulating the sale of commissions. Queen Victoria, recognizing that the ministry, which was responsible to the House of Commons, was the source from which the sovereign should be directed in the matter of the exercise of the royal prerogative, acted upon the advice of Mr. Gladstone and issued a royal warrant cancelling the warrant regulating the purchase of commissions in the army, and the system of purchase was effectively disposed of in this way.

There is another case that came still later, in 1890. At that time a statute had been introduced by Lord Salisbury for the cession of Heligoland to Germany in consideration of Germany's having recognized the claims of Britain to Zanzibar. When the bill was before parliament Mr. Gladstone, ably seconded by Sir William Harcourt, took the view that the government, by making the treaty a subject of legislation, had abandoned the treaty-making prerogative of the crown. He proceeded to show that the prerogative of the crown, exercised by the ministers of the day, was subject to review by the House of Commons and by the House of Commons alone, whereas a bill required the sanction of the House of Lords. Mr. Gladstone pointed out that the commons, in countenancing such procedure and sharing its jurisdiction with the House of Lords, was halving a right which was peculiarly its own, namely, controlling the exercise of the royal prerogative. That position I think is the sound one—the position that the ministry is responsible to the House of Commons, and that the Commons should direct the ministry in this particular. That, I submit, is the true position to be taken with regard to the exercise of the royal prerogative.

The Prime Minister raises a very grave issue, an issue which is entirely new and which deprives this House of Commons of rights and privileges it ought zealously to maintain, when he states that, with respect to the exercise of the prerogative, the House of Commons must share that right with another house of this parliament. The control of the exercise of the royal prerogative in Canada is the peculiar right of this House of Commons, and I am amazed that one who is the leader of the House of Commons, deriving his authority from the House of Commons, should take any view to the contrary. If the House of Commons ceased to support him he would cease to be Prime Minister, notwithstanding all that the other house might seek to do for him, notwithstanding that every member in the other house might be a follower of his own. His power is entirely dependent upon the support he receives from this House of Commons. In the matter of the exercise of the royal prerogative, one of the most vital of the rights and privileges of the House of Commons is that of directing the ministry with respect to the manner in which it is to be exercised.

Take the next point. He says:

> It will readily be recalled that proceedings were taken many years ago against the publisher of the debates of the House of Commons in England, in which it was alleged that a well known citizen was libelled.

I think I am right in saying that the case upon which the Prime Minister relies to support his position is that of Stockdale vs. Hansard—he says yes. Well, that case was decided in 1839, nearly one hundred years ago, and the Prime Minister tells us that it is in virtue of that decision given nearly a hundred years ago that he and his government to-day have taken the action they have. Now, what was that case? Stockdale was a publisher of books and magazines, and one of his books had been referred to in a parliamentary report as being obscene, and on that ground he brought an action against Hansard Brothers, who were the publishers of the government reports, for having libelled his firm in giving publicity, in the way in which it was done, to this characterization of a particular book. Hansard Brothers set up the defence that they had been ordered by the House of Commons to publish its reports, and the courts very rightly held that an order of the House of Commons was not superior to the law of the land and that it could not protect Hansard Brothers in that libel action because a resolution of the House of Commons did not run beyond its own membership, and the law of the land was supreme. That is perfectly sound; certainly the law of the land is supreme. But that case, far from supporting my right hon. friend, does the very opposite. All that it does is to say that, outside of this House of Commons, no subject can plead a resolution of the House of Commons to protect him in an illegal act. What my right hon. friend overlooks however is the fact that a resolution passed by the House of Commons is binding upon those within the house, is binding upon the ministry, which is responsible to the House of Commons. It is not with respect to what lies outside of the House of Commons, but with respect to what takes place within the house, that the resolution has its force. The case of Stockdale vs. Hansard has no bearing on the question before us.

If my right hon. friend wanted constitutional authorities he would have been better advised to cite the case of Bradlaugh vs. Gosset, in which it was made perfectly clear that the courts could not control the Commons in the matter of their resolutions, and that the Commons could take action with respect to matters of concern to itself, which no court could interfere with. And that is what this House of Commons did when it passed the resolution of 1919. It was not trying to override the courts of the land or to circumscribe the royal prerogative by resolution. What the House of Commons was seeking to do was to restrict the powers of the ministry with respect to the advice to be given the sovereign in the exercise of the prerogative of conferring honours, and I say that in this regard the grounds which the Prime Minister has given in support of his position are untenable. At any rate, he should have waited until they were debated in the House of Commons before advancing them as a reason for the action which the government took.

What is the third reason he gives? He says:

> I believe it is now generally realized that the resolution was invalid.

I take the opposite view. I think it is now recognized that the resolution was valid and that every hon. member had so believed for a period of ten or fifteen years. The governments of Sir Robert Borden, of the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen, and the late Liberal administration, and the last four parliaments as well, all believed that the resolution was valid.

The last ground is that Canadians have accepted honours from heads of foreign states which simply amounts to saying that two wrongs make a right. I agree that, if honours are not to be accepted by Canadians from the sovereign of our own country, certainly they should not be accepted from sovereigns of other countries. But the resolution of 1919 was not a controlling factor in that situation; it could not bind the ministry of the day with respect to foreign sovereigns and what they could do; the ministry had nothing to do with advising foreign sovereigns. To control a situation of the kind a statute would be necessary which would restrict the rights of Canadian subjects. But, in respect of advising our own sovereign, the ministry had full power and will continue to have it. In view of these considerations I say that the action of the Prime Minister was nothing short of an affront to the House of Commons; it was, to say the least, an act of discourtesy and I am not giving these words simply as my own. I have in my hand an editorial of the Winnipeg Tribune, which is a strong supporter of the administration.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it expresses pretty well the view that the press of Canada generally have taken when it says, referring to the Prime Minister:

> To say that he has affronted parliament is to state the fact mildly. He has treated it with disrespect.

But may I draw attention to one other fact, namely that His Excellency the Governor General had already summoned this House of Commons. The question I should like the Prime Minister to answer is this: After His Excellency the Governor General had summoned parliament to consider matters of concern to the country, and after members of parliament had been advised of that summons and were preparing to come to Ottawa, why was it necessary for my right hon. friend, in the interval between the time of issue of this summons and the assembling of parliament, to take this step in defiance of the resolution of the House of Commons? There was, furthermore, the notice of a resolution of which the Prime Minister had knowledge, and which would come up for consideration immediately the house reassembled.

Mr. BENNETT: And which is not violated. Look at the resolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not care whether it has been violated or has not; it relates to the subject of titles and thus brings up the whole question. The Prime Minister knows this. Another small technicality—

Mr. BENNETT: No technicality.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:—in dealing with a large subject. I should like to know the reason the Prime Minister found it necessary to do that. In taking the step he did, he was as discourteous to the crown's representative in this country as he was to the House of Commons. When the crown's representative summoned the commons here to discuss public business, I think the commons had a right to expect that they would be free to discuss matters which they knew were coming up for immediate consideration, and to do so without their position being handicapped or circumscribed or altered in any way, as it certainly has been by the action of the Prime Minister.

Let me go one step further. The Prime Minister on the day of the opening of parliament, before making his motion that the speech from the throne should be considered on a certain day, introduced a bill relating to oaths of office. At that time I asked the Prime Minister what the purpose of that bill was.

Mr. BENNETT: No, to explain it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Pardon?

Mr. BENNETT: I was asked to explain. Those are the words.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, the Prime Minister was asked to explain, and I continued to ask him whether the purpose of introducing that measure was not to assert the right of the Commons to deal with matters of concern to themselves before taking up matters of concern to the crown. He, as I recall, replied that I, having been prime minister, ought to know the purpose as well as he did, seeing that this had been a custom for fifty years. May I point this out to my right hon. friend: not only has it been a custom for the last fifty years; it has been a custom from the reign of Queen Elizabeth, for the Commons to assert its right to take up matters of concern to its members before dealing with matters of concern to the crown.

What is of more intimate concern to the Commons than the question of the prerogative of the crown and how the royal prerogative is to be exercised? Seeing that the governor General had summoned parliament and that the Prime Minister himself knows the tradition of the House of Commons with respect to the assertion of its right to deal with its own matters before taking up questions of concern to the crown, why did my right hon. friend take the step he did at that time? There can be only one of two explanations. One is that he must have anticipated that, if he did not take some action at that time, as soon as parliament met, the resolution of the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) would come up, the whole question would be open for discussion, and that a course would be adopted similar to that which was proposed by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), namely, that a committee should be appointed to consider the matter and bring in a resolution and that the Prime Minister believed that, if any such committee were appointed, it would bring in a resolution praying His Majesty not to grant titles to Canadian subjects. If the Prime Minister knew or believed anything of that kind would occur, he was doubly wrong in taking the course he did, because he was going diametrically opposite to what in his heart of hearts he must have known was the feeling and wish of the House of Commons.

On the other hand, he may have felt that if he could change the issue in some way, if he could bring it about that when the subject came up for discussion the position of the government would in consequence of their action be at stake, then, the question would be, not so much with respect to titles, as to whether or not hon. members opposite would retain their seats for the remainder of the present and possibly another session. In that way he may have thought the question of titles would be sidetracked and the real issue never faced. Here again if he entertained any such belief the Prime Minister was doubly wrong in the course he took. Those are two possible explanations; if there is any other, I hope the Prime Minister will give it to the House of Commons. The point that needs to be emphasized at the moment is that, in so far as the Prime Minister's action is concerned, we have to all intents and purposes been told that the question of the prerogative of the crown and the manner in which it is to be exercised is of no concern to the House of Commons. That is one of the largest issues that can be raised. In taking the stand he did, he is entirely wrong. He has against him public opinion, as well, I believe, as hon. members of the house as a whole if they were free to express their own convictions.

I shall bring my remarks to a conclusion by making a reference—

Mr. GOTT: Four hours.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says: "four hours".

Mr. GOTT: Four hours and twelve minutes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I were to attempt to catalogue the sins of omission and commission of this government, I should have to talk for forty hours. I believe it is important at this time, to place before the house some of the reasons why not only hon. members on this side, but the country generally feel that the present ministry have lost all authority to continue to govern in this dominion.

Mr. Speaker, I would have concluded at this point, but for the fact that, for reasons best known to himself, the Prime Minister thought well on the eve of the reassembling of parliament to deliver in the city of Toronto an address about as offensive in the tone of its utterance and the extent of its misrepresentation, as any public speech could possibly be. I do not intend to let that Toronto speech pass without making some reference to it, even if it takes another hour to do so.

Let me read a few extracts from what the Prime Minister said, and in this connection I should like hon. members to consider the body that he was addressing. It was the annual banquet of the Federation of Conservative Young Canada Clubs of Ontario. We have in the Prime Minister's utterances the example which the present Prime Minister of Canada is setting young Canada of the manner in which public issues in this country are to be discussed. This is the way in which politics are to be kept upon a high plane in our country, and the manner in which national righteousness is to be upheld in the dominion. Let me read the first paragraph of the report as it appears in the Ottawa Journal of January 22, from Toronto by direct wire by Canadian Press. These are the words of the Prime Minister:

"The Conservative policy since confederation had been to keep faith with the best traditions of the past and to build a better and more united Canada to pass along to posterity." the Prime Minister said. "The Liberal policy had been to seize upon every opportunity of suspicion and unrest, to tear down and destroy."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I expected some hon. gentlemen to say "hear, hear"; it is what I would expect from some of them. It was not what I would expect from many, and it did not come from many. I ask hon. gentlemen to listen to this:

Those who profess the Conservative faith are responsible for this great dominion. In time of suspicion, doubt and unrest it has been to this great party that the people have always turned.

"Those who profess the Conservative faith are responsible for this great dominion." I cannot imagine that a more ungenerous, a more unchivalrous and a more untrue statement could possibly be made by any public man in Canada than what is expressed in those words. I should like to know whether in the Conservative party has been included all those early pioneers who settled this country, first of all those from France who settled in Quebec, and later those who settled this old province of Ontario. I should like to know whether in the Conservative party of Canada has been included all those who pioneered in the great west and out on the Pacific slope. I should like to know whether in the Conservative party has been included all those who sought in one way and another to serve their country in these halls of parliament. If it has not been so, the statement of the Prime Minister is as untrue as it is unchivalrous and ungenerous. Yet these are the words which he addressed to the youth of the Conservative party; this is the example he set for them in discussing the public issues of the day. To-night I am not going even to attempt to refer to what has been done in this country by great men of both political parties, but I will say that, so far as the upbuilding of Canada is concerned, any man who is patriotic in the true sense of the word will be only too ready to share with men of all political parties the praise that is to be given to those who have taken part in this great work.

Now what is the next statement, Mr. Speaker? It has reference to preferences. Here is what the Prime Minister is reported to have said to the young men who are coming on: "For thirty-five years the country laboured to undo the wrong done by the Liberal party in regard to preferential tariffs and reciprocal trade within the empire," he declared, recalling Laurier's assertion in London that "what we give we give you freely," and without hope of return. "In 1932 this situation was rectified, and preferential, reciprocal trading agreements with all parts of the empire were negotiated."

For thirty-five years, the Prime Minister said, this parliament laboured to undo the wrong done by the parliament of Canada in regard to preferential tariffs.

Mr. BENNETT: Not this parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To undo the wrong done by the Liberal party in regard to preferential tariffs. It was parliament that enacted the preference. In making this statement apparently the Prime Minister forgets that Sir Robert Borden, as leader of the Conservative party, held office in this country for many years and that Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, as leader of a Conservative administration, also held office in Canada for some considerable time. During all that period of time when the Conservatives were in power, the British preferences introduced by Sir Wilfrid Laurier remained on the statute books to all intents and purposes unchanged. Yet the Prime Minister tells these young men, who are to be trained in accuracy and truth in discussing public matters, that for thirty-five years the country has laboured to undo the wrong done by the Liberal party in regard to empire preferential tariffs.

What is the fact with regard to preferential tariffs? When Sir Wilfrid Laurier introduced the preferences he did so because he believed that by giving a preference to Great Britain he would encourage trade both ways across the Atlantic; that, by giving a preference in our markets to some British goods, a greater demand would be created in Britain for the products of our farms, fields, forests and mines, and that a larger amount of trade would pass between this country and the old land, also that consumers in Canada generally would benefit. What was the result? The Prime Minister tells us to-day that the way to find out whether or not a country is prosperous is to look at its balance of trade. What is the result when we look at the balance of trade over that period? Taking it from the time the British preference was introduced down to the time of the United Kingdom-Canada agreement, there was a favourable balance of trade so far as Canada was concerned every year. This is the wrong that the Prime Minister says the Conservative party of Canada has been trying to undo. In those thirty-four fiscal years, the total of Canada's favourable balance of trade with the United Kingdom amounted to $5,978,000,000.

That was the result of the British preference as introduced by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and this benefit to Canada's trade is the great wrong which the Conservative party has sought to undo by means of this United Kingdom-Canada agreement.

But that, Mr. Speaker, was not the only subject on which the right hon. gentleman touched. He had a word to say about the depression, and here I think he was running pretty true to form. His utterances reminded me, as I think perhaps I will be able to show him, of some of the things he said in the last campaign. What do you imagine the present Prime Minister said to these young men, Mr. Speaker, of the attitude of his political opponents towards the existing depression. Here are his words:

> "And while those of Conservative faith have been working with high courage and unstinted effort to bring an even keel, what do we find on the Liberal side," he asked. "We find unrest capitalized, suspicion capitalized, distrust sown, efforts everywhere to tear down the faith of the people by teaching strange doctrines and the worship of stranger gods. They have indulged in a campaign of reckless, harsh, unending criticism, fundamentally directed against our basic institutions and the foundations on which they are built."

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, of any government that has ever been given quite as free a hand in carrying out its policies as has the present administration. I do not believe there has been a leader of an opposition at any time in this parliament or any other parliament who has been more generous to his opponents than I have been in the matter of criticism in these trying times. If any complaint has been made against me by my own friends, it has been that I have not spent more time in condemning the government in all parts of the country. But I have recognized the difficulties with which they have had to contend, and I have felt that the country would feel it was reasonable to allow the ministry as free a hand as possible, though in this parliament I have not hesitated to say quite frankly what I thought when I believed their policies were doing more harm than good and when I felt they were exceeding all rights, even under the pretence of their doing so in order to meet an emergency. When the Prime Minister uses language like this, I am obliged to recall to him some of his own words, in order that the young men of the country may see it is the sort of thing he is accustomed to say. He said that the Liberal party had been seeking to capitalize unrest and suspicion, to sow distrust and to tear down the faith of our people. Listen to this, Mr. Speaker:

Here is what the same gentleman said in an address to the electors of this country in the city of Winnipeg on the occasion of his opening a great political campaign the result of which was to bring him into office. The right hon. gentleman accuses the Liberal party of seeking to tear down the faith of the people. Let me read some of his statements; first in reference to the government of the day:

This group of mercenaries holding office by sham and subterfuge, look upon them as treacherous to you, self-confessed, deserving of your passionate condemnation.

Then, speaking at Regina:

Now we have unemployment, people walking our streets, men and women hungry. We have all these things in this great rich country.

Of course there is no effort in those expressions to capitalize unrest and sow distrust! Then, listen to this:

They play with the lives of men and women. What for? Do they realize there are lives that they are playing with, food for wives and children, hunger. Nine years of wasted effort before the great betrayal. It did not take Judas that long.

No capitalizing of unrest in that; no seeking to raise suspicions; no sowing of the seeds of distrust; no effort to tear down the faith of the people in their institutions or their leaders in expressions like that—no.

Referring to myself, he said:

However blind he may be to your future and deaf to your present needs surely he cannot stop his ears with smug complacence and self-esteem, to the cry that carries across the nation, the cry of the destitute and hungry, the cry of mothers and fathers and little children who call to us as Christians and as Canadians to heal their pain.

No sowing of distrust or suspicion or capitalizing of unrest in these words. But by way of recognition of the moderate attitude which his political opponents have taken toward him and his administration, he tells the young Conservatives of this country that it is in language such as this they are to learn to speak of their political opponents. I shall say no more upon that subject. I submit however, that something better than that might have found expression from the lips of one who has been holding and still holds the office of Prime Minister in Canada. Something better than that should have been forthcoming and was due the type of audience the Prime Minister was addressing.

The next subject to which the Prime Minister referred was that of the railways. For some reason or another he keeps reverting to the question of railways, always striving to make it appear that the railway problem in Canada to-day is due exclusively to the policies of the Liberal party, and that anything the Conservative party has done is in no way responsible for railway difficulties. In regard to the railways the Prime Minister said:

The Conservative policy has been constructive and it left a legacy of a united dominion with one transcontinental railway binding its scattered provinces together. The Liberal party left a legacy of two transcontinental railways in addition to the one already in existence, and impaired our financial resources for generations to come that two might exist in order to destroy all three.

Can you believe that, Mr. Speaker? That is an exact quotation from a press report. The statement is that, first of all, the Liberal party constructed an additional two transcontinental roads, and did so why? They did it, the Prime Minister says, so that the two might exist in order to destroy all three! To continue the right hon. gentleman's remarks:

To-day we have $1,000,000,000 of indirect debt to bear witness to their shortsightedness, costing us $1,500,000 a week in interest charges alone.

Legacy of debt, perpetual deficits and duplication of railway facilities left by the Liberals when they stepped down from power.

No doubt the railways to which my right hon. friend referred were the National Transcontinental and Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk system which has been taken into the present Canadian National Railway system, the Intercolonial and the Canadian Pacific Railway. May I remind the right hon. gentleman to begin with, that the Intercolonial and the Grand Trunk railway were constructed before the Canadian Pacific railway had been thought of. The Prime Minister knows that the construction of the National Transcontinental and Grand Trunk Pacific was the subject of discussion, the main issue in fact, in two general elections. One party alone did not have to do with that matter. The Canadian people as a whole approved of the construction of that railway. As my hon. friends well know, they approved of it in two general elections.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nonsense.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I remind the hon. members who have interrupted that when they criticize the Liberal party for having constructed the transcontinental road, which is now government owned, they must remember that the leader of the Conservative party took issue with the Liberal government when it proposed to have part of the transcontinental system—the Grand Trunk Pacific—controlled by a private corporation, and took the position that the entire transcontinental road ought to be government owned. On May 26, 1904, Sir Robert Borden, leader of the Conservative party, moved a resolution which, while differing from the proposal of the Laurier government, was equally a proposal for a second transcontinental railway. Let me read Sir Robert Borden's motion as it appears in Hansard of May 26, 1904:

> The house is of opinion that instead of ratifying the proposed agreements it would be more in the public interest that the dominion should assume the whole obligation necessary for extending across the continent the present government system of railways thereby completing a transcontinental railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific entirely owned by and under the control of the people of Canada.

I wonder how it is that the Conservative party is to share no responsibility for the construction of a second transcontinental railway when that is the policy enunciated in this house and upon which it based its claim to power in a general election.

Then, what about the Canadian Northern Railway? That railway was begun as a local undertaking in the province of Manitoba, and extended over the prairies. The Canadian Northern management came to the Liberal administration and asked for a guarantee of a loan of $35,000,000 to enable them to connect their western lines with the centres in the east. That guarantee was given by the Liberal administration very largely in order to help the farmers of western Canada. The Liberal administration was also asked for a guarantee of a loan to make possible the extension of the road to the Pacific ocean. That request, however, the Liberal government refused; but the application was granted later by a Conservative government.

Mr. BENNETT: By a provincial government.

Mr. DUFF: What about the $75,000,000?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What are the facts in connection with the actual construction of the mileage of the Canadian Northern? The annual report of the Department of Railways and Canals shows that up to the year 1911 there were 4,840 miles of operated line. In 1914 there were 6,542 miles and in 1920 there were 9,742. In other words, the largest part of the Canadian Northern system was built during the term of office of the Conservative administration, yet the Prime Minister states we have to thank the Liberal party for all the roads in existence save the Canadian Pacific. May I go a step further and remind my hon. friend about some of his own statements. He himself spoke, I do not know whether it was for four hours, but I think it was about that length of time, on this very matter, vehemently condemning his own party, the Conservative party, not the Liberal party, when in 1914 it guaranteed a $45,000,000 loan for the completion of the Canadian Northern as a third transcontinental. Though my hon. friend says, "hear, hear" to my remarks, he told the Young Conservatives of Toronto that it was the Liberals they had to thank for these railways.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I come to another phase? My hon. friend speaks of deficits and the like. What did he himself say in this very parliament in claiming credit for the Canadian National once it had got into good running order under years of Liberal administration? Both he and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) tried to claim for the Conservative party the paternity of this second transcontinental road. Let me read the Prime Minister's own words spoken in this house on June 8, 1928:

> The consolidation of these roads took place first under the Union government and later under the Conservative administration. The consolidation could not be carried into effect until the judgment of the privy council was delivered, and that judgment was not delivered until after the Conservative administration had been defeated. But the consolidation as such, the framework, the skeleton and the statutes were prepared before the present government took office.

That was when the Liberal party were making a success of the Canadian National and the present Prime Minister was seeking to claim the credit for it. What did the Minister of Justice say about the national railway? He did not give credit to his present deskmate, the Prime Minister, but he did give credit to another leader of the Conservative party, and in very emphatic terms. Speaking in this house on March 7, 1929, he said:

> The National Railway system in this country constitutes a lasting monument—

Not to the Liberal party, but a lasting monument:

> —to the ability and statesmanship and determination of a single man—

Not the present Prime Minister:

> —a member of a former Conservative government, and subsequently Prime Minister of that government. It is to his ability and foresight, to his statesmanship and determination that the people of Canada are indebted for this wonderful system of National railways.

I might quote at some length to show how the deficits on these roads have mounted up to what they are. I wonder if the Prime Minister has forgotten what was done by a Conservative administration with respect to the stock of the Canadian Northern, how, notwithstanding the report of the Drayton-Acworth commission that the stock of the Canadian Northern was of no value, or in the actual words of the report:

> The shareholders of the company have no equity either on the ground of cash put in, or on the ground of physical reproduction cost, or on the ground of the saleable value of their property as a going concern.

—how, notwithstanding that that report was before them, a Conservative government gave a value of $10,000,000 to that valueless stock, thereby adding that much to the debt of this country.

Mr. BENNETT: Not a government but a commission.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was a Conservative government that agreed to pay the money.

Mr. BENNETT: It was an arbitration by a commission.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I could mention other matters which perhaps the Prime Minister has forgotten. It was the government of 1917, not a Liberal government, that brought down the Canadian Northern railway acquisition bill. When these roads and the Grand Trunk were in a state of bankruptcy it was a Conservative government which, instead of permitting them to go into the hands of a receiver, took over the whole obligations, paid out money and incurred fresh liabilities in taking over these roads and their debts, and making them part of the debt of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I opposed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister says he opposed it, and yet he tells the Young Conservatives in Toronto that the Liberal party was responsible for all these obligations.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall not at the moment take up the time of the house by recalling what was given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in land grants and in money, exemptions from taxation, and the rest of it. If I wanted to, I think I could show how a very considerable part of our debt has been due to what was given by the Conservative government to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

But there is one order in council to which I wish to refer before I conclude, and that is a new railway guarantee given by the present government since this house prorogued last session. I have in my hand a copy of an order in council giving a guarantee to the banks of their loan of $60,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The loan was made by the banks I believe in midsummer, or an undertaking was given I understand at that time that the loan would be made. On November 29 the government formally by order in council guaranteed the banks to the extent of $60,000,000 in this matter, and Mr. Speaker, this was done under the Unemployment Relief Act. Again this is for the relief of the unemployed. This is the kind of thing that I have been taking exception to all afternoon, the guaranteeing and expending of public moneys for the purpose of assisting corporations, and then allowing it to be understood by the public that these millions upon millions are being spent in order to help unemployed workers in different parts of the country.

I should like to know why the Prime Minister kept this order secret for so long a time.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not. It was issued on November 29 when it was passed, and a copy of it was sent to the right hon. gentleman by myself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the early part of the summer word was current all over the country that the government was going to support the banks in their loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. BENNETT: The order in council itself sets out the reasons for it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have the order in council, and as my hon. friend says, and as I expected he would say, he sent me a copy. It is the only copy of an order in council he has sent to me during the time I have been leader of the opposition. The order in council was passed on November 29, and a copy of it was sent to me a few days afterwards, probably because my hon. friend had seen that a month or so before, when it was current rumour that the order had been passed, I had stated that I did not know whether the order in council had been passed or not, but that if it had been passed I thought parliament should at least have been consulted before any guarantee of such an amount should be given to any corporation. The Prime Minister was evidently anxious that I should see that the order in council had not been passed at the time I had been speaking. But the significant thing is that the banks had got their undertaking months before. Why was the credit of this country promised to the banks? They had made their loans under the guarantee of the government, and on the understanding that the government was going to support them, and I cannot understand why the passing of this order in council should have been delayed until November 29. The country's credit had evidently been pledged on the word of the Prime Minister, and without any order in council. Before the session is over we shall doubtless find out.

Mr. BENNETT: The order in council shows the reason why.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The reasons as I have read them are not very conclusive. It was clear at the time they sought it, that the railways knew where the money was coming from and that the government was going to be back of the loans made by the banks. What I do take exception to is that, in these matters which involve an increase in what the Prime Minister has described as a colossal public debt already arising from the railways, we in this House of Commons should be made responsible for another guarantee of $60,000,000 to a railway, and not have an opportunity of even having our voices heard. That is the ground upon which I take exception. This is only one of a large number of orders in council of a similar kind relating to the guaranteeing of millions of dollars of the country's money, millions to guarantee the banks on account of wheat, millions to support railway corporations and assist other corporations, and yet in all of these things the House of Commons, which is responsible to the people for the expenditure of public money and is supposed to exercise some control over it has not had any voice at all and knew very little and in some instances nothing at all about the transactions themselves. The Prime Minister will probably say that the house was not in session when it was necessary to issue the orders. May I say to the Prime Minister that he is able to anticipate most needs before parliament prorogues and that he is always at liberty to call the house into session. If there is a necessity to make a guarantee of $60,000,000 to a railway corporation or to banks that have loaned that amount, that is ground in itself sufficient for bringing the House of Commons together to discuss the matter. We have had special sessions and there is no reason why the government should not in this matter as in many others have consulted the House of Commons.

This enables me to stress the point I sought to bring out with emphasis this afternoon, namely, that in all its major acts this government has for the most part ignored the House of Commons. We are treated as though we were here simply for the purpose of registering the will of the government, and, as the Prime Minister himself has said, being a sort of rubber stamp.

Mr. BENNETT: What do you mean by that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not only has the House of Commons grounds for having lost confidence in the government, but the government no longer enjoys the confidence of the people. As I said at the beginning of my remarks this afternoon, this lack of confidence of the people in this government has been made abundantly clear by the way in which the people have spoken at every opportunity they have had in by-elections during the last couple of years whether the election has been held in the maritime provinces, in Quebec, in Ontario or in the west. The government's policies have not brought about the improvement in conditions which the government said would come under them. Conditions have become worse instead of better. The government has failed to bring forth any real policy on agriculture; it has failed to bring forth any real policy on finance and monetary matters; it has failed to bring forth any policy on labour matters. It has had no policy except one of restriction in matters of trade. In all these things and in many others, it has been deplorably deficient.

With respect to matters in which this House of Commons is vitally interested in preserving its own rights and privileges, and thereby protecting the people in their rights, the government has been more than indifferent. It has forfeited every right to continue longer in office. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I beg to move an amendment to the address which I believe to be demanded by the people in consequence of the hopeless way in which the government has carried on the administration of the country's affairs during the last three and a half years. It affords the only means of giving expression to their views, the only means whereby the country can expect the change of policies needed in order to get Canada out of this prolonged depression and again on the path to prosperity. The amendment is seconded by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), and is as follows:

That the following be added to the motion: "We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's present advisers do not possess the confidence of the country."

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, after listening to something over four hours of effort on the part of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) one would conclude that we are living in the days of abounding prosperity and that this was a debating society met together for the purpose of having a little friendly discussion. There has been nothing to indicate that the country has been in the throes of the greatest depression of history; nothing to indicate by any stretch of the imagination that we have been passing through the greatest catastrophe of history. Comparisons have been instituted of the trade of 1927, 1928 and 1929 with the trade of the most depressing years of which the world has had a record. Incomparable things have been compared, and it has been sought to have the house believe that the conclusion to be drawn from these comparisons constitute good reasons why this government should lose the confidence of the house.

May I direct attention to the fact that Mr. Ramsay MacDonald at the opening of the world economic conference pointed out that during the period of depression the world's trade had decreased to one-third of what it was before the depression began. Was there anything this afternoon that would indicate there had been a world depression in trade? Was there anything from which one could conclude there was anything other than a passing wave of depression in some remote parts of the world with which Canada had no connection? The other day we had the authority for the statement that the world's trade had fallen to $25,000,000,000, although somewhat improved over what it was a few years ago, while previously it had been $69,000,000,000; therefore the fall has been from $69,000,000,000 to $25,000,000,000. The total of the world's commerce for the last twelve months, reckoned from November, was thirty-six per cent of what it was before the depression began. When I say to my fellow Canadians that their country has done just as well as if not a little better than the average in that our trade has remained at least thirty-six per cent of what it was before the depression, I speak but the simple truth. Yet during all of this afternoon there was not a single indication that the Dominion of Canada had been affected by the world depression. Is that fair, especially in view of the declaration of fairness and righteousness to which we have just listened? Is it exactly what we would expect from such a professor of righteousness? We would hardly expect the author of a new prayer to do a thing such as that. It is a little difficult to think that one who had played with the most solemn things of life by creating a new prayer, especially a member of the House of Commons, would be for one moment guilty of discussing the world's condition without reference to the fact that Canada also had been affected. It is an amazing story. I desire the House of Commons to know that we have passed through a depression and that this story of Canadian trade to which we have listened to-day is the story of all countries of the world, only that our country has been a little better off than most of them.

This afternoon and this evening I was reminded of those speeches to which we used to listen when hon. gentlemen opposite sat upon this side of the Speaker and references to the condition of the country were made by the opposition. We were told that this was the blue ruin tale of Tories. Do you recall them? Do you recall the wailing of Jeremiah which was passed on to the people of this country?

Mr. DUFF: The whisper of death.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman should know of the whisper of death. Attacks have been made upon the accuracy of statistics which have been prepared without reference to governments by those who at Geneva and in meetings of the League of Nations have been referred to as the foremost in the science of statistics. Mr. Coats did not consult any member of the government in the preparation of his statistics. The figures of unemployment which were given and to which I shall refer to-morrow were arrived at from returns made by companies and organizations which reported to the government just as they reported in the days when the right hon. gentleman sat to the right of the Speaker. Do you think that by such references as these you improve conditions in Canada? Do you think you do not bring upon yourself condemnation? Do you think men will not say that your one stock in trade is an endeavour to tear down? Do you think it is not an appeal to prejudice and passion? Apart from creating a new prayer, apart from the attacks which have been made upon responsible officials, overlooking the fact that the country has passed through the direst years of which we have any record; apart from all this, tell me what purpose is served by endeavouring to paint, in blacker hues than they appear, the conditions of your native country? What purpose is there in endeavouring to make it appear that things are darker than they actually are? Why endeavour to discourage the hope and confidence of the people? Why endeavour to tell a story which is blacker than the real conditions that prevail in the country?

Although in doing so I shall depart from my usual custom, I will take some little time to deal with every point that has been raised to-day, and I will defy the right hon. gentleman, or anyone else who may follow after him, to contend, in the light of the real facts in this country, as recorded by historians and statisticians not only in Canada but elsewhere, that this dominion has not made progress towards prosperity and a return to better days, greater than has been made in most other countries in the world. When I hear held up to high praise, the attitude taken by the president of the great republic to the south of us, whom I see exercising almost autocratic powers under authority from congress, I realize the puny powers which we possess under the Relief Act. I find that on one hand approval is given when someone else exercises authority, while on the other hand there is denunciation when we endeavour to exercise similar authority. If the exercise of executive authority under powers conferred by act of congress is a salutary and good thing for the nation in which such authority is exercised, why does it, when it is north of the forty-ninth parallel, cease to be good when similar actions have been taken by the executive in this country, with results that are comparable in every respect?

To those in this house who entertain other views I commend the reading of an article that appeared recently in the Saturday Evening Post, "North of the N.R.A.", written by Mr. Marcosson, whom I did not see and who did not consult me in any way with respect to it. There hon. gentlemen will find his record, after investigation, of the way in which this dominion, with ten and a half millions and with limited financial resources, cribbed, cabinned and confined financially, has been able to meet the storm of the depression as compared with a nation of one hundred and twenty-five millions south of the forty-ninth parallel, with the N.R.A. In order that ample opportunity may be afforded hon. gentlemen to study that record, I now move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Tuesday, January 30, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

CITY OF OTTAWA AGREEMENT

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That, it is expedient to authorize the Minister of Public Works, on behalf of His Majesty, to enter into an agreement with the corporation of the city of Ottawa to extend the period of the existing agreement with the corporation for one year from July 1, 1933.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I asked a question yesterday concerning the Vancouver harbour commission which the minister said he might be in a better position to answer to-day. I should like his answer at this time.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to say that I have not the exact information before me. I have not yet, nor has my department, received any resignation from the Vancouver harbour commissioners. However I should like to inquire further.

WHEAT AGREEMENT

LIMITATION OF ACREAGE TO BE SOWN IN WESTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if a circular is being issued in regard to the wheat agreement, and if so whether or not a copy will be laid on the table?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe a pamphlet has been issued jointly between the government of the western provinces and the dominion, and is being circulated by the provinces. I shall inquire if there are any copies available, and if so will lay them on the table.

SURVEY OF NATIONAL PORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) whether or not it is the intention of the government to introduce a bill concerning harbours, along the lines recommended in the report of the Gibb commission?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): Mr. Speaker, the matter is under consideration.

Mr. CASGRAIN: And has been, for a long time.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, January 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gobeil for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we listened with much interest to the observations made yesterday by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), and his well deserved tributes to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It is true that neither of them was a new member of the house. One of them is a new member of this parliament; the other is an older parliamentarian. The practice that has grown up and has now become traditional, by which a member of one of the two great races in this country moves the address one year and a member of the other race the next year, has been maintained both here and in another place during all these years, and I believe that it is conducive to a better understanding between the peoples that constitute this dominion. I should like to join if I might in congratulating the members who have spoken on the character of the addresses they have delivered. It was to be expected that one who had been so closely associated with the growth and development of the eastern townships and was familiar with the problems of those who till the soil, and also that one who had been so familiar with the development of the delta region near the Fraser river in British Columbia, would be able to speak with some authority, and these two members have well warranted our hopes and expectations in that regard.

When, however, I heard the right hon. leader of the opposition condole with the government over the results of the by-elections, I could not but reflect that the government as it stands to-day has exactly the majority that it had when this house was returned. It is true that there was a by-election in South Huron which was carried by the party that secured the seat at the general election. The Dutch have again taken Holland, and Huron still remains a Liberal constituency.

It is true that a Liberal continues to represent Yamaska. He was elected at the general election by one vote. It is also true that the votes polled at the general election amounted to 709 fewer than those polled at the by-election, when his majority was 84. Therefore on the vote that was polled in the general election he was defeated by 625 votes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: That is very simple, and if in order to gain 83 votes it is necessary to poll 709, you can easily by a process of computation ascertain how long it will take the opposition to get into power.

It is also true that a Liberal was elected in the constituency of Mackenzie in which a Conservative has not been a candidate in this generation until the recent by-election, a constituency the then Liberal-Progressive member for which, elected at the last general election, voted in support of the amendment to the budget on the last occasion on which a budget was delivered when he was in this house.

It is equally true that so far as the county of Restigouche-Madawaska is concerned, and which has been referred to as an old Tory county, there never was a Conservative candidate elected in Restigouche since 1896; and in Madawaska, for reasons that were well understood, Mr. Cormier was elected in the last election, and the gentleman who has succeeded him with his nineteen years experience in the local legislature had those peculiar claims upon the people which brought him the majority that he received. I can only hope, Mr. Speaker, that these gentlemen will give the same measure of satisfactory service to their constituencies in the larger arena which apparently they gave in the legislatures when they were members of them.

Mr. VALLANCE: What about the Nova Scotia general election?

Mr. BENNETT: I might remind the house that a Conservative candidate was successful in the by-election of Three Rivers and that in the western province of Alberta a seat was carried by this government both of which constituencies were at the general election represented by members of the opposition. With two supporters that we did not have before, and the opposition having two supporters that they did not have before we now stand on the very same footing as when this house was first returned and that too notwithstanding the fact that the fate of governments in conditions such as those through which we have passed has been that they have usually suffered defeat. But if one is to judge from the communications one receives and from the statements made by some of those who are within my vision at the moment, many thank God from time to time that this country is not under the guidance of the leader of the opposition in these trying times.

Mr. TOTZKE: What about—

Mr. BENNETT: If hon. gentlemen have anything to say, will they be good enough to stand up and say it at an appropriate time.

Mr. TOTZKE: I am sorry.

Mr. BENNETT: I was about to observe that the general opinion of the business people of this country is not that there should be a general election. The business people of this country are concerned with the great problems with which Canadians have grappled with such courage during the last few years, and I can say perfectly frankly that those who sit on this side of the house regard it indeed as having been a great pleasure and a proud privilege to have served Canada in these hours and days of stress, and if the electors are not grateful, and I have every reason to believe that they will be when the appropriate time comes, we are content because we have had the great privilege of serving the people of Canada.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is this a swan song?

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, there always is some excuse for ignorance and rudeness, but just why we should have it consistently manifested by one particular individual in this house I do not know. Why the house should be afflicted with interruptions from one who failed to secure nomination in his own constituency I do not know.

The leader of the opposition yesterday spent considerable time in endeavouring to prove that the statements made in the speech from the throne with respect to trade and revenue and employment were untrue; in fact, he used that word. Just why one charged with the responsibility of leading a party in opposition to the government should spend time in endeavouring to disprove what is known to almost every man in Canada is beyond my understanding.

On the question of revenue, for instance, can there be any doubt as to what the figures indicate? In July of last year this country's revenues were over $15,000,000 less than they were for the corresponding period the previous year. In the interim of six months we have not only picked up that fall in the revenues but have increased our revenues by over $5,000,000 beyond what they were for the same period last year. So we have that improvement which he who runs may read and he who sees may understand. There it is written on the public records of the country. What purpose is there in endeavouring to have that appear to be untrue which is true? What purpose is served by endeavouring to belittle the efforts of the Canadian people and their courage and persistence in adversity to achieve success and win through to prosperity? What purpose was served by it I leave to the good judgment of the people of this country.

On the question of expanding trade, there are the figures which speak for themselves. They show a continuous increase in trade since May of 1933. That may be read by anyone who reads the public statistics of the country. That cannot have been manufactured; the figures are there, and they speak for themselves. Take these indices, if you will, showing the gains that have been made since early in 1933:

Especially Significant Signs Of Improvement
Gains since early in 1933

	Per cent
Commodity prices	8.5
Security prices	63.3
Farm prices (wholesale)	25.1
Increased employment	16.9
Contracts awarded	72.2
Industrial production	39.7
Mining production	27.0
Revenue carloadings	4.3
Domestic exports	13.1

That is the position as it was at the end of the year or thereabouts. These are matters that anyone can see who desires to see. I repeat, what purpose is there in endeavouring to make it appear abroad and elsewhere that things are different from what they are? Everyone has access to these very figures and can study these very reports. The same condition exists in the United States as was indicated by Mr. Marcosson in his recent article, "North of the N.R.A." What purpose is there in endeavouring to mislead when the facts can be ascertained from the public records of the country? In so far as trade is concerned, the figures are checked with the reports issued by the countries to which our goods go and from which we receive goods. They are verified from time to time. If the right hon. gentleman desires to cast aspersions upon the accuracy of the figures furnished by the Bureau of Statistics, he may continue to do so, but I repeat: What purpose can be served? I assert to this house that if the committee on public accounts, or any other committee of this house, desires so to do, they can summon before them every employee of the bureau of statistics. It will be found that not a single suggestion has been made by any minister or anyone connected with the ministry as to how the records were to be kept or as to how the reports were to be prepared. They have made them with a consciousness of their obligation and duty towards those for whom they are prepared, namely, the people of this dominion. These reports have been prepared without fear, favour or affection and made public to those who desire to secure them.

I should like to give the figures showing the increase in our industrial production as compared with the increases in other countries. These figures show the gains in the different countries for the last twelve months, and are as follows:

1928=100 Industrial production—	Month	1932	1933	Increase
Canada	December	57.5	72.2	25.6
United States	November	58.6	65.8	12.3
United Kingdom	November	90.2	97.3	7.9
France	October	74.8	85.0	13.6
Germany	October	61.0	71.2	16.9

These figures show that in point of fact Canada leads them all and in some cases the increase is double that which has occurred in other countries. The production of steel has always been considered a matter of importance and the following figures show the increase in Canada in 1933 over 1932 as compared with the increases which have occurred in other countries:

Steel production (thousand metric tons)—	Month	1932	1933	Increase
Canada	December	31	50	61.3
United States	December	857	1,849	115.8
United Kingdom	October	447	679	51.9
France	October	468	527	12.6
Germany	October	522	715	37.0

While the increase in Canada has not been as large as that in the United States, where it reached 115·8 per cent, it is higher than the increases in the United Kingdom, France and Germany.

I shall deal next with wholesale prices. We have been making an honest endeavour to secure a higher level of wholesale prices on this continent, and the efforts put forward by the United States are known to all. The changes which have taken place in the index figures of wholesale prices are as follows:

Wholesale prices—		1932	1933	Increase	Decrease
Canada—1926=100	Dec.	64.0	69.0	7.8
United States—1926=100	Nov.	63.9	71.2	11.4
United Kingdom—1913=100	Nov.	101.1	102.8	1.7
France (gold)—1914=100	Nov.	391	383		2.0
Germany—1913=100	Nov.	93.9	96.0	2.2

It will be noted that there is a decrease in the case of France and that the years upon which the base index figure is computed varies in the case of the different countries.

I recall hearing the leader of the opposition refer in a budget debate to the fact that the price of common stocks was a fair indication of the improvement in the condition of the country, it being the value of equities in properties. The increases which have occurred in the prices of common stocks in Canada and other countries are as follows:

Common stocks—		1932	1933	Increase	Decrease
Canada—1926=100	Dec.	58.4	107.6	84.2
United States—1926=100	Dec.	44.8	78.8	75.9
United Kingdom—1924=100	Nov.	92	114	23.9
France—1913=100	Nov.	235	226		3.8
Germany—1924-26=100	Oct.	54.2	60.2	11.1

It will be noted again that a decrease has occurred in the case of France. Here again I think we have some reason to realize that our country has been making steady progress forward.

The next figures I shall give show the increases which have occurred in Canada in the production of different commodities. A very substantial increase has occurred in the production of newsprint which gives employment to large numbers of men, both directly and indirectly. There are large numbers employed in the woods in preparing the pulpwood in order that it may come down in the spring to the mills. There has been a considerable increase in the export of planks and boards, as well as in copper and nickel. Carloadings have always been regarded as a matter of importance, and these show a very substantial increase. I have frequently heard reference made in the house to bank debits. These are the cheques which pass through the banks from time to time. There has been a substantial increase in this item, as well as in the awarding of contracts. The detailed figures are as follows:

Improvement Figures based on Actual Quantities

The next figures I shall give to the house refer to the wholesale prices of Canadian farm products. These figures are given by months and provide a comparison between 1933 and 1932, the index figure of 100 being for the year 1926. They are:

—	1932			1933
	Vegetable	Animal	Total	Vegetable	Animal	Total
January	42·7	68·5	52·3	35·1	57·9	43·6

If we take the production of raw material and of partly manufactured goods, we find the same story of a steady and continuous increase in the volume, in the value and in the activity of those engaged in the production of these goods. Of course, I realize the soundness of the criticism which has been made that we have been looking forward to better days but that we have been disappointed. That is quite true, but so has all the world. As I indicated to this house upon one occasion, Sir Arthur Salter pointed out that the world had about gotten back to prewar conditions when the unprecedented speculation which was carried on on a scale never before heard of brought about disastrous consequences with the result that the second recovery became much more difficult than the first. But allowing for all that, this government, in the discharge of its responsibilities, has never lost courage but has always remained confident and retained its faith and belief that in the end we will succeed.

Before leaving these statistics which I have given I should like to give the house some further figures which show the percentage of gains since early in 1933 with seasonal adjustments, based on an index figure of 100 for 1926. These are as follows:

If we had given way to panic or to pessimism it would have been reflected at once upon the minds of the electorate. Sometimes I think the task has been difficult and the way hard but we have never faltered in the faith and confidence that we have had that in the end this country would win through to prosperity. The facts I have now presented to the house are some warrant at least for the confident faith we have had in our ability to do so. I will not take time to indicate at greater length further factors to which reference might be made, but I shall deal at once with the problem of unemployment and the references made to the matter by the leader of the opposition yesterday.

What are the facts? The facts are that the statistical department prepares these reports from time to time without reference to the government, as I have said, and that in the preparation of these reports their endeavour has been not to mislead, as has been suggested. And for any responsible member of this house, much less the leader of the opposition, to suggest that Mr. Coats would be guilty of a manipulation of these figures is something which, I really do submit, is not quite fair. The language used yesterday is language which, I think, should not have been used. The figures as presented, says the leader of the opposition, represent the prosperity of the country, not a prosperity such as is borne out by the facts but a prosperity borne out by the manipulation of statistics. That appears at the top of page 30. Later he says:

> . . . I think he ought to look very carefully and see that the right thing is done and that there is no further possibility of the manipulation of figures as is the case in the form in which they are given here.

Obviously, I have not had time to go back over all the reports that have been made, but I had the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) ask for a report; and because Hansard has not been published a sufficient length of time to enable a detailed report to be made on the basis of the criticism that has been made, though such a report will be available later, all I can say at the moment is that the report which I have now received reads thus. The leader of the opposition said:

The index figure for the calendar year 1933 was lower than it has been at any time since 1930. Yet this is described as being evidence of increasing employment.

In the statement made by the bureau these words appear:

In the first few months of the year (1933) activity reached its lowest level in recent years, but from April 1 the general trend was steadily upward, the period of improvement extending over eight months.

That is a quotation from the very report to which the right hon. gentleman referred, and the statement I have in my hand reads, in this regard:

The fact that the 1933 average was lower than the 1932 average was due to the first four months; the last five months showed marked improvement over the corresponding months of 1932. The chart from the bureau's report illustrates this.

That chart I hold in my hand; it was available for the right hon. gentleman, as well as for any other hon. member, and it indicates exactly what the facts are in this connection.

Now we come to another matter, namely, the reporting firms. In the United States the Labour Department makes up its figures from industrial reporting firms—trade union firms, if you will, though not all of them are members of the trade unions but those engaged in industrial activities. The statement I have here reads:

It has always been the policy of the Bureau of Statistics to secure, as far as possible, reports from all firms employing over fifteen persons. The number of these firms has increased, but the bureau in calculating its indexes allows for this by relating the number of employees reported each month to the number reported at the base period of 1926. Thus its indexes do not reflect the change in the number of firms.

The proper relation is established by statistical rules that are applicable here as elsewhere in order that there may be no misleading and that the figures may be comparable and not noncomparable, as some have suggested. When it was stated yesterday that the number of firms reporting had increased, perhaps it will be in the memory of some of those in this chamber to-day that, despite all the difficulties through which we have passed since 1930, there has been increased industrial activity, notably in the Toronto area, and the number of firms that have reported has increased substantially over preceding years. That in itself indicates that, notwithstanding the difficulties we have had to meet, our industrial activity has not languished, and the number of firms employing fifteen or more has been increased. To quote again from the statement I have in my hand:

The bureau's index does not go below firms of fifteen employees, but the great majority of the firms reporting to it are firms employing between fifteen and fifty. It is believed to be very representative.

It is true that, as indicated by the report, with respect to those who are engaged in what might be called unemployment works these were included in the figures, and special reference was made to them. The right hon. gentleman said that these figures were entirely illusory. The department say that this is what they have done:

The employment statistics of the bureau are issued by exactly the same staff and by exactly the same methods as they have been issued monthly during the past eleven years, or since their inception by the bureau. No one outside the bureau sees these statistics until they are released or has any say whatsoever in their content or purport. In fact, this applies to the staff immediately engaged in their primary compilation, whose results are never altered in the slightest degree. It would be quite futile for the bureau, even if it were so disposed, to "manipulate" statistics of employment, as such manipulation would at once be belied by numerous other current statistical records. For example, the records of car loadings, bank debits, trade, numerous monthly production processes—all confirm and explain the movement of the bureau's employment index. The only current record of unemployment in Canada is that of the Department of Labour, based on reports from trade unions. This showed a marked decline in unemployment between March, 1933, and October, 1933, with a slight seasonal increase in November. The November index was 20.4 per cent compared with 25.1 per cent in March last and with 22.8 per cent in November, 1932.

There you have the trade union report made to the Department of Labour, and as regards those employed in industry and other branches of activity in this country, the report shows that there has been a steady decline in unemployment from March 1933 to October 1933. In the contentions put forward yesterday by the right hon. gentleman, this statement appears:

The bureau does not distinguish between employment arising out of moneys paid out of the public treasury for relief, and employment as provided by private firms.

The bureau's comment is as follows:

The bureau's index is an index of the volume of employment and is clearly and categorically described as such in each and every issue of the figures. It would be absolutely impossible for the bureau to find out monthly wherein the employment provided had its financial source. The record does, however, clearly show the trend of employment from month to month in a very large number of specified industries whose relation to relief is nil. Highway construction is only one of over 60 industrial classifications shown. Such highway construction has been included in the record ever since 1921, and has presumably always been paid for by taxation of one kind or another. The bureau's index of employment is not to be taken as an index of unemployment except in the most general way, and even this general application has never been made by the bureau.

As a matter of general information, we know that there are about 14,000 employed in camps by the Department of National Defence, and about 19,000 by the Ontario Department of Northern Development, while doubtless there are a number employed by other provinces and by municipalities. The aggregate, however, would appear to be under 50,000 included in the bureau's figures out of the total increase of 146,000 between April 1 and December 1. For example, in manufacturing alone, which cannot be associated with relief, the following increases in payrolls as between April 1 and December 1 are shown.

This is an amazing figure which has been published and sent abroad showing the increase in the pay-rolls between, as I have said, April 1 and December 1 of last year.

Mr. DUFF: May I ask the Prime Minister who is responsible for what he has read?

Mr. BENNETT: It is from the Bureau of Statistics.

Mr. DUFF: Who is responsible for it—the minister or Mr. Coats?

Mr. BENNETT: The minister, so far as I know, has not seen it.

Mr. DUFF: Who is responsible for it?

Mr. BENNETT: Whether it was written by the director, Mr. Coats, himself, or by one of his assistants, I am not in a position to say, but it comes from the bureau and the bureau is responsible.

Mr. DUFF: The Prime Minister who is reading it should be in a position to tell us who wrote it.

Mr. BENNETT: I say that it came from the Bureau of Statistics. The increase in the monthly pay-rolls of the reporting firms from April 1 to December 1, 1933, is as follows:

Economic areas—	Increase
Maritimes	10,500
Quebec	52,000
Ontario	56,900
Prairies	13,600
British Columbia	13,900
Total	146,900

And on the average of 1926 being taken as equal to 100, on April 1 of last year the figure stood at 76 per cent and on December 1 at 91·8 per cent, an increase, as will be observed, of 20·8 per cent. These are facts as they have been gathered by the bureau and if they are disputed I certainly can only say that an opportunity can be afforded to the house and to every member of it to bring before the appropriate committee the gentlemen who prepared these figures.

Mr. DUFF: Who are the gentlemen who prepared those figures?

Mr. BENNETT: The manufacturing industry shows an increase of 41,789 in the same period and they are divided amongst the following:

Animal products—edible.
Fur and products.
Leather and products.
Lumber and products.
Musical instruments.
Plant products—edible.
Pulp and paper products.
Rubber products.
Textile products.
Plant products, not elsewhere specified.
Wood distillates and extracts.
Chemicals and allied products.
Clay, glass and stone products.
Electric current.
Electrical apparatus.
Iron and steel products.
Non-ferrous metal products.
Non-metallic mineral products.
Miscellaneous.

Then there are:

Logging.
Mining.
Communications.
Transportation.
Construction and maintenance.
Services.
Trade.

This shows in respect of the firms reporting monthly to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics a total increase of 146,900 persons during the period to which I have referred. The increases for the months during the period are shown in the appropriate columns. The figures teach their own lesson.

Considering further the matter of Canadian employment I have before me a compilation issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics which shows that 8,061 firms of classified industries reporting in December, 1932, had 765,441 persons employed; 8,428 similar firms reporting in December, 1933, had 850,486 persons employed, an estimated increase in respect of reporting firms of 10·3 per cent. In the face of these facts I submit that Canadians have some reason to feel a sense of pride rather than of pessimism with respect to their country and with the record which they thus establish. I think it is due to those who have been assailed in this house that an early opportunity should be taken to determine the method by which these computations have been made and to demonstrate the soundness of what has been done. That is the position. I do not think it is desirable to take up the time of the house in reading into the record columns of figures one after the other dealing with these matters, because no good purpose would be served by doing so.

In addition to this we have the retail sales which show a marked improvement. I wonder whether there is any member in this chamber who does not realize that every merchant in all the larger communities of this country has said repeatedly that last December was the best month he had had for years. I know one merchant in this city said that it was the best he had had for six years in cash business. I know others who said it was the best they had had for four or five years and others that it was the best they had had for three years, but they have been unanimous in their statement that the retail sales during the month of December have exceeded those of any December in recent years. I therefore conclude that if ever there was justification for stating that there has been an improvement in trade, an expansion in revenue and an increase in employment, it has been in this house to-day. I invite the house to give as close and studious attention as possible to the facts for the purpose of ascertaining whether the bureau upon which we have relied during all these years is the bureau to which we can look with confidence or whether they have manipulated figures, and if so for what purpose I know not, for without direction from someone what purpose would there be in doing this, and without direction from some person, why should they desire to do it? I recall an occasion when the right hon. gentleman waxed somewhat eloquent and angry because attacks were made upon those who could not answer for themselves. It is not in my judgment fitting that those occupying important positions in a department of such transcendent importance to the nation should be attacked without at least some opportunity being afforded to those concerned in making their defence. As there must always be governmental responsibility whether the ministry knows aught of these things or not, I for my part have the greatest satisfaction and pride in saying that I believed the League of Nations was right when it said that our Bureau of Statistics was one of the best in all the world and that the information supplied had been found to be accurate and reliable in every particular and was a credit to this dominion. I still hold that view.

The next point to which the right hon. gentleman directed considerable attention was the trade agreements. How sad a thing it is for him to contemplate those agreements! I suspect that every time he stands in his place and speaks about them he thinks of his efforts in 1923. Methinks I can hear him still pleading his cause in England to a deaf administration that the very things that have been done should be done and that we should have for our exports the preferences we have now received. All the members of the house should take the time to read the record of the economic conference of 1923. I commend it to them. I have read some parts of it to this house on various occasions. Why should the right hon. gentlemen decry so vigorously agreements that have brought such a measure of additional trade to this country? And not content with doing it at home, we find it abroad also. I hold in my hand the Glasgow Herald for February 1, 1933, and the candidate representing the Liberal party, Mr. Kier, made a speech at the close of the campaign, being supported by Major Gwilym Lloyd George, M.P., and other speakers. He is reported to have said:

> —he could now safely say that no entry made by any candidate into any contest had been more amply justified judging by the enthusiasm and support his candidature had provoked. His supporters and himself were late starters, but he believed they were fast finishers.

Then he proceeds to say that, > —he talked on the transatlantic telephone last night to Mr. Mackenzie King, the leader of the Canadian Liberal party, who told him of the anxiety with which Canadian Liberals were waiting the result of the East Fife by-election. Mr. Mackenzie King reminded him of two by-elections held recently in Canada in safe Tory seats which resulted in the return of two Liberals pledged to oppose the Ottawa agreements, which had resulted in increasing the world's tariffs, and pledged to fight for an immediate reduction of Canadian tariffs. He expressed the hope that everywhere in Great Britain there would be encouraged progressive movements designed to promote freer trade and the removal of trade restrictions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure my right hon. friend will permit me to remind him that at the time of the election to which he refers a dispatch appeared in the press to the effect that I had communicated over the long distance telephone with the gentleman he mentioned, and that I immediately denied in this house the accuracy of that report. I stated that I had been rung up by a gentleman from somewhere in Scotland and asked certain questions, and that I had replied to him I did not think it was proper for me even to discuss a matter which related to the domestic affairs of Great Britain, and that I had nothing to say. I said nothing. I made that statement in the house last year, and I am surprised that my right hon. friend does not remember it.

Mr. BENNETT: I certainly accept the statement of the right hon. gentleman. But apparently Liberalism is as unreliable in England as it is here.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: It has been said that as a result of the agreements entered into in Ottawa in 1932 the rest of the world would retaliate against Canada and against the empire. There is of course nothing to warrant any such statement. During the entire period of time that the Liberals were in office after the war they were unable to conclude any agreement at all with Germany, and it was not until after the Ottawa pacts were signed that an agreement was made with Germany, which as I happen to know and as hon. members opposite know, could not be brought about by the late Hon. Mr. Robb or anyone else. So that as far as Germany at least is concerned, one of the large markets of the world, we did make an agreement with them. There was a contract or agreement with France, but under that agreement France three times within a few months, and during the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite, raised the tariff against Canadian wheat. After the Ottawa agreements we negotiated a new treaty with France. So you have at least those two great trading nations with which Canada made trade agreements after the Ottawa agreements. And the agreements that were in force with other countries have not been abrogated. The twenty odd most-favoured-nation clause agreements that were in force, and have been for years, these contracts, treaties and agreements still stand. No country has asked that they be abrogated, no complaint has been made that would indicate reprisals as possible or likely. And as I shall presently show, we have extended our trade with all these nations.

It is desirable to keep in mind the extent to which we as a country have become dependent upon a stable market. I wonder if any member of this house has taken the trouble to realize what it means to have unstable markets for the exports of Canada. Has this house forgotten the observations made by the right hon. gentleman at the close of the budget of 1929 with respect to trade with the United States of America? Have we forgotten the Hawley-Smoot tariff of that day, and his speech on that? Have we forgotten how he said that it is not desirable that we should do anything to protect ourselves, lest we arouse their anger still more and become the victims of it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I never made a statement of the kind.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the word was "provoke." I have it among my papers, but it would disturb the sequence of my observations to turn to it now; I will take it when I come to it. "Provocative" I think was the exact word. At any rate it indicated a measure of regret that this country could not protect itself lest it might offend someone.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is not a correct interpretation, nor fair comment on what appears in the text.

Mr. BENNETT: It was also said that even our British preference should not be increased at this time for the same reason. Now, sir, I ask for any evidence that the world has resented the Ottawa pacts.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: If there is any we have a right to ask for it. Mere statements do not add to our knowledge. Name the countries, give us some indication of them.

Mr. DUFF: There was not anything in them.

Mr. BENNETT: All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is that perhaps the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) may be able to give an answer to that with respect to apples.

Mr. DUFF: Three cents a barrel.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman desires to make a speech his opportunity will come later.

Mr. DUFF: But my right hon. friend asked me a question and I answered.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has a habit of thinking any question is addressed to him that is addressed to the other side. It is a mistake.

May I point out that there has been a steady increase in trade between the countries comprising the British empire; that we have had an assured and sheltered market for our products, that in certain markets where there was uncertainty before there is now certainty, and we know that for a period of three years, five years from 1932, we have that market with respect to those products. We know that if material comes from a foreign country to Great Britain it has to pay a duty of ten to twenty per cent, while Canadian products and products from other parts of the empire enter free.

Mr. DUFF: Did they not always enter free? Was there ever a duty against Canadian goods entering Great Britain?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not know whether it is desirable to take up the time of this house to give the figures at length as to what has transpired in connection with empire trade. It would perhaps take too long. It is sufficient for my purpose to say that not only has our trade increased with Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, by reason of the agreements that were made, and that were subsequently modified and extended, as this house knows, by amending agreements, in the case of South Africa, but our trade with foreign countries has increased, our trade with France, Germany, Japan and notably with the countries of South America, with Peru, Brazil, and other countries on that continent. So that the entire trade of this country has steadily increased during the last few months, or since we entered into these agreements.

Now let us take a few figures with respect to the general trade situation, in order that there may be no misunderstanding. In the past calendar year we have increased our export trade. For the calendar year 1933 our imports were valued at $401,254,311, as compared with $452,614,257, for last year, representing a decline of 11·3 per cent. In those figures I am referring to imports, and hon. members who are familiar with international exchanges know what that must have meant to Canada. Those who know what international balances mean, and understand the necessity for building up balances understand just what is involved by the reduction of our imports and the increase of exports. Every thoughtful man who has to do with banking and commerce knows exactly what that means. This decrease was, however, accounted for by the decrease in imports from non-British countries, which fell from $324,556,642 to $268,380,832. The imports from British countries amounted to $132,873,479 as compared with $128,057,615 in 1932, an increase of 3·8 per cent. Thus, while we have decreased our imports from the world at large we have increased our imports from British countries. And when you reckon just what that means in terms of stable markets, both for them and for us, this house may have some appreciation and understanding of the value which attaches to that fact.

But there is something more than that; there is something more. The principal fall in our external trade has been with the United States of America, and the reason for it—if the reasoning of the right hon. gentleman is to be applied at all—is to be found in what he said yesterday. They have raised almost prohibitive tariffs against the world. They have declined to permit other countries to find markets in their country, and they expect to find markets in ours. Let me at this time give a short statement with respect to the proportion of total imports from British and foreign countries. From the United Kingdom in 1932 we bought 20·7 per cent of our needs. In 1933 we bought 24·4 per cent. From the British Empire we bought 28·3 per cent in 1932 and in 1933, 33·1 per cent. From the United States we bought 58·2 per cent in 1932 and 54·2 per cent in 1933. So we have a continuous improvement in our external trade, so far as imports from the British Empire are concerned,—that is, our trade with British countries. I ask this House of Commons, and I ask the country as to whether or not a sure and stable market of the character indicated is not the best assurance that Canada can have for any permanent recovery from this depression.

Let us now turn to exports. Canada's domestic exports for the calendar year 1933 amounted to $531,474,179, as compared with $493,808,841 for the calendar year 1932. That is an increase over last year of $37,665,338 or 7·6 per cent. That increase is almost wholly accounted for by the increase in Canada's exports to empire countries which increased from $217,156,953 to $254,899,205, or an increase of 17·4 per cent. The relative proportion of our export trade to British and foreign countries was as follows: To the United Kingdom, in 1932, 36·1 per cent; in 1933, 39·6 per cent; to the British Empire, 44 per cent in 1932 and 48 per cent in 1933; to the United States in 1932, 32·9 per cent, and in 1933, 32·1 per cent, and to foreign countries taken together in 1932, 56·0 per cent, and in 1933, 52·0 per cent.

Therefore, as I have said, as a result of agreements which were entered into in 1932 Canada has been able to expand her exports and to increase her imports from empire countries, resulting in a nearer approach to equilibrium between exports and imports in connection with British countries. In other words, the members of the family have been buying from one another, with marked satisfaction to every member of it, and an improved financial condition for everyone within the family circle. When one remembers that for the last thirty-five years there has been a preference by Canada and that it is only during the last two years that preference has begun to operate, so far as Great Britain is concerned, one should recognize that it takes time for preferential trade to improve.

The statement was made in this house that it was to be expected that Canada's exporting business among the countries of the world would fall off. It is pointed out in the speech from the throne that Canada has attained again to fifth position amongst the exporting countries of the world. Is that, or is it not something of which we might well be proud? We met with difficulties, as did all the world. We fell to sixth position and to the seventh position. According to the report from the League of Nations we have gone on, and while our position has been challenged on one occasion by Japan, which country went into fifth place, Japan is now sixth, and we are again fifth.

The figures are very interesting. They indicate something which in fairness I believe this house should consider. When I heard yesterday a comparison of the figures concerning trade for the years 1926, 1927, 1928 and 1929 with those for 1931, 1932 and 1933 I wondered if my ears were not deceiving me, because everyone knows when you compare figures of those years with the figures of to-day, for every nation of the world, you find practically the same position. And that Canada has been able to maintain fifth position amongst the exporting countries, exceeded only by the United Kingdom, the United States, France and Germany, is something which must indicate at once that we, while in the midst of this great depression, have been able to do more than maintain our position among the trading nations of the world. All one has to do is to compare the figures of other nations with our own figures to see how nearly side by side we marched. And, although in the race we were passed once, as I have said, we again find ourselves occupying fifth position among the exporting countries.

Let us again consider France. We find in connection with that country our trade is steadily increasing. I have the figures, but I shall not record them because it would take too long to do so. Then, let us consider the New Zealand treaty. On the very day that the present government took office the New Zealand treaty fell. The very day we took office was the day upon which the New Zealand treaty had been terminated by notice given by the late government. It has been said that on the very day the Prime Minister of New Zealand landed in this city he found that we had placed a duty against New Zealand butter higher than that which had theretofore prevailed. We did so for the agriculturists of Canada, the dairymen of this country. We said, if we were placed in office, we would make tariffs fight for them and tariffs have fought for them. I repeat, our tariffs have fought for them, I will go further; look at the dairy industry of Canada as it stood when we took office and as it stands to-day. So far as New Zealand is concerned, of course we were faced with a difficult problem. New Zealand's largest export was butter. They desired to find a place in our market. We told them that we could not afford to give a preference to any country which would put our own producers at an unfair disadvantage. We said we could not afford to prefer anyone over Canadians. We told them they must adjust their arrangements with us, and that we would endeavour to adjust ours with them. We said that if we had to import butter we would go to the Antipodes, to New Zealand and Australia, and give them the first opportunity to sell in this market such butter as we might require. I am bound to say that the gentlemen from New Zealand and Australia took a reasonable view of the situation. They saw our country; they saw our herds. They knew what we were doing. They learned about our difficulties in connection with carrying on the dairy industry; they learned that we had to keep our cattle in barns and feed them, and were able to draw a comparison between this and their country where sheds and barns are unnecessary. Knowing these facts the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the government were able to negotiate arrangements with them that were satisfactory and have worked out satisfactorily. Now and then some effort is made on the part of a too enterprising Canadian to buy butter from New Zealand in the hope of making a profit from its sale in this country, but when he is asked in view of existing conditions in this country, and they have been asked, to stay his hand and not place that butter on the market until our own supply is exhausted, with one accord these men have had a sense of patriotism and love of this country that induced them to agree to hold any butter that they had imported until it might be required. They too appreciated the necessity and desirability of relying upon our own efforts in the establishment of our own Canadian industries. I shall not dwell further upon that.

There is one matter to which I think I am warranted in referring, which has been largely affected by treaties, and that is the lumber business of this country. I suppose that it is within the knowledge of members of this house that British Columbia exported more lumber last year than in any other year in its history. The largest lumbering trade that goes on in the world is transacted from that province.

Mr. MUNN: Exported to Great Britain.

Mr. BENNETT: Exported to all the world, to Great Britain and to Australia, New Zealand, China and all the world. I have under my hand the figures of the countries to which that lumber goes and the amounts, and it is amazing the number of countries to which British Columbia lumber is sent. It is not simply to one or two or three or four countries. If I might mention individuals, the gentleman in charge of that particular business has built up a market in almost every country in the world. British Columbia lumber is going to all the seven seas.

Mr. DUFF: Did it not always go to the seven seas?

Mr. BENNETT: No, it only went to four. May I direct the attention of the hon. member for North Vancouver (Mr. Munn) to the fact that the greatest exports of lumber which his province has enjoyed in all its history took place during the past year, and largely that has been due to the exports to Great Britain which have been ensured by reason of the fact that our lumber goes in there free against its competitors who have to pay from ten to twenty per cent of the value to get their lumber into the ports of England. I have the figures before me of the exports from British Columbia, but I shall not take time to give them.

I think it may fairly be said, then, that we have abundantly justified the bargains which we made with respect to trade. We have enhanced and increased our business not only with the British Empire but with the countries of the world.

But the right hon. leader of the opposition asked me yesterday, very pointedly, why did we not negotiate a reciprocity agreement with the United States?

Mr. DUFF: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: I was surprised to hear the right hon. gentleman use the word reciprocity, because reciprocity might be a very difficult thing to accomplish with any country in the present disturbed conditions of the world. I shall not do more than ask two or three questions with respect to that. I wonder where the right hon. gentleman gets his information that the United States desires to negotiate a treaty with Canada. All I can say is that I do not believe the government of the United States has been communicating with him to that effect, and they certainly have not been with us. It may be that his former minister to Washington among his activities has given him information to that effect, but that I think is doubtful.

I read to this house last year a joint statement prepared by the President of the United States and myself, and I know of no reason why the facts stated in that memorandum are not as accurate to-day as they were then. That is all I shall say with respect to that.

Mr. DUFF: If the mountain won't come to Mahomet why does not Mahomet go to the mountain?

Mr. BENNETT: There might be some little difference of opinion in some cases as to which constituted Mahomet, but if the hon. gentleman was present no such difficulty would arise.

I find that the right hon. leader of the opposition was in power in this country for many years. Did he negotiate a treaty with the United States?

Mr. DUFF: There was a Tory government then in the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: I find that on April 9, 1929, at page 1403 of Hansard the right hon. gentleman thus expressed himself:

> This year differs from other years in one essential particular. This year, when the government was preparing its budget, it had before it the knowledge which is common throughout the continent, that a neighbouring country was about to make certain changes in its tariff, changes which may materially affect trade between the two countries. Trade between this country and the United States is, I believe, the greatest trade that exists between any two countries in the world, and naturally we are interested in what the citizens of the republic do with respect to matters which may affect that trade. We are interested as well in all that affects the industrial conditions of that country because, as we know from experience, matters are so inter-related in economic affairs that it is seldom that one portion of this continent is appreciably affected by depression or the opposite without other parts being also affected. We have the word of those in authority in the neighbouring republic that there are certain measures to be introduced at a special session of congress now about to assemble. An important measure we are led to believe, is a measure relating to farm relief. Another measure relates to "limited adjustments of the tariff"; that I think is the expression which has been officially used. Having that knowledge before us, I ask hon. gentlemen irrespective of party: In the condition of prosperity which Canada is to-day enjoying would it be desirable on the part of the administration to take any action with respect to the tariff in Canada at the present time which by those across the line who may be interested in seeking to raise the tariff in that country could be regarded as provocative? I say that with the knowledge which we have before us at the present time, were we to do what hon. gentlemen opposite by their amendment apparently wish us to do, namely raise the tariff, we would be creating in the minds of the American people the very sentiment which would cause them to raise their tariff higher perhaps than it was ever their intention to raise it. We do not intend to take any action of that provocative character.

May I say to my hon. friends opposite, in the other corner of the house, that were we to-day to take a step along the lines of increasing the British preference to a greater degree than exists at the present time that step also might be misconstrued, for we know that there are people on the other side of the line who are just as anxious to be troublemakers as certain people on this side of the line, who are ready to misrepresent matters, and we have to take human nature as it is, and deal with it as it is. So facing the situation before us, we have followed the policy that we have followed in the past and that we shall follow at all times, of dealing with each situation as it arises in the light of the conditions as they exist at the time.

I suppose there is no doubt as to the accuracy of that record?

Mr. DUFF: Why pause?

Mr. BENNETT: I think if the hon. gentleman, formerly of Lunenburg, but now of Antigonish-Guysborough, had listened he must have heard what was said by his leader with respect to that matter. But let me ask a question or two as to what is intended by this demand for reciprocity. Reciprocity in cattle, in butter, in eggs, in hogs—reciprocity in all these, I suppose, would be the proper thing to have?

Mr. DUFF: What about fish?

Mr. BENNETT: I am so glad to hear that—fish, as well as cattle, hogs, butter and eggs, because I will now give you the prices of these commodities in Canada and the United States. I got the market quotation to-day on hogs, and I find the figures are as follows:

Hog Prices

	Monday Jan. 29 Per 100 pounds	Tuesday Jan. 30 Per 100 pounds
Toronto—select bacons	$10 15	$10 35
Montreal—select bacons	10 10	10 10 to 10 15
Winnipeg—select bacons	9 25
Chicago—good to choice—180-220 pounds	3 85	4 00
Buffalo—good to choice—180-220 pounds	3 75 to 4 00

So we want reciprocity in hogs in order that Americans can find in Canada a market for their commodities at twice the price they get at home.

Mr. DONNELLY: What about the price of wheat?

Mr. BENNETT: The price of wheat is the same as the price obtained in Canada having regard to the duty of forty-two cents per bushel imposed by the American congress against Canadian wheat.

Just one more moment while I deal with a further question as to the prices of cattle, bacon, butter and eggs, in the two countries. We have now had expressed in this house by western members a desire that we should have a reciprocity agreement with the United States with respect to these items. The prices being received for these commodities at different points in Canada and the United States are as follows:

Cattle—	Per cwt.
Good weighty steers—Toronto	$5.40-$6.50
Good 1,100-1,300-lb. steers—Chicago	5.00 - 6.25
Hogs—	Per cwt.
Select bacons—Calgary	$8.50
Select bacons—Winnipeg	9.00
Select bacons—Toronto	9.45
Select bacons—Montreal	9.25
Good to choice, 180-220 lb.—Omaha	$3.25-$3.40
Good to choice, 180-220 lb.—St. Louis	3.65 - 3.75
Good to choice, 180-220 lb.—Kansas City	3.35 - 3.45
Good to choice, 180-220 lb.—Chicago	3.60 - 3.75
Butter—	Per pound
No. 1 pasteurized, wholesale—Montreal	25½c. to 26c.
Comparable grade—New York	20½c.
Butter Fat—
For special grade cream—Alberta	19c. to 23c.
For special grade cream—Saskatchewan	20c.
For special grade cream—Manitoba	21½c.
For special grade cream—Ontario	27c. to 28c.
For sweet cream—Chicago	21c. to 21½c.

Eggs—	Per dozen
Wholesale prices—Toronto	30c.
Wholesale prices—Montreal	29c.
Wholesale prices—Chicago	19½c. to 20½c.
Wholesale prices—New York	24½c.
Prices to country shippers— Winnipeg	27c. to 28c.
Prices to country shippers— Kansas City	17½c.

That is the reciprocity the hon. gentleman says he wants.

Mr. VALLANCE: There is no reciprocity in that.

Mr. BENNETT: I asked him distinctly if he wanted reciprocity in those items; I named them and he said he did. He wants an opportunity for the American farmer to sell his agricultural products at Canadian prices which are higher than he can get at home. That is the reciprocity they say they want. Let them tell the agriculturists of Quebec and Ontario that that is the form of agricultural reciprocity that is wanted. Go and tell them that you want the American to come into this market to sell his products under such a reciprocity treaty. The only form of treaty that can be arrived at between countries is one that is just and fair to both and one that affords an opportunity for the products of the one country in the markets of the other under the most fair conditions.

Mr. VALLANCE: That is all we want.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. VALLANCE: That is all right but he has suggested it to us.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: If any other agreement is in the minds of those who have been speaking in this house, I can only say that there will be no agreement possible that imposes unfair conditions upon Canadians or that would subject Canadian dairy farmers, butter producers and hog and cattle raisers to the competition of prices received in the United States for comparable products.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Speaker, with your permission, will the Prime Minister be good enough to give—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Speaker, with your permission might I ask the Prime Minister to give the comparative prices received for fish in Boston, New York and Halifax or any other part of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: I have not the figures beside me but I will endeavour to secure them for the hon. gentleman. If he will repair to the library I fancy he will have no difficulty in finding them in a Boston paper.

Mr. DUFF: I do not have to go to the library.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the encyclopaedic mind of the hon. gentleman will provide an answer to his question without reference to the library.

Mr. DUFF: There is no comparison.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall now proceed to deal with another matter, the wheat agreement. The right hon. gentleman devoted considerable time yesterday to dealing with the wheat agreement and stated that this arrangement was eminently unsatisfactory to himself and his party. I think it well that we should start at the beginning of things and I should like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite whether they represent Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta any better than their local governments? I should like to ask them whether they are any closer to the people of Manitoba than the Hon. John Bracken? I should like to ask them whether they are any closer to the people of Alberta than the Hon. J. E. Brownlee? I should like to ask them whether they are any closer to the people of Saskatchewan than the Hon. J. T. M. Anderson?

Mr. VALLANCE: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. VALLANCE: The Prime Minister is asking a question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. VALLANCE: The Prime Minister has asked a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has no right to interrupt a speaker when he is addressing the house.

Mr. VALLANCE: With all deference to Your Honour may I suggest—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman should take his seat.

Mr. VALLANCE: With all deference to Your Honour may I ask—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. VALLANCE: The Prime Minister has asked a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should not interrupt when a speech is being made to this house. I ask him to keep order and take his seat.

Mr. VALLANCE: May I ask a question?

Mr. SPEAKER: No.

Mr. VALLANCE: On a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member wishes to raise a point of order, he has a right to do so.

Mr. VALLANCE: I raise a point of order. The Prime Minister has asked a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. VALLANCE: He asked whether we who sit—

Mr. SPEAKER: The Prime Minister has directed no question to the hon. member. Sometimes in making a speech words are used which indicate a question but they may not be directed to a definite member of the house.

Mr. VALLANCE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: I ask the hon. member to take his seat; he is out of order.

Mr. VALLANCE: If the Prime Minister does not want to answer me—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: On May 30 last a telegram was addressed to me reading as follows:

Winnipeg, Man., May 30, 1933,
5.10 a.m.

Honourable R. B. Bennett,
Ottawa, Ont.

The following resolution was passed at a meeting of the wheat problems committee representative of the governments of the three prairie provinces:

That in the opinion of the committee an increase in commodity prices generally and wheat prices in particular is essentially a condition precedent to any sustained improvement in Canadian economic conditions;

That in view of the present large world surplus of wheat and the present prospect of a further large Canadian crop, some plan of curtailment of wheat production in or exports from the four principal exporting countries is essential to any such price increase;

That we therefore strongly recommend to the government of Canada that it make every effort to secure for this question an early and prominent place in the discussion of the general economic conference and that the governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, pledge the support of their respective provincial governments to the principle of such curtailment of wheat production or control of exports and offer to cooperate with the federal government in formulating plans to carry this principle into operation in Canada;

That any further discussion at the said economic conference should involve consideration of the possibility of any agreement arrived at between the said exporting countries becoming effective in the marketing of any crop handled after the first day of July, nineteen thirty-three.

Sgd. John E. Brownlee,
John Bracken,
M. A. MacPherson.

That telegram was received by me on the eve of my departure for the world economic conference. On my arrival there I found that Mr. Morgenthau, whose committee had been dealing with the matter at Geneva, had set up his committee at London. Representatives of all the wheat exporting countries attended, with the exception of Russia which came in later. After a full discussion certain facts were ascertained to which I shall presently refer, but it was realized that in order to make effective any agreement of that character, it was essential that the wheat importing countries should not believe, as in times past they sometimes had, that they were about to be made to pay through the nose for what they bought. Discussions took place with the wheat importing countries, Great Britain being the largest, and they agreed that it was in the interests of world conditions that there should be an increase in the price of wheat to the producer. The only method by which that could be arrived at was by dealing with the problem through the curtailment of production until such time as production and demand were near an equilibrium. Now, let us see just what was involved in that. This country unfortunately has been greatly misled with regard to wheat. I wonder if the house recalls the fact that immediately after the war we believed that we would have in a time of peace a wartime market, and that we should be able to maintain the sales of our wheat abroad on the same basis as during the war. Well, of course it was an unfounded assumption. We increased acreage, going up and up, increasing the production of wheat, until there were millions of unsold bushels, while across the water, in France, in Italy and in other countries they were getting back to prewar conditions and increasing their production of wheat so as to make themselves self-sustaining if possible. That was the position. How far this country has been misled in this matter I should like to point out. Suppose I merely point to a speech made, for instance, by Mr. Crerar, who is reported as follows:

With reference to the unemployment question, Mr. Crerar attributed the present conditions largely to the fact that the crop in western Canada was not so great in 1929 as that of the previous year, and he made the prediction that if western Canada has a five hundred million bushel crop this year, and other crops were correspondingly large, within six months the greater part of the unemployment in Canada would have vanished.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the date?

Mr. BENNETT: That was June 13, 1930. Others had the same view. We were all mistaken. I am not here to place the blame upon the government of the day because the farmers of the west believed that all they had to do was to grow more wheat and they would be rich; I am not here to blame them for a single moment if they believed, as the farmers did, that all they had to do was to grow more wheat and they would find a ready market for it. The then leader of the government—and I am not saying that he is censurable—believed there was always a ready market for Canadian wheat. Indeed, Canadians had always been taught that. They thought it was so, but alas it was not. There is Italy to-day producing more wheat than the specified requirements of her own people. France, since the war, has improved her cultivation; she has improved the fertility of her soil, so that she is producing more wheat on a smaller acreage than before the war. More than that, she is exporting as a matter of fact certain quantities to Great Britain. And Germany is in exactly the same position.

The French realized the seriousness of the matter, and if any hon. members are interested they can see the form of placard or poster that is being posted up throughout France in connection with the reduction of the acreage of wheat production. One of those posters I have in my hand. Other countries are taking the same position. Now, why is it? The fact is that we had no understanding of the relation of consumption to production; that is all. Yesterday I thought that the leader of the opposition was about to put the case correctly. He said. "If I had a large stock of goods what would I do?" If any of you are familiar with the book written by Mr. Henry Ford during his own crisis you will recall what his answer was: Reduce your inventories. This country has accumulated vast quantities of wheat that cannot be sold. Have tariffs anything to do with it? Nothing in the world. The increased tariff that took place in France took place before this government came into power, three times in a few months; and while I took the view that this was unfair under the treaties, it was a matter which in fact was only incidental to the carrying out of their national policy of being self-sustaining.

I wonder if the people of this country realize the extent to which the terror of starvation has seized the people of Europe. They went through a great war. You all know the conditions in England; you know what those conditions were during a few months of the war. On the continent of Europe two fears obsessed the people; one was the fear of the submarine menace and the destruction of ships that might carry grain to their ports if they were again in trouble, and the other was the fear that they would be held up to ransom in the matter of prices so that they could not pay them. They resented the idea of having to pay a ransom, and shall I make this observation in this regard. I think it is within the knowledge of some of the members of this house that some good Canadians believed that the necessity of one community was the opportunity of another. I will say something that may be misunderstood. The late Sir George Foster was the only man I know of who during the war contended, in season and out of season, against charging too high prices for wheat. He ventured always to say that in his view, if we did that, we should pay the price. Sir, we charged $3 per bushel for wheat during the war and got it; hon. gentlemen know that. When the war was over we continued to increase our production of wheat, believing that all we had to do, as Mr. Crerar has said, was to produce five hundred million bushels and we were rich. But what were other people doing? Confronted with the fear of starvation on the one hand and the fear of being held up to ransom on the other, they at once set about improving their methods of cultivation, in some cases vastly increasing acreage, though in France they did not even increase their acreage. There they improved methods of cultivation so as to make it possible for them to grow more wheat than ever before.

Need I remind the house of something that is known to everyone. Man perfected a machine by which he extracted from the air certain nitrogenous elements that enabled him to fertilize the soil cheaply, whereas before he had to bring nitrates from Chile. Now, confronted with such a situation, what would a merchant do? Overstocked, and without any possible market, what would he do? The right hon. gentleman yesterday talked about markets, markets, markets; he said, "Go and get markets."

An hon. MEMBER: Blast them.

Mr. BENNETT: There are certain markets that can be, but this is not one. When you come to deal with wheat you are faced with this fact as everyone knows, that France, Spain, Italy, Hungary, Esthonia, Roumania, Bulgaria and other countries are increasing their wheat production, so that the Danubian countries have an exportable surplus. France has an exportable surplus, and Germany after supplying her people has a surplus. Italy, with the draining of lands and improved cultivation, and in the effort to supply the food requirements of her own people, has this year produced more wheat than Canada.

With that situation the three premiers of the provinces affected met together and sent me, before I left for England, the telegram which I have just read, and I took the course I have indicated. Conferences were held from time to time, until finally the conference adjourned, the wheat committee remaining in being. Mr. Morgenthau returned to the United States, and Mr. Murphy of Minneapolis, himself a wheat farmer, took the matter in hand from the standpoint of the Americans, who showed the greatest willingness in the world to assist in meeting the situation. Canada was the worst offender; we had the greatest surplus of unsold wheat. What was to be done? Finally, as the right hon. gentleman said yesterday, they met in the High Commissioner's office, and at that office they signed an agreement. The agreement is predicated upon our not growing more wheat than can reasonably be taken care of with the adjustments that are necessary to get rid of the present surplus. Most hon. members know that but for the intervention of the government the wheat situation would be an intolerable one. They have from time to time asked for a wheat board but they have had practically a wheat board for two years. The wheat surplus in this country is very large. I shall give just two or three figures in order that there may be no misunderstanding about the matter, and in order that there may be no uncertainty as to what is said I am going to read this statement which to some extent will answer the question of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young):

The first warnings of impending change in the wheat situation came in 1925 when Italy and Germany increased their duties on imported wheat. In 1927 France increased her import duties on two occasions, practically doubling the rate. With large domestic crops of foodstuffs in prospect in the summer of 1929, France and Italy again increased their import duties followed by an increase in Germany in December, 1929. In June, 1930, the Italian import duty was increased to eighty-six cents per bushel (later increased to $1.07 per bushel); in October, 1930, the German import duty was increased to $1.62 per bushel; and in June, 1930, France imposed a duty of eighty-five cents a bushel on imported wheat. These severe tariffs were followed by the inauguration of milling quotas which limited the amount of foreign wheat which could be used in domestic mills. Smaller importing countries followed the example of the larger importing states and, at the present time, there is not a wheat-deficient country in Europe which does not directly or indirectly impose restrictions upon importation of wheat. The abandonment of the gold standard by the United Kingdom started a regime of fluctuating currencies and as a result importing countries strengthened their quantitative restrictions such as milling quotas and exchange controls. These measures were made more effective than tariffs in regulating imports from countries with inflated currencies.

This one can readily understand.

The question naturally arises as to why this action was taken by importing countries. The answer is simple. Importing countries acted in defence of their own farmers. By taking the action which they did, these countries served notice that they were not going to allow domestic prices to fall to the level of prices in exporting countries where large surpluses of wheat were driving prices downward. They acted to meet the crisis which threatened their economic life. During the past five years the continent of Europe has produced more wheat than North America and therefore the fall in wheat prices vitally affected Europe. The main net importing countries of northern and western Europe had the strategic advantage of being able to withstand the direct effects of the falling international price level through regulating the price of imported wheat by the imposition of import duties and by other devices. In other words, while the Liverpool price of wheat fell to the lowest levels in history, France, Germany, and Italy have maintained prices well in excess of $1.25 a bushel since 1929.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the document from which the right hon. gentleman is reading?

Mr. BENNETT: I am reading from the document that has been circulated by the governments of the western provinces. I am doing so in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Weyburn.

The crisis for European countries as well as for exporting countries arose from the emergence of an abnormal world carry-over of wheat as Europe gradually recovered her pre-war position and exporting countries continued to maintain and in some instances to expand acreage which had been sown to wheat when European agriculture was disorganized during the war and early post-war years.

Now, without going into this at further length, may I give just these figures:

When the wheat conference met in London during the latter part of August, the European wheat situation demanded particular attention. It appeared quite obvious that even the record production of 1932 would be exceeded due to the more favourable growing season of 1933. The principal improvement was in the Danubian area, where a partial crop failure occurred in 1932. The four exporting countries in the Danube basin produced about 129,000,000 bushels more in 1933 than in 1932, with indications that they would have a surplus of nearly 50,000,000 bushels for export in the 1933-34 season. France, Germany, and Italy produced large crops and these were particularly alarming because the effects of the heavy 1932 crops were still evident. The French wheat estimate is 339,000,000 bushels compared with 334,000,000 bushels in 1932. Germany's harvest is placed at 203,000,000 bushels compared with 184,000,000 bushels last year. The Italian crop is estimated at 297,000,000 bushels compared with 277,000,000 bushels last year. The United Kingdom estimates its wheat production at about 62,000,000 bushels, a substantial increase over the 44,000,000 bushels garnered in 1932. The Netherlands, Greece and Switzerland each had larger crops on increased acreage, while the crop in Belgium was reduced slightly due to the lower acreage seeded in 1933. Thus seven of the eight major European importing countries produced more wheat in 1933 than the record yields of 1932. The smaller countries were similarly favoured by the weather in 1933. Spain and Portugal are the only European countries which have appreciable decreases in 1933 wheat production compared with 1932 returns. Thus the continent of Europe, which is the principal market for overseas wheat, will have lower import requirements in 1933-34 because of increased acreages and exceptionally high yields per acre during the past growing season.

Without going further into that, I should like to read just this paragraph from the agreement. The agreement was:

To consider the measures which might be taken in concert to adjust the supply of wheat to effective world demand and eliminate the abnormal surpluses which have been depressing the wheat market and to bring about a rise and stabilization of prices at a level remunerative to producers and fair to consumers of breadstuffs.

May I say that nothing more impressed me than to see the representatives of importing countries rise in their places and say that they believed the only way in which an ultimate return to prosperity would be secured was to bring about for wheat a price that would at least give a profit to the producer. They put that very strongly; they said that they were willing to give the greatest possible assistance to attain that end.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Has the right hon. gentleman the figures of surpluses in exporting countries?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I thought perhaps he might have them to the date of the conference.

Mr. BENNETT: I have them under my hand, brought down to a later date and I shall mention them before I finish. Let me give Canada's position:

It has been shown that the expansion of production of wheat in exporting countries and the return to pre-war production of this cereal in Europe resulted in a burdensome surplus of wheat.

I should like the house to listen to these figures:

In 1914, Canadian wheat acreage amounted to 10,000,000 acres. In 1933, Canadian wheat acreage amounted to 26,000,000 acres. While this situation has developed, the 1933 wheat acreage of Europe, where Canada must sell the bulk of her surplus, has reached and surpassed pre-war levels.

That is the story. I shall see if I can obtain a copy of this document and send it to the hon. gentleman, because there is a great deal of information in it; it answers many questions he would like to have answered, and on the back there is a series of charts bringing the figures reasonably down to date.

What did we undertake to do? First, on the best information available, it was concluded that 560,000,000 bushels of wheat would meet the requirements of the wheat importing countries of the world. It was agreed that Canada should have 200,000,000 bushels of that market. This was somewhat larger, some said, than we had a right to. I am bound to say that the attitude of the delegates was one of extreme fairness. They said this: Canada has been increasing its production in a very marked way and if it has 200,000,000 bushels of that market for the season 1933-34, that will not be unfair. But before the agreement was signed, in order that I might have the assistance and benefit of the views of the western provinces themselves, I cabled to western Canada and Mr. MacPherson, after a conference with the three provinces, came to London and with me signed the agreement. This matter is largely one within the jurisdiction of the provinces. On the large matter of trade we as a nation are affected. With respect to the acreage that shall be placed in wheat, the quantity that shall be delivered to the elevators, over those matters the legislatures of the provinces, of course, have control. The pool organizations in the three provinces have all approved of this agreement, Manitoba being the first, Saskatchewan, I think, second, and lastly Alberta. They have approved of the terms of the agreement. Why? Because they realize that any man in business who is confronted with an unsaleable surplus should so regulate his affairs as to reduce that surplus to the point where his future production will meet the requirements of those to whom he has to sell.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the Prime Minister if the agreement is in force at the present time—

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, the agreement is in force at the present time. We are this year operating on the two hundred million quota for Canada, subject of course to increase in certain contingencies. That is the position of affairs at the moment. That is, the crop year that ends on July 31, 1934, is to witness the marketing by Canada of not more than 200,000,000 bushels of wheat. As far as we can at present ascertain there will be less than that quantity required by the importing countries.

I would like to direct attention to one or two further considerations. If the provinces desire that the national government shall assist them to attain a given end, that end not being within their competence, I look upon it as the duty of the national government, the matter being of such importance, to lend assistance. The national government did so, by acting as I have indicated. It is apparent to any thoughtful man who takes the trouble to read the information available, and from the survey that has been made by a Canadian, Mr. Cairns, the secretary of the advisory committee that was set up to remain constantly in action, the position is just as it was in August only that some of the countries in Europe have produced a somewhat larger quantity of wheat than was expected.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has Russia come in yet?

Mr. BENNETT: Russia executed the agreement, yes. It was left to the exporting countries to determine the extent of the Russian quota on the assumption that 560,000,000 bushels would be the entire quantity imported by the importing countries. Russia contended that she had a larger quantity to sell than the other countries said was available for export. I believe Russia has exported some 25,000,000 bushels so far during the present crop year, and in every respect the provisions of the agreement with respect to the exporting countries have been observed. The report read to this house yesterday by the right hon. gentleman from the Citizen, is, I think, manifestly unfair. It was obviously a statement made up by a reporter. He gave no warrant in any sense for what he had written, and I say it was not a correct statement of the situation. When the provincial premiers were here we did discuss this matter, except that Mr. MacPherson represented Saskatchewan and not Mr. Anderson, who was busy with the Minister of Finance at the moment. The conclusions at which we arrived after the fullest investigation were that nothing had transpired that in any sense improved the situation over what it was when the agreements were made. The provinces remain firm in their conviction that the only way in which they can meet these difficulties is by seeing that the surplus is absorbed, which means that they will lessen their production.

Mr. BROWN: Would the Prime Minister give particulars of the methods employed by the government in putting the agreement into force, as he says they are doing?

Mr. BENNETT: There is no necessity for employing any methods at the moment, because until there is some indication that the two hundred million will be exceeded business goes on in its ordinary way. There has been no restriction of any kind because the demand has not been such as would require it.

Mr. DONNELLY: Does the shipping year end in July?

Mr. BENNETT: No, but they adjust their business as of that date, because as the hon. gentleman knows it is summer in one country when it is winter in another. All these adjustments have been taken into consideration in arriving at the agreement.

Mr. VALLANCE: Would the Prime Minister tell us how much the carry-over of Canada is this year?

Mr. BENNETT: The carry-over of Canada began to accumulate in 1929. Those of you who recall what took place at the opening of parliament that year will remember that in the speech from the throne the Prime Minister of the day indicated that the major part of the wheat crop of the year was still in the hands of the Canadian people. The accumulated surplus exceeded 200,000,000 bushels, as the hon. gentleman knows better than I, beginning to accumulate in 1929. Last year we spoke of it as 220,000,000 bushels, the figure being, I think, some 219,000,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the Prime Minister one question before he leaves this subject? I ask it because I find difficulty in discovering an answer. How does it come that Canada is bound by an agreement which vitally affects the agricultural policy of the whole country, and which agreement this House of Commons has not had opportunity either to approve or to consider?

Mr. BENNETT: In exactly the same way as delegates from this country negotiated the West Indies agreement, that involves us in a loss of a million dollars a year. The executive charged with responsibility discharges its duties as such, and comes back to parliament and asks for vindication and support. If it does not receive it it goes out of office; if it does, it remains in office. In the case of the West Indies agreement, negotiated by the right hon. gentleman and his friends, they negotiated a contract which involved this country in certain obligations that affected the whole country because the taxpayers have to pay about a million dollars a year as a result of it. This is done in the same way as all obligations and agreements are entered into by the executive.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If parliament had had or were to have opportunity to approve the agreement there might be some force in what the Prime Minister says. But apparently the agreement is in force now, and this house has not approved its provisions and has had no opportunity to consider it in any particular, nor is it likely to have such opportunity.

Mr. BENNETT: So were the others in force, as soon as the contracts were made for the building of the ships and matters of that kind. As a matter of fact it is a question whether this agreement requires the approval of parliament; I am rather advised that it does not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the Prime Minister intend to submit it for approval?

Mr. BENNETT: That I have not decided, because it may or may not be necessary.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We will surely have a chance to discuss it in the house?

Mr. BENNETT: There is the widest opportunity for discussion in connection with the estimates, and to make any motion thought desirable for that purpose.

Mr. YOUNG: The Prime Minister made a statement a few moments ago that a way had been found of growing wheat in France much more cheaply than formerly. Can he give any figures as to production costs there?

Mr. BENNETT: The information obviously would be available, but I do not carry it in my head, I hardly expected to be asked questions of that kind now. I dare say the hon. gentleman himself has a fair knowledge of what production costs have been since nitrates have been taken from the atmosphere by an electrical process instead of being imported from Chile. But I have no figures before me.

[Mr. Bennett.]

I shall not discuss this matter at greater length beyond saying that it will be within the memory of most hon. members that the former Minister of Trade and Commerce stated that the question of the sale of wheat was not one with respect to which the Department of Trade and Commerce could offer any assistance. He said the federal government could not do that, that it was a matter of supply and demand. We have ventured into the field because the provinces concerned as units of this confederation have asked our assistance, and while personally I have always felt that these are matters which must be considered and dealt with as part of a broad world plan, it is quite apparent that in dealing with questions of wheat there are only four exporting countries, and if the importing countries are going to take the position they have taken I believe it is the duty of the dominion to lend any assistance it can. So far as that is concerned we will be very happy indeed to afford any further information which may be necessary, as it is not clear that it is essential that the agreement should be submitted to parliament for ratification, involving as it does the jurisdiction of the provinces and, to a more limited extent, that of the dominion. At the moment the provinces have expressed their view that the effect of the grasshopper plague and the drought will be such as automatically to bring about a reduction in acreage which will be somewhat less than that provided for by agreement. Because of that fact it is difficult to express any very definite opinion as to what might or what might not have to be done. This, however, I should like to say: I did not think yesterday that the right hon. gentleman did himself justice when he endeavoured to parody a well known prayer from the Anglican prayer book. I did not think so, and I do not now. I am not unfamiliar with the position to which he was referring. I, too, have received communications from those who believe it is wicked and contrary to God's will to interfere with the production of a country. I was not unfamiliar with the matter to which the right hon. gentleman referred. In one instance, however, after pointing out the facts which I have related, I received from the correspondent a reply which indicated entire agreement with the view expressed. Because people pray for peace in our time it does not follow that in times of peril they do not make good soldiers. And because we pray for plenty there is no reason why we might not have to take disciplinary measures to ensure it. Upon reflection I cannot but think the right hon. gentleman will feel he has not done justice to himself and to the high position he occupies when, in cold type, he reviews his effort to burlesque, parody, and place on Hansard a very serious prayer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was not burlesquing a prayer; the burlesque concerned the government.

Mr. BENNETT: It was a parody of a prayer from the Prayer Book, put in the mouth of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), and I say that it came as near an approach to blasphemy as I have ever heard in this House of Commons.

Then, there is another matter to which perhaps I should refer, and that is that in the last speech from the throne the right hon. gentleman himself prepared, which was delivered on February 20, 1930, these words occur:

> The dominion is already recovering from the seasonal slackness evident at the end of the year, and it is not to be forgotten that the bulk of the 1929 wheat crop still remains in Canadian hands for final disposition.

Just why the country should be proud of the fact that it could not sell its wheat, I do not know. However, the right hon. gentleman saw fit to put words in the speech from the throne indicating that up to that time his government had not been able to find markets for Canadian wheat, that he was conscious of the fact, and that the Canadian producers still had on their hands for final disposition the bulk of the 1929 wheat crop. Well, I am bound to say it has remained there, substantially, in that form or from the production of other years, ever since. That is the position. It was at that time the condition arose, and as I indicated it had reached its culminating point last year, when we dealt with it.

Then, the right hon. gentleman referred to rural credits. I think it well to say only this, that the right hon. gentleman doubtless had in his mind his own efforts in that direction. During the period we sat in conference with the provinces it was quite apparent that the efforts to set up short term and intermediate rural credits had been going on indefinitely for a period of twenty-five, thirty or forty years, and that those efforts had not been successful. Various reasons were advanced as to why it had not been possible. It is possible that upon ultimate analysis it will be found that in the older countries there has been no accumulation of capital, at low rates of interest, available for that purpose. I find in the speech from the throne delivered on January 8, 1926, the following:

> While it is of importance to attract new settlers it is equally, if not more important, to assist those who are already established on the land by reducing the cost of agricultural production. To this end a measure will be introduced offering wide facilities for rural credits.

Will any hon. member in this chamber say he has felt the effect of the wide facilities for rural credits established in 1926? Will anybody in this country say that those wide facilities were established? Although hon. members opposite held office from 1926 to 1930, and although the right hon. gentleman opposite promised legislation in that year, will he say that at the time he went out of office these wide facilities had been established? He knows now, as perhaps he did not know when he prepared that speech from the throne, the difficulties of establishing cheap money credits for the farming population on short and intermediate terms. Hon. gentlemen in the corner opposite who have given much attention to this matter know from what has transpired from year to year in committees of the house how difficult it is to find any solution for the problem. The matter has engaged the attention of the officers of the Department of Finance. The best minds they have been able to secure to assist them have been made available, and provincial officers have discussed the matter with the federal authorities. I can say only this, however, that while I do not feel too sanguine that an adequate solution will be found, I believe some solution will be found which will be beneficial to the rural population. That is all which I believe can usefully be said in that connection.

I now pass to another matter, and then I have finished with this particular phase of my remarks. The right hon. gentleman dealt with the problem of unemployment relief, and the attitude taken by the Prime Minister with respect to the provinces. I find that in 1922 the right hon. gentleman was confronted with a problem of unemployment. In the speech from the throne delivered on March 9 of that year I find the following:

> In many parts of the dominion continued depression of business naturally produced in a much larger degree than usual the misfortune of unemployment. Whilst of the opinion that unemployment relief is fundamentally a municipal and provincial responsibility, my government has felt that as conditions have arisen in a measure out of the late war, they would be justified in continuing for the period of the winter months the expedient of supplementing by grants from the federal treasury the relief contributions of provinces and municipalities for the purpose of alleviating actual distress.

Further, I find the following in an order in council passed on January 25, 1922:

The present administration, assuming office at the close of the year 1921, finds that a condition of unemployment beginning in the late months of 1920 and continuing throughout the year 1921 does not promise any material abatement during the early winter months of 1922.

Consideration has been given to the means which would seem best adapted to the relief of the distress resulting from severe unemployment conditions, and the provisions to this end of P.C. 3831 have been carefully noted.

The minister concurs in the view that the question of unemployment relief is fundamentally a municipal and provincial responsibility; that the abnormal economic and industrial conditions now existing and arising in a measure out of the late war alone afford justification for action on the part of the federal authorities; that federal action must therefore supplement municipal and provincial efforts—

I repeat the words "must supplement"— —must be designed on lines permitting close and effective cooperation with and supervision by municipal and provincial authorities, and must be proportioned by the efforts of those authorities.

That was the declaration made by the right hon. gentleman in the order in council P.C. 191, dated January 25, 1922, and I say to him that it is not correct now any more than it would have been correct then to say that the relief that is being given in municipalities by provinces themselves or the relief carried on by the municipalities is federal relief, because it is not. The federal government by grants in aid is assisting the provinces to carry on their constitutional obligations, just as in 1922 the right hon. gentleman in that order in council declared that to be so. So when you refer to direct relief or to doles in this country I should like this house at the very threshold of the session to understand that in no sense was that ever imposed by the federal government on the provinces.

The provinces met together in 1931 with the federal government and said that the only method by which they could continue to discharge their duties was through direct relief. They said the same in 1932. They met again here in 1933, and again the other day. In 1933 they suggested that something might be done further with respect to public works and undertakings with the assistance of the federal power. In 1934 they said the same thing.

With respect to commissions they claimed, the larger provinces in particular, that they were not prepared to hand over the conduct of their provincial and local affairs to any federal commission that we might set up; that they themselves were masters in their own house and would discharge their own constitutional duties, and they sought and obtained from us assistance based on the actual necessities of the situation. All the provinces have received assistance, not the western provinces alone, but the rich great provinces of the central part of Canada, Quebec and Ontario, have also demanded their share on the same basis as the others and have received it; and they have assumed responsibility for administration. We have told them, and I am repeating what I said to them the other day, that in some instances we are not satisfied with their administration. We told them that we intended to impose conditions on grants being given unless there was evidence of better administration. That we have a right to do, and I think you will agree that it should be done. The same conditions that in a smaller way confronted the government of the day in 1922 confronted this government when in an effort to relieve the situation by means of public works and undertakings—to which I shall presently refer, for they also are dealt with in the same order in council—we asked the municipalities and the provinces to give their assistance, as they did. At page 2 of the order in council which I have just read, the then government of the day set out the conditions under which it proposed to give assistance for the purpose of enabling necessary works to be constructed, even at a higher cost. We have believed that it was not wise or provident to spend moneys on public works under conditions where the cost would be out of all proportion to the results obtained during the winter season.

The camps that have been set up under the Department of National Defence and providing food and clothing and shelter and twenty cents per day for fifteen thousand people or more brought the warmest encomiums upon their administration from the premier of Quebec. Without divulging anything that took place at the conference, I may say that he made that abundantly clear both publicly and privately, and the same might be said of the camps carried on by the Parks branch.

With respect to other undertakings carried on by the provinces to which federal assistance is given, it is of course difficult in the three prairie provinces to provide public works and undertakings in a season like this. When the right hon. gentleman says that the government must submit in broad and general outline, and perhaps in detail, what it proposes to do, I can assure him that that is exactly what is intended to be done, because it is not our purpose to undertake to spend x sums of money without regard to where it may be spent—not at all. But it is believed that, within limits, essential undertakings can be accomplished by the dominion for the purpose of doing something towards finding employment for that class of the population that is not absorbable in industrial activity. But when you have regard to the seasonal changes in this country; when you recall its economic history; when you remember that the bureau of statistics has indicated that the average of unemployment for the whole of Canada year after year before 1930, prior to this depression coming upon us, amounted to about 144,000 people—that was the average that came about through seasonal changes—and when you remember the conditions under which west of the great lakes men become unemployed after the harvest is garnered, and how in the cities and towns there is unemployment when construction work is ended—it will be realized that with those conditions before us the effort that is being made is an effort, in that season of the year when the work can best be done and the best results obtained, to see that public works of a limited character are carried on.

Again I desire to point out that the criticisms urged by the right hon. gentleman against these schemes are criticisms made of the very same effort which he himself and his government made when they came into office in 1922. We were confronted in 1930 with conditions under which sums of money were voted for the purpose of enabling public works and undertakings to be carried on. Level crossings were built and public buildings erected in various cities and towns by the joint effort of the provinces, the municipalities and the dominion; and when the provinces and the municipalities met together in conference and indicated, as they did, their inability further to continue along the lines suggested, we carried out the plan that had been adopted by the late government—the only plan that could be carried out in view of the financial stringency and the difficulty of the provinces in finding means with which to carry on—and that was the giving of grants in aid. What is more, when they met the other day there was a feeling on the part of some that some provinces had not been as economical and as careful as they should have been, that they made larger expenditures in the past than they should have made, and there was quite a critical attitude especially with respect to the four western provinces. But when they heard the story firsthand from those responsible for government, when they realized that these western provinces were not responsible for the hundreds and thousands who were brought in from abroad and landed there as new settlers, calling for roads and schools and facilities of various kinds; when they realized that the western provinces were not responsible for the charters granted to railroads that imposed further burdens upon them, they unanimously passed resolution No. 4 which will be found upon the sheet laid on the table the other day, that under special circumstances special consideration should be given some of the provinces in this confederation.

We have advanced them money, loaned them money borrowed from the people of Canada. We have endeavoured to maintain their credit because we believed that for the maintenance of the credit of the unit as a whole it was necessary to maintain the credit of each of the factor units that made the whole, and to that extent so far we have been successful.

It well may be that in dealing with large questions of finance in this country—I believe it will be—we must impose upon ourselves cruel disciplinary measures and make a very large conversion loan, but in view of the conditions that exist that cannot be done at any moment you think it is desirable so to do. So many factors have to be considered and so many matters determined that I can only say that in my judgment it will be some time before this country will be in a position to carry that forward.

But I do deprecate the attitude taken by some of those who represent the provinces. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) speaking in Calgary the other evening said:

> In British Columbia the government will offer to pay its creditors a reasonable rate of interest, and they will be told they can take their money elsewhere if they are not prepared to accept that rate.

That is how it is reported in the press. But Mr. Speaker we cannot repudiate without destroying our credit; we cannot default without destroying our credit and the burden that comes upon the central power by reason of the enormous obligations contracted by the western provinces indeed places us in a most difficult position. But after threshing the matter out as we did the other day involving certain curtailments of expenditures, I believe it will be found that there are no reckless expenditures going forward at this time but that men are being provided with shelter, food and clothing, and with some employment under conditions that preserve their morale and give them at least a few cents per day for the effort which they are making. I believe that has commended itself to the judgment of observers in other parts of the world. That is all I can usefully say with respect to that.

There is one thing more with respect to the question raised yesterday regarding the central bank. I do not desire to take a great deal of time in traversing this matter, but what I endeavoured to say in London, Ontario, I repeat here, and it is wholly consistent with what took place. When I realized for the first time that this Dominion of Canada could not carry on direct exchange operations with London for any substantial amounts except through Wall street, I personally was of the opinion that this country should have a central bank. A central organization is essential for the purpose of maintaining exchange rates and proper balances. That did not indicate in any sense that the government had so concluded; it was my personal conclusion. I recorded it the other day in London, Ontario, during the course of my speech there. We said last year in this house—I said it in 1932—that we believed the matter would require careful consideration at the next revision of the Bank Act. I thought so then and I think so yet. It is not important what one thinks or does not think with relation to it, but it cannot be gainsaid that it was desirable that an opportunity should be afforded to the Canadian people to present their views on this matter to a commission which represented every phase of thought with respect to financial matters. The banking interests were there, the agricultural interests were there, and what might be called the non-partisan judicial interests were there. An opportunity was presented to all. While I deprecate very strongly the statement read yesterday as to what took place at the conference in London, England, far be it from me to suggest that for a single moment was I responsible for the shaping of any resolution. I voted for that resolution and it was unanimous. I am sorry if through an inadvertence a newspaper reporter has made it appear that I endeavoured to accept any credit for that resolution. I merely voted for it as I believed it was desirable that in countries such as this—there are some others—there should be a central banking authority.

The bill to be presented to this house is not any effort on the part of the government to snatch glory or advantage from their opponents; it is because I believe, with the knowledge I now possess, that twenty years ago there should have been a central bank in Canada. That is a matter of profound conviction at the moment. I trust that the bill to be submitted to the consideration of this house will receive the careful attention which is essential to its successful operation. I think it is quite clear to everyone that we must have such an organization. However, it will not discharge all the functions which some people think it will. It will not give every man money whether or not he has security.

I quite agree with what the right hon. gentleman has said with respect to conditions in western Canada. I lived thirty years of my life in western Canada. I have seen a man with little capital, with practically nothing but his own hands and courage, go upon a homestead and accumulate a great competence and leave a fairly substantial fortune behind him. Across the road I have seen another man take another piece of land equally good, and turn out to be an abject failure. You cannot in the west, any more than in the east, estimate what the differences between individuals are that bring success or failure to their undertakings. One succeeds, the other does not. The hail takes one, the other escapes. The grasshoppers destroy the crops of one while they miss the crops of the other. One succeeds, the other fails. Ever since I have been in western Canada there has been an insistent demand for the loosening of credit. Sometimes I have said to the people of western Canada, as I have said in this chamber, that the banker who would lend indiscriminately the money of his depositors would be untrue to his trust by so doing. Sometimes men have the idea that they should be loaned money simply because they are alive, regardless of any other consideration than their own necessities. After all, a bank holds the money of its depositors in trust, and it cannot lend that money to those who have neither character nor possessions to support their applications for loans. These things must be dealt with upon a business basis.

An effort is now being made to launch a central bank in this country so that credit may be available for the banks under conditions which I trust will be satisfactory. It must not be forgotten that the provisions of the Finance Act provide for many credit facilities which were satisfactory but complaint has been made in days past that fundamentally it did not strike at the very roots of a central reserve bank, of exchange, of international balances and of stability. The world is suffering to-day from a lack of stability in its currencies and in its exchanges, and it is my view, rightly or wrongly—it is the view expressed the other day by Mr. Ramsay

MacDonald—that there can be no return to a permanent prosperity until such time as there is stability of exchanges between the nations of the world. How can it be otherwise? If I buy to-day in sterling and I find it is worth $5, and thirty days from now when my obligations mature, I find it is worth $4.80, or vice versa, how can I hope to have business firmly and steadily established? These are facts that we must consider. It is no more possible for us to solve these problems by mere words than it is by taking thought to add a cubit unto our stature.

There are great forces in the world which we do not control, forces under the control of the millions of the world. We are but ten and a half millions. We are doing our part, but I am sure that these great forces will bring their power to bear ultimately to settle and agree upon the valuation of currencies in order that the world may continue its international business. Hon. members will recall a speech made not long since by Mr. Owen D. Young. He spoke at one of our great universities and he pointed out that probably the future international trade of the world would rest not with our manufactured commodities as much as it would with our luxuries and primary products. Along with other countries, Canada has become a great industrial country. All countries are endeavouring to utilize their raw materials and develop them into finished products. Where a market existed thirty years ago, there is none to-day; where one existed ten years ago, there is none to-day. We are endeavouring to supply our own wants and other countries are doing the same. Changes are taking place everywhere which restrict and limit the ambit of our influence with respect to international trade. It is not possible for us to sell our commodities in countries that can produce the same commodity more cheaply than we can. Mr. Young was of the opinion that having regard to the changed conditions, we would be limited in the international field more or less to the sale of luxuries and raw commodities. That is the reason why stability of currencies is so overwhelmingly important, and I trust that the central bank we set up may play its part in bringing about that end.

I do not think I can usefully say anything more about this phase of the discussion, but before I leave it I want to refer to one matter, in connection with a guarantee given by the government of the day to enable the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to discharge its obligations. This parliament vested the executive with power. It was not power usurped, it was power conferred. Those opposite were opposed to the granting of that power and authority. But this is fundamentally the keynote of the policies of the United States to-day, that the executive has had conferred upon it power and authority in a manner and to an extent never before known. Why? Because emergencies arise from moment to moment which must be dealt with promptly. You cannot set in motion the complex machinery of a parliament or a congress at a moment's notice; the thing must be accomplished by special action. The government that does it must accept the judgment of this house or of congress, as the case may be. If it errs, it will be condemned; if it is wrong, it will reap the punishment of its wrong acts. But if in the discharge of its duties it has kept the public interest always in sight, has used its best judgment, and has seen to it that honesty and integrity shall characterize its transactions, then at least I believe that the House of Commons as well as the people of the country will say that that condition, arising as it has, should be dealt with promptly. In that regard I should like this house, on the very threshold of the session, to understand how difficult indeed it is for this country to carry on where money is required. We have but limited revenues and but a limited population from which to draw them; we have but limited wealth. We have no accumulations of wealth as the older countries have, and, what is more, we must bear in mind the vast aggregation of responsibilities incurred by Canada in the great war, by which we pledged the future to an extent far beyond the general understanding of the people of that day. The future was pledged to an extent which means that to-day our debt is nearly three billions of dollars, and we have a second debt—because debts are measured by the sums on which you have to pay interest to those who lend; we have therefore a second debt in connection with the railways, of nearly one billion dollars. Under these circumstances you can see why it is that we cannot spend millions as our great neighbour can spend billions. When they have exhausted their program to the extent of twenty billions more they will not have a debt, per capita, as large as that of Canada.

Let it be clearly understood that this country has imposed upon it limitations because of the conditions created in the past, and obligations incurred. With respect to the railway situation, the right hon. gentleman yesterday said that more lines of railway were built under the Conservative than under the Liberal administration. I wonder if he realized precisely what that meant. Of course, the last act in the last session of the Liberal government of 1911 was to guarantee the Canadian Northern Ontario bonds, and the road was not finished until years after—finished in the days of their successors. The road was kept in construction as long as possible; for so long as it was in the construction period it could pay interest out of the bond guarantee proceeds, and not otherwise. Therefore they kept it in the construction period as long as possible. But when these miles of road passed into the operating stage we had the Grand Trunk Pacific bankrupt from the day the rails were laid. We had the National Transcontinental, which was to cost thirteen millions, according to Hansard, but cost as a matter of fact hundreds of millions, and which did not earn the money with which to paint the stations. Then too there was the bridge across the St. Lawrence, built twice. All these are part of it, and my complaint in Toronto the other day was that the Liberal party asked the people of the country for support in the light of the fact that during the past their view was so circumscribed, so limited, that they could not see that a population such as ours could not support three transcontinental roads. My complaint was not that we had a system competing with the Canadian Pacific Railway; far from it. Everyone realized that we could support a second road, not in this chamber but in the chamber that stood upon these foundations, Andrew G. Blair, pointed out the inevitable result. He was not listened to, nor were others who pointed out the same thing listened to. These were voices crying in the wilderness. But, sir, we are now reaping the whirlwind; we cannot escape it. We have three transcontinentals. We have the Canadian Northern, built up as it was by the guarantees of parliament, up to Edmonton. I remember the day of the opening there. Then British Columbia stepped in and guaranteed the bonds of the Canadian Northern in British Columbia down to the sea coast. Further, we had the Grand Trunk Pacific from Winnipeg to Prince Rupert, and then the National Transcontinental, from Winnipeg to Moncton, crossing the St. Lawrence river. We had the old Grand Trunk linking up with the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern; for instead of linking up these two systems together, without giving a charter for a third, instead of endeavouring to do what sound business men would do, the cry was, "We cannot wait." And so we plunged ourselves into the venture for two more transcontinentals, with the result that all three were destroyed.

Every morning as I go to my work I pass the statue of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and I pay tribute to the fact that his disinterested patriotism was known to all men; he desired to do what was best for Canada. But the fact is that he did not foresee, when he and his government pledged their support to the construction of two transcontinentals in addition to the one we then had, that this meant certain and sure insolvency to the roads themselves. I do not claim any vision, but I can say that I stood in the hall at Calgary and pointed this out and was denounced as a pessimist. Governments must lead, but they are pushed on by people; and the people of this country in those days, with capital coming in and money being spent, said, "Never mind the morrow." But the morrow has come, and the difficulty that your government experiences at this time is that the limitations imposed upon us by the debts of Canada, incurred alike for the railways and for the great war, place upon us responsibilities that cannot be lightly discharged and that prevent us from taking those forward looking measures which, with capital and credit, we should like to take. Every thoughtful Canadian knows that. And that brings to my mind one thing more.

I hear it said that the late government reduced the national debt of Canada. Well, they did reduce the bonded debt of the nation, but they increased the indirect debt, so that the interest payments upon the latter exceeded by over one hundred and fifty million dollars the sum total that is represented by the decrease in the debt. Everyone knows that. All you have to do is to take the figures of the increase in the indirect responsibilities in connection with the railway and the reduction in debt during the time of Mr. Robb and his predecessor, and strike a balance and you will find that the test of the debt is the sum upon which you pay interest to borrowers. And we are paying in interest, or we were paying at the end of that period of time, over one hundred and fifty millions more than we were paying at the beginning of the period. These are facts, and I mention them because it is important to have a clear appreciation of the situation.

I have dealt now with all the matters I desire to discuss leading up to what I shall have to say with respect to the guarantee given to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I would ask the right hon. gentleman opposite and hon. members of this house to listen to the reading of this document. I shall be content to make no argument with them as to whether or not any one of them charged with responsibility would have done what this government did:

The committee of the privy council have had before them a joint report, dated November 28, 1933, from the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labour, submitting:

1. That they have had under consideration a request to the government from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for a guarantee of a loan of sixty millions of dollars to be borrowed from:

Bank of Montreal
The Royal Bank of Canada
The Canadian Bank of Commerce
The Bank of Nova Scotia
The Dominion Bank
The Bank of Toronto
The Imperial Bank of Canada and Banque Canadienne Nationale

and to be repaid on or before the 1st day of December, 1938, with interest at the rate of five per centum per annum, payable half-yearly, secured by the deposit with and pledge to the said banks by the said railway company of its perpetual four per cent consolidated debenture stock having a nominal or par value of One Hundred Millions of Dollars.

2. That the amount to be loaned by each of the said several banks to the said railway company is as follows:

Bank of Montreal	$22,444,000
The Royal Bank of Canada	12,280,000
The Canadian Bank of Commerce	10,524,000
The Bank of Nova Scotia	5,180,000
The Dominion Bank	2,808,000
The Bank of Toronto	2,632,000
The Imperial Bank of Canada	2,632,000
Banque Canadienne Nationale	1,500,000
Total	$60,000.000

3. That careful consideration has been given to the request of the said railway company and it appears that the capital obligations and indebtedness payable by the said railway company in the United States of America between the first day of June, 1933, and the first day of December, 1934, amount in the aggregate to $32,788,000. The capital obligations and indebtedness payable in the Dominion of Canada during the same period by the said railway company amount in the aggregate to $27,000,000. Of the said capital obligations and indebtedness of $32,788,000 payable in the United States of America, $2,544,000, part thereof, are payable in either the United States of America or in Great Britain.

4. That the said capital obligations and indebtedness of the said railway company have been incurred in the usual conduct of the business, and it has been the practice of the said railway company to retire its outstanding capital obligations by the sale, from time to time, of its perpetual four per cent consolidated debenture stock, but, under the economic conditions which have prevailed for some time, it has been impossible and is still impossible to sell such perpetual consolidated debenture stock, or any other securities of the said railway company on satisfactory terms, if at all, either in the Dominion of Canada or in the United States of America.

5. That the president of the said railway company recently visited London, England, and has reported that it is impossible to secure permission, under existing economic conditions, to make a public offering of the securities of the said railway company in the United Kingdom; and, apart from the existing governmental prohibition against the sale in the United Kingdom of the securities of private companies or corporations domiciled elsewhere than in the United Kingdom, railway securities (other than domestic) of all kinds are not in demand in the United Kingdom; and, further, that it is not practicable presently to renew the obligations of the said railway company maturing in the United States of America.

6. That after careful investigation it was apparent that the only source from which money could be borrowed by the said railway company to meet its said maturing capital obligations and indebtedness was the chartered banks of Canada, and such banks do not make loans for a period of five years unless they are so adequately secured or guaranteed as to enable the said banks to rediscount or obtain advances on the notes of the borrower and thus render available for the conduct of their ordinary commercial business the whole or such portion of the advances made as may be required; and, under existing economic conditions, with the low level of prices for railway securities, the guarantee of repayment by the Dominion of Canada was necessary if the said loan of $60,000,000 was to be made to the said railway company by the said banks.

7. That the perpetual four per cent consolidated debenture stock of the said railway company is widely distributed in various parts of the world, particularly in the United Kingdom, where the market price thereof has in recent months been as high as 85 per cent of the par value thereof, and, in the opinion of the ministers, failure by the said railway company to pay and discharge its said capital obligations and indebtedness at maturity would create a situation injurious to the credit and financial position of the dominion.

8. That, under the provisions of the Relief Act, 1933, the governor in council is authorized and empowered to loan or advance money to or guarantee the payment of money by any public body, corporation or undertaking, and in respect of such loans, advances and guarantees, may accept such security, enter into such agreements, and generally do all such things as the governor in council may deem necessary and expedient in the public interest; and to take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to protect and maintain the credit and financial position of Canada.

9. That the said railway company is a public corporation carrying on its operations not only in Canada but in other parts of the world; and, in the opinion of the ministers, under present disturbed economic conditions, it is desirable, to prevent default by the said railway company in discharging its said capital obligations and indebtedness as they mature, and in the public interest, to grant the request of the said railway company as a measure for the protection and maintenance of the credit and financial position of Canada.

The ministers, therefore, recommend that the Minister of Finance be authorized and empowered to enter into an agreement with each of the said eight chartered banks, guaranteeing payment to such bank of the sum mentioned in the said agreement, being the amount loaned or to be loaned by the said bank to the said railway company, as hereinbefore mentioned, with interest at the rate of five per cent per annum, payable half-yearly, in the following general form.

The form is the same in all cases and I do not think it is necessary to take the time to read the form except these words:

The crown hereby guarantees the repayment to the bank at maturity of the whole or the then unpaid balances of the loans made or to be made by the bank to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

And in the event of default provision is made for taking possession of the securities.

Mr. POULIOT: Much worse than the Canadian Northern deal.

Mr. BENNETT: The position is this, that the capital expenditures of the railway company, as I have said, had in times past been made and I recall very clearly that they were made in connection with branch line construction because the company had substantial cash surplus balances. They made those expenditures, such as on the Royal York hotel, steamships and so forth, hoping and believing that they could sell their debenture stock. Then came 1930 and the following years and the capital obligations borrowed from banks in Canada and the United States to the extent indicated in the order in council, and having been renewed, when the crisis came again, fell due. The company could do one of two things: should they default or should they not? Some hon. members are familiar with financial transactions in Great Britain and probably know the four per cent perpetual debenture stock of the Canadian Pacific ranks higher than any other security that this country has issued apart from its national securities. This stock is held largely by trustees and family settlements. It is held in the United States; it is held in Canada. What would be the effect upon Canada of default? The government had to consider that question. The president of the railway company went to England. The right hon. gentleman wondered about the delay and and I said that if he had read the document he would see that the fact is that it was put off from time to time in the hope that conditions might clarify in either the United States or Great Britain and an opportunity to sell the securities would arise. The president visited Great Britain at the time I was there and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) was there. It was impossible to secure permission to make any issue there and an issue in the United States under the Securities Act was, with the then situation of railroads, also impossible. It must be remembered that the United States has advanced hundreds of millions of dollars under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation from advances made by the nation on borrowings, to its railways, the New York Central, the Pennsylvania and the other great systems of that country. In the light of those facts, we decided to make this grant.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister has just said that it was in August that the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway was in England and unable to accomplish what he hoped he might be able to. How does it happen that it was as late as November 29 before the order in council was passed?

Mr. BENNETT: I can easily explain that. The obligations maturing on December 1, it did not become necessary to close out the transaction until then. That is the reason for the order in council being passed on November 29, because the money had to be available on December 1.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Were the banks, as early as, say the month of August, given to understand that the government would guarantee the loan?

Mr. BENNETT: The banks were given to understand that if all other efforts failed the company would have to get the money from them and a guarantee would be given.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would that be as early as the month of May?

Mr. BENNETT: My memory is that it would not be May. My memory is that it was much later than that. At any rate, as I have said, my memory is that it was August. The right hon. gentleman speaks of August, and that is my recollection.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He left Canada on July 30.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it was July. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre was there at the time. I recall that he sailed on the same ship. At that time it was apparent that the government would guarantee the advance, but the money was not required until December 1, although part of the maturity, I think, had been paid before that date, but the order in council was not passed until November 29, as I have indicated. That was the transaction. If hon. members think the government is censurable for the step it took, it will, of course, have to abide by the consequences. I need hardly say that this action was taken reluctantly. I need hardly say that the closest examination was given to ascertain where these capital obligations had been created and what they represented. It is a matter of satisfaction to believe that within the time limited there will be no liability upon this country. And if there is, the four per cent consolidated debenture stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company empowers its holders on default to take possession of the system. It is a very distinctive kind of security, and it was upon that security the banks made their advances in order that if business improves within that time not only might the money be available for commercial purposes by rediscounting, but the fullest opportunity would be given during that period of time for the railway company to readjust its financial position.

The only other matter that remains to be discussed is that having to do with honours and awards. I had not thought that I would take up so much time in my efforts to answer so many matters brought to the attention of the house at the beginning of the session. In view of the fact that it is within a few minutes of six o'clock I would ask your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, and conclude on the matter of honours and awards after recess.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, there are two matters I should mention before taking up the question of honours and awards. Yesterday the right hon. gentleman referred to a statement made by me in Montreal upon my return from Great Britain in which I had indicated that Canada could not experiment with hours of labour and rates of pay. What I was dealing with, of course, was the question of export trade, and while I did not at that time, I did later state that the question of hours of labour and compensation and matters of that sort had been settled by a conference called by the League of Nations, and that the provinces had been charged with jurisdiction in that regard.

It has been said that the law has not been enforced by the provinces, and a reference to the order paper will show that it is proposed to ascertain to what extent the laws with respect to hours of labour and compensation have been observed in Canada by the provinces. The extent to which the sweating process may have obtained in the provinces is a matter over which the dominion has no jurisdiction. I endeavoured to point out at some length that experiments could not be practised by a country in our position. The all-important matter to which I did refer, and which does not appear in the report, was that we were a debtor nation, and that while a creditor nation might do almost anything it pleased, being under no necessity to consider matters external to its own country with respect to credit, currency, stability or matters of that kind, the Dominion of Canada, being a debtor country, was compelled by the very nature of things to give consideration to them to an extent other nations did not find necessary. This is true especially of the great republic to the south of us, which is a creditor nation.

I desire also to make some observations with respect to what was said yesterday concerning my remarks in Toronto. I do not think that the right hon. gentleman could have done it purposely, but the fact is that he misrepresented the situation. Although I remained silent while the right hon. gentleman read what I was supposed to have said that evening, upon looking at Toronto journals I find that the statements made in the paper from which he quoted were, as I knew, completely inaccurate. I took the trouble to inquire of one who was sitting not far from me at that gathering as to what had taken place. I did give credit to George Brown for having assisted in bringing about confederation. I said that shortly after confederation he had left Macdonald and then I pointed to the position of the Liberal party led by Mr. Blake, to the building of the Canadian Pacific, and the rounding out of the confederation by extending it to the Pacific slope. I think upon comparison of reports appearing in Toronto papers with that read by the right hon. gentleman it will be seen that an injustice was done to me in that particular. Newspapers having to make summaries quickly, in the very nature of things one who speaks with rapidity, as I usually do, is on the following day likely to find himself reported somewhat at variance with what he said. I fancy the right hon. gentleman himself must have observed that frequently. It is not that the newspaper reporters are not fair, but it is due to the inability to compress into a few sentences an address which may have taken thirty or forty minutes to deliver. I make this observation only because I have always endeavoured to pay full tribute to those who brought about confederation by yielding their own strong personal convictions to a compromise view in order that confederation might become an accomplished fact. What I have said, and undoubtedly will continue to say so far as I am at present advised, is that those who study dispassionately the history of Canada will realize that it has been the party with which I have the honour to be associated that had to bear responsibility for great national endeavours resulting in bringing to a successful conclusion the federation of the provinces, a national policy, and that ultimately responsibility has usually rested with the Conservative party at times of great crises, such as the great war and other occasions to which references might be made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope the Prime Minister has made it evident, and that he is clear in his own mind, that I quoted from an Ottawa paper, exactly as I read it.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it was the Ottawa Journal. Not for one moment would I suggest that the right hon. gentleman did not read what was in the paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I read the article in the first instance in the Ottawa Citizen, and was so astonished that I looked up the Journal report, and found that it was similar. I used the Journal report intentionally so as to do the Prime Minister full justice.

Mr. BENNETT: Undoubtedly it was a Canadian Press dispatch. I took the trouble to look at the reports in the Montreal Star, in the Evening Telegram of Toronto, in the Mail and Empire and in the Toronto Globe. There is a lengthy report in the Globe as to what I said with respect to Mr. Blake. There is also an extended report in the Mail and Empire. It will be observed that the summary is not a fair summary of what I said. In order to make definitely certain I conferred with those who were there and heard my remarks. Not long since I was attacked venomously in one newspaper on the basis of a statement copied from another which was wholly at variance with what had been said. Fortunately I had spoken on the radio, and therefore was able to contradict the statement made in the press. That is one of the reasons radio becomes of extraordinary value, because usually there are people behind it who can take down what may have been said and are able to verify the correctness of summaries.

I believe I have dealt with the matters to which attention was directed by the right hon. gentleman, with the exception of his reference to honours and awards. There is standing on the order paper a resolution in the name of the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell), the discussion upon which could hardly be anticipated in its entirety. I purpose however to endeavour to indicate to this chamber that the action taken was to save the House of Commons from being unjustly attacked. I will not to-night discuss the question of honours and awards from the standpoint of their desirability; I will only say this, that in all nations there is usually recognition by the state in some form or another of those who render persistent and continuous service to it. It may be a humble service that they render, or it may be a very exalted one. There have been many men and women in all walks of life who have believed that recognition by the head of the state of services rendered is a proper act on the part of the chief executive. Those who remember the life of Nelson will recall his views on that subject. Those who recall the life of Lord Curzon will remember a speech he delivered in the House of Lords complaining of the scanty recognition of his services which, he said, was wholly at variance with the general custom which had been followed. There is in a new democracy a fairly widespread belief that those who make a statement to the effect that they believe in these things are subject to ridicule on the ground that the basis of their belief is a desire to be recognized themselves. That is usually the difficulty in new democracies; it has been so in days gone by. In this very country, from the earliest days of the establishment of responsible government, the crown in the person of the sovereign has granted awards and honours to those who have served the state in whatever capacity they may have served. The fathers of confederation, it will be recalled, were honoured, some being Companions of the Bath, others Knights Commanders, Sir George Cartier ultimately being made a baronet. These are matters of history. It will also be recalled that in 1802 Napoleon established the Legion of Honour, of four grades, and those in this country who wear on the lapel of their coat the insignia of that honour value it very highly. Honours of other countries are conferred upon Canadians as a matter of courtesy. Some of the great nations of the earth have named Canadians for services rendered as vice-consuls or for some particular service that may have been rendered, whatever it may be. There are illustrations of that about us everywhere. The late Chief Justice of Canada and the late Speaker of the House of Commons were honoured by being made Knights Commanders of St. Gregory the Great. Those who will look at the reports of the Supreme Court of Canada will find the indication of that honour after the name of the late chief justice. These are facts that are known to all of us, as well as within the British Empire, the recognition by the sovereign of those who have rendered signal service—legal, military or naval service, or perhaps for the establishment of a great art building, of which an illustration I have in mind is the Tate gallery in London. You will find many instances in an old country of people who have been ennobled by the sovereign for such services rendered. Whether or not there should be created a claim that is satisfied only by wealth is another matter altogether. Most people believe that any effort to recognize the services only of wealthy persons and to make material positions the criterion of the determination of merit and service to the state is wrong. I am one of them. I believe that every citizen of the British Empire has of right a claim to separate recognition from the crown of services that may have been rendered in any walk of life; I have never hesitated to say so, and I offer no apologies for expressing that view in this chamber. On the other hand, there are those who honestly differ from that view. But it will be borne in mind that no man and no woman receives recognition from the state unless he or she is ready and willing to accept the recognition offered. The right hon. leader of the opposition in 1906 was honoured by his sovereign by being made a Companion of the Order of St. Michael and St. George. There was no reason why the Deputy Minister of Labour, who had rendered signal service with respect to matters of great importance, should not thus have been recognized. Other deputy ministers had been recognized. It would be idle for me to say that I did not believe that one who had served the state for forty-five years and had finally attained to the position of Deputy Minister of the Interior should not upon retirement be recognized by being made a Companion of the Order of St. Michael and St. George. There are other instances that I shall not name. It has been the custom in this country generally and broadly that those who had served the state in positions, shall I say, of great importance, but not in a legislative capacity nor where they had ministerial rank, should be recognized. I think that the late Sir Joseph Pope was one of the most striking instances of that, and there are others of the same kind.

However, there was the view expressed in this country prior to 1919, that the appointments, shall I say, were not such as to commend themselves in all instances to the judgment of the Canadian people. That at least was alleged, and it was of course long believed in this country that there was no place in a new soil such as this for hereditary honours which are largely, if not wholly, indigenous to countries where the law of primogeniture prevails. That has been the experience of the world. Only a few days ago I was reading the debates of the British House of Lords in which the Marquess of Salisbury was dealing with a measure looking to the reform of that body. He pointed out what the hereditary principle had meant, and in addition he said:

> None of us is defending our privileges. But what we do claim is the opportunity to render service to the country in which we live, and the atmosphere that has been created by centuries of tradition, in consequence of the hereditary principle being followed, has enabled this house to exercise a jurisdiction and power and authority denied to any other chamber presently in the world.

That is very true. But the principle should not end there, as he pointed out, and he went on to discuss the matter at further length.

I desire to submit to this chamber a few propositions. The first one is this, that the granting or conferring of honours or distinctions is a prerogative of the crown. One would think it unnecessary to argue the matter, that it might be taken for granted by all, but since doubts are sometimes expressed with respect to that, I shall relieve them all by quoting from Halsbury's Laws of England, second edition, that the crown is the fountain of justice and the source of all honours. That principle has been acted upon for a long, long time; it has been acted upon in theory from the very beginning of our institutions. I quote from Halsbury's Laws of England:

> As all public offices are derived either mediately or immediately from the crown, so the sovereign enjoys the sole right of conferring all titles of honour, dignities, and precedence, and no subject can acquire a new title or dignity except by grant from the crown, unless it be conferred by act of parliament, or acquired by marriage (in case of a female), or obtained by prescription, which, however, presupposes a lost grant.
> Titles of honour are conferred either by express grant in the form of letters patent, or by writ of summons in the case of peerages, or by direct corporeal investiture, as in the case of knights.

That being so, we have established I think beyond peradventure that the granting or conferring of marks of distinction, whatever they may be, by the crown is a prerogative of the crown.

Secondly, what is a prerogative of the crown? It has always been difficult to explain or to define, but in article 511, second edition, volume 6, of Halsbury, it is defined in this way:

> The royal prerogative may be defined as being that preeminence which the sovereign enjoys over and above all other persons by virtue of the common law, but out of its ordinary course, in right of his regal dignity, and comprehends all the special dignities, liberties, privileges, powers, and royalties allowed by the common law to the crown of England.

The third proposition is this, that the prerogative of the crown extends to all parts of the British dominions. It is hardly necessary in this connection to refer to a decision, but there was a decision in the courts in England, and the words of the vice chancellor in 1873 were these:

> I cannot hesitate to say and to decide, that the queen's prerogative is as extensive in New South Wales as it is here, in this county of Middlesex. It has been contended that the title of the crown by forfeiture was confined to this soil—the soil of England. But the queen is as much the queen of New South Wales as she is the queen of England, and I must hold that every right which the queen possessed by forfeiture extended as much to the colonies as to this country.

So I think we have it clearly established that the prerogative extends to this country.

The next question is, how can that prerogative be parted with? Some of those with whom I have discussed this question in days long since past seemed to have the impression that the prerogative of the crown was something operating in favour of the crown or representing something protecting the crown from the people. On the contrary, the prerogative of the crown is usually the bulwark between aggression on the one hand by those who are aggressors and, on the other hand, the rights of the people. That prerogative of the crown is exercisable, as was very properly said yesterday, upon the advice of the ministry of the day. In the king's commission to his governor general in this country, the prerogative of mercy is referred to. It may not be known but is a fact that under the early commissions of governors general of Canada the prerogative of mercy was exercised by the governor general after he had made his own inquiries and without recommendation of his ministry. To-day the prerogative of mercy is exercisable in accordance with the terms of the patent by which His Excellency is appointed. According to his commission that prerogative is exercised on the instructions and advice of his ministers. Hence, from time to time, when the Minister of Justice has indicated, it is our unhappy experience to have these circumstances in connection with capital cases brought before us for decision as to whether the prerogative of mercy shall be exercised on our advice or otherwise. That prerogative of mercy pertaining to the crown by right of kingship is exercised in this country upon the advice of the ministers of the day.

It has been said, and properly so—it is pointed out in Halsbury—that the medium of communication between the sovereign and the ministry is the Prime Minister, and the recommendations made by the Prime Minister to the crown with respect to honours and awards is something that is now well understood. I believe Halsbury points out that the sovereign still retains the exclusive right without reference, although as a matter of fact it is referred to those in whom he has confidence. He has the supreme control over the Order of Merit and the Victorian Order. However, that is entirely beside the question.

In 1902 the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier's order in council, to which reference was made yesterday, frankly recognized that the prerogative of the crown was in existence and that it was operative in the Dominion of Canada. He suggested, as has been later established, that that right or prerogative should be exercised upon the advice of the ministry. As I have said, in this country that is the Prime Minister. In England—to finish the historical side of it—as soon as a government comes into power a committee of the privy council composed of three privy councillors is set up to determine what action shall be taken with respect to recommendations to the sovereign, that is, to decide the adequacy or inadequacy of the award for services rendered and matters of that kind. Lord Macmillan, who was here quite recently, is a member of one committee in Great Britain which deals with these matters. Another committee deals with awards of a different character. A committee of the treasury may make recommendations as to awards and honours that shall be received by the public servants of the country. Since this matter has arisen I think it is well that I should state frankly what the position is in the old country with respect to these matters.

In 1919 a motion was made in this chamber with respect to honours and awards. May I point out that yesterday the right hon. gentleman opposite read from the Winnipeg Tribune and stated that Mr. Bennett had defied parliament. That is the difficulty in connection with these matters. Those who write about them do not take the trouble to ascertain that parliament does not consist of the House of Commons only; it consists of three estates. For those who may be interested I would point out, as I pointed out during the last session, that section 17 of the British North America Act gives a definition of parliament. It reads:

> There shall be one parliament for Canada, consisting of the Queen, an upper house styled the Senate, and the House of Commons.

Therefore, it follows that parliament is not acting unless all three estates combine. There must be action alike by the Senate, by the Commons and by the Sovereign. We call it the royal assent when dealing with the sovereign's will. The Commons enacts its legislation and the Senate does likewise. It is:

> His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows: . . .

In England it is:

> Be it enacted by the King's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows: . . .

After the Parliament Act was passed in 1911 there was still provision made to provide for that particular case where legislation becomes effective after it has been rejected more than once by the House of Lords. Those of us who are familiar with the development of constitutional practice in this country will recall that when the referendum measure was submitted to the courts of Manitoba it was held to be ultra vires. It went to the privy council and the privy council held that it was an illegal exercise of power on the part of the legislature to act as it did to provide, for making legislation effective by referendum. Otherwise it would have meant that a measure might become law without the two estates of the legislative assembly acting together.

What was done in 1919? It will be observed that the House of Commons passed a resolution, but bear in mind that it was the House of Commons. The operative words of the resolution are:

> —humbly approach Your Majesty praying that Your Majesty hereafter may be graciously pleased to refrain from conferring any titles upon your subjects domiciled or living in Canada,

In other words, it asks the sovereign by resolution of the House of Commons to cease to exercise his prerogative in Canada. That was as ineffective in law as it is possible for any group of words to be. It was not only ineffective but I am sorry to say, it was an affront to the sovereign himself. Every constitutional lawyer, or anyone who has taken the trouble to study this matter realizes that that is what was done. I shall refer presently to the matter in the light of the discussion the other day in the House of Lords.

Let us see how the prerogative can be parted with. The prerogative of mercy stands on exactly the same level as the prerogative with respect to honours and awards. Will anyone in this house say that if this House of Commons passes a resolution asking His Majesty to refrain from the exercise of the prerogative of mercy, it would be effective? The life of an individual may tremble in the balance if the construction placed upon this resolution is the construction to be placed upon the exercise of the prerogative of mercy. There is no difficulty in seeing that when one branch only of the legislature acts there can be no measure passed that will affect any question. That must be the subject matter of legislation and a resolution cannot be law and it cannot be made into law. A resolution of the House of Commons is the pious opinion expressed in form of a majority of a group of gentlemen acting within their legislative power or otherwise. The matter of the prerogative and how it may be taken away is stated so clearly that I shall not do more than make a single observation with respect to it, that is, the only method by which the crown can be deprived of its prerogative is by statute. It must be a very special form of statute. Halsbury says:

> The powers of the crown when acting in association with parliament are unlimited. The king in parliament is the sovereign power in the state. It is for this reason that there is no law which the king in parliament cannot make or unmake, whether relating to the constitution itself or otherwise; there is no necessity, as in states whose constitutions are drawn up in a fixed and rigid form and contained in written documents, for the existence of a judicial body to determine whether any particular legislative act is within the constitutional powers of parliament or not; and laws affecting the constitution itself may be enacted with the same ease, and subject to the same procedure, as ordinary laws.
> In practice, however, the King now plays a purely formal part in the making of statutes, for, by convention, he has lost the power of refusing his assent to a bill passed by both houses, or in terms of the Parliament Act, 1911, by the House of Commons alone.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Passed by the Commons alone?

Mr. BENNETT: There is special provision with respect to that. The language makes special provision for the terms in which the king is to act. It refers to a measure passed by the Commons on two occasions and then reviewed by the Lords, and there is a special provision under the Parliament Act, to which the king became a party, as I shall point out in a moment. Let me quote what he says:

> Where the king acts with the cooperation of other persons, those persons are responsible for his acts. If they are wrongful, the king's part in them is disregarded, for it is a maxim of the common law that the king can do no wrong; but the other person who assists him is liable. . . . It is clear therefore that the powers of government are divided. The executive, legislative, and judicial powers are in the main entrusted to different persons and bodies; and the local government is entrusted to another separate set of persons and bodies.

Therefore the judicial, the executive and the legislative bodies must be considered in their relation to the crown, and so far as any act of legislation is concerned, it can be made effective only by the act of both bodies and of the crown. In section 17 of the British North America Act, to which I referred, that provision is made.

I will not do more than try to make it clear beyond peradventure that the only method by which the prerogative of the Crown can be abrogated, curtailed, restricted or lost is entirely by act of Parliament itself, which means, so far as Canada is concerned, not only the king but the Senate and the House of Commons.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is the Prime Minister arguing that if both our houses in Canada passed legislation that would restrict the prerogative of the king?

Mr. BENNETT: No. That matter came up the other day in the House of Lords; I had the report but it is not beside me at the moment. I shall have the report presently, when I will deal with that phase of the matter. That is the question as it stood in 1919 when there was enacted the resolution to which I have referred. Now, for the moment, let us see what the courts of England have said with respect to that. Yesterday, in discussing the case of Stockdale and Hansard, the right hon. gentleman said that it occurred in 1839, which is correct; and the decision has never been questioned since. It has been acted upon as sound constitutional law, and the language used is so strong that I venture to bring it to the attention of the house. It was in part referred to by the right hon. gentleman. Lord Chief Justice Denman, delivering an exhaustive judgment in that case, said:

> The House of Commons is not the parliament, but only a coordinate and component part of parliament. The sovereign power can make and unmake laws; but the concurrence of the three legislative estates is necessary; the resolution of any one of them cannot alter the law, or place anyone beyond its control. The proposition is therefore wholly untenable, and abhorrent to the first principles of the constitution of England. . . . Parliament is said to be supreme. I most fully acknowledge its supremacy. It follows, then, as before observed, that neither branch of it is supreme when acting by itself.

Discussing previous cases he cited with approval the decision of the House of Lords:

> That an attempt, in any one branch of the legislature, to suspend the execution of the law, by separately assuming to itself the direction of a discretionary power, which, by an act of parliament, is vested in any body of men to be exercised as they shall deem expedient, is unconstitutional. In both cases the law would be superseded by one assembly; and, however dignified and respectable that body, in whatever degree superior to all temptations of abusing their power, the power claimed is arbitrary and irresponsible, in itself the most monstrous and intolerable of all abuses.

Patteson, J. concurred, and Coleridge, J. used these words:

> As to that part of their answer in which they speak of parliament being able to make that law which was not law, it is plainly beside the question proposed; for it must relate to the power of the three branches of the legislature concurring, and not to any resolutions of any one of them separately, or even of any two of them. . . . It would be easy to put striking instances of this kind; but they may be summed up at once, and without the least exaggeration, in the remark that there is nothing dear to us, our property, liberty, lives or characters, which, if this proposition be true, is not, by the constitution of the country, placed at the mercy of the resolutions of a single branch of the legislature.

The observations of the Lord Chancellor in 1874, when discussing the effect of a resolution of the House of Commons, is reported in the Parliamentary History as follows:

> This plainly proved, that the Commons literally, as to the question then under the consideration of their lordships expressed it, assumed to itself the direction of a discretionary power vested in a body of men to be exercised as they should judge expedient. His Lordship reasoned very forcibly upon this, and said, that had he been a lord of the treasury, even though he had risked the loss of his place, he would not have obeyed the resolution; and his refusal would have proceeded from a consciousness that nothing short of an act of parliament formally passed by the three estates, had the power of suspending either a part of the statute or any part of the common law of the kingdom. He said he would suppose that a power similar to this was lodged in a board of seven commissioners constituted by act of parliament. He should then say, if the House of Commons passed such a resolution, directing those commissioners how to exercise a discretion the law had given them the sole control over, they would act wisely by treating the resolution with contempt and paying it no regard whatsoever.

Bear these words in mind, because they constitute the basis of the action which has been taken. I should like the house to understand that I have as high a regard for the dignity of parliament as any man, but I am also conscious of the fact that the abuse of power, whether with respect to honours and awards or in any other regard, is something against which every sound constitutionalist must raise his voice, because an abuse by the Commons House of Parliament is no less an abuse for the reason that it is done by the elected body and not by the appointed. It might be well always to remember that fact. It was Coleridge, J., who put it so powerfully, in words that have been quoted with approval throughout the years for nearly a century—words that should be constantly in our minds—that if one branch of parliament, by passing a resolution, can either restrict or restrain or amend the law, or change or alter in any respect the provisions of the common law which comprise the prerogative, then, as he said, without the least exaggeration, there is nothing dear to us, our property, our liberty, lives or characters which, if this proposition be true, is not by the constitution of the country placed at the mercy of resolutions of a single branch of the legislature.

Such is not the law of Canada; it has never been the law of Canada; and when this House of Commons passed a resolution asking His Majesty to refrain from exercising his prerogative it attempted to do something which it was wholly powerless to do. I suppose that someone will say, "Why was that not thought of at the time? There were in the house at that time, Mr. Bennett, constitutional lawyers just as good as you." Well, I have learned that in the stress and strain of parliamentary life many things are overlooked. For instance, during my short tenure of office I came across an order in council appointing an administrator following the death of a lieutenant governor. Everyone knows that cannot constitutionally be done; everyone knows that you cannot appoint an administrator when the lieutenant governor dies. But there it was solemnly done and the chief justice was appointed administrator when the lieutenant governor was dead, the appointment reciting that the lieutenant governor was dead and that the chief justice was to remain administrator until a new one was appointed. I fancy it is not stating the position too strongly to say that many people were greatly disgusted with the discussions that took place in connection with that resolution, the circumstances in connection with it, the way in which it was discussed, the lack of, shall I say, control of the situation by the government itself. Look at the language that is used: a prohibition against the sovereign exercising his prerogative. That is all.

I shall point out presently that within the last two weeks when Lord Salisbury was moving his motion in the House of Lords, the question became acute and the Marquess of Reading, one of the most eminent lawyers of his time, gave his opinion as to the proper method to be pursued in dealing with questions of the prerogative. He said that not only did it require the royal assent by statute to destroy the prerogative, but the consent of the crown to the introduction of a measure to do this should first be received; because he realized, as everyone now does, that the prerogative under modern practice where the executive acts under the advice of the administration, is the bulwark of protection for the subject himself. When the matter came up, the question whether Lord Salisbury's bill could be given its first reading until after an address had been passed and leave given him by the crown to introduce it, became acute, and after some discussion Lord Ponsonby of Shulbrede, leading the opposition, opposed the granting of the power. Then the Marquess of Reading took the matter in hand, as did the former Lord Chancellor, Lord Hailsham. When the discussion proceeded, it was found on an examination of precedents that the situation was somewhat different from what had been expected. The Marquess of Reading, as reported on column 594, said:

> My lords, I desire on this point to add a few observations because, owing to the courtesy of the noble lord who has just spoken, I was informed of the course he intended to take and I have devoted such time as was at my disposal to examine the precedents in order that we might see how the matter stands. It cannot be doubted by your lordships that any bill which will affect the prerogative and powers of the crown must receive the royal assent before it is passed in parliament. The question that is raised to-day is of a somewhat different character, as I understand it, and one for which undoubtedly there is very notable precedent—that is, that there should be a motion for an address to the crown for permission to consider the restriction or alteration of the prerogative of the crown. As I understand the precedent there has been much discussion on the subject—not as to the actual existence of the obligation of parliament to have the assent of the crown before a bill is passed; that I assume will be quite beyond dispute. If we consider this bill, which we have not seen but of which we have had some indications in the press, it seems apparent, particularly if it is to follow the lines of former bills, that if passed it would curtail and restrict the prerogative of the crown. First it would prevent the creation of new peers of parliament and it would also limit the right of summoning peers to attend parliament. Therefore it does—and I should think this would not be controverted—affect the prerogative.
> The question to which I desire to address myself, and to give such information as I can to your lordships upon a subject which affects our procedure in a vitally important point, is as to whether or not it is essential to have this motion for the royal assent before the bill is introduced, or whether it can be given at any time before the bill is passed. It seems to me so far as I am able to gather from the precedents that that is the true position and that there is some difference of opinion on this subject.

He concluded that as long as the consent was given before the bill was finally passed, that was all that was essential. As reported on column 599, Lord Hailsham uses these words:

> The practice which has been very fully stated is conveniently summarized in the little book to which we sometimes refer, "The Companion to the Standing Orders," in which it is set out that: "The consent of the crown, as distinguished from its assent, is requisite to every bill or amendment to a bill affecting the royal prerogative or the interests of the crown. It may be given at any time during the progress of the bill, which ought not to be allowed to pass if such consent be not given."

It therefore follows, as I pointed out last session, that there are special circumstances which surround the enactment of legislation that deprives the crown of its prerogative. Those special circumstances are that consent must be given through an address to the crown before the bill passes the house. In this instance it will be observed that all that was done was to ask the crown not to exercise its prerogative, the language being that the crown refrain from conferring any titles. In other words, this was placing a prohibition upon the exercise of the prerogative. I submit to this chamber that that is beyond the competence of this body, and in addition, in the language of Lord Reading, it is in itself an affront to the crown. As the crown possesses the prerogative, and as that prerogative can be taken away only by statute after prior consent has been given, to pass a resolution asking the sovereign to place a prohibition upon his own prerogative is in itself, as Lord Reading says, what should not be contemplated for a moment—an affront to the sovereign himself. But that was what was done by this house.

Last year the matter was raised when a question was asked by the hon. member for Laurier-Outremont (Mr. Mercier), to which an answer was given on May 17. The answer I gave was this:

> The promotion of the Right Honourable Sir George Halsey Perley, K.C.M.G., to be an ordinary member of the first class or Knights Grand Cross of the Most Distinguished Order of St. Michael and St. George, was made in conformity with established constitutional practice, it being the considered view of His Majesty's government in Canada that the motion, with respect to honours, adopted on the 22nd day of May, 1919, by a majority vote of the members of the Commons House only of the thirteenth parliament (which was dissolved on the 4th day of October, 1921) is not binding upon His Majesty or His Majesty's government in Canada or the seventeenth parliament of Canada.

There is only one further point to be noted, and that is that later the leader of the opposition asked a question to which I gave the answer that he read yesterday indicating that parliament consists of three estates and that until they combine in action, the prerogative was not affected. This year, recommendations having been made by the Prime Minister for the New Year's honour list, so-called, the names of certain Canadians appeared on that list. That was in the exercise of the prerogative of the sovereign on the recommendation of the Prime Minister. The action is that of the Prime Minister; he must assume the responsibility, and the responsibility too for advising the crown that the resolution passed by the House of Commons was without validity, force or effect with respect to the sovereign's prerogative. That seems to me to be reasonably clear.

I am asked two questions. One is why action of this kind was taken at the time it was in view of the fact that parliament had been called on December 12 for the dispatch of business. I suppose it is unnecessary to say to this house that matters of this kind have, in the nature of things, to be disposed of weeks in advance of the first day of January and long before the 12th day of December had been reached and parliament was called for the dispatch of business, this matter had been acted upon. Everyone who is familiar with the conduct of public business knows that is so. On the second point, namely, as to why, in view of a resolution placed on the order paper, action was taken knowing the matter would be brought up for consideration, I think it is only necessary to point to the resolution itself. The resolution is in these words:

> We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that Your Majesty hereafter may be graciously pleased to refrain from conferring any titles upon your subjects domiciled or living in Canada, it being always understood that this humble prayer has no reference to professional or vocational appellations conferred in respect to commissions issued by Your Majesty to persons in military or naval services of Canada or to persons engaged in the administration of justice of the dominion.

It will be observed that the only two that received titles were chief justices, the one of Canada and the other of the province of Quebec, so coming absolutely within the terms of the resolution to be moved by the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell). In other words his resolution is met in exact terms.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would like to point out that the Prime Minister has misconstrued the intent of the resolution.

Mr. BENNETT: I am only saying how it reads.

Mr. MITCHELL: The right hon. gentleman must recognize that I am at a disadvantage. My impression of the whole discussion, both yesterday and to-day, is that it is out of order in view of the resolution on the order paper.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact I felt somewhat as the hon. gentleman does, that it is anticipating a discussion that must take place, but as the right hon. leader of opposition proceeded with it, it became my duty to place this statement before the house. I merely say that this resolution as it reads excepts persons engaged in the administration of justice in the dominion, and the only two persons who received titular distinction were the Chief Justice of Canada and the Chief Justice of the province of Quebec. The rest received recognition for services rendered in various walks of life; I will not discuss that now, that may be discussed later, but this I will say, that it could not be said that any of them received titular distinctions, none of them had any title conferred upon them except the two to whom I have referred. I take the view that if it was fit and proper for the right hon. leader of the opposition to become a Companion of the Order of St. Michael and St. George in 1906 it is quite proper for a woman who has devoted fifty years of her life to caring for mothers and children from door to door and establishing homes, to receive recognition by becoming an officer of the Order of the British Empire.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: No title is conferred; no social precedence is given. Our table of precedence, as is noted in the little red book, very clearly and positively says that neither knighthood nor recognition of this kind confers any precedence. That is in the order itself. In this young democracy, believing as we do that there should be just and proper awards for meritorious service given to the state, that there should be recognition of these men and women who toil without thought of reward, who live lives that are honourable and effective and that are in themselves incentives to better citizenship, why should not the head of the state, on the recommendation of whoever happens for the moment to be in charge of the government, recognize their services in some way as an indication that their services have not passed unnoticed? I can say with respect to one of these cases that came to my attention—none of them, fortunately or unfortunately, are people of wealth or money position—a woman working in one of these remote communities where the task is difficult and the conditions bad, said in a letter to a friend—my memory is clear upon it—that on this particular day, worn and tired from caring for the poor and looking after children and mothers, a spirit of great despondency came over her. Was it worth while? Later in the day she said: "As I was sitting at my desk a letter came from the Prime Minister asking me whether I was content that my name might be recommended to the sovereign for recognition of the service which I was carrying on in this remote place. I went to work with renewed vigour; my work had not been in vain, was not unnoticed." There is recognition of the fine service—she did not say that, but I say it—the fine service given to the state. Have we so lost that sense of regard for really effective service, based not on money or the hope of money, as not to be willing to extend some recognition to those who in remote parts of this country thus serve their fellowmen and the state?

Mr. DUFF: Why not recognize the thousands of women who did the same thing?

Mr. BENNETT: It is always so; there must be recognition of individuals on behalf of all. All may not be at once recognized, but those who represent classes, those who represent particular activities in remote sections, are fairly recognized as typical for all.

Mr. DUFF: No, you pick out a few among many.

Mr. BENNETT: All may not be thus recognized, but those who are, bring credit and distinction upon those with whom they are associated. Despite what the right hon. gentleman said, we see in the newspapers that in remote sections of western Canada the people have gathered together from long distances to do honour to one whose services to humanity have been recognized. They did so with no thought of politics, no thought of religion, no thought of race, but with the realization only that here was service worthy of recognition; they were proud of that service, proud of this woman as representing that great class of women whose magnificent efforts on behalf of humanity had thus been recognized.

Mr. DUFF: But is it only one of thousands. Why not recognize them all?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: That need not be further discussed. I have only to point out that I am informed that in one part of this country at one time there was an effort on the part of the provinces themselves to give such recognition. And in 1927 when we were celebrating the sixtieth anniversary of confederation the right hon. gentleman himself passed an order in council conferring the title of "Honourable" upon all who had been lieutenant governors in any part of Canada and who were then living. What is the difference between conferring the title of "Honourable" on every man who may have been a lieutenant governor, ex post facto, retroactive legislation, and giving recognition to women who toil in remote outposts for the benefit of their kind?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: Here are the words of that order in council, passed on June 30, 1927:

> The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated the 29th June, 1927, from the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, submitting that at present it is provided that the lieutenant-governor of each province is to be styled "His Honour" during his term of office only, and it appears that it would be more consistent with the dignity of the representative of the crown in the province that he should be accorded a designation which, once received, he may retain, not only during his term of office, but for life.
> The Prime Minister further submits that at this time, when the position of the Governor General has come to be definitely accepted as that of the personal representative of His Majesty the King in the Dominion of Canada, it would be fitting on the occasion of the diamond jubilee of confederation—

Birthday honours, you see.

> —for His Majesty's government in Canada to recognize more appropriately the important place held by the provinces in the Canadian federal system by according to the representatives of the crown in the provinces the designation of "Honourable" for life.
> The committee, on the recommendation of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, therefore advise that hereafter upon assuming office a lieutenant-governor of a province of Canada shall be entitled to the designation "Honourable" and shall be permitted to retain it after his term of office.
> The committee, on the same recommendation further advise that lieutenant-governors at present in office or persons who have held the office of lieutenant-governor and are still living, shall, as from July first of this year, be entitled to the designation of "Honourable" for life.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I point out that that order in council was in no way contrary either to the letter or to the spirit of the 1919 resolution of this house.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the right hon. gentleman is not serious. It confers the title of "Honourable" upon those who have been lieutenant governors.

Mr. DUFF: Without any reduction in salary!

Mr. BENNETT: It confers the title of "Honourable" upon those who were then in office and upon those thereafter appointed, yet the right hon. gentleman says it does not conflict. He means, I suppose, that it does not give a titular distinction, but it gives the title of "Honourable", or says it does at any rate. The old title, "His Honour", which is referred to as having been abolished, is now superseded by the title for life of "Honourable" with respect to those, past, present and future, who may fill the office of lieutenant governor.

One question more, and it is this: The right hon. gentleman referred to two cases as having some bearing upon this subject. I did not think my memory played me false. One of them was a case in which Mr. Gladstone in 1870 had introduced a bill to abolish purchase in the army, when the bill went to the House of Lords it was opposed and it looked as though it might be defeated, whereupon Mr. Gladstone asked the Queen to sign a warrant abolishing purchase in the army. In other words, in the exercise of her powers, whether as a commander-in-chief or in the exercise of her prerogative, she signed that order, and the acquisition of places in the army by purchase passed out of existence. If anyone can tell me just what relation that has to the present circumstances I shall certainly be obliged. It was a case in which, fearing legislation would not pass, recourse was had to the prerogative. The other case in 1890 had to do with Heligoland. Lord Salisbury was of the opinion that when a part of the British Empire was to be ceded to a foreign power it was desirable to pass a statute so to do. When it reached the House of Commons from the Lords and was up for second reading, the position taken by Mr. Gladstone, was, "This is not the way this business has always been done; it has always been done by treaty, by the prerogative of the sovereign being invoked, and when the treaty was signed by the sovereign it was laid upon the table of the house, the house in turn either approving or disapproving of it. If it disapproves, the government is beaten, and if it approves, that is the end of it." He made a lengthy speech in which he pointed out that recourse to the prerogative was far better than legislation. The matter was taken up by Mr. Balfour in which he pointed out caustically that it was a new doctrine for Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Harcourt to contend that recourse should be had to the sovereign prerogative instead of legislation by the Commons and the Lords, with the assent of the sovereign. Finally, driven to the position which he had to adopt with respect to it, Mr. Gladstone said, "The reason I do that is this, that if it is a statute we have the Lords to contend with, and if it is done through the exercise of the royal prerogative, we have not." But they proceeded with the statute and passed it in the House of Commons on division. Ultimately it passed through without division on the third reading. What relation all that has to this I do not know; but I put it to every thoughtful man in this house: Can it be said that the exercise of a power by resolution is authority for anything in the world?

Mr. EULER: If instead of requesting the sovereign directly not to exercise its prerogative, the House of Commons had expressed its desire that the Prime Minister himself should not make any recommendation, would the Prime Minister in that case feel himself bound?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member is coming to the point I was about to make. Rarely have I found an argument adduced against a position I have taken which so completely supported my position as that taken yesterday by the right hon. gentleman. He argued that this House of Commons is a body from which I derive authority as leader. That is true. But it was not the house of 1919 from which I derived authority; it was not the House of Commons of 1919 which permitted me to stand in this place in the house. This house would be within its constitutional rights if it passed a resolution asking the Prime Minister to make no further recommendations during the life of this parliament for titular distinction of any person domiciled in Canada. As Lord Reading has said, that would be no affront to the sovereign; that would be treating the crown as the crown should be treated. That would be treating the crown as the crown is bound to be treated. The reason I have not stood in my place and asked this House of Commons to rescind the resolution was that I would thereby be indicating that it had some validity. There is no one in this house who does not know, and particularly does this apply to the legal members, that once you accept jurisdiction by attorning to it you cannot question the jurisdiction. And if I had sat in this house and asked for the rescission of that resolution I would thereby have been a party to the acceptance of its validity.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Did the Prime Minister support the resolution of the present Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) asking the House of Commons to consider the matter?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and I am not sure, but I believe I spoke upon it. I was most anxious that it should go to a committee, because the discussion which is taking place here could then have taken place before the committee, and the committee could determine whether or not the resolution should be rescinded. I am perfectly willing that the question as to whether or not there is any validity in this resolution should be referred to any court in the world. There is not only no validity in it, but the resolution itself, in the language of the Marquis of Reading, is an affront to the sovereign. But if to-morrow or the next day or, in fact any day, this House of Commons sees fit to pass a resolution asking the Prime Minister to refrain from making recommendations to the sovereign, the House of Commons is of course within its rights, because it is from the house that the Prime Minister must derive his authority to act. It is one thing to see to it that our actions are buttressed with the authority of precedent, and another thing to act according to the rule of law. It has been a matter of passing comment, as pointed out by an eminent lawyer not long ago, that a resolution of a House of Commons which has long since ceased to be, could not bind future parliaments and future Houses of Commons.

This happened in Australia: Mr. Bavin came into office desiring to recommend that his chief justice be given a knighthood. Recommendations were made to the Secretary of State for the Dominions and the recommendation was so made by the king. The Secretary of State for the Dominions had no hesitancy in saying that he would act upon the recommendations that were made. The power of a mere resolution by this house, if acceded to, would create such a condition that no principle which secures life or liberty would be safe. That is what Judge Coleridge pointed out. It was stated by Mr. Gladstone in 1870 that the reasonable application of rules was a very important thing. I am putting to this house in the language of Judge Coleridge just what we may expect if we disregard the rule of law which has declared that the prerogative of the sovereign cannot be abrogated, restricted or amended except by act of parliament to which he antecedently consents; and in that lies the safety of the subject, for the prerogative is not of honours and awards alone, but of mercy, of pardon, and of those innumerable things that have grown up in the body of common law in all British countries which protect the life and freedom and the institutions and the liberty of the subject.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): May I ask whether according to the ordinary rules of parliamentary practice and procedure there was any acknowledgment from the sovereign of the resolution that was submitted to His Majesty?

Mr. BENNETT: My memory is that an acknowledgment of the receipt of the resolution was received by the Duke of Devonshire from the private secretary of the king. I was looking that up to-day. It will be recalled that Mr. Nickle moved that the resolution be engrossed and sent through the governor general to the crown, and it was so sent, and an acknowledgment was sent from the private secretary of the king.

I have traversed this matter at some length. I have put before the house the facts as they are, and if there is any doubt as to the soundness of the legal position that this parliament consists of three estates, I am perfectly content that it should be referred to the supreme court or to any court in the world. When I see the language of an editorial in the Winnipeg Tribune talking of doing away with parliament when only one house was concerned, I realize the confusion that is brought about in the public mind by those endeavouring to speak with authority who have no knowledge of that about which they speak. That difficulty always arises in complex and difficult matters of this kind. Anyone who will read the debate in the House of Lords on December 19, 1933, will there see a clear indication of the principles that underlie the exercise of the prerogative by the sovereign with respect to honours and awards.

I have endeavoured in the action that I have taken to protect this House of Commons and all houses of commons from being charged with having been guilty of an affront to the sovereign. Lord Reading has indicated in his speech the true pathway along which hon. gentlemen may proceed, if they so desire. They may pass a resolution, if they so wish, asking, nay, instructing the Prime Minister by a majority of the chamber that they do not wish any further recommendations to be made. By that I would be bound while leading the Commons House of this Parliament. It is always open for any member of this house to move a vote of censure against the Prime Minister for the recommendations that have been made, and it would not be the first time that matters of this kind have been made the subject of a vote of censure in this house. That privilege lies in this House of Commons. But I do entreat those who are concerned about the maintenance of our institutions, who love our constitutional liberties and realize the extent to which they rest upon the exercise of prerogative, an extent of which some have little understanding because they have not investigated, not for one moment to conclude that the House of Commons by a majority vote in 1919 could divest the sovereign of this empire and of this dominion of the prerogative which he possesses in respect of honours and awards.

Sir, I have trespassed longer upon the time of the house with respect to the speech from the throne and the speech made by the right hon. gentleman than I had ever expected to do again in this chamber. I apologize for having spoken at such length, but I found it incumbent upon me to traverse many of the matters referred to yesterday, and there are some with which I should have liked to deal at even greater length, because in these days it is so easy to make charges and to underestimate the recovery and the spirit of courage and optimism that pervades the Canadian people, and to try to depress them by showing signs of pessimism and reflecting upon the progress of the country. I offer no apologies for having taken time to indicate to this House of Commons the progress we have made and the faith and confidence we have in the future, and I say to those who sit beside me here; let us look forward, let us advance, let us discharge the duties that lie before us with high courage and to the best of our ability.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, in rising to continue the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne and the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), the first duty I have to perform is indeed a pleasant one. May I take this opportunity of congratulating the mover (Mr. Gobeil) and the seconder (Mr. Barber) upon the efforts which they made in moving and seconding the address? Unfortunately I do not understand the French language; consequently I could follow only a portion of the address of the mover yesterday. I did, however, appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber). Having in mind the fact that he had only a very slim foundation upon which to build a speech, may I congratulate the hon. member upon his efforts?

I should also like to take this opportunity of congratulating the hon. member for Toronto East Centre (Mr. Matthews) upon his elevation to a position in the cabinet. The department over which he presides I am sure he will find a very strenuous one, and I wish him every success in his direction of it.

Before I discuss the speech from the throne I desire to say a few words with regard to a statement that was made by the leader of the opposition yesterday in regard to the former member for Mackenzie, Mr. Milton Campbell. It will be remembered that the leader of the opposition took a great deal of delight out of the fact that in the recent by-elections all the members returned to this house had been Liberals, and speaking of the former member for Mackenzie the right hon. gentleman stated that he was a former Conservative C.C.F. member of this house. I think that that was a very unfair and very unjust statement for the leader of the opposition to make. In the first place the former member for Mackenzie was not a Conservative, and in the second place, so far as I am aware, I am not sure that he ever was a member of an organization affiliated with the C.C.F. Consequently under those circumstances it is indeed unfortunate that the leader of the opposition should have made the statement that he did. As a matter of fact the former member for Mackenzie was elected in 1921 as a Progressive, and in the elections of 1925, 1926 and 1930 he was again returned as a Progressive. So far as I know, he not only entered this house as a Progressive but also left this house as a Progressive.

I wish now to discuss some of the items in the speech from the throne. The very first paragraph in the speech states that Canada is to be congratulated upon her expanding trade, improving revenues, increasing employment and a more confident outlook upon the future. From the figures given by the leader of the opposition yesterday it would appear that this statement in the speech from the throne was not altogether correct, but when we take into consideration the figures, and the further information which the Prime Minister gave to-day, it would appear that there is some doubt as to just where the truth lies.

If there is an improvement in this country no one will appreciate it more than myself. I am not one of those who are imbued with pessimism; I am looking forward to the time when there will be some easing in the situation in so far as the conditions which have existed for the last four years are concerned. But I wish to take exception to the last sentence in this paragraph which states:

> Canada occupies a leading position amongst those countries where the evidence of a return to permanent prosperity is most convincing.

Whoever was responsible for the insertion of the word "permanent" in that sentence had no regard for economic conditions as they have existed in the past and as they will exist in the future. So long as the profit system remains there can be no permanent prosperity. It would be well for hon. members of this house to recognize that fact. From the beginning of the industrial era right down to the present time we have had swings of prosperity and of depression. In later years the periods of prosperity have become shorter than on former occasions, while the periods of depression have lengthened. I take exception to that word "permanent," and point out to the house that under the profit system there is no possibility of permanent prosperity. If I have time, I shall return to this point later on in my address.

The next paragraph to which I shall refer is in connection with the prices of agricultural products. It is quite true that these prices have increased somewhat and I am sure that every hon. member appreciates that fact. It is quite evident that so long as the purchasing power of the agriculturist is almost non-existent, other industries and professions cannot attain any great prosperity. Therefore, we hope that this price increase will continue for a considerable time.

I should like to say just a word with regard to the last sentence in this paragraph, which reads:

> You will be invited to consider legislation designed to facilitate the efficient and profitable marketing of live stock and agricultural products.

So far as agriculture is concerned, I believe that that sentence is the most important one in the whole speech from the throne. For years we in this corner of the chamber have been advocating that similar action should be taken. Hon. members will recall that two years ago it was proposed to introduce legislation along these lines for the purpose of controlling the marketing of live stock. I do not know whether or not it is correct, but I have been informed that legislation was prepared for that purpose but was not introduced into the house. Under these circumstances may I express my appreciation of the fact that it is proposed to bring down legislation during this session for the purpose stated in this sentence.

Before I proceed further may I direct the attention of the house to the important significance of that sentence. It means that at last Canada is commencing a national planning. Because of things which have occurred during the past four or five years the government is now finding it necessary to begin a national planning in the interests of the Canadian people. While it is only a very small amount of planning that is proposed, at the same time the fact that the government has found it expedient to commence this thing is in my judgment worthy of our notice.

The next paragraph to which I desire to refer is the one dealing with the world monetary and economic conference. As hon. members know, this conference was held in London last summer but I think it is admitted on all sides that that conference was to all intents and purposes a failure. While some slight progress may have been made with regard to the possibility of future conferences, on the whole the conference was a failure. There are good reasons for its failure, and, in my judgment, one is the fact that the countries represented did not take into consideration the real economic factors which underlie the present depression. It was stated in the press that one of the most important functions which the conference undertook was to determine if possible in what commodities there could be a reduction in the volume of production. In my judgment that is not the crux of the situation. Would it not have been better for the conference to recognize the fact that we are now living in the midst of plenty and that the era of scarcity has long since passed? The conference should have given consideration to the distribution of the plenty now available. Just so long as these conferences meet and evade that important question, so long will they continue to be failures.

The next paragraph refers to the appointment of a royal commission to inquire into the banking and monetary system of Canada. Two important recommendations are made by this commission. One is the establishment of a central bank in Canada and the other is that a further investigation should be made into agricultural credits. So far as the central bank is concerned may I remind this house that for the last ten years the group in this corner have been advocating the establishment of such an organization. Almost year after year we have presented resolutions asking that a central bank should be established and now we are hoping, in view of the recommendations of this commission, that that action will be taken. In my judgment the value of this bank to the Canadian people will depend upon the plan of its organization. Under our present banking system the credit of Canada is placed at the disposal of our banking institutions; this has been so ever since the Bank Act came into existence. I believe that if this central bank is properly organized, if it is publicly owned and operated, it can render a great service to the various governments in Canada and at the same time be an important factor in the welfare of the masses of the Canadian people. But should this bank be privately owned, and operated for profit, the service given to Canada as a whole will be almost next to nothing; the profit factor will intervene almost entirely. Of course, I am not in the confidence of the government and I do not know what the Prime Minister and his colleagues have in their minds in this regard. It may be that they intend to have a publicly owned bank to be operated in the public interest. If it is privately owned, and operated in the interests of those who are its shareholders, then I shall be very much disappointed, as I am sure the people of Canada will be. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), when discussing the central bank yesterday, did not make a declaration of his position in regard to the manner in which the bank will be financed—whether it will be a publicly owned or a privately owned bank. The nearest he came to an explanation was to say that he hoped the bank would be Canadian owned. It is quite true that it may be Canadian owned, and yet it might not render that service which the people would expect a central bank to give. I am not one of those who believe that it is the function of a central bank to lend money to all and sundry, but I do believe that through the efforts that may be put forward, provided the government assume control over the central bank, the monetary and credit situation in this country can be better taken care of than if the bank were privately owned and managed for profit. We shall have to wait and see what the proposals are in this regard, but I am still hoping that the Prime Minister will rise to the occasion and create a central bank to be publicly owned and operated in the interests of the people, thereby giving some assistance to the masses in Canada.

The next matter in the speech from the throne, to which I wish to refer for a moment or two, is the wheat quota. The Prime Minister this afternoon read a telegram from the premiers of the three prairie provinces. He gave a history of the negotiations, and in this respect he gave the house information which was not before available. When I approach the question of the restriction of production I ask myself first of all whether enough of this commodity is produced to satisfy the needs of all the people who require it. That is the first question I ask myself, and it would appear, from the vast surpluses that exist at the present time, that undoubtedly there is a world surplus of wheat, sufficient to meet all present requirements. Moreover, we have run up against something quite new in the history of western Canada, at least in the last four or five years, for we see that countries that formerly took large quantities of our wheat are now developing their wheat growing areas to such an extent as to be almost self-sustaining. Further than that, they have been giving bonuses, and have been placing restrictions upon wheat importations. That being so, we have to face a new condition, and it is not surprising that the premiers of the three western provinces should intimate to the Prime Minister of Canada that some effort was necessary along these lines in order to bring down the volume of production until such time as some of the surplus had been consumed. That of course is a very important matter.

Going through western Canada I find that this proposal is being received with mixed feelings by the producers. Some are of the opinion that in the administration of this quota preferences may be given internally, and the view has been expressed to me on many occasions that the producers of the west would feel more at ease if the federal government, in conjunction with the provincial governments of the three prairie provinces, would create a central selling agency through which all wheat exported from Canada would be handled, with powers similar to those exercised by the wheat board of 1919.

I am satisfied that the great bulk of the producers would feel more content if such a selling agency were established as soon as possible. I submit to the Prime Minister that he should give further consideration, in consultation with the representatives of the three provincial governments, if he thinks fit, to the necessity of creating a wheat board in this connection, a board with ample powers to deal with the situation.

The next paragraph in the speech from the throne reads:

> Since prorogation, my government, under the authority of The Relief Act, 1933, have continued to assist financially the provinces in the discharge of their constitutional obligations.

That paragraph, to my mind, is more significant than appears on the surface, for it demonstrates that the present economic system has broken down badly. When the federal government has to come to the assistance of provincial governments to enable the provinces to carry out their constitutional obligations, surely we must look for the reason why such assistance is necessary. According to the Prime Minister's statement this afternoon, it has been necessary to give this assistance to the provincial governments in order that they may fulfil their constitutional obligations in providing relief and work for the unemployed, and so on; and this, in my judgment, is ample evidence of the fact that the present economic system had badly broken down. In my judgment, it is not the function of governments to provide food, clothing and shelter for the people. That is the function of the economic system, and when we find that this government, during the time it has been in power, has had to pay something like $130,000,000 towards the provision of relief through the provincial governments and also to assist those governments financially, what more proof is needed to convince anyone who wishes to understand the situation that the system has collapsed almost entirely?

If the present economic system cannot provide the people with food, clothing and shelter, or give them an opportunity for securing these things, then the time has come when we should do more planning than we have done in the past, and should investigate more closely the reasons why the economic system cannot fulfil this function. And wherever it is necessary we should change or strengthen the system so that it might function properly in this regard.

It is not my purpose to take up more time discussing the speech from the throne. I should like to take just a few moments to deal with what I think is the crux of the problem that we have before us, namely, the reason the present economic system is not functioning efficiently. My judgment is that because of the profit nature of the system, the concentration of wealth in this and other countries has proceeded at such a pace that it is endangering the livelihood of the great mass of the people throughout the world. We have in Canada no figures; in fact we are not permitted by law to secure the figures from the returns made to the income tax branch. Therefore we have to go to another country similarly situated to ours in order to get data which will give us some information on this important question, namely, the concentration of wealth. We have to go to the United States, for instance, to secure such information as is available at the present time. Recently official figures came from there showing that in the opinion of officers in the employment of the United States government, three per cent of the people of that country control 67 per cent of its wealth, leaving only 33 per cent of the wealth to be distributed amongst 97 per cent of its people. I do not know whether we have succeeded in the concentration of wealth to the same extent in Canada. As I have already stated, those figures are not available, but I am satisfied that in that regard we are pretty close behind the United States. This is the crux of the situation as I see it—three per cent of the people of the United States owning 67 per cent of the wealth.

Mr. YOUNG: Did the hon. member say "owning" or "controlling"?

Mr. GARDINER: Owning. That is not all. Let me give the house further information which comes from the United States, because we cannot get similar information in this country. The Comptroller of Currency of the United States government last year made a survey of the banks numbering over 5,000 affiliated with the federal reserve system, including a survey of the deposits in those banks. He found that there were some 30,556,000 depositors in those banks; he found also that the total deposits amounted to $23,542,307,000, but more than that, when he analysed the figures, he found that three and a half per cent of the depositors owned 76·3 per cent of the deposits, showing a very close relationship of deposits in banks to ownership of wealth. If you reduce the three and a half per cent as represented by the depositors to three per cent, you will find that this conforms very closely to the three per cent owning 67 per cent of the wealth of that nation. The point is this, that those who control the wealth of a nation control its purchasing power. This $23,000,000,000 deposited in those banks can be withdrawn at any time to buy anything the owners of those deposits may require, but it will appear that the great bulk of those deposits are the surplus purchasing power of those people, they already having provided for their needs. Inasmuch as there is very little opening to-day for the investment of surplus purchasing power in the form of savings, one can readily understand why it is that this purchasing power, not being used as it has been formerly to provide new plant and equipment, to develop new industries, cannot come into the hands of the people who require the necessary food, clothing and shelter. That being the case, we come to this point that, in my judgment, until such time as there is a redistribution of wealth in Canada and other countries there can be no permanent prosperity for the masses of the people. A redistribution of wealth is essential, and the sooner we make up our minds on that important point, the better it will be for all concerned, not only in Canada but elsewhere.

One thing that struck me, in listening yesterday to the remarks of the leader of the opposition, as a very important omission on his part was this: it will be remembered that he moved an amendment making an addition to the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the amendment being to this effect:

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's present advisers and the official opposition do not possess the confidence of the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was not my amendment. May I correct my hon. friend?

Mr. GARDINER: I should have said:

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's advisers do not possess the confidence of the country.

I quite appreciate the fact that I have read an amendment which I may move, but that does not alter what I have to say as to the situation in regard to the leader of the opposition. The right hon. gentleman yesterday afternoon and night spoke for four hours and ten minutes; he was very critical of the administration, but to my mind the outstanding feature was that the leader of the opposition did not give to the house or country any indication what, if he were called upon to form a government, would be the policy of his party.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not want to take another four hours.

Mr. BOURASSA: Take the time on his amendment.

Mr. GARDINER: If the program of the Liberal party would take four hours to expound, it must be some program. But inasmuch as all that I could take out of his address as to the policy of the Liberal party was that if they came into power there might be some reduction in tariff duties, and they hoped that the central bank to be created would be Canadian owned. I believe the time is ripe for the people of Canada to demand from all political parties a clear statement as to exactly what their program or platform will be. As I am limited to forty minutes I have not at my disposal the time, for instance, to give an outline of the program of the United Farmers of Alberta; nor have I at my disposal the time to give an outline of the program of the Labour group and other groups affiliated with the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. I have not the time to discuss the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation platform, but we have given it to the world; it is open to anyone to know what that program is. The program of these different groups is available to all who desire to know exactly what we are aiming at. And that is something of which the people of Canada have no knowledge, as far as the Liberal party is concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What about the three by-elections we have had?

Mr. GARDINER: We appreciate the way the by-elections went, but after all, by-elections are not always a good indication of what the people are thinking.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Fairly good.

Mr. GARDINER: They may be or they may not, therefore I am not disposed to place too much confidence in the results of by-elections. But seeing that my hon. friend the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) has raised that point, is it the purpose of the Liberal party to wait and see whether the discontent of the people with the present government is such that that party will be returned to power without committing itself to any program?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The platform of the Liberal party was fully outlined on the 27th of February in this house by the leader of the party.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Also in 1919.

Mr. GARDINER: Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am going to move the amendment I read a few minutes ago. It is as follows, moved by myself, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth):

That the amendment be amended by inserting after the word "advisers" the words "and official opposition."

The amendment as amended would then read:

We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's present advisers and official opposition do not possess the confidence of this house or of the country.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, if the rules of the house permitted, I might be tempted to move a subamendment to the amendment to the amendment, making it a full confession that we have lost all confidence in ourselves, individually and collectively. It may appear a joke, but perhaps it would be nearer to the growing feeling of a large number of people in the country than my friends on either side of the house may think. This may be one of the last utterances of my public life. My remaining days in public, and all my days to come, are few. But suppose this were my last declaration, I may repeat here the advice which was given to me nearly forty years ago when I entered parliament for the first time, by a man who had much experience in public life, that is Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who told me: "Do not fall into the mistake into which most of us parliamentarians fall, of believing that people outside think and feel and react as we do. So long as you are in parliament think of the people outside." I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, and I say this quite seriously, after a good deal of thought and reflection and study of history, both of this country and foreign countries, that the confidence of the people in the power of parliaments and parties composing parliaments, to alleviate the sufferings of the people, is in our day very much shaken. I am no revolutionist by temperament; but I come in contact with the people who suffer, who have suffered for years, who see their children suffering around them, and who are told alternately by the interpreters of one party and the other: "It is the fault of the others; put us in power and we will cure your sufferings." Governments change but the sufferings continue, with the result that the people are beginning to doubt either the will or strength of parliaments and governments and parties to remedy the situation. In older, more civilized and more cultured countries than ours, that struggle is seen. Fascism or bolshevism or communism are not the outcome of an instinct to resort to brute force, but of this desire for a change. That is what brought Mussolini into power in Italy and Hitler into power in Germany. That is what is in a measure threatening the condition of things in France, perhaps the best ordered country in the world, socially and economically, but where there is a growing feeling of discontent on the part of an increasing number of people of all classes, and decreasing confidence in the power of their institutions to cure their evils.

My purpose in speaking to-night, heaven knows, is not that I believe that I can offer any cure. In the sincerity of my heart, as a Canadian unconnected with political parties —which may be a fault; I am not putting the parties on trial—I am simply stating what I feel; and in doing so I believe I express the thought of a large number of people in all the provinces of Canada. It is this: could there not be a truce between the fighting groups in parliament and outside of parliament in order to try for something other than merely the retention of power or the conquest of power?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOURASSA: Of course my friends of the Liberal party will claim that they were defeated by an appeal to the feelings of despair of the people, that they were slandered before the people of Canada because they happened to be in power at the beginning of the crisis, and that their opponents must suffer the deserved retribution for what they did in 1930. There is some truth in that. But do they in the bottom of their hearts believe that if they come back into power this year or next, they are by themselves capable, without any moral support from some people outside of their party, either in parliament or out of parliament, of doing any better than their opponents? No, they cannot. I wish to be fair to everyone. I hope I have no enemies in this house. I was a strong fighter in my day, for a short time as a party man and for a long time outside of parties, alternately with and against both parties. But in my growing age I have come to the conclusion that there is more good in each party and every party than their opponents will admit, and sometimes than even their own friends believe. But with the party system, with its traditions of party strife, with the conviction—is it a conviction?—in each party that they must charge their opponents with all the faults and crimes and errors of the past and claim for their party the credit for all that has been done that is good; with that system you cannot expect the growth of a public conscience, intelligent and constructive, and you cannot expect an increase in the confidence of the people.

May I be somewhat personal and address myself to, I shall not say the three leaders of the different parties, but the leader of the government (Mr. Bennett), the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the chairman of the new cooperative association? May I say quite frankly that I have much admiration and sympathy for the three of them? The Prime Minister I have known for over twenty years. Were I not afraid of hurting his extreme modesty I would say that I have the deepest admiration for him. I do say, however, quite unreservedly that he is one of the strongest-willed statesmen we have had in Canada. I will go farther and state that he has a clearness of mind, a quickness of thought and a strength of action which has rarely been possessed by any man loaded with the responsibility of office. I give that credit to him with the greatest of pleasure. But, he knows that he is but a man; he knows that. I believe I could state more accurately than many of his fellow members that I fully understand his desire to do his duty by his country. I know he is public-spirited; I know that he gives the best of himself to what he considers to be his task. But I repeat that he is a man, and only a man. If the whole problem was that of maintaining what he calls sound money or of giving to the country an effective administration in matters of finance and commerce I have no hesitation in saying that I do not think he has his equal in Canada at the present time, and has had very few in past days. But the maintenance of the dollar, the development of trade and the increase of our exports and imports, is not the whole problem; he knows that. That is not the whole economic problem—still less the social problem—it is much more than that. When you deal with nations, with communities composed of millions of men, women and children, you have to consider something more than material problems. You have to take into account what Bismarck, a statesman who was never styled as a dreamer or a poet, called the imponderables, without the consideration of which no statesman can rule his country and entertain proper relations with foreign countries. I state to the three leaders that they must take into account the feelings, the needs, the habits, the requirements, not only material but moral and social, of all the elements of the community. In that regard I appeal to the three parties in this house. They consider primarily the interests of the classes they represent, some having at heart the interest of the farmers, others organized labour, others the interests of the manufacturers. When I refer to that class I am not making any improper insinuation.

There is one class however of which I hear very little, a class which is difficult to count, but which is very important morally, socially and economically. I refer to the small bourgeoisie, as they called it in France, the lower middle class as they called it in England years ago. I was struck with an observation made not long before his death by that highly regretted European statesman, Doctor Stresemann, who unfortunately died too soon for the good of Germany, of Europe and of the world. His remark was this: "The loss that Germany has suffered is not defeat and humiliation; that will pass over. It is not the loss of Alsace and Lorraine; we can make that sacrifice. They have been a source of dispute between French and Germans for centuries. It is not even the loss of Silesia and the building up of the Danzig corridor which separates eastern Prussia from the rest of our country. It is not the loss of land, of men or money; but it is the downfall for generations to come of that humble middle class which have been deprived of savings accumulated during twenty, thirty or forty years." That same class exists here. They are individuals; they are not organized as a class. Therefore they cannot present their views as can the organized farmers, the organized workers, the organized professional men or manufacturers. Nevertheless they constitute the mainstay of the body politic. They contribute their share of direct and indirect taxation to the governments of the provinces and the dominion.

What care has been taken of them during the crisis of the last five years? I will take for example my native city of Montreal, and will appeal for verification to every hon. member representing a constituency of that city. There are to-day on the paupers' list of Montreal men who for twenty, thirty or forty years worked earnestly and honestly as carpenters, plasterers, bricklayers, masons, small contractors and so on. Others were the small employees of large concerns like the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company, a corporation which has grown tremendously at the expense of both the consuming population of Montreal and its own employees. In the words of my friend to my left, they represent a testimony to the rottenness of our present economic and social system. Some of those small employees, after twenty-five or thirty years, were in a position, like the small traders and labourers, to purchase a piece of land upon which they erected tenements. They lived in one tenement and counted upon the rental of the other one or two so that they might die in peace and leave a small property to their children. Those properties are now empty. The occupants of the tenements pay no rental, yet taxation is being piled up. The owners continue to pay tribute to the electric monopoly of Montreal. Nobody comes to their rescue. They are proprietors, and why? Because they followed for thirty or forty years the laws of God and man; because they were moral and sober, and because they gave an honest day of labour to themselves or to their employers without making use of the threat of a union to claim so much more pay or so many less hours of work. What is the result of their practising for forty or fifty years those social, christian and human virtues? They are disregarded by everybody, because they are not an organized class, and are not represented in parliament. Well, belonging to no party and having no electoral fund to draw from either a trade union or manufacturers' association, I raise this evening my humble voice and ask the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance to think of those people when they are preparing their budgets. I repeat that while the money question is a big one, and while the increase in trade is of great importance and is in itself a worthy objective, they are not everything.

But, even that is not all. I am quite sure that the three leaders agree on certain things which are not contained in the program of the two old parties but are contained in the program of the Canadian Cooperative Commonwealth. For example, there is the point mentioned by my hon. friend from Acadia (Mr. Gardiner), the better distribution of wealth. Of course, everybody admits in his heart and conscience that it must come, but the question is: how shall it come? Three or four years ago, at the beginning of this crisis, I ventured in this house the opinion that the government should invite men of wealth, bankers and directors of large insurance companies, to think among themselves what they should do to bring about a better equilibrium between the wealthy man and the pauper, between large corporations and the individual; because if they did not do so of their own will, under the guidance—and let it be a strong guidance—of the rulers of the land; if they did not of their own accord help to bring about an economic and social readjustment in this country, it would not be my friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) who would raise the cry of revolution; it would be raised from Montreal or from Winnipeg or from anywhere; it would come from the crowds of people in the streets.

Was there ever a truer statement than that contained in the famous encyclical of the pope on labour and social questions, that observation which he makes to all rulers—after having denounced communism, after having denounced even socialism as incapable of remedying the evils of the day, after having also denounced the abuses of capitalism, the concentration of wealth and what he calls, quite properly, the economic dictatorship that has taken the place of the public power in most countries,—when he says, addressing himself to the men responsible for the maintenance of law in the countries of the world: "More guilty than the preachers of communism are those who, having received from the people and from God the power to legislate, neglect to make use of their power to correct those abuses out of which revolutions spring up." That happens to have been written by a pope; but I hope that my friends in this house, to whatever creed they may belong, realize that this is not the dictum of the chief of a religion or of a sect. It is the opinion of a man who receives information from the whole world over, who relies upon traditions of order, upon justice and charity, and who appeals to the men who govern in order to make justice prevail in the lands that are confided to their care.

Can that be done by any one party? I do not believe it. I do not believe you can have the strength of public opinion in this country, or in any country, that must be at the back of the necessary measures of reform to curb the power of finance, to liquidate abnormal capital, to distinguish between real capital and false capital, to wipe out what has been stolen from the public and make safer thereby what is legitimate in investment; nor can you bring about a better distribution of the goods necessary to the welfare of the people in such a way that the farmer will get a better price for his produce and the poor devil in the city will not have to pay three times as much to buy food for his family—you cannot, I say, readjust these great questions of economic balance and bring about a better distribution of wealth through the control of capital unless you have a very strong opinion at your back, and unless you can be sure that your opponents will not denounce you as revolutionists or bolshevists. On the other hand you cannot maintain the present state of things by creating the fear of arousing a revolution, without being exposed, and rightly exposed, to the charge that you are making use of power and of a majority to maintain abuses such as have brought revolution in all countries where they have existed.

[Mr. Bourassa.]

Is it two years ago that my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition compared the present state of things to the old feudal system? I felt disposed to tell him then what I say now, that I think that was a slander on the feudal lords; because although some feudal lords abused their power, and although there came a time, of course, when the balance between their privileges and their social obligations was disturbed, yet every privilege that was granted to a high or a small lord under the feudal system was at once a reward for his public services and an inducement for him and his descendants to continue those services. But under the present system the possessors of wealth, the creators of false wealth, especially, those who, like the electric monopoly in Montreal, connected with the Royal Bank and the Montreal Trust, and which exercises upon the city of Montreal and upon all the municipalities within a radius of one hundred miles from that city a domination which no feudal lord ever exercised over his domain—what responsibility do they carry? None. It is an anonymous corporation which has received its power from a government in Quebec, and every time it is attacked it invokes the constitution.

Now I am a friend of the constitution and I stand for its maintenance; but just as I say you will not maintain what is legitimate, I will not say in the capitalistic system, but in the use of capital for the development of industry, by allowing the owners of capital to do whatever they like, neither will you maintain the constitution of Canada by making use of the constitutional argument in the province to say: This is not our business; it is Ottawa's business; nor by us here saying: We cannot interfere because it is a matter that belongs to the province.

The Prime Minister has started on a good path. I was delighted at those two conferences at comparatively short intervals between the federal authority and the provincial. That is a beginning of cooperation. But the Prime Minister of Canada, who has a larger responsibility than the premier of any province, must make them understand quite clearly at those conferences that if this parliament does something to remedy not merely the surface but the real causes of the evil, they must follow suit or he will let the people know where the responsibility lies. It is all very well for purposes of discussion to keep these conferences secret; but when it comes to a decision, if the premier of any province, or the premiers of two or more provinces take upon themselves to block any remedial legislation that may be suggested by the Prime Minister of Canada or by the premier of any province, then let them take their responsibility and put their objections in writing, and let those objections as well as the resolutions adopted be published, so that the people in each province will know where the responsibility rests.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOURASSA: There must be cooperation between the federal government and the provincial governments, first, to make the present laws work better than they do. Look at that matter of the coal monopoly. Is it not three or four years ago that the order in council was passed prohibiting the importation of Russian coal? I took the liberty of denouncing it, but I am sorry to say that not one of my Liberal friends supported me publicly in the house, and the reason given to me was that they were afraid that they would be condemned by the bishops of the province of Quebec because the Conservatives of Quebec were claiming for the Prime Minister the title of the saviour of religion. I took the liberty of pointing out that the only religion involved in the case was that of Senator Webster and his monopoly. How long did it take to get action, and how long is this amalgamation of coal companies into one, directly or indirectly, openly or secretly, under Senator Webster to continue? They are making enough profit in a week's time to pay the $10,000 fine which has been imposed upon them. It is the same with the monopolist here as it was with the sellers of contraband whisky in the United States, the pirates on the high seas; they made enough from the sale of their cargoes to be able to stand the loss of one cargo out of ten without impairing their previously ill-gained profits.

If there must be cooperation between organized political powers, federal, provincial and municipal, we cannot expect this parliament to give a general direction to the country at large, to appeal to public conscience, to take strong measures—strong measures are needed, but I shall not discuss them to-night—unless you make sure that upon certain points at least all parties will agree and will not denounce each other. Can that not be done? All parties united during the war to induce Canadians to shed their blood and ruin their country in a foreign quarrel. I shall not discuss that either, but surely the need of assuring the victory of one set of nations in Europe over another was not a greater or more pressing duty on the people of Canada than the assurance of the life of their children and the future of their country. There was understanding and more than cooperation between the two parties at that time. The constitution was overridden and parliament was prolonged in order to carry on the business of war and increase the number of Canadians who would shed their blood upon the battlefields of Europe. Why cannot something of that nature be done in order to save our country and preserve the lives of some of our boys? Cannot the parties cooperate in order to remedy some of the economic and financial disasters which arose from that war? It is not only the huge war debt of $2,500,000,000 which we are transmitting to our children without having paid one cent, but think of the debts piled up by the provinces, by the municipalities and by the corporations, all because of the folly of the war. I was glad to hear the Prime Minister denounce this afternoon the mistake we made when we sold our wheat at higher prices than it was worth. I came back from Europe in 1922 and advised my friends, some from the west, that a crisis was coming, that the people of Europe would not be foolish enough to go on paying tribute to us to the extent of two or three dollars per bushel of wheat, and the same proportion in the case of other commodities. I told them that those countries were preparing not only to supply their own needs but if possible to make us pay back some of the ill-gained profits which were derived by us during the war.

I am an old timer and a believer in old things. I believe in the law of permanent justice administered by an all-providing God rather than in the laws of a short-thinking humanity. The crimes of one generation are always expiated by the next. That may seem cruel, but it is one of the mysteries of life. I do not ask the adhesion of anyone to my views. I respect the views of all those who thought that we were right in entering the war; but whether we approve or disapprove of that war, there is one thing sure, the contribution of Canada was imposed upon our people without, as the Prime Minister has said, their realizing what the consequences would be. They are now reaping the results. Are we not to do something in the way of cooperation between men of good will in this parliament to remedy some of these dire results? I do not ask you to break the bonds of party; I do not ask you to renounce your fealty to any of your leaders or to any of your ideals; I simply ask you if you do not have sufficient breadth in your minds and sentiment in your hearts as Canadians to look for what is common to all of you. Even at my age I am optimist enough to believe that there is more good in the hearts and brains of all of you than would seem to appear at times. You should try to look for what is best instead of always rehashing old quarrels, old wrangles and old charges. Instead of accusing each other of all the crimes and errors of the past, you should try to find out some means to adjust the present and prepare a better future for the generations to come. If you did that I think you would have accomplished your duty as representatives of the people of Canada to a greater extent than by settling, resettling and never settling old scores.

I present these views with the fullest amity and from the simpleness of my heart. My days have passed, but in my younger days I appealed frequently to those who were also young and full of enthusiasm. My youth is gone, my health is failing; but there is something here which remains youthful because it is eternal, that is, the belief in duty to God, in duty to country and in duty to humanity. By humanity I mean all the people of this country, whether they be Grits or Tories, Catholics or Protestants, Jews, Mohammedans or unbelievers; I mean all the men and women who are gathered in this land under the emblem of the British crown. They are under the immediate care, tutelage and responsibility of this parliament. If we fail in our duty in these present circumstances, the memory of us as a body and perhaps as individuals will be cursed by generations to come. We shall be cursed, not for any crime that has been committed by either party, but perhaps for what might be termed the greatest crime of all, that is, the failure to accomplish one's duty at a time when it should be accomplished. That time is upon us. Our duty is not to squander money, it is not to pile up debts or to maintain a certain number of people without work, including those who do not want to work; as the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) says, it is to try to get to the root and remedy the deep-seated causes of the evil.

I turn now to my friends to my left. They are full of hope. They are a new group with a new program. Let us be frank and admit that there is much in them which is good. I commend this one thing to my young Conservative friends from Quebec: Cease the campaign of slander which has been carried on by calling these men the agents of Moscow. Do you know what you are going to get from such a practice? When the people begin to read, and there are people in Quebec who do read; when they find out that there is so much good in that platform, they will draw the conclusion—they have the logical French mind—that if that is Moscow, then Moscow is not so bad. When you slander an opponent by tacking upon his program or his name or his person something of ill repute coming from a man or party that cannot be reached, the people make a simple application and conclude that the men you denounce or the men with whom you compare them are not so bad as you claim. I give you that advice.

To my Liberal friends in the province of Quebec I give this further advice: Do not raise your hands in horror and say, "Oh no, we have nothing in common with these men from the west, these semi-bolsheviks and quarter-communists." Of course, I would not answer for all of them, I can tell you quite frankly. I no longer answer for any public man or party; I have enough to do answering for myself. But suppose there are among them men of advanced views. Are you prepared to say that there is no one in your party who does not hold some wrong views on some things? When you make use of the pope's encyclical to denounce the C.C.F., why do you not read that part of it which denounces the system that has been built up, maintained and protected by the two great historic parties since confederation? If you do, you will find in the pope's encyclical as much against our social and economic system as there is against communism and socialism. Let us admit that there is much good in the program of the C.C.F., and let my hon. friends of the C.C.F. realize that they cannot expect to have their whole program swallowed by all the people of Canada. There must be give and take between men and parties: only by so doing can we hope to settle our difficulties. Surely we could agree upon some measures to control finance. As regards the central bank, can we not come to some agreement, I will not say to repudiate debts, but to deal with them in such a way that they will be attenuated, so to speak, debts both public and semi-public. Whatever more in the way of trade we do with New Zealand and England will not counteract the tremendous fact that less than eleven million people in Canada bear to-day a public and semi-public debt, including in this the debt of corporations, religious and civil, of over ten billion dollars. Do you realize what that means for a country like Canada which, as the Prime Minister said this afternoon, has no accumulated wealth? It is all very well to talk about natural resources. I remember the observation of a sensible old Londoner who gave a bit of advice to a new statesman coming from Canada to address the people in England. He asked this old Englishman what he would advise him to say in order to be agreeable. The Englishman replied, "I don't know, but I would offer you this bit of advice at any rate: Don't talk of Canada's natural resources, because we have heard so much about them, and they have cost us some money."

This is probably the last session of this parliament before the electoral wrangle takes place, and hon. gentlemen will go back to their constituents and appeal to party spirit and try to make the best they can of their party's cause. I submit that neither party would endanger its chances of victory by making some concessions, by trying to create an operating understanding among all parties with regard to a few questions, because thereby they would enhance the confidence of the people in the sincerity of each group, and also do something to restore, what is badly needed, the faith of the people in our parliamentary institutions and in parliamentary government. For I can tell you that it is going down and down and down quite rapidly. Denunciation of this group may bring victory to one party or the other once or twice; but if this group is ever victorious, if a group which might be, from the point of view of the other parties, worse than this group, ever takes its place, it will be because of the failure of the old parties to realize their responsibility to the people of Canada, to their own members, and to their friends and supporters.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): In the few moments that remain before eleven o'clock I desire to bring to the attention of the house some problems that are of particular interest to the district whence I come. I wish first of all to congratulate the mover (Mr. Gobeil) and the seconder (Mr. Barber) of the address on the splendid speeches which they made in opening this debate. I have had the pleasure of knowing the seconder of the debate for many years and it is all the more pleasing to congratulate him.

All through the west, particularly in the district from which I come, there are people who have suffered greatly from the conditions in which they now find themselves. They have borne their troubles with a brave spirit and have carried on in spite of great difficulties. But debt and despondency are facing them. In many places the crops have been a failure; in some sections they have failed three and four years in succession. These people are therefore at the present time in desperate straits. Their gardens failed to grow; fodder was not available, and their live stock are dying from the hard winter. It is true that relief is being given, and in most instances the bare necessities of life are being supplied; but in a general way the condition is most unfortunate and many are discouraged. Even where crops did grow, the low prices which have been received have not covered the actual out-of-pocket costs of production. The people are asking themselves this question: How can we continue to sell cattle at 2, 3 and 3½ cents a pound when it costs us 5 cents a pound to produce them?

The speech from the throne indicates that some marketing board will be established, and therefore we shall have another opportunity of discussing the whole problem of the marketing of cattle. The cattle industry is one of the oldest of which we have any record. All down through the ages it has been the chief occupation of mankind, and in Alberta it is still an industry that holds out great hope, with a future probably greater than that of the wheat industry, especially in the southern parts of the province. Yet we find that these large ranchers, who have had vision, who have struggled along year in and year out, meeting conditions as they have come, are now on the verge of bankruptcy because of the low prices they are receiving. When the price of beef was 7, 8 and 9 cents a pound there were certain transportation charges that had to be met; and now that the price is as low as 1½ cents, sometimes 2 and 3 cents, we find practically the same charges. The same freight rates are in existence; the same loading charges, the same stockyard charges, the same insurance charges, and so on, that existed previously exist to-day. The same high price must be paid for hay in the terminals, and altogether these expenses are so great that the returns from carloads of fine steers have been as low as one and one-half cents and one and one-quarter cents per pound live weight. These things tend to discourage those ranchers who have become famous for their hospitality, vision, and hard-working ability.

We have heard a great deal about wheat and the people are asking the same question in regard to it. How, they say, can we continue to grow wheat at from 40 to 45 cents a bushel when it is costing us at least 60 cents a bushel to produce it. During the last few days we have heard a good deal about the wheat situation in Europe, and although it does not hold out much hope, we must look forward with the expectation that the price of wheat will meet production costs, because we cannot to any great extent turn our farms into producing any other article of food or use them for any other purposes. With the spirit that is abroad, it is no wonder that the people in the west are turning toward state ownership, communism; that they are looking with anxious eyes toward the Douglas system, inflation, bimetallism and many other isms. They are groping around expecting to find some solution, some system which will improve the standard of living.

I want to speak for just a few moments on an industry which I discussed before in this house, and that is the beet sugar industry. On February 24, 1932, I had the honour of introducing in the house a resolution dealing with the beet sugar industry. At that time I pointed out that it was one which would be a great help to the people of western Canada. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Stewart) also spoke on this question, because he has within his constituency a beet sugar factory. We pointed out that in Canada only 10 per cent of the raw material used for the manufacture of sugar was home grown, whereas in the United States the percentage was from 20 to 25 per cent and in the mother country also from 20 to 25 per cent. We pointed out that the establishment of a beet sugar factory would be a great help to the district in which it would be located, because it would mean the employment of a number of people, would provide traffic for the transportation companies and would consume a great deal of material, thus creating a market for the dealers in and manufacturers of that material. We pointed out also that the valuable by-products would help other secondary industries and that the cattle industry would be greatly benefited thereby.

This resolution was amended in such a way as to have the matter referred to a committee of this house, and the agriculture committee dealt very thoroughly with the question. They called before them witnesses from every part of the country. These witnesses stated that sugar beets constituted a very profitable crop; they pointed out that it was of great value in the rotation of crops, and they gave much information regarding this industry in Canada. Among the men who appeared before the committee were:

H. Marshall, Bureau of Statistics, Ottawa.

Doctor T. W. Grindley, Bureau of Statistics, Ottawa.

W. R. Reek, Director of Experimental Farms, Ridgetown, Ontario.

Thomas Simpson, farmer, Pretoria, Ontario.

G. L. Rogers, President, British Columbia Sugar Refining Company, Vancouver.

B. R. McMullen, Alberta Beet Growers' Association.

Charles Houston, President, Canada and Dominion Sugar Company, Limited, Chatham, Ontario.

Alexander W. McIntyre, Canada and Dominion Sugar Company, Limited, Chatham, Ontario.

W. F. Russell, Alberta Beet Growers' Association.

[Mr. Gershaw.]

Day after day these witnesses were examined; the whole question was thoroughly discussed, and I should like to say that the discussion was watched with great interest by hundreds of people who had located on irrigated farms, who had tried year after year to make their overhead costs and who had failed owing to the collapse of prices. It was watched by people who had some hope that they would be able to produce sugar beets, a crop of high acreage value, and in that way be able to meet their overhead on their irrigated farms. They have been rather disappointed. The report of the committee came into the house on April 1, 1932, and I should like briefly to indicate its nature. It was in part as follows:

The evidence submitted established the following facts regarding the industry:

1. That the production of sugar beets has been carried on very profitably in certain districts of Ontario and Alberta.

The amount paid to the farmers for beets in 1931 was about $2,500,000; during the period of normal commodity prices for farm products, an average price of $7.48 per ton was paid to the farmers for sugar beets, but owing to the present low price of raw cane and refined sugar, the factories claim that they are unable to guarantee more than $5 per ton for the 1932 crop.

2. That large additional areas, suitable for the growth of sugar beets, are available in Canada.

3. That during the past ten years the annual average production of refined sugar in Canada was 963,000,000 pounds; the percentage of beet sugar production has varied from 6.2 per cent in 1926 to approximately 10 per cent in 1930 and 1931.

4. That the sugar beet factories at Chatham, Wallaceburg and Raymond, are now operating at full capacity, and that no further development of the beet sugar industry in Canada is possible until manufacturing capacity is increased.

5. That world stocks of sugar on hand are very large and that an extended surplus of some 4,000,000 tons will be carried over to next year.

6. That there is sufficient capacity in the cane sugar refineries of Canada to refine two and one half times the amount of sugar necessary to meet the demands of the Canadian consumers.

7. That the granting of bonuses or subsidies at present to encourage the production of sugar from beets was not favoured by the representatives of the growers or the refiners.

8. That the consumption of sugar from Winnipeg to British Columbia is approximately 255,000,000 pounds, supplied from eastern Canada as far westward as the Brandon district, and from Vancouver eastward to the Brandon district, except for the 30,000,000 pounds of beet sugar manufactured at Raymond, Alberta.

9. That freight rates on sugar from Raymond to prairie points are from one-half to three-quarters of a cent per pound less than rates to similar points from Vancouver or Montreal.

Summing up, they say:

Your committee therefore recommend that in view of the existing tariff on sugar and in consideration of the substantial payments being made to agriculture and labour by the beet sugar factories at present in operation, the cane sugar refineries should undertake to provide for a gradual increase in factory facilities for the refining of beet sugar in Canada, and that, with the additional advantages in freight rates to points in the middle west, heretofore described, factory facilities should now be steadily increased in western areas where beets are grown, thereby making it possible to produce from beets a more substantial percentage of the sugar consumption of Canada.

Your committee further recommends that if no successful attempt be made in the immediate future by the refineries to increase the facilities for the manufacture of beet sugar, the government should take into consideration steps to accomplish that end.

That was the report, Mr. Speaker, about two years ago. Since then, of course, times have been unusual, but so far as we have been able to understand, nothing has yet been done to carry out that recommendation, which passed this house unanimously. I think that the government should give this matter their immediate attention, in the hope and expectation of doing something to ameliorate the desperate conditions that exist in that part of the country. Money spent by the beet sugar factory is spread over a wide area and goes into many hands. The factory at Raymond spends something like $630,000 a year in the purchase of beets and another $665,000 for supplies, freight and labour. The chief item of cost is fuel, and if the factory could be established in Medicine Hat where natural gas is available that item of cost would be much less. I wanted to bring these facts to the attention of the government and the house because I believe that something can be done which will bring joy and satisfaction to a great many people on these irrigated farms. True, someone has said that there is a great overproduction of sugar throughout the world, but that obtains in respect to other articles as well. There seems to be over-production of wheat, yet we find the nations of Europe using their lands to produce wheat when they might use them for other purposes. We cannot do that to any great extent, but I do feel that if some encouragement were given to the industry, some tariff adjustments made to force the refineries to expand their plants according to the spirit of this report, much good would be accomplished.

We have taken this matter up with some of the refiners, with Mr. Rogers in particular. He points out that he has no intention of expanding refining capacity at the present time, and although the report was published in this form, no arrangement has been made to decide which refineries shall take charge of certain areas. I wish to close by expressing the hope that the government will find time to review this whole problem, and will be able to give some hope of relief to the people concerned.

On motion of Mr. Stewart (Edmonton) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.58 p.m.

The house met at three o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 5, to amend the criminal code.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. BURY: The purpose of the bill is to make two amendments in section 750 of the criminal code, in Part XV, in connection with summary convictions.

The first amendment is to extend to those who have been convicted and sentenced to a fine without imprisonment on default the same rights as are now under the code extended to those who have been convicted and sentenced to imprisonment without a fine, and to those who have been convicted and sentenced to a fine and, in default of payment, imprisonment, both of which classes on appeal can enter into a recognizance and remain at liberty until their appeal comes on. In the case of a man convicted and sentenced to a fine without imprisonment on default there is no such provision, and he must pay his fine and costs in full before he can appeal. The purpose of the amendment is to extend to him the same privilege as is granted already to the two classes first mentioned.

The other amendment is intended to preserve to a convicted person the right of appeal notwithstanding his having failed to indicate an intention of appealing after his conviction. As the law now stands if a man convicted and sentenced pays his fine, and then later within the time limit specified by the code, files his notice of appeal, he may be and sometimes is met at the court of appeal with the objection that he has waived his right of appeal by paying his fine without then indicating an intention to appeal. The purpose of the amendment is to preserve the right of appeal during the time provided under the code for the filing of the notice.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ST. LAWRENCE SHIP CHANNEL

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont):

1. Has the government or any of its representatives had any representations made it or them, or has it or they held or had any interviews or meetings with representatives of the city of Montreal, or of the Montreal board of trade, or of other bodies, having reference to a forty foot channel below the port of Montreal?
2. If so: (a) what were such bodies; (b) what was the answer given?

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to this question the hon. Minister of Marine indicated the other day that an answer would be given later. It would be difficult to answer the question exactly by a written reply for the reason that representatives from several bodies in Montreal saw the minister and other representatives of other bodies saw me, and the answer therefore would be that representatives of various bodies of Montreal saw various members of the government with respect to the improvement of the channel below the port of Montreal. One body, for instance, which sent representatives was the chamber of commerce, and another, the board of trade. The answer given was that departmental engineers would collect all the available information and make a report in due course as to what, if any, action could be taken to provide a deeper channel than that now existing between the port of Montreal and the sea.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): In view of the fact that a committee of departmental employees has been named a commission to study this question I am quite satisfied with the answer of the right hon. gentleman.

DUTY ON IMPORTED MERCHANDISE

Mr. BLAIR:

1. What were the declared values of merchandise imported into Canada during 1931, 1932, 1933, and 1934, to date, by: (a) The T. Eaton Company, Limited; (b) The Robert Simpson Company, Limited; (c) Hudson's Bay Company?

[Mr. Bury.]

2. What amount of duties and imposts were paid upon such importations during each of above-mentioned periods either by the consignee or consignors?

Mr. MATTHEWS: In answer to parts 1 and 2 of this question I would say that it is contrary to the established practice of the Department of National Revenue to give information which would disclose the business of an individual or corporation.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

WHEAT AGREEMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before we proceed with the order of notices of motion, with the permission of the house I should like to lay upon the table two copies, one in English and one in French, of the World Wheat Problem and the London Agreement. This document was mentioned yesterday as having been circulated in western Canada to the governments of the western provinces.

[Mr. Blair.]

GUARANTEES TO BANKS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in answer to a question asked yesterday, I should like to intimate to the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) as to when the banks were made aware of the guarantees. He suggested it was in the month of August and I promised I would look it up. The truth is that while the government did not negotiate with the banks, the information to which reference was made was given before I left this country in June, that is, that if the securities could not be sold, the guarantee would be given.

CREDIT AND FINANCE

NATIONAL SYSTEM OF CONTROL UNDER JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL PARLIAMENT

Mr. W. T. LUCAS (Camrose) moved:

Whereas, the provision of an adequate medium of exchange through the issue and control of currency, is a function inherent in the state, and one which is wholly within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament, and

Whereas, the transfer of this function to private interests to be used as a means of profit, rather than as a public service, has enabled those controlling finance to dominate every phase in the industrial and economic life of the nation, and

Whereas, the depressed and chaotic conditions which now prevail would indicate that this financial control, as at present exercised has proved itself detrimental to the best interests of the people of this country;

Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, the government should give immediate consideration to the reassumption of this responsibility, and the creation of a national system of credit and finance, to be controlled in the interests of all the people, and under the jurisdiction of the federal parliament.

He said: Mr. Speaker, never in the history of Canada and perhaps never in the history of the world has the money question been so widely and freely discussed as at the present time. After the financial collapse and the disclosures which have been made in the last few years, the people are no longer willing to allow the bankers and financiers to do their thinking for them. They are asking themselves this very simple question: Why is it that having the raw materials, the men, the machines and the power to produce in superabundance, we cannot make use of the things we can and do produce? The answer is becoming obvious. It is because of an outworn, man-made, privately controlled money system. Nothing else stands in the way. I want to say to this house and to the Canadian people that among the multitudinous questions which confront them at the present time there is none of such transcendent importance as that which is to be decided by the resolution now under consideration. The question to be decided is: Are the Canadian people to have national sovereignty over their money system, their medium of exchange? In a recent message to congress President Roosevelt made this statement:

> The issuance and control of the medium of exchange, which we call money, is the high prerogative of government.

It is interesting to know that the President of the United States, in spite of strong opposition, was determined to restore this right to the American people. At the present time the authority of the crown over national credit has been made subordinate to the policy of the private financial authorities. This must be changed. National sovereignty over the money power is fundamental. It lies at the very roots of national prosperity and the possibility of a permanent recovery of purchasing power. Shakespeare once wrote:

> There is a tide in the affairs of men,
> Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune;

Just as with the individual, so is a nation called upon at times to make important decisions. We stand today at the cross-roads —to the right, abundant nature, coupled with man's genius, offers plenty for all; to the left, unemployment, misery, squalor, want and destitution. History tells us that the Anglo-Saxon has ever been at his best when his back is to the wall. We stand to-day in that position. There is no turning back, our only escape is by bold frontal attack. The barons of old found themselves in a similar position. They had to strike or remain slaves. They demanded their rights and won them and every child in our schools is taught that the liberty of the people commenced with the signing of the great Magna Charta in 1215. In those early days the masses of the people were uneducated and, therefore, progress was slow. So we find that many centuries elapsed before another great reform was brought about which had far-reaching effects upon the lives of the people. In 1832, approximately 100 years ago, the first reform bill was passed. This was quickly followed by other reforms, and education spread to the masses and so far as history records, since the spread of education, more progress has been made in the last 100 years in our scientific and industrial development than was made in all the centuries of time that went before.

The problem of our forefathers was one of scarcity and famine. To-day man is no longer the slave but the master of nature in so far as eliminating the fear of scarcity is concerned. To-day an abundant nature coupled with science offers a new promise to mankind and yet we stand in that ridiculous position which has been so aptly described as starvation in the midst of plenty. To-day our problem is not one of production but rather one of distribution among the people of the abundance we have learned how to produce.

Capitalism along with education taught men to conquer nature by rapid assault. Under the impulse of the technical requirements of capitalism, the evolution of the sciences has been a triumphal march of the human mind. Science has stripped the veil of mystery from the natural forces which once filled our ancestors with fear. Science has made possible the subordination of natural forces to the human will in the service of our main object the production of the necessities of life with a minimum expenditure of energy, but our social and political science has lagged woefully behind. Yet, Mr. Speaker, in spite of what education and science has done for mankind, the world finds itself to-day in a very unhappy condition. I should like to quote from The Inversion of Science by Professor Soddy, as follows:

> Discoveries, in themselves noble and full of the promise of better things, are being turned to evil. Plethora and glut choke the world's markets and produce not prosperity but unemployment and destitution. The dread powers of nature which science has in harness are being used not to build up a civilization worthy of our intellectual and material greatness, but, with the enthusiasm reminiscent of a lunatic asylum, to destroy and wreck it.

If it is not too painful an operation, stop and think for a moment, and ask yourself, what is wrong? Has nature failed us? Are we unable to produce sufficient to satisfy the needs of mankind?

No, Mr. Speaker, as Professor Soddy has so well said, plethora and glut choke the world markets and produce not prosperity but unemployment and destitution.

When one thinks of the squalor and misery in the world to-day, with its millions of unemployed, but especially in this young country of Canada, with its abundant potential resources, with its virile man power, its immense wheat fields, its great water powers, magnificent factories and transportation systems, one would think that here at least one would find prosperity, happiness and contentment, but, Mr. Speaker, we know that it is not so. However, we are told that we have sound money.

We find in this rich young country thousands of our people unemployed, living on the dole, receiving charity, denied the right of a gainful occupation. Thousands of our young children are under-nourished, with lack of proper medical treatment, not because there are not enough doctors but because there is not sufficient money to pay for their services and so these young people face life with handicaps,—handicaps which will never be overcome. But perhaps one of the saddest things of all is the fact that approximately two hundred and twenty thousand of our young people leave school every year, fitted, ready and anxious to make their contribution to life, and what are their prospects for a gainful occupation? As Tennyson said, "Every door is barred with gold and opens but to golden keys."

Of course, if they are not too "choosey" they may eke out a miserable existence in a relief camp, or by doing some laborious work which could be done much cheaper by a machine, and so after a few years of this sort of thing they lose hope, they lose ambition, they lose courage, and finally have to be carried on the backs of those who are privileged to get a job.

How long is this sort of thing to continue amongst a so-called civilized and Christian people?

We may have so-called sound money, but money exists only by law and we are the people responsible for the law. Is there no one in the state competent to manipulate its bits of metal and paper so that those who can and do make things can buy them?

Two years ago, when speaking on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I made the statement that I believed there was no man in Canada who had such a wide grasp, such a thorough understanding of the financial question as the present Prime Minister and that he had the ability and the courage to grapple with this great question if he could only make up his mind to do so. So far he has not acted. He still clings to the moribund policies of the past and, frankly, I am disappointed, as are many people in Canada who were looking to him for leadership. I believe that, had he stayed away from London and followed his own judgment, it might have been different. Our Prime Minister seems to be following the same advice as did the Right Hon. Winston Churchill in 1925, when as Chancellor of the Exchequer he put England back on the gold standard, which he has since frankly and courageously admitted was wrong.

[Mr. Lucas.]

Let me quote in part from a speech on the budget which Mr. Churchill delivered in the British House of Commons in April, 1932:

> When I was moved by many arguments and forces in 1925 to return to the gold standard I was assured by the highest experts, and our experts are men of great ability and of indisputable integrity and sincerity—that we were anchoring ourselves to reality and stability; and I accepted their advice. I take for myself and my colleagues of other days whatever degree of blame and burden there may be for having accepted their advice. But what has happened? We have had no reality, no stability. The price of gold has risen since then by more than 70 per cent. That is as if a 12-inch footrule had suddenly been stretched to 19 or 20 inches; as if the pound avoirdupois had suddenly become 23 or 24 ounces instead of—how much is it?—16. Look at what this has meant to everybody who has been compelled to execute their contracts upon this irrationally enhanced scale. Look at the gross unfairness of such a distortion to all producers of new wealth, and to all that labour and science and enterprise can give us. Look at the enormously increased volume of commodities which have to be created in order to pay off the same mortgage debt or loan. Minor fluctuations might well be ignored, but I say quite seriously that this monetary convulsion has now reached a pitch where I am persuaded that the producers of new wealth will not tolerate indefinitely so hideous an oppression.

Those are pungent words. That was a courageous utterance, Mr. Speaker. Would that more of our public men would as frankly admit their mistakes and face the cold, hard facts. Mr. Churchill commenced his speech with these words:

> As I left the politics of yesterday for those of to-day, I now leave the politics of to-day for those of to-morrow.

In other words, Mr. Churchill recognizes that we are living under changing conditions, and that what may have been good enough for yesterday will not meet the needs of to-day. Would that our government could grasp that idea. I am afraid the scales have not yet fallen from the eyes of the Prime Minister. He is still following the stern lights of the ship, which light up only the past. He came out west last fall and instead of bringing a message of hope he left a feeling of gloom. There was to be more tightening of belts, more sacrifice, and then almost with tears in his eyes he told what a terrible calamity had happened when poor old Britain was forced off the gold standard.

Well, thank God that in the past hundred years learning has spread to the people, and never were they so well supplied with information, by press, radio, and so on. And what are they being told? What do they read in almost every paper? Most of it is about the wonderful recovery which is taking place in Great Britain. And when did this recovery start? Very funny to relate, it was after she left the gold standard in 1931. Is there anyone bold enough to deny that statement?

Let me quote a short excerpt from a speech by the Right Hon. David Lloyd George:

> Chief among those beneficial actions must be classed our departure from the gold standard in the autumn of 1931. The humour of that lies in the fact that we kicked violently against being released from our gold bondage by the hand of destiny.
> We smashed not only our party system, but the whole of our fiscal system in our convulsive protest.
> We borrowed £80,000,000 for the same purpose.
> Economists prophesied ruin and collapse if we failed to maintain sterling in its top-heavy howdah on the back of the golden calf.
> Luckily we were thrown off. Many other nations thereupon proceeded to do deliberately what we had done by accident, to their own great benefit. . . .
> The departure of so many countries from the gold standard has helped to transfer attention from gold to goods. When gold ceased to be a reliable measure of exchanges, there began to dawn a slow realization of the fact that useful goods are a truer wealth for a nation than idle yellow bars in bank vaults. . . .
> Possibly we may be moving towards an era of world sanity in which international commerce will be less subject to the interests and juggling tricks of bankers and high financiers: in which money will become the servant rather than the tyrant of mankind.

Then let us turn to our neighbour to the south. That great country, with nearly one-half of the world's gold in her vaults, found herself facing ruin. Only last March her banks were closed from coast to coast; then she left gold, and again, funny to relate, from that time on a steady improvement has taken place. Thought is still free, Mr. Speaker, and the people are thinking to-day as they have never done before.

The facts which I have just related are patent to every observer, and while the resolution before the house does not deal with the gold standard, I have merely cited these facts to show that those who now control money power are fighting desperately to retain the gold standard, for they know that so long as our money is based on one commodity, gold, which is scarce and can be cornered, they have a much better chance of retaining their stranglehold on the people.

A new experiment is being tried out by our neighbour to the south. The people of the United States, in their new president, have a man not only with a vision but with the courage to back it up. While some of the measures he is taking may not prove a complete success, he has broken new ground and he has made the statement that if one does not succeed, he will try something else. What he is to be given credit for is the fact that he has broken away from the old orthodox systems which have brought us to our present unhappy condition. Let me quote a few lines from that inaugural address which he made when he took office last March:

> Values have shrunken to fantastic levels; taxes have risen; our ability to pay has fallen; government of all kinds is faced by serious curtailment of income; the means of exchange are frozen in the currents of trade; the withered leaves of industrial enterprise lie on every side; farmers find no markets for their produce; the savings of many years in thousands of families are gone.
> More important, a host of unemployed citizens face the grim problem of existence, and an equally great number toil with little return.
> Yet our distress comes from no failure of substance. We are stricken by no plague of locusts. Compared with the perils which our forefathers conquered because they believed and were not afraid, we have still much to be thankful for. Nature still offers her bounty and human efforts have multiplied it. Plenty is at our doorstep, but a generous use of it languishes in the very sight of the supply.
> Primarily, this is because the rulers of the exchange of mankind's goods have failed through their own stubbornness and their own incompetence, have admitted their failure and abdicated. Practices of the unscrupulous money changers stand indicted in the court of public opinion, rejected by the hearts and minds of men.
> True, they have tried, but their efforts have been cast in the pattern of an outworn tradition. faced by failure of credit they have proposed only the lending of more money.
> Stripped of the lure of profit by which to induce our people to follow their false leadership they have resorted to exhortations, pleading tearfully for restored confidence. They know only the rules of a generation of self-seekers. They have no vision, and when there is no vision the people perish.
> The money changers have fled from their high seats in the temple of our civilization. We may now restore that temple to the ancient truths. The measure of the restoration lies in the extent to which we apply social values more noble than mere monetary profit.

That was a wonderful statement, especially coming from the leader of one of the greatest nations in the world. The only point where I do not agree with the president's statement is when he says that the money-changers have fled from their high seats in the temple of our civilization. It is true that they have been given a severe jolt but they are still fighting strenuously to maintain their control. Let us hope the people of the United States will stand steadfast behind the president in his noble effort to unseat them. I often think if the planet

Mars were inhabited and some person up there with a great telescope could take a bird's-eye view of our world to-day with its unlimited resources, its tremendous wealth producing power enabling it to produce plenty for all, and in the midst of all this abundance he saw unemployment, misery, poverty and want, he could come to no other conclusion than that those people were only fit subjects for a lunatic asylum.

Let us look at this question with plain, everyday common sense. What would one think of a farmer who had great stacks of feed in his fields, plenty for all his stock, but fenced around with barbed wire, far enough away so that only those beasts with long necks could reach the feed, the others having to starve or eke out a miserable existence by picking up the stray bits which fell from the mouths of the more fortunate ones? We know what would happen to him. He would immediately be arrested for cruelty to animals, and rightly so, and yet that is a fair illustration of what is happening in the human family, and what is being done to remedy it?

Doctor Hamilton Fyfe, Principal of Queens University, speaking at the annual dinner of the Engineering Institute of Canada last year, gave the engineers something to think about when he said:

> They should be more than technical advisers, exploited by captains of industry, he told them, and expressed the view that the chief reason why industrial paralysis was allowed to continue was that the engineering profession was "in bondage to finance." They had allowed themselves to be used as tools, and their technical ability had immensely increased productive efficiency, but they failed to apply their intelligence to the solution of the fundamental problem of making industry function for the public good.

Doctor Fyfe hit the nail on the head when he said that the engineers were in bondage to finance, but he should have gone further and said that not only the engineers but the great mass of the people as well were in bondage to finance. The great decision which has to be made to-day is whether the people are going to remain in bondage to finance or are they going to uphold the traditions of their ancestors and demand their rights as free men. In the development which has taken place during the past hundred years, but more especially in the last fifty years, finance has become so interwoven in our industrial and commercial life that it is to-day as necessary to that life as air is to the human body. We would not for one moment think of legislating into the hands of a group of private individuals the sole right to control the air about us which we all need to breathe in order to live, and yet we have done that very thing in so far as our industrial and commercial life is concerned.

> Democracy, in its struggle with autocracy, has failed to recognize that, of all the prerogatives of government, the issue and regulation of the currency is the first, if not the only, essential, and it is not necessary to look further for the cause of its hopeless failure to give to the world a system of humane government. The coining of money can in no sense be defended as a legitimate form of private enterprise. Here at least we may claim to be upon ground that not even the most extreme individualist can dispute.
> But passing from theory to practice, we have seen how our inverted ideas are fast making it the only form of private enterprise. Quite unwittingly and because of the confusions of economists between wealth and debt, democracy has given to the financier of to-day powers which never yet in history have been wielded by the most absolute autocrat. Irrespective of peoples and parliaments, kings and cabinets, the control over the manufacture of money has put into the hands of a few men absolute power over industry, and with it the very life of the nation.
> Industrialized nations are so heavily in debt that industry is being administered as a bankrupt concern in the interests of its creditors, and its primary purpose to produce wealth is more and more becoming secondary to this. Shylock has us all in his grip, scientific men and inventors, black coat and artisan, farmers and labourers, editors and journalists, teachers and professional men—all are being brought under a centralized financial domination. But thought is still free, and, despite the press, let us hope some remnant of it may persevere in our ancient schools and universities.

Yes, thought is still free, and the pioneering spirit and love of freedom which have ever characterized the Anglo-Saxon race are not now going to submit tamely, if I am any judge to a financial dictatorship which has been largely responsible for our present unhappy condition. I am willing to concede that when the monopoly over money was granted to private individuals, finance did not play such an important part in the lives of the people, and that they, the people, were not educated or trained sufficiently to handle it wisely. But in the meantime conditions have changed. The monopoly power of money in private hands has grown beyond all imagination, until to-day it threatens to wreck and ruin our present civilization. In the meantime also, education and science have fitted our people for a more abundant life and some means must be found to see that they get it.

After a conference of English clergymen at Swanwick early this year, the conference circulated a document on "The Christian faith and the economic depression," containing the following statement:

We indict the monetary system as a whole, on the ground that it is not doing what we are justified in expecting it to do, namely, to arrange for the proper distribution and exchange of goods and services. The gifts of God are being withheld from His children. The present widespread sense of insecurity and fear results; and the freedom which Christ came to bring is denied. We are told that one nation by itself cannot reform its monetary system, owing to its dependence upon international factors. To wait for universal consent on this matter is a policy of drift and despair; and we believe that, if our nation were to give a lead, other nations would be prepared to cooperate with us.

The world is looking for a lead on this all-important question, and as the Anglo-Saxon race has ever been in the forefront of civilization, to whom else can we look with more hope for leadership and guidance? Something must be done and that quickly. Our civilization is at present chained to a corpse, and, in the words of St. Paul, cries out, "Who will deliver me from this body of death?" Is it any wonder that the wealthiest age the world had ever known has been brought almost to the verge of collapse? So I present this resolution asking that the control over our money our medium of exchange, be restored to the people, where it rightly belongs, earnestly hoping that this young country of Canada, a country free from the bitternesses, jealousies, suspicions and hatreds which dominate many of the older countries of the world, may give a lead and point the way to a brighter and better day to come.

I wish to place on record a short statement by that great industrialist Henry Ford :

Congress should have kept its constitutional power over money. But it failed to do so. It farmed out the system to private hands—a notion just as antiquated as the old notion which once prevailed of farming out the postal system.

We should have a money system managed by the public for the service of the public in the furtherance of life's continual demand for expansion. Money is right now holding up our progress to the goal which I have outlined. It is our natural conveyor system, but it is not moving. People hold on to money because they think it is wealth. But money is only the mover of wealth, and it is not moving. And those who claim to be experts in the management of the money machine do not seem to be able to make it move.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that I may be pardoned for quoting so freely, but I know there is a tendency for the orthodox party man and the orthodox financier, whether in or out of this house, to look with contempt on anything which emanates from this corner of the house, especially in regard to financial matters. But while the parties referred to may place what importance they see fit upon my own observations, they cannot lightly ignore the opinions of such men as I have quoted, and who, I may say, are only a very few of the leading men of to-day who have glimpsed a clearer vision of the new and brighter day to come and who recognize that the purpose of a just economic system is to deliver goods and services, and that money must be made the servant rather than the master of mankind.

As in days gone by a public opinion developed which won for us our religious freedom, our political freedom, which abolished slavery, and I am confident that there is now developing a money mentality which recognizes that the grim goddess of finance exercises an inexorable power over the lives of the people, and unless conquered will rivet unemployment and poverty upon society until its doom.

So far I have quoted from authorities mostly outside of Canada. I now wish to place on record an excerpt from a statement by an honourable and respected member of this house. Speaking before the Canadian club of Toronto, on November 13, 1933, Hon. C. H. Cahan, Secretary of State for Canada, made the following statement. I presume every hon. member received a copy of this speech, as I did. The speech was delivered on a special occasion in that great financial centre of Toronto, so I believe I am right in assuming it was a carefully prepared speech, and coming from such an honourable and distinguished member of the cabinet, may be taken as an authoritative statement. The Secretary of State in his speech very ably confirmed many of the contentions made in this corner of the house as to how our present banking system controls and manipulates the credit of the people of Canada. The address is entitled, "The Depression, its Monetary Problems." I quote, starting at page 5 where a little historical sketch is first given. I think it is important that it should be on record, because I am sure not only the members of this house but the people of Canada will be interested to know just how our credit is issued and controlled by the banks.

The British North America Act, 1867, which constituted the Dominion of Canada, provided that the parliament of Canada should have exclusive legislative authority with respect to banking, incorporation of banks and the issue of paper money, and also exclusive legislative authority with respect to currency and coinage. Temporary legislative measures were enacted by parliament in 1867 and 1870, but the first general and comprehensive Bank Act was enacted in 1871. Revisions of the act have been made by parliament at the close of successive periods of approximately ten years each. The fifth revision took place in 1923. The sixth revision will be made at the ensuing session of parliament.

In the earlier days of Canadian banking banks' loans to their customers were restricted to their bank notes and their banking capital. The customer usually received from the bank the amount of the loan in bank notes or metallic currency and therewith made his payments to his creditors. As late as 1840 the note issues of the Canadian banks constituted more than one-half of their liabilities. Since then banking practice has radically changed.

On September 30 last the notes in circulation of all the Canadian chartered banks amounted to $141,000,000 and their total liabilities aggregated $2,849,000,000, or over twenty times the amount of their note issues.

The prevalent conception that bank deposits may only be created by actual deposits of specie, or its equivalent in dominion notes or foreign exchange, is quite erroneous. The bank returns for September 30 last disclose that the banks held only $49,000,000 in specie and $127,200,000 in dominion notes, or a total of approximately $176,000,000 in specie and notes, while their current loans and discounts were $1,428,000.000 which was a reduction of $932,000,000 in the amount of current loans and discounts on September 30, 1929. Such a large reduction in outstanding current credits would seem to indicate that the industrial and commercial activities of Canada have been reduced or restricted by nearly 40 per cent since September, 1929.

The aggregate of these loans, by which the bulk of all deposits are created, largely represents advances of credit made by the banks to their customers. The capital and reserves of all the banks of Canada amounted on September 30 to $306,500,000, which was at least partially represented by fixed investments. The credit extended by the Canadian banks is secured in less than one-fourth part by the capital and surplus of the banks, but largely by the good faith, property, administrative efficiency and business capacity of the customers to whom such loans are made.

The creation and issue of money was in former times the prerogative of the sovereign. In a more primitive society money consisted exclusively of metallic coins. Later governments began the issue of paper notes, redeemable in metallic currency, and these notes were declared by decree or by statute law to be legal tender in payment of all liabilities.

In more modern times the invention and adoption of the cheque system has effected a radical revolution in monetary policy. The cheque has now largely usurped the function of metallic coins and government notes as currency.

Under the modern banking practice a bank customer, instead of withdrawing his loan in bank notes and metallic currency, receives a credit entry in the books of the bank for the amount of the bank's loan, as if it were a deposit made by him in his account with the bank. Against this credit in the bank's books of account the customer draws his cheques. The customer's cheque, which is an order on the bank for the payment of money to the payee of the cheque, merely results in the transference of the credit, which has previously been granted by the bank, from this customer's name to the name of another customer in the same or another bank's books of account. In case the payee of the cheque so drawn keeps his banking account in another bank, the two banks, in the larger cities and towns, daily adjust their balances through the clearing house.

The result is that, in modern practice, 70 to 80 per cent of the aggregate of all deposits shown in the Canadian bank returns represent in reality the amount of loans made by the banks and then outstanding. In consequence bank deposits consist largely of credit money which has been created by the banks. When a loan is repaid by the customer to the bank which made the loan, the deposit created by the loan is wiped out, and the aggregate of all bank deposits is thereby reduced by the sum so paid.

Then he gives the total of the deposits of chartered banks in Canada as $2,260,000,000, and continues:

This aggregate of deposits on September 30 last was $436,500,000, less than the average amount of deposits during the year 1929.

Since the cheque system has been adopted the difference between the amount of cheques paid into a customer's account at his bank and the cheques drawn by the customer and paid out by the bank represents a sum of money which the customer owns, but nevertheless this money does not exist except in the accounts of the customer's bank.

What is paid out of one bank account is paid into another bank account by entries in books of account. A relatively small quantity of metallic coins or paper currency suffices for owners who require cash for their petty expenses.

The cheque system, which has been developed, enables the banks to create money without the issue of their printed notes. On September 30 last all the Canadian banks had $141,000,000 of their own notes in circulation, while the aggregate of bank deposits was $2,260,000,000.

It is convenient for the banks, with their numerous and widespread branches, to have available a limited quantity of their own notes, which suffice, in part, for the cash requirements of their customers; and therefore, to avoid the expense of holding in reserve and transferring currency as required, it has hitherto been deemed expedient that parliament should grant to banks the privilege of issuing their own notes in limited quantities as required, not only at head offices but at all their branch offices throughout Canada. This privilege is now being criticized, and parliament must decide at the ensuing session whether or to what extent it shall be withdrawn.

. . . But the cheque system, which now prevails, enables the banks, as I have stated, to create credit money at will for many hundreds of millions of dollars in excess of their note issues. $1,428,000,000 of such credit money was issued and outstanding on September 30, last. In comparison with this bank credit money the amount of all money in circulation is quite insignificant.

But in fact the banks have not an unlimited power of creating credit in the form of bank loans which may be drawn upon by their customers' cheques. Their dependence upon public confidence is so vital to their solvency that in actual practice they invite disaster whenever they make loans which are not accompanied by satisfactory guarantees for their repayment. If the banks are to maintain their solvency they dare not make loans or advances unless they have reasonable confidence that they will be repaid in due time. The fact remains, however, that the banks now have an almost complete monopoly of the credit facilities of the country. They may restrict or extend credit at will within the limitations which I have mentioned; and the question has arisen whether the control of credit should continue to be exercised in the sole discretion of the directors and officials of the banks.

I trust that every hon. member of the house will study that statement carefully. I would suggest that it be printed in large type and distributed to every member of the banking and commerce committee, who will be charged at the present session with consideration of the revision of the Bank Act. That act is to be revised at this present session. The speech from the throne also announces that a central bank for Canada is to be established. This will be something new in the financial structure of the dominion. On what foundation this new central bank is built will depend its success or failure and its influence for good or evil over the lives of the Canadian people. If it is founded on the lines suggested by Lord Macmillan in his recent report, that is under private control, then it is just going to add another link in the chain of international financial domination, which I say without hesitation is largely responsible for our present unhappy condition, as well as that of other countries with privately owned central banks. No, Mr. Speaker, let Canada give a lead to the rest of the world and establish a publicly owned central bank, as recommended by Premier Brownlee in his minority report as a member of that commission.

I wish it distinctly understood, Mr. Speaker, that my resolution does not ask for the nationalization of our present banks; that would be unwise and too costly. The banks have such tremendous sums stored up in palatial structures that I am sure they will wish to retain them as reminders of their monumental folly. What I do ask is that the state resume its complete sovereignty and inherent right to control and direct finance in the interests of all of the people of the country. If this is not done and the control of finance remains in the hands of selfish private interests, then it is my firm conviction that, as inevitably as we are sitting here, we are going to face ruin in the not distant future.

May I ask that when the vote is taken on this resolution every hon. member may forget his party ties, remembering that Canada is bigger and the welfare of her people more important than any political party.

Mr. HENRY E. SPENCER (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, in seconding this resolution proposed by the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas), I do so with a great deal of pleasure because I find that although this subject received very meagre consideration ten years ago, to-day it is receiving not only a great deal of thought throughout the country but also much more consideration in this House of Commons.

The subject has been so well discussed by the hon. member for Camrose that I hesitate to take up very much time in going over ground that has been covered so ably already. We must realize, however, that this depression and the chaotic conditions which we are facing really reflect the unstable monetary conditions under which we exist. We have heard a great deal with regard to poverty in the midst of plenty; this phrase has passed from mouth to mouth daily, but how much is being done to solve the problem? Surely none of us are satisfied, when we admit that this is a country rich in natural resources, that we should have so much poverty, degradation and crime in a new country like Canada. The faulty link, as my hon. friend has mentioned already, is the one between production and consumption, and for that reason this resolution is placed before the house to-day.

Money should be a medium of exchange; we should recognize that at all times there should be sufficient money available to enable all goods and services that may be offered and are wanted to be transferred from one to another. If there is a shortage of money, total goods cannot be transferred. At the present time, in the orthodox mind, money is considered the more important, and goods and services are curtailed to fit in with the amount of money available. Money should be looked upon as a ticket system, and sufficient money should be in circulation at all times to enable us to trade with each other to the fullest possible extent. We know full well that gold as a basis has failed hopelessly for some time past; that has been recognized perhaps more clearly in the last seven or eight years, so very little is said about it to-day. Only three years ago we heard Sir Basil Blackett, a director of the Bank of England, admit here in the city of Ottawa that there was absolutely no need to retain gold as a basis behind our internal currency. Of course gold still has value with regard to the settling of international balances, but I claim that the basis of credit, is the power to produce and deliver goods and services as when and where they may be required. The war was financed not on gold but on the national credit, and the ability of our people to produce the things we wanted in order to carry on the war. In passing I might say that the limitation of the war was not brought about by the amount of money in existence but by the limitation of man power and supplies that were forthcoming.

Therefore I take it, Mr. Speaker, that the issue of money is a prerogative of the government. I received a letter the other day from a legal friend, in which he says:

> It is commonly said that the right to issue financial credit has been transferred to the banks. I can see no proof of that and question it as a fact. I believe it to be a pure assumption. The supposition seems to me to be negatived by section 75 of the Bank Act. As a matter of law I would say:
> 1. That the right to issue all money is part of the prerogative of the crown: In the words of President Roosevelt, "a high prerogative of government." It is so in all countries, and has been so in all ages.
> 2. That financial credit is money and therefore falls within the prerogative of the crown. The definition of money in Halsbury's Laws of England, volume 21, page 37, is, "that form of wealth or credit which is transferred from one person to another by means of coins, bank notes, cheques and similar instruments." Or as Mr. McKenna says, "what is immediately spendable," including all bank deposits drawable by cheque.

Money, as we well know, is of three sorts, coin, currency and credit. As has been so well outlined by the hon. member for Camrose, the coin and currency represent only a very small proportion of the money we use; it is largely made up of credit. By means of the Bank Act the government of Canada allows the banks certain privileges with regard to the issuing of money. It allows the banks to issue paper money, commonly called bank notes or bills, to an extent equal to their paid up capital, and also what they call excess issue to the amount of 15 per cent of their unimpaired paid up capital and 15 per cent of their reserves. This excess can be issued for six months of the year, from September to the following February inclusive. Parliament, however, never gave the banks power to issue financial credit, and I think that is the point on which we must take our stand to-day. Parliament never gave the banks power to issue financial credit; certainly it is not covered in section 75 of the Bank Act.

I should like to quote from the Dean of Canterbury, who puts the case very neatly when he says that this power has slipped unawares into private hands. To-day I read a very interesting address by the same gentleman, which appeared in the Illustrated London News, from which I should like to quote a few lines:

> If in a pre-machine age men could support themselves in tolerable comfort, they can do so a hundredfold better to-day. Every man, indeed, can keep himself and a score of others too. It is a marvellous world. None need want. Remove the artificial restrictions and superabundance is at hand for all. Yet we starve. Literally, and in face of plenty. In the August heat wave Liverpool steamers moved from the docks, and from the neighbourhood of hot and thirsty children, too, and dumped a million oranges into the Irish Sea.

I could quote other similar cases of waste as well.

As I have said, most of our money is credit drawable by cheque. We have often heard, sometimes in this house and sometimes outside of it, that all the money the banks have to lend is money which is placed with them by their depositors. That statement may have been partly right some fifty years ago, but to-day it is entirely out of date. All loans create new money. All cancellations of loans cancel an equal amount of money out of circulation. A bank, therefore, when it creates a loan creates an asset, on the one hand, it also creates a liability on the other, and consequently a bank in making loans has to be very careful to see that it gets good negotiable collateral on which it can realize quickly in order to meet the demands of the depositors in case of a run on the bank.

I should like to quote a few words from the Macmillan report. On page 43 they make mention of how deposits are created and to the increase of cheque money, and under the heading of Bank Deposits they say:

> Bank deposits subject to cheque furnish much the most important medium of exchange in Canada.

On that same page a table is given headed "Proportion of Deposits in Chartered Banks to Notes Issued," and they say, going back to the year 1871, that the proportion of deposits to bank notes was, in 1871 2·7 to 1, but to-day, so greatly has the system changed in favour of the use of cheques, that the proportion has risen from 2·7 to 1 to 17·1 to 1.

Looking over figures that I received the other day from the Bureau of Statistics I find that in 1931 the total gold amounted to $120,000,000; legal tender, $145,000,000, and deposits, $2,422,000,000. This in itself is further proof that we are in an age of cheque money, and not in an age of either coin or note money.

In support of what I have said in regard to loans creating money I should like to quote from one who has already been quoted here to-day, Professor Soddy of Oxford. He says:

1. Money is printed or written into existence by the bank.
2. It enters circulation as a loan to somebody.
3. It is then spent and then becomes a deposit in the name of the receiver.

One can readily see therefore that the greater the loans made, the greater will the deposits grow, and on the other hand, the greater the cancellations of loans the greater will be the drop in the total amount of deposits.

The Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, of the Midland Bank, England, states the case as follows:

The amount of money in existence varies only with the action of the bank in increasing or diminishing deposits. We know how this is effected. Every bank loan creates a deposit and every repayment of a bank loan destroys one.

Just to round out my argument I should like to quote, in spite of the fact that this passage has already been quoted to-day, a few lines from the address of the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), to the Canadian Club at Toronto on November 13, 1933. He said:

On September 30 last the notes in circulation of all the Canadian chartered banks amounted to $141,000,000, and their total liabilities aggregated $2,849,000,000, or over twenty times the amount of their note issues.

The prevalent conception that bank deposits may only be created by actual deposits of specie, or its equivalent in dominion notes or foreign exchange, is quite erroneous.

I am very glad indeed to have such a well-known public man as the hon. Secretary of State come to our support in that statement.

I wish now to give four reasons for what I consider the breaking down of our present economic system.

First of all I would say that it has failed because of the private control of money and credit. Parliament has allowed it to drift into private hands which handle it entirely as a private business, with the profit incentive. Banks can increase or decrease to an alarming extent the amount of money in circulation through the control they exercise in regard to the issuance of credit, and by increasing or decreasing the amount in circulation at any time they can increase or decrease prices. Financiers, therefore, have more to do to-day with regard to increasing or decreasing prices and making business better or worse than has even the federal government in this country.

Secondly, they have attempted to base the currency on gold. We all know that gold is simply a fair weather standard. It has never operated when a time of stress came. Special legislation had then to be passed, as in 1914, to enable the banks to pay their debts in their own notes and to do away entirely with paying out gold. I am very glad that the public generally to-day recognizes that gold is not necessary so far as our internal money is concerned.

Thirdly, the system is debt-creating, and in that connection we have only to look at the debts which this country is carrying, debts created in some cases, it is true, for making permanent improvements, but debts which the federal government should not have incurred; because the duty of the government should be, not to borrow, but to lend.

I should like to put a question to the house with regard to interest. How is it possible to pay the interest on loans? How is it possible to pay the aggregate of loans, plus interest, without creating additional debt to meet the interest on the loans already made? That is one reason in my opinion why debts, both public and private, are increasing so rapidly.

Fourthly, the total prices under our system to-day are always greater than the total costs. That being so, it is impossible to get rid of our total production at any given time, with the result that if we have a surplus we have to find other ways of getting rid of it. There are two ways in which we generally try to do so. One is to sell that surplus on time. We know that the United States of America probably went further in that respect than any other country, by selling goods on time until they had a pyramid of goods sold on time sales to the amount of some $6,000,000,000, and then the whole thing crashed like a house of cards.

The other way is to export the surplus. But if we have not sufficient money at any given time to buy a surplus of goods that are made, we have not the money to buy the imports which may enter the country in exchange for our exports. This naturally leads to every country doing everything it can to interfere with the natural flow of trade in its anxiety to export more goods than it imports, and there you have your economic war, which ultimately leads to military warfare.

I should like to point out four particular things that have happened in this country to which I think we should give some attention. I am not going to deal with the Finance Act this afternoon because it is a large subject and is deserving of considerable time and study. I shall only make a brief reference to it. The bankers have made considerable use of the Finance Act, and I do not blame them because it is a great convenience. In 1918 they used the Finance Act to the extent of $282,000,000. The interest charge made by the government at that time was from three to three and one-half per cent. Among the various securities which can be taken by the banks to the treasury board are provincial bonds. In that same year four of the provinces found it necessary to go to the federal government for help, which they received to the extent of some millions of dollars. They deposited provincial bonds as security with the treasury board. While the private banks of this country were able to get advances under the Finance Act for from three to three and a half per cent, the provinces of Canada had to pay five and one-half per cent. I think it is very unfair that this should be the case. That same year I introduced a bill asking that the same privileges should be given to the provincial governments as were given to the private banks.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the hon. gentleman realize that in the one case you have a two-name paper while in the other case you have only a one-name paper?

Mr. SPENCER: I should like to know what the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) means by "two-name"?

Mr. BENNETT: You have the promise of the bank in addition to the promise of the bonds, while in the other case you have not. The bonds are primary debtors.

Mr. SPENCER: The Dominion government realizes the absolute necessity of not allowing the provinces to default, and their credit should be considered as being equally good. I have not the time at my disposal to give the house a complete list of the securities which may be taken to the treasury board by the banks, but a partial list is as follows:

(d) Promissory notes and bills of exchange secured by documentary title to wheat, oats, rye, barley, corn, buckwheat, flax or other commodity;

(e) Promissory notes and bills of exchange issued or drawn for agricultural, industrial, or commercial purposes and which have been used or are to be used for such purposes.

Surely provincial bonds are as good as these.

Mr. HACKETT: Have they ever been taken?

Mr. SPENCER: They may be taken.

[Mr. Spencer.]

Mr. HACKETT: Have they ever been taken?

Mr. SPENCER: They may be taken.

Mr. HACKETT: Have they ever been taken?

Mr. SPENCER: Probably, as they can be under the act.

The war was largely financed by the extension of credits made against war bonds bought by such credits. One has only to refer to that most interesting book by Sir Thomas White entitled "War-time Finance" to find that he makes a remark something like this: During the war, Canada surprised not only herself but the world when her people subscribed twice as much money as there was in Canada for war bonds and still left ample money with which to carry on increasing business. Anyone who has looked into the financing of the war knows how it was done. One questions very much the right or the wisdom of the government of that day in piling up debt by allowing the banks to finance the war instead of doing it themselves.

In 1914 some $26,000,000 was issued direct by the treasury, $10,000,000 to the Canadian Northern, $6,000,000 to the Grand Trunk and $10,000,000 for general government purposes. On looking up the records I find that the collateral accepted by the government of the day for the $16,000,000 loaned to the railways was railway securities guaranteed by the Dominion government. At that time we took securities which we ourselves had guaranteed!

I should like to refer for a moment to the $35,000,000 deal put through about two years ago. We well know that this was done quite in order with dominion treasury bills. They were turned over to the banks as security for the line of credit given to the dominion. The banks had the privilege of taking those treasury bills to the treasury board and obtaining dominion notes, and they availed themselves of that privilege. The banks charged four per cent for their book-keeping, while the government charged the banks three per cent for issuing legal lender. Running for a period of two years the difference amounted to something like $700,000. At that time the government financed itself to the extent of $35,000,000 at a cost of one per cent. It could have been done for less because it certainly did not cost the banks that much. Why cannot that be done to-day? Why do we have to go out into the market and pay four or five per cent? It would be no more inflation to issue notes than to issue a credit drawable by cheque.

This is one point we have to get across, that is, that anything that functions as money is money.

I have no wish to take up the time of the house any longer but I would like to remind hon. members that the Bank Act comes up for revision this year. There is considerably more interest to-day in this subject than there was eleven years ago.

Mr. IRVINE: You would not think so to look at the house.

Mr. SPENCER: No, you would not.

It is only natural that the banks will do their best to defend their privileges. I do not blame them at all, but there is a responsibility upon our shoulders to look after the interests of the public. I am not aware of what the banks intend to do with regard to employing people to look after their interests, but in 1923 they engaged three of the most eminent legal men in this country, Sir Thomas White, Mr. Aime Geoffrion and Mr. H. J. Symington. There were also other legal men engaged, and with the cost of printing and distributing a pamphlet as propaganda, etc., they spent in that year a total of $96,646.50. Somebody whispered to me the other day that already the banks had engaged Mr. Geoffrion the second time. I do not blame them for engaging these very highly paid men to look after their intersts, but we are here to look after the interests of the people, and it is up to us to do our best to see that the people get a square deal when the Bank Act comes up for revision.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I take no exception to the fact that the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas) has made this motion, but I must point out that a large portion of the discussion, particularly that of the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer), has had reference to a central bank and other matters mentioned in the speech from the throne and which will be dealt with in the very near future.

Mr. SPENCER: May I interrupt? I did not mention the central bank.

Mr. RHODES: Having said so much, it is not my purpose to raise any point of order; my particular object in mentioning the circumstance was to indicate that I do not propose to deal with the matter at length in view of the fact that in measures which are to come before the house we will be discussing the whole question of banking in all its ramifications.

I hope that my hon. friend from Camrose and my hon. friend from Battle River will not take it amiss if I say to them that, listening to their remarks, I could not help bearing in mind a statement made not long since by a very eminent professor in the United States who has specialized in economics and finance, and who gave public utterance to the view that there were only sixteen persons in the world who knew anything about finance. Among those he cited there was not one Canadian. So far as I am personally concerned, therefore, I approach the subject with great humility; but I am glad to know that the views expressed by this eminent professor did not in the least deter my hon. friend from Camrose and my hon. friend from Battle River from discussing this very large question.

The first recital in the resolution reads:

> Whereas the provision of an adequate medium of exchange through the issue and control of currency is a function inherent in the state, and one which is wholly within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament. . . . .

I take no exception to that recital. I have only to point out in that connection that since confederation the control of the issue of currency has undoubtedly been recognized as coming under dominion jurisdiction, and control has been exercised through the passing of the Bank Act and similar financial statutes bearing upon banks and banking during each decennial revision down to the present year. It may be a debatable question whether that control has been as adequate or as complete as the circumstances warrant. But whether it was or was not complete, the fact remains that during all this period we have had control of the issue of currency.

In the second recital my hon. friend has taken in rather large territory. The second recital reads:

> Whereas, the transfer of this function to private interests to be used as a means of profit rather than as a public service has enabled those controlling finance to dominate every phase in the industrial and economic life of the nation. . . .

I do not propose to discuss that second recital at any length, but I wish to take exception to the very sweeping statements which it contains. Nor do I intend to debate the last assertion, that those who control finance dominate every phase of the industrial and economic life of the nation. But I do wish to make one or two observations with respect to the third recital, because it seems to me that it puts forward a point of view which gave colour to the whole of the utterances of my hon. friend from Camrose in moving the motion. The third recital reads:

Whereas, the depressed and chaotic conditions which now prevail would indicate that this financial control, as at present exercised, has proved itself detrimental to the best interests of the people of this country. . . .

As I understand that language, the hon. gentleman takes the view, so common in many quarters not only in this country but in other countries, that the present world depression is largely if not entirely attributable to matters of finance—financial control of the issue of currency, gold coverage, the questions of silver and gold, and all the various matters having to do with finance. As I said at the beginning, any views I have with respect to finance I submit with very great humility. But we can be guided in these matters by the experience not only of the past but of those who have made a study of them; and in this connection I would direct the attention of the house to page 4 of what for convenience, and to avoid confusion, I will call the British Macmillan report. This statement appears:

A period of economic depression such as that which the nation is now experiencing is a testing time for all our institutions, political, social and economic. Systems which in periods of prosperity have worked satisfactorily enough may at such times be found incapable of sustaining the stresses and strains of adversity and may disclose defects hitherto unsuspected. Machinery designed to work within a given range may jam when that range is exceeded. Moreover, there is a natural tendency on the part of the public to seek a scapegoat for any distress which may befall it and preferably to attribute that distress to any cause rather than its own shortcomings. In the search for a cause which should absolve itself from blame the public in the present instance has not been indisposed to find it in our financial system, none the less readily that refutations of the accusation are little likely to be appreciated. Accusation is always easy; defence even though well founded is often difficult. And what is least understood is apt to be most suspected. It has been our main task to examine the available evidence in order to ascertain to what extent, if any, the attribution of the present distress to monetary causes is justifiable, and then, so far as possible, to suggest remedies for any defects in the system we may have discovered.

Perhaps it would not be amiss if I were to refer to one other paragraph while I am on this point:

An important thing to bear in mind is that financial policy can only be carried into effect by those whose business it is. We have in this country a great financial and banking organization, with great experience and great traditions. It is through and with that organization that we have to work, for they alone are the repositories of the skill and knowledge and they alone possess the equipment necessary for the management of our financial affairs. Their views and opinions, however they may fail to commend themselves to enthusiastic reformers, are factors to be reckoned with just as much as the views and opinions of trade unions have to be reckoned with on questions of wages and working conditions.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

On this same point the British Macmillan Commission went into matters at very great length. I do not know that it would be wise to read the whole of their observations as set out in the chapter beginning at page 92 under the title, "The Influence of Monetary Policy on the Price Level." I will cite their opinion, given after they had weighed the evidence carefully, as to the relative effects upon the existing condition, more particularly having to do with the price level, of monetary as against economic causes. Here is their conclusion:

Our view is, therefore, that the price level is the outcome of interaction between monetary and non-monetary factors, and that the recent world-wide fall of prices is best described as a monetary phenomenon which has occurred as the result of the monetary system failing to solve successfully a problem of unprecedented difficulty and complexity set it by a conjunction of highly intractable non-monetary phenomena.

I might read the following sentence for the benefit of my hon. friends, the mover and the seconder of the motion, who were so confident of the ground upon which they stood:

Whether the international monetary system could have solved its problem is a matter on which we should hesitate to express a dogmatic opinion.

And then they go on further along the same lines.

Mr. IRVINE: What is the point about it?

Mr. RHODES: The point I had in mind in making this citation was to indicate that there might be other points of view and that this is not a matter with respect to which one can give an Olympian opinion. I cite this as the mature judgment of a committee that had gone into the matter at length, a committee that has commended itself to the great majority of the members of the house and, if I mistake not, to the gentlemen in the area whence this resolution emanated.

One is tempted in connection with a document of this character to make, perhaps, more quotations than the house would care to listen to, but I cannot refrain from making specific reference to a portion of the one paragraph, No. 297, to be found at page 126 of the report of the British committee on finance and industry. I may say to the hon. member for Camrose that this is an answer to the, if not dogmatic, at least implied, assertion not only in his motion but in his manner of addressing himself to it, that all our ills are attributable to monetary causes and that the condition which obtains in the world to-day could be cured by monetary policies. The paragraph reads:

> We have already referred in this report to many non-monetary causes of disturbance, such as political troubles, war debts, seasonal variations, over-production in some direction or other, changes in tariffs; the collapse of the silver exchange, large changes in fashion and in demand, embarrassments caused by budget deficits or over-borrowing by governments, rigidity of internal economic conditions, and lack of confidence resulting from all these.

And so forth. Therefore my hon. friend will, I think, admit, whether he agrees with that assertion or not, that at least in the opinion of those who have given grave study to this matter there are factors of very great importance having a bearing upon it, other than those of purely monetary concern.

In this connection, and following out the idea to which I have endeavoured to give utterance, I was rather struck with a paragraph in a book recently published called The Economics of Recovery, written by Colonel Ayres of Cleveland in the United States. Perhaps it would be well for me to give it in full, because he comes to precisely the same conclusion as does the British Macmillan commission, if indeed he does not go a little bit further. He says:

> The explanation of the nature of the depression set forth in outline here belongs in that third group. It holds that the depression is one of the major after-consequences of the war, and that its advent was almost inevitable once the great war had taken place. The fundamental principle is that the huge and abnormally distributed material and financial demands of a great war must inescapably disrupt and disorganize any system of production and distribution whether in a planned or an unplanned economy, and whether under a capitalistic, a communistic, a socialistic, or any other system of society. The true lesson of this depression is that we cannot afford any more great wars.

It seems to me that there is much to be said for the point of view expressed in the quotation which I have just given. With a subject as broad as this one could cover a wide field, but may I point out that the resolution itself calls upon the government to give immediate consideration to the reassumption of this responsibility, that is the government issuing a currency, and so forth, as outlined in the preamble to the resolution. May I say to my hon. friend that in the legislation which is forecast in the speech from the throne and which will be all brought down at an early day, the government is giving immediate consideration to this very matter, and also to the creation of a national system of credit and finance to be controlled in the interests of the people and under the jurisdiction of the federal parliament.

The hon. member for Battle River proceeded to discuss details of the administration of the Finance Act, a subject which will be fully covered when the Bank Act and the other acts including the Central Bank Act are being considered by the house. I do not know that any good purpose can be served by our trying to cover the field one, two or three times when it will be so fully discussed not only on second reading in the house but for a long period of time, I fancy, before the banking and commerce committee where our views may be expressed pro and con more fully than can be done in open debate in this chamber. It seems to me, in view of the fact we are going to deal with these very matters in considering the several government bills which have been forecast in the speech from the throne and which will be before the house at an early day, no good purpose can be served by prolonging this debate, or so far as that is concerned, by pressing the matter to a division. I take it we are all agreed that the measures which the government have in view are, so far as principle is concerned, acceptable to the whole house; whether or not they are acceptable in their various details is a matter which can be determined when they are actually being considered. I trust, inasmuch as my hon. friend has had an opportunity to express himself upon the principles outlined in the resolution, it may meet his purposes, in view of what I have said, to withdraw the motion.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, this subject has been discussed from this corner of the house quite often during the past ten or twelve years and our viewpoint, whether erroneous or otherwise, is pretty well known to hon. members, so that I do not now propose to launch out into an explanation of the monetary policies which we have advocated for so long. But frankly I am somewhat disappointed at the apparent lack of interest that has been shown, at least so far, by the house in regard to this resolution. Some of the speakers have indicated that the subject of finance, banking, credit, debt and so forth is one of great interest in the country and in the world to-day. Judging from the lack of interest in the house at the moment, I am wondering whether they are right in saying that. I have heard some hon. members, speaking to audiences in the west during the last year or two, wax eloquent about the piracies of bankers and all that sort of thing, but I do not see them now on their feet making an attack that they could make here where it would be more effective. I am rather surprised to find that is so.

I am even more surprised with the reply made by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). Of course I must forbear from criticizing his speech too severely owing to the humble confession he made at the outset of his remarks, an implied confession, at least, that he knew absolutely nothing about the subject. When a man, either in the House of Commons or elsewhere, makes that frank statement, it would be cruelty on the part of anyone to follow with a ripping speech of criticism, so he has disarmed me at once. I also noted the implied sarcasm of the reference to someone who had discovered all the people in the world who knew about banking and had not included among them any Canadians. I would suggest that the gentleman who wrote the article or made the speech in which that statement was contained should certainly have included the Prime Minister of this country (Mr. Bennett), even if he forgot the hon. members in this corner and the Minister of Finance. But it has always been part of the superstition and camouflage with which finance is surrounded to assert that it is a subject impossible to understand, therefore we must leave it entirely to those in whose hands now lies the power to deal with the financial affairs of this country. May I say to the Minister of Finance that if we discovered nothing else during the investigation at the last revision of the Bank Act, we did discover that the bankers did not know anything about finance at all. Their statements of ignorance stand in the records of the committee investigating the subject, to be seen by anyone who wishes to examine them.

In spite of the supposed wisdom that surrounds those who handle finance, and in spite of the suggestion that it is too profound for the lay mind, I venture to say it is not nearly as profound as hon. members sometimes suggest. I would further say that it is certainly within the compass of any average mind to understand at least the general principles of the financial system now in vogue, and to trace to the application of those principles some of the greatest evils and greatest difficulties with which the modern world has to contend in its economic and social life. The Minister of Finance suggests that since the resolution only asks that the government give immediate attention to taking control of finance, that is now being done, inasmuch as the Bank Act and the Finance Act will come up for consideration and revision during the present session. If that is so, then I assume that the government is accepting the resolution, because if they are already determined to do what the resolution asks for I cannot see that the minister has any reason to reject it.

But let me point out to the minister in that connection that the revision of the Bank Act is not nearly as important as the way in which it will be revised. Revision does not necessarily include a discussion of whether or not finance in Canada should be taken out of the hands of the individuals who conduct it for profit and be handled by the state or by somebody created by the state and instructed so to handle money that it may carry out its specific economic function of facilitating the production and distribution of goods within the nation of Canada. I say there is a very great difference between the subject matter of this resolution and the mere revising of the Bank Act. I wonder whether we will be allowed to discuss the wisdom or otherwise of nationalization of banking when the question of the Bank Act comes before the house. I want to make clear that the thing that is of most interest is not the mere fact of revising the Bank Act. It is not enough for us that we stroke the t's and dot the i's of that act and make insignificant alterations here and there; the significant thing for us is to know what is going to be the basis of our financial system during the next ten years, what shall be the objective of the financial institutions which we set up in this country, in relation to the economic and industrial requirements of the state. These are the questions that we are interested in, and the questions embodied in the resolution so eloquently moved by the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas). The resolution is predicated upon a well known, and I think indisputable fact, that it is the junction of the state to handle the financial affairs of the state; that the right and power to issue currency and to control credit originally was vested in the state, and constitutionally as far as we know is there yet. But something has happened in Canada. I am not clear as to who made it happen, nor do I know the intricacies of the process by which it was brought about, but it does appear now that the authority to control credit is no longer in the hands of the state, at least directly. It has been delegated to another authority. That authority is permitter now to carry on the credit and financial services of the state for private gain. If you take up an ordinary bank note—those who are fortunate enough to have any of them—and look at it you will discover that the king's head no longer appears thereon, but the heads of bankers.

Of course bankers' heads may be as good as kings' heads; I am not comparing heads, but I am indicating that something has happened. The symbol of authority has been changed. We have gradually changed from the authority of the sovereign to the authority of a financial group, which put its own physiognomy on the currency of the state. That, I say, indicates that the direct authority has passed from the sovereign, from governments, from parliament, and gone into the hands of institutions that have no responsibility to anybody, institutions whose object is to make profit. Although this is in perfect harmony with the ethical idealism of capitalism to make profit, it is objectionable as applied to money in particular, because that is something which owing to its universality and indispensability is within the prerogative of the state alone, and should not be entrusted to any private individual or corporation whatsoever.

So I say that the resolution is predicated on what we have always regarded as true, that the state should control the issuance of currency and the administration of credit. It would appear that we no longer have that authority, for indeed the state itself must go to that body to which it has delegated this power, to borrow from time to time for the carrying on of its own public business, thus raising by a pyramiding system a national debt which, while Canada is perhaps not as badly off as many countries, cannot be paid in any country of the world where the system is used, and I think that includes every country.

The next clause of the resolution indicates that the transfer of this power has been made; and I have briefly shown that that is the case.

Then the third "whereas" of the resolution, to which the minister took exception, indicates that as this financial system has been administered under private control it has been demonstrated to be not to the best interests of the Canadian people during the present economic crisis. The chief objection of the minister, as I gathered it, was that there may be a number of causes contributing to the present economic situation. Of course I am quite ready to admit that this may be so, and the resolution does not say it is not so. The resolution is not all-embracing; it does not say that the control of finance must be regarded as an explanation for every detail that is wrong in our present economic situation. It does not say that; it does not make any estimate of the effect of finance at all. It merely says that finance, so far as it has a bearing upon the problems of to-day, has not been handled in the best interests of the Canadian people and I suggest to you, sir, that the minister did not disprove that point, nor indeed did he attempt to argue it. He quoted from the Macmillan report, showing that a number of other elements in addition to finance must be regarded. I was surprised when he went on to say that one of these factors to which the crisis could be attributed was tariffs.

If I had time, sir, I would be prepared to argue—and I should be surprised if the Prime Minister would take issue with me—that one of the reasons why he had to do with the tariff what he has done is exactly a financial reason; that any country owing money abroad can only meet its obligation in regard to those borrowings by exporting goods, and that can be done only by shipping out more than is shipped in. One of the instruments by which it is possible to bring about that result is the tariff; therefore even tariff policy is strictly a financial proposition. No country in the world that owes money to another can wipe out tariffs or lower them, even at the will of a majority of the people, who may not understand that to do so means the financial collapse of that country under the present financial system. Tariffs can be lowered only when the financial system is changed.

What the resolution asks the government to consider is the setting up of a financial system that will not tie us to the apron strings of Wall Street and that will not paralyze the entire economic and commercial life of Canada merely because someone was foolish enough to go to Wall Street to establish credits when we had credits in Canada in abundance, only we did not have either the sense or the will to use those credits, which could have been done without piling up interest charges that were unnecessary. That is the chief reason why this resolution has been moved.

Now we come to the resolution itself and what we ask the government to do. We ask that immediate consideration should be given to the resumption of the responsibility by this government and this nation of the prerogative, if you like, of issuing and controlling the financial requirements of the state. We are asking that consideration. Of course we do not know what is to happen; the government may be going to give us a national banking system. We are not criticising the government at all in that respect, because we do not know what proposals will be made. But surely the only thing a private member of this house can do is to bring in such resolutions as this to indicate at least what we think should be done and what we think the people whom we represent would like to have done, in order to assist the government as much as we can—if the government are thinking about what is the relation of the people to legislation, as I believe they are—to come to their conclusion as to whether in the next ten years our financial institutions should be handed over by statute to the complete domination of private individuals or whether we should make an attempt, an experiment if you like, to administer them through the government or through a body directly responsible to the government, that will be amenable to policies which the government, in the interests of the economic life of the country, may be called upon to lay down from time to time.

The bank charters will be up this year for either extension or curtailment, and I have no doubt it is in anticipation of that very fact that the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas) brings forward his resolution. Therefore this resolution is timely; it gives us an opportunity to reflect upon the most important feature of the whole business of revising the Bank Act, as to whether or not we shall assume the power now possessed by the bankers or continue to extend it to them.

I should say briefly that our banking system is resting upon a wrong basis, and I say this with all due deference to the wisdom that is supposed to surround those who speak about finance. It is on a wrong basis, because up to the present time it has been based upon gold, and there is simply no conceivable intelligent relationship between the amount of money which may be required by a state in order to distribute the goods in that state to the people who produce them and the amount of gold which may be found now or at any other time on this planet. So to that extent it is entirely absurd to continue that basis. The second reason is that gold has an intrinsic value in itself, while the function of money is to become a medium of exchange. To use a medium which in itself has intrinsic value is practically impossible, for then the medium ceases to be a medium and itself becomes a commodity.

Another weakness in that basis is the one which we have had demonstrated so grievously in Great Britain, Canada and other nations of the world during the past few years; that is, that gold lends itself so easily to manipulation on the part of one nation as against another that it can be drained out of one country, bleeding that country white and leaving its industrial life prostrate and at the mercy of a nation in competition with it for such markets of the world as may remain. The next weakness of the present banking system is the wrong motive behind it. It is not, or should not be, the motive of a financial system to make money out of money. You can plant potatoes and more potatoes will grow; you can breed hogs and they will produce more hogs, but you can plant bank notes for all eternity and no bank notes will be produced. The private individuals who handle an institution of that sort assume a tremendous responsibility, and to allow them to interject a private motive into the handling of such an institution is courting disaster. Indeed that disaster has already befallen us.

Let me give an example of the impossibility of the present banking system, and instead of banking I should say the financial system because I am not criticizing our banks as banks. I have no doubt they can add up figures as well as anyone else. I have always found that they could estimate credit perhaps too well; I always had difficulty and no doubt properly so. I am not criticizing them in that regard, nor am I criticizing them for what has been brought about. The conditions in Canada to-day must be chargeable to the members of this house during all the sessions that are past, and if we do not take steps to remedy those conditions they will be chargeable to us to-morrow.

As an example of the impossibility of the financial system, let us look at this: Here is the basis and the principle upon which money may be issued, and I think in our textbooks it is so stated—that money is the symbol of wealth. Therefore, if you have wealth you should never lack in the ability to move it or distribute it for lack of the symbol. Since money is the symbol of wealth, somebody should have the authority to make the symbol when it is necessary to move the wealth.

Let us imagine we are going to move a steel rail costing $100—I do not know just what they cost—for a railway, and let us say that we have to create $100 before we can move that steel rail. Very well, we do so. We move the steel rail into the Canadian Pacific Railway yards to do service, and we move the $100 into the bank till. After twenty years that $100 has become $200, and the steel rail is worn out. And so on. Wealth perishes, but you can go on pyramiding your finance, augmenting and growing and multiplying itself in a regular geometric progression until it reaches the enormous figures that we see represented in the world debt to-day, and which debt cannot be met by any country in the world. The only thing with which that debt can be met is real wealth—goods and services consumed by the people of any age and any time, but under the present financial system goods are not accepted for monetary debt.

The next thing is that banking in Canada exercises an obviously wrong technique. It looks upon money as a commodity, and it proceeds to manipulate money on the basis of a commodity. Money is not a commodity. It is the symbol of commodities, and it must be differentiated entirely in its operation and in its function from that of a commodity. It is precisely because the banking systems of the world, not of Canada particularly, but all banking systems, treat the medium of exchange as a commodity, that this process of creating debts goes on, and as long as that is done we cannot avoid such difficulties as those with which we have had to contend very recently.

Let us look at one feature of the results of this system. One of the great financial critics of this time has put the matter in as simple a way as this. He says: If you will put the money on the table there is no commodity produced in the modern civilized world that you cannot have. If you put the money on the table, yes. Now we have evidence that there are a great many more things produced in Canada than we have money on the table with which to buy them, and what sort of financial system is it which, in order to save figures in a book and pyramid them as debts to posterity, will allow real wealth actually to rot in front of our eyes while the peoples of the world are starving for lack of these very goods, and this because of the lack of money?

I do not say, Mr. Speaker, that the financial difficulty is the only one. I do not say that if we could find a better way of carrying on our financial institutions all economic problems would disappear, but I do say that some of the present difficulties are chargeable directly to the maladministration of finance. This parliament should be interested in finding out to what extent that is so. It should be interested in learning to what extent our difficulties to-day have been brought about through the maladministration of finance, in order that we may use the opportunity which parliament gives us to correct that condition in so far as it may be corrected.

Of course, we in this corner are always willing to learn. When we try to make an argument we may sometimes sound very dogmatic, but really we do not feel dogmatic. Nobody I suppose could be more humble in his appreciation of how little he knows than we are over here, and the only thing that saves us is that little as we do know, we know that we know just about as much as anybody around us. That is the only excuse we have. But if there is anybody else who has a better suggestion than we are offering we shall indeed be very glad to know what it is. But we do like to see some consideration given to what we have been studying for many years, a subject which has been brought to the forefront by sheer necessity in every country in the world to-day, and which now is the very centre of consideration in national and international policies in every country in the world. I am not saying that the government is not giving the subject that consideration. I do not know what sort of a Bank Act we are going to get. We are taking this step, I repeat, to safeguard, so far as we can, the legislation and see that the Bank Act, when it comes, will be a better one than we now have. We wish to see that in our financial structure in Canada we do not have such things as have taken place in this and in other countries by this pyramiding, this debt-creating method, creating a debt which cannot be paid. I imagine that Canada with her splendid resources can come nearer to paying her debts than any other country, but I assert that no country in the world to-day can pay the debts that the debt-creating banking systems of the world have built up on the backs of the people as a whole and on the backs of individuals. Somehow or other the private and the public debts of this country must be reduced, and be reduced not by starving ourselves because under the debt-creating systems we have started something going, the creation of a debt which we can never pay even if we never went into debt any more than we are at the moment. We must have a system which, instead of asking us to deny ourselves of the abundance with which we are almost smothered, in order to pay interest and to safeguard certain outworn fetishes about money, will distribute to every Canadian all the goods that he wants or is interested in working for, and which will see that no goods will be destroyed in this country through the lack of the means of moving them to the consumer. That is a policy which, regardless of any international financial complications whatsoever, can be settled in Canada.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, in spite of the rather discouraging remarks of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), that the government will at least accept our resolution in the spirit in which we are offering it, and thus bear out the statement of the minister himself when he said that the government is giving immediate consideration to this question. If it is, there is no reason why our resolution should not be accepted.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Before the motion is voted on I should like to add my voice to that of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). He pointed out that the very matters which are suggested for our consideration must necessarily be dealt with in the Bank Act, notice of the introduction of which now stands upon the order paper. The whole question of currency is involved in the Bank Act and in the central bank bill, and as well the question as to the issuing power, whether the state or the privately-owned institutions to which reference has been made shall issue notes—all that has to be considered. As we shall have to debate these matters later, why should we prolong this discussion in view of what has been said, when we know that when these bills reach this house they will be discussed, and when they reach the committee be discussed again at still greater length? The reason they are upon the order paper early is that they may be given their second reading and get to the committee on banking and commerce without delay. The notice standing in the name of the Minister of Finance for the first reading of the bill for the extension of bank charters will be moved just as soon as the printing is completed, and with respect to the central bank bill it is expected at least that we shall be able to place it on the order paper next week and get it through its second reading, when the fullest opportunity will be afforded to every member of the house to express his views. I assure the hon. gentleman who has moved this resolution and those who have spoken upon it that the questions to which they referred are to be dealt with in those bills. Full opportunity will be afforded in the discussion of the government measures to deal with every phase of the questions which have been so fully and, shall I say, so amply dealt with by the hon. gentlemen. That being so, the government is not compelled, as it would be by the very nature of things, to oppose this resolution in view of the fact that its bills will deal with these matters. The purpose aimed at, namely the bringing of the matters in question to the attention of the government, has been served. I might say that that was wholly unnecessary because, as I have indicated, these matters are to be dealt with in the legislation to be introduced. I expect this legislation will be down next week unless something happens to delay it in connection with the translation or other matters of that sort. I assure the house that every opportunity will be given to discuss all the phases of the questions raised by the hon. gentlemen.

Mr. LUCAS: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has given us assurance that we will be able to discuss fully these matters when the government measures come before the house. I should like to know if the fact that this resolution has already been debated will debar us from again discussing this question?

Mr. BENNETT: I was rather surprised at the hon. gentlemen coming forward with their resolution in view of the fact that the rules of the house provide for what they do provide. I rather thought that when they saw the bills on the order paper they would defer their discussion. I can hardly say that the Speaker may or may not regard it as a second discussion upon the same matter, but I do say that the government will not offer any opposition to the discussion of these subjects upon the second reading of the bills. They would have to be considered from another angle, that being the angle from which they are dealt with by the government in the measures in question. The government will not offer any opposition to discussions during that debate upon any phase of the matters to which this resolution refers.

Mr. LUCAS: Mr. Speaker, in view of what the Prime Minister has said, and not wishing to prolong the discussion, I beg leave to withdraw the resolution.

Motion withdrawn.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, January 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gobeil for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, the amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Gardiner.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, in common with the other members who have spoken on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I desire to congratulate the hon. members who moved and seconded that address. Of course, I was not able to follow the mover (Mr. Gobeil) entirely as I am not familiar with his language, but the seconder (Mr. Barber) seemed to me to make a very temperate speech. He had a very difficult subject to handle. The one outstanding feature of his remarks was the fact that while lumbering and mining in British Columbia had enjoyed some improvement, the dairying and fruit industries were not in so happy a position. The policies of this government have been to provide assistance for the secondary industries with a consequent demoralizing effect upon the primary industry of agriculture. That is true all over Canada. The Prime Minister takes a good deal of credit for the increased sale of fruit enjoyed by the apple growers of the Annapolis valley. I do not see how the British Columbia fruit grower is enjoying any benefit from the policies of this government, because on the prairies we are buying apples cheaper than ever in my experience. That may be attributed to better shipping facilities, but that is the fact nevertheless, and in consequence the fruit growers of British Columbia, as admitted by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber), are the sufferers.

I shall not have time to cover in detail all that has been said, because the situation has been very ably dealt with by my leader. He spent four hours dealing with the question and the Prime Minister devoted about the same time to a reply. So far as I can see, though he made a splendid speech in defence of his position, what he said did not in any sense answer the statements made by our leader, that the country is in a deplorable condition. I understand that members of the government regard as infra dig any reference to the state of affairs in the country to-day. Well, it was not always so; it was not so in our day, and I propose to deal with some of the statements made by the present leader of the government in 1930, when conditions were not nearly so acute either in agriculture or in the manufacturing industry. Employment, we are told by the Department of Trade and Commerce, is in a much better situation than it was at the zero hour in 1932. I will not go into details. I have no quarrel with the statisticians who prepare the reports, but I will say that, with mighty few exceptions, and we might as well know it, throughout Canada to-day, there is more unemployment in the municipalities than there was at that time. There are more people on relief, and if that is true, how in the world can there be an improvement in the situation?

What did the Prime Minister say about unemployment? He complains about our dealing with this matter just now; he says that we are unfair in our statements. I simply take the records of the commissioners of relief in the various districts throughout Canada as an indication, to show the state of unemployment to-day. It must be borne in mind that during last year the government has had to put a very considerable number of people on relief employment, and they are credited in the statistical statement given by the Department of Trade and Commerce as persons employed. The statement is made that 146,000 more are employed to-day than in 1932. I reiterate that if the statements of the commissioners of relief throughout Canada are true, then that statement is not correct. And I do not see how the situation will be remedied if the policies pursued by the present government are to be continued. We cannot expect any other state of affairs, despite what my hon. friends to the left say, as to the need of a complete new system. I do not agree with that, but I certainly agree that we need many changes in the present fiscal policy of this government.

The complaint is made that we are making a great deal of the unemployment situation. What did the Prime Minister say in 1930? He said that unemployment existed then on a scale never before known in the history of this country, and this by reason of the policies of the Ottawa government. If the Ottawa government was responsible for 117,000 unemployed in 1930, then the Ottawa government is responsible to-day for 1,500,000 unemployed.

An hon. MEMBER: You are wrong there.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am stating facts. The statement of the present Prime Minister in 1930 was that the Ottawa government was responsible for unemployment. He said something else. He said that unemployment was then on a scale that demanded that it be treated as a national emergency. Has he treated it as a national emergency? What else did he say? He said that the Liberal party was trying to evade its responsibility. He was going to give work, not doles; it was a national matter, and as such it was to be taken over by the federal government. Well, he has not kept that promise in one particular. He ridiculed the statement of my leader, that unemployment was first the responsibility of the municipality, secondly, the responsibility of the province, and, if necessary, that relief should then be furnished by the federal government. But what has this government done? After ridiculing the proposal of my leader, the Prime Minister has not departed in any respect from that policy. We now have the proposal of a public works program to be instituted by this government, over which they will have complete control; but so far, with the single exception that the Department of National Defence is giving employment to a number of unmarried unemployed, this government has done nothing but issue relief through the medium of the provincial governments. If it is not doles, what is it? This country is on the dole to an extent never known before, put on the dole by the leader of this government in direct defiance of the pledge given to the electorate of Canada upon which he was elected and now sits in this house. But that was not the only pledge he gave; he gave many more. A great deal was made of unemployment at that time and the right hon. gentleman promised work and not doles. There has been no work however but rather doles, in direct contradiction of the promise he made on that occasion. He said that every man who was willing to work would have work; and on one occasion he said, "Let us not be deceived; let us get to grips with this problem; let us have action, not words." That must be very satisfying to the men on relief to-day. He said:

> I am a man, just as you men who are here, one of your fellow citizens. I have responsibilities, as every man in my position has, and I must not lightly make statements that I am not prepared to the last syllable to carry into effect. And I will not.

I leave it to the judgment of hon. members, to what extent these very solemn promises made by the Prime Minister of this country are being carried into effect to-day.

Mr. POULIOT: None.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I know the problem is a difficult one. We knew it was a difficult one in 1930; we were fully aware of that fact, but we did not then and do not now propose to make to the electorate promises that we will utterly fail to implement or even not try to implement; yet this government has done so. I do not intend to say more about unemployment; I am going to delay further remarks upon this question until the bill is introduced to provide work; I hope the bill will provide work and that some attempt will be made by the government to keep some of its promises on which they were elected. A country like Canada, with all the latent natural resources possessed by it, has no licence to be in the unfortunate position she is in to-day with respect to unemployment, and I lay responsibility for that at the door of the present government.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

The leader of the party to my left (Mr. Gardiner) the other day took exception to the statement of my leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) that the gentleman recently appointed to the tariff board was a Conservative; that he was not a Progressive. I may say to my hon. friend that I never heard a better Tory speech delivered in this house than the one delivered by that same gentleman who then represented Mackenzie. He sought during forty minutes to prove that the Liberal party by their policies had a higher average tariff than that imposed by the Conservatives. If my hon. friend was under any illusion about where that gentleman stood, subsequent events must have dissipated it to some extent when he was appointed to the tariff board because I have not noticed this government being very generous to opponents who opposed them vigorously. This appointment will be one in a list of hundreds, and on every occasion the government took good care to see to it, as they had a right to do, that those appointees were men of opinion similar to their own.

Mr. POULIOT: The former member for Mackenzie was a whitewashed sepulchre.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I give my hon. friend some of my reasons for making those statements, because I think it is important on questions of tariff that we reiterate from time to time the exact position of the application of tariffs by the two historic parties. I am going to give figures in connection with well known imports, imports that are used every day. I have under my hand a table of comparative tariff rates under five different tariff programs. The rates are as applied to imports from Great Britain—rates against other countries under the Bennett or the Bennett-preference tariffs are unbelievably high. I take first cotton printed piece goods, a commodity that goes into every home. The rates are as follows:

Government—	Rate Per cent
Conservative—Borden	25
Conservative—Meighen	25
Liberal—King	18
Conservative—Bennett	61
Conservative— British preference	58.5

Then there is white cotton flannelette, another commodity used more or less in every home in Canada:

Government—	Rate Per cent
Conservative—Borden	17½
Conservative—Meighen	17½
Liberal—King	15
Conservative—Bennett	55
Conservative— British preference	52

I take next wool piece goods, another commodity which goes into every home. These items are chosen designedly, because they affect practically every home in Canada:

Government—	Rate Per cent
Conservative—Borden	30
Conservative—Meighen	30
Liberal—King	24¾
Conservative—Bennett	68
Conservative—British preference	64

Wool Overcoating

Conservative—Borden	30
Conservative—Meighen	30
Liberal—King	24¾
Conservative—Bennett	100
Conservative—British preference	93

Let me take high-grade suitings, another article that is worn by many people in this country although, may I say, not so many of them are being worn to-day because the tariff keeps them out:

Government—	Rate Per cent
Conservative—Borden	30
Conservative—Meighen	30

When one of my hon. friend's colleagues in that group will from his place in this house take the responsibility of trying to lend colour to the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite, we have grave doubt about his being entirely progressive in his ideas, because hon. gentlemen whatever they may claim in the house, go out into their constituencies and invariably tell their electorate that they are for a lower tariff than was ever received from a Liberal party; they try to secure votes that are naturally Liberal, on the ground that they are more radical in this regard than the Liberal party has even been. I have had some opportunity to watch my hon. friends during the past few years and know something about the kind of propaganda they are carrying on. It has never been directed very seriously against hon. gentlemen opposite, indeed my good friend, the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) has gone to the extent of saying that there is no need to hold up the sins of the party who sit on the opposite side of the house, because they are beyond recall, the electorate are through with them. But he devotes a great deal of attention to the Liberal party in Liberal centres in western Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: They all do.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I suppose they do. I quite concur in the amendment moved by the hon. gentleman the other night. We do want the electors of western Canada to know where the Liberal party stands with respect to hon. gentlemen sitting in that corner of the house. May I say further, hon. gentlemen there make a great deal of a new social order. I say to them, go home and study the records of your own government that you have had in Alberta for the past thirteen years; if you are proud of that record, if you think they have been economical—they have been anything but that—if you think they have not put a burden upon the taxpayers of Alberta too grievous to be borne, then I will take back everything that I have said. I am alarmed about the situation in Alberta from a financial standpoint, gravely alarmed. I want to say to my hon. friend that his fears, and the fears of the gentlemen who support him, that they may be in any way contaminated by association with the Liberal party, may be set at rest at once.

Before leaving this question, I admit that there has been some improvement in the textile industry, in the silk industry and in boots; there has been some added employment. But when I inquire of people from those localities as to the wage scales being paid I am astonished to learn that the lowest scale of wages in the history of those industries is now in effect. That requires some explanation. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) is becoming exercised about it, I see. He says it is necessary to have an investigation into the methods of conducting business in this connection. What does my hon. friend expect, when the government to which he belongs gives this prohibitive protection to these industries? Did not his Prime Minister promise that he would see to it that labour was protected in these manufacturing industries that enjoy such a large measure of protection? But they are a little late in seeing that they are protected. What is happening to-day was foretold in no uncertain manner by hon. gentlemen on this side of the house. The government was told that if they gave this measure of protection it would never reach the employee. It never does, it goes in excessive profits to the manufacturer himself. Indeed, I am credibly informed—I am going to ascertain the exact truth of the matter—that in western Ontario there is one individual engaged in the production of silk stockings and silk underwear who stands to make a profit of well over $200,000 this year, and he is paying the lowest wages he has ever paid. I will get that verified, I do not want to make that assertion without absolute proof. But there is need for investigation, and I expect my hon. friend will see to it, when the investigation comes on, that labour has ample opportunity to bring these matters to light, and that if the government have authority to interfere they will interfere at once and stop this kind of thing in these few industries that are making extravagant profits out of the necessities of the people of Canada.

One reason why there is increased prosperity in those manufactures is,—I can say it with full assurance in respect to the country from Winnipeg to the mountains at least,—that every family in western Canada is down to bare bones as far as boots and shoes and clothing are concerned. There is not an individual who can be excepted. They are in a position where of necessity they must buy. And may I say to my hon. friends that this government are not thinking, and never have thought, about the condition of fifty per cent of the people of Canada who live on the land and make their livelihood out of farming. It is little wonder that I hear from day to day the statement made that the government have gone mad in their national policy of excessive tariffs that give the manufacturers of this country the opportunity to exploit the people. In western Canada we were unable to buy new implements. We would buy millions of dollars worth if we were in a position to do so, but as it is we are getting past with hay wire and similar makeshifts to keep these implements together. So of necessity we have to buy parts, and buy them in quite a large extent at an increase of 30 per cent. Then in order to cover our bodies we are forced to pay tribute to these manufacturers in eastern Canada who have been given such high protection. The government should at least see that decent wages are paid the employees.

These are some of the things that I think need to be said to the government. I appreciate the difficulties with which the government is faced. May I say to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance that there is no individual for whom I have greater respect and greater sympathy, for he has to raise the revenues of this country under the difficulties imposed by the fiscal policy of the government. He is constantly in the unhappy position of failing to balance the budget, and forced to go into the money markets of the world to borrow more money to add to the capitalized debt of Canada. Where are we going anyway? I have heard it said by representatives of this government that the western provinces were extravagant. They have been extravagant. They did not take advantage of the good times between 1922 and 1930, but went on spending money. However, I make this statement, that they are no more deserving of blame than hon. gentlemen opposite have been since 1930. When it is considered that the minister has had to add to the capitalized debt of this country over $400,000,000 since taking office, it is a matter for serious thought. When he cannot by any method of budgeting increase his revenues to an extent sufficient to take care of ordinary expenditure, and has to borrow to make up the deficiency, we must admit that such a condition is deplorable. My hon. friend knows, and so does every hon. member of the house, that it is a deplorable position. Yet it is true.

There is one other thing that I want to say now, because my time is limited, and other matters that I intended to deal with I shall have to take up at a later date. I have had some little experience in provincial financing. I have been a member of the federal treasury board for eight years, and I have some knowledge of the difficulties involved in such operations. We have frequently heard the statement, and we heard it reiterated the other day, that there must be a refinancing of the public debt of this country, and that an opportune time will be taken to do it. That is long overdue. Hon. gentlemen opposite make a great deal of the fact that their loan went over so splendidly in Great Britain. But surely there should be some comparison between the drop in commodity prices and the price we have to pay for our money. I am not so concerned about the credit of Canada. I fail to understand why a favourable balance of trade constitutes a bulwark for the credit of this country, when at the same time we are adding annually over $100,000,000 to our national debt and annually are failing to balance our budget. If I were a purchaser of Canadian bonds I would a thousand times rather see the budget balanced and additions to the public debt cease than have the government able to boast of a favourable balance on our restricted trade operations. So long as the policy of this government is pursued you will have restricted trade operations. You have tied yourselves up for five years to a British trade agreement that has brought disastrous results, and if my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce wants to be open and aboveboard he will admit that he finds it difficult when he undertakes to make trade agreements with foreign countries. Canada needs foreign trade; Canada must have it, and Canada can have it if she is prepared to exchange goods. But Canada cannot have foreign trade if she is going to demand money instead of goods. Most of the high tariff countries that have pursued this policy find themselves in exactly the same position.

My hon. friends say, "What are you going to do about a country that refuses to trade with you?" I should like to ask one pertinent question in that regard; I asked this question of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) yesterday when he was dealing with the wheat agreement, with which I shall not attempt to deal at this time. This is my question: How does it happen that our competitors in the wheat selling game have little or no surplus, while we in Canada are carrying over some 219,000,000 bushels into the new crop year?

An hon. MEMBER: That is what we had left over from you.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is perfect nonsense, that is all I have to say. I just ask that very pertinent question. When our competitors are practically cleaned up we are left with the huge surplus of 219,000,000 bushels of wheat going into this crop year, and it is not likely that this surplus will be very materially reduced this year.

I do not blame this government altogether for this situation. I think the pools will have to take their fair share of responsibility, and I think the pools could have been of immense benefit to Canadian wheat producers. But when they sought to invade European markets with their own agents they took a step in the wrong direction; then we began to build up the surplus, and then the provincial governments had to come to their rescue. Finally the burden got too heavy for the provincial governments, and the federal government had to step in. I have a great deal of sympathy with Mr. McFarland in his attempt to market this surplus; I think the government are to be commended for their action, except that I do believe Mr. McFarland made a very serious mistake in the fall of this year. But we are all human, and this is a very difficult situation. I should like to ask, however, whether it would not have been wisdom on the part of this government to have endeavoured to sell a great deal more wheat than they did sell at a time when our competitors were marketing their wheat. It may be possible that the government had not control at that time, but from that time on we have been in the unfortunate position of carrying over wheat.

What are the prospects of selling our wheat? If the statement of the Prime Minister is correct our prospects are mighty slim.

If it is correct that we can only dispose of 200,000,000 bushels, including empire and foreign markets, then we are in an extremely difficult position with regard to the marketing of our surplus grain. It means that the western farmers will find themselves in the position of having to curtail their production, if it is to be done by one stroke of the pen, to something like 60,000,000 bushels, whereas we grow something like 400,000,000 bushels in a normal year.

Not only that, but we are also in a difficult position with regard to almost every commodity. The Prime Minister took considerable satisfaction from the fact that within the last month pork and bacon selects had risen to 10 cents a pound in eastern Canada. Do you know what I sold my hogs for this fall? I sold them for $4.20, and I was glad to get it. Last year I sold them for $2.

An hon. MEMBER: Keep them.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): How can you keep them? Every farmer knows that the moment they get over 220 pounds you are docked, so you have to sell them as soon as they are ready. We have a rigorous climate out there, and we have to try to get our hogs on the market before the cold weather sets in, so we are forced to take these prices. I see distress and suffering among my neighbours, and I may tell the Prime Minister that I take mighty little satisfaction from the fact that temporarily the price of hogs has gone up. As soon as we begin to produce we will find the price go down to the old level. I hope it will not; I should be glad to see it remain at ten cents, and in fact I would be glad to get five cents.

Mr. DUFF: The farmer does not get ten cents.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, of course he does not, but the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) is going to rectify that by means of the inquiry which is to be made, and which is necessary because of the action of this government in putting these individuals in a preferred position. I want to tell my right hon. friend that I hope he attacks the question as vigorously as he promised to do in 1930, when he said that if any individual sought to take advantage of the protection afforded him the government would see that redress was given at once. This has been going on for three years; in a moderate way it is going on right now and I am waiting to see what kind of redress we are going to get. If we do not get redress at once; if it runs on for another six months or so we will not need redress, because we will all be out of business.

I see where one particularly optimistic individual says that it all depends upon the farmer, that on one side of the road he has known a man to become wealthy while the man on the other side of the road was a complete failure. Well, I have seen a few cases of that kind, but by and large the farmer needs all the assistance he can get in a very difficult occupation. Mighty few of them make more than a reasonable competence out of a lifetime of toil. My hon. friends who live in Ontario know that. I have been engaged in farming all my life, and I know something about it. At present I am not in a particularly unfortunate position, but that is not due to the receipts from my farm, which have had to be bolstered on many occasions. When hon. gentlemen tell me that the farmers of western Canada are responsible for many of their difficulties I can only say that I wish they would go out and address a farm gathering in the west when they do go. I notice that they stick pretty religiously to the urban centres.

I have lived in western Canada for over twenty-six years, Mr. Speaker, and I have never known the people to be so incensed as they are to-day. They are willing to consider anything, even sovietism, if it will change the situation, and they are not going to be buncoed any longer. When they get an opportunity to express themselves hon. gentlemen opposite will understand in what high regard they are held by the farming community of western Canada.

On motion of Mr. Thompson (Lanark) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BENNETT: The business to-morrow will be to take the order paper as it is.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What does that mean; shall we take up the address?

Mr. BENNETT: No, just as the business is on the order paper. To-morrow is private members' day.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I notice that this year the debate on the address appears on the order paper under the head of public bills and orders, and I believe that for the first month of the session public bills and orders have precedence on Thursday. Do I understand, then, that the debate on the address will go on to-morrow?

Mr. BENNETT: When we reach public bills and orders the debate on the address will be proceeded with. That is what I desired to say, that we will take the business as it appears on the order paper.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 1, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

PETITIONS

Mr. J. A. BARRETTE (Berthier Maskinongé) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to lay on the table of the house petitions signed by the tobacco growers of the province of Quebec, also by farmers and consumers of said province protesting against the excise tax of 20 cents per pound on Canadian tobacco.

Mr. J. L. BARIBEAU (Champlain), (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to lay on the table of the house a letter from the "Union Catholique des cultivateurs de la province de Quebec" strongly protesting against an excise tax of 20 cents per pound on leaf tobacco sold by the growers to consumers or for exportation purposes.

Mr. J. F. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire from the hon. members who have just spoken where they got their information because we also have people who are interested in the matter.

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS ACT

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 6 to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The amendment sought by this bill is for the purpose of preventing the export of cans of fish falsely or incorrectly labelled or marked. Under the existing legislation even if cans are wrongly labelled or marked they cannot be interfered with until they are offered on the market in a retail way. We believe that this amendment will be in the public interest.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 7 to amend the Fisheries Act, 1932.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. DURANLEAU: This merely involves a correction of a reference number to a certain section. When the act was before parliament in 1932 a section was added to the act, and no correction was made to one of them, as originally numbered, in sending the bill to the printer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the section?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Section 56, subsection (5).

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

AMOUNT DUE PROVINCE OF NEW BRUNSWICK*

Mr. VENIOT:

1. What amount was due the government of the province of New Brunswick on October 31, 1933, and what are the details?

2. Did the government of the province of New Brunswick apply to the federal government for the withdrawal of the sum of $529,299, which has been to the credit of that province since confederation?

[Mr. Stevens.]

3. If so, when was the application made?

4. Is legislation by the government of New Brunswick necessary to authorize the withdrawal of said sum?

Mr. RHODES: I am submitting an answer to this question but in doing so I feel that I should direct the attention of the house to the fact that the hon. gentleman who has asked the question has contravened the rules of the house in making an assertion of fact. It would be none the less a contravention of the rules if the facts were correctly stated but as a matter of fact the sum mentioned was not established at confederation nor did it appear at that time. It was part of the debt adjustments which were made several years after confederation. I raise this question not for the purpose of evading an answer but merely to ensure adherence to the procedure which has been recognized by this house for many years. The answers are as follows:

1. Amount at credit New Brunswick's debt allowance account, October 31, 1933, $529,299.39.

2. The province has applied for the withdrawal of the above mentioned amount.

3. October, 1933.

4. See sections 6 (2) and 11 of the Provincial Subsidies Act, R.S. c. 192.

2. What, if any, reduction has been arranged to take place in the above office as from the beginning of the next fiscal year?

Mr. DURANLEAU:

QUEBEC DEPARTMENT OF COLONIZATION WORK

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Since the month of August, 1933, has the Department of Colonization of the province of Quebec proposed to the federal government that it carry on certain work in the parishes of St. Elzear, St. Emile d'Auclair and St. Benoit de Packington, Temiscouata county?
2. Has this work been approved by the federal government?
3. If so, on what date?

Mr. RHODES: 1. Yes.

2 & 3. The relief works proposed to be carried out by the Province of Quebec at St. Emile d'Auclair, Temiscouata County, received Dominion approval on January 24th, while the works proposed to be carried out at St. Elzear and St. Benoit de Packington are still under consideration.

PRICE OF SILVER

On the orders of the day.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). Last week it came to my notice that a resolution had been sent to the Department of Finance from the Cobalt district to the effect that the people of that district wanted the price of silver fixed at sixty cents an ounce. Will the government announce its policy in this regard?

Mr. RHODES: I have no recollection at the moment of any such requests having been received by the Department of Finance, but I will make inquiry. Even if the request had been received, however, I am afraid I could not submit an answer to the second portion of the question.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I ask whether the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) can answer my question to-day with regard to the Vancouver harbour commissioners.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): After careful perusal of the records, I find that no demand was made for the resignation of the harbour commissioners of Vancouver, and no resignation received and of course it was not considered nor accepted. I know what my hon. friend is driving at, and in fairness to the house, I may say that when these gentlemen were in Ottawa—during last November, I think—some representations were made to them with respect to the purchase of a motor car which, in our opinion, should not have been made in these times. But no demand for their resignation was made.

CORRECTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): I wish to correct an error I made yesterday when I was speaking on the address. I stated the increase I paid last year for farm implement repairs was due to the order in council bringing into effect the 25 per cent duty proposed by the government in 1930. This statement is incorrect as in last year's budget the duty prior to 1930 was restored, and the duty could not be held responsible for the increased price.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

ORDERS IN COUNCIL UNDER RELIEF ACT PASSED DURING PARLIAMENTARY RECESS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): May I ask whether all orders in council which have been passed since the last session under the authority of the Relief Act have been laid on the table of the house—for instance, one concerning guarantees to the Canadian Pacific Railway, a copy of which has been sent to my leader. I think the house has a right to have all these orders on the table.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): It will be recalled perhaps that at the last session, when the act was being passed, a suggestion was made by, I think, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) that precis of orders in council should be published in the Canada Gazette, and as a matter of fact such precis were published in the Canada Gazette from week to week, though while the house is in session the orders in council are brought down. If it is thought desirable that these orders in council should be filed, of course they will be, because a return of the house could be obtained to have this done. I merely point out however that the statute has been strictly followed, and there was no obligation to lay upon the table of the house orders in council that had been passed during the recess. But with the opening of the house it becomes necessary that each order in council as passed should be laid on the table, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) has laid them on the table to-day, as I daresay the hon. gentleman observed. If, however, it is the wish of the house that all these orders in council, particulars of which have been published, should be laid on the table, I will see that it is done.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My understanding was that the precis published in the Gazette were additional to the laying of orders on the table. If the right hon. gentleman will be kind enough to have the orders tabled the house will be grateful.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the hon. gentleman would not wish us to go to the trouble of filing them all. Orders that have attached to them long and tedious pages of accounts from the provinces, I should not think the hon. gentleman would wish to have; but we will file such as deal with matters other than ordinary questions of relief. If there are others which he wishes we will see that they are produced. I was under the impression which the hon. gentleman himself had until I looked into the matter and found that it was not necessary to table the orders passed during the recess.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, January 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gobeil for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, the amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Gardiner.

Mr. T. A. THOMPSON (Lanark): In rising to resume the debate, I wish at the outset to congratulate the mover (Mr. Gobeil) and the seconder (Mr. Barber) of the address on the splendid speeches they made, reflecting great credit not only upon themselves but also upon the constituencies which they have the honour to represent.

I listened very carefully the other day for over four hours to the speech of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and I was very much disappointed when he was through. During that entire time there was no constructive policy, there was nothing put forward by the right hon. gentleman but fault-finding. He found fault with the present administration, and I began to wonder whether these men sitting on the treasury benches, grown old in the service of their country, were attempting to pull down and ruin the reputation of Canada, or whether after all they did not have some business judgment and there was not something that they had done that could find approval from the leader of the opposition.

The right hon. gentleman made the statement that we had a million on relief and a million and a half unemployed, a statement which is not borne out by the facts. I have received a report from the Deputy Minister of Labour giving the figures for the months of November and December of 1932 and 1933 respectively as to the number of families on relief, and that I submit is the fairest way of estimating the number of people on relief in this country. A bread-winner is out of work and goes on relief. He may have a wife and family of half a dozen children, but it is not right to suggest that his wife and children should be numbered amongst the unemployed. He is the head of one family, one bread-winner who has gone on relief. I am therefore giving the number of families that have been on relief, which as I say is the fairest way of arriving at an honest conclusion.

In November, 1933, there were 17,783 less families on relief than there were in November, 1932, and in December, 1933, there were 25,679 less families on relief than there were in December, 1932. That shows conclusively that we are to-day in a better and not in a worse condition than we were a year ago. I cannot understand therefore what good purpose is to be served by public men decrying and blackening the reputation of their own country at a time when every loyal citizen is straining every effort to pull the Canadian people out of the morass and entanglement in which they have found themselves.

Yesterday we listened to another speech, this time from the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart), in which he denounced the tariff policies of this government. He waxed very eloquent and worked himself into a great fever, holding up his hands in holy horror. I thought at the time he was longing for a tambourine or a little tin drum on which to beat the death knell of protection. Whatever it may be, he charged the Prime Minister and the Conservative party with being responsible for all the ills that exist in this country at the present time, and especially did he charge that the policies of the present government were responsible for our unemployment situation. These statements are not borne out by the facts. I claim that the greatest factor in causing unemployment in Canada was the unbusinesslike immigration policy of the Liberal government from 1921 to 1930. During those years they brought in 1,187,319 immigrants against the protests of the provinces in which those people were placed and against the business judgment of our most able Canadians. In the last two years during which they were responsible for immigration, and at a time when our own men were unemployed and when every man who had any insight into our future knew it was a wrong policy, they brought in 331,000 immigrants, of whom 99,000 who came in during the last year were single men who immediately went on relief. Had the former Liberal administration followed the same immigration policy that is being pursued by the present government and restricted immigration to the extent we have done there would be no unemployment and no need for relief here to-day.

When the present government took office they found the markets of the world largely closed to the Canadian exporters. France, Germany, Italy, that formerly took millions of bushels of our wheat, had raised their tariffs to a prohibitive height. The United States to which we had sent a large quantity of our produce had from time to time raised their tariffs making it impossible for us to do business with them with any degree of satisfaction. In 1922 the Fordney-McCumber tariff hit the Canadian exporter a serious blow, and this was followed in 1930 by the Hawley-Smoot tariff, making it impossible for the Canadian exporter to do business with the nation to the south of us. The point I would emphasize is that these European and United States markets were lost to the Canadian exporter between 1921 and 1930 when our hon. friends opposite were in power. I do not blame the Liberal government of that day for the tariff policies of foreign countries but I do blame them for taking knock after knock lying down. I blame them for sitting with folded hands while the markets of the world were being closed to Canadian products and allowing the Canadian market to be the dumping ground for the surplus products of every other nation in the world. Further I say that the tariff policy of the present government has kept Canada solvent and that by securing in the British market a substantial preference for the Canadian exporter they have safeguarded the Canadian producer and protected the Canadian farmer from the very worst effects of the present world depression. The imperial trade agreements made at Ottawa and the general policy of the present government have combined to wipe out a heavy adverse trade balance and to replace it with a favourable trade balance of $136,000,000. This has been one of the greatest achievements of the present government. Notwithstanding the fact that economic nationalism has been paralysing international trade, the Canadian exporter found a haven from the general chaos of world trade in a sheltered market of the British Empire where, in the best market in the world for agricultural and other primary products, the present government has secured for him a preference.

There is nothing that affects Canada to a greater extent than the repayment of her foreign debts and her future borrowing in the foreign money market, and judging from our experience in the past I am convinced there should be set up in Canada a board of financial experts to whom all prospective borrowers should be asked to submit their propositions before being permitted to enter the foreign money market. Such a board would safeguard us against excessive borrowings and protect us from those dangerous terms of repayment that have characterized so many of our loans in the past. The whole economic system of the world is to-day labouring under a nightmare of debt that is paralyzing and demoralizing those who receive the loan as well as those who make it.

We have to the south of us a great nation of 130,000,000 people experimenting with a species of dictatorship, feverishly endeavouring to raise themselves out of the morass of economic and financial entanglements in which they find themselves involved. We wish them well; we trust they will be successful because we realize that the future welfare and prosperity of this dominion is inseparably associated with that of the United States. We are neighbours living close together and what affects the one will always materially affect the other. But while they are strenuously endeavouring to bring about new conditions and a better social life in their country, they seem to forget all about the debt, and I should like to call to their remembrance this fact, that the same prayer which says "Thy kingdom come" says also "Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors."

Our hon. friends opposite during former sessions in the house and on the stump throughout the country have apparently taken great delight in comparing prices of farm produce since 1930 with what they were prior to that date. They seem to forget that no government can control world prices, and that the inexorable law of supply and demand rules the world to-day as it ever did. The only comparison that can be fairly made is between the prices of farm products in Canada and the prices in other countries. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the prices of agricultural products in Canada since 1930 have been higher in comparison with those in other countries than they were during the regime of our hon. friends opposite. Take prices to-day; we have pork selling on the hoof in Montreal and Toronto at 10 cents, while in Chicago it is selling at only 4 cents. The best sign of the recovery from the depression is to be found in the fact that agricultural products are continually rising in price. Canada is essentially an agricultural country, and until the farmers of Canada receive a fair remuneration for their labour and the capital they have invested there will be no real prosperity in this dominion. As a direct result of the agreements made by this government, Canada to-day has a wonderful opportunity to supply bacon to the British market. I find that in 1932 Denmark supplied 67 per cent of Great Britain's imported bacon, Poland, 10·02 per cent, Holland, 8·05 per cent, Sweden, 3·77 per cent, Lithuania, 4·52 per cent, Irish Free State, 1·75 per cent, and Canada only 1·6 per cent, the lowest percentage of any country. Under the agreement with Great Britain, Canada is permitted to send into that country 280,000,000 pounds of bacon annually. While we have doubled our exports to the British market we have not yet exceeded 25 per cent of the quota that has been allowed us. With pork at the price it is to-day, and still 75 per cent of our quota not taken up, there is a wonderful opportunity for the farmers of this dominion.

In the county of Lanark, which I have the honour to represent, the policies of the former government had driven our manufacturers almost to the wall. Many of our factories were closed down, few of them were running over half time. To-day every textile mill in the county of Lanark is running full time, and several are running day and night. Some of the mills that have been closed for years have been reopened. This is a direct result of the tariff policies of the present administration in restricting imports from foreign countries where the scale of wages and the standard of life is so much below that of Canada that they can afford to undersell us in our own market. The opening of these factories in Lanark county has been of great assistance to the farmers, because when the men and women engaged in industrial life have steady employment, they have purchasing power wherewith to buy the commodities that the farmers produce. Mouths are the farmers' best market.

We hear a great deal about social betterment in this country. We want social betterment, but we want it without socialism and without communism. We must have progress, in a young country like Canada we cannot stand still. Changing conditions must bring new remedies. But I have no sympathy with those organizations which would attempt to build up an economic system in Canada such as they have in Russia, based upon atheism, hatred and repudiation of debt. The danger to our present democracy does not lie in attacks made upon it by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation or similar organizations. The real danger to democracy to-day lies in the apathy of its own defenders, the men on the one hand who claim that our present day democracy is rooted and grounded in Magna Charta and the Bill of Rights and so cannot be disturbed, and on the other hand those who use the privileges and liberties afforded by democracy to further their own selfish interests without due regard to the interests of their fellowmen. To-day we have agitation to change the whole system, but it gets us nowhere to damn it and to call it a canker on the body politic. The wise statesman must look for the cause of that eruption, and honestly endeavour to heal it. And in lopping off the dead branches we must be careful not to destroy the living branches or the living part of the tree that has taken ages of the very best that was in humanity to produce.

Just before this house opened there was held in Ottawa a conference of the premiers of the different provinces. While the meetings were held in secret, enough has leaked out to assure the public that several of these premiers were here asking further assistance for their provinces. Now, Mr. Speaker, if these provinces have been unfortunate, if the grasshoppers have eaten them up, if the drought has burnt them out, if the hail and frost have destroyed their harvests, then I say let us come to their assistance, because these are things over which they have no control. But if those provinces insist on electing legislatures that will spend their resources unwisely, that will bonus railways, guarantee wheat pools, enter into social legislation which they cannot afford and which the application of sane business principles would have taught them to avoid, then I say it is out of the question that they can continue any such expenditure and come to Ottawa to have their bills paid.

Mr. DONNELLY: They will not. It will not be long now.

Mr. THOMPSON (Lanark): The province of Ontario pays approximately 45 per cent of the taxes of the Dominion of Canada, Quebec approximately 30 per cent and the remainder, some 25 per cent, is paid by the other seven provinces. How long should the federal government make good—I ask as a business proposition—the extravagance of these provinces? These provinces are not poor, they have wonderful natural resources. The trouble has been poor administration. I am of the opinion that they should be told to put their own houses in order, balance their budgets, live within their means, and that it is high time they were self-sustaining. Since this government took office in 1930 they have had to deal with an overwhelming succession of new phases of the economic situation for which there was no precedent in Canadian history and for which our oldest and most experienced statesmen were altogether unprepared. The fact that the ship of state has been safely guided through the dangerous shoals and is to-day heading for the high seas clearly indicates that a master hand has been at the helm.

I have every confidence in the future of this country; I am not one of those crying blue ruin. I have every confidence in the two great races that form the foundation stock of Canada, the English and the French. They have the hardihood, the business ability and the courage to surmount every obstacle that may lie in their path, and I hope they will work in unison for the future development and prosperity of our common Canada.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there is little in the speech from the throne that is sufficiently definite to form the basis of any very clear discussion. I should like first of all, however, to protest against the military display that we witnessed at the opening. If Canada is earnestly endeavouring to promote peace it would seem to me that there is no necessity of our putting on such a warlike front. I have sometimes wondered why, at the opening of parliament, we might not have deputations of business men, of farmers, of railway men, of miners, and of those others who have laid the foundations for the life of Canada. If we had those men present instead of such a host of officials, backed up by so many military men, it would seem to me that possibly we would create an atmosphere that would bring us a little nearer reality. I suppose the practical difficulty would be that our table of precedence does not permit of anything of the kind.

The speech from the throne refers to improved world conditions. I can hardly understand this, in view of the news that is coming to us daily from almost all parts of the world. Undoubtedly we have witnessed a decline in the influence of the League of Nations; we have been witnessing the practical abandonment of the disarmament conference, and yet I take it that all thoughtful students of international affairs admit that permanent recovery is possible only as we have peace and as we are able to develop the collective system. Further than that, we have been witnessing and participating in an intensified economic nationalism. We deprecate that when it is manifested by other nations, but we have taken our full share to such an extent that from the practical point of view, it is becoming increasingly difficult, for us to market many of our primary products in Europe. We have witnessed still further in Europe the decline of many of the older democratic or so called democratic systems. There we have seen arise bolshevism, fascism and Hitlerism. Even in England there have been very radical changes, though not so much in outward form. In the United States we have had what almost might be termed a revolution, as manifested in the very great changes which the president has introduced.

In view of all these changes that are going on throughout the world I have been wondering whether there is no hope of our having a new deal for Canada. Apparently, notwithstanding the eulogistic references of the last speaker, this government is pretty much content to go along the old, beaten trail.

I think there is no member of any of the self-governing dominions who was not very decidedly perturbed by the fate of our sister dominion, Newfoundland, where they have given up even the forms of democracy. Responsible government has been replaced by administration by a commission, with what amounts to practically dictatorial powers, and I would say that this change has been made primarily not in the interests of the people of Newfoundland but in the interests of the bondholders.

The same sort of thing is going on in our western provinces and municipalities. I shall not take time to discuss the points raised by the last speaker, who referred to the extravagance of the western provinces; that would take too long. I think I could make out a case to show that we have not been more extravagant than other provinces, but the point is that at the present time we are practically bankrupt. A great many of our municipalities are actually bankrupt, and under those circumstances we cannot much longer carry on the ordinary services for which government is constituted. We face, in fact, a new type of slavery in this country, and that is bondage to the bondholders. As children we were taught that freedom had been obtained. Certain kinds of freedom have been obtained, including so called political freedom, though even that is in danger these days. But newer types of economic serfdom are being fastened upon us at the present time. I could not but recall recently a little verse by Herbert Carruth, as published some years ago in Current Literature:

> The rights of men are a by-word;
> The bones are not yet dust
> Of those who broke the shackles,
> And the shackles are not yet rust
> Till the masters are forging new ones,
> And coward lips are sealed
> While the code that cost a million lives
> Is step by step repealed.

To-day we are witnessing a new type of society in which very few of us have any very large measure of freedom. I think it was Rabindranath Tagore who said some years ago that chains were none the less real because they were either invisible or golden.

I spoke of the financial condition of the municipalities and provinces of the west. Let me point out how these affect the living condition of many of our people. In the last few days in Winnipeg, my own city, we have had what might be called a doctors' strike. The doctors have refused any longer to give free medical attendance, and they have recently signed this declaration:

> I undertake to refuse free medical service in the office, hospital or home to any individual in receipt of relief unless an emergency exists. An emergency is one in which life is in imminent danger and for which immediate action is required. This is to take effect on and after the 15th day of February, 1934, unless the civic and/or municipal authorities concerned have made satisfactory arrangements with our committee.

The secretary explains that even a case of ordinary confinement is not to be regarded as an emergency case, except in the case of hemorrhage or convulsions; only then will the doctor consent to come to the bedside of the patient. I do not propose to discuss the professional ethics involved in this question. I recall that some years ago when there was a strike in Winnipeg and when the milk drivers and some of the members of the fire brigades went on strike, a great cry was raised to heaven and it was said that under no circumstances should milk drivers or fire fighters desert their posts of duty. But now we have the doctors, for their own reasons, and possibly they are justifiable, in order to force an issue, refusing to give medical service to any one on relief. We all know there has been a question as to where the responsibility for giving relief lies, whether with the Dominion government or the provinces or the municipalities, and in what degree each is responsible. First of all, when we thought of relief we thought of food. Then we had to extend it to clothing, and out in our part of the world, where it is cold, we had to extend it to shelter, and even to fuel and light, and as these new items have come into view we have found that it is very difficult to get agreement as to who should assume responsibility for these new types of relief.

Now we have hospitalization and medical care. I point out that owing to the practical bankruptcy of many of our municipalities it is next to impossible for them to advance further sums of money for this type of relief. The other day the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden), himself a medical man, raised the question in this house, and the Prime Minister's reply was that he had communicated to the representatives of the medical profession "that there was no reason to believe that the provinces would not discharge their constitutional duties with respect to the health of their citizens." That may be all very well, from a purely constitutional standpoint, but may I say that when there is absolute misery I cannot think that this government or any government is justified in taking such a position as that. If there was a flood, we would not stop to argue whether it was a provincial or federal responsibility to launch rafts and save the citizens; we would go out and pull out of the water the poor fellows who were threatened with being engulfed. And what then shall we say in the case of women who expect in a few days to become mothers, scores of them, who must face that very, very serious crisis in their lives with no hope of obtaining medical assistance unless their case is extreme. I think this is altogether too serious a matter to be allowed to pass unnoticed by this house. I must recall again, those words of Mr. Bennett which have been repeated very often, spoken when he was seeking to become the Prime Minister. He said:

> I say to you, my fellow citizens, my fellow Canadians, speaking to the larger audience, I am convinced this problem has now ceased to be local and provincial and has become national in its importance.

The Prime Minister paid a glowing tribute the other day to those to whom honours had been given, and said that some of them were doing work on the pioneer front. I want to say that if these women doing social work should be given honours, much more should help be given to those who are about to give birth to children and who have no one at the present time to look to for assistance. It is not much wonder that large numbers of them to-day are seeking to learn the principles of birth control.

The speech from the throne goes on to say that the "improved world conditions are reflected in Canada by expanding trade, improving revenues, increasing employment, and a more confident outlook upon the future." As far as those of us from the west are concerned, that is indeed news. I am not going to enter upon the battle of figures which raged here for some hours, but I should like to call attention to some particular incidents that would seem to show that all is not just rosy at the present time.

Here is a heading and paragraph I noticed in the Toronto papers a few weeks ago, on September 26:

Machine gun tanks sent to Stratford to quiet strikers.

Wearing steel helmets and carrying wartime equipment the regiment detrained here this morning, prepared to guard the plant of the Swift Canadian Company and six furniture factories where employees are on strike.

We were told that the poultry workers were being paid two cents for each chicken plucked and that they wanted one cent more, and that it was refused them. If we are having so much prosperity it would seem to me that it might very well be reflected in the extra cent for plucking a fowl which these poultry workers asked for.

With regard to the furniture workers, they are to no small extent the victims of the mass buying recently denounced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). Just here I should like to suggest to the minister that we in this corner shall be very glad to cooperate in any way possible in making the investigation into that matter a success. We can assure the government of our support and will do our very best to try to uncover those bad conditions which have left so many work people, as well as the consumers, in difficulties.

But I should like to ask this. Why not also investigate the dealings of our financial promoters and manipulators? Men like Holt and others of his kind are placing burdens upon this country under which the ordinary people can hardly struggle. Only a few months ago I came across a rather interesting account of the way in which many fortunes have been made in this country. It is taken from Retrospects of a Newspaper Person, by Mr. P. D. Ross of this city. Mr. Ross had done a Mr. W. J. Carrique a good turn, and he tells in the book the interesting sequel. I quote:

Some little time further on, another visit came from Carrique. He laid an envelope on my desk. "This is your share of stock," he said. "My share? What are you talking about?" "We have formed a little company,—the Canadian Street Car Advertising Company." . . . "But, I don't want any of your stock." I said. "It won't cost you anything," returned Carrique, "It's paid-up stock." "Who paid it up?" "Nobody, It's just issued paid-up." I opened the envelope. It contained a certificate for $10,300 paid-up stock in the Canadian Street Car Advertising Company, capital $60,000 paid up. . . . "I don't know where the rest of you fellows got the money," I said. "But I haven't any money to put in this. I don't want any of it. Leave me out."

"None of us have put in any money," Carrique returned. "We have contracts for two or more years with each of the Montreal, Hamilton and Ottawa street railway companies, we to pay certain figures for space in their cars to place advertisements in. The agreement is to pay each company so much a month. The receipts we are already getting from advertisers to put their cards in the cars are more than enough to enable us to make our monthly payments to the street car companies. In fact, we are already so far ahead that we could pay a dividend on $60,000 now, and we have no liabilities to anybody." "Sounds like a fairy tale, Carrique." "It's going to be a real fairy tale," he returned. "I expect the Toronto and Winnipeg franchises, and if we get them it'll be a gold mine."

Mr. Ross continues:

I took the stock. Carrique was a wonder. Before long we had the Toronto and Winnipeg franchises, with nearly all others in Canada.

Mr. Ross goes on to say that in the fifteen years following the formation of the company he had drawn in dividends or bonuses the sum of $78,847, and the account continues:

No shareholder ever paid a dollar—not a cent—into the company. In 1919, W. J. Carrique, who was a shrewd and successful operator in other things than street railway advertising, died a near-millionaire. The Carrique estate and the rest of us soon after sold the total stock of the Canadian Street Railway Advertising Company to Senator Wilson of Montreal for $337,500. My share of the proceeds of the sale was a cheque for $58,185. This, with the $78,847 received during the previous years in dividends, constituted a total of $127,032 which came to me in fifteen years from the Canadian Street Railway Advertising Company from stock for which I never put up a cent—never anything except a small amount of obligingness.

Can one wonder that Mr. Ross entitled that chapter "Why not be Obliging?" I do not know whether that is the kind of fortune that the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) would say was earned by honest toil.

There is another strike to which I should like to refer, that of the lumberworkers in northern Ontario and the Rouyn district of Quebec. Harsh and repressive measures were used, yet according to the Montreal Star of January 4, the provincial government's own investigators—

All agree that the workers are being exploited by a number of contractors and sub-contractors, that their wages are inadequate, and that the goods sold to the workers in the stores operated by contractors are exorbitantly priced, so that when the season is over the lumberjacks find themselves not any richer than before and sometimes poorer, for they are indebted to their employers for part of the goods purchased.

I should like to ask again: Why not some sort of labour code for Canada? If any of the workers in Canada have been better off in the last year it has been as a reflection of the action taken by the American government. I think that is true, for example, of the shingle-weavers on the Pacific coast.

What is this government doing? The Prime Minister declared recently in Vancouver that this government would not be a wet nurse for derelicts. The public was shocked when it realized the large number of unemployed and their plight. The Prime Minister explained in a later speech that he was speaking of derelict industries. On that basis I should like to ask about the textile industry which has been helped for many years by this and other governments. I should like to ask about the $60,000,000 guaranteed to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Is that not being a wet nurse to a derelict enterprise? That is what it seems to me to be. Hundreds of small concerns have been in dire straits and many of them have gone under but yet we find that in the case of a large concern the government comes to its aid. It is all very well to conserve the interests of the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway located in Canada, Great Britain, the United States or elsewhere, but if that is to be done I submit that the interests of those engaged in smaller industries in Canada have an equal right to be taken care of. The only consolation I get out of the transaction is that it is a step towards public ownership. I should like to make a practical suggestion. If we are to guarantee $60,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway, this house ought to know whether the salary of Mr. Beatty has been cut by ten or twenty per cent. If we are to guarantee, we ought to know something about the inside history of the company. If we are to pay the debts, we ought to have something to say as to what the expenditures will be.

The government has recently recommended certain titles and honours but I do not intend to take up very much time in the discussion of this matter. Two more people can boast of titles because of Mr. Bennett having been Prime Minister. But hundreds of people have lost the titles which they had to their property. Most people are more interested in having a title to their little home than in having a title which may be recognized in the old country. In referring to the royal prerogative the other day it seems to me that the Prime Minister was talking a lot of solemn nonsense. As a matter of fact by insisting upon making the exercise of the royal prerogative dependent upon an act of parliament, the Prime Minister is in reality degrading the royal prerogative. I should like to come to its defence. Let me quote from page 409 of the sixth edition of The Law of the Constitution by A. V. Dicey, as follows:

> The survival of the prerogative, conferring as it does wide discretionary authority upon the cabinet, involves a consequence which constantly escapes attention. It immensely increases the authority of the House of Commons, and ultimately of the constituencies by which that house is returned. Ministers must in the exercise of all discretionary powers inevitably obey the predominant authority in the state. When the King was the chief member of the sovereign body, ministers were in fact no less than in name the King's servants. At periods of our history when the peers were the most influential body in the country, the conduct of the ministry represented with more or less fidelity the wishes of the peerage. Now that the House of Commons has become by far the most important part of the sovereign body, the ministry in all matters of discretion carry out, or tend to carry out, the will of the house. When however the cabinet cannot act except by means of legislation, other considerations come into play. A law requires the sanction of the House of Lords. No government can increase its statutory authority without obtaining the sanction of the upper chamber.

If I understand the Prime Minister aright, he seemed to want to make any limitation of the exercise of the royal prerogative in Canada with regard to titles dependent upon the action of parliament, the Commons, the Senate and the Governor General. Let me quote one further paragraph from Dicey, as follows:

> The prerogatives of the crown have become the privileges of the pepole, and anyone who wants to see how widely these privileges may conceivably be stretched as the House of Commons becomes more and more the direct representative of the true sovereign, should weigh well the words in which Bagehot describes the powers which can still legally be exercised by the crown without consulting parliament; and should remember that these powers can now be exercised by a cabinet who are really servants, not of the crown, but of a representative chamber which in turn obeys the behests of the electors.

We had a flaunting of the authority of this house the other day when the Prime Minister went back one hundred years for his authority. In that time the Commons has acquired a new status. I quote Bagehot as follows:

> I said in this book that it would very much surprise people if they were only told how many things the Queen could do without consulting parliament, and it certainly has so proved, for when the Queen abolished purchase in the army by an act of prerogative (after the Lords had rejected the bill for doing so), there was a great and general astonishment.

But this is nothing to what the Queen can by law do without consulting parliament. Not to mention other things, she could disband the army (by law she cannot engage more than a certain number of men, but she is not obliged to engage any men); she could dismiss all the officers, from the general commanding-in-chief downwards; she could dismiss all the sailors too; she could sell off all our ships-of-war and all our naval stores; she could make a peace by the sacrifice of Cornwall, and begin a war for the conquest of Brittany. She could make every citizen in the United Kingdom, male or female, a peer; she could make every parish in the United Kingdom a "university"; she could dismiss most of the civil servants; she could pardon all offenders. In a word, the Queen could by prerogative upset all the action of civil government within the government, could disgrace the nation by a bad war or peace, and could, by disbanding our forces, whether land or sea, leave us defenceless against foreign nations.

The Prime Minister proved altogether too much. Let me quote another paragraph from Dicey, as follows:

If government by parliament is ever transformed into government by the House of Commons, the transformation will, it may be conjectured, be effected by use of the prerogatives of the crown.

The speech refers to certain industries which were flourishing in this country. I think of two, gold and nickel. Roosevelt is to-day taking over all coined gold supply, and I should like to ask this question: Why should Canada continue to pay premiums for gold mined in Canada? It has always been a mystery to me. Further, what is going to be the effect on gold in this country of the decision of the American government to devaluate the dollar? If the gold content of the American dollar is to be altered, who is going to benefit in Canada—the same American corporations which all along have been benefiting? If gold is so essential, why should not gold mining become a public work for the general advantage of Canada? I suggested several years ago that we should establish work camps in the gold mining areas for the unemployed and pay them decent wages, allowing the profits to go to the government and not to American corporations.

Another industry that seems to have been prospering is nickel. Undoubtedly a large proportion of the nickel mined in this country is destined ultimately for the manufacture of war munitions; I do not think anyone can seriously question that. We in Canada very easily protest against the private manufacture of armaments, but in this country we have almost a monopoly of nickel; and nickel it seems, under present processes, is essential to the manufacture of armaments. Well then, if we are really serious in our wish for peace, why should we permit the unregulated export of nickel destined to build up armaments in Europe? I would urge that the government seriously consider taking over control of the export of nickel, or better still, that they make nickel mining a government monopoly. It seems to me that if we have any difficulty at all in tracing the ultimate destination of nickel, we might readily call in the good offices of the League of Nations and at least block this one avenue to the manufacture of armaments.

The speech announces that we are to have public works. I am very glad of that, although I hope it will not be thought ungracious if I say that in my opinion we ought to have had such a program two or three years ago. I would suggest however that when these works are put into operation the workers engaged therein be given decent wages and not merely doles.

I am glad also that a central bank is to be established. We shall have an opportunity to discuss this question at greater length later on. But let me say at the outset that we in this corner will do our utmost to insist that it shall not be a privately-owned or controlled institution. Incidentally, I wonder whether the banking commission, however admirable its report, was absolutely necessary. The Prime Minister recently revealed to the Western Ontario Conservative association that over two years ago he had decided on a central bank. If it had been decided upon before the commission was appointed, possibly we might have saved the expenses of that commission.

There is one rather curious omission from the speech, and that is the usual reference to this season's bountiful harvest. I think perhaps it might have been almost fitting if there had been an expression of gratitude to the drought and grasshoppers that came to the help of the government. I am not among those who say that there should be no control of production; as a believer in planned economy, I think that control of production will have to come. But I think the government is getting at the problem from the wrong end. The Prime Minister suggests that there must be a balance between production and consumption, and that we must therefore limit production. I think we ought to have a try at expanding consumption, because there are undoubtedly large numbers of consumers the world over who cannot obtain access to the supplies of wheat which they might readily use, and if there is to be an international policy to reduce production, surely it should be possible to have some sort of international policy to increase consumption. If we are to have a reduction in production it will prove disastrous unless accompanied by other measures; I think we shall have to have other measures as well.

The Prime Minister the other day spoke of being guided by business interests. I am not at all sure that the business men are convinced that this reduction in production is a very good thing. On October 12, addressing a public gathering at Saskatoon, the Prime Minister said: "Would you not rather have one bushel of wheat you can sell for a dollar than two bushels you cannot sell for fifty cents?" Everyone will agree to that proposition. But there is no guarantee in the agreement either that the farmers will be able to sell or that they will be able to get a price. An editorial in Canadian Business, published by the Canadian Chambers of Commerce, and appearing in October, put the matter thus:

> The government has guaranteed to limit exports to 200 million bushels, but in return has not received any guarantee for the sale of that or even a lesser quantity. It is also claimed that with the quantities of wheat available there is little likelihood of prices reaching, in the near future, at any rate, a figure necessitating a fulfilment of the tariff revision obligations of the importing countries.

I was very much interested in the comment of the Free Press, which is not exactly favourable to reduction. The Free Press of January 20, 1934, admits that:

> —the Alberta farmers have an air-tight case. . . . If the Canadian government proposes to make itself responsible for the quantity of wheat grown and sold in the dominion, it must guarantee an income to the farmers, whose right to compete freely as producer and seller it abridges.

These, I think, are some of the other measures that will have to be enacted supplementary to the control of production.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Is the hon. gentleman overlooking the fact that provision is made in the agreement for also increasing consumption in the consuming countries?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not sure how far that goes. I know that some of the consuming countries were present, but I have not seen any indication that there will be any increase in consumption from Europe.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is in the agreement.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is a reference to it. The speech announces another loan. That is a still heavier mortgage on Canada. The public debt of Canada, including federal, provincial, municipal debts and those of public corporations, amounts now to $8,652,727,000. These figures are taken from the report of the Royal Commission on Banking. Our population is a little over ten millions, and this means $800 per head. At 5 per cent it would represent $40 a year interest per head of population. If we take the average family of five, that would mean $200 a year that we have to pay in interest charges on the public debt. This is an appalling amount and I should like to suggest that whether the present government or the official opposition is in power, to say nothing of our group ever being in power, that money will not ultimately be paid; it cannot be paid. On New Year's Day I remember on the front page of one of our city papers there appeared a photograph of twin babies born on that day. I would like to have a cartoon made and to hang around the neck of each of those two babies a little tag bearing the words "Eight hundred dollars mortgage." Those two children started out in life on New Year's Day, each mortgaged with $800 of public debt, to say nothing of the over-capitalized industrial debt which bears so heavily on each one of us in this country.

Mr. MORAUD: They might have the $800 coming to them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: They might have. There is that much in resources, but it is not available.

I am glad to say that one of the new members recognizes the problem; the new member for Mackenzie (Mr. MacMillan) according to a dispatch by Mr. Hart to the Winnipeg Free Press of October 13 last, said:

> Conscription of wealth to wipe out Canada's burden of debt was advocated by J. A. MacMillan, Liberal Candidate in Mackenzie riding, while speaking at a public meeting held here Thursday night.

He gave figures with regard to this heavy debt and then went on to say:

> I am not an extremist, but I believe that the same authority that came into our homes during the war and took our sons from the knees of their mothers, because there was a national emergency, should not be afraid to take similar steps to bring to the aid of the nation all surplus wealth. We conscripted men, why not money? There is now another national emergency that will have to be faced resolutely and squarely, if the country is to weather the storm. One of the ways out of the difficulty would be to get rid of the terrible burden of interest by paying off a substantial portion of the national debt, and this can only be done by conscription of wealth.

I welcome that statement from the new member for Mackenzie, but I should like to ask: Does the leader of the opposition (Mr.

Mackenzie King) agree? The Liberal party rather puzzles me. Only a few months ago the Hon. Vincent Massey, president of the National Liberal Federation, speaking at Lake Couchiching conference on The New Economic Nationalism, said:

> It's a difficult world to live in; we are witnessing the very transition between old laissez-faire improvising ways of doing things, and a tightly planned modern state system. We have to plan our own recovery in this easy-going country of ours, our own reconstruction, our own relationship to this new world.

And again:

> The primary conflict is not therefore isolation versus internationalism but planning versus improvisation, and in this trouble planning will, I believe, be victorious.

Once again:

> It must suffice for me to say that national planning will have to be the foundation of Canada's international relations. Old conceptions of government must give place to new.

Needless to say, I heartily agree, but I ask: Does the leader of the opposition agree? That is the question?

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the forty minute rule which applies to the ordinary member deprives me of the pleasure of following the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) over the ground which he has covered, as I had already prepared some notes on which I desire to speak referring to the portion of the country which I represent. Opportunity, however, may be given us later on in the session to refer to some of the points raised by the hon. member who lately has laid before the country a new policy which has startled many parts of it and has not been accepted as thoroughly, freely or quickly as probably he had expected.

The old custom that was in existence when I first came into the house, I see, still prevails, of congratulating the mover and the seconder of the address. A couple of days ago the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) came over to my desk to remind me that he and I had had the honour of sitting in parliament for thirty-eight sessions. This is our thirty-eighth session. We are the sole survivors of the parliament of 1900, and looking over the Parliamentary Companion some time ago I was amazed to note that 1,080 members have gone through parliament since the Minister of Justice and I had the honour of being elected for the first time, he for South Wellington and I for Bonaventure. He moved the address and I had the honour of seconding his motion. I am glad Providence has been kind to us that we have both been able to pass through all this turmoil and stress through which Canada has passed during the last thirty-four years we have been here and in which period thirty-eight sessions have been held. I congratulate the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) who, as an active young man, came into parliament last election, and the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) on the way in which they accomplished the difficult task which they had to perform. Moving and seconding the address is not always as pleasant a duty as it might be, but in their case they acquitted themselves well in what was a hard task to perform.

Reading over the speech from the throne and looking back to the program of the present government and its actions since it came into power in 1930, I recalled the first election in which I took part officially. The famous election of 1878 which terminated on September 17, and by which honest Alexander Mackenzie was beaten at the polls on the so-called national policy. I had the honour on that day of being returning officer and representative to a certain extent of Hon. Mr. Mercier who ran in the county of St. Hyacinthe and was defeated by the present Judge Tellier, now dean of the Quebec bench, a retired judge, on the great question of the national policy when Canada went back on the tariff for revenue and took up Sir John A. Macdonald and his colleagues after their escapade of the Canadian Pacific railway scandal, entrusting them again with the government of this country under the old banner of protection and high tariff. I have no time to go back to what protection did or to what was called then an infant industry. When Sir John A. Macdonald delivered his speech in the house he started to qualify this protection as being intended for the infant industry. Canada was then a different country from what it is to-day. A long time has elapsed since then. Our population has increased; our revenue has increased; our standing in the eyes of the world is vastly different, but our liabilities, responsibilities and the burdens which we have to carry have also greatly increased.

When Sir John A. Macdonald, great statesman that he was, appealed to the Canadian nation for support on his policy, he appealed to them naturally with what at the time was the most pressing appeal that could be made.

There was unemployment in the country. He promised to give the people employment, to open factories, to give Canadians the control of the Canadian market, he promised to bring back prosperity to Canada. Alexander Mackenzie had refused to raise the low tariff we had then for revenue purposes, because he thought the manufacturers of Canada were well enough protected at that time and that it was not fair to bleed the consumer for the benefit of the manufacturer, so rather than go into this new adventure of protection and higher tariffs that Sir John took up Mackenzie was beaten at the polls. Sir John took up protection, and we had protection with a vengeance, although nothing compared with that of 1930. It was a boon for the infant industries, they grew, and the Liberal party complained year after year that this protection, instead of being reduced as the infant industries grew, continued to increase. Then in 1896 the blast came. Canada was on the rocks. Protection in Canada was as dead as a doornail. The Canadian west was almost given up, the Canadian Pacific was running its trains with no revenue, Canada in fact was in a retrograde position. That was the effect of protection after its trial from 1878 to 1896.

Then we had the Liberal boom. Why had we that Liberal boom? Because Laurier opened the doors to our trade; Laurier, with Fielding, brought about the British preference, and Canada boomed. In 1911 I had the honour of occupying your chair, Mr. Speaker, and I remember as well as though it were yesterday, when Fielding and Paterson offered the Reciprocity treaty to this house. The only thing that could be said against it was that it was a dangerous thing to deal with Americans, and that Canada was doing well enough alone, and matters should be left as they were.

In 1911 the Reciprocity treaty was turned down. But there is no man in Canada to-day who knows conditions and is willing to be frank but will admit that Canada committed a grievous mistake at that time. When the right hon. Prime Minister, whose talents no one would deny, whose devotion to his party, and I hope to his country, is unquestioned, took up the leadership of the Conservative party I looked back to the days of Sir John A. Macdonald to see how the programs compared. I realized that he was making the same appeal that Sir John had made in 1878: "I will give you the Canadian market, I will make Canadians masters of their own market"! He did that, but since Canadians have been masters of their own market Canadians have no money to buy the products produced in Canada. The present Prime Minister repeated Sir John A. Macdonald's program, took up the same cry, and with the same result; he secured office. The people trusted to what he said, every man is anxious to get a job when he is out of work, every manufacturer desires to get a market if the market he has is not satisfactory. But the failure that came to Sir John's policy has come much more quickly to the policy of the present Prime Minister, because conditions have changed from what they were in 1878. Communications to-day are different, countries are linked together by rail, water and air, the telegraph and the radio. Such was not the case in 1878. When I heard the Prime Minister in 1930 move these high tariffs, my mind wandered back to the days when Wilfrid Laurier and Alexander Mackenzie and Richard Cartwright and Mills and Davis and Fielding and Blair and all those stalwarts of the Liberal party fought day and night against such policies as being suicidal to Canada. High tariffs will never suit Canada, with its immense resources, its enormous territory and its great future. The mistake the Prime Minister made in bringing about this new policy of his had been committed in the United States by the Republican party. The Republican party had closed the doors and raised the walls against other countries, and wanted to subsist to themselves. What was the result? When Hoover appealed to the people last March he faced an army of 14,000,000 unemployed out of a population of 120,000,000. When the Prime Minister went to the country he knew there were 100,000 unemployed in Canada. How many are there to-day? How many were there last year? I am willing to admit that if the Liberal party had been in office during the last three years with the same policy that our friends now have in force we would have had the same results. But if the Liberal party had been in power we would not have had that policy. We would not have closed the doors, we would have continued to do business as we had in the past. The leader of the opposition gave figures; I have no time to refer to figures, but our trade has dropped $2,000,000 a day since the present administration has been in office. Is it any wonder there is hardship in this country.

I represent one of the oldest parts of Canada. It was on the point of Gaspé, four hundred years ago next July, that Jacques Cartier landed in North America and took possession of this northern part of it in the name of the king of France, and erected thereon the cross of civilization. That was the discovery of Canada, and I hope the present government will see to it that the four hundredth anniversary of this great event in the history of this country is properly commemorated. I know representations have already been made to the government. Dates such as this should not be forgotten and should not be allowed to pass unnoticed.

I have had the honour of representing the county of Gaspé for thirty-four years out of the forty-two years it has given its allegiance to the Liberal party. I declare that never have I known conditions to exist in the Gaspé peninsula such as have existed during the last two or three years. When I went down there last year we had been talking about controlling the production of wheat in western Canada, but there were families of poor fishermen on the Gaspé coast who had no bread to eat. Some have no bread this winter, they are subsisting on fish and potatoes—when they can get them. They have no work; our lumber industry is dead, our shanties closed, our mills idle, our fish selling at one or two cents a pound. We have no markets of any kind. We talk about central banks, talk about the control of currency, talk about the amalgamation of railways, talk about all these hundred questions that come before us, but what is the cause of all our trouble? The cause is that we have no markets for what we produce and the policy of this government has made us lose what markets we had. That is the cause of the whole trouble. Find a market for what the farmer produces, for what the fisherman produces, for the product of the miner and the lumberman, and your troubles are solved.

When the Prime Minister came into this house in 1911 I had been here eleven years before that time. He came with wild denunciations of reciprocity with the United States. Is there anything more foolish than to condemn such a policy? Are we not destined forever to have dealings with our great neighbour? The great natural market of this country is the United States. As the United States prospers so will Canada prosper, and as long as the United States does not prosper no prosperity is possible to this country. I am a British subject, I was born a British subject, and in the words of one of my great countrymen, I shall die a British subject. But never forget, Mr. Speaker, that in matters of trade we are talking business and not of political allegiance. Whatever our business may be with the British Empire and the sister dominions it will be always infinitesimal compared to what it should be, what it might be and what it ought to be with the United States of America. Give us the American market to-day; give us the market Laurier, Fielding and Paterson obtained, and immediately you annex 120,000,000 people to this country. My hon. friend from Manitoba who has sat here with me for many years is interested in live stock. Give him the American market and see what will become of the live stock business.

Mr. MULLINS: Hogs?

Mr. MARCIL: Yes, anything; give us the American market and you will see that Canada will change overnight.

Mr. MULLINS: You lost it, not we.

Mr. MARCIL: Sir Wilfrid Laurier went down in 1911, but thank God he went down fighting for a good cause. He fell fighting for the noblest cause ever advanced in this country. Even now, Mr. Speaker, to his eternal memory let it be said that his name is never mentioned in this house except by way of eulogy and in defence of the great principles which he initiated and brought before the Canadian people.

The cause for which Sir Wilfrid Laurier fell is just as important to-day as it was then. How can Canada prosper if the United States does not prosper? How can Canada hope to get along without the United States? Down in my constituency we have no markets for our fish, our lumber or our agricultural products. Thousands of our men are unemployed; they write to me every day and say, "Marcil, you are an old member of parliament. Is there no means by which you can bring about an appeal to the people so that we can have an election and change the political system of Canada? The present system is ruining us. We cannot stand it any longer. We have no work and nothing to eat." When I went to my constituency last summer the first man I met said, "Can't you give me a chance to earn a dollar? I have not seen a dollar for a year." What I say is absolutely true; if the government doubt it let them bring on a by-election in Bonaventure county or in any part of Canada and they will find out that I am correct.

I should like to correct a mistake which the Prime Minister inadvertently made the other day. The constituency of Restigouche-Madawaska adjoins my constituency; we are only separated by the Restigouche river. The right hon. gentleman said that Restigouche-Madawaska had not elected a Conservative since 1896, but that was a slip. In 1925 Mr. Culligan defeated Mr. Michaud in that constituency, and in 1930 Mr. Cormier was elected, so that from 1896 until 1930, in five elections there were three Liberals and two Conservatives returned. Apparently that is good fighting ground. But here is a remarkable fact. This county, which in 1930 elected a Conservative by a majority of five hundred, turned around and defeated the candidate of the same party by a majority of six thousand, and the Conservative candidate lost his deposit. The candidate of the party led by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) was defeated just as badly. The Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) came into my county last summer and warned the people against the coalition that was being formed between the C.C.F. and the Liberals. I am sorry the Solicitor General is not here; of course he was not sincere in what he said, but he warned the good people of Bonaventure not to vote Liberal because the Liberal party were working hand in hand with the C.C.F. The result was quite unexpected, of course.

There are other matters to which I should like to refer, Mr. Speaker, with regard to my constituency. No doubt in the last few days the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) has noticed that the eastern part of Canada has suffered from the most severe snowstorms in its history. They say that such a condition has not prevailed in the eastern part of Quebec and the maritime provinces for twenty-five years. No less than four of the crack trains of the Canadian National railways were tied up at one time by snow in the Matapedia valley, a large part of which is in my constituency. Of course I am not blaming the government for this.

Mr. MANION: It is the only thing we have not been blamed for.

Mr. MARCIL: Snow is the only thing we have in abundance down there, and that abundance comes from providence. There is something that could be done by the Department of Railways, however. The minister is always very pleasant and agreeable, and judging from the number of speeches which he has to deliver all over the country—and his speeches are always interesting and entertaining—he is one of the most popular members of the administration. During the recess I followed his advice and arranged a meeting with Mr. Appleton, the manager of the eastern lines of the Canadian National railways, at Matapedia.

Here are the circumstances, Mr. Speaker. When we took over the Gaspe railway the people of the province of Quebec, who had built this railway as a provincial line, expected that it would remain part and parcel of the Quebec system of railways. We had the terminal at Matapedia, which was the connecting point between the Gaspe railway and the Canadian National railways. When this railway was taken over the late Sir Henry Thornton promised us that he would give it a fair trial, and he left the terminal at Matapedia. Shortly after his sad departure, however, the terminal was changed overnight to Campbellton. So we have a train that runs two hundred miles through the Gaspe basin to Matapedia; then it goes back thirteen miles to Campbellton, over the ground that it covered an hour before, to hand over the mail and deliver passengers. The only alternative is to leave the other passengers stranded on the platform at Matapedia until the train comes back again.

All the chambers of commerce in the province of Quebec, the commercial travellers' association, the Solicitor General and God knows who else have protested. There has been a war on for a year past between the Post Office Department and the railway administration with regard to the cost of carrying these mails from Matapedia to Campbellton and back again. I am told that it cost the Post Office Department $2,000 extra last year to carry these mails down and back. The Postmaster General has been appealed to, as have the Solicitor General and the Minister of Marine, who represent the province of Quebec. Now I want to lay my case before the Minister of Railways. No doubt he will tell me that he has nothing to do with the matter, but that will not work with the people. I know the minister is a friend of the railwaymen; his candidate in Restigouche-Madawaska was a railway man, but now the people of Matapedia want this question settled.

We all know that Mr. Hungerford, who is an experienced railway man of high standing, has been promoted—and fairly, I think—to the position of president of the Canadian National railways. He should view this question as it ought to be viewed. Here is the oldest province in the Dominion of Canada, a province which, with Ontario, carries about three-quarters of the burden of this country. We built this railway; we were given poor service for many years. Now we have an improved service, and we want to keep what properly belongs to us. Why should the terminal be moved from Matapedia to Campbellton, thirteen miles out of the way in New Brunswick? They say it was done because of economy. When Mr. Appleton attended a public meeting in Matapedia he wanted us to appeal to the Board of Railway Commissioners, but how can you expect a lot of poor people in a village down in Bonaventure to undertake to fight the Canadian National railways and prove that it is cheaper to run trains to Matapedia than to Campbellton? We asked the railway commission if they would not inquire into the matter, and they said: No, we cannot unless we get an appeal to us. The people of the district would not appeal because they say that once a decision is rendered it will never be reversed. I ask the Minister of Railways to take that matter up and do justice to the people of that district. Here are people who have had a terminus in their village for the last forty years. It is taken away without any cause or reason, without any benefit or advantage, and at great trouble and greater cost. Why should that condition of affairs continue to prevail? I hope the Minister of Railways will change it.

They talk of economy on the railways, Mr. Speaker. Last December there was an unfortunate accident in my county on the Canadian National railway. An engine driver, John Allard, who had been in the service of the road for forty years, was taking his train through a snow storm, his engine being coupled to the snowplough in front of it. His engine was hauling a long train, and when the snowplough came to the trestle at St. Charles de Caplan the snowplough toppled over and fell into the Baie des Chaleurs, bringing the locomotive and tender down with it. Poor John Allard lost his life. Fortunately the link between the tender and the passenger cars broke and the train remained on the track; but if that had not happened, instead of one life being lost, one hundred lives might have been lost. I am told that this was contrary to railway practice. Is it customary to couple these snowploughs to passenger trains? Is it not rather the practice to send out the snowplough followed by a caboose to clear the track? If the practice that resulted in the loss of this man's life is allowed to prevail on the Gaspe railway, where bridges have to be crossed over the river almost every ten miles, and bridges with difficult approaches, sharp curves and so on, such an accident is likely to happen again. If these snowploughs have to be sent forward before the passenger train comes along, let them be sent with a caboose, and not placed ahead of the passenger train.

Mr. MANION: May I say to my hon. friend that to-morrow I shall very gladly send a copy of his speech to Mr. Justice Fullerton, the chairman of the board of trustees, and ask him to give the matter every consideration. Of course, my hon. friend knows that I have no control whatsoever in either of these matters that he has brought up.

Mr. MARCIL: I agree, but the position I take is this: When parliament speaks it speaks for all, and when I first came to this house, a member of parliament was somebody and a minister was somebody. When I saw Laurier or Blair or some other minister, what I said for my county was the law, and I was held responsible by the minister for what was done in my constituency, and the trust was well reposed, I think, because the people have held me there for thirty-four years. But now they say: Marcil, you are an older man; you are not as smart as you used to be. I tell them that conditions have changed.

Talk about Mr. Justice Fullerton—there is just one instance of the change that has taken place. Parliament has abdicated its functions in respect of the railways into the hands of Judge Fullerton. His salary has not been cut. I must congratulate him upon that. His salary was raised—

Mr. MANION: His personal salary was not cut, but the salary, and allowances, of Sir Henry Thornton was higher than his by $125,000.

Mr. MARCIL: Sir Henry Thornton is dead and the other man is alive. There is another instance, Mr. Speaker, of what parliament has been doing. When you talk to the common people of railway commissions, board of railway commissioners, tariff commissions, soldiers' commissions, land commissions, and so on, they say: What is the use of your going to Ottawa? My reply is, Well, I am going there merely to vote the money that is necessary to carry on these commissions. As a matter of fact, we have abdicated all of our powers. We have no power at all. Parliament to-day is administered by order in council. There is a notice on the order paper to-day by the Prime Minister, who is going to have an inquiry into the spread between producer and consumer. The hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil), who moved the address in reply, talked about New Zealand butter. He was elected on New Zealand butter. Canadian butter at the time of his election was selling at thirty cents, but last year in my constituency the farmers got nine cents for their butter, and they are dying now for an opportunity to vote the other way. The quality of that butter selling at nine cents a pound is first-class because I may say that the butter of the parish of Bonaventure took first prize for the province of Quebec.

Mr. GOBEIL: May I ask the hon. gentleman if he knows what was the average price of butter for 1933?

Mr. MARCIL: On the market it is selling at from twenty to twenty-two cents. That is what we pay for it here.

Mr. GOBEIL: That is not an answer to my question. I asked if the hon. member knew the average price for butter in 1933?

Mr. MARCIL: I am telling you what my farmers get for their butter in Bonaventure, and it is about nine cents a pound, and if the hon. gentleman wants to know their feeling in the matter he might go down there and consult them and see what they think about it.

In the time left at my disposal I am unable to refer to the speech from the throne at any great length, except to say this: My conception of the duty of the government is to try to undo what was done in 1930. In 1930, in order to carry out the promises which they had made in the election campaign, something had to be done, and the government said: We will raise the tariff. They tried to make the people believe that Canadian trade would expand under their policy and that the number of the unemployed would be decreased. That policy has been a dead failure, Mr. Speaker.

As I said a moment ago, the first election I took part in was on September 17, 1878. I have been in public life for over fifty years, and I may say that in the thirty-four years I have been in this parliament, never has a Canadian government made such a terrible fiasco as the present government. It is not because of want of clever men, because there are many clever men in the cabinet. Right opposite me, for instance, sits the former premier of Nova Scotia, and I see also my old friend the Minister of Justice, as well as many other clever men. The fiasco is due to a wrong policy—this wrong policy of hemming Canada in with high tariff walls. We are spending $250,000 on the League of Nations every year, and what has the league been telling us all the time? They have said that these high tariffs, these trade barriers, promote economic war, and that economic war leads to military war. Why are we squandering money in sending representatives to the League of Nations and then going contrary to its recommendations?

I want to congratulate the leader of the opposition on the speech he made on the League of Nations and on his magnificent speech in this house the other day which it took four hours on the part of the Prime Minister to try to demolish. I say, Mr. Speaker, that this tariff policy of Canada must be changed. We must lower our tariffs and open our gates to the outside world as a whole. We must have relations not only with the British Empire but with the whole world. We must have relations with the United States of America, which is our greatest neighbour.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) tells us that each of us carries a mortgage of $800 around his neck. This government does not want to deal with the Americans, but it is ready enough to enter into a treaty with them to give over our greatest heritage, the greatest asset that Canada possesses, that system of waterways in the St. Lawrence and the great lakes. This government wants to go into partnership with the Americans to bring about the development of waterpower and navigation. There is no sane man in this country who ever navigated salt water—I am sorry the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) is not present at the moment—who will tell you that any ocean-going steamer will ever go up beyond Montreal. It is true that small steamers may go as far as Duluth. When Jacques Cartier and Maisonneuve selected Montreal as the head of navigation, they were wise in their day. Beyond that point you can have lake and river navigation, but the large ocean-going steamers will stop at Montreal. Nothing goes beyond Montreal. The tendency is towards the building of larger ships and at the present time many ships cannot go beyond Quebec. Why should we enter into a treaty of this kind at a time when we have no money to meet our engagements and when not only the dominion but the provinces are weighed down with burdens. I heard the Prime Minister state the other day that we had spent $141,000,000 in helping the provinces give relief to the unemployed. I can remember the days when this country had a budget not as large as that. The city of Ottawa has 6,000 families on relief. Practically under the Peace Tower which honours this building we have a refuge which has been running day and night for the last three years. Hundreds of thousands of people out of work have been fed here and the same thing applies all over the dominion. Is that not enough to open the eyes of any man who has a desire to see what is going on?

We must reverse our policy and the sooner we do it the better. If the Prime Minister wants to know what is the feeling of the country, let him go before the people. In all the years I have sat in this chamber it has always been customary for a government to go to the people at the end of four years, but the Prime Minister has had five sessions. There was only one other government that committed the mistake of not going to the people at the end of four years. That was the Tupper government of 1896. They had six sessions and hon. members know what happened to them—they were put out of office. We must reverse our policy as soon as possible. We should have a tariff for revenue purposes only. We should carry on the policies that Laurier and Fielding delegated to us when they left public life.

Hon. members should remember the position which Canada occupied in 1911 and compare it with our present position. In those days the St. Lawrence had been transformed into one of the great waterways of the world. Hon. members will remember the map of the British Empire which was printed in red upon the stamp which that grand old man of Ontario, Sir William Mulock, had accepted by this house. I cannot mention that name without recalling that out of that first government which I had the honour of supporting there are to-day but two survivors, Sir William Mulock and Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, the former Lieutenant Governor of Quebec. These men did something for Canada. They placed Canada on the map. They had a policy which was acceptable to other nations. When Laurier shared with Queen Victoria the honours of the Jubilee in London and when she pressed upon him the acceptance of the title which had been conferred, Canada had entered upon the great golden era which extended from 1896 to 1911. We had free markets and free intercourse with other nations except for purposes of revenue.

We cannot impose high tariffs without their being beneficial to someone. If they are beneficial to the government, they are not beneficial to the consumer. If they are not beneficial to the government, they are not beneficial to anyone. A tariff is nothing but a tax. If revenues are falling, as they are to-day, what is the reason? It is because the tariff is too high and therefore there are no importations. When there are no importations, there is no revenue, and when there is no revenue, then we must borrow and keep on borrowing. We go to London and float a loan for $75,000,000. Is there any country in the world that would refuse to lend money to Canada? Canada is one of the most promising countries in the world. We occupy the best part of the North American continent and we can pay all that we borrow.

The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson) mentioned immigration. I remember when his predecessors John Haggart, Sir John A. Macdonald and others contended that the future of this country rested upon the immigration policy of the Conservative party. They endeavoured to bring immigrants to this country but they had not the Canada which Laurier made. They had not a cheap country in which to live. When Laurier went out of office he had succeeded in creating two new provinces in the west, Alberta and Saskatchewan. As Deputy Speaker of this house I had the honour of signing the bills creating those new provinces. Laurier put over a million new people into the west. These were consumers and they are the mainstay of the west to-day. Our right hon. friend represents Calgary, but what was Calgary in those days? What were Edmonton and Winnipeg? The west was a wilderness except for the narrow strip of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Laurier developed the west along with Sifton who was in charge of the immigration policy. They brought a million strangers into the west and those people are represented to-day in this house. The fathers of some of our present members were numbered among the newcomers of those days. Is there anyone who will say that we have not room for 25,000,000 or 50,000,000 people? If the country on the other side of the line can harbour 120,000,000 with practically the same territory, why should we be content with only 10,000,000? But we have reached this point: instead of expanding and developing, instead of going towards the future with buoyant revenues and buoyant trade and a cheerful population, we are oppressed and weighed down. Our people are dissatisfied and discontented. Policies are being carried out which were never heard of in the days of Macdonald or Laurier. Canada has been changed because of a false fiscal policy.

I believe in the sincerity and optimism of my fellow members on the other side but I reiterate what I have always said, their present policy is a false policy. That fact was decided by Sir John A. Macdonald, the greatest Roman of them all, and when his great successor, Sir Charles Tupper, came into office in 1896, the national policy of those days was as dead as a doornail. That was replaced with the policy of Fielding and Laurier, a policy of reciprocity with the British Empire and with the United States and—

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member but he has exceeded his forty-minutes.

Mr. W. H. GOLDING (South Huron): Mr. Speaker, in rising to continue the debate on the address let me at the outset extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Gobeil) and the seconder (Mr. Barber) of the address. I think we all appreciate the fact that the task assigned to these two hon. members was not an easy one. I think we all agree that they endeavoured to present the views of the government in a clear, moderate and forceful manner and are deserving of congratulation. While we appreciate the splendid efforts put forth by these hon. members, we feel that we cannot agree with their views with regard to the many debatable points which they have brought to the attention of the house.

It is now nearly four years since this government took office in 1930; this is the fifth session and we have had a fifth speech from the throne. Personally I have been keenly interested in reading the speeches delivered year after year by His Excellency since this government took office. I have noticed particularly that upon each occasion great care is taken to emphasize the efforts being made by the government to restore confidence and promote prosperity in our country. I do not think that I am in any way exaggerating when I say that great things were and still are expected from this government, and for that reason the eyes of the Canadian people, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, have been turned with expectancy and hope from year to year to the contents of the speech from the throne. That is particularly true this year, because, after all, hope deferred maketh the heart sick; and as far as the hopes that have been raised by previous speeches from the throne are concerned, I think the Canadian people, and indeed the members of the government itself, must admit that they are far from having been realized.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has accused the Liberal party of trying to capitalize the present unrest and depression. I think it was unfortunate that he should be the one to make this charge, because I have a very distinct recollection of the right hon. gentleman himself, in 1930, going through the country from one end to the other making various speeches, and if ever anyone endeavoured to capitalize unrest it was the Prime Minister himself. It did seem to be the policy, the planned policy I should say, of the Conservative party during the 1930 federal election to endeavour to saddle upon the shoulders of the Liberal government all the responsibility for the conditions that existed at that time. It seemed to me that every Conservative speaker and every Conservative candidate had been schooled to the fact that their duty was to attribute all our woes and ills and grievances to the government of that day. The depression that existed at that time was, in the expressed opinion of our hon. friends opposite, attributable to one source and one source only, and that was, as the Prime Minister himself described it, that band of mercenaries who had betrayed Canada for their own personal gain. We all remember that famous statement, "Nine years before the great betrayal; it did not take Judas that long." That was the language used towards those who then occupied the treasury benches; that was the chivalry shown towards those who were bearing the responsibility of government at that time.

Now, the only comment I wish to make on that is this, that I sincerely hope the time will never come when I shall have to use language such as that with respect to our hon. friends opposite or anyone else. I think we ought to try to give those who do not agree with us with regard to our economic situation credit at any rate for honesty of purpose. We were all anxious, I am sure, to hear the speech from the throne this year to find out what new promises or what new hopes would be contained therein. Before going to previous speeches from the throne, I may say that during the 1930 campaign, while our hon. friends did endeavour to belittle and ridicule the government at that time, they also set themselves up as the ones who were able to lead Canada and the Canadians out of all their economic difficulties, and in order to convince the people that they were capable of doing so, many promises were made which have never been fulfilled but which I think have created such a burden for the government that it now totters beneath its self-imposed load.

It is a well known fact that this government took office with a tremendous burden of responsibility resting upon it. A large part of that burden, perhaps, was not of their own making, but I do think that the greater part of the burden was of their own making, owing to the many extravagant promises made; and while we know that these promises were almost, in fact quite, impossible of being carried out, nevertheless the government secured thousands upon thousands of votes by making them. I quite realize that the picture that was presented to the electorate during the 1930 campaign in regard to the situation which existed then, and which I think to a large extent no party was responsible for, was that the Liberal party was to blame for all these conditions. It is certainly interesting to review the statements made by the government in their previous speeches from the throne. If we go back to the first session held under this administration, which opened in September 1930, we find in the speech from the throne the following words:

> The necessity for dealing with exceptional economic conditions, with the resultant unemployment, has induced me to summon you at an earlier date than would otherwise be necessary. Measures will be submitted for your consideration, including amendments to the Customs Act and the Customs Tariff, which it is anticipated will do much to meet the unusual conditions which now prevail.

You will notice there that they refer to the Customs Act and the Customs Tariff, and at that session the government did introduce legislation which they believed would restore prosperity to the country. Indeed, they were simply carrying out their pre-election pledge to raise tariffs against all countries including Great Britain itself, and that of course they certainly did. Another important thing that was done then was the voting of some $20,000,000 for unemployment relief. In all fairness to the government, I am perfectly satisfied that they did believe that by putting into effect this high tariff policy, and by the action taken at that time, they would restore prosperity to our country—by using this $20,000,000 for the relief of the unemployed and by increasing employment through their tariff legislation, as well as by an effort to raise the prices of natural products. Indeed, I think they believed that by putting into effect their high tariff policy they were going to usher in for Canada a new and better day. After the close of that session, and with these new policies in effect, the people began to look with expectancy for the dawn of that better day, but to say that they were disappointed would be putting the situation very mildly. In a few months another session rolled around, and on March 12, 1931, there appeared these words in the speech from the throne:

> It will be your privilege to consider certain measures designed by my ministers to ameliorate existing conditions, to provide further means by which our people may go forward to achieve a prosperity heretofore unattained and to furnish them with all possible safeguards against a recurrence of the present subordination to world forces.

It goes on to say:

> My government has explored the origins of our difficulties and is firmly of the belief that many of our problems do not arise out of world wide depression, but are antecedent to it; and that domestic factors have also largely determined the degree of economic distress from which this country is suffering.

If that statement was true then it is equally true now, and we on this side have endeavoured repeatedly to point out that domestic factors have largely determined the degree of economic distress from which this country has suffered during the past two or three years.

The statement was made prior to the election of 1930; it was made during the campaign and it has been made since, that the Liberal government in 1930 were not making any effort to meet the change in conditions which was taking place at that time. In direct contradiction to that I say that the then government fully recognized the fact that changing conditions abroad and existing conditions at home were affecting business in Canada, and to meet this situation they endeavoured to formulate a policy, one vastly different in spirit and details from that which was adopted by our hon. friends opposite at the short session of that same year. The Dunning budget was designed to cope with existing conditions and had certain definite objects in view which were made clear to the people by the members of the government at that time. By this an effort was made to divert trade, an action which was really forced upon the then government. An effort was also made to lower the cost to the consumer, to lessen the cost of the implements of production to the basic producer and to lower the cost of raw materials to the manufacturer for export in order that he might be better able to compete in the markets of the world. Another vital point which had to be considered was the formulating of a policy which would at the same time assist in raising revenue. All these points were seriously considered by the then government, and notwithstanding all that has been said to the contrary, in my opinon the Liberal government did endeavour to formulate a policy which would cope with existing conditions at home and abroad. We all know that policy was never put into effect, and we on this side of the house and many people throughout the country feel that Canada was the loser by the change which took place.

It will be noticed that in the 1931 speech from the throne very little was said about world conditions; in fact our hon. friends opposite were at that time not talking about world conditions; it was the Liberal party that was responsible for everything. The speech of that year, after pointing out that the government had explored the origins of our difficulties and were convinced that many of our problems did not arise from world conditions, went on to say:

It was this belief which impelled my ministers at the emergency session of parliament held in September last to remove one of the root weaknesses in our industrial system by effecting such then possible changes in the tariff as would, in their opinion, provide substantial security against harmful world competition. Although in the interval world conditions have changed but little for the better, this tariff legislation has resulted in a marked improvement in the domestic situation.

That was part of the contents of the speech from the throne in 1931. In the third session which opened on February 4, 1932, we find the tone of the speech from the throne somewhat changed. It goes on to say:

World conditions are beyond the control of the Canadian people. But I rejoice that their resolute adherence to policies designed for the welfare of the nation has minimized the adverse influence of external economic forces. This period of trial has shown the Canadian situation to be fundamentally sound. . . . The provisions made at the last session of parliament for unemployment and farm relief are proving effective.

You are successfully meeting difficult domestic problems. Conditions are gradually improving.

In making his address a few days ago, the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) stated that during the last few years about the best that could be said was to express a pious hope that conditions would improve. This is not an expression of any pious hope; It is a positive statement made in 1932 that conditions are gradually improving. Anyone who wants to be at all fair must admit that those words were not in keeping with the situation existing at that time. When we compare the prices which prevailed in 1930 with those which prevailed in 1932 and the number of unemployed as reported in 1930 with the number reported in 1932, we cannot help wondering how anyone could say that conditions were improving. There were only two reasons for making such a statement. The first, of course, was to try to raise the hopes of the people, and the second, and I think the principal reason, was to maintain confidence in the present government.

I quite agree that it really is important that every effort should be made to keep up the spirit and morale of a nation which has had to pass through such a period of depression as Canada has faced. I presume the government will expect us to excuse them on that ground for any unwarranted note of optimism that may have been expressed in their messages to the people given from time to time through the speech from the throne. I am not going to spend much time in adversely criticizing the speech from the throne for whatever note of optimism may be found therein. But I do think the members of this house—indeed, the Canadian people—are keenly disappointed that the government has not offered any concrete suggestion of a policy which would have at least some effect in dispelling the gloom that has prevailed in this country for some time. The government has had splendid opportunities to do effective work; as a matter of fact it has had opportunities in a national and international way that perhaps few governments ever had. There have been conferences; there were two imperial economic conferences, a world economic conference, a conference with the president of the United States; there have been federal-provincial conferences. As a matter of fact this government has probably taken part in more conferences than any other Canadian government in a like period of time. Our Canadian people did expect some beneficial results from these conferences, which certainly provided a splendid opportunity to get this much-advertised blasting policy into operation. But it is quite evident that the blasting machine was not functioning; so we have had large expenditures of money with very little result.

Mr. POULIOT: The result was nil.

Mr. GOLDING: As we all know, the first imperial economic conference was a failure. The second imperial economic conference, which was held in this city, afforded an opportunity for Canada and the other parts of the empire to lead the world in a campaign for a reduction of trade barriers. But, as was clearly indicated in the addresses delivered on this side of the house during the debate on the treaties, the very opposite happened. As a result of that conference not only did Canada raise her tariff against many countries, but Great Britain herself threw her hat into the arena of the tariff struggle, a struggle just as disastrous as far as trade and the restoration of normal conditions throughout the world are concerned as was the great war in its destruction of human life and property.

The Prime Minister stated here the other day, Mr. Speaker, that the trade of the world had shrunk to about one-third of what it had been previously. There could be no better evidence of the correctness of our contention as to the disastrous results that would inevitably follow high tariffs than the figures quoted by the Prime Minister. When we realize that our exports, which amounted to something over $1,144,000,000 in 1930, have fallen to possibly less than half of that figure in 1933-34, I think we ought to make a careful survey of our whole situation to ascertain just what has happened to our foreign trade. I know the charge has been made by members of the government that some of these markets were lost to us during the Liberal regime. Especially has that charge been made in reference to the United States. And of course the charge is perfectly true. But why stop there; why not tell the whole story? Why not tell that it was a protectionist government in the United States which, believing as this government does in the efficacy of high tariffs, brought into being legislation which practically shut off our trade with that country? Why not go further still and examine the result of that legislation as far as the United States is concerned? Why not ask ourselves the question: Was that legislation beneficial to the United States? Did it increase the price of their wheat to any considerable extent? It seems to me that the action taken by the United States in regard to our trade was just about the most suicidal thing that could have happened to that country, and the same can be said of similar action by any country.

Mr. McGIBBON: What about the price over there?

Mr. GOLDING: However, we had hoped that the situation had changed in the United States since that legislation was passed. I know that our Canadian people looked up with new hope when the Prime Minister at the last session of parliament practically announced his conversion to the idea of a reciprocal trade agreement with our neighbours to the south. We hoped that with a government in power across the line advocating a reduction in trade barriers the opportunity would be taken to break down, in some degree, at any rate, the tariff wall that had been built up between us. The Prime Minister made reference to that in his speech the other day. He quoted present prices of hogs and similar products. I want to remind my right hon. friend that while that may all be true, this market in the United States was a valuable market to us, and our farmers regretted very much indeed the closing of that market to them. In 1930 we sent over there more than $15,000,000 worth of live animals. Even last year, with all the restrictions, we sent nearly $3,000,000 worth of live animals to the United States. I say in all sincerity that the government should make every effort to remove the shackles from trade. After all, the greatest problem that confronts this country is that of improving agricultural conditions. We are all agreed that the future of Canada is dependent upon having a happy, prosperous and contented rural population, as agriculture is our greatest basic industry. The demand is urgent by reason of the serious condition in which many farmers still find themselves, notwithstanding all that has been said about the increase in prices—and I hope the situation is just as bright as the Prime Minister pictures it. I am not concerned at all about who is going to get the credit for these increased prices; what I am concerned about, what I think we all ought to be concerned about, is the making of a determined effort to see that those increased prices continue and that our farmers be relieved of some of the suffering that they have had to endure in recent years.

I am not going to attempt to describe conditions in my own constituency. Perhaps they are not as bad as in some other sections of the country, but I want to tell the house that, meeting the farmers continually and knowing them intimately, I know that many who previously made heavy commitments are being driven almost to desperation wondering how they are going to come through. In all my association with the farmers—and I have been associated with them all my life—I have found them to be a courageous class. They come from a group of noble men and women who pioneered this country, and they are not easily discouraged. But this depression has really been reducing our farmers to poverty. They are unable to meet their obligations, to pay taxes, redeem mortgages, maintain interest payments and meet the necessary bills for machinery, gasoline and oil and such things. I feel that the continuance of existing conditions inevitably must affect every industrial and financial institution, and in turn it will seriously affect every worker.

I have read and have heard many different statements as to the reason the farmer finds himself in his present unfortunate position. Some, with no knowledge of farming at all, blame it on mismanagement; some say the farmer is buying too much, some that he is buying too little, and some have actually said that the farmer is gambling too much. I think if any class of citizens have received from our arm-chair and white-collar philosophers of this land more free advice than any other class, it has been the farmers. But I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that during this emergency the farmer does need someone to show him how to surmount the difficulties with which he is confronted; how to run his farm without help; how to finance the growing, harvesting and marketing of his crops; how to construct his buildings and keep them in repair; how to pay taxes, redeem mortgages, maintain interest payments, clothe, feed and educate his family, support the church and other local institutions, as well as a hundred and one other things which time does not permit me to enumerate. I have pointed out that many farmers are trying to meet all these bills with an income barely sufficient to provide for the living expenses of themselves and their families, and I feel that the improvement of farm conditions will involve to a large extent the solution of other problems such as industrial regeneration and unemployment. In view of the definite promise made by the Prime Minister that the wrongs of the Canadian people would be righted, the people in my constituency are keenly awaiting the coming of the great day of fulfilment.

As one of the great exporting nations of the world I think we all realize that we need more and more markets. In this country we do not want any policy of extreme nationalization. I think we all realize that internationally we are all interdependent, and it has been pointed out by economists and statesmen that throughout the world more than a billion people are potential consumers of our surplus products, and that with the right kind of governmental policy they can be converted into actual consumers. All the great problems that confront this country at the present time, including farm relief, agricultural surpluses, the utilization of manufacturing productivity, unemployment, the maintenance of our standard of living, our continued development and progress and international goodwill with resultant international peace, all seem to me to be bound up in this great problem of the expansion of our trade. I am persuaded that not until we start trading with one another, buying and selling and selling and buying, need we expect any economic recovery. No inflation, deflation, reflation or any other kind of flation will be of any avail until we have a buy-and-sellation.

I do not want to conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, without making reference to a speech delivered in Toronto by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) on which I congratulate my hon. friend. I have had some correspondence with the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce, and I am certainly pleased to find from the order paper that the government is going to appoint a special committee to investigate some of the matters that were referred to by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Among the questions into which they are to inquire I find:

(d) the methods and system prevailing in the marketing of live stock and animal products for domestic consumption and export, and the extent to which the present system affords or restricts opportunity for fair returns to producers.

I am very glad indeed that the government are going to make a thorough investigation into this question. I have had a good many complaints with regard to shipping facilities available in connection with sending cattle to the old country, and I am endeavouring to take up this matter with the department. I think hon. members will appreciate the situation in which the farmer finds himself. If he is not getting a square deal it is absolutely impossible for him to defend himself in any way. He is not getting prices that will warrant his taking any action against anyone at all. I think it is the duty of the government to have a thorough investigation made in order to see if the farmer is being given a fair deal, and I hope that will be done.

With regard to the speech from the throne, and particularly with regard to the proposed central bank, of course we have no idea what position the government is going to take. This central bank has been advocated by the Liberal party for some time, and we on this side will simply have to wait until the bill is brought down to see whether or not we can approve of the central bank system proposed by the government.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: May I crave your indulgence to have it called six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. M. CARMICHAEL (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, in continuing the debate on the speech from the throne I assure you, sir, that I have no intention of emulating or trying to excel some of the marathon speeches which thus far have been given forth in this chamber. The government has moved through its accredited representatives:

That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, to offer the humble thanks of this house to His Excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both houses of parliament.

That is the formal motion which is now before the chair, and I congratulate the mover

(Mr. Gobeil) and the seconder (Mr. Barber) on their addresses in placing this motion before us.

From the official opposition has come an amendment to the main motion moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), as follows:

That the following be added to the motion: "We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's present advisers do not possess the confidence of the country."

There is no mistaking the intention of this amendment. It is a straight no-confidence motion and, of course, if carried would mean that the government should forthwith tender its resignation, and the country would be faced with a general election. From this corner of the chamber has come forth an amendment to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner), who leads the so-called Cooperative Commonwealth Federation forces—an amalgamation of farmer, labour, socialist forces, et al, we might say—called the Cocofeds out in our country. They have proposed that the amendment be amended by inserting after the word "advisers" the words "and official opposition". The amendment as amended would then read:

We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's present advisers and official opposition do not possess the confidence of this house or of the country.

Of course, this subamendment if carried would also mean the defeat of the government. It would even have a more far-reaching effect than that. It would mean that the country would have no confidence in either the Conservative or the Liberal forces to carry on government in this country, and the natural conclusion would be that the only force capable of carrying on the affairs of the state would be the representatives of the Cocofeds.

I have been listening to the debate thus far and had not proposed taking any part in it until this afternoon, and then I purposed doing so because I asked myself the question, what was going to be my own action when these various proposals were put before us for recording our vote. I represent a large rural constituency in that great agricultural province of Saskatchewan. I have a population of somewhere around 35,000. They are not all able to be here, and I think they expect me fairly well to represent what would be the majority wish of those citizens.

In order to put my position fairly before the house I shall have to go back a few years into political history and state that in 1921 I was first elected to this chamber under what was called the Progressive association in our province. In my own constituency we had the Kindersley Progressive organization, which was affiliated with the Saskatchewan Progressive association. I was first elected under that organization known by that name.

In the general election of 1925 I was again elected by that same organization under the same name—Progressive. In 1926 I again had the honour of being elected by the people of that constituency as a Progressive. In 1930 our organization changed its name to the Saskatchewan Farmers Political Association, but it did not change its aims, its objects or its ideals. They were still the same as those of the old Progressive organization; that is, they were anti-party. They were opposed to contributions to campaign funds by moneyed interests largely for the purpose of holding a club over the party that might be elected to power. They maintained then, as they have always maintained, that each representative of the people should be elected and his campaign expenses paid by the contributions of the several electors caring to do so in the constituency. My four elections were run on that basis, and the expenses, I assure you, have been kept down to almost a minimum. In 1930 I came here representing practically the same organization, although under a different name, that I represented when I first was elected in 1921. This organization is not affiliated with the United Farmers of Canada, Saskatchewan section, and therefore is not affiliated with the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. The United Farmers of Saskatchewan have affiliated with this newer cooperative association. Therefore, as a representative of that constituency, I do not feel that I am bound by the actions of the United Farmers of my own province. Not being associated with them myself, and my organization not being affiliated with them, I naturally conclude that I am not bound to associate myself with all the views as propounded by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation leaders.

While I have every respect for the farmer and labour representatives in this corner of the house and propose to cooperate with them in so far as I possibly can, I must say most emphatically that I do not share all of their views in regard to our present economic order, or that the best way out is in a complete change of that order. I do not share those views.

Not having any particular party leanings, not being affiliated with any particular party association, I have been led to inquire into just how I was going to express myself in the votes which will soon be taken. I recall back in 1927, on February 14, I had the privilege of moving a resolution in this house as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, no government should have the right to ask for a dissolution of parliament prior to completing the five-year term as provided in the British North America Act except when authorized to do so by a majority vote of the house.

I still hold that view to-day as I did then, that it should be incumbent upon a government to fulfil its full tenure of office of five years when elected by the people and sent here to do so. I do not share the view that we should immediately, on the smallest pretext arising, seek to oust the government from office and call for a general election. It is true that there might be a change on the treasury benches, but it would be a change of personnel rather than a change of conditions in the country, it would seem to me. If we were to change the Conservative administration to a Liberal administration, granting that such a change might take place—I am not assured that it will—but even though it should, I would not conclude that that change of itself would remedy conditions as they exist in the country. I made it my business before coming down here to inquire of different citizens as to what their viewpoint was in regard to a prospective general election this year, and I did not hear one person, not one, either Liberal or Conservative or of any other political stripe, say that we should have a general election this year. So far as the persons whom I interviewed are concerned, it seemed to be their opinion that elections at best are disturbing and expensive, expensive to the country and expensive to the individuals who run their own elections; and of course there is unsettlement so far as business interests throughout the country are concerned. That being the opinion expressed by some of my electors, and having my own personal opinion, I feel that the government should run the full five years. Having no political axe to grind I feel that so far as my individual support is concerned, it is up to the government to carry on. If I were to support the subamendment as proposed, it would mean that I would be asking the government to quit immediately and the official opposition to get out of the way so that the representatives in this corner of the house could be given a chance to carry on. That is what I would be saying, but I do not propose so to say.

Mr. BOURASSA: They are not yet prepared for office.

[Mr. Carmichael.]

Mr. CARMICHAEL: If I were to support the amendment to the main motion, in effect I would be saying that the government should get out of the way immediately and give the official opposition in its great zeal to save the country a chance to do so. I do not feel like saying even that. I still feel that the government is strong enough to carry on for the balance of 1934 and for that portion of 1935 which would be coming to them within their five year tenure of office.

While general conditions in the country may not be quite as bad as the leader of the opposition propounded to us in his four-hour and twenty-three minute speech on Monday, while they may not be quite as good as the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) outlined to us in his almost four hour effort in reply to the leader of the opposition, I do know that in my own constituency conditions are not good. Indeed they are very bad. In the rural municipality of Kindersley, a small local unit of administration, during the winter of 1933-1934 there are approximately one hundred families on relief and it is estimated that the total cost up to April 1 will be $10,000.

Mr. BOURASSA: What is the population?

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Approximately 1,500 in a nine-township unit. In the eleven or twelve-township unit of Newcombe, with a population of around 1,800, there are 188 families on relief. The secretary has advised me that the estimated cost for the 1933-34 winter up to April 1 next is $20,000. Other rural municipalities in my constituency are in practically a similar position. The town in which I reside is similarly placed with a number of families on relief. I want to assure the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson), who spoke this afternoon, that this is not because of the particular stripe of government in our province or governmental extravagances; I can assure the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) that it is not because of the economic system under which we are labouring; the conditions which we are now facing are caused by what I think would be called in legal phraseology, an act of God. We have had an absence of rain, we have had hot winds which scorched and blistered and blasted the crops. In many cases, what little did come through in spite of the drought was eaten up by the grasshoppers. As a result, in my own immediate vicinity the yields of wheat ran two, three and four bushels to the acre, and this only with raking and scraping and scratching. With the low price of wheat, hon. members will realize how much the farmer had to his credit after he paid his threshing expenses. There was practically no feed in the district, hay and oats being shipped in to be purchased by the farmers under the relief scheme. This is the condition in my territory and I know it is even worse in many other parts of Saskatchewan. I had the privilege of driving over a large part of the province during the past summer and through the southern part you could find no feed, no stacks and practically nothing growing green for miles and miles except Russian thistles.

I notice the speech from the throne makes this statement:

You will be invited to consider legislation for the establishment of a central bank.

I heartily favour the intention of the government to establish a central bank in Canada. Page 98 of the report of the royal commission which was appointed to inquire into banking and currency contains some suggestions as to certain main features of the constitution of a central bank for Canada. Section 4 states that the bank should have the sole right of note issue. I trust that in the legislation to be brought forward this feature will be adhered to. So far as my own opinion goes, I would prefer to see this central bank modelled after the Commonwealth Bank of Australia. Upon two occasions I have spoken in this house with regard to the Commonwealth Bank of Australia and I recommend to the members of the government a careful study of the set-up of that bank. It has had a successful operation for a period of over twenty years with each year showing increasing profits which have accrued to the state. It is distinctly a government owned and controlled bank and has the sole right of note issue in the commonwealth of Australia.

Last year we had in London what was termed an economic conference. It was internationally agreed at that conference that the metallic coverage of gold could be reduced from forty to twenty-five per cent without any country being considered as being off the so-called gold standard. I remember hearing a member of the government speaking over the radio, I believe it was the Prime Minister, make mention of that fact and state that if Canada took advantage of that provision we could issue an additional $100,000,000 of dominion notes and still be on the gold basis.

The speech from the throne also contains the following statement:

My government propose further to promote employment by expenditures on essential public works and undertakings throughout the dominion.

I should like to see these two statements linked up. I hope the government of the day will take it upon themselves to establish a central bank and give it the sole right of note issue and then put into circulation such a quantity of additional dominion notes as will take care of essential public undertakings. In so doing there would be no toll levied on the money put into circulation. We all remember that when the $35,000,000 was circulated—I believe it was less than two years ago—there was a toll of one per cent for two years exacted from the people of Canada by the private banking interests to pay them for putting that money into circulation. That was what it amounted to. There was the cost of the note issue, but the profit was one per cent on $35,000,000 for a two-year period, or $700,000, which went to the private banks for the expense of printing those notes. If that is done by our central bank, the money being circulated through that organization, which we hope will be established, there should be no such toll levied. The money could be put into circulation by paying the people who took part in public undertakings such as public buildings, bridges, highways, such as the completion of the trans-Canada highway, the deepening of the St. Lawrence, which has been talked of for some years, and the Peace River outlet, which has also been discussed in this chamber for some time. Such public undertakings could very well be carried out and paid for without the taxpayers having to raise any additional money by means of taxation. When such time comes, I assure the government and in particular the Minister of Public Works, so far as my own section of the province is concerned, I am going to be very bold in asking for some public works which will take care of the unfortunate situation as it exists in central western Saskatchewan and which will give employment to some of the people who are so very much in need of money. It will also tend to relieve the situation that now prevails in that part of the province.

Mr. F. H. PICKEL (Brome-Missisquoi): In the first place, may I congratulate the mover (Mr. Gobeil) and the seconder (Mr. Barber) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

During the last session of this house the committee on agriculture was authorized to hold an investigation into the milk situation then existing between the producers and the distributors. Much evidence was adduced relating to the pernicious and oppressive methods adopted by the distributors in several of the large consuming centres of the dominion, and a report based on that evidence, of a highly condemnatory and scandalous nature, against the distributors was found and duly filed. I presume that as regards any real benefit that has resulted so far, from that investigation, the report has probably been systematically pigeon-holed, and forgotten in conformity with the usual procedure with respect to the findings of commissions. The evidence brought out by that investigation conclusively disclosed that the producer was being unfairly dealt with and exploited by the distributor, and further revealed the fact that the present system was simply creating a few millionaires in the city and driving thousands of farmers into a state of penury. This unholy and damnable condition of the farmer is being encouraged and maintained by our provincial and municipal authorities. They seem to treat the producer with contempt, while the distributor is fawningly looked upon as a representative of the big interests. It is perfectly useless to apply to these bodies for relief; it has been tried many times without avail: the distributors control the situation entirely.

On behalf of the dairy farmers I wish to express our thanks to the house for its courteous concession in granting a committee to hold that investigation. After persistent inquiry on the part of the committee, and much side stepping and mystical evasion on the part of the distributors, many startling facts were brought to light. And then the half has not been told. I am not going to take up the time of the house relating all the difficulties that the producers run up against, but I want to cite two facts that have come to my attention since the investigation was held.

In the first place, I am informed by reliable people that between the first of September and the first of May there is practically no surplus whatever in at least one large plant in Montreal; in fact, there is a shortage, a shortage so acute that the plant has to resort to the manufacture of synthetic milk to supply the deficiency. This milk is manufactured from milk powder. Furthermore, I am informed that in this same plant milk brought in by producers is often emptied into the receiving tanks for pasteurization and distribution. The farmer's can is then refilled with separated milk, buttermilk or this synthetic milk, a colouring substance being added to denote that the milk is unfit for human consumption, and it is returned, the farmer being compelled to pay transportation charges both ways, in addition to losing the entire value of his own milk.

[Mr. Pickel.]

I was under the impression that copies of the evidence and of the report were transmitted to each province with the request that they take action with respect to this unfair practice. How far that request has been implemented in the different provinces I am just at present unable to say, but in the province of Quebec the government has appointed a milk commission, a body shorn of all power or authority, except as a matter of course the ability to draw down a good salary. They have been offering the farmer unnecessary advice, for instance in regard to keeping a better herd sire, improving his pasture, reducing the cost of production, making two blades of grass grow where one grew before and similar information of which the farmer was already well aware.

There were two ways in which they might have been of greater assistance to the producer. The first is this: in the month of May last the distributors offered $1.20 per 100 pounds for association milk. The producers did not see fit to accept that price. A conference was arranged, and after deliberation the distributors increased their offer to $1.35 for association milk. For the benefit of any hon. members who do not understand what association milk is, I may say it is the milk received from the farmer that is distributed and sold by the plant in quarts or gallons from house to house. The excess above this portion so distributed is called surplus milk, for which a much smaller price is paid, and it is the fluctuation in the quantity and the price of this surplus milk that plays such havoc with the farmer. After this offer of $1.35 had been accepted by the farmers, the usual result followed; the distributors simply increased the fictitious, so-called surplus quantity and the farmers received even less than they had been getting before the increase in price. I have in my room many statements by farmers, and I can get bushels of them throughout the country, but I am going to read only one or two in order to give the house an idea of what the farmers are receiving for milk.

I have in my hand a statement from a farmer who is shipping milk from West Shefford, Quebec. In the month up to June 15, he shipped 4,874 pounds of milk, for which he received $1.35 per hundred pounds for 3,800 pounds, and seventy cents per hundred pounds for 1,074 pounds. That netted that farmer just forty-five cents per hundred pounds or one and one-eighth cents a quart. In another instance a farmer shipped 8,420 pounds of milk. He received $1.35 per hundred pounds for 2,500 pounds and for 5,920 pounds he received seventy cents per pound, netting him 45 cents per hundred pounds with transportation out, or one and one-eighth cents a quart. Those are fair samples of the way in which the farmers are being treated as regards their surplus milk.

Later on in the summer the distributors, not content with exploiting the farmer right up to the hilt, turned their tender attention toward extracting a few extra shekels from their consumers. The distributors get it both ways, coming and going. It is a great game; there is no other equal to it, with the same opportunity of displaying spurious generosity at someone else's expense. They first advertised amongst their consumers the fact that the farmer was hard up. That was no idle dream; the farmers are at the breaking point. The distributors spread propaganda amongst their consumers that on account of the dry season the pastures were short, grain was high and out of their great exuberance of friendship and brotherly love to the farmer, notwithstanding the fact that there is never anything but strife between them, much as they were reluctant to do so, they felt it their bounden duty to increase the price of milk one cent per quart or about forty cents per hundred pounds to help the poor farmer out. This was in the month of August. In this way they put the onus upon the farmer for this increased price, although the fact of the matter was that the farmer knew nothing about it and had asked for no special concessions from the distributors at the time, being in no way a party to this gesture supposedly in his behalf. When I first heard of this proposal I was amazed, but withal pleased as I thought perhaps the distributors had really undergone a change of heart and were going to try in a measure to work for the general advantage and atone for the injustices they had inflicted upon the farmer for many years. I could not quite get it out of my mind that there was a nigger in the fence, and this is how the scheme worked out: the price of milk was raised forty cents per hundred pounds; the distributor allotted fifteen cents of that to the farmer, and, according to his usual custom, kept twenty-five cents for himself. This is simply another example of the spurious generosity and double dealing of the distributor.

The milk commission of the province of Quebec could have rendered valuable service had they been so inclined. I noticed in the press during the latter part of the summer and in the fall several reports of the activities of the Hon. Mr. Godbout, Minister of Agriculture for Quebec. He made this statement on several occasions, but in one speech in particular, delivered in the county of Jacques Cartier just prior to the last election, speaking amongst other things of his paralyzed and incompetent milk commission, he said that at the next session of the legislature legislation would be introduced to deal with the milk situation, for instance, to give authority to set the price of milk so that the producer would receive an equal share of the customer's dollar. That is just what the farmer is looking for and what he is eventually going to have. It might just as well be done at once as later on. The farmer is entitled to a fifty-fifty division in the price at which his milk is sold. He will never be satisfied with $1.30, $1.40 or $1.50; he wants a percentage basis. When that is established no more will be heard of lost bottles which in the investigation were shown to range between $7,000 and $18,000 per plant per year, which the farmer unjustly pays for. No more will be heard of the abuse of price cutting indulged in by chain stores as an advertising expedient. No more will be heard of duplication of services and special services for which the farmer is called upon to pay.

Mr. Godbout further stated that the farmer must reduce his cost of production, and which, according to him, should not exceed 45 or 50 cents per hundred pounds. During the investigation we went into that point very thoroughly and established in the first place a cost of production of milk on the evidence of two gentlemen, Father Labelle and Professor Toupin, of Oka, who had made an intensive study of the question. On their evidence the cost of production of milk per hundred pounds was shown to be about $1.50; and that estimate included only the cost of labour, feed and care. But we had Professor Reynolds from the Ontario Agricultural College, Mr. Merriot, Mr. Fletcher, and Mr. Hughes, representing the different producers' associations in Ontario. They had made a particular study of the question, and they estimated the cost up to $2.50 per hundred pounds. In their figure they took into account overhead, interest on the investment of the farmer, taxes, and insurance. Yet Mr. Godbout proposes that the farmer produce milk at 45 to 50 cents! With all due respect to the hon. gentleman's opinion, I contend that is absolutely unreasonable and impossible.

I am not going to say any more about milk. I understand that in Ontario at the present time the government are proposing to stabilize the price of milk. If the province of Quebec will endow their milk commission with some power, and the commission will use that power for the benefit of the producer, I think it will do some good. At any rate if the provinces do not act with expedition in this matter I would earnestly ask the federal government to assume or acquire the necessary jurisdiction to terminate for all time this perpetual cause of contention between the producer and the consumer.

There are other things that the farmer produces besides milk, and he is suffering just as much in connection with those different articles as he is in connection with milk, and is being imposed upon just as badly. How often we hear the favourite expression of candidates in rural constituencies, that agriculture is the basic industry of the country. It is heard oftener, of course, in rural sections than in urban centres. We hear it chiefly during election campaigns by the candidate and his followers, who meet the farmer like a long lost brother and gabble about the importance of agriculture, which in most cases, to the gabbler at least, is just so much hot air, a mere play of words, meaningless drivel. They tell the farmer that the country cannot get along without him. That is true, but the farmer has never been ingenious enough to capitalize upon that fact. The farmer is a peculiar being; he is by nature and temperament an individualist, and this innate peculiarity is largely responsible for his undoing. One of the chief characteristics of farmers as a class is disunion in their own ranks. This inbred disposition of the farmer is taken advantage of by the packer, the middleman and the commission man, in their finished and devastating technique for exploiting the farmer, whose industry is being constricted, compressed and strangled; graded, regraded, degraded and finally crucified by adverse government regulations and restrictive acts unfairly administered by the commission houses, contrary to the spirit of the framers of those acts and regulations.

Now sir, let us consider our home market for a moment and view its inner workings as controlled—improperly controlled—by the middlemen; perhaps I am within my rights in saying illegally controlled. Yet that may not be quite right, because they are bolstered up by different restrictive acts that have been in existence for many years. This did not develop in a day; it has been going on for a long time; the farmer has been ignored for years. His interests have not been looked after by one party any more than the other. This is not a party question; it transcends parties, but it means the life or death of the biggest and best class of citizens in the country. I do not wish to imply that this special legislation was enacted with an ulterior motive against the farmer. I fully concede that these acts were probably decreed with the best intentions and presumably in the interests of the farmers, but the middleman has become a past master in their artful interpretation and administration. He has had a free course, a golden opportunity, and he has made the most of it. The temptation was alluring; there were no obstacles in his way, and he simply took advantage of the situation. It would be very interesting if we could get the full history of the framework of these different restrictive acts. I never heard that a farmer-producer was ever consulted in reference thereto; I have always associated their evolution with the combined efforts of technicians and heads of departments, at the request of shrewd middlemen. They have been enacted and put upon our statute books without in any way consulting the producers.

Our home market should be the best in the world, because we consume ninety-eight per cent of all our farm products at home, with the exception of wheat and cheese. But it is right here in our own home market that the farmer has been exploited and robbed; he is being robbed to-day right on his own doorstep by the distributors. To-day in the cities, sir, you will find the cold storage warehouses bulging with farm produce, though they are not bulging quite so much as they were because the produce has been unloaded to the public by degrees since the farmers stopped producing. These goods were bought up at very low prices, in many cases for less than the cost of production, and the prices were arbitrarily fixed by the commission men. To-day they are being sold at huge profits in order to create millions for a few in the cities. Why should these huge profits redound to the middlemen alone? Some adjustment is in order, and it should be made without delay. If conditions are not remedied at once in the country our rural life is doomed.

Industry of all kinds is picking up, with the single exception of agriculture. The government does not seem to realize that the farmers constitute the biggest and best class in this country, and that if they are prosperous it will have a marked effect upon all other classes. The government does not realize that the farmers are the biggest purchasers of any class in this country. Every day the farmer has to buy goods. He has to purchase the same articles that are purchased by the ordinary citizen as well as a long list of expensive articles which are necessary in the pursuit of his calling. He has to buy wire, nails, roofing, cement, lumber and a long list of expensive agricultural implements and machinery such as cream separators, expensive stablefittings, and so on. And it must be remembered that these expensive articles must be replaced every so often; they detriorate very rapidly. The government forgets that the farmers are perhaps the largest class of employers in this country. If the farmers were receiving adequate remuneration for their labour and goods to-day they could absorb from half to three-quarters of the unemployment which is so rife in the country and about which all governments are very much concerned.

There are one or two things which I think our legislators have forgotten or overlooked for a long time. Perhaps it may be because of the natural modesty of the farmer or perhaps it may be due to the fact that he is patient and long suffering that he is not continually, in and out of season, harrassing the government of the day by adopting the same peremptory tone, tactful schemes and issuing the same dire ultimatums that have characterized one section of our agriculturists. We in the east have made the best of a bad job; we have kept on paying the demands of the west. The fact of the matter, Mr. Speaker, is that the government does not know just how to help the farmer. Our legislators are not familiar with the difficulties and grievances under which the farmer is labouring; consequently they do not know how to give him relief. It is high time they looked into the matter and gave the farmers the assistance necessary to enable them to market their goods. The mere assertion that agriculture is the basic industry of the country and therefore should be encouraged and assisted, which we always expect and hear in speeches from the throne, both provincial and federal, will not help the farmer one iota unless it is implemented by sane and useful action.

Here is the position of the farmer to-day, Mr. Speaker, in a nutshell. He does not ask for a dole or a bonus; neither does he ask that the price to the consumer be boosted. What he asks for is his just share of what his goods sell for. His great and insurmountable difficulty is the distribution of his own goods in his own market. I mentioned the goods that are in the cold storage warehouses at the present time, and which were purchased at very low prices which were arbitrarily fixed by the middlemen. In the city of Montreal five men meet every Tuesday; they say, "We will pay so much for butter this week", and that settles it. During the producing season of the farmers, in the late spring and summer, the prices are depressed and they remain depressed just as long as the producing season lasts; but after he has finished producing and has no more to sell, up goes the price. It is simply manipulated by the middlemen. It does not seem reasonable that the farmers should be subjected to a thing of that kind. This recession of price in the spring and summer during the producing season, and later the augmentation of price in the autumn and winter by as much as one hundred or one hundred and fifty per cent, occur almost with clock-like regularity, and as I say, this price fluctuation is simply the result of price manipulation by the middlemen. I trust that the house will appreciate the perplexity with which the farmer is aimlessly and hopelessly drifting, and the necessity of our getting together and trying to do something for his relief. I sometimes think that legislators never stop to give the farmer a thought. If a commission had been appointed for the purpose of producing a plan for putting the farmer out of business quickly, I do not see how they could have improved upon the system that is in use to-day for accomplishing that object; for it is a fact that the farmer is being driven off the farm. Both these men whose statements I have read are no longer farmers; they have been driven out of farming.

Do our legislators ever pause and wonder why so few dairy farmers are paying income tax? Do they not think that the dairy farmer would be glad to be in a position to contribute to the revenue from this impost? Certainly, sir, the dairy farmers would be only too glad to be in a position to pay income tax. It is amazing that hon. members do not pause to inquire why it is that the dairy farmers, with individual investments ranging from five to fifty thousand dollars in plants, should not be in a position to pay income tax. While the farmer may not be paying income tax directly—I do not know of any farmer in my section who does, and I think it is a crime—nevertheless I firmly believe that the farmers are the biggest contributors to the income tax revenues of any class in this country, but they contribute the tax indirectly and the other fellows get the credit.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's forty minutes has expired.

Mr. PICKEL: Just one more remark, with your permission, Mr. Speaker. The farmer by these restrictive and grading acts is compelled to sell his goods at such a low price that it is the consumers and the distributors who pay the income tax and get the credit therefor, but the farmer contributes it indirectly.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Temiskaming): Mr. Speaker, in extending my sincere felicitations to the mover (Mr. Gobeil) and the seconder (Mr. Barber) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, may I say that in listening to their speeches I was impressed, as I am sure all hon. members were, by the diversity of the problems that we have to face in a country with such an immense area as Canada. The mover of the resolution spoke of the problems of the eastern townships, and was followed by the seconder, residing nearly three thousand miles away on the Pacific slope. Sometimes as representatives in this House of Commons we are criticized because of the long drawn out sessions. The first time I was in this house I asked myself why a session should be long, but it did not take me very long to realize that the main reason was that with 245 constituencies spread over such a great expanse of territory, with different conditions and varying problems in each, it was necessary for the members who had been honoured by the representation of a riding in this house to put before it the problems of his own region, because the prosperity or otherwise of any one section is bound to have its effect upon the country as a whole. That is the reason, sir, why I am perfectly at ease as I proceed to present some of the problems pertaining to our section of the country, more particularly those of northern Ontario.

The first problem with which I wish to deal is that of the railways. I listened very attentively to the splendid speeches of both the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), and I read them afterwards in Hansard. The Prime Minister in his speech made a statement which certainly will not be very favourably received in the northern sections of Ontario and Quebec when he criticized very severely what he called the lack of vision of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and of the people responsible for the construction of the transcontinental section of the national railway system of Canada as we have it to-day. He also made mention of the fact that we have in this country a population of 10,000,000 or thereabouts. Surely the Prime Minister should realize that the construction of that railway through the northern part of Ontario and Quebec is responsible for maintaining at least hundreds of thousands of people in that section of Canada. Let the right hon. gentleman try to visualize the condition of industrial centres like Toronto and Montreal without the population of northern Ontario and Quebec, who are their best customers. The same thing applies as forcibly to the wheat growers of the three western provinces, and indeed to the whole of Canada. No doubt there was over-optimism, but no government could have foreseen what the railways would have to contend with in the future. No one could have foreseen the great development of the automobile industry and the competition of the motor truck and the autobus with our railways. I have in mind a statement made by Henry Ford a few years ago that it would soon be found that the countries which were the least railroaded would be the best off. But in this country, on account of our long distances and our climatic and geographical conditions, sheer necessity compels us to maintain our railroads and their identity; and they were a necessity for its development and expansion.

I listened with a great deal of interest to that part of the speech from the throne in which His Excellency says:

> Since I have been associated with you as the representative of His Majesty in Canada, I have visited every province of the dominion. I have been greatly impressed by the loyalty, devotion and friendliness of the people, as well as the high courage with which men and women were meeting and overcoming abnormal difficulties in their daily lives.

It was with a great deal of pleasure that during last summer we had the honour of a visit in northern Ontario and Quebec from the representative of the king. It is true that for some reason which I know was absolutely unpremeditated, some of the larger centres of population were not visited. I have in mind particularly that wonderful new industrial centre of Kapuskasing, located on the Canadian National railway, and my hope is that if in the future we are honoured with visits from representatives of the crown they will find it possible to visit that fine centre of population. But the visit of His Excellency the Governor General would of course have been impossible without the opening up of that newer section of the country. What does it mean, the opening up of all this new territory in the Cochrane district, the Red Lake district, the Hearst district, the Amos and Rouyn districts and innumerable other sections which are traversed by the transcontinental railway running from Quebec to Winnipeg? All this was due to the building of the National Transcontinental railway from Quebec to Winnipeg. The spirit of optimism has always existed in the province of Ontario. When the provincial government contemplated building a railroad from North Bay northwestward to Cobalt, it is true there were people who doubted the wisdom of building such a road, but that capital expenditure has since been found to be fully warranted. Later on that ribbon of steel was pushed forward to Cochrane. Only two summers ago we had the wonderful spectacle of the opening up of the railroad from Cochrane to tidewater at Moosonee. Although that investment is not earning interest and amortizement, the province of Ontario is satisfied with the investment. It has proved to be one of the main sources of expansion, progress and prosperity in the whole province, and it has benefited the whole of Canada. Before the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) makes any more statements of that nature I hope he will find it possible to study the situation very thoroughly.

Take our own case in northern Ontario. We receive no direct benefit from the canalization of our waterways, but we feel that as long as it is beneficial to some sections of Canada, it has also an indirect beneficial effect upon our own section. The money invested in the canalization of our waterways is approximately $400,000,000. With an interest rate of four per cent per annum, this represents $16,000,000 per year. For the expense of upkeep there is expended annually about $3,000,000. The government does not receive one single cent in return, but there has not been a single word of criticism uttered in any section of Canada with regard to that expenditure. The government has seen fit to enter into a treaty with the United States to provide for the development of the St. Lawrence waterway. Without trying to prophesy, I have no doubt that that waterway will cost hundreds of millions of dollars when it is eventually carried out. I ask the Prime Minister to take this into consideration when considering these matters.

When discussing a matter of such importance as our railroads, every hon. member should consider the benefit derived therefrom by every section of the country. It is quite true that we have not received the attention we deserve in the exploitation of the National Transcontinental. It is true also that there are discriminatory rates from Winnipeg to Quebec which prevent any through traffic in freight or passengers on that section of the road. We made several appeals to the old railway board but we were unable to obtain justice. When the National Transcontinental section of the present government railway system was built, it was never intended for local traffic; it was intended primarily for through traffic, but because of the development of our natural resources, because of our riches in forests, waterpower, mines and agriculture, it is now found that this section is not only self-supporting but is one of the best-paying sections of the whole nationally owned railway system. I hope that my own section of the country as well as the northern section of the province of Quebec will again present their case to the new railway board. We are confident that justice will be given to that particular section of the government railway system, and we believe that that faith will not be shattered.

I shall now deal with another matter which, although regional in its nature, has had its effect upon the rest of the country. I refer to the strike of the bushmen and settlers which took place last fall and is still continuing in certain sections of northern Ontario. It may seem strange to many hon. members that settlers working at lumbering operations have found it necessary to strike, but such is the case. No doubt hon. members have read the particulars of this strike which appeared in the newspapers. It lasted for weeks in the northern section of Ontario and spread past the Quebec border . I do not think it is for me to discuss the wisdom of the leadership of those men. As far as I am personally concerned, I have no love for some of the leaders, and the premier of the province of Quebec has shown that he has no patience with them. But there is no doubt in my mind that the bushmen and the settlers were suffering a great injustice in Ontario, and this applies equally to the province of Quebec. Although some of the leaders may have been radical, I think they deserve credit for the manner in which the strike was conducted and the results which were obtained. They found the men were not receiving justice and they formed an organization whereby the bushmen could air their views and have their grievances considered by the proper authorities. I know for a positive fact that there are members on the other side of the chamber who are still in their constituencies only because of the fact that some lumbermen are still on strike.

Before I proceed further with the matter, I should like to say a few words of praise for the attitude of most of the strike leaders and the officials of such centres as Kapuskasing, Cochrane, Ansonville, Hearst and others. A strange situation existed as far as Ansonville and Cochrane were concerned. The industries themselves were located quite a distance from these centres of population. What I have to say applies more particularly to Smooth Rock Falls and Iroquois Falls. These strikers were sheltered and fed by the towns of Ansonville and Cochrane. It is to the credit of the strike leaders that they always appealed for peacefulness among the strikers. The strikers behaved themselves and therefore received the support of all sections of the population. The national and international unions came to their rescue in order that the strike could be carried on, going as far as giving a part of their weekly wages. The first company which found it possible to settle with the men was the Spruce Falls company of Kapuskasing, and I think great credit is due to Mr. Noble, the general manager of the mill. But a different situation existed in the other industrial centres of Smooth Rock Falls and Iroquois Falls because of the fact that the company was in receivership. It was almost impossible for the strikers' committee to obtain access to the officials of the company, but I think it is to the credit of the officials of the receivership that they tried their utmost to meet the strikers.

In order that the house may be seized of the situation, I intend to cite some of the demands made by the strikers, most of which have been acceded to by the companies. There was practically no complaint as to food. Complaints were made with regard to the sanitary conditions in some of the camps, but I believe these conditions have been remedied. Under the provincial legislation there is sufficient machinery to meet this situation. Another demand was for a monthly wage of $35 for twenty-six working days, plus board. The strikers were forced to compromise on this item. As everyone familiar with lumbering operations will understand, it is absolutely impossible to strike a flat rate of wages. Upon several occasions I spoke to the strikers and urged them to accept a schedule of wages whereby the inexperienced men would receive $26 per month, with the wages graduating to a maximum of $35. If my understanding is correct, an agreement satisfactory to everyone concerned has been arrived at.

The strikers asked for the recognition of camp committees composed of workers in the camps, and the right to hold meetings in the camps. Familiar as I am with all the conditions in the district, I know for a positive fact that an effort is being made to promote cooperation between the workmen and the company, and I was told only a few days ago by an official of one of the large mills in northern Ontario that the agreement was working to the entire satisfaction of everyone.

I will not discuss all the demands that have been made but, only a few of them. Demand No. 9, the men are asking that the wood be scaled twice a month and receipt given. This demand is quite legitimate. I know of one man who had cut an average of ninety logs a day and when he received his scaling receipt at the end of the month his average was very considerably reduced. Obviously this is not satisfactory to the workman, and the situation must be remedied; scaling will have to be carried out in accordance with the requests made by the strikers.

The settlers, I may point out to the house, also took part in that strike, and some credit would seem to be due so far as the leaders of the bushmen's organization are concerned. Lumbering operations are extremely seasonal. Perhaps ninety per cent of the axemen and bushmen are farmers by calling. They spend only a few months, in fact the winter months, in lumbering, returning in the spring to their farming; at any rate, that is true of the majority of them. That fact alone will indicate how difficult it is to maintain a labour organization. However, the nucleus of a permanent organization has been established, which it is hoped will be maintained indefinitely.

The farmers also have their grievances, let us remember. In some instances there was violence, cars having been unloaded, loads upset, and so forth, but the settlers have cause for complaint, and they have formulated their complaints for submission to the company. In the first place, the settlers are asking, for four-foot pulpwood, $5 per cord, of which they suggest that $1.85 be paid in advance. It is not unreasonable that they should be given $5 per cord. Speaking to an Ontario minister last summer, I said that if the provincial government could find it possible to pay the settlers $5 per cord for the pulpwood they cut —that is, $5 at the siding during the coming winter the provincial government would have to spend practically nothing in direct relief. But what has happened? It is true that one corporation, before the snow came, and owing to the shortage of pulpwood, paid $5 a cord for a few weeks, and practically every settler along the Transcontinental, from Kapuskasing to Hearst, hauled pulpwood on the bare ground and found it remunerative; but the moment the snow came—and the snowfall there was premature, as it was in other sections—the company reduced their payment to $3.50. Now, everyone who knows anything about lumbering operations and the cutting of pulpwood will agree that the farmers cannot possibly make both ends meet if they are to receive only $3.50 for their pulpwood. At present some companies are paying $4, but I insist that unless a minimum of $5 is paid, it is absolutely impossible for the farmers to get along. It is no wonder the provincial government finds it necessary to keep up an expensive system of direct relief. The farmers are not being given an adequate remuneration for the pulpwood they are cutting under such difficult conditions.

It was with a good deal of interest that I heard the Prime Minister declare, the day before yesterday, that the pulp and paper industry is one of the greatest industries in Canada. We know how much capital is invested in that industry, and we know the amount of employment it gives to tens of thousands of Canadians. Lumbering operations, as I have already pointed out, are extremely seasonal, and in our section of the province—and this applies to the province of Quebec as well—these operations enable the farmers to balance their budget; it is an occupation from which they can add to their income. But we must remember that one of the best ways to bring prosperity to Canada is to give a fair remuneration to all workmen. The Prime Minister, when he returned from the world economic conference last summer, said that he was in favour of increased commodity prices. I would point out to him that this is not enough; along with increased prices there must be an increase in wages, and if wages are not increased to keep up with prices there will be no prosperity in this country, at any rate not for some time to come. Just imagine the father of a family, getting $26 a month, and trying to keep that family, body and soul together, when he has to pay let us say $20 a month in rent. And in that northern climate fuel is an expensive item. I repeat, it will help matters considerably, and I hope that in every section of the country this will be realized, particularly in Toronto, if the government can find it possible to allow a minimum of $5 per cord to settlers. The settlers are also asking that their wood should be scaled at the time of loading and not at the mill.

There is no reason why the present situation should be tolerated any longer. A few years ago, when we were shipping carloads of pulpwood to the United States as well as to Canadian mills, not a single stick of wood left the siding unless it was scaled. The farmers knew how much wood was in a car and they knew the price that would be paid; they simply awaited the return of the cheque. Under the present practice in regard to scaling the farmers do not know what they are going to receive, and they have every reason to protest and to maintain the strike until this grievance is removed. I know of settlers who have loaded a car containing sixteen cords of pulpwood, and anywhere from two weeks to a month afterwards they have received a scale of twelve or thirteen cords, losing sometimes as high as four cords to the car. Everyone will realize, from the facts as I have indicated them, just how unfair the system is. If it is true that occasionally settlers may have loaded bad wood on the cars, there is a method of remedying such a condition, but every stick of wood that is being shipped should be scaled at the siding. This is a matter of which both departments of labour, provincial and federal, should be fully seized.

I think we should be able to learn some lessons and draw some useful conclusions from this strike. As representative of that district in this house I find myself in a peculiar position. Before leaving for the north country I had a conversation with the federal Minister of Labour, who promised to give all the help he could, and of whose sympathetic attitude to the settlers and strikers I had no doubt. But the moment I was among the strikers, the moment I endeavoured to act as intermediary between the company and the men, I found myself in a strange position. I found, for example, that there were two authorities each of which had a certain extent of jurisdiction. In several instances I found if not conflict at least overlapping between the two authorities. For example, there is an Ontario statute, the Disputes Act, which provides quite clearly that in the time of a strike the mayor of any town or municipality may be sent by the provincial government as an official to try to solve the difficulty But, as I stated previously, we are in a singular position so far as Cochrane and Rouyn are concerned. Many strikers were residing within the limits of those towns and they were being sheltered and fed by those municipalities. We were not directly interested; I mean by that that the industry was not located within the borders of those municipalities. There is certainly overlapping of authority between the provincial and the federal Labour departments. I know the federal Minister of Labour must have found himself handicapped by some of the statutes of Ontario and that conflict of authority does not permit the settlement of strikes as quickly as should be the case. This is quite comprehensible. I cited my personal case and I believe the federal department was in the same position as I was; they did not dare to interfere in the matter until such time as the provincial authorities had found it impossible to work out a solution of the difficulty. I mention this so that the house may know that certain anomalies exist in our statutes. The provincial legislation is a fine piece of machinery so far as the settlement of a strike is concerned, but in times of strikes our Labour departments, both provincial and federal, should give a lead to the officers of the company involved and the strikers. The federal department sent some well qualified officials to the different regions and some good came of their efforts, but I suppose some of them found themselves in the same position as I was; in certain sections they did not dare to make a move because they were treading on provincial ground.

I want to state also that no wood should be loaded on cars unless it is properly scaled; if that were seen to, the present anomaly would disappear. In connection with lumbering operations in our section there is one great curse, if I may use the term, and I believe it applies to the whole of Canada: we have what is called the subcontracting system. For instance, a great corporation like the Abitibi Pulp and Paper Company will let their contracts early in the fall, amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars. Those contracts are given to three or four men, but I know of several cases where they were sublet to a second, third and fourth man, and all the time profits were being taken away from the workingmen. I do not know whether the federal government has any authority in this matter, but this anomaly should immediately disappear. There is no reason why a corporation which has been in existence for a number of years and that knows the ability of its contractors should not be in a position to give contracts to men who are able to carry out the contracts. I know, however, of a number of cases where the contracts have been sublet to a fourth man. I leave it to hon. members to consider what the last man was making on those contracts and how hard the men had to work to make a bare living. Last fall, speaking in my home to one of the subcontractors, I asked him what he thought of his particular contract and whether he expected to make some money. He said: "I have the best stand of timber in the north country, but I will make money only because wages are low." There is something wrong when that is the situation.

As regards lumbering operations I should like to mention the work that some of the men are compelled to do, work that should be done by horses. We have in this country societies for the protection of horses, dogs and cats, but in northern Ontario we have no protection for the health of our bushmen. I maintain that no man should draw, at his neck, as we say, any logs weighing over 200 or 300 pounds. In our lumbering operations the average length of the pulpwood log is sixteen feet and it is mostly black spruce. Everyone who knows the quality of that timber knows it does not take a very large log to weigh from 100 or 200 to 500 or 800 pounds. Last fall I saw dozens of cases of hernia for which those men had no way of getting compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, for the very good reason that hernia is not considered to be in the nature of an accident. Such a situation should no longer exist. A log that weighs less than 200 pounds can easily be handled by the men and there would be no protest from them on that score. But any log that weighs over 200 pounds, particularly one weighing from 500 to 800 pounds should not be touched by any man. Can you imagine men hauling such logs long distances through two to four feet of snow and doing that work all day long? That sort of thing should not be tolerated in a civilized country. Under our highly mechanized industry there should be a way of making it possible to have those logs drawn so that the health of our young men would not be jeopardized. I have seen young men looking the picture of health go into the bush in the fall and come out a few months later mere shadows of themselves and without any chance of getting back to health. There is an anomaly in the fact that a man who on account of doing this work is afflicted with hernia cannot get compensation, even though he is unable to get his strength back. I have known of sad cases that my limited means would not allow me to help. Last fall two men suffering from hernia came to my home and because they had no means, they could not be treated. Any man with medical knowledge knows what this means for the health of these young people. It means that they will never be really healthy as long as they live and their days will certainly be shortened.

As I stated a few moments ago, I have received sympathetic consideration from the federal Department of Labour, and I notice in the house the Minister of Labour (Mr Gordon) who is a colleague of mine, coming from the same district, and who is as familiar as I am with lumbering operations in the north country and also with the anomalies which exist in that section. There is enough legal machinery and, more than that, there is enough humanity in the Canadian people to see that under our modern conditions men should receive better treatment than that given to the ones I have just mentioned; it is worse than the Egyptians must have meted out to the Israelites in the construction of the pyramids. I speak very feelingly on this matter. I could mention names of officials; I could mention Mr. Stanley Merchant of Smooth Rock Falls and Mr. Schanche of Iroquois Falls who are heart and soul with the working men and also the management that they represent, who do not want to be unfair to them and who want them to be good healthy Canadians. Nevertheless a lead must be given and maintained. A lead was given last fall by the stand of labour unionism, the bushmen's organization in the camps, but it must be maintained by the statutes we pass whether provincially or federally. The men must have a more sympathetic hearing and a lead from the government, whether provincial or federal. After all, the citizens of any country are its greatest wealth. I believe that in Canada we are more fortunate than any other nation in the world, but I have shown to the house the anomalies that exist and they must be remedied. Those bushmen, those settlers, do not want any special favours; all they want is a place in the sun and the right to live properly, decently and comfortably. Within our own limits, in our own section it must be possible for these men to receive the treatment that they deserve.

As far as the management of our great newsprint, sulphite and pulpwood industry is concerned, I have only words of praise. But we are all familiar with the fact that on account of watered stock and over-capitalization of some of these big corporations, on account of the extravagance shown by their heads, men who had no direct contact with their management, injustices have arisen and industrial organizations that ought to have been on a paying basis were on the rocks. If these capitalizations were reduced to their natural and proper level I am satisfied these organizations would become going concerns and it should then be possible to give fair remuneration to the working men who devote their time and their energy and their life to the production of the raw material of that important industry.

I believe that no one would censure me for bringing these matters to the attention of the house. We of northern Ontario and northern Quebec belong, geographically speaking, to central Canada. When we hear in the house about maritime rights we sympathize to some extent with their claims. The same applies to the claims of the western provinces and other sections of the country; and surely the members of this house in general can see the anomalies and the problems that beset us in northern Ontario. We do not want favours; all we want is a place in the Canadian family, a hearing of our injustices and problems, and their fair discussion and solution. We intend to cultivate and maintain the spirit of cooperation so necessary to every section of Canada, and in our own sphere of action to continue in our humble way to try to make better and greater the country in which we live.

Mr. HARRY BUTCHER (Last Mountain): Mr. Speaker, before directing a few remarks to the speech from the throne I would like to join with hon. members who have preceded me in congratulating the mover (Mr. Gobeil) and the seconder (Mr. Barber) of the address in reply. I very much regret to have to admit that I could not understand the speech of the former; it is my misfortune that I do not understand French. I did, however, appreciate the excellent speech made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber). I thought it was a moderate and reasonable speech, and I think it was enjoyed by every member of the house.

I would like to draw attention to the amendment to the amendment, moved by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner). According to that amendment the resolution as amended would read as follows:

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's present advisers and official opposition do not possess the confidence of this house or of the country.

I presume that at the close of this debate the house will be asked to pass upon this motion. First the members will be asked to vote as to whether they have confidence in the opposition, and I fear that the motion of the hon. member for Acadia will be supported. Then a vote will probably be taken upon the amendment proposed by my right hon. leader, and that will be defeated. I think it would be very interesting if after that a vote might be taken as to whether the third party has the confidence of the house or the country. Unfortunately the rules of the house I suppose will not permit that. We shall not be permitted to ask this house whether they have confidence in the third party. But we may at least ask the country. Perhaps it is not necessary, however, to ask the country, for already certain parts of it have pronounced their views on that subject. Nova Scotia answered a while ago in quite decided terms. A little while before that election I had a conversation with a very intelligent young Nova Scotian in my own district who had just received a letter from a friend in Nova Scotia. My neighbour of whom I am speaking is a very strong adherent of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and he told me that this letter he had received from a friend in Nova Scotia conveyed to him the glad news that Nova Scotia was going solidly for the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation at the provincial election. Well, it didn't; in fact Nova Scotia replied in almost needlessly harsh terms to their request for support and confidence. Then British Columbia answered, perhaps a little less emphatically but none the less decidedly; and finally Mackenzie. In Mackenzie constituency probably the ground was as favourable as any that could have been found in western Canada. The candidate was handpicked. In that constituency there were at least two men of excellent reputation who had worked hard to secure the support of their fellow members of the Farmer-Labour party. They were rejected, and a man who was obviously selected by the leaders of the party—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am sure the hon. gentleman does not want to mislead this house. The statement that he has made is not correct.

Mr. BUTCHER: I am sure I do not want to hurt the feelings of the hon. gentleman. Perhaps I should not say that, I should say he was introduced to the constituency—

Mr. VALLANCE: Handpicked.

Mr. BUTCHER: —by the son-in-law, I understand, of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The statement is not correct.

Mr. BUTCHER: I accept the hon. gentleman's statement that it is not correct. But at any rate this gentleman, this handpicked candidate, was rejected by the constituency of Mackenzie; that at least I think will not be denied by the hon. gentleman.

Then I want to read a statement made by the hon. member for Acadia as follows:

As I am limited to forty minutes I have not at my disposal the time, for instance, to give an outline of the program of the United Farmers of Alberta; nor have I at my disposal the time to give an outline of the program of the Labour group and other groups affiliated with the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. I have not the time to discuss the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation platform, but we have given it to the world; it is open to anyone to know what that program is. The program of these different groups is available to all who desire to know exactly what we are aiming at. And that is something of which the people of Canada have no knowledge, as far as the Liberal party is concerned.

[Mr. Butcher.]

I want definitely to dispute that statement—both statements as a matter of fact. The people of Canada, those who are interested, have very definite knowledge of the platform of the Liberal party. On the other hand they have not equally definite knowledge of the platform of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. Why? Because it seems to me that there is a different platform for different provinces. For instance we understand that in some parts of the country the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation stands for the socialization of all natural resources, including land. That was the program of the United Farmers of Alberta some few years ago. I understand that now it is no longer a plank in their platform. Freedom of speech is announced as one of the policies of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, yet we are told that in the province of British Columbia it was very definitely stated that there would be discipline of the members of the party as well as restriction of the right of the press to publish anything that was detrimental to the party. So that altogether I think it may truly be said that there are two misstatements—not wilful of course, but two misstatements in the passage I read. In the first place we have not, and the country has not, a definite statement as to the platform of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and it certainly has a definite statement as to the policy of the Liberal party.

Now I want to refer to two short passages in the speech from the throne. The first reads as follows:

My government realize, however, that further increases in price levels are necessary to insure success to those engaged in agriculture.

This is undoubtedly true; I do not imagine that any person will question it. The prices of agricultural products certainly must be raised before there can be anything approaching prosperity for agriculture. There must be prosperity for agriculture before there can be prosperity for industry. But already there has been an increase in the price level of commodities, other than agricultural products, which is in excess of the increase in the price level of agricultural products. I have here a very excellent little publication published by the Searle Grain Company and called the Farmer's Index, in which it is stated that on December 15, 1933, wheat had a purchasing power of 42 per cent of that which it had in the year 1913-14, but that on January 15, 1934, this purchasing power had increased to 56 per cent of that of 1913-14. It is pointed out that while the price of wheat on January 15, 1934, was 71 per cent of the 1913-14 price, the commodities purchased by the farmer were 25 per cent higher than they were in that year. That means that with any given sum to-day the farmer can purchase only fifty-six per cent of the commodities he could have purchased with that same amount in 1913-14.

I think here we find one reason for a great part of the unemployment that exists to-day. There is no doubt whatever that tens of thousands of farmers throughout the land need implements, farm tools, machinery of all sorts and lumber for building; they need clothing, boots and in fact all kinds of commodities that industry would be very glad indeed to supply. Already reference has been made to this fact, but may I say that in my own constituency during the recess I visited half a dozen or more of those farmers who were regarded as prosperous. I talked over the situation with them, and I found that each of these men needed new machinery that he could not afford to purchase at the present time, as well as a hundred other things around the farm and home. Therefore if the wish expressed in the speech from the throne could be only realized, and the purchasing power of the farmers increased, at once a new impulse would be given to industry.

The question arises as to how it can be done, and here of course is where great differences of opinion will arise. The speech from the throne states:

> You will be invited to consider legislation designed to facilitate the efficient and profitable marketing of live stock and agricultural products.

No doubt careful consideration will be given any proposal the government may bring forward, but a further question arises. Is there likely to be any substantial increase in the price of wheat so long as we have such a large carry-over? I am convinced in my own mind that our tremendous carry-over of wheat, which has been referred to by several speakers during this debate, is a continual threat to the wheat market, and that threat will not be removed until that surplus has been considerably reduced. I am going to make a suggestion to the government, and I hope that at least it will be considered. It may be thought impractical, but I believe that in time it may be found to be quite the opposite. Notwithstanding the fact that the wheat markets of Europe are so limited, and that some of them appear to be closed entirely, is it not remotely possible that some of those countries would be willing to barter manufactured goods for some of our wheat? I know that the suggestion will not meet with approval on the part of many of our industrial concerns. I know that it may be said, for instance, that Germany and other countries have all the wheat they require, but I believe that practically every European country could take wheat on reciprocal terms. If we would say to some of these countries, "We will barter 25,000,000 bushels of wheat for manufactured products of an equal value," it is just possible that some of our surplus wheat could be disposed of. If our surplus could be reduced by that means I believe that would be the first step towards an increase in price.

There is another paragraph in the speech from the throne to which I should like to direct the greater part of my remarks. In the last paragraph I find these words:

> You will be invited to consider, amongst others, measures relating to the Excise Act, the Companies Act, the Judges Act, and the Elections Act.

In particular I want to refer to those measures that will relate to the Companies Act. I think the time certainly has arrived when the companies acts of the dominion and the provinces as well need overhauling. One must admit, and we cheerfully do admit, that among the thousands of company promotions in the past the vast majority have been absolutely legitimate enterprises, reasonably financed and carefully organized. In most cases such companies have served a good and useful purpose. Doubtless many mergers also have been of a beneficial character. Of such mergers and such companies and their promoters I have no criticism to offer, and the remarks I am about to make certainly do not apply to them. But there have been other promotions and other promoters that certainly do not fall within the foregoing category, but are of an entirely different character. They have not served any useful purpose; on the contrary their operations have been distinctly detrimental to the interests of the public and absolutely disastrous to those individuals who have been induced to invest in the securities offered for sale.

I think most of us will admit that there are many grave weaknesses and many striking injustices in our economic system of to-day. We do not admit that this system should be scrapped; we do not believe it should be scrapped, but we do believe that these weaknesses and injustices should be remedied. I cannot imagine for a moment that even the stoutest apologist for our present economic system will deny the charges I have made, nor will he deny that many financial crimes have been perpetrated in the recent past by a very objectionable type of company promoter and a similar type of financier and financial organization, causing great loss and hardship and even the most acute suffering to thousands of investors, as well as resulting in a very great increase in the cost of living to the consumer. This is one of the outstanding weaknesses of our system; I refer to the ease with which some financiers have been able to exercise their predatory habits by taking control of certain essential industries in which their only interest is to bleed them white. Already this evening an hon. gentleman has made reference to the milk industry and the manner in which huge fortunes have been piled up by the people handling the milk while the producers have been reduced almost to beggary. No doubt there have been many times when the promoters of this kind of enterprise have been caught themselves in the maelstrom resulting from their operations. They have been caught in the net they spread for others, but that does not in the slightest degree lessen the enormity of their offences or render it any less necessary that the most stringent legislation should be enacted to prevent a repetition thereof.

When we come to investigate the reasons for many of these promotions we find that mainly there are three or four, the first being the desire to make huge profits out of stock manipulation through the organization, reorganization or merging of the companies concerned. Then, having promoted these companies, they demand of the management that they shall reduce the cost of production to the lowest possible point, chiefly by oppressing labour, with no intention whatever of passing the saving on to the consumer but rather that of seeking to exact the highest possible price, make the largest possible profit, control the market and eliminate as far as possible all competition, by any means whatsoever, legitimate or illegitimate. There is no doubt whatever that if not actual fraud something shockingly near to it has been perpetrated by promoters in order to mislead the investing public either by misstatement of material facts or by withholding material information. No doubt these men have been induced to form these various companies because of a general and somewhat natural desire on the part of the public to amass wealth quickly, and they have taken advantage of this desire in order greatly to enrich themselves. With that lack of mercy which is peculiar to the tiger and the wolf, with the cunning of the fox, with fair promises on their lips but foul designs in their minds, they have set out to defraud and cheat the investing public. I know these are strong terms but they are undoubtedly true, and I am quite sure that many hon. members can think at this moment of instances of this kind of thing.

During the past few years there has been, as has already been mentioned in this house, a great increase in the number of huge incomes in the United States—the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) made a reference to this yesterday. I have here some figures which might interest the house. They are taken from Industry, Commerce and Finance, Chapter 4, Use and Abuse of Credit. The extract reads as follows:

Another set of figures that throws some light upon the amounts taken from the general public has been supplied recently by the Internal Revenue Department of the United States government in its income tax returns for the year 1928. The number of personal incomes in the United States in the various classes in 1928, as compared with 1927 were as folows:

That is just one year—1928 as compared with 1927. I shall not read all these figures but I will point out to the house that incomes between $1,000 and $5,000 were decreased by 128,986 in that one year, while in that same year incomes of over $5,000 were increased by 98,323. But that is not the worst of it. Here are some further figures showing how other incomes have grown:

Class of Income	Number of Individuals 1927	1928	Increase
$ 100,000 and under $ 150,000	5,261	7,049	1,788
150,000 and under 300,000	3,873	5,678	1,805
300,000 and under 500,000	1,141	1,756	615
500,000 and under 750,000	384	685	301
750,000 and under 1,000,000	173	298	125
1,000,000 and under 1,500,000	138	284	126
1,500,000 and under 2,000,000	56	108	52
2,000,000 and under 3,000,000	55	91	36
3,000,000 and under 4,000,000	22	40	18
4,000,000 and under 5,000,000	8	18	10
5,000,000 and over	11	26	15

All this happened in one year, according to the United States income tax returns as published by the Internal Revenue Department. In 1928 there were 26 people with an income of $5,000,000 and over, as compared with eleven in 1927. I know that hon. gentlemen will say: "Why mention these things here? They do not apply to Canada; there is nothing like that in this country." There is no reason to believe that that kind of thing has gone on to the same extent in Canada, but it would be interesting to know to what extent less it has been happening here. The evidence already given before the Senate committee in the United States has been a terrible indictment of high finance in that country, and one wishes that a similarly exhaustive inquiry might be made into the history of some of our own enterprises, Canada Paper and Power, for instance. The financial brigands of whom I am complaining have in many instances chosen for their operations the necessaries of life and the minor luxuries for which there is a great demand. They have selected bread, fruit, fish, milk, coal, cotton, wool, pulp and paper, cement, asbestos and radio. Everywhere they dip unholy hands into the life stream of the people. Nothing is sacrosanct to them if by any means, be they ever so foul, they may enrich themselves at the expense of the public. This house has a duty with respect to these men, and I am hopeful that the government when it brings down amendments to the Companies Act will provide restrictive measures against this kind of thing. If that duty is neglected a day of reckoning will surely come, and it may take a form distasteful to most hon. members. The patience of many of our citizens is well-nigh exhausted; they are becoming better informed. If we fail to rise to the occasion, we cannot justly complain if we are replaced by other men who will deal with the matter.

During the dying days of last session I placed several questions on the order paper and received answers, and I am going to read these questions and answers because I want to make an explanation of my reason for placing the questions on the order paper. The first question was:

1. Was a petition for an inquiry under The Combines Investigation Act alleging that an illegal combine consisting of: Canadian General Electric Company Limited, Canadian Marconi Company (limited liability), Canadian Westinghouse Company Limited, Northern Electric Company Limited, Western Electric Company Limited, Standard Radio Manufacturing Corporation (now the Rogers-Majestic Corporation), Canadian Radio Patents Limited, is operating and has operated since January 19, 1927, filed with the registrar under the Combines Investigation Act, during the year 1930?

The reply to that question was "Yes." The next question was:

2. Did the registrar make an investigation and report to the minister?

The answer was "Yes." The third question was:

3. Was the report of the registrar of such a character as to induce the minister to transmit the complaint, the petition, copy of the evidence taken at the investigations and other necessary documents to the Attorney-General of Ontario for appropriate action under section 31 (a) and (b) of the Combines Investigation Act?

The answer to that was "Yes." The next question was:

4. In view of the fact that the Attorney-General of Ontario did not institute proceedings against the alleged illegal combine, has the minister considered the advisability of applying any of the other remedies enumerated in section 31 of the Combines Investigation Act, and what decision has he arrived at in connection therewith?

The answer to that was "Yes, but no further action is contemplated."

I shall now refer to a few of the allegations made in the petition for an investigation filed with the registrar of the Combines Investigation Act in connection with the alleged combine alluded to in the questions I have just read. I shall remark first, however, that of all the pernicious and, in my opinion, financially immoral ventures to which I have referred, this least touches the actual necessities of life. Nevertheless it is an example, though not the best that might be afforded, of that rapacious greed which characterizes the actions of many of the men whose names are almost invariably found upon the list of those most interested in this sort of enterprise. May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to inform you and the house of some of the outstanding features of this particular alleged illegal combine?

In June, 1930, a declaration alleging the existence of an illegal combine was regularly filed with the registrar under the Combines Investigation Act. The declarant, one Charles Ridgway Gilpin of the city of Niagara Falls, in the county of Welland and province of Ontario, declared that a combine was then operating and had operated throughout the Dominion of Canada since January 19, 1927, for the manufacture and sale of radio sets and radio vacuum tubes. It was said that the combine consisted of the companies which I have already named. The petition alleged further that the Canadian Radio Patents Limited was incorporated by and on behalf of the other companies which I have named, with the addition of the Western Electric Company Limited. It was alleged that this company had an authorized share capital of 50,000 common shares without nominal or par value and that the directorate was composed of two directors to represent each of the first named company and Mr. Russell Smart, the patent counsel for all the said companies. At the time the petition for an investigation was filed, it was alleged that 27,500 shares had been issued to the following companies in the following amounts:

Canadian General Electric Company Limited, 6,250 shares.
Canadian Westinghouse Company Limited, 6,250 shares.
Canadian Marconi Company Limited, 6,250 shares.
Northern Electric Company Limited, 6,250 shares.
Standard Radio Manufacturing Company Limited, now the Rogers Majestic Corporation Limited, 2,500 shares.

It was alleged also that according to the annual summary of March 31, 1929, no cash had been paid into the treasury of Canadian Radio Patents Limited. It was alleged further that Canadian Radio Patents Limited was owned and controlled by the members of the combine and that it was not the assignee of the patents set forth in the licences, but was merely a licensee. Among other allegations it was alleged that the objects of the formation of Canadian Radio Patents Limited were:

(a) Fixing a common licence fee for the manufacture of radio receiving sets under patents pooled by the aforesaid companies in Canadian Radio Patents Limited.
(b) Fixing a common or resale price.
(c) Preventing or lessening competition in, and substantially controlling within the Dominion of Canada, or any particular area thereof, or district, production, manufacture, purchase, barter or sale of radio receiving sets.
(d) The otherwise restricting or injuring trade or commerce.

Any one of these allegations, if proved, would constitute an offence under the Combines Investigation Act. In proof of the statements referred to, and many others of an equally serious nature, the declarant gave many details, far too many to be mentioned in a forty minute speech. But it may be stated at once that the material provided did induce the registrar under the Combines Investigation Act to lay the whole matter before the then Minister of Labour. The then Minister of Labour was sufficiently impressed to cause the appointment of Professor Taylor to conduct an investigation under the act. Owing to Professor Taylor's indisposition, the investigation was not then proceeded with. The then government was shortly afterwards superseded by the present government, who, on coming into office, again authorized Professor Taylor to investigate. Quite evidently the new Minister of Labour was impressed by the evidence submitted to him as a result of the investigation for, doubtless acting under his instructions, the registrar turned the investigator's report along with the other necessary material over to the attorney general of the province of Ontario. The attorney general in turn forwarded it to the crown attorney for the city of Toronto, presumably for action. Judging from copies of the correspondence I have seen, apparently the latter gentleman was of the opinion that prosecution should not follow for the following reasons:

(a) That there had been by that time a substantial reduction in the price of tubes.
(b) That the public expense would be large.
(c) That there appeared to be no public demand for prosecution.

With regard to the first reason, it would appear that the reduction in price was subsequent to the commencement of the investigation and that there was no guarantee that prices would not be increased again directly it became evident that no further steps were to be taken.

With regard to the second reason, a large public expense might have been warranted had the result been an exposure of the methods employed to control not only this but other industries of even greater importance to the general public.

With regard to the third reason, it is submitted that the conclusion that no public demand for prosecution had been created may be justly attributed to the fact that the public were unaware of the way in which they were being gouged in order to make unreasonable profits for the promoters of the alleged combine.

Again it must be admitted that of all the products that are now or have been controlled by combines in the past, radio receiving sets are perhaps the least important. They are certainly much less important than the absolute necessities of life such as coal, milk, cotton, cement, and so on, nevertheless we have here another example of the fact that the greedy type of financier to which I have referred has always sought to control some commodity for which there is a large public demand.

In bringing my remarks to a close, I would point out that the material filed with the registrar afforded a strong presumption that the alleged combine was illegal within the meaning of the Combines Investigation Act. In view of the fact that the Attorney General of the province of Ontario did not take definite action against the alleged combine,

I would urge upon the government the advisability of taking one or more of the remedial steps provided by the act. These steps, briefly enumerated, are as follows:

Reduction or abolition of duties,

Revocation of patent,

The Solicitor General may permit an information to be laid against the guilty party.

As I have stated already, the commodity in question in this alleged combine is not one of great necessity to the welfare of the people but it is certainly one of the minor luxuries which we desire to see in every home. This case provides an example of the greed of the type of men who are eternally looking for something for which there is a great demand in order that they may make money out of the promoting of companies to handle such commodity. I shall conclude by making certain suggestions as to the chief lessons to be learned from the foregoing. They are as follows:

1. That there should be exceedingly strict control of all company promotions.

2. That all applications for incorporation sponsored, directly or indirectly, by promoters who have in the past been actively engaged in fleecing the public should be suspect from the very commencement.

3. That watering of stock should be a criminal offence.

4. That many of the reprehensible practices that can at present be dealt with only by our civil courts should be made criminal offences, punishable by both fine and imprisonment.

5. That anything less than complete and full disclosure of all material facts in prospectus or sales literature should be a criminal offence, also punishable by fine and imprisonment.

6. That all parties who contribute to the issue and sale of corporation securities, whether as promoters, brokers, investment bankers, agents, salesmen and even the "expert" who "certifies" to a material statement should be liable to an action for damages wherever and whenever misstatements or misrepresentation of any material fact in literature used by them with the object of inducing any person to purchase such security results in such sale.

7. That omission to state a material fact should be equally punishable as a misstatement of a material fact.

8. That annual statements of corporations should contain as full disclosure of material facts as the original prospectus or sale literature, and that breaches of such provision be punishable as in the foregoing paragraphs.

9. That the payment of bonuses to managing officials without the consent of shareholders should be an offence.

10. That price concessions to interlocking interests and to persons who are supposed to have influence with the powers that be, while the public must pay current prices, should be prohibited, with penalties for breach of this regulation.

I am hoping that in the amendments to the Companies Act to be brought down it may be found that the federal government, collaborating with the provincial governments, has been able to embody some of these provisions.

Mr. ELIE O. BERTRAND (Prescott) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it is an established custom that, at the opening of each session of parliament in the British Empire, the representative of His Majesty is the mouthpiece of the government when delivering the speech from the throne, thus informing the people of the country as regards their economic, social, national and international situation. Moreover, the document indicates the legislation to be enacted in the course of the session for the general welfare of the nation.

I think, sir, that our people were anxious to hear of the speech from the throne, so as to be informed of the legislation that the government had in view to alleviate the burden which so heavily weighs on the shoulders of the Canadian nation, and more particularly, may I say, on those of the farming and labouring classes.

In perusing the speech from the throne, one notes that the government intends to enrich the country with a central bank. It is very difficult to know exactly what is the object of this central bank, judging from the outlines given to us the other day by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) namely that its aim was to control credit from the national viewpoint and stabilize our monetary system with reference to our international relations and commercial exchanges. Therefore, it is very difficult, at present, to discuss the subject, not knowing what legislation will be brought down to remedy the situation. I fear, sir, that this central bank will prove nothing less than an institution for our large bankers. Moreover, it is what is said in certain high financial quarters. If one could obtain in Canada—it is stated—the establishment of a bankers' bank, it would facilitate the business of those who generally carry on large transactions. The people fear that such an institution will be created in this country.

The speech from the throne also mentions that the resolutions of the World Economic Conference will be submitted to the house. It is therefore difficult to discuss at length the subject, because we are informed that amendments to the Bank Act and monetary system will be later on submitted. We must necessarily wait to find out what a central bank means and know what changes will be made in the quotation of our present currency, as compared with what it is now on the basis of gold which we still retain under our present financial legislation. We must necessarily await the bringing down of such legislation so as to be correctly informed of what the house will have to consider.

Further on, the speech from the throne refers to a measure so as to curtail wheat seeding. I wish to frankly admit, sir, that a number of farmers from the southern and eastern sections of Ontario rejoice in seeing that the Dominion had at last understood the farmer's problem by giving a bonus of 5 cents per bushel, in 1932, on all Western wheat, because it was only fair that the growing of certain products, especially wheat, should afford a livelihood to its farmers, and, therefore, the government came to the rescue of those who carried on this production. When however, to-day, so as to solve the problem of those who carry on such wheat growing, they are requested to reduce, in the future, the acreage sown, it affords very little hope of improvement to the farmers of Canada, Ontario and Quebec. However, again do I state that one must necessarily wait. The government also leads us to hope that a measure in connection with agricultural short term and intermediate credits will be brought down so as to help the farmer. The latter is certainly in need of this credit and this, in various ways; however, if we are to judge from the statement made by the right hon. Prime Minister, in answer to the leader of the opposition's (Mr. Mackenzie King) question, the other day, it will be very difficult for the farming classes to obtain such credits, either in cooperation with the government or in cooperation with our financial institutions. He stated: who, among you, after all, would loan money to someone who is wholly insolvent or is on the eve of becoming so?

I am sorry to state, sir, that the farmers whom I have the honour of representing—for the county of Prescott, with the exception of a small industrial town, is essentially farming—are absolutely in the situation described by the Prime Minister. We took much pride in the past in the fact that the farming class was the foundation upon which rested the entire economic structure of our country and that the labouring classes were certainly those who purchase the largest quantities both of the manufactured and agricultural products. I really wonder whether one can find in the speech from the throne, such as delivered to us, any hope of relief. It is true that one finds a little further on, that works are to be undertaken toward the relief of the unemployed, in the course of the year. I shall refer to this subject later, as well as to another in connection with agriculture to which the speech from the throne makes reference.

The speech from the throne further states that we shall be given an opportunity to study the Excise Act, the Judges Act, the Companies Act and the Elections Act. I shall not dwell further on that part of the speech. However, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Butcher) on the able speech he delivered as regards the necessity of amending the Companies Act, so that the various companies, holding either dominion or provincial charters, be so organized that they will only issue stable values to the public, and that the act be so drawn up to protect the interests of those who invest money in such enterprises, thus preventing speculation and informing the public of the real value of their shares or bonds previous to being put on the market.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can err much in repeating what was so well stated by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) that, of all classes, the agricultural one is certainly the class which is undergoing the greatest hardships and meeting the most difficulties. The speech from the throne sufficiently and very clearly states on this subject:

> The prices of agricultural products which have fallen in recent years to the lowest level in history, have shown substantial improvement in the last few months. My government realize, however, that further increases in price levels are necessary to ensure success to those engaged in agriculture.

In fact, if we compare farming products with those manufactured, and if we take as a basis of comparison the year 1926 when the values of products were practically normal, when the farmer could fairly well balance his budget, and when our industries, trade and all other activities in the country were prosperous, I think we can well refer to the figure 100 as an indication of the value of these products. Therefore, basing our calculations on the year 1926, we find that the farmer would have required the amount of products which I shall mention shortly to purchase one dollar of manufactured goods. Taking the figure 100 as our basis of comparison for 1926, the farmer could purchase $1.00 of manufactured goods in 1926, with $1.00 of farm products. In 1927, he could purchase $1.00 of manufactured goods with 95 cents of farm products. In 1928, $1.00 worth with 94 cents. In 1929, $1.00 of manufactured goods with 92 cents. In 1930, $1.00 of manufactured goods with $1.06. In 1931, $1.00 of manufactured goods with $1.33. In 1932, $1.00 with $1.44 of farm products. In 1933, $1.00 of manufactured goods with $1.38 of farm products.

Therefore, in 1933, last year, the farmer was forced to sell $1.38 of farm products so as to purchase $1.00 of manufactured articles, namely a drop of 38 per cent in the value of his products. The farmer must necessarily purchase a great number of articles which he does not produce on his farm. I must add that the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi stole a march on me with reference to the remarks that I intended to make so as to prove the difficult situation of the farmer. I, however, wish to congratulate the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi on his courage. In spite of what is disclosed in the speech from the throne, in spite of his leader's policy, and notwithstanding that he is a government supporter, he admits that there is nothing of any consquence in the speech from the throne, not an iota, that this question should be considered outside of party politics, because the farmer is at the door of bankruptcy and he must absolutely be assisted.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): If the hon. member will allow me. The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi made the same statement last year, he, however, repudiated his statement fifteen days later.

Mr. BERTRAND (Translation): The hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) may be right, however, it gave me pleasure to meet a repentant sinner wishing to preach the good cause. I only saw the good intention of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Hell is paved with good intentions.

Mr. BERTRAND (Translation): Truly, sir, we cannot have more convincing proofs in this matter than those given by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil). Referring to the price of butter, when he moved the address in reply to the speech from the throne, he stated that, in 1929, butter was worth 39 cents in Canada, while in the United States it was worth 45 cents; and he added that, in 1933, butter was worth 20 cents in Canada, while American butter sold at 21 cents on the New York market. He asserted that we had made a great gain since the difference was much less between the price of butter on the Canadian and the United States markets. However, the hon. member for Compton forgot to state that the fixed charges of the farming class are the same as those of 1930, at the time of the Dominion election when all Conservatives taking their cue from their leader, felt sorry for the Canadian farmer, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, they stated that something had to be done to enhance the price levels on agriculture. To-day, although the farmer's lot is the same as in 1930, so far as his debts and liabilities are concerned the hon. member for Compton will allow me to prove, according to his own figures, that the price of butter has decreased 18·70 cents per pound. I do not think that such was the expectation of the farmers, when they listened to our friends proclaiming their policy in 1930.

It is, therefore, not amazing that, to-day, the government states in the speech from the throne:

> You will be invited to consider legislation designed to facilitate the efficient and profitable marketing of live stock and agricultural products.

We welcome such a statement; however, as we are all aware that agricultural products in the world's markets fall under the inevitable law of supply and demand, the statement seems to us as having been inserted in the speech from the throne in view of a probable election in the course of this year. It is a clever way of renewing the pledges of 1930, and, in my opinion, we are greatly reminded of the promises of 1930; for instance those made by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), then leader of the opposition.

At Woodstock, N.B., on July 2, 1930, he stated:

> I regret to see the deserted farm lands of New Brunswick, Quebec and other provinces. Well, I am going to say right here that I shall regard it as my great responsibility if elected on July 28 to see that the collective weight and power of the Dominion of Canada is placed behind agriculture. I would be lacking in qualifications entitling me to head a government if I failed to do so.

We are told, at times, that this pledge was fulfilled since the national market was reserved for the Canadian farmer and that it helped to safeguard the interests of the farming classes. I openly state, sir, that this explanation will not satisfy the farming community of this country, even if some of these pledges have had the honour of being included in the speech from the throne, in 1934. In order to realize to its full extent the difficult situation in which the farmer finds himself, we must quote figures to prove the loss in value of farm products since 1929, the last fiscal year when we were in power, and those of 1932, the last year for which I was able to get statistics on the subject.

The right hon. Prime Minister, in his last speech, quoting a large number of statistics to prove how all the other classes of our social order, all other undertakings and trade activities of this country were progressing, uttered these encouraging words which still linger in my ears: 25 per cent increase in the mining industry, so much per cent for pulpwood, so much per cent for paper. I wonder if there were a small per cent increase for the farming class, so that they might face with more hope the coming year. We note however that it is quite the contrary, when facts are weighed. I shall refer to prices of products in this country and not of those on exports, which are not indicative of products consumed here. The field crops, throughout the country, in 1929, were valued at $948,981,000. In 1932, they were simply valued at $416,587,000:

Live stock on the farm.	$207,317,000	$69,033,000
Wool.	4,470,000	1,093,000
Dairy products.	291,743,000	131,623,000
Fruits and vegetables.	46,398,000	30,245,000
Poultry and eggs. . .	107,664,000	48,824,000
Tobacco.	6,276,000	6,088,000
Clover and grass seed.	2,957,000	962,000
Honey.	2,806,000	1,651,000

For the above products the total value of such farm products, in 1929, amounted to $1,631,081,000 and, in 1932, $711,898,000. Therefore, the value of farm products has decreased more than 50 per cent since 1929, while manufactured products decreased, on an average, 21 per cent or from 100 to 79. That is the situation in which the farmers are placed, they are obliged to face all their liabilities with a decreased revenue of 50 per cent. The value of their land has equally suffered; as a consequence of this said situation, they have lost their purchasing power; as correctly stated by the right hon. Prime Minister, these people are in a difficult position to borrow money. More than 50 per cent of the population of the county which I have the honour of representing in the house, find themselves in that sad plight and in pointing this out like the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) did, I request that special consideration be given to the problems of this class of people who are in need and suffer hardships, they are on the eve of losing their land, a heritage left to them by their forbears after having toiled and laboured numerous years. I publicly state this fact, because the farm is not a place where money is earned and accumulates easily, especially in Ontario and Quebec. One must toil many years and long hours daily to set aside a few savings. In our section, at present, the savings of all have entirely disappeared. In order to prevent the farmers from increasing the number of unemployed and becoming also dependent on the government, everything possible must be done to help this class of our population.

I stated, last year, in enumerating our Dominion, provincial, municipal, school and other liabilities for which the people of this country have rendered themselves responsible, that the enormous amount of such debts burdens us with heavy interest and that if that amount were equally distributed it would amount to $73.20 per capita or $365 per family of five. Thus the farmer burdened with such debts finds it absolutely impossible to meet his liabilities. I am not referring to those who are settled on old farms entirely paid for, but to those upon which there are mortgages and I state that it is absolutely impossible for these farmers to clear their debts unless markets are found for them in order that they can sell their products at a higher price than that obtained at present. Means certainly can be found to assist the farmer. One of these, absolutely necessary, would be to lower the rate of interest, this would alleviate the burden which weighs so heavily on the Canadian people and still more heavily on the farming community, because, as I stated last year, it is the most numerous class, the one most attached to the land and possessing more real estate than any other class; this being so, they must pay a larger portion of the nation's liabilities. May I suggest that sacrifices be requested from big financiers and that the rate of interest be reduced to 2 per cent.

Last year the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) stated that the rates of interest would be reduced. The farmers of my district read this statement with much joy. However, what a disappointment they experienced when they heard that it was the rates of interest on the déposits in banks that were to be reduced from 3 to 2½ per cent. In other words the depositors would receive in the future ½ per cent less on the money they entrust to the banks. This in no way helps the farmer and does not improve his credit, since the banks will no longer make loans to farmers in our district. This measure was therefore no help to agriculture.

It was possible to assist the farming class by reducing the rates of interest and lowering the tariff in order that they might purchase at reduced prices the articles which are indispensable to them and in order that these prices should correspond to the present prices of farm products. Such measures would be absolutely fair, would prevent certain capitalists profiteering through the tariffs adopted by this administration and would establish a more reasonable equilibrium between the various classes of society.

The liberals are not the only ones who believe that such measures are just and equitable. Sir Robert Borden advocated lower tariffs, in February last year; he stated that it was necessary to wipe out the restrictions which paralyzed international trade. This statement was endorsed by numerous citizens who were in the habit of proclaiming that protection was indispensable to this country. Sir John Aird stated that tariffs should be lowered throughout the world. Mr. Thomas Bradshaw, of the North American Life, asserted that tariff changes were absolutely necessary. Sir Herbert Holt contended that tariffs and economic wars were of no avail. Mr. S. J. Moore, of the Nova Scotia bank stated that it was absolutely necessary to relieve stagnation caused by tariff walls. Mr. McLeod, manager of the same institution, advocated radical changes in the tariffs.

Such changes would certainly help the farming community and permit it to purchase at lower cost the products they require.

If it be the correct thing for the government to guarantee the credit of certain commercial and industrial enterprises, so as to safeguard the national credit, I state that it is quite the correct thing also to guarantee the loans made to farmers in order to permit them to remain on the land, exactly the same as means were found to guarantee the loans of the Beauharnois corporations, to supply funds to the Canadian National, to loan money in order to facilitate the sale of the western wheat crop, to disburse large amounts for undertakings to relieve the unemployed, to guarantee the loans of certain provinces and finally to guarantee a loan of $60,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

After all the farming class of this country should have precedence over these various enterprises, because the farmer is the source of all their activities and is the largest consumer of this country. If no assistance is extended to him and he becomes aware that extraordinary advantages are granted to all these enterprises, while the whole nation neglects him, we wonder how we shall keep our sons on the land and succeed in settling new sections, as it is advocated throughout the country. How can our statesmen hope to succeed in settling new districts when they know that farmers who have toiled on our early settled farms can no longer earn a livelihood on them, today?

I now wish to briefly comment on the situation of the unemployed in the county which I have the honour of representing, I shall be brief because there only remains a few minutes of the time allotted to me. We have a large number of unemployed in Hawkesbury. These people would rather work than depend on the dole. I think that they will be somewhat encouraged when they read in the speech from the throne:

> My government propose further to promote employment by expenditures on essential public works and undertakings throughout the Dominion.

Such words give them hope to earn again a livelihood for their family and cease to depend on the government. Our people always prefer work to the dole, however, we have had sad experiences in our district and we do not know what to think of these large public undertakings. In 1930, the Perley bridge at Hawkesbury was erected and I confess that the workmen did not consider it a "pearly" bridge, the contractor having reduced the scale to wages agreed in the contract by 10, 15 and 20 cents per hour, moreover, the men were transferred from one class to another in order to still further lower their wages. We were obliged to complain to the Ministers of Labour and Public Works. Finally, we were forced to appeal to this house and the country before the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) and the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) were induced to force the contractor to remit to these men what they had earned.

In 1932, a contract to relieve the unemployed was granted through the intervention of the provincial government, the dominion government supplying part of the funds. It was in connection with a deviation of a road at L'Orignal. As the levelling of the road was specially undertaken to help the unemployed, we had hoped that a large number of men would be employed. Unfortunately, a mechanical shovel was used for this work and our workmen were deprived of work. In 1933, another paving contract on the transcanada highway, between Hawkesbury and L'Orignal, was given out for the purpose so-called of relieving unemployment. The contractor had intended to employ the workmen of Hawkesbury, L'Orignal and the surrounding country, he was, however, obliged to employ quite a large contingent from Rockliffe Camp, at Ottawa. Our workmen protested against this policy because it was one of the few opportunities given to them to earn enough to support their family. We most earnestly protested and immediately requested that people from the district be employed when such works were undertaken rather than having recourse to workmen brought from distant points. The more so because our people are in receipt of money provided by the unemployment fund, while work is being done at their door.

I had a few other remarks to make, but I notice that the time allotted to me is almost at an end. I shall state in closing my remarks that the people of this country are anxious for a change of government in order to give the workmen a better opportunity of earning a livelihood and the farmer a chance to return to his normal state. We contend that they suffer the most in the present crisis and I can assure you that they desire the reestablishment of a better economic equilibrium among the various classes of society, the free intercourse of our international trade and an opportunity for each individual to occupy his normal place in the midst of our population.

On motion of Mr. Maloney the debate was adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BENNETT: To-morrow we will take the business as it is on the order paper, and probably, in order that we may be prepared for business, we may go into supply and discuss shortly Finance, Justice and Public Works so that we may be able later to proceed without delay.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I may say that there will be no objection from this side of the house—

Mr. BENNETT: We will not pass any item.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I was going to say that if objection were taken to going into supply, it could not be done.

Mr. BENNETT: We have the right to make a motion to go into supply; of course we cannot go into supply automatically. It is not proposed to pass any item, but we wish to prepare the way so that we shall have two or three items that will be under discussion in order that we may proceed with supply when our present business is disposed of.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[Mr. Bertrand.]

Friday, February 2, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

PRICE SPREADS AND MASS BUYING

SPREAD BETWEEN PRICE PAID PRODUCER AND COST TO CONSUMER

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That a select standing committee of eleven members of the house be appointed to inquire into and investigate the causes of the large spread between the prices received for commodities by the producer thereof, and the price paid by the consumers therefor; the system of distribution in Canada of farm and other natural products, as well as manufactured products, and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, more particularly to inquire into and investigate,—

(a) the effect of mass buying by department and chain store organizations upon the regular retail trade of the country, as well as upon the business of manufacturers and producers;

(b) the labour conditions prevailing in industries supplying the requirements of such department and chain store organizations, and the extent, if any, to which existing conditions have been brought about by the purchasing practices of such organizations, and the effect thereof upon the standard of living amongst those employed in such industries and organizations;

(c) the relation between the flour milling industry and the bakeries of the country, and the effect of such relations upon the baking industry of Canada;

(d) the methods and system prevailing in the marketing of live stock and animal products for domestic consumption and export, and the extent to which the present system affords or restricts opportunity for fair returns to producers.

That the committee shall have power to send for persons, papers, and records, and the further power to request the appointment of a commission or commissioners under the Inquiries Act, to secure evidence to be presented to the committee by such commission or commissioners.

That the committee shall report to the house from time to time its findings, together with recommendations of such measures as in the opinion of the committee may be considered necessary to secure as far as possible, fair and just practices in the distribution and marketing systems of Canada, with fair and just returns to producers, employees, and employers, not inconsistent with the rights of consumers.

He said: The purposes to be served by the committee are, I think, amply indicated in the motion which I now move. I should not think it desirable at this time to enter into any discussion as to the correctness or otherwise of representations that have been made with respect to the causes for the great spread between the cost of commodities to the consumer and the price received by the producer. I think that might be regarded as an effort to pre-judge the case, and I prefer to leave it without making any observations as to specific instances. Suffice it to say that I think it is probably well known to most of us that there is a wide spread between the prices received by the producers and the prices paid by the consumers of most commodities, natural and otherwise, with which we have to deal in the country.

The question of the retail trade in the country has received much attention during recent months. One of the trade journals has made very strong observations as to the necessity of having the business of mass buying by large organizatinos in some way regulated, but whether or not that is possible I am not expressing an opinion. I only indicate that the matter has been very forcibly presented to the public in recent months, and it is desirable that the whole subject should be investigated.

It will be recalled by this house that after the war a conference was held, in accordance with the terms of the treaty of Peace, looking towards more equitable provision being made for compensation for labour, better hours, less onerous, shall I say, hours of service, and better compensation. In this country the acute division of legislative powers between the Dominion parliament and the provincial legislatures has occasioned much diseussion, but most of the provinces did pass minimum wage acts and regulations were made under the provisions of those statutes. It is alleged, and very strongly, that there has been practically a disregard of the provisions of those statutes in many of the provinces and that industries and factories have been placed upon the exempt list with very evil consequences to those who are employed in them. Without in any sense indicating the correctness or otherwise of the statements that have been made, the government has thought it desirable that there should be a close and careful consideration of all these matters as they affect the standard of living, compliance with the general principles of the law and the conclusions which were reached at the end of the war and embodied in the treaty of Peace and which in fact brought about the maintenance at Geneva of an international labour bureau to which we have made notable contributions.

With respect to one particular industry in this country to which I observe reference was made yesterday by an hon. member from Saskatchewan regarding the relation between the bakeries and the milling industry, it is necessary for me at this moment only to remark that many of our milling industries own bakeries as subsidiaries and that the effect that such ownership has had upon the price paid for bread or other products of the bakeries is a matter that will be considered by the committee.

The other problem to be dealt with is one that is almost a perennial, that is, how the marketing of live stock and animal products in this country may be improved. The other evening I pointed out that an effort had been made many years ago to improve conditions in Canada and that successive governments, federal and provincial, had endeavoured to grapple with the question. The committee will investigate the method and system prevailing and ascertain to what extent the present system affords the largest possible opportunity or restricts the largest possible return being given to the producers. After consideration I thought it was not desirable to enter into a discussion of specific instances, because that might be regarded as a tendency to prejudge the matter, but I realize that to set up a committee of this kind it is necessary that witnesses should be called, that papers and documents should be examined, and that the committee should have before it evidence as to hours of labour, wages paid, and conditions. That is very difficult for any committee to secure by the mere calling of witnesses and it has been thought that the committee might direct that a commission be issued to some competent person to make inquiries in factories A, B, C and D and report such conditions to the committee. I believe that would serve the purpose without undue expense, and at the same time give first-hand evidence to the committee of the conditions about which complaints have been made. I know hon. members are all familiar with the use of the word "sweatshop" and recently representations have been made to me, and, I fancy, to hon. members opposite as to conditions in some of the factories of the country. It is proposed by this method, if it meets with the approval of the chamber, to deal with the situation, that is, that the committee shall determine that a given individual who has the qualifications necessary shall be appointed to make investigations into factories in Ontario, Quebec or elsewhere and then come back to the committee and report conditions as they are found. I do not think there is anything I desire to add beyond what is stated in the motion itself and these few preliminary observations which are made in explanation of the reasons for the motion being moved.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am rising, not to take exception in any way to the purpose to be served by the motion, namely, that of establishing a special committee of the house to make the inquiry indicated in the motion itself, but rather to express surprise that the government has waited until the fifth session of this parliament to introduce a motion of this kind.

An hon. MEMBER: How long did the right hon. gentleman wait?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If we waited any length of time, it only makes the time hon. members opposite have waited still longer. If, before the late government went out of office, my hon. friends recognized the necessity for an inquiry into the matter referred to, I am more than ever surprised that they have waited so long. The point I wish to make is that, ever since this parliament has been in session, there have been persistent representations as to the necessity for an investigation into the spread of prices; and into the necessity not merely for an investigation but for action by way of legislation which would make more effective legislation already on the statutes, and to meet a most pressing and urgent situation in the country.

The motion indicates that there is to be an inquiry by a committee with the possibility of the matter being followed still further by a royal commission. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has just indicated that in all probability a royal commission will be appointed. I would take that to mean that so far as this session of parliament is concerned, if we are to judge by the length of time parliamentary committees and royal commissions usually take to do their work, we shall hardly be able to look for much in the way of legislation that will help effectively to meet what apparently at last the government recognizes to be a very serious condition. The motion is in large part one of postponing action. What the country is interested in is not so much further inquiry with respect to matters about which nearly everyone knows a great deal, but legislation, if more is required, to meet a situation that is already understood.

Among motions specifically related to the question of inquiring into the spread of prices, was one introduced and discussed at the last session. In the course of the debate information was disclosed amply sufficient to guide the government in the matter of the necessary legislation. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McKenzie) at the beginning of last session gave notice of the following resolution:

That, in the opinion of this house, an immediate inquiry should be made under the provisions of The Research Council Act, chapter 177, R.S.C., 1927, or by other means, into the causes underlying the wide spread between the prices of raw products and the prices of goods manufactured from such products.

That resolution stood on the order paper throughout the greater part of the session. Finally, a debate took place upon it, and at that time the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), who has recently been speaking on this subject, said that later on he would have some observations to make on the subject in this house which would be—and I quote his words—"sympathetic and not in any sense antagonistic to the object they have in view." Why did not the Minister of Trade and Commerce come along with his further observations before the session was over? Nothing more was heard about the resolution. It was allowed to remain on the order paper, the government gave no further opportunity to have it discussed. Yet the Minister of Trade and Commerce now says that at that time he was in sympathy with the resolution. I submit that in view of the discussion which took place on that resolution, the government might well have held an inquiry during the recess and had legislation in readiness at this time, rather than to be now asking the house to appoint a special committee to begin inquiry.

Last night, in this chamber, an address was delivered by the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Butcher) which showed as conclusively as any inquiry that could be made by a committee of this house the necessity for further legislation to meet the obvious restraints of trade and commerce which help to account for the wide spread between prices being paid to producers and those which are being paid by consumers.

I recall that this summer, speaking in western Canada, while in the province of Alberta, I drew the attention of the public to the necessity, perfectly obvious in the mind of every farmer I met while there, of some immediate investigation into what is believed by the cattle raisers to be a series of price fixing arrangements in connection with the processing of products of the cattle industry and of immediate legislation with respect thereto. I quote from a press dispatch from Claresholm, Alberta, of August 14, reported in the Ottawa Journal by Canadian Press, August 15, as follows:

"I find," said the Liberal leader to his Claresholm audience, "that people in the cattle-breeding business here are just being strangled in matters of trade."

In the combine which he believed existed there was circle after circle, each demanding its profit, so finally a great spread grew up between the producer and consumer.

It is not necessary to have any government inquiry to find out that that condition is existing, it is known by the cattle-raisers generally throughout western Canada. What I think was really to have been expected from the government at this time was, not that they should be asking the house, in this fifth session, to appoint a committee of inquiry, but that they would bring down concrete legislation in the light of information which hon. members already have, and which is ample for the purpose of guiding the government.

There is one other aspect which I think is perhaps even more important. It is that the government has already legislation available to deal with matters of this kind, if it will view the whole question sympathetically. Legislation is one thing, but the administration of existing law is quite another. I do not think one need go beyond what has taken place in the last three or four years to recognize very clearly that no matter what the laws may be, unless the department of the government that administers them is wholly sympathetic with the object in view, the law will serve very little purpose. We have on the statutes a Combines Investigation Act which provides all the machinery necessary for the purpose of making the fullest possible kind of inquiry into any matter preventing or lessening competition or restraining trade; effective machinery, machinery giving all the powers and affording as well all the safeguards needed in connection with inquiry into matters of this kind. But where inquiries have started under the Combines Investigation Act, as far as they have been within the control of the ministry proceedings have been protracted and permitted to drag along from year to year so that the legislation itself has been rendered largely ineffective. What is really needed is sympathetic administration.

To illustrate the difference between the attitude taken by hon. gentlemen opposite and that of hon. members on this side with respect to the investigation of combines, monopolies and other organizations in restraint of trade, I might point out that in 1910 the Liberal government of the day placed on the statutes a Combines Investigation Act. That statute served a useful purpose while the Liberal administration was in office. Soon after, the Conservative party came into power in 1911. In 1914, the war came on, and during the period of the war there were other matters to which attention of necessity had to be given, and some matters which were of great importance at other times did not at that time receive the same amount of attention. But long before the war was over, there was ample evidence of the extent to which formidable monopolies and combinations in restraint of trade had been developing, which had been doing much to further the artificial fixation or control of prices. Did the government of the day try to proceed under the act? Did they not rather take a course quite the opposite? Hon. gentlemen will recall that they repealed the Combines Investigation Act, and substituted for it two other pieces of legislation; the Board of Commerce Act, passed in 1919, and a so-called Combines and Fair Prices Act passed in the same year. But these measures had no sooner been passed than their constitutionality was questioned, and shortly before the government of that day went out of office a decision was given by the judicial committee of the privy council to the effect that the Board of Commerce Act was ultra vires. In other words, all that was done was to repeal an act which was wholly effective, and substitute for it measures which would prevent any real investigation taking place meanwhile.

What happened after the change of administration? In 1923, the Minister of Labour in the late Liberal administration reintroduced a Combines Investigation Act. A great deal of study and care had been given to its preparation. A Combines Investigation Act was again placed on the statutes and while a Liberal administration was in office the measure was sympathetically administered. The public soon became aware of the fact that, if the attention of the Department of Labour were drawn to combines and monopolies in restraint of trade in accordance with the provisions of the act, a very thorough investigation might be expected. The result was that many of those who otherwise might have lent themselves to price fixing by agreements to restrict and hamper trade were more cautious and careful in their action. But since hon. gentlemen opposite have come into office the Combines Investigation Act has not been as sympathetically administered. Indeed, one has only to look at the estimates laid on the table by the hon. the Minister of Finance a day or two ago, to see how this very year, at this very moment, at a time when the act is more needed than ever before, and when its provisions should be of the greatest possible service, the government is actually cutting down the appropriation needed for efficient and effective administration of the act. I have in my hand the estimates of the Department of Labour for the year ending March 31, 1935. I find that in the year 1933-34 a total of $43,000 was appropriated for the purposes of the act, but that this year there is to be an appropriation not of $43,000 but of $22,000. The vote is practically cut in half, and this at a time when hon. gentlemen by the motion which they now introduce, concede the necessity for full inquiry into the sort of thing with which the Combines Investigation Act was enacted to deal.

May I add that the Combines Investigation Act contains within its provisions ample powers for all the investigation that need be made to guide the government in the matter of further legislation? The legislation is already there, we do not need to wait for a committee of this house to report on these matters. There is ample provision in the act for conducting inquiry if the government is really in earnest.

Take one matter that the Prime Minister has just referred to, the appointment of a royal commission. The Prime Minister says when this committee meets that possibly they will want some additional information, and that in all probability a royal commission will be appointed to secure the information. Why should it be necessary to take that step when the legislation I have in my hand has anticipated and provided the means to meet the need for that very sort of thing? Let me read section 12 of the Combines Investigation Act, 1923:

> All provisions of the Inquiries Act not repugnant to the provisions of this act shall apply to any inquiry or investigation under this act, and the registrar and every commissioner shall have all the powers of a commissioner appointed under the Inquiries Act, including the powers mentioned in section 11 thereof, whether thereunto authorized by the commission issued in the case or not, except in so far as such powers may be inconsistent with the provisions of this act.

With all the powers that could be conferred under the Inquiries Act, under which royal commissions are appointed, already given the commissioner under this measure; with those powers available to the minister in order to obtain the information that is necessary to guide parliament or his department, why should there be need for a royal commission? More than that, on his own initiative the minister can hold an inquiry into any one of the various matters mentioned in the provisions of the act. He has a staff that is efficient and trained in matters of this kind, and he has a registrar who has shown his capacity for careful, tactful, thorough and efficient investigation. Why should an effort be made to get out from under this act, in an investigation of this kind, and have matters placed in the hands of a royal commission?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

In a word, Mr. Speaker, that is my objection, so far as I have any, to the motion before the house at the moment. I would not in any way discourage any step which will help arouse the ministry to the necessity for action, but I do say that they ought to be fully aroused at the present time, that they ought to have been fully aware of the need for inquiry long ago and that they ought to have been fully aware of the need for what more may be required in the way of legislation. I say the ministry ought now to be prepared with its legislation. Just about this time last year, speaking in this house, I pointed out that if there were, as I thought possible, limitations to this act in coping with new situations which have arisen, the government ought to supplement it by additional legislation. I said that the Combines Investigation Act was only a beginning. I quote from what I said on February 27, 1933:

> The Combines Investigation Act is but a mere beginning and does not meet the situation obtaining to-day. There should be more adequate facilities for investigations, and additional penalties should be imposed. Some conditions obtain which should be remedied by additional provisions in the criminal code. To-day we are seeking in vain to cope with these evils by milder methods.

Why are not additional provisions recommended for the criminal code in order to meet some of the situations which I think are pretty obvious and understood by the public generally? The public are looking at this session not for further inquiry or further royal commissions but for action in the nature of legislation.

I have just one further thought to add, and it is this: Since the government has decided that a parliamentary committee is advisable for the purpose of inquiry, the government should enlarge the scope of the inquiry in a manner which will go to the very root of the situation. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce have drawn attention to what they have referred to as mass purchasing and alleged evils growing out of mass purchases in the retail and wholesale trade. When purchases are made they are made from large manufacturing concerns, and when large manufacturing concerns fix their prices for the things they sell they take into account all items that have entered into the cost of production. I submit that what is really required, above everything else, is an inquiry into the methods of financing of some of the large industrial concerns of this country, and what through reckless financing has been occasioned by way of loss which is being passed on to the consumer and for which the consumer is paying to-day.

That is a situation, Mr. Speaker, of the existence of which we have had ample evidence south of the line, and anyone who is familiar with conditions in Canada will realize that a similar situation exists here. So I would suggest that, before this motion carries, if at all possible, it should be enlarged to include an investigation into the method of financing of some of this country's industrial concerns.

Mr. WILLIAM G. ERNST (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the Prime Minister if he would consider an amendment to paragraph (d) of the resolution. Probably in the case of no other commodity is there a greater spread between the price paid by the purchaser and the price paid to the producer than in the case of fish. Paragraph (d) may be intended to include an inquiry into the fish business, but that does not appear. So I would ask the Prime Minister if he would consider an amendment to that paragraph, inserting after the words "live stock" the word "fish," so that it would read, "in the marketing of live stock, fish and animal products."

Mr. POULIOT: And to-day is a fish day.

Mr. ERNST: Yes, and the price is too high.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): I should like to support the suggestion made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. In the Gaspe peninsula the fishermen complain that they are treated differently from their brother fishermen in the maritime provinces; this is a long-standing complaint, and it has been made more frequently since the fisheries were transferred to the provinces. At the present time there is a move on foot to have joint action taken by the dominion and the province to attend to these Quebec fisheries, so I hope the Prime Minister will agree to the suggestion that has been made and include fish in this resolution.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): When coming to attend this session of parliament, Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take a very active part in the debates, but when I saw this motion which has been brought forward by the Prime Minister I could not help thinking that it should be enlarged. Holding that opinion I wish to suggest, and in fact I may say that I am going to move, an amendment as an addition to the motion before I resume my seat.

My reason for thinking that the motion does not go far enough in the matter of investigation lies in the fact that no reference is made to the point I wish to raise. In paragraph (a) we have the matter of mass buying which is to be investigated; under paragraph (b) labour conditions are to be looked into; paragraph (c) deals with the relationship between the flour milling industry and the bakeries of Canada. These are all to be investigated, but there is one phase of the question of industrial development in Canada which I think should attract the attention of the government to a greater extent than the subjects I have mentioned, and that is the effect of the administration of the finances of this country upon industry in general.

The administration of our finances, as I understand the principle, should be so arranged as to serve industry and not have industry serve finance. It is a patent fact that within the last few years the financiers of Canada have developed industries to serve their own needs. Why should the bankers, brokers, those in charge of bondhouses, trustees or trust companies have the administration of Canadian industry? It is a known fact that one of the chief reasons for failure in the production of newsprint is that the financiers have encouraged kite flying to the very skies. Instead of pointing the way for the industries, attempting to effect a curbing influence, and pointing out that the industries are on dangerous ground, those financiers have encouraged development to the point where they, the financiers of Canada, the brokers, the trust companies and the banks have taken the personal profits to themselves, a process which has not been in the best interests of the industries affected.

The same statement would apply to the development of Canada's mineral resources, to our lumbering industry, and to many others I might name. I repeat that the time has come when this parliament should take the matter in hand and by legislation, and if necessary drastic legislation, prevent the financiers from in future handling the finances of Canada the way they have been handled in the past.

Probably the house would excuse me if to some extent I violate the rules and read from a manuscript. Why should we find industry being controlled by banks and trust companies? If the financiers had not encouraged promoters to fly their financial kites to the skies we would not have in Canada to-day such drastic failures. Let us if possible get to the bottom of the financial evil, and thus lay the foundation for more solid and enduring development of our industrial life. If we can do this we will be sounding the death knell of industrial speculation, we will be securing a solid foundation for our internal expansion, we will secure better wages for our labouring class, we will put an end to uncontrolled and ruinous competition and, above all, we will lessen mass buying, of which there is so much complaint. Through this action organized industry will be able so to lessen its overhead and control its cost of manufacture that competition will find a common ground on which to make offerings of its wares to the public. Those who complain of mass buying cannot, and should not, blame the wholesale purchaser who knows that the manufactured goods offered to him are priced on the basis of the amount of watered stock which can be traced to their cost, the effect over-capitalization has had upon the cost of production, and the relation of high interest rates to such cost.

The firm that has not been cursed by such over-capitalization, watered stock and undue rates of interest can afford to sell at prices yielding a moderate profit. Is it any wonder that wholesale dealers will say to the manufacturers, "Your prices are too high, and unless you come down to something reasonable we will have to purchase elsewhere,—outside of Canada, if necessary. We should not be called upon to pay an added cost arising from the fact that you have to pay from eight percent to twelve percent for the money you have borrowed. We should not be called upon to pay an added price caused by over-valuation or over-capitalization of your stock. We should not be called upon to pay the prices which you claim you must add to your ordinary profit to take care of the high rate of interest which you have to pay for the money invested in the development of your industry." Can you blame the wholesalers for mass buying? Can you blame a wholesaler when he states to a certain firm, "Your cost is too high, and if you do not come down to a reasonable price we will have to look elsewhere, even if we have to look outside of Canada." My conclusion is that the only way to remedy the evil I have outlined is to go fully into the whole matter, call upon our captains of industry, our banks, our trust companies and our brokers to lay bare, before a committee of the house, or, if you like, a royal commission, the methods adopted in their business transaction.

To that end I move the following and ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to add what I have to suggest as subsection (e) of his motion now before the house:

(e) the methods and system that have prevailed in the distribution of common stock, preferred stock and the flotation of bonds by brokers, trust companies and banks for the development of industry in Canada.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to voice my endorsation of the motion now before the house. I feel inclined to believe that had the motion come from this corner of the house we might have been accused of attempting to upset some of our established institutions, and of reverting to socialistic and bolshevistic tactics. However, coming as it does from the government side of the house I suppose we may put it down as an act of statesmanship. Therefore I wish to commend the government upon its act of statesmanship in introducing the motion now before us.

My purpose in rising is to put a question to the government concerning a matter debated in the month of November, 1932. At that time I spoke concerning conditions of wages and labour in the textile industry. During the course of the debate the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) rising in his place stated that the government was prepared to submit the whole question of wages and conditions in the textile industry to the tariff board, when that board had been appointed. The tariff board has been appointed, but I am not going to ask the Prime Minister to refer this subject to it. If the committee now under consideration is appointed, and no doubt it will be, would the Prime Minister tell me whether or not the question of labour conditions and wages received by those employed in the textile industry will come under the purview of the committee and whether such committee will be able to make a thorough investigation into conditions now prevailing in that industry?

Mr. ROBERT McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in the few remarks I wish to make it is not my intention to speak in opposition to the principle of the resolution. As a matter of fact I believe I may claim that the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has adopted my child, because last year I moved a resolution along the lines of the present one. To-day it appears on the order paper as number 23 in the notices of motions. It would appear therefore that in this instance the government is just a year late in considering the matter. I do not know but what the government would be well advised to accept the resolution I have on the order paper instead of this one which the Prime Minister has placed before us because I believe that it is quite possible to accomplish what is desired a little sooner by my resolution than by this cumbersome method of first appointing a parliamentary committee to make an investigation with the hope of having it all completed in time for legislation to be passed at this session.

My reason for presenting my resolution in the first place a year ago was that, first of all, I thought of the farmers and the labouring people throughout the country who are in such dire distress owing to the present economic conditions, and because of those conditions, which still prevail, it is surely time that the farmers who produce wheat, for instance, should be able to get part at least of the profit that comes from the growth of that wheat. The farmer prepares the ground, sows the crop, reaps it and markets it, and after doing all that, he makes the least of anybody who has anything to do with the handling of that wheat. I think that the time has come when the men who labour on the land should have an opportunity of making a decent living. The same thing that applied a year ago still applies to live stock, poultry and all the other farm products. I was thinking principally of farm products when I introduced my resolution a year ago.

The resolution which the Prime Minister has presented to the house deals in paragraph (a) with the effect of mass buying by departmental and chain store organizations; (b) deals with labour conditions; (c) deals with the flour milling industry and (d) with the methods prevailing in the marketing of live stock and animal products for domestic consumption and export. That probably goes far enough, but what I am concerned about is whether the matters which I brought to the attention of the house a year ago and the conditions I pointed out then as existing throughout the country will be fully gone into by this committee of inquiry. When that committee meets, whoever may be on it, when some person introduces something along the lines I have just suggested here with regard to farm products, I do not want some member of the committee to reply that the scope of the committee's reference does not permit them to go that far, and thereby be precluded from introducing that subject.

I am concerned to know just what is behind the fact that the five and ten cents a pound which the producer gets for wool to-day becomes two dollar per pound clothing when it is processed, and why it is that hides that are selling for as low as fifty cents apiece are made into ten and twelve dollar boots, and equally expensive harness, sole leather, lace leather and other products. I want to know not only the facts about the flour milling industry but also why some of the breakfast foods that are so extensively used are so expensive to buy when grain is at its present low price. I want to know why it is that these conditions prevail and if the scope of this resolution and of the reference that will be made to the committee will allow of all these matters being taken up and investigated fully by the committee.

Last year I suggested that tariffs and combines were largely responsible for those conditions. My right hon. leader has dealt with the question of combines. I believe that tariffs and combines are largely responsible for the conditions that exist, and I should like to see that matter fully investigated.

I believe, as has been stated before, that there is considerable to be investigated in the textile industries in this country. My information is that the textile industries are fairly busy, but that the wages are lower than they have ever been before. If that is the case I think there should be an investigation into that industry.

I think inquiry should also be made whether or not there are industries in this country that should never have been given protection —exotic industries. If there are such, I for one am willing to let those industries be discontinued if they are costing us more through their tariff protection and the high prices they are charging for their products than they are returning to us in salaries and services.

During the last two years the expression has been widely used in this country—Buy made-in-Canada goods. We remember that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) a few years ago got out his creed largely devoted to promoting that idea. I believe that that Made-in-Canada slogan has cost us a great deal of money in this country. If we can buy cheaper from other countries, then I believe that industries that cannot make a living in this country without high tariff protection should be allowed to go to the wall. Our farmers and our labouring people must have some relief, and that very soon.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I am willing to support this resolution in every way possible if I can be assured that it will be wide enough in its scope to take in all that I have suggested and as much more as possible.

Mr. J. H. STITT (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, when I came into the house this afternoon I did not intend to participate in this debate. I desire, however, to congratulate the government on the motion which is now before the house. I believe that no action which the government has yet taken has so impressed the electorate of this country that this government has a real concern in the affairs of the people and especially for the producers in Canada.

I want to support the request made by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) that fish products be included within the ambit of this motion. In my constituency of Selkirk the fishing industry is a very important one. Last year the provincial government investigated that industry and found that conditions in it were, to say the least, deplorable. As the market for our fish products in Manitoba is largely abroad, most of our markets being found in the United States of America, it is especially important that this commodity should be included in the inquiry. We found for example, in that investigation that the fishermen of lake Winnipeg, a matter of forty or fifty miles from the city of Winnipeg, were being paid the paltry sum of 1½ cents a pound for whitefish which was retailing in the large departmental stores of Winnipeg at from 12 to 15 cents a pound. The fishermen in my riding were practically reduced to a condition of wage slavery, and no action that this government has taken will find more support in my riding than this proposal to investigate these conditions.

I may say for the benefit of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) that resolutions have been passed throughout this dominion supporting and congratulating him in the stand which he took in the speech he made recently in regard to trade conditions within our own country.

Let me also emphasize a point in relation to the labour conditions prevailing. It is certainly time that this house, under the power which it has in regard to the general peace, order and good government of the country, should really take hold of the question of the labour conditions existing in Canada. I find that last year, even in regard to supplies which were ordered by the government, those people in the province of Manitoba who desired to tender for such supplies could not compete with the province of Quebec, where there was no minimum scale of wage. There ought to be a minimum wage in this country, and I believe there ought to be a minimum price. The fish producer certainly cannot dispose of his product at one and a half cents per pound, nor can the live stock producers throughout the country supply meat products to the large packing industries at prices which only mean serfdom on the land. Just realize what one and a half cents per pound means to our farmers!

I cannot speak in too eulogistic terms of the government's action, but before closing I might say a word with regard to the objection put forward by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) to this matter being discussed by this honourable house. If I rightly understood his remarks, he said that we had a Combines Investigation Act and that this matter ought to be referred to a departmental official. I submit that this is a matter that should come before the supremacy of parliament. I ask the right hon. gentleman: Does it not look as if this government really meant what it proposes to undertake, when it comes before parliament and asks the supreme power of this house to investigate a condition which should not be relegated for inquiry to any mere official.

We have heard speeches from the opposition regarding the contemptuous way in which parliament has been treated. Surely in a matter of this kind, which concerns the whole of Canada's industrial and commercial life, the supreme power of parliament ought to be invoked and the powers of this house should be utilized, to ascertain the fundamental facts existing. I believe the people of Canada will recognize that the Prime Minister and his government mean business, and I congratulate them on their stand.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): Let me say at the outset that so far as this resolution goes I am heartily in accord with it. I do not intend to discuss what is contained in it nor to express any opinions as to what should be added, but I must make this observation. Inquiries of this sort never amount to a great deal so far as parliamentary committees are concerned. Hon. gentlemen need only refer to the investigation held last year, and the statements made in this house last night by the hon. member who had asked for that inquiry, with respect to milk. Everyone knows how futile it has been—even the suggestion made by the committee. I am beginning to think that if we are to remain under the blight of high tariffs in Canada, excessive tariffs, then the only thing to do is to follow the course pursued by previous governments in dealing with railway matters.

Inquiries were made in the House of Commons into freight rates. Hon. gentlemen have access to Hansard and they can ascertain how far we succeeded in obtaining redress. And we in western Canada have a very vivid recollection of the summary manner in which we were treated by the railway companies until finally parliament appointed a railway commission and gave them wide powers of control over every activity of the railways. Since that time, it is true, there have been individual complaints, but in the main the people of Canada have had a court to which they could appeal with some hope of getting redress and receiving decent treatment.

So far as this inquiry is concerned, I say, let it go on. We are not well equipped however to deal with the matter as proposed. Despite the fact that we have many eminent lawyers in the House of Commons, we are not well equipped for obtaining evidence, and the time is too short to get it. Take the matters mentioned in the resolution itself: it would take a whole year to arrive at a conclusion which would enable us to provide relief. However, I commend the government for their effort in starting this inquiry, but I do say that in my judgment we shall have to come to some organization similar to that which we have set up for the supervision of the great railway corporations in this country.

If we are to have a few large departmental stores, and if, as we observe day by day, we are to see the manufacturing industry of the country getting into fewer and fewer hands, with the result that the small retailer has to go out of business, then in order to cope with these intensive organizations we shall have to set up some body clothed with authority to deal with the question of price fixation as practised among these institutions. Let me refer my fellow farmers to one—and I am not going to blame this government in the matter, because I do not believe that either this or any other government, either by tariffs or otherwise, can control the farm implement industry in Canada and the United States as that industry is to-day organized. It has in its own hands a system of price fixation and it is impossible to get at it unless somebody clothed with authority is empowered to investigate such matters as investment, plant, cost of manufacture and the prices they can reasonably expect to receive from the consumer. Unless you make competition free—which I am not even going to advocate—then you will have this evil with its ever-increasing effect upon the purchasing power of the country.

So far as this inquiry is concerned, we shall probably uncover some things, but they will be mighty few; and then the difficulty will be that after all, if parliament is to do anything about it, there will have to be set up, as I say, someone with authority. Personally I believe that we would go further by an inquiry under the Combines Investigation Act; but so far as I am concerned, I am in favour of the investigation. I do want, however, to see something result from it. What effect has the milk inquiry had upon the fixation of prices, and how much have the producer and the consumer been helped? I am afraid that is about where we shall find ourselves in this inquiry.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I had not intended taking part in the debate, having expected that the resolution would commend itself to the house and be received without any great discussion. I can assure the house however that the resolution, as presented by the Prime Minister, has certainly been offered in no partisan spirit whatever; it has been offered in the hope and, as I have intimated, the expectation that hon. members generally throughout the house might at least have viewed this effort as non-partisan, directed solely to securing some solution of some of the most perplexing problems with which this and indeed other countries are confronted at the present time.

I suppose it is quite unnecessary for me to indicate this comparison. Reference has been made during this session to the efforts that are being put forth south of the line, and I received this morning a pile of codes, thirty or forty in number; but it must be obvious to anyone who has carefully observed the efforts to the south of us how many difficulties and perplexities are confronting the people there. It is perhaps one of the most complex and intricate tasks any government has undertaken. The same thing obtains here, perhaps in a lesser degree, because this country is not so large and its businesses are not so extensive. But the desire of the government—and I can say this with absolute assurance—is that this committee, purposely named as a small one, should get to grips with some of these baffling problems.

In the first place, let me point out to the house that a very sharp problem of jurisdiction obtrudes itself into almost any of the measures that are referred to in the resolution, and the government of the day has reviewed some of these problems with the desire to do something, but almost at every turn one takes in dealing with matters, for instance, of civil rights or anything that is included within the ambit of that very broad term, we are up against provincial jurisdiction. Then there is the question, for example, of wages which, as everyone knows, comes under provincial jurisdiction. We could very easily have taken shelter under that; we could have said: We are very sorry for these things but the matter is under provincial jurisdiction and we could have handed it over to the provinces. But the government has recognized that so acute have some of these problems become, with one province having one type of legislation dealing, for instance, with the minimum wage question, another province having another standard or type of legislation, some provinces having no legislation at all and all of them competing one with another in manufacturing and producing within the confines of Canada, that a very difficult problem is presented. I am not going to suggest this afternoon that these questions are simple or easy. They are most difficult and this committee will have a most important and intricate task presented to it when this resolution passes and the committee is set up.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) was very unhappy in his approach to this question and I was disappointed in his address. The other members who have spoken have been a little more generous and moderate, but the right hon. gentleman was most disappointingly critical, and I shall endeavour to show in one or two instances where he has been unfair to the government. I regret approaching this problem in rather a combative spirit because I had hoped it would be unnecessary, but one cannot allow to go unchallenged some statements made by him. He said that his predecessors, the Union government, repealed a perfectly good statute and substituted for it the Board of Commerce and the other bill which companioned it in 1918 or 1919. He said that they carried on under this legislation for a couple of years; that nothing was done and that then the legislation was declared ultra vires of the Dominion parliament. That is quite true, but whether it was a wise or an unwise act, it was a sincere one and a genuine effort at that time to deal with then existing conditions which were almost the reverse of those that prevail to-day. The condition which confronted the government of that day was rapidly rising prices of commodities in Canada and throughout the world with the tendency on the part of producers of commodities—and I am speaking not so much of natural as of manufactured products—to follow the rising market rather with accelerated speed, shall I say, thus boosting prices to an unreasonable extent. My right hon. friend will remember how he and his whole party fixed their campaign in 1921 on the one outstanding war cry—the high cost of living.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The tariff.

Mr. STEVENS: In other words, commodity prices, farm prices, raw material prices and prices of manufactured goods were all on the rise and there was a tendency for the cost of living to go exceedingly high. It will be recalled that one of the main things that brought the matter to a head and resulted in the establishment of a board of commerce was the price of sugar. I am subject to correction by any hon. member if I am wrong; I believe the price of sugar went up to twenty-five cents a pound at that time.

An hon. MEMBER: Twenty-seven cents.

Mr. STEVENS: Someone says twenty-seven cents. I know it went up to an absurdly high price. It will be recalled that wheat, for instance, went to something like $3.40 or, indeed, to almost $4 a bushel on one occasion, and the wheat board was appointed for the purpose of keeping the price of wheat down to a moderate and reasonable level and controlling what was a rising market in that particular commodity.

Conditions to-day are just the reverse of what they were then. Further, the right hon. gentleman says: Deal with it under the Combines Act. Let me turn again to the United States. Since the late Theodore Roosevelt started his compaign against the combines about 1900 roughly speaking, and the Sherman Act and other acts were passed, the United States has operated under them until recently. What was the basis of those acts? Simply that where businesses and industry got together in combination, they were at once suspect. That type of legislation was set up to prevent businesses from getting together and fixing prices. That was really the genesis of that legislation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The United States legislation, not the Canadian.

Mr. STEVENS: I am speaking of the United States, as my right hon. friend, if he will permit me to finish my paragraph, will see. That legislation was in force and was the directing legislation of the industrial life of the United States until last summer. What has happened since then? Under the present president, Mr. Franklin Roosevelt, a gentleman of the same name, there is a complete reversal of that principle. Under the code system and under legislation passed by congress he is making it obligatory for industries to get together, imposing upon them the duty of arriving at a fixed fair price. There is a complete reversal of the legislation in that country that has been controlling trade and industry for the last thirty-two or thirty-three years. Therefore my right hon. friend must surely recognize that when he appeals to the house, as he has done, to disregard the suggested study to which I shall refer in a moment, and points to the Combines Act of Canada, I submit that he is making an entirely retrograde movement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will recall that the Canadian Combines Investigation Act proceeded on a basis entirely the opposite to that of the anti-trust legislation in the United States. The basis on which our legislation was founded is similar to that on which the present president of the United States is proceeding.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I know; because I drafted and introduced the act, and I am familiar with its provisions.

Mr. STEVENS: The trouble with the right hon. gentleman, if he will permit me—I do not wish to be rude—is this: certainly he introduced this act in 1910 or 1909 and he is so wrapped up in the historic fact that he is the father of this legislation, he thinks there is no other type of legislation necessary. I have often heard him refer to this legislation. I was one of the few members in the house in 1923, I think it was, when this modern act was introduced by his government and I pointed out that in my opinion it was wrong in principle. I have always argued that there is no crime in association, whether it be an association of grain growers or of shoe manufacturers or of retailers or of any other class of society—

Mr. RHODES: Or labour.

Mr. STEVENS: Or labour, providing such association is not used for the oppression of the public generally.

Let me point out to the hon. gentleman where he is in error and where he was not, I think, fair to the house in saying that under section 18 of the act all the powers we are asking for in this resolution for commissions to make examinations—and I shall elaborate that in a moment—could be exercised by the registrar. Therefore he says there is no need for any more legislation, take the legislation you have; inferring of course, "it is my legislation and this government is not trying to enforce it."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are speaking about investigation now, not legislation.

Mr. STEVENS: He said quite clearly, You have the legislation in the Combines Investigation Act, use it. That is the effect of what he said. Here is the clause that he cites, section 18:

> All provisions of the Inquiries Act not repugnant to the provisions of this act shall apply to any inquiry or investigation under this act, and the registrar and every commissioner, shall have all the powers of a commissioner appointed under the Inquiries Act, including the powers which are thereby authorized to be conferred by the commission issued in the case, except in so far as any such powers may be inconsistent with the provisions of this act.

What are the provisions of this act? The powers that this act confers are in section 11. That section sets forth that any six persons, British subjects, who are of the opinion that a combine exists or is being formed, may apply in writing to the registrar for the investigation of such alleged combine, and so on. In other words the whole act is directed at one thing, that is the possible or alleged or presumed existence of a combine. That is not what we are concerned about alone.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says "and so forth" but, if he will read a little further so as to include the "and so forth" he will find that an inquiry can be made whenever the minister so directs, not dependent on the six persons.

Mr. STEVENS: But not inconsistent with this act. I do not wish to be inveigled into reading a great deal, but anyone who has given the most casual thought to the subject knows what the definition of a combine is according to this act. But the point I am making is that this power of inquiry under the Combines Investigation Act would be so restricted that the objectives that we have in mind in this resolution could not be achieved at all. Before we could go and make the inquiry that we have in mind regarding sweat shop conditions, using that term in a general way, regarding the relations of firms in the flour-milling industry to bakeries, the purchasing methods of department stores, and so on, we would have to have powers not provided in this act at all.

The right hon. gentleman was peculiarly critical of our proposal in subsection (a):

> . . . the effect of mass buying by department and chain store organizations upon the regular retail trade of the country. . . .

He says that that is not what is wanted He says that what is wanted is an inquiry into the great manufacturing industries of Canada. My concern for the moment is not for the great industries of this country, because they are not suffering particularly. They may be suffering from the general condition of depression. But the industries that we are considering now are the small industries that find themselves manufacturing for large organizations who by the exercise of mass buying power are able to dictate to those industries what their prices shall be. The right hon. gentleman inferred, indeed he stated, that it was the large manufacturing industries of this country that fixed prices, therefore, he says, I would invoke the Combines Investigation Act. But that is not what we are concerned about. It is open to any six people in Canada to make application where they consider there is an abuse of that kind of power. That is provided for by the Combines Investigation Act. But there is no legislation, either passed during the right hon. gentleman's regime or this, that protects or gives a chance of competitive existence to the decent small industry, of which there are thousands in this country, industries that cannot, by the widest stretch of imagination, be classed as combines or vast manufacturing organizations. It is to the assistance of industries of that kind that we desire to go. Not only to them, but to them in so far as they are observers of the law. It is to find out other industries competing with them in defiance of law that we feel it necessary to have this inquiry. Therein lies the entire difference between what is commonly known as the large overbearing industry and the class of small industries that I have mentioned.

Let me draw the attention of the house to what in my estimation is really one of the chief economic problems of industry and commerce to-day, not limited to Canada but common to the whole world; that is the practice that has developed in the last three years in particular of selling goods at less than cost of production. There is scarcely a country in the world that is not indulging in that practice to a certain extent. Indeed many countries are doing it to a degree which if they pursue it much longer will probably bring them to national bankruptcy. There are many industries doing it which also are approaching bankruptcy. Now I admit—I see my hon. friend the member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) getting very busy when I make that observation—I admit that there are people, such as my hon. friend, who hold to the doctrine that it is a contribution to the welfare of humanity if goods are got for less than they are worth. But I want to point out that that cannot be.

It may be a fortunate thing for an individual if he can get an article very cheap at some moment. But if that practice of selling goods at less than the cost of production becomes very prevalent obviously someone else, in some other place it may be, or in some other way, is paying the cost. It has to be absorbed somehow. I do not wish to go into details; the Prime Minister said very properly a few minutes ago that this is not the time for that. But it will probably be paid, as is indeed the case in many countries that are selling goods at less than legitimate cost—I will add that word—by cutting down the wages of employees to a starvation point and thus penalizing those employed in the industry. What we have in mind is to try to find out whether or not the indulgence in unfair and unethical practices is prevalent in this country; to find the causes, to ascertain as far as we possibly can what remedies can be invoked, and, as the resolution very clearly states, to report to the house from time to time the findings, together with recommendation of such measures as in the opinion of the committee may be considered necessary to secure as far as possible fair and just practices in the distribution and marketing systems of Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, just a word further. The hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) I think was very fair in his remarks in the main. He said, however, that he feared it would take so long for this committee to make the investigation that it would be unproductive. I think perhaps his criticism in that respect is not to be refuted too hastily, I can understand that he might be quite sincere in that view. However, it will be noted that this resolution has divided up under certain heads the various types of investigation to be carried on, and there is no reason why these should not be carried on concurrently. Another thing; it is not suggested here that a royal commission should be appointed to follow up what this committee is doing, as the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition repeatedly stated. That is not the idea, and it is not so stated in the resolution. If the right hon. gentleman would deign to read the resolution he would see that it does not contain that inference. Here is what the resolution says:

> That the committee shall have power to send for persons, papers and records, and the further power to request the appointment of a commission or commissioners under the Inquiries Act, to secure evidence to be presented to the committee by such commission or commissioners.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is a royal commission.

Mr. STEVENS: My right hon. friend knew, when he used the term "royal commission" that he was implying and leading the public to believe, to the extent that they may read his remarks, that we were simply seeking to evade the issue. In fact that is what he said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all.

Mr. STEVENS: My right hon. friend so stated. He said that we were seeking to evade the issue, that this committee would carry on its work for a long time and then a royal commission would be appointed. I am trying to make clear to him what the resolution states and what is the intention. The intention is that while the committee is sitting, such additional evidence as may be required can be collected by the commission or commissioners so appointed. That will meet the very just apprehensions of the hon. member for West Edmonton and will facilitate the work of the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is a royal commission.

Mr. STEVENS: From the evidence so collected and the evidence heard by the committee itself it is sincerely hoped that the committee will be able to report to the house as I stated a moment ago, measures that will meet the situation.

My hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) referred to a debate which took place about a year and a half ago with regard to the wages paid in industries that enjoyed certain protection under the Canadian tariff. My hon. friend quoted me correctly from page 1325 of Hansard for November 18, 1932. At that time his suggestion was that the question should be referred to the tariff board, and he quoted me as saying:

> I am authorized to say this, that it is the intention of the Dominion government that as soon as the tariff board is organized, or as soon thereafter as possible, this whole question shall be reviewed by that board.

The hon. gentleman asked what was being done in that regard. In the first place let me say that this point is being reviewed by the tariff board in each case that comes before it in the ordinary procedure. But when it comes to the question of referring to the tariff board a problem such as is indicated in this resolution, it is felt that the situation will be much more effectively dealt with by a committee of the house than by a reference of the abstract question to the tariff board. But the hon. gentleman can rest assured of this, that any time an item is under survey or a question arises regarding the wages paid in Canada by a given industry enjoying protection under our tariff, the board will take due cognizance of such matters and investigate them.

Mr. HEAPS: On that point I should like to ask just one question. I am under the impression that under the resolution now before us this committee, when appointed, will have power to investigate such industries as come within its purview. Of those I should think the textile industry would be one, and I wanted the interpretation of the government on that point.

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot speak for a parliamentary committee, of course, because it must be recognized that such a committee is a power unto itself subject to its order of reference. But giving the ordinary interpretation based upon some experience in these matters I would say that any industry that might be involved in the cause of the large spread between prices received for commodities by the producer and prices paid by the consumer, or that is involved in the system of distribution in Canada, or that comes under any of the different items, certainly would come within their purview if in the opinion of the committee it was thought desirable to go into that matter. But the committee itself must be the determining factor as to whether or not they investigate that particular industry.

Mr. HEAPS: May I point out to the minister that paragraph (b) deals with the labour conditions prevailing in industries supplying the requirements of department and chain store organizations. Under that heading I would presume that since these organizations are large purchasers of textiles that industry would come within the purview of the committee.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think there is any doubt about it, but I hope my hon. friend will not ask me to make a ruling in advance on behalf of the committee.

Before I take my seat there is one other point to which I should like to refer. In his remarks the right hon. gentleman referred to the paucity of action by the present government under the combines act. The impression he sought to leave in the mind of anyone not informed in this regard, I am sure, was that we had simply ignored the act. As a matter of fact, since this act was passed in 1923 there have been 330 cases dealt with, and of that number 142 cases have been taken up since this government took office. I think that is a fair answer to the right hon. gentleman's castigation in that respect.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Personally I remember only a very few cases in which recommendations were made for investigation.

Mr. BENNETT: The registrar can investigate without a recommendation.

Mr. STEVENS: The registrar can take action himself.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I only know of three cases in which investigations have been made.

Mr. STEVENS: I happen to have a few in mind that I can recall, though of course at a moment's notice I cannot give my hon. friend a complete list. The figures I gave are accurate so far as the totals are concerned. Of course many of these investigations, which are initiated by the registrar either at the instigation of six or more citizens, on his own initiative or on the instructions of the minister, are disposed of in a short time. It is either shown that combines do not exist, or that the charges have no foundation, or that some correction has been made. I recall at the moment investigations into moving pictures and radio tubes, the bread inquiry, the fruit inquiry, the tobacco investigation, the British anthracite coal inquiry and the investigation into rubber footwear, which I believe is still proceeding, as well as the inquiry into the price of gasoline. These are a few of the major matters which come to my mind at the moment. Let me say this to the house without hesitation, however, that as far as this government is concerned the combines act has been enforced impartially, and there has been no interference with the officials charged with duties thereunder. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) is not in his seat, but I can say this from personal knowledge. The act has been enforced just as impartially as it was when my right hon. friend led the previous government.

I have spoken a little longer than I first intended, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to conclude simply by repeating that we hope to have a committee—in selecting the members of which the right hon. gentleman will join—that will go earnestly and sincerely into this whole series of questions, which are very broad, with one object in view, that of trying to compose some of the difficulties that exist with regard to constitutional rights and to find measures that are within the power of this parliament to deal effectively with the abuses and difficulties with which trade and commerce and industry are confronted at the present time. As I said in the opening of my remarks the government offers the resolution sincerely, in the hope and expectation that the house will endorse the effort and lend its cooperation as soon as it is possible to do so.

Mr. MARCIL: I should like to ask the minister a question. Would the government include the question of fish in this resolution, as suggested by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst)?

Mr. STEVENS: I think it is covered already, but the Prime Minister has just intimated that he will include fish.

Mr. MARCIL: Perhaps I might be permitted to say a word or two concerning coal combines in the province of Quebec, because some time ago a great deal of public attention was directed to it. Under the Combines Investigation Act an investigation was carried on by the registrar, following which a complete record was sent by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) to the attorney general for the province of Quebec, stating, "It is for you to act now." About thirty years ago there was a member in this House of Commons, our old friend W. F. Maclean, who pleaded in committee that the weakness of the federal government was that enforcement of at least three-quarters of our legislation rested with the provinces. If the Minister of Labour, on the occasion of the coal inquiries, had sent the record to the attorney general of the province without word or comment, and the attorney general in turn had taken no action, that would have been the end of the whole matter. In this instance shall we be in the same position?

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I rise primarily with the intention of supporting the suggestion of the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) that an inquiry may be made into the spread between the amount received for fish by the primary producer and the cost to the consumer. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has been good enough to indicate that the suggestion of the hon. member will be included within the scope of the committee's inquiry, and to that extent I believe the thanks of the house are due him.

Not long ago I was in a retail establishment of a city of about 40,000 people and I saw boneless codfish, a very succulent fish I may say, and one of which I am very fond, offered for sale at 40 cents per pound. I was simply astounded that the proprietor would have the temerity or nerve to ask the consuming public to pay that price for a commodity for which the producer received probably only three or four cents.

Mr. MARCIL: Some of my fishermen get two cents for it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, I have no doubt the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) is justified in his statement. I am quite aware that there is an undue spread between the price received by the primary producer and that paid by the consumer on some of our staple commodities, one of which is fish. Reference has been made to the milk investigation of last year, and further reference to the speech made by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) who had the courage and distinction last year of bringing the matter before the House of Commons and the agriculture committee. I am bound to admit that few results have ensued from that investigation—not nearly enough. At all events a great deal of publicity has been given to the situation, and wherever there is publicity in such matters there are bound to be results which may not be quite apparent at the moment.

Let me point out to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the hon. members of the house, the fundamental weakness of the whole position, namely that of jurisdiction. That matter has been alluded to briefly by the Prime Minister and referred to at greater length by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), who has just taken his seat. After the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada and that of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council we cannot in this house, I am satisfied, pass legislation which will be absolutely effective in bringing about the results we desire. We shall therefore have to find some other method besides that of direct legislation. For instance, the remedy for the situation in respect to milk in the province of Quebec is directly in the hands of Mr. Taschereau and his government. What has he done? He has done just what was indicated last night by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi: he has appointed some kind of milk board, without any power, to go round and tell the farmers what they should do.

I am happy to be able to point out that recently some action has been taken by the government of the province of Manitoba. Speaking subject to correction, I am told that in that province, having regard to the fact that under subsection 13 of section 92 of the British North America Act the jurisdiction in respect of property and civil rights, the fixation of prices and all that sort of thing, lies entirely within the ambit of the province's control, that province has declared milk to be a public utility. That is a concrete way in which this matter could be considered. I am satisfied that in this parliament we have no power, even were we so disposed, to set up a code similar to the N.R.A. of the United States. By the way, if we ever do attempt anything like that, I certainly hope we will not go to the extent the United States has gone. Let me tell the house something about the milk situation under the N.R.A. Just a year ago I was in the republic to the south of us, and at that time the price of milk to the consumer in the city in which I happened to be was ten cents a quart. To-day, under the N.R.A. milk code the price to the consumer is ten cents per pint and seventeen cents per quart. I want to know where the consumer gets off, under those circumstances. I have every sympathy for the farmer, but we must keep the balance even. In the United States they are not keeping the balance even. What labouring man, with a family of small children, could pay seventeen cents a quart for milk?

Let us face the facts before us. Let us not, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) has at least inferentially done to-day, damn the underlying principle of this motion. I am not saying the Combines Investigation Act is not good. I believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce has definitely distinguished between the two objectives before us. Let us all put our shoulders to this resolution and see if we cannot accomplish something to take care of an evil which we all admit and one which I believe every hon. member is sincerely anxious to remedy. No doubt there is too wide a spread between the price received by the primary producer and the cost to the ultimate consumer. We have that condition in connection with many staples of life, of which milk is one. There can be no doubt about that. I suggest that the house leave out partisan views—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Hon. members opposite may laugh, but I should like to tell them that I am not half as partisan to-day as I was when I entered this House of Commons.

Mr. YOUNG: You are getting wiser.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, but perhaps I am getting older and becoming more mature. The primary reason is that while a member of this house I have had the honour to represent the whole of my constituency, having Liberal and Conservative supporters behind me; consequently I have learned to believe that I represent not only the Conservative but the Liberal electors of my constituency. They have approved of my course. Therefore I have grown mellower and less partisan than I used to be. We ought to wish the committee well. In some slight degree I have been able to visualize the task before it. I have no hope that the committee will be able to complete its work to the extent of one hundred per cent, but I have hope that some good may come from its inquiry and that some remedy may be afforded the primary producer of Canada, whose position to-day is one which none of us would like to contemplate in his own business.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few words to say. I should hope that the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) would have lost his partisanship sufficiently to have forborne reference to acts of a provincial government which happened to be Liberal. I do not think he showed evidence of complete conversion from partisanship. However, we all accept what he says, that he is getting better all the time, that he is not as bad as he was, and we do hope that the improvement will continue.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) and my hon. friend have warned us not to expect very much from this inquiry because of these constitutional questions, which by the way are brought up very frequently on the other side of the house now as compared to what they were a few years ago. The good old constitution is doing valiant service time after time as an excuse on the part of our friends opposite for not taking action, but notwithstanding that, to use my hon. friend's expression, the project is "being damned" in advance to some extent by the suggestion that we cannot do much, I unite with those who think that we at least should make a try, and that we ought to get together to bring out the facts with regard to the major matter dealt with in this resolution, and that is the spread between the amount that is received by the producer and the amount that is paid by the consumer. After all, as I understand it, that is the teeth and the backbone of this resolution. It may be found that there are false impressions abroad as to the prices which the producer is receiving and the amount which the consumer is paying. It may be that there are explanations for it. It would be well if any false impressions are removed as a result of that inquiry. It would be well also, if these impressions are decided to be well founded, that remedial action be taken in so far as it can be taken by this house.

I want to join with my hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) and the others who have spoken with regard to including fish products as a subject of investigation in connection with this inquiry. There is an impression abroad in connection with this industry that the spread is far too great. Whether that impression is right or wrong this inquiry ought to bring out. Fishermen may be getting 75 cents to $1.50 a hundred pounds for their fish, while the consumer is paying a great many times that amount. One hon. gentleman opposite spoke this afternoon of the price of fish in Winnipeg. I heard that one day in Winnipeg fish was selling at 25 cents, and turkey at 22 cents a pound. Now it is pretty difficult for people who do not really understand what the luxuries of life are to be persuaded to buy fish at 25 cents when turkey can be got at 22 cents.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): May I correct my hon. friend? You could buy turkey in my constituency last Christmas at from 6 to 10 cents a pound.

Mr. RALSTON: That just shows the value of turkey as compared with fish as food.

With regard to the matter of an inquiry under the Combines Act I do think, with all deference to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the first paragraph of this resolution which provides for an inquiry into mass buying by department and chain store organizations certainly sounds very much like the same sort of thing which is aimed at by the Combines Act. The Combines Act expressly provides for an inquiry into combines which have operated "or are likely to operate to the detriment of or against the interest of the public, whether consumers, producers or others," and which result from any "actual or tacit contract, agreement ,arrangement, or combination which has or is designed to have the effect of:

(i) limiting facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing; or (ii) preventing, limiting or lessening manufacture or production; or (iii) fixing a common price or a resale price, or a common rental, or a common cost of storage or transportation; or (iv) enhancing the price, rental or cost of article, rental storage or transportation . . . ; or (vi) otherwise restraining or injuring trade or commerce.

It does seem to me that mass buying by departmental store organizations comes dangerously near to that provision of the Combines Act, and if that is so, my leader is quite right in suggesting that action may be taken under section 18 of the Combines Act.

There are other provisions in the resolution which seem to pick out particular industries. One has a little difficulty in finding out just exactly what industries are aimed at. The resolution is in most general terms in the first section, that a committee be appointed to inquire into the large spread and into the system of distribution of farm and other natural products, as well as manufactured products. Then the resolution comes down to mass buying. That is covered in paragraphs (a) and (b). Then in paragraph (c) the flour milling industry is particularly picked out, and (d) has to do with:

—the methods and system prevailing in the marketing of live stock and animal products for domestic consumption and export, and the extent to which the present system affords or restricts opportunity for fair returns to producers.

I understand that fish will be added to live stock and animal products, which are specifically mentioned in paragraph (d). I would rather think, after all, that the government is limiting this inquiry to chain store buying and its effects on labour conditions, to the flour milling industry, to live stock and animal products, and fish products. As has been said, there are a good many industries left out of the ambit of this inquiry when we come to examine the particulars of the resolution.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we should try to see what this investigation will bring forth, so that at least we shall have the facts upon which to base some conclusion, and I would hope that the investigation will be not only thorough but rapid in order that we may have its results before the conclusion of this session.

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, before the amendment was suggested to paragraph (d) of this resolution there was no doubt in my mind that an opportunity would be given to investigate the spread in prices between what the producer receives and the consumer pays in respect to any commodity—a general investigation; but since the amendment has been made adding fish, it seems to me that a very limited interpretation is being given to the resolution.

Mr. BENNETT: It is only in paragraph (d) that that is suggested. It is not in the general paragraph; it is in sub-paragraph (d). So it does not limit it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would point out to the hon. member for Swift Current that there is no amendment before the house regarding fish.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I understood that the Prime Minister suggested that he was willing to allow an amendment to be made.

Mr. BENNETT: At the appropriate time I was going to direct attention to the fact that it is included in the words that are now there, but if it is desired to add the word "fish," for abundant caution, I am content that it should be put in. That was all.

Mr. BOTHWELL: So we can take it that so far as this resolution is concerned we are to have a general investigation into the spread in prices on all commodities which the committee may wish to inquire into?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I am sure that everybody will welcome an investigation of this kind. I am rather of the opinion that the government might have passed legislation on the strength of the complaints that they have already received and because of which they are asking for this investigation.

The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stitt) says that the government are sincere in bringing in this resolution. We sincerely hope they are. However, in the past we have had an investigation in which there did not seem to be much sincerity on the part of this government. I refer to the investigation into the price of gasoline and the spread of prices there. Some questions involved in this resolution were brought to the attention of the house in 1931. An investigation was held into the price of gasoline in 1932, but the report made by that committee to the house was simply a rehash of a report made by a firm of auditors. I do not believe that there is a single member of this house who could read and analyze the evidence given before that committee and conscientiously approve of the report that was brought in. Ample evidence was given before that committee for action by the government, and all I can say is that at this late date, in 1934, after this matter having been brought to the attention of the government in 1931, and proven in 1932, we do sincerely hope that something will come out of the proposed investigation.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): I do not think I should let one of these very infrequent opportunities go by to say a word of even mild approval of the government's investigational intentions, as set forth in this motion, and I refer most particularly to subsection (d), where the live stock industry is promised to be looked into. Some of the members of the government will recall that when they came into power they found the sum of $25,000 already voted for this very purpose by their predecessors. The first session after that, in 1931, I urged the government to take advantage of that vote and hold an investigation. The money was there. The vote did not get there all by itself; it was put there for a purpose, and I hoped that the government would take advantage of it and hold the inquiry which had been anticipated by their predecessors. However, they either used the money for some other purpose or let it lapse into the treasury. They did not proceed with the inquiry. On the principle that it is better late than never, I approve of this action on the part of the government, particularly with regard to live stock.

With regard to subsections (a) and (b), affecting the chain stores, it was inevitable that the government should take action if the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) were not going to be let down as a gentleman engaging in heroics before the country with the idea of obtaining some approval, which he did get. I am sure it would not be becoming of the hon. gentleman to let it stay at that. I can bespeak one class of people who will approve of this action, namely, the very much embarrassed retail traders throughout Canada, especially in the small villages in the west. They are at their wits' end to know how to carry on. What with the competition of the buses, and the drays and the highways, the mail order houses and the chain stores, and competition among themselves, they hardly know what line of goods to keep which they can dispose of to advantage. I know the minister will get sympathy from these people.

Just how the minister is going to investigate and put a stop to mass buying I do not know. Perhaps we have been wrong in the past in our industrial development methods, but we have always thought that it was a good thing to conduct affairs efficiently, and that we should buy in large instead of in small quantities. The very foundation of industrial development has been to purchase our raw material cheaply. There is an old saying that anything that is bought properly is half sold, so that the buyer can buy it to advantage. I am sure our wives always like to go to the chain stores—why? Because they can get good bargains. Maybe while these things are so there are nevertheless some abuses. One or two have happened to come to my attention comparatively recently. The chain stores will acquire a line of farm produce, for example, pigs' feet, which is a great dainty with some people. They will buy the whole output of an abattoir and use them as a drawing card for their customers, a sort of advertisement. Instead of spending so much money in newspaper advertising they use this line to serve the same purpose. This competes with the regular meat trade and it affects the price not only of pigs' feet but of almost every cut in the animal. So that the chain store business, with its ramifications, is enormous. Just how it can be remedied I do not know, but I wish my hon. friend good luck.

I do not know whether the minister has tackled something bigger than he realized, but he has certainly undertaken a tremendous proposition, and no one can do anything but wish him well in his remedial endeavours.

With regard to the remarks of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), if I understood him rightly he took credit for the milk investigation—and I do not want to discredit it; it was quite outside its jurisdiction but it did something, and something is always better than nothing as a rule—for having put Winnipeg wise as to how to solve the milk problem there. Well, action had been taken in Winnipeg in this regard before the federal milk inquiry of last session. As a matter of fact, we had witnesses down from that very organization to tell this committee how the remedy was effected there. Maybe I heard the hon. gentleman wrongly, but that was what I gathered from him.

As respects the rest of the resolution, I hope the minister does not think that we are talking unnecessarily long on the problem. He should feel complimented; it shows that he has touched something we are all thinking about. The whole press of Canada is talking about it, and if this proposal does nothing else than divert attention from some of the government's shortcomings, they should be glad that we are devoting some attention to it. I hope they will proceed with all haste, and now that they are dealing with something that does come under their jurisdiction I trust that there will be some good results from the investigation, even though long delayed.

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): I wish to make just a few observations on the motion now before the house. Subsection (d) of the resolution relates to the methods and system prevailing in the marketing of live stock and animal products for domestic consumption and export. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) proposed an amendment which probably is not essential provided the Prime Minister will tell us how wide the scope of the committee will be in this investigation. From my point of view at any rate, it all depends upon the scope of the order of reference from the house to the committee. If we are not going to be allowed to investigate the capital structure of, say, the packing industry, then the whole thing is a fiasco. I speak as one who is interested primarily in live stock and animal products of the farm and unless we are permitted in this committee to investigate the whole capital structure of the packing industry we might as well not refer the matter to the committee. I hope that when the Prime Minister rises he will assure us that the suggestion of the hon. member for Gloucester, indicated in his amendment, will not be necessary and that the reference will give the right to investigate the capitalization of these concerns.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): May I at the outset explain to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the reason I smiled when he said that dumping was a development of the last three years was this: I was reminded of the doleful tales we heard so often from this side when he was over here five years ago with regard to the dumping practice.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not say dumping in the last three years; I never used the word dumping.

Mr. YOUNG: I understood the hon. gentleman to use that word.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think the hon. gentleman wishes to misconstrue what I said. I said that there had been growing up a practice during the last three years, not only internally but in the external market as well, of selling goods at less than cost of production. I was not referring to dumping in the broad sense of the word.

Mr. McINTOSH: Domestic dumping.

Mr. STEVENS: Quite so.

Mr. YOUNG: That I suppose is dumping as it used to be. Well, if it is true that the practice of selling goods at less than cost has greatly increased during the past three years, then it is equally true that tariffs have equally increased during the same period, and we are forced to the conclusion that this practice of selling at less than cost, which we are told will be disastrous, is one that must be encouraged by the high tariffs that prevail.

Mr. STEVENS: Just the reverse.

Mr. YOUNG: My friend says, just the reverse. He means that dumping causes tariffs to rise. It seems to me we have a vicious circle; one begets the other. The thing he deplores is a consequence of the policy he follows.

However, I must congratulate the government on the resolution; it shows at least that they have some glimmerings of wisdom and realize at last the truth of what we have been telling them for many years, that our trouble is that the spread between the price the producer receives for the thing he has to sell and the price the consumer pays is responsible for the fact that our people cannot buy the products of the factories. They cannot buy each other's labour, and that is responsible for much of the unemployment and distress that exist. Reading the resolution carefully I am not sure that the government has yet the right point of view. It seems to me that they are very largely overlooking the consumer in this resolution.

Mr. BENNETT: Look at the last words: "Not inconsistent with the rights of consumers".

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, I shall deal with that a little later. It seems to me that the vital question is not so much: What does the producer receive in dollars and cents for his product? but: What can he buy with that money when he gets it? If he receives, no matter what price for his product and then finds that the commodities he wishes to buy are at a price level he cannot reach, he is not assisted very much.

Not very long ago I was talking to a gentleman who had been farming in the west for many years. He told me that he had never been so well off as in the old days when wheat was selling at sixty to seventy cents a bushel; but, he said: "In those days I could buy a mower for fifty bushels of wheat and now the same mower costs me 200 bushels. In those days I could buy a binder for 250 bushels of wheat whereas now it costs 600 bushels. In those days I could buy a pair of overalls for a bushel and a half of wheat whereas now it would cost four bushels." The trouble to-day with our primary producers is that they have to pay so much for the products of the secondary industries that they are not able to buy them. Three or four years ago when this government took office, prices were declining rapidly throughout the world, and in particular prices of farm and natural products generally, and the government found itself powerless to stop this decline. What was the logical thing for the government to do under the circumstances? It was to endeavour to see that all other prices came down along with the prices of primary products. But the government took the opposite view; they said: At least we can stop the prices of manufactured goods from coming down, and they legislated accordingly. They adopted a fiscal policy calculated to prevent a decline in the prices of manufactured goods commensurate with the decline in the prices of farm products. What was the result? In 1929 a dollar's worth of farm products in this country would buy a certain quantity of manufactured goods. In 1933 it required $1.62 worth of farm products to buy the same quantity of manufactured goods. That widening of the spread had the effect of putting our primary producers out of the market; they could not buy the products of the secondary industries.

We are now told that the mail order houses and chain stores follow unethical practices in their buying methods. It is generally conceded that the cost of merchandising goods, that is, of getting them from the producer to the consumer, is excessive. Perhaps that is due in large measure to the fact that we insist on too much in the way of service, or it may be to an expensive organization that we have for distributing goods. But the mail order houses were the first people to take a step in the direction of solving that problem; they were the first to help in reducing the spread between the price which the consumer pays and what the producer receives. This worked a hardship at the time on the local storekeeper. As a result he was driven to form chain stores and we have the mail order house and the local merchant organized into chain stores, buying now by a more economical method than that followed formerly and so bringing goods to the consumer at a lower cost than before. In that I think they are rendering a real service to the community.

Not many days ago something was said in the press about a speech delivered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), I think in Toronto, and one mail order house challenged him to prove that they had been guilty of unethical practices. If I recall rightly the instance he gave was something like this: That company had gone to a certain woollen mill in Scotland and offered them an order for some 250,000 yards of a certain kind of cloth at a price somewhat lower than the mill was asking. The mill at first refused to accept the price, but when the company's buyer went away saying: Very good, he reecived a telegram a day or two later accepting the price. I cannot see anything unethical or wrong in that. Surely such a company has the right to bargain for those goods as best it can, and when it passes those goods on to the consumer with that saving of price, certainly the Canadian people are going to benefit. If you stop that kind of thing, you say this, that prices must forever remain as they are; they must become rigid and never be lowered. It has been demonstrated beyond peradventure that the government is powerless to stop the decline in the price of natural products, those things that are sold on the world market. The logical thing to do then is to bring down the prices of other things proportionately so that people can buy them on an equal basis. But when you say that you will not allow the prices of certain commodities to come down, to share in the deflation, you are putting other classes in the community in the position where they cannot buy the products of those people. I think it was said by a witness in the milk inquiry last year that even if they got the milk for nothing, they would still have to charge seven cents a quart for it. What does that mean? It means that while the producer got nothing for his labour, certain other people had to have their full share. That is not equitable.

Let us read paragraph (a) of the resolution:

> The effect of mass buying by department and chain store organizations upon—

Upon what?

> —the regular retail trade of the country, as well as upon the business of manufacturers and producers.

Not a word about the consumer. Paragraph (b) reads:

> The effect thereof upon the standard of living amongst those employed in such industries and organizations.

Nothing about the consumer. Paragraph (c) speaks of:

> The relation between the flour milling industry and the bakeries of the country, and the effect of such relations on the baking industry of Canada.

Not a word about its effect on the price of bread. It seems to me that the essential thing is to look at the whole problem from the standpoint of the consumer. If you can get the goods into the hands of the consumer at a reasonable price, he will buy the goods and that will give employment to others. But if you pick out certain classes in the community, as is done in this resolution, and see that they do not suffer any reduction in their wages, the effect will be a rigidity in the price level at certain points; it cannot be adjusted and the result will be that some people will not be able to buy the products of others. I hope the government in making this inquiry will not lose sight of the fact that the whole question should be studied from the standpoint of the consumer. Let me once more quote these words I have quoted before from Bastiat:

Study all economic questions from the consumer's standpoint for the consumer's interests are the interests of the human race.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, this resolution, so far as it goes, meets I believe with the unanimous approval of the house, but like some hon. members who have spoken I do not believe it goes far enough and I think this is the time when further suggestions should be made with a view to enlarging the scope of the inquiry.

I was particularly pleased to hear the subject of fish mentioned by some members on both sides of the house, and in that matter I would say that conditions peculiar to British Columbia fisheries are somewhat different from those prevailing in some other provinces. One hon. member spoke about one and one-half cents per pound being given to fishermen. The fishermen of the Fraser river were offered one cent for fish weighing from seven to ten pounds apiece. Another very peculiar instance in regard to the fishing industry is the fact that while our cannery men were offering our fishermen a certain price for sockeye salmon some of them were paying United States fishermen a higher price and I believe they brought 125,000 pounds of fish into this country which were canned and, I presume, will go out under the empire treaty to the old country. Strict notice should be taken of that phase of the situation.

The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) brought up the question of jurisdiction in connection with milk prices, pointing out that this was purely a provincial matter. For the information of the house and in particular the hon. member let me say that as regards the milk situation in British Columbia it is not provincial legislation that is troubling us now but federal legislation to enable us to have better and fuller cooperation so that prices to the farmers will be increased without increasing the price to the consumer. That undertaking has been given by the largest producers' organization in British Columbia, the Fraser Valley Milk Producers, and we trust that the Dominion government will take serious note of the milk situation in British Columbia.

The three great industries in British Columbia are fishing, agriculture and lumbering, and I would like to speak briefly of some conditions affecting the lumber industry which I think should be taken into account when dealing with this motion. The Prime Minister has been very energetic and received great commendation for his work in helping to find a market for our lumber in the old country. But I would like to point out to him that there are certain factors prevailing throughout British Columbia which should be remedied if the industry is to prosper and the men engaged therein receive at least a decent living. At the present time in British Columbia we have some firms paying 40 cents an hour, others 30 cents, others 25 cents, and we have other lumber concerns with the same up-to-date machinery paying men in clothing only and a mere pittance in food. We have other industries paying the men on what is called a profit-sharing basis, and to me it seems an inhuman attempt to take undue advantage of the workers, because instead of the men being on a profit-sharing basis they are really sharing the losses of some of these firms. They pay them 12 or 15 cents an hour and the men are told that if there is any profit at the end of the month they will be given a share. But it has been noted that when profits begin to arise the men are then given a straight wage of 20 or 25 cents an hour. But while the firm is having trouble and not making any profit they tell the men it would be a good thing for them to be on a profit-sharing basis. I do not think the industry should be allowed to pay such a low scale of wages. Two firms in particular, run by Hindus, I believe, and employing Hindu labour, pay only in clothing and a little bit of rice to the men who are working, and these firms have the same up-to-date machinery and can produce just as much per day as the other mills. This has the effect of bringing down wages of all other workers in British Columbia, until to-day I say without hesitation that the men working both in the lumber camps and in the mills are working at slave wages. If we are going to keep fighting for empire markets, especially in Great Britain, I think the Prime Minister might also well take note of firms using cheap oriental labour; it is almost a breach of faith in empire trade to send that material to Great Britain as Canadian produce. The serious part to me is the fact that it brings down the wage of all the workers in British Columbia to a level of bare subsistence; it is very serious indeed, because we all know that the purchasing power of a country comes chiefly from its wage bill.

Perhaps I will have more to say when we go into committee, but at the moment I am just drawing the attention of the house to these matters.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on the resolution. The hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) asks that the financial structure of the packing industry should be inquired into. I would like the inquiry to be enlarged to take in the financial structure of all our industries. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has said that presently some manufacturers are selling their goods at less than cost of production. I believe that is just as true of the bushmen and settlers in the lumbering and pulpwood industry. The right hon. Prime Minister last Monday told the house of the importance of the newsprint and pulpwood industry. Anyone who read the articles published in Saturday Night last fall and winter on that industry would be fully seized of the situation developing out of its financial structure. It is true that at present the price of newsprint in the United States is very low, I believe that last fall it averaged $34 a ton. The fact remains that things took place in the financing and the reorganizing of these great corporations which the government might well investigate. Apparently this inquiry is going to be set in motion primarily for the purpose of finding out about so-called sweat-shop conditions. I believe on that score alone that the resolution and the inquiry are fully warranted. By sweat-shop conditions we mean that those engaged in the industry are not receiving a fair remuneration for their work. I feel safe in saying that the present stress we have in our lumber industry in northern Ontario and Quebec is largely due to the faulty financial structure of some of the large corporations. Prices go with wages, there is no way of divorcing the two. During this depression, as during others, wages went down before prices of commodities, and when wages are low, buying power is necessarily curtailed, and it is no use trying to bolster up commodity prices unless there is first an increase in the wages of working men. In our own section I have seen one corporation engaged in the newsprint industry, which did not go into receivership, paying more for their pulpwood and to their men than other corporations that went into receivership on account of mismanagement of their financing department, and not on account of their producing organization, but I believe the government would be well-advised to make a thorough examination of the actual financial structure of all the corporations of Canada. The hon. member who preceded me mentioned the fact that in British Columbia they are also having this difficulty in the lumbering industry. I have vividly in my mind a statement made last summer, I believe during the world economic conference, when there was some protest against Great Britain buying a large quantity of lumber from Russia. I believe it was one of the Russian commissioners in England at the time who rightly said, Take the water out of your lumber companies stock, and your large overhead, and you will be able to compete with us. In many of our large corporations we have over-capitalization, and too great overhead, not so much in the management as in the administration. I made the point last evening, and I repeat it to-day, that the government should go into that so-called sweat-shop feature. We have that in our own section on account of the faulty financial structure of a lot of our large newsprint concerns. The statements I am making are supported by those of men prominent in finance and economics, contained in many of our financial papers during the last two or three years. I believe a lot of good would be done if a sweeping investigation were made. We are inclined to ridicule some of the policies of new parties, but I believe they do some good when they address themselves to making the people realize that in some instances stock has been watered to the extent of 400 per cent of the original capital invested. I believe on that score alone there should be very thorough analysis.

I am certain that inquiry will show that retailers as a whole, at least the independent ones, are not making exorbitant profits. It will be found that the margin received by the retailer is very small. If it were within the jurisdiction of the government to compel all retailers to sell for cash only I believe that would go a long way towards a solution of the retailers' troubles, and the consumers would be able to buy their goods more cheaply as well. That policy has been adopted by the chain stores, and it is one of the important factors in their success. I say that as long as you have credit extended in that industry there will be a large spread.

That is all I want to say at the moment, Mr. Speaker, but I strongly urge upon the Prime Minister that he enlarge the resolution so that it may be possible to have the committee at least analyse the financial structure of our large industrial corporations.

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have no hope of adding anything to the debate that has taken place, but I should like to say that I am glad to see that at last the government is getting down to the consideration of some of the basic grievances that are troubling the people of this country to-day. Without doubt this action is long overdue.

May I tell you, sir, that the constituents whom I am sent here to represent are largely petty farmers and labourers. The petty farmers have lost their identity as such in the constituency of St. Boniface and have taken up wood cutting for a living. They have lost their herds and their farms; many of them are on relief, while others are cutting wood at fifty cents a cord, which is largely used in place of coal to heat the city of Winnipeg. The labourers also have lost their employment; to a large extent they are on relief. I believe the abuses that have obtained with regard to the spread between the price paid the primary producer and the amount for which the commodity finally sold is very largely to blame for this state of affairs. Some mention has been made of milk with regard to the city of Winnipeg. It is true that we had an extensive investigation into the price of milk, but unfortunately the primary producer in Manitoba is still getting one cent per pound for his milk, and milk is still selling for ten cents a quart in the city. It is true that the matter is under the jurisdiction of the utilities commissioner, but it would seem that he has no power to bring about a betterment of conditions.

Mr. BENNETT: He could get the power from the legislature.

Mr. HOWDEN: I was going to say that this is a sad state of affairs. Here is a commodity used all over the nation. In Winnipeg it comes under the utilities commissioner, but still we have failed to obtain any betterment in regard to the price or distribution of milk. The same thing is true with regard to other ordinary commodities produced on the farm. For poultry, eggs and beef the farmer receives practically nothing, but those of us who live in the city still pay a reasonably good price for these commodities. With regard to manufactured goods the price is not so low. I grant you that the prices of ordinary manufactured commodities have come down and that workingmen have suffered as a result, but the decline is not at all in proportion to the decrease in the prices received for farm products. I believe that in the production of ordinary commodities the price should be the cost of production, with a reasonable percentage allowed the distributor, but unfortunately that situation does not exist at present.

The statement was made in this house to-day that the remedy is not with this federal jurisdiction. I might point out, however, that if the remedy is not with the federal jurisdiction and is in the hands of the provinces, the municipalities and the provinces are very largely dependent upon this federal authority for their living, so to speak. I think conditions might be imposed upon the provinces by the federal authority which would do away with some of the abuses to which I have referred.

I do not wish to labour the subject at further length. I congratulate the government upon having brought up at this time this very necessary and desirable measure.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, as the representative of a live stock area in northern Saskatchewan I could hardly be expected to refrain from taking part in this debate. This resolution touches upon some very important questions; when we consider the system in effect at present and the methods adopted under that system with respect to the purchasing of live stock for domestic and export purposes, then I think we are approaching a problem that is closely connected with that of the prices paid for live stock in Canada.

After listening to this debate, Mr. Speaker, may I say that it would appear to me that some hon. gentlemen opposite are in doubt as to what can be done or what ought to be done. One hon. member waxed eloquent with regard to the sovereignty of parliament. After listening to him one would expect that there could be no doubt in the mind of any hon. member with regard to the power of the federal parliament to investigate the buying and selling of live stock, mass buying and selling on the part of departmental and chain stores, labour conditions and standards of living prevailing in certain industries and the public relations existing in the flour milling and baking organizations to-day in Canada. On the other hand, however, we had another hon. member express doubt whether or not the government has jurisdiction to go ahead with this inquiry, because these matters come under provincial jurisdiction. This is rather a peculiar position for supporters of the government to take.

I think we all recognize that the federal parliament has ample power to go ahead, and the important question in regard to the investigation mooted by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in this resolution is whether or not the government is sincere. To my mind that is the main question before the house. It profiteth not very much if an individual is gifted with a sharp intellect, has his emotions highly developed and possesses great will power if, back of that development, there is not honesty of conviction and absolute sincerity. So I say again, is the government sincere in this investigation? If it is, this contemplated inquiry may amount to something; if it is not, as hon. members have stated this afternoon, it will amount to nothing. So if the government is sincere I think we ought to have the fullest possible investigation. If the investigation is not complete and well rounded out; if action is not taken on the evidence adduced, then I say that will help finish the government before the country, and really if the move ends in chaos and failure it ought to have just that effect.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not know whether or not the hon. gentleman who is speaking questioned the sincerity of the Prime Minister. I believe he did.

Mr. McINTOSH: May I direct your attention, sir, to the fact that the hon. gentleman is not in his own seat?

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): As a point of order, may I ask if an hon. member of the house may question the sincerity of another hon. member?

Mr. SPEAKER: If such a statement were made by the hon. member it would only be by inference.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): The hon. member used the word.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not find the point of order well taken.

Mr. McINTOSH: Now that this little squabble is all over, we will proceed with the question of the day. I meant to say just what I said. If the government is sincere, and I am not going to say that it is not, then perhaps we will get results which will startle the country. However, before leaving the point may I state that I believe the government is not as non-partisan as some hon. members opposite would lead us to believe. I have been in touch with the problem before us for months, not only as a newspaper man but in other ways. I quite realize the seriousness of the problem brought forward by the government, and have been told time and again that whatever party or whatever man would take hold of the question, go to the root of it and expose the practices and limitations of buying and selling, in the broadest sense of the word under a vicious high protection system, would bring a well-defined public opinion to the solution of this very grave state of affairs. Therefore I believe the government of the day, fully realizing that this is a political matter, is not so non-partisan as some of its members would make us believe. So far as that is concerned, the opposition will have no desire to make any political capital out of the investigation. We will give our fullest support to it on the understanding that immediate and complete action will be taken on the facts and evidence brought before parliament.

If the government is so non-partisan and non-political with respect to this resolution, why did it not accept the resolution of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McKenzie)? Why did it not accept the motion he placed on the order paper a year ago? Why did the government not take action two years ago; why this belated effort? Why is the resolution of the hon. member for Assiniboia sidetracked and a new resolution brought in which has no broader meaning and will bring no result which could not have been brought about by the resolution moved in the name of the hon. member I have mentioned?

So far as the United States is concerned, what has the present government of that country done since it has assumed power, despite all its investigations, coding and actions of that sort? Has it not deliberately sidetracked the most important problems? Has it not left its pilfering high tariffs in effect? Has it not run away from the main problems? And has not all this coding, which even the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) does not like, all this manipulating, this twisting and turning for the last few months, have not all these things been done without touching the nationally economic tariff structure? Well, they will never get very far with a policy of that kind. They may get temporary results, but they will not get permanent results.

After all, the main problem facing this house to-day in connection with the motion before it is not contained in parts (a), (b), (c) or (d). The main problem is the high tariff structure of Canada—not necessarily the departmental and chain stores, the millers, the bakeries and packing establishments—and unless the government will take action to bring about freer distribution, internationally and nationally, we cannot expect conditions in Canada to improve. The government may go on investigating until doomsday, they may draw up commission after commission, give power after power and authority after authority, and continue giving such powers for the next quarter of a century, and they will not get very far. Something more drastic is needed.

To my mind the people must take hold of this problem. The sum and substance of the motion before us is that unless the fullest investigation is made and the greatest good secured this great problem will have to be passed on to the people of Canada in the coming election, and if it is they will tear some of the tariff obstruction down, and bring about a distribution which will result in fairer prices to the consumers and prosperity to the nation.

In closing may I ask for the fullest and sincerest investigation and immediate action on the evidence produced before the committee, not two or three sessions from now, but right away. Unless action of that kind is taken perhaps the time of the house could be better spent in some other direction.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I in closing this rather protracted and wholly unexpected debate point out that the premises of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) are, unfortunately, unsound. Under the Combines Investigation Act there is no authority to inquire into paragraphs (a), (b) or (c). The Combines Investigation Act is limited to cases in which a combine is suspected to exist. The matter was carefully considered. Where the registrar has power on requisition from six persons or from a minister, to order an inquiry, is in a case where there is a combination. "Combine" is of course defined. That however is not the evil for which remedy is here sought. As has been so well pointed out, I was rather surprised the right hon. gentleman should have suggested that the Combines Investigation Act was ample for the purpose of this motion. The right to issue a commission under the Combines Investigation Act is for matters that are affected by that act, but not inconsistent with it, and the power that is asked here is to set up a commission for the purpose of giving effect to whatever desire the committee may manifest, for the purpose of procuring information. In connection with fish and other commodities I do not wish to say more than this, that if it is thought desirable the word "fish" may be added.

Mr. DUFF: It is included.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe most men will agree that modern science has demonstrated to us that the word "animal" comprises all forms of living organisms, as distinguished from vegetable. Under the word "animal" I find this observation:

> We know now that in so far as life and living matter can be investigated by science, animals and plants cannot be described as being alive in different degrees.

The term used to be used just as it has been used in the present instance. The article before me states:

> The common use of the word animal as the equivalent of mammal, as opposed to bird, or reptile or fish is erroneous.

Therefore the word includes fish, and I do not think it is necessary to move an amendment. However, I have no objection to its being done if it is so desired. In the dictionary at the table the word "fish" is defined as: "Animal living in the water".

That would include an animal living in the sea, so that there is no difficulty on that score.

Then, may I point out one matter which covers all the criticism which has been offered with respect to the deficiency of the powers of the committee. They are to inquire into the spread between prices received for commodities by the producer thereof, and the prices paid by the consumers therefor. That is, they are to investigate the causes of the spread. To undertake for a single moment to indicate in a resolution of this type what the causes are would, in my judgment, destroy its very purpose. When the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) suggested that there should be an inquiry into the financial structure, I would reply that such inquiry would be involved in the investigation, because we all realize that one of the items in costing practices is interest on money, taxes and other items. The cost to the consumer of any commodity is the cost of the raw material; the cost of processing, we will say; the taxes; the interest on borrowed money, whether it be in the form of capital structure or bank loans, and other items that need not be gone into in detail. This committee is clothed with power to investigate the causes of the large spread. If the committee should determine, for instance, that over-capitalization is one of the causes; if they declared that the matters to which the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Butcher) last evening referred are causes, they would have power to investigate such matters. Incidentally I should like to point out to the hon. member for Last Mountain that every grievance in the way of combinations to which he referred last night arose under the late administration, and that is rather an odd thing. I do not charge the government with being responsible for it, but I only point out that it is a fact that they came into being under the late administration—if hon. members of the house who are interested in the matter will just take the trouble to trace them to their origin they will find that some of them came into being under our Companies Act as it now exists. But unfortunately, with our divided jurisdiction, many of them came into being under provincial companies acts, and I may add that it was completely established that the federal Secretary of State has no power, and this government has no power, to issue a commission for the purpose of investigating matters connected with the organization of a purely provincial company. Hence it was, when the blue sky law or the Security Frauds Prevention Act was passed and the privy council declared it intra vires of the provincial legislature, it did more than any other single thing in recent years to enable the people to have control over the issue of securities and to punish those whose securities had been sold upon fraudulent misrepresentation.

The other point that was made was as to the interest of the consumer being adequately protected. I would suggest to my hon. friend from Weyburn (Mr. Young), whose well known advocacy of the interests of the consumer found expression in the consumers league in days when he sat to the right of the Speaker more than to the left, that if he will observe the language of the resolution, it says "with fair and just returns to producers, employees, and employers, not inconsistent with the rights of consumers." It is idle to say that you can build on one alone; the rights of all must be considered. When the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) spoke I could not help but think I must suggest to him the desirability of bringing his complaints to the government of British Columbia, because the whole administration with respect to minimum wage is under the control of the provincial government, and rightly so. Sometimes there is a tendency to complain that the federal government has not control of these matters, but the theory upon which our constitution was created was that local matters which in the very nature of things the local government must know about and could easily deal with should be regarded as of domestic and local concern. And so it is that wages, property and civil rights, and these other matters to which the hon. gentleman referred are matters that must be dealt with by the provincial legislatures.

So I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment that is offered by my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) is covered by the terms of the resolution, and I doubt its relevancy if it is proposed in the form in which it stands. The word "fish" I do not think now is necessary. I think my hon. friend from St. Boniface would say that it would have been necessary fifty years ago, but since modern science has dealt with protoplasm in the manner in which it has the division is merely between the animal and the vegetable kingdom, and fish would therefore be included as an animal product.

I can only add that it is the intention of the government in moving this resolution that the committee shall deal with these matters in the broadest possible terms. It is not a committee of the government; it is a committee of the House of Commons; and while the practice of the house is that the government shall always be represented by a majority on the committee, those opposing the government nominally, either the official opposition or those to their left, will have representation upon the committee. The language of the resolution is broad; it is general. The only criticism I have to offer with respect to some of the observations that have been made is that they have overlooked these words, "and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, more particularly to inquire into and investigate—

Mr. VENIOT: May I interrupt the right hon. gentleman for a moment?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. VENIOT: Do I understand the Prime Minister to say that under the motion as presented to the house by the Prime Minister, and without my amendment, we can go into the points I touched upon in my remarks?

Mr. BENNETT: I have no doubt about it, for this reason—

Mr. VENIOT: Then I am ready to withdraw my amendment on that assurance.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not want my hon. friend simply to take my word; I should like his reason to be committed to it as well. The resolution says that a special committee shall be appointed "to inquire into and investigate the causes of the large spread between the prices received for commodities by the producer thereof, and the price paid by the consumers therefor." Now every cause that lies between (a) and (b) can be inquired into, and one of those causes obviously is the question of the capitalization.

Mr. VENIOT: What led me astray was that certain things are specifically mentioned in paragraphs (a), (b), (c) and (d), and I thought that such specification might prevent other matters from being inquired into.

Mr. BENNETT: Those words "and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing," were written in with my own hand. I think there is no gentleman in this house who hears those words who can say that that is not the language that is apt, under our system of draftsmanship, to confer the widest possible powers upon anybody to whom any question is, in the language of the Scottish courts, remitted, or as we say, referred.

Without going into the matter at any further length, in view of what has been said I think it has been abundantly established, and I want it to be accepted by the house, that it is intended to give the widest possible opportunity for dealing with these problems within our legislative jurisdiction. Whether or not there may be a limit I cannot say. That is all I can possibly suggest.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member for Gloucester the unanimous consent of the house for leave to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The amendment is not withdrawn as yet, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to say a few words upon it before it is.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I have no desire to detain the house; indeed, like the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I had not intended to speak again, and I would not do so now, had he not spoken. But, in the course of his remarks, the hon. gentleman said that there was a difference between the American legislation respecting trusts and combines and the Canadian Combines Investigation Act, in that the former American legislation was based upon opposition to combines as such, whereas the present legislation is based upon a recognition that combines are inevitable, and that it is rather at the abuse to which combines are likely to give rise than at combines as such that legislation is directed and for which remedies are provided.

I stated that when the Canadian Combines Investigation Act was introduced the position taken by the government at the time was that combinations as such should not be regarded as illegal, that the Canadian act differed in that particular from the legislation then existing in the United States; also that the same was true of the Combines Investigation Act which was reintroduced in 1923 in Canada. Both these enactments were based on the theory that this is an age of world-wide competition and that combination is inevitable and as such should not be regarded as of itself an evil. On the other hand, it was recognized that large combination makes for great power in the direction of affairs and that all such power involves the possibility of abuse. It was and is against the abuses of combinations that the Canadian Combines Investigation acts were framed.

It is much to the credit of Canada that the position which this parliament has taken from the outset with respect to combines should be the one which, after some twenty-five years of legislation on the subject, the United States has come only this year to recognize as the right one. While, as the Prime Minister says, from the mere statement that an act is intended to have a certain purpose, it does not necessarily follow that that purpose is attained; nevertheless, where the provisions themselves bear out what is said, the statement with regard to its essential features made at the time of introduction of a measure does help to throw light on the matter. If that statement is not in any way questioned when the legislation itself is under review, it is a factor which must necessarily be taken into account in the construction of the statute.

I have in my hand the debates of January 18, 1910, at the time at which the Combines Investigation Act was introduced. Sir Robert Borden was then leader of the opposition, and Sir Robert asked for an explanation. I was, at the time, holding the position of Minister of Labour in the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and in reply to Sir Robert Borden I made, in part, the following statement:

> The legislation differs in some particulars from legislation of a like nature which has been introduced in other countries in that it is not aimed against combines or mergers as such, but rather against the exercise on the part of combines, mergers or monopolies, in an unfair manner, of the powers which they may get from that form of organization. This is an age of organization and not merely of local or national competition but of world-wide competition and any industry or any nation which wishes to hold its own in the field of competition must do much in the way of perfecting organization.

I have read this in order that the record may be complete, as well as to indicate what really has been the main objective of the legislation dealing with combines, mergers and trusts. It has not been against large organization of industry as such, but rather against the abuses to which vast organization and combinations may give rise, that the legislation has been directed. I have in my hand the legislation of 1923, and it will be observed that the very definition of "combine" at the outset recognizes that there may be combinations which are not illegal and are, therefore, not affected by the provisions of the act. It is only the class of combines referred to specifically as having certain of the features mentioned in the definition that comes within the scope of combinations that would be affected by the legislation. "Combine" does not mean that any combine is a combine affected by the provisions of the act, but only such combine as falls within the definition of the word "combine" as set forth. I quote:

> In this act, unless the context otherwise requires,—(a) The expression "combine" in this act shall be deemed to have reference to such combines immediately hereinafter defined as have operated or are likely to operate to the detriment of or against the interest of the public, whether consumers, producers or others; and limited as aforesaid, the expression as used in this act shall be deemed to include—

Among the provisions included are the following:

> (ii) preventing, limiting or lessening manufacture or production; or (iii) fixing a common price or a resale price, or a common rental, or a common cost of storage or transportation; or (iv) enhancing the price, rental or cost of article, rental storage or transportation; or (v) preventing or lessening competition in or substantially controlling within any particular area or district or generally, production, manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, storage, transportation, insurance or supply; or (vi) otherwise restraining or injuring trade or commerce.

These are described as combines, coming within the provisions of the act. The words, "preventing or lessening competition in, or substantially controlling within any particular area," production and so forth, and the words, "otherwise restraining or injuring trade or commerce" are, it seems to me, sufficiently broad to cover anything that is set forth in the motion of my hon. friend with respect to the classes of interference with trade into which it is proposed to inquire.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman is overlooking the governing words. There must be a combination, and that is more than one thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The provision is with respect to a combine that in any way prevents—

Mr. BENNETT: What is it that prevents? It is a combination that does that; that is what the statute says.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Any organization at all, whether two or more people, uniting together for a specific purpose.

Mr. BENNETT: That is it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should say that a board of directors themselves, if they agreed that the organization which they controlled should do something that would affect trade adversely would constitute a combine within the meaning of this act. However, the point is largely secondary because my reference to the Combines Investigation Act was only with respect to the machinery it provided for investigation; it was not intended as a substitute for what is proposed by the motion. The reason I spoke of the Combines Investigation Act was, more particularly, to point out that in my opinion the government, if it had wished to do so and were sympathetic generally with the purposes of the act, would have been able to find within its four corners legislation that would have justified it in investigating, and which would have enabled it to investigate in advance of this session any matter referred to in the motion before the house. Take the terms of the act with respect to the machinery required to set it in motion:

> Any six persons, British subjects, resident in Canada, of the full age of twenty-one years, who are of the opinion that a combine exists, or is being formed, may apply in writing to the registrar for an investigation of such alleged combine. . . .

It is not necessary that a combine shall actually exist. If half a dozen persons are of the opinion that there is a combination in industry which is operating in any way to restrain or injure trade, that is all that is required to set in motion the whole machinery of the act. But even that much is not necessary from the point of view of the ministry. Another section provides:

> Whenever such application shall be made to the registrar, or whenever the registrar shall have reason to believe that a combine exists or is being formed, or whenever so directed by the minister, the registrar shall cause an inquiry to be made into all such matters whether of fact or of law with respect to the said alleged combine as he shall consider necessary to inquire into with the view of determining whether a combine exists or is being formed.

I do not hesitate to say that, if I had been Minister of Labour and had wanted to find legislation which would have enabled me to investigate any of the matters referred to in the motion, that I would have found sufficient scope in the authority given me by the act of 1923 to instruct the registrar under the Combines Act to proceed with an investigation. If the inquiry justified the belief that there was a combination which was restraining or affecting trade in some manner, then there is in the act authority to proceed further with the appointment of a commission to deal with the matter. That was the point which I was seeking to make so far as the Combines Investigation Act was concerned. It was not to substitute this act for what is being proposed at the moment by the motion; it was simply to state the belief that the government might have been that much farther ahead in having ready for submission to the house legislation necessary to meet any of these evils, if it had started inquiries under the act with the power given to the minister as it is provided in the legislation.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that there had been a very large number of investigations under the combines act. I have forgotten the figures, but he surprised me very much as he quoted them. I think what he had reference to was the number of applications which had been made and possibly the number of some slight preliminary inquiries. I have followed rather carefully the proceedings under the act and my recollection is that there have been something like fifteen substantial investigations under its provisions. Of that number, seven were initiated at the time the late Liberal administration was in office and were completed within that time. In addition, three were started, making ten altogether that owed their origin to that period; the three thus started under our administration were completed during the time the present government has been in office. Five in addition were initiated under the present administration. I mention that only for the purpose of accuracy in the record.

May I say a further word in order that there may be no misunderstanding of my attitude or of that of the party on this side of the house? We have repeatedly stated—and indeed the legislation that has been introduced under the former Liberal administration shows the evidence of our belief—that we believed there are many evils of a class which publicity would do more to cure than penalty. Certainly evils which are in the nature of anti-social practices, if that term may be used to cover what I think we all have in mind, namely, the kind of thing that enables the mean man to profit by virtue of his meanness, are perhaps more effectually cured by publicity than by aught else. Anything which will throw light upon these anti-social practices is, I believe, wholly in the public interest. Certainly the kind of practices set forth in the resolution as introduced by the government, constitutes a class of evils from which this country is to-day suffering to a great degree in common with other countries throughout the world. I doubt very much if there is a single evil that more affects the well-being of consumers than those agreements which artificially fix or control prices and one way or another restrict and hamper trade. The internal trade of our country has become honey-combed and enmeshed by secret understandings and agreements. So far as the Liberal opposition is concerned, we heartily welcome anything that will throw light upon this class of evils. I can say for the official opposition that its members will join very cordially and wholeheartedly with the Prime Minister and his friends in endeavouring to make the investigation just as thorough as it can possibly be made.

My criticism, in so far as there was a criticism of the government's proposal, was that I thought it was surprising that it should be in the fifth rather than in the first, second, third or fourth session of this parliament that the proposal for an inquiry should be made; that I felt that the motion as drafted did not go far enough; and that special reference should have been made to and emphasis placed upon the necessity for the investigation of the financial organization of industry, the wreckage that has followed as a consequence of the way in which some financial operations have been carried out in connection with business, and the effect of those factors upon the prices at which commodities are being sold to consumers.

As to the point raised by the Prime Minister just before six o'clock, I assume that he, of course, will be accorded the right to reply. I have no desire to prevent him from replying and he is most welcome to do so, but I should like to know from Your Honour whether, according to the rules of the house, any hon. member who has moved a motion of this character has the right to reply after he has spoken on the motion itself.

Mr. SPEAKER: As I understand the matter, since an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Mackenzie), that is the subject before the house and members may address themselves to that subject. If the amendment is dealt with or if, as the hon. member for Gloucester suggests, it is withdrawn, the original motion is before the house and the Prime Minister has not yet closed the debate. When he was speaking just before six o'clock he was speaking on the amendment.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on something the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) said just before six o'clock. He told the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), who had been complaining of wage conditions in the lumber industry in British Columbia, that his remedy was to go to the provincial authorities, they having control of wages. That is, strictly speaking, correct, but there is a backwash to the subject that brings it back to the jurisdiction and to some extent to the responsibility of the Prime Minister. He said that the province was the place to go to in order to ask for the enforcement of the Minimum Wage Act. I may say that just that has been done; I did it myself. The new government had hardly had time to get photographed before I applied to them.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Before they came to Ottawa.

Mr. NEILL: Long before that. The answer was favourable; it was that so far as they had had time to consider the matter it was their intention to revise the Minimum Wage Act, to improve it to some extent, to remove from it the handicap of the technicality that had been discovered, and to enforce it. But I know exactly what the answer or one of the arguments against action will be. Some years ago, prior to the Tolmie government taking office, a minimum wage of forty cents an hour was established in the sawmill industry. After the Tolmie government took office, it was found owing to a technicality that was discovered, the act was not enforceable in its existing form. No attempt was made to remove the technicality and the whole act lay in abeyance as it does at the present time. But the minimum wage at that time was forty cents; now the wages are thirty cents, twenty-five cents, twenty cents and as low as eighteen cents an hour in the mill. The wage of eighteen cents an hour probably indicates an oriental, but he takes the place of a white man. As I say, I know what the answer will be. The mill men will reply that it will be impossible to pay greater wages than those indicated owing not so much to conditions of the lumber market as to its location so to speak. That is to say they have to send their product to the United Kingdom, which is a good deal like trying to make water run up hill. Coincident with that was the loss of the United States lumber market, to which up to two or three years ago we sold from British Columbia alone $20,000,000 worth in one year. At that time the duty on lumber going into the United States was $1 a thousand. It has been suggested—I think it is common knowledge—that a spirit of retaliation grew up in the United States because we put heavy duties against American products.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. BENNETT: That is not so. They did not increase the duty, I suppose the hon. gentleman knows.

Mr. NEILL: Well, they put on a tax of $3; it does not make any difference whether it is called a duty.

Mr. BENNETT: All the difference in the world.

Mr. NEILL: I think it was called an excise tax, which was applicable only to the foreign imports; what is the difference? At any rate whereas before Canadian lumber used to pay $1 per thousand feet, we will not say by what name the imposition was called,—now it is $4. It was put on for a limited period, to expire in June, 1934, and we had high hopes that before it expired there would be some measure perhaps of reciprocity. I am on record in Hansard as urging on the Prime Minister before he went to Washington, the need for reciprocity with the United States on lumber and fish. However, that fell through, and the president of the United States, I am sorry to say, has extended this impost for another two years.

Then the lumber industry had to turn to the British market, where it is heavily handicapped by many circumstances. One is the long haul, something like 7,000 miles as compared with a few hundred to the States. That makes a difference of between $6 and $8 per thousand in competition with lumber from say Finland or Sweden, which is something like 50 per cent of the value of the goods f.o.b. our wharves. That is a tremendous handicap. Also there is the time lost in getting bills of lading through and getting the money back, and until recently there was a heavy loss in exchange, which has now been done away with. And there is the further fact that the market did not suit us. We want to sell our third class lumber. We had a ready and greedy market for it in the northwestern states, the hard up farmer wanted No. 3 lumber and we could supply it. Anyone can sell No. 1 lumber. But the British buyer did not want cheap lumber, and it could not stand the cost of the long haul. He wanted first-class lumber, and also wanted it cut to standards of lengths and thicknesses different from our standards. We could not supply them out of stock; we had to have the orders specially cut, in some cases with special machinery. The United States market used to take eighty per cent of our product, but now that market is practically all gone. In 1933 we were 318,600,000 feet short of taking up the slack that we lost in the United States market, although we had an enormous increase in the Australian, Chinese and British market. It is on record, I have it under my hand from the lumber association, that the United States in 1933 took from us 551,000,000 feet less than in 1930. Of course some of that loss is due to the depression, but it indicates how much we feel the loss of that market. The lumbermen say, with some degree of truth I think, that these conditions of market in the United Kingdom do handicap them heavily in paying a wage which I think they themselves admit would be a proper one. You cannot conceive that 18 to 25 cents an hour for eight hours a day is a living wage, with our standards of living in the west.

What would be of more value to us in British Columbia than this United Kingdom market would be reciprocity with the United States in fish and lumber. I beg the Prime Minister to keep that in mind. Someone said the other day that that is not possible. But anything is possible; I think I heard a suggestion of whisky against hogs in connection with the United States and another country. If one such exchange can be arranged perhaps another can.

As far as this particular resolution before the house is concerned I heartily agree with its purpose; I compliment the Prime Minister on having brought it in, and hope it will be successful.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the house the amendment of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) is withdrawn.

Amendment withdrawn.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I may conclude the debate, I do not desire to trespass upon the time of the house except to correct, as a matter of record perhaps, as my right hon. friend would say—

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not like to interrupt the Prime Minister, but I would call the attention of the house to the fact that if the Prime Minister speaks now he closes the debate. Does any other hon. member wish to speak on the main motion

Mr. BENNETT: I desire only to correct some misapprehensions.

The common law of England declared in what was known as the Great Mogul steamship case, that all restraints of trade and associations are of course not illegal. Associations of farmers, of workingmen, of manufacturers, of producers, it mattered not who, were not illegal; and the common law to that effect still prevails largely in England. On the continent, of course, cartels are largely favoured. There are two world cartels that are very well known by all those who have to do with trade in these days; one has to do with chemicals and chemical products, and the other with steel. The one with respect to steel is perhaps not quite as effective as the one that has to do with chemicals. However, when it became apparent, shall I say, about the middle of the nineteenth century, that in new countries combinations were operating to the detriment of the consumer to such an extent that they could no longer be endured, legislation was passed by many countries. In the United States the Sherman Act was passed, aimed at ending combines. The Supreme Court of the United States dealt with the great tobacco case, and with the United States Steel case, under the Sherman Act, and with many cases that arose out of combinations in that country.

In this country, as the right hon. gentleman said, in 1910, while he was Minister of Labour, an act was introduced respecting combines that adopted the British common law principle, namely that all combinations were not illegal nor per se bad, but only if they had certain effects; one for instance being unduly enhancing prices, another unduly restraining trade—and very frequently the word "unduly" appeared in consequence of the recognition of the legality of combinations on the one hand and the desire to prevent them from bringing about an improper condition in the body politic on the other. There were two or three notable prosecutions in this country in the criminal courts under the provisions of our criminal code. One was in Brantford; one was against the grain exchange in Winnipeg; one was against the lumber combine in western Canada. When I was much younger than I am now I defended that action. One paragraph in the articles of association, in my judgment when I first saw the case, was fatal to their contention; it was upon that article that they were found guilty and fined, and the combine for the moment disappeared. There have been, of course, several combines in this country that have been held to be not illegal.

In 1923 the present act was framed and placed upon the statute book. Its legality was upheld, if my memory serves me aright, by the privy council. One of the questions that naturally suggests itself is why none of the things to which the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Butcher) referred last night were the subject matter of inquiry under this act during the seven years from 1923 to 1930. I tried to check them up; I speak subject to correction, but I think every one he named came into being between 1923 and 1930, and there was not a single inquiry under the act with respect to one of them. I invite hon. members of this house to look at the statute, to look at the speech of the hon. member for Last Mountain and to look at the dates when these various organizations came into being, and then ask himself that question. The truth is that in days of, shall I say, abounding prosperity—

Mr. YOUNG: That is it.

Mr. BENNETT: —so as to please my friends opposite, when we still had a tariff, I would remind the hon. member for Weyburn you had perhaps fewer demands for inquiries under the statute, but does anyone in this house who read the history of the cement reorganization not ask himself why the government did not institute an inquiry under this act? I can point to other cases. Were the government ignorant of the circumstances under which the bakeries came into being as subsidiaries of the milling companies? Were they, or were they not? So far as my memory serves—and I speak again subject to correction, for I have not looked into these matters at all and am relying only on my memory—the Maple Leaf Milling Company established a subsidiary in the days of Mr. James Stewart, and that made it essential for other milling companies who desired to sell flour to bakeries also to establish subsidiaries.

That is the bread item. Why was no inquiry under the combines act initiated in that case? Why was no inquiry ever suggested with respect to it? There are two cases. I am not going to take the time of the house to-night to go over them all, though I could readily do so. The truth is that from the time the act of 1923 was enacted, so far as my information goes at the moment, 330 applications were made, and of those 142 have been dealt with since 1930, although the act was in force for seven years before the present government came into office. With respect to the fifteen cases to which the right hon. gentleman referred as being important, the truth is that eight of them came up for final determination and consideration during the present regime. They were: (1) moving pictures; (2) radio tubes and sets; (3) the bread inquiry; (4) the fruit basket inquiry; (5) the tobacco inquiry; (6) the British anthracite coal inquiry; (7) the rubber footwear inquiry, and (8) the gasoline inquiry.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Three of those were instituted before this government came into office.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend is correct in saying that three of these inquiries were commenced before the late government resigned office. The present registrar was appointed by the late administration, and I suppose it is known to most members of this house that the government has no jurisdiction over him. We do not set in motion the machinery in connection with any inquiry, neither can we control it. When six citizens, as mentioned by the right hon. gentleman, ask the registrar to institute an inquiry he does so. Then he makes his report, and then the minister has certain responsibilities.

When the matter has reached this stage, as the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) indicated this afternoon, under the constitution the provincial authorities who are charged with the administration of criminal law determine whether or not on the facts an indictment shall be preferred. If in the opinion of the law officers of the crown in any province affected it is concluded that an indictment should be preferred, the attorney general of the province assumes the responsibility of taking the necessary action. That was done recently; the case being sub judice I shall not further mention it. It was so with respect to the plumbers' case here in Ontario; it was so with respect to the moving picture case, also here in Ontario, the indictment being preferred by the attorney general of this province.

This afternoon the hon. member for Bonaventure referred to the long campaign carried on by the late Mr. Maclean in support of the proposition that we should have power to institute proceedings on behalf of the federal government. In the United States, as you know, they have their federal marshals and federal officers for the purpose of carrying on federal proceedings in the courts. Mr. Maclean urged very strongly that we should have such power in this country. That campaign never resulted in any action being taken to amend the constitution, and doubtless it will be within the memory of some of the older members of this house that when difficulties arose in connection with the prosecution of other members of this Commons House of Parliament it became necessary to arrange with the provincial authorities for the appointment of counsel to conduct the prosecution, the necessary instructions being given by the federal authorities.

That is the position at the moment, and during the short time we have been in office we have had this large number of inquiries brought about by complaints being made to the registrar, the evidence taken and the reports made. There is no settled jurisprudence as to what is the proper interpretation of the sections referred to by the right hon. gentleman, and I hope he will pardon me if I say that the courts have decided that you cannot look to the debates in the House of Commons for the purpose of interpreting a statute.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I realize that.

Mr. BENNETT: Therefore what the intention was is not made at all apparent by what may have been said by those who introduced the measure; the courts, by applying the ordinary canons of construction to the language used, must determine the meaning of the statute under consideration. I say frankly that in my judgment the proposals we have made to the house in this resolution could not be met by the provisions of the combines act. I think on reflection the right hon. gentleman will agree that it is quite impossible to say that directors, meeting together as directors of a company, could under any circumstances commit an offence which would be in violation of the provisions of the combines act. The directors of the organization are the organization, and the organization does not combine with itself. In other words a combination means more than one; I think that is the way it was put in some of the cases. That being the case, you will observe from the language that has been used in the resolution submitted to the house that what was sought was not only an inquiry such as has been suggested by the right hon. gentleman but also a determination of the extent to which the power in a single organization may be utilized to the detriment of smaller organizations depending upon its trade for their existence.

That is the point that is at issue, and speaking merely as a citizen I am bound to say that I regard it as an extremely difficult problem to determine to what extent the size of corporations shall be restricted or restrained by legislative acts, and when the point arises when it may be said that size constitutes menace. There are striking illustrations in the commercial world of large corporations being decidedly beneficial to communities by increasing efficiency, reducing overhead unit costs and being able to pay better wages to those who work for them. Those of you who have taken the trouble to read the late Lord Leverhulme's Six Hour Day will perhaps recall that in his lifetime he practically created a single corporation that had control of I might almost say nearly the whole of the soap industry of Great Britain, and a substantial part of the soap industry of the world.

Mr. AHEARN: Matches.

Mr. BENNETT: No, the hon. gentleman is wrong as to that. He was not interested in that.

Mr. AHEARN: He was in that corporation.

Mr. BENNETT: May I be permitted to say that the hon. member who has introduced the subject is not at all familiar with it, or he would not have introduced it at the present moment.

Mr. AHEARN: I accept the right hon. gentleman's remark.

Mr. BENNETT: Let me proceed. The effort here is to provide a committee with power to investigate all the matters incidental to the spread between the cost of production and the price paid by the consumer. I realize that the observations made this afternoon as to the magnitude of the task are perfectly sound, but I believe that by providing for the appointment of a commission by the committee of, say, a single man, to make a definite inquiry with respect to the wages paid in a definite industry, for instance the clothing industry, or in some other industry, and reporting back to the committee, it will be enabled quickly to arrive at conclusions with respect to some of these matters. And if an article appearing in one of the trade journals to which my attention was directed inquiring as to who owns industry is to be taken as having a basis of fact, there should not be much difficulty in ascertaining what the effect is of mass organizations and chain store buying.

I think nothing beyond this can be said, that apparently the attempt this afternoon was to deprecate this effort and to suggest that it had behind it a political background. I leave it to any hon. member in this house who has been familiar with conditions in Canada during the last three and a half years,

I leave to any fairminded gentleman to say whether or not he thinks that was the proper time in which to launch an investigation such as this. The president of the United States in his program indicated that as recovery proceeded, certain other developments would follow, namely improved social conditions as to hours of labour, wages, compensation and matters of that kind. As I have already indicated, we believe that there are signs of permanent improvement in the world, and we desire as far as we may, entrusted as we are for the moment with power, to utilize it in such way that as recovery proceeds the benefits which follow should accrue to society at large in this country of ours and that the evils to which we now refer should not be engrafted upon the community as it recovers from its present depression. That is the reason the motion is now made. The march of recovery should be divorced entirely from those, shall I call them, excrescences which have grown up during the last fifteen or twenty years and which, in my judgment, have been so injurious to the body politic.

There was only one point referred to this afternoon which in my view is of such character that it may present difficulties to the inquiries of the committee. I refer of course to the financial structure of organizations based upon provincial laws, and having no roots under the federal law. At a conference we had with the provinces in 1933 we endeavoured to induce them to believe that it was desirable in the national interest that we should have uniform companies acts, and it will be a matter of some satisfaction to members of this house to recall that in 1933 all the premiers agreed to that proposal. We have prepared a draft act which is now in the possession of the various provinces so that they may determine to what extent they are prepared to march with us in providing uniform companies acts. That is the position at the present time. The real difficulty in connection with the financial structure has been not violations of companies acts but, in my judgment, an absence in those acts of provisions which will ensure absolute publicity as to what the real facts are. I agree with what the right hon. gentleman has said in respect of the reorganization of an existing enterprise. When returns of a company are so great that it is in a position to reduce its prices to the consumers, it should do so. If it is reorganized on a new capital structure based upon an increased number of shares that would permit of a reasonable return being made because of the large profits derived, it should be provided, as it will be in the act we suggest, that there shall be clearly stated that no reorganization of such enterprise shall take place unless there is disclosed that there were paid for this enterprise by the new company blank dollars and that its reorganization contemplates the creation of blank number of new shares upon which it is contemplated that money shall be earned. I could give you case after case, notably one I have in mind where great success followed the efforts of this concern in the enterprise of its promoter seizing upon it and buying it up, selling it to the public on the basis of, shall we say, a six or seven per cent return based upon the returns theretofore being maintained over a period of years.

I need hardly remind this house that there are thousands of men and women in Canada to-day who have been practically ruined because of the shares they bought in various enterprises in this country during the last seven years. It is a blot upon this country's financial history. When we desired to investigate, because of complaints made to the Secretary of State, we ascertained they all had provincial charters, and it was beyond our power to conduct any inquiry into the formation of those companies and their financial structure. That is one of the difficulties with which we have to deal, and I think I may say to this house frankly that the premiers of the various provinces showed a very great disposition to act in cooperation with the federal power in securing, if possible, uniformity in our companies acts. But during the last few years the action taken in connection with the sale of shares and the power that the privy council said undoubtedly the provinces had, namely, to supervise the sale of securities within their respective jurisdictions, has had a marvellously good effect in every particular. I think all the provinces have now enacted that legislation which originated in the province of Alberta, the validity of it having been sustained by the decision of the privy council.

One word more. One deprecates a discussion of the affairs of another country, but I feel quite certain this afternoon that the sudden rush I observed in the press gallery to record the words of wisdom of the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh), and send them by telegraph, as to the approaching failure of schemes of the president of the United States for resuscitation of industrial life in his country, will have a marked effect upon other parts of the country within the next few hours. I feel undoubtedly that will be so. But, apart from that and the effect it will have upon the financial world at large, I do not think the contribution he made questioning the good faith of those who are responsible for those measures will be considered a very serious contribution to this discussion.

Mr. AHEARN: May I ask a question? Is not the whole public faith in this measure bound up in speed—how fast we can get it through the Commons and how fast we can get it through the Senate?

Mr. BENNETT: I think possibly the hon. gentleman is confusing two things. I am not sure just which he is confusing with the other, but I do invite my hon. friends opposite and to my right to secure as nominees to this committee those who they believe will best serve the purpose which we all have in mind. It is the purpose of the government to ask one of its members to act upon that committee, and I hope that in due course he will be elected as chairman. I assure the house that every effort that can be made towards securing evidence as to what the conditions are will be made. If we could forget that it is of greater concern to the Canadian people that curative measures should be provided than that party advantage should be gained by discussions in this house, I think it would be well. I merely make that observation.

I should like to correct my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) who, in his anxiety to blame the retaliatory action, as he called it, of the United States with respect to lumber upon some action that had been taken here, as usual lost his sense of perspective. The real truth is that the president of the United States, as is well known, was opposed to the action that was taken, and it is well known that the house was. But it is also well known that the late Senator Jones succeeded by methods that he himself described at the moment in inducing the Senate to add to the tax bill of that time a provision whereby a tax of $3 per thousand feet was placed upon lumber that came into the United States from British Columbia and elsewhere, and it was to expire at a given date. President Hoover was opposed to it and the house was opposed to it, but the senate attached that tax provision to the measure, and rather than veto it and take the risk that was attendant upon such action as was stated in the public press at the time, the president allowed the measure to go into effect. There was no question of attaching blame upon the government for that action. The tax was imposed in that way, and it had no relation to any tariff legislation that took place here, for it was not tariff legislation itself. The result was what Senator Jones desired to bring about, a lessening of the importation into Washington of Canadian lumber. That is what he sought and that was the result. Those who live in the northwest and a number of builders in cities along the coast were annoyed that it should have happened, but it did. As perhaps the hon. gentleman knows, the excise act has not been opened, as they say, in the congress of the United States for the purpose of making any amendments to it, and until that time comes I suppose it will not be possible by discussions here to bring about a change in the laws of another country.

Mr. VENIOT: Before the Prime Minister sits down, may I ask if that American tax did not apply to all Canadian lumber, not simply to British Columbia lumber?

Mr. BENNETT: It affected all Canadian lumber, and lumber imported from any other country into the United States. I spoke of British Columbia lumber because that is what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni was interested in, and also because of British Columbia lumber going to the state of Washington for which Senator Jones was acting. But the tax of $3 per thousand feet on lumber applied to lumber imported from any country.

I commend this resolution to the house. I had not thought that it would engage the house in any extended debate, but the fact that it has, has probably served some useful purpose. If it has given us a clearer appreciation of the seriousness of the matters at issue and a more earnest desire to bring about a solution of these problems, even in the fifth session of this parliament, that will be better than failure to have done anything for seven years after the statute in relation to combine was passed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not wish to interrupt the Prime Minister, but perhaps he will allow me one question to complete the record.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister left the inference that if it were discovered as a result of an investigation that a combine existed in violation of the provisions of the act, the one and only remedy was to turn over the whole matter to the provincial authorities to proceed by way of indictment. Is it not a fact that there are other remedies provided by the act which the federal government itself can take in the way of reduction of duties, revocation of patents and proceedings under the criminal code?

Mr. BENNETT: There are other means after the province has failed to discharge its duty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I mean previously, without any reference to the province at all.

Mr. BENNETT: You cannot institute criminal proceedings except through the instrumentality of the province and the machinery they control. That was the difficulty to which Mr. Maclean referred. The question of reducing duties, revoking patents and matters of that kind is well understood. That can always be done by federal action. The federal government can institute criminal proceedings—I know one case in which it did—but it must be done in conformity or co-operation with the provincial authorities because they control the administration of criminal justice.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall make a motion with respect to the naming of the committee after it has been settled by the whips whether a larger number than eleven should comprise the committee. Eleven is considered the maximum number for a special committee if it is to do efficient work, although there is a strong body of parliamentarians who believe that seven is the ideal number; but that is impractical in a country the size of Canada, with the official opposition, our friends to the right, and the government having to be represented on the committee, and therefore we have suggested a committee of eleven.

CENTRAL BANK

NOTICE OF MOTION OF MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR INCORPORATION

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee on Monday next to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to incorporate a central bank in Canada, and to provide for the appointment and salaries of the officers and staff of the bank and the appointment and fees of the directors, and to make such further provisions in respect to the functions, powers and administration of the bank as recommended by the Royal Commission on Banking and Currency in Canada.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

BRITISH QUOTA ON CANADIAN CATTLE AND EGGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): In the absence of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) I would ask the Prime Minister, in view of the dispatches appearing in the press regarding the entry of Canadian cattle and eggs into the British market, what efforts were made by the Dominion government to bargain with the authorities in Great Britain for the entry of our produce into that market, and also has the government any information to the effect that steps are likely to be taken shortly by the British authorities curtailing the quota of Canadian cattle and eggs for the British market?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Perhaps the question had better stand as a notice. The fact is that the Canadian quota with respect to a cattle, eggs and things of that sort is dealt with by the Minister of Agriculture in Great Britain after discussion with representatives of the Dominion of Canada.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

COMMITTEES OF SUPPLY AND WAYS AND MEANS BEFORE ADDRESS AGREED TO

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Last evening the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) was not in his place when it was suggested that we would make a formal motion that the Speaker do leave the chair for the purpose of taking an item in supply in order to forward the business of the house and enable supply to be taken at a later date. The hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) directed my attention to the rule, which provides that the Speaker shall leave the chair on Thursdays and Fridays without question put. Obviously that is after he has left it for the first time, and my reading of the rule is that if a formal motion is made, that he do now leave the chair, which of course leaves the whole subject matter open for debate, he may do so on any day, whether it be Thursday or Friday. But after the house has gone into committee of supply, neither on Thursday nor on Friday will a motion be made; the Speaker will leave the chair, but no matter can be discussed in supply which has not been considered on a day other than Thursday or Friday. I think that is the correct interpretation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry I was not in the house at the close of the proceedings last night. I had left word that, if the question of supply came up by any chance, I thought it would meet with the approval of hon. members on this side, rather than lose time altogether, to permit supply in one department to be gone on with provided the department was named and there were no other business with which the house could proceed. I have been looking at what took place and I observe that the Prime Minister said that he was of the opinion a formal motion could be put and the house could resolve itself into committee of supply. I believe this would require unanimous consent on a Thursday or Friday, where no item in supply had been previously called. I should think otherwise there would have to be notice in advance of any motion. I should like to direct the attention of the Prime Minister to standing order No. 57, which reads:

The house will appoint the committees of supply and ways and means at the commencement of every session, so soon as an address has been agreed to, in answer to His Excellency's speech.

At the time the Minister of Finance moved for the appointment of these two committees, nothing was said on this side, no exception was taken at the moment. I think exception should have been taken, that the motion should not have been made until after the address to His Excellency had been agreed to. Having slipped that stage, if I may use that expression, I think we should hardly be justified in going a step further and again transgressing a rule, which evidently was intended to protect hon. members as regards adequate time in which to prepare for the subjects that are to come up for discussion. I hope, therefore, that the Prime Minister will not press the matter and ask us to take up supply to-night, seeing more particularly that there still remain several other numbers on the order paper, any one of which might now be proceeded with.

Mr. BENNETT: Standing order No. 57 was considered when the motion was made by the Minister of Finance. We read the rule to mean that in any event the motion must be made as soon as the address has been agreed to, and cannot be deferred to a later day. But there is nothing to prevent its being made earlier. You set up your committee as soon as the house is in order; but in any event you must set it up as soon as the address has been agreed to in answer to His Excellency's speech. That is the construction which we put upon the rule, although that does not mean that it is correct. It was certainly, however, what we believed would be regarded as the reasonable interpretation to place upon it. The committee of ways and means and the committee of supply are committees that must be set up at the beginning of every session under our general system of procedure, and the rule means, we take it, that as soon as the address has been adopted it must be done in any event. But that does not preclude its being done before that. That is the view we entertain. With respect to the other matter, the only reason I suggested last evening for our going formally into supply to discuss an item in finance, in justice and in public works, was that if the occasion necessitated there would be three departments that would be open for consideration by the members of the house, though we would not pass any item to-night but merely consider it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is it not the Prime Minister's conception of Rule No. 28 that it is absolutely impossible on Friday to go into any estimates unless they have been previously called on a day other than Thursday or Friday?

Mr. BENNETT: That was what I tried a moment ago to say to you, Mr. Speaker. Undoubtedly it means that you cannot consider on Thursdays and Fridays estimates that have not been considered on a previous day. But as, on Thursday and Friday, the Speaker leaves the chair without motion put, it is always competent, when there has been no supply, to make a motion that the Speaker do leave the chair, which then leaves open all the rights and privileges that belong to any member to make a speech or move a motion in amendment. Obviously that was what was meant, but if there is a doubt there is no point to-night in taking up time discussing it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think we had better hold to the rules as we have understood them heretofore. I hope the Prime Minister will not press the matter this evening.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): I notice that standing order No. 28 has been interpreted by some in the way the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) has construed it, but as a matter of fact I am perfectly certain that that was not the intention of the order at all. In the old days you could not go into supply on any day of the week without a motion, and of course that gave an opportunity to every member to move an amendment, to air grievances, and so on. That was considered as perhaps delaying the business of the house too much, and when this clause was put in it was for the purpose of enabling the government to go into supply, without motion, on Thursdays and Fridays, to avoid that difficulty. Then, in order to satisfy the members of the house, it was provided that no items should be taken up on Thursdays and Fridays that had not been already before the committee on some other day; but there was never any intention of taking away from the government the power to move into supply on Thursdays and Fridays in the ordinary way, making a motion which could be debated in the usual manner. I admit that it is possible to interpret the order as some hon. members have interpreted it, but I am perfectly certain that such was not the intention of the order in the first instance; and I submit to the house that it is carrying the argument rather far to say that on Thursdays and Fridays an ordinary motion to go into supply cannot be made by the government, to which motion any hon. member can move an amendment, or debate, or under which he may raise any grievance he may have, as he would on any other day of the week. It is not taking away any privileges from any member of the house if the government has the power to move, in the ordinary way, to go into supply on Thursdays and Fridays, and I am sure that this was the original intention of the rule. Perhaps the wording of the rule was somewhat defective; it was not made as plain as it might have been.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): During the eight and a half years that I was a member of the government we never, by implication or otherwise, proposed any motion to go into supply in regard to estimates that had not been already brought in by motion on the first three days of the week.

Mr. POULIOT: Quite often the cabinet ministers leave their chairs without questions being answered.

Mr. BENNETT: It might be done on the first Thursday or Friday, whatever might be done any other day. On the first Thursday or Friday that would certainly be the case.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Thursday, February 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gobeil for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, the amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Gardiner.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take advantage of the opportunity offered me by the motion ably moved by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) and equally ably seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber), to make a few comments upon some of the matters referred to in the speech from the throne. First let me say that it is very gratifying that the recent interprovincial conference affords us some evidence that the people of eastern Canada are beginning to appreciate the peculiar difficulties which, for various reasons, confront the western provinces. It is unfortunate, therefore, that there should still seem to be in the minds of some the idea that the people of the western provinces have been unduly extravagant in carrying on their public business; that they have been more extravagant than have the eastern provinces. I should not have referred to this matter at this time had it not been for the speech made yesterday by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson). I think therefore this is a fitting opportunity to place before the house some of the facts in regard to the financial conditions of the western provinces as compared with those of the east. I do not think I can do this better than by quoting from an editorial in one of the Winnipeg papers in reply to certain statements made by the Ottawa Journal and the Financial Times. The editorial reads:

There would be none of this talk if these journals knew that the record of Ontario, in regard to increase in current expenditure and in regard to increase in bonded indebtedness, is worse than the records of the western provinces which they have been berating. The current expenditure of Quebec has also grown much faster than that of the western provinces. This will all be news to the journals that have been criticizing so glibly, and it will be news to many other people; but it is perfectly true. If those journals had taken the trouble to look up the records, they would have found that current expenditures increased as follows in the provinces named:

Ontario	$9,916,934	$54,846,994
Quebec	6,424,900	40,854,245
Manitoba	4,002,826	14,491,673
British Columbia	8,194,803	27,931,866

It will be seen that the rate of increase in ordinary expenditure was nearly twice as high in the two eastern provinces as in the two western provinces.

Saskatchewan and Alberta, being much younger provinces, organized only in 1905, the rate of increase in expenditure, due to their very rapid development, was naturally high and cannot fairly be compared with that in the east. But the comparison for the last decade shows a higher rate of increase in the eastern provinces than in those two prairie provinces. The figures are as follows:

	1921	1931
Ontario	$28,579,688	$54,846,994
Quebec	14,624,088	40,854,245
Saskatchewan	12,151,665	18,202,677
Alberta	13,109,304	18,017,544

Thus, the increase for Ontario was about 95 per cent, for Quebec nearly 200 per cent, and for both the western provinces less than 50 per cent.

Now turn to the increase in bonded indebtedness, and the comparison between the records of Ontario and the four western provinces is seen to be even more strikingly in favour of the west.

Mr. BENNETT: As regards Ontario, that of course includes the hydro.

Mr. BROWN: I shall mention that later.

The figures are as follows:

	1916	1931
Ontario	$52,411,401	$499,986,000
Manitoba	30,396,274	94,201,735
Saskatchewan	24,292,044	89,123,725
Alberta	29,000,200	116,801,572
British Columbia.	21,153,146	116,050,610

These figures do not include money borrowed on treasury bills nor, in the case of British Columbia, do they include the railway debt of nearly $70,000,000. But even with those additions, British Columbia's debt increase is not relatively any greater than Ontario's, while the increases of the other western provinces are relatively far less than that of Ontario.

Much of the Ontario debt is for the provincial hydro and for highway improvements. Much of the debt of the western provinces is for telephone systems, provincial hydro systems, highway improvements and public buildings.

Since Ontario has spent money far more freely, both on curent account and on capital account, than have the prairie provinces, the Ottawa Journal would be better occupied in criticizing the "reckless extravagance" of its own province than in attacking the records of the western provinces. Nothing could equal the soaring expenditure of its own political friends who have been in office in Toronto for the last ten years.

Those figures ought, I think, to disabuse the minds of any who are still under the impression that the western provinces have been more extravagant in the management of their public affairs than have the eastern provinces. I said that the western provinces have passed through peculiarly difficult times. Not only have we had to suffer in common with all Canadians from the general world depression, but for a series of years—and the end is not yet—we have had the twin plagues of drought and grasshoppers. The depressed condition of world trade for which this government must bear a share of responsibility—

Mr. BENNETT: Oh!

Mr. BROWN: The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) had not been listening until I made that statement.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I had.

Mr. BROWN: I say again, then, that the depressed condition of world trade for which this government must bear a measure of responsibility—I think that is moderate language—would in itself have struck a severe blow at western agriculture. But it would not in itself have necessitated the relief measures that have been found necessary to provide men and women and children with food and clothing and to provide fodder for starving live stock. Here let me pay tribute to the people of eastern Canada, working in most cases through their churches, which the mayor of Winnipeg, who often talks foolishly, says have failed.

Mr. YOUNG: In that case he did.

Mr. BROWN: But I wish to pay tribute to the people of eastern Canada, who have so generously—

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. BROWN: —given of their means and sent many carloads of food and clothing to relieve distress in the stricken area.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BROWN: My own immediate district has not suffered as severely as have many other districts. But I made a tour through the western and southern part of my constituency after harvest last fall, and I found conditions in many cases deplorable. I found them such that only extreme suffering could result during the winter season. Perhaps the statement made by the premier of Manitoba will impress upon the minds of eastern people the real condition in which the western provinces find themselves in this time of distress. Speaking at the United Farmers' convention in Portage la Prairie in November last, Premier Bracken made this statement, that the income of the three prairie provinces during the last four years was $1,800,000,000 less than during the preceding four years. Think of it!

Mr. BENNETT: Is that the income of the provinces?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not of the governments, of the people.

Mr. BROWN: The general income of the people of the provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that must be wrong.

Mr. BROWN: Is it any wonder, if that be true, and I do not think there is any reason to doubt it, that the revenues of our municipalities and provincial governments have been so reduced that it has been absolutely necessary for them to appeal for help?

The Prime Minister quoted many figures the other day to show that general trade conditions are improving. I am not disposed to question those figures; they may be perfectly correct. But I want to emphasize the point made last night by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) that the improvement has not yet reached the farmer. I listened in a few days ago to a conversation among a group of farmers, and the consensus of opinion was that conditions are worse to-day in that old settled community in southern Manitoba than they had ever been—worse than in the hardest pioneer days through which we passed more than fifty years ago. One of the difficulties facing the people to-day is not only that municipal and provincial revenues have been reduced, but there is a tremendous personal burden resting upon the farmers. The municipalities and provincial governments naturally cannot get revenue when the source of that revenue has almost completely dried up. The great problem that confronts us to-day is, what are we to do with that great burden of debt? We have our debt adjustment boards, I think in all three provinces, certainly in Manitoba; but up to the present all the authority that has been given to them is to secure a delay of proceedings, to prevent creditors from taking immediate drastic action. There are those who tell us that these debt adjustment boards are doing more harm than good, that they are drying up the sources of credit so that farmers cannot borrow a dollar. I am not yet prepared to adopt that view. But there can be no question that these methods cannot be continued indefinitely; at some time we must have a showdown.

What is to be done? I fully appreciate the difficulties of the situation, I fully appreciate the fact that we cannot divide debtors and creditors into two distinct classes and say to one class: You must forego the debts that are due you from the other class. I fully appreciate the fact that the loan companies are largely financed with the money of men and women who have put their life savings into these companies. I appreciate the difficulty, but there is a problem that the people of Canada must face at some time. Much is being said to-day about the farmers' need of short term and intermediate credit. In my judgment there is nothing that would justify a farmer in borrowing money to-day except to meet some extreme emergency or to refund a debt at a lower rate of interest. There is no single agricultural activity into which a farmer can enter that would warrant his borrowing a single dollar with any hope of making sufficient profit to repay the principal with interest. That is the situation that confronts the people of western Canada to-day.

I want to refer now to the wheat agreement. This agreement is being enthusiastically advocated in some quarters and strenuously opposed in others. I shall try to speak moderately, but I will say this, that I look upon it with a great deal of fear. My fear is that an agreement of this kind, instead of remedying the difficulty, will simply encourage the importing countries in the uneconomic policies that they are pursuing. To try to meet one economic ill, or something that has resulted from uneconomic policies, by adopting another plan of doubtful economic wisdom is to my mind a very uncertain experiment.

Granting for the moment, however, that the scheme be theoretically sound, it seems to me that the difficulties involved in putting it into practical force are almost insuperable. I asked the Prime Minister when he was speaking on the subject what steps the government were taking to give effect to the agreement. His reply was to the effect that no steps were necessary at the moment, that there would be no need to do anything until there was an indication that the quota would be exceeded. I cannot see how the agreement which he has made can be carried out unless the government is prepared to take charge of the whole thing, the buying and the selling of the wheat. Not that I am particularly in favour of that, but I do not see how it is possible to give effect to the agreement unless they do that. Are we to go on simply in a haphazard way until the time comes when the quota has been almost reached and then have the government step in and take control? It seems to me that would be absolutely unfair to the different exporting countries. Certainly the matter of export comes within the jurisdiction of this government.

When we come to deal with the question of reducing acreage or putting the individual quota back to the farm the difficulties seem to me to be still more insuperable. That, of course, must come within the jurisdiction of provincial governments. Various propositions have been advanced, I know, but there has been no scheme advanced so far as I have heard that is not open to many grave objections. I know the prairie premiers went home from the recent conference with the intention of making an investigation into the situation and deciding on action later. When they make that investigation, here is what they will find: they will find that for certain reasons there will be a very large reduction in acreage. They will find that there are many districts, in which drought conditions have prevailed for a number of years, where large areas of land will not be cropped for the reason that the owners of that land will not furnish seed. I know that condition prevailed to some extent last year. They will find that there are many farmers owning their own land who will not be able to buy seed, and that the municipalities and provincial governments will not be in a position to furnish them with seed. For that reason large areas of land will not be put under cultivation. They will find also that the menace of grasshoppers will make very doubtful the wisdom of venturing to any great extent into the sowing of wheat.

Sometimes we are told that farming is a gamble. I do not like to hear that word used in this connection, because it confuses the minds of men as to what gambling really is, but it is a term frequently used. I think we can say, however, that there are many districts in which the grasshopper menace is so great that it would seem that a man would be almost as wise to throw his seed wheat into the sea as to put it into the ground, and for that reason I think they will find that many farmers in the infested districts will act on that principle in some measure and will not risk a very large acreage. They will find also that the conditions through which we have passed in recent years, and particularly in the last year, have so reduced the supply of feed that there will be many horses found dead all over the prairies. I know that just at Christmas time a certain gentleman told me, in regard to a particular part of my own constituency, that in a seven mile drive he counted eight dead horses. Just before I left home I was told of a man who had lost four horses, and the reports that come to us indicate that hundreds of horses will die during the present winter. With these conditions prevailing—and they do prevail; I am not making any exaggerated statement—I think the prairie premiers will find that it is a matter of very doubtful wisdom to speak of acreage reduction at the present time. Indeed I think they will be very glad to find an opportunity to drop the whole thing.

Now I should like to make a few comments with regard to some of the speeches that have been made throughout the country. The Prime Minister made a speech in Toronto to which my right hon. leader referred. I did not see as full an account of that speech as did the right hon. leader of the opposition, but I was very much surprised at one brief statement which I read. Speaking of the Laurier preference the Prime Minister was reported as saying that for thirty-five years successive governments have endeavoured to correct the injury that was done to Canadian trade. Those may not be the exact words, but the effect of his remark was that for thirty-five years successive governments had endeavoured to correct the injury that was done to Canada. It seems to me that was a very strange statement to make, when we remember that some of these governments, representing certainly a large proportion of the Canadian people, did not believe that any injury had been done to Canada by those preferences which were granted to Great Britain.

Why will not hon. gentlemen opposite try to get our point of view? We get their point very easily. Their point of view is that the greatest crime that a man can commit is to bring some cheap goods into Canada. We do not hold to that principle. We believe that it would be quite possible to bring some cheap goods into Canada for the benefit of Canadians. Wherefore why should we who hold that view consider that an injury had been done to Canada by the preferences granted by Sir Wilfrid Laurier?

The Prime Minister was also wrong when he said that successive governments had endeavoured to correct this so called injury. My understanding is that successive governments did not endeavour to do so. Why should the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, which was in power until 1911, endeavour to correct this so called damage? In my judgment there is no evidence that any such endeavours were made.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman evidently has not read the last memorandum from Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Mr. BROWN: I shall refer to that in a moment. Neither did the government of the present leader of the opposition make any endeavour to correct that so called injury.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the hon. gentleman read the proceedings of the 1923 economic conference?

Mr. BROWN: I will speak about that. It is true that the Prime Minister, by referring to those things which he has just mentioned, in his speech defending the Ottawa agreements did, by partial quotations, by statements taken apart from their context and apart from the circumstances under which they were spoken, seem to convince himself, and endeavoured to convince the people, that these governments had tried to correct this so called injury. There is one thing, however, that Liberal governments never did, or else I am greatly mistaken. They never endeavoured to force Great Britain to change her fiscal policy. I think that is a statement that cannot be contradicted, in spite of those things to which the Prime Minister referred so frequently in the course of his remarks, and to which he has now directed our attention. I say again that unless I am tremendously mistaken, and have been mistaken all these years, no Liberal government ever endeavoured to force Great Britain to change her fiscal policy.

That is what hon. gentlemen opposite say they have done. In my judgment there is no warrant for the Prime Minister to say, "We have succeeded where others have failed." Hon. gentlemen opposite say they induced Great Britain to change her fiscal policy; that is the boast that has been made by hon. gentlemen opposite in the last few years. I am not so sure that they will be always glad to boast of that fact. There may be some reason at the moment to believe that Canadian producers of farm products are receiving some benefit in the British market, but mark this: the British agriculturists have tasted blood. They have tasted protection; they are demanding more, and under the present Minister of Agriculture they are being encouraged to demand more. It is true that in the meantime he is being held back by the Ottawa agreements, but there is every reason to believe he regards those as only temporary. At the present time he does not hesitate to place duties upon empire products that are not included in the agreement. There is every reason to believe that at the very first opportunity he will yield to the demand of the British agriculturist for more protection. That is the situation. Then, I read the following from the Winnipeg Free Press of January 16, 1934:

> These plans were exposed to general view in a speech Mr. Elliott delivered recently in the south of England to the National Federation of Young Farmers' Clubs. He spoke about the government's anxiety to "improve agriculture" in Great Britain. "We have taken some drastic steps," he said, "but they are nothing to the steps we are going to take in the immediate future." Mr. Elliott then said:
> If we are going to live on our own resources we need to know how to do it. Unless the farmers of this country can produce food all this movement will be stopped, but it will not stop until we have had a lot of terribly nasty food at extraordinary high prices, because we are determined to make it go, and will not admit defeat for a long time. It is up to you to see that the young people know a lot about farming, because it is up to them to produce the food in the future.

Let us make no mistake; as I have said, British agriculturists have tasted blood and they are going to demand more. At that time will hon. members who have boasted that the Prime Minister induced Great Britain to change her fiscal policy be as pleased as they seem to have been in the past? The situation is very well stated in these words:

> British agricultural protectionism dates from the time when the Canadian government, leading the dominions, asked Great Britain to put duties on foreign foodstuffs. Having tasted protection against foreign competition, the British farmers want protection against empire competition too, and they are being officially encouraged.

When I was preparing my remarks I was not aware that the matter with which we have dealt all afternoon would be up for discussion. I did not take any part in the debate this afternoon, but at this time I will venture just a few words. When I read the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) I was struck with one phrase; he spoke about unethical methods of carrying on business. My attention was attracted by his remarks concerning millers and their relation to the bakers, and they brought to my mind a story about a man who was appearing before a magistrate for driving his car recklessly. Defending himself, he said: "I tooted and tooted and tooted." The magistrate replied: "Why did you not stop your car?" "Well," he said, "that is one on me; I never thought of that." That man never thought of doing the obvious thing. I wondered whether this government would be willing to do the obvious thing and, instead of tooting and tooting and tooting, take steps to correct the evils which naturally grow up under the protective system from which we are suffering to-day. That is all I wish to say in this connection at the moment.

Some hon. members have been making speeches throughout the country, and I am sorry there are not more of them, particularly those from Manitoba, in their seats. Not only have the greater lights been talking, but some of the lesser lights have been making speeches. I do not use the term "lesser lights" in any offensive manner, because I realize that some of the so-called lesser lights have in them the possibility of becoming bright and shining lights. Among those hon. members I would not give second place to the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis).

It would seem that this hon. member has been making speeches, and the point he has been trying to impress upon his hearers is that he is not a high tariff man. I read the following:

Mr. Erick F. Willis, M.P. for Souris, Manitoba, was delightfully frank in his address to the Conservative Business Men's Club in Toronto.

Mr. Willis told his audience—and it must have been something of a shock to most of those present—that he represented the new type of Conservative which "makes the party a young man's party" and which does not believe in high tariffs and "all the things which historically the party was supposed to stand for."

Well, here is a new party. The province of Manitoba seems to be destined to be closely connected with new parties. In a large measure the personnel of the Progressive party came from Manitoba.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Crerar.

Mr. BROWN: I have no apologies to make, so far as that is concerned. The leader of the C.C.F. is also from Manitoba, and now we have a new Conservative party organized in that province. I imagine the hon. members from Manitoba and the rural members from Saskatchewan will be glad to join this party because not one of them would go out into any constituency in Manitoba and defend high tariffs. Let me say to these hon. members that when they come face to face with the electors they will not be asked whether they are in favour of high or low tariffs. They will be asked: "Are you in favour of the tariffs of this government?" That will be the question, not the question whether tariffs are high or low. The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) stated in the course of his address: "We will be told that the tariffs are high. We admit they are high." Well, they admit they are high, and yet these hon. members from Manitoba are going across the country stating that they do not believe in high tariffs. When I read this statement in the press I begin to wonder just what the attitude of these men really is.

There are motions of want of confidence in the government now before the house. In his motion the right hon. leader of the opposition states that the government has lost the confidence of the country and I believe he stated there was reason to believe they had lost confidence in themselves.

Mr. BENNETT: Not that the government has lost confidence, but that "Your Excellency's present advisers" have lost confidence. Under the British North America Act his advisers are the whole of the privy council, and that means that they have a lack of confidence in themselves.

Mr. BROWN: I wondered when I read about the new party whether they also had not lost the confidence of some of those members who had hitherto been their supporters. However my mind was disabused of that point when the hon. member for Souris sent me the usual documents to be signed in the fixing of pairs. I found that he still paired with me, and is in support of and not in opposition to the government. So that while hon. members opposite talk a great deal about not believing in high tariffs they still support the tariffs which have been imposed by this government. Let me ask hon. gentlemen opposite this question: Are they in favour of a duty of twenty-five per cent on agricultural machinery? That is a question they will have to answer. Are they in favour of what was done as a result of the imperial conference, namely the placing of a twenty-five per cent duty on cream separators, and a duty on barbed wire? I would not object to carrying on a campaign with these gentlemen; they would never get away with some of the statements they are trying to put over on the people.

It was my intention to make a few comments concerning the speech made by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel). I agree in very large measure with the speech that he made, but he also is in somewhat the same position as some other hon. gentlemen. He told us of the difficulties of the farmer and stated that the farmer had to have a large equipment with which to carry on his work, just as the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) did two or three years ago, when he put on Hansard a splendid list of the implements that a farmer had to buy. But the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi, like other hon. gentlemen, will still continue to support a government that imposes high tariffs which result in keeping agricultural machinery and all the equipment which the farmer must have at a higher price.

We can only meet the present situation, Mr. Speaker, and this will not bring us immediate relief, by first of all taking a step in the right direction. I know that times are going to be difficult. I do not think that there is anything this government can do, or a government of hon. gentlemen to my left, or a government even of this party, that will bring immediate relief. But we can set our faces in the right direction. The last three or four years we have not been going in the right direction. We must make a rightabout face and take steps at once to put into effect the principles that will remove the restrictions from trade and allow trade to move freely between the nations of the world. Not until then will any such methods as are being attempted to-day bring about any effective measure of relief.

There was another matter to which I was going to refer, but I see that my time has almost expired, and I shall have to defer my remarks until another occasion.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Speaker, I understand that it is agreeable to the ministry and all sides of the house that the debate be now adjourned and that we call it a day. I accordingly move that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BENNETT: I congratulate the hon. gentleman (Mr. Motherwell) on the excellence of his speech, and move that the house do now adjourn.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What is the business for Monday?

Mr. BENNETT: The order paper. Monday is private members' day.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 9.55 p.m.

Monday, February 5, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

REDUCTION OF HOURS OF LABOUR AND INCREASE OF PURCHASING POWER

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg) moved:

Whereas, there still exists in Canada an acute unemployment problem, and

Whereas, it is desirable that as many as possible of these unemployed should be absorbed into the industrial life of the nation;

Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into immediate consideration the necessity of reducing the hours of labour of those engaged in industry, and also increase the purchasing power of the masses of our people in order that they may absorb the goods produced, thereby creating a more equitable distribution of our wealth production.

He said: The motion I am submitting to the house to-day is very similar to one which I introduced a year ago and which was not accepted by the government. Immediately after the house prorogued, in June last I resubmitted this motion, and although it is about seven months since that I felt at the time that the problem of unemployment would be just about as acute at the beginning of this session as it was at the previous session.

Those who have read the resolution will observe that it could be divided into three parts; one dealing with the question of purchasing power by the great masses of our people, the second dealing with the reduction of the hours of labour, and the third with the question of more equitable distribution of the wealth produced. To me, Mr. Speaker, probably the most important of the three parts is the one that deals with the increase of purchasing power of the masses of our people. In the increase of opportunities to consume more of the goods produced lies, in my opinion, the crux of the present economic situation. To me that is the only way we can begin to bring about a solution of the present unemployment situation. I feel that if we are going to settle the problem of unemployment there must be achieved a reasonable balance between production and consumption. At the present time production altogether outstrips consumption, and because of that unbalanced situation we have vast numbers of people in our dominion both on the farms and in the cities, who produce enormous quantities of commodities without having opportunity to consume the goods which they themselves produce. It has been suggested quite recently in this house, as well as in other places, that we ought to cut down on our production. I think that is the wrong way to set about arriving at a readjustment of our economic condition. I would far rather attempt to increase the consumptive opportunities of the people, instead of cutting down on their productivity. In fact only a short time ago the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), who I see in his place, was in Europe, and while discussing the wheat proposals of the various governments he suggested that instead of cutting down on wheat production they ought to attempt to increase the consumption in various parts of the world. I quite agreed with the sentiments then expressed by the minister, and I thought what an excellent thing it would be if he would in Canada preach here exactly the same thing he preached at the conference in London. The cutting down of our production is a form of industrial sabotage to which I am very much opposed. I feel that by cutting down production ultimately we are bound to have a reduced standard of living, and of course I am opposed to any reduction of our standard of living in Canada. I would far sooner see every effort advanced to bring about that increased consumption to which I have referred, and a little later I will attempt to explain what I mean by that statement.

To-day we have a huge surplus of commodities. Often this is termed over-production but I think properly it should be termed the surplus production which should have gone back into immediate consumptive channels, to those who directly and indirectly served in its production. We find a tremendous spread between the return to the labourer or the farmer and the prices paid for different commodities. I think in our industrial life it is taken for granted that even the best wages do not represent more than about one-third the cost of what the labourer produces, so two-thirds of the value of the commodities produced go, in profits of one form or another, to those who neither toil nor spin.

I ask for a reduction in the hours of labour, and why do I do that? It is not because men do not want to work; given the opportunity I think men are only too anxious to perform some useful function in our social life. I ask for a reduction in the hours of labour because to-day we have reached the stage in our technical progress and industrial advancement where it is not necessary for men and women to work the long hours that they are compelled to work at present. Just before coming to the chamber this afternoon I received a letter from one of the large industrial centres of Quebec which stated that in a certain industry girls are working 69½ hours per week for a wage of about $8. Men are working somewhat similar hours at high speed and with great efficiency, producing goods far in excess of what can be consumed either here or elsewhere. To-day there is no limit to our productive capacity; I think that is becoming generally recognized on all sides. If we have reached the stage in our technical progress when we can produce more than sufficient to satisfy all our requirements in a comparatively short time, then I think it may be said with a great deal of truth that the masses of the people have earned the right to greater leisure than they have enjoyed in the past.

In this dominion we have vast numbers of men and women who are out of work, as well as great numbers who are working on short time; in addition we have quite a number who are employed. I should like to put this proposition to the house: Supposing all the able-bodied men and women who are capable of performing a useful function in society were put into productive and useful employment; how long would it be necessary for that human energy, so harnessed to the machinery of production, to work in order to produce enough to satisfy all our human requirements? I venture to say that in the course of about twenty hours per week, on the average, there would be sufficient produced to satisfy all our needs and also allow for a reasonable surplus. There are men who have gone into this question rather carefully from a statistical point of view and they claim that with even less than twenty hours of work per week there could be sufficient produced, with the use of modern equipment, to satisfy all our requirements. Then, as I said before, if there has to be a reasonable balance between consumption and production, we have to see that the hours of labour are not in excess of what our consumptive needs really are. Therefore I say, Mr. Speaker, that if we are going to deal effectively with the unemployment situation in Canada it is essential that we reduce the hours of labour, because so far as I can see that is the only way we can ever hope to absorb into industry the vast numbers of men and women who to-day are out of work. Even if our industrial conditions in Canada continue to improve; even assuming that we return to the status of five or even ten years ago, of the half million or more men and women who are out of work to-day there will be hundreds and thousands who never again will be absorbed by the industrial life of this country. The other day the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) computed the number of people out of work as 500,000. I do not know whether or not that is a correct estimate, but according to my information I should be inclined to think it an under-estimate if anything. It is quite true that there has been a slight improvement in the past few months, but it is impossible to say whether this improvement is of a permanent or temporary nature.

Various remedies have been suggested to meet the situation. We have had the remedies brought in by the government during the past few years. We have had high tariffs introduced as a means of increasing employment; we have had public works as another means of dealing with the situation, and then we have had the granting of relief to the hundreds of thousands, in fact millions, of our people who have found themselves in the unfortunate position of being compelled to seek assistance from public bodies. The fact is that to-day we realize perhaps more than we have ever realized before that the so called remedies which have been put into effect in the past few years have not been remedies for the situation at all, for if they had been remedies we would not be confronted to-day with half a million people unemployed in this dominion.

Then may I say a word in regard to public works. Personally I am quite in favour of the government proceeding with a scheme of public works across the dominion, but even public works is not an ultimate remedy for the unemployment problem in Canada. It provides a temporary palliative to the men and women who find themselves out of employment, but perhaps when the public works are completed, with the resulting increase in the public debt, the second stage may be worse than the first. Of course these public works now proposed may be of a different character from those to which we have been accustomed in the past, which in many instances have placed heavy loads on the people. Therefore it has become generally recognized that by the creation of public works we do not in any way attempt to solve the unemployment situation but we are merely prolonging the day when the problem will have to be faced in a more fundamental manner.

Then, many years ago in this House of Commons I suggested the inauguration of a system of unemployment insurance. I have been one who, since coming to parliament have advocated some comprehensive scheme along this line to take care of those men and women who unfortunately find themselves out of work. But the unemployment situation we have to-day is of such huge dimensions that a satisfactory solution through insurance would be impossible, and secondly, our capitalistic structure could not stand the financial strain which the claims of unemployment insurance would entail. Even on the basis of paying $7 a week, a very low sum, to 400,000 people out of work there would be $145,000,000 per year involved. I have to find some wizard in this house who can tell us from where we will get that amount of money, an amount which would not be sufficient to take care of the present number of unemployed alone.

Therefore the remedies we have tried to secure redress for people out of work have failed, and we are compelled by force of circumstances to look to new channels to find ways and means of dealing with this menacing situation. This line of observation brings me to the consideration of some form of planned economy. I realize, as well as any other hon. member, that if we are going to reduce the hours of labour and increase the purchasing power of the masses of our people there will have to be tremendous changes in our present economic structure. Our government would have to take hold of the situation, and would not have to be afraid of regulating and controlling our industries. Undoubtedly there are many people who are horrified at the very thought of a government stepping in and attempting to regulate the industrial life of the country. If some hon. members would pause for a moment they would see just how much regulation and control there is in our every-day activities, and they would not be so much afraid as they appear to be when control is suggested in this house. Those who send up the greatest howl when we in this corner of the house speak of government control or government regulation, are those people who come to the House of Commons and ask for more control and regulation than is asked for by any other people in the dominion.

Let us, for example, consider our bankers. If we talk of industrial control or regulation, or industrial ownership the financial men in Canada will hold up their hands in holy horror, yet they do not hesitate for a moment to come to this government and ask for tremendous guarantees and loans for themselves. It would seem that the government which interferes in private business is all right, so long as those people get the benefit of it.

Then let us consider our industrial leaders. They would be horribly shocked at the very idea of anything in the nature of control or regulation. But who comes to this house more often than those industrial leaders and their lobbyists asking for tariff concessions, one form of control or regulation of our industrial life. It appears that the more control or tariff they can get, the worse conditions become in the particular industry affected. I am referring to some of the highly protected industries which, since receiving increased protection at the hands of this government, have actually decreased the wages paid to their employees and, in many instances also increased the hours of labour. Not only do we have bankers and industrialists seeking favours from the House of Commons or seeking some form of control, but we have our privately owned railway doing exactly the same thing. It is not necessary to do more than refer to the fact that in the past couple of years the Canadian Pacific Railway has received great favours from the government. Only recently they obtained a guarantee of $60,000,000, and about a year ago while they did not receive a donation they certainly got the next thing to it. On that occasion they received more than a million and a half dollars without interest—without interest, mark you, Mr. Speaker—to be paid back when they begin paying dividends to their shareholders. Immediately after obtaining that money, free of interest charges, they turned around and loaned the government $2,000,000 at four per cent interest.

In spite of the fact that there are so many people in Canada horrified at the idea of government control our present government, through stress of circumstances, is being forced continually to put more government control into Canadian industrial life. In order to emphasize that point I shall make two or three observations. The present government thought it most undesirable that radio should be in the hands of private owners, and because of that the broadcasting system in Canada was placed under government control and ownership. That action was taken because the government believed radio under government ownership would serve the people to better advantage than it would if privately owned, and in view of that belief many broadcasting stations were bought out.

The government has undertaken still greater control of our railways. A commission was appointed only recently to take charge of the Canadian National railways, and in the bill which passed through parliament last year there were provisions which gave to the powers-that-be a control of the railways greater than that which has ever existed before. The tariff board, which delves minutely into the industrial life of many commercial concerns, is a form of government regulation and control. Then we have commissions of all kinds in one way or another taking charge of and regulating Canadian industry. However time will not permit me to go into greater details in this connection. Perhaps one of the most significant actions of this government since taking office was the motion on Friday, with which I am in sympathy, to appoint a committee to look into the economic, commercial and industrial conditions of Canada. As I said when the motion was before the house on that occasion, I believe the government should be congratulated upon its introduction. As a result of the motion there will no doubt be a committee to inquire into the working conditions of hundreds of thousands of men and women employed in Canadian industry; it will inquire into the methods of mass purchasing employed by large commercial establishments; it will inquire into the sweat shop conditions, about which I shall have more to say in a few moments. I believe the inquiry will disclose conditions which do not reflect credit upon the dominion or this government. A year ago, in a motion standing in my name, I asked the government to mage inquiries concerning unemployment. I suggested at that time that there be set up a board or commission to inquire into the means of eliminating unemployment, as well as into the questions of jurisdiction of the federal and provincial governments; seasonal unemployment; technological unemployment; reduction of hours of labour; increased real wages; annual productive capacity and consumption in relation thereto; potential productive capacity; and lastly, the spread between wages and prices. But the government turned down that suggestion, and of course nothing was done. But only recently they have appointed a committee that is going to inquire, not into unemployment, but into employment. Important as employment and the conditions of employment are, I think perhaps more important of the two questions is the unemployment problem which we have to face in this dominion at the present time.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in his statement the other day referred to the sweat shop conditions and the low wages that exist in this country. It is rather a strange commentary on what has taken place in the past few years, under the policies enunciated by this government, that at the very moment when there is a little upward spurt in the industrial life of the country and in those industries that have been receiving the highest protection in the dominion, there should spring up in Canada sweat shops, side by side with those highly protected industries. If it were possible even at this time I should like to see a committee set up, not to deal merely with employment conditions, but to deal with the unemployment situation generally throughout this dominion. I should like such a committee to get evidence as to how the unemployed are living at the present tme. I should like the committee to go around to the homes of some of the unemployed and see the small amount of food which they have to consume, and see also the conditions under which the unemployed are housed and clothed, and under which their children are compelled to go to school.

But no; so far there is to be no committee that will delve into that aspect of our national life although, sir, I consider this unemployment situation as perhaps one of the greatest menaces with which parliament is faced at the present time, and as a parliament I think we have a duty and a very great responsibility. We are confronted with the condition that amongst these men who are out of work the majority have not the slightest ray of hope for the future and hundreds of thousands of them are practically sentenced to a life of continual unemployment unless we do something radical to change the basis of our whole economic system. Many of these unemployed are simply drifting to-day, and among them can be heard the whispering of ideas which were never even entertained by them a few years ago.

We have heard hon. members of this house boast, and quite properly so, of the traditions of parliament, for after all parliament as we know it at the present time is the result of many long centuries of growth and development. It has taken practically seven hundred years of uninterrupted parliamentary government to bring us to the stage which we have reached to-day in the Dominion of Canada. In this democracy our ways of doing business are modelled after the pattern of Great Britain, and there parliamentary government goes back approximately seven hundred years, during which parliament has gone on uninterrupted in its course through all those centuries except for a brief period at the time of the revolution under Cromwell. Many people are, unfortunately, becoming tired of present institutions because when we come to deal from time to time with our fundamental problems such as unemployment, which affects the very basis of our economic life, appropriate and concrete action is not taken, or we pass the buck between the federal government and the provinces. I think the time has come when parliament should take a firm hold upon the situation and say that we are going to do something that will ameliorate the present conditions and give a ray of hope to those hundreds of thousands of men in this dominion who unfortunately find themselves idle with no prospect of work. I would dearly like to see our government do something radical to solve this particular problem. The fact that a motion of the government passed this house a few days ago to appoint a committee to make a far-reaching inquiry is an indication that at times the government is willing to make a radical departure from past precedent.

I would ask the government to look for a moment at what is happening south of the line. I am not one of those who can say at the moment whether what the people of the United States are doing is ultimately going to be a success or not, but we must give them credit for one thing, for making a tremendous effort to get out of those chaotic conditions in which they found themselves twelve months ago. But what are we doing here? We are simply going along in the same old rut, following the same old line as in past years, trusting, like Micawber, that something will turn up and bring about improvement in conditions. We have been hoping and praying for such an improvement for four or five years, but no improvement in conditions that is worth mentioning has materialized; we still have those hundreds of thousands of men out of work with no hope of ever being able to be reabsorbed into the industrial life of this country.

[Mr. Heaps.]

As I said at the outset, if we are going to deal with this question of unemployment, of reabsorbing the hundreds of thousands of men and women who are out of work into our industrial life, there is only one thing we can do, and that is to provide them with work, and the way to provide them with permanent work is not by the creation of public works, desirable as that may be as a temporary palliative. No, Mr. Speaker, the only way in which you can find them work of a permanent character is by finding a way to reabsorb them into the industrial life of the country, where they will be producing goods that will get into the consumers' hands, and where the consumer will have an opportunity of consuming the goods which he has helped to produce. If they are going to be reabsorbed into the industrial life of this country, it is obvious that if we are going to work eight and ten and twelve hours a day as people are doing at the present time, we shall be able to produce far in excess of the consumptive capacities of the people. On the other hand, if we are going to absorb these people into the industrial life of the country so that all men and women may be properly absorbed and become useful citizens instead of considering themselves, as many of them do to-day, more or less useless citizens, consuming things which they have never helped to produce, it is necessary that the work should be limited to so many hours per day.

I ask the government to take this matter very seriously into their consideration. I realize how very difficult is the task ahead of any government that attempts to attack the unemployment problem in a fundamental way, and especially when it is attempted to be tackled under our present economic structure with any hope of even partially solving the problem. But as I have said before, from my seat in this house, it appears to me that the only way we can begin to solve this problem is, first of all, to put into the hands of the great masses of our people a largely increased purchasing power as compared with what they have at the present time. Secondly we must reduce the hours of labour all around in order that the unemployed can be reabsorbed into our industrial life. We must give to the great masses of our people an opportunity of consuming the goods they produce. There must be a more equitable distribution of the wealth that is produced. We cannot have that lopsided situation which exists in this country to-day, as in other countries, where we find a superabundance on the one hand and poverty on the other. That I think is recognized by all hon. members in the house as a situation which we here perhaps shall not tolerate much longer. All parties recognize the fact that a more equitable distribution of wealth is desirable, and it is coming to be recognized everywhere that there must be a reduction in the hours of labour. The members of this house, I believe, realize now that the labourer who is worthy of his hire is worthy of something more than he has received in the past. Therefore I would ask the government this afternoon to make some statement that will impart to our men and women, all those who find themselves out of work through no fault of their own, the hundreds of thousands who are unwillingly condemned to a life of idleness, some real hope so that in the not distant future they can look forward to being reabsorbed as useful citizens into the industrial life of the dominion.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): I think we are all agreed that the unemployment problem is the most serious question that faces not only this country but practically every other nation in the world to-day. It is not merely the fact that men and women are unemployed and that they are suffering the misery and want which people in that condition necessarily suffer. The trouble is much deeper than that. There is something really more than the mere physical suffering to be considered; there is something more; the effect which this lowered standard of living will have on the future of the people of this dominion.

The social service council in the province of British Columbia held their annual meeting some little time ago and a very significant statement was made then by Miss Laura Holland, C.B.E., who by the way was one of the persons upon whom honours were conferred in the New Year's list. Apparently she was not troubled very much about whether she would receive an honour or not, but she was greatly troubled about the condition that exists to-day in the ranks of the unemployed. She said that the greatest problem facing the country at the present time was how to restore the destroyed morale of those who were affected through unemployment by this depression. This is the problem that is facing the Dominion of Canada to-day. If it were merely a matter of restoring tangible things, they could be restored just as they were restored after the war in a very short time. But when the spiritual and moral life of the people is destroyed it cannot be restored so quickly.

Now, no one can deny that deterioration in this direction has been taking place during the last four or five years. The committee on homeless men, at the same meeting, submitted a report in regard to these men. The homeless men are to a large extent young men who have reached the age of twenty-one and they are then told by the relief department in Vancouver that they are no longer eligible for relief, so that they must go to the unemployment camps. But when they go to the unemployment camps they are met with the objection that they are not homeless; their parents, they are told, are living in Vancouver and are responsible for their livelihood. But the fact is that in a large number of cases the parents themselves are on relief, so that the chairman of the committee, reporting on the matter, said that it had been amply proved that some of those young men had performed criminal acts in order that they might obtain the means of subsistence.

That is the condition that is facing the country at the present time, and this resolution, I can assure the house, is not put forward as in itself a solution of the problem. Rather, it is put forward in the hope that it will receive some consideration, as one of the major questions involved in any plan that aims at the restoration of economic stability in this country.

I remember that when two years ago the hon. member for North Winnipeg introduced a similar resolution certain objections were brought forward against it. One objection was on the usual constitutional ground, that it was not within the constitutional powers of the dominion government to deal with the question of hours of work. That may be so, but to-day the government is finding itself in the position that, no matter how sacred we may consider the constitution, that constitution, as it is at present, no longer meets the situation. The government is therefore compelled daily to do things which at other times might be considered to be outside the jurisdiction of the dominion. So that in this regard the government has certain powers which it can bring to bear upon the provincial governments in order to make them act with respect to this matter of the reduction of hours. The other objection, as far as I remember, was raised by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine), who pointed out that the reduction of hours and the increase of wages was impossible under the profit system. I am willing to concede that point in the long run; indeed, I am willing to go further than that and to say that the profit system itself is impossible—and the impossibility of it has been conceded by almost everyone. It is because of that that in any general plan of reconstruction, not under the profit system but under a system of producing goods to meet the needs of the people, this question must be given due consideration. A few years ago, I take it, it would have been considered quite beyond the jurisdiction of the Dominion government to take any steps in regard to the reduction of wheat acreage, but that is being done to-day, and as a matter of fact the unemployment problem is approximately on all fours with the problem of wheat production. The only way by which the unemployment problem can be solved is through the provision of work for the unemployed.

Now, the only way to provide a solution for the difficulties that confront the wheat farmers is to ensure a market for their wheat; but if you cannot ensure a market for their wheat to the extent of its production, then the idea is to restrict the supply in order to meet the demand. Well, the same applies to the labour movement. If there are not enough jobs for, let us say, one million workers at eight hours a day, then the logical solution is not to put five hundred thousand to work at eight hours a day, placing the other five hundred thousand unemployed on relief, but to put the one million workers to work at four hours a day. There is another logical reason for this. We talk about the expense of unemployment but regardless of expense, the unemployed are fed, clothed and sheltered by those who are working. It is the men who are working to produce food, clothing and shelter upon whom the burden falls ultimately, and not on those who may be called upon to supply the money tokens by which relief is financed. So that from that point of view I think it would be far more fair to put the unemployed to work and thus ease the burden of work on those who are already employed.

The first year I was here, the first regular session in 1931, I pointed out that one of the root causes of unemployment, that is, outside the general capitalistic system itself, was that the producers do not receive enough in purchasing power to enable them to consume the products of their labour, while the owning class, those who receive their rewards in rent, interest and profit, are unable to consume the remainder of the goods thus produced. But during this depression this is what has happened: the share of the national income going to the producers of wealth has been relatively decreasing and that going to those who are not producers of wealth, but owners of property, has been relatively, and in some cases actually increasing. In that regard I should like to give a few figures for the Dominion of Canada. These are for some of our sheltered industries. As regards oil refining the figures are as follows:

Dividends, etc. . . .	$16,650,045	$16,758,977
Salaries and wages	8,153,000	5,980,000
Wages.	6,900,000	4,612,000

So we see that owners of property during those years of depression increased the amount that they received, but the amount that went into salaries and wages was decreased by more than one-third.

Let us take the figures for the cement industry:

	1929	1932
Dividends, etc. . . .	$1,364,870	$ 680,677
Wages.	3,263,000	1,131,000

It will be seen that wages fell by approximately two-thirds while dividends fell only about 50 per cent.

Let us look at the figures in connection with electrical apparatus:

	1929	1932
Dividends, etc. . . .	$ 2,215,413	$ 2,448,673
Salaries and wages	26,756,000	18,916,000

Here we have a small increase in the dividends and a substantial decrease in salaries and wages.

Sugar Refining

	1929	1932
Dividends, etc. . . .	$ 52,500	$ 187,497
Wages.	2,748,000	2,206,000

These figures go to show that the producers in industry have carried the brunt of the burden of the depression.

It is not contended that if wages were slightly higher there would not be any unemployment, but it is contended that if less were going into dividends and more into wages which would be used altogether in the purchase of consumers' goods, the depression could have been eased considerably. So far as I know we have not general figures for the dominion, but we have them for the United States and conditions there are similar to those here. All we need do in most cases is to reduce them according to population and we have a picture of conditions as they prevail in this country. These figures are compiled by the Federal Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce of the United States in cooperation with the National Bureau of Economic Research and are for the period from 1929 to 1932. The total income distributed to individuals in 1929 was $81,000,000,000. In 1930 it dropped to $75,000,000,000, in 1931 to $63,000,000,000, and in 1932 to $49,000,000,000. In 1929 the actual earned income was $83,000,000,000 or $2,000,000,000 more than the distributed income. In 1932 the earned income was only $38,000,000,000, the distributed income exceeding the earned income by almost $11,000,000,000. Of course this latter sum was taken from reserves accumulated in more prosperous years.

There is another aspect in regard to these figures. In 1929 labour income was $59,000,000,000, or 65 per cent of the total income. By 1932 labour had lost 60 per cent of its income, while income on property declined only 30 per cent. The income of farmers declined from 6·3 billions in 1929 to 3·4 billions in 1932, or approximately 50 per cent. Thus we see again that the producers have carried the greatest share of the burden of the depression.

If we wish to come nearer home, let us take the annual report of the British Columbia Department of Labour for 1932 and we shall find the same state of affairs. This table shows the percentage of income in manufacturing industries of various kinds in the province, that goes to different classes of employees in the industries and how it has changed in the last five years:

	Per cent
Officers, superintendents and managers	9.29	12.77
Clerks, stenographers and salesmen	9.31	14.93
Wage-earners	81.40	72.30

Therefore, while the share of the total income of officers, superintendents and managers, clerks, stenographers and salesmen went up, that of the actual workers in industry went down. In my opinion there is only one logical way to deal with unemployment, or at least to ease the burdens of it, and that is through a better distribution of the income itself and then through a better distribution of the hours of labour of the workman.

I do not wish to take up any more time in connection with this matter, I believe we are all convinced of the necessity of a new approach to the question of unemployment, a new approach to the whole question of our economic condition. I hope that the government will take this matter into consideration, and that they will use whatever power they have to bring about a better distribution of income and also a better distribution of the labour that is required to produce that income.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, the preamble of the motion reads thus:

Whereas there still exists in Canada an acute unemployment problem, and

Whereas it is desirable that as many as possible of these unemployed should be absorbed into the industrial life of the nation;

This states that the unemployment problem still exists, and that something should be done at the earliest opportunity for the unemployed. I remember distinctly that during the special session of 1930, when the tariff was raised by the government after the abolition of the tariff board, this house was told by the Prime Minister that he had received assurance from the manufacturers who had been asking for higher protection that they would not dismiss any employees, and that they would pay the same wages. Members of the house cannot have forgotten that. How is it then that the unemployment problem has grown worse since? Did these manufacturers keep their promises? Some members of the house asked at the time, who were those who made such promises to the government? The facts have proved that these people have not kept their promises any better than the government kept their own.

When the government came into power the problem of unemployment was not such as it is now. We had poor people; our Lord said centuries ago, For the poor ye always have with you. It is a law of nature to have poor amongst us, but their number was much less than it is now. It has been increased by the policies of this government in spite of the numerous protests coming from this side of the house, from the official opposition as well as from my hon. friends in the corner. I am in full sympathy with the mover of this motion, the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), as well as with the hon. gentleman who has seconded it. But now we must come back to common sense which has been forgotten and put aside by this government since it has been in power, especially with regard to the unemployment problem. Last year I humbly suggested to the government to classify the unemployed. Nothing can be done on their behalf unless they are classified. You cannot take a white collar worker and put him to dig some ditches or do miner's work. It is impossible for him to do so. Last year I urged that a classification should be made with care of the unemployed by charitable societies, like the Red Cross, the Salvation Army, and the St. Vincent de Paul society in Montreal and other places in the country. I was told by one of the workers of that society in Montreal that if the information was required it could be given within twenty-four hours by those interested in that charitable work. I do not ask for that information to come from the municipalities, which are interested in paying the least possible for the unemployed; it must come from the charitable societies, those admirable and powerful organizations that exist in every large centre. During the war was it possible to apply the same remedy to all? Was it possible to apply the same cure to all the wounded on the battlefield? No, because some were gassed, others shell-shocked, others wounded in different parts of the body; each one required special and particular treatment. That is the way to deal with the unemployed; they must be classified into railway employees, clerks of different kinds, miners, agriculturists, lumbermen into every class that is trained for a special kind of work. Sir, it is a very simple, very plain suggestion that I offer to the government in all earnestness. At first I thought that the government was afraid to give information about the number of unemployed in this country. Now we have had that information, it was given from the census a year afterwards. We did not know what was the real situation about unemployment. Information was given a long time afterwards and the information given to the house was not complete because many heads of families take care of the unemployed members of their families without assistance from the government.

During the last campaign, sir, the Prime Minister said that he would end unemployment. At that time the question of unemployment was made use of in political propaganda. Processions were organized of some unemployed and supposed unemployed, who attended the meetings held by the Prime Minister and others and shouted, "We need help to deal with unemployment," though the situation then was not as serious as it is now. I have seen huge packages of postcards addressed to every community within range of the voice of the right hon. gentleman when he was speaking over the radio. They reminded me of circus advertisements; "Come and see the big bird that eats iron and steel; that is why we put it in a wooden cage." That is what these postcards made me think of. The Prime Minister was hailed as a saviour; he was said to be a genius. I give him the benefit of the doubt, but at least in his mind luck and genius were confused. People expected to hear from him his recipe for getting rich, but he could not give it, for who can give a recipe for luck? The Prime Minister mistook genius for luck; luck was offended and gave him the cold shoulder and having no genius he was left in distress.

Mr. GOTT: You are certainly speaking to the subject.

Mr. POULIOT: I am explaining why the unemployment problem is not solved yet.

Mr. GOTT: The hon. gentleman said he was going to make a suggestion to the Prime Minister. Since his own leader will not adopt his suggestions why does he make them to our leader?

Mr. POULIOT: Well, Mr. Speaker, once more the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott) is speaking through his hat when he is not wearing it. I am not making any suggestions to my own leader, but to the government, though very few of the practical suggestions that have come from this side, whether from the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) or from any humble backbencher, have been accepted by the government.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that the unemployment problem is not settled yet, and it seems that the government are not in touch with the common people as they should be. I have told my friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) many times that he should see to it that the Prime Minister has time to concentrate and to think about the problems of the state. Hon. gentlemen opposite should see to it that no one looking for a position or for patronage of any kind should be allowed to bother the right hon. gentleman. He should have time in which to exercise his judgment. I do not say that he lacks judgment; I say that he does not make enough use of it. Since the right hon. gentleman has been in power we have had no evidence that he has very often used his good judgment in connection with any policies he has offered to the house and to the country. Now we have to speak very plainly on behalf of those who have nothing to eat and those who suffer from the cold. I say it is time for the government, the Prime Minister as well as the members of his cabinet, to concentrate on the serious problems of the day instead of boasting of miracles which they have never performed.

This brings us to the N.R.A. In a speech delivered in Port Hope last summer by one of the apostles of that experiment, he said they thought of it overnight and started to put it in operation the following day. They must be extraordinary men, becauses I do not see how a plan such as that could be improvised overnight and put into operation the following day. We must go to the root of the situation; we must see what is the real problem in connection with unemployment. The information can be secured by the government at any time they wish it. It is essential that the foundation of a house be completed before the roof is started, so we hope the government will accept this very humble suggestion which has been made several times already. I hope they will at least get some information as to the classification of unemployed, because this great problem of unemployment never will be solved if they do not at first classify all the unemployed including those who do not receive direct relief from the state.

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): Before the debate concludes, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make just one or two observations on the resolution now before the house. I should like to tell the government that this resolution is in keeping with the time-honoured policy of the trade union movement in this country, which for many years has advocated, and insisted upon with some success, a reduction in the hours of labour, with no reduction in the consuming power of the workers. To me it is almost marvellous to see the crystallization of world opinion as to the soundness of the position taken by the official trade union movement as to hours of labour in industry. Had it not been for the very necessary educational program carried on by the American Federation of Labor I believe it will be agreed that the experiment embodied in the N.R.A. would not have been possible in the great republic to the south. Notwithstanding what views we may hold as to that experiment, in my opinion it is the greatest experiment in the history of democratic nations up to this time. After all is said and done it took some courage to make the decision that was made by the president of the United States, which launched this far-reaching campaign in an effort to adjust the output of industry and agriculture to the consuming power of the people of the United States.

I believe the world at large looks upon this experiment with a great deal of sympathy, in the hope that it may prove successful and give leadership to the rest of the civilized world. I was in London during the economic conference this year, a conference that was stillborn because the leaders of national thought in the various countries there represented had not the vision and the courage to appreciate the possibilities of the American experiment. I believe that had there been a world approach to the problem of unemployment and mass production in agriculture and industry, rather than a national approach on the part of the American government an entirely different condition would to-day exist in the world. Of course, the story of what happened at the economic conference was so simple and obvious that it is scarcely worth retelling. I mean simply this, that the gold bloc went there with the definite intention of destroying the usefulness of the conference, the British delegates sat on the fence and the Americans fell out among themselves.

Since the beginning of the session there have been a number of speeches. I should like to feel that the representatives of the people would spend as much time, effort and energy on an important problem such as that which is now before us as they would in a discussion on titles, a resurrection of the old cannibal days when men wore beads around their necks and rings in their noses. I would rather see hon. members concentrate on the real problems confronting our men and women. Even in the boom days of 1928 we were confronted with the same problem. We are apt to forget those days; we are apt to forget the difficulty with which we will be confronted if we ever emerge from this depression—I mean that of being too old at forty-five. That is the real tragedy in the life of this young and growing industrial nation. That is one of the aspects of the resolution presented by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). I believe it is fair to state that our progress is held in check by our inability to consume the products of the fields and the factories. The statement is often made to the industrial worker that his one aim should be that of increasing his leisure hours. That is not the correct view. The argument for shorter hours rests upon the practical foundation of our ability to consume in super-abundance. If this question of production and consumption is not dealt with it has the possibility of destroying the very civilization we have erected. In my view this problem is so simple that the arguments of those discussing it cannot be controverted. I believe it is fair to ask this House of Commons, reflecting as it does the aims and desires of the Canadian people, what it is going to do about it.

I believe it is fair to say that the industrial technique and makeup of Canada is somewhat similar to that of the United States. Between the years 1919 and 1933 in that country the productive capacity of the individual increased by 83 per cent. Between the years 1926 and 1933 it increased by 30 per cent. The remedy for the change is obvious and must, I believe, follow the suggestions contained in the resolution now before us. I remember that in my first session in the house, only two short years ago, I asked a simple question of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) with reference to the activities of our delegates at a meeting of the international labour office, held in Washington in the year 1919. He made light of my observations concerning the necessity for a reduction of the hours of labour. He said, "Some day you will want a six-hour working day." I said, "Yes, I will live to see the day when there will be a four-hour working day in Canada." In those two short years we have seen the government of the United States, under the policy of the N.R.A. insisting upon a six-hour day in connection with certain industries and undertakings. That, Mr. Speaker, goes to show the soundness of the vision and the position taken by the men and women who go to make up the trade union movement in Canada. The problem of hours of labour is one in connection with which the government could take a lead. I believe it is fair to say that our industrial and financial leaders have forgotten that they ever led; I question very much whether or not they ever did lead. I believe they were just carried along on a tide of enthusiasm. Had the government adopted the resolution submitted last session by the hon. member for North Winnipeg there would have been no necessity for the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) to speak as he did in the city of Toronto. Had the resolution been adopted the information would have been secured last year instead of this year. The resolution of last session would have brought out all the facts, and we would have approached the problem having in mind the points of view of the men and women engaged in various walks of life.

I sometimes wonder at our helplessness. We cannot say that science or nature has failed us. Our only difficulty is lack of common sense, and our inability to comprehend the real menace confronting us. Although matters of labour have been of international importance, unfortunately our dominion from a governmental and official standpoint has probably been more backward than any country in the civilized world. Only last year the Italian delegation to the League of Nations introduced a resolution backed by the government of that country calling for the immediate introduction of a forty-hour week into the industry of the nations connected with the labour organization of the league. While it is quite true that no decision was made, we must admit that at least one government in the world has from its own experience realized the soundness of the position which for many years has been taken by Canadian labour.

Of course, there is not much use reducing the hours of labour if at the same time we do not increase consuming power. I believe that much of our difficulty has been brought about by the avarice of the investor and of the business men and financiers of this country. Unless you give the individual engaged in industry sufficient wages to buy back what he produces, inevitably you are facing trouble. You must make it possible for him and her to receive some measure of the fruits of technological progress. This is not a dream, it is not a theory; it is a positive fact predicated upon our past experience.

Those who believed that stacks of paper in 1928 were real wealth were just kidding themselves, and of course the inevitable windstorm came along and blew them out into the street. It would have been far better if they had given that money to the men and women engaged in industry with which to buy back the goods they produced, and thus keep the machine at least in some semblance of normal running order. I believe that that declaration is a fundamental around which all society revolves, and until we are willing to meet that in a practical and realistic way this depression will not show any signs of lifting. What was the greatest tragedy of the machine era? Let me say that we are at the end of an era, whether we like it or not, and those people who think that the issue is between free trade and protection are just having a pipe dream, in my judgment. In the industrial era we concentrated on the machine to the exclusion of the human element in industry. We thought that so long as we produced and produced and produced, that was the solution of the problem, and we completely forgot the human being who, in the final analysis, is the basis of all civilization and life itself.

As an apprentice boy I have seen the development of the machine. I have seen men and women displaced overnight by an advancement in the technique of industry. Let me give you an illustration to show the extent to which the thing is drifting. Once upon a time we thought that all musicians were artists; in fact, they thought so themselves. They thought that the machine would never affect their daily lives, that they were a class apart from men engaged in the normal industries of this country. Then the "talkie" was developed, and overnight it wiped out the means of livelihood of forty thousand musicians on the North American continent. Going even a step further, the mechanical hare was developed, to be chased by the whippets on the racecourse.

When I was crossing the Atlantic this year there was a Russian violinist on board, and I made this observation. I said it was passing strange that we from the great centres of civilization had to come out into the middle of the Atlantic to see one of the great artists play in the flesh. At home we got it through the medium of the machine. I went on to say that all we need to-day to complete the circle is to bring babies into the world in cans like tomatoes, and then of course there will be no use living at all.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the government, in carrying out its building program announced in the speech from the throne, should set an example in fixing the hours of labour on such works at such a level that the employment possibilities under that plan would be greatly increased, and at the same time it would be setting an example to employers throughout the dominion.

Mention has been made of the necessity of amending the British North America Act in order to set in motion any machinery for carrying out the object of this resolution. I am glad to record, Mr. Speaker, that opinion in this country is crystallizing in support of the view that has been expressed from this corner of the house for many years in regard to the British North America Act. Only the other day the premier of Ontario expressed the opinion that the British North America Act was in need of revision to bring it up to the standard of modern requirements in a country so vast as Canada.

I know what the argument of the government is going to be in reply to this resolution. They are going to say that nothing can be done unless all governments in all countries of the world do the same thing. I do not believe that we can wait for that. I do not believe that it is practical to wait for that. I believe that leadership should be given by the government of the day in exploring every channel whereby the driving force of this resolution might become a practical reality, instead of the resolution simply being allowed to be another resolution of this House of Commons. I should like to leave that thought with the government in connection with this resolution. I believe that it is as pressing, if indeed not more so, as any resolution that appears on the order paper from private members of this house, as viewed from the standpoint of the industrial workers of this dominion, and I would urge the government to lend its aid in meeting this very practical problem confronting the industrial workers from one end of this broad dominion to the other.

Mr. WILFRED HANBURY (Vancouver-Burrard): I notice that in the second paragraph this resolution says it is desirable that "as many as possible" of the unemployed should be absorbed. The question comes to my mind, why did the mover of the resolution (Mr. Heaps) limit it to "as many as possible"? Why did he not say "all of those unemployed"? In the same paragraph he says that it is desirable that these unemployed should be absorbed "into the industrial life of the nation." We have another life of the nation; we have the agricultural life of the nation.

Mr. HEAPS: It is the same thing.

Mr. HANBURY: The mover says that it is the same thing, but I notice that none of those in that corner of the house representing agricultural communities has yet supported this resolution, and I would be interested in hearing their remarks in that connection. There is no question whatever that the regulation of labour must come sooner or later, but it is also a very interesting question how you are going to regulate the hours of labour in agriculture.

Again, in the third paragraph of the resolution, the mover urges the government to take into immediate consideration the matters there spoken of. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the government and all thinking people of this country are giving consideration to this question of unemployment at all times, and I think we all recognize the necessity of some regulation of the hours of labour.

Further on, the resolution refers to increasing the purchasing power of "the masses." I really do not know whom the mover is referring to in his use of the words "the masses." I for one would like to have my purchasing power increased. Whether I am to be included in "the masses" I do not know. I think it is important that the purchasing power of all people in Canada should be increased. In the last line of the resolution he also refers to the equitable distribution of our wealth. I think it is important that we should have distribution, whether it is equitable or not. Of course, we should all like it to be equitable; but our problem to-day is that our production is not being consumed. If it were being consumed, whether equitably or not, there would be work for those at present unemployed.

The problem referred to by the previous speaker—and I wish to congratulate him on his remarks—was that of jurisdiction. At the present time jurisdiction in the regulation of hours of labour is a purely provincial matter. In the province of British Columbia from which I come, we have had what is commonly called advanced labour legislation, with regard to the regulation of hours of work and of rates of pay. We find in that province that, with higher rates of pay and shorter hours, and with many benefits to the workers for which industry must pay we are expected to compete with provinces in Canada where there are not such regulations. It must, however, be apparent to all the members of this house that such provincial regulation is really a restriction of industry. It is not only unfair to industry itself, but by virtue of the fact that it must eventually react against the worker, it is unfair to the worker in that province to that extent.

Then we come to the question of international trade. In the lumber industry of British Columbia, assume that we are obliged as a province to pay higher wages and further to regulate the hours of labour. Now, we are attempting to do, and are doing our lumber business throughout the markets of the world, but we are faced with competition with other nations where there are not in force the same regulations, and we are faced with some competition from those provinces of Canada in which similar regulations are not to be found.

These are problems which, as the previous speaker has said, must be met. We cannot continue as we are going at the present time and maintain the same degree of democracy and freedom if we do not come to some conclusion—not just consideration, but some conclusion—and at an early date, which will bring about a re-employment of those at present unemployed.

This of course raises a very great question, particularly in its international aspect. So far as I am personally concerned, and I think I can speak for many engaged in industry in British Columbia, we are quite prepared that the government should make some regulation that might have an adverse effect on our international trade, temporarily at least. We recognize that it would be a temporarily bad influence, but I think I can say that we also recognize that the national existence of Canada is probably more important at this stage than international trade. Therefore I wish heartily to support the resolution which is on the order paper, and I would go further and suggest that instead of consideration something should be done and done at once.

[Mr. Hanbury.]

In this connection, the first practical suggestion is that the provinces of Canada should gather with the federal authority and that we should have a realignment of authority in Canada. The regulation of hours of labour, rates of pay, conditions of labour—these do not constitute the only problem that faces the people to-day; nor is this problem the only one that requires that the Act of Confederation should be reconsidered and revamped. That is the first practical step, and until it is taken I do not see how we can make progress. We shall be receiving evasions and suggestions and criticisms for all time until that step is taken, and I therefore submit in all sincerity to the government that they should do what they can to bring all the provinces of Canada into a conference that will redefine our confederation.

Mr. J. FERNAND FAFARD (L'Islet) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the resolution, at present under consideration by the house requests that the hours of labour be reduced, and, at the same time, wages be increased. I did not think that this resolution would be discussed to-day. After closely following the speeches which have just been made, I deem it timely to make a few brief remarks.

If you increase the wages and reduce the working hours, it is evident that the manufactured products will cost far more and, therefore, our commerce will immediately suffer from it. I wonder if it is fair to request the farmer to work fifteen hours daily to sustain the workman who would only have to work six hours per day? It is said that the farmer is not obliged to work such long hours; however, any one who has lived among them, who has been brought up on the farm, knows fully well that the farmer must rise with the sun, that he must toil many hours, has no control over the working hours, nature sees to that; for instance, the morning dew is uncontrollable.

I wonder really whether it is fair to expect the farming class to work five or six times longer than the workmen, the consumers, and for less wages.

It was stated a few moments ago that the cause of the whole evil was not the tariff, but the various mechanical contrivances invented in the course of the last half century. I cannot admit such an assertion. The real cause of the invention of machinery lies in the labour unrest which broke out everywhere. The workman always seemed discontented with his lot, and man's genius applied itself to overcome the difficulties encountered, by inventing machinery to supplement man's labour. Moreover, I do not think that mechanical contrivances are actually responsible for the depression the workman suffers. Take, for instance, printing; years ago, no country hardly published any books, because it necessitated too much labour and, therefore, was too costly. To-day, there are millions of men employed in the printing of newspapers and reviews of all kinds. And if one studies the subject more closely, he will find that these mechanical devices invented to further develop printing have been the means of exploiting our timber limits as well as our pulp and paper industries, thus benefiting not only these large factories but all labouring classes of Canada. I wished to briefly point out these facts, although I am not prepared to discuss this resolution on its merits.

Mr. J. H. STITT (Selkirk): Before this motion is put to the house I should like to make a few extemporaneous remarks with regard to the proposal. I notice that the object of the resolution is to lessen the hours of labour and to increase the purchasing power of the masses of the Canadian people, and I am sure that every man in this house is sympathetic with that object.

I believe we have come in our history to a time when we must recognize that the era of the machine, as spoken of by the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) has given us in Canada and in the other industrial nations of the world a capacity to produce which means that our people are coming under the domination of the machine. In the first instance it was hoped that the machine would be the servant of man; he has now almost become its slave. I am not speaking in a way that is remarkable for one speaking from this side of the house. The other afternoon I heard a speech delivered by the right hon. gentleman who is now leader of the Senate, and referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis). He spoke about the concentration of power in a turbine, for instance, which is capable of performing the work of 9,000,000 men. He spoke also of the development of power in the Muscle Shoals project now under construction by the United States government, whereby power equal to the physical energy of 18,000,000 men will be produced. He also stated that the world has now on its hands a problem of 30,000,000 unemployed and the time is coming, nay, more, it is at hand when we cannot very much longer say to those people who are out of work and who, in the words of the right hon. gentleman, are suffering degeneracy of character, that it will be sufficient if we give them the mere necessities of life. We have reached in our civilization a stage when the burning of coffee, the destruction of cotton, the cessation of the wheels of industry must be looked upon as mere palliatives. There must be more heroism in our plans and more radiical leadership. It is very hard, even in following the hon. gentlemen who have supported this resolution, to ascertain just how they are going to work out the proposals which they have made. It is very easy for any man in this house or in any other public assembly to speak for the mass of mankind, to be moved by heroic and humane impulses. It is another thing, however, to have humanity accept one's gospel or doctrine, and to work one's scheme according to the law and the conventions of the constitution under which man must work and really achieve practical results. I believe it was the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury) who spoke about the difficulties inherent in the constitution. Have we not reached the time when those difficulties will have to be overcome? After all, the constitution of Canada is only a law; it is only man-made and it can be changed. If the constitution stands in the way of orderly progress, the sooner that constitution is amended in a radical and progressive manner, the better.

But I should like to draw the attention of the house to something of a remarkable nature which has recently happened in the United States. Many constitutional lawyers wondered whether the program of President Roosevelt would be possible of realization under the strict constitution which they have in that country. It is common knowledge, no doubt, to every hon. member that in the United States constitution there is a clause which says that a contract is inviolable; that is, the inviolability of contract is protected by the supreme law of the United States. Yet just the other day in a judgment handed down by Chief Justice Hughes, who is one of the most outstanding jurists in that country, and who was, I believe, a presidential candidate on the Republican ticket, he makes in effect the following statement in regard to interference with contracts: "In this national crisis, contracts must in some way be interfered with in order to make it possible for contracts to be performed at all." That is the effect of his judgment.

There are many actions that could be taken. For instance, the other day, speaking without much preparation I stated that we are face to face with the problem of a minimum wage law in Canada. This was brought to my attention in a rather striking way just before I came to Ottawa. Invitations for tenders to supply overalls were advertised by the government. Submissions were made in accordance with that tender by clothing firms in Manitoba and Quebec, but it was impossible for the clothing firm in Manitoba to tender anything like as low a price as their competitors in Quebec, the reason being that there was no minimum wage law in that province.

Mr. HEAPS: There is.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): My hon. friend tells me I am wrong. Perhaps the minimum was so low, it was not effective, or perhaps it was not enforced; that might be the situation. At any rate, it was impossible for this industry in Winnipeg employing many operators, scientifically organized and not paying high wages, to supply in competition with Quebec firms any kind of reasonable product as required by the government.

I should like to make an observation which occurs to me, stimulated by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard in speaking about the limitations of the constitution. In this parliament we have extraordinary powers under the peace, order and good government clause of the constitution, and in Canada we have reached a crisis where, even if there is an increase in employment, there is not any appreciable decrease in the number of people who are going on relief. Might it not be said that the very fabric of the nation could be preserved only by having resort to that extraordinary power and that in this crisis we have more than ordinary powers to legislate concerning hours of labour, minimum wages and labour conditions than we would have ordinarily? I think an argument could be based on the peace, order and good government clause in the constitution to enable parliament now to go further than it could in 1929 or 1930.

There are some observations that I would like to make on the proposals put forward by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). He made the statement, I believe, that this government was wedded to a system. I do not believe that this government is wedded to a system any more than are the hon. gentlemen in that corner of the house. But we are faced with a situation which exists. I believe that the sweeping proposals enunciated in the speech from the throne, for instance that for the establishment of a central bank, are an actual facing of a situation which has been talked about for years and years, and are the best evidence that something is going to be done. The recent inquiry, moved by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), in regard to our internal trade, hours of labour and spread of prices between producer and consumer, is a most radical step. I feel that I can stand in this house to-day as a man who is supported by labour and by the farmers and fishermen of my riding, and say that I support a government that is more practical and more radical and that has more power and capacity to cope with the situation than any government that ever ruled in this country or any other body of men at the present time. When I made the statement last year that I was a Radical and at the same time a Conservative I meant what I said. And I believe there is evidence to prove that. I do not think that hon. gentlemen in the corner can expect very quickly to obtain a divorce from the present system. They will not get an interim judgment of judicial separation, or a divorce within three months to be made absolute within six months. I do not think they are accomplishing much by making the statement that this government is wedded to a system. Systems are not changed overnight. Systems were not created a priori; this system has grown. Liberals have contributed to this system, Liberals so-called have protected it, Socialists have declaimed against it, Conservatives have modified it, and Conservatives may change it. I have certain proposals to lay before this house with regard to increasing employment in this country, the reduction of interest rates, and embracing the marvellous opportunity which the government has to-day.

Mr. VALLANCE: You had better come over to this side.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): No, if I went over to that side I would only be a voice, I would have practically no power and no influence. If I wanted to play politics and perhaps be returned for the constituency of Selkirk I might go over there—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): —mobilizing the forces of hatred and discontent but not accomplishing anything for the people of my riding or of the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CHAPLIN: You do not like that as well.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I believe, Mr. Speaker, that one of the great problems that we have to grapple with sincerely, honestly and with courage is the problem of interest rates. Last year we discovered that the Canadian people in their corporate, governmental and private capacities were having to pay $421,000,000 of interest annually, and we had not a complete statement. It is conservatively estimated that our interest bill is $500,000,000 per annum. Now after all interest is only the wages of money.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

An hon. MEMBER: What has that to do with this resolution?

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I will tell you what it has to do with it. If we cut down interest rates in a proper way we are going to put money into the pockets of spenders and take it out of the chests of hoarders.

An hon. MEMBER: You might and you might not.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): When you stand up there and ask me what that has got to do with it—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member will address his remarks to the chair.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I hope, sir, I was addressing my remarks to the chair. I do not want to transgress the rules of the house. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that if the hon. gentleman who interrupted has the notion that such an idea has nothing to do with this problem, he has a very poor comprehension of the ramifications of the problem which he is trying to solve. I believe it was the hon. member for Vancouver who spoke about the degeneracy of the unemployed. Now there is no doubt that something ought to be done to assist the people who are unemployed to retain their character and their capacity.

Mr. MUNN: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege; the hon. member referred to the member for Vancouver. Which one? That covers a big field.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I referred to Mr. MacInnis, the member for Vancouver South. I believe that by mobilizing the educational forces in the country from the ranks of labour as well as from our universities, a lot could be done to make the plight of the unemployed more endurable. Of course when we look at this problem as we do this afternoon we recognize the tremendous difficulties with which we are faced. After all we are the fifth exporting nation in the world; if we are going to compete with other countries under a competitive system—and that is the system we have—we must bear in mind what the forces of competition arrayed against us are. I think the hon. gentleman who proposed this motion ought to recognize this; in fact by implication he recognized it I believe in his speech this afternoon. There is not going to be established heaven upon earth or the New Jerusalem erected in this country just by pious resolutions or by stating the plight of the unemployed and the poor in Canada. And when he talks about the health of the unemployed in Canada he ought to take note of the report by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company which states that the health of the Canadian people was never better than it is to-day.

Mr. BOUCHER: They have plenty of rest.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I spoke last year in this house about the plight of the unemployed. I am worried about them, I want their condition improved. We want all the light we can get from any individual and from any corner of this house, but we can certainly do without a lot of the heat that has been engendered without light. When the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) talks about the promises and the nonperformance of the Prime Minister I would just refer him to the remarks of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) the other day, who paid perhaps one of the finest tributes to the leader of this government that has ever been paid to any leader in this house, a tribute that was well-deserved. After all it is a remarkable system that we have when you look at it from this standpoint; a system that has created so much wealth, that has produced so much science, that has harnessed the energy of the world to the extent that a million and a half people in this country could be without means and yet be provided with the necessities of life and have their health guarded as has been done in these very trying times.

I do not know whether, in the summation of his argument, the hon. gentleman who introduced this notion, or this motion—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): —can tell us how to carry out his proposal. Many motions are merely notions, Mr. Speaker; many hopes are not possible of realization, and there are many pious utterances. I do not think this resolution comes within any of those classes, however, because there is much that can be done. If we are to tackle these problems I do not think it is going to help to criticize the Prime Minister and his government for non-performance; in fact the official leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) has publicly stated that the Prime Minister cannot be held responsible for the situation that exists. We are living in Canada in the year 1934. There has been an economic revolution throughout the world. The Bank of England has gone off the gold standard. Russia has been trying to work out her unusual experiment. The United States of America is moving in wondrous ways, and we do not know yet whether this experiment will accomplish very much good, though we trust that it will. We are their neighbours, and with the very best of neighbourly spirit we say Godspeed to the N.R.A. and to the hopes of President Roosevelt and his advisers.

I want to thank the hon. gentleman who introduced this motion for the quiet way in which he did so and for the pleasant manner in which he advanced his arguments. I hope this house can accomplish something. I hope before long the day will come when the unemployed will not be walking our streets, when men will have more leisure to devote to the higher things of life, when we will not be grappling with a mere crass materialism which in time will destroy not only our bodies but our souls. I hope that this resolution may be something more than a notion. Possibly the government might establish a committee to go into the question and bring before this house some concrete measures by which we may hope to realize these aspirations.

Mr. J. A. BARRETTE (Berthier-Maskinongé) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the reason I rise to speak, is because my hon. friend the member for l'Islet (Mr. Fafard) has just made some wise comments with reference to the resolution before the house. I admire the courage of my hon. friend and, like him, I find it absurd to claim for the workmen a six hour day's work when the farmers toil twelve to fifteen hours daily. What the workman wants is not so much reduced hours as work itself. For instance, the dock workers at Sorel, who only work seven hours per day during four days a week, greatly insist on an eight-hour day during five days a week. If their request was granted, it would greatly benefit their families.

I consider that charity is not sought by the workman because it tends to humiliate and demoralize him.

In my opinion, the resolution should be withdrawn, and I openly state that I shall vote against it, should a division be asked.

[Mr. J. H. Stitt.]

I regret that the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) is not in the house, as I would have taken this opportunity to request him to grant longer hours of work to the dock workers at Sorel, who, I feel certain, would rejoice in having more work.

I had no intention to take part in this debate, however, I seize this opportunity to state that the best way of helping the working classes is to give them work.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the object sought by the mover of this resolution is very laudable, and his reasoning to the house in support of his motion was most praiseworthy. By this resolution the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) simply desires to bring directly before the government what is alleged therein, namely that the government give immediate consideration to the problems there set out. The government can have no objection whatever to this motion passing, and at this moment I do not intend to deal at any great length with the subject. I wish to say definitely that for a long time this subject has engaged the best consideration that the government has been able to bestow upon it.

I am sorry that on the present occasion the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), through indisposition, is not able to be present in the house and to take part in this debate, because of all the members of the government he is perhaps most familiar with the subject dealt with by this resolution.

The scope of discussion this afternoon has been somewhat broad. We have heard discussed such subjects as the machine age and interests rates, and a good deal of the discussion has had to do with what one might term the constitutional problems which confront the federal and the various provincial governments. In regard to the last point I can assure the house that it presents some very serious problems. The first object sought by the resolution is a reduction of the hours of labour, but when one discusses that question one is immediately confronted with what the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury) so well pointed out, namely that the provinces of this dominion cling very tenaciously to their provincial rights in regard to all questions pertaining to hours of labour, regulation of labour, wages and the like. While it is easy to suggest that a conference with the provinces should be called by the dominion, and that a broad discussion should take place with regard to certain constitutional amendments, it is a very difficult thing when these conferences do take place to secure that unanimity of opinion which in my humble judgment is necessary between the various provinces of Canada before any radical or serious amendment can be made to the Canadian constitution as laid down by the British North America Act. My experience, and I have had some in regard to interprovincial conferences has been that the dominion and the provinces have never yet been able to agree unanimously on a single important proposal laid before a conference for agreement. The nearest approach to agreement so far reached was at the recent conference held in the city of Ottawa. On that occasion the proposal did not relate to labour problems particularly. The proposal upon which we appeared likely to reach some agreement or some uniformity of opinion was in regard to the organization and incorporation of companies, the issue of prospectuses, the sale of companies' stocks, and the like. After many months of intensive labour a draft bill was prepared and submitted to the representatives of the nine provinces of Canada to ascertain if we could unite upon a uniform law in respect to such matters, a law which would prevail throughout the whole length and breadth of Canada. We do not yet know whether agreement will eventually be reached. The provincial representatives have taken the bill home with them, where they will consult their respective governments, and I believe a subsequent conference will be held about a month hence, the hope being that some agreement will be reached for a uniform law. However that is the first instance in my experience where an agreement sums likely to be reached in regard to constitutional difficulties or constitutional amendments.

I realize as fully as do other hon. members in the house that there are anomalies in the present constitution of the dominion. The difficulty is to apply suitable remedies by agreed amendments. I hope the time is not far distant when we may be able to arrange terms with the provinces in respect of some of the more pressing matters, one of which is assuredly the question of hours of labour throughout Canada which has been discussed this afternoon in respect of the present motion.

We in Canada enjoy many advantages under what we understand as a federal system of government. The United States, in like manner, has a federal system of government. There are many advantages under such a system, and the people of Canada enjoy those advantages, but there are also limitations. I refer particularly to the limitations under such a system imposed upon the federal government in respect of legislative authority. We became a party to the treaty of Versailles and to the labour clauses involved therein. In that treaty we agreed, as far as a federal government could agree, to certain clauses in regard to labour and hours of labour, but we insisted upon the inclusion of a special reservation applicable to the federal system pertaining in Canada—and to any other country which enjoys a federal system—whereby we might consult the various provinces and, if possible, persuade the provinces to legislate in regard to the treaty obligations which the federal government had undertaken. So far we have not succeeded in doing so. The question of hours of labour was discussed in one conference which I attended, not this year but previously, but no agreement was reached. All we have obtained so far is the promise from the various provinces that they will give serious consideration to the proposal. We have not yet reached an agreement. I realize that apart from the subject of education there is no question to which the provinces hold so tenaciously to their strict rights as they do in connection with questions involving property and civil rights, under which subject come all questions of contract, of wages and of hours of labour. Immediately you lay hands on the rights of the provinces in respect of these matters, difficulty arises.

I do not despair that at some time, perhaps in the near future, some satisfactory solution may be found between the provinces and the dominion in regard to hours of labour. I agree at once that in so far as federal employment or any employment at the instance of this government is concerned we can and do control hours of labour at the present time. In dominion contracts for public works and the like we have power to control the amount of wages paid to workmen, and if we so desire we can also control hours of labour. However, this applies only to what we may call dominion or federal works or contracts which comprise only a small percentage of the total work performed in Canada through private agencies. I doubt therefore if at the present time this parliament can legally do very much in the direction sought by the resolution before us.

It is true, as suggested by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stitt) that we might find a loop-hole in the general provision contained in the British North America Act which states that the federal parliament may pass legislation for peace, order and good government in Canada. We have already incorporated this provision in the federal statutes under the relief legislation of last session. However I doubt very much if at the present juncture we would be justified in treating the present situation as a calamity of such magnitude that the peace, order and good government of the country was actually threatened. There is an outstanding judgment of the judicial committee of the privy council in England which decides that grave emergencies may possibly arise when parliament would be entitled to take advantage of this particular clause in our constitution, notwithstanding all or any limitations which are otherwise imposed upon federal authority. But the instances cited in the judgment of possible emergencies are rebellion, invasion, plague, epidemics and the like. I doubt if any condition has so far arisen in Canada, serious as it has been in recent years which would justify this parliament in interfering with provincial rights by legislating in respect of the hours of labour in Canada under the peace, order and good government clause of the British North America Act.

The discussion this afternoon has been profitable and, in some respects, enlightening. All that is asked is that the government should give its serious and immediate consideration to two matters, the first being that of the reduction in the hours of labour and the second the increase of the purchasing power of the masses of the people in order that they may absorb all goods produced. I think I may state that these two matters are within the scope of the motion passed on Friday last by this house and that discussions in committee upon that reference will to a very large extent cover the two matters now before us. A committee will be appointed within a day or two to consider the reference contained in the motion of Friday last. By the terms of that reference the committee is empowered to inquire particularly in regard to the "labour conditions prevailing in industries supplying the requirements of such department and chain store organizations and the extent, if any, to which existing conditions have been brought about by the purchasing practices of such organizations, and the effect thereof upon the standard of living amongst those employed in such industries and organizations." I fancy that under that this clause of the reference there will be a very full opportunity afforded the committee to cover all the ground which would be covered by an investigation under the motion now before the house.

Meantime I can assure the hon. member for North Winnipeg that the government will give serious and immediate consideration to his proposal as set out in the present motion. At the same time I can assure him again that for many months the government have been giving consideration to this problem, and if we have not found a complete solution to it it is not because we have not endeavoured to do so. The government will accept this motion.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, now that we have had a few hours of debate in which there has been a great deal of mutual admiration expressed, and now that the government has accepted the resolution concerning the question of hours of labour I am wondering if we ought not to get down to talk about taking the necessary steps to put into effect the suggestion contained in the resolution. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has said, "We will continue to give serious consideration to the matter." I should have been surprised had the government raised any objection to this pious resolution. I hope it was not drafted having in mind the thought that the government might accept it, because had the government refused to accept it it would have been committing political suicide, so far as any support from industrial workers is concerned. The resolution asks only for "immediate consideration." As the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stitt) well styled it, it is only a pious resolution. But I am going to support it anyhow, although I would rather have supported a resolution urging a definite step forward, calling for something tangible, for some action in the matter.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) says: We have been giving consideration to this for a long time, and we assure the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) that we shall continue to give it further consideration.

An hon. MEMBER: For a long time.

Mr. HEENAN: It will not be for a long time because they will not be in office for a long time.

The question of provincial rights has again arisen. There was one time in my life when I might have talked about provincial rights as the Minister of Justice has talked, had it not been for the fact that prior to 1930 we had leading the opposition in this house a man who was supposed to be the greatest constitutional lawyer in Canada, and it was he who showed us the way to go home—shall I say?—he and the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). He told us that there was no necessity of waiting for the provinces to do anything in this regard. We have the power, he said; we have the right, and let this parliament act. At that time the opposition wanted the government of that day to pass a measure bringing the eight hour day into effect in the steel industry in the province of Nova Scotia. Let me first read what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said, as reported at page 2371 of Hansard of May 21, 1930. Referring to the hours of labour and wages in the steel industry the minister said:

I was referring to the three (ministers) sitting in the front row. Not a minister has offered an explanation, not a minister has offered any sympathy or shown any interest in this matter. I am not sufficiently an expert to say that items 377a, 377b and 377c cover the ambit of this particular industry, but I imagine that they would. In connection with these items we have an opportunity of saying to this industry: "Yes, the parliament of Canada is prepared to give you protection sufficient to enable you profitably to produce these articles"—the minister could do that just as easily as sitting there lolling in his seat—

He was referring to the Minister of Finance at the time. I just wanted to make it clear that he was not referring to myself. The minister went on:

—"but before such tariff will apply you will satisfy the governor in council that the conditions of labour, the hours of labour and the wages paid are such as will afford a decent living." That is what the government could do; that is what parliament could do, and I say right now that that is what parliament should do before it goes a step further.

And the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, when he was in opposition, wanted us to do that before we passed a single, solitary item. Had he left it at that, and had the present Prime Minister not put his own interpretation upon what parliament might do, we might have let it go, but the present Prime Minister, speaking to the question of hours of labour in the steel industry, finished off his great oration and his argument by saying:

We have the opportunity and the jurisdiction; let us leave out all this talk about the province and assert that power affirmatively, and let it be understood in this country that when we agree to principles in treaties, in compacts and conventions, we mean what we say, and that our expressions are not mere sounding brass and tinkling cymbals.

And now, after three and a half years, we have the Minister of Justice rising in his place and telling us that the provinces have a say in this matter, and that the government cannot get the provinces to agree. He does not even tell us which province will not agree. Is it not time that the people of Canada should know what province is holding back progress? Why should not the name of that province be made public if it is blocking the progress to which this government has been giving so much consideration, but only consideration, for the last three and a half years? I think I can say without boasting, because the records speak for themselves, that the government of which I was a member did make some progress, although I will say that it did not progress fast enough. But still it did make some progress towards the end we had in view. We realized that there were constitutional obstacles. Up until 1930 when the present Prime Minister, the great constitutional lawyer of this country, showed me the way, I never had any doubt that the provinces had sole jurisdiction in this matter, but when the present Prime Minister, then leading the opposition, showed the way, the then Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said: Then we will apply it not merely to one particular industry, but to them all. And immediately a coolness came over the then opposition, and you will find in the records that there was a half apology that the matter had been brought up. It was stated that we should give the particular industry under discussion ample and reasonable time to bring their hours of labour into conformity with the treaty of Versailles.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that the Liberal government did take some steps forward in this direction. You will find that under our jurisdiction as we understood it at the time the Liberal government on March 27, 1930, passed order in council P.C. 670, providing for an eight hour day for dominion government employees. The last three paragraphs of that order in council are worth reading. What precedes is in the nature of a preamble. I quote from the order in council:

8. That request has been made to the government for the granting of the eight hour day to its own employees.

9. That it is desirable that the principle of the eight hour day should be applied to any branches of the public service of Canada in which it is not now observed.

And the order in council sums up by saying:

The minister accordingly recommends that, except in cases where the work of employees is intermittent in character, or the application of this rule is not deemed to be practicable or in the public interest, the hours of work of any employees of the Dominion government who are still required to work more than eight hours daily be reduced to eight hours daily, with a half-holiday on Saturday.

The committee concur in the foregoing recommendation and submit the same for approval.

(Sgd.) E. J. Lemaire,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

In that same year we passed an act known as 20-21 George V, an act respecting fair wages and an eight hour day for labour employed on public works of the Dominion of Canada. That act cut down the maximum hours of work on all public works to eight hours per day, whether it was public works undertaken by the government or by a contractor. Let me point out that the present government in its regulations pertaining to relief works did, in the first order in council it put through, provide this same principle, but in later years they reversed it, and in their agreements now with the provinces provision is made, not for a minimum wage, but a maximum wage—that they ought not to pay more than the government of Canada pays; and this is the first country in the whole civilized world in which a maximum rate of wages has been adopted instead of a minimum. That is so far as this government is concerned.

Now, with respect to whatever regulations it may put into effect, is this government going to see to it that other bodies to whom it is contributing moneys out of the public treasury will observe an eight hour day and fair rates of wages? I have in mind the slave camps where men by the thousands have been working in this country for the state, under the most disgraceful conditions that can be found in any country, including Russia. I have here five or six cheques which these men have received after a month's work. Hon. gentlemen need not rush over here; the cheques are not worth stealing. One is for seventy cents for a month's work; another twenty-nine cents; the next twenty-six cents; one for nine cents and last of all, one for one cent.

Mr. GOTT: Have they all got stamps on them?

Mr. HEENAN: Yes. The stamp of the Ontario Tory government is on the face of every one. One cent! I want to tell you that at the next provincial election I am going to have photostat copies of these cheques made so that they can be shown to every citizen. I will show them not only what the provincial government of Ontario has being doing to the workers of this country, but the sort of thing to which this government has been contributing.

[Mr. Heenan.]

Mr. GOTT: And then you won't elect twelve men in the province.

Mr. HEENAN: There are some men in the dominion not worth one cent; that is one of them. The only good thing I see about this one cent cheque is that it shows that the Ontario government still believes in the holy bible, because it was made out to a man named Caesar. They were evidently reading the passage in which we are told to render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's. The Ontario government has actually paid one cent to a working man in this province, contributed to under the authority of the Minister of Labour of this dominion, who has jurisdiction to make them pay reasonable wages.

Now, I said that this was a very pious resolution inasmuch as it asks only for consideration. May I point to a resolution which was moved by myself and seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) in 1931, to be found at page 214 of The Journals of the House of that year. The date is Tuesday, May 19, 1931, and the record reads:

Mr. Heenan, seconded by Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre), moved,—

Whereas, the Dominion of Canada is a signatory to the Articles of Peace of the Treaties of Versailles, thereby subscribing to the principle of a maximum working day of eight hours.

Therefore be it resolved that this house is of the opinion that the government of Canada should take appropriate steps to ensure, throughout Canada, the fulfilment of our treaty obligations and conventions arising out of the peace treaty, relating to hours of work.

It will be noted that the difference between the resolution now before the house and the resolution I have just quoted is that we asked that proper steps be taken to ensure action, whereas this resolution asks for immediate consideration. As the Journal shows, the resolution to which I have referred, which was moved in 1931, was talked out.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the date?

Mr. HEENAN: May 19, 1931.

Mr. HEAPS: I was wondering why it was not on the order paper two years before.

Mr. HEENAN: The hon. member ought to know. He was in the house; why did he not put it on? When some member in some other part of the house rises to help those hon. gentlemen out of the dilemma they get into, they want to suggest something such as they did on previous occasions. They are content merely to ask for serious consideration. When we moved that resolution asking that immediate steps be taken to meet the unemployment situation, my hon. friend walked out of the house with the rest of the Progressives and refused to vote. I have got to the point where I have quit pussyfooting with the question.

Mr. SPOTTON: Thanks for the admission.

Mr. HEENAN: When this resolution was before the house the Minister of Justice got up and complimented your humble servant upon having brought it forward and upon the way in which I had put the matter before the house.

Mr. GUTHRIE: You were only pussyfooting then.

Mr. HEENAN: The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stitt) professed to be sympathetic, and yet he got up and talked the resolution out. I drew his attention to the fact that it was one minute to eleven and that if he talked another minute he would simply kill the very thing he was professing to support; yet he talked it out and killed it.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Speaker, at the hour of recess I had already stated the progress that had been made with respect to reduction of hours of labour in this country and I had put on record the fact that in 1930 the government of which I had the honour to be a member had passed the order in council providing for the eight hour day for all those employees in the government service who had been working more than eight hours a day and that we had had passed in the house and made law what is known as the Fair Wage and Eight Hour Day Act. At that time the government changed and when the Conservatives came into power that was the end of any consideration of the principle of the reduction of hours in industry in this country.

In order that the progress made might be continued, notwithstanding the fact that the resolution moved in 1931 was talked out, the government accepted the principle of it, but I regret to say that they failed to carry out anything promised on the floor of this chamber by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) who was then leading the house. At the next session I had the honour again to introduce a similar resolution and in the discussion that took place the Minister of Justice, speaking for the government, said that inasmuch as the resolution had not carried in 1931, no steps had been taken. In other words, the government said that they were in sympathy with the principle, yet one of their supporters talked the resolution out on a certain day in 1931, thereby defeating it; the government failed to carry out the principle of that resolution which they had accepted a few minutes previously. On February 17, 1932, I moved a similar resolution as follows:

Moved by Mr. Heenan, seconded by Mr. Beaubien:

Whereas, the Dominion of Canada is a signatory to the articles of peace of the treaties of Versailles, thereby subscribing to the principle of a maximum working day of eight hours. Therefore be it resolved that this house is of opinion that the government of Canada should take appropriate steps to ensure throughout Canada, the fulfilment of our treaty obligations and conventions arising out of the peace treaty relating to hours of work.

This resolution that I introduced in 1932 was agreed to by the House of Commons, but notwithstanding that, the present government has taken no notice whatever of it and has done nothing in connection with it. Since that time there have been many dominion-provincial conferences, and, so far as I know, not one word has been said in one of those conferences with respect to reduction of hours in the industries of this country. Therefore, when a definite resolution of this kind is carried, asking that the government take appropriate steps and they agree to it, what does the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) expect when he puts on the order paper a resolution asking the government only to consider the matter? This sort of thing is fast becoming a joke and, as I said before, it is time somebody called a spade a spade and made the government quit this pussyfooting. Either we are going to have the eight hour or the six hour day with a government in power that is in sympathy with the matter, or we are not; and I would give the hon. member for North Winnipeg credit for having more sense than to place on the order paper a resolution merely calling for consideration by a Tory government, because I know the hon. gentleman has his heart in the labour movement and I know the men who follow him have confidence in him. I have confidence in him myself, but I have no confidence in the resolution that he has moved.

Mr. HEAPS: The hon. member will not vote against it?

Mr. HEENAN: Consideration is the only thing you will ever get from the Tory government. I am willing to vote for the resolution because that is all I ever expect from them.

In 1931 or 1932, I forget which, I moved a resolution seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) to the effect that inasmuch as the present Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Bennett), when he was in opposition, went through the country from coast to coast, promising definitely that he would end unemployment or that he would perish in the attempt. That it was the opinion of the house that the government of Canada should bring down immediately measures to deal adequately with the unemployment situation. That was a Liberal amendment and every Tory who was present in the chamber voted against it. I regret to say that my hon. friends of the Progressive group or the C.C.F. group or whatever they call themselves, walked out of the house and would not vote on it—

Mr. HEAPS: I will tell the hon. member why.

Mr. HEENAN:—because they said it was playing politics. To ask the government of this country to bring in measures to deal with unemployment—is that playing politics? My hon. friends should have voted for the resolution because it was a reprimand to men who went through the country as these men did in 1930 making promises they knew very well they never intended to carry out. It is the duty of every man who believes in democracy to vote lack of confidence in a government of that character.

This is not the first time I have brought up this subject. In 1924 I had the honour of having a resolution carried on the floor of the Ontario legislature, calling for a reduction in hours in all industrial concerns. Realizing at that time that the question of wages and hours of labour came under the jurisdiction of the provinces, I moved that resolution, and the then premier, Hon. Mr. Ferguson, moved an amendment to it which in effect stated that until all the provinces and all nations of the world adopt a similar measure its adoption here would handicap the industries of Ontario. That amendment was carried and of course destroyed the whole purport of the resolution. As I said before recess, we are continually passing the buck from the dominion to the provinces, and then the provinces say they cannot do anything until all the nations of the world adopt the same thing. Yet we have a government in power to-day that disregards conditions all over the world; hon. gentlemen who in 1930 said: No matter what the conditions are in other nations, we in Canada have sufficient resources to see that every man and woman in the dominion is working, and if you elect us to office we are going to see that that happens or perish in the attempt. But now we have the spectacle of that government saying it cannot do anything because the provinces have jurisdiction. The present Prime Minister when he was sitting in the seat of leader of the opposition contended that we have jurisdiction; that any industry that gets the benefits of our tariff measures we should make conform to the hours of labour and wages that would give Canadians a proper standard of living. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), when he was sitting on this side of the house, jumped up and told the ministers of the day that they were lolling in their seats and would not take part in the discussion, and he said that before parliament went a step further we should see that these industries that are working their employees more than eight hours a day should put the eight hour day into effect. I say that the ministers, those who are now present, are themselves lolling in their seats after putting into effect policies diametrically the opposite of what the hon. member's resolution asks for. The resolution asks that more workers of this country be incorporated into industry; but the policies of this government are taking men out of industry and putting them into slave camps to work for the state. Men are working—I hope the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sutherland) is within the sound of my voice—at Lac Seul for five dollars a month and board—no; it is not five dollars a month, it is twenty cents a day; for if they lose a day they are docked for it. The Ontario government is bad enough at ten dollars a month, but this government goes one better when it puts men in camps to work for twenty cents a day and board. They have three gangs up there, one working, another quitting and going out, and another coming in. Then when those poor fellows come out and get to steel they have to violate the law in order to get home; they have to steal rides on the trains at the risk of their lives. I know what I am talking about, because I have been on a railroad engine during the last six months, and in temperatures of twenty-five, thirty and down to fifty degrees below zero you can see from ten to fifteen of these young men riding on the brake riggings, between the cars, on the tender. Are they doing that because they don't like work. That is the greatest hardship any man could endure.

Mr. GOTT: The hon. member has two good jobs, while there are thousands of Canadians out of employment.

Mr. HEENAN: I want to talk to men who understand labour conditions, not to a man who never laboured in his life. This is one gentleman who promised to end unemployment and give higher wages or perish in the attempt; now he is telling them they do not want to work.

I said when I started that I was going to vote for this motion. I hate to do it, because it is a pious resolution that means nothing. If the hon. member would only put it that they should immediately take the necessary steps to do something I would vote for it gladly, though even at that I realize that the government would not do anything. However, I am going to vote for this pious resolution which says: Please give the matter further consideration.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Perhaps I may be allowed, Mr. Speaker, to say a word or two in closing the discussion?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member in speaking will close the debate, so that if any other member wishes to speak he should do so now.

Mr. HEAPS: I am impelled to rise after the remarks of the last speaker; I would not have done so had it not been for the fact that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) made certain statements which are entirely unwarranted and wide of the mark. He is using his seat in the House of Commons at this moment not to further the cause of the men who are out of work but to further the cause of the party of which he happens to be a member.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HEENAN: Applause from the government benches!

Mr. HEAPS: In my talk this afternoon I tried to keep entirely to the motion; I did not deviate from what, in my opinion, ought to be the mode of discussion in introducing a question of this kind. Since I have been in this house I have always refused to allow the unemployment situation in Canada to become a political football, and I do so to-night. I take objection to the remarks of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. He kept entirely away from the motion, and merely criticized the government for its action or inaction since it has been in office. In that respect I have criticized the government just as much as the hon. member, but I believe the time has come when we might for a moment forget our partyism, cease to put our party before our principles, and discuss the question of unemployment on its merits and nothing else. It was for that reason that in 1932, when the hon. member who has just spoken brought in a resolution, a pious resolution with a bunch of whereases covering much space in Hansard, we in this corner refused to be a party to it and for that reason walked out of the house and refused to vote. Was it because we had no interest in unemployment? Certainly not; for when the hon. member was Minister of Labour we introduced motions similar to this, and on those occasions did not have his support.

Mr. HEENAN: You got action.

Mr. HEAPS: I remember very well that when the hon. member was Minister of Labour in 1930, I introduced a motion dealing with unemployment, and the then Minister of Labour could not see any unemployment in the Dominion of Canada. But in 1930 he put on new spectacles and he has done nothing but see unemployment ever since. I do not want to say anything against the hon. gentleman, but I do say that hon. members of this house should not make a political football out of such a grave and emergent situation. There are to-day half a million or more unemployed in the Dominion of Canada; yet has any word fallen from the lips of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River that could give them any ray of hope? All he has said is that we walked out in 1932, and that the government of the day will accept this resolution because it is nothing but a pious declaration.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that some hon. members sitting to my immediate right have the idea that there is some form of collusion between those of us in this corner of the house and the government, because of this resolution. That came to my attention during the dinner recess. Let me assure the hon. member who has just spoken or any other hon. member who thinks as he does, that I never even spoke to any hon. gentleman on the government side of the house with reference to the resolution that is now before the house. I have not spoken to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) since the house has been in session, and further than that let me say that the motion standing in my name was placed on the order paper for this session at the end of June, 1933. If the hon. gentleman will look up the records of the house and observe the date it was filed he will find that I am stating the fact correctly. Yet, forsooth, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River comes along and hints that the government accepted the resolution because it just happens to be a pious wish.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the motion was not introduced to-day because it is a pious hope; far from it. It was introduced in this house because I and one or two of my colleagues in this corner thought it was the only kind of resolution we could draft that would cover the situation and meet the rules of procedure of this house and the conditions we have to meet under the British North America Act. We cannot instruct the government to do anything contrary to that act, but we can ask them to take something into consideration and to devise ways and means of overcoming the difficulties inherent in that act. That is why we asked the government to take this matter into consideration, and I am glad they have accepted the resolution. I appreciate the fact that they have accepted it; I think perhaps that is why the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is so much disappointed. I was a little surprised myself when the government accepted the motion, though in the last few days they have shown rather forward tendencies. Last Friday they introduced a motion which represented a very radical departure from their past policies and declarations, and to-day they have gone a step further. I do not care how much further they go, and I do not care from what corner of the house these forward declarations come.

Let me point out, Mr. Speaker, that when the government accepted this motion to-day they accepted three cardinal points to which they would not have agreed had they been opposed to the motion. They have accepted the principle that in the industrial life of Canada it is desirable that those engaged in industry should work shorter hours than they are working at the present time, in order that industry may be able to absorb those men and women who to-day are out of employment. Is that not a laudable and proper objective for parliament to aim at? In the second place we ask the house to accept this resolution with the idea that the masses of the people of this country should have an increased purchasing power. Could anyone object when the government accepted that principle and said they were considering the matter and had been considering it for some years past? Then in the third place we asked for a more equal distribution of the wealth produced. Is there anything wrong with that? It is true that this is only a resolution, but I think it essential that we get a declaration of principles adopted by the house, that is what I think we have done this evening. We have induced the government to accept a declaration of principles which I hope, before parliament prorogues and the government appeals to the country, will bring about some effective action by this government and this parliament to bring into being the very principles that have been enunciated in this resolution.

Some hon. gentlemen have asked how we are going to bring about these changes in our economic life. Well, Mr. Speaker, if there is the will to do a thing the way will be found. Just as in the United States they are reducing hours and putting codes into effect, so will we in Canada be able to bring about these changes when the time comes, if there is the will to do so. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I appreciate the attitude taken by the government in accepting this resolution, which I sincerly hope is only the forerunner of definite action on the part of the government at the very first opportunity.

Motion agreed to.

COOPERATIVE COMMONWEALTH

PRODUCTION AND DISTRIBUTION—PROPOSED ECONOMIC SYSTEM GIVING FIRST CONSIDERATION TO HUMAN NEEDS.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

> Whereas, Canada still faces a serious economic situation, and
> Whereas, the existing economic system is failing to function in the interests of the masses of the people, even denying to large numbers access to the means of livelihood;
> Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, it is desirable that the present system should be superseded by one based on the principle of cooperative production and distribution in which human needs should be the first consideration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, two years ago, when I introduced a resolution on the cooperative commonwealth, the proposal may have seemed very academic. Last year I was able to announce the formation of a cooperative commonwealth federation and this year I am glad to be able to present a carefully considered program. This program, adopted at Regina last August, re-states and develops the point of view and the measures advanced for years in this house by the labour group and the United Farmers of Alberta group.

Frequently it has been said that labour men and farmers cannot work together. I know there are some superficial differences, but in the face of the great difficulties which exist at the present time many of these differences fade into insignificance. As a matter of fact in this house these two groups have found it possible to cooperate to an increasing degree year by year. Perhaps before going on to the program I might make a statement that will help clarify the situation in the minds of some of my fellow members. Our group is not strictly a party; it is rather a federation of provincial organizations. At present we have affiliated with the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in Alberta the Canadian Labour party—Alberta section—and the United Farmers of Alberta; in British Columbia the Associated C.C.F. clubs (B.C.) and the Socialist party of Canada, (B.C.); in Manitoba the Independent Labour party of Manitoba and Manitoba Farmer section of the C.C.F.; in New Brunswick the New Brunwick section of the C.C.F.; in Ontario the C.C.F. clubs of Ontario, the Labour conference of Ontario, and the United Farmers of Ontario; in Quebec the C.C.F. clubs—the Quebec organization committee—and the Labour Partie du Canada; in Saskatchewan the Farmer-Labour group, and I may say that there are several other provincial groups whose applications have not been formally accepted as yet.

The resolution which I advance on behalf of our organization states that the capitalist system, as we now have it, has failed to function. I fancy a great many members will agree. Many however would say that this is merely a temporary defect in the system, and that one of these days we will come back. After an analysis of the general world situation and the history of the last one hundred years I cannot believe that this is possible. It is true that we may have some revival but I believe such revival must be very temporary in character. We believe that the only possible way of overcoming our difficulties is by the setting up of an economic system on an altogether different basis. But I can fancy a great many hon. members in the house tonight will ask, as they have asked before: "But what other system is there, and how do you propose to establish it?" Our manifesto gives the answer, and I beg the indulgence of the house to read the preamble to it, because it gives the general viewpoint that we are trying to advocate and makes intelligible a great many of our motions. I read:

> The C.C.F. is a federation of organizations whose purpose is the establishment in Canada of a cooperative commonwealth in which the principle regulating production, distribution and exchange will be the supplying of human needs and not the making of profits.
> We aim to replace the present capitalist system, with its inherent injustice and inhumanity, by a social order from which the domination and exploitation of one class by another will be eliminated, in which economic planning will supersede unregulated private enterprise and competition, and in which genuine democratic self-government, based upon economic equality will be possible. The present order is marked by glaring inequalities of wealth and opportunity, by chaotic waste and instability; and in an age of plenty it condemns the great mass of the people to poverty and insecurity. Power has become more and more concentrated into the hands of a small irresponsible minority of financiers and industrialists and to their predatory interests the majority are habitually sacrificed. When private profit is the main stimulus to economic effort, our society oscillates between periods of feverish prosperity in which the main benefits go to speculators and profiteers, and of catastrophic depression, in which the common man's normal state of insecurity and hardship is accenuated. We believe that these evils can be removed only in a planned and socialized economy in which our natural resources and the principal means of production and distribution are owned, controlled and operated by the people.
> The new social order at which we aim is not one in which individuality will be crushed out by a system of regimentation. Nor shall we interfere with cultural rights of racial or religious minorities. What we seek is a proper collective organization of our economic resources such as will make possible a much greater degree of leisure and a much richer individual life for every citizen.
> This social and economic transformation can be brought about by political action, through the election of a government inspired by the ideal of a cooperative commonwealth and supported by a majority of the people. We do not believe in change by violence. We consider that both the old parties in Canada are the instruments of capitalist interests and cannot serve as agent of social reconstruction, and that whatever the superficial differences between them, they are bound to carry on government in accordance with the dictates of the big business interests who finance them. The C.C.F. aims at political power in order to put an end to this capitalist domination of our political life. It is a democratic movement, a federation of farmer, labour and socialist organizations, financed by its own members and seeking to achieve its ends solely by constitutional methods. It appeals for support to all who believe that the time has come for a far-reaching reconstruction of our economic and political institutions and who are willing to work together for the carrying out of the following policies.

May I pause for a moment to point out that this document answers a great many of the charges which have recently been made against the C.C.F. and its program. We do not believe in dictatorship; we believe in democracy. We would point out that to no small extent we have a financial dictatorship in Canada; we wish to have a democracy which will really represent the interests of the people. It has been stated very often when we have brought forward our proposals that they are identical with those of the Russians. I would say distinctly that we have no Russian affiliations whatever. Again and again we have stated that we have no connection whatever with the Communist party. Probably the body that has been working the nearest to the lines which we advocate is the British Labour party. We do use the term "a planned and socialized economy," and therefore a great many people seek to put an end to us simply by calling us socialists. Well, everything depends upon the definition. Personally I have no objection whatever to the word "socialism," but I would point out that socialism has a great many meanings to-day. In the co-operative commonwealth we have chosen a phrase into which we have the right to place whatever meaning we wish. I believe I could not do better than to repeat that which I said in my presidential address to the conference:

> Socialism has so many variations that we hesitate to use the class name. Utopian socialism and Christian socialism, Marxian socialism and Fabianism, the Latin type, the German type, the Russian type—why not a Canadian type?
> Perhaps it is because I am a Canadian of several generations, and have inherited the individualism common to all born on the American continent; yet with political and social ideas profoundly influenced by British traditions and so-called Christian idealism; further with a rather wide and intimate knowledge of the various sections of the Canadian people—in any case, I am convinced that we may develop in Canada a distinctive type of socialism. I refuse to follow slavishly the British model or the American model or the Russian model. We in Canada will solve our problems along our own lines. We have a goodly heritage, not only in natural resources but in pioneer traditions and social equipment. If we have the spirit of our fathers we can overcome the difficulties even of our complex modern world.

It has been charged again and again that we wanted to bring about changes by means of violence. At our conference we expressly and deliberately repudiated the charge, and said we wished to bring about changes in a peaceable and orderly fashion. The statement has often been made that the co-operative commonwealth which we advocate involves a highly centralized bureaucracy. There is nothing in our program to suggest that. We do believe that there are certain things which will have to be under the control of the federal government. There are other matters which will come under the control of the provincial governments and other matters which, as now, will come under the control of the municipal governments. We hope that there will be the possibility of a much wider degree of free cooperative effort than we have at the present time.

We start out to bring about these changes by the old and tried political method of electing a sufficient number of people to parliament so that there will be a majority in favour of the program we advocate. At the very outset of our program we place:

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

1.—Planning.

> The establishment of a planned, socialized, economic order, in order to make possible the most efficient development of the national resources and the most equitable distribution of the national income.

To-day a great many people are convinced of the necessity for some form of planning. Even the Conservatives in Great Britain are beginning to talk planning. Mr. Roosevelt has made this idea almost a commonplace here on this continent. I noticed only within the last few days in a pamphlet published by the authority of the governments of the dominion and of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, dealing with the world wheat problem and the London agreement, that these words are in the introduction:

> The issue was clearly—Drift or Plan.

That certainly is coming to be the case. I quoted the other day a very striking passage from the speech of the Hon. Vincent Massey on the New Economic Nationalism, in which he said very clearly:

> It must suffice for me to say that national planning will have to be the foundation of Canada's international relations.

I think we shall have to come to that. We point out in the explanatory note, one of which is attached to each plank in our platform, that—

> The first step in this direction will be the setting up of a national planning commission, consisting of a small body of economists, engineers and statisticians assisted by an appropriate technical staff.

To-day there is no relationship between the giving of credit and the general national welfare. People have been going along in a happy-go-lucky sort of way. The old laissez-faire doctrine has predominated up to the present, and it has brought us almost to disaster.

Especially I would point out, as was done incidentally by one of my colleagues in the debate on the previous resolution, that to-day there is no proper equilibrium between the production of this country and the consuming power of the people. I am not going to-night into the knotty question as to whether this is purely a financial problem, as that may be touched upon by my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote) under another resolution. But whether it is purely a financial problem or whether it is not more fundamental and has to do with the ownership and control of the real wealth of this country, the fact is that we to-day are living in a age of abundance and yet a great number of our people are facing poverty and thousands are experiencing a great deal of anxiety.

I wish I had time to go into the concentration of industry which has taken place in Canada in recent years. I might refer to a very excellent article in a recent issue of the Canadian Forum dealing with Concentration in Canadian Industry. This article points out what we have tried to say again and again in this house in the last few years:

> There were once more than forty banks in Canada. There are now ten. Of these the three largest have for some years done about seventy per cent of the business.

And so with trust companies. Four of the largest trust companies together have over seventy-seven per cent of the assets. And so with loan companies, three of which account for eighty-two per cent of the total assets. It is the same with life insurance companies, three of which control almost half of the total assets. The investment trust situation is very much the same. In our railway transportation we are facing to-day the prospect of amalgamation. Some of us remember that the fact was brought out years ago that Atlantic shipping is dominated by the North Atlantic Conference, of which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is an important member. Five of the Canadian Pacific Railway directors are directors of Canadian Airways. And so on. I shall not take time even to outline the article, but may I read a few words from its concluding paragraph? After referring to a few men of outstanding influence in this country it says:

> Besides these titans there are some sixty others, including eleven directors of the Bank of Montreal and seven each of the Royal Bank and the Canadian Bank of Commerce—who, with a few powerful foreign interests, constitute the controlling group for Canadian finance, transportation, communications, power, paper, electrical supplies, iron and steel, motor cars, agricultural implements, nickel, copper, chemicals, paints, cement, oil, rubber, textiles, milling, packing, tobacco, brewing, distilling, and motion pictures. Perhaps a hundred persons, here and abroad, decide what we shall eat, what we shall drink, wherewithal we shall be clothed, and most other of our activities.

One other very significant statement I quote:

> At most only about 144,000 people in Canada receive income enough to be taxable; about 82,000 of these get $4,000 a year or less, and three per cent of the population gets twenty per cent of the income.

Surely that is sufficient evidence of the concentration of wealth in Canada, and the concentration of wealth has meant the concentration of power, and I think I am free to add that it has meant political power.

We say in our explanatory note:

> The Cooperative Comomnwealth Federation will provide that in Canada the planning shall be done, not by a small group of capitalist magnates in their own interests, but by public servants acting in the public interest and responsible to the people as a whole.

We pass immediately from the idea of a plan to—

2.—Socialization of Finance.

> Socialization of all financial machinery—banking, curency, credit and insurance, to make possible the effective control of currency, credit and prices, and the supplying of new productive equipment for socially desirable purposes.

The control of finance is undoubtedly the first step in the control of our whole economy.

I noticed that not very long ago the press quoted Mr. Taschereau as having said:

> In 1920 there were one hundred paper mills in Canada producing $100,000,000 a year in products, capitalized at $22,000,000, employing 31,000 employees and paying them $45,000,000 yearly. At the end of ten years there were 109 mills, producing $215,000,000 in products, but capitalized at $714,000,000. There had been an increase of 2,000 in employees but payrolls remained the same as in 1920. While product increased 115 per cent capitalization increased 3,500 per cent, roughly speaking.

Under those circumstances we feel that it is highly necessary that there should be a national investment board working in co-operation with a socialist banking system to mobilize and direct the unused surplus of production for socially desirable purposes. I can understand that a program of this kind would not go very far without the question of ownership being involved, and we pass to—

3.—Social Ownership.

> Socialization (dominion, provincial or municipal) of transportation, communications, electric power and all other industries and services essential to social planning and their operation under the general direction of the planning commission by competent managements freed from day to day political interference.

That, of course, visualizes the extension of our present form of administration by commissions, only we would insist that on these commissions the workers must be given a right to participate, and further that workers in public industries must be much more free to organize than they are at the present time.

We believe that only under a regime of public ownership and operation will the full benefits accruing from centralization of control and mass production be passed on to the consuming public. That I think is really where the difficulty will be found in controlling the mass buying that is taking place to-day by the big departmental stores, and which is shortly to come under review by the committee that is to be set up. I do not see how we are ultimately to pass on the economies of mass buying unless we have public ownership or effective control. Let me point out that, contrary to the charges made, the C.C.F. has never thought of socializing all industries. The charge is without foundation. Perhaps I had better read what we ourselves declare in the explanatory note:

Transportation, communications and electric power must come first in a list of industries to be socialized. Others, such as mining, pulp and paper and the distribution of milk, bread, coal and gasoline, in which exploitation, waste or financial malpractices are particularly prominent, must next be brought under social ownership and operation.

That is not so radical as some of our political opponents would have you believe. If the province of Quebec can as a province handle the distribution of liquor, I cannot for the life of me see why a province or municipality cannot handle the distribution of milk. If Ontario can handle the distribution of electrical power, through the hydro-electric system, I cannot see why a province or municipality cannot handle the distribution of coal. We have already proceeded a very considerable distance along the line of public control over these essential industries.

A great many people have told us that this means confiscation. That is a question which, at the Regina conference, we very carefully considered; and whilst we agree that it would be impossible beforehand to consider what should be done in each particular instance, we did lay down certain principles which we propose to follow. I will here read from the explanatory note, for I do not want any misunderstanding to exist on this very important point:

We do not propose any policy of outright confiscation. What we desire is the most stable and equitable transition to the cooperative commonwealth. It is impossible to decide the policies to be followed in particular cases in an uncertain future, but we insist upon certain broad principles. The welfare of the community must take supremacy over the claims of private wealth. In times of war human life has been conscripted. Should economic circumstances call for it, conscription of wealth would be more justifiable. We recognize the need for compensation in the case of individuals and institutions which must receive adequate maintenance during the transitional period before the planned economy becomes fully operative. But a C.C.F. government will not play the role of rescuing bankrupt private concerns for the benefit of promoters and stock and bondholders.

An hon. MEMBER: Nor derelicts.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, nor of enterprises which in the Prime Minister's own words are derelicts. There is the position of investors to be considered. We recognize that institutions and individuals are dependent upon certain investments, and the members in this corner of the house would be the last to see widows and orphans neglected. But we do not propose to allow men of great wealth to hide behind the widows and orphans. We want to see that security is given, not merely to the privileged few, but to all.

4.—Agriculture.

Security of tenure for the farmer upon his farm, on conditions to be laid down by individual provinces; insurance against unavoidable crop failure; removal of the tariff burden from the operations of agriculture; encouragement of producers' and consumers' cooperatives; the restoration and maintenance of an equitable relationship between prices of agricultural products and those of other commodities and services; and improving the efficiency of export trade in farm products.

Again and again it has been stated by critics of the C.C.F. that we were going to take away the farms from the farmers. From the very first there has been nothing of that kind in our minds. We tried, in the very first conference we had a year ago, to guarantee the security of tenure to the farmer upon his farm. We recognize that the farmer is not an exploiter; rather, he is one of the worst exploited. To-day farming is still in the family farm stage, and as long as that is maintained there is no reason why under our scheme there should be any alteration in the ownership of farms.

I may say that in the province of Saskatchewan there are certain supporters of the C.C.F. who advocated that with respect to a limited number, farmers who were hopelessly mortgaged, their farms should be taken over by the state in order to save the owners from eviction.

Mr. VALLANCE: Does the hon. member deny any relationship to this C.C.F. handbook?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There have been a good many different pamphlets. I was explaining that a year ago, before this program was adopted, some of the farmers in Saskatchewan did advocate that, with respect to those hopelessly bankrupt, the state should take over their farms in order to save their owners from being evicted. What we stated was that we would leave the arrangements as to how the farmer should be enabled to retain ownership of his land to be worked out by each province. As hon. members know, conditions in the various provinces differ very widely.

We advocate in that connection a great increase of purchasing power made possible by the social control of the financial system. Control must be directed towards increased employment, as laid down elsewhere, and towards the raising of prices of farm commodities by proper credit and foreign exchange policies, and by the extension of consumers' and producers' cooperatives.

5.—External Trade.

The regulation in accordance with the national plan of external trade through import and export boards.

We are firmly convinced that the old controversies between free traders and protectionists are now largely obsolete. In a world of nationally organized economies, Canada must organize the buying and selling of her main imports and exports under public boards, and take steps to regulate the flow of the less important commodities by a system of licensing. For that reason we would advocate the formation of a wheat board. That is in line with the developments we have in view. During the war we learned a good many things that should now in time of peace be carried into practice.

6.—Cooperative Institutions.

The encouragement by the public authority of both producers' and consumers' cooperative institutions.

The trouble to-day is that the small local cooperative institution is like a cake of ice in the gulf stream; it can exist only a short time: the influences opposed to it are too great. But under an arrangement such as we envisage, it would be possible for free cooperative institutions to flourish.

7.—Labour Code.

A national labour code to secure for the worker maximum income and leisure, insurance covering illness, accident, old age, and unemployment, freedom of association and effective participation in the management of his industry or profession.

I do not think it is necessary for me to go into details as to what would be involved in a labour code. I think we labour members in this corner, during the past thirteen years, have made it abundantly clear what we consider the minimum for the labouring people in this country. I would call attention however to one fact that always comes in to block us; it did so only a few minutes ago. I refer to the British North America Act. Now, we believe that it will be necessary to revise that act in order to make a proper labour code possible. We propose that the necessary amendments to the British North America Act shall be obtained as speedily as required, safeguards being inserted to ensure that the existing rights of racial and religious minorities shall not be changed without the consent of those minorities. What we need chiefly to-day is to place in the hands of the national government more power to control national economic development. In Quebec there have been misrepresentations. I venture to say that no political party so far has so clearly safeguarded the rights of minorities as we have done in the section which I have read to the house.

8.—Socialized Health Services.

Publicly organized health, hospital and hospital medical services.

We believe that health services should be made at least as freely available as are educational services to-day. We are not concerned with whether the cost is borne by the dominion, the province or the municipality. We suggest that this is an enterprise in which dominion, provincial and municipal authorities, as well as the medical and dental professions, can cooperate.

9.—British North America Act.

The amendment of the Canadian constitution, without infringing upon racial or religious minority rights or upon legitimate provincial claims to autonomy, so as to give the Dominion government adequate powers to deal effectively with urgent economic problems which are essentially national in scope; the abolition of the Canadian senate.

As regards what we have in mind with respect to changes in the British North America Act, may I read this from the explanatory note:

The principle laid down in the Quebec resolutions of the fathers of confederation should be applied to the conditions of 1933, that "there be a general government charged with matters of common interest to the whole country and local governments for each of the provinces charged with the control of local matters in their respective sections."

So far as the Senate is concerned, I have not time to enter upon that, but we do not believe there is any place for a second chamber in a democracy such as we are supposed to have in Canada. Perhaps the least said at this time about the Senate, the better for the senators.

10.—External Relations.

A foreign policy designed to obtain international economic cooperation and to promote disarmament and world peace.

We stand resolutely against all participation in imperialist wars. And we do not believe in maintaining the empire as a means by which one group can exploit another. By all means let us stand together for sentimental and cultural purposes, but as H. N. Brailsford said not very long ago: "Empire is debt." That is shown in the case of Newfoundland; we do not propose to submit to that kind of thing.

11.—Taxation and Public Finance.

A new taxation policy designed not only to raise public revenues but also to lessen the glaring inequalities of income and to provide funds for social services and the socialization of industry; the cessation of the debt creating system of public finance.

I think we in this corner have again and again explained what we mean by that, and perhaps under other resolutions during this session we shall have further opportunities of discussing the matter.

12.—Freedom.

Freedom of speech and assembly for all; repeal of section 98 of the criminal code; amendment of the Immigration Act to prevent the present inhuman policy of deportation; equal treatment before the law of all residents of Canada irrespective of race, nationality or religious or political beliefs.

I have on previous occasions expressed myself pretty fully with regard to section 98 of the criminal code and what is involved in it. I shall not enter upon that to-night, but shall simply quote again from the explanatory note:

We stand for full economic, political and religious liberty for all.

We have sometimes been accused by some of our opponents of being anti-religious, notwithstanding the fact that we have expressly stated that we want the fullest religious liberty for all and guarantee the minorities their full religious and cultural rights.

The next plank should perhaps be properly headed: "Humanizing the law." It reads:

13.—Social Justice.

The establishment of a commission composed of psychiatrists, psychologists, socially-minded jurists and social workers to deal with all matters pertaining to crime and punishment and the general administration of law, in order to humanize the law and to bring it into harmony with the needs of the people.

I hope at a later stage in this session the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) will be here and able to say a little more with regard to what this plank might involve.

14.—An Emergency Program.

The assumption by the Dominion government of direct responsibility for dealing with the present critical unemployment situation and for tendering suitable work or adequate maintenance; the adoption of measures to relieve the extremity of the crisis such as a program of public spending on housing, and other enterprises that will increase the real wealth of Canada to be financed by the issue of credit based on the national wealth.

May I add a few words with regard to this:

Unemployed workers must be secured in the tenure of their homes, and the scale and methods of relief, at present altogether inadequate, must be such as to preserve decent human standards of living.

Perhaps, as I have only a few moments left, I might read another paragraph from our explanatory notes:

We propose to provide work and purchasing power for those now unemployed by a far-reaching program of public expenditure on housing, slum clearance, hospitals, libraries, schools, community halls, parks, recreational projects, reforestation, rural electrification, the elimination of grade crossings, and other similar projects in both town and country. This program, which would be financed by the issuance of credit based on the national wealth, would serve the double purpose of creating employment and meeting recognized social needs. Any steps which the government takes, under this emergency program, which may assist private business, must include guarantees of adequate wages and reasonable hours of work, and must be designed to further the advance towards the complete cooperative commonwealth.

We conclude the manifesto with this sentence:

No C.C.F. government will rest content until it has eradicated capitalism and put into operation the full program of socialized planning which will lead to the establishment in Canada of the cooperative commonwealth.

We have been told by some editorial writers that in Canada we already have altogether too much paternalism, but what of the way in which big business has drawn upon the resources of this country by way of charters, franchises, bonuses, tariffs and privileges of every description?—surely this is paternalism run wild. What we want to have in Canada is the planning and organizing of the productive and distributional agencies of the country in such a way as to provide for the needs of the Canadian people.

We very often have eulogies of capitalism. But what is the real situation to-day?

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): I listened with a great deal of interest to the previous speaker (Mr. Woodsworth). Since the prorogation of parliament we have had three politically outstanding events. I was interested in hearing the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation read from the convention number of the Saskatchewan C.C.F. Research Bureau a resumé of what happened at the convention held in Regina. That is one of the outstanding events about which I wish to say something, another being the by-election in the province of Saskatchewan. What the hon. gentleman has said tonight was very much the line of argument that was used during the Mackenzie by-election. But as I look at this pamphlet that was read and quoted from so frequently, I find that it does not agree with the propaganda that was put over at that by-election—at least that was attempted to be put over.

Mr. ILSLEY: Put under.

Mr. VALLANCE: I hold in my hand a copy of that pamphlet, but before dealing with it I would like to refer to some things that happened at that convention which do not appear in the pamphlet. There was at that convention, a famous visitor from the old land, a Mrs. John Paton, the wife of the secretary of the Independent Labour party of Great Britain. On July 17, she addressed the convention. I do not propose to read all her address, but I wish to call attention to some of the things she suggested to this convention that they must adopt in order to be effective.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Mrs. Paton never addressed the convention.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is not a point of order; it is merely a contradiction.

Mr. VALLANCE: I read from the Saskatoon Star of Monday, July 17, 1933:

Stresses Necessity of Changing Present Economic Conditions.

Mrs. John Paton addresses meeting and relates history of I.L.P.; sees striking identity in aims of Canadian and British parties.

Calling for an intelligent rather than a violent and passionate revolution against the present system, and emphasizing the necessity of obtaining power and fundamentally changing the present economic and social system by peaceful means, Mrs. John Paton, wife of the general secretary of the British Independent Labour party, addressing a large gathering in the Canadian Legion hall last evening, related the history of the I.L.P.

You will notice that at that date this convention was in session. I think the dates were the 19th, 20th and 21st—I would like the hon. gentleman to correct me if I am wrong.—She had this to say to them:

The first task of the socialists, the speaker asserted, was to obtain power—complete power over government and all the functions of government so that any insurrection from the ranks of the deposed class might be met with and subdued by military operations.

I merely draw the attention of the house to that. It was not denied at the convention that they would adopt such means.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Pardon me; as a matter of privilege—

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the hon. member raising a point of order?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: A point of order. The statement that was made was definitely denied, that she attended at the convention.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is not a point of order.

Mr. VALLANCE: We have listened to the group in the "haw corner," as the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) called them, quote quite a few authorities to back up their assertions. I would like to quote to them G. D. H. Cole, the British authority on socialism. I wonder if they will agree to this:

We cannot put limits to the pace at which we shall have to proceed when once we set our feet upon the way; nor can we put limits to the degree of dictatorial power which, under the stress of emergency, our socialist government may have to assume. It will be best, as soon as parliament has conferred on the government the necessary emergency powers, for it to meet as seldom as possible, leaving the socialists to carry on.

I now turn to this convention number, the authenticity of which I do not think they will deny, because if you turn to the centre you will find there a photograph of the entire delegation. I find in the front of this a speech delivered by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the leader of this group. In his address, speaking of democracy, what has he to say? I quote:

"Democracy,"—the rule of the people—is a much discounted word. Little wonder. The democracy which we have known in this country has been government of the people by party machines for the profiteers. The parliamentary machine is antiquated and its procedure obsolete. Government has functioned largely in the interests of the exploiting classes. The untrained masses—

Whoever they may be.

—are quite unfitted to pass judgment on the complicated problems that face modern executives.

Mr. HEAPS: Read more.

Mr. VALLANCE: I will. "The untrained masses"—who are they?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Tories.

Mr. VALLANCE: No, they are trained. You and I are "the untrained masses," the great Canadian people. Would not that suggest to you that if it were possible for this group ever to get control of this parliament—

Mr. MUNN: They would murder everyone.

Mr. VALLANCE: —"the untrained masses" would be denied the only—not privilege—the only right they have to state by the ballot whether or not they agreed with the policies in vogue.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): "There ain't goin' to be no" ballot.

Mr. VALLANCE: The hon. member said, "read on"; I will do so:

But having said this, I must confess that I still believe that the will of the people should prevail. This may appear a hang-over from the high-sounding but empty doctrine of Liberalism. But fundamentally it is sound.

Will you laugh now?

An intelligent and alert citizenship is the only guarantee of freedom.

That is Liberalism. That is what we are preaching. That was not preached in Mackenzie by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. In that by-election they even had what they thought was a hand-picked candidate—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We picked him.

Mr. YOUNG: We kicked him.

Mr. VALLANCE: Yes, it was just too bad. Here he is, L. St. George Stubbs. They brought him from Manitoba—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No. 1 hard.

Mr. VALLANCE: —and they proposed to elect him on the theory that he was a victim of the old political parties. Do you know what they said up there? That there is no difference between the Grits and the Tories.

Mr. MANION: Oh, shame!

Mr. VALLANCE: There was at least this difference: the Grits made a judge of him and the Tories undid him.

The hon. gentleman said he did not deny this handbook, but that there was some propaganda put out by provincial organizations with which they probably do not agree. Certainly they do not; I do not find any two C.C.F. speakers travelling about the country who are in agreement with each other. Right at the very beginning of this book I find:

Handbook for Speakers. Compiled from reports of conferences held in Saskatoon and Regina, January 7 and February 11 respectively, 1933.

[Mr. Vallance.]

So it is not so very obsolete, is it? They have a preamble here, and then the handbook goes on:

Socialization of the banking, credit and financial system of the country, together with the social ownership, development, operation and control of utilities and natural resources.

Now I ask the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, what is the greatest natural resource that Canada has to-day?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Land.

Mr. VALLANCE: Absolutely; land, but they found that this was not being accepted. Then they said, "Oh, but we are taking no chances; we have a planned economy, and there is nothing haphazard." I wish we had a blackboard here; to me this is a very interesting document. It states:

This chart is submitted by the central office. It may not be complete in so far as all details are concerned, but is given as an interpretation of a plan on which it would be possible for us to base a new order of society. It is given also as an outline to substantiate the beliefs of the farmer-labour group and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation as a whole that fundamental economic changes can be made constitutionally.

Let us assume in the explanation of this chart that in the next election the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation has elected the largest group of candidates. The Governor General would ask the leader to form a government; the cabinet would be set up and would proceed along the following lines:

Five boards of commissioners, the personnel of which must be experts in their particular capacities, would be created at once, namely:

1. Economic planning board.
2. Price fixing and adjustment board.
3. Purchasing board.
4. National marketing board.
5. Debt adjustment board.

Time will not permit me to read it all, but I think it would be rather interesting just to turn to the plan and have a look at it, and I am going to deal with it pretty much from an agricultural standpoint. You will notice that there is to be a purchasing board. That is the board that purchases the entire production of Canada, everything that is created here, wheat, industrial products and everything else. They will buy them all and then, after they have supplied the needs of the Canadian people, they will give to the national marketing board that which we do not need. If you had this chart, Mr. Speaker, you could follow it along and see exactly how it works out. They proceed to deliver the excess goods to the world's markets, and then they use a unique illustration to demonstrate just how this board will function:

As an example of the way in which we can serve our internal and external prices. Let us assume that our national marketing board has one million bushels of wheat—

We usually have between four and five hundred million bushels; they use one million as an illustration, and I want you to remember this while we are dealing with it.

—for which our purchasing board has paid $1 per bushel in Canadian currency.

Get that Canadian currency.

This million bushels of wheat is placed on the world markets, and we receive 25 cents per bushel in international currency.

I do not know whether that is going to be the actual basis of their plan, that every 25 cents we bring from a foreign country for our surplus goods will be multiplied by four and become a dollar.

This creates a credit deposit in our international currency department—

They have a national and an international department. This is high finance, Mr. Finance Minister.

—of $250,000.

Now let us see how we spend it.

With this amount our import board—

This is another board; the one imports and the other exports.

—buys $50,000 worth of sugar, $50,000 worth of coffee, tea, cotton, etc.

Now I ask hon. members of this house to realize that in Canada we produce between four and five hundred million bushels of wheat annually, and while we use for our own purposes about 120,000,000 bushels, a great deal of that is exported as flour. We will say, however, that we use 120,000,000 bushels of a total crop of say 420,000,000 bushels. We have left 300,000,000 bushels for which we must find a place on the world's market, and there they propose to dump that wheat on that market and bring into the country, according to their own illustration, about twenty-five per cent of what we paid for the wheat in Canada. Do they want to try to convince the farmer that he is any better off if they give him $1 per bushel for wheat and he can buy only 25 cents worth of sugar with that amount? I do not care if you charge me $10 a pound for sugar if you give me $10 a bushel for wheat; you get the same thing. That is what is happening to-day in connection with our exports. I am buying as great a volume of Canadian goods, even with the market as it is to-day, as I could buy under this system. You do not give me any more money; you do not give me any less. You give me just the same as I am getting now. I have to give a bushel of wheat for a pound of sugar, relatively, or 25 cents worth of sugar, so what is the difference to me? This does not mean a thing.

No, this was not acceptable to the farmers, and the C.C.F. know, just as the two old political parties know, that without at least some following from agriculture they can never hope to sit to your honour's right.

An hon. MEMBER: They never will.

Mr. VALLANCE: Oh, I would not say that.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a very interesting book which was written by one of the hon. members in the far corner, entitled An Interpretation of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and its Policy, by William Irvine, M.P.

Mr. IRVINE: Read it all.

Mr. VALLANCE: Why, Mr. Speaker, I have read it so often that I could almost recite it without looking at the book, but I want to be fair to the hon. gentleman. I noticed that the leader of this group was very emphatic as to how peaceful they were going to be. I can remember, as I am sure most hon. gentlemen can remember, when some three hundred unemployed marched on parliament in 1930—or was it 1931?—because the present government took the precaution of having the police reinforced just a little bit, the leader of the C.C.F. got up in his place and denounced the government. I had no sympathy with the government at that time and I have none now in connection with that incident, but when you read such things as these—

Mr. YOUNG: Read it.

Mr. VALLANCE: The hon. gentleman said they did not want British socialism, and he enumerated various types of what he called socialism. I know of only one type; whether it is applied in Russia or anywhere else it has to meet the particular conditions existing. It is environment which makes the change; it is the problem that it attempts to solve. That is what makes the Canadian problem different from any other, because our problems are not those of Russia. This gentleman, William Irvine, has the following to say about it:

While it is neither practicable nor desirable for the movement for a new social order in Canada to repeat the methods and acts of Russia, we may well be proud if we can achieve as much for our people in this generation as Russia has achieved during the last five years. Whatever else may be said of Russia, her people are at work; they are fed and clothed—

I wonder if the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) agrees with that. I know he does not. To continue:

—they are fed and clothed and have an assurance of equal economic security.

Since the group which now controls the destiny of Russia took office, how many times have the people had any say as to whether or not they agreed with their government? Not once. The socialists themselves assert that it is not possible for the people to have a say in the government. Then, to continue reading:

Whatever else may be said of Russia, her people are at work; they are fed and clothed, and have an assurance of equal economic security; they have a great ideal towards which they are moving under the direction of intelligent planning, and they have a hope of ultimate success which we as a people lack in Canada.

Mr. IRVINE: Would the hon. gentleman mind quoting the first part of the paragraph?

Mr. VALLANCE: I have quoted the whole paragraph.

Mr. IRVINE: That is misrepresentation; that is what I would have expected my hon. friend to do.

Mr. VALLANCE: I do not wish to become personal. Now, Mr. Speaker, we know what happened in the Mackenzie by-election. The C.C.F. cannot stand even to be criticized, but they want to be allowed to run at large across the country denouncing everybody, and making each person appear to be a crook. They want the people to think that no one is working in the public interest except themselves, and that all the rest of us are here just to fill our own pockets and to live a life of luxury. Why, only the other day my friend from Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) who has so much to say, mentioned the fact that very few hon. members were in the house. I have counted the members of this group time and again, and have reason to know just how well they attend, if this resolution were not now under discussion there would not be three of them in their seats. There is no group in this house large or small that gives such a small attendance as they do. Why, half of the time there are not three of them in here; there should be a roll call every half hour.

No, Mr. Speaker; the people of Canada are well aware of the conditions we are passing through. I will say this for the C.C.F., that their leader is sincere.

An hon. MEMBER: Not all the time.

[Mr. Vallance.]

Mr. VALLANCE: Yes, I think he is; but there are a good many attempting to follow him who are not as sincere as he is. In the past year the people of Canada, "untrained masses" as they may be, by their ballots registered disapproval of anything the C.C.F. had to offer.

The handbook from which my hon. friend read is well worth reading. I believe even those of us who are most prejudiced against their policy will admit that in this book they have attempted to write something which would appeal to the electors. The convention was held in July. Since then three by-elections have been held in Canada, one in New Brunswick, one in Quebec and one in the West. The "untrained masses" spoke, and there was not one C.C.F. victory. In British Columbia there was a provincial election and again the people spoke, but probably not as emphatically as they did in the rural centres. The C.C.F. realize, as I stated before, that without the huge rural vote they can never hope to sit to the right of the Speaker. In the last year their whole effort has been towards winning the confidence of the farmer and his support of their political viewpoint.

Last summer I did considerable travelling, and happened to be in Mackenzie constituency for a couple of weeks during the by-election. While in that constituency I met many people, and there was a disposition on the part of some to believe in the C.C.F. theories—and I use that word, because they are only theories. I see sitting in this chamber to-night others who were there at that time, and who were not supporting the candidate who won; I believe they will agree with me that as the day of the election approached we could see the C.C.F. fall as grain before the sickle. Had it not been for the storm on the Friday before the election, instead of John Angus MacMillan winning by 1,600 votes he would have won by 2,600. Throughout the campaign the C.C.F. attempted to tie the two old political parties together. It was suggested even that the Conservative candidate would be taken out and that we would bind our forces together. Nothing like that happened; we fought the Tory just as hard as we fought the C.C.F. and the United Front. It seemed to me a tragedy that two groups so closely related, the C.C.F. and the United Front, much more closely related than the Grits and the Tories, could not have united. There was only one reason they could not unite and that reason was Lewis St. George Stubbs. That was the reason they could not unite. I think they learned a lesson in that by-election. During the campaign we denounced the Tory policies and the record of the government. The Tory party has a record and a history; we have a record and a policy. All the C.C.F. had to offer was a program, but the people chose to believe in some group that had accomplished something and had a hope for the future.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Speaker, the resolution on the order paper and now before the house has been very carefully worded. It reminds me of the old fable about the wolf in sheep's clothing: the "wolf" part appears about the middle of the resolution, and is contained in the words "the principle of cooperative production and distribution," and the soft, gentle, "sheep" part is in the last few words, "in which human needs should be the first consideration." It is too cold now, the parks are filled with snow, and the soap boxes have been taken away but all summer long the people of Toronto and of other cities have had to listen to speeches on this same sort of resolution in various parks and from a hundred and one soap boxes and platforms throughout the city. As the speaker who has just sat down (Mr. Vallance) has intimated from soap boxes and platforms men of finance and men who have been successful in business and commerce have been denounced every night in the week. There has been never a good word said of those who have been successful in business and who have given employment in this country—only denunciation of all they are trying to do.

The question of profits has been mentioned. Production is to be without profits. Of course, no one in his right senses would produce without profit in any event, if he could help it; but the party in the southeast corner are expecting to produce without profits. A Cooperative Commonwealth Federation speaker, S. W. Cheshie, speaking in Queen's Park, Toronto, on August 22, and reported in the Toronto Telegram of August 23, made an address advocating the C.C.F. doctrine, and then he advised his hearers to take the C.C.F. magazine, a weekly paper, and he made this statement:

> A profit of three cents per copy will therefore find its way to the coffers of the various clubs.

I might say that the paper sells for five cents a copy. I never heard of a manufacturer asking for a profit of 150 per cent on his product.

I have in my hand a letter from the Fuego Oil Company, dated October 1, 1930, from which I quote this sentence:

> The usual profits from a gusher oil well are such that even the smallest stockholder can benefit remarkably. Remember also we have 10,600 acres of leases, and after one gusher blows in our leases and stock will rise to tremendous values.

Another letter was sent out on August 9, 1932, by the Fuego Oil Company. It says:

> It holds untold promise for those of you who now take up the fight to make this field a truly successful oil field. It is already proven as a producing field, our well has opened up many miles of new potential production area, and with your help we will go on to make it pay you what you have expected from your investment.

I hope this oil company makes money. I hope that any company and any investor makes money. I hope that the directors of this oil company makes money. The directors are as follows: Agnes C. Macphail, M.P., Ceylon, Ontario; Margaret Macgregor, Toronto, Ontario; Mr. H. B. Miner, Milwaukee, Wisconsin; A. O. McArthur, Oyen, Alberta; Herbert J. Kelly, Toronto, Ontario. From this list of directors you will see, Mr. Speaker, that human frailty as evidenced in the desire to make profits is common to the whole human race, and everybody, when he or she gets the chance, likes to make an odd dollar or two honestly.

There is nothing new in this doctrine of cooperative production and distribution in which human need should be the first consideration. This doctrine was advocated in the time of Plato, which was long, long ago. It was advocated in the 18th century by Rousseau and Weishaupt, whose articles and speeches had much to do with causing the French revolution. It was advocated again in the 19th century by Karl Marx, who added to the theories of Rousseau and Weishaupt some of his own, together with those of Louis Engels. So there is nothing new in this at all, and it amazes me how men will get up on soap boxes in the parks and try to make their hearers believe that there is something new in this doctrine. Wherever it has been tried it has never gotten anywhere, except in Russia at the present time, and certainly it will never get anywhere in a country like this.

I was very pleased with the very mild manner in which the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation spoke to-night. He was nothing like as strong in his language as I have heard him on other occasions, but that should not mislead anybody, he would not do that, but in all revolutions, once the revolution gets started, the mild-mannered leaders of the commencement are discarded and more vigorous leaders take charge and run the country through all the ramifications of a real revolution. That is what happened in France, where Mirabeau and Danton were sidetracked, and Robespierre came in. The same thing happened in Russia where Kerensky was sidetracked and the present group of rulers inflicted the cooperative commonwealth policies on Russia, which were responsible for the slaughter of 500,000 Russians and destruction from one end of the country to the other, and for the annihilation of all forms of democratic and responsible government. It has been well said by the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) that there has not been any election in Russia since the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation of Russia took hold of the reins in that country.

I state, and I do not think it is necessary for me to bring quotations to my support, although I have ample quotations to prove it if I am challenged, that cooperative commonwealth federationism is socialism. There is no contradiction of that.

I go further and say that socialism and communism have identically the same objectives. There is no difference in their objectives. The final aim in each case is cooperative commonwealthism, and that is what is advocated for this country.

The speaker who sat down said something about violence, and I should like to quote something in that regard. I quite agree that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) does not by any means advocate a revolution, but I can hardly reconcile his mild manner to-night with the statement he made in parliament on February 1 of last year, when he said:

> Let me say that we must distinguish clearly between the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and communism. It is quite true that both believe in a changed social order, in a new economic system. The communists are convinced that this can be brought about only by violence.

That is right; that is the communist doctrine. The objective is the same in each case, but the communist says; We must reach our objective quickly by violence, while the socialist says: Let us have an educational campaign to try to attain our objective if we can by the vote. But the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation does not say how it would get its objective if it did not get it by the vote. But here is one clause in the cooperative commonwealth platform that was adopted at Regina, and if I am in error I hope that some member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation will correct me. This plank reads:

> The object of the confederation shall be to coordinate the activities of member organizations in order to promote through political action and other appropriate means, the establishment in Canada of a cooperative commonwealth in which the principle regulating production, distribution and exchange, will be the supplying of human needs and not the making of profits.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

That little phrase in there, "and other appropriate means", is the joker as I see it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is all very well to laugh about it, but you will not likely get it by voting, so what are the appropriate means? The various speakers of the C.C.F. say that it must come and the leader of that party in his speech on February 1 last made this statement:

> The communists are convinced that this can be brought about only by violence. They think it cannot be done in any other way. We believe that it may come in Canada by peaceful methods. . . . It may very well be that force may prove inevitable.

That corresponds to the joker. Now, the whole concentration of Marxism is contained in this resolution before us to-night. The resolution embodies the very first principle of the platform of Marx's doctrine, the principle of surplus value, which means that the profits of the factory do not belong to the capital invested in the factory, that the difference between what a factory sells its goods at and the cost at which they are manufactured belongs to the workers and none of it to the factory itself. Well, no factory will remain in existence under such conditions.

Mark you, I am a firm believer in a fair return to labour. My whole life has been associated with labour—I am referring to the actual operatives, the men who work with their hands and heads and not so much with their tongues. I am referring to the man who produces in a factory and not the man who talks on a soap box; the man who does something with his hands or his head to develop the country, and not the man who tries to pull down the country. I repeat, I am in favour of labour getting a fair return, but I am satisfied that no industry in this country, no member of the C.C.F., would attempt to produce unless there was the possibility of a fair return. I think I am correct in that statement after having quoted what has been sent out by the concern to which I have referred, one of the directors of which is a leader in the C.C.F. This doctrine advocated in the resolution before us to-night has never been adopted in any country except as the result of class struggle in which the workers have massed together to overthrow the government of the country and thereby destroy not only the government but industry as well. I am opposed to class struggle. I am in favour of cooperation between the producer and the man who works in the factory to produce, and between them and the consumer. I cannot see how anyone of these three factors in the industrial system can be dissociated from the others. It seems to me their interests are identical, and if one fails all three parts of the industrial fabric of the country must also fail.

Now, the leader of the party, as he sat down, referred to the abundance under our system; the country, he said, has broken down while it has an abundance of everything. And of course, I inferred that could not possibly prevail, according to his argument, under a cooperative commonwealth. Well, there is a cooperative commonwealth in Russia and I look forward with great interest to what the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) will say in this regard when he gets up to speak, because I enjoyed reading what he said when he returned from Russia—not of course the trouble in Russia, nor the distress and suffering, because trouble and distress and suffering are to be deplored anywhere. I wish the Russian people every success, and I do not like to see trouble anywhere. The Russian people have behind them long years of success, but see what they have fallen to to-day under a cooperative commonwealth. As reported in the Toronto Daily Star on July 31, the hon. member for East Hamilton is reported as follows—and he will know whether he was correctly reported or not:

> There are conditions in their factories which the Canadian people wouldn't stand for one minute. Girls walking around barefoot on iron filings, and that kind of thing. But worst of all, is the shortage of food. It's not too bad in Moscow, it's a little worse in Leningrad. But out in the country, it's terrible—especially in the south, where much of the food is grown. I saw I don't know how many hundreds of people starving, in Kharkov and Kiev.

The reporter asked him a question:

> How did you know they were starving? "I've got eyes. You don't need to be a scientist to know a person is starving. When white-faced men and women, and children with distended bellies, crowd around the train at every station begging for money or food—then it's a pretty sure guess they're starving. I saw hundreds of them in Kharkov and Kiev. They didn't even have the traditional dried fish and cabbage soup. They were down to bread and water—and sometimes less than that. . . .
> There may be a lot of nonsense talked about liberty—

Yes, Mr. Speaker; there has certainly been a good deal of such talk in this country and in this house—I am not referring to any particular corner of the house.

> There may be a lot of nonsense talked about liberty; but you appreciate it after you have been to Europe. Life is too short for that kind of thing. When I say this back home, some of them won't like it, but it's the truth; things are bad in Russia.

That is the effect which a cooperative commonwealth government has had on Russia, and no matter how bad conditions may be in Canada, I think it will be agreed that they are infinitely superior to anything in that country. I call to witness the hon. member for East Hamilton, who went over and made an investigation and was good enough to grant an interview to the press. I for one choose the Canadian system, and I am sure that that hon. gentleman will too, in preference to the Russian plan which the resolution calls for—in my opinion straight communism as practised in Russia.

There was a Regina platform and a good deal has been said about it to-night. I want to say a word or two in regard to it myself, not so much with respect to the planks particularly as in regard to what took place there. I agree with the leader of the C.C.F. that his desire is to keep communism out of his party, but he cannot keep communism out of it. The objective is communism or the result of communism, and this cropped up very vigorously at Regina. At the C.C.F. convention there was a delegate named William Moriarity, and I should like to quote what he said. A resolution had been moved to abolish violence from their platform. An amendment was moved by Mr. Moriarity, a delegate from Toronto seconded by Mr. E. K. Winch, delegate from Vancouver, and in the course of his remarks Mr. Moriarity said:

> "The methods suitable to capitalism are those of force," declared Moriarity. After citing examples where peaceful methods in Europe had failed, he declared, while he was in favour of constitutional methods: "If the ruling class opposes the will of the people, we must use a method suitable to the occasion."

Force is communism; force is what distinguishes communism from socialism, the objects of each being the same.

Mr. Moriarity attended the communistic convention at Moscow in March, 1925; in May, 1925, he attended the communistic convention at Glasgow, and in October, 1927, he was appointed organizer for the communist districts eight and nine, Alberta and British Columbia, with headquarters at Edmonton, Alberta. At Regina there were other delegates who had communistic tendencies. I said once before and I will say again that if all those who have communistic tendencies are banished from the C.C.F. party, a large number will be put out of the party.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre stated that farming was not included in his program of socialization, but on February 1, 1933, he made this statement in giving a short definition of the cooperative commonwealth:

> A community freed from the domination of irresponsible financial and economic power, in which all social means of production and distribution including land, are socially owned and controlled either by voluntarily organized groups of producers and consumers.

That includes land and land means farms.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Will the hon. gentleman permit me to say that if I recognize that, it was the statement as prepared two years ago by the United Farmers of Alberta.

Mr. MacNICOL: So that as the farmers are not in accord with socialization of land it was decided to delete that. I do not think the farmers will swallow that, hook, line and sinker. The farmers in the old counties of Ontario who hewed their farms out of the forest, cultivated their land and handed it on to their families are not going to support any party which has even a back door design on their land.

I should like to quote what the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis) said at Regina:

> If the farmer wants a cooperative commonwealth in which everything is socialized but himself—

Apparently there was a great deal of opposition at Regina to socializing land.

> —then he had better have a cooperative commonwealth of his own.
> If the farmer is to enjoy the benefits of cooperation, he will have to come half way.

There never was any half way in revolution; revolutions as a rule, once they got started, went all the way. If the farmer thinks he can afford to support the C.C.F. plan of socialization and will escape having his land socialized, then he is very much mistaken; it cannot be done.

The mover of the resolution spoke very strongly against the capitalistic system. Well, it is communism to denounce and advocate the overthrow of the capitalistic system. I should like to quote one of the clauses in the thesis of the Third Internationale at Moscow:

> The communist international is the concentrated will of the world revolutionary proletariat; its mission is to organize the working class of the whole world for the overthrow of the capitalistic order and the establishment of communism.

So that the overthrow of the capitalistic system is the platform or plank of the Third Internationale communistic organization at Moscow, and being a plank of the C.C.F. in Canada, that plank in any event is communistic.

I should like to say what the C.C.F. is proposing to do as announced on the soapboxes and platforms in Toronto during last summer, Mr. Philpott on May 27, made the statement:

> The C.C.F. is adamant on one thing the whole banking system must be socialized.

And again, on June 3, he is reported as saying:

> The C.C.F. was going to socialize all the essential things of society on a basis of service, not selfishness; on a basis of human needs, not the satisfying of human greed. Among the essential things would be medical health service, milk, meat.

If the house will keep track of the number of things that are going to be socialized, it will observe there is hardly anything left. On June 10 Mr. Philpott is reported as stating that the capitalistic system must go. He goes on to say that it is: "rotten," "insane" and "dead." I shall have a word to say about capitalism later on. Another C.C.F. speaker is quoted on July 16 as saying that the British North America Act, which is the basis of all our rights in this country must be abolished.

Then the hon. member for Southeast Grey is quoted on June 1 as stating that the insurance of Canada must be nationalized. Again Mr. Buckley, one of the C.C.F. leaders in Toronto, stated on August 29 that the Senate must be abolished. In Trinity park at Toronto, on August 30, C.C.F. speakers announced that when they obtained power there would be no salesmen. Of course salesmen would not be required under the system as announced tonight by the leader of the C.C.F., so that travellers and others engaged in selling throughout Canada would also be out of jobs.

Speaking at Stratford, on September 9, the hon. member for Southeast Grey is quoted as wishing to abolish all the businessmen in Canada, in a joking sense:

> "I believe that what makes the C.C.F. most appealing," said the speaker, "is that it is so blatantly idealistic. We have had enough of the hard-headed business man and the superman. They should be dumped into the lake."

Pretty hard treatment!

On November 18, Mr. Philpott, speaking in Massey hall, Toronto, announced that the public utilities, gasoline companies, milk, meat and coal companies will all be socialized and that the stock exchanges must be abolished. I wondered where all the money is to come from with which to do all this, because, as the leader of the opposition well said in speeches in many of the western provinces during the summer, confiscation without compensation would bring about civil war, or words to that effect. But the hon. member for Southeast Grey stated in a speech at Walkerton that a central bank would be established when they obtained power, with authority to print bills and lend same without interest. That kind of bank would be as sound as the snowbanks out in front of this building.

Something was said by the mover of the resolution in reference to the concentration of wealth. I would like to give a few figures in that regard.

There are 80,568 depositors in Canada's eleven loan companies. The average deposit is $358.

There are 70,808 in Canada's thirteen trust companies. The average deposit is $384.

There are 2,821,876 credits to policy holders in Canada's twelve life insurance companies, the average deposit being $478.

There are 4,460,000 depositors in Canada's banks, the average deposit being $413.

I have not the figures of stock holdings in Canadian industrial companies, but I venture to say that in many they do not average any greater amounts than those I have just recounted. This all goes to show that the great masses of the investing Canadian people are investors in good securities, and the amount of their investments is far greater than the amount of the investments that we were led to believe earlier in the evening were held by the very rich.

Now I would like to say a word in reference to the capitalistic system. I am a believer in the capitalistic system, and I am opposed to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation system. My observation of history is that the world owes more to the capitalistic system than it does to any other finance system under which man ever operated from the beginning of this world. The capitalistic system does give every man and woman an equal opportunity to strive, to study, to acquire knowledge, to achieve, to invest money in business, to give employment and to make what he can. It teaches them the laws of thrift; it teaches them that a man must live right to get along, and let his brother man do as he himself would like to do. I think it exemplifies the golden rule in its principles better than any other system. I am quite aware that there are and have been things going on that should be remedied, but these are violations of the capitalistic system; they are not principles of the system, and members of this house, and those who sat here before us, have been trying through the years to improve these things. But the principles of the system itself in my humble opinion are the best that have been devised for the conduct of business in this world and for providing employment and giving people wide opportunity.

I have noted of late with much satisfaction that great labour unions in several cases have been dissociating themselves from the principles of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. And well they should; there is little in common between true labourism and the principles of this federation. I worked for a quarter of a century with men associated with the labour unions; I know what they have done and I am glad to give them credit for what they have done in alleviating conditions that men worked under a quarter or half a century ago. The labour unions have done a great deal of good in this country. They have had sane leaders who have cooperated with the governments of the day in trying to promote legislation beneficial to labour. I am in accord with any legislation that is good for labour. I worked with 900 men for many years. If in this house I can lift my voice in favour of raising the status of the average man who is called the workingman or labour man, I am going to do so.

I am glad to see that these organizations that have nothing in common with socialism or communism have dissociated themselves from the soap box oratory that has been flooding this country for the last two or three years, but which, thank goodness, is on the downgrade. It may have flourished a little for the last year or two, but to-day it is going downhill. Let me tell my good friend the hon. member for South Battleford that he need have no fear of the members in the southeast corner of this house or their party ever sitting to the right of the speaker as a government.

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, certain things that have emanated from at least two of the speakers to-night have brought me to my feet, and I intend to follow up the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance), and the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol), who has just spoken.

I think it was the hon. member for Vancouver who interjected a remark during the speech made by the hon. member for South Battleford, that the members in this corner of the house do not agree. Well, I remember a speech that was made on the floor of this house last year by the very eloquent member for Vancouver, in which he twitted the member for Weyburn about his lack of knowledge of finance. The hon. member for Vancouver said: You know nothing about finance; you should stick to the tariff. There are others in the group also who hold that view with regard to these questions. Now I am not a communist; I agree with what the last speaker has said in regard to certain things that are taking place in the southern part of Russia especially in regard to agriculture. A little later I intend to say a few things about how agriculture is being carried on in Russia.

Speeches in this house, not only on this subject but on other subjects, have disclosed three distinct orientations. Hon. members on the other side very frankly say they would conserve everything good we have in the system at the present time on the protective principle. Hon. members on this side would let things take their own course and, Micawber-like, wait for something to turn up; while the group in this corner would welcome planning on the cooperative principle. Whatever we may think about the policies of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), we at least must agree that he has very frankly advocated the policy of protection. He said he would raise the tariff, and he did so. On the other hand the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) as much as said, "Put me in power and I will lower the tariff." As one speaker said in the west, the right hon. gentleman starts out by lowering the tariff and ends by raising it higher than it ever was during his regime. The other day I saw a cartoon in Maclean's magazine. The Prime Minister was pictured hunched on the back of a donkey, looking very dejected, and behind him were seen many unfulfilled promises. In an oval inset the leader of the opposition was sitting in a chair warming his feet at a fire.

Mr. GOTT: The last round-up.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: The Prime Minister was pictured as going to the last round-up, singing, "Get along, little doggie, get along," but the leader of the opposition was pictured dozing near a fire, oblivious to the storm that was raging outside. I believe that no matter what we may say about the policy of the Prime Minister, to me and to hon. members even on this side of the house he looked more like Richard the Lion-Hearted on a very spirited prancer fighting what to many looked like a losing battle.

When I listened to the lengthy speech of the leader of the opposition I marvelled that a man could speak for four hours without uttering a single sentence in respect of the policy through the instrumentality of which he was going to get this country out of the mess in which it now finds itself. There are people in Canada who still think that all we need is to change the government and put the other party in power, but during the next three, four or five years they will realize that the leader of the opposition cannot play the part of a magician and pull out of a hat rabbits that are not there.

So, Mr. Speaker, the policy of one party in Canada is protection and the policy of the other party is low tariff. I have often heard members say in this house that all we need to do is lop away the mouldering branches. That argument is all right as far as it goes, but what are we to do if the whole tree is rotten? I suppose we will have to chop down the whole thing. Having this in view the resolution proposes that we set up in this country a cooperative commonwealth. So far as our friends to your left are concerned, Mr. Speaker, the only policy they have to offer is the old policy of the tariff. That has been a political football down through the ages; it is a policy that has been fought out between the tweedledums and the tweedledees ever since confederation. All this talk about the tariff reminds me of a bashful young suitor who was sitting beside his lady-love on a sofa. He saw a cat meander into the parlour with its tail in the air, and he said, "Mary, look, isn't that wonderful?" Mary answered, "I don't see anything wonderful about that." "No," he said, "that is true, but just the same it gives me something to talk about." That is all the tariff does; it gives the old parties —especially the party to the left of the Speaker,—something to talk about. The hon. member for Weyburn laughs. He is the Liberal medicine man who usually employs these tariff incantations, not only in this house but throughout the country. He has done so in his own constituency, and he did so during the last by-election in Mackenzie.

Mr. YOUNG: Rather effectively, too.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Well, I was there and I know a little about what went on in that constituency, but I do not intend to deal with that to-night. But if this tariff weapon were taken away from him he would feel like a hen in the lake, or like a fish out of water.

Mr. YOUNG: Is that why you want to take it away?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: If we were to honestly ask ourselves how much the tariff would have to be lowered in order to get out of this depression, no doubt the best economists of the land would tell us that the whole thing would have to be wiped out in order to help the people of this country. A reduction such as has been practised by the Liberal party since confederation, when in power, will have about as much effect in solving the problem of the present economic situation, to use the words of the Ottawa Citizen, as a small garden hose would have on a large forest fire. Nevertheless, this tariff talk goes on and on. The fakir on the street never lacks listeners, and Liberal tariff incantations also draw the crowd, as the hon. member for Weyburn has said, sometimes very effectively, as in the Mackenzie by-election.

Mr. GOTT: Did he display his socks up there?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Well, it was pretty cold up there, and I think he had on a couple of pairs.

The group in this corner has always advocated low tariffs, but we believe that words without deeds would be as sounding brass and tinkling cymbals. Living in a world of reality we know that Liberalism will not lower the tariff enough to do much good, and therefore we have turned to something which we consider more fundamental in times such as these; we have turned to a reform of the monetary system, the bringing about of a better medium of exchange and a better means of distributing the great abundance of the goods we have now to a public bereft of the purchasing power with which to buy the necessities of life. Personally I think the laissez-faire policy practised by our friends to the left of the Speaker, the attitude of sitting by the fire and waiting for the clouds to roll by, is still the only policy they have to offer, notwithstanding what the hon. member for South Battleford told us a short time ago, which was nothing at all.

Therefore I do not see, Mr. Speaker, what in the world they have to go into ecstasies about in regard to the next election, for I believe that if the leader of the opposition does not run into his usual luck, with the help of providence, his lot will be far more miserable than he feels the position of the Prime Minister to be at the present time. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) spoke the truth when he referred to the sullen apathy of the public towards all administrations, be they Liberal or Conservative.

Mr. YOUNG: Or C.C.F.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: There is no C.C.F. administration at the present time.

Mr. DAVIES: What about Alberta?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: It has not been proven yet; we have had no election there, and there is no criterion by which we can measure the Alberta government at the present time. But anti-government feeling does not necessarily mean a pro-Liberal sentiment throughout the country. I feel deep down in my heart that what the people of Canada want is not a change of party but a change of policy, because merely bringing the Liberals back into power without a radical change of policy would be grasping at the shadow and letting the substance go by. I believe if the Liberal party has nothing more to offer than a measly reduction in the tariff their efforts will be met with the odium and reproach of a public sinking deeper and deeper into the mire of ever-increasing bad times.

At a gathering of farmers last summer the relative prosperity of the country under Conservative and Liberal regimes was under consideration. One old timer longed for the old Liberal party and the good times which existed when they were in power. Another old timer, replying, stated that under the Conservative regime times were just as good. "What about the price of wheat, of hogs and of cattle under Mr. Borden's government?" one asked. He declared they were higher than they had been in the days of other governments. Well, those days were different, and I believe everyone will agree with me that it did not take exceptional statesmanship to administer the affairs of Canada in good times, but I hold that it takes near genius to administer the affairs of Canada in times like this. It is no use for any leader to bask in the sunshine of the past and to refer continually to what men have done for Canada in days gone by. The people are not asking themselves what Sir Wilfrid Laurier did for Canada, or what Sir John A. Macdonald did for Canada, but they are asking: What is the leader of the opposition going to do for Canada when he gets into power? They want to know what his policy is going to be. During the four hour speech of the right hon. gentleman I certainly did not hear of one principle or plank through the instrumentality of which we are going to get out of this depression.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Did the hon. member read a speech delivered by the leader of the opposition last February in which he laid down the policy?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: No, I did not read that speech, but I certainly could not get anything out of the four hour speech he delivered the other day. He paraphrased a prayer, and I think that is about all he did. The mere paraphasing of the Lord's prayer will not impress anybody.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That was not the Lord's prayer.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: What we need is a plan to increase purchasing power, a plan to raise price levels and to coordinate the various industries. An hon. member who spoke earlier in the evening said that cooperatism—I believe that is the word he used—is akin to communism. May I say to him that if I thought that was so I would not believe in cooperation. When Canada is ever brought down to an agricultural system administered as it now is in Russia I will no longer give my support to a cooperative movement. Of course I am going to be told that we cannot regiment people without destroying individual initiative and personal liberty. But I would like to ask this question: What does initiative mean in a world where it can no longer be exercised, a world where people are on the verge of starvation in the midst of plenty? There are hundreds of mechanics and technicians without work to do, through no fault of their own. They are just as able as other men who have been fortunate enough to secure positions. Where have those young men and women a chance to exercise any initiative? What does that initiative avail them when they cannot find work to do? The best that can be said of their liberty is that the right is not denied to them to degenerate in enforced idleness and to pine away in the misery of thwarted effort. Therefore I believe that work, as well as subsistence, whether we like it or not, is bound to be given to them by the government of the day, whether that government be Conservative, Liberal, U.F.A., Labour or C.C.F. As one lecturer has put it, if we could regiment men and industry to kill Germans during the war there is no reason why the same cannot be done to rehabilitate Canadians in Canada during times of peace.

I deprecate the insinuation that the policy of nationalization and planning advocated by this group would inaugurate a system of communism such as is now being practised in Russia. The soviet method of ruthless force, terror and autocracy could never be tolerated in a democratic country such as this. The ballot and not the bullet will be our method. I personally would not tolerate belonging to a group if I felt that its plan were to be modelled on the bolshevist prototype especially in regard to agriculture, and I submit my reason for that attitude.

For many months rumours of extreme hunger have been rife in regard to what formerly was the richest, the happiest and the most fertile part of Russia, namely the Ukraine. Letters have percolated into Canada.

I have read dozens of them, in which conditions in the southern part of Russia were painted. Many demonstrations have been held in New York, Boston and in other places on this continent against the hunger existing in the Ukraine. Hundreds of resolutions have been sent to the President of the United States and, I am sure, many have been sent to the Prime Minister of Canada. Possibly the following resolution which was sent to the President of the United States will convey some idea of the conditions which now exist in the Ukraine:

> Whereas, the population of the Ukraine, the richest and most fertile agricultural section of Russia, commonly known as "the granary of Europe" now part of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, is at the present moment in the throes of famine, many persons died and many are dying on account of the lack of food; and,
> Whereas, the present condition of famine and starvation in the Ukraine has been brought about by systematic and ruthless collection of all grains and foodstuffs by the Russian Soviet government from the Ukrainian people and by using same for export and military purposes; and,
>
> Whereas, the Russian Soviet government officially denies all reports of famine and starvation in the Ukraine, and denies to the civilized world the right to assist these starving people; and,
>
> Whereas, Ukrainians in the United States are continuously receiving letters from their relatives in the Soviet Ukraine reporting deaths, disease, sickness and privation from lack of food; and,
>
> Whereas, great newspapers of the world have substantiated these private reports in so far as their correspondents have been permitted to do so; and,
>
> Whereas, requisitions of all grain in the Ukraine by the Soviet government is still going on, regardless of the fact that thousands are starving in this district for the want of food; and,
>
> Whereas, in view of the above facts it appears that the Russian Soviet government is deliberately trying to wipe out the masses of the Ukrainian people.
> Now therefore be it resolved:

I shall not read all that follows because it is too long. It gives the number of people at the meeting, and the place at which it was held, and concludes as follows:

> We protest in strongest terms against the action of the soviet government in removing the grain and foodstuffs from the Ukrainian provinces so as to leave the inhabitants in such provinces in a starving and helpless condition, and we appeal to the public opinion of the civilized world in the hope that they will protest and force the soviet government to cease this ruthless policy of starving the people of the Ukraine.

The chairman of this mass meeting was a man by the name of Petrowsky, but the chairman of a similar meeting held in Boston was a man by the name of Sullivan, an Irishman. I have also in my possession a letter written to Nation's Business, Washington, in December, 1933, by Mr. Witting Williams. I do not intend to read that letter at any great length, but I shall refer to a few of the remarks which he has made in regard to the famine over there. He says:

> Famine, last winter and spring, caused fully 5,000,000 deaths!
> 1. Though unbelievable here, this situation is no longer news in Europe.
> 2. Practically all foreign-born but resident observers put the figure higher than the 5,000,000 victims of "Hungary '21." This hunger has been more widespread. It has also not been lessened by '21's $70,000,000 of American relief. (Party members—3,000,000—last autumn denied the situation and frowned upon helping the starving.)
>
> 3. Amongst themselves upper-class Russians are reported to discuss whether the dead have totalled 15,000,000 or only 10,000,000! Nobody can know: Doctors (all government-employed) dare report death only as due to "Weak Heart" or "Exposure." Big increase in death-rate—also in number of tuberculous young—remains unexplained.
> 4. Moscow correspondents last August were denied access to the district I was visiting. One well known correspondent pooh-poohed all hunger rumours, but now confidentially admits "five million."
> 5. Two other reasons for America's ignorance of conditions are: (a) Army control has lately made censorship both stricter and dumber; (b) "We residents didn't know why Yalta was suddenly, one morning, empty of all beggars and starving—until, about 11 o'clock, we saw hundreds of foreign tourists!"
> 6. I personally saw children and grown-ups dying of starvation.

I do not intend to read any more.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Did he state some moments ago that a meeting was held in Russia or in Boston?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: In Boston there was one mass meeting and another in St. Louis. The chairman of the meeting in St. Louis was a man by the name of Petrowsky.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I thought the hon. gentleman said that one of the meetings was held in Russia.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: No. Many protest mass meetings were held in the United States against what was taking place in Russia.

I might be asked how I know all these things. I might be asked to substantiate the numbers who have died of hunger in Russia. It would be impossible for me to do so. All that I can say is that I have read dozens of letters coming to Canada from relatives in Russia, and some spoke of cannibalism and others of the population of whole villages being decimated. I have some of these letters with me now but for lack of time I do not intend to read them.

Suffice it to say that agriculture is in a very bad way in Russia at the present time. In Europe Cardinal Innitzer of Vienna has sent out an appeal to the Roman Catholic world, especially in Europe, for help for these suffering millions. Appeals have also been sent from France and other countries in Europe. Mr. Mowinkel, the president of the league council, has tried to put this matter on the agenda of the League of Nations, but without success. There were too many axes to grind, too many impending non-aggression pacts, and so finally he handed the whole matter over to the International Red Cross. Dr. Ammende, the secretary or president of the Minorities Association, also sent out an appeal to the civilized world. Even Leon Trotsky, the former leader of the bolshevik party, said in a recent article:

> The agricultural policy in Russia is leading to bankruptcy.

Hon. gentlemen may ask what has all this to do with the resolution before us? I only bring the matter up because it has already been brought up on the floor of the house to-day. I bring it up because if any such thing should happen to agriculture in Canada I would be the first to dissociate myself from any form of cooperation that would result in anything happening in this country such as happened in Russia during the past year.

Walter Duranty, in a book called Tragedies of Russia, says that many former admirers of the policies in Russia who have been over there have now come back to this continent and in sullen silence have refused to answer any questions. Why? Because, as Duranty has said, no one who has not seen the reality would believe the report, and that the power of the dream will be greater than any truth.

The United Farmers of Alberta have always stood firm on the principle of equal rights for all and special privileges to none. It is my duty as a farmer member to sit in eternal vigilance in behalf of the farmer interests of the people who sent me here, and certainly any attempt to fetter the farmer such as is evidently taking place in Russia to-day would meet with my most vigorous condemnation and disapproval. No system of planning that would relegate farming to a position of inferiority should be tolerated. It would be hard to imagine the industrial east sending soldiers and tax collectors to the agricultural west as is now being done in Russia, and get away with it. Yet there are many in Canada to-day who say that an exorbitant toll is continually flowing from the prairies to St. James street. The economic structure of Canada is being destroyed at its mainspring notwithstanding what has been said in regard to Russia. So unbalanced and lopsided has it become that the outworn, rickety affair may topple over at any time, with the farmer, incidentally, at the bottom of the heap. And when a basic industry like agriculture fails it is bound to affect adversely all the other industries in Canada.

In my opinion no plan can succeed unless it accepts the principle of equalization of industrial opportunity as the guiding principle, and supplants the present pursuit of economic reward with the ideal of service as a motivating force; and no new social system can succeed unless the various elements are brought into systematic and harmonious working order for the common good. I believe that agriculture is in need of economic planning possibly more than any other industry. As a primary producer and ultimate consumer, the farmer gets hit both ways. Look at the great discrepancy between the price the farmer gets for his products and what he has to pay for other goods and services. Industrial equality and efficiency are thus essential to his best interests; and furthermore all inefficiency or waste that goes on in distribution reacts to his detriment, either as a producer or as a consumer.

I have spoken of cooperation as a third distinct orientation both in and outside of this house. As an essential working principle in helping the farmer to solve his difficulties it manifests itself in three ways—cooperative selling, cooperative buying and cooperative credit. Naturally the farmer must sell somewhat above the costs of production to make farming pay; since the price at which the farmer can afford to sell is determined by production costs, the intelligent buying of the goods and services that make up those costs is the second important problem; and the necessity for getting credit as cheaply as possible to facilitate selling and buying constitutes the third major factor.

The proper relation of prices will need special attention as it is not so much a problem of how much a farmer gets for his wheat as how much he can purchase when he gets it; that is, keeping the purchasing power of the agricultural dollar on a par with the dollar of other industries in order to bring about an equitable basis of exchange.

This, sir, is the problem of the farmer. It will require economic planning and radical monetary changes, and to this end it is desirable that the present system should be superseded by one based on the principle of cooperative production and distribution in which human needs should be the first consideration.

[Mr. Luchkovich.]

On motion of Mr. Morand the debate was adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. GUTHRIE moved the adjournment of the house.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What will be the business to-morrow?

Mr. GUTHRIE: To-morrow will be a government day and we propose to take up supply. We shall take the departments in the following order: Trade and Commerce; Marine; Agriculture and Justice, and if there is any time left, government orders. The first will be the bill respecting the Precious Metals and Marking Act; then the bill to amend the Importation of Intoxicating Liquors Act; and Bill number 4, respecting the Bureau for Translations.

Motion agreed to, and the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Tuesday, February 6, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

POWERS OF COMMITTEES

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the select standing committees of this house shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the house and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY AND WAYS AND MEANS BEFORE ADDRESS AGREED TO

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Before the orders of the day are called I desire to raise a point of order. It is in reference to the construction to be placed upon standing order No. 57 of this house. The order is as follows:

The house shall appoint the committees of supply, and ways and means, at the commencement of every session, so soon as an address has been agreed to in answer to His Excellency's speech.

On Friday evening last the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) gave what he stated was the government's interpretation of the meaning of that order, which was to the effect that the committee of supply and the committee of ways and means must be appointed immediately after the conclusion of the debate on the address, but that there was nothing in the order which precluded the committees being set up before the address had been agreed to. The Prime Minister was careful to say that he would not say that the contention of the government was right, and you, Mr. Speaker, have not as yet been asked to rule on the matter. I am bringing up the matter at this moment, not for the purpose of in any way delaying procedure or of embarrassing the government, but rather to avoid both those possibilities. I have thought it better to raise the question before the government itself makes any formal motion to go into supply.

Last night the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) who was the acting leader of the house, mentioned that it was the intention of the government to move to go into supply to-day. I have thought it advisable, in order that the matter may be discussed in a wholly dispassionate manner, as a matter of procedure which really concerns members on all sides of the house, and in no sense a party issue to raise the question in the form in which I am raising it at the moment.

It is obvious, from the reading of the rule of this house, that it is copied literatim et verbatim from the rule of the House of Commons at Westminster. There are two words which appear in the order at Westminster that do not appear in our order, the words "in future," but they in no way affect its purpose. The order of the British house is standing order No. 14, it reads as follows:

This house will, in future, appoint the committees of supply and ways and means at the commencement of every session, so soon as an address has been agreed to, in answer to His Majesty's speech.

The interpretation to be placed upon the order by the British house is best given by the leading constitutional authorities on procedure in the commons, and on the law and custom of the constitution. I shall therefore quote from three or four of the most eminent authorities. It will be apparent, once the quotations are given, that there is no longer room for doubt as to what the intention of the order is.

May's Parliamentary Practice at page 520 of the 13th edition, published in 1924, has the following:

> The action taken by the House of Commons upon the demand of aid and supply for the public service made by the speech from the throne, is the appointment, pursuant to standing order No. 14, of those committees of the whole house, which are known as the committee of supply and the committee of ways and means. Motions setting up these committees are made immediately after the house agrees to the address in answer to the speech from the throne, and are put forthwith from the chair, no debate being permitted thereon.

Hon. members will observe that the wording is not that they "may be" or "must be" established but that they "are" established immediately after the house agrees to the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Anson's Law of the Constitution, volume I, fifth edition, 1922, page 286, states:

> The speech from the throne always contains a demand from the crown for supply, and as soon as the House of Commons has agreed upon an address in reply to the speech, it has for many years passed two resolutions—one that on a certain day it will resolve itself into committee of supply; another that on a certain day it will resolve itself into committee of ways and means.

Here we have a positive statement of the customary method of procedure. I submit it is custom that governs in matters of this kind.

I refer next to Redlich's Procedure of the House of Commons, 1907, volume 3, page 133:

> In response to the speech from the throne the commons, as soon as they have voted the address in reply, appoint the two great committees before which the whole finance of the year has to be discussed—the committee of supply and the committee of ways and means.

That is very specific language; as soon as they have voted the address in reply they appoint the committees. It is, I think, conclusive in its wording and meaning.

One further authority I should like to quote is Campion. In his Introduction to the Procedure of the House of Commons, first edition, 1929, page 235, this writer says:

> The committee of supply is "set up" immediately after the conclusion of the debate on the address in answer to the king's speech by resolution in the following form:
>
> "Resolved, that this house will, to-morrow, resolve itself into a committee to consider of the supply to be granted to His Majesty."
> The committee of ways and means is similarly set up at the same time.

The authorities I have quoted Mr. Speaker, are authorities we are continually quoting in this house, and are recognized as eminent authorities. I admit at once there have been occasions in the British house when other matters have been taken up before the debate on the address was concluded, but always where such has been the case they have been in the nature of exceptions; they have been matters of some special significance at the moment, questions which for some special reason required to be dealt with at the time they were, and as to which the results might have been unfortunate had there been delay. What I am afraid of is that in this house we may be changing a custom by the exceptions we are making, that the government is not viewing the proposed course so much as an exception as it is seeking to make what has been an exception in the last session or two a custom which will govern in the future.

This matter is of importance, not only does it affect this house at this session, but the decision that will be given by His Honour the Speaker undoubtedly will be cited with reference to procedure in future years. Undoubtedly the rules are amongst other things for the purpose of protecting the rights of hon. members of the house.

With regard to the interpretation put upon the order by the Prime Minister, I submit that there is no necessity for a rule at all to ensure what the Prime Minister has said is the purpose to be served. The government is all powerful; its rights do not need to be secured by a special rule as to the time within which committees must be appointed. Except where there is a rule to the contrary, it has the power to select its own time. But the minority in the house has in many particulars to be protected in its rights, especially at a time when for obvious reasons the government is finding it more and more necessary to take to itself as much right of way as may be possible for the prosecution of public business. The fact that the government is taking more and more of the time of the house for the government's own program, makes it more necessary for the opposition, regardless of what party may be in opposition, to see that the few rights that remain to hon. members to discuss generally the questions that are of great concern to them are preserved as far as may be possible. The interpretation that is being put upon this rule, especially when considered in relation to what is now being proposed, namely, that before the debate on the address is concluded, the house should resolve itself into a committee of supply to appropriate public moneys, makes the matter one which I think should be settled immediately and that in accordance with what I have shown to be the prevailing custom in the British House of Commons.

The point I wish to make is this, that even if we admit for a moment that the rule is to be interpreted so as to give the government the right to set up these committees immediately, it does not necessarily follow that because the committees are set up, the house should proceed to go into committee of supply or committee of ways and means before the debate on the address is concluded. Indeed Redlich, whom the Prime Minister cites frequently as an authority, is quite positive in his statement on that point. Volume I, page 41, of Redlich's Procedure of the House of Commons, contains the following:

> It is already a fixed custom that the Queen's speech is to be answered by an address which takes the first place in the deliberations of the house.

That is the point I desire to stress particularly at the moment. I believe it was to ensure that the address would take first place in the deliberations of the house that rule 20 was enacted, and where the rule is followed as interpreted by the authorities I have quoted it is pretty obvious that the debate on the address will take first place in our deliberations.

To show how important it is that the customary practice should be maintained may I direct attention to what would happen in the natural order of things if the opposition were considering a motion of want of confidence in the government on going into supply, and there was no other motion before the house. The opposition might wish to move that the motion to go into supply be amended by striking out all the words after the word "that" in the customary motion and substituting therefor the words "the government does not enjoy the confidence of the house." That might delay indefinitely both supply and the completion of the debate on the address. That would be a very natural motion to make at any time of going into supply. But assume that such an amendment were to be moved this afternoon to a motion that the house resolve itself into committee of supply, what would be our position? Already there is before the house a motion to the effect that the address should be amended by directing the attention of His Excellency to the fact that the government does not enjoy the confidence of the country. It is quite true that that amendment though it refers to the country is similar in meaning to the amendment I have suggested which would refer to the house. Both are in the nature of want of confidence motions. I submit that before the debate on the want of confidence motion now before us is concluded, we should not run the risk of entering upon another debate which would certainly arise out of a want of confidence amendment being moved to any motion by the government to resolve the house into a committee of supply. I think, I have only to cite this possibility to make perfectly clear how obvious it is that rule 20 was intended to ensure the completion of the debate on the address before the house should go on with the discussion of any other question.

Of course there is the further fact that the first few days of the session are supposed to be devoted as well to getting the routine business under way and the machinery of business properly established. It always has been the practice, while the debate on the address was proceeding, to have different committees named, to have bills introduced, and to deal with other matters of routine, but not to proceed in discussion with matters of a substantial character until the debate on the address was concluded. May I ask if it is not something more than an anomally for the Commons to be asked to vote supply to His Majesty so long as there remains before the house as an order of business and of current discussion the question as to whether or not the government enjoys the confidence of the house or of the country?

Having submitted the matter in this form, I hope the Prime Minister will not to-day press his motion for going into supply, when the item is reached upon the orders of the day, but will allow the matter if need be to be further carefully considered between members of all parties in the house, so that the best procedure may be followed and the rights of all hon. members protected not only at this session but for subsequent sessions as well.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, just a word in reply to some of the observations of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). In the first place, if he will read the rule which applies to this House of Commons, known as standing order 57, he will find the following:

> The house shall appoint the committee of supply and ways and means at the commencement of every session, so soon as an address has been agreed to, in answer to His Excellency's speech.

That, I assume, means that there is a limitation in regard to the time in which we shall appoint these committees. We shall not delay appointment of these important committees. The conclusion of the address in reply to His Excellency's speech shall be the limit of time for the house to appoint these committees. There is no rule of the house, so far as I know, which precludes an earlier appointment of these committees, if the house sees fit to do so. We are all aware that upon the opening day of each session of this House of Commons, for the express purpose of preserving the right of parliament to deal with other subjects prior to our consideration of the address of His Excellency, a formal bill is introduced respecting oaths of office. There is no reason for the introduction of such a bill apart from the single purpose of preserving the right of parliament to deal with such other business as it may see fit before taking into consideration the speech of His Excellency the Governor General.

I submit that any business can be taken up. Conditions may arise which render it very necessary to discuss some emergent condition, but there is no limitation to the right of the house to deal with any subject. Any business which might later come before the House of Commons can be taken up in priority to the speech from the throne if the house so determines. The citation from Redlich cited by the leader of the opposition is merely to the effect that the address in reply to His Excellency's speech shall be the first order of proceedings. At the opening of this session we did constitute it the very first order, and there it remains upon the order paper. In this practice we are following the course which is invariably adopted in England. After the mover and seconder have made their speeches and, as a rule, after the leaders of the various parties have replied, very often there occurs an adjournment of the debate and other business is permitted to intervene.

May, which I have had an opportunity of examining only for a moment sets out at page 173:

> When the royal speech has been read, an address in answer thereto is moved in both houses. Two members in each house are selected by the administration for moving and seconding the address and they appear in their places in levee dress for that purpose. The form of the address used to be an answer, paragraph by paragraph, to the speech. In both lords and commons since the commencement of session 1890-91, the answer to the royal speech has been moved in the form of a single resolution, expressing their thanks to the Sovereign for the most gracious speech addressed to both houses of parliament, and amendments to the address are moved by way of addition thereto. The transaction of public business is carried on whilst the proceedings on the address are in progress, bills being introduced and committees appointed. In session 1884, debate on the address was postponed from day to day, whilst a motion of censure on the government, regarding events in the Soudan, was under consideration, and in session 1922 whilst two bills presented by the government together with the financial resolution necessary for one of them were passed through all their stages.

There is no limitation expressed by May as to the nature of business which may be taken up. It is important for the prompt dispatch of business in this house that the committees in question should be established as early as possible; it is important to facilitate the transaction of business that the estimates be opened on a Tuesday, because we know that under the rules of the house unless the various departments are first discussed on a Tuesday they cannot subsequently be taken up on a Thursday or Friday. So that for the prompt dispatch of business in the house the present motion is very necessary. The motion that the house go into committee of supply on this Tuesday will enable us to discuss supply on Thursday and Friday. Unless there is a positive prohibition in some rule of this house or an established custom in the British House of Commons binding upon this house I submit we are at liberty to take up any item of business which the house may deem proper, pending our subsequent consideration of the speech of His Excellency. Therefore I take it that the point of order is not well taken, and that the house is at liberty to proceed at this time with business as it sees fit.

I do not quite agree with my right hon. friend in the statement he has first made concerning the rules of parliament. He has stated that the rules are for the purpose of protecting the rights of hon. members in the house. That may be one effect of them, but my submission is that the rules are expressly framed to facilitate public business in this chamber, and to achieve this purpose, the rules should not receive a narrow or limited construction. Rule 57, as now framed, is in its effect a mandatory order upon the House of Commons not to delay the setting up of the committees of ways and means and of supply later than the conclusion of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. But there is nothing of a prohibitory nature in this rule. There is no limitation as to what business shall be taken up or what shall not be taken up, and we know that by immemorial usage we are at liberty to take up such business as the house deems proper.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I submit that the motion to go into supply at this stage should not be entertained. Indeed, to move such a motion at the present time is, in my view, treating the house with scant courtesy. I do not agree with my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) as to the manner in which the debate on the address should be conducted and has been conducted in this House of Commons and in the British parliament. The debate in question is one of the two important debates of the session. Members of parliament after a long adjournment come from their respective constituencies and have a right to say what public opinion is in their respective sections of the country. They have the right to present to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house the views on various public questions of the people they represent, and it has always been the custom and practice to let this debate go on before taking up other public matters.

First I shall quote from Bourinot, Fourth edition, page 95 as to the practice in Canada:

It is not usual in the Canadian houses to discuss any important matter of public policy before considering the speech. In 1901, an address was passed to His Majesty King Edward, expressive of the national grief on the demise of Queen Victoria, and of the continued attachment of the dominion to His Majesty's person and government, before the address in answer to the speech was taken up. In 1878, Mr. Barthe introduced a bill in reference to insolvency, but withdrew it in deference to the wishes of the house until the address was adopted. While bills are formally introduced and advanced a stage, the house generally consents to postpone notices of motion until after the disposal of the address. Of course, the public interests may at some time demand that the house should act otherwise, and—as it is undoubtedly its constitutional right—take up immediately a question of public importance and deal with it. It is usual in the British commons to ask questions, move addresses or orders for papers, present petitions and introduce as well as discuss public bills before the address has been adopted. In the session of 1884 "debate on the address was adjourned from day to day while a motion of censure on the government regarding 'events in the Soudan' was under consideration."

But that was an exception, and at the bottom of the page, 96, Bourinot says:

In 1889 Mr. Abbott introduced in the Senate three government bills mentioned in the speech, before the address in answer thereto was considered. Objection was taken to this departure from the ordinary course of procedure. The bills were placed on the order paper for consideration subsequent to the address. In the following session the usual procedure was resumed.

If hon. gentlemen will look at the following pages, 98, and 99, they will see the interpretation that Bourinot gives to rule 57 as to the appointment of the committee of supply. After referring to the adoption of the address he says:

The next proceeding will be to move immediately that the house resolve itself at some future day into committees of supply and of ways and means. It is also usual to move at this stage of the proceedings the appointment of a chairman of committees when such appointment has to be made at the beginning of a new parliament or in the case of a vacancy in such office.

The same thing is done in the British House of Commons. I shall quote briefly from Todd's Parliamentary Government in England, Volume 2, page 366. He says:

Pending the agreement of the house to the address questions may be put to ministers, and addresses passed for the production of papers.

You see how it is limited. It goes on:

But it is usual to defer the presentation of papers asked for and to postpone a formal reply to an ordinary address, until the answer of the crown to this address has been reported.

Last year the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) said that he did not want to follow the practice in this house but wanted to adopt the British practice. Nobody said a word. I thought that possibly during the last few years a new practice had been introduced in the British House of Commons, but I took the trouble this morning to go to the parliamentary library and look into the debates of the British House of Commons.

In 1928 the address was moved on November 6 and was immediately taken up, debated again on November 7, November 8 and November 9, and then it was adjourned from Friday the 9th to Monday the 12th, when it was again taken up, and again on November 13, again on November 14 and concluded on that day—seven days altogether.

I also found that a number of members varying from ten to fifteen spoke during the debate each day. As hon. gentlemen know, there is no eleven o'clock rule in the British House of Commons, and a considerable number of members speak during those debates.

In 1929 the address started on July 2, was taken up again on July 3, July 4, July 5, adjourned from Friday to Monday, July 8, when it was again taken up, again on July 9 and July 10, when it was concluded.

In 1930 the address was moved and discussed on October 28, taken up again on October 29, October 30, October 31, adjourned from Friday to Monday, November 3, taken up on that day and again on November 4, when it was concluded.

In 1931 the address was moved and discussed on November 10, taken up again on November 11, November 12, November 13, adjourned from Friday to Monday, and concluded on that day.

In 1932 the address was moved on November 22, discussed again on November 23, November 24, November 25, adjourned from Friday to Monday, November 28, and disposed of on that day.

In the present session, 1933, there was an exception for one day. The address was moved and discussed on November 21, and then it was decided that on the following day the house would discuss constitutional reform in India, which was a burning question which the house wanted to discuss immediately, but that occupied only one day and the address was taken up again on November 23, November 24, adjourned from Friday to Monday, November 27, taken up again on that day, and again on November 28, when it was disposed of.

Mr. GUTHRIE: May I ask my hon. friend if on those days he has enumerated in those years there was no intervening business taken up?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Except questions at the beginning of the sitting, as is done here; but there was no discussion of any matter. I have been careful to look into these debates personally.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that that is the sensible way of proceeding. As to the interpretation of rule 57, of course, I believe that it is clear, and that it means that the committee should not be appointed until the address is disposed of. That is the way I read it, and, Mr. Speaker, it is the way everybody has read it until a couple of days ago. That is the way in which it has been interpreted in past years at all times. Even my right hon. friend himself in the session of 1932, which met on October 6 because of the agreements at the Ottawa conference, introduced a motion to give precedence to government measures in order that those trade agreements should be approved as the first business to be taken by the house, even before the address was adopted. The address was voted on November 7, more than one month after the opening of the house. But did the right hon. gentleman move to appoint a committee of supply before the address was voted? No. The government then interpreted the rule as we interpret it to-day, and it was only on November 7, after the house had voted the address, that the committee of supply was appointed.

Another way of showing what has always been the interpretation is to look at the preceding rule, standing order 56, which says:

> A chairman of committees who shall also be deputy speaker of the house shall be elected at the commencement of every parliament, as soon as an address has been agreed to in answer to His Excellency's speech.

I appeal to every member of this house whether they do not all remember that in the first session of every parliament, when a deputy speaker has to be appointed, whether the house did not wait until the address was voted and agreed to before the appointment was made.

The best way to interpret this rule surely is to show what were the intentions of those who drafted it. The rule has been accepted and interpreted by all those who have acted upon it since it existed. Apart from that, what is the position to-day? My right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) has alluded to it. There is a motion of want of confidence in the government and shall we go into committee of supply and vote money to a government that is actually defending its right to exist?

Mr. SPOTTON: Oh, oh.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have no doubt of the way in which the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton) will vote upon this matter but he will not represent the views of the majority of his electors, and he knows it.

Whatever it may be, there is a motion before the chair of want of confidence in the government. The house should not be asked to vote supply at the present time. As my right hon. leader has said, we all have rights in this house. For the time being the Prime Minister is first but we all represent the people of Canada. We have constituents to speak for in this house, we have rights and privileges and I believe that the wishes of the house and even the convenience of the members should be considered by the Prime Minister in this matter.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if it were not for the somewhat rhetorical observations which the hon. gentleman who has just taken his place (Mr. Lapointe) made at the close of his remarks, it would perhaps not be necessary to rise at all. The rules of this house are made by the house and no one else. They are prepared by a committee of the house and submitted to the house for its approval. Therefore, they are not the rules of a government or an opposition, they are the rules that the members comprising parliament have thought desirable to enact. For what purpose? For the purpose of governing their proceedings; not for minorities or majorities, but for the orderly conduct of the business of the House of Commons. That is what the rules are for. It must be remembered that the rules of this house are not identical with the rules of the British House of Commons. They differ in many particulars. I shall point out presently one particular in which they differ and which has brought about the present discussion.

It will be recalled that at the first session at which this government assumed office we were desirous of expediting the business of the House of Commons. I suggested to the leader of the opposition that we should proceed with the address on Friday but he thought it undesirable that we should depart from the practice or custom. Therefore, we waited until Monday when the mover and seconder of the address made their speeches. In Great Britain this is not the rule. I shall take last year as an example. The British House of Commons was opened on November 21, 1933, as reported in the fifth series, volume 283. The house met at twelve of the clock, Mr. Speaker in the chair. The sessional orders were then debated, some questions were asked with respect to certain matters, written answers were given and then the King's speech was proceeded with, as reported on page seven. The Speaker indicated that a copy of the speech had been obtained and the debate on the address proceeded. The King had delivered his speech that day. Mr. Cross moved the motion that afternoon and concluded his speech, as did the seconder of the motion. Sir Herbert Samuel and the leader of the government, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, concluded their speeches and the debate was continued into the evening. The motion to adjourn the debate was made by Mr. Edwards, and it was agreed that the debate should be adjourned until the morrow. Then followed the motion, "that this house do now adjourn," and the house was adjourned at twenty-one minutes before eight o'clock on the day upon which the King had delivered his speech. We do not do business here quite so expeditiously. The leaders of the parties and the mover and seconder of the address do not dispose of their speeches by twenty-one minutes before eight o'clock of the day upon which the speech from the throne is delivered. But on succeeding days the question as to when the debate shall be resumed is determined in one of two ways. If no motion is made that it shall have precedence, it takes its place upon the order paper under the appropriate heading.

In days gone by it has been the custom in this chamber to give precedence to this debate. The right hon. gentleman when in power used to move a motion, as will be seen in the journals of the house, that the debate do have precedence and thereupon it had precedence over all other business and was proceeded with until it was ended. I intimated last year—this is where my friend the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) apparently has misunderstood—that it would take its place upon the order paper under the appropriate heading. This was done last year, the year before and in 1930. It was also done this year when the leader of the opposition asked me whether or not I was going to ask this chamber, which has control of its own proceedings, to give precedence to the debate or leave it to take its place upon the order paper. I told him I proposed to leave it to take its place upon the order paper in accordance with the rules of the house. In other words, I declined to depart from the rules and to-day the address in reply to the speech from the throne occupies a place upon the order paper which is its appropriate place according to the rules. The right hon. gentleman was quite right in asking me whether I proposed to ask the house to change the rules, but I said no, that I proposed to leave the rules to their operation, just as they do in England. Every day this house has been in session, if other business had been disposed of it could have taken up the debate on the speech from the throne when it was reached under its appropriate heading.

I did not change the order of business. Why should we? What are rules for? Why does the right hon. gentleman want us to change the rules? Why does the former Minister of Justice ask that this house should change its rules? We have left the rules as they are and have declined to alter them and give precedence to this debate. The hon. gentlemen who formulated these rules did not so provide and only this House of Commons by motion made can change the rules covering the hearing of this debate. If it so desires, this house can say that this debate shall have precedence over all other business and if it has precedence over all other business, it has precedence over this business because this chamber, like any deliberative assembly, has said that we shall now go on with this business first and take something else second. But there is an absence of any such motion. I presented no such motion; I said: We do not intend to do so. That being so, it just goes on in the even tenor of its way as it does in England, taking its place under the appropriate heading and being called when other matters have been disposed of. The business of the house proceeds in the orderly fashion which parliament has fixed.

I ask this chamber and I ask every hon. member of it who wants to be fair: Why all this discussion when we have done nothing but cling to the rules which were made? The complaint is that we have not departed from them and that I have not moved to give this matter precedence. But I followed the English custom. I have in my hand the opening Hansards for the last four years. When the former Minister of Justice said that this debate had taken precedence he surely could not have read these as carefully as he usually does. The fact is that this debate did not take precedence. It took its place under the appropriate heading.

Now, all you have to do is to turn to the records of the British House of Commons for November 23, 1932, which was the day after the house had opened. The house met at a quarter to three in the afternoon, Mr. Speaker in the chair, and we find this order of business: Private legislation; Procedure (Scotland) Act of 1899, Sir George Collins; Expiring Laws Continuance Bill, one of the most important bills, moved by Mr. Hore-Belisha, one of the Under-Secretaries, Bill No. 1; Mr. Speaker ordered that the ballot should take place in Room No. 10; business of the house; amendments on going into committee of supply.

There is a motion passed before the debate was considered, that no notices of amendments on going into committee of supply be given until the first Thursday after the adjournment of the House of Commons.

Then we find: The Prime Minister, London Passenger Transport Bill, perhaps the most important of all public bills that have to be considered; ordered, that the proceedings of the London Passenger Transport Bill be resumed—Bill No. 2, fixed for Monday next.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear. All these important bills are on the same page.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman must not think that he can escape his own challenge in that way. He has demanded that we follow the English custom. That custom we are following, and now he says that these bills are all on one page. Just imagine such an argument—that certain business is all indicated on one page. Then the debate was resumed, Mr. Churchill continuing the discussion.

Then we come to the next day, the 24th. What happened on the 24th? We find: Questions, just as we have them here, the proper order of business; the debate stood where it was. Then we find mentioned the Lord Mayor's procession: Prisoner's Release; Tote Clubs. Then the Chancellor of the Exchequer answered some questions, and we find further enumerated the Education of Injured Scholars, then a long number of oral and written questions, and then we come to the London Passenger Transport Bill and questions with respect thereto; written answers taking several pages; and just as the other day, under the appropriate heading following questions, came the debate, under the order of business for that day in the British house followed the debate on the address—that is, the 24th.

Turn next to the 25th and you find on that day, at page 364 of the official report for November 25, 1932, bills presented: Dog Racing; Local Option Bill; Hours of Employment (Limitation) Bill; Parliament Act Amendment Bill, one of the most important measures; Workmen's Compensation Bill; Imported Foodstuffs (Marking) Bill; Home and Empire Settlement Bill; Summary Jurisdiction (Appeals) Bill; Municipal Corporations Audit Bill; Shops Acts Amendment Bill; Solicitors (Scotland) Bill; Hotels and Restaurants Bill; Seditious and Blasphemous Teaching of Children Bill; Local Elections (Proportional Representation) Bill; Exportation of Horses Bill; Trout (Scotland) Bill; Miners (Pensions) Bill; False Oaths (Scotland) Bill; Wheat Act (1932) Amendment Bill; Coal Mines (Minimum Wage) Act (1912) Amendment Bill; Slaughter of Animals Bill. Then followed, as here, under the appropriate order, questions for the day, and then was resumed the address, an amendment being proposed by Mr. Atlee with respect to the economic situation.

Then followed, on the 28th day of November, the house having adjourned over the weekend, something which I desire to point out as being of very considerable importance. Questions were on the order paper—Private Business, Oral Answers to Questions. Then followed certain questions oral and written, and then the King's speech and the resumption of the address with respect thereto. That is that year. But I will point out in one moment that in another year something far more important took place. Mr. Baldwin, as Lord President of the Privy Council, moved a motion which involved a very serious debate in which a division was taken resulting in the government being sustained in the views it put forth. I think it important to turn that up in order that the house may have the record complete, and to show that what we have done has been to follow the course exactly as laid down in the British House of Commons.

You will find, for example, in 1931, certain bills introduced, including as a matter of fact the Westminster Act—introduced by the Secretary of State for the Dominions while the debate was pending. Under bills presented we find the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Bill, and then questions with regard to the Royal Navy (Discharges), National Savings Certificates, and matters of that character.

Mr. NEILL: Is there any record, amongst those to which the Prime Minister has been referring, of the British house going into supply before the adoption of the address?

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will wait until I have reached that. I want to demolish one thing at a time; I have now demolished entirely the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite, but I desire to point out one other matter, namely, a motion made by Mr. Baldwin prior to the house continuing the debate; I wish to show the division that took place with respect thereto before the debate was continued. At page 105 of the debates for 1931 we find, while the debate was still pending, that Bill No. 5, the Indian Pay (Temporary Abatements) Bill was introduced on that day before the debate was continued; and under private business we find a bill with respect to Edinburgh Corporation; the Kilmarnock Gas Provisional Order Bill, which was disposed of, and afterwards Mr. Baldwin, Lord President of the Council, rose in his place and moved:

That until the adjournment of the house for Christmas, government business do have precedence at every sitting, that no bills other than government bills be introduced, and that no ballot be taken for determining the precedence of such bills.

That brought about a discussion in which Mr. Lansbury stated his view; Mr. Tinker spoke; Lieutenant-Colonel Moore, Mr. Maxton, and others. The house divided, the ayes being 378 and the noes 9. At page 118 we find a further motion was made by Mr. Baldwin:

That no notice of amendment on going into committee of supply be given until after the adjournment of the house for Christmas.

That was carried without division. We find on page 119 that the debate was resumed, Mr. Gwilym Lloyd George having made certain proposals with respect to it.

Now that proves conclusively that we are following the course that has been followed in the British House of Commons, namely, taking up the debate in reply to the speech from the throne when it has been reached under its appropriate heading, not before and not after; because we have declined to make a motion to give it precedence over every other business. In other words, it takes its place on the order paper. That disposes of that point.

We now come to the second point, with respect to the setting up of the committee of supply. I said to the right hon. gentleman the other evening that as no objection had been taken to setting up the committee of supply and the committee of ways and means the Minister of Finance moved that these two committees be set up. No objection was taken by any member of this house to that being done. The right hon. gentleman the other evening said that possibly the opposition had overlooked doing so. I told him that we had considered the matter before making the motion. I at once admitted that it is open to argument as to whether or not that committee could be set up before we had passed the address. I shall come presently to the reasons why in this house I think it should be done. I said a moment ago that there is a distinction between the rules in the British house and those in our own in some minor particulars; the broad principle being, of course, that this house makes its own rules having regard to its own peculiar conditions. It will be within the memory of members of this house that Wednesday is a private members' day, it is a short day; Monday is a private members' day, a long day; Thursday is a private members' day for the first month. We have a rule, recently adopted, that when the house goes into supply on Thursday and Friday no motion is made; without motion the Speaker leaves the chair automatically on supply being called at the table. But there is one thing to be remembered; that cannot happen until such time as there has been opportunity for the house to discuss the broad question involved in the Speaker leaving the chair in order that consideration might be given to the items of any particular department. In other words when the Speaker automatically leaves the chair on supply being called on Thursday or Friday the house in committee cannot consider the items of any department that have not been previously considered, so that opportunity may be given for a motion of censure, if desired, against the minister and his administration of that department. Now as Thursday for the first month is a private members' day it follows that when private members' business is disposed of the Speaker leaves the chair on supply being called. But as it can only be with respect to departments that have not previously had items not passed, but considered, it follows that there must have been opportunity on motion made for the house to go into committee of supply to enable supply to be discussed.

The only day remaining for the first month is Tuesday. That is the reason for this motion, that is the distinction between the British rules and ours. In this house Tuesday is the only day remaining for the first month, if the business of the house is proceeded with as usual; that is, if private members take up all the sittings on Monday and on Wednesday, on Friday the Speaker can only leave the chair if there has been an antecedent discussion in committee of the items in supply that have to be dealt with by the committee. Unless on Tuesday the motion is made for the Speaker to leave the chair, while the house can go into supply on Friday, it cannot discuss any item because there has been no motion to have him leave the chair. There is no such rule as that in England. This is to meet this country's convenience, the purpose for which all rules are made. But I said to the right hon. gentleman and to this house, we do not ask this committee to pass a single item of supply, we only ask one thing, namely that there should be a formal going into committee of supply in order that an item may be called, as I said, in Finance, in Justice, or in Public Works; not passing them, but considering them, however trifling may be the item, in order that when Thursday and Friday come this house can go on with its business of supply with respect to the various items of the departments I have named that have to be dealt with. Is business to be expedited by the rules or retarded? Are the rules for the house or is the house for the rules? Were the rules made by the house or was the house by the rules? The rules were made by this chamber; and the rule making Tuesday the only day during the first month in which this matter can be dealt with is the reason for dealing with it as we have.

I will not repeat the argument that has been made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) as to the construction to be placed upon the rule. I said frankly the other night that that rule is open to the construction urged by the right hon. gentleman. I put upon it the construction that we did the other evening for the reason that, read with the other rule—and you must read all rules together to make sense out of them, that is the elementary rule of construction—as the first month of the sittings of this house is given up on Thursdays to private members, if the business of private members is exhausted on that day then we must have taken an antecedent step on Tuesday to deal with that situation.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the explanation of this whole matter. This government is in the hands of the house always with respect to the conduct of its business. Always. When we move adjournments, when we move that a certain step be taken to expedite the business, unanimity must be secured in order that business may be transacted. In this instance, reading those two rules together, the setting up of the committee of supply and the committee of ways and means is a matter of which this house has supreme and complete control, and if there were any necessity for relying upon the fact that unanimous action was taken, the validity of the action cannot be challenged. It may well be that had the right hon. gentleman interposed and said, I object to that being done because this rule does not contemplate it, this argument could have been made then rather than now. But now clearly this house is estopped from asserting, and cannot now assert, that the rules have been contravened, for what it did it did with unanimity and the unanimous consent of this house is all that is required to abrogate any rule, to set up a new rule, to do any class of business we think best for the public good and to expedite the transaction of that business. In the closing days of the session, by unanimous consent we do practically everything.

The other question that is raised, whether or not we should pass supply before the governor's speech has been approved by this house, is of course another matter altogether. I am not one who does not realize the force of the argument that has been made against the passing of supply until such time as the speech has been adopted. But on the other hand we must read the rules together for the purpose of enabling business to be transacted. It would just mean that unless on Thursday and Friday we have the business of the house in such a position that the Speaker may leave the chair, and that means antecedent discussion here on the tabling of some items although they are not passed, then that use of the rules would be to prevent business being properly discharged. I submit to the house that that was was not the intention of the rule; that you must read that rule that permits the Speaker to leave the chair without motion put on these two days as a rule to expedite business. But if it comes on during the first month it retards it, unless we take the step we have taken. The only way in which it can be dealt with during the first month is to make a motion on a Tuesday, apparently. That is the position.

If this chamber thinks for a moment that there has been any effort on the part of the government to take rights from members, to deprive them of their privilege, I can assure them that such is not the case. It is so easy to make statements of that kind. I recall in this chamber that as a matter of convenience we have had the Speaker leave the chair on a Thursday or Friday, reserving the right to do so. The question of how we transact business is a matter of how we can best serve the purpose for which we are here, namely expeditiously getting through the business we have to do. Need I say that I vigorously deny the suggestion that anyone is endeavouring to push the business of the house more rapidly than it should be done. I think on reflection the right hon. gentleman will agree with me when I say that is an unwarranted observation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not make an observation of that kind.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman said we were trying to hurry the business.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I was very careful to avoid saying anything of the kind.

Mr. BENNETT: Then it was his colleague who said it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not exactly like that, but pretty nearly.

Mr. BENNETT: I offer the right hon. gentleman my apologies for having credited him with the authorship of the observation that was made by his colleague, the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) but I believe that on second thought he will conclude that this must be wrong. There is no desire to do anything but give this house an opportunity to transact the business of the country, and the government is responsible for that. Reading these rules as they are with respect to supply and the conduct of business during the first month of the session I ask how we can transact business except by taking the steps we have taken. I may say that the other day I expected that hon. gentlemen opposite might have some observations to make, but when no hon. member of this house raised his voice against the setting up of the committees on supply and ways and means, I thought by that unanimity of opinion they desired to make certain that the business of the house should be transacted without unnecessary delay.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the Prime Minister if it was not for His Honour the Speaker to raise the question? His Honour is the custodian of the rules of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: No. If a question arises that indicates lack of unanimity then the Speaker must act, but frequently the rules of the house are set aside by unanimous consent. In the closing hours of every session we would not get through in a week the business we finish in a day or two if it were not that we unanimously agree to the suspension of the rules. The Speaker of the house is the custodian of the rules of the house only to the extent to which the house shows, by lack of unanimity, that it desires him to apply the rules. If this house unanimously resolved this afternoon, on a motion made by any member, that we should adjourn until next Monday, on the adoption of that motion the Speaker would be bound to adjourn the house. He is the presiding officer; it is his duty to apply the rules which we ourselves have formed for the transaction of our business and our conduct in regard to that business.

I again assure the right hon. gentleman and every hon. member of this house that the endeavour to go into supply this afternoon—not to pass an item of supply—in my judgment is not a contravention of the rules, but rather is an application of the rules to the peculiar conditions that arise in this house by reason of the distribution of business, which make it essential that we go into and out of supply, not to pass items but to have it said that we have considered them, in order that the Speaker may leave the chair on Thursdays and Fridays in accordance with the provisions of the rule. There is no case to which my attention has been directed in which the house in Great Britain has gone into supply before the adoption of the speech from the throne. I tell my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) that there may be such cases, but I am not aware of them at the moment. In any case that would not have any effect upon the rules of this house, which have been established for the orderly conduct of its affairs in order to expedite the conduct of public business.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I have had the opportunity of seeing these rules changed many times. In the old days one of the greatest grievances in this house was that on the orders of the day some members would arise and begin a discussion that would last during the entire sitting. We changed the rules to oblige the man who wanted to bring up something that was not on the order paper; he could give notice thereof to the Speaker, and upon securing the consent of the house he could break away from the order paper to bring up the particular matter he wanted to discuss.

Further changes in regard to going into supply were made by Sir Robert Borden during the war, because then it was necessary to go into supply very often during the week to vote money. For that reason the rule was adopted that any item called on Tuesday could be gone on with on Thursday and Friday, when the Speaker would leave the chair without the question being put. I believe there is a great deal of support for that contention, which I think is generally approved of now by everyone in the house.

With regard to the right of the government to call the business in the order they wish, of course they have that power, always subject to the rules of the house. I have great respect for the rules of the British House of Commons, but the rules of this house prevail before those of the British house can be invoked. I remember a very knotty question that was brought up by the then young member for Portage la Prairie, now Right Hon. Arthur Meighen. He raised the point that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, having been elected for two seats, had to take the option within thirty days of sitting for one seat or the other, and he invoked the first of our rules which states that in all unprovided cases the rules in England must apply. That question was hurled at me without notice, and I called upon Hon. Mr. Aylesworth, then Minister of Justice, to come to my assistance. After some research we found that this was a sessional rule in England, and the question to be determined was whether or not on July 1, 1867, the first day of the existence of the dominion, the British House of Commons was in session. It so happened that it was not in session on that date, and therefore the rule of the British house did not apply here. That, of course, enabled me to declare that the point of order raised by the then member for Portage la Prairie was not well taken. I remember that at the same time Sir Wilfrid Laurier remarked that evidently Mr. Meighen was a painstaking member with a future in the house.

As I have said, and as the house knows, the government has the right to call up business as it chooses, always according to the rules of the house. Time and again the rules are suspended; you can do that the moment you have unanimous consent, but in this connection I would direct the attention of the right hon. the Prime Minister to the fact that grievance before supply is the cardinal principle of our British constitution. The right of this government to carry on business has been challenged by a motion presented by the right hon. leader of the opposition as well as by a motion presented by the third party in this house. Before going into supply I believe the principle of grievance before supply should apply; the government should show the house and the country that it possesses the confidence of the house, and the only way to do this is to proceed with the address and have these amendments voted down. The Prime Minister says that calling an item on Tuesday, even if it is not passed, does not mean that we are breaking away from the custom or doing away with the practice, but what does it mean? It means that if we call an item on Tuesday Your Honour will leave the chair automatically on Thursday and Friday, and then we might go on and vote millions, though the authority of the government has been challenged by two motions that are now before the house.

Taking all the circumstances into consideration, Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister, who is a great admirer of the British constitution and who gave us some very interesting information to-day, should have these motions disposed of before we take up supply at all.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few observations on the point of order raised by my right hon. leader. I think it is very regrettable indeed that the discussion on this point of order has wandered so far afield from the actual point at issue. The greater part of the remarks of the right hon. Prime Minister were directed to standing order 28 rather than to standing order 57. I agree with the right hon. gentleman that a few nights ago the question of the construction of standing order 28 came up in regard to the proper procedure in this house on Thursdays and Fridays, and I want to remind the right hon. gentleman, when he speaks of expediting the business of this house, that through its leader this party assured him the other day that if the debate on the address were disposed of the way it should be, according to the constitutional authorities, then we would meet his wishes and would not raise these technical objections in regard to going into supply on Thursdays and Fridays. So that the whole argument carefully built up by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in regard to expediting the public business of the country is disposed of, and the suggestions made from these benches have been disregarded. What is the point of order? The point of order centres around one standing order, and one only. I refer to standing order 57 of the House of Commons. The hon. member who has just preceded me properly mentioned that British rules do not apply in this House of Commons where our own specific rules do apply. Therefore I suggest with all respect that we have in regard to rule 57 a Canadian interpretation. There is an interpretation by Bourinot, and so far as I am concerned we do not have to go beyond the language of Bourinot to construe and interpret the significance of standing order 57. If Bourinot did not so express himself in the quotation read by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) then Redlich and other constituted authorities would prevail.

There are two questions at issue in this instance; one is in regard to the proper procedure in connection with the disposal of the address in reply, and the second question is —and by the way, it has not been answered —can this House of Commons go into committee of supply before we have disposed of the address in reply to the speech from the throne? In regard to the first question I submit that there is a conflict of authority between the British and Canadian practice. Although all the authorities and all the practice in the British House of Commons have been against the statements made by the right hon. Prime Minister—

Mr. BENNETT: What does the hon. gentleman mean by that? I read from the records.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I will come to that.

Mr. BENNETT: There was a third reading of a bill only the other day.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With one exception, every single instance adduced by the right hon. Prime Minister in regard to procedure in the British House of Commons dealt with routine proceedings. In this house we have been accustomed to make similar exceptions in these motions which we have moved year after year to give precedence to the discussion on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. There again the right hon. gentleman's argument falls completely. Can anybody in this House of Commons give a single instance in Canadian history or British history where any House of Commons has gone into committee of supply before disposing of the address in reply to the speech from the throne? I say there is no such instance in Canadian or British history. That is the only question involved in the point of order raised by my right hon. friend, the leader of the opposition.

This afternoon we are facing this question: Are we going to defy the interpretation which Bourinot has placed upon standing order 57? We find "after the address is disposed of the next proceeding will be"—and I call hon. members' attention to the words "the next proceeding." It does not say "during the process of the debate" but uses the words "the next proceeding." It states "the next proceeding will be to move"—and that is immediately after the address is disposed of, "that the house resolve itself at some future day into committees of supply and ways and means."

We have before us a vote of no confidence in the general conduct of this administration. I remember last year that the Prime Minister —and he will correct me if I am wrong—took very high ground, and I think quite properly, when hon. members on this side of the house moved a vote of want of confidence in the administration. He said, "No other single piece of business on the order paper will be touched until this vote of confidence in my government is disposed of in this House of Commons." But to-day he takes the very opposite view. To-day he is juggling the vote of want of confidence all over the order paper so that those hon. members who wish to speak on it in an effort to voice the views of their constituents do not know what period of the day or night they may be called upon to voice the grievances of their constituents.

Mr. BENNETT: May I ask the hon. member a question before he leaves that point? I suppose he is aware that when the edition of Bourinot to which he is referring was written there was no provision about the Speaker leaving the chair without motion on Thursdays and Fridays.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The suggestion made by my right hon. friend has no bearing upon my argument. If my right hon. friend feels the rule is wrong and that it holds up the public business of the government, then let him amend the rule. This House of Commons can amend it. Through its committee it can amend the rules of the house. But I suggest to the house and the Prime Minister that the rules in this little book have been interpreted by the greatest authority on parliamentary procedure this country ever had, by Bourinot himself, and inasmuch as the government is bound by the rule so are both oppositions bound by it and, with great deference I suggest Your Honour is bound by it. Even if this House of Commons, last Friday, through lack of observance of the rules, failed to take the opportunity to exert its undoubted privileges with respect to this rule, I suggest that any time after that error is committed it is not only the right but it is the duty of hon. gentlemen in this House of Commons to call Your Honour's attention to such neglect. I will tell the Prime Minister that we are prepared to co-operate with him in the dispatch of public business. We say that the proper procedure is to dispose immediately of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Once that is done—and in this I am sure I am speaking for the right hon. leader of the opposition—we will not raise unnecessary technicalities in regard to Tuesdays, Thursdays, Fridays or any other days.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point of order has been raised as to the meaning of standing order 57, it reads:

> The house shall appoint the committees of supply, and ways and means, at the commencement of every session, so soon as an address has been agreed to in answer to His Excellency's speech.

Standing order 57 does not prevent the house appointing committees of supply and ways and means before the address in answer to His Excellency's address has been agreed to. As to whether such committees shall so be set up is a matter to be decided by the house, and not by the Speaker.

On February 20, 1930, it was resolved by this House of Commons:

> That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Monday next, and that this order have precedence over all business except the introduction of bills until disposed of.

At the fall session of 1930 no similar resolution was adopted. At the sessions of 1931, 1932 and 1933 consideration of the address was not given precedence. It was interrupted, and without objection other business was proceeded with by the house. On January 26, 1934, this session the house adopted the following resolution, on motion of Mr. Rhodes:

> That this house will on Monday next resolve itself into a committee to consider of a supply to be granted to His Majesty.

There was a further resolution on motion by Mr. Rhodes as follows:

> That this house will on Monday next resolve itself into a committee to consider of the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to His Majesty.

On motion of Mr. Rhodes the message of His Excellency the Governor General, together with the estimates presented were referred to committee of supply. In the present session the house has proceeded in the same manner as it has in the past three sessions. Whether that procedure shall continue is a matter entirely for the house to say.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I direct Your Honour's attention to the fact that there still remains the question as to whether or not this house should proceed in committee of supply while the address of His Excellency is still not disposed of, and particularly when a motion of want of confidence in the administration is before the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: That, I take it, is a matter of policy entirely for the government and the house. It is not one for the Speaker to decide.

Mr. BENNETT: It is quite apparent the committee has been set up unanimously. It would always be in order to move that the Speaker leave the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe the Prime Minister and myself are anxious, so far as possible, to agree on matters of procedure and I hope that both of us desire to maintain what we believe to be the traditions and practices not only of this House of Commons but of the parliament at Westminster upon which our rules are based.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no such ruling in Westminster as this one.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend has intimated that he himself is not aware of any instance wherein the British House of Commons has proceeded with supply before the address in reply has been disposed of. I hope he will not press the motion to go into supply to-day and thereby create a new precedent in this House of Commons which I believe he would regret later on. If I may make the way clear, may I say to him now that, so far as the opposition are concerned, if we are through with the address and on Friday my hon. friend wishes an agreement on the part of the opposition to proceed with supply, we shall be prepared to meet him. There is no desire to embarrass the government in the dispatch of business. Our sole object in raising this question has been to maintain what we believe to be the best traditions and practices of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I think the attitude of the right hon. gentleman is to be commended, but he has overlooked one thing and that is this, that there is no rule in Westminster similar to our rule about Thursday and Friday and as to Thursday being set aside for a special purpose during the first month. I say frankly, as I said to my colleague to my left, the real position is that the rules certainly conflict, and there is no way in which they can be brought into a proper logical scheme unless they are amended. I perfectly appreciate the point which has been made and I understand it, but on the other hand, with this special rule in the Canadian parliament about Thursday and Friday, and Thursday being a day set aside for the first month for a special purpose, it makes a situation that I cannot see how you can get over except in the way that I have indicated.

While I appreciate what the right hon. gentleman has said as to the dispatch of business, he realizes better than most members of the house, from his past experience, that any one member of the house not associated with him in the conduct of the opposition could raise an objection that would be fatal to that action on Friday. That is the real difficulty, and it was to overcome that difficulty that I made the suggestion that the Speaker should leave the chair.

So far as making a precedent is concerned, it is not making a precedent; it is conforming the practice of the house to the rules laid down about Thursday and Friday and as to Thursday being private members' day for the first month. There is a conflict which I see no way of keeping out of except in the manner I have suggested, and still do public business. I am perfectly willing that there should be a conference as to how the difficulty can be properly overcome, and in order that there might be no difficulty I suggested that the Speaker leave the chair. It is only a matter of five minutes to consider an item, and then we would go on with the next order of business. I only desire to have the business of the house done in the proper way.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If I may say a word, I fail to see what difference it makes that they have not in the British House of Commons our rule about going into supply on Thursday and Friday.

Mr. BENNETT: And as to Thursday being private members' day for the first month.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It makes no difference because they do not take supply until the address is disposed of, either on Thursday or Friday, and we never did it either in this House of Commons. Why mention that rule as creating such a great difference as between the two houses? I feel that we should not take supply until there is a vote on the want of confidence motion. Until the address is disposed of I do not see how we can vote for a motion to go into supply.

Mr. BENNETT: I certainly was not aware except in a general sort of way that this matter was going to be discussed to-day. The question now raised as to whether or not we are following the proper course is so clear that it does not admit of argument. We are following the same course as they follow in Westminster, but in view of what has been said I am perfectly content, without in any sense abating from the views I hold and which I am ready to discuss further if necessary, that we take up order No. 3 for the second reading of Bill No. 2 instead of order No. 1.

PENSION ACT AMENDMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): I would ask the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren) if it is the intention of the government at this session to introduce any amendment or amendments to the Pension Act?

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): The question is under consideration at the present time.

SILVER AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): May I ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) if it is the intention of the government to introduce at this session legislation implementing the agreement regarding silver which was signed on behalf of Canada at the world economic conference, and if so, when we may expect legislation ratifying the agreement?

Hon. EDGAR N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in answer to my hon. friend from New Westminster I may say that it is the intention of the government to ask the house to implement the agreement entered into at the world economic conference, but it does not of necessity follow that there should be specific legislation dealing with that matter alone. It may be that we may deal with it in connection with the banking legislation that is to be brought down.

FRENCH TRANSLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): May I ask if the government is aware that the French version of the speech from the throne published on January 25, 1934, in an extra of the Canada Gazette, in the Hansard of both houses of parliament and the French dailies, is stuffed with grammatical errors, translation mistakes, nonsense, misconstructions, wrong interpretations, inaccuracies and blunders of all kinds, totalizing three score and over?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member had better put his question on the order paper.

PRECIOUS METALS MARKING ACT

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Precious Metals Marking Act, 1928.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand that the minister already explained that this is merely a consolidation and revision of the existing act, and that he will explain the details in committee.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

On section 1—Definitions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What are the changes here?

Mr. STEVENS: There is a very slight change. The words "importer of" have been added, and the words "who traffics in" have been substituted for the word "dealer". It is in order to clarify. This was asked for unanimously by dealers in this class of goods.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Jewellers, are they?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Mount.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the explanation of this section?

Mr. STEVENS: On certain silver or silver plated ware and gold and gold plated ware, there are sometimes what are called mounts, that is, a design or some other decoration which is superimposed. These mounts have never been properly defined under the act and this new section clarifies this matter and provides for the application of the terms of the act to the things mounted upon the plate itself. In other words, it is making the regulations apply to the parts mounted upon the plate the same as they apply to the plate itself.

Section agreed to.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

On section 3—Gold. National mark.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister explain this section?

Mr. REID: The section reads "composed of gold of not less than nine carats in fineness," and I should like to know if this regulation is in effect in other countries.

Mr. STEVENS: I think that is the standard minimum recognized in the trade.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The explanatory note reads:

> This proposed national mark on gold and silver articles (not gold plated or silver plated) should stimulate both the buying and manufacturing of gold and silver articles in Canada.

Will the minister explain how this effect will be brought about by this proposal?

Mr. STEVENS: It is expected that the addition of this section will stimulate the art of producing gold and silverware. A very fine business in an artistic way has been developed in this country, particularly in silverware. In years gone by certain countries in Europe—Great Britain has been an outstanding case—developed a definite skill in this art and turned out some very fine ware. Canada, being a new country, has not been particularly forward up until say the last fifteen or twenty years. But in that period the artistic production of gold and silver in Canada has been very material. We are now second in the production of gold and I think third in the production of silver and this country lends itself to the production of gold and silverware. The trade generally has been unanimous in asking for this amendment in order to set a standard in this country for these wares.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Silver. National mark.

Mr. STEVENS: The same argument applies to this section as was applied to the preceding section.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Gold plated and silver plated articles.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What is the reason for this?

Mr. STEVENS: This section is intended to make more clear the regulations covering Sheffield reproductions. In other words, there are certain wares known the world over as Sheffield and the term "Sheffield reproduction" has been used in this and other countries. The natural inference is that the article produced is of similar quality and standard to that generally produced in Sheffield. In the absence of more specific regulations, certain manufacturers have impinged somewhat upon the standard by producing an inferior article. It is to clarify the situation that these amendments have been made. In other words, when the public buy a Canadian article termed a Sheffield reproduction, it will know it is getting an article just as good as the original article.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What is the penalty under the act?

Mr. STEVENS: We do not touch the penalties in this amendment. They are not what I would call stiff but are suited to the case. Frequent prosecutions are undertaken by the officer administering the act.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Gold.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the regulation dated December 6, 1928?

Mr. STEVENS: It will be observed that subsection (7) of this section is very technical but this amendment is simply to transpose into the act a regulation which has been in force for some years. What is sought to be done by this section has previously been done under the general powers to pass regulations not inconsistent with the act. The officers administering the act have at times found themselves embarrassed with the challenge that the regulation might exceed their powers in some technical detail. Therefore, it was thought advisable that the full definition should be carried into the act, and this is done by subsection (7). This subsection is highly technical but it has been gone over with great care by the officers of this and the justice department, all of which are agreed as to the correctness of the definition and its necessity and soundness.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Obligatory marks.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the effect of this section?

Mr. STEVENS: Part of the Trade Mark and Design Act was repealed and in its place was passed what is known as the Unfair Competition Act, 1932. This section formerly appeared in that part of the Trade Mark and Design Act which was repealed and now is being brought under the authority of the Unfair Competition Act, 1932. It is merely a technical amendment.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Electro-plated flat-ware.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What will be the probable effect of this section upon prices?

Mr. STEVENS: I would say that there will be no effect upon prices. This section merely clarifies a matter which has been in dispute for some time. Hon. members know that in recent years there has grown up a large sale in cheap and imitation jewelery and stuff of that character. Young girls like this for decorative purposes and we have been told that some of it is a very fine reproduction of real gold, silver, platinum and other precious metals. All we are concerned about is to make certain that no such product is imported and sold or made here and sold as platinum, gold, silver or plated-ware. The new sections 11 and 11A are designed to clarify the law in regard to these practices. It will not add to the price. In other words, it will not affect cheap jewelery at all, so long as such jewelery does not presume to be what it is not, namely, 14 karat gold or whatever it may be, nor profess to be sterling silver or silver-plated when in fact it is not. In gold plate there is a certain base of weight in gold that must be actually in the ware before it can bear the stamp "Gold Plated," and in silverware there must be a copper or nickel base and a specified quantity of silver in the article in proportion to that base before the article can carry the term "Silver Plated." Anything that does not meet with these regulations cannot bear the stamp "Silver Plated" or "Gold Plated," as the case may be.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Meaning.

Mr. STEVENS: This deals with the nomenclature of the trade and the symbols used—"R.P." for rolled plate, and so forth, as set forth. It is merely to legalize these letters, because on small articles like a ring, for instance, there is not room to stamp the words "Rolled Plate", and the letters will be sufficient. This section specifies the terms that may be used and the meanings attaching to the letters in each case.

Mr. MARCIL: In every newspaper one picks up there are advertisements for the buying of gold jewelery of various kinds. Is there any law in this regard?

Mr. STEVENS: A very strict law. The whole act, including what we have been considering to-day, applies to such matters. Not frequently but occasionally our officers come across false advertising. Such advertisements are carefully scrutinized and where there are grounds for prosecution the offenders are prosecuted. The practice of misrepresentation in regard to cheap jewelery is very sharply dealt with by the officers.

Mr. MARCIL: Is there any provision for protecting the public with respect to prices paid for jewelery they sell, or are the prices left to the buyer himself?

Mr. STEVENS: Competition between the manufacturer and the importer of what might be called legitimate jewelery is naturally very sharp. In the five and ten cent stores and in the department stores there is extensive and keen competition in the sale of the class of jewelery to which the hon. gentleman refers, and so long as such jewelery does not carry deceptive markings we do not interfere. Our duty under the act is to see that the public are not deceived.

Section agreed to.

Section 10 agreed to.

On section 11—Offence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the penalty? The offence might be minor and the penalty severe.

Mr. STEVENS: This subsection is an addition to a number of others all coming within the same category of penalties. I cannot inform my hon. friend at the moment what the penalties are, but they are not severe, nor have I ever heard anyone complain about them. I suppose that anyone who is penalized naturally thinks the penalty severe, but I have never heard any complaints in this regard.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are all fines?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. GRAY: I suppose these amendments were asked for and approved by the Canadian Jewelers' Association. What percentage of the jewelers belong to the association?

Mr. STEVENS: Practically all—all reputable concerns. I do not know of any exceptions, and certainly none have been taken.

[Mr. Stevens.]

INTOXICATING LIQUORS ACT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 3, to amend the Importation of Intoxicating Liqours Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

On section 1—Importation into province forbidden unless consigned to His Majesty, the executive government or commission, etc.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There had been some contravention of the existing law, which was purely technical, and I take it that the object of the amendment is to regularize the matter.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes. There is a full explanation on the second page of the bill. For some time the brewers in Ontario, and in other provinces too, I fancy, have been shipping liquor to persons in Quebec other than the Quebec Liquor Commission, but persons authorized by the commission to receive liquor. Under the Doherty Act however that is a technical offence. The brewers in Ontario, for instance, can sell and ship only direct to the commission. If we insert the word "or" in line 13 and the words "or other" in line 17—that is the only amendment we ask—it will permit brewers from outside the province of Quebec to ship liquor into the province to persons authorized by the Quebec Liquor Commission to receive such liquor, as well as to the commission itself.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Have not all the provinces laws with respect to the control by a commission of all liquor imported into their respective territories?

Mr. GUTHRIE: This will apply to all provinces, but difficulty has arisen only in regard to shipments between Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): To whom would these shipments to Quebec go, to private persons?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, persons licensed by the Quebec Liquor Commission to receive them. But under the Doherty Act at the present time they can only ship to the commission authorized by the province.

CITY OF OTTAWA AGREEMENT

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That, it is expedient to authorize the Minister of Public Works, on behalf of His Majesty, to enter into an agreement with the corporation of the city of Ottawa to extend the period of the existing agreement with the corporation for one year from July 1, 1933.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the minister if it is his intention to introduce a bill based on this resolution, if carried?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes, Mr. Chairman, it is necessary to do so in order to make payments out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister explain the nature of the measure?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The proposition is simply to continue an arrangement that has been in existence for some years past between the government and the city of Ottawa with respect to certain services, and the supply of water at the same rates as have been paid for some years. This agreement was made some ten years ago, I think, and amended while my right hon. friend was Prime Minister, and for the last three or four years it has simply been continued at the same rate, $100,000 per year for water. There is nothing else involved. Many of the questions that arose under the agreement have been settled from time to time and have passed out of the realm of practical matters, and this really applies only to the payment of $100,000 per year for water.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether this is the moment to discuss the broader question of the relations of the city and the government, but I would like to suggest to the minister that when he is taking up with the city council of Ottawa the question of an agreement between the government and the city he seek to impress upon His Worship the Mayor and the members of the council that something besides the mere letter of agreements is worthy of consideration between large bodies such as the government of Canada and the corporation of the city of Ottawa. As the minister well knows, the government of Canada at very considerable expense expropriated certain properties in the city of Ottawa for the purposes of a national park. Before doing so there were conferences between the city and the government as to the extent to which cooperation between the two might obtain in accordance with a generally understood plan. In a word the plan was that a large area in the centre of the city should be set aside as a park to be designated Confederation park, as a permanent memorial to the celebration of the diamond jubilee of confederation. Before any move was made by the federal government, as my hon. friend well knows it was necessary to call into conference the mayor and certain members of the board of control of the city at the time, and secure their general agreement to the plan. It involved action on the part of the city as well as on the part of the government. As far as the government was concerned the carrying out of the plan involved the expropriation of large areas of property in the heart of the city, and paying, I think, over $3,000,000 for properties to be demolished in order that the city which is also the capital might be provided in part with the proposed park. The city itself also undertook to make certain expropriations, and among other things did carry out an agreement to widen a considerable portion of Elgin street so as to permit of the park having a very wide street on the west as an approach to the parliament buildings.

In the course of consideration of the whole plan the question came up as to what was to be done with the few buildings remaining within the area it was proposed to set aside for the park; that area being bounded by Elgin street on the west, the canal on the east—or rather the street just beyond the canal on the east side, I have forgotten the name for the moment—

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Nicholas street.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, Nicholas street, and Sparks or Wellington street on the north and Lisgar street, I think, on the south, I mean the far side of Cartier square where the Normal school is at present located. As hon. members will recognize, already most of that is in the nature of park area, and the question came up as to what would be done with buildings that might still remain within it as the time drew near for their being demolished. While there was not a written undertaking with respect to what would be done in that regard, the understanding was that no new buildings should be allowed to be erected within that area, and that as far as the city hall itself was concerned, if the time came that it was to be taken down or demolished, that location would fall into the general park area. As I was Prime Minister at the time and had to do directly with the negotiations, in which the federal district commission was also concerned, I would like to make it quite clear that there was no doubt in the minds of His Worship the Mayor and the board of control and the city council at the time or of the federal district commission or of the government of the day as to what the understanding was and the basis on which the government proceeded to make the expropriations which it did. Certainly if there had been any possibility of the city not cooperating in a wholehearted manner with the government in the improvement of the capital along the lines laid down, the government of that day would not have asked parliament to appropriate $3,000,000 or thereabouts for the expropriation of an area which lies right within the heart of the city.

The point I wish to make is this: the mayor and city council of Ottawa at the present time have called for designs for a new city hall.

Mr. BENNETT: On the old site?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well the intimation is that the design should relate to the old site, but I understand that His Worship the Mayor has made it clear that that is more for the purpose of getting designs which will enable the city council to form estimates of what such a building would cost than actually to fix the location of the new building. I think the idea is to get the estimates at once for a building of a certain size, but not finally to decide upon a site until there have been further conferences with the government. That is my reason for mentioning at the moment what my understanding is of the arrangement made between the city and the government at the time the government asked this parliament to appropriate large sums of money for the expropriating of certain properties.

I should like to ask the government to stress with the city, if they will, the point that the object of the park is to provide a great open centre which will be not only an adornment to the capital of Canada but also something of practical service to the citizens of Ottawa, who are equally concerned in having a central park which can be used for ceremonial and other occasions and for gatherings of different kinds not to speak of the day to day use by children, young people, and persons of all ages. There is a civic end as well as a government end to be served, and I should like to point out that there would be as much justification for the government taking the properties that it owns to-day in the park area and beginning to erect government buildings on them as there is for the city to claim the city hall site as the one on which to construct a new city hall, since that site comes within the park area.

The government has expropriated all the land along the west side of the canal between Sparks street and Laurier avenue; it has constructed a fine driveway there of which the city has the advantage to-day. That drive is being maintained by the federal district commission. If the government of Canada were to take the ground that merely because they owned that land they could put up buildings within the park area, they would be perfectly justified in building on that roadway. They would be equally justified in putting up large public buildings in the area between Wellington and Sparks street, between the post office and Elgin street and south of Sparks street between the city hall site and Sparks street. The government of Canada would have as much justification for using land which it owns and which it has thrown into a genaral park scheme as the civic authorities have in claiming for building purposes the use of the south side of the old city hall which now has come into the park area. As a matter of fact as yet the civic authorities have not carried out a part of their specific agreement which was set out in writing, calling for the removal of the fire hall and police station from the park area. That should have been done years ago in accordance with the terms of the agreement.

This whole matter has relation to a plan in which all the governments of Canada have been interested and will continue to be interested. The government of Sir Robert Borden appointed a commission which went very carefully into the whole question of the future planning of the capital, and that commission recommended a large park in the centre of the city. The Liberal government which succeeded the Conservative administration of that day sought to carry on the plans of improvement of the capital that had been initiated and commenced by the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and continued by the government of Sir Robert Borden. I hope the minister will impress upon the city authorities the fact that in these negotiations between the city and the government there are larger considerations involved than just the matter of one small site.

I should like to add this, that I am sure this parliament will wish to be generous within reason with the city of Ottawa. That has been the attitude of parliament in the past and I am sure it will be so in the future, but parliament will expect a like attitude on the part of the city authorities. I hope it may be possible for the government, through its negotiations, to complete some arrangement which will ensure that the park area will be preserved as originally intended, and which will also enable the city to carry out some plan with regard to the erection of a city hall in connection with a scheme which will have the full approval of the administration of the day.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Chairman, as one whose honour and privilege it is to represent the capital city of this dominion, in association with my colleague, may I be permitted to associate myself with the remarks just made by my right hon. leader. Though the city of Ottawa belongs to its citizens it also belongs to the whole of Canada as its capital city. On a former occasion, when it was my privilege to speak with regard to the construction of the Victory Tower, I think Hansard will bear out that I said that the construction should be such as to represent the desires, the ambitions and the hopes of the Canadian nation so that the tower might in some way represent all these sentiments.

I do not know what the intention of the government may be with regard to the city of Ottawa, but I would ask that the government should not forget that Ottawa is the capital city of Canada, and that to it come legislators from the various provinces of Canada and visitors from the four corners of the earth. So I think that the government should do everything within reason, even in these very distressing times, to make the capital city of the dominion well worthy of the ambition, the courage and the fortitude of the Canadian nation, of which the right hon. Prime Minister is so wont to speak. When that time comes when the government feel like spending something, I would ask them to consider the fact that as one of the representatives of the city of Ottawa I have urged that this is one city that ought to be recognized throughout Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): In reply to my right hon. friend I can only say that I have reviewed the file of correspondence and representations in connection with the park area to which he has referred, and undoubtedly he has interpreted that correspondence quite properly. There have not been any recent negotiations with the city in connection with the proposed construction of a city hall on the old site, so all I know is what I have read in the press. From those reports I would expect that in the future there might be some discussion of this matter, and certainly I shall bring to the attention of the representatives of the city on such occasions the contentions and representations that have been made by my right hon. friend, because he has been thoroughly familiar with the matter since its inception.

Bound up with this matter is more than simply the opening of a park area. We must consider also the location of the national monument and other questions which undoubtedly, in the near future, will call for a conference between the government and the city. I can only say that we have endeavoured to arrive at a conclusion that is in the best interests of the Dominion of Canada and of the city, and that is calculated to carry out the original intention, so far as possible, as it is expressed in the correspondence.

I can only add that by this legislation we cannot in any way deal with the matters mentioned by my right hon. friend; the act has no application whatever to anything of that kind, since it deals only with certain services for which we make an annual payment.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it only proper to say that some time ago we set up a committee of council consisting of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart), the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) and Sir George Perley to consider this whole matter. The representations which the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) brought to the attention of the house this afternoon were present in the minds of that committee. The report in the press was made available, and the representations made by the city authorities at that time were communicated to the committee. Certainly there is no agreement and there would seem to be nothing in the nature of an arrangement which bound the city with respect to the rebuilding of the city hall so far as we can ascertain. I speak subject to correction with respect to that. There seemed to be however an understanding that the park was to be continued through to Cartier square. I believe expropriation proceedings were taken by the city with respect to the area which lies to the west of the Roxborough apartment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is right.

Mr. BENNETT: Also, the property which lies to the north of that was expropriated leaving, as the right hon. gentleman has said, the fire hall, which is still on city property so far as I have been able to ascertain.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And the police station.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, the police station, the fire hall and the city hall stand in the same position. The matter is now in a position whereby at an early date, whenever time permits the three gentlemen named as a committee of council to meet the city authorities they are to do so and discuss the matter further.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Stewart (Leeds) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 8 to authorize an agreement between His Majesty the King and the Corporation of the City of Ottawa.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, February 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gobeil for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, the amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Gardiner.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before an hon. member proceeds to speak in the debate I should like to make some observations. Mr. Gobeil moved:

That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General to offer the humble thanks of this house to His Excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both houses of parliament.

Mr. Mackenzie King moved in amendment:

That the following be added to the motion: We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's present advisers do not possess the confidence of the country.

Mr. Gardiner moved:

That the amendment be amended by inserting after the word "advisers" the words "and official opposition."

Mr. Gardiner in moving the amendment to the amendment is reported at page 105 of Hansard of January 30, as follows:

The amendment as amended would then read: "We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's present advisers and official opposition do not possess the confidence of this house or of the country.

The hon. member was mistaken in stating that the amendment to the amendment would so read. He has not moved to add the words "of this house or," and they are not contained in Mr. Mackenzie King's amendment. If the subamendment were adopted it would make the amendment read as follows:

That the following be added to the motion: "We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's present advisers and official opposition do not possess the confidence of the country.

The adoption of the subamendment would make the amendment a motion of want of confidence in the official opposition. Members of the official opposition are but individual members, and are not charged with the duty of advising His Excellency. The question as to whether or not the official opposition has or has not the confidence of the public is settled by the mere fact that it is the opposition. It is immaterial that His Excellency be made aware at the present time whether the official opposition or any other party or group has or has not the confidence of the public as long as the government of the day has the support of a majority of the House of Commons. Of this fact His Excellency has been officially advised.

If a vote of want of confidence in a government is carried it means the resignation of the government, His Excellency's advisers. On the other hand a vote of want of confidence in the opposition is of no effect and not a matter to be submitted to His Excellency. It is a well known principle of British parliamentary practice that votes of want of confidence are directed only against the government of the day. I therefore declare the subamendment out of order.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): Mr. Speaker, now that it has been decided to go ahead with the debate on the address I am permitted to get my little say off my chest two or three days sooner than I had anticipated. For that I am very grateful.

Turning to the speech from the throne I have much pleasure in announcing that I believe I shall be able to support one of the important measures forecast, namely legislation to facilitate the efficient and profitable marketing of live stock and agricultural products. I shall support it particularly if it lives up to the forecast contained in the press as to what is to be the nature of such legislation. I understand it is to be patterned after the British Agricultural Marketing Act of 1931 which I have in my hand. If Canadian legislation follows the British it will greatly facilitate the marketing of live stock and other farm products.

I regret however that, apparently deliberately, the government allowed a first class marketing medium to die right before its eyes. I refer to the Cooperative Live Stock Association established in 1928, the operations of which extended across Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific, which had done a very important commission business for a number of years and had just nicely got into the export trade. This Canadian organization had first class connection with the Scottish Cooperative Association in Edinburgh, but it was struck amidships first by adverse exchange in September, 1931, and then by the fact that the government reduced the grant by $10,000. These two unfortunate circumstances combined to put this institution on the rocks.

It was therefore up to the government to do something in connection with the marketing of live stock, and apparently it is about to do something, although it is a little late. I do not know whether or not the Cooperative Live Stock Association, to which I have referred, is still alive, but certainly it is not functioning as an export institution.

I shall not deal at length with the wheat agreement; I should like to see it first. May I tell the government that there is considerable opposition growing up throughout the country against such an agreement. I should not like to take the stand some people are taking. Although I have read Premier Bracken's first class presentation of the subject, I do not quite see how it can work out. Possibly however as time goes on we will get more light on the subject. I am going to enumerate a number of blunders, from our standpoint, which the government has made during the last four or five years in the disposition and marketing of our grain, and in their attempts to stabilize this, that and the other thing. Nearly every attempt made by any country to do something spectacular of an artificial nature, which I am sure the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) does not agree with very much on general principles, to try to get us out of the difficult position we are in has been a failure, and this government's record in this respect is not dissimilar to that of any other country—possibly a little bit worse.

The first matter to which I wish to refer is the Prime Minister's entry into the inter-imperial field of diplomacy in 1930. We all remember that he went to London on October 1, after having first shoved up the duties on many British goods. Then he promenaded to London and announced that he had arrived. Let me refer for a moment to the Prime Minister's first speech, I think it was, in England, and remember, he was proceeding to carry out his blasting and blazing policy at that time. After first slapping the British people, his kinsmen, in the face by shoving up the tariff on a number of British commodities he announced this:

> We must approve or reject the principle. I have put the question definitely to you and definitely it should be answered.

He not only intimates there how he is going to speak but suggests how they should reply. He went on:

> There is here no room for compromise, and there is no possibility of avoiding the issue.

You would think our kinsmen over there were trying to dodge him. He continued:

> This is a time for plain speaking, and I speak plainly when I say that the day is now at hand when the peoples of the empire must decide, once and for all, whether our welfare lies in closer economic union or whether it does not. Delay is hazardous, further discussion of the principle is surely unnecessary. The time for action has come.

Well, if that is the new diplomacy, if that is the policy of blasting and blazing, and I think apparently it was, results came immediately which resulted in our premier coming home empty handed. Before he was in London eight days, I think it was exactly on the eighth day, the Prime Minister let all and sundry know that "where MacGregor sat, that was the head of the table." He was on the radio talking to the world, instead of engaging in a conference. That is such a painful incident that I will leave it with that historic remark of Hon. Mr. Thomas—"humbug." I shall not try to paint the lily. That was major blunder No. 1 in 1930.

In 1931 there was another big blunder, although affecting a relatively small number of people in Saskatchewan. That was when the government undertook to give a five cent bonus on wheat to the growers of the west. It was spoken of first as a compensating adjustment, but it was in the nature of relief or bonus and it followed a very excellent speech made by the Prime Minister on July 1, 1931, in which he announced to the people of Canada the calamity that had struck the western plains because of the drought in that area. But imagine the consternation of the people when they found that to those who had had a fine crop this government disbursed over $11,000,000, and the bigger the crop the more of a bonus the farmer got; while on the other hand, those who had no crop at all or very little got nothing which they did not have to pay back or give a promissory note for. That was the most amazing spectacle of stupidity and asininity in the whole administration of relief, and nobody has ever even attempted to justify such a record. The municipalities in the southwest feeling strongly that they were entitled to some consideration when others were getting a cash handout, not something to be given back but a gift, a Christmas box, sent a deputation to Ottawa proposing that a bonus of one dollar per acre be given in the southern part of Saskatchewan, which was so hard hit on that occasion, and this was refused. That refusal was blunder No. 2—a most egregious and stupid blunder that no parliament of seventeen-year-old schoolboys would ever think of committing. I want to tell my hon. friends over there that that was one of the first things that caused the present government to take a terrible slide in the estimation and confidence of the people of the west. Everybody knew it was wrong. Even those who got the five cent bonus knew it was most unmercifully unjust to the southwest and that is one of the many reasons why the government is rapidly sinking further and further in the estimation of the people of the west.

Then we had the Ottawa conference in 1932. Of course, there was no conference in 1931, or there would have been a more major blunder then. But there were conferences in the other three years. In 1932 a conference was called by the Prime Minister after consulting with the overseas dominions. Of course, we thought then, with the Prime Minister playing the part of host, that everything would be as nice as pie, that everything would be lovely. I think this was the very building the conference was held in. If one-half the reports we got were true, it was anything but a harmonious family gathering. But we will not dwell upon that. We all regret the rumours. Our Prime Minister did not come out of that conference with very great laurels upon his brow.

I want to refer to one statement that is being made all over by the government and its supporters, and that is that we got a preference on our wheat which was tantamount to getting six cents a bushel more than we otherwise would have got. Out in the west the western Tory members are continually trying to leave that impression, although the Prime Minister said distinctly on October 12, 1932, that he had no thought of exacting six cents per bushel more from the homeland for our wheat, thereby adding to the cost of bread in the old country. Here are the Prime Minister's words, at page 135 of Hansard of October 12, 1932:

> I have never at any time represented to the wheat growers of this country that the effect of a preference would be to set up in their favour a price differential in world markets and at the expense of the British consumer.

That is plain enough, yet the followers of the right hon. gentleman are continually stating out in the west that we get a preference which amounts to six cents a bushel for our wheat.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has misunderstood that. The Canadian producer does get six cents more than the foreigner gets for his wheat.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It hits the foreigner but it does not help us. With the low value of foreign currencies, the foreigner has still the edge on us just the same. For fear that we might get a little bit out of that preference, look at the proviso in article 4 of the United Kingdom-Canada agreement. We get the preference provided we sell our wheat "at prices not exceeding the world prices." That is the proviso. Here are the terms of the contract. Of course, we know who put that in there and who agreed to it. It was Mr. Baldwin who put that in to protect himself when he went home, and the Prime Minister of this country wanted article 4 of the agreement so that he would be able to say that he got a preference for our wheat in the British market. But we get no better price. It is just the same as we have been getting for the last fifty years, and we can go on getting it for the next five years under this contract. Blunder number three.

What else took place in 1932? I think it was in 1932 that the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance), the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) and the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) raised the question as to the relationship between the government and Mr. John I. McFarland who was then operating on the Winnipeg grain exchange. I understand that primarily he went to that exchange as the representative of the pool, and whether or not they suggested it, I understand that that appointment was pleasing to the government. Things drifted on until Mr. McFarland became the hedging medium of almost the entire grain trade of Canada. That is the statement made by the Prime Minister in 1932, but prior to that his colleague had made the bold statement that Mr. McFarland was not dealing in wheat, either directly or indirectly, and was not on the market at all for the government. He said that Mr. McFarland was independent of parliament and of the government. What extraordinary statements to make! Who is this Goliath that is on the market and is independent of everyone, including the Prime Minister? I wonder from whom he takes his orders? Does he take his orders from the pool or from the Prime Minister?

We find that since the fall of 1930 when Mr. McFarland began to stabilize the market, whatever that means, the stabilization has consisted in prices going down to the lowest point in four hundred years. Yet this gentleman was supposed to have authority not only to stabilize the Canadian market but to stabilize the world market. Those are his very words.

Mr. BENNETT: Whose words?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It did not stabilize—

Mr. BENNETT: Whose words are those?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). That stabilization process did not but momentarily keep up prices, but it did result in Canada hoarding her wheat until the carry-over was larger than ever before. I have some figures which I obtained from the pool at Regina and from what I know about them I consider them substantially correct. I want to establish that while the operations of Mr. John I. McFarland were well intended by the government, they resulted in prices going down to an all-time record. That is the admission made in a leaflet which has recently been got out by the federal and prairie governments. The yield during the last four years has been smaller but the carry-over in each year has been larger than in the preceding four years. The average total production for the crop years 1926, 1927, 1928 and 1929 was 439,000,000 bushels, while the average total production for the last four years, 1930, 1931, 1932 and 1933, under this government and under the stabilization of Mr. John I. McFarland, was only 368,000,000 bushels. The average production for the last four years was therefore 71,000,000 bushels less than the average production for the preceding four years. The carry-over for 1926 was 40,000,000 bushels; for 1927, 53,000,000 bushels; for 1928, 92,000,000 bushels and for 1929, 127,000,000 bushels, a total of 312,000,000 bushels. The carry-over for 1930 was 127,000,000 bushels; for 1931, 140,000,000 bushels; for 1932, 137,000,000 bushels and estimated for 1933, 219,000,000 bushels, a total of 623,000,000 bushels, so that the average carry-over for this four-year period, 1930 to 1933, was 155,000,000 bushels, or twice the amount of the average carry-over of the previous four-year period. These figures show that while the average annual production for the years 1930 to 1933 was 71,000,000 bushels less than it was for the years 1926 to 1929, the average annual carry-over for 1930-33 was over 76,000,000 bushels in excess of the average annual carry-over for 1926-29.

I will admit that Mr. McFarland might be able to hold up the price of grain momentarily or temporarily; I will admit that he might do it for an hour or two a day or perhaps for twenty-four hours, but there are two things that will always happen when you try to hold up prices above those obtaining on the world's markets. One of two things, and perhaps both, will happen. Wheat will be thrown on the Winnipeg market from Chicago, or elsewhere the price will be beaten down and Mr. McFarland will be put in the position of endeavouring to do the impossible by holding up the market while great volumes of grain futures are thrown at him from all sides. The only result is what did happen,—down goes the price until it reaches a record low for the last four hundred years. That is one thing that will happen. The other is that the slight degree to which he holds up the market immediately loses us export opportunities. Everyone knows that the moment we get out of line with competing countries, exporting ceases or dwindles away to a mere dribble. This policy, begotten of the very best intentions, has resulted in doubling our carry-over in the face of smaller crops during the last four years. I hope I have made myself plain on this point because I do not want to dwell any longer upon it than is actually necessary.

In 1932 the government entered upon a program of fake preferences. They made good and sure that we should not receive any benefit from them by putting in the contract the stipulation that we must sell as we have always been selling, at world prices. That policy and the apparently free-lance appointment of Mr. McFarland had regrettable reactions, but I do not feel like blaming the government too much for them. These policies did not bring the results anticipated for the simple reason that the Argentine and Australia were able to undersell Canada, even though their products were of an inferior grade. This was made possible because of their depreciated currencies. Now that Mr. McFarland is hedging almost the entire wheat crop it cannot be said any longer that he is acting personally for a company or for the pool. He has the credit of Canada behind him and I think this house is entitled to know exactly what he is doing. I have placed some questions upon the order paper but sufficient time has not elapsed to make a complaint about not receiving answers. My information is that Mr. McFarland is in the employ and the pay of the government. Anyway, he has an office and staff.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it well to correct that at once. Mr. McFarland is receiving no pay, either from the government or from anyone else. He is giving his services.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have two or three questions on the order paper.

Mr. BENNETT: He never was employed by the government and the government has no control over his employment. It is by the pool.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Does the Prime Minister wish the house to accept his statement that during all these years Mr. McFarland has been working for nothing and paying his own board and lodging?

Mr. BENNETT: I understand his expenses are being met by the pool.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: He must be a very wealthy man.

Mr. BENNETT: He is a very public-spirited man.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In the meantime, I accept the statement that he is not getting any expenses.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that; I said he was getting expenses.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is said the pool pays his expenses.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: But the statement has been made all along that the pool is not paying his expenses. That is on record in Hansard; the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that several times.

Mr. STEVENS: No, no.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oh, yes; I will have it hunted up after six o'clock and we shall see what the hon. gentleman did say.

Mr. STEVENS: Be reasonably accurate.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I hope the hon. gentleman will look up the figures with regard to these carry-overs. With less wheat he has got a double carry-over.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course; anyone who knew anything about it would know that.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If you had a one bushel crop could you have a one hundred and fifty million carry-over? The more you have, the greater the chances are of a carry-over. But with Mr. McFarland hoarding wheat, just as they hoarded wheat in the United States, it is no wonder North America gained the reputation of being hoarders of wheat, compelling buyers in Europe to turn to other sources for their supplies. It has been a huge blunder on the part of hon. gentlemen, who evidently do not know anything about their business in this respect. That is the trouble.

Mr. STEVENS: Don't get personal; don't be rude. Keep within the rules.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is the time, we are told, to make complaints, to ventilate our grievances, and my constituents are anxious to have from the government an audited statement of the business of John I. McFarland during all these years. I will not take the responsibility of running into an election and admitting that I have not done anything to see that this matter has been thoroughly explained to the people, that they have not been made aware of the relationship of the government with Mr. McFarland and also with the pool. My information is that the original wheat which the pool turned over to Mr. McFarland has not yet been sold and accounted for to the pool. If that is so, and I believe it is, what a wonderful medium of getting rid of our wheat we have had all these years! They were going to show the pool how to sell wheat. Now, Mr. McFarland has occupied the position almost of a receiver. Well, he received the wheat. but he has not sold it—just transferred it into futures. He has not liquidated the pool wheat; and I understand that, not having done any of these things, he has really defaulted or been neglectful in his duties as receiver, so that it is up to the government, for their own sake as well as for Mr. McFarland's, to elucidate a little their relationship with Mr. McFarland and to let us know how much longer that gentleman proposes to keep up this hoarding policy. Is it going to be kept up until all the buyers in England are driven elsewhere for their supplies?

Hon. gentlemen may smile, but these are the seeming facts; and these carryover figures are correct. If they have anything further and fuller to offer us I am sure the house will be glad to know what it is. In the meantime I want it understood that we cannot allow this to run any longer. I cannot take the responsibility of not asking the government for some light on this subject—I will not say demanding; I will ask them for it. The Prime Minister two years ago made a very full statement, a good statement on the government's wheat stabilization policy. I do not know whether he understood it himself, but many of us did not.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the reason you find it good now.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have no doubt the Prime Minister would be glad to be rid of this whole business. I might refer to the situation as it existed last July, when wheat futures reached $1 per bushel. Cash wheat was at one time anywhere from 94 to 96 cents. I happened a little later to have a load of wheat left to sell and received at point of shipment 71 cents. We want to know how much John I. McFarland unloaded when it was at that price and how much he bought in later. We understood that the government intended to get rid of this business as soon as they could. Are they going to wait in order to make money for the pool? Well, that is a noble justification for waiting, but suppose it does not go up. The longer you wait the higher it must get because of carrying charges. Every time you sell futures at low and buy it high it costs money. I hope therefore that the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Prime Minister or someone else will explain the relationship of the government to Mr. McFarland. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has made the statement that Mr. McFarland is responsible to neither the government nor to parliament, and if he is trading in wheat on his own account that is his own business.

Now we come to the wheat agreement. I do not know how it will turn out, but while Russia has agreed to the principle of the agreement the fact remains that she has not agreed to her allotted quota, and to the extent that we may back up they can step in and throw all the wheat they like on the British and European market. That is the situation as I understand it. There may have been developments in the last two or three days, but with Russia out of the picture it is absolute folly to talk about restricting our wheat acreage and permitting them to occupy our place. There is another factor to be taken into consideration in this connection, and that is that in addition to wheat all these countries grow rye. So that all that their farmer would have to do, even if compelled to reduce his acreage of wheat fifteen per cent, would be to grow that much more rye. Rye is made into bread—occasionally it is made into liquids but for the most part it is made into bread, and good bread, which is used almost entirely in some countries in Europe. The result is that you will have as many loaves of bread as ever, if no provision is being made here with respect to the non-growing of rye. That is another evidence that hon. gentlemen do not know their business with respect to the world grain situation. Here we have had one blunder after another, one tragedy after another, and the end is not yet.

Now we come to the proposal that the farmers, among their other worries, will be prohibited from marketing or possibly growing more than a certain amount of wheat.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Speaker, shortly before you called it six o'clock some of my statements were perhaps not exactly challenged but almost so by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. As the latter was not in his seat at the beginning of my remarks I am going to repeat something of what I have already said. When I indicated that the government had credited Mr. McFarland with stabilizing the price and steadying the world market, that was disputed. At page 2083 of Hansard of the 1932 session, the Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

> To the extent that it held the Canadian market steady in the face of the rather strange actions of the farm board south of the line it contributed to the steadying of the world market.

Again:

> Where the government came into the matter, however—and I have said this three times; I trust my language is not obscure—the government simply guaranteed the banks against loss on the pool's initial payment to the farmers on the purchase of grain.

Then getting back to the quotation I made first with respect to the statement made by the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Valiance), here is what he said:

> If it is not true it should be stated accordingly, because it is strongly rumoured that John I. McFarland is to-day holding large volumes of wheat, speculating in futures, with the Canadian people's money.

He was speculating in futures—every one knows that—and doing it with the Canadian people's credit; at any rate if you can distinguish between the two I would like to know. So the hon. member for South Battleford was substantially correct.

But listen to this amazing statement. The hon. minister, just like the Prime Minister, jumped into the breach, saying:

> Oh, no, I must hasten to correct that.

And:

> Mr. John McFarland, of course, is independent of parliament and of the government. He is a gentleman of means, a gentleman with knowledge of the wheat business, and if he has bought wheat on his own account that is his own business.

He was never charged with buying wheat on his own account; he was charged with speculating in futures with the credit of the people of Canada and the guarantee of the government; and if he was not an employee of the government why did the government guarantee his account? Is the government going around helping everyone who has an account or a line of credit to be guaranteed? That would be high finance with a vengeance.

Then in reply to the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) the Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

> I do not know of a bushel of wheat held by the government, either directly or indirectly.

The same Mr. McFarland was then thought to have between 100,000,000 and 150,000,000 bushels of wheat futures and his line of credit guaranteed by the government, and the minister denies it on a quibble. When I heard that denial I thought I could hear in the distance the cock crowing. It is almost enough to make it crow. That is all I have to say in regard to that; I think I have covered all the points that were challenged.

Now a word about the stabilization fund, not Mr. McFarland's, but under the Department of Finance. It is not anything that has been done by the government that I am complaining of; it is what has not been done. For eighteen months on every dollars' worth of goods exported from Canada, whether from the factory, the farm or the forest, that was paid for in British pounds, from ten to thirty per cent was lost in exchange on the transaction. That is what I am complaining about. The government, when it brought down the regulations for the stabilization fund, admitted that loss although its provisions did not include wheat. Why were they paying it if they didn't know their previous attitude was ruinous to the farmer? No; the government tied our dollar up to the American dollar; they legislated for the big fellow with obligations in New York; then at a late hour, when the British pound was coming right anyway, the government magnanimously came along and said: We will pay that exchange.

Mr. McINTOSH: And the farmers lost millions.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, that is what I complain of. They paid out just $20,000 or so when the minister himself estimated anything between $5,000,000 and $10,000,000. Just when the thing had cured itself along came the act providing for payment of exchange, and when they got the regulations fixed up they paid about $20,000, none of it being on wheat.

Now I agree with the Prime Minister about one thing, namely this carry-over, which has been growing furiously under this same stabilization policy of Mr. McFarland; which doubled during the last four years as against the previous four, although the crop averaged 71,000,000 bushels less for the last four years than for the previous four. I think the Prime Minister is quite right in saying that something should be done to remove that carry-over, but the action should not be to go to the farmers and tell them to grow less wheat. What justification have we when we hear statements like that of Mr. Cromie of the Vancouver Sun, made after travelling extensively in India, China and other countries, that three quarters of the population of the world go to bed at night with empty stomachs, while a good number of the remaining quarter go with a stomach too full. Suppose that is exaggerated; suppose half the people of the world go to bed hungry, what justification have we for reducing the present abundance in order to benefit those countries who have too much, and letting the other half of the world starve to death? You are just making C.C.F.'ers every day by following such a policy. You are discounting and damaging the very system that most members of the government believe is all right, the capitalistic system—and I too think it is the best in sight with some corrections; it should be bitted and bridled, however, and not let run around loose as at present. Last year I put on the order paper a resolution, and in the absence of the Prime Minister I am going to thank him now, the first opportunity I have had, for his very gracious and generous remarks in that connection. But what is the use if he does not act on them? Here is the resolution, omitting the introduction:

> And be it further resolved,—that the government of Canada take such steps as are necessary and expedient to explore the possibility and practicability of selling on long term credits a substantial quantity of our embarrassing wheat carry-over to China, or any other available country where poverty, hunger and misery prevail.

Three things may stand in the way of that being carried out. One is, can you find anywhere in this world in which half the people go to bed hungry a country to which you can sell wheat on long credits? We had representatives from China trying to negotiate an arrangement with the government a year ago.

I do not care where the wheat goes, whether to China or Japan or Russia, so long as it goes into consumption and we are not guilty either of destroying it or taking steps to prevent future abundance of it. So long as it goes to help someone and establishes a trade contact with some country that has not yet learned to use our wheat, it satisfies me. We want to develop a taste for wheat flour and wheat bread and get contacts with these countries with huge populations. We have to do it, whether we do it from a humanitarian or a business standpoint. We are being crowded out of Europe, and everyone knows the reason—their desire to become self-sustaining in the event of war, and in some measure justified retaliation against Canada for our high tariffs against them. So I suggest with all the earnestness the Prime Minister gave me credit for last year that disposition be made of our surplus wheat on the best terms possible to those hungry countries. It would of course add a certain amount to the national debt of Canada. Suppose we add $75,000,000—and mark you, Mr. Speaker, we are responsible more than any other country in the world for this huge carry-over—in my estimation even if the government should add $50,000,000 or $75,000,000 to the public debt by taking this action I think it would have a better effect than will result from a reduction in acreage, and it would also bring about a new contact with a new country, establish a line of business which we do not have now and help cultivate a further taste for wheat bread. I can remember when Japan consumed very little wheat, while now she is a very large consumer, and it is the same with other countries. That is my alternative suggestion, and in addition I would say that the proposal advanced by the government is not workable. It is more apt to increase than decrease production, as experience has shown in the United States during the past twelve years.

I know that to many of our eastern friends the question of wheat is a complex problem, but I am going to point out that the government do not even know much about hogs. I have here the official hand-book of present conditions and recent progress in Canada for 1933. We have the picture of the Prime Minister in the front of the booklet, as large as life and twice as natural, and here we are told the kind of hogs we should grow, according to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who goes on to elaborate on the great market that has been opened to us. But, he says, we must grow the right kind of hogs. Here we have the picture of an alleged pedigreed Yorkshire brood sow. It does not look very much like a sow to me, but that is what it is said to be. Of course I do not blame the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) for this, though the experimental farm is credited with supplying the cuts for these pictures for the Department of Trade and Commerce. Then directly below is shown a group or litter of twelve Yorkshire geldings, so called. What a fearful thing it is to fall into the hands of a government that knows nothing about either wheat or hogs. On a very superficial, cursory examination, we find that the alleged brood sow is not a sow at all but the gentleman pig himself.

This pamphlet has gone to libraries in every part of the British Empire, Mr. Speaker. I know when I was in the department these bulletins went to every part of the world. We all know the present fad for research, and just think, perhaps a hundred years from now some technocrat or research devotee will be going through the files of some of our libraries in order to see what was done at the Ottawa conference. I have no doubt, that when he does so he will wonder what kind of political geldings had charge of the destinies of Canada at this time.

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I intend to devote my remarks this evening to the wheat agreement, which I intend to support. I may say that I was in favour of something of this sort being attempted before I knew what this government intended to do. I have been arguing in favour of something like this in my own constituency and in western Canada for a good many months.

I am very glad that the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) undertook to argue against this agreement. Most of us owe more to those who differ with us than we are prepared to admit at times, and after hearing the remarks of the right hon. gentleman against the agreement I am more than ever convinced that we are on the right track. I do not want to be severely critical of the right hon. gentleman, because I suppose he spoke according to his light and understanding, but after listening to his remarks I am sure he does not understand the wheat agreement. I wish to take up the various points in connection with that agreement, and I shall endeavour to show why I am in favour of it and why I think we should support it.

My right hon. friend said the speech from the throne referred to one other measure by which the government proposed to help agriculture and he said that was spoken of as the wheat agreement. He then went on to quote from the speech from the throne the paragraph which refers to the disastrous, price-depressing influence of the abnormal surplus of wheat stocks. He then went on to ask:

What is this so called wheat agreement, Mr. Speaker, and how is it going to help the agriculturists of this country? I think I am right when I say that first of all it is in effect an agreement to reduce the acreage of wheat production.

Then he went on to say:

—the government, having destroyed trade, is now seeking to destroy production—

Perhaps indirectly this is an agreement to reduce wheat acreage; that may be its effect. I hope that will be the effect temporarily, but really it is an agreement on the part of the wheat exporting countries of the world, chiefly Canada, the Argentine, Australia and the United States, to fix the amount of wheat they agree to export, and no more. The quotas fixed as between the various countries are planned, with an allowance of perhaps 47,000,000 bushels for Russia if she can supply that much, to meet the import requirements of the various countries of Europe and the rest of the world that import wheat. We have also an agreement on the part of the importing countries that they will not take steps to increase the wheat acreage within those countries, and that they will encourage the consumption of wheat. We have as well an agreement concerning the exports of wheat from the Danubian exporting countries, which exports are limited to about 54,000,000 bushels.

The pools of western Canada—and I have been a member of the Alberta pool ever since it was organized—I believe to be almost unanimously in favour of this agreement, as are the three provincial governments. I do not know that this is an argument as to why we in this house, representing as we do the people of the Dominion of Canada as a whole as well as our own constituencies, should support the wheat agreement unless we believe it to be in the interests of the farmers and of all the people of the Dominion. I believe that this agreement cannot be called strictly a government measure in the sense that other policies are so termed, such as protection. I do not think the government initiated the drive for this agreement; I believe the government came into the picture because of necessity, because of national interest, because the Dominion government must represent Canada in any world conference, and because of the world nature of the problem confronting the wheat producers of Canada. The agitation for this agreement started because of the catastrophic fall in wheat prices.

[Mr. D. M. Kennedy.]

Personally, Mr. Speaker, I am very much interested in the matter, because I am tired of producing wheat and selling at a loss. Of the crop of 1930, about which we heard so much, I have something like 3,000 bushels in the Alberta wheat pool. It cost me 11 cents a bushel for threshing and so far I have received 10 cents a bushel for the wheat. Since that time I have been selling wheat at an average price of about 27 cents a bushel, including all the grades, and I am sure that it cost easily twice that much to grow.

There is another reason why I am convinced that the agreement contains something of value. All the critics of proposals leading in this direction before this agreement was completed failed, so far as I know, to give us any reasonable alternative. The editor of the Free Press in western Canada has said: "Sell the wheat for whatever it will bring." Well, if we have been giving away wheat at half the cost of production I think we have gone as far as we ought to go in that direction. That is exactly what we have been doing. John McFarland, who, I think, is to be commended for the clear statements he has given to the people of western Canada and the country in general concerning this problem, has stated that all those who have said "sell the wheat" have failed to say to whom we should sell it.

How did the wheat surplus arise? It arose through an increase in wheat acreage throughout the world. The other night when the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) was addressing the house he referred to the fact that in western Canada there would probably be a decrease in the acreage due to natural causes such as grasshoppers and lack of moisture in the soil from the previous year. Then, in the Peace river district we have other causes; for instance, twenty-five per cent of our crop is under the snow, and there will be a reduction on that account. But because we have a wheat quota and provision made for the study of that question, the actual reduction in acreage that may take place in the natural course of events presents no real difficulty so far as its application to this agreement is concerned.

The Wheat Situation, 1931, is the name of a report prepared by the Imperial Economic Committee in which it is shown very clearly that it was the increase in acreage of the world that led to the increase of wheat production. Notwithstanding the fact, which has been pointed out by the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) and several others, that we have had wheat failures in Canada bringing yields 100,000,000 or even 200,000,000 bushels below the normal crop, the world wheat crop average to the acre is a very constant figure. At page 103, statement 8 of the Imperial Economic Committee report, showing the yield per acre in the principal wheat producing countries in the world, it is shown that the average yield per acre for all the world except Russia and China between the years 1909 and 1931 varied only from 14 to 16·2 bushels per acre. So that if we take those figures together with the fact that since 1920 there has been a tremendous increase in acreage we have one factor, if not the chief factor, in the development of the world's wheat surplus. Between 1909 and 1913 the average world acreage, excluding China and Russia, was 196,000,000 acres. In 1920 it was 208,000,000, and in 1931, 235,000,000. I should like the house to note that Canada's acreage increased from an average of 10,000,000 acres between 1909 and 1913 to 26,000,000 acres in 1931. As a matter of fact, this country has increased its acreage out of all proportion to the increases in other parts of the world. The Argentine acreage increased from an average of 13,000,000 acres between 1909 and 1913 to 17,000,000 acres in 1931. In the same period the acreage of Australia increased from almost 8,000,000 acres to almost 14,000,000. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the control of the quota by an agreement telling us to export a certain amount of wheat, assuming that the actual effect will be passed back to the farms and result in a decreased acreage, is, in my judgment, in view of these figures, a sensible proposal.

Regarding the wheat agreement the leader of the opposition has asked this question: "What is Canada going to get in return?" He has pointed out that Canada, having the largest surplus, must make the largest sacrifice. Well, John McFarland again points out in the pamphlet before me issued by the pools that Canada's share in world trade in wheat between 1920 and 1930 was an average of 35·6 per cent, and that under the wheat agreement Canada is given an average of 35·7 per cent or a position a little better than her average between the years I have mentioned. In face of the fact that Canada's acreage increased so tremendously between 1909 and 1931, I think Canada, under the agreement, is being fairly dealt with when we compare her position with that of other countries mentioned therein. The right hon. leader of the opposition said:

> What is Canada going to get in return? The wheat agreement says that the wheat importing countries have undertaken that they will encourage the consumption of wheat.

That is number one.

> They will not encourage increased production in their own countries.

That is number two.

> And once the wheat produced by these exporting countries has risen to a certain figure, which comes to about 98 cents or one dollar in terms of Canadian money at the present time, and remains at that figure for several weeks the wheat importing countries will consider lowering their tariffs to admit more wheat from the wheat exporting countries. Is there any guarantee that wheat is ever going to rise to that figure? And if it does, is there any guarantee that these other countries will carry out what they have undertaken.

Those are the three points enumerated to show what Canada will get in return. The wheat importing countries will undertake to encourage consumption; they will undertake not to encourage increased production in their own countries and under certain conditions they will lower tariff barriers. But, is that a fair statement of what Canada will receive? I submit that it is not, and that it shows that the leader of the opposition has entirely misunderstood the agreement and has failed to grasp the most significant feature in it. What about the agreement of the Argentine, Australia and the United States to control the export of wheat from those countries? The first proposal dealing with the wheat situation was that the exporting countries should get together; and when the leader of the opposition attempted to analyze and present to the house his reasons for opposing the wheat agreement he entirely overlooked this proposal.

Coming to the question of Russia, there has been no undertaking by Russia that she will limit her acreage, and the question of her exports has to be discussed with each of the exporting countries. Surely no one who listened to the statements that were made about Russia in this house last night or has read some of the statements about Russia in the press and the struggle that is going on in her chief food-producing area in the Ukraine, will say that we ought to try to lay down hard and fast rules so far as Russia's acreage is concerned. Within the last few years I do not believe Russia exported in any one year much more than 25,000,000 bushels, and under the quota arrangement for the United States, the Danubian countries, the Argentine, Canada and Australia, there is left about 47,000,000 bushels.

Then there is the objection as to the intensiveness of cultivation. I think that the average returns of the world acreage sowed to wheat will show that there is not a great deal to this objection as to the intensiveness of cultivation. All of us who have tried farming and intensive cultivation in Canada know that you can sometimes run into just about as much trouble by farming well as by farming carelessly. For instance, I know that I have had wheat frozen because it would not ripen due to the intensive cultivation in western Canada just as often I have been caught by dry weather, when I was trying to get by with less intensive cultivation. In the highlands of Scotland, where I farmed before coming to Canada, we had a very steady yield from year to year, but the problem was to get the crop to stand up so that it could be cut by a binder. So I do not think the leader of the opposition made a very strong point when he spoke of the danger of intensiveness of cultivation from the point of view of over-supply.

He also mentioned the constitutional issue. Time and again, he said, the government asks us to accept this wheat agreement without our having a word to say about it, and yet he discussed it for three-quarters of an hour. He did have his say, and from his standpoint as leader of the opposition he may have made some points that look strong at first sight, but they fail when analyzed. He did make one point, however, to which I wish to call attention. He was referring at the time to two agreements affecting the United States and Canada, the St. Lawrence waterway agreement and the wheat agreement. I could not tell by reading the paragraph just to which agreement he was referring when he said that in the United States they were dealing with an agreement and that there they allowed the members to vote as they liked; for, as we all know, the government of the United States is not defeated when a particular measure is defeated, and it carries on for its full term of four years in any event. The leader of the opposition said he would like to have that kind of vote in this house in connection with this agreement, and he was referring, I think, to the wheat agreement. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am always willing to take my responsibility in connection with any agreement or bill with which we are dealing specifically or upon any specific amendment, but I do not like these blanket votes that we have on the speech from the throne and the budget where, regardless of how you vote, you are both right and wrong. So far as the two amendments proposed are concerned, they just about mean this, that the official opposition believes that it could run the business of the country better than the government that is in power, and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation believes that it could run it better than either of the other two parties.

In his appeal to religious conviction the leader of the opposition was, I think rather unfortunate. He was as badly mixed in his theology as he was in his economics. The whole point in the agreement is not a question as between scarcity and abundance, as the leader of the opposition evidently thought it was as shown by the revised prayer which he submitted to this house. The real question is as between superabundance and plenty. That is the question with which we are trying to deal, and I submit that if the leader of the opposition wants a prayer that fits the occasion he will find it in the thirtieth chapter of Proverbs, in the eighth verse: "Give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me."

The leader of the opposition made a statement with regard to the general policies of the government with which I cannot agree, when he said that whatever emergency we may have in Canada, it is due to the policies of the government. I think that must be taken in connection with his statement that the most effective way to help agriculture in this country would be to use the tariff as an instrument of national policy, but use it to serve the interests of agriculturists as well as the interests of manufacturers. I will quote his words:

> May I suggest that a most effective way to help agriculture in this country would be to use the tariff as an instrument of national policy, but to use it to serve the interests of agriculturists as well as those of manufacturers —use it as an instrument to reduce production costs and the cost of living by lowering the tariff in regard to some of those things which will enable the western farmer to reduce his costs of production.

We are all familiar with that argument. I submit that to say that the emergency in Canada is due to the policies of the government is very much wide of the true facts of the situation. I am not saying that those policies have had no effect. I am not saying that lowering the tariff would have no effect. But when he says that the emergency in Canada is due to the policies of the government, and to that alone—and that brings us back to the statement of the leader of the opposition that the proper thing to do is to reduce the tariff—I would refer him to the World Economic Survey, 1932-33, made by the League of Nations, in which publication there is a chart showing the contracting spiral of world trade dropping from $5,000,000,000 in 1929 to less than $2,000,000,000 in 1933. Hon. gentlemen will notice that this chart is like a spider's web or a winding spring, and never do the lines once cross since world trade started contracting in 1929. At page 16 of this publication there is this statement on the decline in world trade:

There were two elements in this decline, the fall in average prices, which appears to have been about 50 per cent, and a reduction of about 25 per cent in the actual quantum of goods exchanged. The exchange of three-fourths of the former quantity of goods, at about half the prices ruling three years before, yielded a total value of world trade little more than a third of the 1929 monthly average.

What guarantees have we that the countries signing this agreement would keep their word? Just the guarantee that governments usually keep their word. We have no monopoly of virtue in Canada, we have as much right to expect that other countries will keep their agreement as they have to expect that we intend to keep ours. I am sur that we intend to keep ours. Surely that is not a fair argument for a man who has boasted that his government put through more trade agreements when in office than the present government. The following dispatch from Manchester, England, dated February 4, appeared in the Morning Citizen of yesterday:

Free trade, Sir Herbert Samuel says, will be the main plank in the Liberal party's new "positive constructive" policy.

"Our first proposal will be that all nations which are willing to trade freely with low tariffs among themselves shall be brought together in a general agreement in order to do so. That is our immediate and principal aim."

If a reduction in Canada's tariff would lead to a reduction in the tariffs of the world, why did not the Liberal policies put into force from 1921 to 1930 prevent increases in the tariffs of Germany and France against wheat and flour? I have no time to give particulars of the increases in those tariffs because my time is passing, but Germany, France, Italy, Czechoslovakia, Austria and various other countries which were importing our wheat in large amounts increased their tariffs by two, three and four hundred per cent between 1924 and 1930. Therefore I submit that there is no alternative to this agreement open to us.

I should like to call the attention of the house to something else. In an effort to regulate the food supply of the world we have come together with these countries. They have agreed that we ought to have a just price, and we have agreed to sell at a just price. I think that that is what is implied in the agreement and it is the only basis upon which we can deal and agree with people if we are to have anything like permanent and satisfactory relations. The world depression was on the way by 1924; it was on its way before 1930 and we felt the change very definitely in Canada in 1929. I have in my hand a book written by G. D. H. Cole. The hon. member who spoke last night thought he was quoting this gentleman, but I do not think he was. He gives statistics from the League of Nations which show that wheat prices were falling steadily from 1924 onwards. I understand the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) is to speak after me, and I am sure he will be pleased with this statement of Mr. Cole:

There had been no corresponding fall in the prices of finished industrial goods, though these too had shown in certain cases a downward tendency.

The Liberal tariff policies of 1924 to 1930 did not prevent a fall in wheat prices and did not prevent an increase in the tariffs of other countries of the world against wheat. In fact I believe that one of the main reasons for the increase in the tariffs of Europe was an attempt to prevent this tremendous surplus of wheat in other countries of the world from depressing the price of agricultural commodities within the countries of Europe. If we could get them to lower these tariff barriers, it would be a fine thing, but I do not know how we are going to do it, especially in view of the present feeling in Europe with regard to war.

I submit that no alternative to the agreement has been offered to this house. There has been no alternative offered which would regulate the imports and exports of wheat throughout the world on a basis which could be beneficial to both producer and consumer. The free trade argument runs something like this: If prices fall, your production will fall. Prices have fallen disastrously and production has steadily increased. There has been some variation, but on the whole this is what has happened. World production kept on increasing and consumption did not even threaten to catch up. If the free play of supply and demand would tend to equalize production and consumption, this ought to be done deliberately and intelligently when there is an over-supply of wheat in the world in relation to the effective demand.

I should like to refer to the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), to which attention was directed by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), in connection with the tremendous prices paid for wheat during the war. I intend to try to show that both hon. gentlemen were wrong so far as the west was concerned, and I shall submit very definite proof. The Prime Minister referred to the fact that one minister had pointed out the danger of charging $3 per bushel for wheat during the war. The hon. member for Labelle made reference to this statement, but I shall not repeat his remarks unless he wants me to do so.

Mr. BOURASSA: Oh, no.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): He left the impression that the people of Europe were afraid that we would again hold them up like that. This agreement is the answer. We say: We will sell to you at fair prices, and they say: You are entitled to better prices than you are getting to-day. The farmers of western Canada had nothing to do with setting the price of wheat at $3 per bushel during the war. If there was any setting of prices to be done, it should have been done in connection with not only wheat but everything else in the country. When wheat was selling for $2 per bushel in Great Britain it was worth less than it was during the years when it was selling for around 90 cents and $1 per bushel.

I should like to refer to the report of the Imperial Economic Committee which gives the index numbers of British and American wheat and of all commodities excluding wheat and flour from 1846 to 1930. This table gives the value of wheat in terms of other commodities over this term of years, and the index varied from 54 in 1919, 52 in 1920, to as high as 119. We must go back to 1864 to find a year in which the value of wheat in terms of other commodities was as low as it was in the year 1919. I do not believe there was any bias in the minds of the people who prepared these statistics, nor was there any in the minds of those who prepared the figures for the imperial economic conference. I have this belief in spite of all that has been said to the contrary; if the people of western Canada as a part of the producers of the world were guilty, directly or indirectly, of bringing about the high price of wheat which prevailed during the war, they have certainly more than atoned for it during the past four years by accepting a price for their wheat which is less than half the cost of production.

Mr. F. W. TURNBULL (Regina): Mr. Speaker, after extending my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Gobeil) and the seconder (Mr. Barber) of the address, which I do most heartily, may I make the observation that several times since this government came into office have I said that it has done more for the farmers of this Dominion of Canada during the three or four years it has been in office than the Liberal government did in the whole nine years previously. The proof of that contention is found in the fact that to-day this government is receiving support for its policies from those gentlemen in the house who do not belong to either of the old parties. We see them rising one after the other and commending the government for what it has done and is doing with respect to agriculture in this country.

My remarks this evening may be somewhat more fragmentary than usual because I desire to place on record some figures in opposition to some of the fancies that have been given utterance on the other side of the house to-day and in the past day or two. Before doing so however I wish to apply myself to some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson) the other day with regard to the relationship of the two central provinces to the western provinces of Canada in the matter of taxation. The hon. gentleman said that 45 per cent of the taxes of Canada were paid by the province of Ontario and 30 per cent by the province of Quebec. Had he said that 45 per cent of the taxes were paid in the province of Ontario he might have been within the mark; but when he says that they are paid by the province, that is an entirely different story. The great companies doing business throughout Canada have their headquarters in Montreal and Toronto to a large extent. The banks, for example, pay one per cent tax on circulation. That circulation is dominion-wide but the tax is paid in eastern Canada, and Ontario and Quebec try to take the credit for it. The great loan companies, the insurance companies, the railway companies and businesses with headquarters in eastern Canada all pay taxes in the east, but they make throughout the dominion the money out of which they pay those taxes. To say therefore that 75 per cent of the taxes in the country are paid by the two central provinces, and to leave that statement unmodified, does not present a true picture of the respective responsibilities of the different provinces of the dominion. The hon. member referred to the wheat pool and the agreements and guarantees. The guarantees will not cost the prairie provinces anything, because they are secured by mortgages on property, and the payments which the pool has agreed to make with respect to the guarantees will be made and continue to be made year by year.

With regard to railway policies, the western provinces have been no more guilty than any other part of the dominion. As regards social legislation, we have perhaps gone further than we ought to have done; but I should like anyone to name me any province that has not done the same. So far as balanced budgets are concerned, the province of Saskatchewan last year came closer to balancing its budget than did any province west of the maritimes. The province of Ontario did not come within $5,000,000 of balancing its budget, whereas Saskatchewan came within half a million. I do not know what the figures are for this year; I am speaking for last year only. In 1928 the agricultural revenue of the three western provinces was $843,000,000, and in 1932, by reason of circumstances not under the control of the prairie governments, that revenue fell to $273,000,000. Under these circumstances is it fair to say that the troubles in the western provinces are due to reckless extravagance on the part of their administrations? I wish to say to the hon. gentleman through you, Mr. Speaker, that the people of the west have been pretty fair customers of the people of eastern Canada, and the people in the east are beginning to realize that fact. Is it right and proper, then, to jump on your customer when he is down, instead of giving him a hand to help him to get on his feet again and resume a position in which he can buy? For that reason I ask the people of the east, who have had good crops all these years and have received more for their agricultural products than we have, owing to their proximity to a market, to be more charitable in their views of the western people who are doing their best in a time of adversity to play their part as citizens of the country in which they live.

Now I desire to address myself to some remarks made by the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) the other day with respect to the tariff. In his address he quoted the tariffs on certain textiles, but he was as far behind the times in doing so as his party always is. The figures he gave were prepared by a man named Deachman over a year ago. They were prepared by adding together all the items that could be charged against British textiles. They were wide of the truth when they were prepared. They included dumping exchange duties, the excise duty of 3 per cent charged on all imports, and the sales tax, which is not a duty at all but is imposed on domestic as well as on foreign goods. That gentleman did not omit from the figures as he prepared them one single item which he could think of, and while they may have been in some degree nearer the truth on the day they were compiled than they are to-day, the fact is that the dumping exchange duties were done away with long ago. So that the figures submitted by the hon. member for West Edmonton and the figures placed before the people of Saskatchewan last summer by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) had, at the time they were given, absolutely no truth in them.

I have figures from the customs department with respect to the very goods dealt with by the hon. member for West Edmonton the other day. I am going to give in the first column the articles he referred to; in the second column the duty which he said was now imposed against these articles; and in the third column I will show what the duty really was according to the figures submitted by the Department of National Revenue on the 1st day of September 1933:

Article	Alleged Duty per cent	Actual Duty per cent
Cotton print, piece goods..	58·5	26·35
White cotton flannelette, bleached..	52	25·9
Wool piece goods..	64	42·7
Wool overcoatings..	93	40·9
High grade suitings.. ..	68	34·2
Wool hosiery..	82	34·61
Blankets..	78	33·4
Axminster carpets..	80	40·3

The hon. gentleman also quoted rates of duty on agricultural implements. He was correct in these, but he drew the same inference which the leader of the opposition attempted to draw all through the west, namely, that we had placed a burden on the backs of the farmers. The right hon. gentleman, standing on the platform one day in the summer at Estevan, made certain statements to this effect in an area where the people had lost four crops and the fifth was then being consumed by grasshoppers—the very area with respect to which, for six weeks in this house, he refused to consent to relief being afforded the farmers until the house was compelled to pass the measure by closure. Yet he stood on the platform there and said, "Had I been Prime Minister of Canada in the last three years you people would not be in the condition in which you are to-day." The contention was made throughout western Canada that the prices which the farmers have to pay for the things they buy are higher to-day than they were when the present government came into office. Let hon. gentlemen make no mistake about it; the farmers of western Canada know better than that.

I have a list of certain types of farm machinery used in western Canada, showing the prices in Brandon as they were in 1930 and as they were in 1933. Let me quote some of the figures:

	1930	1933
14-inch John Deere gang plough with 4-horse eveners..	$ 149 00	$ 136 50
Five-section diamond harrow complete with 1-piece pulley hitch drawbar..	33 90	33 90
Eight-foot outthrow Bissell disc harrow with 4-horse eveners.. ..	72 00	68 00
No. 241—7-foot 9-tooth field cultivator, stiff tooth, with 4-horse steel eveners..	113 50	108 50

	1930	1933
Model "C" manure spreader with 4-horse steel eveners	$ 204 00	$ 198 00
20-size Van Brunt drill with double disc ops.	249 50	212 50
15-27 John Deere model "D" tractor equipped to burn kerosene, distillate, or low cost fuel oil	1,170 00	940 00
No. 5—10-foot John Deere combine complete	1,716 00	1,450 00
No. 3—16-foot John Deere combine complete	2,405 00	1,600 00
25 x 42 Goodison all steel separator complete with feeder, blower, and perfection weigher and register	1,530 00	1,470 00

In addition to that the John Deere Plow Company sold these goods on the basis of wheat being worth 75 cents a bushel, and when wheat was at less than 75 cents they allowed a discount on the cash payment on their machinery, so that at times there was 13 per cent discount. So that far from adding to the burden of the farmers, and far from their goods costing them more in 1933 than in 1930, their goods cost less by large sums, besides which this government is now collecting a six per cent sales tax. The prices I have given I understand include the sales tax.

During the visit of the leader of the opposition to western Canada, when he began to appreciate the conditions facing the people there he grew very sympathetic and produced a great number of policies that he had forgotten about since 1921. I could imagine him as a modern Rip Van Winkle who had gone to sleep in 1921 with a 1919 platform or chart before him. He woke up in 1931 to find the 1919 platform as good as new because it had never been used. The famous chart had not even a pin prick on it. He came into that country under these conditions and told the farmers and other people that he was in favour of a national scheme of unemployment insurance, and further that they ought to have crop insurance to some extent at least against drought, insects and the other matters beyond the farmers' control. The right hon. gentleman promised these farmers things which he knew, or ought to have known perfectly well, were not within the power of himself or any dominion government to grant. Take crop insurance; hail insurance in some parts of that country costs 12 per cent—what would it cost to cover damage by grasshoppers and drought, to say nothing of the other plagues to which farm crops are subject?

Because of these promises I have gone to a little detail in getting the history of unemployment insurance in this country. In the first place, the promise of a national scheme of unemployment insurance was contained in the famous Liberal platform of 1919. Under pressure by the labour members from North Winnipeg and Winnipeg North Centre in 1926 a part of that paragraph that promised old age pensions was implemented by giving grants in aid to such provinces as desired to enter into the scheme. That is the only part of that paragraph that anything was done with at all. The principle of grants in aid, or the placing of money raised by dominion taxation in the hands of the provinces to be disbursed, was afterwards declared by the leader of the opposition to be a vicious principle, and no further attempt was made to carry that principle into legislation. But pressure came from the third party in the house to do something with regard to these matters; election time was coming on and it was necessary to do something. So in 1928 a motion regarding unemployment insurance was referred to the committee on industrial and international relations for investigation and report. A report of the committee as set out in the journals of the house dated May 16, 1928, reads in part as follows:

(1) That the necessity of a policy providing some method of unemployment insurance is one that will inevitably have to be dealt with before long as a solution in part of the industrial problems of the present day.

That sounded all right. Clause 2 accepted the principle of contributory unemployment insurance. Clause 3 reads:

That the evidence of the justice department makes it clear that the responsibility for such legislation rests on the provincial authorities; it being within their jurisdiction under the provisions of the British North America Act, but that it would be within the power of parliament to contribute by grant to such provinces as adopted such legislation, following the precedent set in the matter by technical education, highway construction and more recently the old age pension act.

But the theory of grants in aid having been declared to be a vicious principle, the report of the committee, although adopted by the house, was not followed up. The committee evidently knew the attitude of the government, because instead of recommending immediate action, they recommended by clause 7 that the matter be again referred to the committee on industrial and international relations at a subsequent year. In 1929 the question was again referred to the same committee, and the committee again endorsed the principle of unemployment insurance on a contributory basis. Clauses 2 and 3 of the report, however, read as follows:

(2) Your committee recognizes that while it is highly desirable that such legislation should be uniform in all the provinces and while social insurance has a federal aspect, nevertheless, according to the Department of Justice, under our constitution legislative jurisdiction in relation to the establishment of a compulsory system of unemployment insurance is vested exclusively in the provincial legislatures.

(3) Your committee finds that the provinces on being consulted by the Department of Labour with regard to their attitude towards the establishment of a general scheme, do not appear to be prepared to take immediate action.

There the matter was dropped. The committee recommended that the federal government be requested to bring the matter before the next dominion-provincial conference. I am informed that the question of unemployment insurance was one of the items dealt with at such a conference a year or two ago, and that the attitude of the provinces was that they are masters in their own house. so that in spite of all these facts, which are well known to the leader of the opposition, we find him during the summer going out into western Canada and telling the people that he is again favourable to a national system of unemployment insurance as well as crop insurance. Similar language was used by him in all parts of western Canada. That is the sort of remedy offered by him to people who are in misfortune; he knows perfectly well he has no power to carry out his promise but he hopes it may carry him into office at the next election. I submit that the only insurance that the leader of the opposition was interested in was the insurance of a job for himself on this side of the house after the next election; he was more interested in his success in that election than in the welfare of the people of western Canada.

In connection with that very question of unemployment insurance it might be well to remind the house that we have heard a great deal, during the last three or four years, about the number of unemployed in Canada. It is to be noted that figures furnished by the United States government indicate that during the last six years in which our predecessors were in office 436,000 Canadians migrated to the United States. They migrated there to get jobs that they could not get in Canada, even during the years of supposed prosperity under the last government. Had those 436,000 not been admitted to the United States during those six years our hon. friends opposite would have had a real unemployment problem on their hands before 1930. Unemployment did not originate in 1930. Hon. members know that in Saskatchewan before the provincial election in 1929, there were parades of unemployed to the Hon. Mr. Gardiner to ask him what he was going to do to take care of the unemployed in Regina. If they will read the press they will also know that the leaders of that parade were arrested the next day, brought before the magistrate, and imprisoned for vagrancy. That was the way they treated the unemployed when they were in office, but they are very nice and kind to them now that they are out.

I do not propose to go into very much detail with regard to the wheat agreement or the handling of the wheat by John I. McFarland on behalf of the central agency of the western pools. I would rather leave the speech of the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) in that regard to the electors of Saskatchewan. They know what John I. McFarland has done; they know what it has meant to them.

Mr. YOUNG: They know more than we do.

Mr. TURNBULL: If my hon. friend were in touch with the farmers he would know also. They know that if it had not been for the operations of John I. McFarland, when they hauled a wagon load of wheat to the elevators to sell they would have been told, "Sorry, but we cannot buy your wheat, because we cannot resell it." It was only through the operations of John I. McFarland on the wheat exchange in Winnipeg that the farmers of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba were able to sell large quantities of their wheat at all. They might have put it in storage but they could not have found a purchaser for it except as the wheat moved for export. In that case the carry-over would have been on the hands of the farmers and the cash would have been in the hands of somebody else, instead of the carry-over being on the hands of somebody else and the cash in the pockets of the farmers.

With regard to the reduction in wheat acreage and with regard to the restriction of production, the minimum amount that we are permitted to sell under the agreement is 200,000,000 bushels. In three years since 1921, and including that year, our sales of wheat and wheat in the form of flour combined have been less than 200,000,000 bushels. In the last year that my hon. friends opposite were in office, the year when they had the advantage of those wide markets of which they have spoken, the year when France and Germany and Italy and Czechoslovakia and all the other countries to which we formerly sold wheat shut out our wheat from their markets in spite of the so called low tariff policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, the total amount of wheat sold by Canada was 155,000,000 bushels. When we get a restriction agreement that permits us to sell 200,000,000 bushels it is said to be terrible, to be restricting the farmers' sales, but when other countries put up their tariffs against us, with no protest from hon. gentlemen opposite, so that we can sell only 155,000,000 bushels, that is friendship for the farming population.

There is one matter to which I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens); that is the question of consumption. The average consumption of wheat in Canada and the United States has been rapidly decreasing. Very eminent gentlemen, who are authorities on dietetics and who are supposed to be in the pay of people outside of this country, are persuading people all through Canada and the United States that white bread is not good for them and that they ought to eat something else. I understand they even made an impression on some hon. gentlemen opposite during the vacation. In any event the average consumption of wheat in this country and the United States has been rapidly diminishing. At the present time we are consuming about four and a half bushels of wheat per capita in Canada. There are twelve countries, most of them large buyers of wheat from Canada, whose per capita consumption is greater than ours, and there are nineteen countries whose per capita consumption is less than it is in Canada. If the 130,000,000 people living on the North American continent were to increase their consumption of wheat by one bushel per capita we would have 130,000,000 bushels of this carry-over taken care of at once, and I am told that about one slice of white bread eaten every day will do it.

My suggestion to the Minister of Trade and Commerce is that he get in touch with the national recovery administration in the United States to see whether between the two governments, by an advertising campaign of some kind—a "use more wheat" campaign if you like—you cannot persuade the people of these two countries, as part of the national recovery campaign, to use more bread and in that way assist the agricultural population. Since we have large numbers of United States magazines coming into this country, an advertising campaign carried on by this medium would give cheap advertising in Canada so far as we are concerned.

Having dealt with these matters I wish to touch for a moment or two on the question of national recovery. We are asked from time to time why we do not do the things that are being done in the United States of America. We are asked why we have not had codes in industry, why we have not set hours in labour, why we have not set rates of pay and so on. There is a simple answer to all these questions, even if they were good things to do. The simple answer is that the Dominion government has not the legislative authority with which to take any of these steps. It is asked "Why do you not do it under the peace, order and good government clauses?" The peace, order and good government clauses of the British North America Act do not transfer legislative jurisdiction from the various provinces to the dominion at all; they provide for the peace, order and good government of this country within the limits of the jurisdiction of the Dominion government. It is true that in time of war the legislative jurisdiction of the Dominion government is greatly enlarged in order to deal with those matters that are necessary in order to carry a war to a conclusion, but they do not go the extent of allowing the Dominion government, in time of peace, to usurp any of the functions of the provincial governments.

There are those who sneer at the idea that the British North America Act stands in the way of some things that it may be thought desirable to have done. I heard an hon. member say the other day that the British North America Act was used by the party in power as a shield with which to shelter itself from the need for taking action, no matter which party was in power. I have just read the report of the committee of the house, which at that time was under the chairmanship of the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh), and which, though composed mostly of Liberals, also had represented in its membership Conservatives and gentlemen from the third party in this house. The committee concurred unanimously in the view that unemployment insurance was purely a question of provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. McINTOSH: There is no question about that.

Mr. TURNBULL: Absolutely not, yet hon. gentlemen get up in this house and condemn the government because they do not bring in a bill dealing with unemployment insurance, and in addition we hear those same hon. gentlemen promise that when they get back into power they will do so, though as my hon. friend says there is absolutely no doubt that this parliament has not the power to take that action.

An hon. MEMBER: What about old age pensions?

Mr. TURNBULL: The same was true with regard to old age pensions as a federal scheme. Possibly unemployment insurance can be handled in the same way, provided the provinces are agreeable to having it done in that way and provided we can get away from the idea that it is a vicious principle for the Dominion government to raise money by taxation and allow the provincial governments to spend it. I am somewhat in agreement with the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in that regard. I think the proper way is not to try to get around the constitution but rather to try to amend the constitution. If it should be a matter of federal responsibility let us amend the constitution and make it a federal responsibility, and then we will not need subterfuges in order to attain the desired end.

The question of national recovery is bound up with questions of monetary policy. Perhaps so far as that is concerned the Dominion government has the legislative jurisdiction, but monetary policy is not the only thing to be considered. This country will not be restored to its one time prosperity by monetary policy alone, neither will it be restored just by the setting up of a central bank. There are those who believe that once a central bank is set up everything will be all right, that anyone who wants money will be able to get it in a bundle. One of the leaders of the C.C.F. party in Saskatchewan said that their policy would be to provide all the money desired by those who produced goods as well as all the money desired by those who purchased the goods. But there is more than monetary policy involved; there is the question of distribution and the marketing of goods. That is both an internal and external question; it has to do both with our domestic and foreign markets. The jurisdiction is divided in that case; the Dominion government has control of exports while the provincial governments have control of marketing within their own borders, and that is another item that must be taken into consideration in considering the question of national recovery.

There is also an economic policy to be considered; the control of production, if that is thought to be essential; the regulation of production, if that is thought to be essential, and the establishment of credits, if that is thought to be essential. I am told there are industries in this Dominion of Canada which already have established codes of their own—it may be one of those things that we hear called combines, but there are combines which, if they conduct themselves in the interests of the public, are very desirable—and such industries in Canada as have established codes of their own, have thereby regulated their own business in such a way that their products are on the markets of Canada at less money than they were when they followed a policy of ruthless competition instead of one under which they regulate production among themselves.

Then there is the question as to what part industrial relationships should play in the national recovery. The question of hours of labour, rates of pay, insurance against ill health, insurance against accident, insurance against unemployment—these are matters which must be dealt with if a general national recovery is to be brought about. There is the matter of social relationships, and the question of pensions, whether they be war pensions, old age pensions or any other kind. All these are matters in connection with which there is divided jurisdiction.

Then, there is the question of taxation which ought to be considered, and that of the dominion raising money by taxes and giving it to the provinces to be spent. There is the question of the field of taxation. Let us for example consider the income tax. As a western member let me state that in the province from which I come there is an income tax for federal purposes, and one for provincial purposes. Both those income taxes bear heavily upon the western members. It costs us money to come to Ottawa to live and to earn our sessional indemnity. While a commercial traveller is allowed his expenses while away from home, a member of the House of Commons is not allowed those expenses by the federal government. The provinces have followed the lead of the dominion, and the result is that so far as sessional indemnity is concerned members from Saskatchewan are assessed twice on their gross incomes rather than once on their net incomes. So that there is the question of income tax.

The fact of the matter is that the Dominion government is being asked in all parts of Canada to stage a national recovery while the powers essential to such recovery are largely in the hands of provincial legislatures. The position is an impossible one. In the year 1934 the scheme of things in Canada is entirely changed from what it was in 1867. There have been improvements in transportation, improvements in communication, and a closer relationship between the people in different parts of the country, with the result that matters which were formely of local and private concern or interest are now dominion-wide in their scope and extent. The scheme which was wise in 1867 and which operated under conditions prevailing in that year and many years since may not be wise to-day. In those days people lived in communities separated from each other; they had their individual problems which did not infringe on the individual problems of others; they could take care of their own difficulties in a local way. But now our country is bound together by business relationships, communications and transportation; things which formerly affected the people of only one province now affect the dominion as a whole. The production of wheat in Saskatchewan, a local and private matter having to do with property and civil rights, is one which profoundly affects the whole dominion. It is a matter with which the Prime Minister of Canada could not deal at the conference in London until he had before him the request of the three prairie provinces so to deal with it. And when any person says, Mr. Speaker, that this wheat agreement arrived at in London is the result of a Tory policy of restriction, let me say to him that it is the result of the combined requests of a Farmer government in Alberta, a Conservative-Farmer government in Saskatchewan, and a Farmer-Liberal government in Manitoba. The Dominion government in carrying out its policy was only carrying out the policy asked for by those three prairie provinces through their representative, Major MacPherson, whose signature is affixed to the wheat agreement.

The question of reduction of acreage, if there is any reduction—I do not believe there will be—is a matter for the provinces to handle. Again we are dealing with a question of property and civil rights, a point which the provinces fully realize. There are those who used to say that the Prime Minister of Canada was an economic nationalist. A few years later when we got the imperial treaties these people broadened their views and stated that he was an economic imperialist. In the course of a few more years they may get further wisdom and describe him as he really is. The fact is that only two international conferences in the last ten years have been successful and have resulted in action, the imperial economic conference of 1932, and the wheat conference in London in 1933. Strange to say, the man who is said not to want to have any truck or trade with his neighbours, the man who has been referred to as an economic nationalist, was chairman of both those conferences.

The necessity for national recovery is apparent to everybody. Before this federal government can bring about national recovery it must have legislative jurisdiction placed in its hands. In 1934 we need more centralized authority than we did in 1867, all of which brings me to the point that a thorough revision of the British North America Act with regard to the respective legislative jurisdictions of the dominion and the provinces is long overdue. The field of legislative jurisdiction and the field of taxation ought to be reexamined in the light of present circumstances. The fullest protection as now provided for in the act should be given to minorities, but with respect to monetary, economic, social and industrial relationships there should be a revision of the whole scheme of affairs so that the central authority should have control over those things which have a bearing upon the welfare of Canada as a whole. I am of the opinion that the sooner we set about making this change the better.

Unfortunately there are some who hold the view that if one province dissents from an amendment to the British North America Act there can be no amendment. I believe the sooner we get away from that idea the better. We must get down to the point where we will think that even with respect to the British North America Act—and I understand fully the contractual argument—we are dealing with more than a matter of contract among the provinces. In the interests of a minority province whose economic welfare depends upon the welfare of the dominion as a whole I submit that the majority should rule, and that the act should be revised and revamped in all its phases touching upon the welfare of the dominion as a whole, regardless of whether or not one or two provinces hold out against such revision.

I wish to congratulate the government upon the improvement which has taken place in Canada in the last eight months. I do not say that the improvement is due entirely to the action of the government, because we know that world conditions affect our country as all others. I congratulate the government because in a time of stress it has stood firmly through adversity, has led the Canadian people on the right path, and, more than that, has kept the Canadian people from straying into by-ways so that when world recovery, assisted by our legislative scheme, is brought about, we may be in a position to play a large part in it. We are making as much progress as any other country in the world. We are increasing our exports and our imports. We are increasing our exports to the empire and our imports from it. To hon. members who say that because we have done that we have prevented ourselves from trading with the rest of the world, let me say that we are increasing our exports to and our imports from the rest of the world. In all phases we are adding to our prosperity. When the day comes that western Canada can produce again a crop of wheat—they will do it again—and when they add to their wheat production the live stock they are producing to-day, it will be surprising how fast the wheels of industry will begin to turn in the east and how fast the people of the west will begin to pay their debts and again take their places among the prosperous provinces of Canada.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, there is only one remark of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Turnbull) to which I wish to direct the attention of the house. He said that in the spring of 1932, when the relief bill was before the house, the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) by his opposition to that bill prevented the farmers of western Canada who had been dried out the year before and needed seed, from getting their seed for six weeks. My hon. friend is not well informed on that matter.

It will be recalled that in the summer of 1931, when it was first realized that the entire western prairie country was to have no crop and likely no seed in the country next year, the government took the precaution of buying what wheat there was in the country and holding it for distribution amongst the farmers the following spring. In the spring of 1932, when the relief bill was before this house and members on this side were opposing it through a protracted debate, it was freely said from the other side that the farmers of western Canada would not get their seed until that bill passed. I am going to be kinder to the Prime Minister and the government than the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) was, because with all his faults the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) was not guilty of doing the thing of which the hon. member accuses him. During that debate I had occasion to go west, and when I arrived the snow was still on the ground, the frost had not yet come out, no work had commenced on the land, but the farmers were drawing their seed home from the elevators, and getting it from the Saskatchewan relief commission, and when I came back I found that the same debate was still going on; and so I say I am kinder to the Prime Minister than was the hon. member for Regina. I do not accuse him of depriving the farmers of the west of seed grain until the opposition yielded and allowed the bill to pass.

As I listened the other day to the Prime Minister, he gave us figure after figure, tables and columns of figures, to prove that at last we were turning the corner and that prosperity was beginning to dawn upon us, until I began to wonder if it was really so. But afterwards, studying the figures carefully in Hansard, I was not so sure of it. At page 63 of Hansard the Prime Minister gives us four tables comparing conditions in Canada with conditions in other countries. The object of giving us this table was to prove that if conditions are bad here they are at least as bad elsewhere. They tell us that misery loves company, that a person can always find some consolation from contemplating others who are as badly off as himself but that has well been described as the "consolation of the damned." It is true that the rest of the world is in distress, but if that teaches us anything, if we can learn anything from the four tables that appear on page 63 of Hansard, it is that the world is a unit, that if one country suffers we all suffer, that if one country prospers we all prosper. When we hurt one country we hurt all countries. When we strangle trade with one country we strangle our own trade. After studying these tables which the Prime Minister submitted I hope that he will never again stand up on a public platform in this country and boast that he is strangling the trade of the foreigner.

On the next page, 64, the Prime Minister submits a table showing improvement figures based on actual quantities; to prove his statement that conditions were getting better in this country, he gives the figures for February, November and December, all in the same year, and right at the top of the table appear the words "No adjustment for seasonal variations." To prove the country is prosperous the Prime Minister shows that in February of last year we imported six million pounds of raw cotton, in November nineteen million pounds, and in December nearly twenty million pounds. Well, anybody would expect that our cotton manufacturers would bring in more cotton in the fall, when raw cotton comes on the market, than in February, after the market has been supplied. The Prime Minister does not compare the same months in different years. He compares different months in the same year, and the table is of no value whatever.

But if this table were an indication that trade is improving, it is also an indication that trade has gone the other way. The figures which he submits in most instances show an improvement from February to November, and then a very decided reaction from November to December. Take newsprint production, for instance. The figures show that our production in February was 125,000 tons, in November 193,000 tons, and in December 175,000 tons. Of planks and boards our exports in February were 37,000,000 feet; in November 102,000,000; in December 99,000,000; copper exports, February 1,326,000 pounds, November 4,498,000, and then the figure dropped in December to less than 2,000,000 pounds; nickel exports, February 3,000,000 pounds, November 8,500,000, and then a drop to 6,500,000 in December; carloadings, February 133,000, November 201,000, and then a drop to 157,000 in December; bank debits, February $1,830,000,000, November $2,837,000,000, and then down to $2,491,000,000, in December, or a decline of nearly $350,000,000; contracts awarded, February $3,000,000, November $10,000,000, and then only $8,000,000 for December. So I say that this table which the Prime Minister has submitted as a sign of prosperity is no indication of prosperity because although it shows an improvement from February to November, it also shows a sharp decline from November to December.

On the same page the Prime Minister gives a table showing the wholesale prices of Canadian farm products, indicating that the average price for the year 1932 was 48·4 per cent of what it was in 1926, and that in 1933 it was 51 per cent. But he makes no allowance for the fact that our dollar in the meantime had gone down from 88 cents in gold to 73 cents in gold, and if you make allowance for that difference, then in order to hold our own the average price for 1933 should have been 56½ per cent instead of 51 per cent.

Turning over to page 68 of the Prime Minister's speech, there he gives another example of returning prosperity. He says that he knows one merchant in the city of Ottawa who told him that December was the best month he had had in six years for cash business. But that is no indication of anything. It would be strange indeed if somebody was not doing better than others in this depression. What kind of a merchant was this? It might have been a coal dealer for all we know, and anybody who knows the kind of weather we had here in December will realize that a coal dealer would certainly do more business in that month than in the same month in any of the previous six years.

[Mr. Young.]

On page 70 the Prime Minister says that our exports in 1933 amounted to $531,474,000 as compared with $493,808,841 in 1932. Here again he makes no allowance for the changed value of our dollar. Let us bring those figures to a common denominator and measure them by the unvarying yardstick of gold. Our dollar in 1932 was worth 88 cents in gold; that is the average price for the year; its average price for the year 1933 was 73 cents in gold. Therefore in 1932, when our dollar was worth 88 cents in gold, our exports amounted to $434,551,000, and in the next year, 1933, when our dollar was worth 73 cents in gold, our exports really amounted to only $387,000,000, when you take into account the changed value of the dollar, and that is a very decided reduction when measured by the unvarying yardstick of gold.

On the same page of Hansard the Prime Minister says:

> But there is something more than that. The principal fall in our external trade has been with the United States of America.

Further on he says, referring to the Americans:

> They have raised almost prohibitive tariffs against the world. They have declined to permit other countries to find markets in their country, and they expect to find markets in ours.

In all the years I have been here I have been trying to denounce the tariff policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, but I have never been able to frame a sentence which so clearly and concisely damns the policy of this government. Let us change the pronoun and we will find that it applies with equal truth. Instead of "they," let us put in "we," and it will read this way:

> We have raised almost prohibitive tariffs against the world. We have declined to permit other countries to find markets in our country, and we expect to find markets in theirs.

Did any hon. member on this side ever draw up such a damning indictment of the government's policy as that?

While I am speaking on trade with the United States, let me give a few figures. We have been told repeatedly, especially when we were in office, that this country had an adverse trade balance with that country of some $300,000,000 per year, that we were buying that much more from them than they were buying from us. It was then claimed that the right hon. gentleman would put a stop to that when he got into power. The figures given were substantially true. For the two years 1928 and 1929 our total imports from the United States amounted to $1,715,000,000 and our total exports to that country during the same two years amounted to $1,057,000,000, leaving a so-called adverse trade balance of $658,000,000 for the two years. Let us look at the figures for our trade with the whole world. During the same two years our exports to the whole world amounted to $2,533,000,000 and our imports amounted to $2,513,000,000. That is, our exports and imports to and from the whole world were almost in exact balance, one almost exactly paid for the other. But our exports to the United States were $658,000,000 less than our imports. What did that mean? It meant that while we were buying more from the United States, we were buying less from other countries, and our exports to the whole world were just about paying for our imports. You will recall that 1928 and 1929 were the years when the American people were extending enormous credits to the people of Europe. The people of Europe were using those credits to buy our wheat, our lumber, our newsprint, our surplus manufactured goods and so on. They could not pay for them with their own money, but the Americans had extended credit to them and said: "Go ahead; buy Canadian wheat, buy Canadian lumber, buy Canadian newsprint, buy Canadian mineral products and so on and we will pay for them." And they did. We sold our products to Europe and we received payment from the United States. We received payment in goods—the kind of goods we wanted—and that was the thing that hon. gentlemen opposite complained of; that was the thing they said they would stop. That is the thing that has been stopped. When the people of Europe could not obtain any more credit in the United States, when the United States would no longer pay for the goods that Europe was buying from us, then we could not sell our surplus products. Yet my hon. friends glory in the ruin they have wrought.

Let us now consider the wheat agreement. On page 75 of Hansard the Prime Minister is reported as quoting a telegram which he received from the premiers of the prairie provinces. I shall read only the third paragraph, which is:

> That in view of the present large world surplus of wheat and the present prospect of a further large Canadian crop, some plan of curtailment of wheat production in or exports from the four principal exporting countries is essential to any such price increase;

It is upon that telegram that the wheat agreement has been based. The Prime Minister went over to the economic conference and because he had been advised by the provincial premiers that there was a surplus of wheat in the world, that because of that surplus we could not sell our wheat and it was advisable to curtail production, he took part in the proceedings which resulted in the wheat agreement. Since the opening of this session he has been good enough to place in our hands a pamphlet setting forth the reasons why this wheat agreement is necessary. I shall not take the trouble to read from the pamphlet, but I have made a synopsis of the figures which are to be found on page 8. This pamphlet is the strongest case that could be made out in support of the world agreement. It states that during the thirty years, from 1885 to 1915 the world wheat acreage increased by 100,000,000 acres, an average increase of three and one-third million acres per annum, and that world production in the same time increased by 2,000,000,000 bushels, an average increase of over 66,000,000 bushels per annum. The pamphlet also tells us that that increase was just about enough to take care of the steadily increasing requirements of the world for no surplus had been built up during all those years. From 1915 to 1922 the world wheat acreage decreased by 41,000,000 acres while production decreased by 850,000,000 bushels. In the next ten years, from 1922 to 1932, the world acreage increased by 75,000,000 acres as compared with the 1922 figure, or 34,000,000 acres more than it was in 1915. Had the normal rate of increase continued from 1915 to 1932, the increase would have been 57,000,000 acres. As it was, the acreage in 1932 was only 34,000,000 acres more than it was in 1915. World production in 1932 had increased 800,000,000 bushels above what it was in 1922, but it must be remembered that in 1922 it was down 850,000,000 bushels. The production in 1932 was 50,000,000 bushels less than in 1915. The production figures are not yet complete for 1933-34, but it is estimated that it will be 175,000,000 bushels less than in 1932. The total production for 1933-34 will be 225,000,000 bushels less than in 1915. Under normal conditions there should have been an increase of 1,250,000,000 bushels in that time, and the world would have been able to take care of it.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): What does that prove?

Mr. YOUNG: It proves that this so-called surplus of wheat is mythical—that there is no surplus. But wheat is not the only food of the human race. People might be eating less wheat and more of something else and production might swing from wheat to rye, from wheat to barley or from wheat to something else. In order to get a true picture we must consider not the question of whether there is too much wheat in the world, but whether there is too much food in the world. I have before me the figures for the world production of wheat, oats, barley, rye and potatoes, the five principal foods of the white races. World production in these five foods for the year 1932 amounted to 15,490,000,000 bushels. The average world production of the same foods for the five years from 1926 to 1930 was 18,498,000,000 bushels. In other words, instead of being up, the world production of food in 1932 had decreased 16 per cent below the average. The figures for 1931 reveal the fact that the production for that year was 20 per cent below the average.

In the light of these figures how can anyone say that there is an over-production of wheat in the world? Last year the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) stood in his place in the house and told us that the surplus was rapidly disappearing, that the vast quantities of wheat which the farmers of Europe were in the habit of carrying in the stack and which represented a vast invisible supply had disappeared. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was right when he said that the surplus was largely disappearing, and the time that scarcity is going to overtake us is a year closer than it was when that statement was made. I notice that the minister has not been in his seat while this wheat agreement has been under discussion. I do not blame him because I believe that in his heart he knows there is neither a surplus wheat nor an overproduction. A thousand million people in the world are not getting enough to eat. Give each one of them an extra slice of bread three times a day and the so-called surplus will disappear over night. Some day soon the people of the world are going to wake up to the fact that the world is facing a wheat shortage, that we are actually on the verge of famine. Then the people will rise and demand from their governments an explanation as to why they were not allowed to buy the wheat they needed when the people in other countries were willing to sell it; and the people of this country will rise and demand an explanation as to why this government did not allow us to buy the manufactured goods we needed and which the people of Europe were willing to give in exchange for our wheat.

The trouble is not overproduction of wheat. We must seek the cause elsewhere, and it is to be found in the fact that the governments of the world will not allow their people to buy it, and the governments of the countries that have wheat to sell will not allow their people to accept goods in exchange for it. The solution of the wheat problem is not to curtail acreage but to find some way of breaking down these barriers that prevent wheat from flowing where it is needed and that stop other goods from coming back in payment for it.

In the prairie section of this country we have only one possible source of wealth, namely, our land. Our soil and our climate are preeminently suited to the growing of wheat. In spite of the fact that we are further from seaboard than any other wheat producing country in the world, we have succeeded in growing wheat and putting it on the world market in competition with all countries. We have met with some measure of success growing it. We have demonstrated our ability to make a living at it, but we have not demonstrated our ability to make a living at anything else. Those who tell us to stop growing grain and go in for mixed farming do not know what they are talking about. The country is, as I say, preeminently suited to the growing of wheat and nothing else, and now we are being asked to abandon the one thing that we can do. To what else can we turn? There is nothing else we can make a living at, and because governments in some other countries are trying to force upon their people an uneconomic policy of trying to feed themselves we are asked to abandon the one thing that we can do. Has any one really practical suggestion been offered by anybody who supports this agreement as to how it will be carried out? How will you enforce it? Are you going to go to each individual farmer and tell him to sow so many acres less, leaving the rest of his land to grow weeds? Are you going to compensate the farmer, or are you going to tell him to go ahead and grow all the wheat he likes and then refuse to allow him to sell it? And how will you apportion it? Not one practical suggestion has been offered by anyone supporting the agreement as to how it will be carried out. We have an exhibition in Saskatchewan at the present time of the incompetence of governments. The provincial government is sending out one set of officials to advise the farmers to get busy and prepare to fight the grasshopper plague—because we have twenty-two million acres infested with grasshopper eggs—one set of officials, I say, going out telling the people to fight the grasshoppers lest they destroy the crops, and now another set of officials going out advising the farmers to destroy the crops themselves. This is an example of planned economy—planning done by the state.

In my opinion there is no way of carrying out the agreement except by some form of centralized marketing under government control, and I wonder how many hon. gentlemen opposite are in favour of the centralized marketing of wheat. How many are in favour of the government taking hold and doing all the marketing? Every government in the world during the past several years has been doing its level best to raise the price of wheat. They have raised tariffs, imposed embargoes, granted bounties, enforced milling restrictions —have done everything conceivable to increase the price of wheat. And the net result of all their activities is the lowest price in history. Can we never learn anything from experience? Surely it is time for the peoples of the world to tell their governments to get out of the way and let wheat prices find their own level.

An hon. MEMBER: As was done in the paper business.

Mr. YOUNG: It was government privilege that put the paper industry in the mess it is in now. So much for the wheat agreement.

There are one or two other matters in the speech from the throne to which I would direct the attention of the house. Mention is made of an attempt to provide intermediate or short term credits for agriculture. It seems to me that if we want to provide intermediate or short term or long term or any other sort of credits for agriculture the first thing to do is to make it possible for agriculture to pay its debts. No one will lend money to the farmer to grow crops that will not pay the expense of growing. The money we pay in interest on our debts is not all interest. Part of it is interest on the money borrowed, part of it is the cost of rendering the service and part of it is insurance against loss. The greater the risk the greater the cost of insurance against loss, and if you want to reduce interest rates the first thing to do is to make the loan safe, and that portion which we call interest, which really goes to cover the risk, will disappear. Then it will be easier to get money, and when money is easier to get, when there is more competition in lending, then the cost of the service will come down and interest also will decline. The first and only way to bring down the rate of interest to farmers is to put the farmers in a position to repay the loans they obtain.

Then there is a proposal to try to relieve unemployment by launching an extensive program of public works, and it is generally believed that this will be paid for by the printing of new money. I was startled when the announcement appeared in the press that the Prime Minister would adopt that policy. A week later, speaking in Vancouver, he said that they would have to do some serious thinking before they ventured on such a policy. I hope he has done that very serious thinking. The question arises—Can you relieve unemployment by creating public works? Do you not create as much unemployment as you relieve? In the first place, no program of public works that can possibly be launched in this country will reach all the unemployed. Unemployed are to be found in every nook and corner of the country. You cannot create public works everywhere, and if you take men away from their homes and put them to work on public works you place them under the necessity of paying their board in one section of the country and keeping their homes in another place. Their expenses will eat up their wages and there will be nothing left for them to support their families at home. If you pay for the public works by a direct tax on the people, you take the money out of one man's pocket and put it into another man's, and the man out of whose pocket you take it can buy that much less goods; he buys as much less as the other buys more. You cannot solve unemployment by taking money out of one man's pocket and putting it into somebody else's, because in increasing the purchasing power of the one you are reducing the purchasing power of the other. The way to solve unemployment is to create a demand for goods the production of which will give employment to the people. You must increase the purchasing power of the people, but when you collect taxes from one set of people and give them to another set you reduce the purchasing power of the first set of people by a slightly larger amount than you increase the purchasing power of the others. If you issue bonds, borrowing the money, there is a possibility of bringing into circulation some money that might otherwise be lying idle, but in that event you saddle yourself with interest charges. But suppose you do what it is generally expected will be done—simply print new money? What do you do then? You simply add water to the soup, you only thin it out. For with the same quantity of goods in the country to be consumed, and a little more money to buy them with, it just takes a little more money to buy them. The man who gets this new money simply buys goods that otherwise would be bought by others. There is a danger too in creating public works that we saddle ourselves with a maintenance cost which we will find it very difficult later on to carry. I know we have to see that no one starves; we cannot allow people to starve in our midst; we cannot allow undue suffering, but the condition in this country to-day is so serious that the work of relief must be done in the cheapest possible way, and our experience in the past has been that the creation of public works is not the cheapest possible way. We know from our experience in the first year that it took $4 from the treasury to put $1 into the pocket of the workingman. Perhaps that was an overstatement, for the other $3 did not all go into profits and capital; it went in part to pay wages to those who produced the materials bought. But it has been found everywhere that the creation of public works is the most expensive form of relief you can dispense. Perhaps there are some kinds of public works that would not saddle us with maintenance costs later on, that perhaps might even be revenue producing. We might spend money draining marshlands, making them fit for cultivation, or perhaps improving our forests. We might even try the experiment of reforestation, that would give employment for the time being and perhaps produce revenue later on. There are places where perhaps we could catch the spring run-off of water and hold it against the dry seasons. But speaking broadly the cheapest way to handle the unemployment situation is by paying direct relief, and the finances of this country will not stand relief in any other but the cheapest way.

One other matter, that of the central bank. We are to have a central bank; the Macmillan commission has recommended it; the government is pledged to it, the opposition and the third party all seem disposed to have it. Then the question arises: What kind of central bank are we going to have, and how are we going to run it? I think a great many people are due for disappointment when the central bank comes into being. There are those who think that the central bank is going to force the other banks to lend us money whether we are likely to be able to pay it back or not. There are others who say a central bank is one where the government can get all the money it wants without taxing the people. I heard it said that a central bank is one where a municipality can go with its tax roll and deposit the roll and get the cash instead of collecting the taxes. All these fantastic ideas prevail. What we must remember is that after we get our central bank it will not be able to create wealth out of nothing. It will have to be run by ordinary fallible individuals like ourselves, and the problem will be how to find the very best men to run it; men with understanding, men with courage, men of character. I want to give this piece of advice to the government, that the directors of this bank should be so chosen that neither the government, nor the banks, nor the big financial interests, nor the captains of industry so-called, nor anybody else will be in a position to put undue pressure on them.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. YOUNG: That I think is the best advice I can give the government in regard to a central bank.

Mr. ERRICK F. WILLIS (Souris): I desire at the outset, Mr. Speaker, to compliment the two gentlemen who moved and seconded the address in reply. I desire to do this particularly in view of the fact that the theme of my address will not be entirely complimentary. I listened to the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young), who has just taken his seat, make the usual address in regard to free trade in this country, which I have heard on so many occasions. The hon. member criticized the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) because the Prime Minister dared to point out that there is distress in other places besides Canada, and also that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) had never happened to mention that fact. The hon. member for Weyburn should get together with the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) because they made two speeches entirely contradictory of each other. That, I suppose is due to the policies of Liberalism, which embraces high-protectionism, Progressivism, Liberalism, and other isms—

Mr. YOUNG: And two Conservative parties.

Mr. WILLIS: The hon. member for Weyburn said the fact that the retail stores of this country are selling more than usual meant nothing. That is the sort of argument he advances. When the retail stores sell more goods while the Conservatives are in power it means nothing, but when the Liberals were in power their leader could tour this country and tell people that retailers were selling more, and therefore the country was prosperous.

The hon. member for Weyburn says the wheat surplus is a myth. That will be news to the people of western Canada. Again I refer him to the hon. member for West Edmonton who in loud and vociferous terms the other evening damned this government completely because there is this overproduction and surplus. So all I can say to the hon. member for Weyburn is: "You boys get together."

I cannot complete my reference to the hon. member without paying him at least one compliment. I believe as he does that public works will not satisfy the conditions which we have in this country. Public works themselves, while they have value in certain districts, will not entirely relieve unemployment in this country.

I only desire to make one more correction in regard to the address of the hon. member for Weyburn. He referred to himself as a fallible person, or themselves as fallible persons. I should like him to remember that although they may be fallible, all the persons in this country are not gullible.

I desire to refer to two addresses made in this house. I apologize to you, Mr. Speaker, for making this address, but I had not intended to make it until I read the speech of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown); so if there is any blame attaching in regard to the remarks which I am now making let it rest upon his head.

Let me refer first to one or two remarks of the hon. member for West Edmonton, who the other evening delivered an address of great volume. He referred, as reported on page 136 of Hansard, to the fact that this government, while it did implement its promise in regard to the construction of public works to relieve unemployment, subsequently turned to the dole, and therefore in his opinion it should be thrown out of office. But the hon. member for Weyburn says the dole is the only policy; that for this purpose public works cannot be satisfactorily undertaken. Again I say to the hon. member for Weyburn and the hon. member for West Edmonton: "You boys get together."

The hon. member for West Edmonton says that because of the great natural resources of this country we should have none of the present difficulties. I recall the story of a gentleman who went to the old country and was to make an address to a group of businessmen. He asked one gentleman what it was he should say, and the Englishman replied: "Far be it from me to advise you, except to this extent: for goodness sake don't mention those great natural resources of your country." But the hon. member for West Edmonton feels that the people are still gullible and can still be told these things.

The hon. member for West Edmonton condemns a former member of this house who is now on the tariff board because he had the audacity to say that the Liberal party increased the tariff of this country. For that reason he is to be condemned, in spite of the fact that statistics for any year will prove to anyone who desires to look at the figures that time and again in this house his statement has been proven to be true. One is surprised to hear the addresses of the hon. member for Weyburn in regard to tariffs in this country when that government of which he was a part, increased tariffs during their regime after having promised that they would lower them. One hears strange stories in that regard.

Mr. YOUNG: Strange stories of a speech in Toronto.

Mr. WILLIS: Yes, I am coming to that, and it is no strange story. I am surprised that the hon. member should harp continuously on the same theme when he knows that the government of which he was a part increased tariffs after having promised not to do so. If the hon. member has any doubts in that regard, let him try to get the portfolio of national revenue in a Liberal government in this country. Let the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) try to get the portfolio of trade and commerce in any Liberal government. No, they would have no chance. The Liberal party takes no chances in regard to the tariff; they place in those positions the millionaires of eastern Canada in order to safeguard the interests of the east. May I say to you gentlemen who parade your virtues with regard to free trade throughout western Canada that every government that comes into power in Canada will do precisely the same thing, and if you think the people are so gullible as to swallow that again, then I say that so far as my people are concerned they will not do so. Look at those who are independent in politics in this country; go to the farmers' group in Alberta and ask them what they think in regard to the tariff question no matter whether they were Liberals or Conservatives previously.

The hon. member for West Edmonton quoted many statistics which were furnished by a friend of the hon. member for Weyburn, all of which proved to be untrue and incorrect. I suppose that is the usual line of argument that has been advanced in the past.

Again, and another strange thing, the hon. member for West Edmonton seems to condemn the group which sits to his left. Here is what he says:

> I want to say to my hon. friend—

That was the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) to whom he was speaking.

> —that his fears, and the fears of the gentlemen who support him, that they may be in any way contaminated by association with the Liberal party, may be set at rest at once.

Isn't that good? The good old Liberal party says to the farm groups of Alberta: "You are terrible; we will have nothing whatever to do with you gentlemen." It says to the farm groups of Saskatchewan: "We will not have a thing to do with you; we will condemn you on every platform in Canada." Then it comes to Manitoba and says to the United Farmers of Manitoba: "We are all for you; you are all good boys. Come into our party." So they came into the party, and they are still there.

Let us follow along the speech of the hon member for West Edmonton and see a few more of the difficulties into which he got. He was speaking in regard to protection and the fact that the wages paid in the factories were not very high. He said:

> I am astonished to learn that the lowest scale of wages in the history of those industries is now in effect.

He was speaking of the silk industry and others. In Cornwall in the rayon silk industry the lowest wages now paid are $12.50 per week, which is more than some school teachers are being paid. In spite of that fact the hon. member makes that sort of statement in this house. He must have thought he was out on the hustings in western Canada. Then in another paragraph he says:

> The government was told that if they gave this measure of protection it would never reach the employee. It never does, it goes in excessive profits to the manufacturer himself.

I suppose when the hon. member made that statement he had in mind the furniture industry, which was given a protection of 52 per cent under his government; therefore he had a very intimate knowledge in regard to the excess profits gained by manufacturers under the administration of his party. The hon. member went on to say that this government is not thinking at all of the farmers of western Canada. In reply may I say that this has been proven untrue time and again. I am sorry the hon. member has not read my recent speeches on the subject; I suppose I cannot blame him for that, but I would refer him to my address of March 31, 1933, when I took forty minutes to prove that this government had done more for agriculture than any other government we ever had in Canada.

The hon. gentleman went on to condemn the Ottawa agreements, and finally he said:

> I have lived in western Canada for over twenty-six years, Mr. Speaker, and I have never known the people to be so incensed as they are to-day.

Let me say to the hon. gentleman that I have lived in western Canada much longer than he has. I come from a district where they have not had crops for four years; I visit my people every year and hold from fifteen to twenty-five meetings, and I never saw the people more willing to listen to a discussion of the affairs of their country or more lacking in heat and recrimination than they are at present, due to the fact that they know the government has been doing what it can for them.

Now for a few moments I should like to deal with the reverend and hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown), because he said some things which were true. The hon. gentleman said that the east had sent us many carloads of food and clothing which were greatly appreciated. That is absolutely true. We in our district in particular desire to pay a tribute to eastern Canada for the help they have given us. My district is different from the district from which the hon. member for Lisgar comes, and there came to us from eastern and other parts of Canada some fifty-six carloads of vegetables, which enabled the people to keep alive. In addition there came ten carloads of apples from eastern Canada, without which I believe there would have been many deaths due to malnutrition. So we desire to pay this tribute.

I should like now to make a comment or two on the remarks of the reverend and hon. member for Lisgar in regard to the wheat agreement. He said, "I look upon it with a great deal of fear." May I say to the hon. gentleman that this is the first thing the Bracken government ever did upon which he looked with fear. I would refer him to the Bracken government, of which he is a supporter and a strong proponent, and I would suggest that he take his representations to that government and to the professor of economics of the University of Manitoba, who is a great friend of his as well as a friend of mine. Let him go to the grain exchange also.

Mr. BROWN: They both hold my views.

Mr. WILLIS: Apparently your views have impressed them about as much as they have impressed me. However, I do not desire to comment on the wheat agreement, because western Canada has accepted it. The grain exchange has accepted it; economic experts have accepted it, and those by whom it has not been accepted are those who cannot look with kindly or friendly eyes upon any act with which this government is connected, and who consider that the greatest crime ever committed in this country was perpetrated on July 28, 1930, when hon. members opposite were not returned to power.

The hon. member for Lisgar complained that members on this side do not get his viewpoint. He said:

Why will not hon. gentlemen opposite try to get our point of view?

Let me point out some of the difficulties in the way of getting that point of view. The hon. member for Lisgar and other hon. members make speeches in regard to the tariff policy of this government, but they never happen to mention that their own government while in office increased tariffs. They never mention that fact out in our country, and therefore I have to mention it now. It is difficult to understand the point of view of hon. members coming from the province of Manitoba, only one of whom has the courage to say he is a Liberal. That is to say, of all the members from that province sitting behind the leader of the opposition, the only one who in the province of Manitoba calls himself a Liberal is the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden). The others are Progressives. One calls himself a Liberal-Progressive, another a National-Progressive, and the hon. member for Lisgar is not a Liberal,—oh, certainly not! You may be surprised to learn he is not a Liberal, despite the fact that he has sat behind the Liberal chief for so many years. If hon. members will take the trouble to look up the little red book known as the Parliamentary Guide they will find that the hon. member for Lisgar is still a Progressive, despite the fact that he has continued to follow the right hon. gentleman who now leads the opposition. This is something which I know the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) must find difficult to understand. May I say, however, for the benefit of the hon. member for Acadia, that generally speaking it is not known in the constituency of Lisgar that the hon. member sits with the Liberal party, that he is not a Progressive and speaks against Progressive policies in this House of Commons. That is not generally known, but I promise the hon. member for Acadia that I shall do my best to make it known.

Let us try to get the point of view of these hon. gentlemen. How could we get the point of view of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien). He sits with the Liberals, but we find that he calls himself a National-Progressive. Just what is a National-Progressive? I must confess it is difficult to understand even a rational Progressive, but a National-Progressive is quite beyond the bounds of human thought.

The hon. member for Lisgar paid me a great many compliments which are responsible for my speech of this evening. He quoted from a Canadian Press report of a speech I made in the city of Toronto, in which I am quoted as having said such and so.

Mr. GRAY: Read it.

Mr. WILLIS: The press dispatch states that I was delightfully frank in the city of Toronto. I hope I shall always be so. I read:

Mr. Willis told his audience—and it must have been something of a shock to most of those present—that he represented the new type of Conservative which "makes the party a young man's party,"—

Mr. YOUNG: Go on.

Mr. WILLIS: I pause to say that the proof of my statement is ample. I shall read plenty for you boys before I am through. The proof that the Conservative party is the young man's party is quite unnecessary in this House of Commons, although it may be necessary in the city of Toronto. In the house, as hon. members must know, most of the young men are on the Conservative side because the young men of Canada are naturally drawn towards the Conservative policy. It goes against the grain of a young member from western Canada to accept the Liberals, who go around and preach free trade and then come down here and sit behind a leader who has increased tariffs. That goes a bit against the grain, and while one may become dishonest in his old age we would not expect him to be dishonest so early in life.

The quotation continues with the words:

—and which does not believe in high tariffs—

Mr. GRAY: Read it all.

Mr. WILLIS: May I state for the information of the hon. member for Sarnia and points west that I will read it all. To continue:

—and which does not believe in high tariffs and "all the things which historically the party was supposed to stand for."

The history given to Conservatives in western Canada by members who sit opposite is that the Conservative party is composed entirely of people who believe only in high tariffs and are always looking back. When I made my speech in Toronto I wanted to point out that we do not look backwards, as do hon. members opposite, to theories in regard to free trade which came to us hundreds of years ago, and have been abandoned by those who are still young enough to think. I desired to point out to that audience, as I am pointing out to this house, that the people in western Canada, speaking generally, do not believe in the same degree of tariff protection as is thought proper by people in eastern Canada. That difference is due to the geographical locations of the two sections of the country.

Mr. YOUNG: Why don't you boys get together?

Mr. WILLIS: That is the difference between the boys on this side, and those opposite. We in western Canada accept the inevitability of protection because we know that in the St. Lawrence basin there is to be found fifty-five per cent of the Canadian population. We know that if you boys get into power you will increase the tariffs of Canada—and I use the word "if." You said you would not do it before, but you did it. Any government in power in Canada will increase tariffs, if the world is increasing them. It does not matter what you say, or how you may shake your heads. You said before that you would not raise tariffs; you shook your heads before, but you raised the tariffs. If you wish proof of it may I say that the hon. member who held the office of Minister of Finance in the late Liberal government, Mr. Dunning—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should address the chair.

Mr. WILLIS: I am very sorry Mr. Speaker, that I have not followed the rule of the house. I should much rather address my remarks to you than to hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. REID: So would we.

Mr. WILLIS: Mr. Speaker, one gets into difficulties in regard to this matter because one naturally addresses those who need the information most. The Minister of Finance in the previous government, who has now, of course, gone over to the big interests, formerly sent down each year from the Saskatchewan government a petition to this government in regard to free trade and the lowering of tariffs. Then he came to Ottawa, became Minister of Finance and became connected with the men in eastern Canada who he thought had influence. The Dunning budget was presented to the house, and through the countervailing duties of that budget it was anticipated that we had to have increased tariffs. The duties under the countervailing provisions in the Dunning budget would have effected tariff measures over which hon. members who now sit opposite could not have looked, or beyond which even their fancies could not have reached.

Therefore I repeat that any government which assumes power in Canada at a time when the world tendency is towards higher tariffs must follow that tendency, just as this government did. Any government which comes into power in Canada must get tariff revenue, and hon. members sitting opposite were the ones who gained most through tariff protection. For the first time in the history of Canada they took over $200,000,000 in tariffs from the people. Yet they say, "We do not believe in tariffs, certainly not; we just take the money." They do not pause to consider that five-sixths of the goods which enter Canada come in free of duty.

I believe my remarks will indicate to hon. members at least some reason why I have taken this opportunity to speak. There are one or two further matters however to which the hon. member for Lisgar referred and in connection with which I have some comment. Again the hon. member for Lisgar is killing horses up in his country. He says there are eight horses dead in a distance of seven miles, or something like that. I do not dispute that fact, but I want to warn the hon. member that the last time he told this house about dead horses I had letters, which I now hold in my hand, from men who wanted to engage him in public debate to prove that his statement was incorrect. I have a communication before me now from four men who are willing to take affidavits to the effect that the statement of the hon. member for Lisgar was incorrect. Of course, he is an honourable and reverend member of this house, but I wish him to be careful, that is all, in regard to statements he makes. Because the hon. member is a friend of mine I want him to be careful in that regard. If the hon. member wishes to have a line in regard to who some of these people are he should refer to the reeve of Pembina municipality, who would be very happy to furnish him with the information.

The hon. member for Lisgar says that hon. members on this side who do not believe in high tariffs are still supporting the government. The difference between those who sit on this side and the hon. member for Lisgar is that while he denounces high tariff all the time, yet it is all right when the government of which he is a supporter increases the tariff. But as far as we are concerned we do not preach free trade. We accept protection and have done so always.

The hon. member for Lisgar also said that he would not object to carrying on a campaign with these gentlemen because he would never let them get away with some of the statements they are trying to put over on the people. Well, Mr. Speaker, there are not many miles between us. In my constituency I hold from fifteen to twenty-five meetings each year and I invite questions and discuss at each meeting the tariff issue, taking some time to explain it to the people, with the result that now some of those who come to my meetings know at least a little bit more about it than they did previously. They know a little more about it than my hon. friend from Weyburn, who is now laughing, and who comes to this house and talks free trade and evolves many curious arguments in support of a theory which our grandfathers buried.

Mr. POULIOT: If the hon. gentleman answers questions, he should be sworn in as a cabinet minister.

Mr. WILLIS: Thank you, I accept the office. That reminds me that it is not so very long ago that the Canadian Press gave me a title. I have asked the members of the Canadian Press to give it to me, but so far unsuccessfully, and if anything can be done in regard to that matter I shall be glad of the assistance of hon. gentlemen opposite because it improves one's chances, particularly in the line of matrimony.

It is important so far as this country is concerned that certain forward steps should be taken. I think one of the foremost steps that has been taken by the government has been the appointment of a committee which is to inquire into prices and mass buying in this country. While passing through the city of Winnipeg I was stopped by a number of gentlemen who do not see politically the way I do, yet they asked me to convey their congratulations to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) upon the investigation which is to be carried out with respect to the distribution of commodities.

In conclusion, with regard to the stocks of gold in this country, due to the fact that in the United States the price of gold has now been fixed at $35 and that in Great Britain they are paying practically $35 for gold, it strikes me, as one who knows very little about the matter, that it may be necessary in this country for the government to take over the existing gold supplies now held by the banks and revalue our gold on a $35 basis, to the great benefit of the country, as I see it.

Then there is the question of debt in this country, which is of paramount importance. So far as the people I represent are concerned, it is perhaps the greatest problem which they have to face and will continue to have to face. It seems to me that those who hold the bonds of this country payable in Canada to the extent of some $200,000,000 might very well consent, and would consent, to a refunding at a saving of at least one to two per cent interest, which would mean a saving to the treasury of some $20,000,000 a year. There may be practical difficulties in the way, but at the moment I cannot see them.

Those are the two suggestions which I should like to leave with the house which seem to me of some importance. I trust that at a later date I shall be able to outline certain matters in regard to debt, and relief within the constituency which I represent. The whole drought area of the province of Manitoba is within my constituency as defined by the provincial government, and for the past four years the people in my constituency have been having great difficulty in the payment of their debts, in regard to relief, and in keeping starvation from their doors. They have their problems and the first brunt of them falls upon the municipalities. I have had to make a few trips to Ottawa on behalf of these people, and I have always found the government willing and ready to lend money to the province of Manitoba to help out the people as and when asked for. So far as lending money to the province of Manitoba for the relief of these people is concerned, I say that on that charge this government can be exonerated. At the end of December, by reason of these advances, there remained payable to this government by the province of Manitoba slightly over $8,000,000, which indicates that this government has drawn no political lines in helping to solve the relief problem. They have tried to keep body and soul together so far as the people are concerned.

Mr. BROWN: Before the hon. gentleman sits down, might I ask if he is aware that one of the standing charges against the former government by hon. gentlemen opposite was that Canada had reduced the tariff while all other countries were raising theirs?

Mr. WILLIS: Let me continue a little while. Charges will be made according to the geographical position of the person making the charges. I say at once to the hon. gentleman in reply to his question and to the hon. member for Weyburn, that if they desire to convince the people of Canada of the sincerity of their sentiments they should start with their own members, namely the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm); then the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard), and then the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Factor). If they can convince these gentlemen there might be some hope of their convincing western Canada: but if they cannot, they might as well stop talking free trade because it will bury them just the same as the theory has been buried for centuries.

Mr. L. E. PARENT (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on the address I desire to extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Gobeil) and the seconder (Mr. Barber), both of whom performed in a very creditable manner their duty of trying to convince the members of this house and the people of the country as a whole of their faith in the present administration. I must confess, however, that I differ from them on many of the points on which they expressed opinions. My constituency being composed of ninety-five per cent of Canadians who are descendants of those of French origin, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, and that of the house, I shall continue my remarks in their and my mother tongue.

(Translation) Mr. Speaker, one who peruses the speech from the throne feels baffled by these first lines:

Canada occupies a leading position amongst those countries where the evidence of a return to permanent prosperity is most convincing.

Indeed, sir, as a Canadian, it gives me great pride to note that Canada occupies an enviable place among the nations of the world in connection with the return to prosperity. However, this position is not all that can be expected, especially when we consider that the population of Canada is composed of descendants of hard working and conscientious men, having at heart the progress and development of their country, offsprings of pioneers who opened to civilization our vast native land, comprising the whole northern part of the American continent and which encloses more wealth, proportionately, than any other country in the world, resources which amount to more than $30,000,000,000 or more than $3000 per capita.

I now come to another interesting paragraph of the speech from the throne:

The prices of agricultural products, which have fallen in recent years to the lowest level in history, have shown substantial improvement in the last few months. My government realize, however, that further increases in price levels are necessary to insure success to those engaged in agriculture.

This simply means that His Excellency the Governor General, in the speech dictated to him by the cabinet, states that agriculture, the fundamental industry of Canada, must receive the consideration of the government. In the course of my remarks, I shall endeavour to prove to the house and to all my fellow-citizens that the government has been guilty of negligence towards the farming class.

That is why His Excellency adds:

My government realize, however, that further increases in price levels are necessary to insure success to those engaged in agriculture.

Prices, sir, automatically find their level according to supply and demand. This is a fundamental and recognized fact. However, in order that the law of supply and demand should become effective, one should not, by means of tariff barriers or other impediments, prevent the producer from receiving fair and equitable prices. Tacitly, therefore, His Excellency recognizes that the government has strangled trade and commerce through its tariff barriers, its famous protection policy. This so heralded policy, in the 1930 election, must be discontinued and our tariff placed on a sound basis. I do not advocate free-trade but a reasonable tariff for revenue purposes, hindering neither trade nor industry. Only when these tariff barriers are down as recommended by His Excellency the Governor General, shall we witness the price of farm products increase.

In order to well understand the conditions existing in Canada, one has but to consult our official statistics. We cannot go astray. Certain members have, at times, contended that these statistics are not accurate. Perhaps, there may sometimes be errors, however, on the whole, one can rely on them. As I intend to particularly discuss agriculture, that industry which has had to suffer more than any other in Canada, I shall do so with statistics in hand and my remarks will especially refer to the paragraph of the speech from the throne which advises the government to study the question relating to the prices and sales of farm commodities.

At page 10 of the booklet Canada, 1934, published under the supervision of the Department of Trade and Commerce, we find the following:

While the farmers' difficulties in 1932 were centered around extremely low prices and while their hopes lay in the bountiful crop production of the year, a different situation existed in 1933. Summer drought was widespread across Canada, and prolonged in many sections.

I cannot, sir, see how one can reconcile the speeches delivered in the house by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), and a number of members opposite, with this statement issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce and published in the booklet Canada 1934, showing that price levels were down and farmers, who expected a large crop, were disappointed owing to the very dry season. I wish to refer to the statement, in 1930, of the right hon. Prime Minister when he promised higher price levels for farm products, and, that, if necessary, he would blast the markets in order to facilitate the sale and marketing of their products. On his return from the London Imperial Conference in 1933, the right hon. Prime Minister issued a program, not with the idea of helping the farmers who had suffered losses owing to the drought but one of curtailment of the wheat acreage. I cannot really understand how one can reconcile these two statements. Let us, however, proceed, because there are still other facts to disclose. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) states in this yearly booklet, in the same paragraph which I quoted a few moments ago:

The increase in prices of farm commodities helped considerably to offset the lower production.

Let us examine what is this increase in the prices of farm commodities mentioned and how it came about, if it ever did. Let us examine closely whether such are the facts, by consulting the bureau of statistics.

In the booklet Canada 1934, at page 47, we find that in 1930, the net returns of agricultural products amounted to $758,000,000, in round figures; in 1931, $538,000,000, and in 1932, $428,000,000. It is quite an easy matter to compare the figures for these various years.

Let us now examine what is the decrease in our agricultural resources. At page 67 of the same publication, we find that in 1931, the agricultural wealth of the country amounted to $5,697,000,000, and in 1932, to $5,070,000,000, namely a difference of $627,000,000 in our agricultural assets. Do the Canadian farmers realize that, according to these official figures, their loss amounts to $627,000,000? There has, therefore, not been any increase, on the contrary, statistics prove there has been a decrease.

In order to clearly show the situation of our industrial activities, I shall quote the Bureau of Statistics in connection with our various industries, including agriculture. In 1930, the value of our industrial products amounted to $3,216,000,000; in 1931, to $2,500,000,000, a difference of $716,000,000. Is that an increase, I ask these gentlemen? It would be very hard to convince me of the fact, when the government figures themselves show a considerable decrease.

There is a spread in manufactured products of more than $300,000,000 in less than a year. Is that the realization of the pledges made at the election in 1930, so as to capture both the confidence and vote of the Canadian people?

Still referring to the Dominion statistics, I find the following at page 12 of the same publication under the heading of price commodities:

In March, 1933 (after three years), wholesale prices began the first appreciable advance that has occurred since 1929. It came after an almost unbroken decline of 42 months during which time the Dominion Bureau of Statistics' general index number of wholesale prices fell by roughly 30 per cent.

That is word for word, sir; it is taken from Canada 1934.

It adds:

Prices in some commodity groups such as farm products had dropped more than double this amount—

Namely 60 per cent.

—while manufactured goods showed decreases of less than 20 per cent in many cases.

Much could be said, sir, in connection with the serious results which might be the outcome of this abnormal situation, this discrepancy in the price levels of Canadian farm products and those of manufactured goods.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, February 7, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

AGREEMENT WITH LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS AND FIREMEN RESPECTING SENIORITY

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, the other day an order was passed by the house on the motion of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) with regard to the Montreal agreement. I have received a reply to our request for a copy of the agreement, and I presume this is as good a time as any to deal with it. This is what Mr. Fullerton has to say:

I have your letter of February 2nd with respect to the desire of Mr. Pouliot for a copy of the Montreal agreement, with amendments.

The Montreal agreement is a form of contract between the Canadian National Railways, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen and has to do with the establishment of seniority districts and seniority rules for men in engine service.

This contract and amendments thereto is currently in effect, and it is not considered in the general interest to distribute copies of current contracts.

If there are any specific questions pertaining to the Montreal agreement or its amendments that Mr. Pouliot would like to ask, we will endeavour to answer them.

A number of hon. members have been asking with regard to this agreement, and perhaps this information will serve for everyone.

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): If the house will permit me to do so I should like to thank the hon. member for the trouble he has taken in the matter, but if I do not know the terms of the contract how can I ask questions with regard to it?

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

PROPOSED PROGRAM OF PUBLIC WORKS FINANCED BY DIRECT DOMINION NOTE ISSUE

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, in view of the large number of unemployed, and with the necessity of increasing the purchasing power of the people, it is expedient that the government give immediate consideration to the inauguration of a large scale program of public works, to be financed by a direct issue of non-interest bearing dominion notes.

He said: It is almost unnecessary to state at the outset of my remarks that the reason for introducing this resolution is found in the deplorable conditions existing in Canada, particularly with regard to the employment situation. It is unfortunate that we have no accurate statistics as to the number of people unemployed, but it is safe to say that there are at least over half a million of them. These people are producing nothing; they are living on the taxpayers and consuming real wealth. But that is not the worst of it; they are losing their morale and their ambition. There are thousands of young people who have completed their schooling and are ready for work. During the last three years they have graduated from the various schools and universities, but in that time have been unable to get a worth-while job with an income. I believe that is one of the greatest tragedies of the present situation. Complementary to that, thousands of farmers and merchants in Canada are facing bankruptcy through lack of business. Many farmers are remaining on their farms only through the grace of their creditors or because of protective legislation passed by the provinces.

Our two great problems to-day are first, to give an income to our farmers, and second, to give employment with incomes to those now unemployed.

In considering any remedy which might be brought forward at this time we must of course have in mind its effect upon the whole problem, not merely upon particular sections of the problem. The action which I am suggesting to-day constitutes, I believe, the best way of dealing with the unemployment problem and, incidentally, it will help to improve general conditions in Canada, and the whole national situation. I believe many recovery methods will have to be tried out before Canada finally emerges from the depression, and before we have recovered anything like the degree of prosperity enjoyed in 1929 and the years immediately preceding.

I believe one of the first steps to be taken should be that of instituting a program of public works so as to give direct employment to and increase the purchasing power of the people. Speaking to the board of trade of Toronto on Monday, the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) is reported to have said, "We cannot offer you anything spectacular, nothing but thrift and hard work." That is perhaps a poor enough outlook, but it would not be so bad if we were in a position to offer work to our unemployed. How can people work hard if there is no work to do? Many of our Canadian people have worn the soles off their shoes looking for it; they want to work. The great majority of the unemployed in Canada want work; let us give them that chance. Unemployment is one of the greatest of our present problems—I am of course referring to unemployment without money. One of my returned friends said to me a year ago, "Unemployment with money is leisure, but unemployment without money is hell." I do not need to emphasize the terrible condition of mind of the men who for years have looked for work but without success. The policy of unemployment relief as it has been carried out in Canada is of course to be commended, if we cannot do anything better, but it is really striking at the very heart of the nation. Our greatest asset is our people. I wonder what is in the minds of the people who sing so lustily, "O Canada, we stand on guard for thee." Surely the only thing we can have in our minds when we sing, "We stand on guard for thee," is the ten millions of people who make up this nation. No other asset of this country is so worthy of considering as the people themselves. The future of Canada depends upon its people and upon future generations. We are destroying the morale and the ambition of our people so long as we tell them that they really ought to work, that the way out will be found through thrift and hard work, and yet keep them unemployed. The state for its own protection should see that every man has a chance to work at fair wages; we ought to see, and we can see if we have the will to do it, that there is real work provided for real men to do.

J. A. Hobson in Poverty and Plenty says:

> The right of the worker to demand work on reasonable terms and the correlative obligation of the organized community to provide it, are basic conditions of a civilized government. He has a right to demand work: it (the state) has an obligation to supply it.

Coming to one of our own economists in Canada, Professor Stephen Leacock, in The Unsolved Riddle of Social Justice he says:

> The government of every country ought to supply work and pay for the unemployed. . . . Society owes to every citizen the opportunity of a livelihood. . . . Work must either be found, or must be provided by the state itself.

I agree with Mr. Leacock. I think that is sound philosophy and sound economic doctrine.

It is generally supposed that private industry should and will provide employment, but after three years of waiting we know that it will not furnish that employment, that it is unable to do so. There is not sufficient purchasing power in the hands of the consumers to take up the products of industry, and so industry languishes and employment dies. There is no place to-day for capital investment which offers a return of interest and dividends. People will not invest in new industries until it is apparent that sufficient purchasing power rests in the hands of the people to take up the new production. We should all by now realize that the confidence of the people has been hit to the extent that private industry will not furnish the purchasing power and will not furnish employment. Even those who still have money have lost confidence and are afraid to spend the purchasing power which they hold. As a result of this refusal to spend, unemployment is increased, and when this condition occurs, as has been very well said by John Maynard Keynes, organized society must step into the breach and distribute purchasing power. It must, in other words, start on a spending program. Organized society, of course, means the government, and I think the time has arrived,—indeed it arrived long ago,—that as an organized society we can no longer hold back from the inauguration of a spending campaign,—or, in other words, the putting of purchasing power into circulation.

This principle is very well realized in the United States, where the new recovery plans are now under way, and where the government under the "New Deal" has started a real spending program. I read in a United States paper recently that the plans under contemplation in that country provide for the spending of practically $13,000,000,000, which is more than half the total amount spent by the United States in the prosecution of the great war from the time of its entry into the conflict until June 1921. In that period they spent for war purposes $25,749,000,000, and their present plans contemplate the expenditure of more than half that sum to combat the depression. In other words, the United States is engaged in a war to end poverty and unemployment. They have already allocated $3,500,000,000 for expenditure under the public works administration.

The United States policy is described by their president as one of work instead of doles. The president is reported as using these words:

> This program will end the "dole" with all the disintegrating effects it has on the unemployed, and replace it with "made" work at honest wages.

That is a program which Canada might very well imitate. For three years we have followed the United States in a policy of financial deflation and consequent depression, and surely now that the United States has reversed its policy and is attempting to climb up out of the hole, Canada might at least keep pace with our great neighbour to the south.

I saw in a recent press dispatch from Washington that five million men had been reemployed by agencies financed with funds provided through the public works administration. That is just an indication, Mr. Speaker, of what could be done in Canada if a vigorous policy of public works construction was undertaken and financed by the federal government. I believe that such a program of public works would be the best method of getting our people back to work.

Mr. John Maynard Keynes, who is listed by Professor Irving Fisher as one of the men in the world who does know something, if not all, about money, stated three years ago:

> For every man given employment direct on a program of public works two other men will find employment as a result. Large numbers of men will secure employment in making the materials which will be used in the construction of these works, and others will find employment in making consumers' goods which the newly employed men will want to purchase with the wages which they receive.

The falling off in the construction industry appears to be responsible for much of the unemployment that now exists. In a statement presented last fall to the royal commission on banking by the National Construction Council of Canada, it is pointed out that the estimated volume of construction work in Canada for 1933 was only $66,000,000, compared with an average of $430,000,000 for the years from 1925 to 1930 inclusive. That is, the construction industry itself put out new purchasing power to the extent of $66,000,000 in 1933 as compared with an average of $430,000,000 for the years I have mentioned.

The value of construction in 1933 was estimated at less than 12 per cent of the 1929 figure. The industry employed at its peak in 1929, 300,000 direct workers. Those figures would indicate that the unemployed due to the falling off in construction in Canada probably number more than 250,000 people. The submission made by this association to the banking commission goes on to say that, after taking into account those employed indirectly in the industry:

> It is obvious that the lack of work in the construction industry is responsible in a very large measure for the numbers of unemployed in the country. It is also correct to state that if the construction industry were operating at the 1929 rate, 500,000 people would be back in employment to-day who are at present unemployed.

That is a striking figure, Mr. Speaker, but I believe it can be substantiated. It says 500,000 people would be back in employment. The submission goes on:

> In other words, about half of the unemployment problem in this country can be laid at the door of this particular industry. The construction industry, beyond all other industries, is unique in its ability to provide great diversity of employment. The ramifications of this industry are so far-reaching that it is difficult to find any major industry in the country not seriously affected by its prosperity or otherwise. It follows that a dollar spent in the construction industry is diffused through the whole fabric of industry. No particular group and no particular locality is affected more than any other group or locality. A bridge on the west coast will provide work for steel makers in Sydney. An office building in Toronto provides work for the lumberman in British Columbia. To this aspect should be coupled a second significant factor, that for every dollar spent in this industry approximately 82 cents goes towards labour. In other words, it goes into the pay envelopes of the workers in this country whether they be on the job or whether they be in the factory working on materials and supplies.

Speaking in this house a week ago the Prime Minister referred to the large increase which had occurred this year in the exportation of lumber from British Columbia. I thought it would be interesting to find out how much lumber was being consumed in Canada. I was not able to secure the figures for 1933, but I have them for 1929, 1930, 1931 and 1932. Deducting the exports from the production we find that in 1929 there was an apparent consumption of lumber in Canada amounting to 3,079,474 thousand board feet; in 1930, it amounted to 2,500,904 thousand board feet; in 1931, to 1,560,820 thousand board feet, and in 1932, it had fallen to 1,135,717 thousand board feet. The consumption had fallen from 3,000,000 thousand board feet in 1929 to a little over 1,000,000 in 1932. If we were to revive the building industry in Canada we would increase the consumption of lumber, provide more employment in the bush, more employment in the mills and more traffic for our railways.

From the figures I have given it would appear that the inauguration of a program of public works would be one of the best means of providing employment for those who are now out of work. The submission of the National Construction Council, to which I have referred, states that a survey made by the manufacturers of vitrified tile in Canada showed that 232 municipalities with a population of over 1,000 were in need of sewage systems. I do not think there is a city in Canada to-day in which a program of public works could not be put into operation if funds were provided. I understand that the city of Lethbridge has stated that if the government will furnish them with $500,000 free of interest for ten years they will engage upon a construction program and assume all responsibility for unemployment relief, thus relieving the federal and provincial governments of responsibility in that regard.

We know that the federal government has a large program of public works under consideration, and it ought to be put into operation. I know the minister has received many applications for public works and I am sure that almost every province would be glad to embark on a program of public works if financing could be arranged. I was told by the minister of public works of one of our provinces that he would like to have $5,000,000 for a program of bridge building alone. He stated that these bridges were all needed and that value would be obtained from the money so spent. I do not intend to go over the whole list of useful public works, but I shall give just a few.

Some people think that we have too many highways, but according to the census of 1931 there are 150,000 farms in Canada located on unimproved dirt roads. There is a great need for culverts and bridges, for safe railway crossings, technical schools, hospitals, power plants, power distribution lines, slum clearance work, and housing projects, both urban and rural. Our aim should be a home for every family, houses instead of slums, and homes instead of shacks. Reforestation projects should be undertaken, and there is a need for more parks. One of the latest plans under the new deal in the United States is to provide money for the remodelling of old-fashioned homes. The following is one paragraph which appeared in the United States News dealing with this new plan:

> President Roosevelt again is turning his attention to the home owner. This time he thinks that the man with a home may help along the recovery program by providing work for the laggard construction industry.
> To give him a real incentive, the President is prepared to ask Congress to appropriate $250,000,000 that can be loaned at low interest rates for home rebuilding and home repair. If this fund is eagerly used by the owners of the country's 25,000,000 dwellings, then it can be expanded to open a vast new field for government credit.

There is room in Canada for a similar program. It may be urged that we cannot afford such a program in Canada. Let us see, then, what is needed for a program of public works such as I have suggested. First of all, we need men, or labour; next, we need machines and equipment, and, lastly, we need materials. If we go over the whole list of such works we find that there are plenty of men available; there are architects, civil engineers, electrical engineers, artisans and mechanics in every trade. The same is true with regard to materials and machinery of all kinds. For highway construction we have ample supplies of gravel and rock; we have sand and cement; we have scrapers; we have horses and trucks for hauling. For bridges, we have the steel and lumber. For buildings of all kinds, we have plenty of brick, sand, stone, cement, lumber and hardware; in fact we have everything except glass, and we could trade wheat with Belgium for that commodity. The same thing is true of all the other works which I have suggested. Practically all the transportation facilities, materials and equipment that are necessary are available in Canada, so that any such works which are undertaken can be carried out with the use of our own natural resources and our own men. Why not therefore, proceed with the work?

Professor Henry Clay, a very prominent economist in England, says:

> If we leave money and credit out of account, there is obviously no theoretical impossibility of employing men who at present are kept doing nothing, on plant which is also idle, at any useful work within their capacity.

I agree absolutely with Professor Clay. We have all the men, the machines and the materials necessary, it is only a matter of organization to bring them together to get the work done. But in organizing, we use money to measure the value of labour, of machines and of material. Whether we like it or not, we cannot leave money out of account. Fortunately in this case, under our constitution the Dominion government has control of currency and coinage, banking and the issue of paper money, as well as the raising of money by any mode or system of taxation and the borrowing of money on the public credit. As we are at present taxed to death, I want to rule out taxation as a method of raising money. In addition to having complete power with regard to the creation and control of money, the dominion has control of trade and commerce, interest, legal tender, immigration, tariffs, transportation, and so forth,— in short, over all the vital economic policies which determine whether or not the people of the country shall have employment.

As I have said before on many occasions, in my humble opinion the Dominion government should assume at least the major share of the responsibility for unemployment. This is just another reason why they should engage in a program of public works to give employment to the people. The question of money seems to be the sticker. Mr. J. S. Lennox, in his very interesting book entitled The Cause and Cure of Unemployment, which I am sure many hon. members have read, proposes that public works should be used as a basis for the issue of currency, that public works should be treated as assets and not as liabilities. When we learn to do that we will not have any trouble in financing public works. Whether or not we should go as far as Mr. Lennox suggests, the fact remains that the construction of public buildings to be financed by the issue of dominion notes has been suggested by hon. members in every section of the house. I know that many hon. members will agree that Canada can well afford to finance such a program by the issue of notes.

When I drafted this resolution last year, Canada had no central bank. Having moved, in 1931, a resolution asking for the establishment of a nationally-owned central bank, and having received no support from any quarter of the house except this corner, I did not expect that this year we would have one. Had I known a central bank was to be set up I might have suggested that the money be raised by borrowing from that bank on treasury notes of the Dominion of Canada. That has been done to quite an extent in Australia through the commonwealth bank, and it may be done here yet if we get a central bank—that is, if it is the proper kind of bank. The amount of dominion notes outstanding now is about $150,000,000 less than in 1920, so I am certain that we could with both safety and advantage issue $150,000,000 or $200,000,000 in dominion notes for this purpose. If this were more than was necessary for circulation, the notes would find their way into the vaults of the chartered banks and strengthen their cash reserves. They would also serve as a basis for the further extension of credit by the banks when the demand for such was created by improvement in business conditions.

I have one other suggestion to make if neither of these proposals is satisfactory to the government. The world conference, we are told, agreed that a 25 per cent gold coverage would be sufficient for our note issue. The government could buy gold produced in Canada to the extent of $100,000,000, or to whatever amount they thought best, and issue, on that $100,000,000, $400,000,000 of notes for financing such a program as I have suggested. Even if the $100,000,000 were borrowed at 4 per cent, this would be equivalent to a rate of 1 per cent on the amount of notes issued, which could easily be carried by the revenue received on business resulting from the circulation of the $400,000,000.

I have one further suggestion. As the primary purpose of this program would be to create employment, it seems to me that it would be wise to pay for at least part of the program with what is called stamped scrip money, a special issue of notes. Such scrip or notes would require to have placed upon them at stated intervals, preferably monthly or twice a month, stamps equal to 1 per cent of the face value of the note. I am suggesting 1 per cent, but it might be one-half or 2 per cent. The hoarding or saving of money and the slowing-down of the velocity of circulation have depressed business at least as much as if not more than the contraction in the volume of money in circulation. While present money is hoarded or lying idle in banks, this stamped scrip money would provide a substitute which would circulate three or four times as fast as ordinary money. The great advantage of stamped scrip money is its rapidity of circulation. It would not be inflation; it would put no strain on our gold reserves. If it circulates three times as fast as money, $1 worth of scrip will do as much work as $3 worth of orthodox money in exchanging goods and providing employment. The stamps required to keep it current would provide funds to retire the notes over a period of years.

Professor Irving Fisher, whom the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) quoted a few days ago as naming the men in the world who knew something about money, has given his blessing to stamped scrip money. In 1932 he wrote an article entitled "What Can Congress Do," and perhaps I might quote two or three sentences from that article, in which he discusses measures that might be adopted to break the depression.

He says:

There is, in particular, one measure little known as yet, but which, I believe, is destined soon to command nationwide attention, which might bring us substantially out of the depression if properly applied, in a few weeks. This is "stamped scrip." . . . Stamped scrip will give the consumer the buying power needed to start up operations from the consumer end. . . . One of the chief advantages of the stamped scrip plan, . . . is the speeding up of circulation. Any holder of the scrip naturally wants to pass it on before the next stamp date arrives. No one wants to keep it long. The stamp operates as a stamp tax on hoarding. . . . We ought not to wait four years. We ought not to wait even till the new congress assembles in March. Why should not the "lame duck" congress cover itself with glory by pulling us out of the depression in a few weeks by priming the pump through consumer demand and so let loose the waiting millions of bank credit?. . . But just now, as a capstone of what has already been done, we need what stamped scrip can give us and give us faster than any other means in sight.

I suggest to the government that they might cover themselves with glory before this term of parliament is over by putting stamped scrip money into circulation to prime the pump, as Professor Fisher says, and break this depression.

Mr. GEARY: What has been the experience of other countries with stamped scrip money?

Mr. COOTE: I do not know of any country that has tried it, but I know of quite a few municipalities that have done so, and if I had time I could give the hon. gentleman several very good illustrations of the success it has met with.

Mr. GEARY: I will give my hon. friend a great many illustrations.

Mr. COOTE: The hon. gentleman will have plenty of opportunity if he cares to avail himself of it. Mr. John Maynard Keynes, in his book, Essays in Persuasion, makes some very pertinent remarks which I will give to the house in my own words—I will not take time to quote him. He says that if our ability to produce goods is unimpaired and private spending is not sufficient to use up the production, we cannot impoverish ourselves, as a nation, in public spending to make use of the goods which we are able to produce; obviously, we shall rather enrich ourselves. Rather, we should look at it in this light; that the whole labour of the unemployed is available to increase the national wealth. It is crazy to believe that we shall ruin ourselves financially by trying to find means for using it and that safety first lies in continuing to maintain men in idleness, at the financial expense of the taxpayer. It is with our unemployed productive resources—men, machines and natural resources—that we shall make the new investments. Power plants, distribution lines, highways, housing projects, municipal water and sewer systems, technical schools, hospitals, mental hospitals, public buildings, and so forth, are all investments which the nation could well afford to make at this time. He goes on to point out the waste from unemployment. May I quote one short paragraph written in 1929 referring to Britain:

Since 1921 we have paid out to the unemployed in cash a sum of about £500,000,000—and have got literally nothing for it. This sum would have built a million houses; it is nearly double the whole of the accumulated savings of the Post Office Savings Bank; it would build a third of all the roads in the country; it far exceeds the total value of all the mines, of every description, which we possess; it would be enough to revolutionize the industrial equipment of the country; or to proceed from what is heavy to what is lighter, it would provide every third family in the country with a motor car or would furnish a fund enough to allow the whole population to attend cinemas for nothing to the end of time.

John Maynard Keynes is one of the men who according to Professor Irving Fisher, knows about money. I believe that the Dominion government has spent directly on unemployment relief in one year $41,927,000. I saw a statement in the press recently to the effect that the estimated total expenditure by all governments for unemployment relief in the past four years amounted to $250,000,000, and that has been paid out of the taxpayers' pockets, or out of money borrowed for the purpose. It seems to me that the time has arrived when we should find some other way of dealing with the question of unemployment.

In addition I should like to point out that this is a good time, from a financial point of view, to engage in the construction of public works; at no time since 1914 could they be carried out as cheaply as they can to-day. The index figure for building and construction materials now stands at 78 as compared with 100 in 1926. I should like to reiterate that an adequate program of public works would at this time mean simply making use of idle men, idle equipment and our natural resources to produce real wealth, real assets or new investments to balance the new money which would be issued to facilitate the work. Every day's delay in putting the idle to work is costing us thousands of dollars. The question, in fact, is not: Can we afford to carry out this program? It is: Can we afford not to do it? In the interest of the taxpayer, of the individual whose morale is being destroyed by enforced idleness, and of the state itself, we should undertake this work without further delay and I hope the house and the government will give this resolution their most favourable consideration.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I am neither a sceptic nor a scoffer. I enjoyed listening to the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), because he was attempting to deal in his way with a very great problem. He finds that unemployment is a canker in the body politic and he would apply to it as a remedy a vast program of public works. If I have understood the source of many of the difficulties under which Canada is labouring at the moment, it is that the Canadian people, the people of the provinces, cities and municipalities have overindulged in public works. It is because they have paid out money which they are unable to repay to-day and because they have incurred liabilities, the interest upon which they find onerous in the extreme, that we are in distress at this time. The hon. gentleman, knowing well the poison which has brought about our illness, suggests an additional dose as a means of regaining health.

I agree with him that unemployment is a very serious problem, but I would suggest to him that a remedy other than the one which he has advocated, a remedy which is perhaps more simple and elemental, must be applied to the malady. I think we can all agree that disequilibrium in our population is the great cause of want and unemployment. It is true that farming is not a very prosperous undertaking to-day, yet there is no unemployment on the farm and in so far as eastern Canada is concerned, where farming is carried on more as an avocation than as a vast business, there is no lack of food, fuel or raiment, which, after all, are the things essential to livelihood.

In the city of Montreal in December, the last month for which figures are available, 202,895 people were receiving direct relief from governmental authorities and in April, 1933, 280,096 were receiving sustenance from the same source. In April 34·24 per cent of the population was receiving direct relief, while in December last only 24·79 was receiving direct relief. These figures should be considered critically because they show a decrease in unemployment despite seasonal unemployment which is a characteristic of Montreal, a seaport where there is a long, severe winter and where from time immemorial there are four or five months of the year when the great river is held in the grasp of the ice king, business slows down and employment is not available to a substantial number of artisans, labourers and others who, during the active season, are able to lay up enough to carry them over this long period. There has been some improvement in the situation, but the fact remains that that city is top heavy, other cities in the dominion have a population which is entirely out of proportion to the gross population of the country. The trend of population from the rural districts to the urban centres has been manifest for the last 40 years; in 1890, 70 per cent of our people were on the land, if we are to take the words of Mr. Taschereau, reported to have been pronounced in Montreal the other day, 70 per cent of the people of the province of Quebec are now urban dwellers. For this vast accumulation of population in a few centres there are many reasons; some of them are economic, some are due to the war and I daresay there are a number of undisclosed reasons for this turning of the people toward the cities. We have built up an industrial establishment, of which we are proud and which has aided to make this relatively small country the fifth trading nation of the world. We boast of that fact, and we have reason to be proud. It was while we were building up this machine and while we were taking men and women from the land to man it that the population of the cities grew so rapidly. During the last ten years fully 70 per cent of our entire growth has gone to the cities.

When depression came, when there was a cessation in trade, we found that we had vast numbers of people who were helpless, unable to provide for themselves, not luxuries, not comforts, but the things which are essential to the maintenance of life. They could not provide food, fuel or raiment. For a time we did engage in a program of public works, determined by the various provinces, but ultimately we had to turn to the dole and speaking for Montreal at least, to-day we are feeding at the expense of the public purse more than two hundred thousand people. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that quick, quack methods prescribed by the hon. member for Macleod are inadequate.

We may establish a central bank; we may provide rural credits; we may enact laws providing for insurance against unemployment; these measures may help to reduce the acuteness of the malady but they will not cure it, because in our cities are hordes of people who depend for food and clothing upon industrial work and wages, and when these wages cease the people became dependent upon the state. I submit that a back to the land policy must be practised. I do not mean that we should send these people to the outskirts of civilization and beyond. I do not mean that we should send them to Abitibi and Temiskaming. Last year from Montreal three hundred families went back to the land, but only a relatively small number of people are suited to pioneering. Pioneering is a profession for which people are not prepared by urban life. In the immediate vicinity of our large cities are organized territories provided with highways, schools, churches, telephones, electrical energy and all those things which go to make life possible and even agreeable to the ordinary man, and within those areas are any number of acres of good land which can be obtained at a very low price.

It is my suggestion that if public works are to be undertaken, these areas which are awaiting the return of those who abandoned them for the cities should be rehabilitated in some measure. It is not necessary that a family should have one hundred or one hundred and twenty-five acres; ten or twenty acres in the wooded districts of the eastern townships will provide a family with all the essentials. Where land is situated within reach of industrial centres there is bound to be a certain amount of interrupted employment in the factories which would provide workers with some money after they had met their immediate and urgent needs from the land. Moreover it is a strange thing that in Quebec, which is one of the oldest provinces and which is considered more rural than many of the others, there is produced only a small percentage of the foodstuffs consumed by the people of the province. To a greater extent, perhaps, than in any other province of the dominion the meats, vegetables and fruits consumed there are imported. Market gardening and small farming can be carried on to advantage.

I think this lends point to the suggestion that if people were helped back to the land within a radius of from twenty-five to seventy-five miles of the city of Montreal they could do much to bring back prosperity to the land and relieve the congestion in the cities. I do not suggest that every mechanic is suited for life on the land, but the fact remains that men were drawn from the farms into the factories during the days of great expansion. We built railroads, and some people think we built too many of them. We had to roll rails; we had to provide equipment. The late Sir Henry Thornton told the railway committee some time ago that within a few years, under his administration, the number of cars that had been scrapped and replaced, if put end to end, would reach from Montreal to the city of Kitchener. It was that type of work that gave employment in the cities. Highways were built, and machinery for their construction was necessary. Grain elevators were constructed, and they had to be equipped with all manner of devices which were manufactured in the factories in the cities. Conservation dams and other great undertakings, including waterways were constructed. All the equipment, all the explosives and the other tools and agencies necessary to carry out these great works, were made in the factories, which were located principally in the cities. I for one fear that these days are over, for the immediate present at any rate; I believe that no matter if better times do return there can be no resumption of the volume of industrial activity which will absorb our people into the industrial life of the country. Therefore it is necessary that something be done to find gainful employment, or at least self-sustaining employment, for those who have been out of work for two, three and even four years in the cities.

I said a moment ago that everyone is not suited for service on the soil, but let us take a census; let us find out what proportion of the people in the cities who are unemployed came from the land. I am informed that in the city of Montreal there are between 15,000 and 20,000 families, the heads of which are out of employment, who were brought up on the farm and know in a small way at least how to cultivate the soil and care for domestic animals. Those men, if they were given an opportunity, could grow the food which they require for themselves and their families, commodities which are now being bought for them by the various governments, federal, provincial and municipal. Under the government's policy for reestablishing people on the land an amount of $600 is allowed to each family. This policy has been carried out in conjunction with the railway companies. It may be entirely accidental, but the fact is that the points at which these families have been established are so remote from the points from which they originated that more than half of the amount allotted to them is consumed in transportation expenses. If they could be taken to an area where land can be cheaply acquired and where, in many instances, buildings needing only slight repairs already exist, where schools, churches and other incidents of civilization are available, I feel much would have been done both to rehabilitate the soil in the older sections of rural Quebec and Ontario and to relieve the strain of unemployment in the cities.

Then, there is the other class to whom the hon. member for Macleod referred, namely the youth, the boys and girls who have attained maturity during the depression and who for the last two or three years have festered in activity and have seen the hopes of youth blighted by a hoplessness which they may never be able to shake. They would welcome this outlet for their energies. Employment, life in the open, a sense of responsibility and respectability which comes from doing something, would be one of the not inconsiderable and invaluable results from such a policy.

We are now in the month of February. This is the time a census should be taken in the large cities. I know that would not be difficult in the city of Montreal, where there are social agencies representing every class, every creed and almost every nationality. These agencies would, I am confident, be glad to place themselves at the disposal of the government to take the census. When the census is taken in the early spring—because it is only then that the people can, with wisdom, be taken to the land—many thousands of families could be located at short distances outside their respective cities. This would give employment. Many of the unemployed have worked in the Angus shops and in the Canadian National railway shops. Their services under the present railway policy when so much track is to be torn up and there is a limitation in the need for cars and other equipment, and a tendency to pool the resources of the railway companies will not be in demand for some time to come. If these people could turn their energies toward the construction of modest houses, they could thus pay a substantial amount of the cost of their own homes.

There is nothing original in a scheme of this kind; it has been worked out by several people, one of whom is the mayor of Moncton. My suggestion is that now is the time to take the census; now is the time to ask the big cities to ascertain the number of their unemployed and unemployable, and to find out the number of those suited for reengagement in activities on the soil. I believe that a policy of this kind has more real value than some of the untried suggestions and schemes which could succeed nowhere except in the fertile minds and imaginations of their proponents. These old fashioned methods would do more than the new to bring relief.

We know that the people who first came to Canada had nothing but the soil, a few crude implements and their courage. The land is still here; we have implements, and I for one refuse to believe that the courage is lacking. This is a moment of trial, so frequent in the life of the individual as well as in the life of a nation. From the very first day of a plantation in Canada the Canadian people have had to encounter difficulties, arising from climate, Indian warfare, border feuds, conquests, racial hatreds, political difficulties, constitutional difficulties, and now economic difficulties—that is life. Someone has said that the "joy is in the journey" and "the secret in the search." We may not be able to make of Canada the Eden that the proponent of this resolution believes that its adoption would make it, but we can place within the reach of our people the means of providing food and other essentials for themselves, and make them again self-respecting, self-sustaining and free from, I shall not say the curse but the misfortune of being unable to provide for themselves.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support this resolution may I say, with hon. members who have spoken not only in this but in other debates during the present session, that one of the most serious problems facing Canada to-day is that of unemployment. Nor is unemployment a problem wholly related to those who are out of jobs; I have in mind many hundreds of people on the land, especially in the province from which I come, who, through the necessity of circumstances, are forced to go out seeking either direct relief from the municipalities or work of some kind so that they may be in a position to augment their meagre income. But to my mind the most serious aspect of this unemployment problem is the estimated 500,000 youths of this land who cannot find employment, I would ask any hon. member present what his answer would be to those youths when they ask him: Can you find employment for us? To my mind that is one of the most serious things, almost a disaster, that is overtaking this country of ours.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that public works is not a solution of our difficulties, and no one I believe has ever advocated that public works conducted either by the municipalities or by governments, provincial or federal, would be a solution of all our difficulties. Nevertheless something must be done; we cannot stand idle while a half million of our people lack employment and well over one million need relief.

Some have criticized the policy of President Roosevelt in the United States—what is called the N.R.A. Personally I hope it will be a success, because it has a material bearing on the affairs of Canada and the welfare of our people. If the people across the line begin to purchase more and are provided with more of the sustenance of life, it is bound to react to the benefit of Canada. I hope the N.R.A. will be a success in three of its objectives. Its first objective is to put more people to work; its second, to put more purchasing power in the hands of the people, and its third to ensure a more just distribution of rewards as between labour and capital. Surely no hon. gentleman would dispute that these are three most desirable objectives to be attained.

Some have criticized us for boosting President Roosevelt and his N.R.A. scheme, but if it were true, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) stated, that many Liberals were hoping that the Ottawa conference would be a failure, it would be equally true for me to say that many members opposite were hoping that President Roosevelt's scheme would fail.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. REID: But I would not be so unkind as to say that. I have heard it stated by some that we were overlauding President Roosevelt to the exclusion of our own Prime Minister. However, I am not unmindful that the leader of the Senate, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, has seen fit to hand out a meed of praise to President Roosevelt, and so if I follow him for a few moments surely no member on the other side will criticize me, because he was their leader for many years.

The N.R.A. has at least done this: It has put five million men to work, and that is quite an accomplishment. Talking of the N.R.A. policy in the United States, someone said to me the other day, "I know what Canada's policy should be designated. It should be the N.F.C.—nothing for Canada."

Before dealing further with the resolution itself I should like to refer to a few of the remarks of the Prime Minister in the speech he made at Vancouver. His remarks towards the close of the speech I think were very ill-timed when he referred to the unemployed as "derelicts." In my opinion it was an insult to the unemployed to refer to them in that way and to ask: Where was the pioneer spirit of our fathers? Our pioneers, he stated, did not ask governments to wet-nurse them. There are thousands, Mr. Speaker, in this land who have taken very sorely to heart their being called derelicts, and hon. members who have interrupted, if they found themselves destitute and unemployed like many of our good citizens are, would feel just as keenly as they do about it.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that he is not stating the facts. He knows it perfectly well.

Mr. REID: Mr. Speaker, it was accepted by many of that audience who heard it as referring to the destitute of our country.

Mr. BENNETT: It was not.

Mr. REID: It was so interpreted not only by myself but by hundreds who were there.

As to public works that might be carried out, there are many undertakings upon which the unemployed could be engaged at the present moment, and I shall take a few moments to mention some of them.

In British Columbia we have an undeveloped province with the settlers lacking roads which if constructed would be an asset. They will have to be constructed some time anyway, and to go ahead with that work now would not only be giving useful work to the unemployed but would be doing a national servince as well. There are many public buildings which could be constructed. There is also the question of forestry in British Columbia. I should like to suggest to the government that our large burnt-over areas be reforested. I am almost afraid to report what is being done across the line in that direction for fear of being accused of having strong leanings that way, but a great work in reforestation is being done in the United States, where thousands of youths have been taken out into the wide open spaces under proper supervision and are planting out trees which will be for the benefit of the nation in the days to come. That is a very commendable work which we might also do in this country. It would be a work of national importance and the benefits would certainly be reaped in after years.

I know that I may be asked, where is all the money to come from to provide works on such a large scale? I realize at the outset the danger of turning on the printing press. Past history has shown that the indiscriminate use of the printing press for the turning out of money has been disastrous to many nations. I am not advocating that we turn on the printing presses, but I am going to suggest that we could issue money even if we keep to the Prime Minister's principle of sound money with a backing of gold and so issue many millions more of dominion notes. I am going to place a few figures on Hansard in support of that suggestion, and I challenge any hon. member to call it inflation when I am through.

The present gold coverage in possession of the government is roughly $70,000,000. I have the exact figures here, but I will use only round figures. The present gold coverage amounts to 38 per cent, and dominion notes issued amount to $184,427,000. That has been represented by the Prime Minister and by other speakers as sound money, with a backing of gold. Whether we like it or not, the fact of the matter is that our gold is worth more than that, as is evidenced by the export of gold during this past year from the gold mines of Canada, which drew some $23,000,000 extra owing to the fact that the dollar had been devaluated in the United States, or the price of gold raised to about $34 an ounce. Our gold to-day has a world market value, and Canada could obtain for it at least $34 an ounce; that is the gold which we keep in the vaults as coverage. However, if we took that gold at $34 an ounce, the present gold price, it would have a value of $120,000,000, and with a forty per cent coverage it would mean that we could issue up to $300,000,000 dominion notes, which would mean that we could then issue approximately a further $115,000,000 of dominion notes. No one can say that that would be inflation if they hold to the idea that there should be a forty per cent coverage in gold. Again, if the present gold coverage were reduced to twenty-five per cent, as advocated by the banking commission, we could issue at least $100,000,000, even though we held to the idea that our gold was not worth more than previously.

I am rather surprised that the Prime Minister has not taken steps to seize all the gold in this country. Evidently Great Britain is trying to capture as much gold as she can, and the United States is adopting the same course. I notice in to-day's press that aeroplanes have been carrying gold from France to Great Britain. If we are going to follow the financial program of a country like Great Britain, it is passing strange to me that the Prime Minister has not placed a ban on gold and has not gone further and appropriated all gold in the country. I suggest to him that he take note of the $23,000,000 extra which the gold mines received this year. I think that amount should at least be taxed and a great deal of that profit accrue to the government and not to the private mine owners.

In order to carry out this idea a little further, I should like to place a few more figures upon Hansard. If the gold that is lying in the banks and the present gold coverage of some $5,000,000 on deposit in the treasury by the banks were taken over by the Dominion government, it would mean that we would have a total coverage of over $100,000,000 in gold at the old figure. If our gold coverage were put at twenty-five per cent instead of forty per cent as at present, it would mean that we could issue up to $400,000,000 of dominion notes against that gold coverage. With a coverage of twenty-five per cent we would still have what is termed by some, sound money. As I have stated previously, gold is worth from $34 to $35 per ounce at the present time.

Mr. BENNETT: How much did the hon. gentleman say?

Mr. REID: Between $34 and $35 per ounce.

Mr. BENNETT: I wanted to be sure of what was said.

Mr. REID: If we valued our $100,000,000 of gold at $34 to $35 per ounce we could then issue up to $400,000,000 of notes. This Mr. Speaker would be along the lines of the argument used by the Prime Minister that we must have a coverage of gold. No one could call this uncontrolled inflation. It would not be turning on the printing presses as we would still have the gold to act as a bulwark or brake against the issuing of unlimited dominion notes.

It may be of interest to the house to know that the banks retain a considerable portion of the gold while still having the privilege of coming to the Dominion government and depositing provincial and dominion bonds for dominion notes. According to the returns made by the chartered banks for December there is some $38,000,000 in gold coin, etc., and over $5,000,000 in gold coin has been deposited as security. This represents a total of a little over $41,000,000 in gold. We could keep our gold coverage without being accused of inflation and could still issue many millions of dominion notes. I believe that this will be done before long; in fact it should have been done before this.

The interest alone upon the total public debt of Canada is well over $400,000,000 per year. How long are the people of this country to keep going to the money changers for that with which to pay this debt? In putting on a program of public works, the first thing the government should consider is how to make it possible for us to pay our debts. At present we have a debt burden of some $9,000,000,000 with interest charges of four and a half, five and a half and six per cent. According to this report, the government has advanced since 1930 some $137,000,000 for relief. The interest on this amount for three years would be approximately $20,000,000 if computed at the rate of five per cent. If the scheme I am putting forward were adopted we would easily save the total amount of money which the Dominion government has put out in connection with relief.

I bring these things forward in the best spirit and in the hope that notice of them will be taken by the government. I realize that the proposal does not offer a solution for our unemployment problems, but it is at least a palliative and would help very considerably during these times.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): Mr. Speaker, if I understood the last speaker (Mr. Reid) aright, he intimated that one hon. member who sits to your right, and that there may be more, had entertained hopes of the failure of the recovery plans now being promulgated in the United States. I have not heard of any such hope being expressed by any person, and I cannot for the life of me see why anyone should express such a hope. The two countries are so closely interrelated that the failure of a tremendous scheme such as that of the president of the United States could not fail to have consequences on this side of the line. If it succeeds, we are certain to receive some benefit. Why then should any man in his senses pray for its failure?

There is a difference between the two countries. The other night I heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) say that even if this spending program of the United States, involving some $15,000,000,000, were put into effect and that amount added to the debt of the United States, that debt still would be less per capita of the population of the United States than is the present debt of the Dominion of Canada per capita of our population. For some time the United States has been a creditor country while Canada is and has been a debtor country. In forming any plan we must keep these differences in mind. To consider that we should follow slavishly an example set by the United States is absurd when we consider the differences between the positions occupied by the two countries. If we can get something out of what they are doing to enable us to adopt a course which is good for our own country, we would be extremely unwise not to do so.

I am sure the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) will credit every hon. member in this house with the same sympathy for the plight of the unemployed as that he has expressed. I regret that the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) does not seem inclined to credit the Prime Minister with entertaining the same sentiments. His remark in that connection was entirely unjustifiable, and I should resent it very much if it were made to myself or of myself; and I am sure that the Prime Minister has every right to feel the same way, if indeed he has paid any attention to it at all. If you turn to the speech from the throne you will find towards the close of that document the following words:

> My government propose further to promote employment by expenditures on essential public works and undertakings throughout the dominion.

So that we have at the inauguration of this session a declaration by the government that it proposes to do something along the line suggested by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). I am not so sure myself that expenditures in that way will have the good effect which many people hope for from it. To me it savours rather of a stimulant, in medical parlance a shot in the arm, the effect of which is very likely to wear off, leaving the patient worse than he felt at the beginning. If it is the view of the government that, to the extent indicated, it will be a good thing towards inaugurating rapidity of circulation or augmenting the purchasing power of the people, I am perfectly prepared to subscribe to their better judgment in that regard. But when my hon. friend speaks of large scale undertakings, I assume that he means something which is not necessarily self-sustaining or necessarily, in the words of the speech from the throne, essential public works and undertakings, but something that is designed to go on and on and on until I suppose there will be no harm done by its withdrawal because conditions will then have improved to such an extent that it is not required. That however contemplates an outlook on the future expenditure of money which I cannot reconcile with good business at this moment. My hon. friend from Macleod takes that view I am sure because he does not propose that any such scheme should be financed through the ordinary method of issuing bonds and paying interest upon them. Rather, he reverts to that well known theory of his, that we could issue a great deal of money in this country without coverage, as I have heard him declare on some occasions, or at all events in a manner quite dissimilar from that we are pursuing at the present time. There again I must leave the hon.

gentleman; the proposal suggests too much what my hon. friend from New Westminster spoke of—turning on the printing press. If we look at the speech from the throne, on the preceding page we will see that His Excellency speaking of the world monetary and economic conference, said:

> The conference adjourned without dealing with many important subjects, but arrived at conclusions of especial interest and concern to Canada in respect to central banks, the gold standard, and the percentage of metallic coverage essential to the successful functioning of gold as a medium of international exchange.

Having that pronouncement in mind, we may rest assured that none of the possibilities contemplated by my hon. friend from New Westminster will be overlooked. The government and those entrusted with handling the financial affairs of the country will have all that in mind, and it may be that it will result in a further issue of money, either by reason of the increased value of gold or by reason of the decrease from 40 to 25 per cent in coverage. Whatever effect it may have on the issue of money, I can assure my hon. friend, both as to public works and as to the consideration of the advisability or the necessity, or however you like to put it, of an issue of further money with the gold we have now in hand, we can pass from these subjects, feeling that they are under consideration by the government.

My hon. friend from Macleod again invoked some of the names which are becoming almost household words in this chamber. Again I heard the names of Keynes and Clay and Fisher, and I don't know how many more. Someone acquainted with the doings of these people in England told me that there is a body of them numbering five who meet in Oxford quite often, and that from every conference they hold there emerge six diametrically opposed opinions, of which as a rule Keynes holds two. I do not for a moment suggest, however, that we must not listen to these men; I do not suggest that we must not listen to those who have opposing views. I do feel, despite something the Minister of Finance said the other day, that this matter of money, the monetary system, has been so thoroughly discussed by all and sundry in this country in the last two or three years that we must by this time have developed some expert knowledge of the subject, at any rate enough to enable us to say in this house that we are in a position to discuss the matter with some assurance, at all events, that we know what we are talking about, and that if we do not know what we are talking about we at least know what we want to say. These gentlemen are so varied in their views that there come to my mind the words of Dean Swift—I forget just where he said this: "If the fleas had been unanimous they would have pulled me from my bed." It may be therefore that if we ever could secure from these people some sort of unanimity—and I do not speak of them disparagingly as fleas—they might pull us out of our difficulties.

If you engage in the exploration of an entirely unknown field such as that suggested by the hon. member for Macleod, I think we should pause to think very seriously whether this should be the country to pioneer in that regard. So far as I know, and I am subject to correction, there has been no issue of what is called stamped scrip by any country. My hon. friend said that he knew of none, and I ventured the remark that I could cite many instances of the issue, not of stamped scrip but of scrip. I remember in the closing days of the war every little municipality in France had its own scrip, and some people who were fond of albums bought enough to cover the pages of a first class album—scrip issued by municipalities, all of which went wrong. The method has not proved itself to have been efficient either as a means of accelerating currency or as taking the place of the ordinary currency.

Then it is suggested that we should simply issue money without any interest being paid upon it. That is a very attractive proposition and I do not see why, if it is sound, it should not be extended to our whole debt. Germany did it by the simple process of running her mark down to nothing. By repeated applications of the printing press she discharged the bonded debt of her industry at absolutely no cost at all. But I take it we have not got to that stage in this country; as I say, it savours too much of the printing press. I do not boggle at the word inflation. We have, goodness knows, inflation to a large extent now. It is recognized that the United States dollar has been depreciated; there has been inflation over there to 40 or 60 per cent of the original dollar. Now, we carry along with the United States. If you look at the exchange lists to-day you will find that our dollar is very close to the dollar of the United States, and if that dollar is depreciated our dollar is depreciated to the same extent. My hon. friends opposite were very keen last year on tying the dollar to the par value of sterling. At that time this looked like quite a good thing, because for a pound sterling one could get in this country only some $3 or $4. It worked out in this way, that if you sold so much wheat over there for so many pounds sterling and we raised our currency to parity with the pound, you would get so many more dollars over here for that number of pounds. But if we had done that and stuck to $4.86⅔ as was proposed, we would be losing at the present moment a considerable balance in exchange. This only goes to show—and I do not use it as an argument in this matter particularly—that when you try to tie up to anything that has not a definite and sound yardstick to measure it, you have to follow it up and down through its various vagaries until at no time can you tell where you will be if you want to sell a bill of goods to be paid for next month.

Mr. COOTE: Will the hon. gentleman mention anyone who suggested tying our dollar to the pound?

Mr. GEARY: I thought my hon. friend who has just spoken, did. I understood that was his idea last session.

Mr. COOTE: I never advocated such a proposition; I advocated that our dollar should be worth at least as much as the pound. I advocated that our currency should, possibly, be at least on a parity with Australian currency.

Mr. BENNETT: On one of our agreements last year the hon. member moved an amendment to tie the dollar to the pound.

Mr. GEARY: I cannot say just from whom the idea emanated. All I can do in that regard, because I do not have the record before me, is to stand in the judgment of Hansard; that will settle all questions between us. If I am doing my hon. friend an injustice in saying that he suggested tying our dollar to the pound, of course I accept his word.

Mr. COOTE: All I wanted to do was to make it clear that I did not advocate tying our dollar to the pound. I may have advocated that our currency should be at least as high as the pound. That is a distinct difference.

Mr. GEARY: I think we are rather quarrelling over words. That was the essence of the proposal made, perhaps not by my hon. friend, but I am quite sure, supported by him if he did not make it. Of course I shall accept his correction at any time he chooses to make one.

It is suggested by my hon. friend that it is quite legitimate for the government to issue money for expenditure on public works, taking those public works as a sort of security. I have never been able to see that argument. Public works are no security so far as I can understand; they are not realizable; they are not saleable; they have no market value; they have no value at all unless to the person who puts them up, except in very rare cases where perhaps they might be available for sale. Where one talks of issuing money against, as my hon. friend says, the security of a public building, one does nothing of the sort; one simply issues the money on the taxpaying ability of the people of Canada.

Mr. EULER: Is that not pretty nearly the case as regards all our currency? As a matter of fact, there is not enough coverage.

Mr. GEARY: While we are not to-day redeeming in gold, the security as recognized by the world is there. I am not wedded particularly to coverage. What I am wedded to is the view that we should not by legislation change the value of our currency so as to put it on a basis that is manifestly inferior to what it is at the present time, because when one does that, he is deteriorating our currency and the result would be bad. I have said in the house before—and it is no new thing—you may inflate by the printing press or otherwise, as you please, and if there were an iron ring around Canada, your exchange might be anything; it might be wampum, one dollar bills, ten dollar bills, sharks' teeth, anything you can name as long as we do not go outside our own country. I do not think, however, we claim to be economically self-sufficient and I do not think we expect to be. We must depend upon our international trade, our international relations, and it is beyond my ken that in any country which trades internationally there can be any system of currency which is not capable of being measured against that of another country by some sort of yardstick. The United States has now gone back, not to the old pre-war gold standard, but to a gold standard; it has gone back to a measuring stick which is gold, and we must all look forward to going back to something of the same sort.

My objection to my hon. friend's motion is not as to the public works program. The government has apparently a program of public works under consideration, but the hon. gentleman has spoiled his motion, it seems to me, by a system of financing it which is not sound. By his system a great deal of money will be issued by unsound means; the farmers may get so many more dollars for their ton or bushel of wheat, but with those dollars they cannot buy any more than they could before the dollar was inflated.

I do not intend to attempt to go into this question exhaustively. I cannot agree with the method suggested by my hon. friend for raising the money, and the question of the expenditures themselves and how they should be made is, according to the speech from the throne, a matter which is now under consideration by the government.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I have been greatly interested in the debate this afternoon; it has brought out many diverse opinions. I am bound to say that with much that has been uttered by the last speaker (Mr. Geary) I agree; but when he states that a public building has no value as a coverage for the issue of currency, to some extent I must disagree with him. I cannot see any difference between the borrowing, which is the usual practice, of the money necessary to construct a public building, having the bonds mature ten, fifteen or twenty years hence and paying interest on the investment during the whole period, and the issue within reason of money for a public building that is a permanent asset, less, of course, depreciation. I can quite appreciate the fact that my hon. friend is fearful of inflation and too much money, but in my opinion the money is not going out of Canada; this is a domestic undertaking and has nothing to do with our exchange, and during the period of the investment we may well be in the position in which we are to-day, that we still have the necessary gold coverage, or, if need be, we can reduce it to twenty-five per cent.

I am opposed to the unlimited printing of money, because this would be useless, but I am fearful of our position generally in Canada, not alone that we are debtors to the extent of $9,000,000,000, which is a colossal sum for the Canadian people to pay interest on, but that we have our own federal debt, plus our railway debt which, as was mentioned by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) a few days ago when he was speaking in the house, we shall have to assume. For the life of me I cannot see that it is safe for the federal government to borrow more money and pay interest on it. The worst feature of the situation is that in all probability for the next few years we shall be faced with inability to provide by way of taxation the necessary revenues to carry on our ordinary everyday expenses. We are not the only sinners in that respect. The provinces are following in our footsteps, so that we have not a pleasant financial prospect to face. If the government, as announced in the speech from the throne, intend to begin the construction of public works to relieve unemployment, then to me it seems that the safe course to pursue is to issue additional currency to a reasonable amount for that purpose. I do not say it should be issued to an unlimited extent, but I do hope they will not go into the marts of the world and borrow more money, thus adding to the public debt of this country upon which we now have difficulty paying the interest.

I do think this will be helpful; I quite agree with other speakers that it will not meet the situation in its entirety, but I think perhaps it would help carry us over what undoubtedly is going to be another serious year so far as unemployment is concerned. For a few moments to-day I had the pleasure of talking with General McNaughton, and I was rather pleased to learn that the result of the efforts of the federal government to provide employment, not necessarily paid employment but at all events to give men who could secure no employment, food and clothing—

Mr. BENNETT: And shelter.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): —though I do not think we need bother to mention the remuneration they receive. I learned that almost fifty thousand young men have passed through the hands of the department. That is a very large number of our citizens, and if fifty thousand more men could secure employment under the plan now proposed it would all be helpful. Naturally this would apply not only to unmarried men but also to married men who are in receipt of relief to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: I just want to correct the hon. gentleman on one point, because I know he will be anxious to have it right. Fifty thousand men have passed through their hands, but there are twenty-one thousand men still in their employ.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I was merely mentioning the number given me by the general as having been employed from time to time since the inception of the camps.

I do not intend to go into the question of unemployment generally; we all deplore it and we all agree that something worth while should be done. I merely wish to say that so far as I am concerned I personally do not agree with the idea of going into the money marts of the world and borrowing funds for this purpose. I think plenty of work can be provided in the construction even of public buildings that are required by the federal government throughout Canada. I do not say that by this means we will employ a very large percentage of the men now out of employment, but it will be helpful and in my opinion it will be safe. So I hope that when the government bring down their program they will bear in mind the two points I have mentioned, that we should not be charged with inflation, that we shall have plenty of coverage for the issue of this currency, and that the injection of this currency into circulation will be helpful in many quarters and will provide employment for those who cannot secure it otherwise.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a few words in support of the motion moved by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote): The hon. gentleman has a certain amount of expert knowledge along financial lines. I do not say that I have any such knowledge, but it often occurred to me that a sound system of finance that impoverishes three-quarters of the population must have some flaw in it somewhere, and that is what has happened within the last few years.

I do not see that it should make any particular difference to the credit of the country if the dominion were to issue $100,000,000 of new currency or if the government should establish a credit of $100,000,000 in order to carry on some kind of work. The hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) is concerned about the debt of the country, and I should like to say something in this connection because I believe I know more about it than I know about finance. I believe it is absolutely impossible to carry on the system under which we are living without an ever-increasing amount of debt. I say it is impossible for this reason, that the producers of wealth never receive for producing that wealth sufficient to enable them to consume it, and consequently the surplus values which they produce cannot be removed from the market or disposed of except by creating new debt. That debt, whether it arises through investment in new capital equipment, whether it arises through government borrowings for public works, or whether it is spent in destructive effort in war, keeps piling up. There is no possible way by which those surplus values can be disposed of except by creating debt, so the longer the capitalist system continues the more debt we will have.

I believe that in dealing with this question of unemployment we should take it for granted that every other hon. member of this house is just as interested in the problem and its solution as we are. Last year I spoke at many meetings at which I criticized the Prime Minister and the policies of this government, but I always stated that I was satisfied that the Prime Minister was just as much interested in finding a solution for the problem of unemployment as I was. But I wish to go further than that. The Prime Minister insists on trying to find a solution within the ambit of the present system, and I say that a solution within the ambit of capitalism is absolutely impossible.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. MacINNIS: Very well; bring forward your solution and pass it on to the Prime Minister. I am sure he will be glad to get it, because he has been looking for a solution for the last four or five years. Even if we went back to the peak of employment and production that existed in 1928, still one-half of those unemployed to-day would remain unemployed. The technological improvements in mechanical equipment make it absolutely impossible to decrease unemployment unless we increase very substantially the rewards to labour in the production of wealth. That is the point we should bear in mind, that no matter what steps we may take here, whether they be by way of shortening hours of labour or the provision of public works, they are merely palliatives, though even palliatives should not be turned down in an emergency of this kind.

I do not think there is any particular merit in the solution offered by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), who suggested going back to the land and living as our pioneer forefathers did one hundred or one hundred and fifty years ago. Why stop there? If we are not to take advantage of all the advances that have been made during that time why should we stop at one hundred years back? Why not go back many thousands of years and live in caves in the earth, as our forbears did? It is just as logical to suggest one as the other. As a matter of fact, life is very simple, if we would only take time to analyze it and not base our assumptions on preconceived ideas. Man has always been able to sustain himself, and has always done so. Primitive man provided himself with food and if he needed clothing he provided himself with it. But, as man advanced and gained knowledge certain divisions of labour came about, so that instead of one man doing all the labour necessary for his own sustenance he did only a certain part of it. Then he exchanged directly the product of that labour with some one else for something that person had produced. Now that we have reached the machine age although everyone of us, when he can, performs some useful social function in society, we are unable to exchange with others without paying tribute to a third party.

I am a street-railway man. When working in my home city I take various people to work in the morning,—the tailor, the baker, the barber, the candlestick maker, the carpenter, the machinist. In taking those people to work I am merely exchanging certain services for services these people are performing for me. The tailor makes my clothes, the barber cuts my hair, the carpenter builds my house, and so forth.

Mr. GOTT: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has spoken for ten minutes and has not referred to the matter before the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member addressing the house is in order.

Mr. MacINNIS: The resolution under discussion is very wide and if the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott) does not like what I have to say he does not have to listen to it; consequently he will not learn anything.

The point I make is this, that while we are performing these services we are paying tribute to certain other people who have gained control of our activities. The amount they take in tribute has become so great that there is not anything left in the hands of the producers which will enable them to consume the wealth they have produced. If hon. members wish proof of my statement all they have to do is to refer to the resolution passed only a few days ago concerning the appointment of a committee to investigate the spread in the prices of commodities. The condition I have described has become so unbearable and so obvious that in these days everyone can see it.

I suggest the resolution moved by the hon. member for Macleod has considerable merit not as a solution for our problems, but along with certain other palliatives it would be the means of doing something for the great number of unemployed who find themselves not only suffering physical discomfort but who are in danger of losing their morale in the struggle with the conditions confronting them.

Mr. J. H. STITT (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the resolution before the house this afternoon, and in order that anything I have to say may be properly recorded I beg leave as an introduction to my remarks to read the resolution. It is as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, in view of the large number of unemployed, and with the necessity of increasing the purchasing power of the people, it is expedient that the government give immediate consideration to the inauguration of a large scale program of public works, to be financed by a direct issue of non-interest bearing dominion notes.

The people in my constituency, and those of the province of Manitoba certainly expect me to make some contribution to this debate. I do not pretend to be an expert economist; I do not pretend to have a solution, but while attending a university for a period of three years before the war I had the pleasure and experience of trying to master some of the principles of economics. Then, following the war I was employed for a period of three years in the bureau of statistics, and for another three-year term I have been a member of this House of Commons. During my membership in this chamber I have learned something from the debates. May I say at the outset that I agree very much more with the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) than I do with the hon. members for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) and South Toronto (Mr. Geary) who spoke this afternoon. I should also make it clear that in accepting the nomination as a candidate in the constituency of Selkirk I told the electors assembled that if the time came in this House of Commons when I believed the interests of my country were in conflict with those of my party, my country would get my vote.

I do not see any great reason why the government cannot accept the motion now before the house. It is already committed to a program of public works, although it is not stated in the speech from the throne whether or not there will be a large-scale program. In the very nature of things, if the program of public works is to be used as a remedy for unemployment it ought to be not a small but a more than ordinary program. From rumours I have heard and from reading between the lines I believe the government is contemplating a rather extensive program.

I should like to say this afternoon something which I hope will sink into the minds and hearts of every hon. member of the government and every hon. member supporting it. Before doing so, I must ask you, Mr. Speaker, to call for better order. I should like in this connection to refer to the reasonable speech made by the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart). There is an issue facing the government to-day the like of which has never faced any government in Canada. To the extent to which the government faces that issue it will be either victorious or defeated. Nay, more, Mr. Speaker; the welfare of the great mass of humanity in Canada will be enhanced, or the opportunity will be lost. There can be no doubt about that. If I could write upon the wall like the prophet of old, "Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin." I would take the words of the hon. member for West Edmonton and say, "Beware, before you commit yourselves to a policy of going out, borrowing money and adding to the already burdensome debt of interest overhanging Canada at the present time." I suggest that the government do not neglect the proposal contained in this resolution, and that it consider the financing of public works projects by the direct issue of non-interest bearing dominion notes. I want to make myself clear. I do not believe in uncontrolled and unwarranted inflation, but I say that we have entered into an agreement with the great powers of the world—I believe that Canada is a signatory to that agreement—whereby our gold base may be reduced to 25 per cent. We are standing at the threshold of opportunity when the value of gold has been increased to this enormous extent by the action of the President of the United States, who has handed to this government and to this country, if they want to take, it, a present of almost $60,000,000. That is the situation to-day.

There is this to be said for the proposals enunciated by the hon. member for Macleod. He was fair and reasonable throughout the greater part of his speech. He did not advocate uncontrolled inflation. I want to say this right here in this house, that I believe that the kind of preaching of sound money that we have had in this country is wholly unsound. It has been sweet-sounding for the receivers of interest, but it has meant fury for the masses of Canadians; there is no doubt about that.

I cannot, however, follow the hon. member for Macleod when he proposed that this money ought to be issued in the form of scrip and that through stamps affixed thereto it should depreciate by one per cent per month.

Mr. COOTE: I made that as one alternative suggestion. There were several others.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I do not think that suggestion is acceptable because it occurred to me, when that suggestion was made, that after a period of eight years the symbol of wealth which he proposed, namely scrip, would be automatically destroyed. But there is another reason even more cogent why his proposition should not be accepted. We would then have two kinds of circulating media in this country. We would have a poorer medium as against a better medium, and according to Gresham's law, which would immediately start to operate, the superior medium would be hoarded and the inferior medium would go into circulation. I do not think that you can have in any country a currency medium of more than one kind. I think the experience of the world has tended to show that the inferior medium always drives out the superior and more excellent one.

Nor can I quite agree with the hon. member for Macleod that that is the best way in which to give purchasing power to the people. There certainly is more than one way which ought to be considered. It is, however, one way by which we can secure purchasing power for the masses of the people and give them considerable employment.

The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) in his remarks said that there was no unemployment on the farm. It is true that there is plenty of employment on the farms in Canada to-day, but the agriculturists of this country are almost in a state of serfdom. They are down almost to the status of peasants on the soil. What is the situation that we have in western Canada? Half our export market has been lost; the price of wheat has been reduced almost by fifty per cent, and the whole grain-growing industry has to operate on a twenty-five per cent basis. Is this the time to increase the competition amongst producers on the farm? Is this the time to make more difficult the conditions under which agriculture is operating in this country to-day? That is only a palliative that will last only a little while. It is not really trying to mobilize the forces which we have in this country, and it is not a serious attempt to really cope with the situation.

I remember also that the hon. member for Stanstead said that we have built up in this country an industrial system of which we are proud. But, Mr. Speaker, I for one am not very proud of our industrial system. I do not see how any man in this house can be proud of the situation to-day, with thousands of railwaymen, for instance, thrown out of employment, and where the artisan and the mechanic has no longer any function to perform, where not only are the muscles of men deteriorating through idleness but the skill which their hands have learned through years of labour is being lost, and where hope is fading from their eyes and faith is dying in their hearts of having any reasonable kind of future life. No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree with the hon. member for Stanstead when he says that we are proud of our industrial system. I am ashamed of it, Mr. Speaker.

I had occasion the other day to speak in a church in this city for a little while, and I could not help saying that when that little group in the corner of this house says that things are wrong, they are certainly expressing the truth. Things are wrong, and no matter what speeches are made on this side, no matter how many platitudes are uttered, no matter how we may talk of the spirit of the pioneers, I say that what this country wants is the pioneer spirit in legislation—the spirit that is not afraid, the spirit that is not the high priest of the status quo, the spirit that will go out, to use the words of Lloyd George, and develop our domain, and that will bring to the masses of humanity the necessities of life, for those necessities exist in abundance if only we have the will and the energy and the inspiration to find a way of bringing them to the people.

As there is going to be a program of public works in this country I think that the government should give very serious consideration to the motion that has been proposed. I have just been worrying about an attitude that the government might adopt, and I am going to tell the government through you, Mr. Speaker, if I may, just why I have been worrying as I have been. We have a situation existing in Canada in which we have to pay many millions of dollars in interest on the obligations of the national railway. According to the information that was given to the house by the banking committee last year, that situation is costing us $428,000,000 in interest annually. What are we going to do about it? Are we going to reduce taxation? Are we going to issue money on a twenty-five per cent gold basis and on a plan, consequent upon a revaluation of gold, so that we may cut down taxation? Are we going to refuse to give the people of this country the services they require and lose the opportunity of stimulating business? Or are we going so to organize and control the situation that we shall be in a position to give to the masses of the Canadian people the opportunity they deserve? There is no man or no group in this house that I need be afraid of and I want to say again just as profoundly and deliberately as I can that if this money that can be obtained by the reconstruction of our finances is not used in a humane, in a heroic and in a reasonable way to promote opportunity in this country, then the government will be defeated. In my humble opinion it will deserve defeat.

There is perhaps another matter to which I should refer. I think that one of the great difficulties which we are facing at the present time is the interest burden which the country is carrying. One of the reasons for this is the loss of equilibrium between the value of money being paid in the way of interest and the wages received for labour and prices obtained for other commodities. How can a man who agreed years ago to pay eight per cent interest upon an obligation feel that it is equitable for him to have to pay that nominal amount when he has to produce two and one-half or three times as much goods to meet his obligation? I believe that the time has come when we shall have to get money out of the pockets of the hoarders and put it into the pockets of the spenders. Any scheme which can be elaborated by this house to do that very thing will help to solve the situation.

As an example, let us consider the situation of a farmer who contracted an interest obligation in 1926 when wheat was selling at $1.56 per bushel. With wheat selling at 52 cents per bushel last year, that man had to produce three times the amount of wheat in order to pay the interest upon an obligation contracted in 1926. A nominal rate of interest of eight per cent in 1926 becomes twenty-four per cent when based upon present-day purchasing power. That is usury. When we talk about the sanctity of contracts and when we sanctify nominal rates of interest we forget that what looked like a reasonable contract in 1926 has become a slave pact in 1933. I think it was revealed last session that the parliament of Canada has the power to reduce interest rates already contracted for, and I believe we should exercise that power. If I have the time I shall try to develop my argument.

One of the great difficulties we are facing at the present time is the fact that we are in the straitjacket of interest. These long term contracts have taken possession of our whole body politic and economic and we do not seem to be able to extricate ourselves from the burden which is overpowering us. But we could do so by means of a simple amendment to the Interest Act. All we need to do is to state in clear-cut language that all interest rates contracted for and payable in Canada are to be reduced by thirty-three and one-third per cent. The question may be asked: What is going to happen to our external debt? What will happen to our external debt if we go on the way we are going? We shall not pay any of the principal, let alone the interest. A true Conservative policy, a true Liberal policy and a true Progressive policy is one which faces facts. It is one under which the debtor can meet the creditor and say: This is all that I can pay; these are all my goods; this I will pay you but give me an opportunity to conserve some portion of the money you have loaned me and provide me an opportunity to pay you without becoming your slave.

It will be stated that we owe $4,000,000,000 in the United States and that we must pay the interest upon this obligation. I believe that matter could be arranged by the international joint commission. I believe we could go to the United States and say something like this: Uncle Sam, we have been the best payers in the known world; in the past we have paid you all the interest and the principal we agreed to pay; we have also paid you a pretty penalty by way of exchange and we have given you nearly all the gold that we have produced during the last three or four years; when we borrowed this money you were willing to take our grain, our wheat, our coal and our lumber but you have now closed your doors; instead of leaving us a reasonable opportunity to pay you, you have put us in a position of serfdom. That is what the American tariff policy has done to this country. England is not able to pay her obligations to the United States. The Argentine is not able to pay and Russia still owes $500,000,000 which she has refused to pay. Why cannot we say to President Roosevelt and his advisors: You have a National Recovery Act in your country and we need one in ours; you as a great nation are dedicated to the principle that you cannot exist half slave and half free and we ask you to extend that principle to us your northern neighbour.

There is another way in which this could be done. In the act which we could pass curtailing interest rates by thirty-three and one-third per cent there could be a final clause to read as follows:

> This act will not become operative until proclaimed by the governor general in council.

In the meantime we could go to the United States and show them the situation which exists in this country. We could say to them: Let us float new loans in your country at one-third less interest and thereby give us a chance to preserve our autonomy and our position as a creditor country.

Four billion dollars is owed to the United States and something like $1,400,000,000 to England. What has England done? The government of that country reduced the interest rate on a large loan, I believe it amounted to hundreds of millions of pounds, from over four per cent to something like two and one-quarter per cent. Did we not spend $2,000,000,000 in money and sacrifice the lives of 60,000 of the best of our sons to go to the assistance of England and the empire? Why could we not say to them: If we are British subjects and have paid you this tribute, why can you not give us an opportunity to free ourselves from these shackles that bear us down? Give us a chance to live and to perform the services which are required by our people.

There is still another matter upon which I should speak. An excellent means of assisting the promotion of prosperity and increasing employment in this country would be provided by the creation of a reconstruction purchasing board financed by new money issued on the new gold basis. This would link up the buying power of agriculture and put the industries of Canada to work. This question may be asked: Is there any credit left in Canada; is there any purchasing power? Yes, there is. I believe it is true to say, of over 50 per cent of the farm owners and home owners in Canada, that they have no mortgages whatsoever on their lands and homes. I believe there are many farmers and home owners who have mortgages of less than 25 per cent of the value of their properties and upon which all interest and taxes are paid to date. By a questionnaire which can easily be devised in the bureau of statistics an examination can be made of the purchasing power of these Canadians. Questions like these might be asked: Your name, your legal address; the municipality in which your land is situated; the encumbrances upon your farm or property; the amount owing, and whether taxes are paid or not; how much of your land is developed, and so on. A number of other questions would suggest themselves, all intended to ascertain the purchasing power or credit of the individual. Through the officials, the information received in answer to the questionnaire, might be verified by means of four letters. One letter could be sent to the registry office in which the land is located, to ascertain whether there was any encumbrance or not. Another letter could be sent to the assessor to see what the situation was in regard to tax payments and as to the amount of land cultivated and developed. A further letter could be sent to the bank manager, or a letter might be sent to the municipal official regarding the credit of the individual; and by means of a reconstruction purchasing board we could begin to place orders in the factories upon receipt of orders from the home owner or farmer, which would mean employment for citizens and credit extension for the farmers and home owners.

I am told that it is imposible to work out this scheme. It is not impossible; I contend that it is quite easy. I worked on questionnaires in the industrial census for three years in the civil service of this country, and the essential element in the scheme I propose is that it will prevent hoarding. No money would be lent as money to the farmer or the home owner. The orders would come from these people to the reconstruction board and would then be offered to the manufacturers, and the money for the goods would be paid to the manufacturers or their agents direct, secured by a lien in the form of a promissory note from the agriculturist. By this scheme the $100,000,000, if it is going to be created, could be put into circulation in the most feasible way, and it would guarantee a greater velocity of circulation than any other scheme I have been able to think of. It would mean that the farms would be reconditioned; old barns and homes would be repainted and redecorated. After the plan had been in operation a few months the board would find itself in this position; it would have orders possibly for four thousand mowers, five thousand binders, ten thousand sets of harness, fifteen thousand cultivators, twenty thousand democrats; and the farmer or home owner would be able to specify in his order to the board the particular kind of article he wanted. This would insure his getting a standard article and that the money was not being placed by those who were hoping to further their own political fortunes.

Just realize the situation we are faced with. Here is a scheme whereby the country can issue, without paying interest thereon, a sum of money all the way from $1 to $250,000,000; and as the money has not to be paid for in the ordinary way, that is to say, secured by obligations entailing the payment of interest, we shall have for it such goods and services as the country needs at the present time. Factories would start to work on orders for goods not yet manufactured, and it would mean that the whole of eastern Canada would start operating again to supply the demands of western agriculture. It would mean, I believe, according to reasonable estimates, that the money would be turned over ten or twelve times, and if we utilized $100,000,000 in this way we should be able to provide within Canada at the present time anywhere from $1,000,000,000 to $1,250,000,000 of new business.

I have put up this scheme this afternoon largely because the opportunity presented itself and not because I have been prepared in the way I ought to have been to submit this suggestion. I appeared before the royal commission on Banking and Currency and presented these ideas to them. I was told I was afraid to make these proposals to the House of Commons. I am not afraid to make them, and I make them in the humble hope that they may be of some assistance and that this house will perhaps recognize that there are ways whereby we can put this country to work at the present time. Let me add this additional feature. In handing these orders to the manufacturers we could say. "You are not going to have any overtime in your plant. If you are going to get these orders you will have to operate on a six or a seven-hour day and you will have to pay wages that are fair and reasonable, wages that will provide a reasonable standard of living." Perhaps this criticism will be advanced: Well, this is good only for a year or two, so long as the money lasts. I ask, however, what man can look forward more than one or two years in this present world with the forces of change and even of chaos operating in it? You can take this scheme of mine and if you save $133,000,000 of interest yearly you can put $100,000,000 into business in Canada annually, and you will not have the same interest obligations in twenty-five years that you have to-day.

The great burden we are facing at the present time is the burden of rigid interest rates, and it is closing around us like an anaconda; it is squeezing the life out of the country or, to change the metaphor, it is poisoning the whole process, economic and politic. It means that capital to-day has no confidence; it is so imbued with fear that it cannot go ahead. When the present leader of the Conservative party in the province of Manitoba says that this is the time for governments to get out of the way and give business a chance, I say that business is paralyzed with fear, and this is the time for the government to step in in a reasonable way to give a lead to business, to give the business man some confidence and to rebuild, on this system which is crumbling down, a new system that will be an improvement in which opportunities will be enlarged and Canadians may inherit the life for which they were intended.

I have given much thought to this proposition. I have laid it before influential men in this country and it has been received with a great deal of approbation. I hope that my contribution to the debate this afternoon will be taken in the spirit in which it is intended. In the year 1914 I offered my life for my country; that life was not taken. I offer now what ideas I have, prompted by no ulterior hope of profit to myself.

In closing I should like to commend the eloquent testimony which the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), in his speech on the address to His Excellency the other evening, paid to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). That was a speech made by perhaps the most independent man in the house, a man who is now moved by the spiritual verities for in his speech he spoke about those imponderables that moved the Prime Minister in his service to this country. He spoke about a possible basis of union when we could forget the party questions that divide us in the house at the present time. The citizens of Canada are not interested in the maledictions that are hurled at the little group in the corner and they despise the petty talk that goes across the floor of the house from party to party in a partisan warfare which really does not spell and will not work welfare in Canada. It may be stated that what I have suggested is only a dream, but it is something that I have worked out as a lawyer with what little knowledge I have of economics, with my experience as a member of this chamber and with what training I received in the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

I remember one day when I was a soldier on the battlefields of Flanders, there was a huge gun that used to go off periodically; it exploded at a cost of $1,400 for each shot. As I listened to this gun, I used to wonder in my humble and perhaps dreamy way whether the time would ever come when I would have $1,400 to complete my education. That opportunity came and I am here this afternoon, humble as I may be, unlearned, unschooled and without the art of eloquence to move people who are not even listening to my voice. But if we had $2,000,000,000 to spend upon a war in Europe, if this country had thousands, nay millions, of dollars to send us over there in a blood-letting expedition, the horror of which can never be realized and never be painted by anyone who participated therein, surely the government of the day will not lose the opportunity; surely they will see that forces over which they have no control have placed in their lap, if they want to grasp it, the colossal sum of $250,000,000. Will it be used in a heroic and righteous way? Shall this country achieve prosperity or shall the nation perish?

Mr. HENRY E. SPENCER (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to congratulate very heartily the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stitt) on the able, earnest and valuable speech which he has just delivered. If hon. members would speak as directly as he has done on the subject before us, I feel sure many of our problems would be quickly solved. He has touched on certain important points, with some of which I shall deal; and I shall make some references to speeches made by other hon. members.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

WHEAT AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) if his department is issuing any literature with respect to the wheat agreement, and if so if he would have copies of it laid on the table of the house?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the only document I know about is the one the Prime Minister laid on the table, and it is not being issued by the department of which I am in charge. However, it is a document which, I believe, was prepared from the agreement and undoubtedly statistics contained in it were secured from the bureau of statistics.

STRIKE AT CHAPLEAU

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon). I have in my hand communications from Chapleau, Ontario, to the effect that the strike is still going on, that the situation is becoming extremely critical and that last night 130 men were destitute and seeking relief. There is also information to the effect that strike breakers are being brought from the province of Quebec. I would ask the government to take measures to prevent bringing in strike breakers from the neighbouring province and to help in the solution of this strike.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the matter to which the hon. member has drawn the attention of the house is one purely within provincial jurisdiction. So far as I am aware the federal Department of Labour has not had its attention drawn to the situation to which reference has been made. Of course, we have conciliation officers, but we have found that in certain instances arising out of labour difficulties of the past few months the federal conciliation officer, upon reaching the scene of the disturbance was defeated in his conciliatory efforts by those whose design it was to keep the employers and employees from getting into contact, with a view to prolonging the strike. At any rate, I shall look into the matter and learn what the situation is.

AIR MAIL SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILFRED HANBURY (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Acting Postmaster General (Mr. Dupré) as to whether or not as yet the government has been able to define its policy with reference to transcontinental transportation of mail by air and, if not, I should like to know if he could at this time give to the house any definite date when he will be able to do so.

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Acting Postmaster General): In reply to the hon. gentleman, I cannot make any announcement today, but I will look into the matter.

WHEAT SHIPMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). With regard to the free shipment of 8,000 bushels of wheat from Fort William to the port of London, England, via Buffalo and New York, on December 7, 1933, a shipment which was apparently in conflict with the intent of the Anglo-Canadian trade treaty, 1932, under which a preference of six cents a bushel was to be allowed Canadian wheat shipped through British ports, may I ask the minister what action, if any, his government intends to take with regard to the breach which the British customs authorities have made in the government's policy of political and economic imperialism as applied to wheat?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker in the first place the question of the hon. gentleman involved a great deal of assumption on his part and an ex parte judgment upon the British government for some action which it has not been demonstrated has taken place. Eliminating all the useless matter that was involved, may I say that the regulations governing the movement of Canadian wheat to the British market via a foreign country are British regulations which are set forth clearly in connection with their customs law. I have forgotten for the moment the name of the act, perhaps the British Duties Act, but it is well known and has been referred to frequently here. Those regulations are entirely under the control of the British government, and any movement of grain which complies with those regulations will undoubtedly be admitted by the British government in accordance with their own laws and regulations. I am not aware of any evidence that there has been a violation by the British government of the trade agreement between this country and Great Britain.

Mr. McINTOSH: With regard to the minister's statement, may I say, western Canada would like to see more shipments through Canadian and United States ports as well for the benefit of western producers.

SMELT FISHING SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. MICHAUD (Restigouche-Madawaska): May I ask the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) if it is the intention of the government to extend the smelt fishing season in the Baie des Chaleurs in order to relieve the distress of the people of that district?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): Some requests have been made to the department to that effect, and the matter is under consideration.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): You had better hurry up in reaching a decision as the season will soon be over.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gobeil for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King.

Mr. L. E. PARENT (Terrebonne) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned on Tuesday evening last, I was discussing the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I was referring to agriculture and pointing out the recommendations made in the speech from the throne in connection with farm products; I was establishing the ratio between the prices of farm products and those of manufactured goods. I now wish to point out to the house the sad conditions under which our farmers actually labour, owing to the government's policy.

One must bear in mind that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is well acquainted with the present situation. Members of this house have, perhaps, not all read the publication "Canada 1934." At page 12 this is what we find:

> Such an uneven recession in prices—
> The prices refer to farm products.
> —worked extreme hardships because it seriously disturbed the relative purchasing power of different economic groups in the country.

Groups refer to farmers. This deplorable state affecting the Canadian farmer is due to the famous protection promised in 1930, which, however, only favoured manufactured products as it was so often proved in this house.

Let us briefly examine how the farmers suffer from such a state. Purchasing power is equivalent to product exchange or labour exchange or again service exchange. Through the medium of a national currency, namely, the dollar, in Canada. The farmer is forced to pay a tribute to the manufacturer, varying between 25 and 30 per cent, when he purchases the products of the latter. In other words the dollar earned by the farmer only represents 75 or 80 cents of the value in manufactured goods. The manufacturer, on the other hand, can, with a dollar's worth of his goods, purchase $1.25 worth of farm products. I shall quote some official figures in this connection. On mowing and binding machines, which are two indispensable farm implements, he paid under the Borden regime, a customs duty of 12·50 per cent; under the Meighen regime, the same percentage; under the Liberal administration, half, namely 6 per cent; since this government has assumed power, 25 per cent; and under the preference schedule 28·75 per cent. The outcome, sir, is that when the farmer requires a mowing or binding machine, he must pay 28·75 per cent of customs duty, when purchased outside of the British Empire. I intend, now, to show that farm implements are not purchased in England but mostly from foreign countries; therefore, all Canadian purchasers must pay the duty, according to the tariff in force.

According to the Bulletin 423 of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, published in August, 1933, $203,089 of farm implements were purchased in June, 1933, of which $167,000 came from the United States subject to a duty of 25 per cent, while previously, under the Liberal regime, it was but 6 per cent, and there was only $14,791 worth imported from the United Kingdom. Under the Conservative tariff regime, the farmer therefore pays on almost 80 per cent of his purchases of farm implements, a customs duty of 25 per cent.

Let us examine what happens in the dairy industry, a greatly developed industry in Canada. No farmer can compete in this field of activity unless he has one, two and even three cream separators. According to Bulletin 423, August, 1933, statistics show that Canada imported, in June, 1933, 1,130 cream separators, of which 724 came from Sweden, subject to a duty of 25 per cent; 138 came from the United States, subject to a similar duty, and 72 came from Germany, also subject to the same duty, a total of 934 out of 1,130. There were, therefore, only 196 imported from the United Kingdom and entering the country free of duty.

Furthermore, according to Bulletin 576, February 1, 1934, one notes that almost half of our imports of farm implements in December, consisted of cream separators. Figures speak for themselves. Half of the imports of farm implements in December consisted of cream separators destined to the dairy industry. These imports were valued at $41,039. We imported 567 from the United States which paid a duty of 25 per cent, 166 from Sweden and 70 from Germany. This means that not one cream separator from the British Empire during that period entered Canada. Owing to the Imperial Economic agreements at Ottawa, the duty on all imports of farm implements coming from outside the empire, was raised. And according to the evidence furnished by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, the farmer is obliged to-day to pay a high duty in order to purchase what is indispensable to the farm, while he receives greatly reduced prices for his own products.

It is not astonishing, sir, that His Excellency the Governor General could well afford making special recommendations to this government in order to fill the deficiencies existing. For the last three years, since this government has assumed power, nothing was provided for and in 1933 we note no change which might improve the lot of such an important class as the Canadian farmers.

Let us now discuss the Imperial Economic agreements. Our friends opposite make much capital over the slight improvement of the world or international trade and they appropriate to themselves the whole credit for this; they contend that this improvement in trade is due to these agreements. The Imperial Economic agreements at Ottawa, sir, in my opinion, have not facilitated trade relations. The preference granted to the countries in the British Empire has not increased the sale of our products because our trade abroad has decreased since these Imperial agreements took place. Canada took advantage of the stabilization of currency existing between the pound sterling and our dollar. That is the greatest factor in the improvement which has taken place during the last months of 1933. If the government had not raised the tariff and closed foreign markets, our trade would have similarly benefited and this I contend would have been due to the stabilization of currency and not to the Ottawa agreements.

It must be pointed out, sir, that the supply and demand between two countries is automatically controlled rather than being the result of agreements, and that the stabilization of currency is the most powerful factor in establishing the possibility of exchange between two countries. I shall quote in support of this the views of an authority on the subject, those of the president of the Dominion Bank, one of the most important Canadian banks.

In the course of the speech the president delivered before the general meeting of the shareholders in the Dominion Bank, a speech published in the Ottawa Citizen, the following is how he expressed himself, speaking of our basic industries:

Lumbering is conspicuously better partly because of the rise in sterling exchange—

This corresponds to what I was stating just now.

—which has reopened the export markets, especially, the the far east and Great Britain although the situation with reference to Canada's participation in the British market needs to be cleared up, notwithstanding the conference agreements at Ottawa.

Those are the views of the president of one of our principal banks. They are of great import and confirm my assertion that the agreements at Ottawa were not the greatest factor in our trade improvement; it was the stabilization of currency between two countries.

I also believe, sir, that had our tariff not been so prohibitive to the countries outside of the British Empire, Canada would have exported more on the other markets where we would have had an easy access because in buying from other countries we necessarily forced the latter to barter and purchase from us. Exceedingly high tariff rates have paralyzed and partly closed our factories, reduced the people's purchasing power, plunged the country into the serious crisis we are at present experiencing, brought on unemployment and all the hardships which we had to suffer within the last two years.

Moreover, high tariff barriers were responsible for a decrease in customs returns, a decrease which will have to be compensated by various imposts and taxes, such as the sales tax of 6 per cent on all purchases made by the people; also other excise taxes.

Now, sir, taking the argument itself of the government in favour of its tariff or protection policy, may I state why the principles advocated daily in the house—that the Imperial agreements were responsible for the trade increase with the British Empire, because a preference was granted—are false. No consideration is taken of the fact that, if this same preference or if the tariff had not been increased against other countries, the same principle could be applied. Were not the measures which proved advantageous to the countries of the British Empire, advantageous as well to the other countries?

In order to prove my contention, sir, may I quote the Dominion Bureau's statistics so as to show that, under the low tariff regime, we traded more abroad, while under that of high tariff, protection and Imperial agreements, our foreign trade decreased considerably. I shall first quote the figures in connection with the countries of the British Empire, I shall only mention those reaching in the millions. In 1922, going back slightly more than 10 years, at the end of the Conservative administration, we exported for $345,000,000 worth to countries of the British Empire; in 1929, after seven years of Liberal administration, we were exporting $535,000,000 worth, this, under a moderate tariff regime. In 1932, after one year only of Conservative administration, our exports had dropped to $218,000,000, and in 1933, following the Imperial Economic agreements, at Ottawa, they had not increased but had remained about stationary, at $222,000,000. Let us examine our imports: In 1922, $149,000,000; in 1929, $257,000,000; in 1932, $147,000,000, and, finally, in 1933, they had reached the lowest level and only amounted to $120,000,000. Is that such a laudable result of which one can boast and thank this government? I doubt it.

But that is not all: At page 132 of the publication known as "Canada 1934" one finds that in 1922, at the end of the Conservative regime, our total exports amounted to $740,000,000; in 1929, $1,363,000,000, and, in 1933, under the high protection policy of our friends opposite, $473,000,000. The same ratio applies to our imports.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate I do not think it is necessary to add anything to what has been said already, particularly by hon. members on this side. I refer especially to the able speeches delivered by the mover (Mr. Gobeil) and the seconder (Mr. Barber) of the address and to the splendid effort of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) who reviewed the whole political situation for the last three years and outlined what the government propose to do in the way of bringing down legislation at this session. However, I feel I should take part in this debate in order to express my confidence in the government. I believe the people of the west, particularly the people in the eastern part of the province of Saskatchewan which I have the honour to serve, share with me in that feeling of confidence. I think the people realize what it has meant to the government to carry on the affairs of this country under present conditions and those which have existed for the past three years. Hon. members on this side, and I believe the people generally throughout the country, expect reasonable and constructive criticism from the opposition. In times such as these we should have at least reasonable cooperation and moral support. I suggest to the opposition the cooperation referred to the other evening by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa).

Throughout this discussion the opposition has been prone to charge at least some responsibility for the present condition of the country to the government. I do not think any one party or any one government can be charged with full responsibility. However, I believe that there is certain evidence which can be produced to show that a large part of this responsibility lies at the door of the opposition. When this government took office in August, 1930, they found many problems facing them which had been in the making for two, three and even more years previously. There was the question of lost markets; there were no markets for the products of our forests, our soil and our mines. Does anyone believe that this government is responsible for that or for the transportation problem? Is this government responsible for the deficits in connection with the operation of our great transcontinental system? Are they responsible for the lack of economy, the gross extravagance of the late government and for the commitments, running into several millions of dollars, yes, into hundreds of millions of dollars, which were left on their door-step by the previous administration? I say that they are not.

I think the opposition will agree that the trade of the country is a barometer which indicates the trend of affairs. A comparison of the gross trade of this dominion in 1920 with that in 1929 will not prove very favourable to the administration of the late government. I have in my hand the Commercial Intelligence Journal of January 20, a publication which is available to all hon. members. At page 92 there is a table of exports from Canada to the United States of principal commodities such as are produced on Canadian farms. We find that in the last six months of 1920 the export trade amounted to $119,000,000 and in the last six months of 1929 it had declined to $33,000,000—a difference of $85,000,000 odd as between those two periods.

Turn to another column and you will find that the trade for the last six months of 1932 was $1,763,000, and it had increased during the corresponding period in 1933 to $6,103,000, in other words, an increase of almost 400 per cent. The interesting part of the chart as given on this page is to be found in the items that were entering free into the United States from Canada in 1920, and I would invite the house to compare those figures with the tariff which was in force in 1929. There is a very material increase in respect of many of the articles that appear in the free list of 1920; compared with that year we find a substantial increase in 1929.

Let us now take the exports of wheat. During the period in which the opposition held office there was an abnormal increase in production, and exports did not keep pace with that increase. We find that in 1922 our exports of wheat from Canada amounted to 185,000,000 bushels and in 1930 the total was 186,000,000 bushels. There was a gradual increase however in the carryover, for we find that in 1923 there was a carryover of approximately 40,000,000 bushels, whereas in 1927 it had reached the figure of 58,000,000 bushels. In 1930 it had reached 140,000,000 bushels and last year the carryover was 219,000,000. A similar story can be found in connection with bacon exports. In 1920 our bacon exports amounted to 200,000,000 pounds and in 1921 they had decreased to 98,000,000 pounds. In 1930 they had gone down to 26,000,000, pounds and in 1931 we ended the fiscal year with 12,000,000 pounds. We find however that under the trade agreements carried out by this government with the United Kingdom our bacon exports have increased until last year they totalled 43,000,000 pounds, a very substantial increase.

It is interesting to review the imports of bacon during the same period. In 1920 we imported into this dominion 4,900,000 pounds of bacon and hams; in 1929, 3,000,000 pounds; in 1930, 7,720,000 pounds; and in 1931, 6,330,000. In 1933 the figure had been reduced to 15,000 pounds. That is the result of the agreement with the United Kingdom.

We find a similar story in connection with cattle. In 1921 we exported approximately 300,000 head of cattle, and there was a gradual decrease until in 1931 the figure was 38,000. We know that when this government took office our cattle export trade had practically dwindled to nothing and there were no facilities for shipping cattle overseas; there was not a single vessel equipped for the purpose. I am pleased to say however that under this agreement our cattle exports last year increased very materially until we had reached the figure of 53,000 for the year.

The figures I have quoted with respect to trade indicate the record which the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) established for himself when he was Minister of Agriculture. It is not a very good record, and it is no wonder that he himself, speaking in the city of Regina on October 19, 1931, made the following remarks with reference to agriculture. I quote what appeared in the Regina Leader of that date:

> The Hon. Mr. Motherwell, speaking in Regina, made this statement, that a fresh foundation had to be laid for agriculture in Canada, both east and west, if the country and towns are to be saved.

In no better words could the failure of the Liberal government adequately to care for agriculture be described than in those words of the hon. gentleman.

There has been some talk of tariffs restricting trade. I am getting tired of hearing that statement, and I believe the people of Canada are becoming tired of it too, for there is no evidence of it; in fact, under this government we have now increased our trade. To my mind, such talk is only an evidence of Liberal inconsistency and hypocrisy. It is the Liberal party running true to form, for ever since confederation there has always been the cry about lowering tariffs. In this regard I can do no better than refer to the speech of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Luchkovich) the other evening, and also the speech of the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis); I think they dealt very fully with the argument about tariffs restricting trade and I will not discuss the question further.

What do we find to-day under this Conservative government, in relation to the tariffs which we have put into force Let us consider the gross imports into Canada free of duty. I have here a table prepared by the bureau of statistics giving the figures for the gross trade into Canada from the years 1926 to 1933 from all countries, from empire countries, from foreign countries and from the United Kingdom and the United States. In 1926, from all countries, the gross imports into Canada free of duty amounted to 37·1 per cent; in 1927 the figure was 36 per cent; in 1928, 36 per cent; in 1929, 35 per cent; and in 1930, at the end of the fiscal year, 34 per cent. There was a decrease in the percentage of goods entering free under the late government. In 1931 we find that the percentage was 36·7; in 1932, it was 32·8 per cent; and in 1933, 36·9, back to almost the highest percentage in the last four years of Liberal rule. The figures are similar with respect to foreign countries. I shall give the percentage of the gross imports from the United Kingdom entering free of duty:

Year—	Per cent
1926	18.7
1927	17.7
1928	19
1929	20.4
1930	21.4
1931	27.4
1932	25.1
1933	35.6

It will be seen that there is, as regards the United Kingdom, a gradual increase under our present tariff of goods entering free of duty until the amount is now almost double what it was in 1926. The same story may be told with respect to imports from the United States. The policy of the Liberal party of a gradual reduction in the tariff was carried out in such a way that by the time they left office the tariff was slightly higher than when they came into power.

The other night the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson) in his speech described what tariffs were doing for his constituency; he informed us that many industries had been re-established there, some of them working full time and others on two shifts. This is an evidence of what tariff is doing for industry. I believe the farmers of the west are agreed that the tariff has protected the primary producers and has assured for them the domestic market, that market which absorbs from 90 to 95 per cent of the total goods produced in Canada. There is no market as good as the domestic one.

This government has been carrying on under the most trying and difficult circumstances and I think it is agreed by all that since the very first day they took office they have been addressing themselves to problems which were not of their making. The government has endeavoured to maintain a sound, safe and solvent position and, in doing so, to stabilize markets and also to make markets certain. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in his address the other day gave conclusive evidence that recovery is taking place in Canada, and in support of his statement I am going to give one or two instances. The fact that consumers are buying more extensively according to reports of the retail trade throughout the country, even in western Canada, is an evidence of this recovery. There is an increase in capital expenditure. The statistics show that 200,000 more of our unemployed have been absorbed in our industrial life in the last eight months. Another excellent sign is that there is a steady increase in our favourable trade balance. When the present government took office there was an adverse trade balance of about $120,000,000, and this year it looks as though we might have a favourable trade balance of $150,000,000. There is an increase in our trade with the United Kingdom and also with the United States and there is a very substantial increase in our trade with other foreign countries. As the figures in this connection were given the other day by the Prime Minister, I shall not enter into details. We have now become the fifth exporting nation of the world; we have a sound financial position and we have the confidence and goodwill of other nations with which we are trading, and that is the greatest asset we can have.

We are now on the road to recovery and when within a very few years we reach a normal state, I believe Canada will then enjoy more material development than she has ever done before. All these instances of recovery can, I think, be credited to the United Kingdom agreements made in 1932 and our producers are now, after a year's trial, beginning to realize what those agreements really mean to Canada; they propose to take advantage of such opportunities. In the constituency which I have the honour to represent, I know the people mean to give the United Kingdom agreements a fair trial and to do their part in endeavouring to develop the trade that is necessary. My constituency is favourably situated in this respect. The people of my constituency have from the very first adopted a system of diversified farming; they have developed splendid herds, stock of all kinds, and are in a position to go ahead and take advantage of those agreements. For instance, the town of Wapella, with some 900 of a population and surrounded by a diversified farming district, shipped this year two carloads of dressed poultry, the greater part of which went to the United Kingdom. That is a splendid record and it shows how the farmers there feel with respect to the agreements.

There are many important questions into which time will not permit me to go. For example, there is the monetary problem, the establishment of a central bank and the revision of the Bank Act. Among vital questions which affect western Canada materially are those of debt adjustment and interest and taxes, but I do not propose to take the time now to go into them. On a future occasion we shall have an opportunity to do so. I wish, however, to commend the government on the fact that before they made provision for the establishment of a central bank, they set up a commission before which the people of Canada could go and submit evidence. That was the proper way in which to deal with the matter. As regards debt adjustment, it may be necessary for the provinces to take the question up first but whatever adjustment is made it will have to be with the support and cooperation of the federal government.

The question of the wheat agreement is vital to western Canada at the present time and I feel that this matter should be thoroughly discussed. The other day the Prime Minister outlined the whole situation with respect to the circumstances leading up to the wheat agreement, and it would be presumption on my part to go into it in fuller detail than he did. I am, however, concerned with the carrying out of this agreement. The first thing we must consider is the confidence and good-will that must be maintained with respect to the agreement. When we have become a party to it with some twenty other importing and exporting countries, it is up to the Canadian people to see that we carry it out and that good-will is maintained. From the statistics prepared and presented before the conference there was one of two alternatives to accept or pursue: first, they could continue the cut-throat system of marketing where supply and demand regulated and prices might go to a level which would be chaotic and cause disaster.

Then there was the other plan, as outlined by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) the other evening, that the importing and exporting countries get together and make an agreement. This they did. The exporting countries undertook that there should be a 15 per cent reduction in acreage or production. Our country was allotted a quota, and I think all agree that Canada, thanks to the efforts of the Prime Minister and the representative from western Canada at that conference, shared very favourably in receiving an allotment of 200,000,000 bushels, one per cent more than had been Canada's contribution to the total exports for the years between 1920 and 1930. I want to inform this house that the pool in western Canada is 100 per cent behind this agreement. I have heard their directors speak from time to time, I have made it my business to attend their meetings and see what their reaction was to this agreement, and I say they are 100 per cent behind it. I think it is safe to say that 90 per cent of the farmers in western Canada are behind it, with all due respect to what we have heard from the hon. members for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) and Weyburn (Mr. Young) and other opposition members. They do not voice the sentiments of the people of the west, for I know that the farmers are prepared to cooperate in this agreement, to give it a chance to function, knowing as they do what the overproduction of wheat means and the effect of the surplus on prices. As the hon. member for Peace River said the other night, this is the only desirable alternative, as by any other system we might find ourselves in a position where we have no quota at all.

But the farmers are very much concerned as to how they are to proceed to bring about the 15 per cent reduction. I am farming on a considerable scale myself and I am concerned about it. There are three or four ways in which we might go about it. We might have compulsory reduction by legislation. We might have voluntary reduction, by educating the farmers on the subject. We might have a bonus system, bonusing the farmer who summer fallows 15 per cent more than normal. A fourth plan would be an individual quota system under permit. That is the plan I wish to put forward and speak of more particularly this afternoon. But before dealing with it in detail, let me say that there are certain conditions that lead us to believe that there may be in western Canada this year a very material reduction of seeded acreage. Among these conditions are the abandonment of farms in areas where production has not been good the last few years. There is insufficient seed in many quarters; there is also a tendency to replace tractors by horses, and still more there is the menace this year of the grasshopper infestation causing a very material reduction, which I do not think we can avoid. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not going into details about the first three methods, but I do want to go at some length into the quota plan. Of course we agree that any plan adopted will have to have the cooperation and support of the provincial governments. Possibly they will have to inaugurate it, but they should have the support of this house. So I want to get the concrete proposition before this house. I am sorry that in this discussion there seems to be more adverse criticisms than concrete suggestions from the opposition as to how we might with goodwill develop some plan to carry out this scheme.

Speaking of the quota plan in more detail, I wish, Mr. Speaker, you would permit me to read more or less, as I want to be very careful to make it plain. The plan is:

(a) To determine the requirements by adding to the quota of 200,000,000 bushels the domestic requirements;

(b) To determine the acreage seed to produce wheat in 1934;

(c) Dividing (a) by (b) to arrive at the average number of bushels per acre to produce (a). This will be the basis of computation for

(d) Issuing of individual negotiable permits to market wheat to each farmer who produces a sworn statement of his acreage seeded to wheat for the number of bushels arrived at by multiplying (c) by the verified acreage.

Circumstances over which the farmers of very large sections of the west, particularly in the southern area, have had little or no control, will make it a very difficult matter to persuade them to take a sane view of any proposal to reduce the acreage to be seeded to wheat in the season 1934. Naturally the most strenuous objections are from those in the drought area. In fact I think there is no district in western Canada where a compulsory proposition would be well received. In submitting the plan I offer I would like to call attention to the fact that it is exactly the reverse of the bonus per acre or per bushel plan of two years ago, which gave to those who were fortunate enough to have a crop but gave nothing to those having none. Another feature is that no grain board will be necessary to handle this plan, it will work through the natural trade channels. The farmer fixes his own allotment by giving a sworn statement of acreage, no manipulation would be possible except by perjury. An allotment on a land basis, so much a quarter section, would not be satisfactory.

Taking into consideration the probable reduction from natural causes this year it may be that there will not be more than 21,000,000 acres seeded to wheat in the three prairie provinces; so that, taking the quota and the domestic requirements, permits might be issued to the farmers to market, say, 15 bushels per acre. I want to make it plain that the permit to market should be negotiable. Then in case a farmer's total crop were more than his allotment, he could purchase a permit to market the surplus from a man in a district where there was a partial or total crop failure. That would be a strong feature of this plan. These permits being negotiable, a farmer who was fortunate enough to have a good crop and had a few thousand bushels more to sell than he had a permit for could purchase a permit from a farmer in an area where they had no crop at all. That would bring him in many cases more than the farmers are receiving under the relief plan at the present time. A board or facilities could be set up to regulate the price, and a minimum price might be fixed for the permits so that there would be no speculation or undue trafficking in them.

This is only a suggested plan. I wished to bring something concrete before the house, and I think it is important that we should give suggestions to the government. I believe this plan will be favourably received in western Canada. I have talked with many farmers who are likely to have a much larger crop or yield than perhaps they would be permitted to sell. However, when anyone who is so fortunate as to be in that position I think he will be very pleased to have the privilege of purchasing a permit to sell the surplus wheat. I claim that at least we should have the assistance and cooperation of every hon. member in the House of Commons, and that we should not have to listen to criticism such as has been made of this agreement. This is an important matter, one which is vital to the people of Canada and more particularly to western Canada.

We have heard criticism by the hon. member for Melville. Only a few days ago he stood in this House of Commons and criticized the government with respect to its operations concerning the stabilization of wheat. More particularly his remarks were directed against Mr. McFarland. Having had experience as a cabinet minister in a former government he must have known that he was asking for information which this government could not give. I believe that on many occasions he has been to the pools endeavouring to get information. In some cases when he has got it he has used it in a political way. That is not the manner in which we believe hon. members should work. The government took its action in connection with wheat stabilization only after they had obtained the best possible advice from every interest in western Canada, including boards of trade, municipal organizations, the wheat pool and the grain exchange. I have talked with many members of the grain exchange and with the business men of western Canada, I know they are one hundred per cent behind the operations of Mr. McFarland and that they are one hundred per cent behind the government's action with respect to wheat, because they know that what was done was the only possible procedure.

In attempting to arrive at an agreement there has been an effort on the part of the twenty-one exporting and importing nations to reach a solution which might result in removing the menace of the world's surplus. Further, this agreement, if it succeeds, would help to increase prices, and we know that if the price of wheat is increased, the prices of other commodities will increase also. If there is success the prices of all commodities will be improved. But if there is failure, what then? Well, we will be in no worse position than we were before the agreement was made. That is certain. I say it is up to all hon. members to get behind this agreement and give it proper support. I claim that the present government has done more for agriculture than has any other government since confederation. Had I time I could outline what has been done. What has the Liberal party offered? There is nothing at all constructive in their policy. In the last three sessions of this parliament they have not offered one practical suggestion for the recovery of agriculture. All their speeches in western Canada have been of a breaking-down and destructive nature.

May I for a moment or two compare the policy, with respect to agriculture, this government is pursuing with that followed by the Americans to the south of us. Since March last under the N.R.A. they have destroyed 6,000,000 hogs, and they are bonusing sows for market. In Canada, under the guidance and initiative of our Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) who has devoted himself to the advancement of agriculture, great efforts have been made to induce our farmers to produce the right class of hogs, cattle and all other agricultural products. That is the difference between the two policies. Yesterday the price of live pork in Toronto was ten cents, while the price in Chicago was only three cents. For these reasons I claim that the government is doing everything within its power to help the farmer.

What is the function of a government? I believe I am stating it correctly when I say that it is the duty of the government to guide and encourage the industrial progress and social advancement of our people. It has to preserve industry and agriculture and to direct and control trade and commerce and finance. It has to preserve our national credit. These are the functions of government. In doing these things it has to maintain law, peace and order and has to preserve individual rights and opportunities in the development of our natural resources and our industries, so that there may be a fair and reasonable price to the producer and a fair and reasonable price to the consumer. That is the function of government, and I believe this government is doing that to the letter of the law.

In conclusion I wish again to state that my plan is but a suggestion. I know it will be criticized from many quarters. Certainly, I expect criticism from the opposition, because they criticize every constructive proposition coming from this side of the house. May I again express my confidence in the government, realizing that they are doing everything possible to bring Canada back to a normal state of prosperity and believing that they will be successful.

Mr. T. A. FONTAINE (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few observations concerning the speech from the throne, but before doing so may I join hon. members who have preceded me in congratulating the mover and seconder of the address in reply. Listening to those speeches I was impressed by the diversity of problems which we in Canada have to face. In order to make better and greater the country in which we live I believe we must cultivate and maintain the spirit of cooperation so necessary to every section of our country. I do not intend to cover in detail all that has been said, because the situation has been well dealt with by my right hon. leader. However there are some phases to which I should like to direct a few remarks.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with your permission, as I am more familiar with the French language I shall continue my remarks in my mother tongue.

Mr. Speaker, according to parliamentary practice, the address which thanks His Excellency the Governor General, on the occasion of his speech disclosing the sessional program, to which the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) is no stranger, is generally moved and seconded by newly elected members supporting the government. We note, however, that this year this practice has not been followed because such a task was fulfilled by members who have been sitting in the house for a number of years, they have, however, well acquitted themselves of their task and certainly deserve our sincere congratulations. There are, however, newly elected members in this house, because during the intersession three by-elections were held. Unfortunately for the government they sit on the opposite benches.

These three by-elections held in the course of last year, in three provinces, representing three different sections of the country, have afforded to all impartial and unbiased observers an opportunity of judging of the unpopularity of this government. Notwithstanding all the efforts and appeals of the government, notwithstanding all the means and resources at its disposal, its three candidates were defeated, two of them losing their deposit, three Liberals being elected. Such was the outcome of the people's wishes, in the three provinces, just on the eve of a Dominion election. One fully realizes that under these circumstances, it is with fear and apprehension that the government sees the approaching expiration of its mandate. That is why it seeks every possible means to delay the day of atonement.

Faced with such a result one easily realizes that the contentions of the right hon. Prime Minister fall flat, when he tells us of the supposed confidence still reposed in his government. However, we are aware that he is the first to realize this fact, since, in his speech the other day, this confession slipped from his lips:

> Even if the people are not contented, the government will have had the consolation of knowing that it has performed its duty.

And even if there exists, in fact, a serious improvement in business, and if things are progressing as well as we are assured, notwithstanding the blunders of this government, why do we hear in certain quarters of inflation measures? If the government thinks or finds itself obliged to have recourse to such measures, it is simply because they are aware that the country's affairs are actually in a sadder state than they were. As it was stated, it is the beginning of the end. All realize that the wind is shifting in every province, to the sorrow of our hon. friends opposite and that at the next Dominion election we shall witness the same result as we obtained in the last three by-elections.

All realize that no improvement is taking place, take, for instance, the very important problem of the sale and shipping of our wheat. The monthly bulletin of the "Banque Canadienne Nationale" for January last, points out that, notwithstanding certain hopes, the state of the world wheat market gives rise to much anxiety. Our wheat exports, since the outset of the present season, namely from August 1, to December 15, have only amounted to 73,000,000 bushels, compared with $112,000,000 bushels in 1932. I have before me this bulletin. It reads as follows:

> Since the wheat congress, which defined the export quota of this commodity, estimated at 560,000,00 bushels this being the world's requirements for 1933-34, the production in exporting countries, such as the Danubian states and Argentina and occasionally in importing countries such, as France and Italy, was found greater than what was first anticipated. Under such circumstances, the possibility of increasing our wheat exports are very uncertain.

Sometimes, one hears of business improving. What, however, are the signs which can lead us to conclude with certainty that this so-called improvement is not factitious or momentary. The real proofs are entirely lacking. Let us take, for instance, the building trade. The old saying is: "When building is brisk, all is well". The Bureau of Statistics informs us that at the end of 1933, in large cities, like Montreal, construction has never been so dull and stagnant, for the last 15 years. The monthly reports of 1933, for the city of Montreal, compiled up to December 19, last, indicate that the value of building and repair permits amount to only $5,180,591, while they amounted to $10,428,613 the previous year, for the same period, that is for the year just ended the decrease amounts to more than half. We must not, however, imagine that this recurrence of normal conditions is this year proclaimed by the government for the first time. The year 1934 may perhaps witness the end of the crisis in the same way that each of the years 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933 have witnessed it, and even as the year 1935, perhaps, is bound to see it.

It is interesting to glance back and compare these hopeful forecasts, reassuring prophecies, made this year with those made to us these last years. The hon. Minister of Labour already foresaw the return to normal state, in the autumn of 1932. On the occasion of the anniversary of Labour day, in 1932, he addressed a message to the workers in Canada, of which the following is one of the striking excerpts as reported in the Labour Gazette—an elaborate review published by the Department of Labour, at Ottawa, Sept., 1932 edition, vol. 32, No. 9, page 946, French version:

It is hoped that we have reached the depth of this depression. There are many indications we are beginning to emerge from it. Not the least among these indications is the spirit of optimism which the recent Imperial conference has stimulated in our country.

Further on the hon. minister refers again to an "early recurrence of prosperity." And he ends his message thus:

I express the hope that long before another Labour Day rolls around, a period of prosperity greater than Canada has ever yet known may have been ushered in.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Another broken pledge!

Mr. FONTAINE (Translation): The hon. minister must have noted with regret that he had not been very fortunate in his prophecies.

The speech from the throne delivered on February 4, 1932, also made similar optimistic forecasts, when, in the course of events, the general situation was to become worse and worse. It was stated:

Conditions are gradually improving. The Canadian people have united in the fight against adversity. Prosperity is their just reward.

A few months later, on June 20, 1932, during the Maisonneuve by-election, a great hullaballoo was raised with reference to a supposed message attributed to the right hon. Prime Minister and which read as follows:

I forecast with much confidence an early return to normal conditions.

The people placed no faith in this prophecy and they were right, because conditions grew worse and worse. Similar forecasts are again made to us to-day.

In short, such has always been the case ever since this government assumed power. They have always endeavoured to persuade the people that prosperity was around the corner, and would appear at any moment. Meanwhile, distress increased, unemployment spread, the national debt never ceased to grow and is still growing larger, to such an extent that, since 1930, our national debt has increased by more than $400,000,000. And a few days ago, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), in reply to a question I had put, stated that on March 31, last our debt amounted to $2,596,480,826.16 and that on December 31, last, it amounted to $2,687,122,482.26 or an increase of $90,641,656.10, in 9 months.

As the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), stated the other day, the people have lost faith in the present government and public opinion disapproves of the policy followed by the government ever since it assumed power, in 1930. Again, this year, a return to prosperity is mentioned, however, it is no news, because, since 1930, all the speeches from the throne have alluded to it.

I do not know what views will be taken by this hon. house with reference to the amendment moved by the Liberal opposition, stating that this government has lost the confidence both of this house and the country, however, I am firmly convinced that this amendment is quite in keeping with public opinion throughout the country and I trust that it will be adopted.

The longest paragraph in the speech from the throne is the one which refers to that famous World Economic Conference held in London, in June last. It is admitted that the conference adjourned without broaching numerous important subjects. What is a fact, is that it was a complete failure. What did this conference, in which our Prime Minister, according to his followers, played a leading part, accomplish, as a whole? Practically nothing. Resolutions were adopted, declaring that many changes were necessary, however, while so agreeing each of these gentleman were in fact speaking for their neighbour Evidently too many people had journeyed there to air their own national problems. Canada first; the United States first; the United Kingdom first; etc., but nothing which affected the world. Public opinion, in almost every country, became at the outset sceptical and subsequently remained so. The following, for instance, is how the French newspaper Le Matin expressed it:

To the outsider, it is a religious celebration where are chanted only hymns of universal brotherhood; to the insider, it is a sad mix up where every one thinks only of his own interests.

Moreover, the English and German press were practically of the same opinion. It was stated that prospects seem little encouraging, that the outlook was rather uninviting, that the conference while considering certain side questions, remained helpless before the crisis, etc. In fact, it recalled very much the Tower of Babel.

At times, however, it was rumoured that, thanks to our Prime Minister, the conference had been saved, but that there would be no further discussion on the subjects which had prompted the conference. It was indeed a strange rescue! As all are aware three important questions were to be threshed out: war debts, tariffs and currencies. First, the discussion of these important questions were set aside. Hence, it became quite evident that a complete stale-mate would result and that is what happened.

This conference, known in certain quarters as the "London omnibus" in which 68 nations had reserved seats for an unknown destination, had opened without the necessary preparation. It ended with entirely divergent opinions, hesitations, sudden changes of views, discontent and even with threats. This is now known to all. The conference did nothing to stabilize international currency and that was certainly the most important problem which it should have taken up. I cannot, therefore, see how our Prime Minister can credit himself with any glory, boast of the so-called advantages and endeavour to make us believe that our country benefited somewhat.

It is unfortunate that this government has practically done nothing worth while to help the farmers of my province. Yet, they suffered for a number of years and are still suffering like all others the consequences of the crisis, when their products sell at ridiculous prices, not even sufficient to meet their liabilities. The government within the last years, thought fit to help the western farmers, by granting them a bonus on wheat and setting aside for such a purpose large sums. The eastern farmer, who is also called upon to bear, to a large extent, the imposts and taxes, requested that some help be also extended to him in connection with his products, his dairy products, for instance, and more especially butter. He obtained nothing. Certain privileges were also granted to the western farmer with reference to the distribution of seed grains, yet the eastern farmer, because of the difficult times we are undergoing, would have been very thankful to enjoy similar privileges. I regret that nothing was done, for it is more than time that the government should make a decision as regards helping the eastern farmers, just as it did, in the past, for the western farmers. Faced with these requests the government replied that it regretted to be unable to intervene unless conditions in Quebec, became such that the provincial government found itself unable to cope with the situation. Again do I state that I do not think that this is a fair distribution of federal grants. I therefore request that such a policy be changed.

Furthermore, I regret that as a whole, the government gives no greater consideration to the interests, requests and just claims of the farming classes. It should not so easily forget the pledges and representations made to these classes in order to hoist itself to power in 1930. In these days of distress, it should neither forget that, in fact as well as in principle, agriculture is and remains the most efficacious remedy for unemployment, and that it was rightly said that it is the only industry which feeds and houses its man.

There are also other reasons, in a more general way, which should induce the government to give more consideration and help to the farming class. And I think it is befitting to recall, at present, that it is more important than ever to take the necessary measures to re-establish the disrupted equilibrium between city and rural life. Such fears existed on the eve of confederation, when the rural population represented 80 per cent of the entire population of this country. Strange to say, now that the ratio is down to about 40 per cent no worry seems to exist as regards this abnormal state prevailing in a country like ours. The speech from the throne mentions certain measures which might be enacted in connection with the setting up of farm credit, both as to short and medium terms. Although, regretting that the government had awaited the fifth session of this parliament to give consideration to a measure of such importance, I trust that it will adopt the means by which such a plan may materialize. I further hope that, in keeping with the solemn promises which it made, it will find the markets which the farmers absolutely require for the sale of their products, at fair and profitable prices.

Our opponents still reproach us for not helping them, making suggestions, cooperating with them in solving the difficult problems which they have to face, teaching them how the previous administration, so much taunted by them in 1930, managed to reduce our liabilities, accumulate surpluses, decrease the imposts and taxes, and expand our trade. In their heart they remember the glorious years of the liberal administration and they are fully aware that the people, who equally remember all this, do not lose an opportunity of weighing the facts, and this explains the government's failure in the three by-elections, last year.

First, we might remind them that, in 1930, they were more boastful, they undertook to settle everything, remedy the evil in a few months, relieve unemployment, raise the price of farm products and find work for all. They certainly had no need of the liberals to perform all those deeds. Their leader, the right hon. Prime Minister, could, then, see nothing beyond Canada. He strongly and boastfully asserted that, if unemployment was spreading it was due to the negligence and incompetency of the government, that in a country like ours, unemployment was impossible if the government holding office carried out its duty, that it was an easy matter to promote our trade and, to attain such an end, he proposed, if necessary, to blast the way to the markets of the world. By the way, he naturally did not forget to charitably qualify the members of the King government as "mercenaries," of men thinking of their selfish interests, and he compared the leader of the liberal party to Judas. However, the right hon. Prime Minister has a habit of expressing such kind words towards his opponents. Did he not state, a few days ago, in the house, in his speech that the leader of the opposition did not do honour to the high post he occupies.

What happened following this display, this fine zeal, these ill-considered pledges, unrealizable promises and ridiculous bragging.

Unemployment, which was to be remedied in a few months, rapidly spread in a most alarming way. The number of unemployed was then 117,000; two years later the number had increased to over 1,000,000. The government was therefore not fulfilling its duty. Our trade decreased most alarmingly. The history of our trade, within the last few years, can be told by the following figures:

Year—
1927	$2,306,000,000
1931	1,223,000,000
1932	946,000,000
1933	933,000,000

The government has therefore not done its duty.

Our revenues have not ceased to decrease. The government has therefore not carried out its pledges.

The national debt has not ceased to grow. The government has not measured up to its task. Ever since this government is in office, we have only heard of deficits. The government has therefore not shown efficiency.

Now, the help, participation and cooperation of the liberal party are sought. What good can come of it, since no account is taken of the suggestions it makes and has never ceased to make? Has not the right hon. leader of the opposition unceasingly pointed out to the house and to the public that high protection will produce no good, that a greater freedom in our product exchanges is necessary to the economic life of this country.

It is to be noted that in all this the liberal party is perfectly in agreement with the Congress of the International Chamber of Commerce, held in Vienna, at the beginning of last year and in the course of which a resolution was unanimously adopted which stated among other things, that:

The freedom of both national and international trade must be safeguarded.

Censuring, thereby, the folly of high tariff rates, so dear to this government.

The leader of the government will not apply any other policy than his exaggerated protection. The dire lessons of these last years unfortunately have had no effect on him.

As to the Liberal party its policy is well known, I think, and it will find no difficulty in having it endorsed by the people of this country at the next election. It believes and advocates that trade intercourse must be wider and freer; that trade is a series of barters, between free people, and it comprises imports and exports; that in order to promote exchanges, one must wipe out exaggerated tariffs and put an end to unjustified control of prices. Unfortunately, sir, it seems that, at present no economic policy guides the nations of the world, unless it be a system of excessive economic nationalism which, in the end will destroy itself, perhaps, by burying a civilization under its ruins. These are a few simple and common sense truths that are taught, expounded and advocated by all economists, ever since the beginning of the crisis.

The people are aware that the Liberals in applying their policy brought on prosperity in the past, and they again realize that no good will be derived from putting in force an unsound policy of high protection and barriers to trade. That is why the people anxiously await the day of settling accounts, and that is why also, they wanted, last year, that the result of the by-elections in Yamaska-Restigouche-Madawaska and Mackenzie should be the "mane, thecel, phares" of this government.

The right hon. Prime Minister has often shown that he likes quotations from the Scriptures. May I remind him that it is written somewhere in the Scriptures that the tree is known by the fruit it bears.

The people who are watching every act of their government are well aware that the putting in force of its policy will not bear sound fruit to our country.

It is the leader of the government himself who signed his death warrant when, in 1930, he made solemn pledges which he never kept. He was the one who laid down the principle that, in a country like ours, if destitution, hardships, distress and unemployment is felt, it is not the fault of individuals but of the government which does not live up to its obligations.

The people heard his appeals, promises, pledges, and after they had placed their trust in them, they were bitterly deceived and they now await the opportunity, in the next dominion election, to give vent to their discontent, by emphasizing the fact to the Conservative party that, if it were able to deceive and fool them in 1930, the same thing will not repeat itself at the next election.

Mr. J. K. BLAIR (North Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of expressing my views on economic questions in this debate. We feel that we are under a greater obligation than ever to proclaim the gospel of trade and commerce because we believe that the nations of the world have been engaged in a tariff war, and that this narrow policy of economic nationalism is principally responsible for the depression through which we are now passing.

We also believe that in many countries of the world the voice of the poorer classes is not heard, but rather the voice of the upper and wealthier classes. Socrates, an ancient Greek, thought that the voice of the people was the voice of the deity and that the voice of the people should be heard; that the people, by a process of trial and error, would rise to a higher level. Socrates was put to death and was followed by Plato. Plato thought that the voice of the people was the voice of ignorance and should not be heard. Later on Plato said, "Why trust the people who crucified their leader?" After Plato's time there arose another great philosopher, Aristotle, who was a pupil of both Socrates and Plato. He thought that the voice of the people should be heard in government and that it should be regarded in accordance with the intelligence of the people. He was the teacher of Alexander the Great, and when Aristotle taught Alexander the policy of Socrates and of Plato, the king asked him which of the two he should use. The reply was, "If the people are intelligent, both poor and rich, use the policy of Socrates in some of the Greek states; that policy could be applied geographically." But he went on to say that in Persia, where the people were ignorant and only a few of the upper classes were intelligent, the king should be guided entirely by the upper classes and the poorer people should be ignored.

The question to-day is, Mr. Speaker, which policy is this government following? Is it listening to the voice of the masses or to the voice of a few of the upper classes? I think we can test that by an illustration. When the Liberal government was in power, hon. gentlemen will remember that four thousand people marched upon Ottawa from Oshawa wishing to see the Hon. Mr. Robb and the then Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). While they were deliberating in the theatre how they would see them, Mr. Robb and Mr. Mackenzie King walked into the theatre and asked them what they wanted. The Liberal government believed that the voice of the people should be heard, that the people should tell them their needs, and when the representatives of those four thousand people presented their case to the government they said, "We want better pay and more work, and you can secure that for us by raising the tariff." But Hon. Mr. Robb replied, "We will see that you get better pay and more work, but we will not do it by raising the tariff." On the contrary, Mr. Robb and the Liberal government lowered the tariff, for that was their policy, and the result was that these people got better pay and more work.

That illustrates in a simple way that the Liberal party believes that the poorer classes should have the opportunity of making their needs known to the government, but they ought not to try to prescribe for themselves. They should go, as a patient does to the doctor, and tell their complaints, but they should not attempt to prescribe for themselves, for if they should try to do so they might poison themselves. In this instance their needs and wants were taken care of but not in the manner in which they had prescribed for themselves.

What do we find in contrast to that? Last year approximately 4,000 people, mostly farmers of Ontario and Quebec, came to Ottawa with a petition for the government. What was the result? Their voices were not heard. I, along with the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton), went to see the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) on behalf of these people. The hon. member for South Huron presented his request in these words: Honourable sir, I know that you are busy and may not be able to come down yourself to see these farmers, but will you delegate someone, perhaps the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), to act as your representative and speak on your behalf? The Prime Minister refused to do this. He said he had come to a decision and would not delegate anyone else to act on his behalf. He said:

I am busy, I have an appointment with Lord Rothermere. I think the Prime Minister's action showed an entire lack of responsibility to the people. He was not in the employ of Lord Rothermere; these four thousand farmers were the ones who were helping to pay his salary. They had travelled many miles to see him and his refusal to see them was a declaration that the voices of the masses are not to be heard in the councils of this government.

Our party stands for the principle of equal rights to all and privileges to none. We stand for the retention of the power of taxation in the hands of parliament. We believe that people should pay taxes according to their ability to pay. We do not believe in a horizontal tax such as we had in the case of sugar where the child at a mother's knee pays the same as the millionaire. We believe that the burden of taxation should be according to the ability of the people to pay, but the sugar tax is not of that nature. Such a tax is a crime. We believe in gradually reducing tariff restrictions upon all necessities consistent with the revenue requirements of the country. We believe in the promotion of a favourable reciprocal trade not only with members of the British commonwealth of nations but with all nations of the world. We believe that that would be a leading factor towards a permanent and successful agriculture, industry, shipping and international trade. We believe it would place Canada upon the highway which would lead to an outstanding position among the nations of the world.

The Prime Minister gave us somewhat of a promise that reciprocity would receive consideration but we have no reason to expect this. I would not expect a man to put through a policy in which he himself did not believe, and the policy of reciprocity has been denounced by the Conservative party. We believe that the nations of the world have swung towards higher tariffs which work to the advantage of the wealthy at the cost of the poor. They are making the rich richer and the poor poorer. The papers announce that thirty-seven new millionaires have been created in this country during the last three years. This statement cannot be proved as statistics are not available but we have access to the statistics of the United States. That country recently had a government whose policy resembled that of our own and I should like to quote certain figures to show the increase in incomes which occurred from 1927 to 1928. They are as follows:

Class of income	Number of individuals		Increase
	1927	1928	Number	Per cent
$ 100,000 and under $ 150,000	5,261	7,049	1,788	33
150,000 and under 300,000	3,873	5,678	1,805	46
300,000 and under 500,000	1,141	1,756	615	53
500,000 and under 750,000	384	685	301	78
750,000 and under 1,000,000	173	298	125	72
1,000,000 and under 1,500,000	138	284	126	90
1,500,000 and under 2,000,000	56	108	52	92
2,000,000 and under 3,000,000	55	91	36	65
3,000,000 and under 4,000,000	22	40	18	80
4,000,000 and under 5,000,000	8	18	10	124
5,000,000 and over	11	26	15	136

How can any nation exist with such wealth in the hands of the few? Yet the governments seem to be assisting in this process. I believe that the report in our press was correct and that if available our statistics would show a similar condition. These Americans of great wealth are the ones who are advertising what a great depression there is in that country. They claim that this period of great distress is an act of Providence and unavoidable. I believe that depressions are man-made and I do not see why we should have one at this time. My belief is that this class is responsible largely for our present depression. According to the figures I have quoted, it would not appear as though there is a depression. It simply means that these people are extorting money from the poorer classes and doing it internationally and in a scientific way, because I think that they work in cooperation with other nations.

This government has granted to the millionaire in Canada many special privileges but perhaps the most cruel has been the sugar tax, which was really a donation to the wholesaler, paid by the poverty stricken consumers. We are told that Canada is rapidly advancing towards greater prosperity, but how can we say that with such assurance when we learn that nearly 190 municipalities in the province of Ontario, for example, are not paying their share of relief, 19 of them declaring themselves bankrupt and refusing to pay anything,—such places as Windsor and the Yorks and places around Toronto. It would be different in the case of municipalities up in New Ontario where new settlers are trying to get a footing, but I am referring to places near Toronto where there are people living in fine homes. I do not see why the farmers in the county of Wellington should be paying their taxes, when there are people elsewhere living in lovely homes, riding around in large cars and so on. There is something wrong. The strange thing about Toronto and the Yorks is this. Listening over the radio to the messages coming from the Conservative clubs we have been told that there should be a curtailment of everything, that the reason we have a depression is that there is a superabundance of everything. The people in these clubs were praying for scarcity, and at the time of Thanksgiving, while they were praying for scarcity, those churches in Toronto of the same political calibre as that party were praying for abundance to make glad the heart of man. Here were politicians praying for one thing and churches of the same persuasion praying for something else, so that the Almighty himself could not tell what they wanted. What a strange notion, that famine is due to abundance. Suppose we were going along the road and a squirrel came running out of the bush, with tears in his eyes, telling us that there was going to be a famine this winter. One would ask why; and suppose the squirrel said that there would be a famine because there were too many beechnuts. Naturally one would think that there was something wrong with the poor squirrel's head. Yet that is the sort of thing we hear from the government. Hon. gentlemen opposite are great advocates. I believe that our Prime Minister is one of the best solicitors and advocates I have ever heard. He will take an idea that is positively absurd and prove it to the satisfaction of the general public—prove it to the hilt. And they will believe him in many instances. He is a great advocate, and if only he had a leg to stand on he could travel through anything. He will try to prove that there is a famine in the land because there is a superabundance of everything. What more absurd idea could be conceived? One would laugh at the poor little squirrel for suggesting that there would be a famine because there were too many beechnuts; one would laugh at the mentality even of a squirrel for suggesting such a thing; yet we give our Prime Minister license to put forward and defend such notions.

All through my territory during the last election the railway men were told that if the tariff were raised two or three times higher than it was at one end of the road and raised to the same height at the other end, and if a sales tax of 6 per cent were imposed all round, there would be a great improvement in railway traffic. That was an obviously silly idea, of course. While some may not speak too highly of the minds of railway men, I must speak in high terms of the arguments of the Prime Minister; for he put that idea across, so that we could not get it out of the minds of the railway men. He proved to them that if he raised the tariff two or three times as high as it was, and if he put on a high sales tax, the railways would be more flourishing than ever. I do not know how he did it; no doubt it was his capacity for argument and for bringing his ideas to prevail among the poorer classes. But the notion was absolutely absurd to anyone who thought for himself. He carried that argument with the people, although we believed then as we believe now, that the situation is only aggravated by these high tariffs.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce is carrying out the old policy of Joseph Chamberlain, of splendid isolation. Chamberlain argued that the British people were the chosen race of the earth and should isolate themselves from the common herd, and trade among themselves. That is all very well, but we as a party believe that we should trade anywhere and everywhere. We firmly believe in the British preference, but we do not wish to cut off our trade relations with other countries. Our Minister of Trade and Commerce has a splendid appearance: he has the superficial veneer of a high class gentleman, and is, I am sure, a gentleman; but he lacks that discretion and judgment which you find in the Englishman all over the world and which make the Englishman such a splendid trader. When the late government was in power and was about to negotiate with any other country, the keynote of its negotiations was secrecy, and when the minister came out of a cabinet meeting and was approached by correspondents he had no messages to broadcast. The result was that the negotiations were kept secret and the object of the government was not frustrated. When the price of sugar was high and fish and potatoes were cheap in the maritimes, we negotiated a treaty with the West Indies with the result that sugar was reduced in price and we also received a better price for our fish and potatoes. What do we find now? When we go to the moving pictures we find that the Minister of Trade and Commerce appears on the screen, and there is broadcast a speech prepared by himself or someone else, telling just what he is about to do, what policy he is about to put into force. It seems to me that if any government were about to put into force a particular policy in connection with trade with another nation it would strengthen its position by keeping quiet about the whole thing until the agreement has been executed. But our Minister of Trade and Commerce would seem to be the advance agent for other nations, so that the trade is all gone before this country can benefit. Can you imagine an automobile dealer in Ottawa broadcasting the fact that he is going to Peterborough in ten days' time to sell ten cars to some firm there? Why, his trade would be gone before he got there. But that is precisely the position in which the Minister of Trade and Commerce places himself. He advertises his modus operandi, his method of working and destroys his business before he gets it. And so we have much ado about nothing. We have trips and negotiations, but we find our trade going down steadily. Is that the way in which England won the trade of the world? And how much better in trade and commerce has been the work of our Prime Minister? We can well remember when Mr. Forbes was here and the government slammed the door in the face of New Zealand. We lost millions of dollars and did not raise the price of butter one cent.

Our treatment of Russia will be remembered; the Prime Minister was here day after day chasing the Russian bear. He spent his time chasing the Russian bear, and whenever he rose to speak and his followers were applauding him, I was reminded of Arcturus chasing the Great Bear round the polar star every day and returning to the same point in twenty-four hours. Therefore, whenever I listened to the Prime Minister chasing the Russian bear I said: That is Arcturus again chasing the Bear and the Greeks applauding. The Prime Minister would have been much better advised had he put through a trade treaty with Russia. In this way Canada could have obtained millions of dollars; we could have sent our machinery to Russia; we could have traded with her in many ways, but instead of that the Prime Minister seemed to think it was his duty to attend to the social and moral obligations and the domestic affairs of that country. He went beyond the pale of his jurisdiction. The glory of Britain and her sons is that they will trade with any country in the world; the British traders would trade with China where they have loose marriage laws, with Turkey where they have harems, with the cannibals of the South Sea. The British trader did not interfere with the domestic arrangements of other nations; he was out to trade with them. We would appreciate it much more if our Minister of Trade and Commerce, instead of placing himself on the screen in the movies as an advance agent for other nations, would pay more attention to Canada's trade and if our Prime Minister, instead of chasing the bear, because we never elected him as Prime Minister to be Arcturus, would be a real minister of trade and commerce. It will be remembered that the Prince of Wales said:

> Failure to recognize trade as interchange and obstacles placed in the way of reciprocal trade are perhaps the main causes for the world's present troubles. The British peoples have the idea of commerce running strong in their blood.

The Prince of Wales believed lack of trade was a great cause of the depression.

As regards the Prime Minister not coming to see the farmers when they were in Ottawa, we wondered what detained him. He was too busy talking to Lord Rothermere. That is rather significant in view of the fact that he has had decorations bestowed and has reintroduced titles in Canada, which is something we do not need here. The idea of bestowing titles never flourishes in a democratic country; aristocracy and democracy are not compatible institutions. As democracy advances, aristocracy recedes and vice versa, so that if we want to maintain Canada as a democratic country, the fewer aristocratic methods we have the better for us. This bestowal of titles is simply an old relic of feudalism and is quite unnecessary in this democratic country. The Prime Minister and his colleagues made a tour of Canada and we thought they were investigating the unemployment situation and the question of trade and commerce. They came back, however, with a long list of ladies' names. When they were out there, they had on their dancing slippers and their long-tailed coats; they were not looking after our labouring people at all. We thought that they would produce a solution for unemployment, but after months of labour they brought forth a list of bouquets to be sent throughout this country. That is the last thing we need here. What we do need is attention to our unemployed, to our trade and commerce; bread and butter are what we want.

Methods of communication have been greatly improved of late; we have the telegraph, the telephone and the radio, but while I may be wrong, I do not believe any labouring man or farmer has any way of communicating with a millionnaire who has always been wealthy. There is too much mental static and the message cannot be got across. We have tried for three years to get it across, and have failed. It would have been useless for the Prime Minister to go down to listen to those farmers, because he would not have understood what they were saying. Were a prime minister who is also a millionaire to have been at one time for a week on the end of a crosscut saw or behind the carriers of a threshing machine, he would have something in the nature of a detector bulb in his brain and when a message was being sent to him, the wave length would harmonize, he could tune in and know what was being said. But you cannot send a message from a labouring man to a millionaire who has always been wealthy. Votes will register, but a message will not. There is too much interference, too much static, too many crossed wires.

The government, instead of handing out bouquets lavishly, should have made some provision for our farmers; it must give them a new deal. Take a farm which three years ago was worth $6,000 and had a $3,000 mortgage on it: to-day the farmer has no equity in it and the mortgage company really owns the farm. In addition, we have to consider the low prices that are being obtained for farm products and the high rates of interest being charged, and we must not forget that this situation was brought about largely by the actions of the government. They took all the money out of our rural districts and our towns and villages for their national bonds, depleting the whole country. The result is that we cannot get mortgage loans upon our farms and those in the towns cannot obtain loans on their houses. I should like to see any person try at this time to secure a farm mortgage. It cannot be done in the rural districts of Ontario and I imagine the situation in the west is worse. The man who holds the mortgage is afraid to seize the farm, because at the present time farms are worth very little. If this government would like to help the farmers let them open the gates of trade so that the farmers' products could get out into the world's markets.

Then there are many little things in which they could help. Take the stockyards such as those in Toronto where $30 a ton is charged for hay when hay is selling for $6. The farmer has to take whatever price is offered for his stock but has to pay these unduly high prices for feed, such as $40 a ton for grain. In every way possible they extort money from the farmer and spoil his sales. Then we have these men stepping around trying to grade pigs on the hoof; it would be a blessing to Canada to dismiss every one of these hog graders. Hogs should be graded on the rails, they cannot grade hogs on foot anyway. These fellows are simply working in the interests of the abattoirs.

Now I think we should state briefly the policy of our own party. I will mention just a few points before I close. There is the unemployment situation, that is the most important problem. We think that a representative national commission should be formed which would cooperate with the provinces and municipalities. The unemployment situation was the means of this government getting into power and this government has never dealt with it since, not in a reasonable way. They have been giving doles but that is not what the people want.

Then we want the liberation of external trade. The Liberal party believes that trade is the basis of industrial and commercial development, and that Canada needs trade. The Liberal party would promote trade with all nations.

We need the liberation of internal trade. The Liberal party will seek to end artificial price control and agreements in restraint of trade. Price fixing by agreements restricts and hampers trade. The internal trade of our country has become honeycombed with and enmeshed in secret understandings and agreements.

We want to develop the primary industries. The Liberal party by its policies will continue to further the development of agriculture, lumbering, mining and fisheries by effecting reductions in the costs of production of Canada's basic products and by obtaining wider markets.

We want to safeguard our national railways. We want the democratization of industry. The Liberal party believes that industrial reconstruction is the problem of the future. It will seek to give to workers and consumers, as opportunity offers, a larger share in the government of industry.

We stand for the restoration of responsible government and the reassertion of personal liberty, electoral reforms and a balanced budget. We think it is extremely important to have the budget balanced. As the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen said, we cannot borrow ourselves into prosperity.

Mr. EUSEBE ROBERGE (Megantic) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, after perusing the speech from the throne and listening to the address moved by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil), I am unable to discover anything in them which might relieve immediately the present crisis and still less carry out the promises made by this government in the course of the 1930 election.

Since the last session I have visited many of my old constituents as well as a few from the new parishes which were added to the county of Megantic, at the last redistribution. What are the workmen, farmers and all classes of society saying? Bennett is not carrying out his pledges. Farm products, as a whole, have dropped 50 per cent since the Conservative government has taken office. The workers, especially the miners, hardly earn 50 per cent of the wages they had in 1930, and naturally are only employed half time. Moreover, the people of the counties of Wolfe, Beauce and Megantic are dissatisfied at seeing their counties cut up arbitrarily without any good reason and in the mere hope of retaining or winning these three counties within the Conservative fold at the next election. The Conservatives, far from having made their position secure through these changes, have simply created discontent and the people only await an opportunity to vote, as a whole, against them so as to avenge the insult made to them when their counties were cut up and furthermore, because the government did not carry out the promises made in 1930. The Conservatives misled the people in 1930, but they will not do so at the next election.

The hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) who was able to feather his nest at the last redistribution, made a statement of this kind at a large meeting at St. Malachie:

> The Liberals think that we are reluctant to discuss the sugar tax; however, I am not afraid to do so. It is an excellent measure, the government is in need of revenue and this tax will net them $20,000,000. All will be called to contribute, yet no one will be the poorer.

I think the hon. member would change his mind were he to take up the subject with the workmen.

The hon. member told the farmers that they would get a better price for their maple sugar. What happened? In 1933, the farmers had to sell this commodity cheaper than they ever did for forty years, ever since I have been in business. In my own parish, a car load of maple sugar was shipped and the following prices were paid to farmers:

Quality—

No. 1	5 cents per lb.
No. 2	4 cents per lb.
No. 3	3 cents per lb.

The farmers therefore received on an average 4 cents per pound for their sugar, the lowest price ever paid in my county. This is all the benefit derived by the farmers from this tax and they had to pay dearer for their granulated sugar. The hon. member only spoke once on this subject. I think he must have been warned, because since then, he never referred to this sugar tax in the meetings he held, at least, judging from newspapers. . . .

If ever there were an unfair tax levied by the government it is certainly the one on granulated sugar.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) introduced and had adopted by this house a resolution to the effect that a committee be appointed to investigate the dealings of trusts and profiteers. The Prime Minister could have acted before, because there exists an act empowering him to investigate trusts and the dealings of people who rob the people by their exorbitant profits.

The evidence at the coal inquiry showed that coal dealers were not content with twice the profits that our county merchants make. If they were their profits would be quite acceptable and coal would retail at the most $10 per ton. The trusts, however, retail it to-day at $14, $15 and $16. Every coal consumer has, therefore, contributed to these trusts at least $50 more than they should. In these days of depression, I think, that our people would highly appreciate $50.

The same applies to gasoline. If we were not bled by these trusts, this commodity would retail 5 or 6 cents cheaper per gallon.

Another article which is also controlled, to a large extent, by trusts is leather soles. The farmers are paid for raw hides from 1 to 3 cents per pound, the manufacturing process cost, let us say, 10 to 12 cents per pound which is a reasonable profit, so that leather cost the trusts from 13 to 15 cents per pound. The latter first extended their control over the small manufacturers, to-day, they sell this leather from 45 to 55 cents per pound. It is simply robbery to make such large profits on an article of first necessity. These are the trusts that this government tolerates in our country, they are to a great extent responsible here and abroad for the present crisis through the robberies committed when they realized such large profits and over charged the people. Should a poor person steal so as to provide for his wife and children, he is arrested and sent to gaol, but directors of coal, gasoline and leather trusts, etc., are allowed to steal thousands and thousands of dollars, daily, and are not molested. They are the ones who should be arrested and sent to gaol instead of the poor people; moreover, the wealth acquired by fleecing the people should be confiscated by the state.

The government, sir, has introduced a resolution, just before the expiration of their mandate. Before the inquiries are completed—a very long time—the people will have swept them from power. This government has no intention of preventing trusts from fleecing the public or of having these highway robbers arrested. Two years ago, I exposed, in the house, a man who had fleeced the public for twelve years. I refer to Garfield McKinnon who had fleeced mail conductors. I supplied the government, then, with affidavits and all the necessary evidence to enable them to arrest this individual. I personally, made the request, in the house, to the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) and the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie). Nothing was done because he is one of their partisans, so it is said.

What the people require, sir, are not promises, conferences, inquiries and trips to Geneva or Cairo, it is work and better prices for farm products. As the government is unable to carry out its promises, it should give the people an opportunity of expressing their views, it would then learn whether the people are satisfied with the administration of public affairs. The recent by-elections have shown that they are not. The other sections of Canada, therefore, should also be given an opportunity to express their views.

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few observations on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I intend to follow my usual custom and be brief in anything I have to say. There are certain points which concern the people I represent and which I should like to place before the house and government, and I intend to take this opportunity to do so.

Before proceeding however may I congratulate the mover and seconder of the address upon the manner in which they acquitted themselves in the task they had to perform. I had a similar experience some few years ago, and I realize that either moving or seconding the address in reply is no small task. However when I had the honour of doing so I was seconding an address presented by a government which was doing something for the people, a government which had surpluses instead of deficits, a government which legislated for the masses of the people rather than for the privileged few, a government which was reducing the costs of production in the primary industries and giving them every chance to make both ends meet and a government which was reducing the public debt. Therefore, with the particularly hard task these gentlemen had to perform, I believe they acquitted themselves very well.

On Tuesday of this week the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis) appeared to be very anxious to find out my political status. He is reported as having said the following:

> How could we get the point of view of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien)? He sits with the Liberals, but we find that he calls himself a National-Progressive. Just what is a National-Progressive? I must confess it is difficult to understand even a rational Progressive, but a National-Progressive is quite beyond the bounds of human thought.

Well, if the hon. member for Souris is so anxious to find out what the word "national" means let him refer back to the National Liberal-Conservative party of 1921, and he will get the definition. May I also tell the hon. member that I am not concerned as to whether or not he knows my political status, but I am concerned with the rights of the electors I represent in this house. For the information of the hon. member for Souris may I state that in 1921 I was elected as a National-Progressive; again in 1925 I was elected as a National-Progressive and in 1926 the Liberals and Progressives in my constituency decided to unite their forces, and after uniting chose me as their candidate. What happened? I was the only man in Canada elected by acclamation. What happened to the Conservative candidate? He got stuck in the mud which they had been slinging all through the campaign. Again in 1930, with the Liberal and Progressive forces in fusion, I was elected by the biggest majority that was ever given to any candidate in the riding. I had three opponents, and I am sure that the Minister of Finance, who is always looking for money, was very glad to get that $600 which I brought into the treasury for him. That is my political record. The electors know where I stand, and they have sent me here for the last twelve years. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that they are just as intelligent to-day as they have been through all those years.

Now a word as to political parties. When the Prime Minister made his opening campaign speech in Winnipeg on June 9, 1930, he promised everything under the sun. He was going to blast his way into the markets of the world, and find work for every man and woman who wanted it: in short, he promised everything under the sun. The people believed him to a large extent. He was a big man, and at that time they thought he might be a superman. But what have been the results? The biggest failure that has ever overtaken any government has taken place in this country in the last four years.

We have now in this house another political party, calling themselves the C.C.F. I shall not pronounce that like my hon. friend from Melville (Mr. Motherwell) did. As he pronounced it, using an "h," it sounded like C.C.heifers. I do not think that is right. What is this new party doing? They are promising everything under the sun to-day, so much so that after their convention in Regina I went to my spiritual adviser and said, "Scratch me off your roll." He asked, "Why?" I showed him the C.C.F. platform. I said, "They are going to provide heaven on earth for me and everyone else so why should I seek it elsewhere?" They are promising to socialize the natural resources of this country and to leave unsocialized our greatest natural resource, which is the land. They are promising to uphold and follow the democratic system under which we live, and yet they know that if they are ever going to put their program into effect it cannot be done except under a system of dictatorship.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Rubbish.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: It is not rubbish, and you know it because you are intelligent. But they will not fool the people. The man who is out on the land is attached to the soil. He might find himself in a financial position to-day which is almost unbearable; he might owe a great deal more than he ever will be able to pay, yet that very same man wants to control his own land; he wants to work out his own destiny to the best of his ability without any socialization of our natural resources or of the land. No, Mr. Speaker, the C.C.F. are not going to give me heaven on earth, and since I have listened to their speeches in this house I am going back to my spiritual adviser to ask him to put me back on the roll.

I wish now to deal with a few paragraphs in the speech from the throne. Here is one paragraph the sentiment of which I appreciate:

> Since I have been associated with you as the representative of His Majesty in Canada, I have visited every province of the dominion. I have been greatly impressed by the loyalty, devotion and friendliness of the people, as well as the high courage with which men and women were meeting and overcoming abnormal difficulties in their daily lives.

I want to thank His Excellency the Governor General for his visit to parts of my riding this year. I had the honour and the privilege of accompanying him with a large delegation through certain parts of my riding, and I can assure the house that we were pleased and honoured to see him. Our people were anxious to meet the representative of the crown in Canada, and I am sure that His Excellency, when he remembers the warmth of the welcome which he received in that part of Canada, will take the first opportunity to revisit other parts of the riding. I invite him most cordially to do so. I wish to assure him that the people will be very glad to see him and show him their loyalty and devotion.

In another part of the speech from the throne the government says:

> You will be invited to consider legislation designed to facilitate the efficient and profitable marketing of live stock and agricultural products.

Any legislation along that line will receive my hearty support. There is no doubt that there is too great a spread between the price which the producer receives, especially in the production of live stock, and the price which the consumer pays when he buys the commodity on the market. Any legislation which will give to the actual producer of live stock and other farm products a greater return will be of benefit not only to agriculture but to the whole of Canada.

Another paragraph in the speech from the throne refers to the royal commission on banking and currency and the establishment of a central bank. A central bank might be a very good thing for Canada; I am not in a position to say. But I do know that the establishment of a central bank will not touch the ordinary individual; it will not touch the farmer.

Further on in the speech from the throne the government say that they are making a study of agricultural credits:

> My government have been giving careful consideration to measures that might be adopted for the establishment of agricultural short term and intermediate credits; and have invited representatives of the provinces to study the means by which practical effect may be given to the recommendations in this respect made by the Royal Commission on Monetary and Banking Problems.

What does the report of the Macmillan commisison say? At page 70 of the report I find this:

> In a memorandum prepared by a committee representing the governments of the three (western) provinces, it is estimated that the annual gross revenue from agriculture in these provinces fell from $843,153,000 in 1928 to $273,738,000 in 1932, representing a loss of 67½ per cent in farm income.

You can imagine, Mr. Speaker, the position of an industry which finds itself facing a reduction of 67½ per cent in its income, and yet that same industry is the most important industry to the well-being of Canada. The commission further said:

In the memorandum filed on behalf of the United Farmers of Ontario, an estimate made by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics of the values of field crops in Canada was given as follows:—

1928..	$1,125,003,000
1932..	416,586,000

There is a depreciation of two-thirds in the value of field crops. The commission continue:

The following is an extract from the evidence submitted on behalf of the United Farmers of Ontario as to the problem of short term credit in Ontario.

And this, Mr. Speaker, is applicable I think not only to Ontario but to all our centres of agriculture. I quote further:

Generally speaking, within the last two years the banks have ceased to function in regard to Canadian agriculture. Agriculture is taken to be an activity, or an industry that is not worthy of credit, and from the banking point of view I am not blaming them.

I do not desire to cast any reflection upon the banks, but the fact is that as far as agriculture is concerned they have ceased to function. I hope the genial Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes)—when I say "genial" I mean it—will take what I am about to say under very serious consideration. When a farmer wants to get a small loan of $30, $40 or $50 to carry on seeding or harvesting operations, he goes to the bank and asks for money. The banker tells him that he cannot make the loan because he has no jurisdiction, that it must be referred to the head office. He then says to the farmer: "Suppose you do borrow this money, how are you going to pay it back?" The farmer tells him that he hopes to repay it from the proceeds of his farm. The banker answers right back: "With the present prices being paid for commodities, you would not be able to repay this loan from the proceeds of your farm because your costs of production are higher than the prices you receive for your commodities." The farmer is absolutely tied. I have known of dozens of cases where 150 or 200 acres of land have been ready for the binder but the farmer could not buy the twine with which to tie his grain. He could not get the money from the bank and the man who was selling the twine would not give credit. What does the farmer do in a case like that? There is no stock prepared for market as it is too early in the season and the only thing he can sell is a milch cow or two. Over and over again I have seen a farmer taking a couple of milch cows to the market to be sold in order to get $30 or $40 with which to buy twine. He is forced to deprive his family of what is absolutely needed; he has to sacrifice his milch cows on the market at Winnipeg in order to get the small sum he requires for the purchase of his twine. If the grain is not tied a hailstorm might come along or a sudden change take place in the weather and his crop would be destroyed in five minutes.

Both from the national standpoint and the necessity of the continuance of agriculture, there must be short term credits. I do not contend that the farmer should be able to borrow without having to repay, but legislation should be brought down to enable the farmer to get a short term loan. Surely there must be some way of seeing that the lender is protected and the borrower is enabled to obtain the money he needs. I urge the Minister of Finance not to continue to dilly-dally with the provinces in order to find out what is the best form of legislation. Let us have legislation at this session which will provide the short term credits which are essential if the farmer is going to be able to continue.

I come now to the wheat agreement entered into by the Prime Minister with certain other countries and which provides for a reduction of about fifteen per cent in our wheat acreage. In referring to the surplus of wheat, the pamphlet issued by the government states that this surplus has continued to increase since 1928. It states also that the surplus began to accumulate in 1924. There may be a surplus of wheat in the world; I do not know, but I do know that a lot of people are underfed while we have an abundance in this country. In connection with certain schemes this government seems to work in opposite directions. In 1931 the Prime Minister introduced a measure to provide for a bonus on wheat of five cents per bushel. A bonus upon any commodity stimulates the production of that commodity. In 1931 there was more inducement to produce wheat than to produce barley or oats because the man who produced wheat got a bonus of five cents per bushel while the man who produced the other grains got nothing. The government knew that a surplus existed in 1931 because they so state in this pamphlet, yet they introduced a measure which had no other effect than to stimulate the production of wheat. The man who produced the most wheat got the most money. The government's action is just like a tug-of-war where the forces are equal; there is a pulling at each end but there is no motion either way—the government just stays put.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: At six o'clock I was dealing with the wheat reduction agreement and our quota for exportation, and I pointed out that, according to the pamphlet I have here on the wheat agreement at the London conference, in the year 1928 surpluses of wheat became quite apparent. The pamphlet states that the annual wheat production had by that time become greater than the effective demand from the importing countries. Yet this government, if this statement is true, in 1931 gave a bonus of five cents a bushel to the producers of wheat in Canada—a bonus that could have had no other effect than to increase the production of wheat; because the producer of barley did not get that nickel, nor did the producer of oats or of any other commodity receive it. The man who produced a bushel of wheat was sure to get five cents. Notwithstanding this, hon. gentlemen come along now and tell the people that they must reduce their acreage by fifteen per cent. If the statement to which I have referred is correct, that in 1928 there was a surplus of wheat in the world to the extent indicated, why did this government give a bonus on wheat production in 1931? If they wanted to indemnify the farmers for the low cost of their commodity, why did they not give them a bonus on all their production? And how did they apply the five cent bonus? The man who produced a considerable quantity of wheat got the five cents and the man who produced no wheat got nothing.

Now, if there is a surplus of wheat in the world to-day as the government contends, and I doubt it, how will they bring about a reduction in wheat acreage? There are only two ways I know of: one is to nationalize the land and control production, and if you do that you go over to the C.C.F.; and the other is to give the farmer a bonus for not seeding the acreage he intended to seed. Those are the only two ways I know of. The Canadian people are not ready for the nationalization of land and the control of production by the government, and the government is evidently not in a position to give a bonus inasmuch as it discontinued the bonus in 1932. But what do the importing countries engage themselves to do in this contract? What obligation have they undertaken? They have undertaken not to increase further the wheat acreage and not to increase production by governmental measures. There is a move in England to-day—and I am sure the Minister of Trade and Commerce is well aware of it—to double the production of wheat in that country. If you read Mosley's books you will see that, according to him, wheat production can be vastly increased in England; and as the Minister of Trade and Commerce knows, since England has adopted the protective system the farmer is looking for protection on his wheat. If he gets it he will increase his wheat production tremendously. The importing countries have engaged not to use governmental measures as a means of increasing the production of wheat, but there is nothing else to prevent them.

No, Mr. Speaker, acreage reduction as proposed in this agreement is not practicable, and I doubt whether the government will pass any legislation to put such a policy into force. Indeed, I do not know what sort of legislation they could pass to enforce such a policy. The western premiers may be in favour of the agreement; but the western premiers are not the producers of wheat. I made a survey of rural Manitoba this summer since the promulgation of the wheat agreement and this is what the farmers say: What right had the Prime Minister of Canada to go to England and enter into such an agreement and come and tell us what we shall do? Whom did the Prime Minister consult in this matter? Mr. J. I. McFarland, I suppose—and I do not know that he did consult that gentleman, because if he did it is the first time he has ever consulted anyone. At any rate, the farmers are not in favour of the wheat agreement, and if this government persists in the policies it has been putting into force since 1930 it will not need a wheat reduction agreement. Why, the machinery on the farm to-day is getting obsolete. If this continues, in a year or two the farmer will have no machinery with which to produce wheat. And if the present policies of the government are continued, how will the farmer buy new machinery? It takes everything you can grow on a quarter section to buy a binder; so that if the present policies remain in force no wheat reduction agreement will be needed. I think the Prime Minister had better leave it to the grasshoppers; they have been responsible for more reduction than this agreement will bring about.

May I deal for a moment or two with the resolution that was passed the other day with regard to the investigation into the causes of the wide spread between prices received for commodities by the producer and prices paid by the consumer, the system of distribution and so forth. I am not opposed to mass buying, provided the consumers get the benefit. But what the people want to find out to-day, at any rate the people whom I represent, is how these industries function—industries that stand behind a tariff wall ranging from 25 to 75 per cent. The people want to know how such industries are functioning and to what extent they are exploiting the Canadian public. The farmer wants to know why the government imposed a 25 per cent duty on cream separators to protect the manufacturer producing about seven thousand cream separators in Canada, while putting this implement on the free list from Great Britain, where cream separators are not made.

Mass buying on the part of chain stores and large concerns has benefited the consumers to a great degree. Take the situation in western Canada. Before the chain stores and large concerns like Eaton's went into the west we did not know what we were paying for the things we bought. To-day things are different; there is competition and the consumers get the benefit of it. But it is in regard to the industries which this government has been protecting to a degree never witnessed before that the Canadian people want some information. They want to find out how these industries are financed, how much watered stock there is in the companies, and to what extent they are exploiting the Canadian people.

Let me refer to the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis). If the hon. gentleman or any other hon. member coming from Manitoba and sitting on the other side of the house would pay less attention to the question whether I am a national Progressive or a national Liberal Progressive, and devote their time to an effort to influence this government to put into force policies that would relieve the people of western Canada, I suggest that their time would be much better spent. It would be far more beneficial than any effort they may make to find out whether I am a Liberal Progressive or anything else. I see my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Mullins). I know he does not agree with the policies of the government. Let these hon. gentlemen leave me out of their consideration; instead, let them try to induce the government to institute policies that will help western Canada to get out of the chaotic condition in which it is to-day. If they do that I am sure their electors will appreciate it a good deal more than I fancy they appreciate their present attitude.

[Mr. Beaubien.]

The needs in my riding and in western Canada generally, in fact all over Canada, are these—and I am speaking more or less from an agricultural standpoint—lower tariffs. Let the manufacturer do as the farmer is doing; let him stand on his own feet. Secondly, agricultural credits, short term credits, are essential. The farmers want to have a chance to carry on, but they cannot do so if they are forced to sell their goods in competition with the world while at the same time they have to buy in markets restricted by tariffs to the extent of anywhere from 25 to 75 per cent. I am not looking for much higher prices for farm products; what I do look for is for the commodities which the farmer has to buy to come down and more or less meet the price which he receives for his products. That is what we want in western Canada.

If the government do not change their policies or if they do not go to the country very soon, the agricultural industry may be badly hampered. When they do go before the people, let me say once again to those hon. members who are so anxious about my political name, that they are not going to be asked whether Beaubien is a Liberal, Progressive or anything else; but they will be asked this: Did you support a government that imposed a duty on agricultural implements, on cream separators, on practically every commodity that the farmer has to buy? When they are asked that question, what answer will they give? They will simply say that they supported the policy of the government, which was detrimental to western Canada.

Those matters which I have placed before the house are dear to my people; they are necessary to them and I hope the government will pay heed to what I have said and endeavour to introduce legislation in conformity with the suggestions I have made. If they do so, I am sure the people of western Canada and particularly those whom I represent will be greatly benefited.

Mr. E. C. ST-PERE (Hochelaga) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, my first words will be of congratulations to the hon. members who moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They accomplished their task with a loyalty and sincerity which has always been the practice and will continue so, as long as the Dominion parliament intends to follow such a parliamentary procedure.

The speech from the throne places on the lips of the representative of His Majesty the following words:

Such improved world conditions are reflected in Canada by expanding trade, improving revenues, increasing employment, and a more confident outlook upon the future.

These utterances, sir, do not convey exactly the truth. It is a fact, as the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Parent) stated this afternoon that some trade improvement has been somewhat felt; however, like him, I state that this improvement in our business relations with the various dominions and the United Kingdom must not be attributed so much to the imperial agreements as to the temporary advantages derived from exchanges. An increase of work among the labouring classes! I wonder where one sees this improvement. As a member of a large working division in the city of Montreal, in vain do I seek where this increase exists. The unemployed in the section where I reside, are more numerous than ever; notwithstanding the great publicity given recently to a news item, emanating, I do not know where, to the effect that our large Canadian Pacific workshops were to employ 3,000 men more. After making inquiries among those interested, I wish to state in the house that workers in the Angus shops confessed to me that the staff had hardly been increased by 400 men. Indeed, if one considers that this is a large increase among the working classes, I must state that this government bases its contentions on erroneous figures.

In these days of crisis, sir, I think the government and members should be the first to practise economy. I note that since the beginning of the session—I blame no one, because it is a member's privilege to place on the order paper, the resolution which he wishes to introduce—it has been costly and we have lost precious time in discussing many suggestions as old as the hills, resolutions which for a number of years have been submitted to international labour congresses at Geneva, and that the international labour bureau have considered without coming to any practical decision.

What will be the remedies? The insurance against unemployment, so much advocated by our friends to the left, has been discussed time and again, at Geneva; the delegates of the various nations have morally approved of this rehabilitation scheme, but no government, may I state, has ever put into practice such a suggestion without first exacting a contribution from those interested. The same may be said of old age pensions, insurance against disability and sickness. These are projects that all admit in principle. Were I a millionaire there would be no orphans in my electoral division; however, unfortunately for myself and many others, my circumstances do not permit me to be so generous towards all these charitable movements and social relief schemes. These are great economic and social problems which we are unable to solve to-day owing to the depression existing.

The question of working hours comes under the same heading. It has not been definitely settled in this country; however, I must state, to the credit of the Quebec provincial government, that the first steps to solve this question have been made by the hon. Minister of Labour, Mr. Arcand. A measure has been introduced dealing with the subject. This question of defining the hours of labour was discussed, last year, at the International Labour Conference and what was the outcome? The representatives of the various nations thought fit to submit again this question to the conference which will be held in the course of 1934. Did high protection succeed in bringing to our workers this relief to which they were so much entitled? Will the public undertakings mentioned bring to our workers, our destitute unemployed, this relief, this positive help which they have a right to expect? Indeed, sir, these are remedies which we must accept, they are temporary solutions of the unemployment problem; however, they are not, so to speak, the true solution to such an important question.

There was born in this country, a short while ago, a party which boasts of being able to settle all these important questions to which the nations of the world have sought in vain, hitherto, to find a practical solution. I came across, to-day, an old pamphlet which I purchased as far back as 1901, an essay on the evolution of socialistic theories in the various countries. May I, sir, read to the house, an excerpt on social reformers known as "possibilists." After listening to it, you will realize that its program very much resembles that of the C.C.F.:

The "Possibilists" or Reformists—They comprise the most moderate and practical element of the party, but the least listened to. The strict adherents somewhat despise them and qualify very disrespectfully their acts of "soothing syrup and hubbubboos." The "Possibilists" disdain violent means unless they are absolutely necessary. They prefer moving forward gradually, without agitation, revolution and shock, making use of simple legal means, they are convinced that it is possible to thus reach their goal. They contend that the labouring classes being in majority and controlling the vote can assume power and legally reform society without having recourse to revolutionary means which cause so many victims, is always tainted with much injustice, and is always followed by a great transient crisis and a period of general distress during which every one suffers, and which, because of the discouragement and fears it creates, paves the way to disorders. Their motto is "Let us be revolutionists when circumstances demand it, but let us always be reformists."

It is the most human method, the surest, the best from every angle.

In order to inform a number of our workers who sometimes are led by certain impulses, and misguided agitation, may I place in Hansard the views of Count de Mun, one of the greatest leaders of workmen that France has known. He expressed himself as follows in the French chamber:

> You discuss before the people the entrancing prospect of a collectivist society of which no one of you can explain the functions. No, I state, "None of you," no more Mr. Jaurès than Mr. Jules Guesde, none! I have heard splendid speeches, glowing accounts, broad formulas, but I have never found any one to explain the following two fundamental points: the distribution and remuneration of labour; and as long as this has not been done, nothing practical will come of it except the idea of a monstrous despotism.

The following is a brief comment made by His Holiness Leo XIII, the workmen's Pope, in discussing similar doctrines:

> If such a system was ever realized, it would create disturbance among all classes of society and burden all citizens with a shameful and unbearable yoke; it opens a wide door to mutual jealously, discontent, and disorder; it deprives work and skill of their goal, draining wealth at its source; finally to equality so cherished it substitutes an ignoble equality in destitution and distress.

I leave, sir, to the Canadian workers who suffer from the present crisis, the task of judging where is to be found the truth and to choose the best means to obtain justice. We have heard of industrial control. I have closely followed, since the National Recovery Act was adopted, what is taking place in the United States. No doubt President Roosevelt for some time past has made strenuous efforts to find a general solution which can apply to the problems which interest his country and which, so to speak, interest all the nations of the world.

Over there, as it is the case here, the president cannot please every one. The labouring classes in the United States have requested him to increase the price of articles of prime necessity; he did so; however, some labour organizations claimed that wages, fixed according to definite schedules, were not increasing in direct ratio of the articles mentioned. There again are to be found impediments to the realization of certain hopes.

Another scheme to relieve unemployment in our large cities is the back-to-the-land movement. Colonization has certainly its bright side; however, if this were the only means of relieving the crisis in our cities, the situation would be desperate. That is again, some remedy.

In the course of the Yamaska election—and it is a happy recollection that I have of this election campaign—I chatted about this scheme with a number of farmers. Their reply was: Well, sir, for heaven's sake do insist that the moneys set aside for colonization purposes be placed in a special fund, so as to bring back to our villages our old farmers who understand all about farming, they that abandoned the land, not because they disliked it, but because financial difficulties forced them to do so.

Among the suggested remedies is to be found quite a recent one, the one which the right hon. Prime Minister advocated the night before last, I think, in the city of Toronto. He stated that we would pull through the crisis if we practised thrift and worked. I share his views; however, let us be frank, let us examine whether all those who have practised thrift and worked have reached this millennium which the right hon. Prime Minister wished on his audience in Toronto. We have in our large cities—the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) referred to it the other day—the unemployment question complicated by the one still more acute, of the distress to be found among small property holders. During that period when so much money was expended in dole, this man who was thrifty, this citizen who often is a workman, is faced, notwithstanding the moratorium enacted by our provincial legislatures, with ruin. The state, one must admit, hardly considered the one who is, so to speak, the buffer between the wealthy profiteer and those who take refuge in communism. This man was left to his own resources; no one thought of helping him in the present crisis. How can we preach, later, thrift and work to the children of those who soon will be completely destitute after having practised thrift all their life; to the families of those who have become poorer to create wealth, and have contributed more than certain financial magnates to the prosperity of this country?

President Roosevelt pondered more than our legislators over the situation of these unfortunate people. From the very first days of the organization of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the President of the United States had the sum of $2,000,000,000 voted, issuing bonds, the capital and interests of which are guaranteed by the United States federal government. Oh! one may state that this government—if we must adhere to the articles of the confederation agreement—must come to terms in this respect with the provinces. One may state that the government cannot interfere because the contracts agreed upon between the creditors who hold the mortgages and the mortgagees are within the purview of the civil courts of the various provinces. Similar conditions exist in the United States. Those who have studied the United States constitution know with what jealousy the state rights are guarded, in the United States. Roosevelt did not hesitate before this obstacle. He came to an agreement with the various state governments. The latter hold themselves responsible for the capital represented by these bonds, guarantee the interest, being protected by the clause that the federal government will come to their rescue, if ever circumstances require it.

Such protection could be given to the rights of these small property holders who, in our large cities represent the majority, I shall not say as to the value but number of real estate holders. I fear, sir, if this assistance is denied to them by both dominion and provincial governments, we shall soon have in our large cities a real estate trust. This is most alarming and I regret that I have to reveal to the house the views expressed by a foremost banker to a friend of mine, a member of a city council. This is how certain large business men appreciate the sacrifices, the work and economy to which the right hon. Prime Minister alluded the night before last in Toronto. Oh! the banker said, to this councillor, these small property holders have all our sympathy, however, in a crisis like the one we are undergoing, we must put up with the consequences of this economic disturbance. These properties, he said, will be acquired by other real estate owners. The situation will become normal. The credit of our cities will be guaranteed and every one will end by being happy." Frankly, sir, this banker could not have been raised in the ridings we represent, because he would have more respect for those who deposited their money in our banking institutions.

It may be contended, perhaps, under present circumstances that small property holders must put up with the crisis just like those who have had reverses on the stock exchange or elsewhere. Here again, we must lay down the economic "distinguo." The small property holder who has placed his savings in real estate is not a speculator in the true sense of the word. He invested his savings in a property which he intended to set aside as a legacy to his family. His investment was not made in the hope of reaping a rainbow or confiding his future to the tail of a financial comet, but he economized so that not only his family but also the state would benefit by it, because such an investment would increase our national asset.

The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) approved a short while ago, in principle at least, the resolution introduced the other day by the right hon. Prime Minister, purporting to have a special committee appointed to investigate the spread existing between the cost of manufactured products and their distribution to consumers. The member for Hochelaga, sir, approves in principle this investigation; he however recalls a blue book published by the House of Commons, which he read in connection with the inquiry held in 1919 as regards the cost of living. In the course of this investigation, the directors of certain large industries, questioned by the hon. minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) and Mr. Pringle, etc., confessed having made large profits, shameful profits. I wonder, sir, whether, notwithstanding these direct proofs, these same industries lowered the sale price of their goods. Nothing was done, sir. We trust, however, that the next investigation will have more positive results and that a practical penalty will be meted out to the guilty ones, if any. I shall not refer to a recent investigation, the outcome of which is at present "sub judice."

There seems to exist some fear in the house to express views which might be construed as bold and revolutionary. I can only think of one way to balance all the budgets of our dominion, provincial and municipal governments that of lowering the rate of interest on liabilities. There are not only the small consumers, those deprived of wealth or the middle classes who are called upon to make sacrifices in a period of crisis. Whether the views which I shall express may displease some, I must nevertheless submit them to the consideration of the house. In so doing, I find myself in good company, as a number of eminent economists—although I have not the faith of a peasant of Britanny in all economic theses—numerous business men throughout the world have expressed their views.

Some speeches delivered in the house display a lack of social psychology. I am amazed to hear a number of members forecast an approaching revolution in this country, where people are truly christians. Have the unemployed in Canada manifested heretofore, any signs of wishing to destroy society? A few seditious speeches have been made by certain foreign elements which immigration has brought to our shores. Our unemployed expect but one thing from our legislators: the enacting of economic measures devoid of nationalism destroyers and tending, thanks to international cooperation, to bring back prosperity.

It is urgent, sir, to display statesmanship at times.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): I shall read in this respect an excerpt from a pamphlet published by the Rev. Father Alexandre Dugré, of the Society of Jesus:

No state can too much rely on its strength, or, especially, look upon as vigorous what is really a premonition of decline and ruin: such as the power of money. The concentration of wealth in the hands of a few unscrupulous directors or promoters deprived of social sense, who work in lobbies of parliaments—

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation):

—and together with a controlled press in order to have measures enacted and obtain favours benefiting a group of financiers, to the detriment of the great majority of poor people, that is no more democracy or aristocracy, it is, in truth, plutocracy, the tyranny of Mammon, crowned avarice, economic dictatorship and "l'usura vorax," stigmatized by Pius XI and Leo XIII.

It behooves all legislators to examine their conscience.

What will be the outcome of the present crisis? Together with their colleagues opposite the Liberals hope that it may end as soon as possible. What will be its effect? It has been noxious, heretofore, let us hope that it will be, in the future beneficial, I shall explain myself: The present crisis has forced us to confess our sins of commission and omission.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): That is so!

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): We have been somewhat too proud and unforeseeing; state ownernship in certain provinces, extravagant expenditures in others and the little thought we gave to future, has brought on hardships of which we now feel the aftermath.

Let us be wiser in the future. The important conferences held here and there emphasize this indifference on the part of all nations. What strikes one is that in all these quarters where much discussion take place, where little legislation is enacted, where, however, all human ills are recognized, where the causes of the depression are analyzed, where one especially notes that the nationalism of states, high protection, lack of stability of currency, etc., are the causes of the distress we are suffering—these great conferences always end without results and put off the important discussions to relieve the present ills. When shall we return to our senses?

Mr. SPEAKER (Text): The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. ST-PERE (Text): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few words to add. (Translation): The government's duty is clear. The right hon. Prime Minister quoted, recently, these words of Talleyrand, the great French statesman: "that it was praiseworthy for a public man to become unpopular through the enactment of certain measures which he advocated." Let the right hon. Prime Minister also recall this other statement of Talleyrand: "In my opinion, the true interest of France can never be opposed to those of Europe." Let the right hon. Prime Minister, so as to arrive at some solution of our great problems, be the first to set the example. Let him recall the words of Tilley: "That a word from Canada might have great weight in solving the economic questions which are world wide." Let the Prime Minister of Canada, although an adherent of "Canada First" recall that the true interests of Canada should never be opposed to the true interests of the whole world. This being the case, we shall have moved a step towards the great solution; we shall have set to the world an example of disinterestedness and manifested our good will to definitely settle these problems, the unsettledness of which really hinders the recovery of world prosperity.

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that owing to my inability to understand the French language. I cannot discuss any of the points raised by the last speaker (Mr. St-Pere) in the debate. My remarks this evening however arise from my sense of duty to bring before this house some of the points which have not been raised during the present debate, place before hon. members the points of view of some of the industrial workers in Canada, and to describe the conditions existing in Canada's largest industrial city.

I listened intently to the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) concerning the growth in trade and the increase in employment in agriculture and other primary industries. While I do not wish to be considered a fatalist or one who would paint a gloomy picture when conditions do not warrant it, I must state frankly that so far as my constituency is concerned the enormous expansion in employment and development in trade described by the Prime Minister is certainly not in evidence. I have before me a statement over the signature of Mayor Wilton of the city of Hamilton, presented at the last meeting of the city council in that city, which, at least by implication, indicates the increase in the relief burden within the last two weeks. For the week ending January 13, 1934, there were 7,225 families on relief, whereas in the previous two weeks there were only 6,813, showing an increase of slightly over 400 families. If we figure that out on the basis of five to a family I believe it would be fair to state that 35,000 men, women and children are being fed through the efforts of the various organizations in that great industrial city. On top of this must be put the 450 heads of families who throughout the building and construction program of the provincial government were taken off relief because of their ability to sustain themselves.

I should like to set out clearly the position in which the industrial centres of Ontario find themselves at the moment in connection with this very important problem. They are at their wits' end to know how to meet the situation. A resolution was brought before the city council of my community at its last meeting asking that the whole burden of relief be taken off the backs of the cities of Ontario because of their inability, in their opinion, in the near future to meet the enormous burdens brought about by the tremendous unemployment situation confronting them. In the city of Hamilton at the moment we are spending more on relief than on all other city activities combined, with the exception of education. That will give the house some indication of the very real problem that is facing those charged with the responsibility of taking care of those who, through no fault of their own, find themselves unable to earn a livelihood.

During the past week we have heard a lot about governments and policies in other countries, and we have been told that the people of this dominion are not interested in some of the policies that have been set in motion in these other countries. But, Mr. Speaker, I think it is fair for me to say that inactivity on the part of a government appeals to the people of this dominion much less. Certainly no responsibility can be placed on the working people of this dominion for the present depression. They are the innocent and unfortunate victims of its consequences. Many jokes have been made about the consequences of this depression. We hear quips over the radio about the fortunes lost in the stock market on October 29, 1929, and thereafter. I am frank to admit that it is permissible to treat such things with levity, but I would like to impress upon the house that what the working classes of this country have lost has been the product of their sweat and toil, the product of the money which they have saved in an effort to keep a shelter over their heads and to meet the normal obligations of family life and educate their children

Mention has been made of soap box orators in this country. I would point out that the present Prime Minister of Great Britain received his early education in public speaking on a soap box. Viscount Snowden also received his early training in public speaking on a soap box, and I might add that in his early political life in this country the grandfather of the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) spoke from what might be termed a soap box. It would be well if some of the people who criticize soap box orators went out and did a little soap boxing themselves, and then they would come into close contact with the people who make up the life of this dominion and would be able to get their reactions to the conditions now prevailing in this country.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the working people have a right to ask the defenders of the present system why they are losing their homes through no fault of their own, and why their children whom by their toil they have provided with an education are unable to find employment, and why men, women and children in this country are receiving the very minimum of food with which to sustain life. Why should they go short of raiment when the factories remain idle, and at a time when people are desperate and are eager to go to work? Those are questions that must be answered, and answered, I believe, very shortly.

The speech from the throne mentions that there has been another federal-provincial conference—a conference veiled in secrecy. I think it is fair to say that the people of this dominion know very little of the outcome of the policies that were placed before that conference by the representatives of the respective governments. We have been told that some of the policies which that conference would have liked to set in motion could not be carried out because of the British North America Act. The people of this dominion have a right to know who and which governments were responsible for such disagreement, so that in the provinces we can go out and meet these provincial governments and endeavour to create the necessary public opinion which is the driving force under which our democratic institutions function, so that these policies which many people think are practical may be put into effect, instead of being discarded because they are not in conformity with the British North America Act. I would like to have known the exact positions that were taken at that conference, the nature of the discussions, and the objections that were made, for instance, to a reduction in interest rates. That is a problem which in my judgment has to be faced, and it is being faced to-day by every forward-looking government in the civilized world. Only in to-night's paper hon. gentlemen may have read that it is being faced in a resolute way by the government to the south of us.

The problem of the financial obligations of the four western provinces is also one that I believe must be faced in a resolute way. I do not think that this federal government can go on indefinitely paying the normal running expenses of the governments of those four western provinces. A policy on that question might easily have been evolved at the federal-provincial conference looking towards action similar to that which was taken in Australia, where they had a so-called premier's conference attended by the representatives of the federal government and of the various states, and where a policy to meet the depression in that country was formulated—a reduction in the internal interest rate by twenty-two and a fraction per cent.

I was in England this year and I believe that the pick-up in business there, particularly in the building trade, has been largely brought about through their conversion loans and the reduction in interest rates. Money is now moving into productive channels in which it was not moving so long as the enormous rates of interest prevailed that arose out of the great war.

I was very much interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), who advocated a back-to-the-land policy. There is nothing new in that, and I should like to know what is the view of the government in that respect, having regard to their policy for a restricted production of wheat. Frankly I believe that the wheat agreement is bound to fail. I do not think that governments have reached the stage where they can control the elements, and on that ground alone I do not think that any contraction or expansion of production can be satisfactorily foretold in a practical way. In my opinion the problem involved in the wheat agreement is similar to that faced to-day by the industrial structure of this country. It is nothing less than tragedy, when people are able to obtain only the barest necessities of life, that the government should set in motion a policy which will contract the production of the foodstuffs which the people should be receiving.

Prior to the recent federal-provincial conference there was much ballyhoo in the newspapers in connection with the possible institution of an unemployment insurance plan in this country. We were given to believe—this is not the first time—that the plan was ready and would be submitted at this session of parliament. Frankly, I see no reason why such a policy could not be carried out. It has the support of both major political parties in this house; it has the support, I understand, of most of the provincial governments, and I think it will be supported by public opinion from one end of this country to the other. Notwithstanding the apparent disagreement, I still think the suggestion I made last year is a sound one and should be carried out. A commission should be instituted immediately by the federal government to go into every phase of this scheme. It is said that the present is not the time for the institution of such a policy, but I do regard that as a sound argument. Such a policy should be carried out even if it is necessary to start in a small way.

When I was in Great Britain this year I was amazed at the changes which had taken place since I left there as a boy. There is one factor in connection with such a scheme which is not recognized by the business interests in this dominion. In England to-day there are millions of pounds in circulation which normally would be in the banks and strong boxes if it were not for the driving force of the social insurances. Such a scheme increases the speed of the circulation of currency. The men in England are receiving their insurance payments by right. There is no loss of dignity, because it is something for which they have paid. In my judgment that is a far better method than the undignified manner in which we are handling the unemployment situation in this country. Here we have a loss of pride and, as I have said before, pride is necessary in the development of any country. The federal government should give serious consideration to this aspect of the problem.

I have seen a number of resolutions in connection with the St. Lawrence deep waterway. My own city council has asked me to support any measure which will bring about the early starting of this great enterprise. In my judgment, this waterway will quicken the life of the whole of eastern Canada and extraordinary benefits will accrue to the people of western Canada. If I remember rightly, the matter was mentioned last year in the speech from the throne. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has referred to it in a sympathetic way, and I urge the government to maintain that sympathetic interest in this project. Should the treaty be ratified by the United States government, this government should take every step to bring about the commencement of this great enterprise which would add two thousand miles to the coastline of Canada. I believe the project is sound economically and in every other way.

I am glad to know that the government have at last decided upon a building program. This is one of the reasons why I am speaking this evening. One of the greatest tragedies of the depression is the suffering of the building tradesmen. In the city from which I come, at the present moment ninety-five per cent of those employed in the building trades are out of work. Such a condition is a challenge to our intelligence. Thousands of highly skilled men are ready and eager to go to work and put their hands to the task of building necessary public institutions. They are ready to take up the task of building better homes, and God knows they are necessary in certain centres. Before a policy is laid down in connection with this matter, I should like to leave this thought with the government. They should try and avoid the error which was made by the government of Ontario, which inaugurated a scheme and stated that only those on relief should be employed. Such a stipulation is absolutely unfair, because thousands of men who had been employed in the building industry have not gone on relief, notwithstanding the fact that they have been out of work for some time. When this scheme is set in motion some consideration should be given by the federal and provincial governments to these men. The hours of labour should be such as to permit the employment of the greatest number of men possible, and the fair wages clause should be insisted upon and incorporated in every contract awarded by the government.

I do not think that this building program should be financed by the borrowing of new money. We should avail ourselves of our own credit. This could be done by means of non-interest bearing certificates, subject to recall in such stages as may be laid down. I do not think we should pay tribute to money when we find it necessary to put these men to work One of the things we had better learn quickly is that human life should take precedence over mere money; we must realize that whether we like it or not. I believe that is going to be one of the principles which will be established before we are out of this depression.

It is unfortunate that suffering has always been the midwife of progress. People do not seem to bother about thinking when everything is going smoothly. All great reforms and great changes have come out of the hours of travail when nations have been hard pressed This has always been the case in every forward movement where old ideas have been divorced for the taking on of new.

In conclusion I will say a word or two in connection with the proposed central bank. I shall be frank and admit that what I say reflects the viewpoint of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada. We believe that our banking and credit structure should be nationalized, because it will control the destiny of this country and decide whether a man shall go to work or be out of employment. The potentialities for good and evil are so great in such an institution that only those who are responsible to the people themselves should be charged with the responsibility of its operation. I think it is fair to say that the banking and credit structure functions normally like a great public utility. It stands in the same relationship to the people of the country as the very water we drink, the very electricity we use, and those many other social services which, in our evolutionary development, we have decided from time to time are too important to be left in the hands of any private individual. The position taken by congress is sound, and when the government lays down its policy in connection with the central bank I think it should insist, in conformity with the great mass of public opinion in this dominion, that the bank shall be owned and controlled by the government of the country.

Mr. MARTIAL RHEAUME (St. John's-Iberville) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite proper to congratulate the hon. members who moved and seconded the address, in reply to the speech from the throne, and I shall avail myself of this opportunity to comment on a few excerpts of the speech delivered by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil). I find, at page 18 of Hansard, the following words:

—and the price of pork has more than doubled in the course of the last twelve months.

Had the hon. member for Compton gone back two years, he would have discovered that pork sold, in May, 1932, $6 per cwt. for carcass; in June, $7; in July, $6.50, $7, $7.50; in August, $7; in September, $6.50; in October, $8; in November, $6.25, and in December, $5.50; in January, 1933, $5.50; February, $5.50; in March, $5.50 and in the last week of March, $8; in April, $8.50; in May, $8.50; in June, $8.50; in August, $9; in September, $9; in November, $8; in the last days of November, $7.50; at the beginning of December, $8.50 to $9; in the last part of December, $9.50; at the beginning of January, 1934, $10 and at the end of January, $11 per cwt. If one compares the prices of January, 1934, with those of January, 1933, these prices have probably doubled. If the price has increased, it is because farmers have ceased raising hogs, and those who, within the last three years have raised them have sustained losses. If I remember well, at the last session, in February last, a discussion took place between two Ontario members in connection with the price of pork. The hon. member for Compton contends that, if the price of pork has doubled within the last twelve months, it is due to the Imperial Conference Agreements of 1932; however, if he consults the price list of the wholesale houses in Montreal, he will discover that there was a lapse of a year and a half before the prices went up. If they have somewhat increased, it has been within a year or so. The hon. member for Compton made another discovery. The following is his own words:

Immediately after the government assumed power, the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), adopted the policy of indemnifying the owners of steers found to be tuberculous; this put an end to an injustice and was greatly appreciated by the farming community.

I took the pains to look up the records in the library this afternoon, and went as far back as the budget on agriculture for the year 1925-26. The hon. member for Compton can verify himself that there was an appropriation that year of $1,877,000 for the health of animals, while the total appropriation for agriculture amounted to $6,600,000; in 1927 there is an item of $1,900,000 for the health of animals; in 1927-28, $2,140,000; in 1928-29, $2,258,000; in 1929-30, $2,900,000; in 1930-31, in the first budget brought down by the hon. Minister of Agriculture in this government, we find an appropriation of $2,500,000, namely a decrease of $400,000 as compared with the previous year; in 1931-32, we find a decrease of $300,000; in 1932-33, a decrease of $896,000; and finally in 1933-34 a further decrease of $225,000; which means that for this item alone, the Department of Agriculture expends, to-day, 50 per cent less than the outlay made by the Liberals when in power in 1929-30. Yet the hon. member for Compton thinks he has made quite a discovery!

[Mr. Rhéaume.]

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): That does not destroy my argument.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Perhaps not; however it certainly does not strengthen it, since these figures prove that the Liberal government appropriated double the amount which the Conservatives now expend.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): My argument remains unaffected.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): One can always argue; the question is whether such arguments carry weight, that is what counts.

The hon. member for Compton further states in his speech that the contaminated cattle are shipped to Montreal, slaughtered and those thought fit for human consumption are sold. Probably that has the effect of somewhat lowering the prices of meat, I agree with him on this point. The following is what the hon. member suggests:

I would suggest that there be added to the indemnity paid to the farmer for his contaminated cattle, the price which he receives for the carcass of these animals and that the latter instead of finding their way to our markets, be used as fertilizers.

If the memory of the hon. member for Compton serves him right, he will recall that at the first session that I had the privilege of sitting in the house, in 1931, I placed on the order paper a motion tending to increase the indemnity paid to the farmer for contaminated cattle. I had personally observed, during the previous years, in 1927, 1928 and 1929, when the government inspectors submitted the cattle to the tuberculine test, in the county of St. John's and Iberville, that farmers did not receive the indemnity to which they were entitled. Milch cows, then, were worth between $100 and $125 and the maximum price paid in the county of St. John's-Iberville was $38. Some farmers only received $10, $15 or $20, the amount of the indemnity depended on the value of the contaminated cow. I thought it proper to introduce this resolution because I had personally noticed the losses sustained by the farmers when the test was applied. I believed that this increase in indemnity was a fair and reasonable one, especially when we consider that this government had stated, in the 1930 election, that they intended to do their utmost to help agriculture. The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel), among others, was elected by carrying on his campaign from door to door, among the farmers of his county—he was well acquainted with his people because he had been defeated, I think, three or four times previous to the last election—promising them that, if elected, he would endeavour to have this indemnity increased. As I have some excellent friends in the county of Brome-Missisquoi, I wished to give the hon. member (Mr. Pickel) an opportunity to put this measure into practice. However, any speech favouring my resolution was made on this side of the house. To my amazement the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi stated that the opportunity was not well chosen, that the financial situation of the country prohibited such an indemnity increase. Yet the opportunity was his to prove his generous nature and fulfil an election promise. The members of the government and himself had failed to carry out their pledges; my resolution gave them an opportunity, but they refused to take advantage of it. The hon. member for Compton did not think fit to support this resolution, although he represents a rural riding which, if I be not mistaken, is included in the restricted area. The hon. member for Compton was given an opportunity to rise and support the resolution. I recall that the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) stated that the government could not accept a motion proposing an expenditure of public funds and moved by a member of the opposition.

When hon. members opposite hold meetings in their constituencies, they state that the Liberals impede legislation and have no suggestions to make to the government. On both sides of the house unnecessary talk goes on; however, some good results are achieved by the opposition as well as by the government. We are at present undergoing a crisis, I, therefore, think that the harder the times the more suggestions are needed. Some were made to the government by members of the opposition who sit on the front benches, by men who were at the helm of the country's affairs and have left their stamp, yet the government did not think fit to accept them because they came from the opposite camp. It may have happened, at times, that the right hon. Prime Minister has backed water, however, this has seldom happened. When he consults his ministers or some of his followers, suggestions are probably made to him, it then becomes apparent that the opposition's suggestions are excellent and that it is a necessary institution; they then back water. I think that if the right hon. Prime Minister had put into practice some of their suggestions, the country would be better off.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Will the hon. member allow me to put a question? Is the hon. member aware that, under the Liberal regime, between 1921 and 1930, the indemnity paid for contaminated cattle was reduced?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I accept the hon. member's word, however, I cannot be held responsible for errors the government may have committed, because I was not then a member. Had I been I would have taken my share of responsibility. If the government of that day blundered, we were ready to make amends in 1931, we were disposed to do better; however, the partisans of this government who had pledged themselves to bring up this question, among others, the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi, forgot their promises and refused to help us.

The hon. member for Compton made special reference to butter. I think that if he sits in the house, it is partly due to the butter question. The hon. member contends that, under the Liberal regime, in 1929, butter sold for 39 cents per pound and 31 cents in 1930, while in New York it sold for 40 cents. I think that the price of butter in the United States does not concern us. I have not had the privilege of hearing the hon. member speak in his constituency; however, his friends in the counties of St. John-Iberville, Chambly-Vercheres, Laprairie-Napierville, Brome-Missisquoi, etc., were shocked to find that butter sold at 39 cents per pound in 1929; they were greatly discouraged and lamented over the fate of the poor farmer! I wonder what would have been their thoughts had butter sold 16 and 17 cents per pound as was the case under this government's regime.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): People would have crucified them.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I do not know whether they would have been crucified, however, tears would perhaps have caused their death.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Crocodile tears!

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Perhaps false tears, those of a politician. I recall that one day the hon. member for Compton, in an oratorical flight, stated that the farmer of Quebec should be thankful for the prices he obtained for his farm products. I think, I protested and told the hon. member for Compton that this was not quite the program on which he had been elected in 1930.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. It is the second time the hon. member misrepresents my statements. He was called to order last year, he nevertheless persists again and puts on my lips words which I never uttered and are not in Hansard.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I accept the word of the hon. member for Compton. At all events, if he wishes to hold a meeting with free discussion, he can invite me to his county, we shall then be able to discuss his statement, Hansard in hand.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): One will be held.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): You are invited.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I accept. The hon. member stated that, from 1921 to 1930, the United States increased their tariff on Canadian butter from 2 to 14 cents per pound, and, on cream, almost 50 cents per gallon. Notwithstanding these tariff barriers to prevent our products from entering their country, the farmers sold their butter more than double the price they obtain to-day. They then sold their butter at 39 cents per pound, yet our hon. friends were very despondent. The Conservatives always refer to the price of butter or of commodities in the United States. A fact that hon. members opposite cannot deny, is that the United States government and the president have prepared a program which will benefit the farmer.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): The farmers are on strike.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): The estimates of Department of Agriculture which had always been on the increase from 1925 to 1930, were cut down this year nearly $1,000,000. Does this help the farming class, by cutting down the appropriations which were usually voted for agricultural purposes? It may, perhaps, be stated that the crisis is responsible for this; however, when the estimates are taken up by the house, I shall be able to show that certain estimates in some departments, have not decreased but have been maintained, because at the head of those departments are to be found competent men, who insist on their estimates not being cut down, while other departments have at their head men with no experience.

Now, sir, I wish to comment briefly on the speech of the hon. member for Brome Missisquoi: He begins by congratulating the government for having granted an investigation on milk. I intend to inquire how much this investigation cost the government I do not think that it cost as much as that held on coal, however, I think the result has been practically the same. The government did not condescend to place on the table of the house the report in connection with the inquiry held on coal. Fortunately, it was sent to the Quebec government which instituted proceedings against these companies, the latter were found to be guilty since the judge who heard the case condemned them to a fine. However, the law is rather construed to protect trusts; I hope however that means will be found to prevent these companies from dragging the case from one court to another, until it reaches the highest tribunal of the country, then transferring the case to the Privy Council; meanwhile continue to fleece the people, without paying their fine.

The following is an excerpt of the speech of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi:

> I presume that as regards any real benefit that has resulted so far, from that investigation, the report has probably been systematically pigeon-holed, and forgotten in conformity with the usual procedure with respect to the findings of commissions. The evidence brought out by that investigation conclusively disclosed that the producer was being unfairly dealt with and exploited by the distributor, and further revealed the fact that the present system was simply creating a few millionaires in the city and driving thousands of farmers into a state of penury.

I quite agree with the hon. member, however, I state that....

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Why criticize him if you agree with his statement?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): If the hon. member for Berthier Maskinongé (Mr. Barrette) will be patient, I think I shall be able to state why I do not agree on all points with the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi, for two years back, last year and this one—he showed somewhat that he was a free lance in his speeches. I congratulate him. However, when it was a question of voting, he did so as a partisan. Furthermore, the hon. member complains that farmers are obliged to pay top prices for their material. I shall quote his words:

He has to buy wire, nails, roofing, cement, lumber and a long list of expensive agricultural implements and machinery, such as cream separators.

When the question came up of raising the duty by ten per cent on barbed wire, the hon. member for Brome Missisquoi did not hang behind, he voted, when it was a matter of raising the duty by twenty-five per cent on cream separators he did not lag behind, he voted.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): He adheres to his party.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): It is of little import whether it is his party, he should not have criticized it, then voted with it. I think one should not find fault with someone then side with him.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Is the opposition in favour of placing these products on the free list?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): My reply to the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Lafléche) is that I have not examined the question. At all events, I consider that the farmers pay already enough for cream separators and barbed wire, and that the duty should not be increased by ten per cent, in the first case, and twenty-five per cent in the other, in order to help certain friends of the party.

He states that it is entirely useless to request help from those in authority. I do not know whether this is really true.

The following is an excerpt of the evidence given when the investigation was held on milk and dairy products by the committee on agriculture and colonization. The manager of the Laiterie Saint Laurent is the person who replies:

Q. The St. Lawrence Dairy charge 5 cents per gallon which covers the entire operation?
A. We charge 5 cents per gallon for the entire dairy operation.
Q. You charge this to purchase milk, pasteurize—
A. To purchase milk, pasteurize and resell it to our milkmen.

After comparing this with the evidence given by other dairy managers, I concluded that some were perjuring themselves. I began to peruse this famous report which contains 900 pages, and I wish to state, sir, that if these witnesses had appeared before a court of justice, they would have been arrested and condemned for perjury. I am informed that an hon. member on the committee requested the chairman to dismiss this witness, stating that his evidence was in contradiction with the reports he had made, and giving as a reason that he was too old to give evidence.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Will the hon. member allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): With pleasure.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): What are the names of those who perjured themselves at that inquiry?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I have no details in this matter; however, if the hon. member will do as I did, I shall indicate to him the pages where this evidence is to be found and he can judge for himself.

The following is another excerpt taken from the evidence given at this inquiry:

Q. Mr. Chairman, I fail to see why the committee should be obliged to go over this evidence again. We do not seem to be making progress, and the statement and answers of the witness are not satisfactory. There is not one page of the evidence we have heard within the last two hours that is free from contradiction. We shall reach no result if we do not hear the evidence of someone who has some knowledge of the financial organization of this company.

When a poor devil dares to steal a bottle of milk, in Montreal or elsewhere, he is condemned to pass eight days in jail; however, according to the evidence given by a former dairy manager, we find managers who, in one month alone, robbed farmers for more than $1,300 worth of milk. Yet the government which disbursed thousands of dollars to hold this investigation does not bestir itself. In the findings of the committee, at page 10 we find: "Depreciation, bad debts, overheads, profits and dividends, merger, purchase or absorption of other companies or enterprises, the profit of the producer on the consumer's dollar," everything is mentioned. This reminds me of a sick person who would call for a doctor, then the latter, after examining the patient would thus address him: Sir, you are very sick, you have numerous ailments, and claiming a $25 fee, would put on his hat and walk out.

If it is thought necessary to hold an investigation, to disburse thousands of dollars of public money, let them have at least the courage to remedy the evil. We have written evidence that some witnesses perjured themselves; let the government act against them. Former dairy managers have given evidence that farmers were robbed of milk. From every quarter comes the cry: "We must help the farming class." If the government are in earnest, let them begin by having those who rob the farmers arrested.

Referring to that witness that was thought too old to give evidence; it did not prevent him from drawing a salary of $10,000 as president of the company; his two sons were drawing $5,000, while the upkeep of their motor cars was charged to the company. Notwithstanding all this, the companies contend that their profits are too small to pay a reasonable price to the farmers for their milk. If I follow the evidence—and it is written in excellent French—this company is so incorporated that it is the members of one family alone who control the funds supplied by outsiders.

It was proved that the president of another company draws a salary of $13,500 per year, the vice-president $13,500 and the secretary $8,000.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Were their salaries cut down 10 per cent?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I do not think so. Together, the three draw $35,000; the income tax amounted to $18,500, and the net profits to $155,000. The profits accumulated by skimming the farmer and naturally these companies are allowed to skim the consumer.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): What about the milk?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): There is no lack of milk. I was not, sir, a member of this committee. When I was informed that the report had been published, I communicated with the clerk of the house who was courteous enough to forward me a copy; I have begun to read it, it is very interesting.

In the speech delivered on February 1, by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi, I find the following:

> The milk commission of the province of Quebec could have rendered valuable service had they been so inclined. I noticed in the press during the latter part of the summer and in the fall several reports of the activities of the hon. Mr. Godbout, Minister of Agriculture for Quebec. He made this statement on several occasions, but in one speech in particular, delivered in the county of Jacques Cartier just prior to the last election, speaking among other things of his paralyzed and incompetent milk commission, he said that at the next session of the legislature legislation would be introduced to deal with the milk situation.

The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi seems to resent others making promises. It is true that we are often wrong in judging others by ourselves. I must inform the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi that the hon. Minister of Agriculture of Quebec performs his duty. I had the privilege of making his acquaintance and seeing him at work. If the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi will take the trouble of inquiring, he will find that the hon. Minister of Agriculture introduced a bill in the Quebec Legislature purporting to control dairies and curb the profiteers on the Montreal island. I note that the dairy people who contend to be out of pocket have retained legal lights in their defence. The provincial Minister of Agriculture is not a colossus but he is fearless and I can assure the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi that when the former makes a promise he carries it out. The hon. member will have an opportunity of following the debate in the press and he will find out that if there is a Minister of Agriculture who seeks to do his duty, I have no hesitation in saying so, it is the hon. Minister of Agriculture of Quebec.

In another part of his speech, the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi states that a number of farmers in his constituency were returned more than their share of skimmed milk. I quite believe him because the surplus of milk obtained by dairies is easy to understand, according to the evidence given by certain witnesses at the investigation on milk. I cannot define what might be considered larceny. I am not here to do so. For instance, when a manager asks an employee to call at his office and says to him: Baptiste forwarded 10,000 pounds of milk; let 4,500 pounds be designated as surplus milk; Antoine forwarded 10,000 pounds, let 1,500 pounds be surplus milk, etc., I cannot say whether this can be considered as larceny or embezzlement, however, I know that the same witness states that, in the space of one month this Montreal dairy stole more than $1,300 from the farmers.

Mr. BARIBEAU (Translation): Is this company registered?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I have no information in this respect; however, if the hon. member wishes to find out as I did, let him look up the voluminous report, the reading of which requires much patience. Moreover, if my hon. friend wishes to call at my office, I shall indicate to him the pages, he will then be in a position to verify for himself the truth of my statement.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Have you any knowledge whether they complained?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I am unaware whether they did or not. It matters little. I state that these people are profiteers or cream skimmers and that the country should have recommended—

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Who administers justice?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): May I say to the hon. member for Compton that I think the government has such authority, but not the Quebec government. It strikes me that when a government orders an investigation and uses public funds in so doing, it should implement the findings of the committee. If it blunders at first, it should not again do so. As to the question of coal, I am informed that there were political friends who had to be protected.

I am aware, for instance, that our poor Quebec and Ontario farmers were fleeced by the United States citizens. I do not think we should countenance these profiteers or skimmers, these people who increase the price by 40 cents per hundredweight to the consumer, and who pocket 25 cents, allowing only 15 cents of an increase to the producer, stating: We must increase the price of milk to cover our losses. We should, first, do away with these profiteers and cut down the salaries, especially in the case of a president who's salary is $10,000 per year and to whom a member of the committee had put a question which the Chairman found rather personal because it entered too much into details. It had no significance as all understood, because his answers were somewhat naive. When profiteers like the one mentioned come before a committee and we have a duty to perform they should not be spared more than others.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Is it not a fact that the price of milk was increased one cent per quart, in Montreal?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Yes, it was increased. The producer received 15 cents more per hundredweight and the dairy pocketed 25 cents.

We must conclude, sir, that if the government intends to really help the farming and working classes, it cannot too soon do so.

It is rumoured that an election will, perhaps, take place in 1934 or 1935. I do not think hon. members opposite are yet ready to face their constituents. However, I am ready; I visited my constituents on three occasions and my friends opposite may inform the right hon. Prime Minister that I am quite ready.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Is the hon. member certain that his constituents are in earnest?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Quite so! I received a letter from one of them and he inquires whether I would be so kind as to inform him if, in my opinion, an election will take place because they are anxious to turn this government out of office; and this letter is signed: "A good conservative."

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): What is the name of this person?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I cannot divulge his name to the house; however, if my hon. friend will come up to my office, I shall show him the letter.

In closing my remarks, sir, I request the government to act, especially, to implement the statement of the right hon. Prime Minister, that he was ready to make an outlay of $50,000,000 to help the unemployed of this country. If the Prime Minister has any scheme which might solve the unemployment problem, he can depend on our cooperation, for if we refer to the speech of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) we find that he states he is always ready to give his support to the government when it is a question of disbursing millions to relieve the present crisis.

Gentlemen you have the floor! We await your action!

Mr. ROBERT McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, at every session of parliament the debate on the address is considered from the private member's standpoint as an occasion for us to put forward any matters of particular importance to our constituencies. It is not my intention at this time to be too parochial in my remarks, but in view of one clause in the speech from the throne, which reads—

> My government propose further to promote employment by expenditures on essential public works and undertakings throughout the dominion.

—I realize that full recovery from the depression through which we are passing cannot come so long as there are so many men out of employment. But the question naturally arises whether it is a good thing for the country to go further into debt at this time, particularly for a large building program. The government decided about two years ago that relief by way of public works was too expensive, and that they would try other means. Other means have been tried, and I believe the people of the country to-day are persuaded that almost anything is preferable to the present form of relief. So I think it might be a good thing for the government to consider certain undertakings but not undertakings that will involve an annual expenditure for upkeep

I want to refer to a project with which the government, or at any rate some members of it, are familiar, in the constituency from which I come, namely the building of a dam across the Souris river just west of the town of Estevan. The cost of this work as estimated by engineers who have examined the matter would be about $125,000. The idea of the dam is to provide water for industrial development at this point. The town of Estevan has coal available in large quantities, and is an ideal location for industries if there were a proper water supply. My information is that some industries have decided against locating there because of the lack of a sufficient water supply. The matter is also to some extent of international interest, because one of the objects of this dam would be to control the flood waters in the spring which sometimes cause trouble not only in Saskatchewan but also across the line in Dakota. There is also the feature of regulation of water supply for the town and district. The project has been endorsed by the municipal and town councils and other organized bodies throughout the district.

The dam would be built between two hills, the work consisting of scraping down two hills approximately 1,900 feet apart and building an earthen dam about 1,900 feet long and 20 feet high. One feature that should commend the project to the government is that the work could nearly all be done by day labour, and there would be very little expenditure for materials. I have no doubt that the farmers and the unemployed in that community would work on the project in payment for the relief which they have been afforded, thereby being able to pay their relief debt. Another desirable feature is that once the dam is built, there will be no annual expenditure for maintenance. I therefore commend this matter to the consideration of the government, should they go on with a program such as is mentioned in the speech from the throne.

There are other matters mentioned in the speech from the throne which I will not dwell upon, as they have been dealt with extensively by some of my colleagues, particularly the wheat agreement and the establishment of a central bank. But I may say there was throughout the country some anxiety as to what would be contained in the speech from the throne. People expected that something would be said with regard to the economic conference recently held in London, England. To that conference some sixty-six countries sent delegates. The problems of these sixty-six countries were in many respects identical. It was hoped by a great many people, particularly those engaged in production, the farmers of the west who have no market for their products, that something would be done at this conference to reopen the channels of trade which have been blocked during the last few years. Conditions among the farmers are very bad; in Saskatchewan I believe they are worse than they have ever been. That is why an announcement of what was done at that conference was anxiously awaited. We are very sorry that it proved so unsuccessful. It does not seem possible to do much through conferences with other countries; I believe that the consensus of opinion to-day is that we must try to solve our problems by action in our own country and so relieve the difficulties under which we are suffering.

It is not now and never has been my policy to accuse the government of anything of which they are not guilty. I will say that Canada in common with the rest of the world was bound to have in some degree a period of depression following the war and the uneconomic conduct of affairs that prevailed in all countries since the war. The Prime Minister in his address on January 30, quoted statistics in an endeavour to prove that there has been a considerable improvement in economic conditions in this country. Not only he but a number of his supporters have spoken along the same lines. They appear to be satisfied. But, Mr. Speaker, I will say that the Prime Minister and his supporters in this house are the only people that you will hear give expression to that opinion. If they are satisfied, they are the only people who are. I do not believe the people of the country, who are in such distress, will be satisfied when they read some of the speeches that have been made. We must have an improvement, and apparently it is not to come from this government, if they are so well satisfied with conditions as they are. I was rather encouraged when on October 11 last, I heard over the radio the Prime Minister address a meeting of the board of trade of the city of Winnipeg. Whether it was the environment in the city of Winnipeg, or some other reason, I cannot say, but one statement I heard the Prime Minister make then I have never heard him make since, either in this House of Commons or any other place, namely, that the tariff legislation passed by the present government is only a temporary measure. He gave us to understand that as times improved the tariff would be reduced. I wonder why, when he goes to Toronto and Montreal, he does not make that same statement. I have watched to find out whether he has said the same thing in any other place, and I find that he has not. Surely it must have been the environment of the city of Winnipeg which was responsible for his statement. And again, in 1928 the environment of the city of Winnipeg must have been responsible for the fact that tariff protection and high tariffs were never mentioned at the Conservative convention held in that year.
