VEGETINE
—WILL CURE—
SCROFULA,
Scrofulous Humor.
VEGETINE will eradicate from the system every taint of Scrofula and Scrofulous Humor. It has permanently cured thousands in Boston and vicinity who had been long and painful sufferers.
"Oh! oh! oh!" she exclaimed. "A darling little bed for Flossy. Now she need never go to sleep on the sofa—how any more."
All these presents were opened and displayed in order, even Maria's new dress and necktie, because Mrs. Christy thought of the best way to let every body share the pleasure.
This made breakfast very late, and the family had just finished, when Maria said: "Teddy and Sissy were waiting in the kitchen."
True enough, it was nine o'clock; so Mrs. Christy told Papa he must either keep Grandma company at a little while.
"Bring in your new friends, Kim," said Mr. Christy, "and give them some breakfast, while I am making up my mind."
"Not quite yet, Papa," said his wife. "Maria and I must give them some new things, we were busy getting together when you were asleep last night; then we will bring them in, and you shall have them for them. But you and I had better creep away and leave the children to entertain them."
"All right," said Mr. Christy, "I will not for the world dispute the wisdom of a woman who owns such a handsome pair of cloaks."
Maria only shook her finger at him and went out.
"A dress of Puggie's, with one tucked let down, fitted Sissy to a charm; and Teddy, in a new suit, purchased expressly for him. When they were arrayed in their new clothes, Mrs. Christy ushered them into the dining-room, and then telling the children to see that they had a good breakfast, while she dressed to go out.
It was a long, cold walk to the out-pavement, where Teddy led his new friends, Grandma had kindly offered to help Maria, who seemed very anxious to join the party, and who now brought up the rear, with a large basket on her back, containing the house at last—a large, old-fashioned wooden building, which had, doubtless, once been an elegant mansion. Every room was full, and as Teddy said, their rooms were at the top. The children's father was nowhere to be seen. He had gone with some friends to a shooting match, and, as usual, the little ones were left to themselves. The room where Chickery lived opened from the same hall, and there Teddy led his party. It was a large, square room, with windows and two old-fashioned closets. Mrs. Christy was glad to see the poor invalid could get the sun.
Teddy's only introduction was: "Here's some company, Daddy. Come to bring you Merry Christmas."
"Yes, said Sissy, piping in her little sharp notes, before Mrs. Christy could do more than shake hands with the sick man. And has got a Christmas just like folks. See, Daddy, a new frock and all the beautiful things."
"I find they are finding such a good friend, Merry," said the old man. "They're mighty good children and deserve better than they get."
Mrs. Christy drew up a chair by the bed, and talked with the old man so gently and kindly he found himself telling her all his troubles, as if he had known her for years.
Teddy had taken Kim and Puggie to his room, and was showing them his pet mouse, which came out of a hole near the floor when the child called it, and went through a series of tricks with which he was well acquainted. After which Teddy gave it some crumbs and made it squeal an accompaniment to his funny little whistle.
"Jim is smart enough," said Teddy, when his pet had gone through all its tricks he knew; "but he doesn't like Father. He never comes out when Father's here."
While the children were still busy with their breakfast, a heavy step was heard on the stairs. Jim, the little mouse, ran back in his hole; Sissy caught hold of Teddy's hand; and Kim waited to see what would come next.
"It is up here," said a loud voice.
"Yes, sir, please," replied Maria.
"If she won't like company, Maria, I'll take her to the hall, and she'll hold part of a bedstead, while Maria was telling them where to bring it.
Mrs. Christy said a few words in a low tone to the men, and very soon they entered the sick man's house as quietly as possible.
"Where would you like us to put the bed, Mr. Dougherty?" asked Mrs. Christy of the invalid.
"Whatever the lady likes pleases me, Ma'am," replied the old man, adding, under his breath, "I'm not shure at all whether it's awake or asleep I am; and the girl will be crazed intirely."
Under the directions of Mrs. Christy, the new bed in order, and both kindly waited to give the "poor fellow" a lift, when Mrs. Christy and Maria had made it neatly with the well-worn sheets and the warm blankets which the lady had kept before the fire.
It was touching to see the thin, wrinkled face shine with delight as he lay on the soft, comfortable bed. He gave one quick glance from the window, saw the tops of the trees and a bit of blue sky, and then said, with a great effort to lift his feelings: "If it is not Heaven yet, you've brought me to, Ma'am, it must be the very next door."
"Merry Christmas, Daddy Dougherty!" Merry Christmas!" shouted Teddy running in, followed by the other children.
"Why don't you speak to us," said Sissy, reaching up and touching the old man's face.
"I'm just tongue-tied with all this illegance said the old man, trying to smile.
Mrs. Christy wisely sent the children away, with the exception of Teddy, who seemed quite like a boy of twelve.
"Now, my little man," said Mrs. Christy, "you may help Maria, while I give you old friend a drink of the life-bee-tee; and if we work with a will, the daughter will find her Merry Christmas ready to welcome her."
The old, hard bed was taken down, and its straw mattress carried to the yard below, with the help of a lodger on the next floor, who was quite ready to lend a hand when she found what was going on, although she was not in the best of humors, because her old

"Oh! oh! oh!" she exclaimed. "A darling little bed for Flossy. Now she need never go to sleep on the sofa—how any more."
All these presents were opened and displayed in order, even Maria's new dress and necktie, because Mrs. Christy thought of the best way to let every body share the pleasure.
This made breakfast very late, and the family had just finished, when Maria said: "Teddy and Sissy were waiting in the kitchen."
True enough, it was nine o'clock; so Mrs. Christy told Papa he must either keep Grandma company at a little while.
"Bring in your new friends, Kim," said Mr. Christy, "and give them some breakfast, while I am making up my mind."
"Not quite yet, Papa," said his wife. "Maria and I must give them some new things, we were busy getting together when you were asleep last night; then we will bring them in, and you shall have them for them. But you and I had better creep away and leave the children to entertain them."
"All right," said Mr. Christy, "I will not for the world dispute the wisdom of a woman who owns such a handsome pair of cloaks."
Maria only shook her finger at him and went out.
"A dress of Puggie's, with one tucked let down, fitted Sissy to a charm; and Teddy, in a new suit, purchased expressly for him. When they were arrayed in their new clothes, Mrs. Christy ushered them into the dining-room, and then telling the children to see that they had a good breakfast, while she dressed to go out.
It was a long, cold walk to the out-pavement, where Teddy led his new friends, Grandma had kindly offered to help Maria, who seemed very anxious to join the party, and who now brought up the rear, with a large basket on her back, containing the house at last—a large, old-fashioned wooden building, which had, doubtless, once been an elegant mansion. Every room was full, and as Teddy said, their rooms were at the top. The children's father was nowhere to be seen. He had gone with some friends to a shooting match, and, as usual, the little ones were left to themselves. The room where Chickery lived opened from the same hall, and there Teddy led his party. It was a large, square room, with windows and two old-fashioned closets. Mrs. Christy was glad to see the poor invalid could get the sun.
Teddy's only introduction was: "Here's some company, Daddy. Come to bring you Merry Christmas."
"Yes, said Sissy, piping in her little sharp notes, before Mrs. Christy could do more than shake hands with the sick man. And has got a Christmas just like folks. See, Daddy, a new frock and all the beautiful things."
"I find they are finding such a good friend, Merry," said the old man. "They're mighty good children and deserve better than they get."
Mrs. Christy drew up a chair by the bed, and talked with the old man so gently and kindly he found himself telling her all his troubles, as if he had known her for years.
Teddy had taken Kim and Puggie to his room, and was showing them his pet mouse, which came out of a hole near the floor when the child called it, and went through a series of tricks with which he was well acquainted. After which Teddy gave it some crumbs and made it squeal an accompaniment to his funny little whistle.
"Jim is smart enough," said Teddy, when his pet had gone through all its tricks he knew; "but he doesn't like Father. He never comes out when Father's here."
While the children were still busy with their breakfast, a heavy step was heard on the stairs. Jim, the little mouse, ran back in his hole; Sissy caught hold of Teddy's hand; and Kim waited to see what would come next.
"It is up here," said a loud voice.
"Yes, sir, please," replied Maria.
"If she won't like company, Maria, I'll take her to the hall, and she'll hold part of a bedstead, while Maria was telling them where to bring it.
Mrs. Christy said a few words in a low tone to the men, and very soon they entered the sick man's house as quietly as possible.
"Where would you like us to put the bed, Mr. Dougherty?" asked Mrs. Christy of the invalid.
"Whatever the lady likes pleases me, Ma'am," replied the old man, adding, under his breath, "I'm not shure at all whether it's awake or asleep I am; and the girl will be crazed intirely."
Under the directions of Mrs. Christy, the new bed in order, and both kindly waited to give the "poor fellow" a lift, when Mrs. Christy and Maria had made it neatly with the well-worn sheets and the warm blankets which the lady had kept before the fire.
It was touching to see the thin, wrinkled face shine with delight as he lay on the soft, comfortable bed. He gave one quick glance from the window, saw the tops of the trees and a bit of blue sky, and then said, with a great effort to lift his feelings: "If it is not Heaven yet, you've brought me to, Ma'am, it must be the very next door."
"Merry Christmas, Daddy Dougherty!" Merry Christmas!" shouted Teddy running in, followed by the other children.
"Why don't you speak to us," said Sissy, reaching up and touching the old man's face.
"I'm just tongue-tied with all this illegance said the old man, trying to smile.
Mrs. Christy wisely sent the children away, with the exception of Teddy, who seemed quite like a boy of twelve.
"Now, my little man," said Mrs. Christy, "you may help Maria, while I give you old friend a drink of the life-bee-tee; and if we work with a will, the daughter will find her Merry Christmas ready to welcome her."
The old, hard bed was taken down, and its straw mattress carried to the yard below, with the help of a lodger on the next floor, who was quite ready to lend a hand when she found what was going on, although she was not in the best of humors, because her old know Bill. But think of our wives and children at home. Would ye have us all perish?

Martin heard this conversation, and, putting his lips close to the wall, said, quietly, "Never mind, Bill. I know you would all have saved me if you could. I ain't sorry I brought you the warning. I'm going back to poor old Rosa. If you get out safely, bid goodbye for me to father and mother and little Eddie."

Then, turning away, he went to the stable where his mule was peacefully feeding at her stall, unconscious of any danger. Martin's lamp was still burning, and the smoke had not yet penetrated the wooden barriers between.

At first he felt in hopes he would be safe there. But gradually the noxious vapors forced their entrance. As he saw that suffocation must soon come he snatched a piece of board, and wrote with chalk the names of those that were dear to him.

As he wrote, memory brought their presence before him—his tender mother, who had kissed him such a loving good-bye in the morning, and had looked so proudly at him when he told of his promotion and the better wage he would be able to earn.
