"A difficulty, however, now presents itself. There is not stable room enough to house our engine stock, and no less than 20 or 30 engines are nightly exposed to the weather in the open air at Moncton. It has also been found impossible to effect the necessary repairs in the Government shops, as they are insufficient in size to receive the number of engines offering for repairs. I, therefore, propose to ask for an appropriation on capital account, to cover the cost of a full circle engine house at Moncton, an addition of 112 feet by 200 feet to the machine shops there, and some additional machinery. Unless those be provided, the engine power must suffer severely from exposure and from want of proper maintenance.

So the result is that, in order that we may force an artificial trade against the laws of nature, and carry this coal for nothing or next to nothing from the Lower Provinces, and sell it in Quebec or Montreal, we incur an annual loss on the working expenses of about $363,000, which the chief engineer attributes almost entirely to this coal traffic.

Mr. DICKEY. Will the hon. gentleman read the portion of the report which states that this is due to the coal traffic?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I read it before—

"For several years past I have drawn attention in the annual report to the extremely low rate at which this coal is carried, and there can be no doubt that it is one of the chief causes of the annual deficit."

That is at page 26. He follows up that statement with the other statement which I have given. When I was interrupted by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey), I was saying that this enormous sum of $363,000 deficit on working expenses is mainly chargeable to that fact, but last year they expended also $428,000 in the construction of rolling stock, a large portion of which is also chargeable to this carriage of coal, and in addition to this, they have to provide what the chief superintendent calls "stable room" for this rolling stock; so you find that we have $500,000 paid out for rolling stock alone, the larger portion of which is chargeable to this policy of carrying coal at non-paying rates. Therefore, I think the country is paying pretty dearly for the Springfield coal mines. I think it would be better to buy out the whole Springfield mines, to pay all the shareholders the value of their stock and to keep the men employed now in idleness for the rest of their lives. Why, this comes to nearly a million of money, adding the loss on the running expenses to the $500,000 we have to pay out for rolling stock which is properly chargeable to this cause. It makes over $900,000 during the last year, and I say the policy of the Government in continuing to carry that coal at non-paying rates cannot be defended. Still further, while we are incurring this enormous expenditure of rolling stock on the Intercolonial, we are at the same time spending millions in the construction of competing lines to destroy the trade of the Intercolonial. What will be the use of the money we are spending on that road and on the rolling stock when we know that the freight will naturally go by the shortest route, so that the Intercolonial will be kept up for the use of the Springhill coal mines, and for that only. I suppose that some day we will have a proposition made to present the Intercolonial to the Springhill coal owners. It seems to be run in their interests now, and the result is that an increase in the coal traffic is not a blessing but a curse to the country, because the more they carry the greater is the loss. I submit these figures to show that the Government, when they reconsidered their policy and revised their rates, and stopped making this difficulty, took a very wise course; and it appears there was political influence enough on the benches behind the Government to compel them to alter their course. It was stated here this afternoon that the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) kicked hard, that he would not come into the traces at all, until they went back to the old system and revised the rate to what it is now, $\frac{3}{10}$ of a cent per ton per mile. I have asked a number of engineers and others engaged in railway operations about this matter, and I don't think that in any other part of the world a parallel can be produced where a railway carries coal, or a bulky article like coal, at anything like the ruinous rate at which they have been carrying coal from the Springhill mines.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is a matter connected with my county about which I want to make some observations. I moved for some papers in connection with two or three claims that some of my constituents have on the Derby branch of the Intercolonial Railway; and I stated sometime ago when I withdrew four of these notices, that some of these matters had been settled and in three more a sum was offered which my constituents refused to accept. With respect to four of these cases, they are settled, and I have nothing more to say; but I want to say this in reference to the case of Mr. George Knight. Mr. Knight had a living spring and brook which took its rise on the side of a hill just in front of his house, and ran from there towards the river, within about one-eighth of a mile, or thereabouts, of the Derby branch of the Intercolonial Railway. The authorities of the Intercolonial came and took that man's spring and built a tank over it and absorbed the whole of it, covering up the brook through his meadow for about one-eighth of a mile, and they have refused to pay him any damages for it. Mr. Knight claimed $2,000.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh!

Mr. MITCHELL. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but I tell you it is not a small thing for a farmer who keeps a large stock of cattle and horses, to have to drive them in the winter season one-eighth of a mile to the river, and cut a hole in the ice where they may drink. In the course of that operation one of his cows slipped on the ice and he lost her. Hon. gentlemen may laugh at that kind of a thing. It is very easy for my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), who is getting all he wants done, railways built here and there and everywhere, getting the ear of the Government in such a way that he can get anything settled that he wants. But in the case of Mr. Knight his spring was entirely taken away from him, and he is put to great inconvenience for the want of it. The Government offered him $50 for his land damages and for taking away his spring and brook. I hold that was entirely unreasonable. The other day the right hon. gentleman referred these matters to the Minister of Public Works to confer with me with a view to settlement, and I thought that Mr. Knight ought to accept $500. The Minister of Public Works, with Mr. Schreiber, thought that $250 was enough. Now, Sir, I know that $250 is not enough. I consented to make the offer to Mr. Knight, and I wrote to him telling him I had done the best I could, and suggesting that rather than have a law suit in the Exchequer Court, he had better accept it. He wrote me back saying that he would lose the whole money before he would accept it. I think he is fairly entitled to get remuneration to the extent of $500, and in my opinion the man has been damaged to a greater extent than that for the reason that he has to drive his cattle during the whole winter season once or twice a day, down to the river where he has to cut a hole in the ice in order that they may drink. If the gentleman who controls that railway saw this man driving his cattle in the winter time down to the river, as I have seen farmers do, I think he would not have been so hard about it. The fact of the matter is that Mr. Schreiber, who controls this railway, is as hard as flint. He has no consideration for these poor people at all. All he cares about is to save a few dollars for the Government. I think that the right hon. gentleman will do well to reconsider this case, and to ask his acting Deputy Minister of Public Works again to look into the matter, and to see whether the statement that I am making is correct, as I know it to be, and I think he will agree that the man is fairly entitled to $500 for the damages he has sustained. Then with regard to another case, that of George R. Parker. I have not the evidence so clear about that. Mr. Parker states to me that the sum of $200 which has been paid him, and for which they have taken a receipt, is not for his land damages by the railway at all, but it is for damages to his house, which he had to move back and dig a new cellar, for which they gave him $200 as per contract. With regard to another case, that of Mr. Samuel Russell, we fixed upon a sum of $400 or $500. Mr. Russell declined to accept the $400. Mr. Schreiber has made a report upon it, in which he speaks of a receipt in full for claims and damages. Mr. Russell alleges that he never gave his receipt in full for any land damages. The receipt was for a contract job to do a certain work. I am not able to state that Mr. Russell is entitled to $2,000—I do not think he is entitled to that much—but I do think he is fairly entitled to $600 or $700 for the damages sustained. He keeps a store on the spot, with a public-house and a blacksmith shop, and they have stopped up all approach from the river to Mr. Russell's premises, and it will cost him $700 or $800 at least to make a landing, to say nothing of the damages he has sustained. Now, I would like the Minister either to give these three cases his personal attention, or to ask the Minister of Public Works to confer with the railway authorities in regard to them. There is another case, that of Thomas Flynn. When water was carried to the railway station at Newcastle they dug through the whole length of his farm, several acres, and threw up the shell rock and thus spoiled a considerable extent of land, and for this damage they never paid him a cent. The Government have since offered $100. I wrote telling him the offer, and he replied indignantly that he had lived thus far without the money, and if they could not give him something approaching the damage done he would lose the whole rather than accept that offer. That is the position of these four claims, and I desire the Premier to have them looked into and try to come to some arrangement with respect to them. With regard to the management of the Intercolonial Railway, I am not going to say anything about it just now. My views with respect to its management were so clearly laid before the House last year that I do not think it is worth while to occupy time in setting them forth now, particularly when such plain and frank statements have been made by the member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon), and the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) and, therefore, I will defer any remarks till later.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice in the Auditor General's accounts last year $38,000 charged for snow sheds and snow fences. It is a matter of surprise to me that on a road which has been operated so long it should be necessary to invest such a large sum for the purpose of erecting snow sheds and snow fences. It will be remembered that the statement was made by the Government two years ago that the line was well protected as regards snow sheds and they had been erected whenever required, and it was then stated that the appropriation then made was for snow sheds to take the place of sheds worn out. Last year there was charged to capital account $38,201 for snow sheds. Again, there is an item, heating and lighting cars, $21,000. I cannot understand how such an item can be charged to capital account. $24,000 was the appropriation, and $21,000 has been charged to capital account. The manner in which the Intercolonial Railway is handled is a matter of serious consideration to the people. When we consider the statements made by the member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) that the people are paying $2,500,000, between the amount we lose by operating the road and interest on the money invested in it, or about 50 cents per head for the entire population, and that from this expenditure we receive no return whatever, it is quite time the House should begin seriously to consider what is best to do with the line. No doubt, for political purposes, expenses have been made in all directions. No doubt expenses have been incurred only to better the condition of members sitting in this House, and money has been spent on building branches or lines which have been competitors to each other and which have run but a very short distance from each other. We will hear later something of the Oxford and New Glasgow line, but I will embrace the opportunity afforded in the Supplementary Estimates to deal with that whole question. When we consider all these facts, it is time the people should consider what course should be adopted in regard to this road. Over $47,000,000 are now sunk in it, and yearly we are adding to the capital account. When the late Government were in power they closed the capital account of the Intercolonial Railway, but the present Government reopened it, and have added to it yearly items such as I have been speaking of, snow fences, heating and lighting cars and even law expenses. I contend it is quite clear that a sufficient number of cars are not furnished for those worn out during each year, and this is apparent from the report of the Minister of Railways. Of first class cars there are altogether 69. Not one new one was added to take the place of those worn out. Of second class cars there are 76. Only one was put on the road and charged to working expenses. Of conductors' vans there are 79, and only one new one was placed on the road last year and charged to expenses. Of box cars there were 1,635 and only twenty new ones were put on the line and charged to running expenses, and the average life of a box car is nothing like that proportion. To the number of coal cars we have added 148. Here is an item which proves a matter of serious consequence, and that is the carriage of coal. We are quite willing, in order to assist those in love with the National Policy, to do everything possible to carry coal at reasonable rates; but when the Intercolonial Railway at the expense of the country is burdened with the carrying of coal in the interests of Springhill at an enormous loss, as is frankly admitted by the Chief Engineer of the department, it is high time to consider whether it would not be wise either to lease Springhill coal mine or make the Springhill company a present of the Intercolonial Railway if they agree to run it. It is quite clear to my mind, and I have listened to explanations during the last six years, that this is one of the Dominion's financial sinks of corruption and nothing else. It is on a par with Rideau Hall, and we shall have to have an investigation annually, for every year it is getting worse. In the interests of the people this House should closely investigate the expenditures connected with the road, and we should terminate the extravagance prevailing. I believe in some cases officials are employed and paid large salaries who, if traced up, would be found to be in many cases related to hon. gentlemen opposite. It is too bad to know that only one railway in the Dominion is owned by the Dominion, and that that line causes an annual loss of $2,500,000. I heard the Minister of Finance state a short time ago the indebtedness of the Australian colonies, and he said their per capita indebtedness is far in excess of ours. He did not tell us they owned their own railways and that the Australian colonies drew from the operation of their lines over $13,000,000 of clear profits a year after paying expenses, while we operate one line and have a deficit of nearly $3,000,000 annually. The evidence presented to this House of the extravagant way in which matters are handled on the Intercolonial Railway, the constantly increasing expenditure on capital account for items which should be charged to working expenses, furnish proof that the road is worked in the interests of a certain clique who are virtually sapping the life out of the line, for the maintenance of which the people are responsible. It is time this expenditure was stopped, and from year to year it is getting worse. Every year some new recommendation is brought down for a large sum to purchase rolling stock or make terminal improvements or the construction of additional or branch lines. There is some particular constituency that is thought to be not quite safe. In order to make it all right some additional sum has got to be spent in order to build some branch lines. Year after year we are adding to the mileage and to an expenditure which is virtually buried and from which we do not receive one dollar in return. I say that it is time to put a stop to this, and as far as I am concerned I shall always be ready to raise my voice—I do not care what Government is in power—against the continually increasing expenditure which is an actual loss. There is not a man in this House who, if he were conducting his own private business, would conduct it in the way which we are managing the business of the country here. We admitted that at the time of Confederation it was necessary to build the road. It was considered as a Dominion line and a necessity, in order to give us an independent outlet to the seaboard, but the very moment that line was built we should have closed the capital account and never opened it. When the people of any sections of that country wanted to get branches built they should have done it in the same way that the people in the western part of Canada do it. Look at the Oxford and New Glasgow Railway which has cost the country $1,600,000 for the purpose of accommodating three counties, because those counties are represented in this House by strong supporters of the Government. I notice that there is a considerable amount yet to be spent in order to complete that railway, and we will give more attention to that when we come to the Supplementary Estimates. I say that it is time we should put a stop to this system, and whoever else does not I shall at all events protest against it.

Mr. ELLIS. I will not say the hard things which my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) says about the Government with regard to the Intercolonial Railway, if they will make an effort to meet the commercial requirements of the people of Halifax and St. John at the termini of the road. That effort has not been made at all. The complaint made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) and endorsed by the hon. member opposite (Mr. Kenny) is, that the management of the road is so far removed from the centres of the population along the line that there is no convenient way of approaching the management. If Mr. Schreiber happens to be any distance from Ottawa, or if he happens to be in Ottawa and not in a mood to attend to the business of the railway, it would seem to be apparent to the people of St. John, at any rate, that he does not attend to it. The persons who represent him at Moncton have to await his will and pleasure, or to await his making up his mind on a question, and very often great delay occurs when important questions are put to them with regard to the management of the road. Again, at Halifax and St. John there are no agents of the road in the sense of persons able to make any contract or to take up any representative position with regard to giving freight rates, or making arrangements such as ought to be made in large cities. Now, Sir, it does appear that the deficit of the road increases in a larger proportion year by year as the receipts increase The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) has pointed out that certain American railways are carrying coal at three-tenths of a cent per ton per mile and I presume they are making a profit. If that be so why cannot the Government of Canada make a profit on the coal that is carried on their railway. One reason of that I think is the enormous expense of the superior management of the road. There are too many officials and there is too much expense for management which does not directly reach the running of the railway. I will call your attention to this fact. In the year 1886 the loss on the running of the Intercolonial Railway alone was $106,042, and the total loss including the Eastern Extension and the Prince Edward Island Road was $190,637. In 1887 the loss on the Intercolonial Railway was $232,105 and including the Eastern Extension and Prince Edward Island Road the total loss was $311,901. In 1888 the loss on the Intercolonial Railway was $363,657 (the loss on the Intercolonial Railway has just doubled in two years) and the total loss including the Eastern Extension and Prince Edward Island Railway was $454,823. The total loss on the Intercolonial Railway in three years in the running expenses was $701,694 and on all the Government railways in the Maritime Provinces it was $956,461. Now if the statement is correct which the hon. the Minister of Finance put forward—and he put it forward with considerable effect in his Budget speech—that there was a constant growth of trade between the Provinces, why is it that with that increase of trade there is a constant increase of loss in the running of that road? It would seem to be a natural inference that if trade is increasing, the deficit at any rate should have decreased, but on the Intercolonial Railway the more business that appears to be done the greater the loss. It is not necessary, perhaps, to refer to the capital expenditure, but that has also increased $1,500,000 since 1885, and only twenty miles of railway have been added. In other words, the extent of road added has cost about $75,000 per mile. The stores account is most astonishing. We are told that in 1886 there were $719,660 worth of stores on hand; in 1887, $678,109; and in 1888, $498,634 worth of stores on hand. I did not look into the accounts sufficiently to find out myself, but I would like to know, if the Minister of Finance is good enough to tell me, if this decrease in stores is to be added to the deficit of the running expenses of the road.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not to be added to the running expenses.

Mr. ELLIS. I desire to say that it is the general impression—of course I do not know it myself—but it is the general impression of persons who know about this railway, that there is nothing like that amount of stores on hand, and that there is no inventory of the stores taken at the time that the financial auditor audits the books. I do not know whether that is true or not, but that is the general impression.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend had better not make such a statement unless he knows whether it is true or not, because those statements are damaging, so far as anything that can be said by the hon. gentleman is damaging. An inventory is taken regularly every year, yet my hon. friend states almost positively that no such inventory is taken.

Mr. ELLIS. Perhaps I have not made myself sufficiently clear. I have no doubt that somebody on the part of the railway makes some inventory of the stores, and that that statement is sent in; but no independent person like the auditor who audits the accounts goes over these stores. The statement of the railway authorities has to be taken in the end, as well as whatever report they choose to make upon the value.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a responsible officer who does it.

Mr. ELLIS. Now, Sir, with regard to the business of the road. Last fall, the Board of Trade of St. John, or some members of it together with a gentleman who sits in this House, made an effort to have a lumber business created between Bathurst and St. John. They endeavored to send down the lumber that was frozen in on the northern rivers to the port of St. John to be shipped there. But the rates which the manager of the railway proposed to charge were so high that this trade could not be carried on at all, and no business could be done. If you apply the coal rates to the lumber it should have been carried for about seven dollars a carload of 20,000 lbs, but the management of the Intercolonial Railway would not carry it for less than $20. If it is proposed to do business, surely better rates could be given than that. Why carry coal for three-tenths of a cent per mile and charge three times as much for carrying lumber. I grant that the short distance would make a difference, but it ought not to make such a difference as that, if trade is to be developed. It is a common report, I cannot speak for its truth myself, that a cargo of sugar was landed at St. John, to be carried over the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal; but the rates were so high that the owner found it to his advantage to load up his sugar on the American steamers of the International Line at St. John, carry it to Boston, reship it at Boston on the American railway, and carry it by that route to Montreal; and the street rumor, at any rate, was that he saved $3,000 by the transaction on the rates offered by the Intercolonial Railway. I do not blame the Government for these things; I trust that they will understand that I am simply speaking in the interest of the business community which I represent, so that opportunities may be afforded to us of making this road more available than it is at present. I would like to ask what kind of rolling stock the present vote is for?

Mr. FOSTER. It is to provide cars for the summer travel to Cape Breton and also from Quebec to Cacouna—three first class cars—and to fit them up with chairs, which is believed to be an economical way of providing parlor cars.

Mr. ELLIS. There was a vote last year for iron snow sheds. Have they been erected?

Mr. FOSTER. Three have been erected.

Mr. ELLIS. By whom were they built ?

Mr. FOSTER. Carrier & Lane built two, and Fleming & St. John built another.

Mr. ELLIS. I trust that the First Minister, who has charge of railway matters now, will be able to give the subject some attention himself. I am satisfied that he feels enough interest in the city of St. John to do what he can to promote its welfare. If he were in contact with the people for three or four days, he would find that a large amount of dissatisfaction exists, not only among opponents of the Government, but among all who are desirous that the trade of the city should be increased, and they find the condition of the railway a stumbling block in the way of the carrying trade.

Extension along city front at St. John, upon condition that the city provide the right of way and other necessary lands, free of charge, and assume all liability for claims for damage by reason of the track running along the street, both as regards damage to property or person or otherwise.....	$17,000

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. These conditions seemed hard and fast, and it is thought expedient to alter them, as reference would have to be made to Parliament before any portion of the money could be expended. So I would suggest that it should read thus:

"Extension along city front at St. John, subject to such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may authorise and impose."

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I would ask the hon. gentleman whether it is not his intention to insert some amount for a similar purpose at Charlottetown. He was waited on by a deputation from the Board of Trade, who asked the Government to extend the railway along the wharves at Charlottetown, and he said he would take the matter into consideration; but I see nothing in the Estimates for the Prince Edward Island Railway at all. I know that the line has been extended as far as the Steam Navigation Company's wharf, and the Government have already expropriated the lands.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Representations have been made on that subject. It is under consideration, and I have no doubt the hon. gentleman will see, when the Supplementary Estimates for next year are brought down, whether Charlottetown is not taken care of.

Increased accommodation at St. John.....	$25,000

Mr. ELLIS. Would the Finance Minister be good enough to tell us what this is for ?

Mr. FOSTER. The object is to purchase a piece of land at the Mill street entrance to the St. John station yard, to give increased yard accommodation.

Mr. ELLIS. The hon. Minister of Finance, in his Budget speech, quoted a great deal from the report of the Labor Commission, but we have not yet had that document before the Committee. I recollect that, in the evidence taken, it was shown that a great many employés of the railway got something like $1.50 a day, and have to work something like sixteen or eighteen hours a day. I would be glad, notwithstanding the expense of the road, if something could be taken from the salaries of the higher officials and added to the pay of these men. A good many of them live in King's and some of them live out of the town a little. There is certainly ground of complaint among the employés that they are not sufficiently paid. I do not know if the increased accommodation which my hon. colleague referred to, will afford to the St. John hackmen any relief. The railway broke faith, and that was the worst feature of the whole affair. These hackmen went upon a strike, and did not go to the station for about a week, which caused a great deal of inconvenience to travellers. The agent of the road, Mr. Wallace, came to St. John and made them a promise, and when Mr. Schreiber was called upon to fulfil the promise, he wrote an impertinent letter to the mayor. I think some accommodation should be afforded to these men. They only want a little shelter, and I think it should be given them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will see about it.

Mr. CAMPBELL There is another matter to which I should like to call the attention of the House. I had occasion to call attention to it last year slightly. I refer to the rates on the Intercolonial Railway for carrying flour. We, of course, all want to see the Intercolonial Railway pay. It has cost a large amount of money, and the deficit now amounts to a very large sum, and if we can suggest any way by which the deficit can be decreased it is only right that we should do so. About 100,000 barrels of flour go into Prince Edward Island every year, and nearly every barrel goes from western Ontario down to Charlottetown and Summerside vid Boston, and I believe if proper arrangements were made all that flour would be sent down to Charlottetown and Summerside by the Intercolonial Railway. The rate from Chatham, Ontario, to Halifax all last summer, and nearly the whole of this winter, was a net rate of 48 cents per barrel. Now the rate to Point Duchesne and to Pictou Landing was 58 cents a barrrel, with an additional 7 cents to take it over. That made 65 cents a barrel to Charlottetown, or about 15 cents a barrel higher than the rate vid Boston. The point I wish to make is this: If the same rate were applied to Pictou Landing that is given to Halifax, viz., 48 cents per barrel, and then if the flour were brought over for 5 cents, making 53 cents against 50 cents vid Boston, that would ensure nearly every barrel going over the Intercolonial. If you can carry flour to Halifax for 48 cents, there is no reason why you cannot carry it to Point Duchesne or Pictou Landing at the same rate, and you have the steamers running from those points to Charlottetown and Summerside. It would be better for these steamers to carry the flour at 5 cents a barrel and give employment to our own men rather than have our steamers empty and receive the flour by Boston. Now, every Saturday, can be seen steamers leaving Boston loaded down with Canadian flour going into Prince Edward Island. It would be a good thing if the system I recommend were inaugurated and the country receive the benefit of the freight which would amount to 800 cars annually. There is another thing which I think very unfair. The rate from Chatham to Dalhousie, Campbellton, and Newcastle, New Brunswick, is 75 cents per barrel; to Moncton and St. John it is 58 cents, and to Oxford Amherst, Shubenacadie and Stellarton the rate is 75 cents; while to Halifax the rate is down to 48 cents. Surely, if you can carry flour to Halifax at 48 cents a barrel you ought not to charge on 300 miles of a shorter haul 75 cents. I admit it is necessary to have a low rate to Halifax and St. John, in order to compete with the Boston route, but the rates charged to these inland points seem altogether too high. If you can carry at a profit, as I suppose you can, to Halifax, for 48 cents, there is no reason why you should charge the miners in the coal mines and the fishermen around the Baie des Chaleurs 27 cents a barrel more than you charge to Halifax. The differences are altogether too great. I hope the hon. the Minister will see the desirability of adopting such rates as will ensure the transport of flour required for Prince Edward Island over our own transcontinental line, and I have no doubt an arrangement can be made which will ensure this traffic to our own line.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I see in the Auditor General's Report an entry of "Chapman Estate, land expropriated, $240,000." Where is that ?

Mr. FOSTER. At Lévis.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) has referred to the freight on flour. I do not object to the rate on flour, which, I suppose, is based on an estimate of what it can be carried at. What I desire to bring to notice is the general complaint in Halifax that the western millers have an advantage over our own importers in this respect, that they are allowed to keep their flour in the cars or at the depot for 30 days. The idea originated from the practice adopted in Boston. It was there intended to hold the flour for a certain time for exportation, and it was found necessary to give the sea board flour a longer time than the local importers, but that does not apply to Halifax at all. There is no export from Halifax, and it is not right that the millers of the west should be allowed to keep their flour 30 days at the depot, whereas the importers at Halifax have to move it in 48 hours. That practice should be put an end to.

Mr. KENNY. My. hon. friend knows that this privilege is confined to those who send the flour abroad. A privilege is given to those who have the flour there to remove it within 48 hours, unless they export it, it may be to Lunenburg or to Liverpool. I am told that, as my hon. friend (Mr. Jones) says, the privilege is sometimes abused, but the object of the provision was to encourage the shipping of flour over the Intercolonial road.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). That may be correct, but the practice which applies in regard to an American port does not apply in regard to a shipment along our own coasts. I doubt if such a construction can properly be placed upon the regulation in regard to foreign shipment. Export means export out of this country.

Mr. KENNY. As far as the Intercolonial Railway is concerned, export means shipping by water.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Export must refer to anything shipped out of the country, and in this respect the millers have been granted a privilege which I think should be discontinued.

Cape Breton Railway..... $1,100,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Perhaps the Minister will let that stand. I believe the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn), who is not very well, desires to speak on that subject. He intended to speak before going into Committee of Supply, but he did not desire to delay the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Why can it not be discussed on Concurrence?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That would not facilitate the matter. The hon. gentleman has some observations which he is very desirous to make, and it will not delay the Committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman ought be here.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He was here, and intended to speak before we went into Supply, but he was not very well.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If we are going to get through the Session this summer we will have to make a little more progress than we have to-day. With all deference to the hon. gentleman, I never saw, in all my experience, in any one day, such a waste of time as there has been to-day.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I must say, in reference to the hon. gentleman's remark, that I doubt if any single subject has come before the House for discussion for many a day which was more deserving of consideration and debate than the monstrous waste of money which has taken place on the Intercolonial Railway. We have had, I believe, less satisfaction for the $47,000,000 that we have spent upon that road than for our expenditure on any other work.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am told that the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn) is out in the lobby. The fact is that he does not want to speak at this time of the night.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I cannot see that the time has been wasted in this discussion. I think we were entitled, in regard to so serious a matter, to have had some plan or proposal of the Government placed before us to put an end to the extraordinary excess of expense over income on that road, but we have not had a word from the Government on that subject.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The reason has been given that the business has been increasing and the revenue decreasing. The tariff has been steadily year by year reduced for the great object of encouraging trade along that road, and especially inter-provincial trade. There has been a steady reduction of rates. How can we expect that it will be otherwise? It is true that the hon. member from Charlottetown (Mr. Davies) said we were criminally liable for carrying coal at these rates.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not think I used the word "criminally."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD He said it was a criminal waste of money to carry coal at three-tenths of a cent per ton. Another gentleman who sits on the same side says: It is true that coal is carried too low, and I think that the road should pay, but at the same time I think the rates on lumber are too high. Another says: I think the road ought to pay, but I think the rate on flour is too high. There is a continual pressure brought from all sides to keep down the rates of freight, and that is a reason why there is a steady increase of expenditure because there is more work done and it is not done at remunerative prices. We must have one policy or the other. We must either work that road as a commercial company would, and only consider what would pay; or we must consider it a portion of the great national highway connecting the Provinces, and built for the purpose of being the link between the Maritime Provinces and old Canada. We must either treat it as a work uniting the Provinces more closely and keep down the rates of freight, and make no profit upon it, or we must adopt the plan of a private company and put on rates such as would make the road as prosperous as possible.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Surely the Minister will see that there is a totally good and broad distinction between carrying goods at the bare cost price, which might be excusable under some circumstances, and favoring a particular industry belonging to particular private individuals, and conveying goods at a dead loss, as is the case in regard to this coal. In the latter case, you must charge more on other goods, and the whole contention to-day has been that, in conveying this coal as we now do, we are conveying it at a dead loss, and at a cost to the rest of the country which is a gross injustice.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no doubt that this is not a paying rate, but, as the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) has stated, it has been kept to that rate instead of being raised, because it was found that the railways from Pennsylvania to Massena were carrying coal at such a rate that, if our rate were raised, it would result in bringing in American coal, and would cut off the increasing trade between the Nova Scotia mines and Canada. It would simply transfer the coal trade from Nova Scotia to the Pennsylvania mines. As to the statement that it is unfair to encourage one industry specially, and that in this way the rates are raised on others, I must say that I do not think any rate is too high. The Intercolonial Railway receives only $\frac{2\frac{3}{4}}{100}$ of a cent per mile for the flour going to Halifax, which is not a paying rate at all. The hon. gentleman from Kent (Mr. Campbell) says that is true, and the rate ought to be put down low at Halifax and St. John in order to compete with Boston. In order to give the trade to our own railway, there is a rebate at Halifax and St. John, and, therefore, the question is not whether the same rate should be allowed on the whole line, but simply whether at all the intermediate points a reasonable rate is charged. On the other portions of the line there is not the same reason for granting this special rebate as there is for the great ports of Halifax and St. John. But looking at it from a commercial point of view, freight don't pay at all on the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. LAURIER. That shows conclusively that we cannot legislate against geography, and we had better have reciprocity.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would like the hon. gentleman to say when the same principle does not apply to the carriage of flour which goes to Prince Edward Island. There are about 200,000 barrels of flour going there yearly, which now goes by way of Boston; whereas, if you allow flour going to Charlottetown to go at the same rates of carriage as to Halifax and St. John, the cars which now come back empty, would carry that flour at a profit.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is a point worth consideration.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like the hon. gentleman to say why the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, that undertakes to regulate the rates of other roads, does not apply the rates that are fixed on other railways to the Intercolonial Railway. It seems to me that might be done until the road pays, and then if the Government chooses to run the road without profit, but at the same time without loss, the rates could be reduced.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think every miller in the Province of Ontario, including those of Bothwell, would protest against that doctrine. They have got now the supply of flour for the Maritime Provinces, and if my hon. friend succeeded in raising the rates for commercial purposes only, our millers would raise such a storm that even my hon. friend would feel himself bound to yield.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What quantity of coal is taken from Springhill to Quebec and Montreal?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. About 200,000 tons.

Mr. KIRK. The hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) before recess spoke of a matter to which I wish again to draw the attention of the Government, and that is the matter of operating the Eastern Extension as a separate road from the Intercolonial Railway. The result is, as the hon. member for Halifax said, to make it very much more expensive for those doing business on the Eastern Extension Railway, and it gives an advantage at any rate to Halifax over the Eastern Extension towns. For instance, flour, as has been mentioned by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), is carried from Chatham, Ont., to Halifax for 48 cents per barrel, but it costs 80 cents to take it to Antigonish, which is the station that is used by the section of the country from which I come. Now, Halifax and Antigonish are competing points for the flour trade for the eastern section of the country, and you are giving Halifax an advantage over Antigonish which is sufficient to destroy altogether the trade of the latter place. The rates are so much higher east of Halifax on the Eastern Extension, that I believe there is no flour at all taken east of Antigonish by the Intercolonial Railway. I believe the flour nearly all goes by the way of Boston for points east of Halifax; therefore, I think the Intercolonial Railway and Eastern Extension is losing a very large trade in consequence of the discrepancy with respect to flour and other articles. There is another difficulty which, I think, might be obviated if this railway was operated as one road. Passengers coming west from Antigonish can only get tickets to New Glasgow, where they have to renew, and I do not think that is a state of affairs that ought to exist.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Nobody has a better business capacity than the First Minister when he chooses to apply himself to business, which he does not very often do. Now, as I understand, we convey from the Springhill colliery 200,000 tons of coal at $\frac{3}{10}$ of a cent per ton per mile, and the enquiries I have made tend to show that $\frac{5}{10}$ of a cent per ton per mile, which is about the rate at which English railways carry coal, is the lowest rate at which it can be carried, so that on every single ton that we carry we loose $\frac{1}{5}$ of a cent per ton per mile. Now, if the hon. gentleman will make a calculation he will find that as we convey that coal 600 miles, or thereabouts, on the Intercolonial Railway, loosing $1.20 on every ton, the keeping up of this colliery costs this country $240,000 a year, not speaking of the rolling stock and all the rest of it. Now, I doubt whether it can be maintained that you sustain more than 500 miners in getting that coal out.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It has made a town of between 6,000 and 7,000 inhabitants. There were only 1,200 before.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We cannot afford to pay a quarter of a million to build up a town of 6,000 or 7,000 people. Moreover there was a town there long ago.

Mr. AMYOT. There is a good way of making the Intercolonial Railway pay and that is to connect it with the system of railways north of the St. Lawrence. I do not pretend that we should throw millions into the hands of a private company. I do not say that those who subscribe a few thousands should receive millions from the Government. I think the Government should complete the Intercolonial Railway by connecting it with other systems of railway, when the commerce of the Intercolonial Railway could be doubled. I do not speak only for the interest of Quebec, which no doubt would be benefited if the bridge were built, but I speak of the interest of the Dominion. We talk of the Intercolonial Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway as making one line from ocean to ocean, which is perfectly true, except that at Quebec the communication is broken. I do not mean to say that private companies should make fortunes out of the Government under that pretext. Those who favor the bridge should be proprietors of the bridge, but even supposing it should cost a few millions, that would amount to nothing compared with the importance of the work.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Is this a final sum for the Cape Breton Railway?

Mr. FOSTER. It is to complete.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). When is it likely to be opened?

Mr. FOSTER. It will be completed, I think, in October next.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What has been the total cost?

Mr. FOSTER. Up to the 1st January, 1889, $1,500,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How much of the $800,000 remains unspent?

Mr. FOSTER. Most of the $800,000 is spent.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). There has been $2,500,000 voted. This vote of $400,000 for the construction of a bridge over the Narrows is in some respects to be regretted. Look at its position at this point of Bras d'Or Lake. We have spent a considerable sum in building the St. Peter's Canal, and by Mr. Hyndman's report it appears that on some days from 60 to 70 vessels pass through that canal and down the lake, besides steamers, this navigation taking place from the middle of May to 31st December. This bridge is contemplated to be 1,800 feet long. Does not the Minister think it would be a very serious inconvenience to the trade at that portion of the lake to have a drawbridge, when from sixty to seventy vessels are passing through each day. I am not speaking now with respect to the location of the road. There is some difference of opinion with regard to the location, it being thought by some that the road is not properly located. On that question I will not enter, as I believe it will be discussed by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn), but it involves the placing of a bridge across the Narrows, where there is so much shipping, and the Government should hesitate before placing a bridge there. It would have been better to have had a ferry there than a bridge. I have received letters from the American Bridge Company, complaining of want of facilities for obtaining information respecting this bridge, and they have the idea that it is the determination of the Government to give the work to the Bridge Company in Montreal. Whether that is so or not, I cannot say; but I am reminded by the bridge company and its agent in Halifax, that when the large expenditure of money for iron bridges was made in Nova Scotia, from $400,000 to $500,000, under the Act for that purpose, all those contracts, when open for competition, were taken by the American company at prices under those of the Montreal Company; and, therefore, I think it would be a pity if any obstacles were placed in the way of the American company competing for the work. That is the impression they entertain with respect to the matter, and if it is a fact, it is much to be deprecated, especially if that company could build the bridge for less than the Montreal company. I do not say such is the case, but such is represented to me. I repeat that the Government should hesitate before erecting a bridge at that point where it will prove a serious impediment to navigation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is a general consensus of opinion that a bridge is the best means of connecting the two ends of the railway at the Narrows. The hon. gentleman quite understands that wherever there has been an attempt to perform the service by ferry, even by railway steamers with cars on board, it has always been found unsatisfactory, and it has been changed to a fixed road with a permanent bridge. The hon. gentleman may remember when the cars crossed the Susquehanna by ferry, and we now find the Grand Trunk building a tunnel at River St. Clair in order to get across the river, although they have a very complete system of steam ferries. At the Narrows there is a very high tide and in winter there is a good deal of ice, and altogether there is no certainty of continuous transport. There is such an uncertainty that there, by universal consent, as in other places, a bridge is preferable. There is no chance of there being an interruption of trade from the bridge. The draw is 100 feet wide, the vessels are all small, and there will not be any difficulty in their getting through, and the bridge when once built will be there for all time.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.). I am not going to discuss the location of the road, but I call attention to the fact that when Parliament was asked to vote a sum of money for the construction of a railway in Cape Breton, hon. members on this side of the House called attention to the fact that two or three routes had been proposed, and we insisted that before the money was voted the House should know what route would be adopted. One might cost $1,250,000, another nearly $2,000,000, and we insisted that it was monstrous to ask Parliament for a vote until the Government had come to a conclusion as to the route. The Government held that they could not do this, and gave the House no information; and the result has been pretty much as it has been in all railways constructed in the Maritime Provinces during the last three or four years. When the Government came down with the vote for the construction of the railway they said it was their intention to have a steam ferry at the Narrows, and there would be no bridge. As time went on they lengthened the contemplated line from 75 or 76 miles at a probable cost of $1,400,000 to a distance of 98 miles, which at $20,000 a mile, which was the estimate, would give about $2,000,000, without the cost of the bridge. The chief engineer in his report stated:

"The present proposition is to cross the Grand Narrows by a steam train ferry, and to this end preparations are being made, but it may be worth considering whether or not a steel bridge resting on iron cylinders filled with concrete would not be preferable. The length of such a structure would be 1,600 feet."

The Government have adopted that suggestion and Parliament is about to involve an expenditure of $400,000 for the construction of a bridge in addition to the $2,000,000, which the rest of the road is going to cost. In fact, this road in Cape Breton, which, according to the estimates brought down, would cost $1,250,000, is going to cost $3,000,000. An hon. gentleman says it will cost $4,000,000. He is better acquainted with the road than I am, but I am taking the figures of the chief engineer, $20,000 a mile, and the cost of the bridge as estimated to-night, and they come to pretty nearly $3,000,000. I say this Parliament should be very chary and very careful of voting sums of money for the construction of railways in the manner they have done heretofore, unless they know that the line has been surveyed and fixed and an estimate made of the approximate cost. It is perfectly monstrous the way in which those roads are constructed in different parts of the Dominion. You have the authority of the Minister with reference to the line and gentlemen who do not understand the location assume that he is acting on some data to justify his statement that this road is going to cost a million, but next year another million is asked and sometime afterwards another half million, and so it goes on until the road that was to cost a million dollars will cost three millions. I would ask the hon. gentleman if the construction of this iron bridge is not going to interfere with navigation?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONADD. No; it does not.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) If it does not interfere with navigation well and good, but I am under the impression that it will to some extent.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; it will not. The crafts are all small. The hon. gentleman has been there himself and he knows.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). If this bridge does interfere with navigation it will be necessary to take power to build it by statute, because if it interferes it would be a nuisance and could be abated; and any steamer and any vessel going there and being interfered with can have the nuisance abated and taken down. The right of navigation is a paramount right, and the Governor in Council has no more power than I have to order that bridge to be built if it will interfere with navigation. He must have the authority of Parliament to build it in such a case. That is the reason why I have called the attention of the Government to this. My only object was to point out to Parliament that this is another of those roads in which Parliament has been misled to vote money on the erroneous statement made by the Minister.

Mr. FLYNN. It was my intention this evening to deal with the whole question of the railroad in the Island of Cape Breton and particularly with reference to this vote for a bridge to cross the Narrows. I waited till after ten o'clock for an opportunity of doing so, but finding that this discussion on the Intercolonial Railway was to occupy so long a time I felt that I would not do justice to the question or to those interested if I undertook to discuss it at this late hour. I requested the leader of the Opposition to ask to have this particular item stand to some other time, but the Premier did not see his way to do so, and why he did not concede the request on this occasion I am at a loss to know. It is useless to say that the construction of this bridge across the Narrows will not obstruct the navigation to the lake. I am prepared to prove that and I think that I will convince this House (and I will take the earliest opportunity of bringing the matter forward) that this bridge will obstruct navigation. I very seldom ask any favor from this House and I think it rather strange that the First Minister has not conceded my request to let this item stand. I intended to move an amendment to Supply if the item was reached at any seasonable hour, but I thought at so late an hour as 11 o'clock, I would not have time to treat the subject as it deserves.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman can speak on Concurrence, or move in Supply?

Mr. FLYNN. Why not leave the item stand?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The reason is that it is getting so late in the Session, and we must get through the Estimates.

Mr. FLYNN. It is only one item and would not make much difference. It could be passed afterwards.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman has every opportunity of speaking in Supply, and there will be no objection to that.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I would ask the hon. Minister if he has any estimate for this bridge, because I am given to understand that it will ultimately cost a much larger sum than is placed in this vote to-night. Have they taken tenders for the bridge?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Are the tenders accepted?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Who are the contractors?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Messrs Reid & Isbester.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What is the amount of the tender?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think it $515,000.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is that to fully complete the bridge?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. LISTER. Were there any other tenderers?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. LISTER. Does the hon. gentleman know who they were?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not from memory. There were several.

Mr. LISTER. Were Isbester & Reid the lowest tenderers?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Did the American Company tender?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I suppose they did not get the specification on which to make their tender?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; they did.

Mr. LISTER. May I ask why the lowest tender was not accepted?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Because there were good reasons for selecting those men.

Mr. LISTER. I suppose we ought to know what the reasons were.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will bring down the papers if the hon. gentleman wants them.

Mr. LISTER. I hold a communication in my hand from respectable and reputable contractors in this country, who were able, financially and in every way, to have carried out this contract if it had been awarded to them. They inform me in this letter that there were six tenderers, that their tender was lower than that of Isbester & Co., but that their tender was passed over and given to Isbester & Co. I refer to McMahon & Co. They say they have all the capital necessary and the plant to carry on the work. They were prepared to put up whatever security the Government might think proper to exact, but, without any reason or explanation, the contract was given to men who tendered for the work at a price higher than this company was prepared to do it. I ask the First Minister why their tender should be passed over and the contract given to others who tendered at a higher price?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will bring down the papers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the papers should be brought down long before Concurrence.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There will be no difficulty about that; I will bring them down on Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. LISTER. It is understood we can discuss this matter on Concurrence. I maintain that if we are to follow the principle of asking for tenders, and if people go to the trouble of investigating the whole matter and putting in a tender to the Government, then if their tender is quietly ignored and the contract awarded, not to the lowest, but to the highest tenderer, everything else being equal, you might just as well give the work without tenders at all.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is not so.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Can the hon. gentleman tell us from memory what is the difference between the tender that was accepted and the lowest tender?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; I cannot.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). When this appropriation was first proposed, I asked the Minister who had charge of the matter to give us an estimate of the cost, the plan of survey and the location of the road. He told us that there were two surveys under consideration. Now, when anyone looks at the map he will see that the line chosen by the Government will be a very long line, if Louisburg is the terminal point.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It does not go to Louisburg.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, it does not go there now. What is more, anyone who looks at the geography of the place will see that the road is located for two-thirds of the distance with a lake on either side, so that if there were a population on the Island, it would have no advantage from the road except at the two extremities. The road has been located where it interferes with navigation. When the Government undertake to locate a road like this, they should ask Parliament to sanction that location. Before Parliament gives its sanction to a work that will interfere with navigation, they find that it has been located and built, and they have no option but to accept the work which has already been done without their consent.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman tell us what has become of the great winter port of Canada, Louisburg? I was educated here into the belief that it was to be our great winter port. Sir Charles Tupper used to tell us that it was to be one of the termini—Port Moody or Vancouver was to be the terminus on one side of the continent and Louisburg on the other; and all the lines we have been voting money for during the past few years were to lead up to that harbor. Now it is abandoned, and there is nothing there but a little narrow gauge road from Sydney to Louisburg. Are we to unlearn all we have learned in the past few years about this winter port?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think Louisburg will vindicate its own character and reputation, if it is to be the great port which I believe it will be. The winter port at present is Sydney. There is an old road, I believe, between Sydney and Louisburg. I have very little doubt about the great start Cape Breton will take and the impetus to trade which will be given by the building of these roads there, and that Louisburg will vindicate itself, and that more than the anticipations held out by Sir Charles Tupper will be fulfilled.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. More than Sir Charles' expectations? Good gracious!

Oxford and New Glasgow Railway—construction. $300,000

Mr. FOSTER. This is to complete.

Mr. KIRK. When the Government asked Parliament to vote a sum of money to build this road, it was said to be in the interest of all eastern Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. It was said that it would shorten the distance for eastern Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island by 45 miles; but it turns out now, after the road has been built, that it does not shorten the distance one mile. We were told also that it was only going to cost $1,250,000 to build and equip this road; but we find that it has already cost $1,150,412, and we are now asked to vote $300,000 more. When this road was proposed, we who represented counties east of Pictou declaimed the idea of having charged to our counties an expenditure of something like $2,000,000, which we knew to be in the interest of the county of Pictou and the other two counties, Cumberland and Colchester, through which it alone passed; but Sir Charles Tupper, who was in the House at that time, convinced it that the road was not in the interest of Pictou alone, but in the interest of all eastern Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. He pointed out that the Intercolonial Railway formed two sides of a triangle, and that this road was to be the third side. He said:

"I can best illustrate to the House the position if I say that that corner of the chamber is New Glasgow, that corner is Oxford Junction, on the Intercolonial Railway, and that corner is Truro. At present the people of the whole of the eastern portion of Nova Scotia, the whole of the great county of Pictou, the county of Guysboro', the county of Antigonish, and the whole island of Cape Breton in addition, have, in order to reach Moncton in New Brunswick, to travel to Truro; and this intersection, taking the hypothenuse of seventy-five miles—that the construction of the road which I proposed to this Parliament to secure shortens the distance between the whole of that great portion of Nova Scotia and the rest of Canada by no less than from forty to forty-five miles, for every pound of freight and every passenger, that is carried. But that is not all, Sir. It brings the Pictou coal fields into communication with Canada, and gives them in distance an advantage of forty-five miles over that they now enjoy, in competing with the Springhill coal fields, which at present monopolise, to a great extent, the supply of the Intercolonial Railway and of these upper Provinces. I say, Sir, if there ever was a case presented to Parliament in which the interests—not of a section or of a small portion of the country, but the interests of the whole of this country—were involved, it was in that proposal to aid in the construction of those seventy-five miles of railway."

It was to make the distance from Moncton to New Glasgow 45 miles shorter, but it turns out, since the road has been built, that, according to the statement of the First Minister himself, and according to the Intercolonial Railway time table, that both roads are exactly the same length. The right hon. the First Minister, in answer to my question stated that the road from Oxford Junction to Pictou branch was 72 miles. He stated also that the Pictou branch was 15 miles. It is 15 miles from Pictou to Stellarton and three miles from Stellarton to New Glasgow. Now, the Short Line Railway does not tap the Pictou branch at Pictou, but about 14 miles from Stellarton; therefore, if you take 72 miles, the distance given by the First Minister, and 14 miles to Stellarton, and 3 miles to New Glasgow, you have 89 miles instead of 75. Then, the distance on the Intercolonial Railway from Oxford Junction to Truro is 46 miles, according to the time table. From Truro to New Glasgow is 43 miles, making 89 miles, so that the two roads are exactly the same length. How then is the hon. gentleman going to benefit Prince Edward Island or the great counties of Antigonish and Guysborough and all the eastern counties in Cape Breton, when all he has done is simply to spend money to accommodate the local interests of Cumberland, Colchester and Pictou. I claim that the Government have obtained a vote from Parliament by making false representations, and there ought, at least, to be some explanation. The money voted by Parliament was obtained on the representation that the road would shorten the distance, which it has not done.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I would like to ask the hon. Minister in what position the claim of the old company stands for the Oxford and New Glasgow road. When we discussed that question last night, the hon. gentleman in reply to the enquiry of the hon. member for Guysborough, said that so much money had been paid on the old account, but I suppose that was for the payment of laborers which we voted some time ago.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I presume so.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Has there been any settlement between the Government and the company?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is before the courts now.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Has any payment been made?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would just ask the hon. gentleman if he contradicts the statement made by my hon. friend that we were promised 45 miles shorter road, and as a matter of fact we have not gained a mile?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I neither admit nor deny it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is either true or false. I know the hon. gentleman is not familiar with these matters, but a serious imposition has been practiced on the House in getting us to vote this money.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will enquire into that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Surely the hon. gentleman knows that?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Indeed, I do not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman might be expected, as acting Minister of Railways, to know that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have only been acting for a short time, under the circumstances the hon. gentleman knows.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is a gentleman here who can explain the matter, and he must know that simple fact.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is 26 miles shorter by Pictou than by the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. KIRK. Where does the hon. gentleman get his figures? I have a time table in my hand.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have the information of the chief engineer.

Mr. KIRK. The information the hon. gentleman gave when I put the question was not what he has just stated.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The question is not how short it is to Pictou or New Glasgow. It is the road from Oxford Junction. Parliament was not asked to carry it to Pictou or to New Glasgow so as connect with the Eastern Extension. According to the mileage, given by the chief engineer in his own book, the lines are just as far apart, two miles from Oxford Junction to Brown's Point and from that to New Glasgow.

Mr. TUPPER. What are the grades?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E I) We are talking about the distances. The hon. gentleman is very anxious to get off distances into grades. Sir Charles Tupper said the distance was shorter by 45 miles, and the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) repeated the statement the other day. It turns out now that the line does not shorten the distance, but has been built solely for local purposes.

Mr. KIRK. There was no railway then to Pictou at all.

Mr. JONES (Halifax.) It is a matter of common regret that the Government should bring down their chief engineer to endeavor to mislead the House and that he should be a party to it. We have the right to expect from the servants of this country that when they come here to give information they should give it frankly, and no man knows better than the hon. gentleman that the road from Oxford Junction to Brown's Point is 72 miles, and to reach New Glasgow 17 miles, making 89 miles. The chief engineer knows these details and the Government should know that the distance from Oxford to Truro is 46 miles, and from Truro to New Glasgow 43 miles, making 89 miles in all. You may take 89 one way and 89 the other way, and there is no difference. But if you will only call it 15 miles, it only shortens the distance two miles, as stated by the hon. member for Prince Edward. This is only a sample of the misrepresentation which has characterised the railway expenditure of this country. This was brought down for the purpose of the Conservative interest in those counties, for the purpose of securing the return of the Government candidate, on the representation of the then Finance Minister, repeated lately by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that the road was going to shorten the distance 45 miles. If the statement of a Minister of the Crown is no more to be depended upon in this regard than some statements I have had occasion to characterise to-night, I think we have arrived at a very low state of public morality and honor. We have a right to expect that when the Government bring down a proposal for the building of a great public work they shall be in a position to place before the House information of a reliable character, and when they bring a proposal to construct a branch road for a political purpose, leading the House to suppose that it is going to shorten the distance, and open up the coal fields of Pictou and the West, that it is going to shorten that road 45 miles, when they must have known it would not shorten it two miles, it is a condition of affairs which is disgraceful to the country, and to those who proposed and defend this work. We have a right to know what the actual difference is, and to see for what our money has been expended. The Government cannot wriggle out of this, they know they are in a false position in regard to it, and if they would say so at once and ask for absolution, there is enough generosity on this side to let them out of that because we have let them out of a good many bad scrapes, and one or two more would not make a great difference.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to inform the House, having ascertained the information from the chief superintendent, whether the distance is shorter between Oxford and New Glasgow by the new road for which we are now voting this money?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That is a point we should know.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am told that the road is shortened, but only by seven miles.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We have the report of the chief engineer in Appendix No. 5, that the distance from Oxford Junction to Brown's Point is 67½ miles, leaving out the Pugwash Branch which is 4¾ miles. It is six miles from Brown's Point to New Glasgow, making 83½ miles. By the Intercolonial time table the distance between the two points by way of Truro is 89 miles, so that the reduction is only 5½ miles, and we have built five miles extra for the Pugwash Branch.

Intercolonial Railway—Repairs and Working Expenses..... $3,200,000

Mr. JONES (Halifax). There is a very large increase made here for locomotive power. Will the Minister explain whether this is intended to be for new stock or for working the road simply?

Mr. FOSTER. For working the road.

Fisheries..... $231,500

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It is very unfortunate that we have not had the report of the Minister of Fisheries brought down.

Mr. TUPPER. It will be laid on the Table on Monday, and I believe that is an earlier date than the report has been laid on the Table for many years; because, like some other departments, this one ends with the calendar year instead of the fiscal year.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Last year there was a discussion on this subject, and the then Minister explained that the report was delayed for reasons which would not occur again.

Mr. FOSTER. That was very late in the Session.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). We cannot discuss these items very intelligently without the Minister's report on the subject being before us. Can the Minister give us any further information as to the results of the fish-hatching establishments? Whether right or wrong—and I think my hon. colleague (Mr. Kenny) will bear me out in this—as far as we can learn from the experience in regard to the hatchery near Halifax, there has been no beneficial result flowing from it. That opinion has been very generally expressed, as I have heard, in regard to hatcheries in other places, and in regard to the hatchery near Halifax, those who profess to know have come to the conclusion that it is a complete failure. I am sorry that it is so. It was established by the Government of which I was a member under the impression that it would stock our rivers with salmon fry, but we cannot see that any advantage has resulted from it. The rivers where the spawn has been placed have not improved in proportion to the stock taken out of them. I may be referred, as I have been before, to the reports of the persons in charge of these hatcheries, and may be told that they think they are a success. I attach very little importance to reports from such interested quarters, because, of course, all those gentlemen are interested in saying that they are successful. I have had so many representations made to me in reference to the Halifax hatchery that it would take too long to explain them to-night. I understood that my hon. colleague had some persons in whom he had confidence visit that hatchery last summer, and that their report was in the same direction as I have stated, that no great advantage had been derived from it. This is no question of blaming or censuring the Government, but I think we have reached a point in this matter where we either ought to make a very important departure or to give it up altogether. I think it is evident that the fry are placed in the rivers either too early, or from some other reason, which prevents their being of the advantage which was expected. Under these circumstances I think the Government would do well to take the earliest opportunity of ascertaining from the United States and elsewhere what the result of their enquiries have been. At present, so far as I am aware—and I say it very regretfully, because no one is more interested than myself in seeing our fisheries increased all along our shores—I have received information from reliable sources that the fish hatchery at Halifax has been a failure.

Mr. KENNY. As my hon. friend has referred to me, I may mention that I am not in a position to express myself as emphatically as he has done with regard to the results of the Halifax hatchery. There is a great conflict of opinion as to the results of this expenditure. But it is a scientific and a technical question, of which I have no practical knowledge. My hon. colleague has referred to the fact that some friends of mine visited the Sackville River to inform themselves. I was aware of the circumstance, but that was not the object of their visit. I was requested to go there myself, but my health did not permit me do so. Their object was to see the working of some of the fishways and not what the hon. gentleman supposed.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Is it the intention to rebuild the fish hatchery at Dunk River, in Prince Edward Island?

Mr. TUPPER. No, not at present.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) If the hon. gentleman has come to the conclusion from evidence in his department that these fish hatcheries are beneficial, why does he not have one in Prince Edward Island?

Mr. TUPPER. We have a considerable number of hatcheries in Canada, and the cost of maintaining them is very great. There is considerable discussion in the country as to whether, after our 12 years of experience, we should increase or diminish these hatcheries. At the present time we have great facilities for removing the fry long distances, as we are doing now in some cases from Ontario to the lower Provinces. We have two hatcheries in Nova Scotia besides those in New Brunswick, and it did not seem proper to ask Parliament for a sum to repair the breaking away of the dam at the Dunk River hatchery, the results of which had not been sufficiently satisfactory to justify that course being taken. As for myself, I have not yet come to any definite opinion as to how this system has worked, although I have in my possession an immense amount of evidence which I have read, and which will be laid on the Table on Monday. The evidence I refer to is found in the report of the superintendent of the hatcheries, in which he reviews this question very elaborately from his standpoint, and he is an enthusiastic believer in them. In other countries they are going more extensively into fish breeding every year, particularly in the United States and in the mother country. They have been wonderfully successful in hatching shad on the Pacific coast; and fortunately for us, a great many of those that were hatched in the United States waters have found their way up the Fraser River to British Columbia. Although a great deal of the fry is lost altogether from one cause or another, the fisheries have been greatly aided from the hatcheries. A good argument has been adduced in behalf of the fish-breeding system which I may mention—I am dealing very generally with the subject from the nature of the position in which we stand just now—the argument is that while the rivers have been polluted to the great destruction of fish, our fisheries would have shown a far greater falling off had these hatcheries not been started. Of that, however, I am not very competent to judge. I shall certainly make it my business to consult with people, and investigate the matter during the recess.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I regret that the same thing happens this year that has always happened—we never have a dollar for fish-breeding in Prince Edward Island when these estimates go through. How many fish hatcheries are there in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick?

Mr. TUPPER. There are two in Nova Scotia—at Sidney and Bedford; one on the St. John River at Miramichi and one at Restigouche in New Brunswick; three in Quebec and two in Ontario.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does not the hon. gentleman think that the reason he gave just now for not rebuilding the dam at Dunk River applies exceedingly well to dispensing with three or four of the hatcheries in the Maritime Provinces? The fact is that one fish hatchery is quite sufficient for the whole of the Maritime Province, and the whole enormous expense might be saved. The facilities for carrying ova from one place to another are so great now that there is no difficulty about it.

Mr. KIRK. The Minister said there were two fish hatcheries in Nova Scotia and two in New Brunswick. I have been told that there is something called a fish hatchery on Harbor Lake, in the County of Antigonish. Have you another name for it?

Mr. TUPPER. Mr. Wilmot has constructed several huts at certain places in which he deposits the fry. They are cheap things, run up and left there until the next season, and not at all expensive. They are merely places in which he works with the fry.

Mr. EISENHAUER. How does the department distribute this fish over the different rivers?

Mr. TUPPER. Applications are sent in. Already a large number have been received this year, and this is about the time for distribution. The department endeavors to apportion the fry as fairly as possible in the different rivers that are considered suitable.

Mr. EISENHAUER. Has any been sent to Lahaie?

Mr. TUPPER. There is too much sawdust, I am afraid, just now.

Mr. EISENHAUER. I have not much faith in the benefit of these fishing hatcheries, because we have been allowing sawdust to get in the rivers for the last year or two. I think if the hatcheries are of so much benefit they should make up the loss of fish.

Mr. TUPPER. That is one of the arguments used by the advocates of hatcheries.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Has any fry been put into Lake St. Claire?

Mr. TUPPER. I cannot give the distribution throughout Ontario. All the applications have been received and have been scheduled, and the officers are now endeavoring to apportion the quantity of fish.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Please note Lake St. Claire.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman consider that one fish hatchery for the Maritime Provinces is quite sufficient to supply them?

Mr. TUPPER. As I intend to take up the subject I simply ask for the old vote. I dare not at present make a radical change in the system of carrying on the work and I am only asking Parliament to do what it has done for 12 years. In regard to the hatchery in question, there is an opportunity for making a halt before asking Parliament for a sum sufficient to enable me to put that place in order.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). The hon. gentleman said he did not intend to apply for more money because fish hatcheries were very expensive, and the distribution of fry could be made from other fish hatcheries.

Mr. TUPPER. And the results were not very satisfactory.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). Is the hon. gentleman prepared to say that one hatchery would supply all the wants of the Island?

Mr. TUPPER. It is claimed now that our hatcheries are not large enough, and are not as large as those hatcheries built in the United States.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Still you are going to supply all the Dominion with fry.

Mr. TUPPER. We are going to supply all we can.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then I understand we are going to suffer.

Mr. KIRK. Does the hon. gentleman find from the reports of his overseers that fish, such as salmon, are more abundant in the streams in consequence of the artificial propagation of fish?

Mr. TUPPER. There has no doubt been a decrease in the capture of salmon in late years. There are many causes to account for this; but the argument of those who speak with authority on the subject is that the decline would have been tenfold, or a thousandfold greater except for the valuable aid given by the fish hatcheries.

Mr. ELLIS. There was a statement published in a Miramichi newspaper that a few days after the deposit of a large quantity of fry in that vicinity there were large quantities in the water dead.

Mr. TUPPER. That occurs everywhere; some of the fry never reach any size or maturity. That even occurs with ordinary spawn.

Mr. KIRK. We ought soon to be able to tell whether this large expenditure on fish hatcheries is of any advantage or not. I have always supported the expenditure, and I am not opposing it now. The Minister of Justice has undertaken to propagate fish in a stream in his county, where, in a few years, the question will be thoroughly tested. If the fish can be propagated in that stream, where the Minister of Justice has built a fish-way, it will be evidence of the value of the work; but if there is a failure there, and I am watching it very closely, there will be failure anywhere.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In regard to the item of $100,000 for fishery protection steamers and vessels, I desire to ask whether the Minister thinks it necessary, now that we are again to have this year the modus vivendi to keep all these war steamers in commission?

Mr. TUPPER. We had the modus vivendi, in operation last year.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You had the cruisers.

Mr. TUPPER. We have not settled on the number of cruisers required this year, and I may say that none of them were chartered for more than one season. We are asking the same sum from Parliament, but it is a matter of precaution. We may not expend the whole of it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is it the intention to charter as many vessels?

Mr. TUPPER. I think we can do with a smaller number of sailing craft, if the present intention of the Government in connection with the utilisation of the Stanley is carried out.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). There is a cruiser called the Charles Tupper. I suppose she will be retained?

Mr. TUPPER. No; I am sorry to say she has gone to the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I). I think we might dispense with half the number of cruisers.

Mr. PLATT. What proportion of this amount goes for the protection of the fisheries in inland waters?

Mr. TUPPER. This amount of $100,000 is appropriated for those vessels which have been used in the protection of the fisheries, and we have at present a cruiser on the inland waters which is charged against this sum. It is for the protection of the very valuable fisheries in the great lakes and against poaching of every kind.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The hon. Minister has brought down a return, in response to a motion made by my colleague, with respect to fishing bounties paid on the Island. It was stated that some fishermen in Little Sands, whose names I gave to the Minister at that time, were refused their fishing bounties on account of having done lobster fishing, and that, therefore, they could not have been engaged in the deep sea fishing. I wish to state that all those gentlemen have sent me a statement in return denying positively that they fished for lobsters during 1886, and they are prepared to testify that on oath if the hon. Minister wishes it. They have sent me this memorial which I wish now to hand over to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. They point out that two parties who did fish for lobsters were paid their bounty while they who did not fish were not paid. I would ask the hon the Minister to get his commissioner, Mr. Duvar, to go down to this section of the Island and hold an enquiry into this matter.

Mr. TUPPER. I will ascertain the best means to enquire thoroughly into this matter.

Mr. LISTER. I take this opportunity of bringing before the members of the Government a matter very deeply affecting that large and important class of people in this country, the fishermen, and a matter in which they are at the present moment very much interested indeed. It is not necessary for me to say that the fishermen of this country form a very large portion of the population, and constitute a great part of the wealth-producing population of the country. To prove the correctness of that statement I would refer hon. members to the returns in the census of 1881, the last official figures that I have been able to get. I find that, in 1881, there were taken in Canada, 1,130,720 quintals of cod; of haddock, hake and pollock 192,539 quintals, and 574,503 barrels of herring. I find that, according to the last Trade and Navigation Returns, we exported from Canada last year $7,793,183 worth of fish. I find also according to these returns that the total of vessels engaged in the fishing industry in 1881, was 1,131; that there were men employed on those vessels to the number of 8,401; that there were fishing boats to the number of 30,427; men engaged on those fishing boats 51,603, and that there were 2,150,259 fathoms of net used. Hon. gentlemen will see from the statement I now make that there is an enormous sum of money invested in the business of fishing, and that there are many thousands of men engaged in that occupation, producing a very great amount of wealth and contributing a very large portion of the export trade of this country. Now, Sir, what I am particularly interested in is the exportation of the fresh fish of Canada, and more particularly so far as it relates to the fishermen of the Province of Ontario. From every Province in this Dominion, there is every year a large exportation of fresh fish to the United States. According to the Trade and Navigation Returns we imported from the United States last year only 1,914,138 pounds and we exported to the United States during that same time,

23,666,440 pounds. So far as the fresh fish caught during the summer months is concerned the United States is our only market outside of the home market. It will be seen that our exports of fresh fish to the United States are 21,753,302 pounds more than our imports, and this applies to fresh fish only. Hon. gentlemen will see how important it is that no restriction should be placed upon that trade and that any danger that restrictions might be placed upon our exports to the United States should be removed so far as we are concerned. This fresh fish is admitted free of duty in the United States, but in this country there is a duty of half a cent per pound on fresh fish imported from the United States. I would call the attention of the Minister of Customs to the fact that our total imports amount to only $51,992 and the amount of Customs collected would of course be a mere trifle. What the fishermen fear is—and they have brought it to my attention and asked that I should bring it to the attention of the Government, to the attention of the House and to the attention of members who are interested in the question as I am—what the fishermen fear is that on account of the duty on fresh fish imported into Canada from the United States, the American Government will during this year in all probability place a duty on fish exported from the Dominion of Canada. If such a duty is put on our fish it will mean a loss to the fishermen of Canada of between $100,000 and $200,000 a year. This is a very important question for these fishermen and I would ask that the Minister of Customs should look into the question. I am sure that I am voicing the feelings and wishes of every fisherman in the Dominion of Canada from British Columbia to Prince Edward Island when I say that this duty upon fresh fish coming into Canada ought to be removed. It is no advantage to us whatever and it is a constant menace to the fishermen of Canada that the United States will retaliate and put a duty on fish going into that country. Our fish compete with American fish in the markets of the United State, they can get along quite well without our fish, and if this duty is put upon Canadian fish by the American Government it means that the fishermen in Canada will lose by it to the extent of the duty. The business is a precarious one and no obstacle ought be put in the way of the fishermen of the country making the most they can out of their occupation. I feel that it is only necessary to call the attention of the Minister of Customs to the condition of affairs to induce him to seriously consider the propriety of removing the duty now put upon fresh fish brought into Canada. There is a duty of course upon pickled fish and barrelled fish coming into Canada and in the United States as well, but the United States admit our fish free of duty.

Mr. BOWELL. For immediate consumption.

Mr. LISTER. The fish goes in in June, July, August and September, and of course it is for immediate consumption, but so far as I know, there has been no duty put upon fresh fish at any time by the United States.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is a point of some considerable practical importance to a number of persons. Of course if the Government do not wish to give any opinion on it well and good, but I think an answer is due to my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister). There is no doubt that any such duty as he names, on imports to this country, is a constant provocation to certain parties in the American Congress to put similar duties on our exports, and as the importation into Canada is not one-tenth of our exportation to the United States, it is decidedly to our interest to abolish the duty, if thereby we can avoid the chance of a duty being placed on our own fish.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is scarcely the time to discuss an alteration of the tariff; but still we have heard the statement of the hon. gentleman, and it is worthy of every consideration.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will you consider it?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; we will.

Mr. BRIEN. This is a very important matter to the people of the section from which I come. In the constituency I have the honor to represent there are something like a hundred fishermen who, with their families, are dependent on this industry alone; and a duty of half a cent a pound placed on fresh fish would throw these men out of employment; and the fact that they have been engaged in this industry for a number of years, and no other, makes them unfit for any other employment. Therefore, I think it is very desirable, considering the small amount of revenue that accrues from this duty, the Government should remove it entirely, and not leave any provocation to the United States to impose a retaliatory duty. The matter having been brought to the notice of the Government, I have no doubt they will give it their attention. The fishermen of my district sell fully 99 per cent. of their catch in the United States; their boats go to American ports constantly; if they are deprived of the American market, they will have none at all; and if they are thrown out of this employment, they will be left in almost destitute circumstances.

Mr. PLATT. I agree with the First Minister that this is hardly the time to discuss tariff matters; but as the interests of the fishermen are very important interests, and as we may not have another opportunity this Session to bring these matters before the Government, we do so now. I have a grievance which I wish again to lay before the Minister of Customs as well as the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Fisheries. It is perhaps not so large a question as that raised by my hon. friend from Lambton, but it is one in reference to which the fishermen are complaining sorely in the district from which I come. I do not know that the tariff itself is at fault, but the regulations of the Customs Department place a duty on nearly all the twines used for fishing purposes in the inland waters. We know that twines are admitted free, but the Customs Department classes all the finer twines which are used for the manufacture of nets for catching herring and all the smaller fish in the inland waters, as threads, which are charged 20 per cent. duty. This may seem a small matter, but it is very important to the fishermen. The habit of these industrious and frugal people is to make their nets during the winter months in preparation for the summer's fishing; and their wives and families as well as themselves are employed at this work. All the twines used for the manufacture of the nets used for fishing in the inland waters are now subject to a duty of 20 per cent., which prevents these people carrying on that useful industry; and they feel the grievance all the more, because, though many of them are supporters of the National Policy and the present Government, they think that in this particular instance home industry is not encouraged, because we find that the very net which is manufactured from this dutiable thread is admitted free. A great many people have been employed in the winter months manufacturing nets for the wealthier fishermen and the merchants; but they have found it more profitable to import the nets than to have them made by these people; so that the fishermen are deprived almost completely of that source of benefit. It would be a very easy matter, it seems to me, to remedy this. I do not know why the Customs authorities have seen fit to place these finer twines on the list of dutiable threads. I was told in the Customs Department that anybody could tell that these finer twines were threads, but I never could find the dividing line between a twine and a thread; and why the manufacturers of this country require a duty to be placed upon these finer twines, which are never used as threads, I cannot see. If the Minister of Fisheries is at all anxious to serve these people, I do not see why he should not press on the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Finance the advisability of changing this regulation at once. It would be a very great boon to the fishermen if that change were made even now, so that these people would have the advantage of free twine for fishing purposes as the law intends.

Mr. GILLMOR. The discussion refers more particularly to the duty on fresh fish. I represent a constituency which, being close to the State of Maine, has a special interest in that subject. The people of that constituency depend largely on fishing, and their market for the sale of their catch of fresh fish is entirely in the State of Maine. I have listened to a great deal of discussion on this fishery question. The policy on both sides has been one of retaliation, but I would like to see the Government set an example of conciliation. I think this would be a good time to take the duty of fresh fish. All through this fishery discussion I think there has been a good deal of provocation given to the Government of Canada to retaliate; but I do not think it is a profitable game. If the duty is left on, it will entail a great loss upon Canada and particularly upon the county I represent. I understand how much provocation has been given to the Government, because I know something of the habits of American fishermen; I know their disposition to encroach upon the rights of Canada. I know the men, and among the worst of them are those from Nova Scotia; they are reckless and lawless with regard to other people's rights. I do not see that it is resulting in any good. I would like to see Canada lift herself to a higher place, and set an example of conciliation. I would like to see the Government try to settle this difficulty, and not wait too long. I do not like to see the Government back down. I have a great regard for Canada and the Government of Canada, and when our Government has taken a stand, I do not like to see them back down, but my experience is that they have to back down in the long run. Let them try the policy of reconciliation, instead of that of retaliation, and thus set a good example to our American neighbors, who, no doubt, do exceedingly mean things. That, however, is no excuse for Canada doing equally mean things by retaliation. Our trade in fresh fish is, perhaps, more than that of all the lakes. The county I have the honor to represent, has a very large interest in this, and you can understand how important it is to us. Our fishermen go out and do their day's work; and instead of coming home to any part of Canada, they run right to a seaport where the fish are purchased and taken off to Boston and other American ports. I understand a good deal of the relations between Canada and the United States, living on the frontier and understanding thoroughly the American fishermen. I understand how they have encroached upon privileges that do not belong to them. I hope a new departure will be taken and our American friends set the Christian example of reconciliation.

Mr. FREEMAN. I must ask my good Nova Scotia friend to consider whether he ought not to take back what he has said about Nova Scotia fishermen. I am quite confident he is mistaken, as I have a large acquaintance with these men and many opportunities to see them.

Mr. GILLMOR. I refer to those who have gone to the States and become naturalised.

Mr. FREEMAN. I am glad the hon. gentleman has made amends so thoroughly.

Mr. BARRON. I do not wish to discuss this particular point, but would ask the House if the letter written by the American consul here regarding the spirit of retaliation would not be applicable here. The letter refers to the export duty on logs. That does not apply to the discussion now, but the letter is very interesting and might perhaps give some information concerning the relations between the two countries.

The CHAIRMAN. The hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. KIRK. The Nova Scotia fishermen to whom my hon. friend from New Brunswick (Mr. Gillmor) alluded are those who have been expatriated owing to the bad laws of this Government, and consequently do not feel altogether pleasant towards this country. These are the men the hon. gentleman alluded to. With regard to this duty on thread to which the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Platt) has referred, it would be an advantage to the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces as well as Prince Edward, if the thread were made as cheap as possible, because fishermen in the long winter nights knit their own nets, and the material they require should be made as cheap as possible.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no duty on the thread.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). All along the shores of Lake Erie, adjacent to the County of Kent, there are a great number of pound nets put there by Americans who come from Cleveland and Ohio. They draw out the nets and take the fish out, and the smaller fish and those of not much account they throw away. The good ones they take to Cleveland and other places. Complaints were made last year that they threw the smaller fish into the water, thus putrifying the temperature and the waters around. I believe the regulation is that the nets shall be an inch square, but the regulations are not carried out at all. The mesh is too small, so that a great many of the small fish cannot escape as they could if the mesh were wide enough. During the summer of last year there were great complaints from the people along the shore of Lake Erie, not only on account of the disagreable smell that arose from the decaying fish, but also on account of the great destruction that was allowed of the small fish, and now that another season is rapidily approaching, I hope the hon. the Minister will see that the proper law is strictly adhered to.

Mr. WATSON. Before this item passes I desire to say that a very large interest is springing up in Manitoba in regard to the export of fresh fish. The Trade and Navigation Returns show that $95,576 worth of fresh fish was exported from Manitoba last year, and nearly all that goes to the United States. The people interested in fishing in that Province were very much alarmed when it was stated that the United States were going to retaliate by putting a duty on fresh fish. That would be a severe blow to our people. The fish they export are generally pike or jackfish, which are purchassd there for about a cent a pound, so that a duty of even half a cent a pound would stop the export. Those fish are sold in Chicago for three cents a pound. They are caught in the winter time and are shipped by the cargo. I hope the Government will consider this matter favorably. I believe that the small amount which the Government derives from the duty on fish coming into the country should not weigh with them in such a matter as this, and that it should receive their serious attention, because, if the American Government should be irritated on account of this duty and should retaliate on us in that way, the result would be to wipe out this industry in Manitoba.

Mr. BOWELL. Does the hon. gentleman know that very strong representations have been made from his Province to have an export duty put upon the fish there?

Mr. WATSON. From whom?

Mr. BOWELL. From people in your own county and in Winnipeg, because they are looking forward to the complete depletion of your lakes in regard to fish, and especially whitefish.

Mr. WATSON. Our chief exportation is pike or jackfish, and I am of opinion that the greater the facility that can be given for the exportation of those fish or their extermination, so as to allow the whitefish to increase, the better it would be. If any restrictions are to be placed on the export of fish, I would like the Minister of Customs to place them on whitefish, and allow the people to export all the jackfish they can.

Mr. PLATT. In reference to the question of twine, the Minister has stated that there is no duty on twine, but I have here a specimen manufactured by W. J. Knox, of Glasgow, which paid 20 per cent. duty, while the fishermen want it free.

Mr. HESSON. There are tons of twine made by Ryan & Son, and also in Halifax, and I do not see the necessity of importing it free. They make twine of all varieties, and I believe they could compete with any manufacturer.

Mr. EISENHAUER. I desire to say a word or two on the fishermen's bounty.

Mr. FOSTER. The item is passed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is understood that any of these items can be discussed.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a statutory item.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We constantly discuss statutory items if there is anything to be said about them. That is the object of putting them on the Estimates.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; they show the expenditure of the year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They do not show the whole expenditure for the year.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They show the estimated expenditure.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I never before heard a refusal to allow discussion on an item because it was a statutory item.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Go on.

Mr. EISENHAUER. I understand that the amount paid to the fishermen for bounties in 1887 exceeded the $150,000 authorised by statute, and that it is the intention to reduce the amount per ton in 1888 in order to bring the expenditure within the sum authorised by statute. I do not think that is a proper thing for the Government to do, because they cannot take credit for voting this amount of $150,000. In 1876, they received $4,500,000 from the United States for the rights and privileges which the fishermen of that country had enjoyed for many years in our waters. They have received the interest or the benefit of that amount for twelve years, and they have paid this bounty for only half that time; so I think it is not fair to the fishermen of the Dominion to reduce the amount simply to keep the total within the sum voted. The fishermen of Lunenburg have not received their bounty for last year, and I am told that in other counties that has been the result. I should like to ask the Minister if that is the case?

Mr. TUPPER, The rate per man has not been reduced. The rate per ton on the ships had to be reduced, and for this reason: It is not correct to say that the amounts payable in 1887 were not according to the regulations, but perhaps the hon. gentleman's figures are taken from some purporting to be for that year. It is true that, in 1887, the amount came to $163,000, and the vote was insufficient to make the distribution among those who were properly entitled to it, so it was necessary to make a reduction in order to keep within the statutory vote.

Mr. EISENHAUER. I know that the Government cannot go beyond that, but I think the fishermen should receive some consideration at their hands.

Mr. TUPPER. The Government are powerless in the matter.

Mr. EISENHAUER. I am aware of that, but the hon. Minister should remember that the fishermen have no protection against foreign fish. Although there is a duty of 50 cents a quintal on foreign fish, it is no protection to them, because the fish come in as if there were no duty at all. I asked the Government during the earlier part of the Session whether any change was proposed in the system of bonding foreign fish, and I could not hear very distinctly the reply of the hon. Minister of Customs. I think he said they were considering the matter or something of that kind. I bring this matter to his notice now in case there may not be an opportunity later on. I think that a radical change is necessary in the system of bonding foreign fish. The Minister of Customs is well aware that these fish come in, and are allowed to be handled as much as we handle our own fish. They are allowed to be dried on the wharf, to be put in store and taken out again if necessary, and I think that some change in that system is necessary.

Geological Survey $60,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like generally to know the territory that is going to be geologically surveyed. It seems to me that a good deal more of this money is being frittered away than there need be, and we do not get any considerable new territory thoroughly surveyed and brought in. Of course I speak on a somewhat superficial examination of the hon. gentleman's reports, as the work may be more thoroughly done than I suppose.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I asked the director some few days ago to give me some information with regard to what they propose to do during the coming season, and he has furnished me a memorandum giving the names of the officers he is to send out, and the regions they are to explore. In British Columbia it is proposed to send Dr. Dawson, who has been working there the previous year, and Mr. Bowman to work on Vancouver Island. Mr. Macoun, the botanist, will be sent into the New Westminster district. In the North-West Territories it is proposed to send Mr. McConnell, who has been in the Yukon district for the last two years. It is proposed to send him to Peace River to report on the coal oil fields. That will be new work entirely. Although it has been reported that we have extensive oil districts up there, they have never been looked into very closely. In Manitoba, Mr. Tyrrell will continue his exploration about Duck Mountains. The hon. gentleman, no doubt, is aware that it is reported that there is also coal oil in that neighborhood. In Ontario, Mr. Lawson will continue his work east of Port Arthur. Mr. Bell continues his work in the Sudbury district; and Mr. Cochrane will complete the topographical details of the region about Owen Sound. In Quebec, Mr. Ingall continues his work in the phosphate regions of Buckingham and Templeton. Mr. Ells will complete a map of the Eastern Townships from Lake St. Peter to the Vermont boundary. Mr. Adams will work in Chambly county, and Mr. Low in Quebec and Portneuf counties. Mr. Bailey continues his work in connection with the Temiscouata and Madawaska districts. Mr. Chalmers continues work in southern New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Mr. Fletcher continues his work in Pictou county, and Mr. Faribault in Halifax county.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to know from the Minister whether, in the North-West, where we are lords of the soil, it is the intention of the hon. gentleman to cause a series of borings to be made at various points, so as to give us some practical idea of the various formations. That matter has been discussed once or twice in the House. I think something was done in that direction.

Mr. DEWDNEY. So far as I have heard, there is no intention to do it this year. I may state that there are two borers in the territory, one is owned by the Galt Company, and the other by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. They have been boring the last year for their own information. On enquiry I find that the plant required for the work is very expensive, and we have no money for it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What would the cost be?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Somewhere about ten or twelve thousand dollars. To-day a good diamond drill would cost that sum. I made enquiry especially to find out the cost from Mr. Galt and also from the company, and they said it would cost ten or twelve thousand dollars to get a machine. I understand the importance of the work, and would very much like to see it undertaken. I think it would be well worth the expense, and if the House feel inclined to vote the money I should be glad to expend it in that way.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think where we own the soil it is well worth while to have borings made to a reasonable depth. My information as to the cost of a diamond drill differs materially from that of the hon. gentleman. I understand it could be obtained for a much smaller sum, sufficient to enable borings to be made to a reasonable depth, say six or eight hundred feet. That would not be very expensive, as we know that in that country a great deal of the soil is alluvial. I am sure we would learn a great deal more by these borings than we are learning by these exploring expeditions. There is another point to which I would call the attention of the First Minister, who was formerly Minister of the Interior. I understand, and the Minister of Interior has indicated, that the attention of the Government has been properly called to it, that there is supposed to be most extraordinarily rich oil fields in certain portions of that territory. I have heard the area estimated as high as 80,000 or 100,000 square miles, which I take to be an exaggeration, but I have no doubt that there is considerable reason to believe that a very extensive territory there is underlaid with oil, somewhat similar I presume to the oil deposits known for centuries near the Caspian. I do not think it would be proper to retain all that territory absolutely in sovereignty, but I have a very strong impression that we would do well to retain a very large tract of that territory absolutely in the Crown. Just now, it is true, we cannot make it useful for commercial purposes, but it is not impossible that for a territory like that we might at no remote period be able to derive a very considerable revenue if we continued to keep possession of the more profitable oil district or a portion of it. I have more than once suggested to the First Minister, when he was Minister of Interior, the expediency of the Government of Canada, in its capacity as general trustee for the pubic, retaining possession of, at all events, a portion of the more valuable coal fields and probably of the more valuable mines, and I think this quite virgin coal oil field that is reported to be discovered would afford a very good opportunity of trying the experiment. Of course it is a departure from our previous policy, but it is a departure worth making and an experiment worth trying. I should like to know what the First Minister or the Minister of Interior thinks on that point.

Mr. DAVIN. I am very glad this subject has been brought up by the hon. gentleman. The subject of borers has been before the attention of persons interested in the North-West, and I brought the matter at an early period, in fact when I came down, before the attention of the Minister. The question of expense was the question that seemed to be difficult at that time. I am very glad that from the Opposition, and especially from the hon. gentleman who watches the expenditure on the part of the Government, the suggestion has come that there should be boring done in the North-West. With respect to what the hon. gentleman has said as to the course the Government should take, I entirely disapprove of it. It is the course that has been found a perfect nuisance in the North-West, that is that if the Dominion thinks it has valuable territory a system of exploiting it should be adopted that would result most beneficially to itself. The result has been already disastrous. It involves an entire mistake of the principles of political economy, an entire mistake of the relations between the Government and the public, because it supposes the relations between the Government and the public are the same as those between some large trader and the public, whereas the Government and the public interest are so mixed up that if a private individual makes a fortune out of a coal mine or out of an oil discovery you enrich the country in the best and directest way. It is a principle that an hon. gentleman, who held a high and honored place in the Government of Canada entertained strongly, and in 1883 I did everything I could to dissuade him from what I considered then to be a greengrocer policy, and I am surprised to hear this suggestion by an hon. gentleman so erudite as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) who conducts the financial criticisms on the Reform side of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Sound political economists entertain very different opinions on this subject. There is no one likely, in the future, to produce more mischief to this country than that of allowing private individuals to monopolise natural gifts which ought to belong to the whole country. I do not believe that valuable public properties should be handed over for perfectly insignificant considerations to gentlemen who happen to be favorites of the powers that be. Such cases have resulted in great disaster to this and other countries, and, unless I greatly mistake public opinion, a great deal of public property diverted in this way, will be taken back again before many years are over.

Mr. DAVIN. I quite agree as to the impropriety of handing over to any individual or number of individuals for political considerations the public domain. What I contend for is, that a Government makes an economic mistake when it thinks that it will not give a certain piece of property at the present time because at some future time it may be more valuable to it; in that way it will really retard the development of the country and in that way injure the country. The two things are wholly distinct, the position adroitly taken up in reply to me by the hon. gentleman and the position I took.

Mr. WATSON. I entirely agree with the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and also the Minister of Interior who has stated his belief that it would be a good thing to have a drill or borer make certain tests throughout Manitoba and the North-West. I believe, as a great many are led to believe, that there are many valuable deposits of oil through Manitoba and the North-West. Near Lake Dauphin they have for the past two years been boring with the result of strong indications of securing oil; but the company's engineers have found working very expensive. They have had a long haul for their machinery and have labored under many difficulties; and the Government could not do better than spend a certain sum in purchasing drills and machines and organising gangs at two or three different places to make borings and ascertain the results. There are also no doubt valuable salt wells in Manitoba. Along the western shores of Lake Manitoba and Lake Winnipegoosis salt springs have been known to exist from early days, and half breeds made all the salt they used from those springs which are on the surface, and I have no doubt by boring very valuable salt wells would be discovered. With the present long haul of salt from the Eastern Provinces, salt would be very valuable as well as petroleum. Moreover, salt will no doubt be required in the future for farming purposes. I agree with the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that a certain portion of these valuable deposits should be reserved for the public use; I would not favor the reserving of all the territory because enterprise should be encouraged in prosecuting the work. In Manitoba there have been discoveries of coal, and in south Manitoba a company has been formed to open up and develop a coal mine at Turtle Mountain. Much good would undoubtedly be done by such an expenditure being made, and better results might be obtained than from spending the money on the Geological Survey. I hope the Government will consider the matter favorably, and in the near future make the tests of which I have spoken. They will undoubtedly be in the interest of the whole Dominion in addition to benefiting the particular localities in which they are made.

Resolutions reported.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 1:30 a.m. (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 8th April, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 126) to amend the Summary Convictions Act, chapter 178 of the Revised Statutes, and the Act amending the same (from the Senate).—(Sir John Thompson.)

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY—PETITION.

Mr. SHANLY asked, Has the Government received any petitions from the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company? If so, has any action been taken, or will any action be taken thereon, by the Government?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A petition was received on the 12th March, 1889, from the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway, protesting against the granting of subsidies to railways which duplicate and compete with existing lines. No action could, of course, be taken on this petition, but it will be considered when any railway claims are laid before Parliament.

ST. GEORGE'S BRIDGE—STRUCTURAL DEFECTS.

Mr. MULOCK asked, Whether the attention of the Government has been drawn to an article in the Engineer, copied into last week's Scientific American, pointing out the structural defects in the St. George Bridge whereby the recent disaster might be accounted for? Whether any steps are being taken as to other railway bridges, to see whether they are also structurally defective for the reasons therein contained? Has the Government received any report from their inspecting officer on the subject of the disaster, and would it be in the public interest that such report should be brought down?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The attention of the Government has not been drawn by any one to this matter except by the notice of the hon. gentleman. No steps have yet been taken with regard to other railway bridges, but this subject will be attended to. The Government have not received any report from the inspecting officer on the subject of the disaster.

VICTORIA BRIDGE.

Mr. AMYOT asked, What is the total cost of the Victoria Bridge; the yearly outlay for its maintenance and management, and the yearly revenue it yields?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government have no means of knowing what the total cost of the Victoria Bridge is, except by application to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. I have no doubt if the hon. gentleman will apply to Mr. Hickson, he will give him every information.

LA CLOCHE ISLAND—PROVINCIAL CLAIMS.

Mr. BARRON asked, Did G. W. Burbidge, Esq., then the Deputy Minister of Justice, or any subsequent Deputy Minister of Justice, ever give an opinion, in accordance with the request of the acting Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, bearing date 19th June, 1882, preferred a second time on the 13th April, 1883, relating to the respective claims of the Government of Canada and the Provincial Government of Ontario to the Island of La Cloche and other Islands referred to in the despatch of the Under Secretary of State to the Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, under date of 30th May, 1882? If yes, what was the date of the opinion? To whom was it directed? Was it in favor of the contention of the Government of Ontario, as set forth in the said despatch of 30th May, 1882? Was it in favor of the contention of the Dominion Government, as set forth in the memorandum of the Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, bearing date the 13th June, 1882? If no opinion was given, why not?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The Deputy Minister of Justice did give an opinion. The letter giving said opinion was dated on 30th April, 1883; it was directed to the Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs. The opinion was not favorable to the contention of the Ontario Government, in so far as La Cloche and other islands in the vicinity of Manitoulin Island were concerned. The opinion was favorable to the Dominion Government's claim to the La Cloche, and other islands in the vicinity of Manitoulin Island, and on the north shore of Lake Huron, but not to those on the eastern shore of Georgian Bay; but without more exact information the Deputy Minister of Justice expressed himself as unable to give a positive opinion as to the claim of the Ontario Government to the Islands last referred to.

LAKE ERIE BASS FISHING PERMITS.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, Have permits been given to the Long Point Company or to any members of the same, to take bass in the waters of Lake Erie, at Long Point or elsewhere, during any part of the close season? Have permits been given to any company or individuals, to take bass in the waters of Lake Erie, at or near Pelee Island, during any part of the close season?

Mr. TUPPER. No permits were given to the Long Point Company. In 1886 the Minister of the day granted the members of the Pelee Island Club permission to angle for bass for a period of 20 days during the close season, with the provision that no fish were to be caught for sale and that all female fish were to be returned to the waters alive.

MONTCALM POST OFFICES.

Mr. THÉRIEN asked, Whether the Government have received reports respecting the opening of two post offices in the northern part of the county of Montcalm?

Mr. HAGGART. Two applications for post offices in Montcalm have been received. One at St. Marie de Salomée has been granted, and the office was opened for work on the 1st instant. The other at Ste. Famille was also granted, but has not been opened, owing to a difficulty about the site, which is expected shortly to be settled.

SAWDUST IN RIVERS.

Mr. THÉRIEN asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to appoint officers to look after the sawmill owners, and prevent their throwing sawdust into the rivers.

Mr. TUPPER. It is not the intention of the Government to appoint any further officers to look after the sawmill owners and prevent their throwing sawdust into the rivers. The ordinary fishery officers are expected to do that.

ORANGE INCORPORATION.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government, during the present Session, to introduce a Bill to incorporate the Orange Order?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This would be a private Bill, and it is not the intention of the Government to introduce such a Bill, and I am afraid, therefore, that my hon. friend (Mr Charlton) will thus be deprived of the opportunity of voting against the Bill as he did twice before.

Mr. CHARLTON. The First Minister has stepped outside of the usual course by going beyond an answer to my question. I may say that though I voted in that way before, I might not vote so again.

TORONTO SCHOOL OF INFANTRY.

Mr. MITCHELL (for Mr. McMULLEN) asked, Were tenders asked for bread supply for "C" School of Infantry, Toronto, last fall; how many tenders were received; the name and amount of each tender; the name of the successful tenderer, and the price and the term the contract is for?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. On the 5th December, 1888, tenders were invited for this service. Four tenders were received: William Carlyle, of Toronto, at $2\frac{23}{32}$ cts. per lb.; Thomas Adams, of Toronto, at 3 cts. per lb.; Johnstone Little, of Toronto, at 3 cts. per lb.; and W. H. Knowlton, of Toronto, at $3\frac{3}{4}$ cts. per lb. The contract was given to William Carlyle, at $2\frac{23}{32}$ cts. per lb, for the term of one year, commencing 1st January, 1889, he being the lowest tenderer.

REGINA BARRACKS CANTEEN.

Mr. DAVIN asked, Is the right honorable the Prime Minister, in whose departmental charge is the North-West Mounted Police Force, and who, speaking in the House of Commons on the 15th February, 1889, said, respecting the canteen at Regina barracks as managed by a civilian from Winnipeg: "I have made up my mind, on the whole, that the game is not worth the candle; we shall close that arrangement with the present caterer, giving him the notice we are allowed to give under those regulations, and allow the men to manage their own affairs by a committee of Sergeants, and buy their supplies, so as to avoid any appearance of unfairness toward the trade," aware whether any steps have been taken to carry out his orders, and that Commissioner Herchmer has canvassed his sergeants to petition for the continuance of the canteen as managed by Mr. Buchanan, thus antagonising the declared policy of the Prime Minister made to this House?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In answer to this question which contains some statements of fact, which are rather contrary to the Rules of the House, I may say that formal notice to vacate the canteen on the 15th May next was given to Mr. Buchanan some time ago. I am not aware that Commissioner Herchmer has canvassed his sergeants to petition for the continuance of the canteen as managed by Mr. Buchanan. I have Commissioner Herchmer's positive assurance that he has not done so. The commissioner has recently forwarded to the department certain representations which have been made by the non-commissioned officers and constables with regard to the canteen, but I have not yet been able to give the matter consideration.

BRESAYLOR HALF-BREEDS.

Mr. WATSON asked, Whether the Government have yet received any report upon the subject of the claims of the Bresaylor Half-breeds for the value of their furs alleged to have been wrongfully appropriated at Battleford? If not yet received, is it expected that it will be received during this Session?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes, reports have been received.

Mr. LAURIER. Will they be laid upon the Table of the House?

Mr. DEWDNEY. If they are asked for.

Mr. LAURIER. Then they cannot be obtained this Session?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is not our fault.

IMPORTATION OF FISH IN BOND.

Gen. LAURIE moved for:

Copies of all correspondence with the Customs Department, instructions issued to, and reports received from, inspectors and collectors of Customs in reference to the importation of fish in bond for the purpose of subsequent exportation, together with copies of any regulations bearing on this subject framed and issued under the authority of the Customs Act.

He said: I regret that I must detain the House a little, because there are matters connected with this motion which are of considerable interest to a large number of people in the Maritime Provinces, and especially in the Province of Nova Scotia. It is necessary that I should go a little into what are apparently side issues. Under recent arrangements, the French Government have given a very large bounty on fish sold outside of the French dominions. They have done this, for the purpose of stimulating an industry which would increase the maritime population of France, and would enable them to command a larger navy than they have at present. For this purpose, they have given as much as $1.80, or about 10 francs, on each quintal of fish sold outside of France, or the French colonies. This has created a great deal of feeling, not only among the fishermen in the Lower Provinces, but also in Newfoundland, where they are exceedingly troubled on this point. A Newfoundland correspondent, writing to the Harbor Grace Standard from Leghorn, says:

"Every steamer from Marseilles brings 400 to 600 bales of Bank fish of excellent quality, which is retailing at 16s. and 17s., and, as you may easily imagine, our English cure——"

What is styled English cure there, is really Newfoundland or British American cure.

"——is quite neglected, and, what is still worse, perishing. You seem to be surprised that this French fish should be new and properly cured, but you forget that it is cured and salted on board the vessels which come across to Bordeaux, Marseilles and Cette, and there dried under sheds, a few days being sufficient for this operation. The French Government gives a bounty of 16 francs (shillings) per quintal on all the fish exported to Leghorn, 14 to Genoa, and 12 to Naples. The French fishermen are masters of the situation, and will very soon ruin the English colonists unless something is done. Larger vessels are now building in several French ports which are intended for this industry, and, from what we hear, a fresh impetus is to be given to the fishery."

The Newfoundland newspaper editor goes on to say, speaking of the feelings of the people of Newfoundland:

"Yes, a fresh impetus has indeed been given to this French industry, and the fact for us has a very peculiar significance. The French fishing fleet in Newfoundland waters this year numbered no fewer than 350 vessels, aggregating 35,000 tons. Their catch is estimated at one-and-a-half millions quintal. The Cape Ann Advertiser says that 'after supplying their home market they will have from a half to three-quarters of a million quintals to export, which, aided by the Government bounty of $2 a quintal, makes competition from either Newfoundland or Norway almost impossible.' It is with regret that we have to admit the partial truthfulness of this assertion. This bounty-fed fish of our Gallican rivals has done and is now doing much injury to our interests in the leading fishmarkets of the world. As we have before pointed out, it is only of late years that the French have entered into large competition with us in the Mediterranean. In 1884 20,000 quintals of codfish, of French cure, were imported into Northern Italy. This quantity was increased in 1885 to 100,000 quintals, while a similar rate of increase was seen in the French imports into Spain—the aggregate in the latter year amounting to the immense total of 250,000 quintals, and during the present season no fewer than 500,000 quintals of French codfish were in competition with us in these markets. Can these striking, very alarming facts, we ask, be contemplated with equanimity or composure by our people? All the more need therefore for every effort being made to lessen the French catch of codfish in the waters surrounding this coast and on the banks. And with the help of the Bait Bill, after it has received the Queen's assent, we believe that this can be accomplished to a large and gratifying extent."

Now, that shows the injury to Newfoundland that accrues from the large bounty given by the French Government, and the adoption of the system of paying this bounty in the case of fish sent into foreign markets. The Newfoundland people so thoroughly recognise this that they have decided to legislate in the most stringent way to meet the competition that their own fishermen are subjected to by the action of the French Government. I hold in my hand the statutes of Newfoundland showing how they have met this action of the French Government:

"Whereas in the interests of the fisheries of this colony, and for the preservation of the bait necessary for the pursuit of these fisheries, it is essential to regulate the exportation and sale of such bait. Be it therefore enacted by the Governor, the Legislative Council and Assembly, in Legislative Session convened, as follows:—(1) No person shall export, or cause or procure to be exported, or assist in the exportation of, or (2) Haul, catch, purchase or sell for the purpose of exportation, or (3) Sell or purchase for the purpose of sale, any herring, caplin, squid, or other bait fishes, from on or near any parts of this colony or of its dependencies, or from or in any of the bays, harbours, or other places therein, for bait purposes, without a special license, in writing, obtained from the Receiver General of this colony, which license may be in the form set forth in the schedule hereto annexed, and shall be of no avail beyond the fishing season for which it is granted.

"Every person guilty of a violation of any of the provisions of this Act, shall, for the first offence, be liable to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, and in default of payment of any such penalty, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding six months, and for the second or any subsequent offence, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding twelve months."

But they do not stop there, they go on further to say:

"Any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this Act, in addition to the penalties provided in the fifth section hereof, shall be liable to have his vessel, or the vessel used by him, seized in manner aforesaid, her tackle, apparel, furniture and outfit, forfeited and sold by public auction."

That is pretty stringent legislation, as you will observe, but they go on still further. They find that even that will not keep the French fish out, even when they have provided against the purchase of bait in order to deprive the French fishermen of the means of catching fish. They also go further, and provide against buying fish to go into their markets to be there bonded and again sent out to those markets which they hope to secure for themselves. The same year, 1887, the colony of Newfoundland enacted:—

"It shall not be lawful for any importer of dried fish to warehouse the same in any of the ports of this colony and its dependencies without the payment of the duty herein before provided of $1.50 on every quintal so warehoused, and the provisions of any Act of this colony with regard to the warehousing of goods, on the first entry hereof, or to the allowance of the drawbacks upon exportation, shall not in either case apply or be construed to apply to such fish."

So, you see, Newfoundland will not admit them to bond at all. If they come in they shall pay the duty, they shall not be admitted to compete without paying duty. To go further, I find that the Chamber of Commerce, which is naturally composed of exporters as well as producers, men who make their living by buying and selling fish as well as those who make their living by catching fish, at their annual meeting, expressed themselves as follows:—

"The following is the opinion of the chamber in regard to the operation of our Bait Act: The wisdom of vigorously enforcing the Bait Act is already manifest, as the French fishermen's catch on the Banks is unusually short, and this fact has given an impetus to prices in this market, which have opened at 20 per cent over last year's rates The short catch above referred to will lessen the competition our Labrador cure has been subjected to in Italian and other markets during past years, and with the prospect of the increased demand and consumption, paying rates are likely to rule here for our staple."

Then, the Italian Government, finding that these fish were coming in to their market and competing in an unsatisfactory way, in an unnatural way, as they conceived, by reason of the bounty given by the French Government, caused the following notice to be published in the Canadian papers:

"The Royal Italian Consul in the Dominion of Canada hereby gives notice to Merchant Shippers of Codfish to Italian ports, that it having come to his knowledge that French caught and cured codfish have been and are shipped from Canada to the Mediterranean, begs to remind merchants that all shipments made to Italy must be provided with a Consular Certificate of Origin to be appended to the respective invoices and bills of lading, in the absence of which the special Import Tariff may be applied and levied on all other cured codfish, to the prejudice of the Maritime Provinces trade.

"Halifax, October 1."

Here we have them demanding that the fish sent out by us must be capable of identification. When we come to the practice of the United States, we find that they permit fish to be imported and retained in bond to be exported. I am informed that their regulations require that when imported, the packages cannot be broken open, the fish must be exported in the same packages in which they are imported, or otherwise duty will be charged; thus they will not be permitted to be unpacked in bond at all. Now, Sir, this being so, we now stand alone. We find that all other markets consider that these fish are treated by a bounty to the prejudice of the products of the countries to which I have referred. But we, so far as I am informed, and as my constituents believe, permit this fish to come in and be bonded and afterwards exported. I am not prepared to say under what conditions these fish are kept in bond, but I am informed they are kept in bond not under the supervision of the Customs authorities, but are simply placed in a merchant's warehouse, under an arrangement that a certain quantity has been received and that that quantity must be exported. Although the question may have been for some time one of public importance, it is evident from the statements made on the subject that of late it has become a rather serious question, and it appears from a statement prepared from the returns that only since 1887 has it assumed importance. 20,000 quintals of codfish came in from St. Pierre in 1887, 14,000 in 1888. Our fish were thus brought into competition with fish from St. Pierre, and our fish had to be placed on the market against fish subsidised by the French Government. The returns show, moreover, that before 1884 there was no fish imported from St. Pierre, and therefore this is practically a new question. To show the feeling of the fishermen, I may say that I hold in my hand a memorial, signed by 5,000 fishermen of Nova Scotia, addressed to the Minister of Customs, setting forth:

"That during the present summer, considerable quantities of dry fish have been imported in bond from St. Pierre, into Halifax, Lunenburg and other ports in Nova Scotia, which has had a serious effect on the prices of the fish caught by our own fishermen.

"That the bounty of ten francs per quintal (a sum almost equal to the cost of production) which is paid by the Government of France on all fish sold by the fishermen of St. Pierre outside of French possessions, renders them very dangerous competitors in our own home market.

"That the French fish thus imported has not been placed in bonded warehouses as by law required, but has been handled, dried and packed in the same manner as our own fish, the only requirement being that a sufficient quantity should be entered outwards to satisfy the Customs officials that all had been exported.

"That unless prompt and decisive measures are employed to prevent a continuance of the importation of French caught fish to supply our foreign trade, most serious loss will result to those who now employ their time and capital in the prosecution of the fishing industry, including not only the fishermen themselves but also the owners and builders of the vessels employed as well as those who dry and prepare the fish for market—all of whom combined embrace a very large and important class of our population.

"That with sufficient encouragement on the part of our merchants and under the leniency of the present Customs law, there is great danger of unlimited increase in the importations of bounty protected fish in future years, the result of which, it is safe to predict, will be the ultimate destruction of the fishing industry of Nova Scotia, and the almost utter annihilation of our splendid fleet of vessels.

"The most stringent laws and regulations are in force in the Island of St. Pierre, and Canadian fishermen are granted no favors by the Customs officials of that port.

"That while the policy of the present Government is, and has always been, to afford every consistent measure of protection to the varied industries of our common country, more especially should this be the case, and in a more marked degree—when the products of our own shores are competed with in our own home-market, by simular products of other countries assisted by a bounty nearly, if not quite, equal to the actual cost of producing the same.

"Your memorialists, therefore, respectfully pray that Your Honor will be pleased to give this most important matter your serious consideration, and, if possible, cause such enactments to be made as will require that all importations of such fish be at once placed in Government warehouse under the hand of the proper official, and be exported in bond in the same state and condition, and in the same packages in which they were landed—said packages to remain unbroken, thereby exempting said article of bounty assisted fish from the operation of section 83, chapter 32 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, Vol. 1.

"Trusting that Your Honor will see the immediate necessity of discriminating against bounty assisted fish when placed in competition with the production of our own fisheries,

"We have the honor to be, Sir,
"Your most obedient servants,
"(Signed by five thousand),
"W. S. BREWER."

In order to show that this is not merely the view entertained by those who actually catch the fish, but is the view entertained largely by those interested in the export of codfish, and also those who combine the business of outfitter as well as that of exporter, I may state that I hold in my hand a letter from a leading member of one of the most prominent firms in my county exporting fish to the West Indies. The writer goes on to say:

"In reference to French fish, I have noticed of late there has been quite an airing of the question through the papers, which no doubt you have seen and the greater part of which meets my views. It is my opinion they should be subjected to the same restrictions as any other dutiable goods and not allowed to bond unless in packages for export, to be strictly made under the care of the Customs Department until exported to the place of their destination. This I should think is about the general opinion."

Our feeling is this: We desire, so far as in us lies—and this House has endorsed over and over again its desire to support the National Policy—to support a policy of protecting the industries of our own people from foreign competition. We claim that this policy is not followed out in the present arrangement in connection with the fishing industry. We claim that the bounty given by the French Government, which we cannot prevent being given, but which, by legislation, we can countervail and meet in some way, will destroy our fishermen. We believe it will eventually reduce the number of our fishermen employed in our fisheries, and that, eventually, they will be found incapable of competing with those men who are receiving 10 francs, equal to $1.80, for every quintal of French fish they bring into this country. 70,000 of our people, who add $18,000,000 to the wealth of the country, will thereby be driven out of their employment and forced to seek other pursuits. It is hardly necessary to say that, living where they do and as they do, that practically means that their industry would be entirely destroyed and they would have to go elsewhere to obtain a livelihood. We say that as the Newfoundland, the Italian and the United States Governments have all dealt with this question, so we ask that this Government shall deal with it in the same way. The fishermen define a very reasonable way, and what they ask to be done is simply to enact that the same regulations shall be applicable in Nova Scotia as regards these French fish as are applied in all other cases. We are told, as a justification for permitting these fish to come in and be handled in bond as they are, that it is better they should be permitted to come, that otherwise they would go down into the markets, to which we ship our fish, and would compete with us in those markets, that they would be placed in those markets at a lower price, and that such is undesirable, and it is better that our exporters should obtain them and export them as the necessities of the market demand. But, we believe, and I have every reason to believe, that our contention is a good one, that these fish, if they could have been sent down to the West Indies to have competed with our fish, would not have been brought into Halifax and out of other markets, but would have been sent direct to that foreign market; but it is because the exporters of St. Pierre cannot place them in condition on those markets, they are sent into our markets. It is believed, and it is the contention of those who bring this subject before the country, the House and the Government, that the expense of curing these fish in St. Pierre, and preparing them for market, would practically prohibit their coming into market in competition with our fish, because the fish cannot be cured, packed, and handled as cheaply, and the packers cannot obtain materials as readily, and do not possess the same facilities, as do our men. I conceive that the position we are now assuming leaves a choice between two alternatives. Shall we take the position of Holland, a country that simply handles and exports the products of other countries, or shall we assume the position of England, and be the producer and exporter of our own goods. I claim, that if the National Policy means much, it means protection to all our industries, and it is for that reason I ask that our fishermen may receive the same protection as is accorded to other producers in this country, and that they may not be placed in direct competition to those who use our market as a slaughter market, and send in goods upon which they receive a very large bounty when they can get them into our markets as they do. It is for that reason that I make this motion and press this action, as requested by our fishermen, upon the Government.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It was quite natural that the representative of a county like Shelburne should have brought before the House a question in which he thought the people of that county were so much interested. The hon. gentleman has placed before the House, in a moderate manner, the views which he and the people he represents entertain, and with that I have no fault to find, but if the gallant gentleman had been more familiar with the details of the question he would not have fallen into some of the errors which characterise his otherwise fair and moderate statement. I am not unwilling that the fishermen of Nova Scotia should be fairly treated in every respect, but in the first place I think we have to show that they have been dealt with unfairly in the way in which the hon. gentleman has pointed out. I may remark that the fish from St. Pierre and Miquelon, as well as from Newfoundland, have been coming into the port of Halifax since, at all events, the year 1850, when I entered into business. We have always looked upon that fish as a legitimate import and as no disadvantage to the export of our own products. The hon. gentleman, answering an objection which I suppose he anticipated would be raised by those who took a different view, said that if the fish were not sent to Halifax, they would be sent direct to the West Indies, but he went on to explain that those fish were not sufficiently cured to enable them to be sent to the West India market. I may inform the hon. gentleman—and to that extent it will strengthen his argument—that the fish from the French Islands are, as a class, superior to our own bank fish cured in our own country; that they are fit for any market in the West Indies, and as he anticipated or as others would say, this fish if they did not come to Halifax would go to the West Indies direct from St. Pierre, as they have been in the habit of being sent for many years past, and when there they would fill up the markets which are supplied, as a rule, from Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. If this fish is sent to Halifax, our people have the advantage of handling them, they have the advantage of packing them, and they have the advantage of employing their vessels to send them to the West Indies and of bringing return cargoes back to Halifax. Therefore, so far as that is concerned there is no loss to the commerce of the country. It is not unnatural, I suppose, that when a question is brought forward by interested parties, that a class of people, even fishermen, intelligent as they are, are very soon led to believe that their interests are seriously infringed from the importation of French fish. The conclusion would be that the agitation which was gotten up among the fishermen along the coast, resulted in the petition which the hon. gentleman says has been so largely signed and now presented to this House. I say, Sir, it was not at all unnatural that those people should take that view of it, because we know, if you go to parties who are interested in any branch of trade, and point out to them that the same class of goods is coming in from abroad and that they think they are not getting as much from what they are producing as they should get, that they will naturally arrive at the conclusion that it is owing to the importation of a small quantity of a similar article from another country. That was the way with regard to this French fish. I might give the House a slight history of this question, and, going back three or four years, I may point out that in 1884 there were no French fish imported into Nova Scotia at all, and the price of our bank cured at that time was $2.25 per quintal. I admit that this was a very low price for our own fish, but the price was not affected by any importation from abroad. In 1885 the price of our own bank fish was $2.75 per quintal, and there was no import of French fish to create this low price. Therefore, the French fish were not responsible for those low rates. In 1886 a small quantity of about 1,000 quintals came in from the French Islands, and the price of our fish was $1.90 and subsequently advanced as the season went on. Therefore, during this season again the importation of French fish was no factor in the low rates which prevailed for our own products. In 1887 some fish was imported in the early part of the year when our own cure opened at $3.25 per quintal, but the price subsequently advanced until in the latter part of the season it reached $4 per quintal, showing that the importation in the earlier part of the season of a small quantity of fish had no effect whatever in lowering the price of our own article. In 1880, 18,000 or 20,000 quintals of French fish were imported when our own fish was selling at $4 per quintal, a price which, I may say in presence of any gentleman who is familiar with that grade of fish, was a remunerative price indeed. Unfortunately, the catch happened to be very light in the early part of that season, and the price went up to $4 a quintal, and some fish came in from St. Pierre and sold at that rate. But the season went on, and the small quantities of French fish that came into the market were absorbed, and our own fish advanced to $4.25 per quintal. Therefore, the fish from St. Pierre had no effect whatever in lowering the price of our fish; but our fishermen, unfortunately for themselves, thought they would be able to control the prices of fish, and they kept back their catch. They did not recollect that Newfoundland, with its large catch, was alongside of us, and that fish would be imported from St. Johns if prices went too high. Although $4.25 was paid for bank fish of our own product, they still refused to bring in their fish, and they held them over till spring, and then, crowding them into the market, forced prices down to $2.25 or $2.50 per quintal, losing $2 per quintal, which they might have obtained in addition if they had brought them in early. There was not a French fish in the market to contribute to this result. All the fish from St. Pierre had gone out last fall; though to-day, I suppose, our fishermen, smarting under the losses they have suffered from their own bad judgment in not bringing their stock to market, are inclined to put them down to every cause but the legitimate cause. The hon. gentleman has referred to the quantities of French fish that go to the Mediterranean. If the hon. gentleman had read the Newfoundland papers and the reports of the Chamber of Commerce there, he would have learned that they attribute the preference that is given to the French fish in the Mediterranean ports to the fact that they are much better made, that they arrive in better condition, in much smaller quantities than the fish that come from Newfoundland. Early in the autumn their custom is to take from 10,000 to 15,000 quintals of fish from Labrador. They take them in all kinds of weather, half made, pack them damp and green, and send them to Genoa, Leghorn or Naples, and they arrive there in a condition that compares very unfavorably with the condition of the Icelandic and Norwegian fish. The fish from Iceland and Norway are sent in immensely increasing quantities to Portugal, Spain and the Mediterranean ports; and that is one of the things which have largely affected the trade of Newfoundland in that part of the world. That is, no doubt, entirely owing to the inferior quality of the fish the Newfoundlanders send there, compared with the fish which they are brought into competition with. The hon. gentleman has asked that the Government should take means of seeing that fish are handled in a different manner. The question first is, is it in the interest of commerce to exclude these fish from our ports? Next, if they are allowed to come in, should they be exceptionally dealt with? We know that the importers of wheat, when they bring it from abroad, are allowed to handle it in bond and to export it in different packages from those in which it was imported; we know that coal is not left in a bonded warehouse, but is exposed to the atmosphere; and a good many other articles are treated in the same way. Fish must naturally go into a store that is dry; a damp store would impair its value. Hence, when cargoes of fish have come in, the Customs authorities have allowed them to go into ordinary fish stores to be dried and then exported. I cannot see how that course has caused any loss to the revenue or any injury to any branch of our commerce, and I hope the Government will hesitate before they impose any restrictions upon, or hamper what may be a very necessary part of our foreign trade. We know that if these fish come to us, we can export them in bond to Portugal, where the duties are the same as ours; and now they can go to Italy as well. For these reasons I cannot see what steps can be taken, or, indeed, what steps are necessary, to make any change in this regard. These fish have been coming during the last few years, and no injury has arisen. They were not coming in this year when prices were very low, and were not contributing to those low prices. A few came in last year when all the fish our fishermen had to dispose of could have been sold at very high rates, if they had been willing to accept the market prices. Our fishing industry is a great industry,

Mr. BURNS. It may be that the duty recently imposed on English codfish has been the same as that imposed on French codfish, but it was not so until a recent date. On many occasions I called the attention of the Minister of Customs to the fact that the practice prevailed in Halifax of bringing in French codfish and exporting them as English or Canadian codfish to Italy, in order to avoid the duty imposed in that country on French fish.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). There was never a quintal of French fish sent from Halifax to Italy at any time.

Mr. BURNS. I am advised to the contrary. In the county I represent, there are some of the largest fish establishments in the world, and I am informed by the managers of those establishments that that practice prevailed very largely in Halifax, and, in fact, all over Nova Scotia, and by it a great injustice was done to our fishermen, as fish caught by the French had the advantage over ours of a bounty of 10 francs a quintal. I have been informed that these fish were brought into Halifax and sent in British bottoms to Italy, and so evaded duty, because, in the absence of a treaty between Italy and France, a duty is imposed in the former country on French fish, and thus an injustice is alleged to have been done to our fishermen. As to the importation of fish in bond for the purpose of exportation, I am not prepared to say whether a great injustice is done in that way or not, but my impression is that it does operate to the disadvantage of our own fishermen, as they are brought into undue competition with fish which are caught under the bounty system. I desire now again to call the attention of the Minister of Customs to this, and to press upon him the necessity of giving consideration to the complaint that I have made on behalf of the fishermen in my county, by ascertaining if this practice has prevailed, and, if it does not prevail now, to what extent it has prevailed in former years, because I am informed that it did prevail to a considerable extent, and that it became so notorious that some international complications resulted and that questions are even now being followed up in connection therewith.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I ask leave to make a short explanation. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Burns) has referred to the export of fish from Halifax to Italy. The only cargo that, in my recollection, was shipped from Halifax to Italy was shipped by my own firm; and probably owing to some such representations as the hon. gentleman has referred to, that cargo was seized by the Italian Government as French fish, though it had the properly certificated papers from the consul and the Custom house. I immediately cabled to the High Commissioner in London, Sir Charles Tupper, and sent a member of my firm over; and I am bound to admit here that Sir Charles Tupper took the most prompt and energetic steps in the matter, and, through the Foreign Office, made the most decided representations to the Italian Government, which resulted in the release, in a week or two, of this cargo; but owing to the detention, we sustained a loss instead of making a profit, and I am now, through the High Commissioner, prosecuting a claim against the Italian Government for having improperly interfered with my property. That matter is now in the hands of the British Government, and Sir Charles Tupper says he thinks the claim is a very proper one. I say publicly that I found the greatest advantage in having a gentleman of such large experience as Sir Charles Tupper in London, having communication with the Foreign Office, and through the Foreign Office with all the consuls and with the Italian Government. But for that, I believe we would have had to submit to the injustice of paying two shillings a quintal more on our cargo; but the fact that we are prosecuting that claim against the Italian Government, and are bound to prosecute it to the end, is the best proof I can give that there was no French fish on that vessel.

Mr. BURNS. Of course, I accept unreservedly the statement of the hon. gentleman that there were no French fish on his vessel, but I think the very fact of the detention of his vessel must prove that such a practice had prevailed. The attention of the Italian Government must have been called to the circumstance that French fish were being shipped to Italy in British bottoms, and there must have been some such foundation for the seizure of the hon. gentleman's cargo.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). -I understand that the report was made from Newfoundland by some one who was interested in the business, though I do not suppose it was intended to injure me. There was no other shipload of fish sent to Italy from Halifax except that one.

Mr. EISENHAUER. A few days ago, I referred to this matter. The hon. member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurie) has gone very thoroughly over the points which I would desire to bring before the House. Our fishermen are of the opinion that if a more rigid system were followed in regard to those bonded fish, it would have the effect of keeping a large quantity of these foreign fish out of the country, and that would raise the price of our own fish. Whether that would be the case or not, I am not prepared to say. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) seems to think that the importation of foreign fish does not affect the price of our fish. The county I represent is interested very largely in this matter, and they are, as the Minister of Customs is aware, pressing for a change in the bonding system. As the Minister knows, we are not allowed to send our fish loose into the American market. We have to send them in packages when we send our fish in bond for exportation to the West Indies and other countries, and our fishermen claim that our Government should insist that foreign fish coming into the Dominion should come in in packages. My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Jones) has contended that we would lose the employment of the labor of our own men, by having those fish come in in packages instead of in bulk. I think in this respect we have a just claim, and I hope the Minister of Customs will consider this matter. I understand a very large petition has come in asking for this change, and it will be for the Government to make enquiry into the matter after the Session, and see whether it will not be beneficial to the fishermen generally to grant them their request.

Mr. FLYNN. There can be no doubt that the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces are under the impression that the importation of French bounty-fed fish into Halifax has the effect of lowering the price of Canadian fish. I do not know whether the hon. member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurie) asked to have a more rigid bounty system or not, but there is no doubt that if these fish were put into a damp warehouse they would be injured. There may be something in what the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) has said, that if these fish were not purchased in Halifax in bond they would be sent direct from the French islands to the West Indies, and might, perhaps, thus lower the price of our fish; but, at all events, the fishermen of our Provinces say that the Government of this country, having adopted the National Policy in everything else, ought to extend it to the protection of the fishermen. For everything we consume we have to pay a great deal more than we did before the introduction of the National Policy, and yet the product of our industry, fish, is not protected in any way. Our fishermen know that their French competitors enjoy the advantage of a bounty of ten francs a quintal on fish, or $1.80, by means of which the Frenchmen can undersell them. The fishermen of the Maritime Provinces feel very much aggrieved at the fact that, while they have to pay high duties on everything they consume, they have to compete with the bounty-fed French fishermen whose fish, coming into Halifax from St. Pierre and Miquelon, lowers the price of the Canadian article. If you are going to continue the bonding system, I cannot see how it can be remedied, or what remedy the Minister of Customs would suggest. Dry fish are not like any other property which you can put into a bonded warehouse and keep there until sent out of the country. They must be put in a dry place and carefully kept. I do not see what the hon. member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurie) asks for, or what he hopes to obtain, unless it be the prohibition of these fish altogether. However, I shall wait until the papers come down.

Mr. EISENHAUER. If we had free access to the American market, there would be considerably less danger of the West Indian market being overstocked, and of the price of our fish being thereby reduced. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) said that we had the market of the whole world for our fish. If he had studied the question he would not have made that remark, for with our mode of curing bank fish we can only have two markets: the West Indies and the United States. We are met in the United States by a duty of 50 cents per quintal, so that very few of our fry fish, bank cured, have found their way there. The cure for all this depression in the West India markets would be reciprocity with the United States. Had we free trade with the United States, large quantities of our fish would be sold there, and we would not find the West Indies glutted as they often are at present. I hope before a year or two at the most the Government will bring about reciprocity with the United States, and the hon. the Minister of Customs probably will not then be troubled by many requests on the part of our fishermen for a change in the bonding system.

Mr. KENNY. My hon. and gallant friend for Shelburne (Gen. Laurie) has very happily commemorated his return to the House, after his long enforced absence, by bringing to the notice of the House a matter which very much concerns the fishermen of Nova Scotia. I remember, in 1887, when I presumed to say something which affected the fishermen of Nova Scotia, my hon. colleague was pleased to say that I did not know what I was talking about. Last year my hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Eisenhauer) was pleased to express himself in exactly the same language. I did not find fault with that hon. gentleman. The idea was not original, the language was not original, and it so happened that when he made use of that expression he was sitting alongside the now vacant seat of my hon. friend from Halifax. But there seems to be, to-day, a difference of opinion between these hon. gentlemen. The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Eisenhauer), who is quite as practical in his knowledge of fishery matters as the hon. the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), has expressed his opinion, though in a very guarded manner, that the importation of this bounty-fed French fish is injurious to the fishermen of Nova Scotia; and I was very much amused, the other evening, when the fishery estimates were under consideration in this House, to find that so earnest and so zealous was the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Eisenhauer) to put himself on record in that expression of opinion before my hon. and gallant friend from Shelburne (Gen. Laurie), that he took advantage of the discussion on the fishery estimates to emphasise his opinion on that matter. I find no fault with him for doing so, because, if I am correctly informed, in 1887, when he was running his election in Lunenburg County, which is one of the most prosperous and enterprising counties in our Province, and where the fishing industry is one of the largest, my hon. friend stated to his constituents that when he came here and had a voice in the legislation of this country, he would raise his voice to prevent the importation of these bounty-fed French fish. If I am wrong, I am here to be corrected; I should be sorry, indeed, to make any such statement if I did not believe it to be true. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) says, loud enough for everybody in this House to hear, that the member for Lunenburg (Mr. Eisenhauer) did not make that statement. Now, if the member for Lunenburg says that he did not, I shall immediately withdraw it, but I have been told that such was the case. I mention it here to-day to show the appeals that have been made by hon. gentlemen representing fishing constituencies in Nova Scotia when running their last election. The request of my hon. friend from Shelburne (Gen. Laurie) seems to me a very reasonable one. He simply asks that this French fish which comes into our jurisdiction shall be treated in exactly the same manner as it would be treated if it went into the United States—that it should be imported and exported in the original packages. I would remind my hon. friend the Minister of Customs that, if I am not mistaken, this matter has been very frequently brought to his attention, and I sincerely hope that this year it will receive some action at his hands. It is within the knowledge of gentlemen who take an interest in these fishery questions, that fish to the value of nearly half a million dollars, passes through the United States in bond from the Lower Provinces to the West India market. I think I am correct in the figures—it amounts to very nearly half a million dollars. Of course, hon. gentlemen who are familiar with that trade recognise that that freight takes that course from the fact that the United States have facilities for shipping that fish by steamer which, unfortunately, do not exist in the Canadian ports, and if the American people, and if our own exporters of fish, can transmit in bond so large an amount of fish south to the West Indian market, I see no difficulty why the Customs regulations of Canada should not be so arranged as that the fish should be imported and handled only in bond, and only in the original packages, when it comes within our own territory. Now, Sir, my hon. friend the senior member for Halifax has pointed out that during the years 1884, 1885 and 1887, very low prices prevailed for codfish in Canadian markets. In 1884 he puts it at $2.25 per quintal. Now, the French fish, as he no doubt correctly informs us, did not come into our market at that date. Just imagine what would have been the result if it had come into our market, receiving $1.80 a quintal bounty, when our fishermen were only receiving $2.25, or $2.75, or even $3.25. Now, this French fish comes early into our market, and regulates the price of fish for the whole season. After Halifax, the largest market for fish in Nova Scotia is the community represented by the hon. member for Lunenburg, and I am told that in the year 1888, one of the dates to which my hon. colleague has referred, when the market opened in Lunenburg in the spring of 1888, the price was fixed at $4:50 a quintal, but subsequently there was an importation of French fish from St. Pierre, which cost only $4 per quintal, and the price of fish consequently receded to $3.50 per quintal; but the sellers of fish would not submit to it, and as the catch was short in 1888, the price which generally prevailed was $4 per quintal, as stated by my hon. colleague. But even then, Sir, I contend that our fishermen lost 50 cents a quintal on all their catch of 1888, owing to the importation of this French fish. Now, Sir, we all know that on the Grand Banks where this fish is caught, our vessels have to compete with, and are alongside of the French vessels; that the outfit of our vessels, as a rule, is more expensive, and they are at a greater distance from their homes, and in the result on the whole catch they are handicapped by this excessive bounty of $1.80 per quintal. Sir, when the price of fish is low, hon. gentlemen who are familiar with this trade will recognise at what a very great disadvantage the Canadian fisherman is placed, because hon. gentlemen who are familiar with that trade know that in the Island of St. Pierre we cannot land a fish; we would not be allowed under any circumstances to land a fish. We are also competing with the American fishermen, and the American fishermen are protected by their own Government against this French fish in the exact manner in which my hon. and gallant friend from Shelburne (Gen. Laurie) asked that the Canadian fishermen should be protected. We have to fish in common waters, we have to meet in a foreign market in competition, and we do ask as a simple matter of justice to our fishermen, that the same regulations should be enforced in Canada as prevail in the United States. My hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Flynn) has very forcibly pointed out that we have adopted in this country, and it has been confirmed by the people at the polls, a policy of protection for our industries; and we simply ask that the same measure of protection should be applied to this industry, and the way we propose is one which involves no injustice to any portion of our people. I have pointed out the protection which is afforded to the French fishermen, I have pointed out the protection which is afforded to the American fishermen. I desire to point out that this fish is brought from St. Pierre in foreign vessels very frequently, giving employment to foreign coasting vessels, which are in active competition with our own. My hon. colleague has referred in very eloquent terms to the magnificent fleet of fishing vessels which we have on our Atlantic coast, and they are certainly a very great credit to our Province, and we take exceeding pride in them. In making this contention to-day our desire is simply that this fine fleet of vessels shall be increased and improved.

Mr. KENNY.

The large petition which my hon. friend from Shelburne (Gen. Laurie) presented, shows the active interest which the fishermen in the county he represents take in this question. The expressions of opinion which we have had from hon. members from Nova Scotia, from the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn), and the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Eisenhauer), show conclusively that that interest is not confined to the constituency represented by my hon. friend from Shelburne. I know that in the constituency which I have the honor to represent, in conjunction with the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), the fishermen take, generally, the same view exactly as do the fishermen in other parts of the Province, and they consider that an injustice is done them by the present regulations. My hon. colleague has referred to the fact that, so far, no irregularities are reported as having occurred in the handling of this French fish; but he must admit, as an experienced business man, that the system is liable to be abused.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). No.

Mr. KENNY. My hon. colleague says no. I appeal to business men in this House whether a system which permits bonded goods to go into private stores, where there is no Customs officer to superintend them, as there are in bonding stores, is not likely to be abused, especially when there may be a lot of bonded goods on one side and a lot of free goods on the other. Whilst I cheerfully admit it has never come to my knowledge that the privilege has been abused, yet it is one very likely and liable and open to be abused, and I think that is one argument against the present system. My hon. colleague, in a matter which was under discussion, I think, within the latter days of the past week, I said, stood alone for his Province in a certain contention he made. I have to repeat that again to-day. My hon. colleague in the contention which he makes stands alone for his native Province; there is not another member from Nova Scotia to-day who takes the view of this question which my hon. colleague takes, and, therefore, although I am not so experienced as he is in fishing matters, I feel quite gratified in knowing that all the members from Nova Scotia except my hon. colleague entertain the same views on this question as I do. My hon. colleague contends that since 1850, since he has been in business, so far as he knows no disadvantages have accrued to our fishermen from the importing of this French fish. However that may be, the fishermen who are the most immediately concerned and interested in this matter, evidently are of the opinion that the present regulations are disadvantageous to them, and ask for a change. But why should we not also, in a matter of this kind, be guided by the legislation which has been enacted in the colony of Newfoundland, a colony where fishing is nearly the sole industry; and my hon. and gallant friend from Shelburne (Gen. Laurie) has read to the House very interesting and instructive notes giving us the exact manner in which the law is administered there, and showing how jealously the Government of that colony protects its fishermen. It is no unreasonable request we are making to-day off the Government of our own country, and I sincerely hope that the Minister of Customs—and if I were disposed to find fault with him I should have to say that, in my humble opinion, he ought to have moved sooner in this matter—will enact such regulations as will ensure to our fishermen in this matter that measure of protection to which they are entitled and which they have not received hitherto. The fact of so large a quantity of our fish having been transported and trans-shipped through ports in the United States shows conclusively that any of our merchants who desire to import this fish from St. Pierre in bond will be able to do so. If the Government accede to the request we make to-day in the name of the fishermen of Nova Scotia, no great injustice will be done those merchants, because, if they still desire to handle this fish, they can do it, as it is done by their competitors in New York and Boston, in bond. My colleague has also referred to the fact that we shall still have to meet this competition in the foreign markets, and, in proof of that, he has instanced the great increase in the fishing industry in the north of Europe. That is an argument which might be used on this side of the House as a contention in favor of giving greater consideration to our fishermen than they have hitherto received, and the fact of this great competition in this industry shows the necessity which exists of watching jealously the rights of our own fishermen. I trust the Government, and especially the Minister of Customs, with whom I have had many conversations on this subject, will take this matter into their serious consideration, and we shall have, at an early date, the imposition of such regulations as will give to our fishermen that fair measure of protection which the hon. member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurie) has asked in the motion he has made, and which, after all, is simply giving to them the same measure of protection which the United States give to their fishermen, with whom ours are such active competitors.

Mr. BOWELL. The question brought before the House by the hon. member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurie) is not a new one to the department. Some three years ago, when on a visit to Halifax, my attention was called to similar complaints to those which have now been presented. I made a personal investigation into the matter so far as I possibly could at that time. I met a large deputation of members of the Board of Trade. I must confess they were composed of both sides of politics, and, as the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) has said, those who agree with him politically were very strongly in favor of adopting the course which has been suggested by the hon. member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurie) and the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), while members belonging to the party to which I belong and supporters of the Government, took the other view. In fact it was a question which was then treated from a commercial standpoint, irrespective altogether of politics. After fully investigating the matter and enquiring from the collector of Customs the course which had been pursued in the past, I was informed that no change had been made, that the provisions of the law which have existed since Confederation still continue upon the Statute-book and were carried out at Halifax, that is the clause which gives the power to the collector of Customs, or such other officer as may be chosen, to adopt such regulations as he may think best in the interests of the revenue, and to allow the packing and repacking of any fish which is brought into the country while in bond. The clause reads as follows:—

"During the regular warehouse hours, and subject to such regulations as the collector or proper officer of Customs at the warehouse may see fit to adopt, as well for the carrying and taking of such goods to the warehouse, as for other purposes, such importer may sort, pack, repack, or make such lawful requirements respecting the same, in order to the preservation or legal disposal thereof, and may take therefrom, samples (and so on) for the purposes of sale or exportation."

I then made enquiry, as to whether the privileges that were given by the collector, under the authority of that clause, had been abused by any of the merchants, and I was assured by him that such had not been the case in the past. The papers, when they are brought down, will show that the inspectors could find no case in which the privileges ceded to importers and merchants had ever been violated under that clause. In looking at the question, from what has been termed by some hon. gentlemen who have spoken, the National Policy standpoint, which is to provide, as far as possible, labor for our artisans and our laborers, and freight for the vessels belonging to those who are engaged in maritime pursuits, I came to the conclusion at that time, that until it could be shown that the privileges granted by the law, had been violated, either directly or indirectly, that this change would not be in the interest of the shippers, or of the merchants, or of the laborers in Halifax, or those who have warehouses and wharves, which were used for the purpose of resorting and repacking this fish. Being unable to come to the conclusion, that a change would be beneficial, I found myself, whether fortunately or unfortunately, exactly in accord for once with the hon. the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones).

Mr. JONES (Halifax). You are sure to be right then.

Mr. BOWELL. I am sorry I cannot say that the hon. gentleman is right upon all occasions. I admit that in the United States the practice is precisely that which the hon. member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurie) has pointed out. When my attention was called to the practice which had prevailed in this country, and also the restrictions which were placed upon imports to the United States, and upon fish in particular, I made enquiry, and I found that the fish there when placed in bond must be exported in the same packages, without any sorting or re-packing. Now, in this particular practice adopted in Canada, I am sure the member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) will give the Government and the department over which I preside credit for carrying out a policy which is a little more liberal than that, and especially will he give us credit when that policy is in the interests of our shippers and our laborers. If a change be made in the regulations, as has been suggested, then there would be a restriction placed upon the importation of fish which is not placed by the law upon any other article. It is true that coal is imported, and, knowing the difficulty which presented itself in the bonding of coal, one of the first regulations which I suggested, and which was carried out by the Government, was to allow importers of coal to bond the article in their yards, making an entry of the full quantity when imported, and obliging them to account for it, either weekly, or fortnightly, or monthly—large railway enterprises and companies were given a longer time in which to make their entries and their returns, than others—so that while the revenue was protected in that respect, the merchant and the importer of coal had not to pay the full amount of duty until the coal was sold. The same system prevails in the bonding of pig iron, and bar iron, and all larger articles which are bulky and very heavy; they are allowed to go into the merchants' yards, exposed almost to any person who might go into the yard to take them away, but no ill result has been found to follow from that practice, and, consequently, I think the House will agree with me in saying that it would be a very great hardship if the merchants were compelled by regulations of the kind to which I have referred, to place coal in bonded warehouses under lock and key which would be held by Customs lockers. Until some injury can be shown to result from this practice, I do not think it would in the interest of the trade that it should be interferred with. When the ex-member for Lunenburg, the member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurie), and the member for Gloucester (Mr. Burns), called my attention to the articles which have been published in the papers relative to charges which had been made against certain Halifax merchants, that they had been importing French fish and in the curing of it under the practice which had prevailed that they had substituted Canadian fish therefor and exported them to Italy, thereby enabling them to have it entered at a lower rate of duty than if it were French bounty-paid fish, I at once referred all the letters and newspaper articles to the Inspector of Customs for the Province of Nova Scotia, who after enquiry made a very full and exhaustive report which will be brought down, he was unable to discover that the law had been in any respect violated. I have also been unable to find by the investigations which I have caused to be made that the equivalent of the fish imported has ever been exported for that which has been imported. If that were done it would be a direct violation not only of the rules and regulations of the department, but of the law of the land, and any person who would do that in making his export entry would have to commit a fraud upon the revenue and make a false declaration. I have failed yet to find that any of the merchants who have been interested in this particular trade have violated the law. If they turn to clause 103 of the Customs Act, and to many other clauses in the Act, they will find that if that were done it imposes a very heavy penalty upon them. I am as anxious, and I am sure my colleagues are equally as anxious, to protect the fishermen, as any Government can possibly be. The Government have endeavored to assist the fishermen, by putting upon the free list most of the articles which they use, and the Government has also, as an indirect protection, granted them a bounty of a sum at least equal to the interest received from the American Government for giving permission to fish in our waters. I am unable to give an opinion as to the quality of the fish. I understood my hon. friend from Shelburne (Gen. Laurie), to say that in the repacking and sorting of the French fish which is imported into Canada, that Canadian fish of an inferior quality were substituted for them.

Gen. LAURIE. I never said so.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I understood the hon. member to say so.

Gen. LAURIE. I never alluded to any interchange of fish at all.

Mr. BOWELL. I understood the hon. gentleman to say so. I made a note of his remarks: "equivalents exported for that which was imported."

Gen. LAURIE. I said "could be exported."

Mr. BOWELL. I am pointing out that I am unable to discover that any fraud has been perpetrated upon the revenue. If the fish were inferior, then I could understand that we might need to substitute Canadian fish, for the purposes of exportation. If, on the contrary, they were superior fish, there could be no possible object in doing so, unless there was a desire to impose on the foreign merchant who purchased them, under the impression that they were French fish; but I am under the impression that those who consumed the fish in Italy would know inferior fish just as well as we could, and a practice of that kind could not prevail for any length of time without being discovered. The senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) pointed out, I thought, somewhat clearly, that if any disadvantage to our fishermen had arisen from their obtaining a lower price for their fish than they would otherwise have done, it was their own fault, for, instead of selling their catch when they could obtain a good price, they retained it, as many merchants do their goods, in the hope of a rise, and instead of rising, fish fell in the market; and then, for some reason or other, they come to the conclusion that the fall in the value arose from the importation of French fish into this country which came into competition with theirs. But French fish, or any other fish, could not come into competition with Canadian fish, unless it were smuggled in, or having been brought in in bond, it were allowed to be taken out of the warehouse, or from the wharves, and to be taken into the market, and sold.

Mr. KIRK. Except Newfoundland fish.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no proposition to interfere with Newfoundland fish that I am aware of.

Mr. KIRK. Newfoundland fish come in free of duty.

Mr. BOWELL. I am discussing the effect of the importation of French fish, bonded and cured in this country, and the effects of such a system on the fish market of Nova Scotia. The hon. gentleman wants to divert me from that point by introducing a new question altogether, which we shall be prepared to debate when necessary. If the hon. gentleman, with his free trade views, thinks that we should impose a much heavier duty than we have now on Newfoundland and French fish and other fish, I am not prepared to say I would not go with him, and I could only congratulate myself and the House and the country on having another accession to the ranks of the National Policy party. I might say a few words in reference to the charge which has been made, that merchants in Canada who ship to Italy had been substituting Canadian fish for French fish in order to obtain access to that market. When the papers are laid upon the Table it will be shown that my officers could obtain no evidence whatever to justify that charge. I was very glad of it, because it would be a reflection upon our shippers and our largest merchants, who have been occupied in this particular trade for many years; speaking individually, I have sufficient evidence to justify me in believing that almost any amount of fraud can be perpetrated when duties are to be evaded. However, there has been no evidence adduced to my department to show that any of the merchants have been guilty of it in this instance, and I take this opportunity to bear testimony to the honesty of the merchants of the Maritime Provinces in that respect. I do not know that any more rigid system would afford any greater protection to the revenue, but if it can be shown that the fishermen can be protected any better than they are by the adoption of the rigid system which prevails in the United States, I shall be prepared to recommend its adoption to my colleagues; but the House must not forget that if that system is enforced in this country, it must of necessity deprive the laborers and artisans of the seaport towns from which these exportations take place, of the labor which they now receive in unloading, unpacking, repacking and loading again for exportation; it will deprive the warehouse men of the rents and fees they receive for the use and occupation of their wharves and warehouses where the fish are dried, packed and re-sorted; and it will deprive the vessels of this country of that quantity of freight. But if it cannot be shown that our fishermen have received in the past, or will receive in the future, any injury from the continuance of a practice which has prevailed ever since Confederation, then, I believe, and I think the House will agree with me, that it will be in the interest of the Dominion and everyone concerned, that no change should be made. But if, I repeat, it can be shown that the fishermen are injured in any way, directly or indirectly, by the practice now prevailing, I shall be very glad to recommend its discontinuance. I was a little surprised at the statement made by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), that he was informed, or understood that these fish were placed in the private warehouses of merchants in Halifax, and were without any Customs supervision.

Mr. KENNY. I beg to correct the hon. Minister. I certainly said so, but that system prevails not only at Halifax, but wherever the fish are imported. They are placed in what are called the fish warehouses. I think that point was referred to by my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Flynn) and other speakers, who showed the difficulty there is in handling fish in ordinary bonded stores, which are frequently built of stone, and are damp. If I am in error, I should like any hon. gentleman who is better informed than I, to correct me; but I understand that the fish are placed in the private warehouses of merchants at Halifax and the outports.

Mr. BOWELL. What I intended to say in reply to that statement was, that they are to a certain extent placed in the fish warehouses or sheds under somewhat similar circumstances to those which my hon. friend has referred. I had made particular enquiry as to whether this was done without any Customs surveillance, as to whether the fish when imported was allowed to go into these warehouses in bond without the Customs officials supervising the landing of the fish or watching them while they were in bond, and ascertaining beyond doubt that the fish exported were those which had been in bond. In every case I have been assured by the Customs officials in Halifax and other ports in the Maritime Provinces that such is not the case; they have assured me that in all cases where foreign fish, whether French or Newfoundland fish, or any other foreign fish, are landed, they are received under the supervision of Customs officials, and when exported they take care to see, in repacking, resorting and reloading, that the fish exported are those which were in bond. I was afraid the House would be under the impression that there was no strict supervision whatever over the management of this particular branch of Customs. If that should be the case, I have been misinformed both by my inspectors and the different collectors.

Mr. KENNY. As this is a matter which concerns the merchants of Halifax who are 1,000 miles from here, I may be allowed to interrupt the hon. the Minister of Customs to say that I am afraid that he is leaving the impression on the House that I intended to insinuate that there have been irregularities in the management of Customs with regard to this matter. I have never heard of any. I can confirm what the hon. the Minister has said, from what I have heard in connection with the trade. To my knowledge, we have never had any irregularity. My contention is, however, that this is a matter which is open to be abused, because, necessarily, these fish in bond cannot be subjected, to the same mode of treatment to which all other classes of goods in bond are subjected, and to which our fish, when we ship to the United States in bond, is subjected to in that country.

Mr. BOWELL. I am sorry the hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I did not intend to leave the impression on the House that he had made any imputation, directly or indirectly, against the merchants of Halifax. On the contrary, what I took down was that they were allowed to enter without customary supervision. What I wanted to point out was what my hon. friend has said, that I made special enquiry into that very point, and I found by the reports from the inspectors and the Customs officials, whose duty it is to look after the interests of the revenue in this particular, that the supervision over the importation of fish was precisely the same as it would be over the importation of coal or pig iron, or anything else, and that no irregularity existed in the Customs Department in the city of Halifax, or in any other part of the Maritime Provinces, in this respect. I have given as plainly as I can the reasons which induce the department not to interfere with the practice which has prevailed in the past. I was under the impression, and I have not yet heard anything to change my mind, that the practice has not been abused. I cannot understand how the fishermen of Nova Scotia can have their interests interfered with by allowing the foreign article to come into the country and be reshipped out of it again, any more than I can understand how the importation of a million gallons of whiskey placed in bond and reshipped out of the country could interfere with the market of the distillers in this country. There is only one way in which it could, and that would be by substituting water for the whiskey in the barrel, which has been done occasionally, and by that means committing fraud. A fraud somewhat similar might be practiced with regard to the fish. If the fish were brought into the country and went into consumption without paying duty, or if they were an inferior fish which would go into consumption and the better quality taken out, so that the merchant would receive the higher price for that better quality, it would be for his advantage; and, vice versa, if they sent out the inferior article, and sold the better article in the country, to take the place of the inferior article, I could understand that would interfere with the merchants, not only in the Maritime Provinces, but in the whole Dominion. I shall esteem it a favor, if it can be pointed out to the department where any particular instance has occurred in which the market has been interfered with, or any fraud perpetrated under the system which has prevailed. No doubt, under all regulations, frauds may be perpetrated, no matter how strict the surveillance. In our bonded warehouses, siphons have been placed in barrels, in the upper story, and the liquor abstracted from the puncheons, and water substituted, and we did not find it out until the liquor was all gone. I do not pretend to argue that the ingenuity of man is not such that he cannot find means to commit fraud, no matter how strict the regulations may be, or how binding the oath he has to take, but until fraud is shown to have been committed, I do not think it would be advisable to change the system. The moment a single instance is pointed out to me where the rules have been abused, and the fishermen have suffered, or where the revenue has been defrauded, I will make further investigations, and devise regulations still more stringent, if necessary, than those which prevail in the United States.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I must say I agree with the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) and the hon. the Minister of Customs in this matter. I cannot see how the importation of fish in bond for subsequent export, can in any way interfere with the trade of our own fishermen. It is admitted on all sides that the importation of these fish in bond has not given rise to any irregularities or fraud, and it does seem to me that the motion of the hon. gentleman from Shelburne (Gen. Laurie), that these fish should be admitted in bond after they have been put in casks, would amount to this, that the work and labor now given to the people in Halifax in taking the fish in bulk and putting them in packages would be transferred to the laborers at St. Pierre-Miquelon. We must recollect that there are but two markets open to our fish, the West Indies and the United States. We know that during the last two years there has been a great development in the fishing industry in the county of Lunenburg, so much so that to-day a very large fleet of fishermen are engaged in the capturing and curing of these fish, and the result is that the markets are glutted. Those who have a knowledge of the trade know well that the West India market is at any time comparatively small, and that the shipment of two or three schooner loads to one of the islands would glut the market. The remedy is not to be found by hampering trade, by prohibiting the importation of fish into the country, but by the opening up of new markets. The junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) has expressed, no doubt, the very strong and sincere sympathy which he feels for the fishermen, but I would ask if he has devoted his attention for any length of time to discovering how the market for our fish can be enlarged? He has been told by one of the most practical and experienced men in the trade that it is essential we should obtain, in order to fully develop that industry, free admission into the markets of the United States. I am in hopes that he will even yet see eye to eye with hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, not only in reference to this question, but also in regard to all other maritime interests. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman whether it would not be well for him to bring that influence, which he must have with the Government, to bear in order to treat the fishermen as favorably as the Government treat the coal owners of Springhill. There is a market, though it is true it is a limited one, for these fish in Montreal; but, owing to the regulations, and owing to the tariff on the Intercolonial Railway, the distance is so great and the expense is so great that we cannot ship that fish to Montreal and make it pay. I believe the cost of transferring a barrel of fish from Halifax to Montreal is 60 cents, and that makes some $50 on a carload of fish. The hon. gentleman supports a Government which levies that tax on the fishing industry, while at the same time it takes care that the capitalists of Springhill shall be allowed to carry coal from Springhill to Montreal at about $4 a car, reckoning it at three-tenths of a cent a ton. The hon. gentleman knows that if the freight on the fish were reduced to the same rate to which the Government have reduced the rates on coal, a large and profitable trade might be developed, and his supporters who are engaged in the fishing industry would be largely benefitted. But I think it is perfectly plain that the hon. gentleman is bound to keep the low freights on the coal, and he does not seem to be very much concerned about the high rates on the fish. I am certain that, if that question was submitted to an arbitration by gentlemen from the Province of Ontario, and they were told that the Halifax fishermen had to pay $50 a car for transporting fish to Montreal, while the Springhill miners have to pay only $4 a car for coal, they would decide that it was a great injustice to the fishermen. I do not mean to argue that a whole carload of fish should be carried for $4, but where there is that enormous discrepancy between the prices, it must be seen that there is a discrimination between the fishermen and the coal capitalists. I rose to call the attention of the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) to this subject, knowing his interest in the poor fishermen of Nova Scotia, and I hope he will bring his influence to bear in order to induce the Minister to reduce the railway tariff, which is now almost prohibitory, on fish from Halifax to Montreal; and, when he has succeeded in that, I will ask him to go further and to throw his influence in to obtain the opening to these fishermen of the greatest market they have in the world. You talk about the development of the Lunenburg shipping interest in the last few years, but no man dare put bounds to the development which this fishing industry would have in a few years under those circumstances, and no one knows that better than the hon. gentleman.

Mr. TUPPER. Did the hon. gentleman say that the freight on coal from Halifax to Montreal was $4 a car?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I said it was three-tenths of a cent per ton per mile.

Mr. TUPPER. He must mean $4 a ton. It is sold in Montreal for about that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I made that statement the other day, in the presence of the chief superintendent, and I understood it to be accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite as correct.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman said it was $4 a car for coal against $50 a car for fish. I understand that the rate on coal per ton from Springhill to Montreal is $1.80, and on 15 tons—the quantity that the larger cars carry—the rate would be about $25 a car.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The rate per ton is about $1.50.

Mr. FREEMAN. I have observed with a great deal of interest the gingerly manner in which the friends of the fishermen on the other side of the House have treated this question; and now, from the fishing question, they have gone over to the coal question. I expected, when this question came up, that the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) would have shown his usual interest in the fishermen. I expected that he would declare himself, as he generally has done, the friend of the fishermen and would have stood up for their interests. Now, that the interests of the fishermen are affected by the importation of French fish into Halifax, there can be no doubt. Before I left my own county in the Province of Nova Scotia, this matter was brought to my attention, and I was requested by a number of fishermen, who are friends of mine, to look after their interests, as far as I could, when this matter came up for discussion, as it was expected it would. I am very happy to be here to-day to say a few words in favor of the fishermen. Our own fishermen ought to be protected against all foreign fishermen. The fishing industry is one of very great importance. The value of the fish exported from this country annually is $7,793,000, and there are but a few industries which are more important than the fishing industry. Perhaps there is no industry that is more capable of development than the fishing industry, and there is no class of the people more deserving of the protection and the care of the Government than are the fishermen of Nova Scotia. From time to time, when we have heard the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) speaking of his interest in the fishermen and pleading for favors for the fishermen, and condemning the Government when they seemed to show a lack of interest in the fishing industry and the fishermen of Nova Scotia, I have felt my heart warm to him, and have wished that he would come and take his place on this side of the House. I must, therefore, to-day express my disappointment, when I find his own interest, and the interest of his firm, and of the merchants in Halifax, hiding from his vision the interests of the fishermen. I was much more surprised when I found the hon. gentleman from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), employed to take a hand in against the fishermen, and endeavor to divert the attention of the House from the subject which was under consideration, and to take it to the Intercolonial Railway—a subject which hon. gentlemen opposite keep always on hand—and to the question of the Nova Scotia coal which comes up here over the Intercolonial Railway. They keep that always ready to come in and make up for any little deficiency when they make complaints against the Government. I would like to ask what the duty of coal has to do with the fishing interests of Nova Scotia? I would like to know how this Intercolonial Railway affects the fishermen of Nova Scotia? That is the industry, and that the phase of it, which we are talking about now, and have been talking about this afternoon—it is the dried codfish that we are talking about, not the fresh fish. When we come to the fresh fish question—and that is a very important question, and I intend to say a word about it—then we have another and quite a different phase of this question. We are talking now about the dried codfish portion of this industry; and, I say, that when the French fishermen get a bounty on their fish, when they are allowed to carry their fish into Halifax, and there, under the guise of being bonded, are exposed in stores, stores owned by individual firms, or individual men engaged in the fishery, when they are allowed to be piled up alongside of piles of Nova Scotia fish, I say, when this is allowed to be done, it is a manifest injustice to the fishermen of Nova Scotia, and it interferes with the price of Nova Scotia fish beyond all question. Gentlemen learned in the law make dispute about this matter, but it has nothing to do with the fishing interests. It is a very easy matter for them to make out a nice case here, but when you present that case to the fishermen of Nova Scotia, they will set it aside in a very brief but a very energetic manner, and they will show you that, notwithstanding all the sophistry thrown around this question, it really interferes with the price of their fish, and they ask of the Minister of Customs and the Government that they shall be protected; and I trust that before we leave this question the Minister of Customs will see that it requires something more than a mere nominal care for these fish when they are put in these Halifax stores. Why, Sir, it is very possible that the men who have the oversight of these fish know as much about the difference between French caught and cured fish, and the Nova Scotia caught and cured fish, as they do between a California orange and a Demerara orange. There is every difference between the two. Indeed it requires a man skilled in these matters to discover whether a pile of fish that was pointed out to him in the early part of the season as French fish, has not been taken away altogether and a pile of Nova Scotia fish put there. I am not accusing any of the merchants of Halifax of doing anything of this kind. But we know that merchants, as well as captains of ships—even the Minister of Customs, sometimes—make mistakes in matters like this; the merchants in stores make mistakes sometimes and imagine that they have paid the duty when they really have not, and it requires the Minister of Customs to point out these goods to them, but when he does so he does not accuse them very harshly, he does not say that have been guilty of any criminal offence; he simply asks them to pay the fine, and they pay it and go on again. These men who have French fish piled up in their stores—they do not make a mistake, oh, no, it is their employés who handle the fish who make the mistake; and they take away the French fish and put a pile of Nova Scotia fish in its place; and in this way there is a great deal of French fish passed through the fish markets in Nova Scotia. I was a little surprised at the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Eisenhauer) not taking a more active part in this matter. I have before me a memorandum showing that at the time of his election that hon. gentleman condemned the importation of French fish into Nova Scotia. He declared that he would not buy any French fish, that he was opposed to its importation into Nova Scotia. I expected that he would come out again in the old fashion way. He belongs to a race of men who do not quibble when they talk about grievances. He has blood running in his veins that makes men prompt to talk about their grievances and to enforce a remedy; and I expected that he would have manifested that disposition which I know belongs to him, and that he would have condemned this importation of French fish with that vehemence of which he is capable, and spoken in favor of the large number of fishermen, of noble men, the large fish industry in the county of Lunenburg. There is no county surpassing the county of Lunenburg in the number of its fishermen, and in the importance of that industry. I was in hopes he would have risen and spoken with that vehemence which is characteristic of him, in favor of the fishermen of his county, and in condemnation of this practice, which is constantly increasing, of allowing French fish to come into the Province of Nova Scotia. Now, Sir, I want to say a word about the fresh fish industry. I am very sorry to say, that the people of these Upper Provinces have but very little idea of our fishing industry; they have but a slight idea of the importance, and of the value of our fish in Nova Scotia. Since I have been in Ottawa, I have been endeavoring to get a piece of Nova Scotia fish to eat, but I have entirely failed. Sir, if I had not advanced so far in the journey of life, I think I would make an effort in some way, to get some good Nova Scotia fish into Quebec and Ontario, to show the people what we have got down in Nova Scotia in the shape of good fish. I do hope that, now we are going to have the Short Line finished, now that we are going to have this great railway completed, now that Nova Scotia is going to be as near to Montreal as it is to those beautiful ports in the United States which our friends opposite love so well—I do hope that our ports in Nova Scotia, these poor commonplace towns down by the sea, will in some respects equal these wonderful cities in this land over which flies the great eagle that we hear about. I hope now, Sir, that these hon. gentlemen will second us in our efforts to supply this country with fresh fish. Sir, if we are assisted in this matter, if we are encouraged in this matter, not only by the Government but by all the loyal men of this Dominion, I feel satisfied that we will not be so desirous of seeking markets under foreign flags, and that we will be able to find an outlet for our fresh fish in these Upper Provinces. There is now a very large trade, and a continually increasing trade will grow up between the Lower Provinces and the Upper Provinces in fresh fish. Then, Sir, I feel satisfied that another very important object will be gained by Nova Scotia supplying the Upper Provinces with her fresh fish. I hardly need to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that it is well known that Nova Scotia has supplied statesmen for this Dominion since Confederation. I was asked the other day how it was that we had done so, and whether we had a stock of statesmen lying in reserve. When I replied in the affirmative, I was asked how we had managed to manufacture them in such abundance and of such ability, and someone suggested that it must be because of our fish. Well, Sir, I believe that is a fact. People require fresh fish, not fish that has been lying round two or three days and been hawked round like the fish here. If we had the Short Line completed—and it all depends upon the Short Line—I am sure we would be able to supply all the Dominion with fresh fish, and also with statesmen equal to those who have been sent here from Nova Scotia. I trust the Minister of Customs will take this matter into consideration. Knowing the energetic manner in which the Minister conducts the business of his department, I feel very delicate in saying anything about the matter, for I do not consider I shall be able to make him break his record. I do not think there is any back down in the Minister of Customs. I have known some occasions when I should have been happy if he would have backed down, but he is the last man to back down, and he adheres to his views very determinedly. I suggest that the Minister of Customs should pay a visit to Nova Scotia and study up the fishery question, and study our fishing industries. He should travel through the Province and visit the county of Queen's, and look at the manner in which our fishing is conducted, and, after visiting Nova Scotia, he should travel also through Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick and spend three or four months by the sea. He would return here a different man, being much benefitted by the sea air, and the information he would obtain would be of benefit to the Government, and he would then be able to meet hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House when they again bring up the fisheries question. I hope he will pay us a visit and investigate the requirements of our fishermen. Above all, I desire that our fishermen should be fully protected against all foreign encroachments, for this is important to our fishing industry. For some time they were led away with the idea of unrestricted reciprocity. Some few years ago reciprocity was the great word on our shores, and the fishermen were led by gentlemen of the persuasion of hon. gentlemen opposite to believe that if they had reciprocity simply they would have everything necessary for their welfare, that the fish would give a kind of reciprocity, and in return for the kindness of fishermen offering them very nice bait, they would take hold of the lines a little more readily. So they were to obtain not only the market of the United States without paying duty, but they were to obtain an increased quantity of fish. They are getting their eyes opened now, they are beginning fully to understand the importance of the fishing industry, and if to-morrow the question were put to our fishermen whether they would be better off with the privilege of our fish entering the American market free of duty, and giving the Americans the privilege of using our fisheries, I believe they would hesitate a long time before they would decide that they would do so.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). No.

Mr. FREEMAN. The hon. gentleman says no; I say yes. I am not prepared to say what our fishermen would do, but I am prepared to say they would hesitate before they would freely give away our fisheries and so allow the Americans to come in and take charge of our harbors, our bays, and our country, and all our fisheries, for the privilege of our sending in fish free. I am bound to say, as one living among fishermen, that that would be paying too dearly for the privilege of the removal of the duty, and I am satisfied that if we were to give up our fishing privileges for the removal of that duty, five years, two years would not elapse before we would rue our bargain and be very glad indeed to get back into the position we occupied before such bargain was made. One of the great objections I have to this fad of unrestricted reciprocity advocated by the other side of the House, is, that we give up our fisheries. I believe while there are mines of wealth in the Upper Provinces, there is no industry equal to the fishing industry in the Dominion. It is ever developing. A discussion was had the other day on fertilisers; we require no fertilisers for our fishing grounds; our fish produce their own fertilisers. We have a mine of wealth there in the fisheries that hon. gentlemen are unaware of. I desire to impress upon the House the necessity of looking well into the fishery question, and of guarding the interests of our fishermen. The merchants know well how to protect themselves, and they never allow their interests to be tampered with; but the fishermen are not in that position, they desire Parliament to protect them and watch over their interests; and, in the name of the fishermen of my own Province, I call upon the Government to protect our fishermen against all foreigners, whether French, Yankees, or people from any other country.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I desire to make a statement in correction of a remark I offered respecting the cost of carrying fish and coal between Halifax and Montreal. Estimating the distance at 722 miles, and calculating the charge at 60 cents a barrel for fish, and 7 cents per ton per mile for coal, the charge is $4.80 per ton for fish, and $2.16 per ton for coal. These figures on a car load would give $48 per car load for fish, and $21.60 for coal.

RETURN ORDERED.

Copies of all correspondence between Mr. Allan Wright, or his solicitor, with the Government of Canada, or any of its officers, in reference to a claim for damages in connection with the Indian Town Branch of the Intercolonial Railway, and also any report from any of the Government officers in reference to the same subject.—(Mr. Mitchell.)

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

MANUFACTURERS' LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, on Friday last I stated that on Monday I would speak as to the motion of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), with relation to the Manufacturers' Insurance Company. I do not see that the hon. gentleman is in his place, but whenever he arrives in the House I shall take the opportunity of speaking on the subject.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 68) respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. EDGAR. There is, I suppose, sufficient time before us this evening for certain explanations which the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), who has this Bill in charge, did not appear to be able to make on the last occasion we were in Committee on this Bill, owing to the shortness of the time at our disposal. I dare say that the hon. gentleman will now give us some information on one or two points which, I think, are material in considering this Bill. For instance, last Session the House authorised the issue of $15,000,000 in bonds by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and also authorised the Government to guarantee the interest on these bonds for fifty years. These bonds were largely appropriated by the terms of the legislation to the same purpose exactly as it is proposed to appropriate about twelve and a half million dollars of the consolidated debenture stock which is to be issued under this Bill. It is not quite a year since that issue of $15,000,000 was placed at the disposal of the company for the purpose of improvements upon the railway, and I think the House is certainly entitled to know how it comes to pass that within one short year the Canadian Pacific Railway Company require an issue of twelve and a half millions more of bonds for the improvements of the railway; not for original construction, but for improvements such as wharves, plant and equipments. My recollection is that in the correspondence which was laid before the House last Session, between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway that the president of the railway assured the Government that if that issue of $15,000,000 were guaranteed by the Government it would supply all that was necessary for the requirements and equipment of that road, so the Canadian Pacific Railway would require nothing further for a long time to come. I think on that point the promoter of the Bill should give the House some information.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I think it is a pity that the hon. gentleman did not ask for this information at the Railway Committee.

Mr. EDGAR. I did ask for it, and I could not get it.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. There were officers of the company there who would have given the hon. gentleman all the information that he seeks for. I may say with regard to the loan guaranteed by the Government last year, that all that the company is responsible for with regard to that legislation, and all that the Government have to look to, is the payment of the interest by the company, and ample security was taken then to secure the country against any loss. This Bill does not propose to interfere with that security in any way. All the priorities then existing on behalf of the Government or now existing, will remain in force, and nothing in this Bill affects any of the securities. That security is now a charge on the company, and the debenture stock is not to supersede any of the securities of the Government. The £500 sterling a mile comes in ahead of the stock, and to some extent comes in ahead of the interest which the company are to pay on the $15,000,000 loan, but this £500 a mile is to be spent in improvements on the company's property, such as improving the roadway, bridges, trestle-work, &c. It is, in fact, for the purpose of improving the earning power of the company and thereby enabling it the better to pay the interest on the loan. In point of fact, instead of this security being ahead of the Government security, it is actually rendering the company better able to pay the interest on the $15,000,000. The hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Edgar) went into an elaborate calculation, the other day, to show that last year the interest on this loan came after the $35,000,000 bonds, but that now it was coming after $121,000,000. In answer to the statement I would say that this Bill does not in the least change the original position of the company with regard to the security of the Government. All those fixed charges which are mentioned in the schedule of this Act, amounting to upwards of $4,000,000, were then ahead of the interest on this loan, but these fixed charges were distributed over the branches of the line, and it is now proposed to make them come in equally over the branches and the main line. The equity of redemption on the main line without those fixed charges, is not as valuable, I submit, as the equity of redemption would be to-day over the whole property of the company subject to all these fixed charges. The earning power of the main line is increased by the feeding it receives from the branch lines, and without this feeding from the branch lines the main line would be able to earn very little. If all these feeding lines were owned by independent companies or by antagonistic companies, they would take all the cream of the earnings from the main line and leave nothing but the skim milk for that line to earn. The main line without those branches would be of very little assistance to either the Dominion or the company. The equity of redemption over the whole property, after it has got this consolidated debenture stock upon it, will be worth more to the company, and therefore render it better able to pay the interest on the $15,000,000 loan than the main line itself with only $35,000,000 against it. I think, Sir, that this is the main subject upon which the hon. gentleman spoke. I submit that this measure, which is destined to promote the efficiency and earning power of the company, will put the company in a better postion to earn the interest on the $15,000,000 loan. The hon. gentleman says that last year the company got a certain sum of money, and this year they are coming down with this Bill. All I can say is that if the hon. gentleman had asked the question in the Railway Committee, he would have found where that money had gone. I cannot tell him now from memory; but I can tell him that it takes a great deal of money to build and operate a railway of this magnitude, extending from ocean to ocean. After it has been running for a few years, a great many temporary works have to be replaced with permanent works. In the distance from Quebec to Vancouver a great many trestles and temporary bridges have to be rebuilt or improved; a great many wharves and elevators have to be constructed; sidings have to be put down here and there, and, although each siding may only cost $2,000 or $3,000, when you consider the length of the line, in the aggregate, they cost a large sum of money, and a million dollars really does not go very far. The company do not say when they intend to issue this stock, but when it is issued it will be put to the best use in making this road what we all desire it to be, a great national highway worthy of the country.

Mr. EDGAR. I think my hon. friend is not at all accurate when he says that this new issue of consolidated debenture stock does not place a large sum of money ahead of the Government guarantee. I only ask for information in reference to the new issue of £500 sterling per mile, which I was told by the solicitor of the company in the Railway Committee was equivalent to $12,500,000. Beyond any question whatever, that is sought to be placed as an entirely new charge on the company ahead of the Government guarantee.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. It is to increase the earning power.

Mr. EDGAR. I suppose the theory is that it will increase the earning power, but that does not prevent it being placed as a new mortgage ahead of the Government guarantee. But in the case of any small private railway company, which came to ask for power to make a new issue of securities, I think the House would enquire why the issue made a year ago was insufficient. The hon. gentleman says I ought to have asked that question in the Railway Committee. I did ask it, but I think we all remember that there was another question of an inter-provincial character raised in that committee, which was absorbing so much of the discussion on that occasion, that a question about a mere matter of detail, involving $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 could not be listened to. There is plenty of time this evening; the House is not going to prorogue at Easter, I understand; and, in a matter involving so many millions, I think we ought to be given the time, and I intend to take the time, in endeavoring to get this information. I think it would be deplorable if somebody did not rise in the House and try to get information on points like this; and I do not offer the slightest apology to anybody for doing it; I hold that it is my duty to do it. With reference to the $15,000,000 authorised last year and guaranteed, I find in the schedule that there were $5,000,000 for bridges, trestles, reducing grades, and other improvements; $5,000,000 for rolling stock, locomotives, box cars, &c.; and $5,000,000 for elevators, filling trestles, sidings, docks, &c. That these are all admirable purposes, and most essential for a great undertaking like this, I do not deny; but the alarming feature is that after getting these sums one year ago for these purposes, which are not purposes of original construction, the company come to the House and ask authority to issue $12,500,000 more for the same sort of purposes. If that sort of thing is to go on continually, I think we ought to know it; but I hope the case is not as bad as that, and I had hoped the hon. gentleman would give us some explanation of what had become of the $15,000,000—whether it had been expended, or whether there was any sum in reserve, and whether or not the whole of this $12,500,000 would be required presently; but he does not vouchsafe that information, and I suppose we shall have to draw our own conclusions. The hon. gentleman says that the rearrangement of the securities does not affect the position of the Government. Well, I think the position of the Government has two or three aspects. In the first place, there is the guarantee which they gave to pay $525,000 a year if the company does not do it. To guarantee half a million a year for fifty years is not a trifling matter, but one about which we may well have a little discussion. I have no doubt the principal of this loan is perfectly well secured by the lands, but the Government do not guarantee the principal; they only guarantee the interest. There is some security for the interest if the road goes on and is successfully run; but there is no absolute security for that interest, and, therefore, if the Government will not do it, the House is interested in seeing to the position of the country. There is another interest which the House and the country have in this matter. An increase in the charges of the Canadian Pacific Railway from Vancouver to Montreal is created to the extent of at least $52,000,000 plus the $12,500,000, that is $64,500,000 altogether. Is it not of vast importance to the people of this country that that line should not be overcharged and overloaded, because we know that all the burdens put on it in the way of interest have to be met by the tolls charged on freight and passengers carried over the line, and that the whole country will pay them. Every $10,000,000 which we have put on that road has to be paid by the people of the North-West and old Canada who pay tolls and tariffs to the company; and therefore the whole country is interested in seeing that it is not unreasonably charged. The hon. gentleman says this does not really make a new charge. There is no use, I think, in talking in that way to this House. It may possibly not be a bad arrangement, but it undoubtedly creates a charge. There is now $35,000,000 on the line from Vancouver to Montreal, and there is $52,000,000 on the leased lines. They are two separate systems: one is the line built and assisted by the country; the other is the system of railways which the company have secured for their own business purposes, which of course are very likely, wise purposes, and will contribute to the business of the company. I think I showed the other night that the $35,000,000 is just 20 per cent. of the cost of the line from Montreal to Vancouver. I think I showed, and I do not think it will be disputed, that the $52,000,000 on these other lines is the full amount of the cost, is 100 per cent of their cost. It is a matter which we should consider, whether it is a good bargain for us to agree to that. I do not know what the earnings on the leased lines are, representing that charge of $52,000,000. Perhaps the hon. gentleman can show us that, although the cost of the leased lines is nothing like the cost of the other, the earning powers are much more, and that, therefore, they can stand a much larger mortgage. If he can give us some information of that kind, there would be some argument in it, but it is clear, from the argument of cost of the two systems, there can be no justification for this blanket mortgage. The only justification can be that the earning power of the one system—the leased system—is five times greater than the earning power of the other. The hon. gentleman says it is necessary for the main line to make these connections, so that they will contribute freight and traffic to it. That may be so, and I have no doubt it is so, but they have those connections already; they have got all those leases to-day; we are not giving them power now to secure lines that they have not already secured, so there is no argument in that. I do not know why it would not be well to make two systems of securities, if there is any reasonable doubt that this is loading down the line from Montreal to Vancouver to put $87,000,000 on it when there are only $35,000,000 really on that road. Why not state that the $52,000,000 covering all these leased lines shall be consolidated, and let that remain a blanket mortgage on those lines, while the $35,000,000 remains as a mortgage on the Government line? That would leave the Government line not loaded more than it is to-day, and it would be for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to work out those two systems in unison. Suppose the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should, year after year, find that they want ten, or twelve, or fifteen millions of dollars, as they have found for two years past, to build up these trestles, which I understood and stated on a former occasion in this House were only temporary and would have to be reconstructed some day. Supposing the company should come here year after year and say that this enormous system must be loaded up year after year, and state that this is necessary in order to build elevators, and permanent way, and new trestles and so on; and suppose, at last, that they find they cannot float their bonds, that they have been asking the public to take too many of them, what would be the result? I suppose the main line would revert to the Government. We are so enormously interested in it that I suppose the country would not permit the main line to fail. Then we would find that the whole main line would be saddled with a sum of $131,000,000 instead of $35,000,000. We might, under other circumstances, say that we would drop the leased lines and go on with the line which the country built. For the honor of the country we would have to maintain it, and, if this Bill passes, we would find the whole thing loaded on to that Government line. You cannot disentangle the two systems. You will have to take the whole thing with double the mileage which the Government undertook to build. These are matters which it is worth while for the Government to bear in mind. I do not want to delay this Bill to-night, but, in the public interest, it is of vast importance that we should understand where we are standing to-day if we pass this Bill.

Mr. LAURIER. I understood from the right hon. gentleman, last Friday, that the Government had entered into an agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the construction of a line from Harvey to Salisbury. Can the hon. gentleman give us some more information on this point?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot do it to-night, and for this reason: I stated that the Government had entered into an agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in relation to the construction of that road. At that time, although the agreement had been settled between the Government and the railway company, it had not passed formally into an Order in Council. After that conversation took place, it did pass into a Minute of Council, but it has not yet become an Order in Council. I suppose it will to-night, and that I may be able to lay it before the House to-morrow.

Mr. LAURIER. If this were a public measure, I would certainly feel it my duty to oppose it until all the details of the agreement which is said to be made between the Government and the company were before the House; but, as it is a private measure, I do not want to retard its passing, because it is a separate question. The hon. gentleman says that this is intended to promote the efficiency of the company. Very well, but he must expect, when he comes down with his proposition to which reference has been made, that we shall have a great deal to say in regard to it, because, if the agreement is what we expect it to be, it will be found that all the pledges given three years ago by the Minister of Railways, speaking for the Government, have been altogether lost sight of and violated.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will postpone that question until the agreement comes down, but the hon. gentleman will find that those pledges have not been violated.

Mr. LAURIER. I will be delighted to find that that is so, and I shall be much surprised.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think, after the statements which have been made by my hon. friends as to the financial effect of this proposal, by the country guaranteeing the interest on this money, the hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill should give the Committee some information on the subject.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I do not think the hon. gentleman was in when I spoke. I tried to-night to show that the Government last year did take all due security for the payment of the interest on those bonds, and that the money here which now goes ahead of them is for the purpose of increasing the earning power of the road, and thereby giving additional security that the interest will be paid. The shareholders are putting this ahead of them, they are not interfering in any way with the earning power of the company to pay the interest on these bonds. The hon. gentleman asked about these £500 a mile. He will remember that he was told in the Committee this was a provision not all for immediate use, but for use in the future, and the speech he has made is more intended for a meeting of shareholders than for the House. This Bill has to be approved of by the shareholders before it becomes law.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What portion of the $15,000,000 has already been expended, and what remains in the hands of the company?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I cannot really say. It is being expended now very fast from one end to the other, over the whole 5,000 miles of railway.

On sub-section 3,

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon. the Minister of Justice ought to give some information in regard to the statement made by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar). If the effect of this Bill is to be such as that hon. gentleman says it will, it is but just to the House that the hon. the Minister should give this information. No doubt the hon. gentleman who is promoting this Bill is a very high authority in the House, but he is not in the Government just yet, and we would like to see a member of the Government state whether the Bill will bring about the consequences predicted by the hon. member for West Ontario. The Government are responsible for it, although it is a private member who introduced it. As for myself, I desire to say that I will not be responsible for the consequences of this Bill.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Government are in no way responsible for this Bill. It stands before the House like any other Private Bill. The hon. gentleman must have misunderstood the argument of the hon. member for Ontario, or he would not have called upon me for information as to the mode in which this Bill affects the security of the Government, because I presume it is in relation to that subject he desires me to speak. The hon. gentleman will remember that the guarantee last Session was based upon the security of the land grant to the company, and the mortgage to secure the payment of the interest was taken upon that land grant. This Bill, although it increases the fixed charges on the railway, has no relation to the land grant of the company and does not propose any charges which will affect that grant.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. the Minister of Justice knows well that there is no security given to the Government—that the only security which the Government have is of this nature: When the lands——

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. A clause to that effect is in the Bill. It does not affect the lands.

Mr. EDGAR. The lands are mortgaged, and it could not affect them. All the lands that the company had unsold were mortgaged to secure the principal of the $15,000,000 bonds, and when those lands were sold, and realised upon, after paying the cost of doing so, and after paying some $3,500,000 of outstanding land grant bonds, the net surplus was to be paid in to the Government, who were to hold it as trustees for the holders of the bonds, to secure the principal, and the principal alone. If it should happen, and when it should happen, that there would be a net balance in the hands of the Government of that money, the Government was to pay 3½ per cent. interest upon it, and as that interest accrued, from the Government to the company, the company could deduct from it whatever money they had to pay on their guarantee; and that is, in so far as the land is concerned, I think, the hon. the Minister of Justice will bear me out in saying, all the security the Government took for the loan. But it will be recollected that the Finance Minister said that was a matter of small import, because the Canadian Pacific Railway were going to earn so much every year that they would be able to pay this out of their net profit, and that there was only $35,000,000 of mortgage, at any rate, ahead of them on this great undertaking. That is so, but it is not going to be so any longer. Perhaps the Government can tell us how much they owe the Canadian Pacific Railway in respect of interest on those sales? The Government will, perhaps, tell us if anything like enough has been realised to pay the land grant bonds outstanding, or how long it will be before sufficient will be realised? I do not say there is no security in that respect, but it is somewhat remote, and the Government should take care to guard generally against any impairing of the general security of the company.

Mr. MITCHELL. The matter resolves itself into a very small compass. The only claim the Government have against the company at all is for the $15,000,000 for which they have the security of the lands, and Parliament agreed to confirm the arrangement which the Government made last year in relation to those lands, and I believe the Government got ample security in those lands for the repayment of that money. The Bill under consideration is intended to enable the company to amalgamate and consolidate their security, and get money at a cheaper rate, and thus lower the fixed charges upon that property. It will also enable them, and that is the only salient feature of the Bill, to issue, to the extent of £500 sterling a mile, bonds for the purpose of putting on additional rolling stock, elevators, and keeping the line in a complete and efficient state. I do not think there is anything to fear from the passage of this Bill. It is purely a private and domestic matter, and at this late stage of the Session we ought to pass it without further delay.

Mr. MULOCK. I will just endorse what has fallen from the hon. member for Northumberland. I understand the only possible contention can be that, to the extent of these $500, the security of the Government, as endorsers of the £15,000 000 loan might be postponed. If the 13,000,000 acres of land which are mortgaged to give that endorsement are not worth the amount of our liability, then our whole venture in the North-West has turned out a failure. I am willing to take the chances of the security being adequate; but even if it were not, the £500 per mile will enhance the value of the property, increase its earning power, and improve rather than diminish our security. From a business stand point and as a business risk, I see no danger whatever. I do not think it will be in the slightest degree impaired, provided the £500 sterling is invested as required by the Act, and we have a right to assume that the company will see that there is no misapplication of that fund, and for that reason I am willing to take my share of the responsibility in supporting this legislation.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The security mentioned by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Edgar) is correct except in one particular and that is that the lands are pledged for the payment of the interest as well as the principal, the principal first and after that the interest.

On section 8 (new),

Mr. EDGAR. With reference to the suggestion of the Minister of Justice, that I was mistaken in saying that the lands were not to pay interest, I can show that I was not mistaken; for section 4 says:

"It shall be a condition of the mortgage that the net proceeds of the sale shall from time to time be paid over to the Government, the company at its option may pay over other moneys to the Government, the whole to constitute a fund to be set apart and held by the Government exclusively, for the purpose of settling the principal of the said bonds."

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. And after the payment of the principal it secures the interest.

Mr. EDGAR. It does not say so.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I would ask that in section 8, the words "this Act of incorporation or otherwise" be struck out, and the following inserted, "the Act which authorised its incorporation." This is the clause which was drafted by the Minister of Justice in order to show that it does not affect the lands which were granted by way of subsidy to the company.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before the Committee rises, I would like to understand who is correct with reference to the security we hold on the lands for the payment of these bonds. I understand the agreement to be last year, that 15,000,000 acres of land were given exclusively for the payment of these bonds. As that land is sold, the money arising from the sale is paid into the Government and held as a trust fund exclusively for that purpose. Supposing that the contingency arises that the interest of the bonds we have guaranteed is not paid, and we have to pay it. The Minister of Justice will not contend that he can abstract from that principal trust fund, that he can take anything of it to pay the interest. He cannot do it. That fund must remain until the whole amount of the principal of the bonds is paid off; and if we paid out the interest on the guarantee in the meantime we could not touch that money to recoup ourselves. So that practically we have the security placed in our hands for the payment of the principal of the bonds, which bonds are not held by us, but held by third parties, and we are trustees to receive the proceeds of the land and hold them as security for payment of the principal money. If in the meantime we are called upon to implement our guarantee to pay the interest on these bonds, we have no security for repayment.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The agreement with the Government distinctly provides the contrary, as I understand it. The lands are security for the principal first, and then for any arrears of interest.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The lands are security as payment for the interests until the land realises the full amount of the principal.

Mr. MULOCK. We are not making a new contract. The contract of 1887 is not being varied and it is not being prejudiced.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

DIVORCE—SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 123) for the relief of George McDonald Bagwell.—(Mr. Brown.)

Bill (No. 124) for the relief of Arthur Wand.—(Mr. Small.)

DIVORCE—WILLIAM HENRY MIDDLETON.

Mr. SMALL moved second reading of Bill (No. 125) for the relief of William Henry Middleton.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin.) To my mind the evidence given in this case is not sufficient to warrant this House in passing this Bill. The evidence is incomplete and unsatisfactory, it is not such as would convict any person in a court of law. The only real evidence produced was that of the Pullman car conductor. We find that he states that a lady took passage from Ottawa to Boston. At St. Albans she was joined by some individual. Who that individual was is not stated. He took tickets for Boston and took a sleeper in a Pullman car. It is contended that the two parties occupied one section. The conductor then was asked whether he was sure with respect to the names of these individuals. He stated that he was, and then he was asked how he could be sure as to these persons. He said that on his return to Ottawa some of the officials of the road had asked him whether or not there was a lady and gentleman left St. Albans together for Boston, and it was on that account he remembered it. Further on he was asked whether there were any other parties on the sleeper. He said he did not remember, he thought not. A year and a-half afterwards this Pullman car conductor, who did not know that circumstance, pretended to be able to identify, by photo., the two parties as those who had gone from St. Albans to Boston. If he did not remember whether there were any others on the car or not, he could scarcely be able to swear definitely whether those parties had been the ones who had taken passage from St. Albans and gone to Boston. He was cross examined as to whether he thought they were husband and wife; he said he thought they were. Other questions were asked him and very unsatisfactory replies obtained. I contend that on such evidence, and this is the only evidence upon which even a suspicion can be conveyed, it is not sufficient evidence on which to dissolve the tie of matrimony. It is an unreasonable proposition. If we leave that evidence and go to the evidence of the detective in Detroit, that evidence is not sufficient because the circumstances connected with it are not enough to show there was any guilt whatever as regards the parties.

Mr. LISTER. He was coming out of the room, that was all.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). At ten o'clock in the day a man was seen coming out of the room, and he was going down into the city very likely, and his coming out of the room at that hour is not sufficient to entitle a husband to a divorce from his wife. The detective stated that he went to the door and heard someone talking. He was asked as to whether he heard what they were talking about, and he said he could not hear anything further than the the man cough. The man came out of the room. The detective went and rapped at the door, and the lady asked, who was there? The detective said that a person was there desirous of seeing Mrs. Howard, the name under which she was registered at the hotel. In a few minutes she came to the door, and the detective spoke to her. The detective said: "Are you Mrs. Howard?" The reply was: "I am." The detective replied: "Your correct name is not Mrs. Howard, but Mrs. Middleton," and she answered "Yes." If she were desirous of concealing her name, if she were guilty, as it is represented she was guilty, she would not so readily have said that her name was Mrs. Middleton. If you take the evidence of the servant, I say that is not sufficient to prove this case. There is not any of the evidence which will show any guilt on the part of Mrs. Middleton. If you take the subsequent evidence, it is all of a circumstantial character and is not sufficiently strong to justify an Act of divorce. I contend, therefore, that it is unreasonable that this House should be called on to grant a divorce in this case. It might be said that more evidence could have been offered, that a greater amount of evidence could have been presented to the Committee of the Senate. If there could have been more evidence produced it should have been advanced, and we have on right to allow a Bill of this kind to pass, for if there is more evidence it should have been furnished. The Bill should be rejected on this occasion, and it could be reintroduced next year, if there was more evidence that could be produced and laid before the Committee of the Senate. I shall, therefore, take pleasure in voting against granting the relief asked for in this Bill.

Mr. LISTER. The simplicity of the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House is astonishing. If there ever was a case in which the applicant is entitled to a divorce it is this case. What does the evidence show? That on the day in question she left her home without the knowledge of her husband, went on the train on which it is said this man joined her; her sister met her there; the Pullman car conductor the day afterwards was asked about the incident, and that brought to his mind the fact that these two people had occupied the same berth on that train on that night. If we follow them to Detroit we find they occupied the same room, that the detective swore that Hamilton came out of the room; that he, the detective, then went into the room and found this woman in her night dress and with a shawl around her shoulders. If that does not convince the hon. gentleman that there is something wrong in the state of Denmark, I do not know what will.

Mr. WILSON. I call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that the hour has expired for Private Bills,

Mr. SPEAKER: There is one minute more.

Bill read the second time, on a division.

MANUFACTURERS' LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Before the Orders of the Day are called I wish to speak on the motion of my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister) respecting the Manufacturers' Insurance Company. It would appear from the hon. gentleman's remarks that an undue return had been made with respect to the formation of this company, and with respect to the deposit of the money. This statement of the hon. gentleman was based on a letter that appeared in one of the Toronto papers, signed by Mr. Maclennan—now Judge Maclennan—as solicitor for Sir Alexander

Campbell. The whole thing has arisen from misapprehension, which the House will understand when I explain the matter. The Manufacturers' Insurance Company was got up in Toronto and the promoters formed a provisional board of directors, who proceeded to get sufficient stock subscribed and a sufficient fund raised to enable them to procure a charter. At that time Sir Alexander Campbell was in England. I was asked to become the president of the company, and I agreed to do so. Sir Alexander had left the conduct of his business, or of some of his business, in the hands of Mr. Frederick Barwick, barrister, Toronto, whom everybody knows. Mr. Barwick wrote to Sir Alexander Campbell stating that the company was being formed, that I had agreed to become the president, and asking him to become vice-president and to take the necessary stock. Sir Alexander Campbell answered him by a telegram which I have the permission of both Sir Alexander Campbell and Mr. Barwick to read. The telegram is this:

"Letter received. Answer, yes; subscribe same amount as Macdonald.

"CAMPBELL."

The Macdonald named being myself. Sir Alexander Campbell followed up that cable message by the following letter:—

"LONDON, ENGLAND.

"MY DEAR BARWICK,

"I have your note of the 6th. The letter of Mr. Carlile with reference to the Manufacturers' Life and Indemnity Insurance Company was closed with your own. I do not intend to allow the fact of my holding the office of Lieutenant Governor to interfere in the least with my ordinary pursuits, which are not very numerous, and do not involve anything other than the responsibilities of such a position as you now suggest to me to take in the Manufacturers' Life and Indemnity Insurance Company. And in reply to your note I beg to say, that with the conditions you make with reference to securing the strength and stability of the company, I will very gladly accept the position of first vice-president under Sir John Macdonald. I see in Mr. Carlile's letter that he says Sir John Macdonald has taken stock, which I shall be very glad to do also on my return, to such an amount as I may think reasonable. Should it be necessary to fix this amount in the meantime, you may subscribe for me to the amount as Sir John Macdonald has subscribed.

"Faithfully yours,

"A. CAMPBELL."

Then apparently Mr. Barwick asked for an answer before the receipt of his first "cable," and Sir Alexander Campbell says:

"I have just cabled you. Letter received. Answer yes. Conditions as indicated. Subscribe same amount as Macdonald."

On this Mr. Barwick very naturally thought himself at liberty to subscribe the stock which he did as the company were anxious to get into operation without delay, and the necessary amount of the percentage on the stock subscribed to the same extent as myself was paid. Then it was advertised that the company was being formed; I was announced as president, and Sir Alexander Campbell, Mr. George Gooderham, of Toronto, a well known gentleman, and Mr. Bell, of Guelph, as vice-presidents. After all this Sir Alexander Campbell came back from England and, on considering matters, changed his mind. He thought that he would not take the stock, that he would not accept the vice-presidency nor be connected with the company, for reasons which I need not for the purposes of this statement enter upon. He stated that he would rather not do so; and after some discussion, and as there were plenty of subscribers for the stock, and as, of course, it would be impossible to insist upon his being vice-president if he did not choose to be vice-president, his stock was cancelled and the company was formed without him. I have in my possession correspondence of April the 3rd, just the other day, which I am privileged to read. It is a letter to Sir Alexander Campbell from Mr. Gooderham, the first vice-president of the company. It is as follows:—

"TORONTO, 3rd April, 1889.

"HON. SIR ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, K.C.M.G.,
"Toronto.

"DEAR SIR,—You are doubtless aware that the attention of Parliament has been drawn to the fact that you appear as a shareholder to the extent of $10,000 in the original list of shareholders of the Manufacturers' Life Insurance Company, returned to the Government under oath of the proper officer of the company, and that you have denied over the signature of your solicitor in the Toronto World of September last that you were ever connected with the company either as a shareholder or one of its vice-presidents.

"These statements, without more from the company, will be calculated to leave it in a very false position, and one which its enemies would be only too ready to take advantage of. I, therefore, write to request that you will kindly permit me, as an act of justice to my company, to lay before Parliament your cable from England to Mr. F. D. Barwick, authorising him to subscribe stock upon your behalf, such portions of your letter to him as confirm the cable and are germane to the matter, and the power of attorney authorising the subscription of stock signed by Mr. Barwick on your behalf. I desire these for the purpose of showing why the provisional directors represented you as a shareholder and vice-president of the company. It was upon the faith of these representations, among others, that I, myself, became a shareholder and vice-president of the company. I certainly never thought of blaming the provisional directors under the circumstances for making these representations, and if any one else has, it has not come to my knowledge. I desire also to say that since hearing your explanations, which I was only lately favored with, I freely admit that you acted entirely within your rights on the matter, and further that it would be most unjust to you to reflect upon your action which, in the light of your recent explanation, places your conduct beyond adverse criticism.

"I shall take the earliest opportunity of having the matter laid before Parliament when I trust both yourself and the company will be relieved from any imputation in the matter.'

"Faithfully yours,

"GEO. GOODERHAM."

To which Sir Alexander Campbell replied:

"TORONTO, 3rd April, 1889.

"GEO. GOODERHAM, Esq.,
"Toronto.

"DEAR SIR,—I am in receipt of your favor of to-day, in which you ask my permission to lay before Parliament my cable and letter to Mr. F. D. Barwick of 20th April, 1887, which you are quite at liberty to do.

"I regret exceedingly that you consider that the letter of my solicitor to the Toronto World of September last to which you allude, should have placed your company in a false position, but I found that the public press in articles commendatory of the company were still associating my name with it and I felt it was necessary that I should correct this.

"In view of your assurance that you do not hold me blameworthy, it is not necessary that I should state here the grounds upon which I considered myself obliged to take the course I did."

"Yours faithfully,

"A. CAMPBELL."

IMPORTATION OF FISH IN BOND.

Mr. EISENHAUER. During the debate this afternoon on the motion of the hon. member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurie), the hon. member for Queen's, N. S. (Mr. Freeman) stated that I had given a pledge to my constituents that I would oppose the importation of any foreign fish. I wish to deny emphatically that I made any such pledge.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. COOK moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 9) to amend the Railway Act. He said: This Bill was referred to a Select Committee some time ago, and the Committee, I understand, threw it out without much consideration. I consider it a Bill of some importance to the public at large. When the public are landed at a station, I think they should be provided with a platform, and I think that their baggage should be carried with care and should not be smashed as it often has been by the employés of railway companies. Still, the Bill met the fate it did in the Committee, from the fact stated by the Minister of Justice, that, in his estimation, it was not properly drawn. If hon. gentlemen are more interested in railroad companies than in the public, then they may reject this Bill, and I am going to give them the opportunity of doing it. I move that the House go into Committee on the Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Committee of Supply!

Mr. COOK. Yes; I may say, as it has been jocularly thrown across the House, into Committee of Supply. There is probably a supply in the pockets of a great many gentlemen.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Before the question is put, it is only fair to the Committee, of which I was a member as well as the hon. gentleman, to state that the Bill was not unceremoniously reported upon by the Committee. The Bill is a short one, containing only three clauses. The Committee fully heard the hon. gentleman's explanations of it; I think they heard them a second time, after giving two or three persons interested in railway enterprises an opportunity to present their arguments against it. On the occasion of the second reading of the Bill, I called the attention of the House to what I considered were grave objections to its passage. The first section imposed upon a railway company the necessity of having a platform at every stopping place to enable the passengers to alight, preventing, as I thought, the stopping of trains for the convenience of passengers at accommodation stopping places, preventing trains stopping at street crossings, and preventing the convenient despatch of excursion trains, which are very long, and for which it would be impossible to erect platforms of sufficient length. The attention of the Committee was called to several instances, as to one of which the hon. gentleman made a complaint, of the inconvenience of passengers not being allowed to leave a train before it could reach a platform beside which another train was drawn up. The other feature of this Bill relating to the treatment of the baggage of passengers I also called attention to. I showed that the penalty would always fall on the company, even though the employees of the company might be solely culpable, and notwithstanding any precautions the company might have taken for the proper treatment of passengers' baggage. It was on these considerations that I recommended the House not to assent to the Bill; and, therefore, with the view of disposing of the matter, I move that the House do not go into Committee on the Bill, but that the Bill be taken into consideration this day six months.

Amendment agreed to, on a division.

FRAUD IN THE SALE OF NURSERY STOCK.

Mr. BOYLE moved second reading of Bill (No. 6) to prevent the practice of fraud by tree peddlers and commission men in the sale of nursery stock.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There can be no objection to this Bill being read a second time, with the understanding that it will be sent to the Committee which has been specially appointed to look into all these matters which come under the criminal law, and that my hon. friend who has this Bill in charge shall be added to the Committee.

Mr. LAURIER. When this Bill was up before, the hon. mover of the Bill expressed himself as ready to discuss it. There are strong objections to this Bill being read a second time at all. If the hon. gentleman has any explanation to give, I would call on him to do so now.

Mr. BOYLE. In rising to move the second reading of this Bill, I do not know that I need detain the House at any great length in proving the existence of the evil which it aims at. I have, no doubt, every member here present will recall instances of the frauds of tree peddlers and nurserymen in the sale of nursery stock. The first clause of the Bill reads as follows:—

"No person, and no agent of any corporation or association, shall sell or offer for sale any tree, plant, shrub or vine or other nursery stock not grown in Canada without first filing with the Secretary of State of Canada an affidavit setting forth his name, age, occupation and residence, and if an agent, the name, occupation and residence of his principal, and a statement as to where the nursery stock aforesaid to be sold is grown, together with a bond to Her Majesty in the penal sum of dollars, conditioned to save harmless any citizen of Canada who is defrauded by any false or fraudulent representations as to the place where such stock sold by such person, corporation or association was grown, or as to its quality, variety or hardiness for climate: Provided, that the bond aforesaid shall, when the principal is a resident of Canada, be given by such principal and not by the agent."

I propose to fill up the blank with the sum of $1,000. I do not wish to be understood as casting any reflections on the business or occupation of selling nursery stock, or in any way impugning the character or integrity of the majority of the people engaged in this occupation. Now, I would be very far from desiring to do anything which would in any way interfere with the exercise by these men of a safe and necessary occupation; but I do not think these people will in the least be affected by this measure. My own opinion is that by removing from the path of competition those who are found to be worthless and unnecessary, those who practice fraud and dishonesty, the occupation of the honest dealer will be made but the more remunerative. I fancy that no man engaged in that business will find any difficulty in obtaining security to the extent of $1,000, either by the aid of some reputable person of good financial standing or by the bond of some reputable guarantee company. No person desiring to traffic honestly and to conduct his business in a legitimate manner would object to this measure, but would rather be favorable to it. Nor do I desire to say that the farmers, fruit growers and others, which this Bill is intended to protect, are, in any way, unable to look after their own interests. I believe the majority have sufficient shrewdness and prudence in business management to take care of themselves; but, unfortunately, there is a sufficiently large portion who have not given sufficient consideration to the matter, and who are apt to become the victims of fraudulent and dishonest men, and it is the duty of Parliament, so far as it can, to legislate for the protection of this minority. I may be asked why the Bill does not give protection against other frauds? I freely admit that legislation might be extended further in this direction, but I think this measure is sufficient, as an experiment, at present, and, when we see how well it will work, we can extend the principle further. This class of fraud differs from others in this respect: that it takes a much longer time to be discovered, and thus makes detection more difficult. An order is taken from the fruit dealer or grower in which certain varieties of fruit are specified and recommended for hardiness, adaptability and other valuable considerations; it is duly filled, and no one but an expert can say that the goods are not true to their name, and as represented. It is only after they have been delivered and paid for, it is only after the fruit-grower has expended his patient toil upon them and has lost years of toil, and also the use of his land, that he discovers the fraud, and for this reason legislation ought to be directed specially against this class of fraud. Perhaps a more important objection raised against the Bill is that it seeks to discriminate against foreign nurseries in favor of our own. I admit some such discrimination is provided for in this Bill. I admit that is a feature of this Bill; and my reason for making this discrimination is that I want to strike at the root of the evil. It is among foreign nurserymen that the evil exists. So soon as an order is taken by one of these agents, he hies himself to one of the foreign nurseries or buys at auction lots of the rubbish and refuse of American nurseries, which he labels according to the orders he has taken, and ships to the persons who gave him the orders, and the fraud is not discovered until too late. I have received a letter from a nurseryman residing in the west who recites the methods adopted by one of these nursery dealers some years ago. He says:

"One of the largest swindles was perpetrated in 1872 and 1873, by a bogus firm from Ohio whose agents overrun the country claiming to sell new varieties of extraordinary merit and who to better carry out their swindle, carried wax fruit in jars. Their orders were filled with ordinary stock from a bankrupt American nursery and the varieties were labeled to suit their orders It was claimed by many that this firm carried out of the country more than $100,000 and that too in spite of warnings in the press, which were given by parties who had become suspicious and made investigation just about the time the stock was delivered."

Another letter bearing on the subject I have received from a gentleman in Nova Scotia who complains as follows:—

"The delivery is invariably attempted by a different party from the one taking the order or making the contract as agent. The article is never of the class stipulated, treelets frequently being dead beyond recovery. The article may be refused, but it is left upon the premises, the deliverer professing to know nothing of the terms made by his predecessor. The recipient of the goods refuses payment and in consequence is sued at a remote district perhaps 200 or 300 miles distant. The plaintiffs live in a foreign state and are not required to make any deposit in security for costs of defendant should the latter win the suit. The consequence is that if the defendant gained the suit upon trial he would have to bear his own costs besides loss of time. Again, as frequently happens, the defendants are summoned for appearance at these remote distances in the midst of seed-time or harvest. The consequence of these adverse conditions is that they will pay amounts not exceeding $50 rather than undergo the outlay, loss of time and direct expenditure of money from the outset. The claim may be a swindle as palpable as the nose upon a man's face, yet, under the circumstances enumerated they will rather pay the claim than risk the loss of perhaps double the amount.

"These itinerant peddlers are usually destitute of character and invariably impecunious. The loss of a suit at law by such individuals results in nothing better to the defendants than having to pay their own costs, on the principle that 'nothing can be had of cat but the skin.'

"These foreign agents serve no useful purpose on agriculture or horticulture for now there is abundance of local seed-grower nurseries, &c., the products of which are better adapted to our climate than the foreign articles."

I hold that no such objection can be raised against our own nurserymen. They accept bonâ fide orders through their own agents and are scrupulous to execute their orders with great exactness, as the very existence of their business depends on the integrity with which the orders are executed. I do not therefore propose to hamper them by unnecessary restrictions. A year ago, for reasons best known to this House, our Government saw fit to reduce the duty on nursery stock, and thus expose our nurserymen to the fierce competition of the foreign nurserymen. It was claimed that the Americans admitted our nursery stock free, but so soon as our nurserymen entered their markets, they were met by so many restrictions, local restrictions, municipal taxes, license laws, and other restrictions of a like character, that they were prevented from having any chance in the free trade market of the United States. The New York State Legislature enacted that:

"No person shall be authorised to travel from place to place within this State, for the purpose of carrying to sell or exposing to sale any goods, wares or merchandise of the growth, produce or manufacture of any foreign country, unless he shall have obtained a license as a hawker and peddler, in the manner hereinafter directed."

Mr. CHARLTON. In what manner?

Mr. BOYLE. By license.

Mr. CHARLTON. What is the difficulty in getting a license?

Mr. BOYLE. There is none in getting the license, but it costs $50 per annum. Michigan enacts:

"No person shall be authorised to travel from place to place within this State, for the purpose of carrying to sell or exposing to sale any goods, wares or merchandise, or to take orders for the purchase of goods, wares or merchandise by sample lists or catalogue, unless he shall have obtained a license as a hawker or peddler, in the manner hereinafter directed."

The subsequent section imposes a license of fifty dollars for one year. Another section provides:

"Nothing contained in this chapter (or Act) shall be construed to prevent any mechanic, manufacturer or nurseryman residing in the State from selling his work or production by sample or otherwise without license, nor shall any wholesale merchant having a regular place of business within the State be prevented by anything herein contained from selling by sample without license, but no merchant shall be allowed to peddle or to employ others to peddle goods not his own manufacture without the license herein provided."

This State enactment prevents not only for selling by hawking or peddling, but also taking orders for any foreign product. The State laws of Massachusetts provide that:

"Any person may go about from town to town or from place to place in the same town exposing for sale and selling fruits, provisions, live animals, brooms, agricultural implements, hand tools used in making boots and shoes, fuel, newspapers, books, pamphlets, agricultural products, of the United States and the product of his own labor or the labor of his family; but nothing in this section shall be so construed as to include among the things that may be so exposed for sale or sold any articles of the growth or produce of foreign countries."

Section 4 provides:

"That license may be granted upon certain conditions for selling wares not mentioned above (that is articles the growth or produce of any foreign country) to any person who is or who has declared his intention of becoming a citizen of the United States and applicant must make oath to this effect."

Vermont, also, has restrictive laws upon foreign products and requires every licensed peddler to be a citizen of the United States. The Revised Statutes of Maine provide as follows:—

"Whoever except as hereinafter provided travels from town to town or place to place in any town on foot or by any kind of land or water conveyance, carrying or offering for sale any goods, wares or merchandise, whole or by sample, forfeits not less than $50 nor more than $200 and all property thus unlawfully carried; but this provision does not apply to commission merchants and commercial brokers travelling from place to place in the city or town where they reside, and selling or offering to sell goods by sample or otherwise; nor to any citizen of the State selling fish, fruit, provisions, farming utensils or other articles lawfully raised or manufactured in the United States."

Another enactment provides for the issue of the licenses and fees to be paid. The most rigid and arbitrary of all the provisions is that in the State of Minnesota, which is the last with which I will trouble the House, and I ask the special attention of the hon. members to this law. It provides as follows:—

"Sec. 1. It shall be unlawful for any person, corporation or association to sell or offer for sale any tree, plant, shrub or vine not grown in the State of Minnesota, without first filing with the Secretary of State an affidavit setting forth his name, age, occupation and residence, and, if an agent, the name, occupation and residence of his principal, and a statement as to where the nursery stock aforesaid to be sold is grown, together with a bond to the State of Minnesota in the penal sum of two thousand ($2,000) dollars, conditioned to save harmless any citizen of this State who shall be defrauded by any false or fraudulent representations as to the place where such stock sold by such person, corporation or association was grown, or as to its hardiness for climate: Provided, that the bond aforesaid shall, when the principal is a resident of this State, be given by such principal, and not by the agent.

"Sec. 2. The Secretary of the State shall, on the full compliance with foregoing provisions, give the applicant aforesaid a certificate under his official seal, setting forth in detail the facts showing a full compliance by said applicant with the provisions of this Act. And said applicant shall exhibit the same or a certified copy thereof to any person to whom stock is offered for sale.

"Sec. 3. Any person whether in the capacity of principal or agent, who shall sell, or offer for sale any foreign-grown nursery stock within this State, shall furnish to the purchaser of such stock a duplicate order, with a contract specifying that such stock is true to name as represented."

Section 4 provides for the punishment of anyone who infringes the other clauses of the Act. It will be noticed that, while these provisions apply to some extent to citizens of other States, and as between one State and another, they all apply against Canada. I hold that, if it is lawful for New York, Maine and other States to prevent foreign produce being sold in those States, it cannot be wrong for us to enact this Bill. If Michigan and some other States can say that the citizens of no other country shall sell trees in those States, it is not wrong for us to enact as I propose we shall to-night. And, if this law of the State of Minnesota is right and my Bill is almost a copy of it—it is right for us to enact the same law, especially as our nurserymen are exposed to competition with the nurserymen of the United States. We should have the right to pass legislation here similar to that. There is no violation of international comity, there is no breach of the rules of courtesy which should obtain between ourselves and foreign countries, and I hope that this Parliament will permit this Bill to become law.

Mr. BROWN. The Committee on Frauds have examined a great number of witnesses, and the members of that Committee have been astonished beyond measure at the divers way and means by which unsuspecting men have been defrauded of large sums of money; and I am sure that the people of this country will hail with pleasure any legislation in the direction of punishing the people who pursue this system of defrauding and cheating the farming community. The hon. gentleman has stated to the House in a concise manner the facts in regard to his Bill, which, in many respects, are similar to those which have been brought to light by the Committee on Frauds. Probably to-morrow that Committee will be able to report to the House, but I may say now that I believe that report will show that the most atrocious and scandalous frauds have been perpetrated, in regard to grape vines, where men in the Province of Ontario have been practically ruined in consequence of believing in the declaration of the men who sold them these vines, and charged them perhaps $1.50 apiece for them, on the guarantee that they were exceedingly prolific. The forms of agreement were very ingeniously drawn, and, after the vines were tested, the purchasers found they were not only no better than vines which they could have obtained in Canada at one tenth of the price, but were a great deal worse. I am sure that any legislation of this kind will be hailed with satisfaction, because the evidence which has been given before the Frauds Committee shows that the people have been swindled not only in regard to vines but in every conceivable thing that the farmer requires, and, up to this time, there has been no mode by which these swindlers can be attacked. Some people say that the farmers ought to know what they are about, and not allow themselves to be gulled in that way. But as my hon. friend says there ought to be something done for the protection of the minority, who are not so strong-minded and not so able to resist the arts of these travelling schemers. I have great pleasure in giving my support to so admirable a measure.

Mr. COLTER. I have perused this Bill and I believe there are a great many things in it which are of importance to the farming community, But these frauds which the hon. member for Monck (Mr. Boyle) wants to prevent, are not confined to foreign grown nursery stock at all. I know very well that some of these frauds are perpetrated by our own nurserymen. A few months ago I was consulted professionally by a gentleman who bought a stock from one of these nurseries. It is not proper for me to allude to it more particularly, but this nursery is not very far distant from the constituency of the hon. member for Monck. After the trees had come into bearing he found they were not at all true to sample. He had not preserved the contract as against this nursery firm, and his case was practically hopeless. He was damaged to a great extent, and as a matter of fact he was obliged to grub out those very trees. We ought to have some protection such as that which is foreshadowed here against foreign grown nursery stock, against the nursery stock that is grown in our own country. Contracts of this nature differ materially from ordinary contracts. The purchaser and the seller are not on equal terms. The seller of this nursery stock knows, or ought to know, what the varieties are, but the purchaser cannot tell from handling the trees, what these varieties are. Therefore, when a person sells any nursery stock, falsely representing its quality, he is guilty of a fraud, and this fraud ought to be punishable. Besides, if we are to have some provision of this kind, and we were to strike out of the first clause the words "not grown in Canada," there would be no invidious distinction between our own nurserymen and those on the other side. If our own nurserymen intend to do what is right there would be no harm whatever in striking out this invidious distinction; and if we made a similar correction elsewhere through the Bill, I believe a very great benefit would be conferred upon farmers, and no harm whatever would be done to our own honest nurserymen.

Mr. BARRON. I listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown) with a good deal of interest, and I can certainly endorse every word he said regarding the frauds perpetrated upon farmers. This Committee, of which he was chairman, took a good deal of evidence, and I am sure that the report, when it is brought in, will be of very great use indeed. I do not think, however, that the hon. member pursued his usual industry prior to speaking upon this particular Bill, for I fail to see that it is directed against fraud in the manner in which legislation is proposed to be directed by virtue of the work of his Committee. He appears to support this Bill because he thinks it is a protection against fraud; I, on the other hand, oppose this Bill because I think it is calculated to perpetuate a fraud. It is calculated to deprive farmers who buy fruit trees of the benefit of two markets; it is calculated to prevent the importation into this country of fruit trees the result of which, by coming into competition with home nurseries, would give the farmers of our country cheaper fruit trees. I, therefore, oppose the Bill for the reason that it is in effect introducing the protectionist principle, and preventing the farmers from having the benefit of purchasing their fruit trees and nursery stock in as cheap a manner as possible. I, therefore, move that the Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read this day six months.

Amendment negatived on a division, and Bill read the second time.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved that Bill (No. 6) be referred to the Select Committee on Bills Nos. 16, 9 and 13, and that Mr. Boyle's name be added to that Committee.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I regret exceedingly that the Government has seen proper to adopt this course in reference to this Bill. I think if they had considered the interest, the welfare, and the friendly relations of this country with our neighbors across the line, they would not have adopted the course of referring this Bill to a sub-committee. The hon. gentleman who had charge of the sub-committee has not yet reported the proceedings of that Committee to this House, and I think it was not fair nor parliamentary that they should refer to the proceedings and make use of the evidence obtained by that Committee, and retail it to this House, until such time as the Bill has been presented to the House. I am very much surprised indeed that the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown) should go so far out of his way, having had a Committee under his control which he ought to have reported to this House long ago, that he should come down here when a Bill of this importance is under discussion, and there retail what he conceives to be the gross wrongs and injustices that had been inflicted upon the farmers of this country. And yet, Sir, with all these serious charges, and he in possession of them, allows two or three months of the Session to elapse without making a report to this House upon which to found the Bill, and to put the other members of this House in possession of the information he had obtained. I say that if he is chairman of that Committee he has done a gross injustice to the members of this House, and he ought in all fairness come down and allow the other members of the House an opportunity of acquiring the information he has obtained. Sir, we find that this Bill introduced early in the Session, and presented a few days after the opening, has been delayed and allowed to remain upon the Order Paper from that time to the present. Has it been on account of the reasons of the promoters of the Bill? Or has it been from the desire of the Government? Am I to understand that the Government feel justified in allowing this Bill to become law, and thereby keep the promises that they have made? I will appeal to them whether they have not given their friends to understand that this Bill should not become law this Session. I would ask if the Government have not led those interested in nursery stock on the other side of the line to understand that this Bill would not be allowed to become law. It is trifling with this House for the First Minister or the Minister of Justice to refer this Bill to a Committee whereby to strangle it. They should have the manliness, the fortitude, the determination to treat this Bill in a fair and equitable manner. They should allow the people of the United States to know distinctly whether they are going to allow this Bill to become law or not, and not relegate it to a Committee to be slaughtered there. The promoter of the Bill has introduced a Bill, of what nature? He says that in the United Stated peddlers are charged $50 for the privilege of peddling fruit trees, if they go from one State to another or even among citizens of one State, and he pretends to say that the nurserymen or agents selling fruit trees should likewise pay a tax here. This is a State tax for revenue purposes. This is quite a different Bill. Does the United States impose upon agents receiving trees from Canada going into the United States a bond that those trees shall be in such and such a condition? What would be the result if this Bill becomes the law of the land? It would virtually exclude every nurseryman from one end of the country to the other from having the opportunity of selecting fruit trees from nurserymen of the very best standing in the United States. It would compel our people to accept fruit trees from our own nurserymen, and our nurserymen could bring whatever fruit trees they felt disposed to from the other side, take them to their own nurseries and distribute fruit trees grown there throughout Canada. I ask this House whether we should treat in this unfair and unjust manner those who are carrying on business as agents of nurserymen on the other side, and compel them to give a bond that the trees would be as specified, and that the nurserymen, if they appointed sub-agents, should give a bond and come to the Secretary of State's office here and register their names. If this Bill should become law it really means the prohibition of the importation of nursery trees from the United States to Canada. Are the Government prepared to place a measure on the Statute-book to prevent nursery stock coming from the United States? The Americans allow small fruits to go from Canada to the United States. Is this the kind of feeling the Government wish to encourage between this country and the United States? Is this what we are to expect as a sort of compensation for allowing Americans to fish in our waters? Are the Government going to compel the Americans to pay a little homage to us on account of fruit trees? It is unfair to adopt this course in regard to this Bill. I ask them to come forward and say whether they will or will not allow this Bill to become law. I appeal to the First Minister, and ask whether he has not already promised those engaged in the business on the other side that such a Bill as this would not become the law of the country at the present time. I appeal to him as to whether he has not already undertaken that this Bill should not become law during the present Session. If such be the case, it is wrong to leave these agents, who are anxious to know whether their business is going to be interfered with, in doubt as to the Government's policy. The First Minister claims to be the friend of his country, he claims that he desires to do everything in the interests of the Dominion, and yet it is unreasonable that he should consider this Bill merely for the sake of not giving offence to the hon. member for Monck (Mr. Boyle). Such is not the course any hon. gentleman should take in this House. It would be more manly to say what he intended to do and what he did not intend to do, and we must view with the most serious apprehension the passage of this Bill. I am opposed, therefore, to this Bill going to a Special Committee. I believe its reference would be injurious to the public interests and detrimental to the best interests of Canada, and if it be referred to that Committee I have no guarantee and no reason for believing that those engaged in the nursery business can carry on their trade during the coming season. The hon. member for Monck (Mr. Boyle), may bring strong pressure to bear to allow the Bill to pass into law, and thereby those engaged in the nursery business would be hampered in conducting their business during the coming season. For these reasons and for other reasons I consider that the course pursued by the First Minister and the Government is hardly a fair one for those engaged in the trade in Canada and is not fair to the people of the United States.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. member for Monck (Mr. Boyle), in the course of his remarks, gave us an indication of the reasons that actuated him in bringing this Bill into this House. He tells us that a year ago the Government removed the duty from nursery stock, and that, in consequence of this, Canadian nurserymen have since been subjected to a fierce competition from American dealers in nursery stock, and it is for this reason that he desires to give them protection again in the indirect manner that this Bill proposes. It is, therefore, that this fierce competition may be remedied, it is for that purpose that the Bill is brought before this House. The hon. gentleman spoke of rubbish being brought from American nurseries. I know something about nursery stock, and I have bought nursery stock both from Canadian and American nurserymen, and it is a very good thing for the farmers of Canada that we have American competition in this matter. We get from the Rochester nurseries, the most extensive on this continent, the best class of stock obtainable, and it is a great boon to the farmers to be able to obtain that stock, and any impediment placed in the way of obtaining it is one detrimental to the interests of the farmers at large, however it may affect the interests of the nurserymen in the county of Monck. This Bill, if it should become law, would inevitably produce irritation. The first clause provides that a Canadian nurseryman may give a bond himself. It says: The principal may give a bond and that bond shall enable him to employ any number of agents in Canada. But a principal of a nursery stock firm in the United States is not permitted to give his bond, although I am told by some of them they are perfectly willing to do so, but his bond is to be exacted for every agent and every employé of that firm selling stock in Canada. Now, some of those nursery farmers employ two or three hundred agents, and the agents work for them, some probably for a few days or some probably for a month or two, and to exact bonds of a thousand dollars each from those agents is simply to prevent them from the privilege of doing business in Canada at all. This would be interpreted as a most unjust provision, and as a cowardly provision as well, because it aims indirectly to do that which the Government does not dare to do directly, for if it comes into force it will prevent those persons from doing business in this country at all. In Congress last session a Bill was introduced by Mr. Baker, I think, who I believe is the member for Monroe County, New York, which is the seat of the great nursery interest of the State of New York and of the United States. This Bill in the preamble sets forth the fact that the Bill introduced in the Canadian Parliament by Mr. Boyle—that gentleman's name is mentioned—was a reason for calling on the Congress of the United States to retaliate, and as an act of retaliation they proposed among other things to place a duty of five cents a dozen on eggs. Our exportation of eggs to the United States in one year was about fourteen million dozens, amounting to more than $2,000,000 in value, and a duty upon eggs would effect every housewife in this country. I do not know of any duty upon any article which would have a more disastrous effect on the fortunes of the party opposite than a duty imposed upon eggs by the American Government, because that duty would bring the argument home to so many families in this Dominion that free trade was a good thing and that an import duty on Canadian products into the United States was a bad thing. I believe the Government ought not to permit this Bill to pass a second reading in this House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It has passed its second reading.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is an unfair Bill, because it provides that the owner of an American stock nursery must give a bond for every single man whom he employs in Canada, while only one bond is exacted from a Canadian nursery owner who may employ any number of agents. That is a very unfair provision and it is a provision that would provoke a bad feeling and provoke retaliation as well. If you want to shut out American nursery stock, impose a duty on it squarely, but do not attempt to shut it out by this flank movement which will, in my opinion, be productive of very bad results.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) charged the Government with introducing a Bill trying to carry by a side wind what they dare not do directly and openly. Now, my hon. friend from Monck (Mr. Boyle) took up this subject of his own accord. He is a member of Parliament. He acted according to his own lights and opinions and introduced this Bill, certainly not at the request, or at the instance, suggestion or knowledge of the Government. He introduced it as an independent member of Parliament, and we have now arrived at its consideration and its second reading has been carried. The hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says that a Mr. Baker introduced a Bill into Congress, and if the hon. gentleman will look at that Bill introduced by this Mr. Baker he will see it was a most ridiculous piece of legislation, and that it certainly would be laughed out of either House of Congress the moment it was brought to a vote. If we in this Parliament cannot introduce any Bill, or discuss any financial or fiscal policy; If we cannot prevent frauds upon our own people for fear that some man at some date may make a motion in Congress, why we might as well dissolve ourselves at once. We in this Parliament are to consider what the interests of this country are, and the suggestion that because Mr. Baker says: if we prevent useless trees, vines or shrubs to be fraudulently brought into Canada they in the States will put a duty upon our goods, ought not to deter us doing our duty by our own people. My hon. friend beside me says that if we pass an Act declaring that the selling of sawdust, pine hams or wooden nutmegs should be punished, we do not do so lest they would have a retaliatory Act in the United States. I think it will be remembered that we passed an Act prohibiting oleomargarine as being a fraud upon our farmers, and we were not afraid that any retaliatory Act of Congress would be held over our heads because if a fraud is practiced on our people we wish to punish that fraud. The details of this Act can be fully considered in Committee, and I think myself that his provisions are of very great use. The very fact that my hon. friend from Monck (Mr. Boyle) has introduced this Bill has warned fraudulent agents that they are watched, and that if they do sell fraudulent goods there is a law here to punish them. The second reading has been passed, and the suggestion is simply that this Bill should be sent to the Committee. I have no doubt that it will be well and fully considered. Neither of the hon. gentlemen opposite have said one word upon the fact that similar legislation indeed more severe legislation has been passed in four of the States of the Union. They have no objections that those States should protect their farmers from fraud; they have no objection that those Legislatures should protect their farmers from being swindled, as our farmers have been swindled by a parcel of men coming into this country running through the country and selling those trees, grape vines and other shrubs, and then running out of the country and leaving our farmers with this valueless property on hand and with the loss of their money. As to the details of the Act allow them to be judged by the Committee. I think that the farmers of the country will understand who are their friends when they find that there is such a strong advocacy by hon. gentlemen opposite against the interests of the farmer, when a member on this side of the House tries to prevent them from being swindled.

Mr. CASEY. The right hon. gentleman states that the hon. member for Monck (Mr. Boyle), is an independent member of the House, that he can do just as he pleases, and that he introduced this Bill without the advice or even the knowledge of the Government. I have a suspicion that if the right hon. gentleman said to the member for Monck: "Now, you have introduced this Bill, you have put yourself on record, you have shown to your fruit growing constituents what are your desires on their behalf, but it is not judicious to force through the measure as it is at present, you had better withdraw the Bill." I believe that if the right hon. gentleman used such language to the hon. member for Monck, the Bill would have been withdrawn. Therefore, I say that I hold the right hon. gentleman and his Government responsible for the principle of this Bill, though, of course, the details might be settled in Committee hereafter. Since the Government did not prevent this Bill from going to the second reading, they are responsible for the Bill, for we all know they can prevent any of their supporters from forcing a Bill to the second reading if they so desire. After the announcement made in Washington by the right hon. gentleman's accredited diplomatic agent at that port, Mr. Erastus Wiman, and telegraphed from there, I think that both this country and the United States expected that this Bill would be choked at an early stage of its infantile existence. Such not being the fact, however, we have to deal with it now. The hon. gentleman asks us if we are to be debarred from legislating against frauds on farmers for fear some one would propose retaliation in the United States Congress, and he ridicules the idea that Mr Baker's Bill could be accepted by that Congress. Of course, nobody asks the House to refrain from such legislation for fear retaliation would be proposed in Congress, but we ask the House to refrain because retaliation would be likely to carry there. We all know the temper of that Congress. Instead of its being ridiculous to suppose that the Baker Bill could be accepted, it is likely to pass; and if the hon. gentleman does not wish to laugh at the interests of the farmers and everybody concerned, he should not laugh at the idea of retaliation being carried in response to the distinct challenge which this Bill gives. The hon. gentleman said that three or four States had similar legislation to this. Well, I think when he remembers that the States have not power to deal with commerce or to regulate the importation of articles into those States, he will see that he was mistaken in making that statement, and will have to modify it. They have internal laws dealing with frauds, of course, as any Province of this Dominion might have; but no State can make a law forbidding the importation of foreign goods except under certain conditions, and the hon. gentleman knows it. Every hon. gentleman opposite who has spoken on this question speaks as if the frauds supposed to be perpetrated by nursery agents were perpetrated by Yankees who have come over here to swindle the Canadian farmer. In the first place, I do not think these frauds are numerous. I never heard any one in my constituency complain of being defrauded by Yankee nursery stock. But the men who sell these goods throughout Canada are not Americans; they are our own citizens; and to say that every one who sells American nursery stock is habitually dishonest or habitually practices fraud on the farmers, is to insult some of the best men in our own country. The class of men who sell American nursery stock, in my county at all events, and I suppose it is the same elsewhere, comprise some of the best and most respected citizens in the county, men often above the average of the ordinary citizen; and to say that these men habitually practice frauds, while they are equal to or perhaps above the standard of the men who represent Canadian nursery agents, is to insult not only the class to which they belong, but the whole community.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say any such thing.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman did not say it in so many words, but he distinctly assumed in his language that this was a statute to prevent frauds. Now, who is charged with practicing the fraud? Not the nursery owner, because he does not bring his trees to Canada and offer them for sale; it is the agent who persuades the farmer to buy, and who is usually a good, respectable Canadian farmer, and who is chosen for that position just because he is a well known respectable farmer in his neighborhood; and to insinuate or assume, as the right hon. gentleman directly did, that these men practice frauds on the farmers, is an insult to the class to which they belong, and an insult which they will be likely to resent. As my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) treated fully the subject of retaliation, I will say nothing about that except to reiterate that there is no reason to believe that the Canadian citizens who are agents of American nurserymen cheat any more than agents for Canadian nurserymen. I believe neither of them cheat; I have never seen any cheating by them; and to say that either of these classes cheat is an insult which I cannot hear without protest.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). I do not think it is a question of the dishonesty of the agent so much as it is a question of the dishonesty of the men who supply the agent with the stock. No agent can judge the kind of stock which he gets at the time, and which he distributes to the farmers; he may think he is selling a good stock, when he is selling a poor one. I have been victimised myself by an honest agent who bought the stock and sold it to me, and after waiting two or three years, I found that the kind of stock which had been ordered had not been supplied to the agent, nor by him to me. Therefore, the charge is not against the agent who sells in Canada, but against the men who supply him. I may say that the American nurserymen sell their stock wherever they can in their own market, and they send to Canada what they have left on hand so as not to reduce the price in their own country; so that Canada has been made a market for the refuse stock of American nurserymen. If the Canadian nurseryman defrauds the purchaser, the purchaser has a right of action, and can get at the man who defrauds him; but he has not the same means of action against the American nurseryman.

Mr. CASEY. He can get at the agent.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). The agent is not responsible, because he may be an innocent man, and I believe he generally is; he cannot judge of the kind of stock furnished him, but he has to depend on the character of the men who supply it to him; and if the right hon. gentleman made the charge, it was not against the agents, but against the men who supply the refuse stock of the United States to the Canadian agents.

Mr. LAURIER. I have no doubt the hon. member for Monck (Mr. Boyle), when he introduced that measure did it on his own motion, without consulting the Government at all; for I believe if he had consulted the Government, the Prime Minister would have told him that he had better not bring that subject forward, at least in the manner he has done. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman who addressed the House a little while ago that we ought not to be deterred from bringing forward any measure which we think in the interest of the country for fear of retaliation by the United States. If we were to announce such a doctrine, it would be tantamount to giving up our independence. So far I agree with him, and I would agree with the Prime Minister except for this fact, that the title of this Bill is misleading. It is not to prevent fraud, but to prevent a certain kind of commerce between the two countries. We have reciprocity in the articles mentioned in the Bill; and if it were adopted, the consequence would be that this trade which is now going on on the frontier would be put an end to; the American producer could not find a market in our country for his goods. This must be the object of the Bill, as is apparent from the language of the hon. mover himself; and not daring to put that on the Bill itself, he gave it another title. What we find in it are not provisions to prevent fraud, but simply provisions to prevent trade, and for this reason we oppose it on this side.

Mr. FISHER. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson) who spoke a moment or two ago, showed clearly, I think, the difficulties that would surround the enactment of a law of this kind. The hon. gentleman defends the character of the agents in this country, and says the First Minister in attacking the character of those agents must certainly have been incorrect, and I agree with him in that respect. But unfortunately by this Bill, as I read it, it would be the agent who would suffer. If the gentleman is deceived, as the hon. member for Welland said he is, it is not likely that he is ever constantly deceived. Yet the agent who supplied that bad stock from the United States, who is the agent under this Bill, would have to provide the bond and the security, and he would have to suffer by forfeiting his security if the stock turned out too bad.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The principal would furnish the agent with security.

Mr. FISHER. I very much doubt that. He might and might not, as the case might be, and there is no provision in the Bill to make any difference in this respect. The hon. member for Welland also pointed out another thing which is of importance in regard to the working of this Bill. Very frequently agents remain only one year with the one employer, and it is often impossible to tell how the stock sold is going to turn out until two or three years after it is planted, so that by that time the agent would no longer be in the same employ. How long will the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill provide for the holding of this security? There is another question of far more importance, and that is the international question, in which the honor of the country is really concerned. Only last year we put upon our free list, in consequence of the action of the United States Government, plants, shrubs and trees, and I believe this Bill is simply a subterfuge for the purpose of doing away with the effect of that policy. On several occasions hon. gentlemen opposite have accused the United States of acting unfairly and dishonestly towards us in making Customs regulations and putting charges upon articles in violation of their agreement with us, such as putting duty upon the cans in which our fish were preserved. We have in no measured terms condemned the United States for such action; we declared that they had trailed their honor in the dust. I should regret to see our Government attempting to put us on the low level our friends opposite feel justified in putting the Americans. I regret that not very long ago the present Government did that by putting a duty on the peach baskets in which all the peaches were imported into this country. I protested against that; I protest against another attempt to trail our honor in the dust and put us on a lower plane of international honor than any other Government has succeeded in doing. As I read this Bill, I look upon it as a means by which we shall get escape from the contract we made last year with the United States to put upon our free list trees, shrubs and other such articles. We do so in letter, but if this Bill becomes law we will do the contrary in spirit. We will be proceeding in the way the Government desired us to go last year when they refused at first to put these articles on the free list, despite our statutory offer. This is the principal reason why I object to the Bill. I object also on the general principle that we are going to cause an increase in the price of the article to the agriculturist without protecting, in the slightest degree, our nurserymen.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not know whether the Bill will have the effect attributed to it or not, but it is very clear that it is our duty, as far as we can by legislation, to remove it. I know that in the section of country where I come from, it is a very common thing to find, when our farmers take their fruits to the agricultural shows and label them according to the names given when the trees were sold, that disputes constantly arise, and they are obliged to send the fruits to experts for the purpose of getting them renamed, and it turns out in nearly every instance that the fruit trees sold to them were not properly named, or were not sold according to name at all. Instead of getting, as they supposed they were getting, first-class trees of certain varieties, they found that they were supplied with inferior trees of other varieties. The same thing is true with regard to grape vines. I remember distinctly some few years ago a gentleman, who sold grape vines through my section of the country, and who said he was prepared to sell a large number of varieties, and who sold them at the rate of 50 cents each, representing them to be very superior quality, told some of his friends before leaving that he supplied those orders out of vines which he purchased at half a cent apiece, and that all the different varieties came out of the same lot. When we know that such frauds are perpetrated on the agriculturists, it is time we should put an end to them. We find also that the trees sold in our country are not true to name. They almost invariably turn out to be something different from what they were represented to be at the time they were sold. In my own garden I do not think in a single instance, the trees I bought turned out true to their name, and when I showed the fruit, I was told generally that they were not properly named, and on sending them to the exhibition they received there names entirely different. It is time a Bill of this kind should pass. The contention of hon. gentlemen that we ought not to attempt to legislate to protect our people for fear of encurring the displeasure of our neighbors seems to be a childish matter. We are here to look after our own people, we have the machinery to legislate, and we are here to protect the interests of our people, and to punish crime and fraud wherever we find it. If we have no rights in Canada, but are always to depend upon foreigners in the conduct of our affairs, the sooner we know it the better. It is apparently the cue of hon. gentlemen opposite whenever a measure is introduced to protect our own people to cry it down. They would make out that we have no national rights, that our Parliament has no authority, and that we ought not to do anything which a self-protecting people considers itself empowered to do. I think we ought to be ashamed of ourselves as a Canadian Parliament if we acknowledged that we were standing in such a position to-day, and, whether it is in this line or in another line when people are prepared to prey on our farmers or our merchants or any other class of our people, we should be always ready to protect their rights, as far as Canadian Parliament can do it, irrespective of what other people may say or do about it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the hon. gentleman who proposes this Bill and the gentlemen who support this Bill have not given us any sufficient reason for passing it. The Prime Minister has said that four States of the Union have adopted something similar to this Bill. I do not see how that is possible when the Constitution of the United States provides that matters of trade and commerce are vested in the United States. The first clause of this Bill says that:

"No person, and no agent of any corporation or association, shall sell or offer for sale any tree, &c."

That is not a prohibition against fraud, but against trade. It applies not only to a man who offers bad or spurious stock on the market, but to the very best that can be produced, precisely such as the farmer may order, as much as to a man who supplies stock which is different from that which has been ordered. How does the hon. gentleman propose to protect the farmers against what he calls fraud? Take the Northern Spy apple tree. That will be planted out eight or ten years before it will bear. The purchaser and the vendor may both be in their graves before that. How does the hon. gentleman propose to prevent fraud in that case? The most of those who are engaged in fruit growing will know the tree by its appearance. In nine cases out of ten, the farmer knows the tree when he sees it, and, if he does not, this legislation cannot afford him the least protection. The farmer knows, for instance, that the Rhode Island Greening grows almost horizontally, and not in the same way as the Spy, or the Baldwin, or several other varieties. If he cannot detect the variety by its appearance I do not see how he is to be protected by this Bill. It is not like a manufactured article in regard to which, within 24 hours, you can tell whether you have been defrauded or not, by calling in an expert to examine it. In the case of trees you have to wait until they bear. The fact is, that this is a measure designed to prevent the free importation of American fruit trees into this country, and it would be better to put a duty on them if the hon. gentleman wants to place an impediment in the way of that reciprocal trade which was adopted last year. Certainly the hon. gentleman does not expect to get this Bill through the House this Session. If the leader of the Government wants to get through the business before Easter it is useless to have measures of this sort brought forward at this period of the Session. If measures of this kind are withdrawn on both sides, and if the Government withdraw measures which they do not think it absolutely necessary to pass, I think they will be able to get through in the time, but if this sort of thing is to go on that idea must be abandoned.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My hon. friend says he does not understand how any State in the United States could pass a Bill like this. If he will take the Bill introduced by my hon. friend from Monck (Mr. Boyle), and will follow it word by word, I will read him the Act of the State of Minnesota, right across the line, which prevents any Canadian tree grower from going into that State at all:

"An Act to prevent the practice of Fraud by tree peddlers and commission men in the sale of nursery stock:

"Be it enacted by the State of Minnesota:

"It shall be unlawful for any person, corporation or association to sell or offer for sale any tree, plant, shrub or vine not grown in the State of Minnesota, without first filing with the Secretary of State an affidavit setting forth his name, age, occupation and residence; and, if an agent, the name, occupation and residence of his principal, and a statement as to where the nursery stock aforesaid to be sold is grown, together with a bond to the State of Minnesota in the penal sum of $4,000, conditioned to save harmless any citizen of this State who shall be defrauded by any false or fraudulent misrepresentations as to the place where such stock sold by such person, corporation or association was grown, or as to its hardiness for climate: Provided, that the bond aforesaid shall, when the principal is a resident of this State, be given by such principal and not by the agent"

Mr. LAURIER. Is that constitutional?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am reading an Act of the State. It is for the Supreme Court of the United States to decide that question. The Act is in force.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Supreme Court, in the case of Brown against the State of Maryland, decided that question many years ago. Chief Justice Marshall declared that the State has no right to do anything of that sort.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This Act was passed long after Chief Justice Marshall was dead.

Motion agreed to, and Bill referred to Select Committee.

WRECKING IN CANADIAN WATERS.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex) moved that the order for second reading of Bill (No. 7) to admit vessels registered in the United States of America to wrecking, towing and coasting privileges in Canadian waters, be discharged and the Bill withdrawn.

Motion agreed to, and Bill withdrawn.

LICENSING OF STATIONARY ENGINEERS.

Mr. COOK moved second reading of Bill (No. 8) to provide for the examination and licensing of all persons employed as stationary engineers, and all persons having charge of steam boilers and other devices under pressure. He said: The Canadian Association of Stationary Engineers is an important organisation. It numbers between 5,000 and 6,000 people in this country. This Bill has the support of all the labor organisations in the country. Petitions in its favor have been presented to the House from the District Assembly, Knights of Labor, Toronto; from Ernest Wyoke and others, Stratford, Ontario; Edward Carney and others, Toronto; W. Roth and others, Toronto; Toronto Typographical Union; Trades and Labor Council, Toronto; Local Assembly, No. 2056, Knights of Labor, St. Catharines; Local Assembly, No. 2513, Knights of Labor, Port Dalhousie, Ontario; Hand-in-Hand Assembly, No. 5743, Knights of Labor, Toronto; Cigarmakers Union, No. 58, Montreal; River Front Local Assembly, No. 7628, Knights of Labor, Montreal; Local Assembly, No. 3449, St. Thomas, Ont.; Local Assembly, No. 2305, Knights of Labor, Toronto, Ont.; District Assembly, No. 236, Knights of Labor, Uxbridge, Ont.; Cigarmakers' Union, No. 140, St. Catharines, Ont.; Trades and Labor Council, city of London, Ont.; Odilon Parizeau et al., Montreal, Que.; Canadian Marine Engineers Association, Montreal; Canadian Association of Stationary Engineers, Stratford; and a petition of 1,650 inhabitants of the city of Toronto sent to the Secretary of State. This petition was intended for the House, but it was wrongly drawn by the promoters and it had to be sent to the Secretary of State. It embraces a large number of the manufacturers of the city of Toronto, such firms as that of Christie, Brown & Co., and others. I have also letters from all the different organisations urging the passage of this Act. However, as I find a number of gentlemen in this House who object to its provisions with reference to pressure, I propose that the Bill shall be confined to engines of 25 horse power. I propose also to exempt the marine engineers. The marine engineers of the Dominion of Canada have already to undergo a strict examination, and it will not be necessary to have them pass an examination under this Bill provided they have certificates from the steamboat engineers of the Dominion. I also propose to exempt private houses; but the 25 horse power, without any reference to private houses, will exempt private houses. Now, I will read a report made by this Canadian Association of Stationary Engineers last year:

"A body of intelligent and respectable citizens. Having no objects that can be criticised, no plans not warranted by sound common sense, and a regard for the rights of others; wishing that justice may be meted out to all, believing that the importance of the profession of steam engineering has never been placed in its proper light before the public. Knowing as we do the important part the stationary engineer takes in the manufacturing interests of this growing and prosperous country. We feel constrained to call the attention of the steam user and the general public to the requirements of the age, and the adoption of such measures as will secure the best service for the steam user, and the greatest immunity from loss of property, limb and life, thereby helping the employer, the employee, and securing a benefit for the general public.

"The use of steam involves great danger, where it is used, or under the control of those who do not understand its power, who do not know the simple adjuncts that only can insure safety, or who have not the necessary skill, sobriety or integrity. The reputable engineers of this country, who have honestly adopted the profession as their business and occupation, feel called upon to speak, when they see the great number and increase of criminally fatal boiler explosions, the total disregard for economy, and the great loss of time and money in managing the light repairs about any steam plant. The rapid growth of manufacturing interests have attracted all kinds of incompetent and careless men into the ranks of the stationary engineers who cast an odium on the business and materially assist to spread death and destruction in connection with the use of steam. We know that boiler explosions are not accidents and can be prevented, and we believe that in these enlightened times a man should understand his business before taking charge of any device under steam pressure, and that he should be held responsible for his actions. Our responsibilities are as great as those of steamboat engineers, who have to pass a board of examiners and procure a license before taking charge of engines and boilers. This was done for the protection of the public and the steamboat owner, in the case of steamboats, the law goes even further, the boilers as well as engineers are subject to Government inspection. During 1887 we have records of 215 boiler explosions by which 376 persons were killed outright, and injuring some fatally and many very seriously 455 persons. The Hartford Inspection and Insurance Company report that up to the year 1885 they had made in all 560 797 inspections and had discovered 303,718 defects, 6,216 of which were considered dangerous, this gives us the alarming result that 1½ per cent. of the boilers were working under dangerous conditions, that more explosions do not occur is because the necessary conditions were not all present at one time.

"Thus we see that explosions can be prevented, 1st by placing only examined and certificated persons in charge of boilers, and by passing a law to the effect that all boilers shall be examined by Government inspectors, if this were done there is no doubt that a much greater safety and economy would result. The making of laws for these purposes are not new, in nearly every city of any importance on this continent, ordinances to this effect have been passed, viz: The cities of New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Cincinnatti, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, St. Louis and Montreal. The District of Columbia and the State of Indiana have passed such a law, and in the States of New York, Ohio, Illinois and Tennessee such laws are now pending. In France the law is very stringent, the boilers are inspected during construction, and are under Government control all the time, and explosions are things of the past. In the German States also very strong Government measures are the law, and the destruction of property, limb and life is reduced to nil. As to steam boilers we know that science and experience show how absolute safety can be had, hence we are justified in asking the strong arm of the law to step in between mistaken economy, ignorance and the lives and safety of the citizens.

"We believe that we are requesting nothing unreasonable, nothing unjustifiable, nothing to which the steam user or the public at large will object, but that we are asking only what is absolutely necessary for the better protection of property, limb and life. We know that common sense, right and justice are at our side, while seeking to place such a law on our Statute-books, and we feel assured that the Bill now before the House will receive that measure of thought and earnest consideration usually bestowed on matters of such importance."

"We have the honor to be,
"Gentlemen,
"Yours faithfully,
"THE CANADIAN ASS'N. STATIONARY ENGINEERS."

I have also a communication from a gentleman furnishing me with statistics, a gentleman who is very anxious for the passage of this Bill. He says that in 1886 there were 160 explosions of boilers, 308 people killed, 413 injured, of whom it is estimated that one-half died. In 1887 there were 215 boiler explosions, 376 people killed outright, 455 injured. In 1888 there were 136 boiler explosions, 234 people killed outright, and 297 injured; or a total in the three years of 511 boiler explosions, 968 people killed outright and 1,165 injured.

Mr. SPROULE. Is that in Canada?

Mr. COOK. I also find that since 1882 ——

Mr. HESSON. Where did these explosions take place?

Mr. COOK. I am reading you the letter as it was sent to me.

Mr. TUPPER. Whereabouts were the explosions?

Mr. HESSON. Is that in Canada or in France?

Mr. COOK. I am reading the statistics as they were given to me.

Mr. TUPPER. Tell us where they took place?

Mr. COOK. He did not tell me that.

Mr. HESSON. In the whole world?

Mr. COOK. I do not suppose it was in the whole world. Perhaps some of the hon. gentleman's constituents could tell him, there is an association there. I have a letter from the association in the town of Stratford in which they speak of——

Mr. HESSON. Are these statistics from Canada or from the United States?

Mr. COOK——

"They also find that since 1882 the organisation of stationary engineers numbers now, in round numbers, 5,000 men. They never had an explosion of any boiler under their care."

The statement is made that explosions are consequent upon employing incompetent men. The members of the association, which numbers 5,000 men, have never had an explosion of a boiler of any kind. It is not necessary to mention the names of the writers of all the letters I have received. I have received a letter from Stratford, from W. Bates, secretary of the association; also from the Hamilton Association of Stationary Engineers, from a similar association in Montreal, from a similar association of Toronto, from the Canadian Marine Engineers of Toronto, from the President of the Canadian Marine Engineers Association of Toronto, in which he speaks of several narrow escapes from accident that occurred lately in that city. He speaks of a narrow escape at the Cyclorama, because the party in charge was not capable of knowing the pressure on the boiler. The indicator only showed 15 lbs. whereas he had from 75 to 80 lbs. There was a narrow escape of an explosion also at an establishment where the public frequent, and another at one of the hotels. I hope the Minister of Justice will not endeavor to relegate this Bill to his slaughtering committee. He has already to-day sent a Bill to that Committee from which he certainly knows it will not emerge again this Session. I shall protest against a similar course being taken in the case of this Bill, and if the hon. gentleman insists on sending it to a Committee he must take the responsibility of doing so.

Mr. TUPPER. I think that on reflection it will be seen that the hon. gentleman's measure is rather crude and ill-considered. He virtually admits that in stating that he proposes, should the Bill be sent to a Committee, to eliminate engines above 25 horse power, cases of marine engines, and cases of private houses. I call the hon. gentleman's attention to a very important fact in connection with his proposed legislation and that is, that, in order to get it before this House properly, it has been necessary for the hon. gentleman to connect it with the criminal law, and he deals in that way only with one part, and that not the most important part, of a very important question, and that is with respect to the certificates of the engineers, while he leaves the engines alone, whereas the statistics show that the explosions are almost exclusively due to the character of the engines and boilers themselves. With that part of the subject the hon. gentleman's Bill is silent, and with that part of the subject the local legislation alone can deal, and no doubt the hon. gentleman was aware of that fact. I will now point out another difficulty in connection with this legislation being made desirable and effective by this method of dealing with only a part of the subject, and it is this: The hon. gentleman has failed to provide proper machinery for carrying the Bill into operation. While we have provided, in case of marine engines and steamboats, a regularly paid staff of officers, the hon. gentleman proposes that the work shall be done by men who may be willing to come and receive fees. The hon. gentleman, in his Bill, has merely suggested the possibility, while making it a offence for a man to attend to this duty without possessing a certificate, of obtaining the services of examiners by the payment of fees; but he has taken no means to secure a proper examining staff of inspectors, because there is a provision of the Bill setting forth that these officers shall be paid by such fees as they may obtain from such men as may present themselves for examination. I appeal to the hon. gentleman himself as to whether it is not highly dangerous, and even opposed to the intention he has in view, to endeavor to force upon the House or to ask the House to sanction legislation of that ill-considered nature and incomplete character by dealing with only one part of, and by no means the most important part of his subject. The engines may be of the poorest character imaginable and badly constructed, improperly manufactured, and yet the hon. gentleman's Bill does not provide for accidents that are likely to arise from this cause, but it simply provides that no man shall be in charge of such poorly constructed engine unless he has passed an examination before one of the inspectors whom he hopes to obtain. I do not intend to raise the other point, which might be raised, as to whether the Bill is in order in regard to the charge it contemplates. It might be said that the charges are to be fees and for certain work done; but the danger to the public is that while the Bill might be effectual in suddenly stopping steam engines in the country and motive power for a large number of factories and industries, it falls short of obtaining a competent staff to see that the provisions of the Bill are properly carried out. I submit that it would be more logical and more consistent with the interests of the country at large and also with those of the engineers and the public, that means should be first devised for the establishment of a competent staff for the examination of candidates before we attempt to make it criminal for engineers and laborers to enter upon their work without certificates, as a certificate cannot now be obtained from anyone since there is no officer to grant it. I might conclude by reading a quotation from the report of the chief mechanical engineer, J. R. Arnoldi. In the first portion of his report he deals with the clauses which the hon. gentleman has suggested would be eliminated from this Bill in Committee. He says:

"In regard to establishments where engines are in use, it is but natural to assume that the interested proprietors will employ competent men to manage them, and it is found, in general experience, that the greater portion of men in charge of ordinary engines and boilers, who give careful and constant attention to their work and most satisfaction to their employers, are men who rise from being ordinary workmen, and even laborers in their own employ, and few, if any, of these men could pass the examinations called for by this Act.

"As mechanical officer in charge of the machinery, boilers, &c., of the Parliament and departmental buildings, Ottawa, and other Government buildings elsewhere in the Dominion, with a constant experience of 16 years, I fail to see any necessity for this Bill, and I do not consider it practicable."

I might supplement that statement made by this gentleman of considerable experience, and say that I do not know at this moment of any similar legislation to this in any country. The House is aware that this Parliament has legislated already in regard to marine engines, and if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cook) will study that legislation he will see that Parliament was careful to deal with a more important subject before dealing with this portion of it and that is to provide for the proper inspection of the engines themselves.

Mr. COOK. The boilers, not the engines.

Mr. TUPPER. The engines and the boilers as well, as the hon. gentleman will see if he reads the Act. He will find that Parliament made careful provision as to what style of boiler and what style of engine Parliament deemed it proper to permit a steamer to carry, and that Parliament appointed a regular staff, paid not by fees but by a fixed salary to inspect and deal with those subjects. Under those circumstances I beg to move:

That this Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.

Mr. WILSON (Argenteuil). Mr. Speaker, this is a question which I think the hon. gentleman who has introduced the Bill (Mr. Cook) has not much knowledge of and I hope the hon. gentleman will excuse me if I as a manufacturer and as a man who has been connected with steam boilers for many years express my views on the subject. Had the hon. member been thoroughly acquainted with the facts he would never have stated in the preamble of the Bill that the danger lay in stationary engines or in those devices worked by steam power. The danger does not lie in the steam engine nor in the want of proper qualification by stationary engineers or those who work steam engines, but the danger lies in the manner of producing the steam and in the steam boiler itself. In all our municipalities in the different Provinces there are inspectors appointed who are called "boiler inspectors" and who especially look after the safety of those boilers. I know that in the municipalities of Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton, Quebec and other large cities in which a number of steam boilers are worked there are efficient officers to look after the examination of boilers and to see that they are sound and in good order before the owners are granted licenses to work them. If the hon. member who introduced this Bill (Mr. Cook) meant in any way to guard against the destruction of life and property he should have introduced a bill referring only to steam boilers and not to steam engines. But the hon. gentleman proposes to deal with steam engines which are as harmless as the babe unborn; if you leave the steam out of them. The steam engine without the steam boiler is not in the least dangerous to life, and there is no reason for legislation in regard to it. If the hon. gentleman intended to protect life he should have framed his Bill so as to prevent the licensing of men who are ignorant of the strength of a boiler and of its capability for bearing steam pressure. There are few engineers engaged in our workshops who will undertake to have anything to do with steam boilers, for that matter is left entirely to the fireman. I admit that in some places we have engineers acting as firemen, but the employer can always secure that the engineer so engaged is a thoroughly competent fireman and that his training is such as to warrant him being so employed with safety. In my opinion this Bill is ultra vires of the Dominion Legislature. I think the powers which it assumes to take belongs entirely to the Provinces or to the municipalities where those boilers may be situated, and I do not believe that this House should be asked to waste time in considering it. It is very true as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has said that the Dominion Government has power to deal with marine engines, for they are operated upon the waters of the Dominion and in different places, but I think that the regulations as regards stationary engines should be left to the provincial or municipal authorities or to the discretion of the manufacturers, who employ men to take charge of these engines. I think that the figures that the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Cook) gave us with reference to the destruction of life in Canada from the explosion of steam boilers are a little wild. I am satisfied that no 260 persons have been killed from this cause, and I believe that the hon. gentleman would not save one-third or one-tenth or any part of the number from any protection that might be afforded by this Bill. I hope that the time will not be wasted in discussing this Bill which would be of no practical advantage and which would only throw more labor on those who have in charge the conduct of manufacturing concerns in this Dominion.

Mr. IVES. There is one feature of this question which has not been referred to by hon. gentlemen who have opposed the second reading of the Bill. I noticed that the hon. member who moved the second reading has shown that nearly all the petitions in its favor come from unions of stationary engineers or labor organisations. I was not surprised at that because if the title of this Bill had been "An Act to render it possible for all stationary engineers to obtain employment at high prices from the manufacturers of the country" the title would have been appropriate to the effect that the passage of this Act would have. I consider this Bill to be a very mischievous and a very meddlesome piece of legislation. There are a vast number of small manufacturing industries all over the Dominion using engines of from 25 to 100 horse power which would be seriously affected by the passage of this Act. The result would be that they would be unable any longer to employ the competent men they have been in the habit of employing at a moderate rate of wages, and they would be obliged to employ a class of men with far higher qualifications, to whom they would have to pay a much higher rate of wages than their business would enable them to pay. The passage of this Bill would simply mean the stoppage of the business of a man with a small engine engaged in manufacturing in a small way. Although he might have had a man in his employ for three of four years who had worked satisfactorily and well without any accident, he would be liable to a penalty if he any longer continued to employ him. The hon. gentleman has not shown any need of this measure. He has read statistics of a number of deaths which have occurred from explosions of boilers in 1886, 1887 and 1888. He would not tell us to what an extent of territory those statistics referred; but they unquestionably refer to the whole world. So far as Canada is concerned, I follow the newspapers with considerable regularity, and we are not often shocked by accounts of boiler explosions. I am not aware that we have had any loss of life at all through explosions of stationary boilers. As an hon member has said, the danger is not with the engineer who runs the engine, but it is in the boiler itself; and if the boiler is a good boiler, there is practically no danger at all. I am strongly opposed to this measure, because I think it is mischievous and meddlesome, and would interfere with the business of a large number of small manufacturers who could not afford to pay the wages required to employ the class of engineers prescribed by this Bill.

Mr. WATSON. I believe some good might be done by the passage of a Bill of this description. I would be in favor of some slight amendments to it, but I entirely differ from the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries and from the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) with regard to the cause of the explosions of boilers. They seem to think that explosions are altogether due to the defective condition of the boilers. I have a practical knowledge of these matters, and I say that in almost every instance the cause of a boiler explosion is the incompetency of the man handling the boiler. I have had some considerable experience for years in the construction and repairing of boilers, and there has hardly been an instance within my knowledge of an accident occurring through the defective construction of a boiler. The explosion is always caused by the water being too low in the boiler, and by the fireman not being competent to handle it. With regard to small manufacturers being injured by the passing of this Bill, any person who could not undergo the examination required by sub-section 4 of section 9, and get a certificate which would only cost him $2 a year, would not be a fit and competent person to fire any boiler. So far from that provision being a hardship on the owners of small steam appliances, I say it would be a great benefit to them. If their firemen had to undergo some such examination, they would devote themselves to preparing for it. A great many people innocently have property destroyed in consequence of employing incompetent men. I know no instances in which men are more deceived, and in which greater loss of property takes place, than in having incompetent firemen and engineers. In the case of threshing machine boilers, in nearly all instances in which they are injured or damaged and made practically worthless after running two or three seasons, this is in consequence of incompetent men being in charge of them. The hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Wilson) has stated that the steam engine is as harmless as the unborn child. He must know, in speaking of an engineer, that in a great many cases the man who runs the engine is also the fireman. I had hoped that the principle of this Bill would have been adopted, and I should have been prepared to suggest two or three amendments; but apparently the intention of the House is to defeat the Bill entirely. I think the fact of gentlemen objecting to a Bill of this description because it is advocated by trades and labor unions should not defeat it. As a rule, these men are working not only for their own interests, but for the interests of the general public. I know of no measure which would be of greater benefit to the owners of steam appliances than in requiring the men who take charge of those appliances to undergo an examination.

Mr. MACDOWALL. As the hon member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) has spoken in favor of this Bill, and as I believe it is directly contrary to the interest of the North-West, I feel bound to congratulate my hon. friend the Minister of Marine for the action he has taken in moving the amendment. The hon. member for Marquette says that anybody should be able to pass the examination which is stipulated in sub-section 4 of section 9, but I will call attention to sub-section 2 of section 9, where you will find that a second-class engineer is required to have a very thorough knowledge of his duties; in fact, he has to pass a very severe examination. A great many men in the North-West who are thoroughly capable of running such an engine would not be able to pass such an examination.

Mr. WATSON. 200 horse power?

Mr. MACDOWALL. Yes, I believe they would not only run a 200-horse power engine, but when difficulties arise, though perhaps not men of very high education, they are men of practical training which they can be put to use. I do not underrate the importance of imposing proper restrictions upon engineers in large factories or large centres, where a large number of people are employed, but in out-of-the-way places, like many in the North-West—and this Bill applies to the whole of Canada—it would be very detrimental to the interest of the people to do so. If the Bill were to apply to the whole country it would be very detrimental to the interests of our people. We know that the first thing it is necessary to have in a newly-formed settlement is a grist mill, and these mills are very often started by men of small means and without technical knowledge. These men are perfectly capable of running such a mill, and I think deserve every encouragement; but, if this Bill should become law, it would take away from them the right to run such a mill, and throw the whole thing into the hands of trade unionists. In centres such as Winnipeg, or Prince Albert, or Calgary, in the North-West, there would be very few certified engineers, and the public works there might be shut down at any time from the sheer impossibility of getting such engineers. Another objection is clause 2, which provides for the appointment of an inspector, and the inspector must have a certain knowledge. Now, there are some settlements in the North-West, and, I believe, in British Columbia, where it would be impossible to find men with the knowledge requisite to be an inspector who could grant certificates, and, in that case, the engineers there would have to come down to some large centre in order to pass an examination, and if there should be any difficulty between the employer and the engineer necessitating the employment of another engineer, the latter would have to be brought from eastern Canada, since none could be found in the west.

Mr. COOK. I was somewhat surprised at the assertion of the hon. the Minister of Marine respecting the provisions covered by this Bill; but he is a young man who has not been very long in the Government, and of whom, therefore, too much must not be expected. He stated this was different from the Steamboat Inspection Act, because these boilers could not be made perfect. Is he not aware that there is no inspection of boilers for steamboats when manufactured. Is he not aware that there is no Act by which steamboat boilers must be inspected when manufactured. In Germany and some other countries no steamboat boiler can be manufactured without its being subject to the inspection of the Government inspector, but we have no such inspection here. Last Session a deputation waited on the Government in reference to this matter. The hon. gentleman then was an independent member of the House, and the Minister of Finance occupied the position then that the hon. gentleman does now. This deputation declared that they had the assurance of the then Minister that they had proved their case and that legislation would be introduced. He did not say when, but he gave them to understand that they should have legislation this year. But the present Minister of Marine declares we are not to have legislation at all. He, also, in speaking about inspectors, asks where they are to come from? Well, they will come, perhaps, just as the Minister of Marine came, from father to son; an inspector might be made just as the Minister of Marine has been made. The hon. gentleman spoke also of the differences existing between the Bill I am promoting and the Inspection Act for steamboats. Why, the hon. gentleman must know that I, as an independent member of this House, have no right to introduce a Bill such as the Steamboat Inspection Act, by which I would ask the expenditure of money by the Government. He ought to know that it is the duty of the Government to take matters of this sort off the hands of private members and make them Government legislation. I expected that was what the hon. member would do. I did not expect him to defy the members who are supporting this measure by saying that it would never pass. I did not suppose he was going to fly in the face of all the labor organisations in this country, and I believe a large number of manufacturers are in favor of it. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) is of course a large manufacturer. He has large steam mills, and, perhaps, he would have to pay $5 a month more to an engineer if this Bill became law. I am also a manufacturer, and I have a number of men employed and an engineer, and I conceived the idea a few years ago that it would be to my advantage to have a capable man to manage the steam department of my mills. But I am perhaps not so extensively engaged in the manufacturing business as the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Wilson). I believe he runs about a fifteen horse power machine making tissue paper. I believe he has about as much horse power as you would find generally in a threshing mill on a farm. I propose to exempt him. Everything up to the extent of twenty-five horse power shall be exempted, so that he will not come within the provisions of the Act. He need not feel so very much alarmed. We know that at the explosion of the Ammonia Works at Toronto, a few weeks ago, a man was killed. That was in consequence of the incapacity of the party who was in charge of the steam power. If the Government are determined that this Bill shall not pass, I think the course pursued by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries more acceptable than that pursued by the Minister of Justice on a former occasion with reference to a Bill of my own, and also a fairer proposition than that made to-night, with regard to the Bill of the hon. member for Monck (Mr. Boyle), which was referred to a Select Committee that will never see the light of day. If the Government are prepared to take the responsibility of moving the three months' hoist, I must do my duty. As regards the framing of the Bill, I think the parties most interested—the manufacturers as well as those who are coming within its practical working—have attested their approval of the manner in which it has been drawn. The hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Wilson) objected to that, and said I did not understand exactly what I was doing. The hon. gentleman appears to have the knowledge of the whole House, upon which questions of machinery, with the fifteen horse power running his tissue paper business.

Mr. WILSON (Argenteuil). The hon. gentleman ought to know since he poses as having a great knowledge of our manufacturing interests, that the mill I run requires 400 horse power instead of 15.

Amendment agreed to, on a division.

COMBINATIONS IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

Mr. WALLACE moved second reading of Bill (No. 11) for the prevention and supression of combinations formed in restraint of trade. He said: The importance of this question, not only in Canada but in the United States and in other countries of the world, has brought it very prominently before the attention of all the people of these countries. In the United States, perhaps, these combinations and trusts have attained their greatest magnitude and importance. We find there that the important products, the important industries, the important manufactures are, to a large extent, under the control of these trusts and combinations. The Standard Oil Company is one example of a trust where one vast company controls the whole production of oil in the United States. We find also that, in the refining or manufacturing of sugar, almost the whole of the sugar produced and sold in the United States is under the control of one vast trust, which has been declared by the courts of the United States to be illegal. We find also that other industries in the United States are under the control of these combinations, and that has been found to be so profitable in the United States that Canadians, watching the enormous profits which have been made in that country in that way, have gone into the same business. In regard to coal, for instance, we find that a combination was formed in the city of Ottawa on exactly the same lines as the cotton seed oil trust, the standard oil trust, and the sugar trust in the United States—a trust formed by those who were interested in order to control not only their own business but the business done by others. From the investigations which we held last winter—and they were pretty thoroughly made—we found that the coal men in the city of Ottawa controlled not only their own business in the combination, but controlled also all those who started or wished to engage in the business of importing or selling coal. We found that three men, with an aggregate capital of $15,000, after paying enormous bonuses to those who were not in the ring—$10,000 to one man, $5,000 to another, and to others less or greater sums than these—divided amongst themselves, on a capital of $15,000, after paying all expenses of management, and all the expenses of the combination, $33,000. We found that, in the city of Toronto, the coal men had a still more iniquitous system, for, while they had a combination which controlled and regulated the price of coal, they had some most pernicious rules and regulations, which I am satisfied are contrary to the laws of Canada as they exist to-day. I quote from the report of last year:

"The most arbitrary rules are enacted. Detectives are employed and the dealers placed under surveillance—oaths of fidelity to the constitution and rules are required not only of the members, but also of their salesmen, and the oaths in the case of these employés are made in some cases retroactive as well as prospective. All violations of oaths are adjudicated upon by the executive committee referred to, the penalties being heavy fines or expulsion. One-sixth of all fines goes into the general funds of the Coal Branch, and the remaining five-sixths are divided amongst the importers. The record showed three different fines imposed of $1,000 each. Thus the public is presented with the extraordinary spectacle of a mercantile association arrogating to itself powers conferred upon law courts alone, with, in this instance, the judges in the case virtually condoning perjury by the acceptance of fines to be divided amongst the importers. This phenomenon is not the less painful or less objectionable in character from the association which perpetrates it being distinguished by the respectable title of 'The Coal Branch of the Toronto Board of Trade.'"

Now, with reference to the manner in which the Toronto coal ring disposed of their coal, this is what we found. In cases where the Dominion or the Local Government, or charitable or public institutions asked for tenders for the supply of coal, the coal ring met and decided at what price those Governments or those institutions should get their coal, and they put up at auction to the members the privilege of supplying the coal at those prices. In some instances, as much as $1,500 was paid as a bonus for the privilege of supplying the Dominion or the Local Government. In another case $1,399 was paid, and in other cases smaller sums. Even in the case of charitable institutions, the privileges were put up to auction and large sums were paid. Of course, the money was made in the profit out of the selling of the coal, not the legitimate profit, but the illegitimate profit which they required in order to pay these large bonuses to the ring. That was the effect in Toronto. We find that these coal organisations are still in existence. We find the organisation in Toronto, and we find it in Ottawa, but in Ottawa public opinion has been brought to bear so strongly that coal which was sold at $8.50 a ton during the whole winter of 1887-88 was sold at about $6, or in some cases $5 75 a ton during the present winter. We know that the price of coal in the United States was almost exactly the same this year as it was last year, and that the cost of freight was almost precisely the same; and the fact of coal being sold in Ottawa for at least $2.50 per ton less shows either that the dealers were very magnanimous or generous this year, or that they were robbing the public last year. We find another large combination existing in Canada. A few years ago the Wholesale Grocers' Guild was formed in this country, and two years ago they succeeded in inducing the sugar refiners of Canada to enter into an agreement with them. We find, from the sworn evidence taken last year, that the Wholesale Grocers' Guild had attempted before, but unsuccessfully, to induce the sugar refiners to join with them; but two years ago an agreement was come to between the sugar refiners and the Wholesale Grocers' Guild. At first, they wanted to make the sugar refiners agree that they would sell only to the members of the guild. To this they would not agree, but they induced them to agree that they should sell to the members of the Wholesale Grocers' Guild at a certain price, and to all who were outside the guild at about a quarter of a cent per pound more than to those who were inside the guild. This agreement has been changed several times, so that during our investigation last year we found it stood at $\frac{1}{8}$ of a cent advance to all who were not members of the Wholesale Grocers' Guild, and 2½ per cent. discount, making about 30 cents per 100 pounds, or 90 cents per barrel, that those who were not members of the guild had to pay higher than those who were members. We found that they also had an agreement by which they were to sell at a certain advance to the retail trade; so that we had an arrangement that I contend was objectionable and illegal in two directions; in the first place, those members of the wholesale trade who did not choose to become members of the Wholesale Grocers' Guild, were almost debarred from entering into the sale of sugar at all; they were placed at an immense disadvantage, and illegal and improper disadvantage, while sure and certain profits were secured to all those who were members of the Wholesale Grocers' Guild, because the price at which they were to sell to retailers was a fixed profit regulated by the guild. Now, this arrangement was found to be so satifactory to them that they extended it in other directions. They not only had combinations with the sugar refiners, but they also had combinations by which they secured a large profit on the sale of their tobacco, on the sale of their starch, and on the sale of other commodities that they deal in. So that a large portion of the commodities dealt in by the wholesale trade were under regulations by which they secured fixed profits and by which they shut others out from participating in the purchase of them, even the members of the wholesale trade who did, perhaps, as large or larger business than themselves, and they shut them out except at advanced prices, and then they would secure their profits in selling to retailers. The effect of this was inevitably to increase the price to the consumer, and it was wrong in principle besides. Then we go on to some other lines of business. We investigated the manufacture of binders' twine, and though we found that last year the price had not been increased higher than the price that was paid in the United States, we found that a combination already existed, that they regulated the price, that they regulated the output of each manufacturing establishment, and that they were a close combination among themselves. We have still more objectionable evidence to produce this year, for we find that these binding twine manufacturers have increased the price of the twine out of all proportion; that though the raw material, manila, has not increased in price, they have largely increased the price of twine, as much as 50 per cent. over the price it was last year. Another combination that we investigated last year was that of coffin-makers and undertakers, and we found that to be a most objectionable organisation. The coffin-makers and manufacturers of coffin supplies had undertaken to sell to none but members of the Undertakers' Association. In order to become a member of the Undertakers' Association, a man had to get the consent of three out of four of the nearest undertakers living to him; of course, in a small town that was impossible. If there were but two undertakers there, they did not want another man coming in to cut up the business, and the three nearest undertakers had to give their consent before a man could start in the business. The result was, as we have numerous letters to prove, and the evidence before the committee to prove, that they became a close corporation and no body could enter the business. Their freedom was interfered with, and they could not enter into the business of undertaking because the manufacturers of coffins and of coffin makers' supplies were prevented from selling them goods The result of this was injurious and unjust to those who wished to engage in a legitimate business, and who had all the qualifications and capital necessary for engaging in it. Then we have other combinations springing up during the present year. I have in my hand an advertisement clipped from a newspaper the other day, which reads as follows:

"Salt. The undersigned are sole salesmen for Canadian salt. Address L. Rightmyer & Co, Clinton.

"JOHN RANSFORD, Secretary."

What does that mean? That means that on the first day of March last an agreement went into force to this effect: A number of men formed a syndicate and went to the manufacturers of salt in Canada, who were then and had been for several years past, selling salt delivered on the cars by the carload at 55 cents a barrel. They sent to these salt manufacturers and said: "We will give you seventy cents a barrel for the product of your salt wells for the next 12 months, instead of 55 cents, the price at which you have been selling for several years past." They were anxious to make such a favorable bargain, and the syndicate bought all the products of all the salt wells in Canada for 12 months, and paid 70 cents a barrel, which the manufacturers were selling before for 55 cents, and they immediately raised the price to $1.05 a barrel by the carload, so that they increased the price of salt over 90 cents in one day, and every farmer who had previously been buying his salt delivered at his station by the single barrel for 90 cents to $1, is to-day paying $1.50. I think this act is illegal, it is an injustice; it is more than that, it is a robbery of the farming community, and I propose by the legislation we have here to put a stop to these iniquities. Now, there are many other objectionable undertakings, combinations and trusts formed in Canada; they are being formed every day. Those that have been formed have been found to work well; they have been found very profitable to those engaged in them, and a great encouragement is given in other lines of business, and in other lines of production, to form combinations in their respective lines. Another very objectionable combination is that of fire insurance associations in Canada. This does not extend to the insurance of farm property, but I believe it extends to all other kinds of property in Canada. They formed an insurance combination some years ago including all but the mutual companies; and the result has been exactly the same as in other combinations. The first or immediate effect is to raise the price, and that was the case in Canada. The prices for insurance was raised, and raised most inequitably. Very little attention was paid to the character of the insured, to what we call the moral hazard, and a cast iron arrangement was formed that did injustice to many individuals besides increasing the price of their insurance, and it was very unjust and unfair in its application. Then we find in biscuits and confectionery that combinations have been formed. In biscuits we take an American price list of articles that are sold in Ottawa; and we find that biscuits can be imported and pay a large duty and be sold cheaper than Canadian biscuits. But we are told: Look at the duty on the sugar, look at the duty on the lard. Well, the duty on the sugar in Canada, I apprehend, is not as high as the duty on sugar in the United States. As a matter of fact, the prices of the article are about the same in both countries. Two weeks ago granulated sugar was cheaper in Canada than in the United States, to-day it may be a little dearer; it varies in that way, but the average price is pretty nearly the same in Canada as in the United States. Lard is dearer in Canada than in the United States, because we have a duty here and the Americans pay the duty and bring it in largely. Flour, also, is a little dearer here; but the whole difference in the cost of the raw material will not make a difference of half a cent a pound, while in many cases we find a difference in the price of the articles purchased on each side to be three cents or four cents per pound. We are told that the remedy for this state of affairs is to abolish the tariff, that the tariff is responsible for "trusts" in Canada. I deny it. What has the tariff to do with the insurance combination, or with the coal combination, yet the latter is the most iniquitous combination in Canada to-day, that is the combination on hard coal. There is no combination on soft coal, on which there is a duty.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is not so.

Mr. WALLACE (York). Our information sworn before the Committee said it was so. Then we have a combination of wholesale grocers. What has that to do with the tariff? They are not manufacturers, they are simply men who handle the goods, and yet it is one of the most iniquitous combinations in Canada and is one of the least justifiable. They tell us it is necessary to the prosperity of their trade. I deny it. In Toronto there had not been for 15 years, I believe, a single case of a wholesale grocer failing, while every other business whether mercantile, manufacturing, banking or otherwise, showed failures, and the record is not broken except by the wholesale grocers. Of course we do not wish them to fail or to have any break in their prosperity. But they were prosperous before 1884, when they formed their combination, and they can prosper without their combination now. Then there is the question of salt. What would abolishing the duty on salt do? It is free when it is brought in from the old country, and it is free for fishermen's uses, no matter from what country it may come. This iniquitous combination of salt has nothing to do with manufacturing. A man goes and buys the product of all the manufacturers. The manufacturers are not breaking the law and should not be punished, but the individual who forms the combination and then doubles the price, breaks the law. We have 600,000 farmers in Canada among whom there is no combination, and in fact a combination would be impossible among them. We have perhaps 1,800 or 2,000 flour millers, with perhaps the largest capital invested of any manufacturing industry here to day, and there is no combination among them. We have the manufacturers of agricultural implements, and H. A. Massey of Toronto, Mr. Copp of Hamilton, and A. W. Morris of Montreal, three of the largest manufacturers in those articles, all swore there was no combination in their goods. Are the manufacturers, which have no combination, going to ruin? No, they are prosperous; they have their ups and downs and are more prosperous some years than other years, but they do not find it necessary to give up business. Mr. John Abel, a large manufacturer, says it is absolutely necessary for the existence of manufacturers that these combinations should be stopped. It is said that some of the combinations of manufacturers have been built up by the National Policy. Our investigation, I am glad to say, showed that very few of the worst combinations were those produced by the National Policy. But if there be any combination in Canada of manufacturers built up by the National Policy, they have no right to have those combinations and they had better take warning that they are not wanted in this country. The very essence of the National Policy and what we claimed for it was that, although for a time the price of the manufactured article might perhaps be a little dearer, the competition of the various manufacturers in the country would cause the price to be reduced. I am glad to say that this is the universal effect, and as a result of the National Policy we have cheaper goods than ever we could have had without the National Policy.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Your Bill says the contrary.

Mr. WALLACE (York). My Bill says nothing of the kind. I repeat, we have cheaper goods than we could have had otherwise, and also a better quality of goods. This excrescence or incubus on our manufacturing industries should not be allowed to exist. If this is always the result of the National Policy, the National Policy will have to go with it. I propose to strike these combinations out, and to compel manufacturers and producers whatever class or rank to go on as other classes of the people have gone on, and they have been prosperous and successful in this country. The Bill I proposed at first was the one of which I gave notice at the end of last Session. I have gone ever it carefully, and I intend to ask the House to permit its substitution by the second Bill which I have the honor to submit. The objection made to the old Bill was that it created a new offence, and the judges might perhaps interpret the Bill more severely than was intended. This new Bill does not create a new offence. It simply states what the law of England and Canada to-day is and has been for years past, and fixes a penalty for offences against the law and warns them not to break it. It does not interfere in the slightest degree with the legitimate trade and commerce of the country. It has not that object, and it could not effect that object. The law simply permits industries to be carried on, it permits healthy rivalry between commerce and manufacturers, it gives every man in Canada an equal chance, which the law of the country is bound to give him, and it gives equality all round. It has been said that, by taking off the duties on those articles, the evil would be cured. As I pointed out in the case of salt, such legislation would not punish the evil doer, because there is no duty on the article. This is one of the most important subjects that could engage the attention of the House. It is a great evil and a growing evil, and it affects every man, whether farmer, mechanic or any other class. But we were told the other day, by a member of the Board of Trade of Toronto, that the combination of the wholesale grocers in Toronto promoted morality, that all the other business men were not doing their business after a straightforward legal means and were doing crooked business, whilst that they in the combination were doing a straightforward business and promoting morality and honesty. In answer to that I have a letter from a gentleman in the town of Woodstock, which I will take the liberty of reading to this House. It is as follows:—

"WOODSTOCK, ONT., 12th March, 1889.

"Mr. CLARK WALLACE, M.P., Ottawa.

"Dear Sir,—I write to express my warm approval of your anti-combines Bill. I am a grocer of 30 years experience and have done the largest business here for the past 15 years, and our business here is in a very bad state on account of the combines viz, the Grocers' Guild, about 60 per cent of my turnover is now at fixed prices and very soon we will not be able to buy even a wax candle except at a price fixed by the guild, the result of which is that eleven new grocery stores have started here during the past three months. No doubt travellers induce them to start by telling them that they can buy as cheap as the largest stores and as so and so has made money so can they possibly, showing them their orders booked, but that is not all; I find that respectable houses in both wholesale and retail who conscientiously abide by the terms of the guild, are being undermined by small jobbing houses who may not invoice goods at less than guild prices but who give them baits and also cash to secure their orders which cash is charged to expenses and winked at by the principals. This appears to be increasing to such an extent that I fear before very long that the large firms that were so anxious to form the guild will be the first to get out of it.

"I have taken a decided stand for the last month and have not purchased any goods at fixed prices when I could avoid it and when I cannot get over it, and now I mean to buy from whoever fixes me the largest rebate. This is very demoralising but self protection demands it. I have spoken to the leading grocerymen here and they all agree with me that the guild is wrong, and as it was found that combinations of labor were not correct and that one man's labor was worth more than another's. So it will be found that combinations of capital are also wrong. Surely a man's capital, credit and experience, should be worth something to him, but the grocers guild sell goods at fixed prices to any one on credit totally ignoring the fact that the very essence of a business transaction is the risk. Wishing you much success with your Bill,

"Yours respectfully,

"JAMES SCOTT"

I have received also letters and resolutions from the Dominion Grange, from the Knights of Labor and from the retail grocers of Montreal, Kingston, Toronto, Quebec, Sherbrooke, Windsor, St. Catharines and Hamilton. Almost all Canada has in some form or other signified its approval of a measure that would tend to put down these illegal combinations in trade and therefore I beg to move the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. BROWN. I move that the Bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. SPEAKER. This cannot be moved in amendment. The Bill must be first read the second time.

Mr. GUILLET. I think that this House will certainly not approve of relegating this important matter to the Committee of Banking and Commerce in view of the fact that we have already the evidence of some 65 witnesses who have given their sworn testimony before a Committee of this House in reference to the operation of these combinations. I do not propose to detain the House at this late hour with any lengthened remarks on this important subject. It is a matter which has excited the interest of the entire people throughout this Dominion, for all classes and sections feel that they are being oppressed by unreasonable exactions from the operation of these combinations. The farmer, the mechanic, the laborer, and in fact all the toilers by hand or brain and even most of our merchants and manufacturers have denounced those combinations. It must be remembered that there are very few indeed who are indentified with these combinations and that the opponents of this Bill are only those who are immediately interested in upholding the combinations or who belong to or profit by them. There is no opposition to this Bill from any other source and for the very simple reason that the investigations of the Committee have thrown such a flood of light upon the operations of these combinations show that those interested in the combines have substantial reasons for opposing the passing of this law. The reason for the opposition to this Bill from those interested in the combines may be expressed in the old couplet:

"No rogue e'er felt the halter draw
With good opinion of the law."

It is charged that those combinations are due entirely to the National Policy, but that phase of the subject has been very satisfactorily dealt with by the mover of this Bill, and I need not dwell upon it to any considerable extent. Certainly if the National Policy has to any extent been responsible for encouraging combinations it must get the credit of having protected the country from similar and worse foreign combinations which had we not the National Policy would have ruthlessly laid waste our industries. Those combinations are not confined to Canada. They are more powerful and more oppressive in the United States than they are here, and we even find that they have found their way into free trade England. We know that in England now, they have the salt combine and the tin combine and the syndicates in steel, iron and copper, and we know that those combinations are now felt to be most oppressive in England. I have an extract here from the London Grocer bearing on this matter which I will read. It is as follows:—

"Since the salt union came into existence the prices of all descriptions of salt have been steadily raised until common salt, which was selling at 3s. to 5s. per ton is now quoted at 7s to 10s 6d per ton. The quotations for lump and other qualities have also been increased by about 100 per cent., while some of the finer qualities have been raised 125 per cent."

It is certain that these combinations which exist in foreign countries would have found their way here and had a disastrous effect in our own. It will be found on investigation that there are many articles of English manufacture imported, such as pickles, Nestlé's Food, blues of various kinds and a large variety of grocers' sundries, which are placed under agreements, and which must be sold at fixed prices by the merchant who deals in them, owing to the foreign manufacturers having imposed restrictions on their agents. So that it is not only in coal, in oatmeal, which is not to any considerable extent manufactured under a protective policy, that we have found combinations, and they would have existed even if there had been no National Policy. The people have adopted the National Policy, however, on the good faith and understanding that there should be no restriction on competition. They were assured that the competition that existed in the country would bring reasonable prices, and that condition of things was realised until these combinations were formed. Therefore, I say that in order to keep good faith with the country, they must be suppressed in order that the National Policy may do its proper work. It has been shown that the effect of competition in various lines has been to bring the price down to a level below that at which goods could be imported if there was no protective policy in the country. We find that it is only in a few lines that there are combinations; the vast majority of manufacturers in the country, including the iron and woollen manufacturers, have not combined. Those who have attempted to justify these combinations have claimed that there has been excessive competition. There was little proof of this before the committee of investigation. It was shown that there had been no excessive competition, which had been alleged on behalf of the sugar combination, as having driven the dealers in sugar to combine together in order to protect themselves from competition that was demoralising the trade. The investigation showed that the condition of things against which they complained had existed many years; there had been no demoralisation, no bankruptcy, no failures; and I have extracted the evidence of Mr. Ince, a member of the firm of Perkins & Ince, of Toronto, who came to give evidence on behalf of the Grocers' Guild, which had formed the sugar combination. He was asked:

"Q. Do you know of any failures in Toronto within the last ten years? A. I think there is one I think Bryan, Ewart & Murray's has occurred within ten years, and there have been others.

"Q. Within the last five years? A. I cannot remember any, I am happy to say. I am very much pleased to say that the grocery trade of Toronto is in a good position, which I think is due to care, and I am happy to say there have been very few failures."

The sugar combination at that time was but a year old; and yet in the previous five years there had not been one failure. I think that is most satisfactory, showing a healthy condition of the grocery trade at that time, and the condition of things then was not different from what it had been for fifteen years. The fact was that the merchants were prosperous, but they were not growing rich fast enough to suit themselves, and they made a combination with the view, as they admitted, of raising prices; and the effect has been to raise prices considerably, and the people have had to pay them; the money has had to come out of the people's pockets; and this Act is intended to suppress the combinations of these gentlemen who have had their hands in the people's pockets so long, and to compel them to withdraw their hands. Competition safeguards the prosperity of the country; it is the life of trade; and all classes have to meet it. The farmers have to meet it from the immigrants who are coming in. They go into the unsettled portions of the North-West, and you find an increased production of the various products of the farmers, and they have to meet the competition of that production. Then, in all kinds of manufactures and trades, you will find the same thing. The carriage maker or the woollen man who is manufacturing on a small scale has to compete at a great disadvantage with those who manufacture on a large scale. The same rule applies to the tinner, the clothier, the blacksmith, and people in all lines of business; they have to submit to competition, they have to toil harder, and to satisfy themselves with fewer of the comforts of life. Why, then, should there be combinations in a few lines of manufacture to oppress others? I say it is a condition essential to the prosperity of the country that there should be free competition, and no monopoly to compel people to pay excessive prices. The effect of such a state of things would be to impoverish the masses and to drive people from the country. But we are told that free trade will cure it all. But it has been shown that these exactions and combinations occur in free trade countries; it has been shown that in salt, in steel and in copper they have raised prices enormously. It is preferable to have the combinations in our own country; we can deal with them here; we cannot deal with these foreign combinations; but we can see that the combinations in our midst are brought to the bar of justice and that they pay the penalty. Then, we are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that unrestricted reciprocity will cure these evils. Why, combinations on the other side are one hundred fold more numerous than they are in this country. I have a list of them here, and I will read to the House some of the articles which are subject to combinations in the United States:

"The Standard Oil Trust and American Cotton Oil Trust have sown their seed in a fertile soil, and the rank growth is to-day polluting the air and stifling the existence of healthy life and progress It is currently reported and believed that "trust" monopolies have drawn within their grasp not only kerosene oil and cotton seed oil, but sugar, oatmeal, starch, white cornmeal, straw paper, pearled barley, coal, straw-board, castor-oil, linseed-oil, lard, school slate, oil cloth, salt, cattle, gas, street railways, whiskey, rubber, steel, steel rails, steel and iron beams, nails, wrought-iron pipes, iron nuts, stoves, lead copper, envelopes, paper bags, paving pitch, cordage, coke, reaping and binding and mowing machines, threshing machines, ploughs, glass and water works, and the list is growing day by day. Millions of dollars in cash or property, are being drawn into the vortex."

And yet hon members opposite think we must cure these evils by unrestricted reciprocity. What they say practically amounts to this: the jackals are abroad in this country, let us introduce a horde of American wolves to drive out the jackals. They say the hawks are carrying off the chickens and they would prevent that by permitting the American eagle and vulture to carry off our lambs. We find the system of the National Policy infested with parasites, and they cry out: "kill the National Policy." We say the good tree bears good fruit, but there are fungus growth and excrescences, and we will prune the good tree. They call on us, however, to cut it down, but I say that is unreasonable; we ought to preserve to the people the benefits of the National Policy which they have approved so often. Let us grapple with the evils which have grown up under it. On the other side of the line their Legislatures found they were paralysed by wealthy and powerful trusts. That is not the case with us. This Legislature will deal with these combines. We will yet see such a tumult about their heads as will very much surprise a great many people; and these combines will no longer exist after the Bill becomes law. I do not think I ought to take up the time of the House at greater length. There are some points that might be raised as to the position and grasping character of these trusts, but I do think this House will sympathise with those who have been arbitrarily excluded from the exercise of those privileges which they hereto enjoyed, as citizens of a free country, in purchasing their goods as they could do before these combines were formed. In the formation of these combines there has been unwarranted interference with freedom and civil rights. It is not to be borne that people should be compelled to pay so large an increase on the price of these articles and be subjected to insufferable exactions, as have been those who refused to enter the combines. Consider the case of the wholesale grocers, such as Mr. Joseph or Mr. Matthewson, of Montreal. It is well known that the sales of a wholesale grocer in sugar amounts to about $300,000 a year, representing on an average about 15,000 barrels of sugar. These men, who have been excluded from the right of purchasing from refiners, have to pay 90 cents per barrel more for sugar than those in the trust, or $12,000 out of their hard earnings, just because they could not reconcile their conscience to taking a solemn oath of secrecy and obedience to the dictates and rules of a trust; and because they refused to prostitute their consciences they were subjected to a taxation of $12,000. These trusts have placed their hands on the sacred ark of freedom, and should be put under the ban of the law.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. member for Hamilton proposes that this Bill should be sent to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. I think, after the second reading that would be the proper thing to do with it, because, as it stands, it would be perfectly unworkable. I will call the attention of the House to some of the provisions. The hon. gentleman proposes to punish as a special misdemeanor the granting to any person, who is a party to a combination, any facility which is not granted to other parties. A railway company may say: we will carry coal for so much if you will take a train load of it, but if you want simply a carload, we will not carry it for any such figure. And so, a combination made for putting up the price of an article might not be reached at all, nor would that made by a railway company for a rate be reached except under a special provision of this sort. So far as a combination of that is concerned, if it is to be effectively reached, it must be by some such principle as is recognised in the United States in the interstate commerce legislation. It shall also be a misdemanor to unreasonably enhance the market price of an article or commodity which is an object of trade, but it would be utterly unreasonable to expect a judge to undertake to say what an unreasonable enhancing of the price would be. Would it be 5, 10 or 20 per cent.? That must be done by Parliament.

"For unduly restraining the traffic in any such article or commodity."

What is the undue restraint? Now, take an instance: The cotton manufacturers of Canada may have the capacity to manufacture 24,000,000 pounds per year. A surplus is created, and the only way to restore the relation between production and consumption is to stop manufacturing for a few months, and all parties agree to do that. They would come under the operation of this Act.

Mr. WALLACE. I have given notice of a motion to amend this by another Bill.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have only the opportunity of considering the Bill which is before the House. The other is not before the House. I am pointing out the impracticable character of the measure before us. I have found that its provisions are largely unworkable. I think the object the hon. gentleman has undertaken to perform is, in many respects, a laudable object, but it could not be accomplished as his Bill now stands. I will not enter into discussion as to how far the Customs laws produce the state of things the hon. gentleman is trying to remedy, but I may point out that the hon. gentleman's Bill he asks us to read the second time will not accomplish its purposes. If the House reads the Bill the second time it will be necessary to send to the Committee where its provisions are being considered.

Mr. BROWN. Very large interests are at stake in the various sections of the trade and manufacture of Canada daily, and I desire very much to have the opportunity of being heard before the Committee to explain my views on the question. I move that the Bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. WALLACE. I must oppose this proposal, because I think it is simply an attempt to burke the Bill. That is the only object. There has been no matter brought up in this House that has received more thorough investigation from a Committee than this question of combinations. In the Committee last year 63 witnesses were examined and 26 meetings were held, and the other members of that Committee can tell the House that the subject was exhaustively considered. Of the 63 witnesses who were examined, 40 were members of combinations themselves, and they were here defending those combinations, and had the utmost opportunity of giving their views. I think they gave their opinions fully before a Committee of this House under oath, and it is not necessary now to refer this Bill to a Committee. I will, therefore, oppose the reference to a Committee, and, if necessary, I will ask the House to divide upon the proposition.

Mr. FISHER. We must not imagine for an instant that the Bill of the hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace) is the Bill of the Committee of last year. That Bill is an evolution of the hon. gentleman's own brain from the evidence adduced before the Committee, as he considered it. The Bill was only brought before the Committee at its last sitting, and it was not accepted by the Committee because the Committee did not think it was at that time in a position to bring in a Bill.

Mr. WALLACE. I was only referring to the report of the Committee which was unanimously adopted.

Mr. FISHER. That is perfectly true, but I do not wish the House to imagine that this was a Bill adopted by the Committee. I concur with the statement of the hon. gentleman that the Committee very thoroughly investigated this question and examined a number of witnesses, and I think the report is exhaustive on the subject of combines. Therefore I do not think it will be necessary to summon witnesses before the Banking and Commerce Committee, but I do think it is necessary that the clauses of the Bill should be examined and that some material changes should be made in it by the Banking and Commerce or some other Committee of this House. It might go into Committee of the Whole, and be threshed out there, but I think it would be better to send it to the Committee on Banking and Commerce and let them thresh it out.

Mr. COCKBURN. As seconder of this motion, I emphatically protest against the suggestion that I did so with the view to burke this Bill. The hon. gentleman has had this Bill before the House for a few weeks, and during that time he has found it necessary to make serious alterations in it. His own ideas were apparently so crude and hastily formed that he has had to propose certain material alterations, and I thought it was necessary that we should give him further time to consider his measure, and therefore I thought it was only right that the Bill should go before its natural committee, the Committee on Banking and Commerce I think it is the most important commercial Bill which has come before the House this Session. It may arrange or disarrange the whole commerce of the country, and therefore the House will see, and I think even my hon. friend from York (Mr. Wallace) himself will acknowledge the propriety of that motion being adopted, and that it is not intended to burke a Bill which has for its intent so much to benefit the interests of the country.

Mr. SPROULE I do not think anyone in this House will agree with the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Cockburn) or with the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown), because, at this late state of Session, it is evident that it will be almost impossible, if not altogether impossible, to have that Bill considered by the Committee and brought back to the House in time to pass it. The First Minister asks us in the first place to suspend the debate which is taking place on one of the most important Bills before the House in reference to these unlawful and unreasonable combinations which have sprung up in this country during the last few years and then it is proposed to send it to a Committee. We must look upon this as a most important measure. If we judge it from the interests which are involved, if we judge it from the manner in which devices have been brought to bear on the legislators of this country in connection with it, if we judge it by the restrictions on trade which it proposes to obviate, restrictions which enhance the price to the consumer and reduce it to the producer, we must see how important it is. Why, therefore, should we attempt to burke it by this device at this time, or why should an attempt be made to prevent the debate taking? It is because the debate would lay bare a state of things which is disgraceful to the country, and which would show the people of the country facts that they would insist upon their representatives legislating on the subject in such an emphatic manner that they could not avoid doing so. We all know that, if this motion is carried, it will do away with the Bill for the present year at any rate. Procrastination is the thief of time, and we do not know what may happen before another Session, we do not know what devices may be brought forward before another Session takes place. Though it is late in the Session when this Bill is proposed for the second reading, the hon. gentleman is not to blame for that. The Bill has been on the paper for sometime, and it has stood, when it has been called, at the request of the Government, at the request of hon. members who profess to desire to put a law of this kind on the Statute-book of this country. Now, without giving time for discussion, and on the plea that it is late in the night or early in the morning, it is asked that this Bill should be relegated to a Committee so that it will not have time to be passed this Session. However, I for one propose to go on with this discussion. What are the objects of these trade combinations?

Mr. SPEAKER. The question now is to refer the Bill to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, and the hon. gentleman cannot go into the merits at this time. He can only discuss the opportuneness of the motion.

Mr. SPROULE. I think, if I prove that the necessities of the time are such as to require that immediate attention should be given to this Bill, I shall establish the fact that it should not be sent to that Committee, because everyone will admit that, if it goes to that Committee, it is impossible that it should become law this Session. The eyes of the people of Canada are to-day directed towards the legislators in this Parliament, and those who feel that they are injured by reason of these unlawful combinations expect that every member here will endeavor to pass some law which will restrain them. If we fail to do that, it will be looked upon as an indication of a disposition on the part of this Parliament to put the matter off. It will appear as if the operators in these nefarious lines had brought their operations to bear on the legislators of the country in order to prevent the passage of the Bill. I think the experience of a few days or weeks will prove the truth of what I say, because the efforts which have been made to prevent the passage of this Bill by manufacturers and middlemen and others who have resorted to illegal means for that purpose are so well known to hon. members that many of them dislike to refer to them. I think we will find that the people in general will imagine that these means have been resorted to for the express purpose of burking legislation on this subject during this present Session.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would just point out to the hon. gentleman that I suppose he does not expect to get through the Bill to-night. Well, then, if he does not get through the Bill to-night, it will stand over till next Monday.

Mr. SPROULE. I understand that it is on the Orders of the day among Government Orders.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, yes; so it was, but if you choose to take it out of the hands of the Government, you must manage it after your own fashion.

Mr. CURRAN. I merely wish to say that there are a certain number of persons interested in various branches of trade, railway companies, insurance companies and others, who are anxious to be heard before the Committee on Banking and Commerce, who have representations to make; and in view of the discussion of this Bill, and the many defects that were pointed out, and which could have been much more elaborated by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and as we are now having a brand new Bill substituted for that originally submitted, certainly the hon. member ought not to try to block those who merely wish to have an opportunity of presenting their views to the ordinary Committee of Banking and Commerce, where the Bill can be put through in one day, and legislation had upon this subject during the present Session.

Mr. WALLACE. On the statement of the Premier that an opportunity will be given to have the Bill put through after it has been referred from the Banking and Commerce Committee, I accept the suggestion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot promise that. I will promise the opportunity if the House chooses to give it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12:55 a.m. (Tuesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 122) respecting the collection of certain tolls and dues therein mentioned.—(Sir John Thompson.)

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. TUPPER moved third reading of Bill (No. 129) to amend the Fisheries Act.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Before the Bill is passed, I wish to call the attention of the Minister to the question whether this Act is constitutional or not. Since the Bill was before the House last, I have had an opportunity of looking into the case of Delaney and McDonald, and I find the question was distinctly raised there as to whether the provision was not ultra vires. The only distinction which I make between section 6 of the old Act and this Bill is that the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were then excepted, and are now included. The law as it read at that time was:

"The use of nets or other apparatus which capture salmon shall, except in the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, be confined to tidal waters."

That exception is eliminated. The question was raised in that case as to whether that did not amount to a prohibition of the right of a riparian proprietor to fish in front of his land; but, as the court decided that the Province of New Brunswick was not included in the section, they expressed no opinion on that question. My hon. friend will observe, however, that the court were very cautious in reserving their views on that point, and I remember that, in the case of the Queen against Robertson, which I argued myself before the Supreme Court here, there was very much doubt felt as to whether this would come within the powers of this Parliament. There is also another point to which I would call the Minister's attention. Under the seventh section it is provided that:

"The Minister, or any fishery officer authorised to such effect, shall have power to define the tidal boundary of estuary fishing for the purposes of this Act."

That simply leaves it within the power of the Minister, or of the fishery officer, to do away with the rights of riparian proprietors, and this will be a very important matter, especially in regard to the St. John River. The influence of the tide is felt very largely on that river for a distance of 70 miles from its mouth, but it is not a tidal river, because the tide is checked by the falls at the mouth of the river. There are very important salmon fisheries on that river, particularly in what is called the Long Reach, and those are very valuable to the riparian proprietors; but this Bill will have the effect of destroying the rights of those proprietors. Between Fredericton and St. John, a distance of 85 miles, the whole of the fishing may be stopped because these are not tidal waters in the legal sense, although the influence of the tide is felt in that river probably for a distance of 6 or 7 miles above Fredericton. I do not think the fisheries vary from one year to another; one year we have a good season and another year a bad season, but I do not think there has been a great deal of diminution. I have heard complaints from persons on the rivers as to parties putting their nets there. It seems to me that one consequence of this Act will be practically to deprive the owners along the rivers of the right which was secured to them under the Act of Confederation.

Mr. ELLIS. I object to this Bill on several grounds. The Minister himself, in introducing it, and again in moving the second reading, stated that it applied to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick alone. But that is not correct. I find that it goes much further than stated by the Minister, and that it applies to the rivers in Ontario as well. However, I am not concerned about the Ontario people. If they do not care to look after themselves, it is not the business of the Lower Provinces members to do it for them. The underlying objection in my mind to the Bill is that it takes away the riparian rights of the people on the rivers of these Provinces for the benefit of fly-fishermen. As regards the St. John River there is a distance of 220 miles from its mouth to the junction to the Tobique River, and along that distance no fish was ever taken by fly. From time immemorial the riparian owners have exercised the privilege, and the absolute right, of placing nets from the shore and taking salmon. It is now proposed to take that right from them entirely. Then, 60 miles from the mouth of the Tobique River to the forks, the right of fishing by nets has existed from the time the settlers first went upon that river. No salmon, so far as I am aware, has ever been taken by the fly on the Tobique River below the forks; a few are occasionally taken above the forks for 30 or 40 miles up, with the fly. So the object appears to be to preserve the St. John River for the benefit of fly-fishermen at the head of the Tobique River. The effect of the measure will be to deprive all the people of the Province of New Brunswick along the river of the privilege they have heretofore enjoyed of fishing with the net. The next section of the Bill gives power to the fishery inspector to define what is a tidal river. It is left entirely with that officer to declare where the tide ends and where it begins. The tide is felt 60 miles up the river from the mouth, by the mere backing up of the water, so that this section leaves a very large discretion to the officer. It cannot be contended that there is any great decrease in the amount of the salmon catch in that river. If the hon. gentleman is sincerely desirous of protecting the fishermen, he had better turn his attention to the Restigouche River, where fly fishermen are slaughtering the fish. There has been a constant effort on the part of both the Local and the General Governments to transfer the rights of the people of these fisheries to lessees. I know that in our own Province it has created a great deal of hard feeling. Last year on the Tobique River where some persons were fishing, they were attacked and a lady was killed in her canoe. A striking circumstance in connection with the matter was that a clergyman of the Church of England thought it his duty to write an article to the public press, showing the feeling which existed, and in a measure palliating that feeling, because the people were being deprived of their rights For these reasons I believe that the Bill is objectionable, and I, therefore, move that it be not now read the third time, but that it be read this day six months.

Mr. MITCHELL. Before making any observations upon this Bill, I would like to ask the Minister to state the reasons for which he asks this House to pass this measure, and upon what authority, whether upon representations of the people, or upon the mere motion of the officers of the department? As soon as the Minister answers this question, I will make some observations upon this subject. In the meantime, I reserve my right to reply.

Mr. TUPPER. I reserve my right to speak when the proper time comes. The hon. gentleman was not in the House when we took the Bill into Committee, and I was asked a number of questions. The point which the hon. gentleman wishes to raise, he can raise just as well before I have stated my views. As to the points raised by both the members from the city of St. John, I decline to be cross-examined at this stage.

Mr. MITCHELL. As the hon. gentleman declines to be cross-examined, as he chooses to call it, I must state any objections I entertain against this Bill. I have no hesitation in saying, that it is an outrageous Bill, one that never should be passed by this Parliament. It is an interference with the rights of the people, it is a Bill that, so far as I know and believe, has not been asked for by the people of that part of the country to which it particularly applies—the Maritime Provinces. There are numerous rivers in the Province from which I come, commencing with the Richibucto, Restigouche, Miramichi, Nipisiguit, Kouchibouguac, and other rivers, where the people residing on their banks, have farms, and own the riparian rights, and use the rivers for fishing purposes, and this Bill proposes to deprive them of their rights. I have asked, for the purpose of obtaining information, the grounds upon which the hon. gentleman has introduced this Bill. I have asked the hon. gentleman to state whether—I speak only for the Province of New Brunswick, but, I dare say, it applies equally to Nova Scotia, and, very likely, in some way, to the Province of Quebec—there is a single petition from any one of the inhabitants of one of those localities, asking for the passage of such a measure as this is. I will take my own river by way of illustration, a river which is, perhaps, 200 miles long. The tidal water runs on one branch about 40 miles from the mouth of the river, on the other branch, perhaps, 45 or 50 miles, and there is a stretch of 100 miles on those branches where the people now have an inalienable right to catch fish under regulations established by the Fishery Department under authority of law, but this Bill will deprive them of the right to fish and set nets. Is this House prepared, at the arbitrary will, and on the recommendation of officers of the department, to pass a Bill that will sweep away, by half-a-dozen lines of print, the rights of thousands of people settled along those rivers? From time immemorial, before the Minister of Marine was thought of, before his immediate ancestor was born, the people along those rivers have enjoyed those rights under regulations, first, of the Local Legislature, to set nets under certain restrictions, namely, that they should not extend more than one-third across the channel in non-tidal waters; and, afterwards, in 1867, when further conditions were imposed, by which there should be a certain distance allowed between the different nets, so that the fish might have a chance to propagate. But this Bill comes in, and at the arbitrary will of the officers of the department, a fishery officer shall have the power to declare that not a net shall be set on the river. Is that the kind of legislation this House will put up with? I have asked information from the hon. gentleman, and he has treated me in a cavalier manner, and in a manner which no man who has been a few months in office should treat an hon. member who has for years occupied a place in this House, and who for years was Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and who, because I was not in the House when he made his explanation, now declines to be cross-examined or questioned by myself. If the hon. gentleman intends to conduct business in that way, he will not be a very great success. He will find that sugar will catch more flies than vinegar, and that it is wiser to civilly answer questions put in a civil manner and to furnish the information we have a right to obtain, especially with respect to a measure of this kind which is going to sweep away the riparian rights of thousands of people in the Maritime Provinces who have to-day an inalienable right to the fishing I think this House will never consent to a measure of that sweeping character; certainly it will not do so before we obtain an explanation as to the authority in which this is proposed to be done; whether the people have requested it, whether any petitions have been presented, and I am ready to say now and I do believe that not a single petition from a single inhabitant of the Maritime Provinces has been presented requesting that this Bill should pass into law. I endorse what has been said by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis), and the hon. member for the county of St. John (Mr. Weldon), that this is a measure no doubt inspired by the sporting men of the country, by the fly fishermen, by the men who obtain leases of the fishing, by the men who get the exclusive right from the Local Legislature to fish with the fly in the different rivers of the Province, because the Province has the right to lease these fishing privileges. We have no power to control them, the courts have decided that question; and these men, who are mostly foreigners from the United States and elsewhere, come in to prevent the settlers—the men born on the soil, whose ancestors have enjoyed these rights and exercised them for generations—now enjoying the fishing privileges; and we are asked to permit all their rights to be swept away simply because a few foreign fishermen come in to fish during four or five weeks each year, and who desire to keep the rivers supplied with fish for their sport in remuneration of the small payment they make. It is, however, far more important for the country that the men who have enjoyed these privileges, and who have an inalienable right to them, should not be deprived of getting fish to feed their families. I shall be one of the last men who would desire to destroy the fisheries of our rivers. I know as much about them and a little more than does the hon. Minister, for it is a matter to which I gave great attention during the period I held office as Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and both before and since that period; and I contend that the fisheries of our country are as well protected to-day as they ever were, that there are no abuses existing that cannot be easily remedied, and, I believe, that with the guardianship we have upon the rivers now, there is no necessity for depriving the people who have inalienable rights to the privilege of fishing, of taking the fish as food for themselves and their families, or for purposes of trade. There is a stretch on the river which runs through my county for 60 miles above tidal water, where every farmer has ten, fifteen, or twenty fathoms of net run into the river, not an illimitable quantity, but a quantity according to the regulations laid down by the department over which the hon. gentleman presides. It is proposed, without any explanation from the hon. Minister, to pass a measure which will take away this right, and I ask the House never to pass such a measure. It is an outrageous measure, and one to which the House should never consent; and I trust it will not pass it, certainly without some explanation which we have not yet obtained.

Mr. TUPPER. Perhaps it would be as well to dispose of the outrageous feature of this measure at the outset, and I think the hon. gentleman will find, if he will take the trouble to look at the speeches he made in this House, that one of the best arguments in favor of the Bill now under consideration was made by himself in 1883 when a Bill was introduced with this clause, was passed in this House without division, then went to the Senate, was there passed and sent back. As I explained the other day when the hon. gentleman was not here, this Bill is framed to meet the same circumstances and the same conditions the former Bill was intended to meet. The hon. gentleman spoke, as he nearly always does, under great excitement and made statements to-day, and in order to induce the House to accept them as worthy of reflection, he dwelt on the fact that he was experienced and had filled the office of Minister of Marine and Fisheries for some time, and was, therefore, able to speak on that subject. I prefer his calmer, clearer reasoning in 1883 to the statement he has made to-day in anger, simply because I did not see fit to be cross-examined on the third reading of the Bill, when I had explained it fully in committee. In 1883 the hon. gentleman understood the subject, and he has evidently forgotten it, because he now seems to think that we are perpetrating an outrage upon the fishermen of this Province in passing legislation of this character through the House. I am able to tell that hon. gentleman that up to 1883 he thought that this very legislation was the law of the land, and the litigation in the courts of New Brunswick actually arose over a license signed by his own hand, and executed by him as Minister of Marine, granting those valuable fisheries which he now wishes the riparian owner to enjoy undisturbed and uncontrolled—granting those fisheries for the purpose of fly fishing. The hon. gentleman will find, if he looks up the discussion which took place in 1883, that when the acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries (the present Minister of Customs) had charge of the Bill the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) took this legal ground that he has taken to-day, and mentioned, as he has now mentioned, the points that have been raised in the courts additional to those which have been judicially pronounced upon. The hon. gentleman from St. John then argued the legal phase of this question, and the acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Bowell) was supported in a very clear and very able argument by the member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). I will read some of the hon. gentleman's remarks, as he has forgotten, apparently, what they were.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have not forgotten a line of them.

Mr. TUPPER Then the hon. gentleman must think that every one else has forgotten it. Before quoting the hon. gentleman I may say that from 1867 up to 1882 the department had proceeded upon the idea that the Act should be construed as this Bill seeks now to have it construed, and on that idea the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) and his successors acted in controlling those non-tidal waters, and so preventing the spawning beds of the salmon being overfished or unduly fished. The member for Northumberland acted under this impression, and the courts intervened and said that while that was true and while that was the meaning of the Act in every river but those in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, in consequence of the section which I propose to amend, yet the non-tidal rivers of those two Provinces were entirely exempt from the operations of the Act. A Bill similar to this was introduced then, and the hon. member for Northumberland, instead of abusing the Minister of the day, instead of cross-questioning him, instead of making charges that he was endeavoring to perpetrate an outrage, or that he was favoring one class of people against another, supported that Bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. What lease was it? Was it the Rowe or Robinson lease?

Mr. TUPPER. How many leases did the hon. gentleman grant?

Mr. MITCHELL. I will answer the hon. gentleman when I get a chance.

Mr. TUPPER. That was the lease granted to Mr. Robinson in 1874. The member for Northumberland then said:

"I may say, of course, it is necessary that legislation should be had with regard to the fisheries, and that the Dominion statute which governs them should be amended and altered, so as to suit what is now believed to be the law of the land."

As I have before explained, he believed this present Bill to be the law of the land. And he continues:

"But which is very different from what was believed to be the law of the land some time ago."

He continued to say:

"I think the Ministry deserve credit for endeavoring to meet the case as it has arisen, but it is a difficult one, indeed."

The hon. gentleman goes on to review those difficulties, and to meet the legal contentions of the member for St. John, with regard to the matter.

Mr. MITCHELL. Better read my remarks.

Mr. TUPPER. I have read them, and the hon. gentleman will find them quite instructive, but as I agreed with all that he said, or most of it, I will not trouble the House further than to quote the following:—

"I think it is not unwise, and that my hon. friend from the County of St. John, on consideration, will see, that between the choice of two evils, whether we shall allow unlimited fishing by these proprietors or require of all persons desirous of fishing, having a proprietary right to fish, to go to the Government and ask for a license, and that whether one horn or the other of the dilemma be adopted, I think my hon. friend will say that, in the interests of the protection of the fisheries, it is better to trust the Government of the day, whoever they may be, than to allow the unlimited fishing which proprietors will naturally exercise if no restrictions are placed upon them."

And so on in that direction, and the effect of the hon. gentleman's moderate and calm advice was to induce the House, without division, to pass this Bill. This Bill which is now before the House contains the same clause as the previous Bill on which the hon. gentleman then spoke. It is unnecessary for me now to reply to the points which the hon. gentleman has raised, for they were raised in committee when the hon. gentleman was absent, but in a little less vigorous fashion than they were raised by him to-day. In reply to the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon), I might state that he seems to have mistaken the object which the Government have in view in connection with this legislation. I am able to tell him that instead of this being simply in the interests of fly fishermen who pay their fees, not to us, but to Local Government, and from whom we do not get any revenue at all, I may tell him that this Bill is in the interests of all the tidal fisheries. This Bill is intended to preserve to the fishermen on the tidal waters the salmon fishery, because it goes without saying that if unlimited and uncontrolled netting is allowed to go on, on the spawning ground of the salmon above the tidal waters the salmon fisheries will become absolutely destroyed. I would give to the hon. member for St. John statistics to show that in the River St. John, to which he alluded, the fact of allowing the law to stand as it now stands, and of allowing unrestricted netting in the spawning grounds of the salmon, is every day more clearly seen to be to the detriment of the fishermen, and that not merely in the non-tidal part of the river, but in the tidal portion of the river itself. For instance, taking the four counties in which the tidal portion of the river is situated, St. John, King's, Queen's and Sunbury, the catch in 1887 was 197,252 pounds, and in 1888 it was 173,365 pounds, or a decrease of 23,887 pounds. Now, in the counties where the river is non-tidal, York, Carleton and Victoria, the catch in 1887 was 52,448 pounds, and in 1888, 29,250 pounds, or a decrease of 23,198 pounds.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Can you give us the particulars of the harbor fisheries?

Mr. TUPPER. No, I have not the returns for the harbor with me. But that is sufficient, I think, to show that there is a serious and alarming decrease in those very waters where this astonishing practice is carried on. Can the hon. gentleman who knows so much, and who ill brooks any difference of opinion from his own on fishery matters, name any country outside of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to-day where it is allowed to net salmon in the spawning beds, either for the pretended benefit of the riparian proprietor or the residents, or anybody else. It is an anomaly which exists there, and which was never intended to exist, and which that hon. gentleman himself has explained in this House has never been entertained as a construction of our legislation from the beginning down to 1883; and the officers in the department under him have continually urged upon the department since that time that unless some legislation of this character were introduced, these fisheries would be completely ruined. So there is no radical change proposed. There is only an interpretation of this Act in the sense in which the Government intended it should be read in 1883, and before that time. In reference to the point raised by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon), I would submit briefly, as he himself admits, that the courts have not gone so far in the contention that was raised in this case, that he, I believe, is not prepared seriously to argue that the British North America Act, and under it, our right to regulate the fisheries, would make it ultra vires, or impossible for this Parliament legally to pass legislation for the avowed and sole object of regulating and preserving the fisheries. If we have no power in this Parliament to pass a regulation of this kind, then all our regulations should go by the board which have in view a restriction of fishing. There is not an absolute and total denial of the right to fish above the tide, because, although that subject is not mentioned in this Bill, the Act, when read with it, leaves this state of things, that where it will not injure the spawning beds of the salmon, or where salmon can be fished above the tide, without injury to the tidal fisheries, it will be seen that the next section, providing for a license being obtained from the Minister of Marine, such as was given heretofore, would prevent the recovery of a penalty and a successful prosecution.

Mr. ELLIS. By the legislation which the hon. gentleman has proposed, the sixth section, giving the right to issue a license, will no longer apply.

Mr. TUPPER. I am not referring to the sixth section. I am referring to the next section, and the only section in the Act, not in the Bill, which provides for the recovery of a penalty. As the hon. gentleman will see, the Bill before the House does not in its terms refer to a penalty, and before any disastrous effect would occur to the person fishing where fishing is prohibited, it would be necessary to show that he had no license, because the penalty is for fishing in those prohibited waters without license and without permission. So that, even in that respect, the hon. gentleman has not been able to make good the point that by this Bill absolute prohibition is enacted, that will prevent the setting of a net or fishing for salmon by nets in a non-tidal portion of the river. With reference to the other matter alluded to, it is not, perhaps, necessary to speak at great length; that is, a portion of the general Act which enables fishery officers to fix the point where the tidal water ends and the non-tidal water begins. That was considered long ago necessary for the purpose of certainty, for the benefit of the fishermen concerned, as well as the more easy carrying out of these regulations. Instead of leaving the matter to be decided in the courts of law, where the expense of expert testimony, witnesses, etc., would be incurred, the Legislature decided in the original Bill that it would be wise to enable the officers to determine the character of the waters, and to define them; and in practice that provision has not been unduly exercised, but it is exercised at any time in reason. The effort is to find as near as may be where the waters meet, and that point is fixed and determined upon. I think I have covered, in a very summary way, the points raised. This subject, if fully discussed, would take much longer time than the House is, perhaps, prepared to give to it; but I am glad to know that even if these points have been briefly discussed, they were considered carefully by Parliament before. We make the system uniform by this Bill. It is the system that now obtains in all the other Provinces besides Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and it is not an unpopular system. It is a system which has worked well, and which the Government from 1867 to 1882 supposed to be in force throughout the Dominion.

Mr. MITCHELL. Would the hon. gentleman please read that portion of the speech he referred to, in which I expressed a different view from what I do now? for he has not read it yet.

Mr. TUPPER. I read the portion of the speech which I think established the statements I made. I will send the hon. gentleman the Hansard, and I have no doubt the House will be willing to hear his explanation of it.

Mr. KIRK. When this question was before the House a few days ago, I asked the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if it was the intention of the Bill to prohibit the catching of salmon with nets in other than tidal waters, and his answer was yes, it would be confined to tidal waters.

Mr. TUPPER. That is what the Bill states.

Mr. KIRK. If I understood the Minister correctly, he has stated just now that the Government have the right to issue licenses to fish in those waters. The Bill has only one clause, but it means a great deal:

"The use of nets or other apparatus for the capture of salmon shall be confined to tidal waters, and any fishery officer may determine the length and place of each net or other apparatus used in any of the waters of Canada."

According to this Bill, it is quite clear that nets cannot be set in waters other than tidal waters in the Dominion of Canada, and the fishery overseers are given the power of saying how long the net shall be. I did not know that they had that power before. There is a provision in this law which prohibits the use of swing nets. That is in the old law, so that it is not an alteration. Now, it appears to me, and it has been the feeling always in Nova Scotia, that the law was oppressive and has been always quite stringent enough. In the ninth section, the law provides that in the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick salmon shall not be taken between the 15th of August and the 1st of March. At all other seasons of the year, no salmon shall be taken. That is a very stringent law. There is only a short season in Nova Scotia when salmon can be caught, April, May, June and July, four months; and we are prohibited from catching fish with nets during the remaining eight months. I am firm in the belief that if the officers of the Government were made to do their duty, as they should, the salmon would be quite sufficiently protected under the present law. In sub-section 7, section 8, the law requires that nets shall not be set closer to each other than 250 yards, and the officers have the power to determine that the nets shall be set at a greater distance apart than 250 yards. It also provides that nets shall not be set within 200 yards of the mouth of any stream, nor in pools where salmon come to spawn. These are very stringent provisions which, if properly enforced, would sufficiently protect the salmon. But they are not enforced. The officers, as a general rule, are only noted for drawing their salaries. The salmon are thus allowed to be destroyed in consequence of the dilatoriness of the officers of the department. It does appear to me that it is about time for this Government to cease restricting the liberties of the people, whom they are driving away by their legislation as fast as they can. The hon. the Minister of Marine was scarcely appointed to that office when he passed an order forbidding the dropping of sawdust into the streams from saw mills, and closed down nearly all the mills in the Province of Nova Scotia in the interests of the salmon fisheries. What is to become of the men who work in the woods at the lumber business? They will have to leave the country. Having driven these men away, he now proposes to drive others away by prohibiting them from catching salmon. He ought to know that the farmers who came and settled on these streams did not come because of the value of the land, in many cases, but because the streams afforded them the means of providing food and support for their families, and in this way they enjoyed the privilege of fishing for salmon up to the present. Now, we are to be told that they are not to catch for their own table. It is a monstrous proposition, and the hon. gentleman will find it is considered monstrous when he comes down among the people who are in the habit of fishing salmon.

Mr. BURNS. In the remarks I am about to make on this subject, I will not attempt to deal with the constitutional question involved. That is a matter I leave to the determination of the legal minds of the House, but more especially to the determination of the law officers of the Government, who, I presume, gave it serious consideration before introducing this Bill. I desire to express an opinion entirely different from that expressed by the hon. member for Northumberland, whose opinion I have a very great respect for, but who, I am afraid, has allowed his somewhat bellicose disposition this evening to run away with his judgment. For the purpose of making a point, he has named to the House several rivers, which impliedly would be affected by the operations of this Bill. He has named the Richibucto the Buctouche, Tabusintac, Kouchibouguac—and he might have gone on and cited a number of others in which there are no salmon at all. On the whole north shore of New Brunswick there are only two salmon rivers, in any portion of which nets have been set, namely, the Restigouche and the Miramichi. Now, the opinion I have to express, and it is an opinion I have formed after careful observation, and can express with confidence, is that it is materially necessary, in the interests of the salmon fisheries of the northern part of New Brunswick especially—I do not propose to deal with the River St. John, because I am not so familiar with that locality—that fishing by nets should be prohibited in non-tidal waters. To day I believe there are in the Restigouche only two or three nets above the point called the head of the tide. On the Miramichi there are perhaps a larger number, but whether that number be great or small, in the interests of the coast fishery, which is the commercial salmon fishery of New Brunswick, it is absolutely essential and necessary that fishing by net should be prohibited in non-tidal waters. The number of fish that have been caught in the nets above tidal waters may not be very large, but they are usually caught at the season of the year when they are full of spawn. If it is necessary to protect the spawning grounds at all, it is necessary to prohibit the use of nets. It has been stated that this legislation is introduced at the instance and for the benefit of sportsmen. Well, I have no particular prejudice in favor of so-called sportsmen, in favor of those who come from abroad and monopolize our streams because they may happen to have more money than those who live on them; but I will do them this justice, that to the sportsmen a very considerable amount of credit is due for the manner in which they contribute to the protection of the streams. It is in their interest that the streams should be protected, and the fish allowed to propagate. It is also in the interests of the Provinces that this legislation should be passed, because anything you can do to enhance the value of the up-river fisheries, the fly fisheries, will be a benefit to the Province. So that not only from a provincial, but from a Dominion and a commercial standpoint, there are important reasons why this legislation should go through. As regards the last provision of the Bill, which prohibits the use of swing nets in catching of salmon, I must confess I was considerably alarmed when I first read the Bill, but my apprehensions have been removed by statements from the Minister of Marine and his deputy, that the term swing nets used in the Bill is not meant to apply to that part of salmon nets which are commonly called swings. On every stand of salmon nets, there are certain portions or extensions from the main net which are called swings, and naturally the salmon fishermen on the coast were considerably alarmed on reading this Bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the hon. gentleman state what he means by swing nets?

Mr. BURNS. If the Minister permits me, I will give the definition of it. It is a net fastened at one end, loose at the other end, with the exception that it may be perhaps kept from moving to a great distance by a line fastening it. In other words, one end being fastened, the other end is at liberty to swing right or left to a certain distance. So that term of swing nets cannot apply to the swings now used in connection with the salmon nets; in fact this provision has been in the Fishery Act for the last twenty years, and, therefore, no apprehension can be felt on that score. If I had not received that explanation and that definition and had not found that the term had been in the Act for the last twenty years, I should have felt it my duty to my constituents to oppose this Bill, but because my apprehensions have been allayed, and I believe it is very necessary in the interests of the coast salmon fisheries of New Brunswick, that fishing with nets in non-tidal waters should be prohibited, I shall vote for the Bill.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I wish to explain, in a few words, the vote I am going to give on this matter. I find in the Revised Statutes the Fishery Act, section 8, sub-section 5, the general law of the country that excepts from its effects the Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and the lakes in the Province of Ontario. I am at a loss to understand the grounds for such an exception—because we should have a general law for the whole Dominion—and there was not a single reason why those Provinces, in so far as fisheries are concerned, should not be under the general law of the country. Therefore, I shall vote for the amendment moved by the hon. gentleman. I wish it to be understood that I am expressing no opinion on the question of jurisdiction and should that question be brought up, I should have further remarks to offer to the House. The sawdust matter was also brought up. I, for one, am opposed to sawdust being let in the rivers by mill owners, in so far as it tends to destroy the fish. I shall, therefore, favor any law that will prevent sawdust being thrown in the rivers. We could not guard the fishing by too many wise measures, for the fish is rapidly decreasing in our inland waters. Our rivers fall into larger rivers or into the sea and serve as tributaries to the larger rivers or receive fish from them; and if you do not protect it at the mouth of the river, you diminish its quantity. It is an important source of wealth for the Dominion and we ought to preserve it by every possible means. I shall, therefore, vote for the amendment moved by the hon. Minister.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The Minister will recollect that, up to the year 1882, the Dominion claimed the exclusive right to deal with riparian owners, but in the case of the Queen against Robertson, which I argued before the Supreme Court, the point was raised, and it was decided in favor of the riparian proprietor. I contend that the effect of this Act is simply to destroy that right. First, I say, that this is not within the power of the Dominion Parliament; and secondly, it interferes with property and civil rights, and I think it is very important that it should be considered in that view. You must take this Act in connection with other sections of the old Act. The Act in the Revised Statutes is simply the old Act of 1868, which was passed when the Parliament of Canada supposed they had a right to deal with these matters. My hon. friend has said that the penalty cannot be enforced, because a man can get a license to fish above the tidal waters; but my hon. friend must see that, when he has eliminated that provision as to a license, the fishery officer has no power to grant a license, because Parliament will have declared that no nets, or other apparatus, can be used at all in non-tidal waters. The next clause says he shall not fish without a license, except with a rod and line, in the manner known as fly surface fishing. So, unless he can fish with a fly, he is prohibited from fishing in non-tidal waters, and all the rights which the courts have held as incident to a man's right of property are taken away.

Mr TUPPER. Supposing this Bill became law, and a prosecution was undertaken against a party for fishing in non-tidal waters, and the defendant produced a license under the next section of the Act, could the penalty be recovered?

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I say yes, and I will show my hon. friend why. Take sub-section 6 of section 7 of the 31st Victoria, chapter 60. The hon. gentleman repeals sub section 5 altogether. Sub-section 6 declares that:

"The use of nets or other apparatus which capture salmon shall, except in the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, be confined to tidal waters; and any fishery officer may determine the length and place of each net or other apparatus used in any of the waters of the Dominion."

So far, my hon. friend's amendment is precisely the same as this Act, eliminating the exception in favor of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, but then it goes on:

"Provided, that nothing contained in this section shall prevent the use of nets for catching salmon in the lakes of the Province of Ontario, nor preclude the Minister from authorising, by special fishery licenses or leases, the capture of salmon by nets in fresh water streams."

That proviso is taken away, and you must read sub-section 7 in connection with that.

"The Minister, or any fishery officer authorised to such effect, shall have power to define the tidal boundary of estuary fishing for the purposes of this Act; and above the actual limit so to be laid down, it shall be unlawful without the special fishery lease or license, above provided for."

Mr. TUPPER If my hon. friend will allow me, I would point out to him that while he is quite right in saying that the immediately preceding section will be gone, the words "above provided for" will not refer to that, but they will refer to the beginning of the Act, which provides for the granting of leases and licenses.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Here is sub-section 5, which the Minister eliminates from the Act.

Mr. TUPPER. You have read that.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I will read it from the Revised Statutes:

"The use of nets or other apparatus for the capture of salmon shall, except in the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, be confined to tidal waters, and any fishery officer may determine the length and place of each net or other apparatus used in any of the waters of Canada; but nothing contained in this section shall prevent the use of nets for catching salmon in the lakes of the Province of Ontario, or preclude the Minister of Marine and Fisheries from authorising, by special fishery licenses or leases, the capture of salmon by nets in fresh water streams; provided, that no one shall fish for or catch salmon with swing nets in any of the waters of Canada"

What does my hon. friend propose to do? He proposes to repeal that section, and what does he say?

"The use of nets or other apparatus for the capture of salmon shall be confined to tidal waters, and any fishery officer may determine the length and place of each net or other apparatus used in any of the waters of Canada; provided, that no one shall fish for or catch salmon with swing nets in any of the waters of Canada."

So the proviso as to special fishery licenses has disappeared. Then how can my hon. friend say that the Minister or any other officer can issue a license to set a net without a special fishery license? I say that, under the present Act, no Minister nor fishery officer can over-ride the law. The law says that no net shall be used in tidal waters in those Provinces except under the authority of licenses, which are repealed, so there can be no fishing by nets or by any other apparatus, not even by hook and line. The effect will be that in the River St. John no fishing can be done between the mouth of the river and the junction of the River Tobique, a distance of 220 miles; no man can put a net or cast a line in that river. My hon. friend has stated that in York county in one year there were 52,000 fish caught, and in another year 29,000. In the counties of King's and Queen's, 190,000 were caught one year, and 150,000 the next year. My hon. friend cited these statistics for the purpose of showing that salmon fishing was diminishing. No doubt one year may be better than another, but, on the whole, there has been but little diminution. Then, again, in the harbor of St. John there is a large fishery going on, likewise in the Bay of Fundy. But I take these statistics to show that the people who catch salmon in the River St. John, in the counties which are not spawning grounds, will be deprived by this law of the right to take a single salmon. It does not touch the spawning ground at all. It has been pointed out by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis) and the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Kirk), that the people have had these rights all along. They have held these rights by virtue of the ownership of the river bank, and the effect of this will be to prevent them from fishing except by rod in any part where the Minister chooses to decide that the waters are tidal waters. It seems to me that this is an infringement on the rights of parties. We find that it was contended under the 19th rule which was issued in June, 1879, by the department, that fishing for salmon except under the authority of a lease or license, was forbidden. It was contended that that was not the prohibition but only a regulation of the fishery. But the Chief Justice, in the case of Delaney vs. McDonald, said this:

"I do not so read it. But admitting that it might be so construed, I cannot find anything in the Act giving the Minister of Marine the authority to require a person who has by law the exclusive right of fishing, to take out a license to fish in front of his own land."

Now, I say the effect of all this will be to deprive a number of people of rights which they have heretofore exercised. I think it is a good deal, as the hon. member for Guysborough said, that the officers are not as active as they ought to be in protecting the fisheries. My hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Burns) spoke about other rivers which are salmon fisheries In those rivers the salmon fisheries were destroyed to a large extent before Confederation by the numerous mills on the large streams. He speaks of the Restigouche, and he says there were only three rivers where salmon are caught, the Restigouche, the Miramichi and Nepisiguet. The Restigouche and the Nepisiguet empty into the Bay of Chaleur, and both are practically owned by individuals who do not allow anybody there except fly fishermen. The Nepisiguet is owned by a St. John club, and the Restigouche by a New York club; and except a few proprietors like Mr. McDonald, there are but few riparian owners, so that these rivers are, practically, given up to fly-fishermen. I have heard people complain of the nets put by the fishermen outside of the Bay of Chaleur, and assert were it not for the regulations which compel the nets to be taken up from Saturday night to Monday morning, the river fisheries would be entirely destroyed. The Miramichi River flows through the county of Northumberland, and on a large portion of it there are many people who earn their living from these fisheries. The spawning grounds are above. The people outside of the mouth of the river or in the harbor of St. John catch the fish on their passage up or down. The feeling among the people is that this will be a great injustice to them; and having looked into this matter carefully, I believe that their feeling is well founded.

Mr. MITCHELL. I rise to an explanation. In relation to this matter the hon. Minister of Marine has chosen to say that I have spoken with a good deal of temper. Well, Sir, it is not a matter of suprise that I should speak with some temper when I find the livelihood of a large portion of the people of my county taken away by an arbitrary Act like this. I do not think I spoke with unusual warmth, but, if I did so, I think this House will excuse me under the circumstances. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman refused to give me the explanations which I asked of him before I made any remarks at all. He refused to tell me whether any single individual on the whole of these rivers had asked for this Bill, and he very flippantly replied that I was absent from my place when the Bill was in committee, that he had given the explanation there and would not give them again. He did more. He took up a speech made by me in 1883.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman rose to speak, giving as a reason that he wished to make a personal explanation. I would remind him that what he is saying now is not a personal explanation.

Mr. MITCHELL. I was coming to it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If there is any objection, I move that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. MITCHELL. I may say that I did not rise to speak under false pretences. I was coming to the explanation, I was approaching it when I stated that the Minister quoted a speech made by myself in 1883, when I was endeavoring to protect the fisheries of the country against the extreme view taken by the hon. gentleman from the County of St. John in relation to what the law was. He quoted from my speech, and he said that the member for Northumberland had better read that speech and refresh his memory, and he spoke in that flippant manner which he is apt to use in this House. He quoted—what? He quoted two short paragraphs of a speech, four columns in length, and I challenge any one to say whether my speech would warrant the assumption which the hon. gentleman drew, and by which he tried to mislead this House as to what my opinions were at that time. Sir, I have no hesitation in saying that the inference the hon. gentleman drew from that printed speech in the Hansard was an unfair one, an unjust one, an untrue one. My object on that occasion was to stand by the Ministry of the day and to help them to preserve some kind of control over the net fishing of the country. The contention of the hon. gentleman from the county of St. John on that occasion went to show that inasmuch as the courts of the land had decided in the case of the Queen vs Robertson, that the whole system of proprietary rights was changed by the decision of the court, the Government had no power to issue licenses and practically had no control over the fisheries of the country. My contention, on the other hand, was that it was necessary for the safety of these fisheries that the Government should preserve some control in some way, not to take away the rights of the people, but to regulate the exercise of those rights, the manner of setting nets, the length of the nets and the period during which these nets should be set. I will not take up the time of the House by reading that speech at length, but I will tell the hon. gentleman now that he cannot find a single line in it from start to finish that will sustain the position he endeavored to lead this House to believe that I had taken on that occasion. The hon. gentleman had better be a little more accurate in his statements in the future when he attempts to put words in the mouth of a man who knows what he is talking about. I did not forget the statement I made on that occasion, and as his father said, in giving testimony the other day, so I say, that "I never said it, because it was not true." That is the statement the hon. gentleman's father made the other day, and it is the statement I make now. I know I could not have said it, because it was not true. Now, Sir, my hon. friend has chosen to refer to the case of Robertson vs. the Queen, and he has chosen to bring my name into it in connection with the matter. The hon. gentleman says that the whole question of the fisheries was determined, and determined against the Dominion while I was Minister of Marine and Fisheries. That is not true. It was settled by the courts years after I left office. When, in 1867, I came into the position of Minister and organised the Department of Marine and Fisheries, I found a certain state of the law existing, under which the department issued licenses to permit fishermen to fish. I continued that condition. I always had my doubts as to the right of the Government to exercise the control which they professed to exercise as against the riparian rights of the people. But I found that condition of the law in existence, and it was continued without trouble and without contest. But in regard to the case which the hon. gentleman has quoted, Robertson vs. the Queen, let him look at the law. It is a case arising on my own river, and I reserved by a special clause, if my memory serves me correctly, the riparian rights to individual owners along the river. Does that show any desire to abandon the riparian rights of the people? I repeat that the House will find that I reserved the rights to the proprietors of the property to fish off their own land. The hon. gentleman will not find a single reference, not only in 1883 but in any year, where I deviated in any particular from the position I assumed and the position I occupy at this moment. What I did contend against then, I contend against now. Here is the distinction I made at that time:

"And I think it not unwise that my hon. friend from the County of St. John, on consideration, will see that between the choice of two evils, whether we shall allow unlimited fishing by these proprietors, or require of all persons desirous of fishing, having proprietary right to fish, to go to the Government and ask for a license, and that whether one horn or other of the dilemma be adopted, I think that my hon. friend will say that, in the interest of the protection of the fisheries, it is better to trust to the Government of the day, whoever they may be, than to allow the unlimited fishing which proprietors will naturally exercise if no restriction be placed upon them."

That is the contention I made at that time. It is the contention I make now, not that the Government have the right to deprive the owners of the rights to fish—they have no right to do that, but they have the right to say that they shall fish under certain restrictions and in a certain way. That was my contention at that time, and I have not varied it in any particular, notwithstanding the attempt of the hon. gentleman to misrepresent what I have said here to-day. I feel in this matter that it is due to the people of my constituency that I should say a word or two in reply to the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Burns). The hon. gentleman says he is in favor of the terms of the Bill. I am not surprised at the hon. gentleman being in favor of the conditions of the Bill, because there are very few riparian-right fishermen on his river, as the tidal flow of the River Nipisiguit is very short, while on my river there is a tidal flow from its mouth of 40 to 50 miles and above that there is 100 miles of river, probably 70 of which is settled more or less, where the people own the land on its banks and have from time immemorial set nets. What was contended during the administration from 1867 to 1873, and what was carried out by everyone of the Ministers from that day to this, was this: That those people should fish under restrictions and regulations laid down by the department, under authority given by Parliament, and that they should only set nets out of tidal waters, one-third the distance across the river. That has been the law from time immemorial, it is a law which has been carried out to the satisfaction of the people. The hon. gentleman has spoken about spawning beds. Much he knows about spawning beds in rivers! The fish do not spawn in the main branch of the Miramichi within many miles of the head of the tide; and are the people for 50 miles to be deprived of fishing in the river, because the fish go past their lands to spawn? The hon. gentleman was speaking on a subject of which he knows very little, and he should study up the details of his department before he endeavors to make statements against and criticise speeches of hon. gentlemen who know much more than he does. The Bill should not pass into law. A still further reason why it should not pass is contained in the fifth section, which reads:

"5. The use of nets or other apparatus for the capture of salmon shall be confined to tidal waters, and any fishery officer may determine the length and place of each net or other apparatus used in any of the waters of Canada; provided that no one shall fish for or catch salmon with swing nets in any of the waters of Canada."

I object to that clause of the Bill. The law from time immemorial has provided that from the mouth of the Miramichi up to the head of tidal water the people shall have the liberty to set nets; and the several distances were fixed by metes and bounds. That right was established 100 years ago and has been exercised ever since with entire satisfaction; and yet it is now proposed to take these privileges out of the hands of the people, supersede the law, and place them in the hands of a fishery officer. This Act will undoubtedly lead to enormous difficulty with the fishermen. It will be an act of injustice and of unfairness to place such power in the hands of men who are not always too fit to exercise it, and in the hands of men who may be animated by spleen, or animosity, or political antagonism, because that comes in as a strong element in the matter in a way that should not be allowed. If this Bill passes into law the hon. gentleman is throwing into the fishing districts of the country an amount of trouble which will not be easily allayed.

Mr. TUPPER. I do not think by loud talking and using language, which I am very glad to say is used by hardly any other hon. gentleman in the House across the floor, that the hon. gentleman will be able to escape from the very pitiable position in which I have been able to place him to-day. I am glad to see the hon. gentleman endeavoring to crawl out of the position in which he found himself, and where he was pinned by that very speech from which I quoted, and from which the hon. gentleman dare not quote at as great length as I have done.

Mr. MITCHELL. Read any part of it.

Mr. TUPPER. I quoted much of the hon. gentleman's statement in 1883, more than the hon. gentleman dare quote. Before the hon. gentleman undertakes to charge any hon. gentleman with misleading the House by references from Hansard, he should be able to get a better case under his hand than this, and he ought to be able to show the House from that speech wherein I misrepresent him.

Mr. MITCHELL. I say you did not prove anything from my speech.

Mr. TUPPER. If I wish to convict the hon. gentleman of trifling, or attempting to trifle with the intelligence of this House, I would occupy more time in reading from that speech.

Mr. MITCHELL. I defy you; you dare not.

Mr. TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman is not attempting to bully some one in this House he is endeavoring to trifle with their patience every day in the Session, but I am not now going to trifle with the patience of the House by reading any more of his speech from Hansard.

Mr. MITCHELL. Go on; read the speech.

Mr. TUPPER. We have enough of the hon. gentleman's speeches in the Hansard and in this House. We have had them ad nauseam, but I have the satisfaction of knowing that he cannot refer to one sentence of this speech of his to sustain the position which he has taken to-day and which is absolutely inconsistent with the position he took before. I defy the hon. gentleman to contradict me in saying that he supported a Bill containing provisions of this character and that he supported, in that speech of 1883 which is there for any one that cares to read it, the arguments which I have made to-day in favor of this Bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not support what you say; I dare you to read the speech.

Mr. TUPPER. I am very glad to say, that any hon. gentleman who cares to follow up this very interesting enquiry, has the proof at hand. I wanted to show to the House, the lamentable ignorance of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mitchell) who is attempting to instruct us on the fishery question. He thinks, because that he was a party to the establishment of the navy, during his occupancy of the office of Minister of Marine, that he alone ought be an authority upon fishery questions. If the hon. gentleman seeks to keep the reputation he made years ago, when, as he says, he found it his duty to support the Government of the day, he had better say very little on fishery questions, if he has nothing further to instruct the House on than the points he endeavored to make in this debate. Take the lease of Robinson, signed and sealed by the hon. gentleman, and it shows how inconsistent his position is to-day. He is the great defender—is he?—of those enjoying riparian rights. But did he, in that lease, protect them in what he calls the enjoyment of their rights, and insert a provision, allowing them to fish for salmon in the non-tidal portions of the river? No. The hon. gentleman took the position then, that we take to-day, in this Bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the hon. gentleman allow me one word?

Several hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. TUPPER. I will quote the provisions in the hon. gentleman's lease. I know the hon. gentleman feels uneasy, for I have the record here, and it is not a question of my word or his, but it is a question of record. It is a question of Hansard in one case, and of the lease in the other, signed by that hon. gentleman himself when he was Minister of Fisheries. That provision of the lease says:

"Provided always, that actual settlers shall enjoy the privilege of fishing with a rod and line in manner known as fly surface fisheries in front of their own properties."

And yet after this the hon. gentleman tells the House that the Minister is ignorant, that fish do not go there to spawn, and that this is an invasion of riparian rights. I have shown the ridiculous position in which the hon. gentleman stands in two matters. Let me continue it. I will show the House how much we can depend on that hon. gentleman's great knowledge and great experience, when it comes to a question of temper. The hon. gentleman says that this outrageous Bill contains another more objectionable clause than the one which has been under discussion, and he says it is a terrible thing that any fishery officer may determine the length and place of each net or other apparatus used in the waters of Canada. That was the law in the hon. gentleman's own time.

Mr. MITCHELL. No, Sir.

Mr. TUPPER. That is the law on the Statute-book. That is the law of the Revised Statutes, and the hon. gentleman, if he wishes, can easily see that this is the law that he, himself, administered, or was bound to administer.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is not the law.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says it is not the law, and I do not wish to take up the time of the House by further contradictions. I appeal this time, in proof of what I say, not to the Hansard, not to the lease of the hon. gentleman, but I appeal to the statutes themselves, and he will find that, in that respect, there is no alteration, proposed, or suggested, in the present law of this country. The hon. gentleman is very fond of having the adjournment of the House moved, in order to display his wonderful erudition, and to show, if he can, the ignorance of any hon. gentleman who dares to differ from him. I think the next time he ventures to make an explanation of this kind, he should take more time, and exercise more patience, in a careful and calm deliberation of the question.

Mr. MITCHELL. I rise to one explanation.

Several hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have a right to speak when I am misrepresented. The hon. gentleman quotes the lease in which I expressly reserved the riparian right of fly-fishing. The right of net fishing is regulated by the statute and requires no regulation. I stated that I had this reservation in the lease, although I only spoke from memory of a transaction that took place years ago. With reference to this provision which he says I objected to, about giving the fishery officer power to regulate the length of the nets, I may tell him that by statute that has existed for over 70 years. The net fishing from the mouth of the river upward is limited by metes and bounds which cannot be got over.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT AMENDMENT.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 4) further to amend the Revised Statutes, chapter 5, respecting the Electoral Franchise.—(Sir John Thompson.)

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will ask the Committee to return to section 2, and to concur in an amendment to the section which I laid on the Table, and which was debated when the Bill was last in Committee. At the request of hon. gentlemen opposite, we agreed that the revising officer should be restricted, as to the information on which he could make up his list, to official records and to statutory declarations. I think the Committee will agree with me that declarations of that kind, made ex parte, should not be acted upon for the purpose of striking a name off the roll. I have, therefore, redrafted the section, for the purpose of enabling the revising officer to avail himself of those declarations for the purpose of making additions to the roll, but omitting the provision that he can use them for striking names off the roll. The Committee will remember the various provisions of the Act providing that the party whose name it is proposed to strike off the roll should be given notice, and the leaning is generally in favor of retaining a name on the list. If the revising officer availed himself of the statutory declaration for the purpose of striking off, the burden of proof would be reversed, without any notice being given to the person affected.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think it is to be regretted that solemn declarations, based on information or belief, should be admitted. A father may testify as to the qualifications of a son, and an employer as to the qualifications of a wage-earner, but to permit other persons, upon mere hearsay, which is not recognised in any other court as evidence, to take declarations on information and belief, would be a great misfortune. That would be putting a great number of names, in many cases, upon the lists which ought not to be there, and the expense and difficulty of getting them off would be very great indeed. I think the case my hon. friend from Kent gave, which happened in his own county, is a good illustration of what might take place where declarations of this sort are allowed to be made. I think the hon. gentleman should not admit those declarations as to information and belief, but if he persists in admitting them, he should also provide that, in every case, the person upon whose declaration, based on information and belief, names have been put on the list, should appear at the final revision for the purpose of being cross-examined as to the sources of the information and belief. And in case he should fail to appear, other evidence should be necessary to maintain those names upon the list.

Mr. BURDETT. I would suggest that the hon. Minister should have some mode of preserving the declarations, in order that they may be obtainable by persons who require to use them. These declarations should be filed with the clerk or the revising officer, who would, when necessary, give certified copies. In this way persons who made frivolous declarations could be held up to public ridicule. The declarations should also be drawn up in the same form as affidavits, based on absolute knowledge, which are sworn to, and used in legal proceedings, and an indictment should lie against the party making the declaration in case he did so without reasonable grounds for such knowledge and belief, so that dishonest men on either side should not be in a position to have at will names entered on the list which the opposite party would be put to considerable trouble and expense in getting struck off.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I thought that, having discussed the question of information and belief the other day, we would hardly renew it, at any rate, until the third reading of the Bill, and that by that time my hon. friends opposite, having carefully considered the question, would have withdrawn their objections. We have provided that the revising officer shall be obliged to exhibit those declarations, and shall be obliged to furnish any person with copies who desires the same. As regards the appearing at final revision, the hon. gentleman's amendment would require every person who made a declaration to come and substantiate it, even though the application was not contested.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Only in cases where names were entered on information or belief, and not from personal knowledge.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Even as to those, in many cases there would be no contest at all; and where there is a contest the provisions of the law as to notice to appear and result of non-appearance and subpœna are sufficient.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). When I find cases such as those stated by the hon. member for Kent and the hon. member for South Victoria, I think every precaution should be taken, and it would be better not to accept names on information and belief.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It would be utterly impossible to frame an Act which would prevent wrong decisions, and that appears to have been the case in Kent. I promised to make provision for copies of these lists being sent to postmasters, and, in Prince Edward Island, to secretaries of school districts. I, therefore, propose that sub-section 2 should be amended in that way.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. PLATT. Is there any provision for the distribution of the ten copies for the unsuccessful candidate in case he is dead?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have received a letter to-day which I will read, and the hon. gentleman will see from that how this provision in regard to obtaining information has worked. The writer says:

"I regret to see that one of the proposed amendments to the Franchise Act permits the revising officer to add names to the voters' list on the declarations of information and belief of the declarant. Now, anyone who knows anything of the methods of the Government supporters and unscrupulous revising officers must see the wide door here opened to fraud. Why, in this way John Mason was enabled to add scores of names to the Kent lists in 1886, that, at the expense of several hundred dollars and the time of Mr. Christie and myself for months, we were unable to get off, although they had no legal right to be on. We urged before Judge Woods the utter absurdity of putting on names in that way; we pointed out that Mason, who was then a comparative stranger in Chatham, could not possibly have any acquaintence with the persons whose names he sought by his declaration to put on the list. We offered to call Mr. Mason himself, who was then in court, to prove on his own testimony that he did not even know the persons who he declared, to the best of his information and belief, were entitled to be put on. Mr O'Neill, who was acting for Mr. Smith, objected, and for fear we might be permitted to call him, Mason got up and left the court. The revising officers who desired to act honestly and fairly with both parties refused to receive such evidence. Under the amendment proposed, this method that was rejected as unfair, and in point of information, worthless, by many and the best revising officers, is now given a statutory effect. I trust this provision may not become law."

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is one other point to which I agreed to call the attention of the Committee, and that was to make provision for the correction of clerical errors. Two suggestions were made in reference to that. One was that there should be a correction of errors after the list is revised and before it is transmitted to the Queen's Printer, and the other was that the correction should be made after the list is printed. I think the only correction that is feasible is one to be made before the list is transmitted to the Queen's Printer. When the list is transmitted to him, it has been signed and is the electoral list. Any errors which may creep in while it is being printed might be corrected otherwise, but the revising officer has no longer any control over the list after it has been transmitted. I move that these words shall be inserted in the 21st section, that is in section 5 of the present Bill, line 46:

"After giving reasonable notice of delay, so as to enable errors to be corrected."

Mr. PATERSON (Brant.) I believe one of the suggestions to which the Minister alludes was made by me. I do not pretend to be able to frame an Act, but I see a considerable difficulty, and I think the Minister does also, in this. If the list comes to the printer as finally revised by the revising officer, and some errors should occur in the printing office, if some names should drop out, there should be some machinery by which they can be restored; and the same in regard to names which are not correctly spelled or any errors which may occur in the list finally printed. There should be some machinery by which such errors could be rectified. I observe in the newspapers that, in the lists used in the late contests in regard to the Scott Act, some well-known residents in this neighborhood, some property holders who had an undoubted right to vote, found their names were not on the list, and they could not vote. If we are to have a list made in that way, it should be taken in such a way for elections that there should be no possibility of mistake or error in the printing office. This seems to me to be one of the most important points to guard, and I would like the Minister to say definitely that there cannot be a mistake made in that way. Does he propose that the list which the revising officer certifies to and sends to the printing office shall be the list to be used, notwithstanding any errors in the printed copy?

Mr. CASEY. I understood the Minister to propose to insert words giving "proper delay and reasonable time for correcting errors." It seems to me that that almost amounts to a reopening of the revision. I do not think that is what my hon. friends were asking for. What they wanted was to make sure that the list which came from the printing office should be the same as that which the revising officer sent. The Minister says that as soon as the revising officer has signed this list and sent it down, his duties are performed. In a sense they are; but I do not think they are fully performed until he has ascertained and certified that the copy which leaves the printing office is identical with the copy he sent down. A slight mistake in the spelling of a name, or in the number of a lot, might throw a man out of his vote, a mistake purely unintentional. I think it is the duty of the revising officer to read the proof carefully and revise it along with his original copy, and finally to certify on one or more copies of the list as finally printed, to certify that they are in accordance with the list that he made up.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Of course, every effort must be made to prevent the mistakes which are possible in printing great numbers of names, and every effort will be made, by the transmission of proofs to the revising officer and by plans of that kind. The principle of the Bill is that the list, when finally revised and transmitted to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, is the authentic list of voters in that electoral district. The list, after being finally revised, corrected and certified, is to be transmitted to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, who shall insert a notice in the Gazette, and on and after the publication of that notice the persons whose names are entered on that list as voters, subject only to correction or appeal, shall be held to be duly registered voters in and for that electoral district; so that the list which is finally revised and certified to the printer, is the authentic list.

Mr. CASEY. I speak of mistakes arising in the printing office.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I propose that the revising officer shall correct them before the list is printed; and if any mistakes have occurred in printing after that, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall correct them. That is all plain when we keep in mind the fact that the roll sent to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, which is the manuscript to be printed from, is the authentic list.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E I.) I think it should be the duty of the revising officer to verify the printed list, the list which the printer prints from the certified list; and I would suggest that the word "before" should be inserted instead of the word "after," so that it shall be read that "after verification" by the revising officer, he shall transmit the list to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. Then the revising officer would have to verify the correctness of the printed list by comparing it with the certified list. I think that sub-section 6 had this very thing in view. Even as it is, it will be the duty of the revising officer to verify the printed list by comparing it with the certified list after it is printed.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The object of that sub-section 6 is to correct the printed list which is sent to him for distribution. But what I want to avoid is that the revising officer should have any power after the list has been certified and transmitted to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and after it has become authenticated as the voters' list of the electoral district, I want to prevent any further revision.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What we want to get it at, so far as I can understand members on both sides of the House, is that the printed list shall be a correct transcript of the certified list. The draughtsman of the Bill must have had that object in view, when he put in these words: "Shall cause them to be printed, and, after verification by the revising officer, shall transmit a sufficient number of each to the revising officers and to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery;" the object therefore being, that the printed list shall be a correct copy of the certified list. My impression is that, as it stands now, he will have to compare the printed list with a certified copy, to verify its correctness.

Mr. PLATT. Why should the revising officer's duties end before the lists are printed? Why should he certify the lists until he has read the proof, and seen that the printed lists are correct? We contend that it should be placed under the revising officer's eye, until it is handed in to the returning officer at the election. I can see no reason why this list should not be sent to the printer before it is certified by the revising officer.

Mr. CHARLTON. We can hardly say the printing is done before the proofs are corrected. The printing is not complete until the proofs are correct. It strikes me that the proper person to correct the proofs is the revising barrister who made the list. I do not see how we can ensure a correct list unless we have a revised list, and revised by the officer who makes the list. In listening to this discussion I am struck with the truth of the old adage:

> "What a tangled web we weave,
> When once we practice to deceive.'

At this moment I call to mind an anecdote told the other night by the right hon. gentleman about the Jew and pork, about the clap of thunder that saluted him as he came out of the restaurant where he had been partaking of the forbidden meat, and his exclamation: "Good heavens, what a fuss about a little pork!" On this question we may say what a fuss we have about this absurd Bill, and how long it is drawn out. I sympathise with the Minister of Justice in his attempt to make workable an unworkable scheme, and in so far as printing the lists at Ottawa for the whole Dominion is concerned, I think it is impossible to do the work correctly and satisfactory, and that the attempt is a total mistake. The entire Bill is clumsy, ridiculous and absurd, and we should drop the whole matter and go back to provincial lists, which will cost us nothing instead of a great deal of money, the expenditure of which will be involved in working this Bill. There is too much cost altogether for the amount of pork.

Mr. COLTER. I wish to submit this point to the Committee. Supposing an election is coming on and these lists are sent out to the deputy returning officers and they prove to be different from the certified lists, how is that difficulty to be remedied? Supposing the printed list sent out by the Government Printing Bureau differ materially from the certified list, and supposing some names are omitted, how are those names to be placed on these copies?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not think there is any practical difficulty, for this reason: that the list is to be made in triplicate, one copy of which is to be sent to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. It is to be printed, and after being printed, it is to be distributed all over the riding, and everybody preparing for the election will know exactly what it is to be. If there are any mistakes, we may rest assured they will be discovered and rectified.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). When the mistake is discovered, how will it be rectified?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The lists distributed are not the authentic list. They are nothing unless they are certified copies of the list held by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and he is to issue the copies, and is responsible for seeing that they are true copies; and if they are not true copies, he is to make them true copies.

Mr. CASEY. It is all very well to say that, in theory, no mistake can occur because the original list will be in the office of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and another in that of the revising officer. But there is no authority for anyone to interfere with these lists after they are printed, or to put a name on or off the list. Of course, it would not do to give such authority after the list was printed and the elections coming on. The only true way to proceed is that, so soon as the printed list is printed, the proof should be sent to the revising officer to be revised, and the corrected proof returned to the printing office and afterwards copies of the corrected list should be sent out and distributed. It would never do to leave power with respect to names in the hands of any official, for additional names might be inserted on the list and no one be the wiser. If the official were compelled, before distributing the lists, to see that the copies were authentic, the whole trouble would be obviated. In some quarters of the country extraordinary names are found, including French and German, and it could not be expected that the proof-reader would be thoroughly accurate in regard to these, especially as the handwriting of some of the revising officers would not be perfectly legible, and, I repeat, the only remedy is to send the proofs back to the revising officer for final revision before he certifies to the printed list.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am willing to adopt the suggestion, that before copies are distributed they should be verified.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is a question as to whether we have more confidence in the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, or in the revising officer. I would sooner trust the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery than the revising officer, as regards the county which I represent.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. COLTER. When the House rose at six o'clock, I was about to direct the attention of the Committee to the propriety of sending, under this sub-section 6 of the Act, the lists, not only to the revising officer, but also to the member for the riding, and to the defeated candidate, as well. I believe that the Minister of Justice has consented to accept this suggestion. I would also suggest that when the lists are finally printed, they shall be numbered consecutively from first to the last, in each polling sub-division. This, I believe, would reduce the chances of typographical errors occurring, because the total number for each polling sub-division could be very easily ascertained, if this rule were followed out, whereas mistakes might occur if they were not numbered consecutively.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I propose to add a sub-section:

"7. A copy of the list so printed shall be sent to each member of the House of Commons for the electoral district, and one copy to each of the defeated candidates for such electoral district."

Amendment agreed to.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I was spoken to by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette), who had a notice on the paper, as to errors in notices, and I have arranged with him an amendment which may be added as sub-section 3 to section 20 of the Act, relating to what shall be done at the final revision. I propose this sub section to meet his views:

"No application to add or remove a name shall be dismissed on account of error in the name or surname, or designation, mentioned therein, provided such error is corrected on or before the final revision, and provided that the revising officer is satisfied that the application was reasonably certain, and that the person intended to be named was not misled by such error."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CASEY,

Mr. DAWSON. The reason for this amendment, which I now suggest, is that the Indians live a great deal in common, and having a claim on the same location, consider they all have a right to vote on it. This will simplify the law by making them get location tickets, and save the revising officers a great deal of trouble in deciding what Indians shall vote on the land.

Mr. EDGAR. This does not disfranchise any Indians?

Mr. DAWSON. No, it does not alter the law; it only saves dispute.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Who grants the location ticket?

Mr. DAWSON. The agent gives them location tickets when they apply for them, and when the Indians decide among themselves who are entitled to the location tickets. The Indian Act of 1880 provides for that.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. As I understand it, the franchise is now conferred upon Indians who hold separate portions in the reserve, and the hon. gentleman requires that they shall hold location tickets for their separate holdings.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do they get these location tickets as a matter of course, every year?

Mr. DAWSON. They do when they apply for them with the sanction of the band. The band sets aside a location, and then the tribe decides which Indian shall hold the location ticket.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The location ticket is given by the consent of the band, and that is an estate for life. At present, under the law, the Indians have to prove it. Instead of all that trouble, he is given his location ticket in his deed. It is a lease for life, with the consent of the band. He holds that in severalty as long as he lives. It is for the purpose of establishing beyond a doubt, that the Indian has a right to vote when he produces his title.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is the agent who grants the location ticket, or the Superintendent General on the recommendation of the agent.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course, but it must be by a solemn vote of the council.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The evidence that an Indian has been in possession of the lands for a long series of years is no evidence that he is entitled to vote?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, because it has to be held in severalty. By permission, an Indian may live eight or ten years or more on his lot, but that is permissive. The council can move him and put another upon his land. The lands are held in common.

Mr. EDGAR. This matter, after all, is in the hands of the Superintendent General, because section 16 of the Indian Act provides that:

"No Indian shall be deemed to be lawfully in possession of any land in a reserve, unless he has been or is located for the same by the band, or council of the band, with the approval of the Superintendent General."

And the next section says that:

"When the Superintendent General approves of any location as aforesaid, he shall issue, in triplicate, a ticket granting a location title to such Indian."

So that, after all, the privilege of voting, if this amendment is made, will be granted only upon the issuing of the location ticket by the Superintendent General.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman knows that everything that is done until the Indians are enfranchised is done in their council, recommended by the local agent and approved by the Superintendent General, because they are under the guardianship of the law; but the ticket cannot be issued without a vote of the council, and then it is issued as a matter of course by the Superintendent General.

Mr. LISTER. There may be some difficulties in that. Many of the bands which have councils have not always apportioned the lands with fairness. Supposing an agent refused to recommend the issue of a ticket to a man who had occupied the land for a number of years, the Superintendent General would be powerless. We must not assume that these councils will act fairly in all cases towards all the Indians. They are actuated by certain considerations in the same way as white men are. No doubt there will be cases in which they will refuse to grant the location, and then the Superintendent General has no power to come in, because his power is only confirmatory.

Mr. ROOME. I would propose that these declarations might be made before any reeve, deputy reeve, or municipal councillor, where there is no other person authorised to take them.

Mr. COLTER. Would the persons making such declaration be liable to the penalties for perjury if they made a false declaration?

Mr. EDGAR. I think the Act in reference to extra-judicial oaths would have to be amended in order to make a false declaration of that kind perjury.

Mr. IVES. Why should not the mayor and the aldermen be included?

Mr. EDGAR. It is impossible to give a fair consideration to such an important change in the law as that proposed by the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Roome), in two minutes. I do not think it is fair to the House that an important change like that should be proposed without notice. I see many advantages in the proposal of the hon. gentleman, but we must have those declarations made in proper form, and I would suggest that the amendment should stand over, as it is impossible to look into the law now.

Mr. MULOCK. The only question is whether the declarant would be liable in such case as he would be if he made his declaration before a notary or a commissioner. I think the suggestion is a very good one, but the question is whether those declarations would be affidavits within the meaning of the Act.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think it would be enough to say that these persons shall be justices of the peace for that purpose.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman is proposing to incorporate in the Act a matter of dispute. The Local Governments have been appointing magistrates for 22 years, and the Government here have acquiesced in that construction of the British North America Act. I do not say that the Government here might not appoint a magistrate for certain purposes, but it does seem to me that in declaring there shall be a justice of the peace for that purpose is simply to incorporate in the Act a contested point; and if the courts were to decide, contrary to the hon. gentleman, that we have jurisdiction here, that the Crown, as represented by the Governor in Council, may appoint a magistrate, the result would be that this would go for nothing. But if the hon. gentleman were to provide that parties taking an affidavit or a solemn declaration before a reeve or deputy reeve, shall be held amenable to the law relating to perjury, if they swear falsely, then he would accomplish what he proposes to accomplish in this way without the possibility of going wrong.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the hon. gentleman forgets when he says that we are incorporating a contested point here. The point in contest is whether the provincial authorities can, under any circumstances, appoint a justice of the peace, but the power of the federal authority to appoint has never been questioned in any way. It is expressly conferred by Her Majesty on His Excellency.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The British North America Act provides for the appointment of a certain class with judicial authorities, amongst which magistrates are not included.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I wish to bring forward the motion of which I gave notice the other day, that I hope the Government will accept. It places the franchise in Prince Edward Island upon an equitable footing. I explained the other day that in the Act of 1886 the hon. gentleman conferred upon all those who were of age on the 20th day of July, 1885, and were entitled to vote under the local franchise, the right to vote; and I propose that that principle shall be made continuous. I, therefore, move:

That section 10 of said Act is hereby repealed, and the following substituted:—

"In the Provinces of British Columbia and Prince Edward Island respectively, besides the persons entitled to be registered as voters, and to vote under this Act, every person who, on the first day of June, in each year, is of the age of 21 years, and is not by this Act, or by any law of the Dominion of Canada, disqualified or prevented from voting, and is a British subject by birth or naturalisation, and resident in the said Provinces, and is entitled to vote in said Provinces respectively, by the laws which are severally enforced in the same, shall have the right to be registered as a voter, and to vote, as long as he continues to be qualified to vote, under the provisions of said last-mentioned laws respectively, and no longer."

Amendment negatived.

Mr. BRIEN. Before the Committee rises, I would like to offer a suggestion or two. I think the intention of the Act as avowed by its supporters, is to extend the franchise to every industrious citizen. That has not been done. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), who moved the address in reply to His Excellency's speech a few months ago, in speaking about the franchise, said:

"It confers the franchise on all citizens who are not confirmed paupers, or have no stake in the country."

Well, if this be the case, if that is the intention of the Act, then I think that a large number of men are excluded. The average rate of wages in the agricultural parts of the Dominion is from $1 to $1.25 per day. There are only 313 days in which a man can work, and if he only earns $1 a day, his wages per year only amounts to $313 at the most. But, as it is impossible for all men to work full time, we find that the average number of days that men work is only 250; therefore, they cannot possibly come up to the standard required by this Act, consequently, a large number of industrious citizens are disfranchised. For the information of the Committee, I would read the average wages earned by farm laborers in the Province of Ontario. In the Lake Erie district, it is $241; Lake Huron district, $255; Georgian Bay, $254; West Midland, $251; Lake Ontario, $253; St. Lawrence and Ottawa, $249; East Midland, $256; northern districts, $262; so that in the entire Province of Ontario the average rate is $250. Out of 3,354 wage-earners in eighteen different towns, only 563 worked 300 days and over; the average number of days is only 263 in towns and cities. In cities and towns where they work in factories and shops and can work in stormy days, the average might be a little greater, but still this Bill would exclude these important classes in both town and country. We have extended the franchise to Indians, but still we propose to refuse it to our white laborers who are not less qualified to vote. I have experienced a great deal of difficulty in so far as I have had anything to do with the revision of the list. We found that but a few applicants could attain to the $300 qualification. Besides, the present Act entails a great deal of difficulty and hardship upon many wage-earners by compelling them to give an account of every cent earned. For these reasons I move that:

Sub-section 6 of section 3 of the Franchise Act be amended by striking out the words "three hundred and fifty dollars" and substituting therefor the words "two hundred and forty dollars."

Also, that sub-section 6 of section 4 of the same Act be amended by striking out the words "three hundred dollars" and substituting the words "two hundred and forty dollars."

In the last Ontario Act the franchise was extended to all wage-earners who had an income of $250, but even in that case, I think there is a considerable number of laborers who are excluded, and I believe that it was the intention of the Act to extend the franchise to every industrious citizen.

Amendment negatived, and Bill reported.

INTEREST ACT AMENDMENT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 132) to amend the Revised Statutes respecting interest (from the Senate). He said: The object of this Bill is to fix the rate of interest which judgments shall bear. The question has arisen lately in the North-West Territories, inasmuch as the Interest Act provides the rate of interest which contracts shall bear when no other rate is provided, but judgments not being strictly of the nature of contracts, it had been held that there is no provision as to judgments bearing interest. Provisions of doubtful validity have been made with respect to this subject by Provincial Legislatures.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Under the third section a change would be effected and judgments would bear interest at 6 per cent., which formerly only bore interest at 5 per cent. I do not think, however, that a man has a right to allow a judgment to remain and bear interest at a high rate.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is only proposed to take the second reading to-night and to go into Committee at a future day.

Mr. IVES. Judgment with interest will be calculated from the date of the serving of the process.

Mr. DAVIN. This Bill will meet a want greatly felt in the North-West Territories, because we cannot collect overdue taxes with interest at more than 4 per cent.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 126) to amend the Summary Convictions Act, chapter 78 of the Revised Statutes, and the Act amending the same (from the Senate).—(Sir John Thompson.)

REGISTRATION AND POSTAGE OF LETTERS.

House resolved itself into Committee to consider proposed resolutions (p. 469) providing for the rate of registration and postage of letters.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. HAGGART. The object of the first part of the resolution is to enable the postmaster to charge a registration fee on any valuable matter which may be sent through the post office. I propose to change the second part of the resolution to the effect that the postage of local or drop letters shall be 2 cents per ounce in cities and towns where there is delivery by carriers. That leaves the Act the same as it is now, except in cities and towns where there is delivery by letter carriers. It assimilates our law to that of the United States where the rate is 2 cents on similar letters, and to that of the United Kingdom where the rate is one penny. I propose to change the second part to read so as to affect only periodicals issued less frequently than at intervals of one month. This allows monthly periodicals to pass as free as newspapers do, and to make specimen newspapers entitled to be sent at one cent per pound. It provides that no periodical may be carried free of postage under the 26th section of the Post Office Act, if it is published at intervals of more than one month. It leaves the law the same on certain printed matter, and on packages of seeds and matters of cognate description, namely, one cent for each four ounces. Printed manuscripts, proofs, lithographs, photographs and documents partly written and partly printed, not being deeds, policies of insurance, and miscellaneous, may be sent at one cent for each two ounces. This makes the postage on this class of matter the same as it is in the United States and Great Britain.

Mr. JONES (Halifax.) This resolution increasing the postage on drop letters will bear hard on cities, and it appears to me to be unnecessary. I do not see upon what principle the hon. gentleman is called upon to double the rate on the postage of drop letters. It is true that in some instances the letters are distributed by the carriers, but in most cases merchants and citizens have private boxes in the post office and the carriers are not called upon to distribute the letters. Business men now send their circulars through the post office at one cent, and this class of matter does not involve any increase of expense on the post office. I think that the Postmaster General should consider this, for he will see that the reason he gives for increasing the rate in places where there are letter carriers would not apply where persons have private boxes in the post office. I know that this increase of rate in drop letters is very unpopular in the cities of the Dominion, because it is looked upon as unnecessary. It is very unfavorably received by the business community generally.

Mr. DAVIN. I consider that the Postmaster General has taken from this clause everything that was objectionable in it. I am very glad indeed that this impost on the monthly periodicals, and therefore upon literature, has been removed. In regard to the objections of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Jones), I wish to point out to the Committee that if this objection has any force it will regulate itself. If, for instance, the Postmaster General finds that the rate of 2 cents is too much upon drop letters where letters are sent round by the letter carriers, the merchants will not avail of this means of communication and the revenue from this source will so decrease as to cause the Postmaster General to return to the old rate. On the other hand, if the merchants continue to use those sealed circulars at the 2 cent rate it will prove that it is a fair rate, and that anyone who is familiar with the present condition of our postage system and the amount that it costs the country will be very glad if there is an adjustment in this respect between the expenditure and the service rendered. I do not think that there is anything whatever in the objections of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Jones).

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I confess that I do not quite understand the first part of this resolution, which has reference to registered matter. It would seem to imply that the postal officials might be at liberty to register anything that came into the office, and to charge for registration if it were supposed to contain valuable matter. I should like to enquire whether this is a change in the law, and whether the opinion I have in reference to it, that postmasters may register, if they choose, anything that goes into the post office and charge for it, is correct?

Mr. HAGGART. It is a new feature. In most countries it is compulsory that all valuable matter shall be registered. In some countries, if it is not registered, the matter is forfeited, in addition to a heavy fine being imposed. Where it appears evident to the postmaster that a letter contains something valuable, he can fix a penalty to the amount of the registration fee, which is collected at the place of delivery. This also prevents the temptation to postal clerks of abstracting letters which are not registered, and which are supposed to contain valuable matter.

Mr. CASEY. Unless power is given to the postmaster to open letters, how is he to ascertain whether the matter is valuable or not?

Mr. HAGGART. That is a rather difficult matter; but it is where it appears evident to the postmaster that the letter contains valuable matter.

Mr. CASEY. Still it depends on the postmaster to say whether it appears evident that the letter contains valuables. It may be a piece of pasteboard or a piece of stiff paper that feels like a bank note, and the postmaster is given power to fix a penalty, not on the man who posted the letter, but on the man to whom it is addressed, and the enclosure may not be worth the cost of registration. I think the old plan is the best, for the man who sends the letter to take the risk of its being stolen in transit. I think this Bill would put indefinite and improper power in the hands of postmasters, and would enable them to tax the wrong party. I almost fancy that, on reconsideration, the matter would appear in the same way to the Postmaster General himself.

Mr. LISTER. I fancy, so far as this registration is concerned, that no one is likely to be seriously injured by it. But I have a matter to bring before the Postmaster General, which I think was brought to his notice by others, that is, the postage on examination papers. As he knows, throughout our Province the examination papers of the schools are sent to the inspector, and hitherto the postage has been exceedingly high. I believe the postage on these papers should be greatly reduced, say one cent for four ounces. I have been written to on the subject by one of the public school inspectors, and I cannot do better than read his letter:

"It is the usual practice in the public schools to have written examinations for promotion from one class to another, and after the examination is over the papers of the pupils who pass the examination are sent to the inspector for review and confirmation. According to the present postal regulations the postage on these examination papers is very high, and unless the hon the Postmaster General can be induced to give the rate, of, say one cent for four ounces, in many counties, perhaps all, these examinations will have to cease, or else be conducted on a different basis, from that which obtains at present. Mr. McIntosh, Public School Inspector for Hastings, has, I believe, had some communication or correspondence with the Hon. Mr. Bowell, who, I believe, has promised to give all the assistance he could in the matter."

I think this matter is worthy of the consideration of the Postmaster General, and if he thinks the rate on this matter should be reduced, it can be added to the articles which are charged one cent for four ounces.

Mr. HAGGART. I received a good many communications from inspectors in the direction of the hon. gentleman's suggestion. If the document is partly printed and partly written, it would pass at the rate of one cent for two ounces. If it is wholly written, it has to pay full letter postage, as you will see the difficulty of distinguishing it from other correspondence.

Mr. CASEY. Does not the law provide that printers' manuscript——

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the hon. gentleman will excuse me, perhaps it would be more convenient, if the discussion is to be on the details of the Bill, that the resolution should be adopted and concurred in, and then the Bill will be brought up for a second reading at once, and taken up clause by clause, and every question can be raised on one or other of the clauses.

Mr. CASEY. But I think this is the place to discuss the resolutions, and I do not suppose it will take any more time to do so now than it would under the Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Only the discussion will be had twice over.

Mr. CASEY. I do not think it need be repeated.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, very well.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like to ask the Postmaster General on what principle he doubles the rate of postage on what are called drop letters, which are dropped into the post office to be delivered in the city or town? It appears to me that it is unnecessarily taxing the commercial community.

Mr. HAGGART. It is on this principle, that it has been found that where a letter has been dropped into the post office in a city, and delivered by a letter carrier, it does not pay to deliver it for one cent, which is just half the rate charged in any other country in the world; and this provision is to assimilate the rate to that prevailing in other countries.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). It will be a serious tax to individuals in large cities. There are two classes of people in those cities, one to whom letters are delivered by carriers, and the other, who have boxes in the post office for which they have to pay a rental, and this increase is an additional tax upon them. I seems hard that a letter can be sent all over this Dominion for 3 cents, and that you have to pay 2 cents for a letter that is dropped into the post office, and put into a box in the same office. In the United States, the postage for drop letters is the same as for other letters?

Mr. HAGGART. Drop letters delivered by carriers are charged the same rate as other letters in the United States; and in England the charge is a penny, even if the letter is delivered next door.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). But in the United States all letters are carried for 2 cents, while here you charge 3 cents. I think it is going to be a pretty heavy tax in cities.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). I cannot see anything more reasonable than that the cost of the letter carriers should be charged to the people in cities who receive the benefit of them. The country should not be taxed for the benefit of the people living in the cities.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I was expecting that some representatives of other large cities would have spoken on this matter, because I feel sure that if the mercantile community in Toronto, Montreal, Quebec, and other large cities knew what was proposed here to-night, there would be a strong remonstrance against it. It is manifestly unfair to the mercantile community of those cities. The Postmaster General says it is intended that the rate he is proposing is to pay for the expense of delivery. If you pay a man a dollar a day, he would only have to deliver fifty letters to earn his pay. In the majority of cases, they deliver a great many more than that. Therefore, I think that the Postmaster General is trying to make money out of the cities in order to supply the deficiency in postal revenue. I know as a business man what the inconvenience of this would be. In the cities a large amount of circulars go through the post, and I suppose the hon. gentleman never lived in the city during election times or had to run an election in a city, or he would have found that from 5,000 to 6,000 notices have to go through the post at a very critical time, the expense of which will be doubled. I remember a short time ago seeing in a Toronto paper a remonstrance against this proposal, and subsequently the statement that the Postmaster General had consented to drop it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Drop the letters.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). And I had hoped, when he introduced the resolution to-night, that he was going to introduce a change of policy in this matter. I hope he will yet take the matter into consideration.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The revenue will be diminished rather than increased by this proposal. A large amount of matter goes through the post office at one cent, which will not be mailed if the charge is raised to 2 cents.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Before this resolution passes, I wish to enter my protest against that part which provides for compulsory registration. It seems to me that the department would be acting in an arbitrary manner in compelling a person to register a letter he sends through the post office, whether he likes it or not. If the sender of the matter chooses to take the risk of sending it without registering it, that is his business, and the department ought not to say that when he puts a letter in the post office, the postmaster should be the arbiter to decide whether that letter should be registered or not. The sender is the person who ought to decide whether the matter he sends is valuable or not, and whether, even if valuable, he should take the risk of sending it unregistered or not. It is assuming most arbitrary power on the part of the department to say that when I post a letter, which may perhaps not contain valuable matter, but which may feel from the outside as if it did, that letter should be registered and a postage rate of 5 cents additional—for I believe the rate of registration is to be raised to that amount—imposed.

Mr. HAGGART. This is taken from the regulation that exists in Great Britain, and a similar regulation exists all over Europe.

Mr. CASEY. The Postmaster General must not think he is settling the question by quoting regulations, either of England, or of anywhere else. We think here that we can make some slight improvements on the way they do things in Europe. The hon. gentleman, himself, was one of the first to combat the idea that any English precedent should rule here, especially in trade questions, and we can bring that home to him in discussing post office matters. If it does not rule here in regard to tariffs, I do not see why it should rule in regard to post office tariffs. We should look at the thing from a common sense view, as the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. White) looks at it. This view certainly does not prevail, when we are going to give postmasters the right to say what mail matter shall be registered and what shall not, and propose to tax the receiver and not the sender. It is well understood that when a man sends valuable goods in an unregistered letter, the sender is responsible and not the Post Office Department, nor the receiver, and, therefore, no loss can possibly accrue to the receiver should the letter not reach its destination, provided the sender is a responsible person. Should the sender choose to take the risk, it is arbitrary legislation on our part to try and force him to take precautions. I know the hon. the Minister wishes to make this a popular Bill. Being a new Minister he would not like to do an unpopular thing, but I assure him he will find this little provision one of the most unpopular things he could put in the Bill.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). They have not in England the cheap method of transporting valuables by Express which we have here.

Mr. HAGGART. The United States have it.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). The rule in England has been to send nearly all valuables by post; but in this country valuables are largely sent by Express; so that in England provision had to be made that is not so much required here, and I think a regulation that applies to England does not apply to this country. With regard to the 2 cent postage, when my hon. friend from St John (Mr. Weldon) or my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Jones) drops a letter through the post office, a man is hired by the Government to carry that letter to its destination; but when a letter is dropped to my address at Niagara Falls, I have to send my own man to get it.

Mr. DAVIN. If the proposition of the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. White) were correct, it would follow that the officers of the department, knowing that a letter unregistered contained valuables, should not apply to it more care than to one that does not.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Why should they? The department is not responsible.

Mr. DAVIN. There is a moral obligation.

Mr. CASEY. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIN. Certainly, there is. With regard to the argument of the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) that we should not copy from England or from the States, of course we should not unless there is reason for it. Then the hon. gentleman used the absurd argument that because my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) does not favor free trade, he should therefore not take any hint from what goes on in England. But the conditions in every civilised country for the distribution of letters, the main conditions on which to found a postal system, are always the same, viz., highways, railways and population. Whereas when you come to questions of protection or free trade in Canada you have a new community, in England you have a highly organised and advanced community, and there is no analogy between the two. With regard to what my hon. friend from Renfrew (Mr. White) has said—and I have always a great respect for what he says, because it is generally to the point—I say, if a post office clerk sees that any letter contains valuable matter, there is a moral obligation on him to have a watchful eye over that, and for that obligation the persons interested should pay.

Mr. McKAY. I was in hopes that the suggestion offered by the right hon. the First Minister would be carried out, and that this Bill would pass its second reading and be discussed in Committee clause by clause. The Bill is intended to make up some of the loss of the Post Office Department, but I do not think it is just to the mercantile community in the cities that they should be called upon to make up that deficiency. I believe the letter carrying system in the cities pays for itself. I think that the loss, if any, should be distributed over the country where letters are carried for long distances. We have had a very strong protest from the Board of Trade in Hamilton in relation to this proposal. It will be a great tax on the mercantile community, and I believe that instead of increasing the revenue from the drop letter delivery it will lessen the revenue. There are now many agencies which deliver letters and circulars at low rates; and I am satisfied that, if the rate is increased to 2 cents, these agencies would increase, and the revenue from drop letters would decrease. There are also a great many business people who have private boxes in the post office, who do not avail themselves of the letter carrier system, and who therefore ought not to be taxed for its maintenance. I desire to place on record my view that the Bill is not in the interest of the mercantile communities in the cities.

Mr. HESSON. There are other people interested besides those in commercial centres like Halifax, St. John and Hamilton, and I am satified that this Bill will meet with the general approbation of the people of Canada. If the Minister had found it possible to give us a 2 cent rate for the entire Dominion, I would have been prepared to support him, but he has done the next best thing, which is to give us the one ounce for the 3 cents. That will be a very great advantage, and hon. gentlemen who have discussed the changes which are proposed have not referred to that very important point. The hon. members from Halifax,

St. John and Hamilton have stated that the 2 cent rate on drop letters will be a heavy burden on the mercantile community. Those gentlemen in those cities have deliveries five and six and some imes seven times a day. When we remember that the letter carriers are employed for their convenience in these cities at the expense of the whole people of Canada, I think no one in this House will say that they are paying a fair rate for drop letters when they pay only one cent. I had occasion to enquire into this matter in regard to the city of Ottawa. I saw that a large staff of letter carriers were employed in this city, and I saw that a large revenue was apparently derived from the city of Ottawa post office, but when I investigated the matter, I found that the amount of expenditure which was necessary was so large in this city, which is one of great importance as a business centre, and as the capital of the Dominion, and the headquarters of Canada, when that was deducted from the receipts, the city of Stratford gave a larger revenue to the Dominion than the city of Ottawa did. If you investigate the expenses of maintaining the letter carriers in these mercantile centres, you will find, that the expenditure on that account, in cities of the size of Ottawa and Hamilton, forms a very large item in the post office expenditure. I think, that those who have the advantage of five or six deliveries a day, without any trouble being caused to themselves or their families to go for the mail matter, should not object to the payment of 2 cents on drop letters. There are a large number of post offices in the country where the postmasters are getting from $14 to $20 a year, and I think it is most unfair that in cities, where they have all the advantages I have pointed out, they should not in some way be made to pay a fairer proportion of the burden on the country. This Bill provides that they shall, and I am confident that there is not a gentleman who represents a rural constituency, a town or a county, who will not endorse what the Postmaster General is proposing in this respect. I am only sorry to see that the hon. gentlemen who represent cities are not more liberal in this matter when they consider the greater advantages which they possess.

Mr. SCRIVER. Having had some little experience as a postmaster myself, I am prepared to say unhesitatingly that I approve of the feature of the hon. gentleman's Bill, which proposes to give to the postmasters the right to enregister documents which are apparently of value when they are put in the post office; because, when those documents are lost, although the department is not obliged legally or perhaps even morally to trace them out, it endeavors to do so, and the labor which is entailed is very great, both on the department and on the postmasters. That labor and that expense will be very much lessened by the adoption of such a regulation as this Bill proposes.

Mr. CASEY. No doubt what my hon. friend has said has great weight, but it still leaves the point unsettled as to how the postmaster is going to decide what is valuable and what is not. If he could enregister only what is valuable, it would be all right; but I do not see how the Postmaster General is going to give the postmasters the supernatural power of looking through an envelope and seeing what is inside. However, I only rose to call the attention of the Postmaster General to a matter which I have personally mentioned to him, and to ask him whether he has considered the question of introducing insurance of letters, according to the English system.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Surely you are not appealing to the English system, are you?

Mr. CASEY. When the English system is reasonable, I am willing to adopt its provisions. In England, it is possible to register a letter in such a manner that the department is responsible for its safe transit up to a certain amount. The loss by registered letters here is so small that, if the Minister is in search of revenue, I believe this is probably the best way in which he could get it. People would be willing to pay a much larger amount than the ordinary registration fee to obtain this insurance, and the department would lose so few letters of that kind that they would make almost a clear profit of the extra amount of postage. I am not aware of how that is worked in England, but I have never seen any suggestion in the English newspapers that it has worked badly, and I think it would be a great boon for the people here to be able to ensure the money or valuables which they send through the post office. The charge might be graduated according to the value. I desire to ask the hon. gentleman if he has considered that point, and whether it is not possible to insert some such provision in the Bill?

Mr. HAGGART. The practice in England is for the registration fee to ensure the delivery of all valuables under the value of £2 10s., and a small insurance fee as high, I think, as £10 or £12. I considered the proposition, but I did not think it advisable to introduce it into the Bill.

Mr. CHARLTON. I understood the Postmaster General sometime ago to indicate his willingness to grant a 3 cent per ounce rate.

Mr. HAGGART. It is that. The delivery in cities is increased from one cent per half ounce to two cents per ounce, and the letters are increased from half an ounce to one ounce.

Mr. CHARLTON. What is the decision with regard to monthly periodicals?

Mr. HAGGART. The definition of a newspaper periodical is changed to cover those published not less frequently than once a month.

Resolution reported, and concurred in.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. HAGGART moved second reading of Bill (No. 93) to amend the Post Office Act, chapter 35 of the Revised Statutes of Canada.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 2,

Mr. HAGGART. Sub-section (i) is amended to cover decoy letters, and to render any person stealing them guilty of the same offence as of stealing an ordinary letter. (k) is amended so as to include baskets. (l) is amended so as to include post office mail cars.

Mr. CHARLTON. Who is to decide as to who is authorised to receive letters? That ought to be a little more clearly defined. A postmaster may consider somebody authorised to receive a letter, who is not authorised.

Mr. HAGGART. That is a copy of the old Act.

On section 3,

Mr. HAGGART. That alters the old Act by adding obscene prints or photographs, and to cover persons who send through the mails improper forms of duns on postal cards, for the purpose of making the matter public. A similar provision is incorporated in the American law.

Mr. CASEY. There are two or three matters, which, although they may be contained in the old Act, require to be investigated. Any one probably can decide what an obscene picture is, but every postmaster might exercise his own taste as to what was an immoral publication. We know that certain literary works of such standing as to be considered fit to be in every library have been stopped by the Customs authorities on the ground that they were immoral, because they advocated doctrines that appear to most of us to be atheistic or freethinking. For example, Tom Paine's works have been stopped by the Customs on the ground of immorality. An hon. friend beside me truly says that Bob Ingersoll's speeches should much rather be stopped on the same ground. I hold that this is leaving too much discretion in the hands of postmasters, and we should also be careful not to leave too much temptation to tamper with mail matter. I understand that one of the new provisions prohibits duns expressed in improper language in post cards. That is a proper proviso. Then, again, as to the question respecting illegal lotteries and gift enterprises, I do not know how the postmaster is to guess whether a certain circular is an improper one or not, and whether the circulars passing through the mails have reference to an illegal lottery. He may obtain an idea from the large number of circulars passing through the post office that they are connected with a lottery, but, I submit, although the postmaster may have the best intentions in the world, he may cast discredit on circulars sent by a highly respectable firm. It is at all events a dangerous power to place in the hands of postmasters. Again, as to the question whether circulars are intended to deceive the public or to obtain money under false pretences, how can the postmaster know whether any scheme to which the circulars refer is intended to deceive the public? He cannot do anything of the kind, and it is very dangerous to allow postmasters to attach a mark to letters stating that they are intended to deceive the public. Circulars relating to a meeting connected with the Orange Order might be stopped in this way, and other circulars looking to the raising of money for the building of a Roman Catholic church might be marked suspected to be fraudulent, and great injury might thus be done to either party. The Postmaster General is going too far in conferring improper power on his subordinates. If the matter were left in his own hands, I would have greater confidence in his exercising impartially the powers, but they should not be entrusted to postmasters throughout the Dominion. I ask the hon. gentleman most seriously if he is not giving too much of the spirit of bureaucracy to the postal service. The postmaster could not tell whether a circular were illegal and improper unless the envelope bore on the outside printed matter showing that the undertaking was of an illegal nature. We find that circulars respecting what are called "green goods" pass through the post offices without being disturbed, and in this respect the postmaster's powers are useless, while in other cases if there is a circular not exactly to the taste of the individual postmaster, it might be stopped and marked fraudulent and damage might thus be done to most respectable concerns.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman has no objection to giving the Postmaster General power to stop a saucy dun, but he objects to the Postmaster General having power to stop obscene literature.

Mr. CASEY. I did not say so.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the hon. gentleman will look at the clause of the Bill he will see it gives power to the Post Office Department to make regulations declaring what shall and what shall not be deemed desirable under this Act, and it makes provision for restrictions within reasonable limits and regulations also for prohibiting the circulation of dangerous and improper articles. It is simply giving power to the department to make regulations within reasonable limit. That power has been exercised by the Post Office Department without any objection in the past, and it is exercised by the post office authorities in England and the United States, and wherever there is a postal system.

Mr. CASEY. Of course these regulations are made by the department, but they are interpreted and carried out by the postmasters. I would have no objection to the stoppage of obscene and immoral publications. As to a saucy dun, that is shown on the face of the post card. I say in regard to these clauses that the powers given to the postmasters are very dangerous, while under the preceding clause the postmaster had a right to open letters on suspicion of their containing immoral works.

Mr. AMYOT. I call the attention of the Minister to the propriety of informing parties to whom pictures or letters are sent, which are seized by some officer whom we do not know, also to the parties by whom the packages were attached. It would prove a check. As it is a letter may arrive and be seized, and we do not know by whom or where, or the reason. If the party to whom it was addressed were notified of the fact that would be a check; and if the officer, whether he was a good one or a bad one—and if he had been appointed by the opponents of the Government he might be a bad one in that sense, or vice versa—knew he had to communicate with the party interested, that he had detained such a paper or package, that fact would be a protection to the public. I hope the Postmaster General will take this into his serious consideration.

Mr. HAGGART. I think there is something in the suggestion the hon. gentleman has made. Hitherto the Postmaster was not obliged to send notice to the party whether he detained an immoral publication or not. I think that, under the new regulation, if he detains a publication of that kind, or of any kind mentioned here, he ought to send notice.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). In this provision it is proposed that the department may make regulations fixing the charge of registration upon letters. If I rightly understood the Postmaster General when this Bill was introduced he stated that it was his intention to increase the rate of registration on letters posted to be registered. I think I understood him to say that he would increase it to the same rate as is charged in the United States.

Mr. HAGGART. No; to half the rate, 5 cents.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I think this proposed increase from 2 cents to 5 cents would be a heavy imposition on the farming class and upon the small merchants, provided, as I understand the hon. gentleman to say, that no additional security is to be given under the system of registration to be adopted by the department, than is given at present. I understood the Postmaster General to say that he did not propose to guarantee any amount in a letter that was registered at any post office. I thought that he said at first that it was the intention of the department to guarantee moneys or valuables enclosed in registered letters up to a certain amount and if that course is not adopted now I think it would be a very great hardship on those to whom I refer if the rate of registration is increased. I must again protest against the power which is assumed in this Bill, to register matter whether the sender wishes to have it registered or not. I would say in reply to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) that there is an obligation on the department to deliver every letter that is received for delivery, and there is no greater obligation to deliver a letter supposed to contain valuable matter than one which may not be supposed to contain such matter. A letter may not contain valuables, but it may be very important to the sender that it should reach its destination. I say that it is a duty imposed upon the Post Office Department to deliver every letter at the place to which it is directed. Again I contend that it is in the discretion of the person sending the letter to say whether it should be registered or not. Let me point out a circumstance which I think will illustrate what I mean in regard to this matter. Letters containing bank bills or money of that description are usually registered, but if I post a letter containing a cheque, which is just as valuable as money if

I have funds to my credit, and if that cheque is made payable to the order of the person to whom I am sending it I do not consider it necessary to register the letter, and so it is with regard to drafts or notes. I think it is a most arbitrary measure on the part of the department to insist upon exacting from the person who receives a letter supposed by the postmaster to contain valuables, a registration fee in addition to the postage. It is the sender who ought to decide whether he wishes to have the security whatever security it may be, that is afforded by the registration of that letter.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There are, of course, two views to be taken of this matter; the one that is presented by the Government in the Bill and the other that has been presented by the member for Renfrew (Mr. White). If a postmaster is at liberty to decide whether a letter upon which is placed the ordinary postage contains valuables or not it necessitates close inspection of the letter, and that close inspection may lead to the letters being purloined instead of their being registered. I do not know that it would add anything to the safety of the transmission of letters to induce every postmaster in the country to inspect the letter closely with a view of ascertaining what its contents are. I think that this is a very serious objection and it is one that must necessitate the habit of close inspection in every post office in the country whether the party in charge is a person of integrity or whether he is not. I do not think that the habit of prying into the contents of letters passing through the post office is a good habit to cultivate or to encourage, and, taking everything into consideration it seems to me that the party who posts the letter ought to decide whether he will register the letter or not. I believe that the old practice in this respect is better than the one the Government propose to substitute.

Mr. DAVIN. If the reasoning of my hon. friend from Renfrew (Mr. White) were correct, nobody need ever register, because he says there is the same obligation precisely on the part of the Post Office Department to deliver any unregistered letter as to deliver a registered letter.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). So there is.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, if there be this same obligation there is the same security, and why then should people register?

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). There is a distinction there. The man who wishes additional security registers.

Mr. DAVIN. Yet the hon. gentleman says that the obligation on the part of the Post Office Department is absolute.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). So it is.

Mr. DAVIN. Then there can be no additional security. The reason for registration is that there is additional security, and we have the registered letter watched from hand to hand until its delivery to the sendee is secured. There is a very important reason why the Government of the country should not desire to have valuable matter sent by post in an unregistered letter. There is the constant temptation to purloin on the part of their servants, and the constant danger of the demoralisation of the service. There is also the additional security given to the delivery of valuable matter. Those are two good reasons why the change proposed by the hon. the Postmaster General should be carried out. A moment ago we had a discussion about the habit prevailing in Europe and England, and in a matter of this sort, where the circumstances are precisely the same, the practice of a community so old, and so successful, and so admirable, undoubtedly forms a very good precedent for our guidance.

Mr. DALY. I certainly agree with the remarks of the member for Renfrew (Mr. White) with regard to registration. In our country we have not the same number of banks or of post offices to issue post office orders as in the old Provinces, and there a great deal of money is transmitted by registered letters. Therefore, I hope sincerely that the Postmaster General will not increase the rate. In reference to the other proposition contained in the resolution, I agree also with the hon. member for Renfrew, and reserve any remarks I have to make on that question until it is before the House.

Mr. HAGGART. The object of the regulation regarding letters unquestionably containing money, was to reach what might be transparent on the outside, such as jewellery or watches, as in other countries; but if hon. gentlemen think that the regulation might cover other things, and wish to send letters at their own risk, I have no objection to striking out the latter part of the clause.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I would ask my hon. friend to consider the question of not increasing the registration fee.

Mr. HAGGART. Registration in this country is lower than in any other country in the world. The registration fee in England is 5 cents, in this country 2 cents, and in the United States 10 cents It would be impossible to introduce the amendments which I propose to introduce for the efficient transmission of registered matter unless I get more fees. I intended to perfect the system, in fact introducing into this country the American system, which would enable us to trace a registered letter to any part of the country. That system consists in the delivery to a certain clerk of a certain parcel properly secured with a peculiar kind of lock, which will show if it has been tampered with; that parcel is delivered at the end of the journey to another clerk, who transmits it, and so on. That system can be applied to only a few cities in the country, but there is a further improvement which would enable you to put registered matter in a peculiarly shaped bag with a peculiar lock which would show tampering, and along with it there would be a system of registration and checks which would lessen the duties of the mail clerks, and ensure the certain tracing of the matter to any section of the country. That would entail a great deal of expense. The rate I propose to charge is as low as that charged in any country in the world. Our present system is very complex. I intend to include patterns, samples, parcels of merchandise, newspapers, books, circulars and miscellaneous matter, so that if a person wishes to send them by parcel post he can do so, and register them for 5 cents.

Mr. CASEY. If the hon. gentleman positively assures the House that he cannot perfect a good registration system in any other way than by increasing the charge, he will have to take the responsibility. I have not heard any great complaints yet of the failure of registered letters to reach their destination, and I do not think the hon. gentleman can tell us that the proportion of registered letters lost in Canada is greater than it is under the so-called perfect system in the United States. In fact, I think it is the other way; in the United States they lose a larger proportion of registered letters than we do in Canada. But the point I wish to get at more particularly is that the hon. Minister should put his registration charges in this clause, just as he has put the postal charges in the other clause. This is a clause to give the Governor in Council the power of taxation, which is a thing utterly unconstitutional.

Mr. HAGGART. I will insert in the clause the words "not exceeding 5 cents."

Mr. CASEY. Is that to be the uniform charge on everything that can be registered?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. I regret very much that the Postmaster General has deemed it necessary to increase the registration fee on letters from 2 cents to 5 cents. This is a matter which would affect Manitoba to a very considerable extent. Manitoba has not the facilities of banks and money order offices which other Provinces enjoy, and the result is that a great number of the letters have to be registered, not only money letters or letters containing valuables, but, under our municipal law, tax notices as well. I can assure you, Sir, if this increase from 2 cents to 5 cents becomes law, it will be a great hardship on the municipalities of Manitoba. I am glad to see that the Postmaster General has seen fit to drop the compulsory registration, and I think if he could see his way to allow the registration fee to remain at 2 cents, he would meet with the unanimous approval of the House. In increasing the rate to 5 cents, the Government may find that letters hitherto registered will not be registered, and that the revenue will not materially increase. If the hon. gentleman does not see fit to drop this provision to extend the registration rate to 5 cents, I shall deem it my duty to test the feeling of the House on the question when the Bill comes up for the third reading.

Mr. LANDERKIN. When the Postmaster General is increasing the registration fee from 2 cents to 5 cents, he should give the public a guarantee that the registered letters will reach their destination. If he does not give the public greater security than we now have, I do not see why he should raise the fee. I believe it is possible to minimise the loss of registered and other letters by looking more sharply after the officials. The Postmaster General will never be able to perfect our system until he does so. If we had good honest officials, that would be the highest guarantee that every letter sent would reach its destination. I was looking over the Postmaster General's report, and I find the loss of registered letters much greater than it should be. The loss, I think, could be very materially reduced. In nearly every case where the letters have gone astray, I believe it has been owing to the dishonest conduct of those entrusted with the mails. If the Postmaster General would make an example of those who are tampering with the letters, that would have a more salutory influence on the service and bring about a change better than by increasing the registration fee. There are many people who do not register letters containing money because they say it is safer not to do so. In so many instances registered letters have gone astray, that many people believe those not registered are more apt to reach their destination, owing to the fact that post office officials are not aware that they contain money. If the Postmaster General will see whenever a misdemeanor is committed by any of those engaged in the postal service that they are dismissed and punished, he will do more good than by adding to the taxes of the people, without giving any additional security for the safe delivery of the mail matter.

Mr. WATSON. Could not the hon. gentleman make an exception in favor of tax notices?

Mr. HAGGART. We have the power of making regulations, and the suggestion of the hon. gentleman may be worthy of consideration.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I am opposed to fixing one rate of registration upon one class of mail matter, and another upon another. If you are going to make a 5 cent rate, let it apply to all classes of letters registered, but at the same time I think my hon. friend had better consider, before the third reading of the Bill, whether he ought not to leave the rate at 2 cents. There is a good deal of force in the argument respecting additional burdens being imposed upon people who are least able to bear them, without any guarantee that the additional rate will reduce the probability of loss.

Mr. WATSON. In a great number of instances the letters registered by municipalities are drop letters, as municipalities are obliged by law to register their notices of assessments, and these certainly should not be rated as high as letters containing money or other valuables which go a long distance.

On section 5,

Mr. HAGGART. I propose to amend this section by providing that, in section 21 of the Act, the rate on local or drop letters shall be one cent per ounce weight except in cases where there is a delivery by letter carriers, in which case the rate shall be 2 cents per ounce prepaid.

Mr. ELLIS. Where a man owns a box in the post office, does the Postmaster General make any distinction between the letters delivered there and those delivered by carriers.

Mr. HAGGART. We make no distinction where there are letter carriers in the city.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I shall not detain the Committee further now, but at the next stage I shall divide the House upon this question.

Mr. WELDON (St John). I am convinced that this will entail a loss of revenue. If a merchant desires to send out 1,000 bills or circulars, the cost at this rate would be $20. You can get a man to deliver them for $10 at the outside. The post office will lose the whole revenue on those bills or circulars in that way. I believe that, when the people come to consider that they have to pay 2 cents for a drop letter, they will hesitate to put it in the box. It is true that one cent is a tax which amounts to something in the course of a year, but still the people do not think so much of that; but, when it comes to 2 cents, I feel sure that there will be a diminution in the revenue. My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) said that we should take our inspiration from England, and I would ask whether in England they have ever increased the postage rate?

Mr. DAVIN. I never said so.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I understood my hon. friend to say that we should follow the example of England. But this is a retrograde movement. The tendency in other countries is to reduce the postage rate, and here we are increasing it, and this will bear particularly on the poor people in larger cities. It will not be so heavy on the rich merchants because, as I have pointed out, they can send their clerks or can hire people to deliver their circulars or bills, but the poor people will have to pay this tax.

Mr. HESSON. In the city of St. John a large commercial business is done, and the gross revenue is very large, but if the expenses of that office are considered, there are many small places in Canada, where they have not the advan age of this city delivery, from which the revenue is larger than it is from St. John. The gross revenue from the St. John post office is something over $37,000, and the expenses for clerks and carriers amounts to over $30,000, leaving some $6,000 balance, while Stratford is yielding a revenue to the Government of over $7,000, without having any letter delivery. The same is true in regard to the city of Ottawa. The revenue is $46,892, and the expenses amount to $45,000, mainly incurred for city delivery, leaving a net revenue of $1,800. There are 27 letter carriers employed, and about the same number of clerks. I regret to say this, because I do not know whether there will be any saving in this provision or not, but I think the Minister is fully justified in trying to obtain a little more revenue for the work done in these offices. I again protest, on behalf of the country constituencies, that the hon. gentleman should not unduly press his opposition to this change.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Will the hon. gentleman say that Ottawa is to be taken as a sample of any other cities?

If he went down to the post office here, he would see that the franks sent through this office exceed all the franks sent through all the other offices in Canada.

Mr. HESSON. I referred also to your own city of St. John.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I do not know what the revenue is in St. John, but I am certain that putting a rate of 2 cents on drop letters will reduce the revenue, because people will not send their letters in that way.

Mr. McKAY. I believe, with the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) that the introduction of this sytem into cities will reduce the revenue instead of increasing it, because people who have a large number of circulars and bills to distribute will take advantage of the distributing agencies. The hon. member for Perth (Mr. Hesson) has mentioned two or three cities for the purpose of comparison. I will take Hamilton, with which I am best acquainted. I find that in Hamilton there is a weekly delivery of drop letters of 15,700, which, at one cent each, makes an annual amount of $8,164, which more than half pays the cost of letter carrier service in that city. By adding the other cent to these drop letters, you make the drop letters of that city pay the whole cost of the letter carrying; that is, the mercantile community of that city pays the whole cost of that system, which I think is not justice to the business people of Hamilton or any other city.

On section 8,

Mr. BURDETT. On this section I wish to call the attention of the Postmaster General to a matter that has already been laid before him in respect to answers to examination questions in the Deaf and Dumb Institute, and by pupils in schools. I think the question regarding the examination papers and answers of pupils in our schools, has been laid before him by the school inspector. The superintendent of the Deaf and Dumb Institute, at Belleville, writes me that for a number of years it has been the practice to permit the answers of pupils to questions submitted to test their efficiency at the close of the examination year, to pass through the post office at the rate of one cent per four ounces, and I notice by the regulations formerly enforced that the words "wholly or partly written or printed" such as deeds, &c., are used. Now, in the case of pupils in the Deaf and Dumb Institute, their parents in many cases have no way to become informed of the progress their children are making. It is even very difficult in some cases to get parents to send their children to the institute at all, and still more difficult in many cases to get the children to go. At the close of each year in May, when the pupils are examined, printed examination papers are laid before them. To these they have to give written answers, they have no other way of communication. He desires to have those answers done up and sent to the parents in order that the parents of each child may see what progress their child is making. There is no other way to communicate this information to the parent, and no other way for the pupil to communicate it to any other person. I submit that it is an exceptional case, and I think the Postmaster General would be justified in permitting these answers of the deaf and dumb pupils to be sent in the way I indicate. It was done previously, under former regulations, but it seems a ruling was made a year or two ago that prohibited the sending of them without paying letter postage. It simply means that if letter postage is demanded to the full extent, they will not be sent, and it will be a great detriment to the children of that school. We all feel a deep interest, I know the Postmaster General, as well as every other person, feels a deep interest in the educational advantages that are given to these young people. Very marked progress is made in many cases, and useful and well informed men and women come out of these institutions. If there was any other way by which parents could know the progress their children are making, I would not urge this so earnestly as I do. I, therefore, trust that the hon. the Postmaster General will consider this a special case, and if he will permit them to go in that way, I think he would be doing a service to the country, as well as a just act.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman spoke to me before upon this subject, and I assured him that I would do all that I possibly could for the purpose of carrying out the wish he conveyed to me. But the difficulty arises that if you once let an institution of that kind have free postage, there are always other institutions calling themselves charitable institutions, educational and religious institutions, that will be coming in and asking for similar privileges. The difficulty arose in the definition of newspapers. A government might be pressed for the purpose of allowing an agricultural, a religious monthly or some such periodical as these to pass free, and it has been found impossible to draw the line which should and which should not pass. Accordingly all postal authorities have made the distinction on the ground of the frequency of publication. The same principle applies to institutions of this kind, and it is impossible, once you admit a precedent, to refuse the same privileges to others.

On section 10,

Mr. WELDON (St. John). With regard to a letter insufficiently paid, I think it should be forwarded on double postage being collected. If a letter is put in with the stamp dropped off, or if the stamp is insufficient, I think the letter ought to be forwarded on payment of the double amount. Why should not letters without stamps, and it must be remembered that the stamps sometimes come off, not be forwarded to their destination as non-prepaid letters are on double postage being charged?

Mr. HAGGART. The system referred to by the hon. gentleman exists in some countries. The objection to it is that some parties sending letters will not prepay them and this is found to be a nuisance.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I can understand how this may properly apply to letters sent from foreign countries, but with regard to letters within Canada I think the letter should be forwarded and double postage collected.

Mr. HAGGART. In the United States they detain the letter, and send a circular to the party stating that on receipt of sufficient postage the letter will be forwarded. The arrangement here is simply to prevent the nuisance of parties sending letters without postage.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). As the regulations stand now I understand that if upon an envelope there is printed the words: If within so many days the letter is not delivered it shall be returned to the parties whose names are given,—it will be returned. The present clause in the proposed Act might be read to indicate a change in that system. Does the Postmaster General wish to stop that system?

Mr. HAGGART. We intend to continue it.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Is there any material change in this clause, which is proposed to repeal section 45?

Mr. BOWELL. The principal change is to make every post office official a customs official for this purpose, and it is to make the Act workable, particularly since the parcel post system has been introduced.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). If some arrangement could be entered into between the Customs and Post Office Departments whereby parcels would be delivered by the postmaster and whereby he would be empowered to collect the duties thereon, it would be a great benefit to outlying districts.

Mr. WATSON. I am very glad, because in a new country where there are few customs officers great difficulties may occur. I know that English people who receive boxes at Christmas, containing perhaps some contraband goods, suffer great inconvenience, and if an arrangement between the Customs Department and the Post Office authorities could be arrived at whereby the postmaster would collect the duties payable, it would be of great benefit.

Bill reported.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. BOWELL moved second reading of Bill No (117) to further amend the Customs Act, chapter 32 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. He said: Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I desire to inform the House that since this Bill was introduced I have found in the practical working of the Customs Act difficulties, which I desire to avoid in future by amending some of the clauses. I would call the attention of the House to those changes and then we can discuss them when we are in Committee, and if we should succeed in getting through Committee to-night we can allow the third reading to remain over for a day or two in order that those who take a greater interest in this matter can better understand it. I desire to change the 68th section of this Act, which defines what shall be understood to be an importation sent through a foreign country in transit to Canada. At present there is a duty of 10 per cent. on tea purchased in the United States, while tea which is purchased and imported directly to Canada from the country of growth and production is free. We have hitherto treated all teas imported vid Boston or New York or any other American port and sent direct in transit to Canada as a direct importation. In order to evade the provisions of the law merchants in New York have been in the habit of importing cargoes of tea, and instead of sending it direct to Canada, as their papers would indicate it should be sent, they have allowed it to remain not in bond at the warehouse nor have they made any entry. The fact that tea is not dutiable in the United States prevents them from bonding. They are obliged under the law to make the entry and if they make the entry it becomes United States property, hence they cannot send it afterwards as a direct importation from the country of growth to Canada. In order to evade that provision of the American law they have allowed the tea to remain in warehouse as unclaimed goods until such time as they can obtain a market for it. It is the best possible evidence that could be given that it was not originally intended for Canada, for if they can find a market in the United States they would sell it there and not send it to Canada. A case which came under my observations within the past few days is one in which the tea remained as unclaimed goods in a warehouse in the city of New York since last October. I decided, and was sustained in the opinion by the Justice Department, that that was not a direct importation and the importer had to pay the duty. I desire to place the following addition to the 68th clause of the Act which has reference to the bringing of goods from the United States to Canada in bond:

"Goods that have been entered for consumption or for warehouse or that have been permitted to remain unclaimed or that have been permitted to remain for any purpose in any country intermediate between the country of export and Canada, shall not be considered as in transit through such intermediate country and shall be treated as goods imported from such intermediate country and be valued at the rate of duty accordingly."

That, I think, will avoid any difficulty in the future. I desire also to amend the 12th section of the Act, which provides for the confiscation of goods which are enclosed in a package and not mentioned in the invoice. Lawyers have discovered what they think a defect in the clause as it now stands; that is, that if goods are not found while they are passing through the Custom house that they cannot reach them afterwards though you may find the invoices in the possession of the merchant who has received them in the manner that I have indicated. I do not think, however, that in reference to that clause of the Customs Act that this contention could be sustained, but in order to avoid difficulties and lawsuits I propose to amend the clause as follows:—

"If any goods are enclosed in any package which are not mentioned in the invoice or entry of such package, such goods if found shall be seised and forfeited. If such goods are not found but the value thereof has been ascertained the importer or other person who has made the entry or caused to be made entry of such package and who neglects on receipt of such package to immediately make report and entry of such enclosure shall forfeit the value thereof."

The practice in the past has been, and I think it can be sustained by the law, to confiscate a sum equal to the value of the goods when the goods so imported could not be found. This places the matter beyond a doubt. Merchants who understand the working of this clause will see that it gives the merchants a privilege, in case the goods have been passed through without being discovered, to make entry of the goods so soon as received.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

On section 4,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The change proposed in this section is a very important one. When the Customs law was enacted in 1879, I think that for the first time this principle of charging duty upon the inland transport charges was adopted. Representations were made at that time by those interested in importing, if not by the Montreal Board of Trade and others, that it would work unfairly, and that it was not in the public interest that we should adopt that principle. The Minister at that time compromised the matter by exempting goods imported from Great Britain and Ireland, and now he proposes to wipe out that exemption. The Minister told us the other day that he found that through treaty arrangements between Germany and England he was unable to charge the inland transport charges on German goods, and in order to remedy that he proposes that Great Britain and Ireland should no longer be exempt from this provision any more than any other country. Now, it seems to me that we have arrived at a time when it would be wise for us as a Committee to consider this whole question of charging duties on these inland transport charges. For my own part, I think it would be wise if, instead of striking out the exemption of Great Britain and Ireland, the Minister should take the other tack, and exempt goods coming from all countries from this charge; in other words, that he should wipe out this section of the Customs law altogether. Its phraseology is copied from the American Customs law; and, as I pointed out the other day—I spoke with some hesitancy at the time, but I am convinced now—that provision in the American law was repealed in March, 1883. If the Minister thought it was wise to adopt the phraseology and follow the line of the American Customs law at that time, perhaps it would be worth his while to consider whether, seeing that the Americans have learned by experience that it was wise to repeal that provision, it would not be wisdom for us to do so too. At any rate, it will strike this Committee as somewhat strange that while the American Government, who have as complex a system of tariff rates as we have, should find it in the public interest to repeal this provision, we should find it in the public interest, not only not to repeal it, but to enact more stringent regulations in reference to it. I think it is not very defensible to add these inland transport charges at all. If the object be to secure a revenue, I think the Minister of Customs should take the bold course of increasing his tariff rates of duty, instead of endeavoring to secure revenue by such a roundabout way. I believe representations have been made to him by business men adverse to this provision. In its operation it has caused hardship in the past, loss to merchants, trouble to importers, and loss to carriers, and now it is proposed to add very greatly to the burdens of importers by the extensive change the Minister proposes. I think such a course would tend greatly to diminish the profits of our own railways and our own steamship lines; and I think the interests of all concerned will be served by repealing the clause altogether. It is represented by those who are engaged in the carrying trade—I think in a memorial from the Montreal Board of Trade—that the Canadian route labors under greater difficulties every year. The port of New York has its line of steamers sailing direct, not only to all ports to which our own Canadian steamers sail, but to the different ports of the European countries, and will be able, if we adopt this plan, of charging upon inland transport charges, and especially the transhipping charges, to take the trade from our own lines. No wonder, then, that the merchants of Montreal, the shipping interests as well as the importers, are protesting against this amendment. A parcel of goods is, for instance, bought by a merchant on the continent, and our steamship lines will have to compete for the carriage of the goods with the lines sailing from New York, and, in order to compete, will perhaps be compelled to offer as low a rate as those ships which sail direct from Hamburg or some of the other ports. In order to secure that freight, our Canadian lines sailing from Liverpool, or the other ports where they touch, will have to offer as low rates as American lines sailing direct from the ports where the goods were purchasad, and you can see the disadvantage they thus labor under. But the hon the Minister of Customs proposes by this amendment to put our steamers under this additional disadvantage, that a merchant buying goods at an European port will have them sent direct from that port to New York, and thence to Canada, in order to escape paying duty upon the transport charges which will be required if they are taken on our own vessels. Either the importer will have to bear the loss, or it will have to be borne by our own carrying lines, and the Committee cannot fail to see how injuriously this would affect our trade. Why should not the enterprising merchant be at liberty to go to any market he chooses—the cheapest market in which he can buy his goods—without being compelled to pay duty on the inland transport charges? It is manifestly unwise to maintain this practice of charging duties upon inland transport, as well as upon the value of the article itself. How does it work with reference to different classes of goods? Take high price goods. Take, for instance, the valuable, costly cutlery from Sheffield. You have a package of that in which there may be thousands of dollars worth of goods. The merchants would have to pay duty on the inland transport from Sheffield to the port of Liverpool, or whatever port he is shipping from. That would be comparatively light, you would say, in comparison with the value of the goods; but take an article like crockery, and bring that from the potteries in Staffordshire to the port of shipment, and you have not only to pay the excessive duty on the goods, but also a duty on the package; and if there is a certain percentage of breakage you have to pay duty even upon the broken crockery. Besides paying the heavy price at the original point of purchase for the packages and freights, you have to pay a heavy freight from Staffordshire to the port of shipment, and, in addition, if you add the duty on the inland charges from the Staffordshire potteries to the port of shipment, a serious item is added to the cost of these articles: I do not want to detain the House, but wish simply to point out clearly to the Committee the position in which we will be placed if this amendment be adopted I would like to hear the views of the Hon. Minister of Customs in reference to this point before discussing this amendment further. My idea would be, instead of amending section 61 of the Customs Act in the manner he proposes, to expunge it from the Statute-book altogether. If the Minister must have some additional revenue, let him take the bold course of adding it on to the article, and not take this roundabout way. The American Customs have abandoned what the hon. gentleman proposes to perpetuate and intensify. We, who have copied the very phraseology of their language for the first time in this Act, might do well to consider whether we should not follow their example and wipe out all these charges for duty on inland transport, and revert to that which, I think, is the correct principle, that the price for duty shall be the price paid for the article where it is purchased.

Mr. CURRAN. With reference to this amendment which my hon. friend now suggests, I may say that, in a very great measure, the remarks of the last speaker are the views of the mercantile community in the city which I have the honor to represent. There have been a great many very erroneous notions in connection with the effect of this amendment, if we can call it an amendment. The merchants who are interested in the imports to this country are far from regarding it as an amendment at all. Not to repeat what has been said by my hon. friend, I may say, in the first place, that the merchants contend that it will be a most difficult matter to levy this duty upon goods, on account of the peculiar charges in connection with this transportation,—not merely the railway charges but the charges for cartage, and other expenses, which were enumerated to me the other day at a meeting of the Council of the Board of Trade, held at Montreal on Saturday last. They say that the system in England differs entirely from that which prevails on the continent. There the goods are sold at a certain price free on board, while in England nothing of the kind takes place; and all these extra charges, some of a trivial nature—1s. 6d., and other small amounts of that kind—will have to be computed on a bale of goods containing a variety of imports, and perhaps calling for a different duty from the others; and it will be almost impossible to reach the duty to be levied for these additional expenses of transportation without a most complicated system arising out of it. Now, my hon. friend has spoken about the disadvantages that our Canadian lines of steamers would suffer from as regards American lines plying between English ports and ports in the United States, New York more particularly. But there is also another disadvantage as between the Canadian lines themselves. For instance, goods bought in London and shipped on board at London by a line of steamers sailing from that port, would have nothing to pay for inland transportation, whereas, if goods of the same kind were bought in London and shipped to one of our ports vid Liverpool, the cost of transportation from London to Liverpool would be added. There would thus be an actual discrimination between two lines of Canadian steamers simply because one would sail from one port in England and another would sail fron another port. The merchants are of the opinion that it would be far better, if the present duty be not sufficient, to increase the duty upon the goods rather than introduce the amount which is now proposed by my hon. friend the Minister of Customs. They say that they do not particularly object to any reasonable increase of the duty, but they do object to this system which is now suggested, which they contend will affect our trade most injuriously, which will affect the various interests which have been referred to, and will cause a vast amount of annoyance. The gentlemen representing the Boards of Trade of Montreal and Toronto, are to wait upon the Minister of Customs tomorrow and to lay their views before him upon this point, and I know that their contention is that it would be far better to wipe out that portion of the clause altogether, and, if necessary, to add to the duty already levied upon goods imported rather than to adopt a system such as that which is now suggested by my hon. friend the Minister of Customs.

Mr. BOWELL. I explained fully, when I introduced the resolutions and the Bill, the reasons which had induced the Government to suggest this change in the law. I do not know that it is necessary or advisable that I should detain the Committee with any further remarks upon that point. My hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) has fallen into the same error, though not to the same extent, as a great many others have done who have written in the newspapers and have written to the department, and even I regret to say from Boards of Trade and Chambers of Commerce. My hon. friend pointed out the disadvantages which would accrue to Canadian ships bringing goods purchased in the European market and taken to Liverpool, over the American ships running direct from the port of shipment. That is not the fact. The value for duty is not the price of the goods purchased in the foreign market with the charges added to Liverpool. If a Canadian vessel entered into an arrangment with merchants in Germany or Belgium or any other foreign country for the carriage of goods from Liverpool to Canada, after the arrival of these goods there, there would be no more duty or charges added to the value of those goods than if they had been shipped directly from a port in that foreign country. I hope I have made myself sufficiently clear on that point.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but this is a matter of some importance. Suppose, for example, that goods were shipped from Antwerp to Montreal. As I understand him, a considerably less duty would be collected on those goods than on the same class of goods shipped from Liverpool, supposing the goods were manufactured in the interior of Belgium or Germany and were shipped to Liverpool for exportation to Canada. I unders and that from Antwerp to Canada they would pay less duty than they would pay if they were shipped from Liverpool to Canada though both classes of goods came from the same point in the centre of Germany.

Mr. BOWELL. No; that is the error which I was endeavoring to correct, and into which other gentlemen have fallen. If you go to Antwerp and purchase £100 worth of goods and they are shipped directly to Montreal, the duty would be levied on that £100; but if you shipped them to Liverpool the £100 value at the port of shipment at Antwerp would be the value for duty. The only point is, that, if a merchant goes into the interior of Belgium, for example, and purchases goods worth, say, £75 and it costs £5 to send them to Antwerp, then the value for duty would be £80.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Supposing it cost £10 to send them to Liverpool?

Mr. BOWELL. That would not be added.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That would be the same thing.

Mr. BOWELL. No; the wording of the clause shows that it is not, it reads:

"In determining the value for duty of goods, there shall be added to the fair market value, at the time of exportation, of the quantity so exported and imported in the principal markets of the country from whence the same have been imported into Canada, the cost of inland transportation, shipment and transhipment——"

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What does that mean?

Mr. BOWELL. Let me get through and I will explain.

Mr. CURRAN.

"—with all the expenses included, from the place of growth, production or manufacture, whether by land or water, to the vessel in which shipment is made, either in transitû or direct to Canada."

So you see, from the wording of the clause, that the costs of the inland transportation are added only until you reach the ship which brings the goods to this country.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). That is the ship that leaves Antwerp?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes; the ship that leaves Antwerp. At present, if you purchase goods in Manchester and send them to Liverpool, the transportation charges are not added; but, under the proposed amendment, that will be charged. My hon. friend says that the merchants in Montreal take very strong objections to this clause because they say it will add to the trouble and annoyance of making their entries. I have never found the slightest complaint in Montreal or any other port when it was necessary for the merchants to take their invoices and deduct these charges. If there is no trouble in deducting these inland transportation charges, and other things which appear on the face of the invoice, I do not see how the trouble is to be increased by taking the invoice as it is presented to the Customs, and taking all the charges for duty. When there is no trouble in making deductions, how can it be any great trouble to them to allow the invoice to remain precisely as it is sent to them, with the charges added to it? My hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) has correctly pointed out that when this principle was adopted in the Canadian law it was taken from the American Customs Act as it then existed. It is quite true that that law was lately repealed. I find that the provision in the United States Customs law being section 2907 of the Revised Statutes, making dutiable inland transportation charges, which came into force on the 28th July, 1866, was repealed by section 87 of the Act of the 3rd March, 1883. See also synopsis of decisions of the Treasury Department, 1886, covering the United States Attorney General's opinion in reference to the dutiable value under the law as it stood after the repeal of section 2907 above referred to, which virtually fixes the dutiable value, and these are the words he uses, at the actual market value or wholesale price thereof at the period of the exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country from which the same has been exported. Now, if you go to Antwerp, by way of illustration, and purchase goods which have arrived in that city from the interior, the freight has been added to them, and consequently they are just exactly in the same position for duty when they reach the United States, as they would be if they had been purchased in the interior, and the inland charges added to them at Antwerp. The difficulty, then presented itself in carrying out the law as it now stands, and which I fear would be the case if we adopted the suggestion of the hon. member for Brant and repealed that provision altogether—the difficulty might be the great number of invoices that would be presented representing goods to have been purchased in the interior of the country when in fact they were purchased in the principal markets of the country. Now, the United States law provides for the value of goods for duty in the principal markets of the country in which they are purchased, and if that be carried out literally, it would include all the inland transportation. I do not think there can be a doubt upon that point; and the fact that there have been so many disputes and so much trouble arising from the wording of the law as it exists at present, induced the collector of Customs at New York, I am quite sure, when he was giving his evidence before the Commission, to state that he believed and was convinced that it had been a great mistake to repeal that provision of the law. There is another reason given by those who were instrumental in having that clause repealed in the United States, which was that they were desirous of reducing the revenue, and that they could do it by that means without interfering to any appreciable extent with their protective system. It is quite true that it would add to the value of the goods for duty, and by that means increase the revenue to that extent; and I need not say that whenever any proposition is made for laying additional burdens upon the merchants, they, as a rule, object to it. I must say this, however, that the Montreal merchants have stated very frankly and clearly that rather than have this provision adopted they would prefer to see two or three more per cent. placed upon the dutiable value of the goods. But to my mind, and from the experience I have had in carrying out the Customs law, I cannot see that any more trouble would arise to the merchant, nor do I know of any difficulties that would present themselves in carrying out the provision of the law as it now stands. If we were to repeal that provision, as suggested by the hon. member for Brant, it would mean a loss of about a quarter a million of revenue upon continental goods alone. Of course it would not cause a loss upon those from England, because duty is not now charged in that country upon inland transportation. In the despatch to which I referred, when speaking upon this subject before, from the German ambassador in England, he points out that the difference in respect to German goods, amounts to 65 per cent. I should not have calculated the sum as high as that, but I know that in many classes of goods, and particularly those to which the member for Brant called attention, that is crockery, when purchased in the interior of Germany, it does add to the value of the duty of those goods 40 to 50, and in many cases 60 per cent. or higher. In Great Britain it could not have that effect, because the distance they are carried is not so great. The strongest reasons advanced against the proposition, to my mind, was by the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), that is, that it might have the effect of causing merchants who purchase goods in London to send them by a vessel sailing from London to New York, rather than to send them to Liverpool and have the inland charges added to the value of the invoice for duty. That is the only objection I think that can be brought that has the slightest force in it against the proposition which is now before the Committee. I hope I have made myself sufficiently plain in reference to the intention of this clause. I have pointed out the misapprehension which has existed and still exists in the minds of many of those who have written upon the subject, and many of the boards of trade who have sent resolutions in connection with the matter. It is only to-day that I received a resolution passed by the French Chamber of Commerce in Montreal, in which they object to the adoption of this principle because, as they say, it will add the ocean freight to the value of goods for duty.

Mr. CURRAN. The Montreal Board of Trade does not take that view at all.

Mr. HOLTON. How much additional revenue does the hon. gentleman expect that the imposition of this duty will give him?

Mr. BOWELL. I have not made that calculation, but I think the increase may be nearly as much as the sum we would loose if we were to repeal it.

Mr. HOLTON. How much?

Mr. BOWELL. About a quarter of a million.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The Minister of Customs has given a very explicit statement with regard to this clause, which I think the Committee fully understand. Divested of all explanation it simply amounts to this, that he is going to ask us to give him a quarter of a million more revenue.

Mr. BOWELL. It may be that, or less. I think it will be less.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The reason it was taken off in the United States was the reason assigned by the Minister of Customs, that they wished to reduce their revenue, and, therefore, they could afford to do it, whereas we, under the present circumstances, have to resort to every means of taxation to get every cent we can out of the consumers of this country. Now, I admit that if they were going to take a quarter of a million out of the taxpayers of this country it would be better to come down and advance the duty directly. That would be a more plain and intelligible way; it is one that the people understand, and it would do away with a great deal of trouble which the present position involves. On that point I think the House will agree that it is a very reprehensible Act; the House will agree that the present industries have sufficient protection without this quarter of a million which the Minister asks the House to give them in addition. If it had been understood from the commencement that this measure was going to involve so large an amount of taxation as the Minister now mentions he would have found generally among consumers, not among manufacturers, of course, a much greater outcry than has yet come up against the Bill. The working of the Bill is simple enough, I admit, there is no trouble about that. If the Minister proposes to add to the cost of an article the expense of the inland transportation, that is an intelligible proposition. But the difficulty of working it seems to be such as is indicated by the member for Montreal Centre (Mr Curran), where goods come from different parts of England. For instance, up to a certain time a very large portion of the shipments coming by the large lines to Montreal has come by way of Liverpool. Of course the hon. gentleman is now legislating in favor of one line that comes from London direct. After this time the advantages will be so great that no London goods can come by way of Liverpool, and I know the hon. gentleman had no such object in view; but that is practically what the measure amounts to. It is an interference with trade which will be found to be very objectionable to the proprietors of the large steamers directly interested. The hon. gentleman explains that on goods going to London, for instance, from Antwerp, the ocean freight up to that point would not be included, and it would form no part of the inland freight, because it would be collected in full at the time of shipment. I cannot see very much difference between ocean freight going to the port of shipment at London to be shipped to Canada, from that of inland freight of similar goods coming from a manufacturing district in England to London to be transhipped to Canada. I cannot see on principle what the difference can be. It is part of the expense of getting them to the point of departure for this country, and if they happen to be water borne part of the way to London it should make no difference over the fact that they were land carried from the interior of the country to London, the port of shipment. In that respect the hon. gentleman's reasoning is rather faulty and does not harmonise. The main fact is that we are asked to vote a quarter of a million more of taxes, and that is a very serious thing. I think at this late period of the Session the Government should hesitate before they ask the House to commit themselves to such an important measure as this is, and I repeat that if it had become known that this is what the Bill involved we would have heard much more about it than we do at present. I can understand Boards of Trade taking these Bills as they are presented and not always understanding them, for they have not always the benefit of the explanation given by the Minister; but, in my opinion, they understand the bearing of the Bill and they will understand more than ever that the object of this Bill is to obtain more money.

Mr. BOWELL. No.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Then let the hon. gentleman lower the duty on those articles so as to harmonise the amount collected, and then I should not see so much objection to the Bill.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The Minister always speaks with a good deal of complaisancy about the errors into which people fall, and he sets us right in a very dignified way.

Mr. BOWELL. I hope I did not do it offensively, I did not mean to do so.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The trouble is the Minister is an autocrat, with power not only of introducing a Bill into Parliament but of interpreting a Bill afterwards. He brings in a Bill, and we read over a clause in it, and interpret it according to the general meaning of the English language, but the Minister rises and says that the hon gentleman has fallen into the same error that a great many people have already fallen into, and I will tell you the meaning of it. I hold that in this Committee we are dealing with the Bill as introduced, and I hold that the explanation of the Minister does not bear out his contention. His ruling may be so and so, but if he rules that way he rules contrary to the wording of the Bill, which I will read:

"In determining the value for duty of goods, there shall be added to the fair market value, at the time of exportation, of the quantity so exported and imported in the principal markets of the country from whence the same have been imported into Canada, the cost of inland transportation, shipment and transhipment, with all the expenses included, from the place of growth, production or manufacture, whether by land or water, to the vessel in which shipment is made, either in transitu or direct to Canada."

The wording of the resolution is as plain as it can possibly be made. Goods shipped at Hamburg for Liverpool to be sent to Canada are under the Bill subject to dutiable charges by the water route just the same as by the inland route, and the same applies to interior points of Germany. The language is this: "Either in transitu or direct to Canada." The meaning of the section is this: that if goods are purchased in any European country, the cost of transportation, in Germany, for example, is added to the price at Liverpool, and the cost of transportation from Germany to Liverpool is also added. If so, all the expenses of transportation, whether by land or water to the vessel in which the goods are to be shipped, are included. That is the meaning of the section. The Minister says that is not the meaning of it. If not, he should alter its wording. We cannot afford to place an Act on the Statute-book which is susceptible of other interpretation than that according to the ordinary rules of interpretation.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The Minister when introducing this Bill stated that it arose in consequence of representations made by the ambassador of Germany with respect to inland transportation charges on German goods, while such are not made against British goods. I fail to understand how a treaty between England and Germany could affect any matter between England and her colonies. I could understand very well how such a point might be raised respecting the construction of the most favored nation clause as between England and Germany or England and the United States, but I cannot understand it as between England and her colonies. I have no doubt that the effect of this measure will be to cast additional burdens upon the importers of the country to a very large extent. As I said before, I must confess I cannot understand how between the mother country and her colonies our fiscal regulations should be interfered with by a treaty between Great Britain and another power. Then, with regard to what my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) said, I must say that, although I listened very attentively to the explanation of the Minister of Customs, I am not at all clear as to the construction of this clause.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Did I not make it clear?

Mr. JONES (Halifax).

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Not any more clear than the Minister of Customs. I must say that the words "either in transitu or direct to Canada" puzzle me as to their meaning, and, taking the whole thing together, I should be inclined rather to agree with the interpretation of my hon. friend from Brant. The words:

"The cost of inland transportation, shipment and transhipment, with all the expenses included from the place of growth, production or manufacture, whether by land or water, to the vessel in which shipment is made—"

—mean, I think, that if the goods come from the interior of Germany, they would be taken by land and water, and it would be inland transportation to the vessel. I may say that I am very much puzzled as to the construction of that clause, and I believe that the strict interpretation of it would lead me to the conclusion of my hon. friend from Brant, that it would include the transhipment from Antwerp to Liverpool. I have talked with my hon. friend, the Minister of Customs, about this inland transhipment with regard to goods from the United States, and I think it is more against the Maritime Provinces than it is against the upper Provinces, because if goods are carried by rail they pay no duty, but if carried to New York and shipped to St. John or Halifax, then the inland transportation is added. In that respect I think that we are in an unfair position.

Mr. BOWELL. When I introduced the resolution, I endeavored to explain the reasons for this change. My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Weldon) says that he does not understand why a treaty between Germany and England can interest the colonies so far as it relates to the imposition of duties or what might be termed our internal regulations respecting our tariff. The treaty was entered into, between Great Britain and Germany, in 1865, before Confederation, and it contains what is known as "the most favored nation clause." The provision in that treaty also binds the colonies, and hence the colonies of Great Britain at that time were made a party to the treaty. That being the case, Germany says: "You have provided in the wording of that treaty that you shall have no advantages in trade matters that are not enjoyed by ourselves, nor will you give any advantages to a country which is a party to that treaty that are not given to us." That includes the colonies as well as Great Britain, and hence the advantage given to Great Britain by adding the inland transportation for value of goods for duty is an advantage which is given to Great Britain and Ireland by Canada and which is not given to Germany. I hope I have made myself clear. I approach this point with a good deal of diffidence, because it appears that I am unfortunate in not being able to make clear to some hon. members what I conceive to be a misunderstanding of the law on the part of my hon. friend (Mr. Paterson). He seems to be a little touchy on that point. If he can suggest to me any language that cannot by any possibility imply offence I will use it. I think, however, that I used a moderate term. If you take that clause you will see that it is not an arbitrary interpretation on the part of the Customs Department. Arbitrary, dictatorial or whatever the hon. gentleman may think proper to call me in the position I occupy.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I did not call you names.

Mr. BOWELL. Well, that has nothing to do with the matter. I may be a potentate, or absolute, or anything you please, but here is my friend alongside me (Mr. Cockburn) and I might refer it to him without any fear of the result, to let him tell the House what the grammatical interpretation of this clause is. Whatever interpretation my hon. friend from Brant may put on this clause, I may state that it has been on the Statute-book ever since I have been in the Government. There is no change in the law so far as this is concerned, and the interpretation which he has given it and as to the effects that would follow therefrom have never been experienced either by myself or by any member of the Government.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That is simply because you did not put it into operation. You did not carry out the law.

Mr. BOWELL. That is a matter of opinion. If I were to call you dictatorial in the manner in which you give answers, it might be offensive, but I will not, because I know you do not mean it. I have never gone to the Council to ask for an interpretation of this law, for to my mind it is so clear that a child might understand it. It says:

"In determining the value for duty of goods, there shall be added to the fair market value, at the time of exportation, of the quantity so exported and imported in the principal markets of the country from whence the same have been imported into Canada, the cost of inland transportation, shipment and transhipment, with all the expenses included, from the place of growth, production or manufacture, whether by land or water, to the vessel in which shipment is made, either in transitu or direct to Canada."

Now can the ocean between Antwerp and Liverpool, or from Antwerp to any other port, be by any possibility construed into being "inland transport?"

Mr. WELDON (St. John). That is the old Act.

Mr. BOWELL. The clause is precisely the same as to wording as the old Act. There is no change so far as this is concerned. It is the land or water charges, by which it is conveyed to the ship in which it is placed for shipment to this country, that are added to the value of the goods for duty. It applies exclusively to the "inland transportation" and nothing more. Then the words, "in transitu" were used for the very purpose of avoiding that interpretation which has been put upon the clause by the hon. member for Brant. If those words were not there, there might be some reason for that interpretation. If you send the goods from a foreign port via England, they are in transitu via England, just as the hon. member for Brant says that they are in transitu when sent from Yokohama via New York. If his argument amounts to anything, the duty should be added to all the charges from Yokohama to New York. If the clause will bear that interpretation in one way, it must in the other. That has been the interpretation placed upon it by a number of newspapers, misled, I think, by the meagre resolutions which were placed upon the Notice Paper when it was introduced. I would ask my hon. friend to sleep over this—to take it and apply the rules of grammar to it, and then take the words "inland transportation" as governing the whole of the charges which are to be added, and consider in addition the privilege that merchants have to send the goods through a foreign country, and he cannot come to any other conclusion than the one I have come to.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). While I sleep on that, I will give the Minister of Customs this to sleep on: I happen to have here an opinion which was given by an able counsel with reference to the working of this clause on the Statute-book, and I will read what he says:

"The point at which the transportation ceases, the cost of which is to be added to the value for duty, seems to be the point at which the last shipment by water is made, by means of which the goods are expected to reach Canada."

Just what I said, and Liverpool is the last point at which the last shipment by water is made. He goes on to say:

"In this instance, again, the language of the clause is singularly ambiguous, but it seems to be intended that the point of shipment in a vessel in a port of the country ex quo is the point at which the cost of inland transportation, to be computed in the dutiable value, is to cease. And two modes are evidently pointed at by which the goods can afterwards reach this country, viz, directly from the port of shipment and indirectly via a foreign port on this side of the Atlantic, reaching Canada from thence by land, and the transitus spoken of in the clause must therefore mean the carriage of the goods across the ocean."

That is the opinion of a counsel who was asked to give his opinion, and if the Minister wants to know who the counsel is, it is the Hon. J. J. C. Abbott, one of his colleagues in the Government, and, therefore, he will admit its value. He goes on to point out:

"It is scarcely necessary to point out that, although the meaning thus stated is probably the meaning intended to be conveyed by the words, 'in transitu,' used in the resolution, they really possess no such distinctive signification, as they apply equally to a shipment direct to Canada, and to a shipment to Canada viâ a foreign port."

That is, that the words "in transitu" apply equally to a vessel coming to Montreal or to one coming to New York, and the charges to be added were all the charges for transportation from whatever country the goods came to the place where the last shipment is made. Now, when you consider that so much money or revenue is involved, it is worth while for the Minister to give the matter a little consideration, and to see whether, if the clause is to go on, it cannot be amended. But I submit that if it means the imposition of another quarter of a million upon the people of this country plus the annoyance to the importer, plus the loss to the Canadian steamships and the Canadian railways, this Committee ought to take into consideration the advisability of repealing it altogether. Follow the example of the United States in repealing this provision, as you followed their example in copying the exact phraseology of it from them. The Minister on another occasion said that this law was on the Statute-book before the National Policy. I think he was altogether wrong. The law that existed before was this:

"The value for duty of goods on which an ad valorem duty of Customs is imposed, imported into Canada by sea, shall be the actual value of such goods at the last place at which they are purchased; and the value of such goods for duty, if imported from the United States by land or inland navigation, shall be the actual value of such goods at the last place at which they are purchased for importation into Canada, and whence they are directly conveyed, without change of package, to Canada; and whatever be the country from which the goods are imported or in which they are purchased, such value shall be ascertained by adding to the value of such goods at the place of growth, production or manufacture, the cost of transportation, whether by land or water, and the shipment and transhipment, with all expenses included, from the place of growth, production or manufacture, to the place where the goods are purchased, and if they are purchased in the United States, thence to the place whence they are directly conveyed to Canada as aforesaid."

That was the old Act, but it is entirely changed in this Bill. The system that prevailed then was this: An invoice of goods are purchased in London; they are foreign made goods; the law prescribed that if they were produced in Germany, the Minister, in estimating their value, would take the cost of the goods in Germany, and add the cost of transporting them from Germany to London, if that was the last place where the purchase was made. That was simply put in for the purpose of enabling the Customs Department to ascertain the value if it was disputed. Then there is this anomaly in this clause: The Minister gives us an illustration of the way in which he will work his law, that in the case of goods purchased in London, the inland transport charges to Liverpool would be added; but in case those goods were not purchased in London,—if they were produced in Germany, for instance, and taken to London, and the importer purchased them in London, would he add the inland transportation charges from London to Liverpool on those goods?

Mr. BOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant.) Under what authority?

Mr. BOWELL. Because that is the place where they are purchased.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant.) This clause does not provide that it shall be from the place where purchased. It says from the place of growth, production and manufacture. Therefore, goods bought in London, purchased, manufactured or grown outside of London, could not be affected by the duties under this clause. The whole clause is wrong, and will have to be re-drafted, if not abandoned, or it will have to be left wholly to the discretion of the Minister of Customs to put whatever interpretation he pleases upon it, without reference to the wording of the Statute at all.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Under the protection the Minister of Customs gives there could be no difficulty; but his successor might adopt a different view, and the more you look into the clause, the more complicated it appears. I cannot understand about the treaty. The treaty was made in 1866, before Confederation, between England and Germany. We are bound to this extent by the favored nation clause, that a colony could not make a different duty against goods imported from Germany as compared with those imported from the United States. But, quoad Great Britain, we are one country, so that the duties we charge on English goods can in no way come under that clause.

Mr. BOWELL. The clause provides specially that no import or export duties shall be charged between Great Britain and her colonies which would favor either as compared with Germany. I propose to add the word "including" before the words "shipping and transhipment," and to strike out the word "included" in the next line and to add the words "connected therewith." This will make that part of the clause read: "The cost of inland transportation, including shipment and transhipment with all the expenses included therewith."

Mr. BOYLE. I am going to ask the Minister of Customs if this clause not only discriminates between British and foreign ports, but also between different ports in the United Kingdom? For instance, in the dry goods trade, the three principal ports are London, Manchester and Glasgow. The prices of the goods in those three markets are much the same, but the effect of this change might possibly be to drive the purchasers of goods to London, Liverpool and Glasgow, and to leave out Manchester, in order to save this duty on inland charges by shipping direct from London, Liverpool and Glasgow.

On section 6,

Mr. BOWELL. The amendment I propose is simply to prevent people bringing out machines from a foreign country, ostensibly for their own use, without paying duty upon the royalty, as all other persons do. It is so amended as to make it clear that the value of the duty shall include the value of any royalty.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I should judge the hon. the Minister would have great difficulty in managing that royalty business. There are continually new lines upon which these royalties may be used. I had a case myself in which I bought the right to use a patent right for fifteen years, and the value was added on, but there was a clause in the agreement that I might be free to give up at any time using the royalty. But, when I came to pass the hon. gentleman's officers, I was met with the claim that there would be 15 years' value added to the article, and I might abandon the use of it at the end of three months. The perplexing part was that, if I gave up the use of it, there was no provision for my getting it back. There was, in fact, a special regulation passed in regard to it, but the whole question of royalties is a very difficult one to manage.

Mr. BOWELL. It is a very difficult one.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think, unless the officers are very vigilant, as I believe most of them are, one person might be paying for the use of an article while another was not.

Mr. MASSON. I would ask the Minister whether it is the intention to charge for what is generally known as a royalty under such circumstances as this: Suppose the inventor and the manufacturer of an article lives in the United States, and has a patent there and also a patent in Canada. Under his Canadian patent he charges for the use or the right to vend the article in Canada a certain sum, which is commonly called a royalty. Is it the intention under this section to add the fee to the price or value which the manufacturer in a foreign country obtains, because the article being used in Canada, gains by virtue of the Canadian patent?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Is the article made in Canada or in the States?

Mr. MASSON. Say it is made in the States, but imported into Canada, and used or sold in Canada, and for the right to use or sell in Canada, the patentee, who lives in the United States, but has obtained under our law a patent in Canada, by virtue of his Canadian patent, charges a certain fee for that privilege. It does not seem to me that that is a subject for duty at all.

Mr. BOWELL. If a man has a patent in the United States and manufactures there an article which costs him a dollar, and he charges a royalty of another dollar, that amounts to two dollars, and would be the value for duty. If he obtains a patent in Canada he has to manufacture in Canada within a year, or lose his rights under the patent. I think what my hon. friend desires to learn is in regard to a case where a man has a patent in Canada and sells the right to another to manufacture and then sends over to Canada a portion of the machinery required to complete the article, whether the whole value of the article should be charged on the portions which are imported.

Mr. MASSON. That covers a part of it.

Mr. BOWELL. If the article is made here, we have nothing to do with it. If an American manufacturer sells to a Canadian manufacturer the right to make the article, it is not our business what he sells it for, but, if he imports a portion of the article, he would have to pay duty upon it. The question has been before the department, and it has been decided that, where they send ordinary castings of an article patented in the United States and patented in this country, it was dutiable under the tariff. At first, I thought it came within the clause of the law which provides for the imposition of a duty on parts of an article, and that the value of the parts for duty should be in proportion to the value of the whole.

Mr. MASSON. The explanation of the Minister meets in part the question which I asked, but I do not confine it to parts. By way of example, I may put a case to show the drift of my question. A person in the United States has a patent in the United States, and he patents the same invention in Canada. He sells to a party in Canada the right to make and vend in Canada, for which he receives a fee for each article sold. The person in Canada is manufacturing, but he has not a sufficient supply on hand. As he is manufacturing, the question of the patent lapsing at the end of a year would not apply; but he is not manufacturing in sufficient quantities to meet the demand, and the article is sent in by the patentee in the United States.

Mr. BOWELL. Then it would be dutiable beyond a doubt.

Mr. MASSON. What I ask is, would what is called a royalty on each machine be added to the value for duty?

Mr. BOWELL. Not if it were manufactured here, but if it were imported it would be.

Mr. MASSON. He is paying the fee not to import the article, but to sell it here by virtue of a Canadian patent, and not in reference to the price in the United States. It has its price there by virtue of the American patent, but why should the additional price be put on here after the man has paid the amount in the United States, and has paid for the enhanced value there? Why should you add an additional enhanced value by way of the royalty which is paid here? It seems to me that the importer is at a disadvantage in that.

Mr. BOWELL. I desire to move the following additional clause:—

That section sixty-eight of the Act be amended by adding the following thereto:

"Goods that have been entered for consumption or for warehouse or that have been permitted to remain unclaimed, or that have been permitted to remain for any purpose in any country intermediate between the country of export and Canada, shall not be considered as in transitu through such intermediate country, but shall be treated as goods imported from such intermediate country and be valued and rated for duty accordingly."

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Do you mention any time?

Mr. BOWELL. No; I have not. What I wanted to prevent is a repetition of the trouble which arose in reference to the tea.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The object is all right, but, unless you limit it to some time, you will have to decide on each entry.

Mr. BOWELL. That would be difficult. I think it would be better to leave that discretionary with the department. Cars might be ready to make the transhipment from the vessel, or they might not be there, some cause might exist by which it could not be done, and a necessary delay of 24 hours or 48 hours might occur, as very often does. When only such delays take place, the importation has not been treated in any other way than a direct importation.

On section 11, sub-section 3,

Mr. BOWELL. If goods are seized now, they are condemned, and the law provides what shall be done in order to complete the confiscation. It gives the right to the party from whom they are seized to object to go into court, but there is no provision governing a case where a merchant says: "I do not desire you to interfere with my case, there is the money." The money is deposited.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What have you been doing with the money previous to this?

Mr. BOWELL. We have put it in the bank.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The summary seizure of a vessel sometimes works injustice on the owner. I know the Minister will say that if they do not retain this power people will transfer their vessels and put them out of their hands. But I have known cases where there has been no collusion of that kind. It seems the Government have no right to come down and seize a vessel that has been rendered liable for violation of the Customs Act, a year or two before. I think that is an extreme interpretation of the law.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman does not mean to say that the Government has no right under the law to do that. Equitably considered there is a good deal of reason in the position taken by the hon. gentleman; but under all revenue laws the right to seize a vessel that has violated the law exists. When discussing this matter before I referred to the English decisions. You will find by consulting them that where a vessel has contravened the Merchants' Shipping Act, the vessel became absolutely forfeited, although she had been sold no less than three times, still she was seized and condemned.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). That might have been by collusion.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no evidence of that in the trial, and I read all the evidence. But one can easily understand that if a vessel was to be held harmless for smuggling, the very moment there was a probability of her being caught for smuggling, the owner would transfer her to some one else. Cases have come up where people have a heavy mortgage upon a vessel, and where she had been caught in a flagrant case of smuggling; and the same argument has been used: "I invested my money in this security, and am I to be robbed of it by the Government taking the vessel?" You might just as well repeal the law with respect to smuggling if you adopt the principle of the hon. gentleman.

Bill reported.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 1:05 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 10th April, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OTTAWA, MORRISBURG AND NEW YORK RAILWAY.

Mr. HICKEY moved:

That as it appears from the Minutes of the proceedings of the Senate on the 28th of March, 1889, that the Select Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors reported that they had decided by a majority not to pass Bill (No. 43) to incorporate the Ottawa, Morrisburg and New York Railway Company, which report said Minutes show was concurred in by the Senate on the 2nd April inst.;

Resolved, That the Accountant of this House be authorised to refund the fees paid on the said Bill, less cost of printing and translation.

He said: I had intended to make some extended remarks in support of this resolution or in explanation of it, but feeling that I cannot treat, as they merit, the two or three individuals who have unfairly attacked me elsewhere, I shall have to bury my indignation with the Bill, which for the second time has been rejected.

Motion agreed to.

DUTY ON FLOUR.

Mr. MULOCK asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government, during the present Session, to take any steps, and if so, what steps, towards meeting the demands of the millers for increased duty on flour, with the view of putting an end to the unjust discrimination complained of by the milling industry?

Mr. FOSTER. The question, I think, is a little improper, having a statement of what is put forward as a fact. The Government does not admit that there has been any unjust discrimination. With reference to this question, my hon. friend will see that it is of such a nature that it would not be wise for me to give an answer at the present time.

COLLECTOR JULES QUESNEL.

Mr. LAVERGNE asked, 1. Was complaint ever brought by a person named Henderson Black, or a person named John Black, or any other person whatsoever, belonging to St. Johns, P.Q., between 1878 and 1888, against Jules Quesnel, collector on the Chambly Canal, at St. Johns? 2. If so, what was the character of the complaint? 3. What was the kind of security given by the said Jules Quesnel? 4. What are the duties of his office?

Mr. COSTIGAN. There is no record on the books of the department of any complaint by Mr. Black, or any other person, against J. Quesnel. The security given by Mr. Quesnel, as collector of canal tolls and of hydraulic rents, was a bond, dated 18th March, 1879, for $2,000, by the Citizens' Insurance Company. Afterwards, on the 17th April, 1882, he gave the personal bond of Charles Arpin, for $1,000, and of George C. Futvoye, for $1,000. These were replaced on 1st May, 1885, by a bond of J. O'Cain, for $1,000, and of Joseph Simard, for $1,000, the latter being still in force.

PILOTS BELOW QUEBEC.

Mr. AMYOT asked, How much did each of the pilots for and below the harbor of Quebec receive for each season of navigation, from 1880 to 1888, both inclusive?

Mr. TUPPER. The pilots for and below the harbor of Quebec have received on an average from 1880 to 1888, inclusive, as follows: 1880, $680; 1881, $504; 1882, $602.60; 1883, $651.47; 1884, $549; 1885, $576; 1886, $581.50; 1887, $618.13; 1888, $520.23.

ST. CATHARINES MILLING AND LUMBERING COMPANY—COSTS AND CLAIMS.

Mr. LISTER asked, What amount has been paid by the Government, up to this date, on account of the costs incurred in the case of the "St. Catharines Milling and Lumbering Company" vs. "The Queen"? What will the total costs incurred by the company, in connection with this suit, amount to?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The amount paid so far for the costs of the company is $11,152.67; the amount paid to the London agents is $5,000. In regard to sums in connection with the case before the Privy Council, I am not aware what the total amount is, the bills not having been presented.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Is it the intention of the Government to pay the costs incurred by the Government of Ontario, on behalf of the Province, in the case of the "St. Catharines Milling Company" vs. "The Queen?" Has the "St Catharines Milling Company" made any demand upon the Government for indemnity, on account of losses incurred through the failure of the federal authorities to maintain them in possession of the limits upon which the said company were licensed to cut timber, or on any other account? If so, what is the amount of such claim?

Mr. DEWDNEY. It is not the intention of the Government to pay the costs incurred by the Government of Ontario on behalf of the Province, except those which were awarded by the court. Information has been given to me by Mr. Ferguson, the solicitor of the St. Catharines Milling Company, that a claim will be made, but no official demand has been made on the Government.

FORTIFICATIONS AT ESQUIMALT.

Mr. PRIOR asked, Have the Government ever applied to the Imperial authorities for a copy of Colonel O'Brien's report on the fortifications necessary at Esquimalt, British Columbia? Have the Government ever received such report?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In the absence of my hon. colleague, I beg to say that no application to the Imperial authorities for a copy of Colonel O'Brien's report for the fortifications necessary at Esquimalt, British Columbia, has emanated from the Department of Militia and Defence. The Department of Militia and Defence has never received such report.

BUOYS AND LIGHTS AT LAKE ST. JOHN.

Mr. COUTURE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to provide buoys and lights, for the protection of steamers navigating Lake St. John?

Mr. COSTIGAN.

Mr. TUPPER. Some time ago the Government were waited upon by two influential deputations from the district concerned, and this subject was pressed upon the attention of the Government. Since then the subject has received, and is now receiving, the careful consideration of the department.

BUOYS AND LIGHTS ON SAGUENAY RIVER.

Mr. COUTURE asked, What amount has been paid to Mr. Ainsworth Sturton, as keeper of buoys and lights on the River Saguenay, for the year 1888-89, and whether other sums have been paid to him, in the form of repairs to buoys, or otherwise, and to what amount?

Mr. TUPPER. $250 were paid on 19th February last to A. Sturton for maintaining buoys, receiving stores and delivering supplies to lighthouses during the year on the River Saguenay, that being the amount of his contract. No money was paid him for repairs to buoys or for other services.

HYDROGRAPHIC SURVEY OF LAKE ST. JOHN.

Mr. COUTURE (translation) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make a hydrographical survey of Lake St. John, and also a marine chart, with the purpose of facilitating the navigation of the lake—which will have for a result the colonisation of the north shore of the said Lake St. John? If so, will the operations be begun this summer, as being the most favorable season for this purpose?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) In answer to the hon. gentleman, I may state that it is not the intention of the Government to have that survey made at present.

TIGNISH BREAKWATER.

Mr. PERRY asked. Has the Department of Public Works given instructions to repair the Tignish breakwater, Prince Edward Island? If so, is the work to be let by tender? If not, under whose management are the repairs to be made?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Instructions have been given to repair the Tignish breakwater, Prince Edward Island, by day work. The work has not yet been commenced, but at the proper time a clerk of works will be appointed.

MIMINEGASH BREAKWATER.

Mr. PERRY asked. Have instructions been given to repair the breakwater at Miminegash, Prince Edward Island? If so, who is the person acting as superintendent over said work?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No instructions have been given to that effect.

DUTY ON PORK.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin) asked, Is it the intention of the Government, during the present Session, to increase the duty on pork?

Mr. FOSTER. That question is of the same nature as the one asked by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), and it is of such a kind as to be inadvisable to answer it.

MENNONITE IMMIGRANTS.

Mr. CARLING moved that the House resolve itself into Committee, to-morrow, to consider the following resolution:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the amount due on certain loans, amounting in the aggregate to $96,400, made to Mennonite immigrants on the security of members of that community resident in the Province of Ontario, under the authority of the Act 38 Victoria, chapter 3, should be computed as though the interest stipulated in the agreements relating to such loans had been four per cent. simple interest, instead of six per cent. compound interest, and that payment in full may be accepted on the basis of such computation.

Motion agreed to.

ENQUIRIES.

Mr. DAVIN. I should like the Minister of the Interior to state when we may expect the Bills dealing with the North-West—the North-West Territories Bill, and the Bill to amend the Dominion Lands Act. It is now almost in fœci sessionis.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I hope to be able to bring them down in the course of a day or two.

Mr. McMULLEN. When may we expect that the Government will lay on the Table the original cheques connected with the St. Catharines Milling and Lumber Company?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I will enquire into the matter.

SUPPLY—LOAN OF 1888.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, my duty on the present occasion is of a somewhat disagreeable character. I would myself have very greatly preferred that the view expressed by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech as to the character of the late 3 per cent. loan should have proved the correct one, and I make that statement not entirely from the regard I entertain for the hon. gentleman and the Government, but because I feel that the transaction, if I understand it correctly, is not one which will redound to the honor and credit of the people of Canada. So far as I can understand, a very great blunder has been committed, and a perfectly needless risk has been incurred as to which no sort of adequate explanation has been offered, or, I believe, can be offered. It is but just to the Minister of Finance to say that he is only in the slightest degree, if at all, responsible for the original inception and management of this loan. I think, Sir, that he was appointed Minister of Finance on the 28th day of May last, and that the prospectus of this loan was issued in London on the 9th of June, and apparently Sir Charles Tupper, while still Minister of Finance, had left this country with full power to negotiate this loan; therefore, although it is true that the hon. gentleman, being Minister of Finance at the time, is legally and technically responsible, I must say that I do not consider he is morally responsible for this loan at all. It was carried through by our High Commissioner, who took all the credit, and on whose shoulders, therefore, the chief responsibility must rest. Under these circumstances, and when the particulars of this transaction were brought to the notice of our present Minister of Finance a few days ago, apparently for the first time, I think he would have been well advised to have admitted frankly that a grave error had been committed, and to promise that he would do his best to remedy it, if indeed it can be remedied. But the hon. gentleman took another course; he has preferred to defend and to justify this loan, and he has even endorsed it a second time, having endorsed it already in his budget speech. Under these circumstances it becomes our duty to investigate the whole matter connected with this loan in some detail. In the first place, I would, however, like to call the attention of the House, to two points First of all, I may warn them that the term "prospectus," in itself, is apt to be rather misleading. We are accustomed to associate the word "prospectus" with a sort of manifesto rather remarkable for picturesqueness, than for strict accuracy of detail, such as is often put out by commercial companies who desire to attract subscribers. I believe, Sir, that of late, the courts, and notably the English courts, have treated prospectuses with much more severity than heretofore, but, be that as it may, there can be no doubt whatever of this fact, that a loan prospectus, issued by a Government, in order to obtain subscribers to a loan, is a document of a very formal and binding character. It is, in fact, a statement on the part of the Government, of the terms and conditions upon which it proposes to borrow money, and according to all the customs of the Stock Exchange, and, I believe, according to the law of England as well, every statement made in the prospectus is of a stringent and binding character, and must be strictly interpreted. The other point to which I would call the attention of the House is this: I do not believe that this is a case in which we can place much dependence on any opinion that may be expressed based on the experience of other loans, and for this simple reason, that I believe, that in this loan we are engaging in a totally novel experiment, the like of which, so far as I know, has never been had recourse to by any other Government under the sun, for the purpose of floating a loan, and I strongly suspect that, when this experiment is played out, that it never will be had recourse to again by any other Government.

Mr. EDGAR. Or by this Government, either.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Now, the main question which the House has got to decide is a very simple one, and it is a question which requires no special financial experience to deal with. The question is one which any business man in this House, or any man of business outside of this House, can answer for himself, without one moment's hesitation, and it is this: Was it, or was it not, a wise and prudent transaction on the part of the Government, for the purpose of floating a 3 per cent. loan, having fifty years to run, to pledge itself to purchase back that loan within the space of ten years, by nearly equal instalments, and, presumably, at a high premium. That is one question, and it is the main question which I shall submit for your consideration to-day. There are other questions of a more intricate character connected herewith; there are the questions of what the ultimate, or probable loss may be, and how far, and under what possible circumstances the Government of Canada is justified in attempting to repudiate an obligation which it has entered into. These questions, I say, involve considerations of a much more complicated character, and with respect to them, there is, no doubt, room for a considerable difference of opinion, but as to the main facts, there is, happily, no material difference. I have here the official statement of the hon. Minister, made in his budget speech, with regard to the terms of the loan, in which he informs the House that about the 10th or 12th of June last, he effected a loan in London, at the rate of 3 per cent., having fifty years to run, without any sinking fund attached to it, and that for that loan he obtained on the average a rate of £95 1s. sterling. Sir, had the fact been as the hon. gentleman stated, had he been correct really as he was technically in saying that there was no sinking fund attached to it, I admitted then, and I repeat the admission now, that the loan would have been a very excellent transaction, and would have justified all the eulogiums that the hon. gentleman passed upon it. Unfortunately, although it is quite true that there was no special sinking fund attached to it, I discovered, on examining the prospectus, that although there was no particular and special sinking fund mentioned, there was the equivalent of twenty sinking funds attached to it under a very remarkable clause in the prospectus, to which I will call your attention. In the prospectus issued by Messrs. Baring and Glyn, under the express authority of the High Commissioner, and of the Minister of Finance, they stated:

"With a view of rendering the sinking funds of the various loans more effective than heretofore, the Canadian Government intend to apply the sums annually required for the reduction of the National Debt in purchases of the stock now offered. The amount at present annually applied to the redemption of the debt is about £350,000 sterling, and as the sinking funds are accumulative the amounts yearly increase."

Now, I have examined this prospectus carefully, I have looked over the bond attached to it, and neither in the one nor in the other can I discover the slightest words of limitation; the slightest thing in either the prospectus or the bond which in any way modifies or relieves us from the obligation which that clause imposes upon us. The House will probably understand how important that provision is when I tell them that if they will take the trouble to examine the various prospectuses and the various bonds which have been issued for all the various loans made by Canada since 1867, it will be found that in all cases (excepting these loans guaranteed by the Imperial Government, who took care of their own sinking funds) it will be found that in all other cases words of limitation are most carefully inserted. They will find that in the loans of 1874, 1875, 1876, 1878, 1879 and 1885—in the case of every one of these there is inserted in the prospectus, and, I believe, also in the bond attached, the following clause:—

"A cumulative sinking fund of not less than one-half per cent. per annum will be employed in the purchase of the bonds or stock of the loan at or below par, the Government reserving the right to invest the sinking fund in other securities if the price of the loan should be above par."

Now, the House and the Government will note—because this is a matter of first-rate importance—that in all other cases in which we have had a sinking fund established—although that sinking fund is infinitesimal as compared with the huge amount devoted to the repurchase of this loan—words of limitation are most carefully introduced into the propectus, and, I believe, are afterwards, in all cases, incorporated in the bond. Under these circumstances, my contention is that the Government of Canada has bound itself, by the phrases used in this unhappy clause in the prospectus of the loan of 1888, to such an extent that whereas we thought we had borrowed at 3 per cent., repayable in fifty years, what we have really done is this: we have made a loan nominally for fifty years, but that loan, by express provision in our own prospectus, we have bound ourselves to repurchase probably in ten nearly equal annual instalments, thereby, in all likelihood, compelling ourselves to repurchase our own loan at a high premium, and practically converting it from a fifty years' loan to a five years' loan. That is my contention. In reply, what has the Minister of Finance to say? In order to give the hon. gentleman all possible opportunity to consider this question, so that he might not be taken unawares, I addressed to him, about a week ago, a question as to what the intentions of the Government were in the event of this loan going above par; and to that question the hon. gentleman replied as follows:—

"The Government considers that the language used in the prospectus of the 3 per cent. loan recently negotiated in London, whereby it is declared that 'The Canadian Government intend to apply the sums annually required for the redemption of the national debt in purchases of the stock now offered,' requires them to use the sinking funds therein referred to in the purchase of the said 3 per cent. loan, in case the said securities should be held at a premium at the time of purchase, unless such premium is considered unreasonable and produced by unfair competition."

Upon that, as the House will remember, I felt it my duty to make a statement in my place, embodying substantially the contention which I have just explained. The hon. Finance Minister, having taken time to consider, about three days afterwards replied as follows—I will give all the essential parts of his reply, in order that I may not by any chance misrepresent him:—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

"Having stated so much as regards the considerations which make it necessary for us to buy a large amount for our sinking fund, a practice we have pursued heretofore, the intention expressed by the Government, and which was simply an expression of intention, does not bind the Government, in any case, if it be seen there is an unreasonable appreciation. I think it is sufficient to state this fact, which is stronger than any fancies we may indulge in with reference to the future. We have been buying out of that stock from the 1st of July of the current year. We have bought over $1,000,000 of that stock, and so far from there being any undue appreciation of the price or any evidence at all of putting up the price, we have bought at a lower price than we received for the loan, £95. We bought, for instance, on the 1st of July, 1888, at 94 5/16, 94 1/4 and 9 5/8 On the 1st of October, we bought at 92 3/4; that is net, taking into account accrued interest. On November 1st, we bought at 93 3/4, and on the 1st of December at 92 3/4. That, I think, shows that there is not very much to be apprehended in the way of undue appreciation of these stocks. * * * I think this is sufficient to make as a statement at present, and I may, in conclusion, state my own opinion, and the opinion of the officers of my department, who are careful, and, I think, thorough men, that, taking all things into consideration, there is no ground for the alarm which was rather foreshadowed by my hon. friend, and no ground for the possible conclusion which was also foreshadowed by my hon. friend, that this may prove an unremunerative and costly loan. Taking it all in all, I believe it can be fairly maintained that it is the best loan we have yet put upon the British market."

Now, Sir, with respect to that, I beg to state, that that is an explanation which really explains nothing. The hon. gentleman does not deny the facts which I have adduced, nor could he deny them. What he has done, has been to introduce a new element of complication into this matter, as to which I shall have one or two words to say presently. Reduced to its simplest expression, what the hon. gentleman tells us is this: First, that he hopes and prays, and apparently his department hope and pray, that no harm will come from this transaction; next, that he proceeds to argue, on very unsound premises, as it appears to me, that no harm can come of it; and, lastly, that he is prepared to repudiate our own obligation if harm does come. Sir, I proceed to analyse the hon. gentleman's arguments in detail. As to the first, it is not easy for me to say much. I also hope, against hope I fear, that no harm will come of this transaction. Possibly, Sir, the chapter of accidents, or Providence, may interfere to save us; but I will remind the hon. gentleman, that the age of miracles is past, and that it is not usual for Providence to interfere to save either men or Governments from the consequences of their own gross negligence or folly. However, we will let that pass. I come to the second plea, that, in the opinion of the hon. gentleman, no harm is likely to come, or, indeed, can come, and the reason he gives is somewhat remarkable. He tells us that no harm is likely to come in the future because he has succeeded in purchasing a considerable quantity of this stock at or below the price we obtained for the loan in open market. Sir, I am afraid that the hon. Finance Minister—it is no discredit to him, because he is as yet a young Finance Minister—has not fully comprehended the ordinary course of business on the stock exchange or the London market. It takes some time for a loan of £4,000,000 sterling to find its way into the hands of permanent holders or investors. While that process is going on, there is generally a considerable amount of the loan lying loose in the hands of the middlemen, who, being sometimes compelled to sell, are often willing to part with the loan for one or two per cent. less than they gave for it. That is a thing of constant occurrence. I remember very well, in floating the first 4 per cent. loan in 1874, that that state of things lasted, to the best of my recollection, for eighteen months or nearly two years. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman will permit me to tell him that the fact that in the first six or nine months he has succeeded in picking up a couple of hundred thousand pounds of this loan at reduced prices, affords no criterion whatever as to the position in which he will find himself a little later on. The hon. gentleman I suppose is aware that we have two descriptions of stocks and securities. We have inscribed stocks, and we have also bonds. He knows also, no doubt, that that portion which is inscribed is almost invariably strongly held by permanent investors. It does not follow that the amount which remains outstanding in bonds is not strongly held by permanent investors, for it often happens that they prefer to keep these stocks in the shape of bonds rather than inscribe them. But my point is this, and the hon. gentleman will do well to attend to it. The hon. gentleman may lay it down as a certain fact, as a foregone conclusion, that the stock which is inscribed has gone mainly into the hands of permanent investors. If the hon. gentleman will look at Wettenhall's list, which is the best authority on the subject, he will find the list shows that already, in the space of nine months, £1,200,000 stg., or very nearly one-third of the loan, has been put on the inscribed list and has been converted from bonds into inscribed stock. He may, therefore, consider most of that withdrawn from the open market and gone into the hands of men who propose to hold it for permanent investment. Let him consider what his position in two years hence will be. By that time, at least one-half, and probably more than one half of the stock, will be in the hands of permanent investors who will not be at all disposed to part with it without great inducement. Under the arrangement we have made, we will be the proprietors, in two years from date, of nearly one-third of the stock, and there will remain practically available to trade on between £700,000 and £800,000 sterling in the ordinary open market. It does not require to be a financier of experience to see that if he is compelled under those circumstances to purchase, or if the trustees of the sinking fund are compelled to order purchases to the extent of £100,000, when there are only £800,000 practically available to be purchased, the remainder being in the hands of permanent investors or of the Government itself for sinking fund account, such an order would inevitably raise the price of the stock in the market probably by many points. Therefore, I think we may dismiss the argument that no harm can happen to us in the future, because in the first few months we have succeeded in purchasing this stock at or below the price paid to us for it. As for the opinion of the officers of the Finance Department, no doubt it is entitled to all due respect, but I beg to remind the House that this is a case to which their experience will afford no parallel. Never before has the experiment been tried, never I hope again will it be tried, of floating a loan with a 10 per cent. sinking fund attachment to it. But there is a more important question than this to be discussed. The hon. gentleman, in the few words that he proposes to add to the prospectus, has raised a question of the most delicate and difficult character. He has opened up, I must say, a vista of complications. The hon. gentleman tells us that the Government is not bound to purchase if it be seen that there is an unreasonable appreciation, and he further tells us there will be no difficulty in deciding what is an unreasonable appreciation. Well, I take issue with the hon. gentleman on both points. The hon. gentleman ought to remember that there are two parties in every bargain. He ought to remember that there is on the one side the men who have purchased and who now hold this stock, backed by the Stock Exchange, the most powerful financial corporation in the world, and on the other, there is the Canadian Government. But the Canadian Government have not got the sinking fund under their own exclusive control. They appoint one trustee, but there is another trustee whom they do not appoint. And these two gentlemen are bound to administer the sinking fund, not in accordance with the dictates of the Finance Minister of Canada, but in accordance with the terms of their trust, in accordance with the law, and, to some extent, in accordance with custom; and the hon. gentleman will find that, so far from being an easy matter, it is going to be a very difficult matter, indeed, to repudiate this obligation, even supposing that he was justified in his contention that the Government could repudiate an obligation of this kind because it proved inconvenient to discharge it. Allowing that, for the sake of argument, the hon. gentleman will find that it is an exceedingly difficult matter to decide what is an unreasonable premium. Let me give an illustration in point. In 1876 we floated a 4 per cent. loan at 91. Five years later, in the early part of 1882, that loan was rated from 104 to 106, through the natural operation of the market, aided, perhaps, by the very minute sinking fund attached to it. Therefore, in those five years, that stock had risen 14 or 15 points, and, according to the statement of the hon. gentleman himself, in eleven years that stock was re-purchased at 114, having risen 23 points. Now, will the hon. gentleman, before this debate closes, tell the House what he would consider an unreasonable appreciation? Will he tell the House how he means to decide, whether this stock has reached an unfair and unreasonable position in the market, or not? It is of the first importance that he should do so, and I invite his special and particular attention to that point. I may also point out that it is not sufficient for him or for anybody else to presume that money, which has been falling for some years back, will now, to suit his convenience, cease to fall. We have seen, in a very few months, some very remarkable transactions. We know that the United States 4 per cents., payable in 1907, having barely eighteen years to run, are to-day quoted on the London Stock Exchange at 131. He will thus see that those bonds scarcely average 2½ per cent. to-day. I noticed the other day in the Monetary Times the statement, which I confess surprised me, that the State of Massachusetts, one of the states of the Union, had floated a loan of a little less than a million dollars—a 3 per cent. loan having thirteen years to run—at 108 50. In other words, the State of Massachusetts had floated it at a rate of interest which only affords the holders two nine sixteenths per cent., or a very small fraction over two one-half per cent. The hon. gentleman must also know that, under the recent operations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the 3 per cent. consols are to be converted into ½ per cents., which will probably become, in the future, the standard of value in the English market. There is another important consideration that must not be lost sight of. The hon. gentleman, by his own action, is largely estopped from taking up the position he desires to take. The fact is, that by virtue of this extraordinary clause in the prospectus, we have received a considerably larger sum for the loan than we had really the right to expect to obtain. I do not believe that our 3 per cent. loan would have obtained as high a price as it did by several points, were it not for this clause. Under those circumstances, with what show of justice are we going to back out of the agreement which our agents and High Commissioner deliberately made? The hon. gentleman may reply that monstrous cases may arise. That is most true. Very monstrous cases may arise. I will not say that cases may not arise in which, however reluctantly, however it may go against the grain of honorable men, we might not be obliged to repudiate, to a certain extent, that agreement. I will not take that position; but I call the hon. gentleman's attention to this: It is most true, under that clause, that monstrous cases may arise; and, therefore, that probability should have been guarded against in the strongest possible manner. Have I not called the attention of the House to the fact that, even in the case of the trifling, insignificant sinking fund of half of one per cent., where only 1-200th part was to be redeemed, words of limitation have always been inserted in order to guard against just such evils as this. There are two ways in which that might have been done. The hon. gentleman, or rather his agents, could have provided that the loan should be redeemed by drawings—that is, as I suppose the hon. gentleman is aware, by a sort of lottery, by which, when the bonds come to par, they are drawn for, and those which are selected are paid off—or, he might have provided by introducing words of limitation such as those which have been introduced in every other loan which we have made since 1867, having a sinking fund attached, and not being guaranteed by the Imperial Government. The House must remember that we put this loan on the market at 92½ per cent., and that we got in many cases 3 per cent. more than our minimum. We got on the average £2 11s. more than the minimum which was fixed. The hon. gentleman knows that the custom is to fix the minimum at a rate only a few shillings under the amount you expect to obtain. It is quite clear that this loan was largely appreciated owing to the existence of this most remarkable clause. It is quite clear that the twelve millions tendered for this loan were put in largely by reason of this clause. Now, the Stock Exchange, when the hon. gentleman desires to introduce these words of limitation, will say to him—and I do not see how he, or any Canadian Minister, is going to answer them—You, for your own purposes, chose to take this means of floating your loan for more than it was worth; you took your profit; now take your risk. Now, what is the answer to all this? Let the hon. gentleman remember that this prospectus of ours has been scattered broadcast all over the United Kingdom. I have here, furnished by the hon gentleman himself, a list of some fifty newspapers of very wide circulation, in every one of which this prospectus has been inserted; and the hon. gentleman must remember that the words of a prospectus cannot be trifled with, that the prospectus is a very stringent and binding proposal, and that the prospectus must be lived up to. More than that, I say it is far better that we should sustain a heavy loss than that Canada should lightly or heedlessly repudiate her engagements. There might be a point at which the line would have to be drawn, but how is the hon. gentleman going to say what premiums are unfair? He cannot be sure that the premiums are raised through a combination. He would have to establish the existence of the combination. The price may go up, and naturally will go up. It is the natural result of our own act, and how can we, how can he, how can any man expect to escape penalty for the act which we deliberately committed, and from which we have in the first instance profited? Now, I return to my original contention, and I say that the terms of this clause bind us to purchase the four millions in ten annual instalments of £100,000 apiece. So far as the Dominion of Canada is concerned, you have practically converted your fifty year loan into a five year loan, and I say also that, although the effect may not be apparent at this instant, the price is certain te be raised, and to be raised soon. Let the hon. gentleman wait until that loan has had time to crystalise, that is, to get into the hands of permanent investors, and then, if he has not been able to take any effective precautions before, he will find that these results, which I have pointed out to him, must necessarily and inevitably follow. It appears to me, under these circumstances, that the best that could happen would be this: We may be able to buy back this loan, if we are lucky, at an average of par. I call the attention of the hon. gentleman to this. If we have to repurchase that loan in ten instalments, that is practically equivalent to a rate of interest of 4¾ per cent., nearly 5 per cent. And I make it out in this way. We have been obliged to pay nearly 2 per cent. in the way of commissions, brokerage and incidental expenses, I think 1¾ per cent. is the actual amount. So on the hypothesis of buying back at par, we will lose 6¾ per cent. on the whole transaction, and, as it has only five years to run, you may add something like 1½ per cent. per annum to the 3¼ per cent. which we have to pay as ordinary interest, making the cost of the loan until the whole is re-purchased 4¾ per cent., and that at a time when ordinary Canadian municipalities can and do borrow money freely at 4 and 3½ per cent. Sir, there is one chance, and, as far as I see, one chance only, such as it is. Instead of the rate of interest falling, it may, peradventure, rise. It is possible that a great European war may break out at any time within ten years, and, in that case, if interest were to rise, although we would lose just as much in reality, the result would not be so apparent. The consequence of this enormous sinking fund would be to buoy up our loan, not to send it to a high premium, which would be the result of a fall in interest. What would be the result to us in that case? The result would be that our other securities would fall, and thus the hon. gentleman or the trustees of the sinking fund might have to buy in a 3 per cent. loan at par when they could purchase our 4 per cent securities at the same rate. That is a point which the hon. gentleman, if he bases any expectations on the fall of interest, should bear in mind. The risks we have run are self-evident, and are two-fold. First, when the prospectus was put out, there was the utmost temptation offered to speculators on the Stock Exchange to form a syndicate to get control of a large portion of the stock, and then to hold us to the prospectus. Perhaps that was attempted to be done at or about the time the loan was issued. I have some reason to believe that the attempt was made and failed. When I first saw the hon. gentleman's prospectus, when I first became acquainted with the existence of this remarkable clause, I at once communicated with a friend of mine in London whom I knew to be versed in the mysteries of the Stock Exchange. Within the last day or so, I have received from him a communication in which he tells me that such an attempt was actually made, that a syndicate was formed at the time of the issue of that prospectus with the design of getting control of a large amount of the loan; but, fortunately for us, though no thanks for that to our High Commissioner, the design was baffled by the accident that these gentlemen had not anticipated that the loan would go to so high a premium, and they lost their chances by bidding a few shillings too low. I am inclined, therefore, to think that that particular peril may have passed away for the time, though the hon. Minister will do well to bear in mind there is no warranty that gentlemen now holding the stock may not have combined already, or may not choose hereafter to combine for the express purpose of using this clause and getting the advantage of the premium to which our sinking fund operations will inevitably force the loan. But, Sir, that is not the most serious side of the question. I told the hon. gentleman that his real trouble would come when the bulk of this loan fell into the hands of permanent investors. Now, that the hon. gentleman may understand that I am not speaking at random when I tell him that there is great probability that within a few years the bulk of this loan will be held by permanent investors, I would call his attention, and the attention of the House, to the following facts: We issued a five million loan at 3½ per cent. in 1884, I think, or 1885. I find that of this five millions £4,468,000 are now held in inscribed stock, and, presumably, by permanent investors. I find that of our four million loan, issued a short time ago, about three millions are likewise held by permanent investors; I find that of our other loans a large proportion are held in inscribed stocks, which are well understood to be held, for the most part, by permanent investors. Now, the hon. gentleman and the House are perfectly aware of this fact: When moneys are taken by trustees and placed in particular stocks, or when they are taken and held for purposes of permanent investment, such persons, as a rule, are very difficult to disturb, such investments will not put their stock on the markets lightly. They require to be tempted by a high premium, and they demand a considerable additional price for the disturbance and the inconvenience of looking out for new investments. Therefore, it is a very serious consideration indeed that a large proportion of our other stocks have gone, and presumably a large percentage of this stock will go, and is going, into the hands of men who hold them permanently. Of course a sufficiently large premium will tempt them out, but they are not going to put their stock on the markets to suit our convenience, and the operations of our sinking fund investment will tend every month, every quarter, to strip the market bare as bare can be of the ordinary loose stock which, under ordinary circumstances, will seek for purchasers there. Sir, I find it difficult to understand how so utterly absurd a transaction should have been concurred in by the gentlemen whose names I see appended to that prospectus. Here we have a sinking fund of 10 per cent. per annum attached to a loan which has fifty years to run. Why, Sir, it is enough to buy the whole loan half-a-dozen times over. An ordinary sinking fund is so proportioned that at the very outside, in thirty or fifty years it may have to run, it will barely amount to the sum total of the original loan. But here we have a sinking fund twenty-fold as large as an ordinary sinking fund, and while the ordinary percentage attached to all our other loans is one-half of 1 per cent., we have a sinking fund of 10. An ordinary sinking fund attached to such a transaction as this, would be £20,000 and no more. We have a sinking fund begining at £350,000, going up in these 10 years to £472,000, averaging more than twenty times the sinking fund ordinarily attached. Sir, I am not going to spend any time over the silly pretext that it was necessary to do this to make our sinking fund more effective. Why, Sir, we were perfectly at liberty to use our sinking fund in buying this stock without giving any pledge at all, and so there was no necessity for doing this. Suppose you did want, for reasons of finance, to appreciate the 3 per cent. loan; we had full power in our own hands to use the whole of this £350,000 for it. It was the greatest absurdity and the greatest folly to go and tie ourselves up and bind ourselves to do it. I say that the negligence is little short of criminal; I say that the Minister of Finance owes it to himself, owes it to this House, to demand explanations about this matter, and in particular to demand, although it be an unusual thing, that under these circumstances the agents should give to him, and he should lay before the House, the names of every man who originally applied for this stock, the names of every man who received an allotment of this stock, the names of every man, so far as he can find, who now holds this stock, and the amounts they respectively applied for, subscribed to, or held. That I demand of him, and I think the common sense of this House and of the country will sustain my demand. Now, Sir, it is clear we will probably lose the sum of £200,000; that is to say, on the assumption that we get this stock at or about par. Be that as it may, the stock will soon become exceptionally scarce in any case, and I know transactions in Canadian stocks usually are few, as the hon. gentleman can see by examining the bonâ fide transactions recorded in the Stock Exchange list. Here we are practically placed at the mercy of parties who can make their own terms with us, which terms we cannot refuse to accept without repudiation, without denying the obligations we ourselves entered into. I regret exceedingly that agents of the character of Barings and Glyn should be mixed up with this transaction. I would be glad if they could afford any explanation; I would be glad to find that they have remonstrated with our High Commissioner; I would be glad to find, though the hon. gentleman did not say so, that they had communicated, as I think they ought to have communicated, specially with himself about this matter. I cannot, as at present advised, hold our financial agents in London altogether blameless. They receive from us the sum, I think, of £15,000 a year for managing our sinking funds and other investments. They made £40,000 sterling out of this identical loan, and I think they ought not to have allowed such a clause as that to be inserted Still, having regard for their high character, having regard to the fact that up to the present time, at any rate, there has been no ground to suspect our agents of permitting anything to be done detrimental to the interests of Canada, I will await, for my part, such explanations as they may have to offer. But I say that the youngest tyro in finance, the youngest bank clerk, the youngest clerk in the hon. gentleman's department, I say that any ordinary municipal officer, if it were only the treasurer of a township, would have known better than to allow such a clause as that to be inserted in a prospectus, to which his name was appended, applying for a loan. More, Sir, I say that the position, so far as Canada is concerned, involves loss and disgrace. Ruinous demands may possibly be made upon us, and what is our excuse for repudiating those demands? Our only valid excuse would be that the excessive folly or misconduct of our agents had involved us in an obligation which it was morally impossible that we could fulfil. Now, Sir, I put a possible case, a case which is not only possible, but which, if my information is correct, was within an ace of occurring. While we were enjoying a fool's paradise over here, while we were congratulating ourselves on the high position of Canadian credit, while we were declaring from one end of the country to the other that no such loan had ever been negotiated before, let the hon. gentleman consider what his position would have been if a syndicate had been formed in London which had got control of, say, two millions of that stock. Why, Sir, under this arrangement, in four years from this present moment, we would have been obliged to buy in all the remainder of the stock, and we would have been confronted with a determined and powerful body of creditors controlling every penny, every pound, of the remaining stock. The hon. gentleman says that it would be a very easy matter under such circumstances to prove a fraud. I doubt that exceedingly; I think the hon. gentleman would find, if such men had played their part with any ordinary prudence, the mere natural operation of this great sinking fund requiring to be invested from year to year would force the stock to an abnormally high figure, and it would be the hardest thing in the world for him or anybody else to prove conspiracy. Now let us see what our position would be in such a case. Recollect that every 5 per cent. that this stock rises, will cost us about a million dollars. If the stock gets to par and we repurchase it at that figure, we lose one million; if it gets to 105, we lose two millions; if it gets to 110, we lose three; if it gets to 115, and, as I have shown, our 4 per cent. stock rose to 114 from purely natural causes, we would lose four millions in repurchasing it. The hon. gentleman may ask, do I say that we should pay such prices? Well, Sir, I reserve my opinion. This loan is not of my making, this had no sanction of mine, nor ever would it have had. The question has got to be answered by the Minister himself; it is for him to say what is to be done in such a case. And remember, although it has not occurred, although as I believe by lucky accident it was prevented from occurring, it is a case which may occur at any time and the hon. gentleman may find himself called upon to deal with it. That is what we are exposed to under this clause, if I read it aright; and I ask, if so, what do these parties deserve? The thing is so obvious, the neglect of the plainest precautions is so glaring, the consequences which may flow are so grave, that the Minister of Finance for the first time in Canadian history has had to rise in his place and to threaten that if he found it inconvenient he would repudiate our formal obligation.

An hon. MEMBER. Never.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I hope not. But, at the same time, I cannot but see that circumstances may arise in which it may be difficult for the strongest purist to say that the Minister of Finance was called upon to carry out to the letter the terms of his prospectus. But, as regards the Minister of Finance, I admit that he was originally free from blame in this matter; he was hardly Minister of Finance for one hour, I may say, before this transaction was entered upon. All he deserves to be censured for is this: I think, bearing in mind his own position in this matter, that when he received the prospectus of the loan, he, as a man of intelligence and common sense, should have seen the possible consequences involved in it, and should have at once taken the earliest opportunity of protesting against it and of demanding explanations from our agents and from the High Commissioner; and had he done so, had he taken prompt action, it is possible a remedy might have been found. Now the position is very different. All the hon. gentleman has done is to introduce this new element of complication by declaring that the Government of Canada will not fulfil their obligation if the loan is unreasonably appreciated, a course which, as I have pointed out, may involve us in no end of difficulty and entanglement. It must be admitted that the real culprit with which this House has to deal is mainly the High Commissioner, and perhaps, in a secondary sense, our financial agents.

Mr. MITCHELL. He can stand it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps he can. What I believe has happened is this: I can fancy Sir Charles Tupper, in his usual reckless fashion, was determined to make this loan a wonderful success at any hazard, and he has done it. He did achieve a wonderful success for the time. This transaction has one merit. There is no doubt this transaction is perfectly unique; there is no similar case to this to be found in the whole annals of finance. Very strange expedients may have been had recourse to on the London Exchange to float a loan, but I will venture to say that not even Mexico, or Honduras, or the South American Republics, or Spain, or Greece, or Turkey, ever thought of the expedient which presented itself to our hon. High Commissioner. It was a stroke of genius, and, like all strokes of genius, it was wonderfully simple, too. I make the hon. Minister of Finance a present of the hon. gentleman's recipe for floating a 3 per cent. loan having fifty years to run. Nothing can be simpler. Promise to buy the loan back in ten annual instalments at a much higher premium than you get for it, and I will promise you will make the loan a success—for the time being. It is an instance of thoughtful economy entirely without parallel. Turning that affair over in my mind, I can think of but one illustration which would fairly meet the case. I remember some years ago hearing a story of an Irish butler who was urged by his master to be particularly careful with respect to a cask of very excellent small beer, and with thoughtful economy, only paralleled by this clause of ours, the butler put a hogshead of strong ale in the cellar on tap beside the cask of small beer, and he did succeed in prolonging the natural duration of the cask of small beer. I do not know whether Sir Charles Tupper has an Irish strain in his pedigree. I see that Her Majesty was lately persuaded to make him a baronet of the United Kingdon. I think Her Majesty, and I say it with all due respect, should have made him a baronet of the Green Isle pure and simple, more especially as the honor was conferred strictly "more Hibernico," because the hon. gentleman had failed to accomplish the negotiation he had engaged in. As to the amount of the loss: it is utterly impossible to say, unless the chapter of accidents come in to deliver the hon. gentleman, what the possible loss may be. If we are very lucky, I think we may escape with the loss of one million, that is, that we may repurchase our loan at par. But it is quite possible that the loss may reach two millions, three millions or four millions; and yet the hon. gentleman might find it a matter of exceeding difficulty to obtain any reasonable pretext for carrying out his threat of repudiation. As to the policy of repudiation, I hold it to be dubious to the last degree. I, for my part, would rather bear, and advise the hon. gentleman to bear, a very heavy loss, than allow it to be said that the Canadian Government, when they made a foolish bargain, would attempt to repudiate it. I doubt very much whether the hon. gentleman can repudiate it unless it goes to an exceedingly exorbitant and extortionate premium. But I entertain no doubt whatever that, unless some extraordinary circumstance occurs, the inevitable result of the operation which is prescribed for us by this prospectus, must be, and will be, to force our loan to a price far in excess of that which it would otherwise have obtained. And now I have a word to say to hon. gentlemen opposite. This is not a party question, and I appeal to hon. gentlemen whether, as sound business men, and as men having regard to the interests of the country, they will allow this transaction to be passed over in silence, unless some much better explanation be offered for it than has yet been submitted; and, when I say a better explanation, I may say that I would not be content, for my part, to accept an explanation resting on any ipse dixit either of our financial agent, or of the Finance Minister, or of the Finance Department. The explanation ought to show clearly and distinctly how, and on what ground, the hon. gentleman is prepared to establish that a particular premium is unreasonable, and how, and on what ground, he could defend the conduct of the Canadian Government in attempting to introduce into a clause like this, words of limitation, which, most undoubtedly, ought to have been there from the first, but which, for whatever reason, have, contrary to all precedent, contrary to all ordinary precaution, been omitted therefrom; and, in order that the House and the country may have an opportunity of passing judgment on this matter, I now beg to submit, for the consideration of the House, the following motion:—

That all the words after the word "That" be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof:

"Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be Resolved, That it appears, from the Public Accounts, and from statements made in the House by the Minister of Finance, and from the prospectus of the loan, that the Government of Canada placed a loan of £4,000,000 sterling on the London market, in the month of June, 1888.

"2. That the said loan bears interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, and is made repayable at the end of fifty years.

"3. That the said loan was sold at an average price of £95 1s.

"4. That while the said loan had no special sinking fund attached thereto, it is provided in the prospectus issued in connection therewith by Messrs. Barings and Glyn, the financial agents of the Government of Canada, that,

"'With a view of rendering the sinking funds of the various loans more effective than heretofore, the Canadian Government intends to apply the sums annually required for the reduction of the national debt in purchase of the stock now offered.

"'The amount at present annually applied to the reduction of the national debt is £350,000 sterling, and, as the sinking fund is accumulative, the amount yearly increases.'

"5. That the effect of the said clause is that the Canadian Government will be obliged, in order to comply with the obligation therein entered into on their behalf, to repurchase the entire loan of £4,000,000 sterling above mentioned in ten or more annual instalments, averaging £400,000 each.

"6. That the said loan will be thereby (as far as the Dominion of Canada is concerned) converted from a loan having (nominally) fifty years to run, into a loan having a little over five years to run.

"7. That all former unguaranteed loans, having sinking funds attached, contain a provision, inserted in the bond or prospectus (and usually in both), setting forth that the Government of Canada shall not be obliged to purchase said stocks on account of investment for sinking fund, if said stocks should raise above par.

"8. That neither the prospectus, nor the bond issued in connection with the three per cent loan of £4,000,000, contain any such provision.

"9. That the natural tendency of the existence of the obligation to apply a sinking fund of this magnitude to the purchase of a loan of £4,000,000 will be to raise the price of the said stock abnormally, and may result in the loss of a large sum to this country.

"10. That in any case the cost of the commission, brokerage and other charges incurred in negotiating the said loan, spread over a period of about five years, will add greatly to the rate of interest payable on the said loan.

"11. That, even if the said loan can be repurchased at an average of par, it will involve the payment of a rate in excess of the price obtained for the said loan which will make the annual charge for the said loan (till the same be repurchased), equal to a rate of interest of nearly five per cent. per annum, and will at best make the transaction unduly onerous to this country.

"12. That the said transaction is improvident and evidences negligence on the part of those charged with the interests of Canada in this matter."

Mr. FOSTER. I was disposed at first to sympathise with my hon. friend in the disagreeable duty which he has stated he had to perform in the House this afternoon, but as I did not notice any very great evidence of sadness or any feeling akin to that as the hon. gentleman proceeded, I withdrew my anticipated sympathy, although I must say that I have nothing to complain of my hon. friend in the tone and manner in which he has criticised this loan. He has very generously given me the opportunity to wash my hands clear of the larger measure of the responsibility incurred in the floating and management of the loan. I may say to him that I do not propose to take advantage of his generosity in that respect. The loan was made under this Government and when I was a member of this Government, it was made when I was Minister of Finance, the position I hold to-day, and the Government, as do I myself, as one of the members of the Government, hold themselves responsible for the loan, such as it has been put on the market. There is one thing, I think, that hon. gentlemen will have noticed during the address of my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and that is, the predominance in his address of that quality which he deprecated in advance with reference to what might be the possible nature of the reply that I should make to his criticism. He said that he would not be satisfied with any ipse dixit of the Minister of Finance, or with the ipse dixit of any person, but that he wanted something more than statement, he wanted actual proof. Now, if there was one thing which was prominent in the criticism of my hon. friend from the time that he commenced his speech until he sat down, it was the vein of supposition which ran through it all. His remarks were based upon what might be, and almost every argument that he adduced to this House was an argument founded on a probability in the hon. gentleman's own mind and not an argument founded on what he could state was the fact at present or would be fact in the future. I hold that what he requires in an explanation must be more strongly required in the charge, and he ought not to charge, and to base his arguments for this charge, on the mere possibility of what may happen and what just as possibly may not happen. In the first place, then, in reference to the manner of floating the loan, he blamed the financial agents to a certain extent. Well, Sir, the financial agents who were interested in the floating of this loan, were the very same financial agents who have been interested in the floating of loans for Canada for a number of years past, and, I believe, were the same who were interested in the floating of the loans of 1874, 1875 and 1876; and if my hon. friend will go back and refresh his memory a little as to what took place in 1876, in some rather memorable debates which took place in this House, he will find that when he supposed that members then in Opposition made an attack upon those agents or insinuated something in reference to their dealings, he rose in his place and indignantly repudiated on their behalf anything but honorable and fair and square dealing. They were the agents of Canada, he said, trusted by us, it was to their interest to perform that trust, and they were honorable men who would not advise what they did not consider to be for the best interests of Canada. Is it possible that those men have deteriorated since that time? I think not. I am willing to believe that they were honest agents then, and I am willing to believe that they were honest and reliable agents during the year 1888, and that the prospectus to which they appended their names, and the advice which they may have given in reference to that prospectus, were given honestly and honorably, and in the best interest of Canada. In reference to my friend's case, it depends wholly on the existence of an unqualified and absolute obligation; it falls to the ground, and falls to the ground utterly, unless it be a fact that we have entered into such obligation, and that we are bound to carry out that obligation. I think that my hon. friend will admit, and that hon. members on both sides of the House will admit, that unless that is established, his whole criticism falls to the ground, and that we are in the same position with regard to the loan of 1888 that we are in with regard to the other loans. Let us see what took place. My hon. friend referred to certain loans which were made before, and he named them to the House. I need not repeat them, but in all of those loans in which there was a sinking fund attached, two things took place. There was the issue of a prospectus, which expressed a general intention, and certain general conditions; but after the issue of the prospectus, which is not a legal obligation——

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is an obligation.

Mr. FOSTER. There came an obligation, in the form of the bond, which went to the financial world on the same page, and in the same advertisement, as the prospectus; and two things took place with reference to my hon. friend's loan, and every loan to which there was a sinking fund attached. For instance, here is the prospectus of the hon. gentleman's loan of 1875, one of the clauses of which is this:

"For the £1,000,000 Dominion 4 per cent. loan, a cumulative sinking fund of not less than one-half per cent. will be employed in the purchase of bonds or stocks of the loan at or below par, the Government reserving the right to invest the sinking fund in other securities, if the price of the loan should be above par."

Hon. gentlemen will see that that was an expression of intention. It is far more strong as an expression of fact than the clause in the prospectus of the loan of 1888, for it stated that the sinking fund would be so employed without a peradventure. But my hon. friend did not think that bound him; he did not think that was enough; and on the very same page of the prospectus, where there is always put the blank form of the bond, which every man looks at as well as at the prospectus, and which is the instrument which completed the bargain between himself and the Government, what did my hon. friend put? He put this:

"The principal and interest of the above sum are chargeable upon the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, under authority of the above Act, and a sum equal to one-half per cent. per annum of the principal sum of such portion of the aforesaid loan as may be issued, will be set apart and invested for the redemption thereof in the bonds or stock of this loan, if the price is at or below par, the Government of Canada reserving the right to invest the amount in other securities when the price of the loan is above par."

These are the two actions which took place with reference to the hon. gentlemen's loan, and with reference to all loans which have had a sinking fund. There was first the general expression of intention, more strong in the prospectus which I have read than in the prospectus of 1888; but that does not bind; that is not an obligation or stipulation; the obligation and stipulation are found in the bond, which is the instrument the man holds.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not by any means. That is wholly wrong.

Mr. FOSTER. And I may here ask, and I put it to my hon. friend, if it was not necessary to insert that in the bond, why did he put it in the bond? Why not put it simply in the prospectus? But he himself and his agents knew, and every man who floats a loan knows, that he must put it in the bond in order to make it an absolute obligation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, I distinctly deny the statement.

Mr. FOSTER. What statement do you deny?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That it was necessary to insert in the bond the stipulation contained in the prospectus.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, why did you put it in the bond in the case of every loan to which a sinking fund was attached?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will tell you, if you wish.

Mr. FOSTER. Now let me call my hon. friend's attention to the prospectus of the loan of 3 per cent. sterling bonds for £4,000,000, the minimum price of issue being 92½ per cent., which is the prospectus we are discussing with reference to the loan of 1888. This is the clause in it:

"With a view of rendering the sinking funds of the various loans more effective than heretofore, the Canadian Government intend to apply the sums annually required in the redemption of the national debt in purchases of the stock now offered. The amount at present annually applied to the redemption of the debt is about £350,000, and, as the sinking funds are accumulative, the amount yearly increases."

This is an expression of the intention of the Government; and I may state that that expression of intention followed in the very course of the practice of the Government for years, namely, that we have purchased exclusively out of our own bonds for sinking fund purposes; that we have purchased out of our low-priced bonds for a very evident reason, not because it was necessarily more profitable to purchase a bond below par for a sinking fund, as compared with a bond above par, but the great element of consideration which caused that course to be taken was this, that where you have a stock running below par, it is to the interest of the country to have that stock appreciated. If you issue a 3½ per cent. stock, as was the £5,000,000 loan of 1884, and if you place it at 91 or 92, it is to the interest of this country, looking to future loans which have to be put on the British market, looking to the best interests of Canada, to buy out of that stock for the sinking fund, because the steady purchase from the stock for the sinking fund helps to appreciate the value of that stock; and when you bring that up to par, and go again to float a loan on the British market, you go in on more favorable conditions, with a lower stock at par, and with the probability of getting a little above par when you put on a stock at the same rate per cent. It was following in the line of that practice, and it is a good practice on the part of this Government, that the prospectus stated that we should purchase out of this below par stock. We had no other below par stocks. The 3½ per cents. issued in 1884, below par, had gone above par, and our 4 per cents. were, of course, above par; and following the line of my hon. friend and the line of all Finance Ministers heretofore, it was stated that we would buy for sinking fund purposes out of this stock which was below par; and that expression of intention simply carried out the practice of the Government from Confederation to the present time. But alongside of that prospectus, and on the very same page in the advertisement, as is usual, was the form of the bond of the Canada 3 per cent. stock, and in that the simple clause which refers to this is not a clause which has any reference to sinking fund, not a clause which stipulates anything on the part of this Government with regard to sinking fund purchase, but is simply this: "The principal and interest on the above are chargeable upon the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada under the authority of the above Act." The obligation to buy for the sinking funds is not in the bond. There is no stipulation, and I stand here upon the ground, which is fair, honest and legal, that that statement of intention with reference to the matter in the prospectus—along side the form of the bond, which omitted all mention of it, and which can alone interpret the obligation and the stipulation—places us under no legal obligation, that we have entered into no stipulation to buy out these stocks for the sinking fund, no matter to what price they may go, and no matter what combinations may exist. If that ground is well taken, and I believe it is—I do not believe any honest, fair-minded man or any legal authority will say anything else—then the basis on which my hon. friend has founded his whole criticism has fallen to the ground, and his criticism falls with it. Let me put another case to my hon. friend. He dwells a great deal on the fact, that if we buy for the sinking fund out of these stocks, and if we buy up to the value of £350,000 or £400,000 per annum, whatever it happens to be, in ten years time we shall have exhausted the stock, and therefore the loan which was to have run fifty years will simply run barely ten years. This is the second great point of my hon. friend. Therefore, he said, where you thought you had bonds which were to run fifty years, you find at the end of ten years you have bought them all up. I put this case to my hon. friend. He would have found no fault, I suppose, if we had put on the market a 3 per cent. loan at 92½, and if it had been floated as successfully as this one or nearly so; and if, having to pay two million dollars each year for our sinking fund, instead of buying 4 per cents. at 110 or 112, and 3½ per cents. at 106 or 108, we had bought all the sinking fund securities out of this 3 per cent. stock. Would my hon. friend have found fault with that? Would any hon. gentleman who is listening to me have found fault with that? If he would, then he would have found fault with the practice followed by the financiers of Canada from 1868 to this time. Supposing that to be the case, and that there had been nothing mentioned in the prospectus at all with reference to the intention of the Government; supposing that the loan had been put on the market below par, and had remained a stock not above par for ten years, at the end of ten years buying on this principle, which is well approved, we would have exhausted the whole loan; and a loan which was to have run for fifty years, we would equally in this case have bought back in ten years. Therefore my hon. friend's criticism falls to the ground, unless he can show that we are obliged to pay an unreasonable amount for the stocks which we buy of these 3 per cents. Let us see what does happen when we have bought, for sinking fund purposes, at the rate of two million dollars per year, out of that stock, and at the end of ten years—leaving out the fact that this intention of the Government is not shown in the prospectus at all—have exhausted the stock for sinking fund purposes, and brought it to par. Has Canada lost anything? My hon. friend must recollect that when we give a bond of £100 for £95, we must pay £100 at the end of the time limit, and if we pay it before that limit is reached, we do not, therefore, lose the whole difference between the under par price at which we sold and the face of the bond, but only what that difference would be worth to us for the unexpired time of the loan. That is an element which must be taken into account as well. Suppose we have exhausted the loan at the end of ten years and have appreciated that stock to par, is that bound to be a loss to Canada? Not at all, because Canada will go upon the market for another loan, and not upon a market where she will have to take £95 for every £100, but where her stock has been appreciated up to par, partly through her own purchases, and when she puts on another loan at 3 per cent., instead of getting £95, she will get £100 or more. That is the compensation which comes to the country from the appreciation of the stock which is put upon the market below par and at a low rate of interest.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Aye, if the appreciation be a natural one, but not if it is caused by your having to buy the stock yourself.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend asks, how are you going to tell when there has been an undue appreciation or how prove conspiracy. I do not think that is a difficult matter. I say so with all deference, because my hon. friend has told the House that I am but young in the business, and he is a man experienced in these matters for a long period of years. But, I say, when my hon. friend quotes to me the prices or the variations upon the British market of the United States 4 per cents, when he tells me that Massachusetts has put on lately a 3 per cent. loan—state or municipal, I do not know—at a price above par, and then argues from these variations that it is impossible for us to tell when a particular stock of our country is unduly appreciated or not, I do not think my hon. friend is arguing on a right basis, but has taken the wrong ground of comparing things which are dissimilar. There may be differences between the United States and Canada which may affect the bonds of each in different ways. There may be differences between different states of the United States which may affect their bonds as compared with each other, but I hold, with regard to one country, with different issues of stock of that country running upon the market, it is not difficult to tell, comparing the one with the other, whether one has been unduly appreciated or not. My hon friend's argument is that we cannot tell whether it has or has not been unduly appreciated, but that it will be raised because of this prospectus clause, which he calls an obligation. I say, that it is an easy matter to tell whether there has been an undue appreciation or not. Take our 4 per cent. stocks, our 3½ per cent. stocks, and our 3 per cent. stocks; and I hold, that by comparing one of these three classes of stocks with the others, you can tell at once, whether in that particular stock there has or not been an undue appreciation. That is a proposition no man will pretend to deny. It will, therefore, be an easy matter to tell whether this stock has unreasonably appreciated, or whether or not it would be a profitable stock for us to buy. I do not think it is necessary for me to give a much more lengthy reply to my hon. friend. The whole thing rests upon his contention, that we entered into an obligation in the prospectus which is binding, and that it would be a repudiation if we did not carry it out. I say, there is no such obligation, but that we are required by the intention expressed in the prospectus to buy out of this low rate stock as has been our usual practice, and as is the best and most profitable for the country, and to continue this practice of buying out of stocks of our own, in order to appreciate those stocks, so long as they are unreasonably appreciated And we are not further bound by the expression in the prospectus to which there is no parallel in the bond. There being in the bond no stipulation whatever, and it being the bond which makes th e obligation, I say we are not bound to pay unreasonable prices for this, we are not bound to follow it if it unreasonably appreciates, by means of combination or the like of that. My hon. friend says this was a most absurd transaction, and he had a little facetious pleasantry—all to himself, I must say—in reference to the High Commissioner. The House did not seem to appreciate his jokes, I suppose because a financial subject is so dull and heavy a one that it seems out of place to joke about it. He said it was an absurd piece of business, almost a criminal piece of business on the part of the High Commissioner, the agents or the Government, and that it had no parallel. My hon. friend is not, it seems to me, in a position the most favorable to criticise what takes place with reference to loans and with reference to financial matters. My hon. friend has a financial history of his own. From 1874 to 1878, my hon. friend occupied this position upon the Treasury benches. He had to do with the British money market, and he put, I think, three several loans on that market; and he stands alone amongst Finance Ministers of this Dominion from 1868 to the present time, and I am sure he will occupy that unenviable notoriety of standing alone amongst Finance Ministers for all future time, in the method which he adopted in putting his loans on the British market. Let me call the attention of the House to those loans. There we e two loans made in 1868 and 1869, before my hon. friend came into the position of Finance Minister. When he came in as Finance Minister, he laid down this doctrine—I do not give the ipssima verba, but I give the sense of the hon. gentleman's doctrine—which was that there are only two cases in which we may venture to issue a loan by tender: first, if we have an Imperial guarantee, and second, if time or immediate success in the negotiation is a matter of indifference. My hon. friend was then trying to justify a departure which he made in the manner of floating a loan on the British market, and he laid down the doctrine that there are only two conditions under which you can afford to ask tenders for a loan—one, if you have an Imperial guarantee, and the other, if you do not care how much time is consumed or do not care particularly about the success of the negotiation. He stands alone in that view. When Sir John Rose made a loan in 1868, he asked for tenders and took the highest.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It was a guaranteed loan.

Mr. FOSTER. It being a guaranteed loan. When Sir Leonard Tilley, in 1883, asked for tenders for a loan, he did the same.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That was guaranteed.

Mr. FOSTER. Partly. My hon. friend came in 1874, and put a loan upon the market, and he fixed the price of that loan at 90, if I mistake not. He did not leave it open to tender. He made a departure entirely from what had been done before, and has been done thereafter. The hon. gentleman talks about losses. Let me remind him that, in that loan of his in 1874, which he refused to allow to go to a free tender on the market, there was a discount of £9 19s. 3d. on every bond he issued. That is, for every £100 which this country had to pay, my hon friend got into his hands £100 less £9 19s. 3d. My hon. friend will say that that was a special case, that it was when he wanted to put on the market a purely Canadian loan at 4 per cent and he had to break through old custom; that he had to put on an unguaranteed Canadian loan, and that, therefore, the discount would be higher. But let us come to two years later. Let us come to 1876, and my hon. friend did not then have to break the ice. He was going over to the British market, which was in a peculiarly favorable condition for the floating of a loan, with money in the banks to repletion, with the markets glutted, and with the condition of affairs so in other parts of the world that a stated and peaceable credit such as Canada had could command the attention of the people in the English market. At that time, when our 4 per cent. bonds were quoted on the market at from 92½ to 94, instead of asking for tenders, he made a fixed price of 91, which was less by 1, or 2, or 3 per cent. less than our 4 per cent bonds were quoted at on the market. What was the result? Taking even the times which he gave, which were exorbitant, giving for the last payment no less than 267 days after interest commenced to run upon it, he came out of the market with a discount of £10 or more upon every bond for which we had to pay £100 afterwards. Yet my hon. friend criticises this loan, and criticises the manner in which it was put on the market, and the cost of it to the country. I think my hon. friend scarcely stands in the most favorable position possible when he attempts to criticise loans in regard to their cost to this country. These two discounts to which I have referred, one of £9 19s. 3d., and the other of £10 or a little more, are the largest discounts which have ever been taken from a loan in the history of the Dominion of Canada, and I feel sure that they are the largest that ever will be so taken. When Finance Ministers came into office afterwards, did they act upon the hon. gentleman's doctrine? Not at all. They acted upon the well received doctrine which had been acted upon in Canada always before, and asked for tenders, fixing perhaps a minimum price and taking the highest tenders. When Sir Leonard Tilley negotiated a loan in 1878, which was partially guaranteed, the discount amounted to only £3 8s. 9d. In 1879, on a purely Canadian loan, the discount was £1 18s. 1½d., which was less than half the discount on the second 4 per cent. loan floated by my hon. friend in 1876. I state this as a comment upon the hon. gentleman's criticism of the High Commissioner of this country. I think I have met the main points made by my hon. friend in his criticism, but I will say this in addition. My hon. friend has made, or has attempted to make a great deal out of this guarantee. He has attempted to accuse us of repudiation, or, if we do not repudiate, he says we will be mulcted in extraordinary payments for the purchase of the sinking fund. He has made these statements, he has pressed them on the House, he has called the attention of the country to them, and, as far as he has been able, after having for a good many years tried to depreciate the credit of the country, but unsuccessfully, my hon. friend has now ended by endeavoring, seeing that its credit is good, and that it stands in a condition unsurpassed in the previous history of the country, to lead the hounds of speculation to fasten themselves, if they possibly can, upon the good credit of Canada. Neither the first nor the second of these attempts will succeed. As our credit is good, so we will maintain it, and the Government of this country is in a position to protect, and will be found able to protect, the finances of this country from any combinations of speculators that may be found in the old country or in this.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). We have witnessed to day what we have often witnessed in this House, that when a charge is preferred against the Government, and they find themselves unable to make a reply that they know would be at all satisfactory to the country, they attempt to divert attention from it; and they also resort to the argument, and they have been forced to do it in this case—though I rather wonder how they could do it—of trying to represent the one who feels it his duty to bring a grave matter before the House, as crying down his country, as endeavoring to injure Canada. We do not propose to be led away from the discussion of this question by any of these side issues, as to the loans that were put upon the market by the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment that is now in your hands. These have been matters of discussion in this House time and again. If the hon. gentleman has erred, I think those who have heard him to-day will admit that he is quite able to defend, not to say justify, his course, and to prove that he acted in the best interests of Canada. But that is not the course that we are adopting at the present time. We do not wish to be led off into a discussion of questions that have been thrashed out time and again, not apparently to the entire satisfaction of hon. gentlemen opposite. We are dealing with a transaction that has been entered into by this Government, and we expected the Finance Minister to give some explanations, to give some reasons, to give some defence of the conduct he has pursued. Now, it has been pointed out by the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment, that we have had an entirely new departure in the mode of placing this loan upon the money market. When the Finance Minister attempts to say that they have only followed in the steps that have been taken by others, as he said in his reply the other day, he did admit this much, that they had bound themselves a little more explicitly in this transaction than had been done under previous management. He has been very bold in his assertions, but what are the facts? I do not wish to reiterate what has been said, but the whole subject is so simple that, as the hon. member who moved the amendment, said, the merest tyro in finance, the youngest bank clerk, if he will allow himself to think upon the subject for one moment, cannot come to any other conclusion than that a most foolish—to use no stronger term—arrangement has been entered into. Why, Sir, what was the case with reference to the previous loan, and the sinking fund attached. It was, that there should be one-half of 1 per cent. of a sinking fund attached, and we were bound to use that sinking fund in the repurchase of that particular loan; but, even in that case, with only one-half of 1 per cent. binding us, we had a proviso in it, that we should not be bound to purchase that stock if it went above par. And that is quoted as a precedent for placing a loan upon the market in which we bind ourselves to pay what is equivalent to 10 per cent. of a sinking fund toward the repurchase of this, and without any provision whatever to guard ourselves against having to pay whatever price that stock may attain in the market. Now, Sir, this is a comparison of the two cases, nor can any amount of reasoning, any amount of referring to the loans of 1874, 1875, and 1876, that have been discussed so often, any amount of talk as to pointing out in the Canadian House of Parliament to the English investors, how they may make a good thing out of this stock, break the force of the charge made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Just as if the moneyed men on the London Stock Exchange did not know what might be done in that way just as well as the Finance Minister of Canada; as if the shrewd business men who handle the finances of the nations of the world, would be unable to comprehend what was contained in this, if the hon. member for South Oxford had not pointed it out. That gentleman has been guilty of a great many misdemeanors, but now he has crowned the sum of his iniquity by pointing out to these men how they may take advantage of us in this transaction. Sir, is it not childish to hear arguments of that kind in a Canadian House of Parliament? Does he think gentlemen will be deterred from doing their duty in this House by the presentation of any such pretence of argument as that? Now, Sir, what is the defence that they have made? I am sorry to say they have attempted no defence, pointed out no way of escape from the probable loss—would I not be justified, after listening to the calm presentation of the facts of the case and all connected with it by the hon. member for South Oxford, in saying the almost inevitable consequence of what we have done in reference to this matter? The Finance Minister treats it lightly. He says it may depreciate, it may go up to par, it may go above par. It is true it may get into the hands of permanent investors—I suppose there are investors in England that could buy up all that was in the market in a short time—he says it may go up, but if we think it has gone beyond a price that suits ourselves, then we will not consider ourselves bound to buy at that figure. Why, Sir, is not that repudiation broached in the Canadian Parliament by a Canadian Minister of Finance, by that gentleman who was not blamed by the member for South Oxford—but the Minister of Finance heroically rushes in and assumes all the blame, if blame there is, attached to this loan. Sir, I cannot see the necessity for his doing that, although it may be considered as a heroic act. It cannot be that his object was this, to come in and assume the responsibility attached to that act in order to show its character with more force, possibly, than before, and giving them to understand that it is the sentiment of the Canadian Government, uttered through a Canadian Finance Minister, that if it suits the purposes of this Government to repudiate their obligations, this Government are prepared to do it, and they are not afraid to announce it to the world. Sir, I think the House would be very sorry indeed if we have been driven to that position. I think the House will regret very much that statements such as these should have been uttered by the hon. gentleman, He tells us that there is no obligation. Well, if there is no obligation, I cannot understand what an obligation is. I confess, as the hon. gentleman himself does, to the fact that I am not as well versed in these matters as some other gentlemen; but I take it that in an ordinary business transaction, when you issue a prospectus of a loan, and you state without any guard, without any reservation whatever, that you are putting twenty millions of dollars, in round numbers, on the market, and that you have a fund in hand that is equal to about two millions, and that, at the present time, you expect to have two millions every year, and that every year you will buy two million dollars' worth of that stock. I say, Sir, that the people who buy that stock, buy it on the understanding—and it is an understanding, it is an engagement on our part, if I understand it, certainly in honor, if not of binding legal force, certainly there is moral obligation—that you shall implement the engagement you entered into, and carry out what the Government of Canada had placed before the investing British public in good faith. I do not know that I need to discuss this matter further. It is impossible to put the thing plainer than it was put in the calm and dispassionate speech of the hon. gentleman who felt it to be his duty to point out the circumstances that surround this loan, and the probable consequences that might issue from it. I can only view it, as a member of this House, in the same light, and when I am asked to pronounce upon an engagement of this kind, I can only say that I consider it was a most ill-advised arrangement, and that when a proposition comes before the House declaring that it was an ill-advised arrangement, I will be bound to give my assent to it. I cannot imagine how it was possible, scarcely, what motive could have induced any one to place a loan upon the market under such terms, with such conditions, with no reserve, or guard, or hedge in any way, as was the case with this loan placed upon the market in London. The hon. gentleman, in his attempted defence, says, when these bonds matured you would have had to buy them back at par anyway, losing sight of the fact that these were not to be bought back for fifty years. He also lost sight of the fact, when he referred to these loans, when he referred to that investment, to the repurchase by the one-half per cent. sinking fund attached to other loans, he lost sight not only of the fact that they were not to be bought if they went above par, but that there was authority given, and it was expresely so declared, that the sinking fund, if they went above par, should not be used in the purchase of that particular security, but could be used for the purchase of others. Has he in this prospectus made any other provision for the use of the sinking fund if he does not by the 3 per cent.? He has made no provision, but he has deliberately bound himself to use the sinking fund for the repurchase of this particular stock, no matter at what price it may be held by the permanent investors in whose hands it will be. He is not able to deny that; but he is forced to this position, that the Government are not bound, and will not feel themselves bound, if the parties should hold the stock at a higher figure than he thinks is right, to implement and carry out their engagement. He is bolder to-day than he was the other day. If I remember his words, he admitted that the Government were bound morally, if not legally, to use the sinking fund in the repurchase of this last loan put upon the London market. The answer he gave was as follows:—

"The Government considers that the language used in the prospectus of the 3 per cent. loan recently negotiated in London, whereby it is declared that 'The Canadian Government intend to apply the sums annually required for the redemption of the national debt in purchases of the stock now offered,' requires them to use the sinking funds therein referred to in the purchase of the said 3 per cent. loan, in case the said securities should be held at a premium at the time of purchase, unless such premium is considered unreasonable and produced by unfair competition."

He admits that was the engagement, that we were bound to do this. The sinking fund was to be used for that purpose, no other provision was made in the prospectus to provide for the use of the sinking fund in any other way, even supposing the stock went to an unreasonable price. If he had intended to have availed himself of the position, if he had wanted to avoid repurchasing it at an unreasonable price, he would have left himself at liberty to have invested the sinking fund in some other direction; but he left himself wholly without any other recourse than to repurchase again what is equivalent to one-tenth of the stock year by year until the whole was repurchased. And we find, just as it was summed up and clearly placed before the House by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that this Government acted as I have indicated. And it cannot be said that we were disposed to be unfair towards them in regard to this loan, for the hon. member for South Oxford was generous enough, when he made his speech in reply to the financial statement, to admit honestly and candidly, in the light of the information he then possessed, that the loan was a good one, and he congratulated the Government on having effected it. Yet charges of base, sinister, petty malice are made against the hon. gentleman to-day because now, with the full light thrown upon it, he has felt it to be his duty to condemn it. When these facts that have not been and cannot be contradicted or denied, that have not been and cannot be controverted, have come to light, it is plain that this loan nominally of 3 per cent., running for fifty years, is in all probability likely to cost 4½ per cent. or 4¾ per cent. for a loan not longer than five years on the average, and we must admit that it is a financial operation of the most extraordinary nature ever heard of, not only in the Dominion of Canada, but in any civilised nation on the earth.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I was in the hope that the Finance Minister would not be left alone in his defence of this loan, although, when I consider that the leading organ of the Government has to-day condemned this prospectus on almost the same grounds as have hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, I am not surprised at the silence prevailing on the other side. I have not much to say on this occasion, because my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, has covered all the grounds that I thought were left open by way of reply. But I must say, after listening very attentively to the Minister of Finance, that if I was to pass any judgment upon his speech to-day, I would say that, unfortunate as the prospectus was which Sir Charles Tupper issued, the speech of the Minister of Finance was still more unfortunate. We, as a Dominion, have prided ourselves heretofore upon the fact that we have honestly and strictly implemented every obligation we have undertaken. We in this country know that there is nothing in the world so sensitive as capital, and we know that the official declaration by the Finance Minister of Canada, a country which is constantly going upon the Stock Exchange of London for large amounts, that he does not consider the statement of facts and promises made and intentionally expressed in the prospectus issued to enable him to obtain the loan to be binding on Canada, will have the most depressing effect upon our existing securities and a very serious effect when we go to borrow money hereafter. The hon. gentleman has expressed a legal opinion that a promise made in a prospectus, that if anyone will accept some bonds he offers, this country will do so and so, is not a legal obligation. I should like to know where he got his law. I have not had an opportunity of looking up decisions with respect to prospectuses, because the ground taken by the Finance Minister the other day, as the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) has shown, was entirely different; but my recollection of the opinions expressed by the highest judicial authorities of Great Britain is entirely at variance with the conclusion which the hon. gentleman has drawn. I am very much inclined to think that he will find, if he should ever come to test this matter, that a statement of positive intention made on the part of a borrower, that if you purchase his bonds, he will do so and so, and the capitalist purchases on the faith of that statement, the court of equity will compel the borrower to carry it out. But, assuming for one moment there was a mole of escape from the strict legal obligation, what position do we occupy to-day? Is there an hon. gentleman here to-day, or is there a man in this country, who doubts that when the Canadian Government, through their legally authorised financial agents, supported by the High Commissioner of Canada, deliberately, in a printed prospectus, declare that it is the intention of the Dominion Government to apply the whole sinking fund to the purchase of this particular loan, and that loan is placed on the London market after the prospectus had been published in all the London newspapers, and is taken up on the strength of that statement, can it for a moment be contended, or will it be contended that, even if there is not an obligation which can be enforced in a court of law, there is not a moral obligation which it would be dangerous and ruinous for this country to repudiate. We have for the first time in Canadian history, a Finance Minister standing upon the floor of this House, declaring that he, for one, does not consider there is either a legal or a moral obligation on our part to implement our solemn promise, and that he will repudiate the promise if occasion serves. If the Government's necessities should compel the Finance Minister to go to the London Stock Exchange to borrow four or five millions, and if he made the statement that he intended to have a sinking fund, or adopt some other method, the brokers would read his promises made in the circular or prospectus, and compare them with the official declaration he has just made, that he does not consider the country can be compelled to implement such promises. And what will be the result? The result will be to largely impair our credit. He has told us that the hon. gentleman on this side of the House who made the motion has suggested some kind of scheme to money-lenders in England whereby they may combine to the injury of Canada, but as was pointed out by my hon. friend, it is incredible to assume that the results, which must flow from this promise, were not known to the financiers of England when that prospectus was read by them. The hon. gentleman knows well, as was pointed out by the hon. gentleman from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that many of those who made the purchase, made it on the faith of that promise, and because that promise largely appreciated the value of the stock. The other day we examined some of the English papers published at the time that this prospectus was issued, to see how it was treated by those who deal with financial matters in England, and we found that the matter had been commented upon in the financial articles published in the Standard, one of the most reputable and respectable English papers. I hold in my hand the Standard, a paper generally recognised, all over the world, as having a very high financial standing, so far as its monetary articles are concerned, and I find that on the 14th June last, in an article intituled "The Money Market," it reviews the prospectus which the hon. gentleman now defends, and the reviewer was struck with astonishment at this new departure, and called attention to it. This omission in the prospectus could not have been a mistake, because the attention of the promoters of this loan was called to it before the loan issued. The article in the Standard reads as follows:—

"The paragraph in the prospectus of the Canadian 3 per cent. loan which says that the sinking funds of the Canadian debt generally will be used to buy up the bonds of this new loan in the market, has led many people to conclude that purchases would be effected regardless of price. It is impossible to conclude that the Government of the Dominion can contemplate doing anything so extravagant. A limit must have been fixed beyond which the sinking fund purchases would cease; and it is a pity that a limit was not stated."

Why, Sir, the financial critic of that paper would not believe it was possible that men with heads on their shoulders and having the good of their country at heart could go on the money market with such an insane proposal, and he said there must be some mistake, and that "some limit must have been fixed." We have the facts before us to-day that there was no limit fixed by the Government, and the astonishment which this financial critic experienced, and the doubt which he expressed that the Dominion Government could contemplate doing anything so extravagant has been realised. We find that there has not been inserted either in the bond or the prospectus or in any other notice given by the Government any limitation whatever upon the promise they made, and, according to the Standard, the impression would be that unless the limit was fixed the Government would be bound to effect the repurchase of these bonds regardless of price. I am very much inclined to think that the Minister of Finance will not find the legal gentlemen on his side of the House endorsing the legal position he has taken in this matter, but whether they endorse it or not the moral obligation on the part of the Dominion is as binding on us, and the consequences of that moral obligation will be as serious as if we had entered into a legal obligation capable of being enforced in a court of law. We find that in all former prospectuses we carefully guarded ourselves against any compulsion in the purchase of the stocks when they became appreciated beyond par, and if we omitted to mention any limitation in this prospectus there is no tribunal which would allow us to repudiate our express stipulation and the pledge we had solemnly given. I cannot conceive that any court or any judge would allow us to repudiate our express stipulation in this prospectus. The hon. gentleman says he is going into court, but what is he going to plead? He says: "I made a foolish bargain and I want to escape from the consequences of my folly." I have heard that plea very often in courts of justice, I have heard men say this bargain is very foolish, and I ought not be called upon to implement it, but I did not find the courts generally allow them to escape on that plea. The hon. gentleman may have been foolish in making this loan on the terms he did, but he is more foolish in defending it as he did to-day. He may have been foolish, but he can depend upon it, that he will be compelled to implement the promise he has made. There is no doubt that the issue of the loan in this way appreciated the price we obtained from the purchasers, and having obtained the advantages from the omission of those words of limitation, can we honorably go into court and ask to be relieved from the obligation we have deliberately entered into? I do not see how we can ask to be allowed now to interpolate words, the omission of which we have had the advantage of in the sale of our stock. To my mind, if we did this, we would not be listened to by a judge in a court of equity, and I am quite sure, that there is not a stock exchange in the world where, if such a plea was put forward, it would not be repudiated on the moment, and the man who put it forward, be kicked out of the stock exchange. I regret exceedingly, from a national standpoint, that the Minister of Finance has seen fit to make the declarations he has made to-day, and which, I contend, are practically immoral declarations; declarations telling the world that Canada, a country which has hitherto kept all its obligations, is ready to break these obligations with persons who put confidence in us. We have made a foolish bargain and we can punish the men who made it, but we must carry out our obligations no matter what the cost is. If we do not carry out our obligations how can we dare to go on this money market again and ask to borrow money from these people? Every one who knows the Dominion of Canada, knows the condition of the country at present, they know the obligations which we are entering into every day, they know the new obligations which the Government has undertaken and which will be submitted to the House in a few days, they know that we must in consequence of these obligations borrow more money in the English market and how can we, if we have disgraced ourselves and adopted a policy of repudiation which has been more than foreshadowed by the hon. the Minister of Finance in his speech to-day, how can we face those people and ask them to place confidence in us in future? It would be more creditable to the Minister of Finance if he adopted the line of policy to-day which he adopted the other day, and in which he admitted that we were required, as part of our obligations, to purchase these bonds even though they went beyond par, and the only limitation he then put upon our obligations was, "unless they are unduly appreciated." That portion of the question has been so thoroughly threshed out by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that I shall not go into it again. It does not require a man to be a financier to see how foolish that argument is on the part of the Finance Minister of Canada. Suppose in four or five years' time the holder of £100,000 of this stock went to the trustees of the sinking fund, and tendered it at 20 per cent. premium, and the commissioners of the sinking fund would not purchase; supposing that an attempt was made to make the commissioners purchase, in a court of law, how would the commissioners be able to convince the courts that 20 per cent. premium was an "undue appreciation." The commissioners could not buy any of the other stock, and the holders might say: "We bought this stock in the first instance because we knew you would be compelled to redeem it within a certain time, from the terms of that very bargain; you cannot go anywhere else, you cannot get it anywhere else, and you have to pay that price." If you refused to pay it, you would be laughed out of court, and you would only expose your own folly in making the bargain. Sir, there is no defence that can be made for this unfortunate prospectus. The people of Canada will have to bear the burden, and I trust that from both sides of the House there will come the strongest denunciation of the policy the Finance Minister has foreshadowed, of repudiating the legal and moral obligations which this country has entered into.

Mr. EDGAR. When the Finance Minister's attention was first drawn to this matter by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), he naturally did not know the terrible financial entanglements which were likely to arise from the prospectus he had issued in 1888 for that loan, because when he answered the question which was put on the paper, and deliberately set himself as Finance Minister to answer it with regard to the effect of that prospectus, he did to a very large extent admit the binding character of the prospectus, for he said that the words contained in the prospectus required the Government to use the sinking fund therein referred to in the purchase of the said 3 per cent. loan. When the question came up again on the 5th of April, he still was not prepared to adopt the policy of repudiation which he has chosen to-day, because he did admit that the prospectus perhaps carried with it a pledge a little more explicit than the clauses of the preceding prospectuses. To-day he has announced a new policy, a policy of repudiation, because he distinctly told the House that he did not consider himself bound by the language of the prospectus, but only by the terms of the bond itself. Well, that is certainly new law to me, and new law, I venture to say, to every legal gentleman in this House. If the Minister of Justice or the First Minister were in their seats, I would appeal to them to say whether the position taken by the Finance Minister to-day is law. I do not want to impugn his financial experience and ability, but I will question his responsibility in standing up in this House and stating that by the law of this country or the law of England the prospectus does not form part of the contract made after the prospectus has been issued. Surely the obligations of the Government of Canada are to be held as sacred as the obligations of the promoters of a private company would be. I cannot find a case, I admit, of a Government ever before repudiating a prospectus, but I can show the hon. gentleman what the courts in England think of the promoters of companies who have attempted to repudiate prospectuses. Now, remember that the hon. gentleman to-day repudiates the whole prospectus. The other day he accepted part of the responsibility of it, but told us that, in addition to what he said in that prospectus, he meant that it should have been qualified; and while it would require them to purchase the loan back out of the sinking fund, even if it went above par, still there was this qualification in his mind, unless such premium were considered unreasonable and produced by unfair combination. Why did he not include that condition in his prospectus? The other day he did not repudiate the prospectus, although he does to-day. I say that, in the first place, the prospectus cannot be repudiated, and, in the second place, all omissions of material conditions in the prospectus must be condemned, and the parties affected are not bound by those omissions. In a case quoted in Buckley on Joint Stock Companies, in a decision by Vice Chancellor Kindersley, these words were used:

"Those who issue prospectus holding out to the public the great advantages which will accrue to persons who will take shares in a proposed undertaking, and inviting them to take shares on the faith of the representations therein contained, are bound to state everything with strict and scrupulous accuracy, and not only to abstain from stating as fact that which is not so, but to omit no one fact within their knowledge, the existence of which might in any degree affect the nature or extent or quality of the privileges and advantages which the prospectus holds out as inducements to take shares."

Instead of saying shares we will say bonds, and the words exactly apply to the omission from that prospectus of what the Finance Minister now proposes to insert as a condition, that if the premium is considered unreasonable, he will not redeem. Then Lord Chelmsford said in another case:

"The objection to the prospectus is, not that it does not state the truth as far as it goes, but that it conceals most material facts which the public ought to have been made acquainted, the very concealment of which gives to the truth which is told the character of falsehood."

If these observations would apply to a private company, they would apply with all the greater force to a Government, and I venture to predict that the hon. gentleman will find, when he next goes on the London market to float a Canadian loan, that he will have to publicly swallow and repudiate and take back the language which he has used to-day on the floor of the House, and will have to announce that he did not mean to say, and that he does not believe, that the Government were not to be bound by the prospectuses which they or their agents issued for floating loans. There is no class in the world more sensitive than the money lenders in London, and they have the power also to bring the hon. Minister of Finance to his bearings; because he cannot carry on the business of the country for twelve months without taking his hat off and going to the stock exchange in London to ask for quotations for Canadian securities, and they never will allow Canadian securities to hold a position on their market unless they understand that the announcements which are solemnly made by the Finance Minister and his financial agents shall be binding upon the Dominion.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

MANITOBA AND SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. LARIVIÈRE moved that the amendments made by the Senate to Bill (No. 61) to incorporate the Manitoba and South-Eastern Railway Company, be concurred in.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am afraid that the hon. gentleman cannot ask that these amendments be concurred in now. They are very numerous and important. Under the circumstances, the proper course to follow would be to refer the Bill back to the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, and I move in, amendment, that this be done.

Motion agreed to.

LAKE MANITOBA RAILWAY AND CANAL COMPANY.

Mr. McDOWALL moved that the amendments made by the Senate to Bill (No. 62) to incorporate the Manitoba Railway and Canal Company, be concurred in.

Mr. LARIVIÈRE. I understand this Bill is in the same position as the one I have on the Orders, and, therefore, should be referred back to the Railway Committee.

Mr. McDOWALL. This Bill has been amended by the Senate Committee, and the promoters do not object to the amendments.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am sorry to differ from my hon. friend. The promoters of the Bill may not object, but as these amendments change the Bill considerably, striking out about one-fourth of the Bill, and adding a new clause, I think they are too important to be concurred in now. I do not think there is another member other than the hon. gentleman who has had time to look into the Bill. This will not prevent it passing. I think it should go to the Railway Committee, as well as the other, and I move that it be referred back to the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines with the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

DIVORCE—W. G. LOWRY.

Mr. SMALL moved second reading of Bill (No. 119) for the relief of William Gordon Lowry.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This is the Bill to which I called the attention of the House a few evenings ago. At that time I did not make a motion to defer the Bill because, as I stated, I felt it my duty simply to call the attention of the House to the Bill, as I had received a strong impression from reading the evidence that it ought not to pass, and I said I would content myself with making that statement and asking the House to divide upon the second reading. A number of hon. members who discussed the Bill then were of opinion that it should go to the Committee on Private Bills, and they urged that view and supported it with various arguments, some of which did not seem to me to have sufficient weight to carry the House. For instance, one was that because the Bill had received the approbation of the Senate, it should receive the approbation of this House. That is a proposition in which I cannot concur, because, while I have the greatest respect for the Senate, and allow full weight to the investigations made by their Committee, I still consider that every member of this House is bound to take his own responsibility in considering and voting on a Bill of this character. It seemed to me that, even with what every member might have known apart from the evidence—and I am excused in making this reference, because some of the advocates of the Bill here indicated that they knew there was no collusion between the parties—there could be no difficulty afterwards in an Act being passed, founded on the evidence which the husband and wife may make for the purpose of the divorce which both desire. I also stated that it was evident that both parties desired a divorce and were interested in obtaining a divorce. I heard with great respect the observations founded on the reading of the evidence which were made by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) and the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), and I have given some consideration to the Bill since then, and have also given further consideration to the evidence. I do not hesitate to say—I feel bound to say—that the most careful consideration which I have been able to give to the evidence since that time convinces me more firmly than ever that this Bill is one which ought not to pass, and that, if it should pass, it will be a most dangerous precedent in regard to legislation of this kind. After the division on the second reading when I was not in the House—for if I had been in the House I might have made some remonstrance on the subject—the Bill was restored to the Paper, I believe without objection. Considering that some hon. members in the previous discussion desired that this Bill should go to the Private Bills Committee, and considering also that the House has deemed it advisable to restore this Bill to the Order Paper, I shall not make a renewed remonstrance to the Bill passing this stage and going to the Committee on Private Bills; but I say now, in justice to those who are promoting and supporting the Bill, that, unless a different case is presented to the House when the Bill comes back from the Committee, I shall feel bound again to test the sense of the House upon it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time, on a division.

Mr. EDGAR. I hope that, when this Bill goes before the Committee on Private Bills, it will not be merely as a matter of form, as I am afraid it has been on several occasions. I quite agree with the Minister of Justice in feeling that, with all due respect for the other House, we should not be entirely bound by their proceedings, and that, when Bills of this character go before a Committee of this House, whenever the members of that Committee, or a majority of them, think it is a proper case for investigation, they will have the parties before them in order to form an independent opinion upon the question and present that opinion to this House. As to what the Minister of Justice has said in regard to both parties desiring a divorce, I cannot see any harm in that, so long as they are not collusive parties in the sense of making evidence to go before the House.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I rise to repudiate the insinuation of the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Edgar) that the consideration of such Bills before the Private Bills Committee is a matter of form. I have for years had the honor of being a member of that Committee, and, whenever a question of this kind or any question comes before that Committee, they consider it fully and thoroughly, and they vote there as they are prepared to do here. The measure is considered on its merits, the evidence is examined by the members of the Committee, and each member expresses his views fearlessly; so that the assertion of the hon. gentleman is entirely uncalled for, and it is not true.

SUPPLY—LOAN OF 1888.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). It is not only the importance of the subject which is before the House, but also what I may call the statement of the legal proposition by the Minister of Justice which induces me to occupy the time of the House briefly on the subject which we have been discussing this afternoon. It is a matter of very great importance to this country, and to the good faith which should be kept with our creditors. Before discussing this loan, I will consider the proposition which has been laid down by the Minister of Finance, that the prospectus is not of a binding nature, because the statement contained in the prospectus is not included in the bond issued. If we were to treat this as a legal question, I do not think the Minister of Finance would find any gentleman of the legal profession who would agree with him in that. If there is any point in regard to which the English courts are more sensitive than another, it is in regard to prospectuses issued by public companies, either to induce parties to embark in the enterprise or to lend their money on the faith of the securities. In either case, the statements made in the prospectus are in the nature of a contract, and are held to be either a misrepresentation or a concealment—it is immaterial which—of the facts if they are not carried out. Every tribunal throughout the mother country—and the cases have not been by any means few—up to the highest courts of the land have always held that it requires a matter to be of uberrimæ fidei, of the greatest possible faith, when put forward in the prospectus. My hon. friend from Ontario (Mr. Edgar) quoted from the opinion of an eminent judge, and I find that very same principle, and the words of that judge, adopted by the House of Lords in a case which was before them. Before I proceed with a discussion of the position in which we stand now, I will take the proposition as a legal proposition, as if it was binding upon the country. Whether the object was to induce the public to take shares in a company for the purpose of borrowing money to carry out an enterprise, or whether the purpose was to induce the public to loan their money, in either case the same principle is applicable. The Lord Chancellor, in speaking upon this point, says:

"But although, in its introduction to the public, some high coloring, and even exaggeration, in the description of the advantages which are likely to be enjoyed by the subscribers to an undertaking, may be expected, yet no misstatement or concealment of any material facts or circumstances ought to be permitted. In my opinion the public, who are invited by prospectus to join any new adventure, ought to have the same opportunity of judging of everything which has a material bearing on its true character, as the promoters themselves possess. It cannot be too frequently or too strongly impressed upon those who, having projected any undertaking, are desirous of obtaining the co-operation of persons who have no other information on the subject than that which they choose to convey, that the utmost candor and honesty ought to characterise their published statements. As was said by the Vice Chancellor Kindersley, in the case of the New Brunswick and Canada Railway Co. vs. Muggeridge, those who issue a prospectus holding out to the public the great advantages which will accrue to persons who will take shares in a proposed undertaking, and inviting them to take shares on the faith of the representations therein contained, are bound to state everything with strict and scrupulous accuracy, and not only to abstain from stating as fact that which is not so, but to omit no one fact within their knowledge the existence of which might in any degree affect the nature, or extent, or quality of the privileges and advantages which the prospectus holds out as inducements to take shares."

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the position which is taken by the highest tribunal in the mother country. If, then, so far as public companies are concerned, they are obliged to observe the strictest fidelity, how much more must the Government of a country be obliged to avoid any appearance of deception in the prospectus that they put forward. They are morally bound by honor, by that honor which enables them to place their loan in the money market, to abide by their engagements, and if this principle is applicable to public companies, in a far greater degree must it be applicable to those prospectuses which are scattered throughout the country to invite persons to invest their money in loans. We find that this prospectus was circulated throughout the whole country; as the hon. member for South Oxford stated, it was published in a number of papers, it was put forward as the means by which this loan would be paid, and under these conditions the people of Great Britain were asked to put their money into this particular loan. It was put forward as a loan by a colony in a country like England in which, so far as she and her colonies are concerned, the word repudiation is unknown. Heretofore the mother country and her colonies have kept full faith and credit with the people with whom they have dealt. Now, we have to look to see what is the nature of the prospectus put forward. We find here a most unusual clause. We find in the loans of 1874, 1876, 1878, 1879, 1884, a particular clause of limitation, setting forth distinctly the mode in which the sinking fund was to be provided for, as the means of gradually extinguishing the debt. We find, for instance, in the loan of December, 1878, it was stated:

"For the £1,500,000 4 per cent loan a cumulative sinking fund of not less than one-half per cent. will be employed in the purchase of the Dominion 4 per cent. bonds at or below par, the Government reserving the right to invest the sinking fund in other securities should the price be above par."

Such was the clause, or a similar clause, put in all the previous loans up to this present loan, but in this present loan a change is made in the terms. We find in it a clause of an unusual character, at least a clause which has not been put in the conditions of the previous loans which were offered by Canada. That in itself would attract attention. It would show at once that some departure was made from the ordinary course by which we expected to enhance the price of this loan. It would naturally show that greater advantage was to be obtained by it than would be obtained in the ordinary course. Now, what is the obvious meaning of this clause? We find that the hon. member for South Oxford put a question the other day to the Minister of Finance. The Minister took some time to consider that question, and then he made this answer:

"The Government considers that the language used in the prospectus of the 3 per cent. loan recently negotiated in London, whereby it is declared that 'The Canadian Government intend to apply the sums annually required for the redemption of the national debt in purchases of the stock now offered,' requires them to use the sinking funds therein referred to in the purchase of the said 3 per cent. loan, in case the said securities should be held at a premium at the time of purchase, unless such premium is considered unreasonable and produced by unfair competition."

Here we have stated in distinct language the obligation of the Government to carry out the proposition put forward in the prospectus, with the qualification, which does not appear upon the face of the prospectus, that the premium should not be unreasonable and produced by unfair competition. Such was the answer made by the Finance Minister, admitting an obligation in accordance with the plain and obvious meaning of the clause put into the prospectus. Eliminating the last part, the qualification that is found there was a distinct acknowledgment of the undertaking put forward in that prospectus, and that that loan would be so understood. What is the position now taken by the Finance Minister? He comes forward and says practically that he is not strictly bound by the prospectus, because the conditions are not put in the bond. But the prospectus is what is presented to the public to induce them to take the stock, and it is the pledge of the Canadian Government that the sinking fund will be appropriated in a certain manner, and this is a solemn obligation which we cannot repudiate no matter what the result may be. In that pledge the honor of Canada is involved. What will be the effect of that loan? The effect will be that every year we shall have to pay £100,000 towards the reduction of the debt, and instead of it being a fifty-year loan we shall be bound to pay it off at the utmost before the expiration of ten years. Surely that is entirely different from the statement put forward with respect to this loan when it was first referred to by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), when he frankly and fairly gave credit to the Finance Minister for the manner in which the loan had been effected, and said it was one of the best loans ever made. For what reason was the clause inserted? Why was the change made from the ordinary course taken with respect to these loans, not only when my hon. friend was Finance Minister, but when the present Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick held that position? It was done with a view to advance the loan. It apparently had its effect, for we find that parties purchased it at a high price and far above the limit. If, then, on the faith of the statements published in the prospectus, and if they were inserted there for the purpose of advancing the price of the loan, surely after we have obtained that price by reason of those statements, we have no right to turn round and repudiate them. Surely after we have got the benefit we have a right to bear the burden, and no matter what the cost we shall be obliged to meet it. What will be the effect? It will be that as the stock rises in price we shall be obliged to pay par or a premium, and instead of getting the loan at the rate asserted, we shall be paying a very much higher rate. The Minister of Finance said that even if we have to pay £100, it is only paying the amount we agreed to pay. It is true; but time is the essence of the contract in this case, and there is a great difference between paying off this loan at the end of 50 years or next year, because if we pay it next year we are paying a high rate of interest. If we were to pay off the loan to-morrow we would be paying 8 per cent. instead of 3 per cent. Such seems to be the conclusion deducible from the position in which we are placed, and surely under these circumstances to represent that this loan as a fifty years loan, when it is really a ten years loan at the very outside, indicates a great degree of recklessness in placing the loan on the market. I should like an explanation as to why such a departure from the ordinary course was made on this occasion. There must have been some sinister object in view, or it was done for the purpose of obtaining a higher price than otherwise could have been obtained and with a view afterwards to get rid of it. I fail to see how we are going to get rid of it. If parties who buy the stock choose to hold it at a certain figure, what right have we to say that it is held at that figure by a fictitious combination. It must also be remembered that the trustees are bound not only to maintain the credit of Canada, but they are bound in their position as fiduciaries, parties standing between the Government and the bondholders, to see that the Government's pledge is carried out in its integrity. When these bonds advance to a premium of 20, 30 or 40, how can the Finance Minister show that this has been done by a combination, or that it is unreasonable? If it should go far beyond a fair market value it might be open to suspicion that such had been done, but before it reaches such a position we would be called upon to pay a large sum to relieve ourselves from this position. The hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) quoted the opinion of the London Standard on the subject, as stated in an article in which it brought the matter to the notice of the London money market at the time. It has been urged that it is very unfair for the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to come forward and explain this matter, and let other people know how they have been taken advantage of. Surely the people in London who manage monetary affairs are quite as astute, and perhaps even more astute, in such affairs than perhaps any member in this House, and, therefore, while I consider no charge can be made against the speech of my hon. friend, I claim he is not only doing what is right for the interests of the country, but simply his duty as an hon. member in bringing forward this matter in the manner in which he has brought it forward. The subject has already been called to the attention of the London money market, as is shown by the article which has been read. I will not extend my remarks, because the matter is in a narrow compass. The language in the prospectus is plain, the meaning of it is easy to be ascertained. What is the fair, obvious and natural meaning of these words? The Minister of Finance has admitted to an extent what we say is their meaning. That, I say, is the true meaning of the words and the meaning that would be placed upon them. But I will go further, and say that if there might be an ambiguity about them, the construction should be favorable towards the bondholders, and under no subterfuge of words or ambiguity of wording should this country endeavor to escape from its proper obligations. I find in the organ of the Government in Montreal to-day an article on this subject, which seems to bear out fully the proposition of my hon. friend from South Oxford. After referring to previous loans this article quotes the language of the prospectus. It says:

"With a view of rendering the Sinking Funds of the various loans more effective than heretofore, the Canadian Government intends to apply the sums annually required for the reduction of the national debt in purchases of the stock now offered."

"The amount at present annually applied to the reduction of the national debt is £350,000 sterling, and as the Sinking Fund is accumulative, the amount yearly increases."

How can any person, whether a legal gentleman or otherwise, read this statement and come to any other conclusion, by taking a fair and reasonable construction of the clause, than that as far as Canada is concerned this pledge must be carried out to the letter. More particularly is that the case when we notice the change of base from the conditions attached to previous loans when there was an express limitation. Then the article in the Gazette proceeds:

"The point raised by Sir Richard Cartwright is whether, under the clause the Government holds itself bound to devote the whole of the sinking funds to the purchase of the three per cents, no matter what price the holders of this stock may demand. If the clause in question were taken as imposing a rigid and inexorable obligation, the consequences to the Treasury might be most serious. One result would be the extinction of the loan in ten years, because the total sum applicable to the sinking funds is now $2,000,000 annually, and as the whole amount of the three per cent. issue was $20,000,000, the loan would be paid off in a decade, instead of having a currency of fifty years as contemplated at the time of issue, and as stated on the face of the bonds. That itself would not be a serious matter, provided the bonds could be purchased at a low price, at 95 for instance. But the danger lies in the possibility of a syndicate being formed to 'corner' the stock, that is to say to buy up all the stock placed in the market and hold it at a high price on the faith of the promise that $2,000,000 will be annually spent by the Government in its purchase for the sinking fund."

"At the same time it is to be regretted that so lax a clause was inserted in the prospectus, because it is always better to avoid having thrown upon the Government the responsibility of interpreting the terms of a loan, as set forth in the prospectus, in a modifying manner. The sinking fund obligations in all preceding issues had been explicitly stated; there could arise no controversy as to the meaning of the language, but in the prospectus of the 3 per cent. loan the intention is made to appear to employ some two millions annually in repurchasing the stock without any qualification as to the price. The reason of this new departure does not appear."

And again:

"As loans mature the price, of course, declines, which is an additional reason for holding the sinking funds free for investment in the 4 per cent. loans maturing in 1903-8, instead of in a lower rate loan which does not mature until thirty years later. Upon the whole, we cannot but regard it as unfortunate that the sweeping clause without restriction should have been inserted in the prospectus of the loan of June last."

That same "sweeping clause without restriction," as set forth by the Gazette, was inserted in that loan in a manner which would naturally call to it the attention of the investors, and induce them to put their money in the loan. If so the Government has got to abide by it and the trustees of the sinking fund would be bound—whether legally bound or not is a matter with which we have nothing to do at all, and I am not dealing with it as a legal question—but the trustees would be bound by that prospectus as a matter of morality and as a matter of honor to carry out their obligations to the bondholders. Further than that the Government of the day, or whatever Government may hold the reins of power, will be bound to carry that out in order to maintain the credit of Canada and to show that she is a colony of Great Britain able to meet her obligations.

Mr. WALDIE. I would like to say a few words on this matter before the vote is taken. When I first read that we had borrowed $20,000,000 at 3 per cent. for fifty years, even though we were paying a commission of 2 per cent., I thought it was a very favorable transaction, but I had no idea whatever that there would be a greater sinking fund provided for its redemption than was usual with a fifty years loan. When we were informed a few days ago that the provision for the redemption of this debt, instead of being from a half to 1 per cent., was 10 per cent. and that instead of this loan being for a period of fifty years costing us 2 per cent. commission, it was a loan for not more than five years, costing us the 2 per cent. commission for that time, I found that this entirely changed the character of the loan. I agree with the Finance Minister that if he continues to purchase his 3 per cent. loans on the English market everything should be done to enhance the value, but this only enhances the value of this particular 3 per cent. loan and it would not enhance the value of a second 3 per cent. loan unless it had the same terms attached to it. I believe that the Finance Minister who seems to think that the prospectus of this loan is so favorable to this country, will never attach it to a second 3 per cent. loan. I do not think it is at all likely that such a bond will be attached to any other loan, or that the country will be again misled to suppose that they are borrowing money for fifty years when they can actually retain it for only ten years. I think this is unfortunate, inasmuch as we find that before a year has rolled by about 10 per cent. of the amount that was loaned to us has been paid back again. Although we may not have lost anything in the amounts actually paid for those bonds which we have redeemed, yet we have paid 2 per cent. commission upon them, and we have never used the money for the purpose for which the loan was contracted. Instead of using it for the purposes required, the money was loaned again at one and a quarter per cent, while we were paying 3 per cent. on the £100 and only able to loan the £93 that the loan netted us. When we come to consider the circumstances connected with this loan, we must agree that it is a very undesirable transaction. What will be the effect of it when we are called upon, as we will be called upon very shortly, to issue another 3 per cent. loan? The next loan will not have such a favorable prospectus, for it is impossible after this discussion that the Finance Minister will ever permit such a prospectus to issue again on the English market, and we will therefore have to make a 3 per cent. loan of a different character to this, and it will be rated at a different value on the market. We may then have one, two, or three loans at 3 per cent. not bringing the same market price as this. I do think that when the Government finds as is quite evident that there has been a very serious mistake made in the issuing of this prospectus, that they will consider it advisable that the loan should be retired as speedily as possible and that the public credit of Canada should be maintained.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I desire to say a few words upon this question, and were it not for what was stated in the last few minutes of the debate I would not have detained the House by saying anything upon the argument that has been advanced; because I feel that in dealing with a question of this kind the position which the Government ought to take, and the position which the Government take, is not dependent upon any legal theories on our contract or our representations. I do feel that in thus presenting this question to the House our hon. friends opposite have endeavored to prove too much when they have assured this House that we have entered into legal and binding obligations to invest all the payments of sinking funds in this stock, and that such is our legal and binding obligation under the loan which we have made and under the contract which we have assumed. In order to present that view to the House our hon. friends opposite have read various decisions, one of which has been read twice—the second time with a great deal of emphasis by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon)—in which one of the first judges of the United Kingdom declared that the utmost good faith was necessary in any representation made in a prospectus upon which the public were induced to invest their money. To that point I wish to address myself, and first of all let me refer to the legal effect of our obligations in this prospectus, not as I said before for the purpose of basing the defence of the Government as regards this loan, nor for the purpose of stating our future action as regards this loan, solely upon the legal doctrines which may govern it, but for the purpose of removing the impression which has been improperly cast on the judgment of the House as regards what that legal effect may be. As to the effect of these decisions, only a specimen of which was given to the House by the hon. member for St. John (because the number of these decisions is legion, and the language of scores of them is even more emphatic than that which the Lord High Chancellor of England used in the decision read to the House) I conceive that as to the legal effect of that class of decisions, first of all there can be no doubt, or difficulty, and, secondly, there can be no question whatever that they have not the slighest bearing or application to this question. Now, the position which was asserted by the Lord High Chancellor of England there, which was affirmed in the House of Lords following his judgment, and which has been followed in a multitude of cases in almost every court in the land, was this—and I use this example, because it belongs to the class of cases in which this question has come up for adjudication, and in which these decisions have been given; the questions which have arisen in these cases have been questions in regard to the obligation which the promoters of companies incur to those whom they invite to take stock in the enterprises which they are endeavoring to promote; and the doctrine which was laid down there, and which is concurrent with scores of decisions in all courts of the Empire, is simply this, that when a prospectus invites persons to take shares in an enterprise on false representations of facts or concealments of material facts, the persons who by those false representation or those concealments are induced to subscribe for stock, are not bound to take the stock for which they have subscribed if they are in a position to prove the concealment or misrepresentation. That step, Sir, has long been passed in this transaction, assuming the prospectus to be all that it is stated to be by my hon. friends on the opposite side of the House; and I will endeavor presently to present to the House the view that it is not what has been stated. But assuming it to be an undertaking as to which a material fact was misstated or a promise made, those persons have since subscribed the loan and have received their securities. They are not in the position in which the litigant in those suits would have been if, when raising the question promptly, as they are bound to do at all events, they had said that there was a material misrepresentation in the prospectus on which they had been induced to subscribe, and following the course of that decision they would not have been obliged to make the loan or receive their bonds. In this case they have received their bonds, they have loaned their money, they have made beyond and above the terms of that prospectus, a deliberate, emphatic and binding contract as regards which this phrase forms no part, no condition and no term. I admit as much as is claimed by hon. gentlemen opposite when I admit that the decisions which they have cited indicate that persons who have subscribed for shares or stock are relieved from taking that stock or shares if the representations are found to be untrue or if there has been any material concealment of facts. But the decisions are abundant that the prospectus is not to be referred to at all, is not to afford any such ground of relief, whether it contains any suppressions of facts or any material misstatement of facts if, after the prospectus, the parties have made a new and distinct contract as, for instance, articles of association. After that, the prospectus can no longer be referred to, and those who would assert a material misrepresentation of fact in the prospectus are still bound, because they have entered a new engagement altogether, of which that forms no part or condition. An illustration of that may be cited in the course taken by hon. gentleman opposite as to previous loans, when it was intended that the provision as to a sinking fund should form a condition of the transaction. Then, the representation to bind the Government, the condition and the terms, were stated in the bond. It was stated in the bond how the sinking fund was to be provided and how applied—that it was to be applied in the purchase of Canadian stocks unless they rose above a certain figure. When these lenders of the recent loan, having subscribed the stock, let us assume, on the faith of that representation in the prospectus, took a bond having no such condition contained in it, and put their money up, they would have no legal rights under the prospectus. But as to the terms of that prospectus being carried into the bond, I repeat, I do not make this argument for the purpose of contending that we ought to stand, in dealing with a transaction of this kind, on the strict terms of the bond or the strict letter of the law, but I do it because on this question the mind of the House ought not to be prejudiced by the contention that decisions which have no reference to it ought to govern it, or that we are bound by the terms of this prospectus precisely as if they were inserted in the contract. The cases referred to relate entirely to the proposition that a person having subscribed his money on a prospectus of that kind, need not follow it up by making his investment, and I have referred to the class of cases which distinctly provide that when the investors have a contract in which that condition is not inserted, the subscribers can no longer avail themselves of the prospectus. But I will call the attention of the House further to the position hon. gentlemen opposite have assumed in submitting this resolution to the House. They have a vantage ground to a certain extent, because they profess to base their arguments on the ground that they are preserving intact and inviolate the faith of Canada. Notwithstanding my view of the legal obligation of Canada in this regard, I do not believe that there is one of my colleagues, nor would I, be willing to rest in carrying out this contract, on any legal doctrine whatever if a strict regard to honor obliged us to do otherwise. We would be perfectly willing to submit our rights and the rights of those we represent to be decided by any proper tribunal, precisely as though the words used in the prospectus were incorporated in the bond; and what are they? Are they a promise?—did anybody in subscribing that loan believe they were a promise—that the sinking fund investment from year to year would be invested in this loan? Did anyone who subscribed for it believe that although he was making a fifty years loan to Canada, he was really only making a five years loan? Did anyone believe that when he was lending money to Canada for fifty years we were bound to pay it back in five years, while he was not bound to receive it back in five years? If anyone supposes that those who made the loan believed that, the fact that it has not appreciated unduly, and that no one has endeavored to extort from Canada a price above that which the loan realised to us, would be conclusive as to any such view being in the minds of investors. But the language of the prospectus is simply an expression of the intention of the Government; and even if that were incorporated in the bond, I think we might fairly submit to any reasonable man of business, to say nothing of any question of law whatever, the question, if the conditions which were stated by the hon. Minister of Finance arose, if those securities were unduly appreciated by fraudulent means, or had attained an unreasonable premium, whether the Government would be bound by a simple declaration of intention which they had formed at the time the loan was issued, and when good faith was expected quite as much on the part of investors as on the part of the Government. What I was going to call the attention of the House to, as regards the undue advantage which our hon. friends opposite seek to derive from this motion, is that, while the motion is put forward as one in the interest of the good faith of Canada, with the view of preserving intact the credit of Canada, it is really put forward in such a form as to bind the Government and the country, and goes far beyond the terms of the prospectus, and far beyond what we have any reason to believe investors themselves ever intended or expected. While the prospectus was put forward simply as an expression of the intention of the Government, and while the Minister of Finance has declared his willingness to be bound by that to every reasonable extent, as long as there is good faith and reason in the minds and in the conduct of the other party, this resolution distinctly obliges the Government, this House and the country, under all conditions, and no matter how unreasonably enhanced the price may be, and how unfair may be the means by which this enhanced price may be reached, to buy the stock. The effect of such a resolution would be:

"That the Canadian Government would be obliged, in order to comply with the obligation entered into on that behalf, to re-purchase the entire loan of £4,000,000 sterling above mentioned in ten or more annual instalments, averaging £400 sterling each; that the said loan will thereby, as far as the Dominion is concerned, converted from a loan having nominally fifty years to run, into a loan having a little over five years to run; that all former unguaranteed loans, having sinking funds attached, contain the provision inserted in the bonds of prospectus, and usually in both, setting forth that the Government of Canada shall not be obliged to purchase said stocks on account of investment of for sinking funds, if said stocks should rise above par; that in connection with the said 3 per cent. loan of £4,000,000, neither the prospectus nor the bond issued contain any such provision; that the natural tendency of the existence of the obligation to apply a sinking fund of this magnitude to the purchase of a loan of £4,000,000 sterling, will be to raise the price of the said loan abnormally, and may result in the loss of a large sum to this country."

If it were thought proper to censure the Government for having made the loan upon such terms, that would be a distinct proposition, but the proposition now is, whatever the legal or moral obligations of the country may be, to declare to the holders of these securities and to the speculators who may hereafter come into possession of them, that Canada is bound, over and above the terms of her prospectus and her bond, to pay any price they may choose by any means, however unfair, to exact.

Mr. LAURIER. It is difficult to see, after the language we have heard from the hon. the Minister of Justice, what is the intention of the Government. Their intention when they issued the prospectus was to redeem the loan in a certain manner. We made a loan of £4,000,000 sterling. At this moment, under existing loans, we are bound to invest every year the sum of £300,000 annually and the sinking fund of outstanding loans will in future years reach the amount of £400 sterling. The holders of the bond require for the sinking fund, and the trustees of the Government are directed by the prospectus of the loan to invest that amount every year in the purchase of a loan; and as to this point the intention of the Government, whatever it may be now, was clear at that time. Here is the language of the prospectus:

"The Canadian Government intend to apply the sums annually required in the redemption of the national debt in the purchase of the stock now offered."

This is an order to the trustees of the sinking fund. This is a mandate to them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. LAURIER. What is the meaning, then, of those words? If this is not a mandate, what were those words put in for, and what was the intention of the Government in putting them in? I cannot conceive what the right hon. gentleman means when he says this is not a mandate. If it is not, what is it? Certainly the language is plain, and when the Canadian Government, going to the London market, say in their prospectus:

"The Canadian Government intend to apply the sums annually required in the redemption of the national debt in the purchase of the stock now offered."

The banks of London could come to no other conclusion than that henceforth the £350,000 annually, which are to be in the hands of the trustees of the sinking fund, were to be applied annually to the purchase of that stock. Suppose now the stock can be had at or below par, what will be the consequence? I presume, from the language we have heard to-day from the Minister of Finance, that if that stock can be had at or below par, the Government would not hesitate to buy it and apply it to that loan. In fact the hon. the Minister of Finance said to-day it would be to the advantage of Canada—and he dwelt at length upon this idea—that we should invest annually in the redemption of that loan. Supposing he could have it at or below par, what would be the consequence? It would be that inside of ten years the whole of those four million of bonds would be in the hands of our trustees, and practically in the hands of the Government of Canada, and, practically, the loan would be paid. The hon. gentleman stated this afternoon that Canada would profit immensely by purchasing the stock of that loan, instead of purchasing, as he had been forced to, even last year, at a premium of 114. That may or may not be; but supposing it is so, what will be the consequence? It will be simply that we have no longer a loan of fifty years, but a loan of ten years. It will be that instead of paying a loan in fifty years, at 3 per cent., we will pay it in ten years, at an interest of not of 3 per cent. per annum, but of 5 per cent. per annum. Will the hon. gentleman say that the conditions of the loan are the same, whether it be payable in ten or in fifty years? Will he say that the conditions of the loan negotiated last summer are the same, whether the capital is to be reimbursed in ten years or in fifty years? The hon. gentleman will surely not pretend seriously that in each case the conditions are the same. I hold that the conditions are much more onerous in the case of a ten year loan, and this is exactly the point which has been made by the mover of this resolution and which has not been answered. It is practically that, though the Government have negotiated a loan for fifty years, they have effected a loan which is to be reimbursed in ten years, and, therefore, all the conditions boasted of when the loan was made, instead of being advantageous, are onerous to Canada. Taking the most favorable view which the Government can take, this is the effect of the loan. Take another consideration not less important. Suppose the loan cannot be had at par; suppose we have to buy it at a premium as we probably will; suppose the holders of our sinking fund have to pay a premium. The hon. gentleman said to-day we have been forced to purchase some of our own stock at a premium of 114. Well, if it comes to that the hon. gentleman, I suppose, will have no objection, but he will see the loss to Canada. Should it, however, go to a higher amount—let the amount be ever so high—is the hon. gentleman prepared to say that Canada will not be forced to pay any rate which is quoted in redemption of that loan, whatever the profits may be? Now, we hear the pretension that Canada is not bound legally to purchase at a high premium, and that Canada is to be the master to decide whether or not the premium is too high. This was, in fact, the substance of the hon. gentleman's answer the other day, when he stated that the terms of the loan—

"Require them to use the sinking funds therein referred to in the purchase of the said 3 per cent. loan, in case the said securities would be held at a premium at the time of purchase, unless such premium is considered unreasonable and produced by unfair competition."

Well, who is to determine that? Who is to determine whether the premium is reduced by unfair competition? Nobody can determine that but Canada. It is, therefore, Canada which will be the judge, though a party to the cause, and Canada will not be an independent tribunal that can decide between the bondholders and Canada, between those who are to receive and those who are to pay. Still, according to the hon. gentleman, it is Canada herself which is to determine whether the premium asked is too high or not. Well, even taking that view, it seems to be a most unfortunate one to take. We are told that we have no legal obligation upon us. I refuse to discuss whether we have or have not a legal obligation, but it seems to me that it would be a shame and an injury to the credit of Canada if we were ever to rely on the technical language of a bond in order to see whether we were under a legal obligation or not. It seems to me that we should disregard the idea whether we are legally bound or not to resume that stock as it is offered. If there is no legal obligation on our part, certainly there is a moral obligation. Whether we are bound in law or not, we are bound in morality. What would be the effect of this language which we have heard? If the bondholders were to come to the Minister of Finance, or to our agent in London, and were to offer some of this stock, and, if the Minister of Finance were to say: No, I will not take it back because the premium is too high, there would be a cry of indignation even in this country. I will not speak of the effect in England, where the effect on our credit would be tremendous, but in this country every citizen who has at heart the honor of the country, who has at heart a desire to uphold the credit of this country—and this country cannot maintain the position it desires unless it keeps its credit always above par—everyone, not only the capitalists and the millionaires of this country, but even the laborers would repudiate the language which has been used to-day. What is the effect of this language used in the prospectus if it does not create a moral obligation? If the Minister of Finance is at liberty, at his own option, to repudiate the language used in this prospectus, why was such language put in this prospectus? There must have been some meaning or some intention when these words were put in the prospectus; and, if the meaning is not that which has been stat d by my hon. friend who moved this resolution (Sir Richard Cartwright), what does it mean? Was that language put there as a trap, or was it intended simply to have an effect upon those with whom the Government intended to deal? There is only one construction, and that is the most charitable one, that the Government of Canada intended to apply the sinking fund, which amounts to $350,000 annually, in the purchase of the stock offered. That is the most charitable construction that can be put upon this prospectus, and, unless the Government are prepared to accept the full consequences of their language in that prospectus, there must be some sinister motive when this language was put in, which cannot be repeated on the floor of Parliament.

Mr. MULOCK. It is somewhat difficult to reconcile the attitude of the Minister of Justice and that of the Minister of Finance on this question. The view of the Minister of Finance appears to have undergone a considerable change since the matter was brought to his attention. Perhaps that of the Minister of Justice would undergo a similar change after more reflection. However the Minister of Justice has endeavored to present to the House an erroneous view of the relations to the money market of a nation like Canada. He asserts that, because the clause in the prospectus was not incorporated in the contract, therefore Canada was not legally bound, that the rights of those who tendered were one thing when they offered the tender, but that those rights became different when the contracts were entered into. I maintain that the contract entered into, prepared, as it was, by the Government, was bound to have been a contract entirely on the lines of the specification, that everything which was material to the contract or which modified it or which gave any right to the persons tendering, should have been made part of the contract. But the Minister of Justice says that, whatever may have been the rights of the tenderer, having become merged in the rights under the contract, he cannot thereafter look at the prospectus to see if he has any moral obligation under that. I do not think it is necessary for us to consider this question in the light of strict law. I am not aware that the obligations of nations are so construed. I am not aware that when a foreign nation obtains a loan in the English market, the investor tries to see whether he will be able to issue an execution in case of default in China or in Peru or in any other foreign country. The honor of the Crown is taken as a factor in the contract. The bonds may not show that he has any claim on the honor of the Crown, but that is the only security he has. If we are to come down to the legal construction of the contracts, if the English investor has to look at the contract in order to see whether he is to get a good security, then I venture to prophesy that neither the Minister of Finance nor Canada will ever again be able to float a loan on the English market on such terms as we have in the past. I was glad to find that the Minister of Justice was able to discover some good, sound, holding ground. He found himself in a different frame of mind from the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Justice was not in favor of the Government repudiating. It is only a few days ago that he had to show that the Government must not repudiate a contract which they were pledged to in a part of the country with which he is connected. He understands what repudiation means, and he understands that the honor of the Crown cannot be tarnished. If rumor is true, Canada will have to redeem her honor in that case, and she has been taught a lesson in that way. But the Minister of Finance is a more advanced pupil in the school. A week ago he declared on the floor of Parliament that Canada was legally bound to this. In answer to my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) he stated that Canada was legally bound under an obligation to invest the whole of the sinking fund annually in the redemption of these bonds, provided that the price was not unduly appreciated. To-day he says no. That is another step in the process of repudiation. To-night he sees it differently, who knows but in a little further time he will have made a further progress in this direction.

An hon. MEMBER. A back down.

Mr. MULOCK. Now, Mr. Speaker, a worthy citizen from the east, an historian, has given great credit to the people of the eastern parts of this country for many qualities, and among others that of being great as talkers. Certainly we have good evidence of the correctness of that historian's opinion on the floor of this House. The Minister of Finance is gifted in that way, and I compliment him upon his facility in presenting every case he does to this House in the most favorable light. It is greatly to his credit that he is able to command that language with which he does succeed at times in clouding an unfortunate position, as he has endeavored to do in this case. But finances are not figures of speech. The financier is not necessarily an orator; and whilst the Minister of Finance is highly gifted in some respects, I venture to question whether he has yet attained that experience which would enable him to deal effectively with the finances of a great nation like Canada. I say that it is not to his discredit, for it is unreasonable to suppose that any person without great experience can step into the office he is endeavoring to fill, and does fill so well, yet we cannot expect that he can fill it to the extent of the requirements of the country. Now, in this particular case the Minister of Finance, with a chivalry which I appreciate, has taken upon himself the whole responsibility, perhaps he has taken upon himself more responsibility than he is bound to do; if so, it is his loyalty, and I commend him for it. But at the same time I think the act for which he assumes the responsibility, and which is the act of the whole Administration, is one that is objectionable in so many respects, no matter how you look at it, it is so full of financial mistakes, that it would have been well had he transferred some of that responsibility, had he consulted authorities upon the subject, and had he at last prepared with due care a prospectus which would not have landed Canada in the position she is now in. Now, I remember last year when this loan was before the House, when his predecessor asked Parliament to give consent to make this loan, we then pointed out to Parliament that there was no necessity for a loan of this magnitude, this being part of a larger loan. We pointed out at the time that it would involve having on hand a considerable amount of money for a considerable length of time until other liabilities of ours matured, and until this money was required for public works. The Minister of Finance of to-day took part in that discussion and defended the proposition. He knew he was shortly to succeed to the inheritance, and he at an early stage served his apprenticeship under the then Finance Minister, and I am afraid that the imagination of his predecessor has produced a rather strong impression upon him. I cannot admit that he has yet attained to that imagination that made his predecessor so famous, although he is making considerable progress toward it. A couple of years ago we remember that his predecessor announced to this House that such was the fertility of the great North-West that it was able to produce in one year 640,000,000 bushels of surplus wheat. That was a fine proposition, and the Finance Minister of to-day, following this worthy example, although at a respectable distance, told us on a recent occasion that Manitoba and the North-West produced a surplus of wheat of 20,000,000 bushels.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, I refer the Minister of Fnance to a certain speech of his that is of record, and therein he will find the statement that the North-West and Manitoba produced last year a surplus of 20,000,000 bushels of wheat over and above all that was required for that country; whereas everybody who cares to get at the facts of the case know that the surplus during that year did not exceed 20 per cent. of the amount stated by the Finance Minister. Nevertheless I am not blaming him for that small departure from facts. He had a worthy example before him, and, as I say, he has followed in the footsteps of his predecessor, but at a respectful distance. Coming back to the particulars of the loan, I think many features of it are objectionable. For example, I think the Government on that occasion borrowed too much money, they borrowed too much at a time, they borrowed at an inopportune time a large amount of money that should not have been borrowed, and with what result? That money came over to Canada and was placed in our banks here, if rumor is correct, at first without any interest at all. There were some millions thrown into our Canadian banks, bearing no interest, then after an effort you succeeded in getting 1½ per cent. at a time when you were paying 5 per cent. in England, and if this loan is paid off at the end of ten years, as a straight loan of five years, it will cost us 5 per cent. during that time, and that money you are lending out at 1½ per cent., I think over a third of it at only 1½, and some of it at no interest at all. The effect of that was largely to embarrass the financial institutions of the country. You disturbed the banking interests of Canada; you embarrassed the banks. At the very time that you were loaning this money out at 1½ per cent., and a portion of it at no per cent.. you were taking in deposits from people all through the country at 4 per cent. That is the way that the Minister of Finance is enriching this country. The Minister states that if we repaid the amount the next day after we borrowed that money at 95, and out of that we had to pay a commission amounting to nearly 2 per cent., we would not have been any poorer. Why, Sir, that 5 per cent. discount, and the commission off it as well, represents the cost of making the loan, if it were spread over a period of 50 years. But to

to allow the whole cost of placing a 50 years loan to be charged against it for one year, or for a shorter period, is certainly, in my opinion, bad financing. At the very best this cannot be considered as a straight loan for a longer period than five and a half years, and you have there for this state of affairs, that the discount and the commission that you paid for a credit for 50 years, are absorbed in the credit of five and a half years. Now, the Minister of Justice admits that we are, to a certain extent, bound to this prospectus, but not really and absolutely bound. I will put the Minister of Justice this question: If we are bound—and I understand that all the members of the Government admit that we are bound—to expend the whole of our sinking fund every year in redeeming this particular loan, provided, in their judgment, it can be got at a certain figure, they say below par.

Mr. MULOCK. I presume they will admit that they would be bound—even according to this additional term they are importing into the contract—that they would be bound to expend the whole of our sinking fund each year in the purchase of these particular securities, provided they can be got at par or under. Now, at this very moment we are under legal obligations to expend a portion of our sinking fund each year in redeeming other securities. The Minister of Finance recited certain loans made by Canada since 1874. I have looked into these, and I understand that we are under an absolute obligation—not a mere moral obligation, but a legal obligation, forming part of the contract, to expend every year a certain portion of the sinking fund in redeeming our public securities, provided they can be got not higher than par. It may happen, as a matter of accident, that to-day our public securities are above par, but it may happen to-morrow that some of our public securities can be bought below par. Does not our legal liability at once accrue, and must not the country expend a portion of the sinking fund in redeeming other securities? And it may happen at that time that we have that fund invested in two securities; we have here, under this obligation, undertaken to invest the whole sinking fund in the redemption of this particular security, although under other contingencies we may have to pay a portion to redeem other securities. Some hon. gentleman may say that that may never happon. But that is not the way to deal with legal obligations; we are not here engaged in kite flying, and we are not entering into contracts that are not to be carried out. We must not depend on mere chance as to the means necessary to relieve the country from liabilities into which it may enter. There is nothing more sensitive than the money market, as has been stated by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), and should there come a great disaster such as a European war or other causes these securities would decline below par. And where would we be in such an event? We are bound to invest our sinking fund in two different securities. I have thus shown the result which will accrue from the adoption of this prospectus. The Finance Minister declared that the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in bringing this matter to the attention of the House on this occasion was engaged in decrying the country. Have there ever been words uttered in Parliament or outside Parliament more calculated to injure the country than the utterances of the Minister of Finance himself, when he asserted that under certain conditions he would repudiate the solemn promise of the people of Canada? He told us that in this House to-day, and he will, by that statement, reduce the credit of Canada as other nations have had their credit reduced; and it may happen that we may pay for it in the future and we may lose all the advantage gained by this particular transaction a hundred-fold, owing to the unfortunate position taken by the Administration in regard to this matter. For my part I think it far better for Canada to look this matter straight in the face. The Government have made a mistake; let them admit it honestly and face the difficulty, and whatever the cost may be let the Government at all events pay the money and save the honor of the country. That is what the Government is for and what the people demand, no matter what it may cost, and, lest any impression might be derived from the statement of the Minister of Finance that we are prepared to allow him to qualify the contract entered into, I for one say he has no right to qualify it, and I doubt if the people of Canada, even for the purpose of saving money, will allow him to qualify it, but public opinion will be at the back of the honor of Canada, even if it is repudiated by the Government of the day.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I do not propose to detain the House more than a few minutes in regard to the matter now under discussion. Let me say at the outset that whatever may be the legal attainments of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, he evidently does not agree in financial matters with the financial leader on that side of the House. He has taken exception in the course of his speech to-night to the manner of the loan, the amount of the loan and the time at which it was negotiated. He contended that the time at which the loan was negotiated was inopportune, and that too much money was borrowed.

Mr. MULOCK. Not all those points.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Pretty nearly all, if he recollects the statements he made. He said too much money had been borrowed and that the time was inopportune.

Mr. MULOCK. To borrow that amount.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Let me refer to what the financial leader of the Opposition, the hon. gentleman who sits beside him at present, is reported to have said on a recent occasion in regard to this particular loan. That hon. gentleman is reported to have said that:

"On the whole I am glad to bear my testimony to the fact that I think the last loan was a good loan, that it was well made and the time was well chosen."

If I understood the hon. member for South Oxford aright, he continued in that opinion until the prospectus was placed in his hands, when he discovered that something had been done in this proceeding which in his opinion imposed upon the Government conditions which up to that time he did not suppose had been imposed upon them. I confess that in speaking in regard to this question I do so with a great deal of diffidence. I have a very high respect for the financial talents of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), but I think in regard to this matter he has rather overdrawn the picture. I quite agree with that hon. gentleman that if the parties who subscribed their funds to this loan were induced to do so by the prospectus which was laid before them by our agents in London, and were induced to pay a higher price than otherwise would have been paid for this loan, then I say his contention may be right. But what is this prospectus, what does it say? It says that:

"With the view of rendering the sinking funds of the various loans more effective than heretofore, the Canadian Government intend to apply the sums annually required for the reduction of the national debt in purchases of the stock now offered. The amount at present annually applied to the reduction of the debt is about £350,000, and as the sinking fund is accumulative the amount yearly increases."

In this prospectus also we find the form of debenture, the form of bond, which is the contract between the borrower and lender. This form of bond reads as follows:—

"The Government of Canada hereby acknowledge to be indebted to the bearer in the sum of pounds sterling, being part of a sum authorised to be raised in virtue of an Act of Parliament of Canada, passed in the 51st year of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, Chapter 2, which sum the said Government undertakes to pay on the 1st July 1938, at the office of Messrs. Baring Bros. & Co., and Messrs. Glyn, Mills, Currie & Co., in the City of London, in England, with interest in the meantime from the 1st July, 1888, at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum."

In all the prospectuses that had been issued heretofore, the form of the bond contained the condition that a sinking fund was to be provided for the redemption of those bonds, and it was very well understood upon the market, at all events in this country in the discussions that took place in this House and in the public press in regard to this loan, that this was to be a loan without a sinking fund. Here is expressed the intention of the Government to devote a certain amount of money, which must be raised yearly and must be invested by the Government for the redemption of the former loan, and to invest it in this loan instead of investing it in other securities. The Government are bound to invest the sinking fund in securities of some kind, and if it does not appreciate beyond what the fair market value will be, then the Government will be perfectly justified, and will be acting in the interests of Canada, in investing the sinking fund, which must be invested in securities of some kind, in these securities. I think the statement made by the Minister of Finance that it would be a very easy matter to determine whether this security had unduly depreciated by comparing its price with the price of other securities of Canada is a sound one, and it seems to me that unless there was a conspiracy on the part of our agents in London to get the Government of Canada into a false position in regard to this loan, the contention of the hon. gentleman is a sound one. Of course I do not speak from a legal standpoint, because I do not understand the legal construction of this particular clause in the prospectus; but as there is great divergence of opinion among legal gentlemen as to the effect of this clause, it seems to me that it may be taken for granted that, at all events, we are not under a legal obligation to redeem these securities. Then if we are not under a legal obligation, are we under a moral obligation to purchase these securities at any price they may be put up to? I do not think that we are. Let me put a case of this kind, it is an extreme case I admit, but it is a case that might possibly arise. Suppose the owners of these bonds would refuse to sell them to the Government at any price, suppose they would say: "We have these bonds and we intend to keep them," what would the Minister of Finance do in such a case? I admit that it is an extreme case, but it is one that might possibly happen. Let me say in regard to this matter that so far as investors are concerned my experience and my information leads me to the conclusion that in the present condition of the money market and the probable future condition of the money market, a loan extending for 50 years would be more acceptable to investors than a loan that would be redeemed within ten years. It appears to me that whoever invested their money in this loan did it with the full understanding that the loan was to run for 50 years and that they were to receive their interests half yearly, and I believe that this is the reasonable conclusion which business men must arrive at in regard to this loan. I do not propose to discuss the legal aspect of the question, as I said before, because I do not pretend to understand it. I do think there can be no moral obligation on the Government to redeem those securities to the extent set forth in this prospectus, in which they declare it to be their intention to redeem them, if those securities are put beyond what is the real actual market value. Therefore, I think that the motion of the hon. gentleman ought not to carry.

Mr. COLTER. At this late stage of the debate I do not intend to occupy the time of the House for more than a moment or two, but I think that the attempt that was made to prove inconsistency on the part of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in characterising this loan as a good loan, when he was not aware of the contents of the prospectus in question, and with characterising it differently after he became aware of this prospectus, is an attempt which should be frowned down by this House and by the country.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I have made no such statement.

Mr. COLTER. The hon. member for South Oxford made the statement in one case, assuming the facts to be just as they appeared from the statement of the Finance Minister; and, subsequently, he made a statement when the true facts became known to the House.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). The hon. gentleman has mistaken me. What I wished to say was that the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) did not agree with the hon. member for South Oxford, inasmuch as that the member for South Oxford had said that this was a good loan and effected at an opportune time.

Mr. COLTER. That is assuming that the discovery which he subsequently made was not made. It leads up to this position: that the attempt to show the discrepancy between the member for North York and the member for South Oxford has no foundation whatever, because their statements were made on a totally different set of facts. It appears that we have had a judicial construction of a question similar to this in our own courts in the Province of Ontario, and I would call the attention of this House to the case of Hodgins vs. the Ontario Loan and Debenture Company, which is reported in our law reports. This was a case in which a loan was effected largely on the face of a prospectus which was issued by the Ontario Loan and Debenture Company to a man named Hodgins, who borrowed from the company $4,400, and he had executed a mortgage on the instalment plan providing for the payment of principal and interest in twenty annual instalments of $428.28. Before he made this loan he had access to a circular which was issued by the company, and that circular was treated as follows, in the judgment of Mr. Justice Patterson, who is now a judge of the Supreme Court:—

"The managers of the society had been accustomed to advertise the advantages offered by their institution by sending 'to the public,' as Mr. Bullen expressed it in his evidence, through the post office, a great number of circulars, containing amongst other inducements to deal with them the following announcement: 'The following is the rule of this institution: Loans can be paid off at any time, and a discharge of mortgage will be given. The rules of the society being when this privilege is taken advantage of, to charge three months' additional interest at the same rate at which the loan was made.' This very explicit piece of information introduced by a parade of the security which borrowers had in the publication of the loan tables, which rendered them free from every possibility of extortion, deception and fraud; and by a further statement, which is worth referring to for the contrast between its terms and the gloss which Mr. Bullen attempted on his oath to give to the circular. 'These loans' it is stated are made at a fixed and uniform rate. Borrowers sometimes desire to exchange or otherwise dispose of their property or the means of repaying a loan may occur or happen in various ways before the mortgage expires, and much inconvenience is frequently caused by not being able to obtain discharges of mortgages at any time."

Then the learned judge makes this remark in giving judgment:

"The design with which a document of this kind was circulated could not of course affect its construction, as that must follow the meaning naturally conveyed by its language to those who read it. That meaning obviously is, that a loan made at the fixed and uniform rate set down in the tables might, by a rule which distinguished the mode of dealing of this society from that of private capitalists, trustees, or executors, be payed off at a time and on a scale different from the uniform rate at which the loan was formerly made, in case a contingency happened which made the borrower desire to pay it off? One contingency expressly mentioned is that which has arisen, viz., the means of repaying the loan which are now afforded by the power to borrow money at a cheaper rate."

It appears that the borrower, in this instance, wished to redeem his mortgage before its maturity, in accordance with the terms of this circular; and the company, defendants in this case, resisted the attempt that was made by Mr.

Hodgins to compel them to take back the money and give a discharge of the mortgage. Mr. Justice Patterson says:—

"The question is, whether the plaintiff can insist upon redeeming his mortgage according to the terms put forth in the circular? I should be sorry to find so grave a defect in our administration of justice as would be apparent from a negative answer. It would reverse the boast of the circular, and make it an instrument of 'extortion, deception and fraud.'"

Now, this is the language which the learned judge in giving judgment in that case, thought fit to use with regard to those who had issued that circular and who then were attempting to evade the consequences of it:

"I agree with my brother Burton in the ground upon which he has based his judgment. I am also of opinion that the plaintiff's right to the relief he seeks may be sustained upon the strict footing of contract, either the contract evidenced by the mortgage itself or a collateral and an independent contract."

I need not quote any further from the judgment, but I may say that the judgment of the Court of Appeal in this case was unanimous in upholding the judgment previouly given by Chancellor Spragge, and this case has never been reversed in any way by appeal. It seems to me that the doctrine there laid down and which has been upheld as good law, is the same doctrine which has been contended for by the hon. member for South Oxford. If it is good law in a court possessing the high standing of the Ontario Court of Appeal, I think it ought to be received with a good deal of respect by the members of this House. I merely rose in order to call the attention of hon. members to this particular, and to show that we consider that the Government of Canada ought at least to rise to as high a standard of morality as the courts of Canada exact from a loan company.

House divided on amendment of Sir Richard Cartwright:

Amendment negatived.

Mr. LABELLE. The hon. member for Gaspé is in his seat, and did not vote.

Mr. JONCAS. I did not vote because I paired with the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards). If I had voted, I should have voted against the amendment.

Mr. TROW. I wish to call attention to the fact that the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. McGreevy) has voted, when I understood that he was paired with the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot).

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Indians, Quebec—relief of distress $4,200

Mr. MITCHELL. Let us have some explanation about this.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The vote is the same as was granted last year. We are obliged to aid nearly every Indian in the Province of Quebec, on both sides of the St. Lawrence, with both food and clothing, and also to provide them with medical attendance.

Mr. LISTER. Who has the distribution of this money?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The Indian agents of the different reserves.

Mr. MITCHELL. Where are those tribes situated?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I am unable to give the information now.

Mr. MITCHELL. In voting this money we have a right to know whether it is properly distributed or not, and the vote should stand if the hon. gentleman is not prepared to give that information.

Mr. LISTER. I think we have a right to know where this money is expended. The different tribes in Quebec and Ontario have moneys and annuities of their own. I know several tribes in Ontario, and I know that none of this money goes to them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This vote has been taken for very many years. The hon. gentleman knows that some Indian bands in Ontario have funds, and some of them are rich, and they do not come here for relief. But in the Province of Quebec there is no Indian fund. Some of the Indian tribes are doing comfortably enough on their reserves, but others in portions of the country which are not so fertile are assisted every year, and this money is expended through the different Indian agents where relief is found necessary. There has never been a demand before for the details of this particular item. I think we ought to pass it as it always has passed, and as the hon. member for Northumberland desires a statement, it will be brought down.

Indian Schools—Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick..... $22,197 50

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe here that an increase of nearly 50 per cent. is required for the Indian schools in these four Provinces. If that money be well spent, hon. gentlemen on this side are not disposed to oppose it, but this vote requires an explanation.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The proposed expenditure is made up of a number of items. The expenditure during the year ending 30th June, 1887, for schools was $8,040, and as the Indian school fund only amounts to $5,000 it had to be supplemented, in order to pay for the schools established. There is an increase in the salary of the teacher at Oneida of $50. At the Sault Ste. Marie there is an expenditure of $2,220, most of which has been granted before. This is made up by a grant of $60 to the 37 pupils. In Fort William there is a new branch for 20 pupils, at $50 a head. There is the annual grant to the Indian boys of Manitoulin Island of $1,500. In New Brunswick there is an item for schools of $1,800. These Indians have no funds of their own.

Mr. MITCHELL. They have the Indian lands, and the timber lands out of which some funds are drawn by the Government, so they have funds of their own.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They have timber lands but they have no school funds.

Mr. DEWDNEY. In Nova Scotia there are salaries for teachers in eight places at $300 apiece, making $2,400, and there is $400 to cover the cost of a schoolhouse at Shubenacadie, which is a re-vote.

Mr. LISTER. These expenditures do not appear in the Auditor General's Report. If this report is to be of any use to the House, these expenditures should appear as well as the others. Will the Minister say that they will appear next year?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Certainly. I have been surprised that the Auditor General has not asked for them.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Do I understand that, in these schools, the salaries of the teachers have been advanced, or is this expenditure for the opening of new schools?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Some of the salaries have been advanced.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I have received a communication from a teacher who is, I think, in the riding represented by my hon. friend from Algoma (Mr. Dawson), and he states that he gets only $25 a month for teaching in an Indian school, where the cost of living is fully double, and in regard to many items, three times as much as it is here. I do not think I will be charged with urging extravagant expenditure, but, in regard to these Indian schools, if they are doing good work, I believe the House would be disposed to be generous. This man is living on the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and in view of the difference of price that is only starvation wages. Beyond that he claims that he was not fairly treated in regard to some time which he had lost, and he says he sent reports to the Superintendent General through Mr. McFall, but he feared that, as had happened to him in a previous instance, his communication had not reached the department.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What is his name?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). His name is E. W. Lys, at Waubigon. He claims that he did not receive all the salary to which he was entitled, and it seems to me that he makes out a case for consideration. I do not know what is the average salary paid to the Indian school teachers, but, if we are to have progress made, the payment should be sufficient to secure, at all events, a moderately capable man. If the teacher is able to give something by way of presents to the pupils out of his own pocket, it works very well, and to keep a man at such a place on starvation allowance would be to defeat the object we have in view in establishing these schools, in helping forward the Indian children and making them more fit to take possession of the rights of citizenship.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The department has been steadily increasing the salaries of the teachers in the Indian schools to a moderate extent. At first, a great many of them were getting only $50 a year, and their salaries have been gradually inceased to $200 and $250, and now there is an effort made to provide for a uniform salary of $300—that is, that no one shall get less than $300. Very high educational requirements are not required for an Indian teacher. If he speaks English and Indian, and teaches the children to read and write the cipher, that is about all there is required. You cannot get men of high attainments to go into those schools at all, and $300 has been found sufficient to obtain the description of teacher required for these Indian schools. There may be particular cases where persons are put to such expenses that $300 would not be a sufficient inducement.

Mr. McDOWALL. I congratulate the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) on the position he has taken, and on seeing that, in out-of-the-way districts in the North-West, the cost of living is so high that the agents of the Government should be well paid. That is contrary to the view taken by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) when the Estimates for the Department of the Interior were before the House. I congratulate the hon. member for Brant on holding that the representatives of the Government, whether they be Dominion land agents or Indian school teachers, should be paid according to their services.

Mr. DAWSON. In regard to the salaries paid to the teachers of Indian schools in the district I represent, I am very glad to hear that they are to be increased to $300 a year. The salary to which my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) referred, $25 a month, is a high one in comparison with some, which amount to only $150 a year. There are learned men working for that amount in these schools, but they have very great hardships to undergo. The Indians help them, but they have in some cases to chop their own wood, build their own houses and live as the Indians do. The schools in Algoma should be somewhat extended. The Indian population is very large in that vast district. There are 10,000 or 12,000 Indians there, and there are not enough schools. The two industrial schools now in operation are doing good service. The Indians take readily to all sorts of handiwork, and those industrial schools are admirably conducted, and are producing a very great deal of good amongst the Indians. We would be better off if we had a few more of them. On the north coast of Lake Huron the game and fish are disappearing, and there should be some industrial schools there so that the Indians could be instructed in agriculture. Within the past few years they have made a good deal of progress.

Mr. McMULLEN. In reply to the hon. gentleman opposite, I would say that he has never heard me complain of the salaries that are being paid to school teachers. Whenever I have advocated a reduction in the items, they were referring to such men as Commandant Cameron and Mr. Chipman, and men of that stamp.

Mr. McDOWALL. I merely wish to say that I did not refer to Commandant Cameron, or to the other gentleman named by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen); but I was referring to the land agents in the North-West who, I believe, have a very important work to do.

Mr. MULOCK. Are the salaries of the school teachers charged against the Indian Fund? Does this vote that we are paying out of the Consolidated Fund of Canada, pay all the salaries, or do we have to dip into the Indian Fund?

Mr. DEWDNEY. A part is paid out of the Indian Fund. I have a list here showing what was paid to each teacher in Ontario and Quebec the last quarter; it amounts to $2,382. That is paid out of the Consolidated Revenue, and the other half is paid out of the Indian Fund.

Mr. MULOCK. When we talk about increasing salaries we have to remember that we are not merely dipping into the Consolidated Revenue Fund, but we are also affecting the Indian Fund. With regard to the qualification required for school teachers, while the remarks of the First Minister may apply generally, I think that with regard to some of the bands in Ontario he will require teachers of a higher grade.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; and they are paid much higher among the Six Nation Indians and the Indians of Brant.

Mr. MULOCK. I have visited some of these Indian schools, and I find the pupils as advanced as in some of the public schools.

Mr. DEWDNEY. In regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Brant, although the salary is fixed at $300, that is the minimum. If the average number of pupils is over 25 the teacher is allowed $12 per annum each up to 44. Where the attendance is large the teachers get more than $300, if below 25 he only gets $300.

Payment of Annuities under the Robinson Treaty... $15,588

Mr. DAWSON. Some years ago a return was presented to the House showing the arrears due to the Indians under the Robinson Treaty, and I think it was roughly estimated at $800,000; at all events, if my memory serves me, it was over half a million. Here is an enormous sum of money due to these Indians of whom we are now speaking. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) spoke of the funds for schools being taken from the Consolidated Revenue. In these arrears there is a fund which would provide for industrial schools and help the Indians to stock their farms with cattle and implements, and all that sort of thing. When the Minister of Interior brings down the information that was promised lately, I would like him to bring down such information as would give us an idea of how much is actually due in the shape of arrears to the poor Indians under the Robinson Treaty. I know that the matter is now being arranged between the Ontario and Dominion Governments. The land has fallen to the Ontario Government, and by a recent decision of the Privy Council, I believe the principle is sustained that the Province that gets the land ought to pay all claims upon it in the shape of Indian annuities. So I suppose the matter will now be settled.

Revote of amount voted last Session, but not expended, for the removal of the residue of the Lake of Two Mountains Indians from Oka to Township of Gibson... ..... $4,977 20

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the position of that arrangement?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The chief who is in charge of these Indians who removed to Algoma, has informed me how they were progressing. He states that they are in a very contented state, and anxious that their friends who had remained at Oka should join them. Some friends of the Indians remaining at Oka are endeavoring to persuade them to remove to Algoma, and I have reason to believe that in the course of another year a great many of them will join their friends there.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Those Indians who have been removed to the Township of Gibson are, I am happy to say, in a very prosperous condition, and there is nothing in their circumstances that should dissuade the remainder of the band from removing there also. They have abundant work in the mills, if they choose to take it, they are clearing land and putting up good houses. The only complaint that I have heard is that they have not been fairly treated by the Seminary; they complain that the promises of the Seminary, made at the time of their removal, have not been carried out. I would ask the Minister of Interior to ascertain whether that complaint is well founded, because if it is not, it is unjust to the Seminary, and it increases the ill-feeling among the Indians, and also prevents the remainder from removing.

Mr. MULOCK. I have had occasion for some years to bring before the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, a certain matter which I would bring to the attention of the Minister of the Interior, in whom I think I can discover an extreme desire to do justice all round. A Mr. Grant took up 100 acres of land in the township of Gibson. He cleared several acres and expended about $300 in building a house. Shortly afterwards this township, or at all events the land around him, was set apart as an Indian reserve, and Oka Indians were removed to his neighborhood. They were all around him, and so he thought they had a right to his land as well. In consequence of this incursion he abandoned his property to the Indians and withdrew from the township; and then he applied, himself at first and afterwards through me, to the department here for compensation, and up to this moment the question has never been adjusted. I observe that the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Tyrwhitt) has entered the Chamber and I should be glad, as he is familiar with the case, and as I have had some conversation with him on the subject, if he would add any information he possesses. I am satisfied that the party in question is entitled to fair compensation. I do not know that a legal claim could be established in the Exchequer Court; but the case is as I have stated it. The incursion of Indians took place into the whole township, and his neighbors became such, as he had never contemplated, that he had to abandon the settlement, and his improvements were taken possession of by the Indians. Under these circumstances this gentleman is entitled to compensation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think so from my recollection of the facts. The Dominion Government did not take possession of this tract or form it into a reserve. The circumstances were these: The Seminary were anxious to have the Indians removed from Oka. There was a dispute which had assumed a very irritating form. The Seminary advanced a sum of money, and the Parliament of Canada advanced a sum, and with those two amounts they purchased from the Government of Ontario these lots. They purchased them at a fair market price, $1 or 50 cents an acre.

Mr. MULOCK. Your Government negotiated with the Ontario Government and arranged the matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Seminary bought the land, and we supplemented their vote of money. Mr. Grant was there as a squatter, I suppose.

Mr. MULOCK. As a settler.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If he had a title he would have held his land. The Seminary had a right to buy the land for the Indians. They bought it for the Indians; the Indians went there like any whites or any other British subjects, and they had a right to go there and settle on those lots. Mr. Grant did not like his neighbors, and went away. There is no reason why the Indians should pay Mr. Grant.

Mr. MULOCK. I am not asking that the Indians should pay him.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Nor that the Government should pay him.

Mr. MULOCK. I think the Government should pay him. The Dominion Government caused the entire change that took place. It may be that the Seminary were desirous that the change should take place, but this Government arranged with the Local Government for the whole block of land. The Seminary may have supplied funds, but this Government was the moving power. The Government were anxious to place the Indians out of the scene of the troubles which had occurred before, and thought it better to remove them from their old associations and discord; and in doing so they surrounded this man with a class of neighbors he never contemplated.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The claim is against the Ontario Government if they improperly sold those lands to the injury of Mr. Grant.

Mr. MULOCK. The Ontario Government did not sell this man's land. This man's land continued his own, but the Indians whom the Dominion Government put there took possession of it. I ask the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Tyrwhitt) if he does not feel that there is an obligation resting on the Government in this matter.

Mr. TYRWHITT. I cannot say that I am equally familiar as the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) is as to the facts, but I am equally interested in the welfare of Mr. Grant, from the circumstance that I have known him my entire lifetime, for a great many years before the hon. member for North York was acquainted with the country. I am equally interested with him in Mr. Grant's welfare, and I should be only too glad to assist Mr. Grant in any way I can, provided it is in accordance with the rules of the department. I shall be only too glad to assist Mr. Grant either now or in any future time I can in accordance with the rules of the department.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I know something in regard to this matter, as I was sent on behalf of the Government to deal with the settlers, and the Government did remunerate all those who had made improvements. How Mr. Grant did not come to be remunerated I do not know. Compensation was paid to all settlers in the township of Gibson; but the purchase of the land was made by the Seminary, and I do not think this Government had anything to do with it. The bargain was between the Seminary, the Province of Ontario and the Oka Indians. The Dominion Government, as superintending Indian affairs, had something to do with it, but the money was paid by the Seminary. How Mr. Grant was not compensated I do not know, because compensation was made.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The others had no title, they were squatters. Mr. Grant owned the land.

Mr. MULOCK. The First Minister may remember these facts, but my impression is they are not correct, and I think he will find he is mistaken. I will tell the House how Mr. Mr. Grant was omitted. He had built a house and cultivated a certain quantity of land and his position was exactly the same as those to whom the Government made compensation; but it happened that he had rented his house and was absent from the township at the time the Government made the settlement, and he did not learn that the Government had taken possession of his property until sometime afterwards. His tenant took to flight when the Indians took possession, and he did not inform Mr. Grant of the occurrence; and when Mr. Grant put in his claim for settlement it was found that the others had been paid and he had been left out. That is how it came about.

Mr. O'BRIEN. He ought to be paid for his improvements.

Mr. MULOCK. I will ask the First Minister to look into the matter.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I will look into it.

Mr. MULOCK. And give an answer before we get through with Concurrence.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes.

Mr. TYRWHITT. Possibly what has brought this matter to the mind of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), is that I showed him a letter from Mr. Grant a few evenings ago. I had been to the department and had interested myself in Mr. Grant's case, which I think has been under consideration for some time. I do not think the hon. member for North York would have brought this matter up this evening had I not shown him the letter from Mr. Grant a few evenings ago.

Mr. CHARLTON. I desire to call the attention of the Minister of the Interior to a matter of some importance, and it is one that will come within his department. I received a communication some time ago from a gentleman by the name of Froude, with respect to the propagation and domestication of beaver. I referred the matter to the Minister of Agriculture, who told me that it would come more properly within the province of the Minister of the Interior. He sets forth in his memorial that the business of raising beaver can be easily and successfully prosecuted at moderate expense. That fur, as the hon. gentleman knows, is becoming very scarce and I think that the suggestions contained in the memorial are worth the consideration of the Minister of the Interior, and that a small sum expended in this way would be of great advantage to the country. Of course if the feasibility of beaver culture was once established, private enterprise would take the matter in charge and prosecute it successfully, but it will probably require Government aid to have the experiment made. I know that the experiment of raising and cultivating mink was made in one of the States of the Union some years ago and proved very successful, the result being that the quantity of fur was greatly increased and the prices reduced. From what knowledge we have of the production of fur-bearing animals there seems to be no doubt that the raising of beaver could be successfully engaged in. I would ask the Minister to give his attention to that memorial which is now in the hands of the Minister of Agriculture, and to give the matter that consideration which its importance deserves.

To pay A. Dingman $220

Mr. LISTER. Would the hon. gentleman state what the salary of Mr. Dingman is?

Mr. DEWDNEY. $1,700.

Mr. LISTER. I suppose his time belongs entirely to the Government, and such being the case I would ask some explanation as to why this additional pay should be given?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I think this is some old standing account that was settled by my predecessor. I presume Mr. Dingman accompanied the superintendent when he made the negotiations. I do not know the particulars of it, but there must be some special reason for it, because he was paid by Order in Council.

Mr. LISTER. He being a permanent officer of the department, I cannot understand why he should receive an additional salary, but I suppose the hon. gentleman is not able to give an explanation as it was before his time. Before we pass from the Ontario Indian items, I might remind the First Minister that a year or two ago I brought to his attention the fact that an investigation was going on on the Indian reserve at Walpole Island and on one or two other reserves in Ontario. At the instance of several Indians who claimed that they belonged to the tribes which were only entitled to the Indian annuities, and that certain other Indians who had come into the reserve years and years ago, were not so entitled although they had married and intermarried, their children and grandchildren, and great grandchildren are now living on these reserves and have received annuity moneys for years and years and although they were received into the bands at different times by resolutions at their council meetings. Some few of the Indians had made claims that these Indians I have mentioned were foreigners and not entitled to participate in those annuities. Now, the Indians who are complained against, in every instance, form the majority of the bands. They have been admitted, properly or improperly, I do not know which, but they have intermarried with the members of the other tribes, they have located on the lands and become regular members of the bands so far as we know. In addition to this, all these Indians, with the exception of five or six in the band to which I have particular reference, have petitioned the Government that this investigation should be stopped. At this late date, after forty or fifty years, when nearly all proof as to how they were admitted into the band has disappeared, it would be manifestly unjust that these Indians should be declared by the department or by the decision of the commissioner to be no longer members of the band. I desire to point out to the Minister that this investigation, prolonged as it has been for nearly two years, is creating the greatest possible unrest on the reserves. Indians who formerly were industrious and lived at home attending to their farms, are day after day coming into town and letting their places run into a condition which I could hardly describe. The commissioner comes there once in a while and holds an investigation for a day or two, and his visit seems to resuscitate all the difficulties I have spoken of. I can assure the Government that the continuance of this investigation is doing great harm on the reserve. I know that there is evidence before the Government that this investigation is not wanted by the Indians generally, but only by the smallest minority of that tribe. On the reserve in my county the council have passed a resolution asking that this investigation should not be proceeded with, and in the interest of the Indians I would strongly urge on the Government to have this matter brought to an end. The Indians have got the idea that an act of injustice is to be perpetrated on them, and that feeling is growing worse from day to day and ought to be allayed at once.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I have looked into the matter to some extent, and the information I have received from the department is as stated by the hon. gentleman. I have not considered the question sufficiently to make up my mind regarding it, but I will take an early opportunity of doing so. Of course we do not want to do any injustice to any one.

Mr. LISTER. I do not pretend to say that.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice by the Auditor General's Report that this Mr. Dingman drew a salary of over $1,600 last year and also $240 for the Dundee Commission. I think it is extremely objectionable that men employed at respectable salaries should be permitted to double their pay by charging for extra services. I see now in the estimates $220 for this person while I am quite sure that he is getting the same salary as last year. This question of clerks being allowed to draw double pay has been brought before the House on several occasions and the Minister of Finance stated, when I brought the matter up before, that the number was largely increasing. I find that we have now on the list 483 officials, who are drawing money in addition to their salary. Clerks and officials of all kinds are getting to understand that once they are installed in office any little pickings they can collect, for extra services rendered, is sure to be acknowledged by the head of the department. Now, I think this should be put a stop to. A man who is drawing a salary of $1,600 a year, if asked by the department to attend to a little matter like this Dundee Commission, should be willing to do that without charging $10 a day while his salary is going on. I notice that this practice is increasing from year to year. Last year 400 were on the list, and this year there are 484 people who have been granted extra allowances of this kind.

Indians—Prince Edward Island..... $2,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the meaning of the increases of salaries in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The whole increase is in teachers' salaries. I fancy there was a representation made that the salaries were too small. They only amount to $50 or $75 a year.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to call the attention of the Minister of the Interior to the salary of the Indian agent at Inverness. I notice that he has not been paid in proportion to the salaries of other agents in eastern Nova Scotia. I hope the hon. Minister will look into the matter and see that he is put on a level with the other agents in Nova Scotia.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I propose to make that representation to my colleagues, and endeavor to get it carried out.

Indians—Manitoba and North-West Territories..... $941,146

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe a considerable decrease here. What is the cause of this, and how many Indians are at present under treaty obligations to whom we require to pay annuities?

Mr. DEWDNEY. This shows a decrease of something over $9,000. The number of Indians who are participating in annuities is 25,780 men, women and children, 95 chiefs, and 335 headmen. That makes something like 26,000 Indians.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. According to that, the Indians are costing us about $200 per family, which certainly does appear a very exorbitant sum indeed for us to expend in the maintenance of the Indian tribes. We ought to obtain all the results we possibly can for very much less than $40 per head for every man, woman and child. I do not want to go into a minute detail of these various items, but I think that plain fact will strike the people of Canada as showing that this is an exorbitant sum to pay.

Mr. MACDOWALL. As a resident of the North-West, I would say to the hon. member that if he possibly did go into the details, and if he knew the work which is being done in the North-West, the sum would not perhaps appear so exorbitant after all. The condition of the Indians is very different from what it was ten years ago. At that time they were wild men on the plains; to-day they are farmers cultivating their farms. The expenditure has been incurred in bringing them into this state of semi-civilisation; and considering the cost of transport and supplies in the North-West, I think an outlay of $38 per head is very small indeed. If the hon. member went through the industrial schools and saw the excellent work they are doing, he would find that the expenditure is being made in a very wise way indeed. The Indians have been taught to cultivate their lands and to produce what they need, and have made wonderful advances.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have, however, a very strong opinion that a very large proportion is spent to provide for hangers-on of the Government of the pattern of Mr. Webster and Mr. Smyth, and that a great deal of the money is entirely wasted, especially that which goes to Indian agents, farm instructors, and all that class of people.

I am not in the least convinced that we ought to be called upon to pay out of the pockets of the people, $200 on an average for every Indian family. Are the Indians, in the opinion of the hon. gentleman, increasing or decreasing?

Mr. DEWDNEY. On some of our reserves the Indians are increasing to a small extent, but on the majority they are decreasing, but not to a very large extent. As a whole the general health on the reserves has improved every year; they are becoming civilised and seem to live in a more cleanly manner. Although this appears to be a large amount, $138,000 is paid under treaty; there is also a certain amount of implements, seed grain, and other articles, for which we are obliged to pay under treaty. In regard to the education of the Indian children of the North-West, I feel very proud of the result. I have a return which shows that a larger amount of Indians there receive instruction than in Ontario or Quebec.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). With regard to the food supply of the Indians, it was explained some years ago that, as soon as they were on reserves and taught agriculture, they would become self-supporting; but the Government still have to provide food for these people. A large amount is also voted for industrial schools. My opinion is that the best possible school for the young Indians is to set them actually at work with the men who are farm instructors. The Indians were employed occasionally, but a very few of them were employed at all. They had an opportunity of seeing the process of farming carried on where these farms were established, and I think the result was that, at the end of three years, we had to buy the food in order that these instructors might be kept from starvation while they were drawing their wages. I do not know how far that condition of things has improved, or how far these people are able to produce their own means of subsistence for the wages which they get, but it seems to me that farm instructors sufficient in number to draw wages to the extent of $32,000, are sufficient in number to raise food for these Indians even if they were not doing anything for themselves. If these farmers were honest men and were paid according to results, they would be able to bring the Indians to the field and make them self-supporting. It seems to me that the department is a failure and must be considered a failure until these appliances that the Government have introduced can produce what food the Indians require, and more than they require for the means of subsistence.

Mr. DEWDNEY. If the hon. gentleman took the opportunity of coming to the North-West when I am there, I could take him through some of our reserves in the south or the north, and I think he would change his views in reference to this matter. We have now 29 instructors, and the other employés, who are mostly Indians, are 52 in number. If we were to put them on one piece of land and give them teams of oxen and so on, they might be able to raise plenty of food for the Indians, but that is not the purpose. These instructors are not there to raise food. We do not allow them to do that on their own places, because the Indians do the work. But for the Indian labor, we could not cultivate, as we are doing, some 8,000 acres of land. Last year we cultivated 6,783 acres. Almost every acre of that was ploughed and seeded by the Indians, and, although there are a great many Indians who are raising a great deal more than they consume themselves, we cannot take that out of their fields and give it to their next door neighbors. Because in that way we would destroy all their energy. We get all we can out of them. In the Birtle district, we have two agents, one clerk, one farming instructor, and two employés, who are half-breeds or Indians, and in that agency we have 1,165 Indians. In the Moose Mountain Agency, we have 273 Indians, and there we have an agent, a clerk, one instructor, and two other men who are Indians. On the Crooked Lake Reserve there are 647 Indians, and there we have an agent, a clerk, four instructors, and three other employés. These are continually with the Indians working with them from morning to night, but they do not raise any food for themselves. With regard to the supply farms to which the hon. gentleman referred, I may say that they were established in early days, before there was any grain in the country at all, and for the purpose of raising seed grain. They did their work comparatively well, but, when there was no further use for them, we got rid of them.

Mr. McMULLEN. It appears to me that the prices for implements paid in the North-West were in some cases very high. For instance, I find 142 cart wheels and axles for which $27 apiece was paid. I see also that 37 harrows were purchased at a cost of $32 apiece. I can hardly understand why we should pay such prices as that in the North-West. I see also that 53 ox-yokes were purchased at $7 apiece, and ploughs at $31 apiece, while breaking ploughs cost $25 each. I think in some of these items the price is very high, and I should like to know under what system these are obtained, whether by tender or otherwise? I suppose in Ontario you could buy a plough of the same kind as that for which $31 is paid here for $16 or $18, and I have heard it stated that these implements are sold in Manitoba at as low a price as they are in Ontario. I have heard of machines being sent there which could not find buyers, and so the shippers had to take what they could for them.

Mr. DEWDNEY. They are all bought by public tender. They are all advertised for at this time of the year, and the contracts are let a little later than this.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I think the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) must have made a mistake in reference to the agricultural implements and other things to which he refers, because I think he has usually contended that agricultural implements were very dear in the North-West, and now he says that bankrupt stocks, as I suppose, or large stocks, at any rate, are sent up to the North-West, and that implements can be bought there very cheaply. I wish there were more cheap implements for sale.

Mr. McMULLEN. The statement I made was that there had been large shipments of agricultural implements, in some cases taking lower prices than what otherwise might be got. More were sent than were needed, and under these circumstances the Government should have been able to supply themselves at a less cost than we see here. I would like to ask what provision is made for preserving these implements? Are they kept under cover, or are they outside?

Mr. MACDOWALL. I hope the Government will not buy implements in the manner described by the hon. gentleman. I believe that the only proper way is to advertise for tenders and take the lowest tender.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am pleased to see that there are more "fellows" from the North-West than one.

Mr. DEWDNEY. In the early days it was very difficult to protect the tools because it was difficult to build houses, even for our Indians or agents. But circumstances are changing, and if the hon. gentleman visited any of our reserves he would see that ample provision is made for protecting the implements brought to the agencies before they are distributed. Of course, after they get into the hands of the Indians, they are not so well cared for, but the Indians themselves are beginning to recognise the importance of storing their implements. It is the business of the farm instructor to teach them the necessity of doing so.

Mr. McMULLEN. I agree with the opinion of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that the exertions that we are making from year to year to teach these Indians to produce food for themselves, are to a large extent a failure. I was told by a party who had some experience with the Indians of the North-West, that on one reserve where the Indians had been supplied with seed potatoes, after the instructor had told them how to plant and as soon as his back was turned, they took the seed out of the ground and ate them.

Mr. DEWDNEY. That is an Indian trick. We have many little faults of that kind to contend against. I have known many old women on the reserves who will watch until every man has left the field, when they will dig up the potatoes that were planted and cover up the hills, and no one knew, until sometime afterwards, why the potatoes did not grow. But the Indians are learning better. With regard to the Indians raising something for themselves, I will read a letter I received a few days ago from one of our reserves:

"We have not used an ounce of contract flour for Muscowpetung's band for the last three months. We put in a little wheat on the lower farm and had it ground for the destitute. The farming Indians in most cases will feed themselves for sometime to come."

I have several reports of a similar nature, showing that they are progressing as fast as could be expected.

Mr. WATSON. I believe that contracts, as a rule, are let for the delivery of these tools on the reserve?

Mr. DEWDNEY. To be delivered on the reserve.

Mr. WATSON. I pointed out some years ago that if contracts were let for the different supplies to be delivered at certain points on the railway, and then contracts were let for their delivery from these points to the reserves, the supplies could be got by the Government much cheaper than they are to-day. The hon. gentleman has some practical knowledge of the way freights are carried in that country, and the great inconvenience it is for people who tender for small quantities of goods down east to be delivered in the west, and he knows how hard it is for them to make arrangements for the delivery of those goods from the railway stations to the reserves. I think that if a system was adopted of advertising for tenders for goods to be delivered at certain points on the railway, and then contracts were let to freighters to deliver those goods at the reserves, it would be much more satisfactory to the general public and to those who tender for the delivery of the goods. As it is at present, only large contractors can undertake to supply these goods.

Mr. DEWDNEY. There are some points on the railway where I think that might be done, but there are not many. All the supplies for the North and the North Saskatchewan, I think, would be better delivered under our present system, certainly with less inconvenience to us, and I do not think it would make much difference in the price. I know it has been the impression of a number of gentlemen here that it would be better if we had a central point at which all goods should be delivered, thence to be shipped into the interior. That course was adopted before I took charge of the Indians in the North-West, at a time very different from the present, when all the freighting was done by carts. It took me nearly two years to gather up the tools and implements scattered through that country at the time, which the contractors had failed to deliver. I think the time is coming when it will not be necessary to purchase so large a quantity of tools as we are doing now, for the reason that the Indians are learning their value and purchasing themselves. Heretofore, as hon. gentlemen know, when the Indians saw either tools or provisions, or anything of that sort in a storehouse, they liked to get them, and they will not leave the agent or the party in charge until they get something; if they cannot get an axe they will take a file. Now, however, many of them are buying tools and implements for themselves, with the money they make out of the surplus crops they have raised. So many of them are doing this that it accounts for the decrease which we have here in those articles. I can name at least five or six Indians, who, last year, bought self-binders themselves, and they are paying for them out of the grain they are raising from year to year. The fewer tools that we have to deliver at the agencies, the sooner we will be able to adopt the suggestion of the hon. gentleman, and keep a certain quantity at headquarters and then the agent can requisition for what he really needs.

Mr. MACDOWALL. Do I understand that the hon. gentleman advocates advertising for supplies for the North Saskatchewan, in local papers, so that local people can have an opportunity of tendering? We can obtain flour and beef in the country in which we advertise for those articles. Strong baker's flour, I suppose' is not expected, but good wholesome flour such as white people eat in the country.

Mr. DEWDNEY. We call for local tenders for all staples which can be supplied in the Territories. It must be good wholesome flour, or we shall be charged with feeding the Indians bad flour.

Mr. WATSON. I called the attention of the House two or three years ago to this matter, on account of statements made that while people might be able to tender for certain goods, it was impossible for them to calculate the cost of delivering them from the railway station to the reserves. I believe such a system as I have spoken of might be adopted. It would be doing away with the middlemen and large contractors, and divide the trade between the manufacturers of the east and freighters of the west. In regard to flour, no doubt the member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall) is making a sufficiently good flour at Prince Albert to enable him to tender for flour for the Indians. I hope the time may come when it will not be necessary to supply so many implements to the Indians. I call attention also to the fact that the Yellow Quill band on the Assiniboia are not on their reserve, and, therefore, they should not receive annuities.

Mr. DEWDNEY. We have endeavored to get them on their beautiful reserve on Swan Lake, but have not been successful. I do not think we can deprive them of their annuities.

Mr. McMULLEN. I see we have paid $60 and $70 per head for cattle last year, and there is an item of $34 for cattle driving. Might not the Indians be employed in this work as well as freighting, for which $113 was charged?

Mr. DEWDNEY. We endeavor to give the Indians all the freighting we have, but we have to pay them for doing it. Wherever we can utilise the Indians we do so, but we have to pay them. With regard to driving the cows, they no doubt had to be delivered on some distant reserve, and were driven by Indians who had to be paid.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. $70 per cow seems rather a large sum, unless they were some of the Valancey Fuller's cattle or pedigree cattle.

Mr. MACDOWALL. Cows in the North-West bring $60 per head.

Mr. WATSON. $70 is a very high price. From the explanation of the Minister it appears that these cattle had to be driven some distance to a reserve. In Birtle district, two or three years ago, when supplies were required and some cattle, tenders were invited, but unfortunately for the people living there, they had no notice until two days after the tenders were received. I happened to be in the district and there was great dissatisfaction among the people; and increased prices have to be paid for articles by the Indian Department because tenders are not invited in the locality where they are required.

Mr. MACDOWALL. $60, $65 and as high as $70 was the regular price for cows in the North Saskatchewan district. At present, I am sorry to say, they would not realise very much, because there is no sale for anything there.

Mr. WATSON. On what reserve were the cows delivered?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I know that they were tendered for and let by contract, but I cannot tell where they were delivered. I will furnish the information. I am anxious to know myself.

Mr. WATSON. I know that in Manitoba you can buy a very fair milch cow within the last two years at from $25 to $30. The price, as the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Macdowall) says, has been very low, and it appears to me that this is a very high price to pay.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not think that the hon. gentlemen opposite should blame us for detaining them on these items. I can remember when hon. gentlemen took up a whole night's discussion about some old woman's cow which was killed. I find that there were 24 sheep purchased here at $24 a pair, and I would like to know if the raising of sheep has been found to be successful in the North-West?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes. Wherever we supplied the Indians with sheep they have taken very great care of them and they are now utilising the wool in some reserves. They have a spinning wheel on one reserve and they make their own socks and mits; they took the contract last year to supply one of the industrial schools with mittens. The first establishment supplied was on the Moosomin reserve and the sheep were wonderfully successful there. At one time they had a credit of four or five hundred dollars from the sale of surplus sheep.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am glad to hear that the raising of sheep has been successful in the North-West, because some farmers who have gone from my own district to Manitoba have sent back very poor accounts of the growth of sheep there.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I see there is a large item here for flour. How much is there in a sack?

Mr. DEWDNEY. One hundred pounds. Every bag is weighed to see that it contains that.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I find that the price is about $5.40 a barrel, may I ask if it is furnished by tender?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes; every sack of flour that is used is purchased from the lowest tenderer.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The price that is paid for the flour is altogether beyond the market value of flour at that time.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The price depends a great deal on where it has to be delivered.

Mr. McMULLEN. $25 per pair for blankets and 60 cents a yard for étoffe seems to be very high prices. I would like to know who furnishes these things?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I think they are furnished by Mr. Garland, of Ottawa. They are very good blankets, and the étoffe is of very good quality.

Mr. McMULLEN. That appears to be a very high price for Indian clothing.

Mr. DEWDNEY. You have got to get good materials or they would be of no use.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is quite clear that very extravagant prices are being paid for these supplies, and I am of opinion that in view of the large number of railways there are in that country we ought to be able to supply the Indians cheaper than we do now. I hardly blame gentlemen from the North-West encouraging the Government in the expenditure of money, for they do that on all occasions. From the time they had the war up there they seem to appreciate large expenditures in that section of the country. If we get value for the money spent it is all right, but I think we should endeavor to cut down the cost of a great many of the commodities supplied. $22 for ploughs and $150 for ordinary reapers that we ought to be able to buy for $75 is too much. We ought to put a stop to that kind of thing. I hope that the hon. gentleman now installed in the office of Minister of the Interior will endeavor to get these items reduced, and that he will see, as I am sure he will, that we get value for the money we spend.

Mr. MACDOWALL. The hon. gentleman has made a remark with reference to the North-West members, which I do not think should be allowed to pass without comment. He says that their object is, and that they do everything they possibly can, to have money recklessly expended in that country.

Mr. McMULLEN. I said nothing about reckless expenditure; I said they were inclined to encourage the expenditure of money in the North-West.

Mr. MACDOWALL. With that qualification I am quite willing to accept the hon. gentleman's statement. As long as it is a wise expenditure the members for the North-West are always willing that money should be expended for the benefit of the country.

Mr. DEWDNEY. It is not fair to criticise the price of these implements unless you can state the point at which they are delivered. In some cases the freight often costs as much as the implement itself. All I can tell the hon. gentleman is, that if the Government thought proper to put it in the power of any man to go and buy the implements, or anything else required by the Indians, by private contract, it could be done and money saved, but that would not satisfy hon. gentlemen opposite. Immediately the Government did that we would be told that we were acting improperly, and I think we would be. The only thing we can do is to buy by tender, and we cannot do anything but give the contract to the lowest tenderer.

Mr. CAMPBELL. We are furnished here with a detailed statement of the prices of supplies, and it is not mentioned where they were purchased. We bought a large amount of bacon which cost 15 cents a lb. and for beef we paid 8 cents a lb. It seems to me simply monstrous to talk about having to pay 8 cents a lb. for beef in a country like the North-West. Then I find that teams were hired for $1.25 per day for each team. There is evidently something wrong in that, for you cannot get any team I am sure in the North-West for that price.

Mr. WATSON. The Minister cannot wonder at the Opposition criticising these items, because we find that in one instance oxen cost $87.50 each, and in another instance only $59 each. With regard to the supply of meat, it appears to me that in a country like the North-West, where cattle can be grown so easily, the Government should find some means whereby the beef for the Indians should be raised in the vicinity of the reserves. It seems strange that the Government should pay 15 cents a lb. for pork in a country where beef could be raised by the department at a cheaper rate than 8 cents a lb., and I believe the Indians would be much better pleased at having fresh beef furnished to them. I have a vivid recollection that when the Indians complained of the pork that was fed to them, I think, under the superintendence of the hon. gentleman who has now charge of this department, they actually agreed to take three-quarters of a pound of fresh beef in preference to a pound of pork. The Indians ought to be furnished with beef at a lower rate than pork.

Mr. DEWDNEY. At one season the Indians are very anxious to get beef, and at the other to get pork; you cannot depend on them in that respect. We do supply beef whenever we can from settlers, as close to the reserve, where it is consumed, as possible. It does seem singular that in our great western cattle country we are paying 8 cents a pound for beef, while in Assiniboia, in the neighborhood of the reserves, it only costs 5 or 6 cents a pound. We have found it profitable to send beef from the Touchwood Hills to Morley. The demand for beef in the North-West is very large. Last year all the surplus steers were shipped to England, and the shippers said they made more money in that way than they would have done by the Indian contracts. I fancy that this year we shall have trouble with regard to our beef, because we shall feel the shortage which took place in calves three years ago.

Mr. WATSON. Where cattle can be raised so easily as they can in the North-West Territories, and where the Government have farm instructors, would it not be possible for the department to raise their own beef?

Mr. DEWDNEY. We are supplying one or two of our reserves with some two-year old heifers for that very purpose. Two years ago we did that on a reserve on the Qu'Appelle River north of Regina, and we got very satisfactory reports of the care the Indians took of the cattle. That is the nucleus of a herd of cattle which we propose to keep for that very purpose. We are doing the same thing at Fort Pelly this year, and part of the present vote is for that purpose. I should have asked for money this year to do the same thing on many other reserves if I had not found the vote so very large. It has only been within the last two or three years that we could trust our Indians with cattle in that way. They are beginning to understand our ways better, and are not as hungry as they used to be, and I propose every year to make some advance in that respect. On our western reserve among the Blackfeet and Bloods they will not accept cattle, which they might have accepted under the treaty, because somebody has put it into their heads that if they raise cattle their rations will be stopped.

Mr. WATSON. No doubt the ranchmen and the contractors object to the Indians in the North-West keeping cattle. It would be more important to try and raise the beef in that district for the Government than in Qu'Appelle and other places.

Mr. DALY. It may interest the hon. gentleman who has just spoken to know that nearly all the beef that was supplied the Battleford agency was purchased in his own constituency. Although the hon. gentleman may advocate the encouragement to Indians to raise cattle on their own reserves, his own constituents would not be too well pleased to see that done.

Mr. WATSON. I do not wish to see the people of this country taxed for the benefit of any other people in my district, and am quite satisfied that the people I represent will thank me for trying to reduce expenditure.

Industrial Schools..... $128,094

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are the Indian pupils supported as well as taught?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Both.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the average cost per head?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The Qu'Appelle school last year cost $78 per head; Battleford, $233 per head; St. Joseph school, which is at High River, cost $231 per head.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are not those exorbitant?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I do not think so. They compare favorably with the expenses of similar institutions in the United States.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How many pupils are there in each school?

Mr. DEWDNEY. In the Qu'Appelle school, 70 pupils; in Battleford, 45 pupils; in St. Joseph, 27 pupils. Comparing these schools with American institutions, I find that in 13 of the States six cost, for officers, an average of $3,070 per annum; while the Qu'Appelle school cost $2,100; the Battleford, $2,040; and the St. Joseph, $2,800.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Government intend to provide any sum for the Industrial school carried on at Portage la Prairie.

Mr. DEWDNEY. On several occasions I have had applications for assistance to that school, but refused. The Indians who attended them are those hanging round the Portage, who should be on the reserve.

Mr. WATSON. These Indians have been over twelve years around the town, and this school is well worthy of some assistance from the Government. I know several of the pupils, and they can read and write fairly well. Now the agent, Mr. Ogilvie, reports favorably as to the working of the school. I think this is one of the cases where the Government should grant some assistance. They are inducing the Indians to keep their huts in better shape and to wear better clothing and to keep themselves clean, and I think they should be encouraged by the Government.

Mr. McMULLEN. Do we board these teachers in the industrial school, or do they board themselves?

Mr. DEWDNEY. All the officers of these establishments are boarded.

Mr. McMULLEN. I observe that we pay them $1,200 or $1,300 a year.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The principals of those large institutions were engaged at that figure when the institutions were started. Looking at what is paid in the United States, I think it is a large salary, but having engaged those gentlemen at that salary, we do not like to reduce the salaries. However, in future, we propose, in any new institution, to lower the salaries for the principals.

Mr. WATSON In the Indian school at Portage la Prairie, they feed and clothe the pupils, and they do not get any pay. I think the Presbyterian Church subscribes $200 a year, but I think that school deserves support from the Government.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I will take a note of that.

Mr. McMULLEN. There is a large increase, nearly $8,000 for maintenance under this head.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The department has decided that it would only employ married men on the reserves, and consequently we have to ration the whole family. That is one reason for the increase. We have also established new agencies, one at Fort Pelly and one at Onion Lake. The increase in the price of flour is also quite an item.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see that, under the head of general expenses, there is an increase of nearly $17,000. I notice further that last year $84,000 is put down for salaries. I suppose the salaries might average about $1,000 a year.

Mr. DEWDNEY. From $1,000 to $1,200.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That would represent about 80 agents, and that seems to be a very large number of agents for 5,000 families of Indians who seem to be looked after.

Mr. DEWDNEY. There are nineteen agents.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Nineteen agents cannot consume $84,000 in salaries. The hon. gentleman will see that the amount for salaries is $84,237, and there is also an amount for travelling expenses of $30,000, and the hon. gentleman has just mentioned that the average salary is from $1,000 to $1,200. What does the $84,000 for salaries represent?

Mr. DEWDNEY. This includes the whole of Manitoba and the North-West. In the North-West alone, there are nineteen agents, fourteen clerks, twenty-five instructors and fifty-two other employés, who, however, do not come under the item. Then we have the expenses of the Regina office, out of which is paid the salary of the Indian Commissioner, the Assistant Commissioner and several clerks there, amounting altogether to $21,580. Then there is the survey branch which is included in this, and the two inspectors of reserves and two school inspectors. The amount paid out of this for the chief surveyor's salary and the inspectors is $8,420.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is a large sum for two inspectors.

Mr. DEWDNEY. They get $2,400 each and travelling expenses.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see a separate item of $30,000 for travelling expenses. That is in last year's accounts.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I do not think you will find it in this year's vote.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not able to know how you are going to divide this year's vote, but I see that last year the amount paid for travelling expenses was $29,921, in addition to $84,237 for salaries.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I thought that I had the details of the whole, but I have only details of the increases over the last year's vote, but I will get the particulars to-morrow. In the Birtle agency there is an increase in the clerk's salary from $720 to $900; increase of the interpreter's salary from $25 to $30 per month; rations for families of employés, $120. Duck Lake, new agent's salary, $1,000; agency buildings, $1,200; Moose Mountain agency, a clerk, $600; and an increase in the salary of the interpreter, $60. Crooked Lake, increase in agent's salary, $1,200 to $1,400. That is the highest salary we pay any agent. He is Colonel McDonald, no doubt well known by hon. gentlemen here, who has been in the service since 1874. On the Assiniboine reserve the agent's salary was increased from $1,000 to $1,200. At Muscowpetung's a cattle herder has been appointed specially to look after the herd of cattle that I mentioned a short time ago. Repairs to agency buildings, $350. A mower and rake have been bought to harvest hay for this herd of cattle. At the Carlton agency, agent's salary, $1,000; clerk, $600; interpreter, $120; travelling expenses, $160; sundry expenses, $200; stationery for office, $140. At Battleford there is a slight increase for clerk's salary. On the Blackfoot Reserve a blacksmith has been employed for six months. Extra rations for families of employees, $440. On the Blood Reserve, provision for a carpenter, six months, $300; rations to employees, $200. We had to provide for the new inspector of schools, Mr. Betournay, at a salary of $1,200, with $1,000 for travelling expenses. Repairs for building at Regina, $400. Then we have to pay for removing Indians to their reserve who have wandered away from them. Prizes to the most successful teachers in the Indian schools, $200.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I see some large items here for flour under general expenses. Can the Minister tell me who has the contract for supplying this flour? I find here that we paid over $60,000 for flour, and the price I am bound to say is at least $1.40 per barrel higher than the fair market value last year.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Where?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Where is this? I want to find out. We find that wheat only costs about 80 cents a bushel; according to that a fair price for flour would be $4 per barrel.

Mr. DEWDNEY. If that is on the North Saskatchewan, it would be worth probably $8 or $10 per barrel.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would like to know who has the contract, or if there is any chance of anybody else getting it?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The Messrs. Ogilvie had the larger share of it this year; Mr. McMillan of Qu'Appelle had a portion, also Mr. Joiner, of Fort Qu'Appelle; and the Regina mills had a portion of it. Five or six different parties supplied the flour last year. The Hudson Bay Company had also a portion of the contract.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would advise the Minister to build a mill up there and make his own flour.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I hope the Minister will not do anything of the kind. There are mills already there.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). We are told that the various articles bought in that section can be purchased as cheaply as they can in any part of Canada, or in the United States. If we go over the various items charged here, we must come to the conculsion that a greater price is paid than ought to be paid. I notice here an item for buckboard, $250. I also notice an item of $404 paid to the Indians for a celebration. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would tell me the number of Indians who attended the Brant celebration, by whose authority they were sent and the amount charged?

Mr. DEWDNEY. In regard to the item for buckboards, they are made specially for the work for which they are used and are made extra heavy for the inspectors. Buckboards can be purchased for $60 or $75, but they would not last an inspector two weeks, and when a man gets on the prairie he does not like to be left there. I have paid $125 for a buckboard These buckboards will carry 500, 600 or 700 lbs. Some Indians came down to attend the Brant celebration the year before last, including four Indians from McLeod agency and five or six Crees. They were here for some weeks and they attended the celebration, which no doubt did a great deal of good.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am satisfied that $125 for a buckboard is an extravagant sum.

Mr. WILSON. It is evident that excessive sums are paid for articles supplied in the North-West. I hope in the future we shall have a detailed statement of the cost, and tenders asked for.

Mr. DALY. Following the example of hon. gentlemen opposite I desire to ask for an explanation as to an item on page 3 E. 18, Keep-of-the-Rat, Manitoba Asylum, $64? I do this in the interests of my constituents.

Mr. DEWDNEY. He is one of our Indians, I presume.

Indians, B. C..... $74,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When will the Reserve Commission close?

Mr. DEWDNEY. If we did not look for speedy settlement of the interior it might close very soon, but if the population goes into the interior it will not be possible to do so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This reserve question is a pretty serious one. When the item was under discussion some years ago the Commission was expected to close within three years. That time and the amount voted have been very much exceeded.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The reserves are not very large, but they are very numerous and there has been great difficulty with respect to them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This has been going on for a great many years.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes; since the first Commission was appointed. The whole work of two of the Commissioners has had to be gone over again.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then all that work had to be practically thrown away?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes; virtually so.

Expenses of government, bridges, schools, &c., of the North-West..... $145,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I find there is an increase of $17,000 on the Estimates of last year.

Mr. DAVIN. If I remember rightly there is no increase here, but last year all the money was not all expended, and it is one of the things that the people of the North-West have at heart that the amount that is voted to the North-West should remain to its credit and should not be allowed to lapse.

Mr. DEWDNEY. There are some increases here. There is an increase of $500 for the travelling expenses of the Advisory Board, of $10,000 for schools, and for roads and bridges an increase of $10,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see that the Regina Leader figures very conspicuously in the accounts of the North-West. Is there any increase in the expenditure for the Regina Leader?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I do not see any particulars of an increase for the Regina Leader in the notes I have before me.

Mr. DAVIN. As the name of the Regina Leader has been mentioned once or twice——

Some hon. MEMBERS. The item is passed.

Mr. DAVIN. I apprehend I can speak whether it is passed or not. As the name of the Regina Leader has been mentioned once or twice here and as I have an interest in the company that publishes the Regina Leader I should like hon. gentlemen very much to go into the accounts of that company and to see the work that has been done for those items.

Mr. CURRAN. Life is too short.

Mr. DAVIN. Some hon. gentlemen seem to think that this amount is given as a lump sum to the Leader or to somebody connected with it. If they saw the blue-books nearly as massive as your own, Mr. Chairman, thousands of them printed to represent this amount, they would probably come to the conclusion that there was no advantage given to the Regina Leader.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Mr. DAVIN. I say there is no use crying "carried" at this time or any other time if I think it is necessary for me to speak. There are not throats enough in this House to cry "carried" if I think it is my duty to this House, or to myself, or to any one of my clients to speak. That item although appearing in those blue-books, belongs to the Territories. It is a Local Government account, and no doubt it appears here because we have under our management at the present day those Territories, but the funds that we vote here we do not vote as a sort of gratuity to the Territories. They belong of right to the Territories, and as I explained here when speaking some few weeks ago, we did not get by thousands of dollars anything like the amount the Territories are entitled to. I may say here on the part of that company and on the part of that paper so often quoted, that I challenge and invite hon. gentlemen to look into the items and to look at the specimens of the work done, which they will find in the library, and if they will enquire as to the wages paid in those Territories they will discover that there is full value given for what is received.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think I understood the hon. gentleman to say that he is personally interested in the Regina Leader.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would like to ask if the hon. gentleman has forgotten section 16 of chapter 11 of the Revised Statutes of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. DAVIN. I am perfectly well aware of that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understand that this Regina Leader, in which this hon. gentleman is interested, has a contract with the Government, and I wish to call the attention of the House to that section of the Act which says:

"In every contract, agreement or commission to be made, entered into or accepted by any person with the Government of Canada, or any of the departments or officers of the Government of Canada, there shall be inserted an express condition, that no member of the House of Commons shall be admitted to any share or part of such contract, agreement or commission, or to any benefit to arise therefrom; and in case any person, who has entered into or accepted, or who shall enter into or accept any such contract, agreement or commission, admits any member or members of the House of Commons to any part or share thereof, or to receive any benefit thereby, every such person shall for every such offence forfeit and pay the sum of $2,000"

I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that under the hon. gentleman's own statement, made from his place in this House, and under his own responsibility, the hon. member is receiving a benefit from this contract, and I ask that the Minister of Justice should institute proceedings.

Mr. DAVIN. If you wish to proceed yourself, you will get half of the fine.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I wish to call the attention of the House also to the fact that in the Interpretation Act, the word "personal" means a body corporate. The hon. gentleman is contravening the 16th section of chapter 11 of the Consolidated Statutes, and is liable to a penalty of $2,000. I hope the Minister of Justice will consider this.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I shall.

To provide for the payment of Mr. Fabre's salary and the contingencies of his office..... $2,500

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Fabre sent us one immigrant, I am credibly informed, as the result of three years' labor. When is the second one to be sent?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think this is a perfectly shameless vote which we are asked to make every year. There have been no returns, and hon. members know that there are none, and for one I will raise my protest against it if we do not divide the House upon it on Concurrence. Nobody attempts to justify it, and hon. members know in their own conscience that it is $3,000 thrown away every year. In point of fact, you pension a man to live in Paris the year round. It is a disgraceful item.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I think the First Minister promised a report to the House on this matter, and if we have not the report, we ought to have some explanation from some member of the Government. Perhaps the Minister of Public Works can tell us how many French-Canadians who have gone to France have been returned through the labors of that man.

Mr. McMULLEN. We should certainly have some explanation with regard to this item. It is an outrageous thing that year after year we should have a vote of this kind to enable a man to live in state in Paris who is doing nothing for the country, simply because he is some relative of a Minister or some hanger-on of the Government. We contend that there is no work that he performs for the salary he draws. If he is really a hanger-on, or some relative of a member of the Government, and has to be kept somewhere, let us bring him home and board him here; we can do it here at much less expense than in Paris. We are entitled to some explanation, and we will not allow the item to pass until we get it.

Mr. FOSTER. This is not a new item, and explanations have been given each year. The Minister of Agriculture who is responsible for it, is not here, and the item can stand.

Commercial Agencies..... $10,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What are you going to do with this?

Mr. FOSTER. Last year and the year previous, out of the vote was taken the expense of sending delegates to the West Indies and South America. This year I am trying to perfect a plan by which the money will be spent more in accordance with the nature of the vote, with the view of ascertaining if there cannot be some real commercial agencies established in certain ports. I think a feasible and good plan can be arranged, and it is with that view that I ask the vote this year,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is it the intention of the Government to introduce a system of consular agents?

Mr. FOSTER. I am looking into that whole subject, and when the House meets another year, I think I shall have a plan which will commend itself to the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If you are going to have a system of consuls for the Dominion of Canada, it will cost more than $10,000 before you get through with it, and we had better consider well such a scheme before we commit ourselves to it. Only about $1,300 were expended in 1888. How much does the Minister expect to expend in the current year?

Mr. FOSTER. Probably $2,000 or $3,000.

Mr. WATSON. I would like to ask the Minister if a settlement has been made with Mr. Wood, who went to Australia?

Mr. FOSTER. So far as I know, Mr. Wood has been paid his travelling expenses, and that, I think, is due to him. I do not think there was any arrangement made for salary. He offered his services gratuitously, and we agreed to pay his expenses.

Mr. WATSON. I understood from Mr. Wood that he was to receive a fair remuneration from the Government for his services.

Mr. FOSTER. That is not my understanding.

Survey, construction of roads, bridges and other works in connection with the hot spring reservation near Banff Station, N.W.T..... $20,000

Mr. McMULLEN. We would like to get some explanation of the money spent on Banff Springs. Last year there was $40,000 spent.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I am not aware of the expenses of the previous year, having had nothing to do with Banff Park except to visit it. But I find that a great deal has been done in the way of making roads and bridges. This year the expense is only $20,000, and in future we propose to keep down the expenses. I had a memorandum prepared to inform the House of the details of what had been done, but did not expect it would be required to-night.

Mr. McMULLEN. Seeing that we have expended a large amount of money there, nearly $40,000, this item should be allowed to stand until the hon. gentleman can give us the information required.

Inspector and Registrars, and Contingencies..... $15,160

Mr. McMULLEN. How many registrars are there and inspectors and what are their salaries?

Mr. DEWDNEY. This is the first time this item has been voted by itself. Previous years it was included in the North-West Government item? The registry office includes the registry books, stationery, furniture, and we allow for that $3,400. At Winnipeg, Mr. Scott is the registrar and he gets $2,000. Mr. Sproat is registrar at Prince Albert, and he gets $1,200. J. A. McLean, registrar at Alberta, gets $1,200. G. Roy of North Alberta gets $1,200; and J. A. Montgomery $1,200. This makes the $6,000 in salaries. Two clerks in the Regina office get each $730. A clerk in the Alberta office gets $730, and the inspector at the registry office, Mr. Barker, gets $1,600.

Mr. McMULLEN. We employ an inspector at $1,600 to look after five registry offices. We have only one inspector for the registry offices in Ontario. Some of the officials connected with the Interior Department might do that inspecting, and save this $1,600 a year.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Mr. Barker was appointed specially to instruct the registrars in the new system. Up to this time he has been constantly employed at that work, and in the event of a registrar not being able to attend to his duties we must find somebody to put in his place, and Mr. Barker is now doing the work for a sick registrar.

Resolutions reported.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 1:40 a.m. (Thursday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 11th April, 1889.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORT.

Annual Report of the Department of Fisheries for the year 1888.—(Mr. Tupper.)

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 133) for the better securing of the safety of certain fishermen (from the Senate).—(Mr. Jones, Halifax.)

CHEESE EXPORTED TO ENGLAND.

Mr. VANASSE asked, Whether the Government are aware that certain cheese dealers in the United States are in the habit of marking on cheese exported by them to England via Montreal, the words "Canadian Product," greatly to the detriment of the real Canadian article in the English market; and do the Government propose to adopt means to put an end to this fraud, which involves consequences greatly prejudicial to the Canadian producer?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government are aware, from general report, that certain cheese dealers in the United States are in the habit of marking on cheese exported by them to England via Montreal, the words "Canadian Product." The subject having thus been drawn to the attention of the Government, we shall consider means for preventing this fraudulent practice. These frauds ought to be checked, and this can only be done by enacting some legislation pointing directly to the fraud.

RAILWAY SUBSIDIES.

Mr. COUTURE asked, Whether the Government intend to comply with the request of the large and important deputation from Chicoutimi and Saguenay and grant them the railway subsidies applied for?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government have under consideration the request and the representation of the large and important deputation from Chicoutimi and Saguenay on this subject.

T. BOURGEOIS.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, Whether the Government are aware that Mr. T. Bourgeois, Post Office Inspector for the Three Rivers division, has been sick and unable to perform the duties of his office for several months past?

Mr. HAGGART. No interruption has taken place in Mr. Bourgeois' correspondence with the department, nor has any intimation been made of his inability to attend to his duties.

WHARVES AT LAKE ST. JOHN.

Mr. COUTURE (Translation) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to build two wharves at Lake St. John, the one at Roberval and the other at Metabetchouan Post; and what sums will be granted for these works?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) The attention of the Government was drawn to the necessity of these wharves at Lake St. John, by the deputation which came here the other day from Lake St. John. The Government have, as yet, taken no action in the matter.

REPAIRS TO THE WHARF AT ST. ALPHONSE.

Mr. COUTURE (Translation) asked, Whether the Government intend to issue orders for the use, in repairing the wharf at St. Alphonse, of the timber prepared by Benjamin Simard, by order of the Government Inspector of Works, and since rejected for political considerations?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I cannot answer the question put by the hon. member, on account of its not being drawn in a proper language.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That Government measures shall have precedence on every Monday during the remainder of the Session, after Questions put by Members.

He said: I submit this motion with a view to secure prorogation by Easter, and no doubt the proposition will be hailed with pleasure by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. That will depend a great deal on the future intentions of the Government. This motion, I apprehend, indicates that the right hon. gentleman is willing to fix an approximate day for prorogation. Still, I must call his attention to the fact that much business yet remains on the Order Paper. We have Bills relating to Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes, to amend the Summary Trials Act, to amend the Revised Statutes respecting Interest, to amend the Summary Convictions Act, respecting Militia and Defence, relating to Bills of Lading, and to amend the Copyright Act. Then we have resolutions respecting Judges' salaries; also Bills respecting the inspection of timber and lumber, to authorise the granting of pensions to the members of the North-West Mounted Police, respecting expropriations of land, and resolutions respecting loans to Mennonites. Besides, it is possible that the Committee of Ways and Means may sit again, because when the Finance Minister delivered his Budget speech, he stated that while he would not propose any important modifications of the tariff, some slight modifications might be necessary at a later period. Then there are the general Estimates, the Supplementary Estimates for the current year, and the Supplementary Estimates for next year; the last named have not yet been brought down. There is also a motion standing on the paper in the name of the Minister of Justice, indicating that possibly the Government may take up the Combines Bill. I observe by the Votes and Proceedings of to-day, notice of a Bill to amend the Inland Revenue Act. Besides, the Government promised, at the opening of the Session, that a measure would be introduced respecting mail subsidies for the Atlantic and Pacific services, and only a few days ago the First Minister intimated that the House would be called upon to consider a certain arrangement for the construction of a railway from Harvey to Salisbury. It is possible that, in addition to all these measures, railway subsidies may be proposed. All these measures go to make up a full bill of fare. If we are limited to the measures already on the paper, the House might possibly prorogue by Easter; but if we are to take into consideration, not only the measures on the paper, but also measures that have yet to be proposed, I must leave it to the hon. gentleman to fix when he expects prorogation to take place.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the hon. gentleman will see that the more Government measures there are on the paper, the greater necessity there is for the Government obtaining all possible time for their consideration. The hon. gentleman will, I think, admit that the Government have this Session advanced their business with all convenient speed, and that there has been considerable discussion on some measures. Perhaps, looking at it from the gallery, it might be said that there was a good deal more talk than was necessary. That I do not at all mean to say, but I merely make the remark en passant. The House has worked steadily during this Session, and the Government, I think, have pressed their measures with due promptitude. Of course, the reasonableness of the motion I propose to make to-day is to be governed more by the business which is not Government business, than by the business which is in the hands of the Government. Looking over the different public Bills and Orders, I do not think that there are very many measures that could be expected to be got through during the Session, even though it were protracted for some time, and the Government, I think, would be inclined, as far as the House would allow it, to take any measure on which there was no great difference of opinion, and have that transferred to the Government Orders, with the understanding, however, that it is not a Government measure, but placed there merely to expedite it on account of the short period to which the Session is supposed to extend. I would press that we want another day, even for the business on the paper, but we will have Supplementary Estimates, and we will have, I hope, a very moderate Bill for railway subsidies. All this can, I think, be disposed of, if you give us this one other day. It is a case of Oliver asking for more, and I think the hon. gentleman will grant it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But this is a Roland.

Mr. LAURIER. I have not at this moment any criticism, or even any comment to offer as to the way the business has been carried on. I must, however, take exception to what the right hon. gentleman stated, even though it was by way of a joke, that there has been too much talk during the present Session.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not at all say it came from the Opposition.

Mr. LAURIER. If it has been confined to the Government side I have nothing to say, but, before we discuss this matter further, perhaps the right hon. gentleman will consider it is quite appropriate to ask whether he proposes to have any adjournment at Easter?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In a matter of that kind I would submit to the convenience of the majority of the members of this House, but I should rather think that we had better adjourn on Thursday, the 18th inst., over Good Friday, until the Saturday before Easter Sunday, and sit again on Easter Monday.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear. As short an adjournment as possible.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I would suggest to the right hon. Premier that he would add to his motion, after questions put by members, the words "and the usual hour for private Bills," because we should have private Bills at the usual hour on Monday night.

Mr. MITCHELL. I entirely object to this motion of the right hon. gentleman. I think it is dealing very unfairly with the private members of this House, because, if he takes away Monday, we have not a single day to bring private matters under the consideration of Parliament. This is a complaint which I have made on many previous occasions, and the culmination now is, that every day is to be taken away from private members. If the hon. gentleman were making an effort to get through before Easter, I could well understand it, but he is going to have an adjournment at Easter from Thursday until Saturday.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Only for Good Friday.

Mr. MITCHELL. If there is going to be an adjournment over Easter, I do not think that the only day at the disposal of private members should be taken away. I put motions on the paper as early as the 20th day of February, and I have not been able to reach them yet. There are now over thirty motions of private members on the paper, and I should like to ask this House whether it is reasonable or fair that we should be foreclosed from bringing up these questions which our duty to our constituents calls on us to place before the House. I do not think it is reasonable or right, or that it should be conceded. Of course I am a very small minority in this House and therefore unable to influence it, but if I could I would prevent this motion being carried.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A minority ought to be counted not by numbers, but by strength, and although my hon. friend is not very strong in numbers he has got the other strength. On looking over the list of motions I find that my hon. friend has only got three on the paper.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is a good many, considering that I have not been able to get one yet.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think his first motion, in reference to the Derby Branch Railway, ought to be struck off the list, because, I think, it has passed.

Mr. MITCHELL. You said you would bring down the papers, and you have not done so.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. At all events, the order is passed. Perhaps the hon. gentleman can move his other motions now, and if the House will allow them to pass, we will grant them.

Mr. COOK. I move as an amendment to the motion:

That all the words after "That" be left out and the following substituted, viz.: Mr. Cook's resolution on the subject of granting Home Rule to Ireland be made a Special Order for consideration on Monday next.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would simply say to my hon. friend that I think that the majority of the members of this House want to exercise their home rule at home in Canada rather than in Ireland.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. MITCHELL. The right hon. gentleman understands that these three motions of mine on the paper are ordered by the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With the consent of the House, I have no objection.

Mr. LAURIER. May I ask the hon. gentleman if he intends to sit next Saturday?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No. The hon. gentleman has been a Minister and he knows that Saturday is a very convenient day to the Government. We want next Saturday in order to help us through the following week.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to ask again if it is clearly understood that my motions have been ordered by the House?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It can only be with the consent of the House that the three motions of the leader of the Third party be adopted.

Several hon. MEMBERS. Agreed to. Carried.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it my duty to acknowledge the courtesy which the right hon. gentleman has shown me on this occasion—and the whole House, too.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copies of all letters, reports, and correspondence had between Mr. George R. Parker and the Government, or any of its officers; and also between the Government and its officers, in relation to claims for land, and damages, in connection with the Derby Branch Railway.—(Mr. Mitchell.)

Copies of all papers and correspondence in connection with a claim of Messrs. A. and J. Adams for loss incurred by the wreck of their vessel Carrier Dove, caused by the change of lights at Crapaud Harbor, without due notice to the public.—(Mr. Mitchell.)

Papers, reports, returns and correspondence in reference to the condition of the railway subsidised by the Parliament of Canada, extending from the western end of the Derby Branch Railway to a connection with the Northern and Western Railway, in the County of Northumberland, New Brunswick; also all correspondence, &c., had between the Government, or any of its officers, and the proprietors of the said railway, with the object of opening it up and running trains thereon.—(Mr. Mitchell.)

SUPPLY—CAPE BRETON RAILWAY.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. FLYNN. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I desire to bring the question of the location of the Cape Breton Railway before the House. Two years ago, when it was announced by the Government that it was their intention to build that railway by the Grand Narrows, the people of Cape Breton became very much alarmed, and their alarm took the practical shape of holding public meetings, and sending delegates to protest against the adoption of that route. The counties of Capes Breton and Richmond sent delegates in the winter of 1887, who urged, among other reasons, that it was a departure from the well expressed intentions of the Government and Parliament, of building the line through Cape Breton, as a continuation of the Intercolonial Railway, by the southern route via St. Peters. They urged many reasons—that that route was shorter, was easier of construction, and was to terminate at an open winter port. Notwithstanding all these reasons, the Government adopted the route by which they are building the road at present, but with the assurance that the Grand Narrows would not be bridged. That a steam ferry could and would be operated there. I propose, in dealing with this question, to show, in the first place, that during the many years the railway was discussed here, it was understood that it was to be a continuation of the Intercolonial Railway, viâ St. Peter's, to Louisburg and Sydney; in the second place, that the cost of the route by the Grand Narrows will far exceed the cost of the southern route—will, in fact, give two roads on both sides of the Island; in the third place, that the Grand Narrows route will not accommodate the majority but only a small minority of the people, and cannot aid in developing the resources of the country, as it will not pass through any great agricultural or mining district in the island; and, in the fourth place, that the building of a bridge at Grand Narrows will obstruct the navigation of the Bras D'Or, and render St. Peter's Canal, which was constructed at a cost of three-quarters of a million dollars, comparatively useless. When discussing this question on a former occasion, I was met by the senior member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) with the taunt that the electors of Cape Breton had confirmed the selection of this route in 1887. I propose to show that that statement was not accurate. At that time there were seven candidates in the field, and that is what saved the hon. gentleman and his colleague. Five of those candidates were opposed to the route; in fact, his colleague was opposed to it, and expressed his disapprobation of it in both public and private, but he said that as the Government had selected the route, he, as a good and faithful Tory, would support it. Mr. McDougall polled 1,882 votes and Mr. Murray polled 1,702 votes. If you take the vote polled by Mr. Gillies, 890 and that polled by Mr. Moseley, 539, they make together a total of 3,131, as against the 1,882 polled by the hon. gentleman and his colleague, or a majority of 1,249 against the Grand Narrows' route. The vote polled on that occasion clearly shows that a majority were against the route by the Grand Narrows; but there were other reasons. The Government, when they had made up their mind to build the road by the Grand Narrows, determined, as the leader of the Government decided at that time to dissolve the House, to keep dangling before the electors the railroad without definitely announcing what route they would adopt; but for some reason the Government were forced to show their hand, and a contract was entered into on the 28th of January; and in midwinter, on the 8th of February, ten days after the contract was signed at Ottawa, the contractors were in Sydney. The papers were immediately filled with advertisements for supplies, laborers and everything else; there was a great flourish of trumpets in reference to this railway; the contractors who were sent there especially in the interest of those two members, did everything they could for them. But, as soon as the elections were over, all this ceased, and the 95 miles of road which the contractors were to commence in midwinter, and which were to be constructed from day to day until they were completed, are not yet half completed; and what is more, the laborers on that section between the Grand Narrows and Sydney, who have given their honest toil, are yet unpaid for the work they then performed. The contract was taken for the eastern end by Sims & Slater; the Government held a deposit of $50,000 for the due performance of the work; and what did we hear the other day when the question was asked if this deposit had been given up to the sureties of Sims & Slater? It was stated by the right hon. leader of the Government that the money had been given up, but that a bond had been taken for it. Now, we have the fact that to this hour these men are unpaid. Last Session this question was put, on the 30th of April, by the hon. member for Inverness:

"Whether the Government intend to adopt means to compel the sureties of Sims & Slater, contractors on the east end of the Cape Breton Railway, to pay laborers and others who were employed by them?"

The answer which was given by the Minister of Public Works was:

"Any legal means the Government may have to get these matters settled, of course, the Government will take."

Nearly twelve months afterwards—a few days ago—the question was again put, not by the hon. member for Inverness, but by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McDonald), whether it was the intention of the Government to pay the laborers who worked on the Cape Breton Railway for Sims & Slater and their sub contractors; and what was the answer? The answer on this occasion was given by the right hon. the First Minister himself. He said:

"It is not the intention. The surety, upon receiving the deposit, gave bonds to pay any legal claims for wages."

Now, as I have stated, the hon. gentleman, who took this deposit of $50,000 for the due performance of that contract, acknowledges to this House—when these contractors failed to perform the work and the contract was taken from them before completion, and while these laborers were unpaid and were clamoring, through their representatives, for payment—that he gave up the $50,000 security, and tells the laborers of Cape Breton that it is not the intention of the Government to see that they are paid, and that they can proceed on the bond. I had the cash, he tells them, it is true, and that was the only means in my power to protect you; but I gave it up to the sureties, and now you can proceed on the bond. This bond, we may presume, is but a worthless piece of paper, and we can easily foresee what slight chance of success the laborers will have of getting their dues by proceeding on the bond which the First Minister took after he gave up the deposit. Why was the deposit given up? I remember a noteworthy occasion in this House when the Government were charged with having thown away over $200,000 of the money of the people, by giving to the Messrs. Onderdonk the contract for building a section of the Canadian Pacific Railway. They were told that Messrs. Charlebois & Macdonald were lower tenderers by over $200,000, and they were asked: Why, then, did you throw away $200,000 of the people's money in accepting a higher tender? The answer was that Messrs. Charlebois & Macdonald's deposit of $20,000 was not good, because the cheque was only marked good for two days; and, although that deposit was made good until paid, because there was a telegram from Montreal to the bank here declaring that it would be good until paid, still the only answer the Government gave was that that deposit was not good. The Government must, in that case, have set some value by the deposit; but in this case, when the contractors failed to carry out their obligations, and there is a large amount due to the laborers, they gave up the deposit, and told the laborers to proceed on the bond. The laborers are still unpaid, and when they ask for the bread they have earned for their families, the hon. gentleman turns round, calmly, and says to them: There is the bond, proceed on it. Here is a Government which shows marvellous solicitude in the interests of the labor ing community of this country. Such is the solicitude the right hon. gentleman feels for the laboring classes, that he has had a labor commission sitting for the last two years, and which has not reported yet, and which has cost the tax payers of this country over $70,000—and for what? to show the great solicitude the right hon. gentleman has for the laboring classes of this country. And yet the poor laborers of Cape Breton are still unpaid. What language could I use sufficiently strong to denounce such a course of conduct as this? Here is a man who pretends he is so anxious for the welfare of the laboring classes of this country, that he has put the people to a large expense in connection with the Labor Commission, and who, in this instance, has given up the money he held as security for the payment of the laborers' wages, and then tells them to proceed on the bond. Let me refer to another point in the way in which he is treating the people of Cape Breton. When this work was commenced, it was naturally thought that the men of Cape Breton, many of whom had acquired experience in masonry work, and in other capacities particular to railway construction, would have had the first chance of employment. They did apply; but did they get work? No, Sir, it is a fact which the hon. gentlemen knows well, that men were sent from Quebec, Ontario, and Pictou, and different parts of Nova Scotia, as masons, timekeepers, and other capacities; and the young men of Cape Breton, who had the right to expect employment, and who were capable and experienced, were refused work, and Cape Breton was actually made a dumping ground for these other men. That cannot be denied. What is the fact to-day? On this very section that the Government have taken control of, and which the Government had let to favorites, these parties have left the laborers unpaid, and I am informed that up to this hour they are still unpaid. I hold the Government responsible for this. I now propose, in the first place, to show that it was always the intention that this Cape Breton road, when built, should be built vid St. Peter's, as a continuation of the Intercolonial Railway, having its open port at Louisburg or Sydney. I intend to be as brief at the nature of the question will admit, and will read an extract from the speech of Sir Charles Tupper, who was Minister of Railways in 1883. In introducing the Railway resolution, he said:

"It is proposed to give to the Great American and European Short Line Railway Company, for 80 miles, from Canso to Louisburg or Sydney, a subsidy of $3,200--not exceeding in the whole $256,000. The construction of this 80 miles will extend the great interocean system of railway communication to which we have been devoting so much time and energy for the last few years, from Port Moody, on the shores of the Pacific, to the easternmost part in the Dominion of Canada. The port of Louisburg is open all the seasons of the year, and by that port we have the shortest route to Liverpool, as the distance by way of Louisburg is 200 miles shorter than by Halifax."

Again, in the Session of 1884, Sir Charles Tupper moved the following resolution:—

"For the construction of a line of railway from Oxford station, on the Intercolonial Railway, to Sydney or Louisburg, a subsidy not exceeding $30,000 per annum for fifteen years."

We have also a memorial in 1884 signed by a large number of members of Parliament, in which they urge upon the Government:

"The extreme desirability of taking immediate measures for procuring the extension or connection of the Canadian Pacific Railway from Montreal to or with the following ports in the Maritime Provinces, to wit: St. Andrews, St. John, Halifax and Louisburg, by the shortest practical line."

We have also a memorandum signed by the five Cape Breton members, and the hon. member for Inverness was one of them who signed it. In that memorandum they say:

"'$3,200 per mile is inadequate for the construction of a line of railway from the Strait of Canso to Louisburg.' 'A railway from New Glasgow to Louisburg would prove a valuable feeder to the Intercolonial.' Again: 'A larger subsidy would be required to induce a company to undertake the Cape Breton section concurrently with other sections of the line from Montreal to Louisburg.'"

All these clearly point to Louisburg. The expressions and utterances of the hon. the Minister of Railways, and the hon. member for Inverness, on the floor of this House, only a few years ago, all point to Louisburg. Again, we have, as late as the Session of 1886, the hon. member for Inverness, on the 9th April, asking if it was the intention of the Government to provide for the extension of the Intercolonial Railway from Canso to Louisburg; and, on the 21st April, the Minister of Railways made this reply to the hon. member for Inverness:

"That negotiations were in progress looking to the extension of the Intercolonial Railway from Canso to Louisburg."

Again, during the same Session of 1886, Sir Hector Langevin moved a resolution, that it is expedient to provide that the Minister of Railways be authorised to construct a line of railway from a point in the Strait of Canso to Louisburg or Sydney. He said on that occasion:

"It was the intention of the Government to take the best line, the line that would be most feasible and most advantageous to the Island at large."

Mr. CAMERON. Hear, hear.

Mr. FLYNN. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." I shall prove that the line taken was not the most advantageous. I think I have shown from these extracts, from the utterances of Sir Charles Tupper, as Minister of Railways, and the utterances of the hon. member for Inverness, when he asked those questions, that it was always the intention to build the line from Canso to Louisburg.

Mr. CAMERON. I would like to ask my hon. friend, if in those questions I did not mention Sydney or Louisburg?

Mr. FLYNN. No; I was just going to say that in these very questions the hon. gentleman had left out Sydney, and that evidently he then never dreamt of Sydney. Simply from the Strait of Canso to Louisburg, and the answer given just before the adoption of this route was, to Louisburg. I have read those extracts, and they are sufficient to prove that the public were led to believe that, whenever the railway was extended to the Island of Cape Breton, it would be vid St. Peter's to either Louisburg or Sydney. There were many reasons for that. It would be a shorter and a cheaper route, and would be a continuation of the Intercolonial Railway, terminating at an open winter port. These reasons led us to believe that we would have the road constructed by that route. I propose to refer, in the second place, to the cost of this route, and, in doing so, I shall be as brief as possible. I intend to show that the cost by the present location will be 50 per cent. more than it would have been by the southern route. Mr. Hyndman, who makes the report in 1886, or Mr. Schreiber, in directing it to the Minister of Railways, says, in speaking of the southern route:

"The work on about one-fourth of the total distance may be classed as heavy, and the remainder medium to light. The bridging on this route is not of an expensive character, the largest structure being that over the Inhabitants River, consisting of one span of 180 feet, and 450 feet of pile trestle. The indications of rock are by no means formidable, and it is estimated that the construction and equipment of this road, including sufficient wharf accommodation at each terminus, to serve the present traffic, would not exceed $20,000 per mile."

After speaking of the line up to the 12th mile, he says:

"From 12th to 13¼ miles the grades are easy, the alignment good, and the work light; the line then descends until it crosses the St. Peter's road at 16½ miles. No grades over this last portion exceed 32 feet per mile; the alignment is good, and the work not heavy, though a small quantity of solid rock will likely be met with; structures unimportant."

From the 16½ to the 19th mile, the same thing. Then:

"Between 19th and 23rd mile, the grades are undulating, none exceeding 56 feet per mile; the work is not heavy, though the material in cuttings will be largely rock (solid and broken). No sharp curves are necessary.

"From the 23rd to the 26½ mile the line runs between the St. Peter's post road and the River Tillard. The grade descends at the rate of 50 feet per mile from the 23rd to 24⅝ miles, thence level to and beyond the crossing of the River Tillard at 26½ miles. The work is heavy over this portion, the material in cuttings largely rock; good stone suitable for masonry will be found in cutting west of crossing of River Tillard. The depth at low water in this river is about 3 feet, the bottom composed of boulders and gravel; the foundations will be inexpensive, one span of 100 feet will be ample.

"From the crossing of the River Tillard to St. Peter's Canal (29 miles) the grades are undulating, none exceeding 57 feet per mile. The alignment is good. Though the work over this portion is not light, no rock is likely to be met with in the cuttings.

"From the 36th mile the grade descends for one mile at the rate of 29 feet per mile along the inlet of Loch Caileau; thence level for three-quarter mile along shore of Loch Caileau, then descending again at varying rates, none exceeding 66 feet per mile, until an elevation of 25 feet above high water is reached at 38½ miles. The work over this portion is generally light, a small quantity of solid rock may be met with along the outlet of Loch Caileau.

"From 38½ miles the line works into the valley of the Grand River (outlet of Loch Lomond), then along the west bank to the 43rd mile, where the river is crossed. Light undulating grades are used over this portion, no curve sharper than 5 degrees will be necessary. Work not heavy, and the material earth and gravel. The Grand River will require one span of 125 feet."

Then, from 46½ miles to the 50th mile:

"The work will not be heavy, the alignment good, the material generally sand or gravel, and boulders, and no important structures"

From the 50th mile to the 51th mile:

"Grades easy, alignment good, and work light."

From the 56th to the 60th mile, it is the same way, "The work not heavy, and the material earth and boulders; some 5-deg. curves will be necessary; structures unimportant." From the 60th mile to the 64th mile:

"Over this portion the work is not heavy; good ballast is found in different places; some 6-deg. curves will be necessary; no important structures."

From the 66th mile, "The work is not heavy, the material clay and gravel." From the 66th mile, he says, "The work is not heavy, and the alignment is good, though some solid rock will be met with on the 67th mile." From 68½ miles, he says:

"The grades over this portion are very light, the alignment good, the work not heavy, and the material clay and gravel."

And so on to the 79th mile, where he says:

"From the 79th mile the line descends to the head of Louisburg Harbor, with varying grades, none exceeding 53 feet per mile, thence along harbor, with easy grades, to the terminus at Slattery's Cove."

This is the description as contained in the engineer's report of the southern route vid St. Peter's to Louisburg. Now I propose to turn the attention of the House for a moment to the report in regard to the character of the country through which the present line of railway runs. In estimating the cost, the engineer put the cost of the southern route at $20,000 per mile, and the cost of the route by which the road is being built at $20,000, if the steam ferry could be operated at the Grand Narrows. It has been a matter of wonder to me how the engineer could have made such an estimate, because a careful reading of the reports must lead anyone to come to the conclusion that the cost by the present route would be much greater than by the southern route. It was generally believed in the Island of Cape Breton, and is believed to-day, that when the Government had made up their minds to built by the central route, that the engineers were instructed to make a report that the cost on the central route would not be greater than that on the southern route. They knew that, if the engineers were to give a true report, it would show that the cost on the central route must be much in excess of that by the southern route. I think I have here sufficient evidence to show to the House that the cost by the line which they are building now must be much greater than by the other line. Let me take the report itself, and see what is said about the present route from Hawkesbury to Grand Narrows. Mr. Schreiber says:

"West of the Grand Narrows the country is very rough, necessitating heavy work and considerable curvature. The structures are somewhat numerous, there being eight spans of 100 feet required, besides a large number of small bridges and culverts."

"From 13½ to 17½ miles the line ascends the high ground between River Inhabitants and Deny's River, by the valley of McMaster's Brook. Grades of various inclinations are used over this part, none exceeding 80 feet per mile, until an elevation of 280 feet over high water tide level is reached at summit. This is the highest level reached on this survey. The work over a part of this distance may be classed as heavy; the material, except, perhaps, a part of one cutting, will be clay and gravel. The general direction of the line, from 14½ to 17½ miles, is not good; curves of 5 and 6 degrees are necessary to keep within the limits of the narrow valley. Structures, though not very large, will occur frequently over this portion; one trestle 150 feet in length and 30 feet in height, one of 90 feet in length and 25 feet high, and one span of 40 feet."

Then he goes on until he comes to this:

"At 29½ miles the line turns abruptly to the north, then sweeping around the northern end of a high ridge it resumes its easterly direction again at the 31st mile. Two other lines were run between the 29½ mile and the 31st, with a view of improving the direction, both of which failed. From 29¾ to 31½ miles the grade descends at the rate of 66 feet per mile, then various undulating grades, none of which exceed 64 feet per mile, descending to the 36th mile, when an elevation of 44 feet above tide level is reached."

Then, Sir, going down to the 37th mile, he says:

"The arm of the basin at Deny's River, called the 'Little Narrows,' is 450 wide at the point selected for crossing, the greatest depth of water is 25 feet, shoaling gradually to the edges; no current. The bottom was found to have 3 to 5 feet of mud overlying compact sand or gravel; a structure having two spans of 100 feet each is proposed for this crossing. The work over this portion is heavy, large cuttings of gypsum occurring frequently, 6-degree curves will be necessary in the alignment. A trestle 200 feet in length and 35 feet high will be required between the 42nd and 43rd miles."

Again, at the 45th mile, he says:

"The work over this portion is heavy, the material in the cutting is chiefly clay overlying gypsum, though one large cutting of conglomerate rock occurs near the 50th mile. The curvature over this portion will be considerable, 6-degree curves being frequently required. One trestle of 300 feet in length and 47 feet high occurs between the 47th and 48th miles."

Then, again, he says:

"The direction of the line between Grand Narrows and Benecadie Point is nearly at right angles in the general direction, and the total length of the line is thereby considerably increased. Benecadie Pond, at the point selected for crossing, is about 1,100 feet wide; the greatest depth of water is three feet. The grade elevation is six feet over water level."

Again he says:

"Between the 70th and the 71st miles McIntosh's Brook is crossed; the valley of this stream is 500 feet wide. A trestle 450 feet in length and 35 feet high will be required."

And again:

"Between the 78th and 79th miles Gillis' Brook is crossed; the valley of this stream is 700 feet wide At restle 650 feet in length and 47 feet wide will be required. At the 80th mile the head of East Bay is reached, and from that point to Sydney the line keeps close to the main post road between St. Peter's and Sydney."

Now, I contend that in this report of the engineer's on the two routes there is enough evidence to show conclusively ——

Mr. McKEEN. The hon. gentleman has been speaking of a line which has been surveyed but not been adopted.

Mr. FLYNN. I do not know what line is surveyed. I moved for these papers in 1887, and I have got them here. I went to the office and was told this is the only report, and in the papers there is no mention of any other report. There is nothing official to show where the Government are building the road, but the report of engineers from which I am quoting, and I can only go by the official report. It will not do for the hon. gentleman to state in answer to me that the Government are not building by this line. These are the reports, and there are no subsequent reports. I knew I would be met by the reply that this is not the line that they are building, but still it is the line shown by the papers, by the official documents placed on the Table of the House. My intention is to show that the statement of the engineer is not correct when he says that if a steam ferry is operated, it will only cost $20,000 a mile. The report itself contains evidence that it must be largely in excess of the cost of the southern route. It is a well-known fact that bridges and heavy cuttings are what makes railway building expensive. Now, the engineer states that by the southern route there are only fifteen bridges, only one across the River

Inhabitants of an important character, whereas by the route on which the railway is now located, by the Grand Narrows, there are twenty-one bridges, necessitating large and heavy spans and trestles. How is it possible for any sane man to believe that a road where there are twenty-one bridges will be less expensive than another road with only fifteen bridges, even if the other expenses of building the two roads were the same? The idea is too preposterous, but it is in keeping with everything else in connection with this railway. The leader of the Government knew that if the engineers were told to go into Cape Breton and make a survey of the southern route, giving an honest and impartial report of the cost, according to the best of their ability, and also to go by the Grand Narrows and make a careful survey of that route, and give an honest and impartial report—he knew that the engineers would have reported that the cost would be 50 per cent. in excess of what this report states. If the Government had also stated: We are not only going to build by this line, making it longer than the other and costing more, but, eventually, we are going to obstruct navigation by erecting a bridge across the Narrows—if they had made that avowal in 1887, we know it would have been fatal to the project. I do not hesitate to say, from all the facts, that the intention was to keep the cost of the present route down to the cost of the southern route, and the engineers were instructed to report accordingly. Here we have over 3,000 feet of spans of bridges on the present route, and only 1,200 feet on the other. But, Sir, there is more to prove my contention that the cost of the present route will be greater. In 1886 some French gentlemen, representing a syndicate who were prepared to construct the railway through Cape Breton, visited that Island and went over the two routes. They read the report of the surveyors, and after they traversed the country, they at once stated that it was impossible for that road to be built as cheaply as the other. They came up here to Ottawa and told the Minister of Railways, so I am credibly informed, that the road by the Grand Narrows, where they proposed to build, would cost 50 per cent. more than the estimated cost given by the engineers, and they would have nothing to do with it. We have also the fact that the contract was taken from the contractors by the Government because they failed to perform the works as rapidly as they had agreed to do. They stated, in a memorial to the Government, that they were deceived by the estimate given by the engineers of the cost of that railway. And what is the fact now? They have an action against the Government for damages to the extent of $200,000. But supposing that the evidence I have given, the report I have read of the engineers, was not sufficient; suppose the evidence I have given of the fact that the French syndicate were prepared to build, but abandonod the project because they found that it would cost more than the estimate of the engineers—suppose all this was not sufficient, we have in further proof of the correctness of my contention, in the action of the Government, who took a vote in this House in 1886 for $1,700,000, and the other night they took a vote for $700,000 for the same purpose, these two sums together bringing the cost of that work up to over $25,000 a mile, independently of the cost of the bridge across the Narrows. Therefore, I say that I was correct in attacking the report of the engineers, and in declaring that when they stated that the cost would be the same, they were misleading the country. From the facts that have been developed since, I do not hesitate to say that if the road is built, it will cost $30,000 a mile and over——

Mr. CAMERON. Ha! ha!

Mr. FLYNN. The hon. gentleman may laugh. When I stated a year ago that it would cost over $20,000 a mile, he laughed in the same way. But there are the facts, and can he deny that, so far, it is costing $25,000, without the bridge?

Mr. CAMERON. Do you mean to say that it will cost $25,000 a mile, besides the bridge?

Mr. FLYNN. Yes, and more. The road from the Strait of Canso to the Grand Narrows will be 95 miles in length; we have now voted $2,400,000 for the construction of the road without the bridge, which brings the cost up to over $25,000 a mile. Now let me see what the cost would be by the southern route. By building via St. Peter's and Loch Lomond, Sydney can be reached by 80 miles of railway. By adding a branch of 10 miles you can reach North Sydney, making a distance of 90 miles, saving five miles of railway and avoiding the Grand Narrows ferry. 66 miles of this line would be common to the national line to Louisburg, which Port can be reached by a branch line of 15 miles, you have a total distance of 105 miles, accommodating the three towns of Sydney, North Sydney and Louisburg. The estimated cost of this line was $20,000 a mile, making a total cost of $2,100,000. If this line had been carried out the terminus would have been at the open winter port of Louisburg. Let me now take the Grand Narrows route, by which the line has been built. The distance from the Strait of Canso to Sydney by the present route is 95 miles, which, at $30,000 per mile, would make the cost $2,850,000. If you add the distance to Louisburg, which I have placed at $20,000 per mile, it would make $500,000, which, added to the cost of the road to Sydney, would make $3,350,000, being $1,250,000 more than the cost of a road by the southern route, independent of the cost of a bridge at the Grand Narrows. If you add half a million dollars, the amount of the contract for building the bridge—in all probability it will cost much more—it will make a total cost of $3,850,000, or $1,750,000 more than the costby the southern route. But this is not all. The statistical record states that the cost of working expenses of railroads, in 1887, was $2,363 per mile. The increased distance, if you extend to Louisburg, would add yearly about $18,000 to the cost, or a sum, if capitalised at 4 per cent., equal to $1,200,000. It has always been contended by hon. gentlemen opposite—the hon. members for Cape Breton—that the road, to be complete, must go to Louisburg. What did the junior member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKeen) state, when this question was under discussion? He said:

"That the road under construction would fail in its object if it is not continued as far as the important harbor of Louisburg. We know that it is the only open port we have on the Island of Cape Breton. Sydney is closed for some four months in the year, but Louisburg is open—free to the navigation of the world, we might say. We know that the route from Sydney to Louisburg intersects one of the richest mining localities in the Dominion, mines which represent a capital of eight or ten millions of dollars, and seven or eight collieries which have no outlet to the sea except by Louisburg. Without the extension to Louisburg, the system will be incomplete and must partially fail to accomplish the object sought to be achieved."

Why, both Mr. McKeen and Mr. McDougall, before election, stated that the road between Sydney and Louisburg would be broad gauged and equipped by the Government within two years. Mr. McDougall gave a guarantee to that effect, with a condition, that if that promise was not fulfilled within two years from then, that he would resign his seat. An Ottawa despatch to the Montreal Gazette furnishes a more detailed statement of the proposals which Messrs. McDougall and McKeen have made to the Dominion Government in reference to the Louisburg railway. The despatch says:

"The two Cape Breton members, Messrs. McKeen and McDougall, have had a lengthy interview with Sir John Macdonald and Sir John Thompson on the subject of the extension of the Cape Breton railway from Sydney to Louisburg. The Cape Breton members appear to be determined to secure this concession, in order that the road may be opened up to Louisburg simultaneously with the Cape Breton railway now nearing completion. When the road is extended to Louisburg, instead of being only able to ship coal during five or six months of the year, it could be shipped during the whole year, as Louisburg harbor is always free from ice. As it is at present, the output last year was 500,000 tons. This, the deputation informed Sir John, could be doubled. It may be added, that Messrs. McKeen and McDougall have had several interviews with the Premier on this subject, but at the last, they had statistics, maps, etc., showing the location of the several mines and the close proximity of them to the proposed road. Sir John was satisfied of the feasibility of the scheme, and said that the matter would be looked into."

I have read these extracts to show that the road will be incomplete unless it is built to Louisburg, that it will fail, as the hon. gentleman says, in its object, and that we may look forward, in the near future, to see the road extended there. I have no doubt, if it is so extended, it will cost, as I have said, $1,750,000 more than if it were built by the southern route, that is, independent of the bridge at the Narrows, or an amount sufficient to give us railway accommodation on both sides of the island. Owing to the peculiar formation of the Island of Cape Breton, being divided into almost two islands by the waters of Bras d'Or Lake, two roads are necessary to develop its resources, one by the north, accommodating Inverness and Victoria, and the southern, by Richmond to Louisburg, Sydney and North Sydney. Where have they built this road, which is misnamed the Central? The road runs mostly through two peninsulas, through a narrow neck of land isolated by the Little Bras d'Or and Whycocomagh Bay on the north, and by the waters of the Great Bras d'Or and East Bay on the south. It is isolated from nine-tenths of the area of the counties through which it passes, as can easily be seen by referring to the map, connecting Cape Breton and Inverness Counties at their extreme points, and having neither mineral or agricultural resources to develop. Nor does it pass through any important agricultural district. From the head of Whycocomagh Bay to Grand Narrows, a distance of 20 miles—and I would particularly call the attention of the House to this fact—the average width of country through which the road runs is not over four miles; for about five miles from Orangedale it does not average over one mile in width, and at Little Narrows, for some distance, it is not half a mile in width, passing through a country where there are holes and plaster beds, making it difficult and expensive to build a railway. There was a bridge built there last fall, and it sunk from six to eight inches in a short time after being built. The hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) asked the First Minister a question in regard to those holes and quagmires, to which he got his answer. Mr. Fletcher, of the Geological Survey, stated to one of the delegates that in process of time the whole district would be submerged, that portions of the Bras d'Or Lake near there now covered with water were at one time land. It is a well-known fact that pieces of land bearing large trees have disappeared out of sight in the very neighborhood of where this railway is being built, and this is the place in which the Government are to build the railroad and they will call it justice to Cape Breton. I say, Mr. Speaker, that a greater injustice was never perpetrated on a people, or a more reckless waste of money ever proposed, than the building of that railway by that route. But the Government cannot claim now that they had no information, or that they were not warned before they undertook the construction of that road. They cannot plead ignorance of these facts, and they cannot throw the responsibility wholly on the report of their engineer. As I have stated before, the very moment that it was announced that the Cape Breton Railway was likely to be built by the Grand Narrows, the people became alarmed, they took immediate action by public meetings and by every means in their power to protest against the construction of the road by this route. The Government were warned of this in time. The delegates who came here, comprising the Honorable Senator Macdonald and Mr. McKay, leader of the opposition in the Local Legislature, representing Cape Breton County, and Reverend Father Quinnan and Doctor Chisholm, representing Richmond. They warned the Government of the injustice they would inflict on Cape Breton if the road were built by that route. The Government were also warned by a memorial signed by the Rev. J. McNeill and 4,000 others, and by a petition from seventeen or eighteen Catholic clergymen who were assembled in Sydney on some public occasion. Some of these were clergymen favorable to the Government. But they felt in the interest of the country that it was necessary to warn the Government against constructing the railway along the Grand Narrows. I do not see this petition among the papers, but there is no doubt that it was sent here. There is one memorial, signed by the Rev. J. McNeill and 4,000 others, which I will read to the House, and which will show how they protested, and how they urged on the Government in the interest of the country not to throw away money in a manner which would jeopardise the future of Cape Breton, by building this railroad by the Grand Narrows. This memorial was written in 1886, and I would call the particular attention of the Government to it. It says:

"To His Excellency the Governor General of Canada in Council:

"The petition of the undersigned electors of the Island of Cape Breton humbly sheweth,—

"That your petitioners felt highly gratified at the determination of your Government to construct a line of railway through Cape Breton to Louisburg or Sydney, as a continuation of the national system of railways.

"That your petitioners would regard with much apprehension, the final location of the line by the Grand Narrows and Bois-dale-Route, because, (a) if so located, the road will accommodate neither the fishing, the mining, nor the agricultural interests of the Island; because (b) the Grand Narrows is an insuperable obstacle to the national importance and commercial success of the line.

"That, in the opinion of your petitioners, the railway will satisfy four-fifths of the people of Cape Breton, if built in the shortest and most direct course by St Peters to Louisburg or Sydney, as contemplated by the Act.

"That your petitioners would refer to the mass of statistical information that has been furnished your Government, respecting the positive advantages of the route via St. Peters, sent by memorial, on behalf of the people of Cape Breton, and dated the 21st September last past.

"That your petitioners view with alarm, the strenuous efforts that have been made by parties who, in their endeavors to secure the location of the road via Grand Narrows and Bois-dale route, persistently misrepresent the interests of Cape Breton, and the desires of her people.

"That your petitioners have sufficient confidence in the good judgment of your Government to believe that they will locate the road by that route that will best serve the national interests of Canada, and the commercial interests of Cape Breton, which route has been indicated above.

"That your petitioners make the last appeal to your Government on behalf of the route via St. Peters, and would now implore, that all further location by the Grand Narrows and Bois-dale be forthwith discontinued.

"And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

"CAPE BRETON, November, A.D. 1886."

This is a memorial presented in 1886 protesting in language as strong as can be made use of against the adoption of that route. The memorialists refer here to "a mass of statistical information that has been furnished your Government respecting the positive advantage of the route vid St. Peter's, sent by memorial on behalf of the people of Cape Breton and dated 21st September last past." That is not amongst the papers, but we have the fact here that it was submitted to the Government. I have now shown to the House that the moment the people of Cape Breton became aware that the location of the road was to be by the Grand Narrows, they became alarmed, and by public meetings, by delegations sent here, by memorials, by petitions, by statistical information, by adopting every means in their power they implored the Government not to jeopardise the future of Cape Breton by building along this route. What have we on the other side in favor of this route? What have we behind the Government to show that, by building this railway along this route, any portion of Cape Breton has urged them to do so? Has there been a delegation? Has there been a memorial? Has there been a public meeting held in any part of Cape Breton to ask the Government to build the road by the Grand Narrows? No, Sir, there is no such request. I say that these facts speak loudly in favor of my argument here to day. I say there must be something unfair behind this, and I regret to say that the great influence possessed by the Minister of Justice in the Cabinet—for to him was largely due the selection of this line—was used against the best interests of Cape Breton. I make this statement on no authority of my own, but on the authority of Dr. Chisholm, of Halifax, one of the delegates to Ottawa, who, in the pamphlet which he published afterwards, speaks of the Minister of Justice as having used his influence in favor of the Grand Narrows route. Alluding to Dr. Chisholm, I may say that he would not make a statement unless he had some grounds for it, and he must have obtained that knowledge while he was here in his official capacity as a delegate, because I know he is incapable of making any incorrect statement. I feel that it is due to Dr. Chisholm to state publicly here that he acted in this matter from the purest, most disinterested and most patriotic motives in the interest of his native island. Now, Sir, having said so much as regards that part of the subject, I propose to show that the millions of dollars which the Government are spending on this railroad does not accommodate the people of Cape Breton or will not in any way assist in the future requirements of the Island. I intend, in dealing with this matter, also, not to ask the House to rely on any statement or assertion of my own, but I intend to prove it by the public utterances of the people of Cape Breton, not in the County of Richmond, but in the County of Victoria and in the County of Inverness. In 1887, shortly after the route was adopted, a large meeting was held in the shire town of the County of Inverness, with the warden in the chair, asking for aid for a railroad running through the important centres of that county down to the Straits of Canso. Even last January, a meeting was held there for the same purpose of asking the Dominion and local representatives to do everything in their power for the purpose of getting aid to build a railroad through the important centres of Inverness County to the Straits of Canso.

Mr. CAMERON. And we will get it.

Mr. FLYNN. Yes, he may get it; but I am going to show that this road is no good to Invernes, is no good to Victoria, is no good to Richmond, no good to all the southern part of Cape Breton County, and that being the case I would ask why have the millions of public money been spent in building by the Grand Narrows. If Richmond gets no benefit, and if only a small portion of the County of Cape Breton gets the benefit of it, why is this money wasted? If no portion of Victoria gets any benefit, why is Parliament asked to spend these millions? Now, my object is simply to show that by building this road by the Grand Narrows, the money will be absolutely thrown away. On the 10th of last January a public meeting was held in Baddeck, the shire town of Victoria; the council was in session at the time, and every district of that county was represented. The hon. member for Victoria was present, and was one of a committee to prepare the resolution passed at that meeting. Now, I want to call attention to the resolution passed at that meeting:

"Whereas it is desired and required by the people of Cape Breton Island, and more especially of the Counties of Victoria and Inverness, that a railway should be built from Baddeck in Victoria County, via Big Baddeck, Middle River, and Lake O'Law, to Margaree and Broad Cove, in the County of Inverness, and thence via Mabou and Port Hood to the Strait of Canso, as one through trunk line. Therefore, resolved, that our representatives of the Dominion and Provincial Parliaments, and all and every the electorate of the counties, more especially, of Victoria and Inverness, deem it their duty and privilege to urge, advocate and further to their utmost power and ability the construction of said railway."

Here are the reasons they gave for the road—I have only selected a few of them:

"Because the north-western half of the Island of Cape Breton (for Cape Breton is naturally two islands) is altogether devoid of railway facilities"

"Baddeck is situated on a splendid harbor, in the course of all the steamers traversing the Bras D'Or Lakes, and is the natural outlet on the lakes of a magnificent agricultural, timber and mining country, extending all around for 50 miles inland."

A number of other reasons are given which I leave the hon. member for Victoria to state. One would imagine, from these meetings held in the Counties of Inverness and Victoria urging the construction of railways through these important counties, and urging their Dominion and Local representatives to use their efforts for a through trunk line to the Strait of Canso, that there was no line of railway building in Cape Breton. The facts speak loudly in corroboration of what I have stated to-day, that the railway constructed by the Grand Narrows will be of no use to an overwhelming majority of the people of Cape Breton. It may be of some use to the senior member for the County of Cape Breton; but valuable as he is to his party, I believe, and the country will believe, that it would be too dear a price to pay for his support—the millions that will be thrown away upon the construction of that road, and the sacrifice of the future interests of Cape Breton. There are many reasons to show that the whole transaction connected with this road was not a fair and square, above-board, honest transaction. There are certain features connected with it that must lead any impartial mind to that conclusion. It is true, I cannot bring clear and positive evidence to substantiate the conviction that is in the minds of many of the people of Cape Breton, and the strong conviction that is in my own mind; but I have given the House sufficient evidence to prove the position I take. I have shown that if the cost of the road had been put at its proper estimate of $30,000 a mile, and if the Government had said that they would build a bridge across the Narrows, and would ultimately extend the line to Louisburg, making it 120 miles long instead of 100 miles. If all this had been avowed, it must necessarily have been fatal to the Grand Narrows route. The building of a bridge was not then proposed, but when I brought this matter up before, I warned the Government, and they were warned by the delegates, that if they carried the road by that route, they would have to build a bridge across the Grand Narrows. When the senior member for Cape Breton replied to me on that occasion, the whole burden of his speech went to prove that a bridge was not necessary. He said that the previous winterhad been the most severe that we had had for thirty years, and that the ferrymen had crossed every day without one solitary exception. When the engineer, Mr. Hyndman, had received reports of some surveys, the hon. gentleman wrote a letter to him, stating that the information he had got was incorrect, and that there was no necessity of building a bridge there, as a steam ferry would be sufficient. Less than two years ago, it was positively asserted that it would not be necessary to build a bridge across the Narrows. What did Mr. McDougall himself say? Here is his letter:

"DEAR SIR,—You will remember that when discussing the subject of the Grand Narrows crossing with you, before leaving Cape Breton last fall, I learned from you that, acting on information received from Mr. McNeil, you reported to the Department of Railways that the ice in the Grand Narrows attained a thickness of some six feet at certain periods in the winter. I subsequently called Mr. McNeil's attention to this, and he told me that you could not have possibly understood him, as no permanent ice forming at or near the Grand Narrows scarcely ever exceeds one foot in thickness, and at the crossing points in the Narrows there is seldom any ice at all; none, however, to impede regular crossing with an open boat during any period in the winter. The only reference which Mr. McNeil, or any other person, could have made to ice forming a thickness of six feet is, that in some parts of the lake, when the ice is broken, the force of strong winds would cause such ice to be piled up, in a crumbled form, on the shore, to a height or thickness of six feet, but does not apply to the immediate points at which the crossing is made. I can only refer you for corroboration of these facts to the ferrymen of forty years' experience on both sides of the Narrows. I might further add that the mails from Port Hastings for North Sydney have been crossed over the Grand Narrows in an open row boat during the last two winters every night (except Sunday), and although the winter of 1885 was an exceptionally severe winter, the service has been accomplished without a single interruption by ice since first established. The same may be said with regard to the mail service performed across the ferry for a period of some fifteen or twenty years in day time, previous to the establishing of the present night service in connection with the mail to and from North Sydney. And I trust you will be pleased to represent this matter to the department, in conjunction with your former report, if you have not done so already.

"I beg to remain, Sir,
"Your obedient servant,
"H. F. McDOUGALL.

"P. K. HYNDMAN, Esq., Civil Engineer, &c."

He did present this to the department, and it was embodied in the report. But let me point to what occurred on the floor of this House only last Friday night, when the Chief Engineer was here, and when we saw what an exhibition he made when the question was brought up regarding the millions which were voted to build the line from Oxford to New Glasgow on the pretence that it would shorten the distance by 45 miles. When the First Minister was asked as to the distance to be saved, he would not condescend to answer the gentleman who put the question to him. But, when forced to do so, when told by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones): You have your Chief Engineer within a yard of two; get the information from him,—he went to him, and replied: Twenty-six miles. When told that was not true, then he made a pitiable exhibition of himself by stating seven miles. Now, I say, when the Chief Engineer will attempt, in broad daylight, in the face of Parliament, to mislead the public, I ask, am I not warranted in saying that I have no faith in the reports of his subordinates. The fourth proposition that I intend to take up has reference to the bridging of the Narrows. The bridging of the Narrows will interfere with the utility of the St. Peter's Canal and I assert obstruct the navigation of the Bras d'Or Lake. About 35 years ago the Local Government of Nova Scotia were urged to open up the narrow isthmus that divides the waters of the Atlantic from St. Peter's, on the one hand, to Bras d'Or Lake on the other. When the Government of that Province commenced railway construction, they knew Cape Breton was contributing to the construction of that work without getting any advantage, and they agreed to open up the canal. At the time of Confederation the canal was partly constructed and fell into the hands of the Dominion Government, who completed it and put it in its present condition. It is impossible to overestimate the value of that canal to our coasters and our fishermen. The number of vessels that pass through it has been increasing daily. Not only has it been of advantage to the shipping interest, but also to the farmers in the interior by giving them facilities to send their produce to market, and it has also been a great accommodation to those going to the mines. I know the reply will be made to me that this bridge will not obstruct or interfere with navigation, but, in case such an assertion should be made on the floor of Parliament, I wish, in advance, to state that it will obstruct navigation. In making that assertion I do not base it altogether on my own knowledge of the place—and I have some knowledge of it—but when it was announced publicly that the Government were determined to bridge the Grand Narrows, a good deal of excitement was aroused among that class of people who use the canal as coasters and fishermen, and I made it my business to enquire from every man his opinion. There was but one voice, and that was that it would obstruct navigation, and that mariners would rather run the risk of an open Atlantic voyage then go through St. Peter's Canal to the Grand Narrows. It will be easily seen how the bridge will obstruct the navigation of the lake. When you go to the Grand Narrows, so far as the eye can reach, from east to west, there is nothing but the open, exposed sea. Now, with a current of four miles at least, as stated in the official report, and that increased by the velocity of the wind, when the wind is running high—and when you put a draw-bridge there, it must necessarily be increased—with no anchorage, with nothing but the open sea, what vessels would attempt to go through? You might as well fill up the canal, if you are going to put a bridge across the Narrows. Mr. Hyndman says, in his report concerning this bridge:

"Because of the great amount of shipping which passes through there, a low level bridge would be objectionable, besides its great cost; and the cost of a high level bridge would, by reason of its increased length, be very much greater."

I intend to show you the importance of the canal. I am going to give you, not any statement of my own, or knowledge contained from the people of the locality, but official information of the importance of the canal and the necessity of freedom from obstruction in navigating the Straits of Barra, where you propose to build the bridge:

"The shipping passing through the Narrows consist principally of fishing schooners which come from the east to fish in the Great Bras d'Or Lake, and coasting vessels, all of which pass on through the canal at St. Peter's. On some days as many as sixty or seventy have passed backwards and forwards. The season of navigation is from the middle of May to the end of December. There is a line of steamboats running each way every second day, between Sydney and Port Mulgrave, through the canal, besides occasional steamboats belonging to the same company which ply between ports in the two Bras d'Or Lakes The steamship St Pierre of the Anglo-French and American Company, makes fortnightly trips through the lakes between Halifax and Miquelon."

Here we have the official statement from Mr. Hyndman that there are as many as sixty or seventy vessels passing through the Grand Narrows every day during the navigable season. Will any hon. gentleman pretend to say, with a draw-bridge at a place like this, with an open sea east and west for miles, that there will not be detention to vessels passing through, and great risk of loss. Every man who has put his foot on the deck of a vessel, and knows anything about the Bras d'Or Lake, and the Current, and the Narrows, will tell you there is. I have also another document, and it is the last I shall read. It is the report of a meeting held in St. Peter's, County Richmond, to protest against the building of a bridge at Grand Narrows. This meeting was held on February 28th, and the following is the resolution that was passed:—

"Whereas the opening of the St. Peter's Canal has developed an extensive shipping trade through the Bras D'Or Lakes; and whereas the erection of a bridge over the Grand Narrows would cause serious detention to vessels passing through, and would make the navigation of these waters more hazardous and dangerous on account of the difficulty of mooring vessels to a pier in an open bay and with a strong current running; and whereas, said detention and risk would prevent shipowners from utilizing that otherwise safe, convenient channel; and whereas, such an obstruction to navigation would seriously damage the shipping interests of the Maritime Provinces, and practically destroy the usefulness of the St. Peter's Canal, thereby causing loss to the Government and injury to the growth and prosperity of this county: Therefore resolved, that this meeting protest against the building of a bridge over the Grand Narrows. Further resolved, that our Dominion representatives be instructed to place our grievances before the Government and Parliament at the earliest possible opportunity."

That is the resolution protesting against the building of the bridge. Again, I might say that the lighthouses erected between the Grand Narrows and the St. Peter's Canal would be of little use afterwards. The members of the Government know very little, unfortunately, about the geography of that part of the country, for if they did and had any interest in the welfare of the people, the line of road would never have been located by the Grand Narrows. But the right hon. the First Minister did us the honor of paying us a visit last year. He passed through St. Peter's Canal to the Grand Narrows, and no doubt his keen eye took in the situation. I have been informed that the importance of the canal was pointed out to him, and that it was also pointed out to him that, if the Grand Narrows were bridged, the canal would be practically destroyed. His reply was that it would never do to destroy the canal, and he was right, but if he bridges the Narrows, he will destroy the canal, which was opened out at a cost of three-quarters of a million in order to enable all those who use the Brasd'Or Lake to enter it freely, and now you propose to destroy the canal by another expenditure of three-quarters of a million of dollars in building the bridge across the Narrows; and it is not only the people of Cape Breton who use that canal, but people from other parts of Nova Scotia who go with coasting vessels by that route, carrying produce to the Sydney Mines and carrying coal back, and so saving the Atlantic voyage. These people will also suffer by the bridging of the Narrows. I think I have shown that this route will cost much more than the southern route. I have shown that it will not accommodate anything like the majority, but rather a very small minority, of the people of Cape Breton. You have already voted nearly $3,000,000 for the construction of a railway in Cape Breton, but the people of Inverness and the people of Victoria are still asking their representatives to use every effort to have a railway built, because this railway will be of no benefit whatever to them. I say to the Government, in the interests not only of the present but of the future of the country, abandon the idea of building a bridge at the Grand Narrows; leave the waters of the Bras D'Or Lake as you found them at Confederation and as nature left them for our use, free and unobstructed. You can, if you desire, before it is too late, retrieve, to some extent, the error you have committed. Proceed with the construction of the work from Point Tupper to River Inhabitants, thence through the important centres of Inverness and Victoria. Abandon the line between River Denys and Sydney, and save the amount this will cost, and the cost of bridging the Grand Narrows, and these amounts, put together, will not only build a line in the direction to which I have referred, but will also build one by way of St. Peter's and Loch Lomond to Louisburg and Sydney, thus carrying out the general intention of Parliament, which has been frequently expressed, of having a winter port at Louisburg. Unless you do what I have indicated, you will throw away a large amount of money to very little purpose. What are the facts to-day? Have you satisfied any county in Cape Breton? We have the gentlemen from Inverness and Victoria urged by their constituents to get a line built through those counties. We have the gentlemen from Cape Breton urging the building of a line to Louisburg, because otherwise the national highway is incomplete. The building of the Intercolonial Railway should have been a warning to the Government. They should have remembered the millions which were thrown away for political purposes in building that road, as millions would be thrown away for political purposes in building this road. If the Government were animated by a desire to economise in the expenditure of public money, and had a proper regard for the interests and future welfare of Cape Breton, this railroad would never have been built by the Grand Narrows route. I tell the Government that a strong feeling of opposition to this route exists in Cape Breton, and they know it. Sir, the people of that Island—the richest for its area of any portion of this Dominion in everything that constitutes national wealth—entertained hopes in the near future of having their vast resources developed by means of a railroad. But these hopes you have blasted by your insane policy of building by the Grand Narrows. It is a wreckless waste of public money to serve political purposes. I know that in protesting against your railway policy in Cape Breton, I voice not only the sentiments of the people of Richmond, but also of a large majority of the people of the other counties in the Island. I know the evil results that bridging the Grand Narrows will produce. I know the injury it will inflict on the fishermen and coasters, and the general commerce of the Bras d'Or Lake. Knowing these facts, I felt it my duty to submit them to the House, and, as the representative of a county in that Island, to protest against a policy fraught with disaster to her best interests. If you bridge the Grand Narrows, you will render the St. Peter's Canal—constructed at an enormous cost—comparatively, if not completely, useless. You will obstruct the navigation and interfere with the commerce of the Bras d'Or Lake. Your policy, instead of promoting and encouraging, will check and retard the development of our resources and strike a fatal blow at the progress and prosperity of Cape Breton. I beg to move that you do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved:

That the location selected by the Government for the Cap Breton Railway is inexpedient, inasmuch as the route selected is longer and more expensive than is required to effect a connection between the Atlantic ports and the railway system of this Dominion, and is in every way less calculated to serve the national and local interests which such an enterprise is designed to promote.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). I am somewhat surprised at the motion which has just been tabled by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn), and I am sure that the people on whose behalf he pretends to speak on this occasion must be greatly surprised that, at this late date, he has made the charges he has now made to the House. The hon. member came here entrusted with the responsibility of presenting those statements nearly two months and a-half ago, but he has sat in solemn silence without uttering a word of protest of the character he has uttered to-day until now, nearly at the close of the Session. He came here in charge of resolutions from the municipal council of his county, from meetings in his county, and from electors in his county who sent in petitions, but he remained from the first day of the meeting of Parliament until this day, after immense sums have been voted away by Parliament for the work to which the hon. gentleman alludes, without uttering a word of protest. Under those circumstances, can any hon. gentleman on the floor of this House say that the hon. member has discharged his duty on behalf of those whom he pretends to represent in this House. Did he discharge his duty to his county, did he discharge his duty to the Dominion of Canada, when he, with his colleagues, sat in the House in silence, without uttering a word that would induce the Government to withdraw the moneys that were appropriated to building the railway by the present route? I think that this fact alone is sufficient to meet the charge made by the hon. member, and it will relieve this House of the necessity of my going into particulars, although I would have liked to do so if the hon. member had brought the matter up at an earlier period of the Session. The hon gentleman, by delaying his statements till this afternoon, has himself given the answer necessary to meet his charge. However, if the House will permit me, it may not be out of place to refer briefly to some of the points which he has raised. In the early part of this Session he presented petitions, the first sentence of which said that they represented 7,000 inhabitants—French Acadians of Cape Breton. The hon. member presented a petition on the 26th of February, which I examined and found it to contain thirty four signatures of people of French extraction and forty-four people of other nationalities. I find that on the 27th he presented a petition with sixty-one French names and forty-three other names. On the 8th of March he presented a petition containing 105 names—I believe they were nearly all French Acadians. Those were the only petitions, and the only signatures to the petitions, presented to this House during the present Session. The total number of signatures to these petitions representing 7,000 French Acadians of the Island of Cape Breton, was only 200, and eighty-seven of other nationalities. That shows the importance of these petitions, and the importance of this question in so far as it agitated the minds of the people represented by the hon. gentleman himself. Now, I will refer to some of the points which the petition raises. The petition says that the districts of the Island through which the Government are now building this railway, are in themselves insignificant, unproductive, and so on. Now, in order to show the true state of the case, I will take the number of people living within a distance of ten miles on either side of the line of railway which is now being built. I will also take the number of people living within ten miles on each side of the line which the hon. gentleman would have this House believe the Government should have adopted. I think every hon. gentleman will agree that this is a fair and reasonable way of comparing the so-called insignificance of the adopted line with the one he proposes. I also propose to show the relative products of the country embraced within the same limits, and if I make any statement that is not correct, I want the hon. gentleman to correct me. Now, starting from the Strait of Canso, and taking 10 miles on each side of the railway, whether that includes water or land makes no difference, so long as I find the population. In the route that is now being built, which is designated as the central route, I find, starting from the Strait of Canso, that the population in the county of Richmond that is taken in by that line, is 1,341; the population in the county of Inverness is 7,807; and in the county of Victoria, 6,332; in the county of Cape Breton, 24,607, making altogether a population of 40,150 within 10 miles on each side of this road, or within a 20-mile belt from one end of the road to the other. I find, in addition to these, that there are living to the north of this line, in the counties of Inverness and Victoria, 23,982 inhabitants. Now, it must be remembered, that these people could not be benefited by any line south of the present one, that the present one must necessarily suit them better than the one the hon. gentleman is advocating. Of the 23,982 living to the north of this 10-miles limit, there are 17,844 in in the county of Inverness, and 6,138 in the county of Victoria. Adding these to the population within the 10 miles on either side of the line, and we have a population of 64,000, in round numbers. Now let us see what population we can find within 10 miles on each side of the route advocated by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn). I find that the total population in the county represented by my hon. friend, is 15,121. By adopting the line advocated by my hon. friend, and adopting the 10-mile limit on either side of the line, I find that I take in every inch of the hon. gentleman's county, and we find that there are 3,434 inhabitants in the county of Inverness who come within the 10-mile limit, and the number of people in the county of Cape Breton coming within the 10-mile limit, is 5,995, making a total of 24,550 who are within 10 miles of each side of the route advocated by my hon. friend, as against 40,150 within 10 miles on each side of the other route, and the 23,982 inhabitants living to the north of that line. Now, if that is not an answer to the charge set forth in that petition that this country through which the road is going is insignificant, I do not know what is an answer. As I said before, if my hon. friend doubts the figures that I am giving to this House, I will give him each district within this belt separately. Let me now go on to speak of the so called unproductiveness of the "peninsula" route. I claim that the principal products of these sections of the Island of Cape Breton, in fact, of the whole island, except the fisheries and mines, are farm products, and the chief among those products are grain, potatoes and hay. The following statistics show the relative productiveness, as well as the population, of the country on the respective routes:

When I quote the southern route I wish hon. members to understand that there is no land south until you cross the Atlantic, that there is nothing to be expected except what is produced within the 10-mile limit; but in the case of the route adopted by the Government a large proportion of the population and of the products lies to the north. That, to my mind, is a sufficient answer with respect to the unproductiveness and unimportance of the peninsula route, as that petition sets forth. I can quite understand the feeling of the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn), on this question, and there are other hon. gentlemen who can very clearly understand his feeling on the matter. I may mention that my hon. friend held a seat in this House some years previous to the present Parliament. He also held a seat in the Local Legislature of the Province from which he comes. He held an important position in that legislature and occupied one of the most important offices in the Government, and during the time he held that position the Government of which he was a member adopted a policy with respect to railways in the Island of Cape Breton. The policy adopted by the hon. gentleman and his colleagues on that occasion was a policy simply of paper railways, and we have those paper railways to this day. The hon. gentleman, in 1872, was a member of the Local Government of Nova Scotia, and that was the year when, so far as my researches go, that Government adopted their first policy with a view to building railways in Cape Breton. They adopted that policy while my hon. friend occupied the position of Commissioner of Crown Lands, and, to begin with, they promised by Acts of Parliament and by the voice of that Parliament a land subsidy of 150,000 acres and half the royalty on coal produced in the island, towards building a railway from the Strait of Canso to Louisburg. In 1873 they amended that legislation, and, in addition, passed legislation with a view to building another line of railway between Sydney and East Bay, in addition to the proposed line from the Strait of Canso to Louisburg. In 1874 they amended that Act again; they gave it a turn-over in order to please the people of the island for the time being, and in order to keep them interested in these paper railways. In the year 1875 they changed their policy, and promised $4,000 per mile for a railway from the Strait of Canso to Louisburg, and $4,000 a mile for a railway from the Strait of Canso to Broad Cove, so that there should be no danger of the people uniting against the Government. In 1876 they provided for a railway to the Strait of Canso, and, in addition to that, they provided a subsidy of $8,000 per mile and 150,000 acres of Crown lands in addition, for a railway with an extension from the Strait of Canso to a point on Bras d'Or Lake, abandoning the road to Louisburg. They would not mention the point because they thought they would catch everybody by simply naming "a point on the Lake." In 1877 they extended these Acts, and in 1878 they adopted the same course, and up to that date they did not pay a single dollar to the building of railways on the island, they simply gave the people paper railways year after year, although in my county some 40 or 50 miles of railway was built without any Government aid. The Government went to the people and were defeated at the polls, and those who took their places gave attention to the building of railways and to their completion: they perfected a scheme and brought it before the Legislature. Soon afterwards they appealed to the people, who did not, however, return them to power. On the accession to power of the party supported by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn), the Government went to work and strangled this legislation lest any practical effect should follow. They again reverted to the system of giving the island paper railways. In 1886 they provided a subsidy of $3,200 per mile for a railway from the Strait of Canso to St. Peter's, to East Bay, to Sydney, to North Sydney, to Little Bras d'Or, from Baddeck to Broad Cove, in fact, they promised by this legislation that we should have railways anywhere and everywhere over Cape Breton. This is the legislation which has been adopted by the party supported by my hon. friend, and which was first inaugurated by the party while the hon. gentleman occupied a very important position in that Government. To this day they live on this paper railway policy, and they expect the people of the country to live on it also. Hon. gentlemen will understand what feelings prompt the hon. gentleman when he takes advantage of an occasion like this to present his statement to the House. He allowed the whole Session to pass without making a protest and it is only on almost the last day of the Session, the very day when the date of the question of prorogation is discussed in this House, that he brings up the question. What he would like us to do now is that the Government would withdraw the application of this money from the people of Cape Breton and let them live on paper railways for a little while longer. That would be on a par with the policy that my hon. friend (Mr. Flynn) enunciated in 1872, but that paper railway policy ceased to carry Cape Breton members to Parliament. The hon. member (Mr. Flynn) would lead the House to believe the other night that there had been no opportunity for bringing up this question now. It may be possible that when he goes back to the people who charged him with the responsibility of bringing this matter before Parliament, that he will say he had no opportunity of doing so earlier in the Session. For the information of my hon. friend, and for the information of the people who I have no doubt take a great interest in this matter, I will point out the number of opportunities that the hon. member for Richmond had to bring up this question. The hon. gentleman brought up the question to-day on a motion to go into Supply and let me point out that this House was moved into Supply, just the same as it was to-day, on the 12th February, on the 15th February, the 19th February, 22nd February, 1st March, 19th March, 22nd Mard, 28th March, 29th March, 2nd April, 5th April, 10th April, and to-day the 11th April. My hon. friend allowed every single one of those opportunities to pass without making his protest to this House. Hon. gentlemen will now see what force his remarks can have in the face of the action, or want of action, of the hon. gentleman himself. The hon. member, in order to show that this route was not properly selected by the Government used the argument that there was an agitation in the Counties of Inverness and Victoria for the building of more railways, but he never attempted to present the argument that there was an agitation for building the line on the southern route except at the expense of the line that is now being built. He asks Parliament now to abandon this line which is being built, and some 40 or 50 miles of which is ready for the rails to be laid, and to adopt a route to the south of this, but he cannot present one argument to this House in favor of the route which the hon. gentleman himself advocates, except that it would benefit the extreme eastern point of the county which I have the honor to represent. My hon. friend has also made the statement to this House that my colleague from Cape Breton and myself were not supported by the majority of the people of the county when we appealed to them at the last election. I differ with my hon. friend on that question. It is true that in the county which I have the honor to represent there was a good deal of agitation got up, and agitation which I am prepared to explain to this House was got up under false statements and false pretences by the agitators in connection with this question. The people were led to take part in this agitation under a misapprehension of how this matter stood. It is true as the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn) has said that important and leading gentlemen from my own county came on a delegation to the Government to tell them that they were making a mistake in selecting that route. But what has been the result? These gentlemen came here and told the Government that if they insisted on carrying the line through the central route, which is now adopted, the result would be they could not get a member from the island of Cape Breton elected to support them and that they could not in their appeal to the people of Cape Breton Island, expect a supporter of the Government returned, unless they adopted the route which those delegates favored. I had occasion to come here at that time, and I did not come at the request of any one in my county, but I took the responsibility on myself of coming here and telling the Government what I knew, and of telling them where those people misrepresented matters. Now, Sir, what followed? Those two popular gentlemen from my county—they were always known as popular men and they are known to-day as popular men, one of whom leads the Opposition in the Provincial Legislature of Nova Scotia and the other a Senator in this House, and we all know the popular position that that hon. gentleman occupied both in this House and in the county which he represented - those two gentlemen came here and the result goes to show that a mistake was made by these gentlemen notwithstanding that they were popular. They made all those strong statements to the Government in Ottawa and they went back to Cape Breton and undertook to bring out two independent candidates on the question of the route adopted by the Government. These candidates went from point to point in the county and used the charge against the Government that they adopted the wrong route, that they had adopted a route which was not acceptable to the majority of the people of the island or of the county; but what was the result? Those two candidates were defeated in the election and defeated so badly that they could not save their deposits of $200. Why should my hon. friend undertake to inform this House that these people had a majority of the people of the county at their back, when their candidates who ran on this issue supported by them, could not save their deposits at the election. My hon. friend (Mr. Flynn) may attempt to refute this statement, but I will refer him to the Parliamentary Companion and he will find there that in the last election I, who was charged with advising the Government to do what was so terribly wrong—not only to the people of the Island, but to the people of the whole Dominion—I was returned at the head of the poll with 1,882 votes and my colleague from Cape Breton (Mr. McKeen) was next with 1,875 votes. I may inform my hon. friend if he does not know it, and I am sure he does, but I wish to inform the House that Mr. Murray, the Liberal candidate who was pitted against my colleague, would not undertake to discuss the question of routes during his candidacy. When in the north he was favorable to the northern route and when he was in the south he was favorable to the southern route, but he evaded the question as much as possible. That gentleman obtained his votes on purely personal and political principles. He got 1,702 votes as against 1,875 cast for my hon. colleague, (Mr. McKeen.) The Liberal candidate who was put up against myself was a Mr. Slattery living at the port of Louisburg and representing the voice of the people of the southern part of the county. He had the advantage of not only being a Liberal but of being a strong southern route man as well, but he only obtained 1,062 votes as against 1,882 for myself. Now I come to the candidates who were put up by the gentlemen who came as delegates to Ottawa to represent to the Government the mistake they were making. Mr. Gillies one of the independent candidates only obtained 895 votes as against the man who had committed this great wrong, according to the member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn), and who had advised the Government to do what they did, and his independent colleague, who was put up against my hon. friend, got 518 votes, as against 1,875 polled for my colleague. That is my answer to my hon. friend's charge with regard to the feeling of the people in my own county on this question. On the occasion on which we discussed this question in this House two years ago, in reply to my hon. friend, I made reference to the fact that on my arrival at Ottawa at the time the delegation was here, I found that the statement was made by this delegation that the two Counties of Inverness and Victoria had no interest in the matter at all, and would be quite satified that the line should be built by the southern route; and they laid greater stress on that statement so far as the County of Victoria was concerned. Having heard that on my arrival here, I took the trouble of telegraphing to the leading men of both parties in the county of Victoria; and I will just read my message and their replies. I telegraphed to the Hon. C. J. Campbell, then representing the county in this House; to Dr. Bethune, who was an independent member in the Local Legislature; to Wm. McCurdy, who represented the county at that time as a supporter of the Liberal Government in the Province; to John A. McDonald, the present representative of the county in this House, and at that time a member of the Local House also; and C. R. Hart, a prominent merchant of the county. The question I put to them was this:

"Do people of Bad leck and Victoria County strongly favor Narrows route to preference to any southern route? Delegates here say not. Answer quickly."

This message was sent on the 7th of January, 1887, and I received the replies on the following day:

From C. J. Campbell:—"Of course people of Victoria strongly favor Central and Boisdale route as located, and will strongly protest against any change."

From J. L. Bethune:—"Victoria County unanimously prefer Narrows to southern route. Must have branch to Baddeck."

From Wm. F. McCurdy:—"I was under the impression that there is no doubt about feeling of Victoria in this matter. Baddeck and Victoria County generally have, and are, united, and will insist upon the Grand Narrows route in preference to any southern route."

From John A. McDonald:—"People of Baddeck and Victoria favor central route, southern routes are so far from us, and further, than eastern extension. Not a man in the county would vote for southern route in preference to Narrows route."

From C. R. Hart:—"Local and Dominion members, business men of the whole county, and all classes of people strongly favor central route in preference to any southern route."

These were the sentiments of the leading people of Victoria on that occasion, before the contract was let. Hon. gentlemen will understand the difference between what those people might be led to say then and what they would say to-day. They told us that they would not favor any other route, and that view has been supported by the people at the polls. There was no question at the polls as to the proper location. No one in the County of Victoria dared to open his mouth to question the route, and the hon. member who now represents the county was sent to this House, not only at that time, but on a second occasion, when the Liberal party would not bring out a candidate. In the County of Inverness there was no question of route either. The people of that county supported the route which has been adopted. They admitted that only one line could be built by the Government, especially in the meantime, and that the route which would serve the greatest number of people, and which they would support, was the route which would reach the harbor of Sydney, and if possible the harbor of Louisburg; and for that reason the people of Inverness could support no route, except that which has been adopted by the Government, and they would protest against the southern route, if the Government proposed to adopt it. More than that, three of those counties sent supporters of the Government at that election, while the one county that protested against the route which has been adopted, did not send a supporter of the Government. My hon. friend from Richmond, and the candidate against whom he ran, both protested against the route selected by the Government, and I venture to say, that if the people whose names were signed to the petition, which was presented to the House against the route, were to-day asked the question, they would say that that route is the one which serves the greater number. Now, I do not consider that it is necessary that I should delay the House any longer with regard to my hon. friend's statement, except to say this: We are urging the Government to extend that road to Louisburg, with the view to the development of our mines, and the route which my hon. friend described to this House would not touch those mines had it been adopted. He says that it should go by Loch Lomond, and that a branch should be built to Sydney, and on to Louisburg. Such a route would not touch a single mine in the county I represent, and, Sir, there is not a mine in the hon. gentleman's county. Of the $10,000,000 invested to day in the coal mining industry of Cape Breton, not one dollar is in the county represented by my hon. friend or on the route he advocates. The people who have signed the petition now before the House contend that the road must go to Louisburg; they admit also that it must go to Sydney, and they say they are quite willing that it should go to North Sydney. If that is the case, we must see what the mileage of this route would be. Road to Louisburg, 85 miles; branch to Sydney, 12 miles; Sydney to North Sydney, 18 miles; total, 115 miles; adding mileage required to connect all the mines with Louisburg, about forty miles; while we can connect all the mines with the present road with a mileage of some fifteen miles less. The House may not know that the route advocated by my hon. friend, with all those branches, is not as feasible or practicable, and not as favorably reported on by the engineers. The hon. gentleman is just as far in error in quoting the length of this route as he was in quoting about a route that was not adopted by the Government at all as an argument against the adopted route. He read from the report dealing with a route that goes by East Bay, 40 miles of which was not adopted by the Government, and over-looked the report on the Baisdale route, which has been adopted and more favorable than the one quoted from. My hon. friend pretends to know all about this road, but the display of knowledge that he gave to-day shows that he knows nothing, because he has to refer to reports in order to obtain knowledge that he could get at his own door. I venture to say my hon. friend never traversed a mile of that road. I would like my hon. friend to say whether he has travelled over ten miles of that road between Hawksbury and the town of Sydney. Some of the bridges my hon. friend quoted as the heaviest structures on that line, apart from the Narrows, were bridges across rivers and streams over which the road, if it went by the southern route, would equally have to pass. No matter what route the Government adopted, the road would have to cross those streams over which are the heaviest structures. In the other cases of the heavy structures, they were on a road not adopted by the Government at all. My hon. friend quoted from the report of Mr. Hyndman, that there were 60 vessels passing the Grand Narrows every day, as a reason why the Government should build the Narrows bridge. I wish to inform my hon. friend there never has been a day yet, in the history of the Island of Cape Breton, when thirty vessels went through the Narrows. It is considered a great deal when 25 pass in one day. Quite a number do pass—5, 6, 10 or 15—and on a very exceptional day, 20, to which a bridge would not be any serious impediment. My hon. friend makes this statement from a report which he says himself is not a correct report, which he says is made with a view of influencing the Government to build up this road. These are the so-called incontrovertible statements quoted by my hon. friend. The remarks I have made, I believe, are sufficient to answer the charges made by the hon. gentleman, so far as the country is concerned and so far as the people of the Island are concerned; and with regard to my hon. friend's charges against the Government for their management of this work, I presume he will get his answer in that respect. It is not for me to defend the Government beyond what I know to be the facts within my own personal knowledge and the knowledge of the people I am here representing. I am very much obliged to the House for the patient attention given my remarks, and am sorry to have delayed the House at this late stage in the Session.

Mr. KIRK. Although I may be open to the charge made by the hon. member for Cape Breton against the hon. member for Richmond, of not knowing anything about this line in consequence of never having travelled over it, yet I feel it my duty to say a few words upon this question, because the work is one of very great importance, and one in which every hon. member cannot help feeling an interest in view of the amount of money required to build it. This is also a work in which I have always taken an interest, and since I have been in this House I have always had great pleasure in supporting it. So far as the location of the line is concerned, that is something I know very little about personally, but any hon. gentleman who will take the trouble to look at the map of Nova Scotia will see—even in the small scale as it is given in the report of the Minister of Railways—that the location of that line cannot be in the interest of the whole people. Cape Breton Island comprises four very important counties. This central line is on a location which any man who will look at the map must see does not and cannot accommodate the four counties, and can accommodate but a very small portion of one or two of them. When it was first proposed by the Government to locate the line on the central route, the people of Cape Breton, generally, viewed the proposition with considerable alarm. I remember at that time a public meeting was held in the town of Sydney, and that meeting condemned that route. They appointed a delegation to go to Ottawa for the purpose of laying the matter before the Government, and, if possible, to urge upon them the necessity of constructing the road by the southern route. The delegates appointed at that time were the Rev. James M. Quinan, Dr. Murdock Chisholm, Senator McDonald, and Dr. Wm. McKay. The delegates were all Conservatives, for the people knew well it would be useless to send a Liberal here. On that delegation were the four most influential Conservatives in the county. They presented to the Secretary of State in Ottawa the following letter:—

"The undersigned beg to enclose herewith petitions from electors of Cape Breton protesting against the adoption of central railway route, and praying for the adoption of the St. Peter's route. We are instructed to say that the warden of the County of Inverness and several electors of the said county signed said petitions."

Now, the senior member for Cape Breton has given to this House a large number of references in order to prove that the interests to serve by the central are greater than those to be served by the southern route. In answer to that I will give the hon. gentleman the letter which the delegates wrote with regard to that point:

"That by building viâ St Peter's and Loch Lomond, Sydney can be reached by 80 miles of railway easily constructed, and North Sydney by a branch of ten miles additional—making in all 90 miles, thereby saving 5 miles of railway, avoiding the ferry at Grand Narrows, and accommodating 50,000 of the population of the island."

Now, the largest population the hon. gentleman could get for the central route was 40,000, and I dare say he made it as large as he could. These delegates, who were not personally interested in the matter, stand in this respect in contrast with the senior member for Cape Breton, who not only owns a large portion of land near the line, but is otherwise personally interested. The delegates conclude:

"Moreover, by this route, all due encouragement would be given to agricultural, mining and fishing interests, as the statement already submitted to your honorable body sufficiently proves."

I have not that statement, but this letter is a complete answer to the hon. gentleman as regards the interest to be served. We have been told by the hon. member for Richmond, and it has not been denied, that this central route will cost $3,850,000 to complete. Now, when we consider that when this line was first spoken of in 1883, and the resolution was brought down by the Minister of Railways, asking the House to vote the sum of $3,200 per mile to build this road, or a sum total of $256,000, he led this House to believe then that that was a sufficient sum to build this road, that all he wanted was $256,000, to build the road from the Strait of Canso to Louisburg and Sydney, in Cape Breton, and when he was asked by the hon. member for West Durham if he had any assurance that the company would complete the work with this subsidy, he said:

"I have the assurance of the General Manager, Colonel Snow, that they will. Previous to his leaving here, I told him, although I knew the work was more costly in Cape Breton than in other sections, I was not prepared to recommend a subsidy of over $3,200 per mile, and I asked him before taking that step, whether he would be prepared to carry out the work, and he assured me they would."

He also said:

"I have taken great pains to ascertain the financial standing and position of this company, and I think I am in a position to state that, whatever work they engage in, they will carry through. The Government made a contract with them to extend the line from Oxford to New Glasgow, and, although they have made great progress with it and incurred large expense, they have not yet called for any portion of the subsidy, so that I have no doubt at all as to their financial ability. Dr. Norwin Green, a well known capitalist, and a gentleman connected with a great many railway corporations in New York, who is associated with parties who can command any amount of capital, is the president of this company, which, I am sure, will vigorously carry the work to completion, provided they accept the subsidy. They asked for a larger subsidy."

So the House will see that the Government were exceedingly modest in asking the House to begin the work; but, once they had begun it and had pledged the House to it, they were compelled to go on, and that road, which was to cost the country only $256,000, has now cost $3,800,000. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn) has stated that the southern route would only have cost $2,100,000, so that there is a difference of no less than $1,700,000. I maintain that, if the southern route had been adopted the difference of expense between that and the central route would have been sufficient to build another railway through the Counties of Inverness and Victoria, which the people of those Counties are asking for, and those two roads would have amply accommodated all the interests in the Island of Cape Breton, whereas this road will only accommodate one County and a portion of another of the four counties in the Island of Cape Breton. I do not desire to detain the House in regard to this subject. I have only to say that, in talking with people from Cape Breton who are perfectly familiar with all the circumstances in connection with this road and all the interests to be served by it, men, too, who are strong supporters of the Government, men whom I have never before heard say a solitary syllable against the Tory Government, they have declared to me that this was a most scandalous waste of public money, and that a Government which would expend money to build the line by the central route, ought not to be permitted to exist for any time. This is the opinion of some of the strongest Conservatives I have met, who know all about the different routes, and this is their ground, because they maintain, as I do, that this money would have built two roads on each side of the Bras d'Or.

After Recess.

Mr. KIRK. Had the money been appropriated and expended on the southern route, there would have been a sufficient sum left to secure the building of the road through Inverness and Victoria, for which, I understand, the municipal council of Inverness have recently voted to tax themselves $100,000. Then the people of Inverness need not have taxed themselves $1, except for the right of way, and that line would not have interfered, in the slightest degree, with the navigation of the Bras d'Or, or with the navigation at the Grand Narrows. The senior member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall), in his speech this afternoon, charged the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn) with having sat silent in his seat, during all this Session, and during other Sessions as well, without saying anything against this central route.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). I did not say other Sessions; I said this Session.

Mr. KIRK. It appears to me that there was no necessity for my hon. friend from Richmond to say anything against the route this Session. He had placed his opinions on record with regard to that route in other Sessions, but, that he did not speak earlier this Session on the question of the Grand Narrows bridge he is not to be blamed for. He presented three petitions from the people of Inverness, who seemed to be very much agitated on the subject of the Grand Narrows bridge, and he was prepared, if he had had an opportunity, to make a speech on this question at an earlier date, but he only got an opportunity to do so to-day.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). Will the hon. member state when the House refused the hon. gentleman an opportunity?

Mr. KIRK. He had an opportunity on one occasion at 1 o'clock in the morning to go on and make his speech, but he did not think it proper to go on at that hour, and he would not have done himself justice if he had gone on at that time to make a speech of an hour and a half. He was wise not to make his speech on that occasion, but he took the first opportunity afterwards, and it is not yet too late to bring this question before the House.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). After the money is voted.

Mr. KIRK. No one heard until last fall of the intention of the Government to build a bridge across the Grand Narrows. It was always understood that they intended to operate the road with a steam ferry, and not to build a bridge there. Consequently, there was no necessity to deal with that question until now, but the Government have now decided to build a bridge across the Grand Narrows, which, many people believe, will very much interfere with the navigation there. I think, when this House appropriates large sums of money to establish a public highway, they should take very good care that in doing this they should not destroy any existing highway which is quite as important as the one they are constructing. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr Flynn) has pointed out clearly that to build a bridge across the Grand Narrows would greatly interfere with the navigation of the Narrows, and would almost utterly destroy the St. Peter's Canal which has been constructed at a cost of more than half a million of dollars. Anyone by looking at the map can see that a bridge there would be exposed on each side to the open sea. The tide, in ebbing and flowing there, has a very rapid current; and we are informed, too, that the anchorage there is very poor, and that being the case it must necessarily interfere very seriously with navigation, and for that reason the people are considerably exercised over the matter. But what is the use? They know perfectly well that it is no use to petition this Government in regard to the matter; they know the petitions would be treated just as the delegates were who were sent up against the adoption of the route. They know the Government will do this, and they know it will be supported by the members from Cape Breton; for that reason, no doubt, the people have refrained from petitioning Parliament not to destroy this highway into the Bras d'Or Lake.

Mr. CAMERON. I regret to be called upon to speak on this question at this late stage of the Session. Notwithstanding what my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Kirk) has said, the member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn) had several opportunities since the commencement of the Session to air his views on this question. It is a singular fact that he deferred discussion on this question until this stage of the Session. He had opportunities to talk upon it, even before tenders were asked for the Narrows bridge, and he had several opportunities to air his views against building that bridge before the time of receiving tenders had expired. But he failed to discharge his duty to his constituents, and persistently declined to bring this matter before the attention of the House until the tenders were in, the contract signed, and the question placed beyond the power of this House. But he had an object in view, evidently; he supposed that at this late stage of the Session, the members of the House would be very anxious to get through the business, and would be so impatient that, after listening to his dissertation on this subject, they would not hear any other member. But I hope the House will forbear with me, because I have not occupied much of its time for the last two or three Sessions, while I give my views on this question. The hon. member from Guysborough tried to mislead the House to believe that the cost of the line by the central route will be great enough to enable railway companies to build all the branch lines, not only in Cape Breton but in Nova Scotia as well. This is a mere delusion on his part, and he will fail to convince the House that such would be the case. The central route is 98¾ miles in length, including the branches. The estimated cost of that road is $20,000 per mile, it may cost more. But the line defined by my hon. friend from Richmond is 108 miles long, and the estimated cost of that road also is $20,000 per mile; so it is fair to estimate that if the southern route were adopted it would cost equally as much, because the estimated cost is the same as that of the central route. Therefore, the route asked for by my hon. friend from Richmond would cost not only as much as the central route, but would cost besides nearly as much as the Grand Narrows bridge will cost. It is, therefore, very unfair for my hon. friend to endeavor to mislead the House as he has done. He cannot mislead the people on the Island to believe that the cost of the central route would be sufficient to build not only the southern route but all the branch lines on the Island. I think it is also unfair for my hon. friends opposite to ignore the fact, that, while the people were building roads in Nova Scotia proper at the expense of the local treasury and of the Dominion treasury as well, the private enterprise of the residents of Cape Breton built not less than seventy miles of railway without any aid from either Government. This is a fact which our friends from Guysborough and Richmond ought to be candid enough to lay before the House in justification of the Government assuming the responsibility of building only ninety-eight miles at the exclusive expense of the Dominion treasury. But Cape Breton railway agitation has a history. Those of you who were in the House during the term between 1883 and 1887 may recollect that on more than one occasion I felt it my duty to air this question. I was accused more than once of tracing the history of the Island of Cape Breton from some time prior to the flood up to the present time, in endeavoring to lead the Government to undertake to subsidise partially a line through the island. It has been my policy, and I never hesitated to say so in public or in private, to induce the Dominion Government to build the main line at the exclusive expense of the Dominion treasury, and to grant the usual aid given to local railways for the purpose of building branch lines. In 1883 I advocated this course. During that term a promoter of the short line from Montreal to Sydney and Louisburg, was in the city of Ottawa pressing the claims of his company for the usual subsidy of $3,200 per mile for a branch line through the island, and also a subsidy for all the unconstructed links between the Strait of Canso and Montreal. During that Session I took a leading part in the agitation, and I was misled to believe that the Local Government of Nova Scotia would aid us in the construction of that line, because at that time the line between New Glasgow and the Strait of Canso was in the hands of a private company, and it was impossible, I might say, for the Dominion Government to undertake the construction of the Cape Breton section as an extension of the Intercolonial Railway. But, I then advocated the purchase from the company of the eastern extension and the assumption by the Dominion Parliament of the extension through the Island. My remarks on that occasion will be found in Hansard, 1883, page 1272. After showing the wisdom of the Government in constructing the line from Moncton to Louisburg or Sydney as part of the Intercolonial, I concluded as follows:—

"Under these circumstances, in the near future, it is just possible that the line between Truro and the Strait of Canso, instead of being a local line, will eventually become a part of the Intercolonial Railway; and the extension of this line from the Strait of Canso to Sydney or Louisburg will only be a construction of a road which is a Dominion line. It is, therefore, evident that the Dominion Government has an interest in that extension as a feeder to a road which may, in the near future, become a road owned by the Government; and whether this will be so or not it is well known that the Eastern Extension through Cape Breton to Sydney or Louisburg will be a feeder to the Intercolonial from Truro westward. On these grounds I hold that it should not be considered a local road. Although the subsidy for Cape Breton is not as large as the people of the island would possibly desire, and although I have no doubt that they would expect and suggest a larger subsidy, still I hold that this subsidy will be sufficient to ensure the extension of the road from the Strait of Canso to Sydney or Louisburg; and that, as soon as railway enterprise will take a firm footing on the island, it will no doubt ensure a network of railroads over that island, developing the resources of this important section of the Dominion."

That was my idea in 1883. At that time the Local Legislature of Nova Scotia promised us not only $3,200 per mile, but they promised a great deal more, if necessary, for the completion of the road. The promoter of the road, who was here at that time, assured me that he had a guarantee from the Local Government of $3,200 per mile, which the Company led me to believe would, in addition to the Dominion subsidy, enable it to construct the road through the island. In order that there may be no doubt about it I will quote the utterances of members of the Local Legislature during 1883; which will be conclusive on that point. They were made in a discussion in the Local Legislature in Nova Scotia, with a view to obtaining the Eastern Extension and the Pictou Branch from the company owning it and utilising the whole line for the purpose of railway extension in Cape Breton. The company while here were led to believe that the Local Government would give them the Pictou Branch and the Eastern Extension in addition to a Dominion subsidy of $3,200 per mile, and that would enable the company to complete the road through the island. During that discussion, Dr. Haley, member for Nova Scotia and a good Grit, said:

"I am willing to support the Government in maturing the transfer of the Pictou Branch and Eastern Extension by purchase from the Local Government, because I believe they are taking over a valuable asset. We believe, as I have said already, the Eastern Extension is one of the most valuable assets of the Province of Nova Scotia, and though the western counties do not receive any advantage from the taking over of this road, yet I, as a western member, am willing to vote for railway extension in the Island of Cape Breton from the proceeds of the sale of the road."

This was the opinion of one of the hon. gentlemen representing Nova Scotia. We have also the opinion of another hon. member in regard to the same question. He said:

"The road is the key by which to open railway construction in the Island of Cape Breton. I and my friend expect the Government to deal with the question so as to secure railway extension in Cape Breton."

This was the language used by the member for Victoria on 16th April, 1883, during the time the representatives of the Short Line Railway were here agitating for a Dominion subsidy. We have also the opinion of Mr. McCoy, a supporter of the Local Government on this question. He said:

"Now, I would like to ask my hon. friend and every member in this House if he would undertake to say that the Eastern Extension Railway and the Pictou Branch, even with the low rates of freight imposed by the present Government, does not pay a handsome dividend to-day. They (the Opposition) will be prepared to assist the Government in raising the funds to enable them to pay for the railway and place it in the hands of the Government, so as to enable them to carry the railway into the Island of Cape Breton, not stopping short at St. Peter's, but carrying it through to its proper termination."

The Premier said:

"It would be with great pride that I would be enabled to carry out a policy that would send the iron horse running through the gem of the ocean, the Island of Cape Breton."

This was the opinion of the leader of the Local Government in Nova Scotia at the time. In fact I might quote from every Grit supporter of the Local Government, and from every member of the Local Government as well, to prove that the object which they had in view, in the purchase of the Eastern Extension from the company at that time, was simply for the purpose of granting it as a bonus to a railway company for the purpose of extending the line through the Island. Was it, therefore, unreasonable for me to believe that they would carry out their promises? I so represented the state of things in this House and on the strength of those representations, aided by the unanimous vote of this House, the votes of the Opposition as well as those of the Government, a subsidy of $3,200 per mile was granted to the company. But, unfortunately, as soon as the Local Government of Nova Scotia secured the support of our deluded friends from Cape Breton to purchase the Eastern Extension, so soon did they repudiate the promises made at the time the question was under discussion in the Local House. They acquired the power to purchase in the spring of 1883, as they represented for the sole purpose of giving both the Pictou Branch and the Eastern Extension as a subsidy for the construction of the road through the Island. But to our great surprise we found that the Morning Chronicle, the organ of the Local Government, on 13th November, 1883, editorially concluded as follows:—

"The Dominion Government have been humbugging Cape Breton long enough; they voted $12,000 a mile for a road in Ontario, while they fooled Cape Breton with an offer of $3,200 per mile which they knew would not be acted upon. They have millions of money to spare, they can give Cape Breton a railway if they want to do so. The Local Government's liberal offer has been before them for months. They ought to have accepted it long ago, let them accept it now."

This was the position of the Local Government as far as we can judge from the utterances of their organ, and we find that besides repudiating promises which were made to us by representations in the Local Legislature, by letter and otherwise, they, as soon as the Dominion Government granted a subsidy of $3,200 per mile, repudiated their promises. The result was that which we hoped to attain shortly after the vote was granted here, was as for from being accomplished as ever. In the meantime the Local Government purchased the Eastern Extension and the Pictou Branch, and, besides, they sold that line to the Dominion Government before 1884. You would suppose that after they had sold the Pictou Branch and the Eastern Extension they would at least give us the proceeds of the sale for the purpose of extending the line through the island. All their professions of friendship to Cape Breton during the time they were agitating for power to purchase the road from the company, misled us to believe that they would either give us the road itself or the proceeds of the sale for the purpose of extending the line through the Island. But they did neither one nor the other, and you will be surprised to learn that up to the present time they did not expend a dollar on railways in the Island of Cape Breton. In 1884 the company presented itself again here and held that if they secured a subsidy of $3,200 per mile additional to that given to them in 1883 by this Parliament, it would enable them to finish the road, and the prospects of securing it were so good that the Local Legislature of Nova Scotia, and particularly the Grit portion of that Legislature, determined that something would have to be done to prevent the construction of any railroad in the Island. We find that the policy of that party in Nova Scotia since 1867 has been to delude the people of Cape Breton, to believe that they were friendly to that Island, and whenever they voted subsidies for the purpose of constructing railways in Nova Scotia proper, they always held out the hope that Cape Breton would receive a proportionate amount. In 1876 there were $2,000,000 to the credit of the Nova Scotia Government in the Dominion treasury and at that time the Local Government in Nova Scotia, which was a Grit Government, sub-divided that amount for railway purposes. They granted $600,000 for branch lines in Cape Breton and the balance for other branches in Nova Scotia proper; but, as usual, they went back on their promise to Cape Breton, and while they secured the aid of its representatives for the purpose of obtaining subsidies for their own roads, as soon as they secured the subsidies they repudiated their promise to the people of Cape Breton. At that time they granted $4,000 per mile for a branch line through Inverness and $5,000 per mile for a line from the Straits of Canso to Sydney or Louisburg, but they succeeded in defeating the construction of the railways in the same manner as they always prevent the construction of any line on that island; that was by creating dissensions among the people themselves in reference to the routes. In fact on the eve of every occasion when it was probable that the people of Cape Breton would secure railway extension through that island the Local Legislature since 1867, ruled by the Grits principally, always managed to create dissension for the purpose of preventing the construction of the road. In 1884, they felt alarmed, they feared that the subsidy granted in 1883 and the subsidy in prospect in 1884, which was equivalent to $3,200 per mile and the Eastern Extension, granted by this Parliament for that purpose, would cause the line to be carried out and they found that it was necessary for them to make a movement which would be calculated to counteract that enterprise. We find that on the 10th March, 1884, Premier Fielding, the Grit Premier of the present Government, delivered himself in the House of Assembly as follows:—

"Hon. W. Fielding said: The suggestion of the Hon. Attorney General ought to meet the wishes of the hon. gentlemen opposite. The Bill was not being passed there a final stage. He did not agree with the member for Inverness (Mr. Fielding was referring to the local member for the County of Inverness) as he thought it was no harm to have more companies than one chartered for railway purposes. He had seen a telegram in a Cape Breton paper suggesting that the granting of that charter was going to embarrass the Dominion Government, but though he for one was inclined to look to the Dominion Government to assist in railway building in the Island of Cape Breton, he did not see how the passage of this Bill, and the conditions suggested by the hon. the Attorney General, could have any such effect."

It may seem singular to hon. gentlemen in this House to hear what the Premier of Nova Scotia said in 1884 in view of the fact that he and his Government misled the people of Cape Breton to believe that his whole aim in purchasing the Eastern Extension and the Pictou Branch, in 1883, from the company then holding it was for the purpose of giving the whole of that line for railway extension in Cape Breton. As soon as he secured the object he had in view, that is, the support of the Cape Breton members to his scheme, he repudiated it, subsidising another line on the 10th March, 1884. But he then found it necessary to create dissensions as usual for the purpose of preventing the construction of the road and by the language which I have quoted he aided the passage of a rival charter for a railway through the island. The Short Line Railway Company was prepared to construct the road from the Straits of Canso to Sydney or Louisburg at that time, and it had also a charter to build a branch as far north as Cape North through the County of Inverness. But the Local Government chartered a rival company for the purpose of having a rivalry of routes, and for the purpose of having a competition between the two companies for the Dominion subsidy. That company was named the Cape Breton Railway Extension Company, Limited; and as hon. gentlemen who happened to be in this House at the time know, they elected as president of that company the illustrious predecessor of the hon. member for Richmond. At that time that gentleman was the instrument that was used for the purpose of preventing the construction of any railway in Cape Breton by the Short Line Railway Company; and the Premier of Nova Scotia aided and abetted him in securing a charter for that purpose. I recollect having written to Mr. Alex. Campbell, the local member for Inverness, to whom the Premier of Nova Scotia referred at the time. My object was to ascertain whether the Local Government would aid the Dominion Government in subsidising a company to build a line through the Island; and I received a reply from Mr. Campbell, dated 25th February, 1884, in which he says:

"My Dear Doctor,—Yours of the 20th is at hand. I immediately called on the Attorney-General and asked him if he would press on the Government either of these propositions, that is, the $4,000 per mile or the increase on royalty. He told me that he was willing to do more if it was necessary, and give me the enclosed note. He has introduced a Bill last Friday to incorporate a company to build railroads in the Island of Cape Breton, which I think is the very company you allude to. I enclose the name of the body incorporated. I have prepared a Bill to revive the Acts of 1875."

Here is the assurance given in writing by the Attorney-General of Nova Scotia, dated 25th February, 1884, in his own hand:

"I am satisfied the Local Government will aid even to a greater extent than you suggest.

"A. J. WHITE."

I am sure that any hon. gentleman in this House who knows the difficulties companies have to secure money to enable them to construct railways, will admit that to obtain two or three charters over the same line, granted by any Legislature, is the way best calculated to defeat the object in view. This was the course pursued by the Local Government of Nova Scotia at the time, led by the present Premier of Nova Scotia; and he succeeded in defeating the object we had in view, namely, the construction of a railway through the Island of Cape Breton by a company. In 1886 the Dominion Parliament decided to build a main line exclusively at the expense of the Dominion treasury. My hon. friend from Richmond has referred to the public meeting held in the County of Inverness in 1886. That meeting was called for the purpose of securing the opinion of the people of the county in reference to the vexed question of railway extension through the Island. A resolution was passed at that meeting, unanimously desiring that the Dominion Government should build a main line exclusively at the expense of the Dominion treasury, and that the Local Government should be asked to subsidise local lines; the municipal councils of the Counties of Victoria, Cape Breton and Richmond passed similar resolutions; and, in 1886, an attempt was made in this House to create a discussion on rival routes. I expressed my opinion in reference to that question on the floor of this House at that time. I urged the predecessor of the hon. member for Richmond not to discuss the question of routes. I held that if a company could be got to undertake to build a line from the Strait of Canso to Sydney or Louisburg, the wisest course would be to leave the company absolutely to decide the route, and that if the Dominion Government would undertake the construction of the line, it should have the right to select the route. Although I was always favorable to the construction of the road by the central route, yet I never felt that either a company or the Government that would make accurate surveys and see the character of the country through which the different lines would pass, would ever undertake the construction of the road from the Strait of Canso to Louisburg by the southern route. I was perfectly willing, indeed anxious, to leave the selection of the route to either the company or the Government if it would undertake the construction of the road, and I so expressed myself in this House. As soon as the Local Government, led by that astute little Premier, the Hon. W. S. Fielding, found that the Dominion Government assumed the responsibility of constructing the line, as a main line through the Island, as desired unanimously by the municipal councils of Victoria, Inverness, Cape Breton and also Richmond, in January, 1886, they took immediate steps to create, if possible, dissensions on the Island with a view to counteract the political effect which the construction of the main line might have on the people of the Island; and in 1887 we find that they turned their attention particularly to Inverness. During the agitation between 1872 and 1887, the discussion on the question of rival routes in Cape Breton convinced every railway company that purposed to build through that Island, and the Dominion Government as well, that it would be madness for any company or for the Government to build any line as a main line through the Island unless by the central route. No sane company having in view local traffic would ever undertake to construct a line from the Strait of Canso to Louisburg by the southern route. Notwithstanding what my hon. friend has said, I, who know the character of the country through which that line would pass, know, without any assistance from the reports of engineers, that the southern route would cost as much as, if not more, than the central route, and that the line which he advocates would be a longer one than that which the Government have adopted. Now, what did they do in Inverness in 1887, when they found it was necessary to turn their attention to myself in particular? The Short Line Railway Company had a charter for the purpose of building a branch line to Inverness. They found this was not sufficient, notwithstanding the fact that a company had already a charter, and the Local Government of Nova Scotia, in 1887, chartered two other rival companies for the purpose of constructing a branch line through the County of Inverness. In fact, there was much excitement among capitalists to get hold of a branch through Inverness, on account of the representations made by the advocates of the southern route, representing that the enormous resources of Inverness were of such a character that no local line was as necessary as a branch line through that county. This agitation created such excitement among capitalists to get hold of the construction of a branch line, with the view of making immense profits, that no less than four companies secured charters from the Local Legislature for the purpose of building branch lines. I, who know something about the difficulties which companies have in raising capital for the purpose of constructing lines in any part of the Dominion, concluded at once that it was the same old game practiced, not to knock the heads of the people of Cape Breton against each other, but to crack the head of the member of Inverness against his own. They had only one head to deal with. They had four charters for the purpose of building branch lines through Inverness, and they sent the four companies up to the Parliament of Canada to secure a subsidy for each branch line. The Local Government of Nova Scotia, by an Act of Parliament, promised each company chartered by the Local Legislature for the purpose of building branch lines through Inverness a subsidy of $3,200 per mile and a land subsidy of 2,000 acres per mile. I have only, to prove this, to quote section 5, chapter 1, of the Acts of 1886, which is known in my county as a lobster clause of the Nova Scotia Railway Act. This clause promised to every chartered company in Nova Scotia $3,200 per mile, and a land subsidy of 2,000 acres, and no less than four applications were sent to your humble servant for the purpose of securing the Dominion subsidy of $3,200 a mile for four of them from the Dominion Parliament. This is the clause to which I refer:

"The Governor in Council may grant to any company offering to construct any line of railway in Nova Scotia, not already subsidised by the Province, a cash subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, and a land subsidy not exceeding 2,000 acres per mile, provided that such subsidy shall not in any case be granted until the company offering to construct the railway shall have furnished to the Governor in Council satisfactory evidence that it has at its disposal, either from grants provided by the Parliament of Canada, or from private capital, or from both, funds sufficient, with the subsidies authorised by this part of this Act, to complete such railway, and shall have given ample security for said completion."

The Local Government chartered four railway companies for the purpose of constructing branch lines through Inverness, and the representatives of each railway company appealed to me to assist it, and secure the Dominion subsidy for itself. In order to show you that I am not exaggerating, I shall call your attention to only one of the demands made by one of those companies, because it would prolong the Session until July next before I could get through with the history of the deception practiced by the Grit Local Government of Nova Scotia on the people of Cape Breton. I shall quote the high authority of the leader of the Local Government, Premier Fielding, as to the manner in which they were always able to butt the heads of the Cape Breton people against each other by agitation on rival routes. On 10th April, 1888, Mr. Fielding said:

"It has been the fact in times past that a skilful political leader could knock the heads of the two divisions of Cape Breton together, and prevent anything like united action on the part of Cape Breton members, by raising the question of the rival routes. In fact the question of the rival routes in Cape Breton is a more serious question than the rivalry between the mainland and Cape Breton. I have my own opinions on the subject, but I would be quite willing to grant aid to either of these routes, if the company on commercial principles was ready to build on either of them; but if we are forced to decide between the routes, as we would be by this resolution, then I see great difficulty in the way. I am quite willing to admit the strong claims of Cape Breton. If this resolution had the approval of all the members from the Island, if it could be taken as a fair indication of the interests of Cape Breton, then it might be an indication of the line of policy which this Government would adopt. But I am afraid it does not; I am afraid it brings up the question of the rival routes, an exceedingly difficult question. On behalf of the Government I have to say that, if any company be found to build a railway in Cape Breton, the Government will be ready to aid in that work to the extent of their power."

The Grit Premier of Nova Scotia knew well the manner in which he could always create dissension among the people of Cape Breton, for preventing the construction of any railway in any part of the Island, and since 1887 he has devoted his special attention to Inverness. As I stated, the Local Government chartered no less than four railway companies to build branch lines through that county, and I will only refer to the representations made by one of these companies to myself in order to show the manner in which they have been trifling with the important question of branch lines in that county. On all occasions, the Local Government of Nova Scotia managed to secure the aid of some representative from the Island to mislead the people. That Government knew full well that, if any representative or any person from the mainland attempted to practice such deception upon our people, they would not believe him, and therefore they always adopted some person who they believed would have the confidence of the people. In 1887, after they chartered two companies, two in that Session itself, knowing that there were two railway charters for that county previously, they set on my trail an old friend, who held the confidence of the people for a long time, and I have no doubt holds the confidence of a section of the people of that county now. He was to be set on my trail for the purpose of misleading the people of Cape Breton to believe that that Government were in earnest in their professions of friendship for the County of Inverness at all events, for at that time they were ignoring the other counties in the Island. I will read the following letter which I received from that gentleman:

"HALIFAX, 18th May, 1887.

"H. CAMERON, Esq., M.P.

"MY DEAR SIR,—I have not troubled you with any letters of mine this Session, but have watched that so far you have been silent on Cape Breton interests. Mr. McRam is here from New York with full powers to negotiate and enter into contract for the building of the branch lines of railway in your county. I understand that Mr. McNeil, a member of the Local Government, took some care to have the enclosed Incorporation Act passed, and views, with much favor, the lines of railway to be opened up, so that through him the co-operation of the Local Government, to the extent of $3,200 per mile and some other concessions, will be assumed. The company comprised of wealthy capitalists, require no municipal concessions or guarantees further than the right of way and exemptions from taxation, while I notice that some other incorporated company requires municipal guarantees which, at the outset, shall create doubt and distrust of their being able to successfully complete any great undertaking of this kind. My object in writing you is that you had some correspondence with Mr. McRam, and that with A. McRay, Esq., a member of the Legislative Council, we saw the Provincial Secretary here and explained to him the object of commencing soon in order to have the line completed in the time mentioned in the Act. He stated that the first move should be by the Dominion Government in procuring the subsidy either in the Estimates or by resolution, and once the contract would be entered into then that his Government would be prepared to do their part. In the absence of his council he was not prepared to give any written guarantees until further progress was made at Ottawa, but that he would view with favor these important lines, and once the company would show that they had made proper arrangements with the Dominion Government and prove to their satisfaction their ability to build this road within a reasonable time, then that the $3,200 per mile would be provided by them, making payments whenever ten miles was finished. The Local Government would be deeply interested in having a road to the Inverness coal fields, shipping during winter at Cariboo Cove and probably at Cheticamp during the opening of navigation. The object now will be to see that the Dominion subsidy would be provided for in the Estimates or by resolution in your House. I understand that another company is incorporated, but the very fact of their seeking municipal guarantee for the interest of $100,000 as being made a consideration proves that they are more adventurers who simply desire to sell their charter. You can readily understand that Mr. McNeil would not view favorably any line that would not include Port Hood and the shore which the other company would not do. Mr. McRam is here now and he is waiting for further instructions from Mr. Bell, then he may have to proceed to Ottawa. The Incorporation Act will speak for itself, and I have no doubt you will be able to see that money matters will be arranged there so that the contract may be entered into soon. The engineer and staff are ready now to come to locate the line as soon as matters are pressed forward a step or two. You may understand that I have no direct interest in this matter only as far as it tends to the general development and prosperity of our common country.

"In haste,

"Yours very sincerely,

"W. ROSS."

Every person who knows the gentleman who signed this letter must know that he is a person who has taken a very active part in the politics of Nova Scotia. You find, by his letter, that he was fresh from the office of Premier Fielding of Nova Scotia, and he was only representing one of the four companies that sent representatives to me in a similar manner asking me to secure aid for a branch line through the island. All this was done with the view of preventing the construction of the line through that county. The subsidy to which my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Kirk) referred as having been granted by the municipality of Inverness was not granted for the company in whose behalf Mr. Ross wrote to me, but to another of the rival companies, so that at the very threshold of the agitation for the construction of branch lines in Inverness, the Premier of Nova Scotia has taken this effective means for the purpose of preventing it; but, as he found that even yet there was very great danger of the company undertaking the construction of the line with the offer of a subsidy which was given by the Local Government of Nova Scotia, it was found necessary, not only to have all these rival companies chartered, but to pull wires in order to divide the company against itself. We find that the company to which my friend, Mr. Ross, referred was organised in Halifax on 12th September, 1887. It was agreed between Mr. Allen and Mr. Bell to undertake the construction of that road. The agreement between them reads as follows:—

"Whereas the Inverness and Richmond Railway Company, Limited, was incorporated by the Legislature of Nova Scotia, 3rd May, 1887, and William H. Bell and Frank B. Allen have undertaken to build said road, it is agreed between them as follows:—That the sum of $400,000 in the bonds of the said road shall be set aside to be sold or hypothecated to raise the sum of $100,000 to be used in the construction of said road; that all interests beyond this amount belong to the said Bell and Allen jointly, and other and further negotiations shall be by their joint consent; and all moneys advanced by either of them shall be a credit to the party advancing the same; and no bonds or stock of said road shall be issued to either party without their mutual consent; and all stock issued shall be held by the treasurer of the road till a mutual division shall take place between the parties hereto; that the money necessary to finish the survey now under way shall be advanced by the said Allen on the condition above set forth; that should said bonds not be negotiated, such other arrangements looking to the raising of money on bonds and stocks of the company shall be by their mutual consent."

This company, then, was prepared to undertake the construction of the road under these conditions, but the Premier of Nova Scotia managed to divide the two leading heads of this organisation, one against the other. Here is a statement given to me by the president of the company, W. H. Bell, of the holders of the stock subscribed on that occasion: Frank B. Allen, 990 shares; John M. Dow, 10 shares; W. H. Bell, 1,000 shares; William Ross, 10 shares; William Dunn Allen, 10 shares. Although Mr. Ross declared in the commencement of his letter that he had no connection with this road, we find he was one of the shareholders of the company; and we find that, immediately after the Local Government set to work to divide this company into two sections, he did all he could to prevent the other section from securing a subsidy from the Local or Dominion Government. Not only so, but there were other companies chartered by the Local Government, who pursued the same course. While I listened to the hon. members for Richmond and Guysborough assailing the Dominion Government for undertaking the construction of a line through the Island, I could not help remembering the deception practiced by the party with which these members had been associated in Nova Scotia, whose Government misled the people of Cape Breton to believe that they had always been friendly to the construction of roads through that Island, for the purpose of securing aid for roads in which the people of the mainland were much interested; and since 1877 they have pursued the iniquitous course of chartering several rival lines through the County of Inverness for the purpose of creating dissension, so as to prevent the construction of a branch line through that county. Every hon. gentleman in this House who knows anything about the construction of railways, must admit that it would be practically impossible for any company to build any of these rival lines as long as there are so many charters granted by the Local Government for the purpose of building branch lines through the county. I have no hesitation in saying, in answer to my hon. friend from Richmond, that, so far as the County of Inverness is concerned, the people are all but unanimous in favor of the construction of the line by the central route, and equally as unanimous in favor of the construction of the Grand Narrows Bridge. He need not attempt to mislead this House to believe that the contrary is the fact; they are all interested in building a branch line through the County of Inverness for the purpose of developing the enormous resources of that county, particularly in coal which lies dormant beneath the soil. They know full well that the construction of the Narrows Bridge is the key by which a company can be secured for the purpose of building that branch line; and he will represent to this House and to the country in vain, that the majority of the people of the Island are either against the construction of the main line, or the construction of the bridge. I felt it my duty to show the deception which has been practiced by the Grit Governments of Nova Scotia on the people of the Island from 1867 to the present time, and that deception is being practiced, not only in the Local Legislature, but by members of this House for the purpose of continuing the same policy. The senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) kindly asked for a grant from this Parliament last year for a branch line through Inverness. I had forgotten at the time to thank him for the manner in which he asked the House to subsidise that road to the extent of $3,200 per mile. But when I find that the Government which he supports in Nova Scotia has chartered four rival companies for the purpose of building branch lines through the Island, and that the same Government is promising $3,200 per mile to each of the rival companies, I feel that the sincerity which characterises their conduct, had to some extent characterised the conduct of my hon. friend who so kindly advocated a subsidy for that line, which is very essential, and which will, in the near future, be constructed, but never as long as the little Premier of Nova Scotia rules the destinies of that Province and of that Island.

Mr. McKEEN. The persistent hostility of the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn) to the Government's railway policy in Cape Breton, is to be regretted, inasmuch as the valuable time of this House has been taken up in discussing a matter which, from the circumstances, cannot do any good to the Island of Cape Breton or the country at large. During the Session of 1887 the hon. gentleman very fully discussed this question and elaborated his grievances at great length. During that discussion it was shown I think conclusively, that the policy of the Government in the location of the road through the Island of Cape Breton, had been fully endorsed by the people concerned. I think it was then shown that three at least, out of four counties of that Island, had approved of the location of that road, to which such great exception has been taken by the hon. member for Richmond. As the hon. member has chosen to mention my name in connection with the discussion which took place on that occasion, I will ask the House to listen to a few remarks I made then, which he did not quote in his speech this afternoon:

"It is a most unfortunate fact that the noble Island of Cape Breton is so nearly bisected as to make it almost two Islands, and being two islands, it is entirely impossible to locate a line of railway which will suit both the north and the south sides of the island. Much might be said in favor of both routes, and I feel a good deal of sympathy with the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn), but unfortunately, his county is situated on the southern side of the island, and it does not derive the benefit from the proposed line of the road that the other side does. I think, from what I have learned from the engineers who had charge of the surveys of these routes, that the expense of building the road would be pretty nearly the same. From what I gathered from the engineers during the agitation with regard to the location of this road last autumn, I concluded there was not more than a mile difference in the length of the lines. I learned also that the gradients were about the same, and that the expense of construction, with the exception of building the bridge across the Narrows, if that should ever be found necessary, was almost the same. I think, therefore, the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn), is misinformed when he says that the expense of building the central line is much greater than if the southern line were built."

"I simply take the estimates given by the engineer in charge of the line, in expressing that opinion. Personally I may say I have no great preference for either. Either line suits us, and, therefore, I did not take any decided ground. I may say, however, that I fail to see the necessity of taking up the time of the House upon this question when we know that the matter has already been decided by the Government, that the line is under contract, that the work of construction has been going on for the last four or five months, that thousands of dollars have been spent in building the road from Sydney to the Grand Narrows and that it is absurd to suppose that the route could be changed on account of any representations that could be made at this late hour."

I think I can repeat the statement I made on that occasion with much greater emphasis now. That line has been under construction for the past two years, and why this matter should be brought up now, why an agitation should have been awakened at this late date, and why the time of the House at this late stage of the Session should be monopolised by such a useless discussion is more than I can understand. At the same time some statements have been made here which I think it is my duty to notice. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Flynn) in his remarks this afternoon told us this road was in a very incomplete state, that it would not be finished for about two years.

Mr. FLYNN. No. I said it was two years since it was commenced, and it was not half finished yet.

Mr. McKEEN. That is the same thing. The hon. gentleman said further that laborers were unpaid, and that the surplus laboring population of Ontario and Pictou was dumped on the Island of Cape Breton to do work which should have belonged to our own laboring men. In regard to these contentions I am not prepared to say very much; but I think that if our laborers were unpaid, I am very sorry more of the population of Pictou and Ontario did not go down and do the work for nothing. While speaking on this matter I must say that the fact that some of our laborers have been unpaid has been brought to my notice on several occasions, and I have remonstrated with the engineers in charge, and others, in regard to the existing practice whereby contracts are let to irresponsible parties on the lowest tender, which system leads to work being given to people who are incompetent to carry it out; and if there is any difficulty in connection with the payment of the laborers, it is on account of contractors taking work at prices which are not paying prices, and when the contractors are unable to fulfil their obligations they leave the country, and the men are left to look to the Government or to the members for remuneration, which I am sorry to say they have not always received. In regard to the cost of the road, it has been stated by the hon. gentleman that it is going to cost some three millions of dollars, irrespective of the cost of the bridge. I am ununable to understand that calculation. The road between Sydney and Hawkesbury is precisely the same length by the southern route as by the northern or present route. I myself made a careful examination of the plans in 1887, and having had some experience in surveys of this kind, I know that the distance by the two projected routes between Sydney and Hawkesbury, namely, by the southern and northern route, is almost precisely the same. Then as regards the cost, we have nothing to judge by except the estimates of the engineers. Those estimates gave the cost of construction at exactly the same figures, namely, about $20,000 per mile. Experience has taught us that this was an under estimate so far as the central line is concerned. The same argument may be applied to other routes, but as this road has never been built no one can tell what the cost would have been. We know, however, that the gradients on the southern line were said to be a little heavier than on the central route, but it was the opinion of the engineers who made the survey, whom we must presume to be honorable men, that the cost of the central road would be no more, excluding the bridge, than the cost of the other road. But supposing that the southern road could be built for $20,000 per mile and the central road for $25,000 per mile, which is the maximum amount the engineers now estimate it will cost, the difference is only $5,000 a mile, and that on ninety-three miles, I believe, is only $465,000. So, how it is possible for the hon. gentleman to make this great difference in the cost of the central as compared with the southern route is more than I can understand. As regards the inuendoes or insinuations of the hon. gentleman as to the means by which the location of the road was brought about, I have nothing to say. I am not in the secrets of the Government, I do not know by what means the location of the central route was decided. I take it for granted that it was decided on business principles; but this I know that the Government having made their decision and the contracts having been let, we came to the conclusion that it was best to accept the situation and to fall in with the Government's policy. The only difficulty we saw in the way was that of the ferry at the Grand Narrows. That ferry would have always been more or less an objection, but it was proved by the engineers and others that it could be successfully maintained. My own opinion was that the line could be operated by a ferry. The first idea of a bridge being built across those Narrows emanated from the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn) himself. In his speech in 1887, to which I have already alluded, setting forth the great grievances to which the Island was subjected in adopting this line, he stated as follows:—

"If that is the case and the road is built on that route I maintain that a steam ferry cannot be used at all times, and it necessarily involves the building of a bridge. One of the surveyors states that the bridge can only be built at an enormous cost, and it has been estimated by some that it will amount to at least a million dollars."

Here is an admission by the hon. gentleman that if the road is permanently located here a bridge is certainly necessary. That was his admission, and I think the first suggestion of the construction of a bridge made on the floor of this House came from the hon. gentleman himself. It is contended that this bridge, if built, will obstruct the navigation of Bras d' Or Lake and of the Narrows, and, as I know, a great deal of opposition has arisen to that work by the people of Richmond County, represented by the hon. gentleman. But we must look at the other side of the Island. The hon. gentleman must admit there is a large commerce existing between Sydney and the lower end of the lake and Grace Bay and Cow Bay, and no opposition has come from those quarters. I, with my hon. colleague, represent a county which has a population more than double that of the County of Richmond, but we have yet to hear the first word of protest against the building of the bridge, and we in our county maintain that the principal part of the commerce of Cape Breton is conducted there. The coasters which pass through the Narrows pass through our county, and it is to our county the people come for their coal and to sell their farm products. We own a considerable number of vessels, and yet we have never had the slightest complaint from any master mariner or coal proprietor or from any of the merchants who supply the lake trade. None of those have taken any exception to the building of this bridge, and why ought the people of the smallest county on the Island be supposed to obstruct this great enterprise which I believe is hailed with delight by all the people of the eastern part of Cape Breton Island. When this road was first projected the great exception that was taken to it was that it might obstruct the Narrows, but that difficulty has been overcome and I believe, as far as I know, that this central line will accommodate the people of Sydney and of the outlying mines, as well as any other line can. I say this knowing that the line is now an established fact and knowing that, although I never gave it any support in the past I think our people are satisfied with the situation and I say it is ill-advised to raise those contentions at this late date. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Flynn) referred to the petition which he has presented to the House asking that the present line of railway from Orangedale (I think the petition states Orangedale) to North Sydney, should be abandoned, and the route turned towards the County of Inverness, and also that the line connecting North Sydney with Louisburg, going around by the coal mines, should be adopted. Now, Sir, I cannot imagine that the hon. gentleman or his constituents, in presenting that petition to this House, ever supposed or imagined that it would be for one moment entertained. What does it ask for? It asks practically for the abandonment of 56 miles of road which are now under construction and approaching completion; 56 miles of road on which have been expended the money of the people of this country to the extent of more than $850,000. A more absurd proposition was never presented to any Parliament, and what do they propose to give us in return? They propose that we should undertake to build a road from North Sydney to Hawkesbury via Louisburg. I have always advocated, and I hope to advocate as long as I am in this House or in public life, the connection of Louisburg with Sydney and with the entire railway system of our country. I do not intend to go back on any statements I made in this regard during the discussion on this matter in 1887; but, Sir, to abandon our present line and to deprive our harbor of North Sydney of the connection it is likely to have with Hawkesbury, and to add to the distance some 47 miles, is a proposition that the people of the eastern part of our county would not for a moment entertain. As nearly as I can remember, North Sydney and Louisburg are equi-distant from Hawkesbury, but if we were to abandon the present line, if we were to build a road to Hawkesbury via Louisburg it would increase the distance from North Sydney via the coal mines to Hawkesbury about 47 miles as compared with the present route. Let me say a word as to the position of North Sydney. It is one of the most important, energetic and growing towns that we have in the eastern part of Nova Scotia. It has a shipping tonnage every year entering its port about equal to any port in the Dominion with the exception of Halifax, Yarmouth and Montreal. Its population including the district is about one-half the whole County of Richmond, and its revenue collections last year were some $19,000, while the whole revenue collection of the County of Richmond was under $2,000. This is the town that is to be made tributary to the County of Richmond and to other parts of the Island according to the policy of some hon. gentlemen. I say that Sydney and North Sydney are two of the most important centres in our Island. I think it is no more than right that they should receive equal railway facilities with any other part of the country. The question of a railway to Louisburg is one that has always been agitated by the people of our Island and by not only the people of our Island, but I am glad to be able to say of the entire Lower Provinces.

Mr. PURCELL. What do you call the distance from Hawkesbury to Louisburg?

Mr. McKEEN. About 85 miles, according to recent surveys.

Mr. PURCELL. I mean along the shore.

Mr. McKEEN. That is the survey line, and it is the only line I know of. With regard to the Louisburg Railway I hope that the House will bear with me while I attempt to show the necessity and the importance of continuing the present system by the collieries of our county through to Louisburg, and we hope the day is not far distant when this will be made one of the great Atlantic ports of the Dominion of Canada. I cannot do better in this connection than to read the remarks of the late Minister of Finance. In speaking in this House he said:

"I need not refer to the great volume of shipping which is now pouring into the harbor of Sydney. I do not think it will be necessary for me to detain the House at this stage of the Session, to speak longer on this question, though great and important as it is; but I will say that it would be difficult to overrate the value to Canada, of obtaining this great route, from ocean to ocean, and it would be difficult to overrate the importance from every point of view, of opening up the Island of Cape Breton. The Island of Cape Breton is cut off by the Strait of Canso, although there is no ice, and no difficulty in maintaining communication across by means of a boat—and, perhaps, at no distant day, by a bridge or a tunnel, although that is not proposed at present. It is at present cut off by the Strait of Canso from railway communication with the rest of the country and it will be impossible to overrate the importance of the development of the Island of Cape Breton, of the construction of that line of railway. Independent of enormous coal fields, independent of the valuable fisheries, it is known that Cape Breton possesses a large portion of good soil adapted to cultivation and development, and also mineral resources of various kinds that only await the facilities railroads alone can give in order to cause the island to spring forward, as I am sure it will, with unwonted rapidity."

I maintained on a previous occasion in this House that our railway system was incomplete without this connection from Louisburg to Sydney, and that with it we would have a continuous line from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean with an open winter port all the year round. I was glad to hear the member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) bring this matter up the other night and speak on behalf of the claims of the port of Louisburg. I was glad to see that hon. gentleman advocating the contentions that have been made in this House in favor of the opening of the railway to that port. I only hope that, on all succeeding occasions whenever the necessity may arise, we may have the assistance of that able gentleman to help us in our contention for the claims of the harbor of Louisburg. I do not wish to trespass on the time of the House; I know it is becoming impatient, and I can assure you that I have taken up this question with a great deal of diffidence. There is not a man in the House who is more reluctant to hear me than I have been to speak; but this is a question of great importance to the people of our county, and when we see our rights and privileges assailed, it is our duty as far as we can to defend them. Now, Sir, what does the hon. gentleman propose? He opened his remarks this afternoon by telling this House that the railway to Sydney, as now being constructed, was of no use to the Island, that it was wrongly located and very expensive, and he wound up by asking in his amendment that we should be deprived of that railway altogether. His amendment reads:

"That the location selected by the Government for the Cape Breton Railway is inexpedient, inasmuch as the route selected is longer and more expensive than is required to effect the connection between the Atlantic ports and the railway system of this Dominion, and is in every way less calculated to serve the national and local interests which such an enterprise is designed to promote."

He has offered no alternative, he has offered us nothing, he simply proposes to deprive us of that railway for which we have been fighting for the last twenty-five years. I presume that this amendment must have been moved in the interests of the hon. members for Halifax and those of the western part of the Province, who are desirous of securing for the port of Halifax the communication with the Atlantic, which we consider the port of Louisburg is intended by nature to have. This amendment must meet with the opposition of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and it is on that account that I have ventured to trespass on the time of the House to-night. We were further told that this railway, as now located, would be of no benefit to the Island. I wish to say that, on the contrary, it is going to effect a commercial and social revolution in our Island. We cannot overestimate the benefits that will accrue from the opening of this road, particularly if the hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches conceive it, as I believe they do, to be in the interest of the country to continue it to Louisburg. That is a proposition I have advocated ever since I have had the honor of a seat in this House, and I intend to advocate it as long as I am here, whether I succeed or not; and in advocating it I feel that I am supported by my colleague, who is equally interested in seeing this road extended to Louisburg harbor.

Mr. PURCELL. I wish to say a few words in reply to the hon. member who has just sat down. I am a practical man, and I have been through that country, and I want to say that the route which has been adopted is a very different route from what any practical party would adopt. The fact of the matter is that all the way to Louisburg is a very easy road to build. I have built the St. Peter's Canal, and the docks at Port Hood, and I have been all through that country, and I know what I am talking about; and I want to say to the hon. gentleman that he does not know exactly what he is talking about. There is no route by which that road could be constructed better than by that which is suggested by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn); and it could be built for a good deal less money by the route from Hawkesbury to Louisburg than by the present route, and there is no person who knows that part of the country better than I do.

Amendment of Mr. Flynn negatived, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Sault Ste. Marie Canal..... $1,291,400

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. On this very important item, we shall expect some explanations in detail by the Minister in charge.

Mr. FOSTER. The estimated cost of the Sault Canal is $2,657,809.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does that include all the approaches?

Mr. FOSTER. That includes everything. There has been voted already $1,291,400. The "A" contract has been let for the work in three different sections. The new vote this year is $300,000 and the re-vote $991,400.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Last year you mentioned $2,800,000 as the probable cost. Have you had further surveys made to lead you to reduce your estimate?

Mr. FOSTER. The surveys and the examinations which have been made have led to a nearer estimate than could have been made last year.

Mr. PURCELL. I said, you must remember, that the cost with a lock pit would be $3,000,000.

Mr. DAWSON. As this matter is up, I may be permitted to give some little information which will be very satisfactory to the House, as to the rapid increase in the traffic in that part of the navigation of the great lakes. I have just received in advance a statement of the traffic that passed through the Sault Ste. Marie last season of navigation. The total freight was 6,411,000 tons. The total passages were 7,803 vessels, and the total lockages 3,845. The number of sailing vessels was 2,009, and steamers 5,297. The total number of unregistered craft was 484. I draw attention to this as it shows the rapid increase of the traffic in that part of the country. Last year it was said that the then existing canal on the American side was quite equal to all the traffic, and that there was no necessity to build a new canal. Here is a report on that subject by the chief engineer of canals, General Poe, of the United States engineers:

"The project for obtaining a navigable channel of 16 feet in depth between Lakes Superior and Huron had been barely completed when the demands of commerce so enormously increased that the work of attaining a depth of 20 feet throughout was undertaken with the full sanction of both legislative and executive authority. A necessary part of the project is the construction of a new lock upon the site of the old state locks, to have a length of 800 feet between gates, a width of 100 feet throughout, a depth of 21 feet on the mitre-sills, and a single lift approximating 18 feet. The canal is to be deepened to correspond. The estimated cost of this enlargement of the canal system is $4,738,865, for the details of which see the annual report of the Chief Engineers for 1887. The statistics of the commerce using the canal indicate more clearly, each succeeding year, the urgency for rapid progress in the improvement."

So that the traffic has increased vastly quicker than the means to accommodate it can be provided. The traffic, in 1887, was, in June, 1,685 vessels, or an average of 45·76 per day; July, 1,665 vessels, or an average of 53·07 per day; and in August, 1,780 vessels, or an average of 57·42 per day. The average all through was 55·76 per day for 92 days. Now, the corresponding period in 1886 only shows an average of 40·66 per day for 92 days, showing a rate of increase during 1887 of 37$\frac{1}{7}$ per cent.; and during the past summer it was still greater over 1887, than 1887 was over 1886. Should the same rate of increase continue for three years more, we would reach the utmost capacity of the lock, which is 96 per day. On one day, in the month of June, 84 vessels were passed through the canal; on the 3rd June, 49 vessels passed the canal, carrying 49,258 tons of freight, or an average of a little more than 1,000 tons per vessel. Over 50,000 tons were passed on one day, but in a greater number of vessels. Thus we can see that this traffic is increasing so rapidly, that on the United States side they are not only providing a new lock, but they find the river not sufficient for the traffic, and are opening up a new channel which will shorten the distance. The total estimate of the cost of the lock now being made is $4,738,863. The cost of the present lock is $2,440,000, and the first locks cost over $1,000,000. The estimated cost of dredging the new channel is $2,659,000. So the Americans on their side are making an expenditure of $10,800,000 on this work. It has been said, and the comparison is often made, that the traffic passing at Sault Ste. Marie is equal to the traffic passing through the Suez Canal. That is not quite correct, but it is not very far from it. The traffic on the Suez Canal up to 1887, the last year for which we have returns, averaged 8,400,000 tons annually for the three previous years—the traffic of Europe and Asia for the whole twelve months, navigation being always open. The Sault Ste. Marie Canal, in the six or seven months of navigation passed through an amount of 6,411,000 tons, so it is not very far behind the Suez Canal and is fast coming up to it, the Suez Canal traffic having been practically stationary for the last three years. To show still further the traffic which is growing up on these inland lakes, I may mention that the annual traffic passing Windsor and Detroit has been estimated by the American engineer at the enormous amount of eighteen millions of tons. There is no other point in the wide world where such a large traffic passes, and I draw attention to the enormous traffic arising on the great lakes in order to show to the Government and the country that some more comprehensive system than has hitherto been followed must be adopted on these inland seas, in the way of lighting the coasts, in the way of providing harbors, and in the way of deepening channels where they are too shallow. There is a great future for that traffic when we consider the vast extent of the North-West and the enormous exports of wheat which we must expect from that territory. I believe there is no question raised this year as to the necessity of this lock, but I will submit these tables which contain a great deal of information and show the growth of the traffic from the opening of that canal to the present time:

Mr. PURCELL. With regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) I may say that last year I made my estimate that it would cost $3,000,000 to build that canal. I have been through that country a good deal, and I think I am a practical man. The people who know me believe what I say, and I say that we did not last year talk about the lock pit, which is going to be the most expensive thing in connection with that contract. Mr. Page would bear me out in saying that the lock pit of that canal will be more expensive than the lock will be. I give that from my practical knowledge. The hon. member is a little mistaken, and I tell him that it is not the lock or the approaches to the lock, but the lock pit, which is going to cost the money, and I tell him that the lock pit will cost all the money I stated last year, $3,000,000. We will see whether it does or not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I). I would ask the Finance Minister whether this lock pit is included in the contract?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The lock pit is included in the contract. Everything connected with the canal is supposed to be included in the sum mentioned by my hon. friend.

Lachine Canal..... $79,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is there any special purpose for which this sum is required?

Mr. FOSTER. It is for the purpose of settling for the St. Gabriel basin. There is a contract with Mr. Delorimier to complete about 500 feet of rubble wall below Côte St. Paul lock, $4,250; and the amount required to settle for the St. Paul basin is $44,750. Then there is a raceway and some drains and ditches, stone fences, contingencies and superintendence, making up the amount of $79,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think, if I remember aright, there was some difficulties experienced with the lessees of water power on that canal, and I think the Government ordered enquiry to be made. What is the position of the leases there? Has any arrangement been come to? Some vessel owners have complained a good deal of the difficulty of navigating that canal, in consequence of the demands of tenants for water, and of the very considerable current that was produced thereby.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There has not been anything done as yet with respect to adjusting the over-issue of waterpower, but that is now being looked into by the department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The season of navigation will be on in a very few weeks. It is a matter of considerable moment to all who use that canal, that some understanding should be come to, because I believe considerable difficulty is experienced.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not considerable difficulty. There has been a complaint that the vessels were impeded by the current caused by the excess of water used. Of course the present lessees must hold the power leased to them, although it may cause some little disturbance.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Unless my memory is at fault, these various leases contain express provisions that the parties who draw water are not allowed to use it to the disturbance of navigation. If that is the case, it will remain in the hands of the Government to regulate as they see fit. It is desirable that the vessel owners should know what the Government propose to do.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no provision of that kind. There is no means of doing so, except by purchase of the property, and granting compensation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Were leases given without provision?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. So I am told.

Mr. SHANLY. I do not think there has been any recent complaint of obstruction to navigation by the draught of the mills, I say not recent, because the increase in the size of the canal is so great, and the volume of water sent through is so much greater than it was, that, while the draught of the mills remain just the same, I do not think there can be any great cause for complaint by the vessel owners, because the mills are doing the same work they did before the enlargement. I do not remember to have heard any recent complaints.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does my hon. friend consider that there is not much risk, with the present size of the canal, of inconvenience? I put the question because, although I do not know myself how the matter may be, complaints have been made to me within the last 18 months certainly, perhaps within the last 12 months; they may have been exaggerated, very likely they were, but complaints have been made on the part of vessel owners that they were a good deal inconvenienced in passing through the canal.

Mr. SHANLY. I could not say without making a careful examination myself; but this I do know: that the increase in the volume of the canal is so enormous, while the draught remains the same, that there must be an immense diminution in the causes that retarded navigation, that were formerly complained of by vessel owners.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can the First Minister say about what time these leases expire?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I can ascertain.

Mr. SHANLY. They are perpetual.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They are of long standing. But I am informed by the chief engineer that since the enlargement of the canal there is no cause of complaint; that the only thing the Government can do hereafter, should there be any trouble, which is very improbable, would be to insist upon a better description of wheel, allowing the same amount of power with a smaller waste of water.

Cornwall Canal..... $1,200,000

Mr. FOSTER. The amount is required to meet the expenditure to the 1st of July, 1890. The contracts entered into to complete the excavation, require the canal to be enlarged to a depth of 14 feet; also to complete the four remaining docks out of the six, the enlargement of two being completed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the bank been placed in a proper state of repair, and is there no fear of another break?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The engineers say that there is no danger of a break, and that the repairs have been completed. The hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) is of a different opinion, as the hon. gentleman no doubt heard the other night when he made his very instructive speech.

Williamsburg Canal..... $800,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose this is intended to secure 14 feet navigation.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There have been doubts expressed at different times, as the First Minister knows very well, as to whether we can really secure anything like that depth of water from Kingston downward. Have the engineers in the department reported specifically to the Government that they are sure of getting 14 feet without very expensive rockwork at the bottom of the river?

Perhaps the First Minister will not take offence if I ask the member for South Grenville (Mr. Shanly) his opinion on the subject, if he has had occasion to look into it lately. I heard him express the opinion once, an opinion which struck me as having a great deal of force, that, on the whole, it would be a great deal cheaper to tranship grain into bargos and take it down to Montreal rather than expend a very great sum in obtaining 14 feet navigation from Montreal to Kingston.

Mr. SHANLY. I would say, since the hon. gentleman has referred to me, that perhaps I have peculiar ideas upon that point. I never was in favor of securing the extreme depth of 14 feet between Kingston and Montreal. I was strongly in favor of securing that depth as regards the Welland Canal, but I think transhipment at some point near the foot of navigation, say Kingston, will be the rule, and that a less depth than 14 feet would answer the purpose fully. That is my own personal opinion. It is the opinion I have held for a number of years, and it is one I have never changed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can the Minister of Finance give the Committee any idea as to the total sum that will be required to obtain 14 feet navigation from Kingston to Montreal? The Government engineers must by this time have arrived at some idea with regard to it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am informed by the chief engineer that the St. Lawrence between Kingston and Lachine will give us 14 feet. There are some points to be improved and there will be considerable other expenditure.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can the First Minister give us any idea as to what sum—I know considerable allowance has got to be made—that will be required over and above that already expended to complete the navigation, so as to give us 14 feet? I presume 14 feet at low water is meant. The St. Lawrence is subject to very considerable fluctuations, there being sometimes as much as three feet between high and low water.

Mr. SHANLY. Four feet.

Mr. FOSTER. The amount required, taking the appropriations of 1889 and 1890, will be a little over thirteen millions. The appropriations for 1889-1890 are estimated at $4,170,400. So the amount required will be $9,380,709 over and above that sum.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is an estimate only.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the latest revised estimate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It seems a very large amount of money to pay over and above what we have already spent. Is it the Government's idea that they can bring ocean going craft down, because I would doubt that very much? Is it really worth our while going to this enormous expense for the purpose of enabling a comparatively small number of vessels to go down to Montreal? My information coincides very closely with the statement of the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Shanly) that cheapness and economy would be much better promoted by the transhipment taking place at Kingston than by spending nearly nine millions or very likely twelve or fifteen millions, in order to get 14 feet of water.

Mr. FOSTER. I must correct the statement I made in this way: that the amount I mentioned includes the cost of Sault Ste. Marie Canal. This year we have voted $1,294,000 for that canal, and next year there will be required $1,341,409. These two sums I included in the $13,000,000 which will be required to finish the system. The 14 feet provided for is 14 feet taking the lowest known level of the water.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD I will read a statement prepared by the department:

"After completion of the several works embraced in the scheme of canal enlargement in progress and contemplated the position of navigation will be as follows:—

"A freight-carrying vessel loaded to the depth of 14 feet will be able to pass down from Lake Superior through the Sault Ste. Marie and the Welland Canal into the St. Lawrence; here the natural water way of the river will be utilised as far as the Cornwall Canal. Traversing the Cornwall Canal, Lake St. Francis, the Beauharnois Canal and a channel deepened through the lower part of Lake St. Louis, the Lachine Canal will be reached, and through it Montreal.

"Upward bound vessels will use the canals and river as far as the head of the Cornwall Canal, and at Farran's Point the rapids or strong current can be surmounted either by the construction of a deepened and enlarged canal, the cost of which is estimated at $500,000 or by the provision of a chain tug using the river channel, the cost of which is set down at about $100,000. Passing this point the Rapide Plat and Galops Canals, will give access into Lake Ontario, and thence upward through the Welland and Sault Ste. Marie to Lake Superior.

"NOTE.—The present Galops Canal is 7⅞ miles long, the length of the enlarged canal will be about three-quarters of a mile long."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then I understand the cost of the entire system will not be nine millions but seven millions.

Mr. FOSTER. That is for the St. Lawrence system alone.

Mr. PLATT. Will the First Minister state the amount we have thus far expended on the Murray Canal?

Mr. FOSTER. Up to 1st December, 1888, $975,282. The amount now asked, $217,000, will complete the work on the canal.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is the hon. gentleman able to state whether the difficulties said to have been met with, owing to the falling in of the banks, or the presence of something approaching a quicksand, have been overcome?

Mr. FOSTER. I think that has been overcome.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can you state positively that that has been overcome?

Mr. FOSTER. I am informed that there was never any trouble, as far as quicksand is concerned, in the Murray Canal.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is seven years since it was commenced, and it was promised to be built in two, or, in the outside, in three years, and the reason given for the delay was that there was difficulty experienced from time to time. That canal contract was let out in 1882, and certainly the time has been exceeded by several years. I think it has got a depth of only 10 feet.

Mr. FOSTER. Ten feet navigation, at the lowest water.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So that it cannot be used for vessels of the draught you propose to send down the St. Lawrence. It would be available only for vessels of small draught.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Vessels of a smaller draught of course; vessels that would require to go by the Bay of Quinté by the County of Prince Edward into the open lake. It is calculated it would be extensively used by steamers and barges carrying ores across to the United States, which is expected to be a very large business.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But surely the hon. gentleman is not going to spend money to create a traffic with the United States, to the detriment of the Canadian producers? That is contrary to his policy announced here time and again.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the hon. gentleman will find that we have a very wholesome and productive reciprocity there. We will send over enough ore to purchase coal enough to supply the smelting works in Canada.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suspect you will without difficulty, or without deepening the canal.

Welland Canal—deepening to 14 feet $100,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How much remains to be done to complete the deepening to 14 feet?

Mr. FOSTER. The amount of $100,000 is required to complete the deepening and to settle contracts, so that completes the entire matter.

Trent River Navigation..... $80,000

Mr. BARRON. I would like to draw the attention of the First Minister to the report of Mr. Rogers, the chief engineer of the Trent River Navigation works, who says:

"Navigation commenced on the completion of swing bridges. During the past three years new steamboats have been placed in the waters from Lakefield to Balsam Lake. There are now 13 steamboats on this stretch."

I do not suppose that he intended this report to be misleading, but it is quite misleading, because the fact is that although we spent an enormous sum of money in building a lock at Fenelon Falls, the navigation above the falls is completely stopped by reason of the obstruction of the railway bridge, and on account of the ridge at Cameron Lake, which has never been removed. The first Session I had the honor of a seat in the House I drew the attention of the First Minister to these circumstances, showing that this money was completely thrown away unless the obstructions I speak of were removed, so as to allow of navigation. From that time up to the present (two seasons of navigation) not one single thing has been done in the matter. I confess that when I drew the attention of the Government by telegram last summer, to the fact that the swing bridge at Fenelon Falls was being delayed in its construction, that they showed a reasonable promptitude to have it completed as fast as possible so as to allow of navigation over the lock itself. But I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that the railway bridge is there without any swing in it at all, and it is utterly impossible for any craft of any dimensions such as it is proposed shall navigate these waters to get through into the lake further than about 100 yards north of the lock itself. Even if that bridge is made so that craft can pass backwards and forwards, there is still a ridge at Cameron Lake, which prevents navigation especially when the water is at all shallow. It seems to me that the Government put the cart before the horse in this matter. They went to work and spent this enormous sum of money on this lock, of which of course I do not complain, but it is entirely useless without the clearing away of these obstacles. The matter is of considerable importance to the people of that district.

Mr. SHANLY. May I ask what railway is there?

Mr. BARRON. It is the Victoria Branch of the Grand Trunk Railway. The enormous output of forest produce in that part of the country is really astonishing. The waters all lead to Fenelon Falls, and I certainly can applaud the expenditure of money so far as this lock is concerned, if for no other purpose than to enable the forest produce to get to some railway station; but as I have said the whole expenditure becomes absolutely wasted, and it has been wasted, and we have lost the interest on that expenditure for two years for the simple reason that the Government will do nothing in the way of removing these obstructions. I know that great complaint was made last year that the Government did nothing; a great many people wanted to make use of the upper waters in connection with the lower waters but they were prevented from doing so. Large contracts were entered into in anticipation that these obstructions would be removed, but the contracts had to be cancelled. People entered on the construction of steamboats, and I see that the engineer, Mr. Rogers, states the fact that steamboats were built on the upper waters, but these steamboats have been rendered useless by obstructions to the navigation of these waters. I would like to draw the attention of the First Minister also to the fact that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction with this work so far as the Commission is concerned. The Government for years and years have professed to be in the possession of knowledge sufficient to enable them to ask large appropriations for the purpose of building the Trent Valley Canal. I can refer to the letter of the chief engineer of the 21st May, 1881, directed to Mr. Page, and which is as follows:—

"SIR,—By direction of the Minister I have to request that you will be pleased to take the necessary steps to obtain during the ensuing summer surveys for a system of canals, &c., whereby communication may be made between the Bay of Quinté and Georgian Bay, already in part effected through the Trent River Works, for which survey the sum of $6,000 was voted by Parliament at its last Session."

Sir Charles Tupper reported to Council as follows on 8th April, 1882:—

"The undersigned has the honor to represent that from time to time during many years past, as shown in many successive annual and other reports, the establishment of a line of water communication between Lake Ontario and the mouth of the River Trent, and Lake Huron, through the utilising of existing river and lake waters, has been under consideration."

It will be seen from these two documents that the idea was to construct the Trent Valley Canal, not simply to open communication between the inland waters. Then, we have the statement of the First Minister in a speech which he made in Peterborough in the month of June, just before the election; and of course he was desirous of creating the impression that it was the intention of the Government to go on and build the canal. He said:

"Every town of a sufficient size wanted a post office and a custom house, and every part of the country wanted some improvement in order to develop its resources, just as those he was addressing demanded the carrying out of the Trent navigation system, and they were going to get it. It was by a mere chance the Government had the opportunity of carrying out that great project of inland navigation."

Speaking of the Trent waters, the First Minister said:

"The Government kept them till the revenue had expanded sufficiently to justify them in going to Parliament as they did last Session, and getting a substantial vote which would be sufficient to add 150 miles of internal communication to their part of the country. The vote taken last Session would, however, amply guarantee that the whole work would be carried out as fast as the revenue would allow, so it could be constructed."

The impression created up to that time was that the canal, from Lake Ontario to the Georgian Bay, should be constructed, not simply that the inland waters should be connected by means of locks. Mind you, I do not condemn the Government for spending this large sum of money to connect the inland waters, because I believe it is a good expenditure; but what I do complain of is that the Government should create the impression, time and time again, that they were going on with the construction of the Trent Valley Canal, while they are not doing so. Mr. Stevenson, speaking on the night of the last election, by the authority of the Minister of Public Works, said:

"The Minister of Public Works had given him every assurance that the Trent Valley Canal contract between Peterborough and Lakefield would be let during the coming summer. This was no electioneering dodge because the elections were now all over."

Mr. Stevenson made that statement on the evening of the very day on which he was elected. Therefore the Minister of Public Works must have stated that to him before the election was held, so that when Mr. Stevenson said that it was not an election dodge, I take issue with him, because the statement was made to him before the election was held, and he used it as such. Now, I would like the Minister of Public Works to say whether he intends to ask the Government to carry out that pledge to build the works from Peterborough to Lakefield. It appears that the Government have taken refuge in the appointment of a Commission—to ascertain what? To ascertain that which the Government have professed to know for many years past, when they assured the public from time to time that they were going on with the work. The First Minister has stated that the Commission has not reported, and very likely will not report this Session. In fact, one of the commissioners has left the country on a holiday, with the knowledge and consent of the Government, so that we cannot expect them to report for some time yet. They have ceased taking the evidence, which is necessary to enable them to report. I want to know why they do not report? The Government may think that this is a light and unimportant matter, but I can assure them that the people do not think so at all. They think that the Government are simply playing with this matter, and that they have appointed this Commission to give them an opportunity to get out of the work, because I can inform them that the Commission intend to report against going on with this canal. Whom did they appoint on the Commission? A gentleman from Toronto, who, if in favor of a canal at all, is in favor of the Huron and Ontario Ship Canal; then they appointed a gentleman from Montreal, who, I believe, is antagonistic to the canal as the people of Montreal are; and the chairman is a Peterborough gentleman, who, I believe, will be largely guided by the other commissioners. When the Commission report against the canal I suppose the Government will not go on with it, and if they do not they will be flying in the face of what they again and again have promised to the people. I want to read what the Peterborough Review, which is a Conservative organ, thinks of this Commission. It says:

"The statement made by the Minister of Railways and Canals that a Commission would be appointed to examine during the recess into the nature and cost of further works to open the Trent Valley navigation will not be favorably regarded in this district. The nature and cost of these works have already been fully investigated and if the Ministers insist upon their officials producing them they will find ample materials on which to form a judgment. Indeed on the information before them they some time ago found a judgment, recognised the value and feasibility of this great improvement and promised to carry it out as promptly as the finances permitted. So far they have continuously prosecuted the works, but the section now on hand is now near its completion, and for the first time since it was recommenced there will be a cessation of the work. There is no disposition to dread an investigation on account of want of confidence in the merits of this improvement. The more it is investigated the more clearly it will appear that for a comparatively small outlay a route can be opened that will be of great value to the country at large Its benefits have been plainly demonstrated and have been officially admitted. Mr. Stark's careful estimates showed that it would be far from costly for a route of such great importance, and nothing has since arisen to modify this view. If a Commission is to be appointed, we hope it will consist of men of sound judgment, and then there can be no fear of their reporting adversely to this necessary work But, as we have before remarked, we see no need of a Commission. The stage of investigation is passed. Another section, say from here to Lakefield might well be placed under contract, for the plans and estimates are ready. Many railways that have been subsidised in other parts of the Dominion are of far less public importance than this navigable route."

That is the opinion of the Conservative organ in the town of Peterborough, and I tell the Government that the people have very little confidence in this Commission; they believe it is nothing more or less than a subterfuge to enable the Government to get out of the pledges on which they carried riding after riding in the different elections. One objection made to the construction of this canal is that it will take a great deal of water. The reservoir for this canal is supposed to be Balsam Lake. There need be no apprehension with regard to the supply of water, because a considerable distance north of Balsam Lake is Hollow Lake, the waters of which are almost immediately connected with the waters which flow down towards and into Balsam Lake; and not more than half a mile will need to be canalled or trenched in order to bring a plentiful supply of water down from the far north. The only argument I have heard against the construction of this canal is the possibility of there not being sufficient water. That difficulty can be easily removed, not only with benefit to the construction of the canal, but with a large advantage to the lumbermen and mill owners all along the Trent valley waters, because by this means they will be enabled to bring down logs and other forest produce from the far north, and also with the result of retaining along the Trent waters the different centres of business which are now there. I do not approach this subject in any party spirit at all. I recognise that the First Minister secured votes from both parties, as he knows very well, in the different elections, on the strength of his promise that this work was going on. Sir Charles Tupper at great expense to the country paid a visit to the different waters up there and I have no doubt created by his presence the impression on the minds of the people that this work was one of such magnitude that it was intended to carry it through. A great many people on both sides of politics buried the political hatchet for the purpose of supporting the Government in the belief that they were going on with this work, and I warn them that they are in danger of losing the confidence of the people, who may transfer that confidence to some other gentlemen who may be more likely to carry out their pledges.

Mr. STEVENSON. As the hon. gentleman has taken upon himself to bring my name into this matter, I want to say a word or two. The hon. gentleman, who is a well known unbeliever in this scheme, who ridicules it, who has stood up over and over again in public and said that it is clap-trap, and that the Government never intends to do anything of the kind, comes now before this Committee and mixes up things in this hang yarn style. As far as I am concerned, this thing never entered into the elections hardly at all, either the last or any other election, in fact it was the hon. gentlemen from the other side who made most of this question by saying it was all clap-trap, that the Government would never build it, and would never commence to build it.

Mr. BARRON. I say that now.

Mr. STEVENSON. When the commissioners passed the route of the canal, did the hon. gentleman ever meet them? Did he send information to the Commission to enable them to come to a proper judgment?

Mr. BARRON. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Did he give any affidavit at all? No; but he comes to this House with this story now. During the election he referred to, I never mentioned public works at all in connection with this matter. Now, bring your paper if you like. If I mentioned a Minister at all, I mentioned one for whom I had a high respect and who is now no more. I say that the Government took the proper course in this matter of appointing a Commission—I suppose an independent commission. They appointed as chairman a gentleman from Peterborough, who himself was an advocate of the scheme all his lifetime. There may be gentlemen opposed to it on the Commission, for all I know, but I have to learn that yet. I believe the Commission is a fair one which will report what it finds to be correct. The hon. gentleman knows well that during the long debate on this subject, there were two or three engineers who differed very widely on the cost of the canal, more especially from Peterborough to Lakeville. One made an estimate of $1,000,500. It was a wise move for the Government to appoint a Commission to take evidence and ascertain the probable cost of that section of the canal. There are many difficulties of course in the way, and I can understand those difficulties. I do not propose to put the Government in any position other than what is honest and square, and I am quite satisfied the people of the County of Peterborough do not want anything but what is right. There are difficulties in the way. Evidence has been sent to the Commission that the class of vessels now in use in the grain trade are much larger, and require larger locks and greater depth of water than formerly. On local grounds the canal ought to be built. That country is full of iron which will some day find a market; I hope not across the line, but on our own side. I hope we will be in a position to manufature our ore in Canada without going across the line. What I am saying is correct, and I am quite satisfied that the hon. gentleman spoke from a bunkum point of view. He said he knew it was all trash, that the Government never intended to build the canal; but he never attended a public meeting in my county that I am aware of. But privately he always said that the thing would never be built, and that surely I was not a believer in it. I am a believer in it, I have the firm belief that the canal will be built, because the demands of the country require it. People in the sections from Peterborough to Lakeville will certainly benefit by it. and it will open up a very large additional area. The whole area from Hastings to Cameron Lake will be opened, and the canal will give immense water power to run any quantity of mills along its line. I did not intend saying anything to-night. But, as I am here, I may say that, as far as I know, the intention of the Government, is to assist in the building of the canal. The chief engineer, I am quite satisfied, has been, by many, misconstrued in saying he was opposed to it. There has never, as far as I can learn, been any wish to oppose it, but rather the reverse. The hon. gentleman now wants to ascertain the actual state of matters, and the Government are anxious to lay before the country, before they undertake a work which will inevitably involve a great amount of money, its true position, and I cannot say anything against any Government doing that. As I feel confident, from what I know of the Commission, they will report favorably on the canal. I have been at several meetings of the Commission and have heard evidence given before them, and, from what I know of that Commission, I believe the hon. gentleman will be satisfied that there is no clap-trap about it, but that it is intended to be a verity and a certainty, and that we will have that canal. When he brings his papers forward, he will find that I did not accuse the Minister of Public Works of saying anything of the kind which he has asserted.

Mr. BARRON. I do not think the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Stevenson) and I are so far apart after all. I do not know that it is proper to retail private conversations on the floor of the House, but I would be quite willing to have all my private conversations on the subject of the Trent Valley Canal retailed here. I have said, and I say again that the Government look upon this canal as so much trash, and that they do not intend to build it, and no doubt I told my hon. friend from West Peterborough (Mr. Stevenson) of that fact, and no doubt I said, and I say again, that the Government have taken advantage of this Commission by way of a subterfuge to get out of building this canal. If my information is correct, the Commission will not advise the building of that canal. If the Government were sincere and honest and earnest in this matter, they would not have allowed one of the commissioners to go to the old country, especially in view of the fact that the commissioners ceased their labors many weeks since. If the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Stevenson) were as anxious as he professes to be in this matter, he would have told the Government that one of the commissioners was going to England, and he would have used all his influence on the Government in order to get them to insist upon the commissioners reporting one way or the other before they went away. But one of them has gone with the knowledge of the Government, and they have not reported, and it will be some time before they can report. The hon. member for Peterborough says he did not say what I charged him with saying in reference to the Minister of Public Works. I must, of course, accept his statement. No doubt he does not remember making that statement, but I know that he has an enormous faith in the Peterborough Review He sticks by that paper and that paper sticks by him, and that paper does put these words into the mouth of the hon. member for West Peterborough, as being used on the night of his election:

"The Minister of Public Works had given him every assurance that the Trent Valley contract between Peterborough and Lakefield would be let during the coming summer. This was no electioneering dodge, because the election was all over."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman knows that that must be a mistake on the part of the Review, in referring to the Minister of Public Works instead of the Minister of Railways and Canals. The Minister of Public Works had no more to do with it than I had.

Mr. BARRON. I am not particular which member of the Government it was who made that promise, but it was stated that the promise was made by some member of the Government, and the mistake is not mine, but that of the hon. member for West Peterborough. Then the hon. gentleman said I have always laughed at this canal: That is not so. The hon. gentleman cannot mention any public occasion on which I have not spoken in favor of it. In our part of the country we are all deeply interested in it. If the hon. member for South Victoria (Mr. Hudspeth) were present, he could speak of a meeting which was held in the town of Lindsay, where resolutions were unanimously passed in favor of the construction of this canal The county council of Victoria, the county council of Peterborough, and all the different councils of the counties through which the canal will run have petitioned for this canal. Now, the hon. gentleman says I did not attend a meeting of the commissioners in Lindsay. I do not remember the commissioners ever going to Lindsay. So little interest did they show in the matter that I do not think they ever went to Lindsay. I did attend a meeting in Lindsay where Mr. John Carnegie, a strong supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite was present, and gave most valuable information on the subject. When the hon. member states that I spoke against this canal, he must accept my statement to the contrary, for it is not so. If I were in the position of the hon. member for Peterborough, I think I would bring my influence to bear a little more strongly on the Government in order to make them carry out their pledges. I am not now discussing whether this is a proper work or not, but the Government have time after time, as it suited their purposes, assured the public that they were going on with this work from Lake Ontario to the Georgian Bay, but now they are backing out of it and are taking advantage of the Commission to let themselves down easily. The result, I believe, will prove the correctness of my statement that the Commission will report against the work, and that the Government will back out of their pledge.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Silence admits that this statement is true.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Barron) has made a number of statements which I think unworthy of him, and for which he has no foundation. He supposes everything against the Government, and he supposes everything against the Commission. Who were the commissioners? I suppose he would not object to Judge Weller——

Mr. BARRON. No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—Judge Weller, who lives at Peterborough, and he is the chairman of the Commission. Will he object to Mr. Kennedy, of Montreal, one of the first hydraulic engineers on this continent, and who is now absent in consequence of illness and has been obliged to go to Europe, which everybody regrets? The third gentleman is an engineer of standing, Mr. Frank Turner of Toronto. Everyone knows of him. These are three honorable, upright men, and to say that they were appointed to make a sham report to enable the Government to back down is unfounded, is unworthy of the House and of the hon. gentleman, and, if I had not been called to my feet by the remark of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), I should have considered it unworthy of reply.

Mr. BARRON. I did not say it was a sham report.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I leave it to the House if that is not the case.

Mr. BARRON. I said they knew what the report would be, and they were likely to take advantage of it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is another side to this question. It is six or seven years since the Government asked for considerable sums of money to carry out this work. It seems to me extraordinary that after this work was undertaken, and after pledges were made by some members of the Government—certainly by Sir Charles Tupper—that the work should be proceeded with, in the sixth or seventh year afterwards the Government should find it necessary to institute a Commission to find out whether, in 1889, it was possible to do a thing which they had declared, or one of their number had declared, was to be done in 1881, 1882, or 1883—I cannot recollect the exact year, but I recollect the facts. The Government ought, before going into the expenditures which they then incurred, to have found out, through their engineers or other competent authorities, whether the thing could be done or not, and the appointment of the Commission appears to me, and I think will appear to the country, to indicate that they commenced this work on very imperfect information, and that they made representations to the inhabitants of the Trent Valley on very imperfect information.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman is unjust, though I do not think he is intentionally unjust, in the inferences he has drawn. The Trent Valley scheme was before the country and was a subject of discussion many years ago.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Fifty years ago, at least.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Before the hon. gentleman or I were here, the Government of the country got some light on this subject. The Trent navigation was considered to be an inland water carriage similar to the Rideau canal. The reports are to be found, the statements of the cost are to be found. When the Government took up this matter some years ago they decided it must be a work to be built by degrees, as the country could afford it. The Government have gone on and built it by degrees, and the hon. gentleman opposite admits that the work, so far as it has been built, is of great advantage to the country through which it passes, that it has opened out a large stretch of water communication, that there are steamboats plying on those waters, doing a very considerable trade. The Government have gone on steadily in the construction of the canal, bit by bit, coming every year to Parliament and explaining how much would be built in that year, and how much money was wanted. The statement has been made lately by engineers of standing that whatever might have been the grounds on which the original estimates were made by competent engineers—and that original plan was adopted by public sentiment years ago—those grounds have changed, and it would cost much more now. Well, the Government of the day would have to come to Parliament to get a vote. It was a sum exceeding by some millions the original estimate. Then two very competent gentlemen were appointed, and a third gentleman of high standing and character—and certainly any leanings he might have would be in favor of the complete construction of this work—was appointed chairman that he might, as a legal man, marshal the evidence. We are waiting for that report, and that must be submitted to Parliament, it must meet the assent of Parliament; and we would be quite unjustified in going on, having been informed again and again of late years that the work would cost infinitely more than was stated by the engineers in those days. And there is no loss of time. The hon. gentleman says we have been idling. We have been carrying out steadily the object with which we have started, that is to build a water line of communication by degrees, taking a vote for enough to employ a certain number of men, and do a certain amount of work during the next year. We are doing so this year, and before this money is expended I hope that Mr. Kennedy will be back and then we will get a report of the whole matter, and it will be for Parliament to judge, when we come down with the Estimates, of the expediency of expending this money. I do not believe that hon. gentleman has any grounds for saying that he believes these gentlemen are going to report adversely. I do not think he has been taken into their confidence, I do not think he knows anything about it; and he cannot get up now in his place and state that he has any reliable information that these gentlemen have been such fools as to tell him, or to tell anyone else beforehand, what the report was going be. I challenge the hon. gentleman to substantiate that statement. It is so absurd in itself that I do not think, with at all undue respect to him, that we can place any reliance upon it unless he produces additional evidence of it. It cannot be so. These gentlemen know their duties. They are gentlemen of character, they are professional men as well, and they would not have consulted the hon. gentleman, or taken him or anybody else into their confidence. The hon. gentleman for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), when he was speaking about the St. Lawrence Canal, although that is part of the policy of the Government, did not hesitate to state, and it was his duty to state, that he had heard that on the whole it would be more economical, and perhaps as well, to use a system of transhipment rather than deepen the canal to 14 feet. Well, the Government were pledged to build a water communication within a depth of 14 feet, and yet if Parliament chooses to say: We have changed our mind, or if the Government, on full evidence, think that it would be inexpedient to carry out their original intention, they are not to be charged with doing anything wrong; on the contrary they are to be praised, to be lauded, even though the hon. gentleman might call it backing down. They should be lauded if, upon a careful study of the circumstances, they think that the original intention ought to be, in the interest of the country, changed. That is the plain state of the case. The hon. gentleman says it is not a political question at all. The whole animus of the hon. gentleman was political in the most miserable party sense.

Mr. BARRON. I am not going to be drawn out by the First Minister to give the source of my information. I am willing to admit at once that I have had no conversation whatever with any of the commissioners, but I am positive that my information is most reliable that the Commission is going to report adversely to the construction of this canal.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It cannot be.

Mr. BARRON. It can be. It is quite possible that some of the commissioners may have spoken to others and given their views as to what the report is going to be. I will not say whether that is so or not, but it is quite possible that in some roundabout way the information may have come to my ears. But we can only wait for the future to prove whether I am right or wrong; I am willing to rest my case with the future. The Premier said that I charged them with idling. Now, I used the word "idling" in connection with the work at Fenelon Falls, and I reiterate it. I say for two years and a half they have had that money expended at Fenelon Falls, the interest upon it being lost, because there has been no use made of the works, and the reason is the obstruction to which I drew the attention of the Finance Minister two years ago; and nothing has been done from that time to the present. Now, to show that I am not altogether wrong in regard to this matter, I want to read the First Minister's statement in this House on the 11th July, 1885:

"The system is a very old one. It has been reported on by many able engineers, and at last the Government adopted the idea of making a permanent work by connecting the two great waterways."

Meaning Lake Ontario and Georgian Bay. Now, if that was his intention, then I ask why, in the name of common sense, we must appoint a Commission now to find out whether it is necessary to do that which he said was going to be done in the year 1885? He goes on:

"It may be it cannot compete in all respects with other and deeper waterways, and with a railway system, but it will be substantially a Dominion work, connecting the two waters, and at the same time a great advantage to the fine district of country through which it passes."

Now, of course the First Minister may read me a lecture. I am young in the House, and he, being so very much my senior, is at liberty to do so; but his lecture will not be accepted by the people of this country who believe that they are being deceived. But I am quite willing to rest my contention as against his with the people in the country who are interested in this great work.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would like to know if the delay in the report of this Commission is going to delay this work which the Premier appears to think of so much importance to this country. It is a most unfortunate thing if the illness of one of the commissioners is going to stop a work which he says is of so much benefit to the country, and which he says, the Government earnestly desire to push forward, and in which the hon. member for Peterborough seems to take such a lively interest. Is it not possible for the other two gentlemen to collect the information? This question has been before the country for fifty years; the Government have had some years experience in office, and after they had been in office for a number of years they appoint a Commission, after they have spent a good deal of money, to see if this thing is feasible at all. It appears to me singular if these two waters are to be connected that after fifty years of preparation and enquiry, after the Government had spent a large sum of money, it became necessary to appoint a Commission of investigation to find out as to its practicability. Then one of the commissioners fell ill, an estimable and reputable gentleman, and on this account this work, which is of pressing importance, is to be delayed another year. It does not look as if the promoters were really in earnest, and as if they believed the scheme was practicable. There has been a good deal of discussion in this House in regard to the proposed Ontario Ship Canal. It was advocated some years ago by Mr. Blaine, who represented one of the Yorks. He at that time was a good Liberal, but he went over to the Tories, and he has gone away, as nearly all the Tories go, to the United States. One of the difficulties that attends our Liberals when they become Tories is, that they become Annexationists and go to the United States I think the temper shown by the First Minister towards the member for North Victoria (Mr. Barron) is rather out of place. That hon. gentleman was only discharging his duty to the section of country from which he comes and to the Dominion at large. I think the display of temper was scarcely called for by the mild criticisms made by that hon. gentleman. The explanation may be that the Premier has entertained an antagonism against the hon. gentleman for having voted against him on a certain occasion, some time ago, thus becoming one of the unfortunate thirteen described by the First Minister. I hope that antagonism will not be extended into canal and other matters. We have had enough of theological discussion for some time. I must say that the First Minister generally controls his temper and acts with becoming decorum, and yet when an hon. gentleman rises and makes a fair criticism in regard to works in his own county and in regard to a subject with which we have been dealing for ten years, and on which large sums have been expended, and in regard to which the Government appointed a Commission to see if those works were required and were in the interests of the country, the First Minister rises in a rage and denounces this young member as one of those who formed one of the 13 whom the First Minister designated as belonging to the de'il.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It was stated by the Government in 1883 that they had full information on this subject. I find that Sir Charles Tupper stated at that time that the facts had all been collected, and that $8,000, the cost of the survey, would complete the work, so that he would be able, next Session, to report the whole scheme. The Government, according to Sir Charles Tupper, ought certainly to be in possession, before 1889, of all the facts and should have ascertained the cost.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Even if the canal were not finished, there has been substantial benefit done to that part of the country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My point was this: that the hon. gentleman's colleague had many years before stated to the House that the Government would be in a position in a very short time to give complete estimates of the cost of the werk and state what they were going to do. Several years elapse, then the Government appoint a Commission. That is not business, and it is not the way a public work should be carried out. In so far as the advantages to the particular localities are concerned, all well and good; but when the Government propose through a responsible Minister to engage in works of this kind, I repeat we have a right to expect that they have made up their minds as to what they are going to do, and have obtained full estimates as to the cost of the work.

Tay Canal..... $25,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I thought this work was finished last year?

Mr. FOSTER. $25,000 is required to complete the basin, and carry out other works.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the total cost of these works, and is this really the last amount required?

Mr. FOSTER. The cost is $364,951.

Rideau Canal..... $28,100

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe that this is a revote, and that the money has not been spent. Why was nothing done, and what is proposed to be done?

Mr. FOSTER. This vote is required to increase the supply of water to the Rideau Canal, by erecting several dams and constructing cuttings, so as to connect the several lakes forming what is known as the Devil Lake system.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And to supply Gananoque with water power.

Mr. FOSTER. That is not stated.

Repairs and expenses to Canals..... $468,855

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What does the hon. gentleman estimate are the receipts from all our canals collectively? I see that on account of canal revenue there was deposited in 1888 a total of $318,000. Are we to understand that matters have come to such a pass that while we are required to spend on these canals as nearly as may be on capital and income account, $790,000, that all our estimated expenditure of receipts is only $318,000? Is that the state of the case?

Mr. FOSTER. That is about the state of the case.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is a very bad showing.

Mr. FOSTER. So far as the money is concerned; but those canals are of a great benefit to the country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think this is the worst showing we have had for a great many years.

Mr. FOSTER. The revenue has been very much beyond the expenditure for some years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But not to that extent. What does the hon. gentleman propose to do with the canal tolls between Montreal and other points?

Mr. FOSTER. The same regulations hold as last year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is to say we are going to abolish those canal tolls?

Mr. FOSTER. No, not abolish them; they are diminished from the old rates, and the same Order in Council was passed this year as last year regulating them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to have the First Minister's attention for a moment. The hon. gentleman is aware that a question has been raised by the American Government as to the alleged discrimination which is being made against their vessels by practically throwing the whole burthen of the tolls on their vessels going through Government canals. Has there been any correspondence between this Government and the American Government on this subject, and what is the contention of the American Government?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no correspondence.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. None since when?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There has been no correspondence.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think they made a complaint of an unjust discrimination being exercised against their vessels?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think that something of that kind was said in the discussions at Washington, but up to the present there has been no communication on that point. That is one of the points that will have to be a matter of discussion, and I think that if the point is conceded it should be considered as a concession and a corresponding concession should be made to us.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have no objections to every possible concession being obtained, but I think we have been coming out rather badly in some of these cases about these very matters. Then, I understand distinctly that the American Government, so far as the hon. gentleman's memory is correct, have not made this a source of complaint?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not made any complaint.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman is sure of that?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no recollection of it. Of course I will have to enquire before I will be positive.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is a matter of very considerable moment. I shall not press the point further because it is not necessarily involved in this item, but I would ask the hon. gentleman to make enquiry and to ascertain whether or not any complaint or any demand has been made by the American Government in respect to that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; I will.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And if there should be any correspondence, I presume if the public service permits that, the hon. gentleman will have no objection to lay it on the Table?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course not, if the public service permits.

North-West Mounted Police..... $723,426

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the exact strength of that force just now, officers and men?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You may reckon upon a force of 1,000 men, non-commissioned officers and men, including scouts. There may be a few more or less, as they are continually getting discharges for length of service, sometimes they buy their discharge, and in a very few cases they desert. There are 45 officers, 5 medical officers and two veterinary surgeons. The whole strength of the force is 1,052.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can the First Minister state how many of those officers are graduates of the Military College?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There are seven graduates from the Military College.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As the hon. First Minister has recently been visiting his constituents at Kingston, where he took occasion to make a profession of repentance for the lack of faith he had in the Military College, and stated that he regarded it as a very excellent institution, I would ask him if he is prepared to assign a number of commissions in the Mounted Police from time to time to the best graduates of the college if they choose to avail themselves of them. I have suggested to him on more than one occasion that if we are to keep the college efficient, in addition to the commissions which are given by the English Government, we ought to provide some half dozen commissions to be given to the best of graduates; and it appears to me that the Mounted Police would afford an excellent opportunity of attaching say a couple per annum. They need not be made assistant inspectors; they might act as sort of supernumerary cadets until such time as it should be found expedient to give them full commissions.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The plan that has been adopted, as nearly as may be, is this: We take from the non-commissioned officers the most deserving, and we take occasionally the more likely officers from the active militia who have been reported by the Major General as showing superior military aptitude. I think about half of the officers have been promoted from the ranks. The hon. gentleman knows that that force is a corps d'élite. Admission to it is eagerly sought after by sons of gentlemen, educated men, so that when they are promoted from the ranks they are found to be in every way fit, socially as well as otherwise, for the rank of commissioned officers. We have in the force gentlemen who have held commissions in Her Majesty's service. The last promotion of an inspector was that of an officer who had been an adjutant in a regiment of the line, who had come to Canada and enlisted in the force, who rose soon to become a non-commissioned officer, in due season became a staff-sergeant, and has now been appointed an inspector. So with several others; and I think the hon. gentleman will say that those who have thus risen are the most valuable men we could have, because while they have been non-commissioned officers they have been over the whole country, and have got acquainted with the Indians, the trails, the system of patrolling, the habits of smugglers, and being educated men in addition to having this experience, they make very valuable officers. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that we should take a certain number from the Military College. It is rather unfortunate for Canada that that college is so good, and gives so complete a military education. A large proportion of the men educated there are eagerly sought after and get commissions in Her Majesty's service. It is satisfactory to know that some of our young gentlemen get commissions, but at the same time that is not without its loss. We lose some of our best men who enter the army and never come back. Some will come back. One of the best officers we have is Superintendent Perry—a gentleman whom the hon. gentleman knows. He came from the Bay of Quinté, was educated in the college, passed with honors, was gazetted, got his commission in the Royal Engineers, but, luckily for our service, he met with an accident, breaking his leg, which laid him up so long that he had to give up his commission. He came to Canada and is now Superintendent in the force and one of the best officers we have.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have no objection to the hon. gentleman's practice of promoting a reasonable number of men from the ranks. I am inclined to think that what he says is correct, that many of the men are of a superior grade of life, well educated, and fit for promotion. All that I suggested was that, in order to prevent the evil which he deplores, of losing our best educated graduates, I would attach a couple of commissions in this force per annum to the Royal Military College.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There are not two vacancies in the year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It would be possible in a force like this to offer cadetships—that is a sort of supernumerary sub-lieutenantcy, from the college—who could be promoted as occasion occurred. In many foreign corps a similar practice is followed. This force is apt to be broken up in so many detachments that it often would be very convenient to the officer in charge to have a small number of additional officers at his disposal.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman's suggestion is worthy of consideration.

Mr. McMULLEN. I find that we have fourteen officers to whom we pay $1,667, besides feeding and clothing them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We do not clothe our officers.

Mr. McMULLEN. If even they clothe themselves the salary is too high. A large number get $1,000 each; and, on looking over the items of Supply, I notice that very high prices are paid in the North-West—from 9 cents to 11 cents per pound for beef, 70 cents per pound for fancy tobacco for those men to smoke. The prices paid are exorbitant.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With respect to tobacco, that is bought to be repaid. The police are scattered all over an immense country, and cannot get a good supply of tobacco. Most of them, I take it, smoke, and the tobacco is bought at a reasonable price, and sold to them at cost price. As to beef, that depends on the part of the country where the beef is supplied. It may be hundreds of miles from the places of supply and railways. Every year, of course, the prices will decrease as the amount of cattle increases, and the means of transport. These things are tendered for by public tender, and the lowest tenderer, if a responsible party, always gets the contract.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). In reference to Mr. Pierson, surgeon in the service, he is employed 266 days at $1.50, and is credited with extra work, $358.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He is an old commissariat officer, who works every day of the year and works at night.

Mr. LANDERKIN. How many men are there in the police?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. 1,052?

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I do not see how a man can work day and night.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is exactly what you are doing now.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see, under the head of arms and ammunition, that we have a vote of $20,000. How are the police at present armed?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They have got the Winchester repeating carbines, and the Enfield revolver.

Mr. BARRON. Has the First Minister had any complaints about the working of the Winchester carbine?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not that I am aware of. I believe it is not so good a weapon, from a military point of view, as might be found; but when it was adopted it was the very best arm used. It is quite sufficient for the purpose, and, having a supply, it would not do to throw them away.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is not only a matter of considerable importance that these men should be supplied with a good class of arms, but also the class of arms that can stand rough wear. I was under the impression that the Winchester had not quite filled the bill in all respects.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is not a fancy rifle. A great many of these new inventions are in skilled hands, and, being always kept away from bad weather and rough usage, they are of course in good condition, but the Winchester has been there for years, and has proved of service in the field. They have been used in the United States for many years. The Indians desire to have the Winchester rifle above all things, and we are very anxious to get it away from them.

Mr. BARRON. I can tell the hon. gentleman why the Indian likes the Winchester. The Indian, as a scout, likes to have the Winchester rifle, and so do all scouts, because they can carry it horizontally, but it is not serviceable for the police because they have to carry it perpendicularly, and very frequently, when the cartridges are in the magazine, they stick and will not go into the barrel. In my experience in the North-West, I found that was the case, and others found the same thing. It is possible that complaints have not been made by some of the Mounted Police, but some of them did complain that it was not a proper rifle for that purpose. The hon. gentleman will understand the fix a man will be in when he had the cartridges in the magazine and found that he was not able to get them in the barrel.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. At all events, they have got the arms, and it would be the height of folly for us to throw those arms away and get better.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Was any report made on the subject?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think so. I believe Commissioner Herchmer is perfectly satisfied with the rifle.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman make an enquiry, and let us know at another time whether, in practice, the Winchester rifle is used as a magazine rifle at all, or whether it is true that, in riding, they have been compelled to content themselves with having only one ball in the carbine, because, if that be the case, while we suppose that we have armed the force with a repeating rifle, we may prove to have supplied them with a rifle which is only capable of using one round at a time. It is a question of moment, though I hope we shall not need to utilise the arms of the Mounted Police.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). How many recruits were added to the force last year?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. About 160.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). How much is charged by the surgeon for examining a recruit?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. $2 for every man.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I find that last year we have an expenditure at Ottawa, for attendance at Medical Board, Sir James Grant, $80, H. Hall, $130. Then Mr. Powell receives $50 for compiling medical requisitions, and Sir James Grant for examining recruits gets $304. Dr. Halliday, who lives in Peterborough, received $ 8 for examining recruits, and Dr. Wright, of Port Hope, $20 for the same service. There are other charges for examining recruits in different places, amounting in all, with other medical expenses, to over $500.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We pay $2 for every examination and report, and about 50 per cent. of the men examined are rejected. There are medical boards established in the centres when it is necessary to examine men who have been injured in the service, and who have a right to compensation by gratuity or pension. In such cases, the board receives $10 a day.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). When men are injured in the North-West, do they return to Ottawa to be examined by the medical board here?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Many of them come back to their friends, and apply for their discharge and for compensation, or for pension. Then they are examined in the most convenient place. Of course, if they remain there, they are examined by the board in the North-West.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I see no charges for examination by medical boards in the North-West.

Sir JOHN A MACDONALD. There is no necessity for a board there, because they are examined and reported upon by the medical officers of the establishment. There are a surgeon and several assistant surgeons there, and they form the board and make their report, and they do not get anything for it.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). How many of the force are there at Qu'Appelle station?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not know how many at this moment. The number of men at the different stations frequently varies. They may be of a particular strength for particular reasons, and for a particular season; and they may be detailed to go elsewhere. They are a removable body, moving over the whole of that vast country.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Is there a hospital at Qu'Appelle? Is there extra medical attendance at Qu'Appelle more than at other points?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Then I would like to have the Minister explain how we are charged $3,194.50 for drugs at Qu'Appelle.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is the whole amount of the column on the preceding page brought forward.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Oh, it is Regina. Look down a little lower.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Regina is not Qu'Appelle. Regina is the headquarters of the force. The drugs are stored there and distributed to the different points when they are wanted.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Is there a large force at Fort McLeod?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A considerable force. There are nearly 200 men, and there is a hospital.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I find you have charged $926.10 for drugs. I see you charge at Calgary $15 for extracting teeth, and a little below that, $16.50 for four pairs of forceps. Now, if you have a surgeon paid for his services, and if you have paid for forceps, how is it that you have charged $15 for punishing a poor unfortunate individual who suffers with toothache?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They must have a good many teeth to be pulled.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I see large items in several places for alcohol, 30 gallons at Regina, and Bass's ale amounts to a considerable item. How do they get it there? I thought that was a prohibition country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. These are medical comforts for the different hospitals.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I notice that whereas the hon. gentleman only asked for $5,000 here, nearly $15,000 were actually expended for medicine and hospital expenses in the year 1888. Either that was an extraordinary expenditure for 1888, or else the present vote is much below the requirements of the force.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I take it that was a large purchase of stock to be kept on hand.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I am sorry the right hon. gentleman has not given a gratuity to Constable Boyd, in whose behalf the hon. gentleman will remember that I made application. He was struck down by a horse, and he was brought down here. I have seen the man; there is no doubt that he is injured for life.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This man Boyd is getting temporary relief, and I hope we will have such legislation as will enable us to treat his case as the hon. gentleman thinks it deserves. I believe it is a bad case.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I would like some explanation in reference to the item of Kenneth Campbell & Co., Montreal, drugs, $1,674.79. If we are charged with the cost of drugs in the North-West, how is it that we are charged with this item at Montreal? We find at almost every station in the North-West very large items for drugs.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. All these supplies of drugs are bought from three houses—Kenneth Campbell & Co., Montreal, Adams, Mason & Co., and Hooper, of Toronto, and they are entered here. All drugs are put in in the name of Kenneth Campbell & Co., or whatever firm of the three it may be which supplies these medicines.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). The quantity of drugs used is enormous for the number of men. It may be they are a very sickly lot and have to be taking drugs all the time, or they are in a very unhealthy country, or their duties are irksome and almost dangerous. It does not look well to see sums of six, eight or nine thousand dollars a year for drugs with a force of a little over 1,000 men. I have no objection to the items for instruments, but the surgeons should take care of them. While I admit the force is one of great utility, its cost is excessive.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The medical stores were much depleted in 1885 at the time of the outbreak. They have been refitted since, $15,000 being the first sum and the present vote being only $5,000. This amount covers not only drugs but medicines, medical comforts, and hospital supplies, and I do not think it a very large sum. If the hon. gentleman were a military surgeon he would find that it was not a large sum. The supplies are given on the requisition of the senior surgeon, Dr. Jukes, formerly of St. Catharines, who is a very conscientious and painstaking man.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). It is true there is only $5,000 in the Estimates this year, but last year there was a much larger sum. In regard to the stores being depleted, it must be remembered that we paid large amounts during the rebellion, and made up the supplies. There is something wrong in the whole affair, and drugs may perhaps cover a multitude of sins in the North-West. I call the Minister of Finance's attention to this point, in order to see whether another article does not pass under the name of drugs.

Works at Banff Park $20,000

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The First Minister stated last year that the amount then voted would be sufficient for the completion of the park.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I could not have said that.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I think I can show it to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I recollect reading last year's debate and I do not remember seeing any such statement; but, at all events, it could hardly have been so, for there must be some provision for officials who live at the park and take charge of it. This year the superintendent made a recommendation for the sum of $40,000 which he thought it was necessary to expend this year. I cut the amount down to $20,000, although I think a good deal more could be spent there with advantage. It is proposed to spend $5,000 on a main sewer through the town, which work is reported by the superintendent to be most necessary.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). How are we liable for that expense?

Mr. DEWDNEY. All the property is in our hands.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What revenue do we derive?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Up to 30th June, 1883, we received for rents $1,875; at the cave, $245; at the basin adjoining the cave, $273; hay, $321; wood, $200; lime, $137; other items, $18; total, $2,951. For six months ending 31st December of last year the revenue was $1,776; $642 rents; $242 cave; $340 basin; $363 hay; $17 wood; $257 lime; and $164 water rates.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Does the Canadian Pacific Railway pay any rent?

Mr. DEWDNEY. They pay for the water and so much for each bath. If there is a swimming bath they pay so much more. I think $10.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Who does the hotel belong to?

Mr. DEWDNEY. There are two hotels in the park. One belongs to Doctor Brett and the other to the Canadian Pacific Railway. There are several other hotels in the town.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). What property do you rent for $642?

Mr. DEWDNEY. That is rent for the leased building lots.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Is there likely to be many of these lots taken?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I think so. There seems to be an increasing demand for them every year.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). For what space of time are the leases of these lots?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I forget the conditions of the lease. The parties renting have to put up a particular class of building depending on the location. The plans of the residences have to be approved of by the superintendent. I forget for what time the lease is; I think it is for 15 or 20 years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What are the extent of the lots?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The town lots are 50 by 120; the building lots on the river are much larger—an acre I think.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Have you a regular rental on these lots, or do you put them up for competition?

Mr. DEWDNEY. There are regular rates, but I have not the particulars with me.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose the hon. gentleman has some schedule or Order in Council defining the terms upon which these lots are leased?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Oh, yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman might bring it down, as it is a matter of interest to us to know what they are. Does the hon. gentleman remember the time of the leases?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They are building lots for 21 years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. At the expiration of the lease what becomes of the building?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I don't remember, I presume the lease will be for 21 years with a renewal upon a new system of rental.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I think the policy of renting those lots as indicated by the Minister is a very bad one and no wonder you have not more houses there.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I will bring down the returns and I think the hon. gentleman will see that we charge reasonable rent for the lots.

Mr. McMULLEN. What time do you give a party to build, or is it allowable for a person to hold lots in fee to sell or transfer them?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I think that most of those who apply for lots have built immediately.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I suppose they are not bound to build if they pay their rent?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not know, but if a man buys a lot he is obliged to build according to approved plans as the buildings are intended to be ornamental. If he does not build the land remains a portion of the park and he pays the rent for it, and if he assigns it the assignee is subject to the original terms of the lease.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If I remember aright an anthracite mine was supposed to exist in the centre of the park. Is it leased, or worked, or does it remain idle?

Mr. DEWDNEY. It is being worked rather extensively now I believe. That was purchased by Mr. Stewart before the park was established.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is the whole of the mine, whatever it may be, in the hands of Mr. Stewart?

Mr. DEWDNEY. No. The area that he purchased was only about 800 acres. There is seven or eight miles of the park through which the coal runs and which belongs to the Government.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I presume it is not the intention of the Government to part with that at present?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). The First Minister conveyed the idea that a man who leases a lot is not compelled to build on it. If people are permitted to hold a lot without building they are retarding the progress of that property in which we all are interested and desirous of being developed as rapidly as possible. I could not gather from the First Minister what the exact time of those leases were.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no doubt they are for 21 years.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Suppose they are for 21 years and if a man can purchase choice lots there, and he has the right to transfer them, it might lead to speculation and the person holding them might transfer them at a higher rent. We take a great pride in that park, and we certainly ought to have more information than we have been given, so that we may see whether the Government have been carrying it on on business principles and have been taking good care of the property.

Mr. ELLIS. I take no pride whatever in that park. I think it is a mistake to impose the burden of this institution on the people of the country who are not able to bear it. What difference does it make to the people in the east, or the people here, whether this park is maintained or not?

Mr. HESSON. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman. I do not suppose he has ever put his foot in that country, and does not understand what it is to have such an institution for people of travel and people of money. I think the Government are doing an excellent work there. I have been there on one or two occasions, and I am satisfied that it is in the best interest of the country. The hon. gentleman would not object if it were at St. John, N.B.; but I think we have a right to look to the interests of the west as well as the east. I do not think the hon. gentleman should find fault with what has been approved of by gentlemen on that side of the House as well as on this.

Mr. ELLIS. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he has visited the Maritime Provinces?

Mr. HESSON. I have.

Mr. ELLIS. Do you think the people down there should pay for this institution?

Mr. HESSON. We pay for a great deal down there.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I quite agree with the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis). I took exception to this expenditure two years ago, and I think if we have any money to expend we can expend it in different ways more for the benefit of the country. We spend $2,000 a year on Major's Hill Park for the benefit of the people of Ottawa, and now we are spending about $20,000 a year, I will not say for the benefit of the people of the North-West, but for the benefit of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. If they want to have a park there, they should bear the expense of it, and not the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. BARRON. The remarks of the hon. member for Perth I think were very characteristic of him. He said that this park should be maintained to give pleasure to people of leisure and people of means. There are other people in this Dominion besides people of leisure and people of means. I am aware that the hon. gentleman bows with great respect to people of leisure and money, but that is no reason why the ordinary tax-payer of the country should bow with such respect to them as to put his hands in his pockets to keep up this establishment for them If the hon. gentleman thinks an institution of this kind should be kept up for people of leisure and means, let him contribute himself in some other way, so that he will not put the expense on the ordinary taxpayer.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. HESSON. I do not think the ordinary taxpayer objects.

Mr. BARRON. As an ordinary taxpayer I do object to this expenditure, and I think the people of the country would decidedly object to it.

Mr. HESSON. I do not think they would object; it is only small, narrow-minded fellows like you.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the entire cost of this park up to the present time?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The cost in 1886 was $4,500; in 1887, $36,170.97; in 1888, $39,612.48; and for the six months ending 31st December, $16,128; making a total of $96,411.

Mr. McMULLEN. I must concur in the remarks that have dropped from hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. I cannot see that it is necessary in the interest of this country to spend about $100,000 a year on this park. I notice that we have some expensive officials up there. Geo. A. Stewart receives $2,700 a year. What are his duties?

Mr. DEWDNEY. He is the superintendent of the park. He is an engineer by profession; he has superintended the laying out of the park and the construction of the roads; he has also planned and built the bridges in the park; and he keeps the accounts.

Mr. McMULLEN. So it appears that while we receive only $2,951 in rents we pay the man in charge $2,700, so that for all the money we expend we get practically nothing in return. I have visited the park, and I found considerable complaints of people who had leases and did not build. I spoke to one man who had built far away out in the bush, and asked him why he had built there.

Mr. DEWDNEY. There has been a wonderful change since then. Many fine buildings have been put up.

Mr. McMULLEN. There cannot have been a very great change, judging by the amount we receive. It is a mistake, in my opinion, to lease property to a man without a condition that he must erect a house within some reasonable time, because if you permit people to lease property in that way, from year to year as people build round them they keep back the progress of the place, and in the end sell out to somebody else at a profit. The only way we can make anything out of this park is by leasing the property and getting rents for it, but if we grant these leases without any building condition there will be no inducement to people to improve the place and make it attractive.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). May we expect to receive the terms of the lease and other agreements entered into between the Government and the leaseholders?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I will get that. The Annual Report of the Department of the Interior appears to me to give a better showing than what was given to me by my officers to-day. The revenue from the lots south of Bow River alone amounts to $5,452, representing an interest at 6 per cent. on $90,740, or at 4 per cent. on $136,111. The Canadian Pacific Railway are paying $20 an acre for the five acres on which their hotel is situated. The sanitarium pays $20 an acre on five acres. Four lots of hot springs pay $10 an acre. Four lots Transfer Company pay $30 an acre. Lots in town sites pay $2,168. Sundries amount to $2,400. The maintenance and repairs cost $4,000, protection of game and fur, $800, and salaries $500. My idea is that a few rough trails built through the mountains for excursion parties to visit points of interest would be preferable to these expensive roads.

Mr. BARRON. Do you intend to retain Mr. Stewart, after his duties are over, as an engineer?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Somebody will have to be retained or the park will soon deteriorate.

Mr. BARRON. $2,700 is a big price to pay.

Mr. WATSON. It seems to me that quantities of land are held by people there for speculative purposes. There are four acres, for instance, given for a livery stable. That is too great a quantity for that purpose. Have these people the right to sub-let a portion of their land?

Mr. DEWDNEY. They cannot sub-let.

Mr. WATSON. It would be better for the Government to lease those lots to persons who would build on them, and if they do not build within a certain time their lots will be cancelled.

Customs—Salaries and Contingencies in the Province of Nova Scotia..... $112,550 00

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I placed on the paper a notice of motion for correspondence between the department and the Mayor of Halifax, relating to the admission of a steam fire engine free of duty. I had communication from the mayor to say there was no correspondence, but he had several interviews with the Minister on the subject, and I believe there was some correspondence in another way. The Government property in Halifax is protected by our fire department, and there is a good deal of Dominion property in Halifax. I think the Government should have admitted that engine free of duty under the circumstances. In Ottawa this Government made a large expenditure putting up a fire department on the ground that as we had the benefit of the protection of the fire department in Ottawa we should reciprocate in some way. In view of this precedent, I think Halifax is entitled to some consideration.

Mr. BOWELL. This is a matter over which the Minister, individually or departmentally, has no control. The hon. gentleman knows that the officers of the Customs Department have to carry out the law, and the law imposes a duty upon engines brought into the country; and it is only when applications of that kind are made and carried before the Treasury Board, which can act under the Audit Act, that a remission of the duty can be made under certain circumstances. The only correspondence which has taken place has been between Mr. T. E. Kenny, on behalf of what is termed the board of works, for the admission free of duty of the fire engine. This question was fully considered by the Treasury Board, and they decided that, under all the circumstances, it would not be advisable to admit fire engines free, for the reason that, if they were admitted to Halifax free, they would necessarily have to be admitted free in all sections of the country.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Not all.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not know why not. Halifax is not exceptional in that regard. There is Government property in St. John and in Charlottetown and in nearly all the large cities, and, as all the other cities had paid duty on these fire engines, it was not deemed advisable to open the door and make fire engines free in Halifax. The matter was fully considered, and that was the opinion of the Treasury Board with which the Council agreed.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman says that similar applications would be made all over the country.

Mr. BOWELL. I say that applications were made.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I say that, if applications were made from places where the Government property had the protection of the fire brigade, the Government should have admitted those fire engines duty free. The hon. gentleman has entirely ignored the fact that here in Ottawa the Government have made considerable concessions on that ground. They purchased a large property here, and last year there was a considerable grant made to the city of Ottawa on the ground that the Government had the benefit of the fire brigade. There is a large amount of Government property in Halifax. They have their large building in the city, they have their deep water terminus and their railway terminus, and all these are protected by the fire brigade, and they pay no taxes except for the water and light which they require; and I think it is a very small two-penny half-penny affair for the Government not to deal with these matters in a broad general spirit, not only in regard to Halifax but in regard to every city where they require an engine for the purpose of protecting Government property. In all those cases, I think they should admit those engines duty free.

Mr. BOWELL. In Nova Scotia, the principal increase is in Halifax, amounting to $2,500. This arises from the necessity of putting on extra men in the winter, when the harbor is visited by a much larger number of steamers than it is in the summer, and, in addition, we have put on a small yacht to visit the ships when they enter the harbor. An extra expense has also been necessary in all the larger ports in connection with the postal service. Some apparent increases are accounted for by the transfer of outports to ports, and a decrease is shown on the other hand by the abolition or reduction of these ports. The total increase in that Province is $7,190, and the reduction $3,945, leaving a total increase of $3,245.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Has the Minister appointed a surveyor in the port of Halifax yet?

Mr. BOWELL. I have not. Mr. Garrison is still acting.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Does the hon. gentleman think it proper to keep an office of that kind open for so long a time? I understand that Mr. Garrison has been twice up for his examination, and has failed to pass.

Mr. BOWELL. No; he failed only once. He is a good officer, and performs his duty efficiently, but he did not get enough marks to pass the examination, and he remains at the clerk's salary, without any increase, though he is performing the duties of a surveyor. I told the collector, and I told Mr. Garrison himself, that, if he passed at the next examination, I would confirm his appointment, and then he would get the salary of a surveyor, $1,500, instead of $1,200, which he is now receiving.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I said at the time that I thought it was an unsuitable appointment, and I think the result has justified my remarks. I think it is very unfortunate to keep so important a position open for two years in order to suit one individual under very peculiar and exceptional circumstances.

Mr. KENNY. As far as I can learn, Mr. Garrison is a very competent officer. I recognise the propriety of his conforming to the regulations of the Civil Service, and I understand from the Minister of Customs that, as soon as he qualifies for the position of surveyor, he will be appointed to it. When this was mentioned the last time, I had no personal acquaintance with Mr. Garrison, but since that time I have made it my business to inform myself as to his qualifications for the office, and I am very reliably informed that he is a competent officer.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Referring to the vote for Prince Edward Island, I would ask the Minister of Customs what is the reason for the dismissal of Mr. Hesson, the landing waiter in the port of Georgetown, Prince Edward Island?

Mr. BOWELL. The reason is that for five or ten years he was reported as an officer whose principal duty was to go once a month and sign the pay roll, that there was nothing for him to do, that he lived on his farm and simply went to his office when the pay day came and took his money.

That was the only reason for his dismissal, and I think the House will justify his removal from office. It is true that the gentleman applied for superannuation.

Mr. ROBERTSON. What is his politics?

Mr. BOWELL. I do not know. I should judge however, having been put there by the hon. gentleman's friends, that he must belong to his politics. But for keeping him there I am responsible to a great extent, and for his having drawn money without giving a return. Since I have had charge of the office I have reduced the staff in Georgetown by two or three officers. Mr. Hesson was the last one removed, he has not been replaced. Another one, a Mr. Stewart, who was not required was also removed.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Where did the hon. gentleman get his information with regard to the small duties Mr. Hesson was performing?

Mr. BOWELL. I got it from the inspector. I instructed Inspector MacLaren to make an investigation of all the outports in the Island, and I made the removals upon that report. I will read the report concerning Georgetown:

"I next visited Georgetown, distant from Montague six miles. The officers of this port are sub-collector Charles Owen, salary $700 per annum; landing waiter Thomas G. Hesson, salary $400; locker Dalziel, salary $300. The amounts collected at that port last year was $1,401, and the salaries are $1,400, with expenses of $18. During my visit I learned that Thomas G. Hesson, who is in receipt of a salary of $400 per annum, during the summer months devotes only a small portion of his time to the Customs, being entirely engaged on his farm, and from my questioning him I found that he had scarcely reported himself to the office since the first of May."

This report is dated late in the fall—

"This I told him would not do. It has also been his habit for years during the summer months to work on his farm, only calling at the office for his monthly pay, and leaving the Customs work to be performed by locker Dalziel, who is a first-class reliable man. I would, therefore, strongly recommend that officer Hesson's services be dispensed with, there being no need of this officer. The collector and officer Dalziel are fully equal to the wants of the port. I further consider that Hesson has been an imposition on the department for years, and his continuance in office would be in no wise advantageous to the department."

These are the reasons which induced me to remove him.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Those are strong reasons, but I have information of a contrary nature. I know the people in the locality, and they inform me that Mr. Hesson was doing a great part of the work. The Port of Georgetown is frequented by a great number of American fishing vessels and consequently a good deal of work falls upon the Collector of Customs, especially in the autumn season of the year. Mr. Hesson was an old appointment, made by the Local Government before Confederation, and I have never heard found any fault with him. From the information I have received from people in that section of the country, it appears he was one of the best of officers, and was attending to his duties faithfully. He had to attend at night time as well as in the day. When the Northern Light was running and used to call at this port, Mr. Hesson had to be on duty whenever she came into port. He has been a long time in the service, and I think it was rather hard to dismiss him without superannuation, and the people in that locality think so, too. He subscribed to the superannuation fund.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then, why did he not get superannuation?

Mr. BOWELL. Because he had been drawing his pay for years and doing nothing.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Dalziel was appointed a good many years after Mr. Hesson, and was doing the work before Dalziel did any work at all.

Mr. BOWELL. There were four officers at this port when I assumed office, and there was no more work to be done then there is now. When I visited the port I did not consider that it required four officers to do the work, which two are doing now. Owen and Dalziel are quite sufficient to do all the work. The hon. gentleman says that Hesson has performed his work well. No doubt he has; he attended to his farm, and signed his receipt for his check regularly, like a little man, every month. I have not a word to say against Mr. Hesson as a man. I do not know him. But I do say that, in many ports, I have found altogether too many men to do the little work there is to do; and in every case where a vacancy took place, and where the services of the officer could be dispensed with, I have not filled the vacancy. That is the way the estimates for the Customs have been kept as low as they are. I think the country will justify the removal of a great many more men than I have removed, that is my honest conviction. The hon. gentleman knows that upon that report I have removed from the Island of Prince Edward some ten or a dozen officers during the last summer, and I have not heard a single complaint except through the friends of those who have been deprived of the privilege of taking public money which they did not earn. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) intimates, although he did not say so directly, that this man was removed on account of his politics. I may remark that I have received a great many more complaints from those who support the Government for the action I have taken in removing their friends who were not performing any duty, than I have from friends of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). If I may judge from the statement of the hon. member on my right (Mr. Robertson), which is admitted by the Minister of Customs, I look upon this as a very high-handed, arbitrary act, indeed, utterly unwarranted. He has admitted that this man had been a long time in that position; he has admitted that his services were dispensed with because they were no longer required at the port. The hon. gentleman admitted that during the long time he had occupied that office he had contributed towards the superannuation fund. He has admitted that whenever there was any work to be done this officer did it.

Mr. BOWELL. I did not.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Then the hon. gentleman must go to the head of the office, for he is the person who is responsible in respect to officials doing their work. I look upon this as a most arbitrary and unconstitutional act, and the hon. gentleman need not pose as one who looks with scrupulous regard to the rights of officials under the Superannuation Act. We have only to look at the recent superannuation of a judge—one who is most active in politics as well as in judicial life, and who has been superannuated—I mean Judge Clarke, and we find that he is drawing $1,700 a year from this country and at the same time is receiving $10,000 from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Was there ever a greater outrage in the world than superannuation under those circumstances? He was a most active judge and one whose services as judge of the county court could not be retained and who voluntarily relinquished that position, the Government being a party to it, and giving him $1,700 a year superannuation allowance, and he has accepted a position under that great corporation, the Canadian Pacific Railway, at $10,000 a year. It is an outrage on common sense that the Minister should pose as an apostle of economy with respect to superannuation, for he takes a poor man who for 25 years has been drawing $400 a year and regularly contributing to the superannuation fund, and because he has no one to stand up for him, his services are dispensed with and he is not superannuated. It is an exhibition that does no credit to the Minister, or to the Government, or to the country that would permit it. He was entitled, if his services were no longer required, to come under the Superannuation Act, and if he did not do his duty during his term of service it was the fault of the head of the office. The explanation of the Minister of Customs is not an acceptable one, and it shows how unequally and unfairly Government patronage is distributed. When it suits the Government to superannuate a man for political purposes it can be done and that man can obtain $10,000 for his services, and yet he receives $1,700 a year from this country for life. I think the Minister can hardly justify his action in either one case or the other. He could justify the superannuation of this man because he was entitled to it; with respect to the other case he may be called upon to justify it by a vote of this House.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No one will find fault with the Minister of Customs in reducing the staff if it was more numerous than necessary, but I submit it should be done according to the rules adopted by business men. If there was necessity for a reduction, and the evidence shows that there was, why did not the Minister relieve from duty the officer last appointed? One officer I am informed has been employed only a few years. The Minister employed him himself.

Mr. BOWELL. I have already told the Committee that I had made no appointments at Georgetown.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The gentleman feels persuaded he was appointed by this Government.

Mr. BOWELL. I say he was not appointed by the present Government.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). When was he appointed?

Mr. BOWELL. I do not know when he was appointed.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman will be prepared to take the statement of a gentleman who says he does know. He held office years before the other officer was appointed. There is no charge of incapacity or refusing to perform his duty. It was in the public interest, no doubt, that a reduction should be made, but fairness and justice demand that in making a reduction, the last appointed should be the first to go. Then there was added the fact that against this man no charges of incapacity or insubordination have been made, but the simple statement that there was not enough work to do. He was not granted any superannuation although he had contributed to the superannuation fund during twenty-five years. The action of the Minister in this case is not justifiable on the face of it.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I commend the Minister for endeavoring to curtail the expenses of officials, and no doubt he will find many cases were dismissal could properly take place But it has been hinted that this man has a farm and lives a long distance from the town and did not attend to his work. He has a small farm within five minutes walking distance of the wharf. From what I gather from the inhabitants, he was very punctual in his attendance and was ready to do day work or night work, when work was to be done.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not propose to allow the hon. gentleman, even though he may know much of the locality, to put words into my mouth which I did not utter. I said nothing about the distance of his farm from the town. What I said was that during the whole summer he had devoted his time to his farm, and during that time he has been drawing a salary, for which he has given no return, and under these circumstances I did not think he was entitled to be placed on the superannuation list.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Was that report communicated to him?

Mr. BOWELL. It was the reason given him when he was removed, and the Order in Council states the reason why he was removed. In regard to his removal, I took the report of the inspector, and I retained the officer who had attended to his duty. However severe the comments of the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) may be upon this question, I am quite prepared to defend myself before this House and the people in regard to making these reductions. The great difficulty is this: that it is more difficult to make a reduction in any part of the staff in any part of the country, and the Minister receives more condemnation for it, more particularly from those who are constantly complaining of the expenditure by the department and by the Government generally, than to add thousands of dollars to the expenditure.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman had no right to violate the law.

Mr. BOWELL. I have not violated the law in the manner in which it has been done. It is optional for the Government if a man has been receiving pay for years and has done nothing for it, whether he should be superannuated; and this man should be very well satisfied that he received money for doing nothing, without being placed on the superannuation list for the rest of his life.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Whose fault was it?

Mr. BOWELL. I assume the responsibility of not having removed a dozen or twenty of them years ago. If there is any condemnation at all, I should have been condemned for not having removed such officers before.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I would ask the hon. gentleman if he thinks he should dismiss the last appointed?

Mr. BOWELL. That depends altogether on circumstances. I find that the last appointee, to whom you refer, was appointed on the 7th November, 1873, about the time the Island came into Confederation.

Mr. McMULLEN. Can the hon. gentleman give us a similar case where a man who has been in the employ of the Government for a number of years, and who paid into the superannuation fund and was dismissed without a charge against him, received no annuity or gratuity?

Mr. BOWELL. I do not know that there is a case analogous to this. I am delighted to hear the hon. gentleman arguing in favor of the superannuation.

Mr. McMULLEN. No; I did not.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes; you did, or something like it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I will not allow him to put words in my mouth.

Mr. BOWELL. Will the hon. gentleman sit down till I get through.

Mr. McMULLEN. Don't put words in my mouth.

Mr. BOWELL. I did not put words in your mouth.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes; you did.

Mr. BOWELL. No; I did not.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes; you did.

Mr. BOWELL. No; I did not.

Mr. McMULLEN. You said I argued in favor of superannuation and I said nothing of the kind. I asked the hon. gentleman to give us a case were he removed an officer from the service who paid into the superannuation fund and who was dismissed without any charge, and in which you gave him no gratuity? You put words in my mouth that I did not say. Give us any similar case?

Mr. BOWELL. I tell you I do not know of any other case; is that sufficient? You blame me for not giving this man superannuation, that looks like as if you argued in favor of superannuation. I would have no objection that this report and the action taken upon it should have been printed and sent all over the country.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The inspector could not remain in that town very long and he evidently got his information from some other party, probably the collector. The collector gave the information that this man had a small farm and of course as he had only a small salary, he should have some other means to make a living for himself and his children. Let me inform the hon. Minister that the collector has himself a farm and that he spends a little time on it, and I would not be surprised if this man spent as much time in the office as the collector did.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Would there be any saving if the collector were dismissed instead of this man?

Mr. ROBERTSON. There would be a considerable saving.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That makes the case worse.

Mr. COLTER. There is something strange in this matter. When a man pays into the superannuation fund it seems that he pays that he may be entitled to share in the superannuation allowance. What would be thought of the morality of an insurance company that receives premiums year after year from a man and when the amount insured should be paid that the company would repudiate it? The Government in this case puts itself in a similar position to the company that would repudiate its debts. For what purpose was this superannuation allowance received from this man who has been dismissed if not to supply him with a gratuity when his services would be dispensed with? This seems to me as very little short of a fraud on this man and it seems to me that the Government of Canada, representing the resources of this country, should be able to at least do justice. I do not think that we have a right to say that the superannuation should be extended, but when contributions have been received year after year from this official that they may be applied for his benefit when his services are dispensed with, to refuse him that benefit is to set the law at defiance. I think, when the occasion arises, that we will be able to show that the Minister of Customs who is so very economical in this respect has made some appointments that are wholly uncalled for.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would recommend the Minister to come a little nearer home if he is bound to dismiss officers. I notice that the receipts in Colborne are $2,426.26, and that the expenses of the office $2,869.26. How many officers have you there?

Mr. BOWELL. Where did you get that? What Colborne do you mean?

Mr. McMULLEN. Colborne, Ontario.

Mr. BOWELL. The salaries in Colborne are: Mr. Macfarlane, collector, $300; Mr. Schofield, landing waiter, $300; Mr. Hann, preventive officer, $250; contingencies, $7.87; total $857.87, and the total receipts were $2,518.32.

Mr. McMULLEN. It may be Cobourg.

Mr. BOWELL. Perhaps it may be somewhere else. In Cobourg the total expenses were $2,869.26 and the revenue $19,385.73.

Mr. McMULLEN. Are there no points at which the revenue is less than what you pay for officers' salaries?

Mr. BOWELL. Oh, yes; a good many places. I took the trouble to make an investigation into this matter to satisfy myself after seeing an attack made on the department in one of the city papers here. I found that in the ports to which he refers that the expenditure to-day did not exceed the income as largely as it did in 1878 when I assumed office. The hon. gentleman will understand how that occurred. There are many places where it is necessary to place preventive officers and where there is no revenue at all. As an illustration, I have in the interest of the fishermen principally at Grand Manan placed three officers along the coast to prevent smuggling and to facilitate the fishing vessels in making their entries. There is little revenue collected there, but smuggling is prevented.

Mr. McMULLEN. I admit that it is necessary that we should have Customs officers and Customs houses to prevent goods being imported without paying duty. But I believe there are some offices in Ontario where there was very little collected and where the salaries exceed the amount.

Mr. BOWELL. I am not aware of any of those.

Mr. COLTER. I presume Hagersville is an outport of Hamilton.

Mr. BOWELL. I think it is.

Mr. COLTER. I would direct the attention of the Committee to the fact that there is no necessity whatever for the appointment which has been made at Hagersville. That place is thoroughly guarded from all all quarters by officers now in existence, and the revenue which is collected at that point is utterly insignificant. There may be a few carloads of coal, but they are about the only imports that come there, and the only reason why this appointment was made was to enable the gentleman who formerly sat for the county I represent to say that he had succeeded in getting so much for the county. Goods could not come there unless through other ports which are well guarded. On the line of railway on which it is situated, we have Hamilton at one end and Port Dover at the other, at which ports the duties are collected on goods coming from Lake Erie or from Lake Ontario, and if goods from Buffalo or Suspension Bridge, or from Detroit, there are officers at other ports to guard the revenue. As the Minister is so economical in Prince Edward Island, there is no reason for throwing away money in Ontario. I say this appointment was not in the public interest at all, but was made for political purposes.

Mr. BOWELL. That is a matter which will have my serious attention, particularly as the member who represents the county says there is no necessity for the office. I find that Mr. Thos. Geo. Hesson was appointed on the 19th January, 1874, and that Mr. Wm. Dalziel was appointed on the 7th November, 1873, so that all the indignation as to the seniority of this gentleman was lost.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I want to inform the hon. gentleman that Mr. Hesson was appointed by the Local Government before Confederation, and that Mr. Hesson's appointment is in my desk, if the hon. gentleman wishes to see it. He was re-appointed by the Dominion Government when Confederation was formed.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am glad to see the hon. Minister must feel, if he has dismissed the elder and retained the younger man, he has done wrong, judging by the joy he showed when he thought it was the other way.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Has the hon. the Minister of Customs received any petitions asking him to make Aylmer, Elgin County, an outport of entry? It is a town of considerable size, over 3,000 population, and it would not cost a great deal to make it an outport of entry. At Port Bruce there is nothing hardly being done.

Mr. BOWELL. Is that an outport of London?

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). No; an outport of St. Thomas. It would be a great convenience if someone were appointed at Aylmer, and it were made an outport of entry.

Mr. BOWELL. There was a petition sent sometime ago from Aylmer. There is scarcely a small town in the country that does not petition to be made an outport of entry. I send all such petitions to the inspector, Mr. Newburn, and if he reports favorably I generally carry out his recommendation. My impression is that the report was against Aylmer.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is the hon. gentleman going to re-instate the official whom he has improperly discharged from Prince Edward Island?

Mr. BOWELL. I have his commission. It is dated in 1874; I have also another paper signed by Mr. Morrison, Assistant Colonial Secretary, appointing Mr. Hesson on the 15th December, 1870. He was appointed by the Local Government in 1870, and got his commission from this Government in 1874, and the other man was appointed by this Government in 1873.

Mr. LAURIER. The other man might have been in the employ of the Local Government too.

Mr. JONES (Halifax.) The hon. gentleman should admit that Mr. Hesson was improperly dismissed.

Mr. BOWELL. He was properly dismissed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why is there the increase in British Columbia?

Mr. BOWELL. There is a deduction at New Westminster of $1,504, and an increase at Vancouver of $1,200. I am afraid that will not be sufficient, during the present year, to perform all the work that will have to be done there, on account of the increase in trade at that port. At Vancouver there is an increase of $1,200 in the Customs, owing to the extra work at that point. I am asking $3,000 to provide for a probable preventive service along the frontier. We find large quantities of goods brought over the Northern Pacific, landed at Sand Point, and taken across the country to the river, and by that means taken into the interior.

Board of Customs and Outside Detective Service... $17,000

Mr. BOWELL. The special agent is Mr. Wolff, who resides in Montreal. Mr. McMichael attends to a good deal of that work in connection with his duties as financial inspector, and Mr. O'Keefe, with two or three on his staff, at New Brunswick looks after the work there. That branch extends over Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island as well as New Brunswick, while Mr. Wolff has charge of the staff all over the Dominion. I think I know what the objections are to this staff, and I have no doubt, from what I learn, that, before the House rises, there will be a discussion on this question, and if the hon. gentleman likes to defer the discussion to that time, I think I shall be able to justify the action of the department in keeping the staff still in existence by showing the result which follows from it.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). And by showing the amount of money which each one makes himself?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, the amount each one makes through the work he performs. From what has been said, one would suppose that the money was taken out of the general revenue to pay them. All they get out of the general revenue is their ordinary salaries. Whatever they make in addition to that is made by seizures, and that is paid by those who violate the law. Whether the system is a correct one or not is open to discussion, and it would take longer than I think we desire to remain to discuss it now, but I shall be ready, when the discussion comes on, to justify the action of the department in this matter.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I agree with the hon. gentleman that this opens too large a question to discuss to-night, and, as the Minister intimates that it will form the subject of debate under some other resolution, I will not enter into it now; but I may tell him that there will be a great difference of opinion on that point, and that, though he may be sustained by hon. gentlemen who usually sustain the Government, there is a very strong opinion in mercantile circles that the present system is a very injudicious and a very improper one, clothing, as it does, some not very responsible persons with such large powers.

Administration of the Chinese Immigration Act, including remuneration to Customs Officers..... .....$2,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There should be some discussion upon that, but, if the hon. gentleman will agree that we can take that up on Concurrence, we will allow it to pass now.

Mr. BOWELL. Certainly.

Resolutions reported.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 2:10 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 12th April, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DIVORCE—W. G. LOWRY.

Mr. SPROULE presented the sixth report of the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills. He moved:

That the evidence taken before the Committee this morning on the Bill for the relief of Wm. Gordon Lowry, be printed and distributed.

He said: I do this because I understand that if the matter were referred to the Committee on Printing, it might take a longer time to get it before the members of the House.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 134) to amend chapter 148 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, respecting the improper use of fire-arms and other weapons (from the Senate.)—(Mr. Brown.)

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. FOSTER (for Mr. COSTIGAN) moved that the House resolve itself into Committee, on Monday next, to consider the following resolution:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Inland Revenue Act and to make better provision for ascertaining the duty to be charged on malt under the said Act; to provide that a duty of excise of fifteen cents per gallon shall be imposed on spirits used in a bonded manufactory in the production of ether and other chemical compositions, as from the 22nd May, 1888; for the remission of the duty on malt used in the manufacture of vinegar under certain restrictions, and for the better supervision of bonded manufactories; and to make provision that from the 1st July next the excise duty on cigarettes, weighing not more than three pounds per thousand, shall be $1.75 per thousand, and on those weighing more than three pounds per thousand, $6.00 per thousand, and also to provide further for the manner in which tobacco and cigarettes may be put up in packages.

Motion agreed to.

TARIFF CHANGES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I wish to ask the Finance Minister, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, whether he is yet in a position to state whether or no the Government propose to make any changes in the tariff? It is supposed that we are to close the Session very soon, and it would be well that this should be known.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not in a position to state to-day. I hope I shall be able to do so in a little while.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that he might be able to state on Monday next.

Mr. FOSTER. I might.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman will see that it is a matter on which notice should be given, otherwise the Session might be delayed longer than he might wish.

SUPPLY—ENQUIRIES.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. PERRY. Before that motion is put, I beg to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the fact that the answer he gave to my question in reference to the Tignish breakwater the other day, was not correct, and is likely to mislead the members who represent the district where this breakwater is. The question I asked was this:

"Has the Department of Public Works given instructions to repair the Tignish breakwater, Prince Edward Island? If so, is the work to be let by tender? If not, under whose management are the repairs to be made?"

The answer which the hon. Minister gave was this:

"Instructions have been given to repair the Tignish breakwater, Prince Edward Island, by day work. The work has not yet been commenced, but at the proper time a Clerk of the Works will be appointed."

The first part of the answer may be correct, that orders have been given to repair the breakwater, but the second part, that "the work has not yet been commenced," is not correct. My hon. friend must know that the work is now going on; I am sure it is not going on without his authority. I have received letters from home since this question was asked, stating that work is going on, that money has been paid, that men have been employed, and that stuff has been bought. Is it possible that this work is going on, and that money is being spent among favorites of the Government, without the knowledge of the Minister? If that is allowed to be done, I am sure the breakwater will not be much the better for the little repairs they may make on it. I am astonished that the Minister is not prepared to give an answer which would set me right, as well as the House and the people at large, on this matter. I do not mean to say, that the Minister did it wilfully; perhaps he did not consider the question; perhaps he had not time to do it; but it is a matter of great importance, if there are men there secretly carrying on this work, giving contracts, and paying wages to favorites of the Government, without the knowledge of his department. I say it is an outrage; it is squandering money. It would be better to take the $2,000 or $3,000, or whatever it may be, that is being paid, and make a present of it to the half-dozen favorites of the Government there, because the breakwater will not be any the better from the expenditure of that money. If it has become indispensable that this country must support some of the favorites of the Government there, it should be done by an annual subsidy, and not in this underhand way. Perhaps the hon. Minister is not aware that this work is going on, but I have several letters certifying that it is, and that a certain gentleman named Thomas Bernard is hiring people, buying piles, and superintending the work. It is a sorry thing for me to have to get information from an outsider. When I go to the trouble to ask a question of the hon. gentleman, I expect an intelligent answer, but he gave me an answer which was no answer at all. Even little boys, not seventeen years of age, are hired there, and are getting men's wages—why? Because they belong to a certain person who seems to be a favorite of the Government. I can look on it in no other way.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman might have spared himself that excitement. If he had only put the question to me quietly, and asked me if there was not some mistake in this statement I made the other day, I would have read the statement I have in my hand from which I made the answer. It is a statement signed by the chief engineer of the department, and dated from his office, the 10th of April. The statement is this—I will read every word of it:

"Instructions have been given to repair the breakwater, the work to be done by day's labor, as following the practice which has obtained in the department for years in case of small repairs. I am not aware who is the foreman, as the last information I have is to the effect that the repairs had not been commenced, and, indeed, I could not see how they could well be until the ice and snow had disappeared."

Of course, I cannot be on the spot, and I must rely on the chief engineer, who gave me this statement. I do not know anything about what the hon. gentleman has said in reference to a man named Thomas Bernard being engaged on the work, and I will certainly enquire about that.

Mr. WELSH. When will the report of the Government engineer, on piers and breakwaters in Prince Edward Island, be brought down? I would like to see what amount of money is required for these repairs before we go into these estimates.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I sent word to the chief engineer to give me a report as soon as possible. In answer to the enquiry made by the hon. gentleman, the statement sent to me was that it is impossible to submit now a report on the piers in Prince Edward Island, or an estimate of the cost of repairs, for the simple reason that there is no information as to their present state and condition, and to obtain that information would require a regular visit and examination. Where attention has been called to a particular pier, an examination has been made and a report and estimate of cost and repairs submitted. On receiving this, I wrote him back for a statement with regard to the piers in Prince Edward Island, concerning which there were estimates. He is preparing it, and I have no doubt it will soon be before the House.

Mr. WELSH. It is a very strange thing that, after a gentleman has been visiting the Island on Governement work, connected with those piers and harbors, we have no report, after nine months have elapsed, from him. This proves the disgraceful way in which public works are attended to in Prince Edward Island. I will move very shortly for a commission into the way public works are managed in Prince Edward Island, since there seems to be no other way of finding out what is done.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I want to call the attention, either of the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Public Works, to the fact that, last night, I asked the Government what they were going to take up to-day, and they informed me they were going to take up some Bills first. I have no objection to their going into the Estimates, but, as a matter of convenience, the statement of the Government in such matters should not be departed from.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is most likely that I did say we would take up some Bills, and then go on with the Estimates, but I thought it better to take up the Estimates at once, and I suppose the hon. gentleman has no objection to that?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not at all. I merely call the hon. gentleman's attention to this, because it might possibly happen that the change would, under other circumstances, be inconvenient. It would be better if the Government would make up their minds as to what they are going to do.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. the Minister of Militia has sent down a return which is only part of the information that I desire him to lay before the House. He has sent a return of a number of Martini-Henry rifles. What I particularly wanted was a return of the cost of manufacturing the ammunition for these rifles at the works in Quebec. I should like very much, if the hon. gentleman would furnish us, the additional information, because it is important for us to know.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I did not so understand it. My deputy, who was here, took a note of what the hon. gentleman said, and I sent the return on that note. I have no objection, however, to supplement that return by one showing the cost of the ammunition manufactured in the cartridge manufactory.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I would like to ask the Minister of Customs if the report in the Government organ at Montreal is correct, that the Government have decided to waive that portion of their Bill respecting the duty on inland tariff? I have a telegram from the Chamber of Commerce or Board of Trade of Halifax protesting against it. I do not want to say anything about it, but I wish to understand if the Government organ is well advised in stating that the hon. gentleman does not propose to carry that portion of his Bill into effect.

Mr. BOWELL. Whatever the intention of the Government may be, there have been no instructions, directly or indirectly, given the reporter of the Montreal Gazette, or anyone else, to make the announcement.

Mr. LAURIER. The Government have had for several weeks before them representations made by the lumbermen as to the policy recently adopted by the Government upon the increase of the import duty on logs. Can the hon. the Finance Minister inform the House whether the Government have come to any decision on that point or not?

Mr. FOSTER. The Government have not come to any decision, other than that already in existence.

Mr. LAURIER. That means nothing at all.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Salaries of Officers and Inspectors of Excise.... $270,801 25

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is a considerable increase in this vote. Will the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue explain it?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The increase is made up as follows: New appointments, $4,455; annual increments, $4,035; promotions, $2,026; transfers, $1,200.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What promotions are those?

Mr. COSTIGAN. This is entirely the outside service. They are promotions from third class to second class, and from second to first. In one case perhaps an inspector was appointed. Increases as the result of examinations, $735; increases without change of class, $1,145; increases due to change of class, $302. Total, $13,958. The reductions are made up in this way: Superannuation of George Travis, collector at St. John, $1,470; resignation of J. J. McHugh, $940; retirement of C. M. Hamilton, $90, being the balance of that year's salary; A. J. Smith, superannuated, $1,000, new appointments at St. Catharines, provided for but not made, $1,750, making a total of $5,250, which, deducted from the total increase of $13,958, leaves a net increase of $8,708.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). On what ground was Mr. George Travis superannuated?

Mr. COSTIGAN. To promote the efficiency of the service.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). In what way?

Mr. COSTIGAN, The deputy collector of the office at that time, Mr. Burke, was promoted in his place. Mr. Travis was beyond the age, and perhaps the hon. gentleman will recollect that, at the time I came into office, there was a very strong report of my predecessor's against the whole staff of the St. John office for inefficiency and irregularity. A change was made of four officers, and Mr. Travis would have been retired at that time, in view of the report then made, but, as he had been appointed many years before with the rank of deputy collector, but without the salary of that rank, I gave him the minimum salary attached to the rank of a deputy collector, and, as the retiring allowance is based on the average of the last three years, I allowed him to remain in order to get the benefit of the salary which he had only obtained at a late date, and which was the minimum of the class to which he was appointed many years ago.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). How many officers are there in that office now?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I cannot give you the names, but the staff is one less than it was at that time.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Burke is up here now, is he not?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No; he was appointed deputy collector at St. John some years ago, and when Mr. Travis was retired, Mr. Burke was promoted to the collectorship, as being a very active and intelligent officer, and then promotion took place in all the other ranks, without any new appointments being made.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). What is the increased expenditure in St. John?

Mr. COSTIGAN. There is no increase there.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There will be an increase in consequence of superannuation.

Mr. COSTIGAN. No; the superannuations took place over a year ago, and there is one less employed in the office.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What I wanted to get was the details of the increases.

Mr. COSTIGAN. A great many of our officers are excisemen, whom we can send, and very frequently do send, to any part of the country we like. I have already given the details of the increases. Of course the annual increments go over the whole service. The promotions are from one class to another, irrespective of any Province, and based upon the persons having passed the promotion examination. No man in the service has been promoted without having first complied with the law to the letter, and no one has received an increase of salary beyond the increment allowed by the law.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is as good a time as any to call attention to the state of facts which our Public Accounts disclose, and which, I think, calls for some little information from the Minister in reference to this department. If any hon. gentleman will take the trouble to examine the statements of our receipts and expenditures on this particular vote for the last nine or ten years, he will note that in 1879 our total expenditure was about $211,000, while our receipts amounted to $5,390,000, and they averaged fully that in the succeeding years. Now, from 1879 to 1888, the charge for these services, or for what I presume are nearly the same services, has swollen to $373,000. That is an increase of nearly 60 per cent. over the expenditure of some eight or nine years ago. A part of that might be accounted for, I presume, but when you recollect that our receipts from Excise were, in round numbers, $5,400,000 in 1879, and were quite up to that in succeeding years, and that in 1888 they had only risen to $6,000,000, the Minister will see that the increase of the expenditure from $211,000 to $373,000 is, on the face of it, quite a disproportionate increase. For his own sake, I think some reasonable explanation of that should be given. As I said before, some small part of that may be accounted for, but the increase, taken as a whole, is quite disproportionate to the service performed, and I should be glad to hear what the Minister may be able to say on the subject.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The increase in the force appears large, but it must be remembered that there has been an increase in the revenue, until now it amounts to nearly $7,000,000. Moreover, the imposition of higher duties requires a more strict supervision in the collection of the revenue. Then, again, the gradual increase of salaries can be accounted for by the fact that the Civil Service Act provided that the salaries of second and third class excisemen should be from $500 to $1,000 a year. We found it advisable at once, as soon as that Act was passed, to frame regulations, and divide the staff of excisemen into three classes, and to divide the salaries, so that every third class exciseman, every new appointment, came in at $500; he served six months on probation, and at the end of six months' probation he was confirmed, at $600, and remained there, to work up by annual increasement, at $30 a year, until he reached the maximum of that class. The whole staff, as it existed at that time, has since been kept down to the minimum, and growing up gradually. Further than that, I may state that I have been most anxious to keep down the expenditure as much as possible. With a view to the consideration of the Estimates for this year, I had a circular sent into every district of the department in Canada, calling attention to the desirability of reducing the staff, if possible, with a view of being able to decrease the estimate, or, at least, to prevent an increase. On looking over the reports from every inspector, I could not find a single place where an officer could be spared, or retrenchment could be made. More than that, in many of the districts, I have now before me requests from the chief officers asking for additional help. But I have not provided for any such increase in the present estimates.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman will note that I quoted from the year 1888, in which the income was six millions only. There was an increase of $600,000 in the total receipts over those of 1879. In order to collect that additional $600,000, the cost of the department had been raised $160,000. Now, that is, apparently, to say the least of it, a most enormous increase. The larger amount ought to have been collected at a lower percentage instead of a higher, but, so far as it appears in the Public Accounts, the additional sum of $600,000 cost us 25 per cent. to collect.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I see the hon. gentleman, in reply to the hon. member for St. John, has said that Mr. Travis had been superannuated in order to promote the efficiency of the service.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I see by a return brought down from the Inland Revenue Department, that Mr. Travis, collector, is put down here as superannuated to promote economy, not to promote the efficiency of the service. I observe $2,086 for superannuation in the department under the head of Excise, and one George Sutherland is put down for age, another man is put down for ill-health, and Mr. Travis is put down to promote economy. Are these items embraced in the expenditure given by the hon. gentleman now, the superannuation return of $2,000?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I was only referring to Mr. Travis.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It would appear that there has been $2,086 in superannuation allowances granted this year up to December 31st, 1888, in the hon. gentleman's department. That would increase the amount beyond what appears in the blue-book.

Preventive Service..... $15,800

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What has been the result of that preventive service?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Officers are appointed in different parts of the country to look after frauds, and they have been fairly successful, especially during the last year, in preventing illicit manufacture. Besides that, they travel through the country to look after the cigar and tobacco trade, and to the obliteration of marks upon oil barrels, and generally to assist the permanent staff in securing the observance of the law.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I see in the Auditor General's Report of last year, under the head of Preventive Service, $9,327 was paid to a large number of officers in the Inland Revenue Department. Then there were some items paid for travelling expenses, $4,817, which will make pretty nearly the item the hon. gentleman asks for now. But, in addition to that, there was the sum of $3,476 paid for information. The Auditor General appears to have asked the hon. gentleman for an explanation of what this money was paid for, and I see in a letter published on page E 164 of the Auditor General's Report, that the Minister of Inland Revenue declined to give that information. He says:

"The information I must, of course, decline to furnish. The sums referred to were expended in accordance with the intention of Parliament."

I do not know what the intention of Parliament was, or how it was expressed. If I remember aright, it was not voted for any secret service fund. If it was expended in that way, I would like the hon. gentleman to say. I refer the Minister to the Auditor General's Report, in which payments under the head of Preventive Service appear. I find, under the general head, an item of $3,476.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The item in the Auditor General's Report covers two cheques or drafts drawn by me, not exceeding $700 on the whole. The item of $3,000 odd has nothing to do with it. I have stated before in this House that there is an amount of $15,000 placed at the disposal of the Minister for the time being, for the payment of certain preventive service. The whole of that amount every year has been accounted for in the regular way, except last year there were these two special cheques. In a former year, one or two cheques were used in the same way, and no question was raised by the Auditor General with respect to them. When the Auditor General asked information with respect to the payment of these two cheques, I replied that I could not give it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You declined to give it.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I explained the matter to his satisfaction, and he admitted himself that a payment might be made through me in connection with information given looking to important seizures, and that I could not give the Auditor General the name of the party to whom payment was made. There is no reason why he should receive it. Knowing that I was using the authority that I presumed I had to make those payments to the extent of about $700, and knowing that I was making those payments in a private way, I furnished the particulars to the leader of the Government, giving the name and the object for which the payments were made, this being done by me for my own protection and as a guarantee that proper payments had been made. But I could not give this information publicly, and the Auditor General admitted it. I think, since 1882, when I came into office, I have used $300 in addition to these cheques in question in this private manner.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I see in the Auditor General's Report an item of $3,407 charged under the head of Preventive Service as being paid for information. There is also an item: Honorable John Costigan, $500.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The item appears in my own name, because I gave the cheques in my own name, $500 and $200 respectively.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). A return should be furnished as to how that money was expended, for it is not a very satisfactory way of bringing down an item in a lump sum, and this is a pretty large amount.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I think I have given all the explanation I can offer, and I am sure hon. gentlemen opposite will accept it as a fair explanation, if I understand rightly the authority I posseses to retain any part of the money to make payments in that manner. In regard to the item of $3,400, that comes up under the head of the general service. It was paid in the regular way, and the department was recouped to some extent by the penalties imposed.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I only want to know fhe fact. Does the hon. gentleman understand that he has authority, and if so, where does he receive it, to expend any and, if so, what amount for secret service? If there is any statute empowering it, I have nothing more to say; and if the House has voted it, I have nothing more to say; but I do not understand there is either any existing statute or legal authority or any vote of the House empowering this expenditure. If the hon. gentleman has power to expend $800, why should he not have power to expend $1,800? Is there any limit to his authority? Are we to understand that out of the $15,000 for preventive service, the hon. gentleman can expend any proportion he wishes, giving as a reason that the expenditure is for secret service?

Mr. COSTIGAN. If the expenditure is necessary to effect seizures or protect the revenue, and if is necessary to use in a private way a portion of the fund, I am justified in doing so, making a return to the leader of the Government in order that he may know exactly for what purpose the payments were made.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) From what statute does the hon. gentleman derive that impression? Is there any statutory authority? I understand that public money cannot be expended except under statutory authority or an express vote of the House. There is no express vote of the House, and where is the statutory authority? It is inconceivable that there can be absolute authority exercised on the part of the Minister to spend what he likes.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I have told the hon. gentleman that since 1882 the total amount expended by me under my own name out of the amount voted for the preventive service was about $900, and that it was spent in order to protect the revenue. The hon. gentleman asks under what statute I have acted. I do not know. My experience before I became Minister was that by the Government of hon. gentleman opposite that item was considered a special appropriation made for a special service. The hon. gentleman thinks that the Minister should not have the power to spend one dollar without giving the name and making a return. One of my seizing officers, however, need not give the name of the informer; he can pay a portion of the penalty to an informer and he need not publish his name. If he can exercise that authority, and if I have expended in this way the small sum I have mentioned during the last eight or nine years, I think there was nothing immoral about it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am not expressing an opinion as to the morality of the transaction; but I am enquiring whether the hon. gentleman has asked for or received authority to expend this money. The hon. gentleman says that a certain amount is voted for preventive service. Such is the fact; and there are twenty officers who receive salaries for performing this service, and the details with respect to them are published. I repeat my enquiry, where did the hon. gentleman obtain his express authority to expend any of this money? The expenditure may be right or may be wrong; but there are many things not done, although they would be quite right, because there is no authority.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I may have been wrong, but I was under the impression that I had that power.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I observe that $13,065 was obtained in connection with a seizure, out of which an informer was paid $15, an officer $5,334, and $5,195 went to the revenue. Besides those amounts, the hon. gentleman paid out $3,476 for information, and $500 was paid by him privately under his own name. All the revenue received is $5,000.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I think the House will accept the explanation I have made. I have not pressed for penalties as hard in every case, and perhaps I might be considered as over-lenient. I tried to allow them to get clear with a warning on the first offence, but where the second offence was committed I let the matter go to the courts. We get very little revenue from that class of seizures.

Increased pay to officers of large distilleries and factories	$5,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would suggest to the hon. Minister that, another time, he might save discussion if he would assign what he requires for the service of preventive officers, and state when he wants a vote for special services. That account should be strictly by itself, so that the House would understand what it is doing. If I understood the explanation given by the Minister, about two-thirds of this went to the salaries of some twenty officers and that he wants to hold some $5,000 or thereabouts at disposal for obtaining information. I see here a number of men, beginning with Mr. Bogue and ending with Mr. J. Watson, were paid $9,327, as well as two items: one, "paid for information, $3,476," and "paid Hon. J. Costigan, $500." I think we ought to have the items divided, to show what is for special purposes and what for regular information.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. gentleman seems to be under the impression that two-thirds of this was for salaries and such information. I stated that every dollar of the amount voted has been accounted for except the $500 for which my name appears, and that is a very small proportion out of $15,000. I can give the vouchers of the officers who made these payments, to the hon. gentleman, but, of course, I cannot give the names of the informers themselves. The payment is a regular one, and it is accounted for in a regular way.

Mr. GILLMOR. Will the hon. Minister state the duties which Mr. J. Bogue performed, and where he resides?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I cannot give much information as to where he resides, because the hon. gentleman, no doubt, knows that better than I do myself.

Mr. GILLMOR. I see he is set down as for St. John.

Mr. COSTIGAN. He is under the supervision of the head officer of that district, but he resides in some of the towns or villages of Charlotte County. His duties are to travel over a certain district outside St. John and look after illicit distilling.

Mr. GILLMOR. There is no illicit distilling in the County of Charlotte.

Mr. COSTIGAN. We don't know that.

Mr. GILLMOR. I never heard of it.

Mr. COSTIGAN. We found illicit distilling where, perhaps, the hon. gentleman never heard of either. We seized over eighteen stills within the last few months.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Surely not in Charlotte County?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No; but in other places. Mr. Bogue has also got to see that the law is carried out with regard to the sale of tobacco and cigars, and the importation of oil, and the proper defacing of the inspection marks. I think that this gentleman has discharged his duties so well that a request has been made to the Minister of Customs to secure his services and co operation as an active, intelligent and efficient officer. Personally, I do not know the gentleman.

Mr. GILLMOR. I was merely anxious to know what duty he performed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the practice of the hon. Minister with respect to officers in Manitoba? Do they still continue to receive increased allowance on account of the increased expenses of living there?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I am almost sorry to say that they do not, because I think it is rather a hardship that that increased allowance is stopped since last year. They get nothing but their salaries, as fixed by law and the regulations of the department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are you going to make any alteration with regard to the vote for cullers?

Mr. COSTIGAN. We will let the item stand, as I am in hopes of reducing it very materially.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will not interfere, if there is any hope of reduction.

Salaries of Inspectors and Assistant Inspectors of Weights and Measures..... $48,200

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What receipts does the department get for this expenditure?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I think the receipts would make up about half the expenditure. I may say that recently I introduced a change which will result gradually in a very considerable reduction of expenses, that is, by proposing in future, whenever a vacancy occurs in an inspectorship, that vacancy will not be filled up, but will drop into the next inspector's district, and the duties will be discharged by that one inspector, until such time as the Weights and Measures divisions will be made co-equal with the Inland Revenue divisions. That will have the effect of reducing the number of inspectors of weights and measures, from about twenty to nine or ten. In that way a considerable saving will be effected.

Mr. ELLIS. I would like to call attention to the fact that the total revenue received last year for the inspection of gas amounted to $7,000, while the expenditure was $20,000. Why should the people of the country, a great many of whom have to burn bad oil and pay a heavy tax on it, be required to pay for the inspection of gas in cities, for the benefit of gas consumers in cities? Besides, we know that the electric light is superseding gas. The revenue from the inspection of weights and measures last year was $37,000, and the expenditure $67,000. So that on these two items the expenditure is just about double the receipts. I submit to the House that the inspection of gas by the Government ought to be swept away altogether—that the consumer of gas ought to pay for his gas the same as anything else. I also think that the whole system of the inspection of weights and measures might be greatly simplified, and the whole expense done away with, by leaving these matters to the municipalities. I am satisfied that in St. John, both the inspector of gas and the inspector of weights and measures do practically nothing at all for the revenue they receive, and I think the hon. gentleman's office is a refuge for more useless officials than any other in the country.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I am sorry to hear the concluding remarks of the hon. gentleman. I think what he says in reference to the inspection of gas is well worthy of consideration. That matter has struck me in the same way. But the same argument does not apply to the inspection of weights and measures, because the service performed in inspecting them is useful to the country districts as well as the cities. But I admit that the inspection of gas is for the benefit of cities, and that the country does not get the benefit of it. I will give the matter my attention, with the view of trying to balance accounts as nearly as possible, if the service is continued.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think a very desirable change could be made in the system of inspecting weights and measures. When the inspector goes around to inspect weights and measures, he usually goes into an establishment and looks over all the weights and measures; and then, perhaps, in the course of a day or two he goes around again and delivers to the person who owns the establishment a certain number of cancelled stamps to represent the weights and measures he has inspected. The man who gets the stamps never takes the trouble to see whether they correspond in number with the weights and measures which have been inspected; and if an inspector is disposed to do any wrong, he has ample opportunity; there is no check over him. Instead of the inspector giving the man a number of cancelled stamps, the stamps should be attached to the weights and measures in some way. Besides, when the inspector comes to town, he announces that he is at such an hotel for the inspection of weights and measures, and that people must bring their weights and measures before him. If they do not do that, he will hire a rig and charge them with the expense, for the purpose of going around and making his inspection. I say the present condition of things is wrong, and if a man is disposed to take advantage of it, and collect more money than he returns to the Government, he can easily do it. When a man inspects a weight or a measure, he should attach to it the official stamp or seal; then he should be charged with the stamps he receives when he goes out of the department, and credited with the stamps he returns when he comes back, and should account for the balance. That is the only system that will protect the department against fraud. But the present system encourages fraud, because it leaves the cancellation of the stamps entirely in the hands of the inspector himself. I know myself a case in which not a single stamp was cancelled, but the inspector collected the fees, and he may not have returned a single cent to the Government. There should not be room for that sort of thing. Then, under the present system, there are many cases in which scales escape inspection, as there is no stamp put on to indicate whether a scale has been inspected or not. When an inspector comes around, there are people who will say that they have only so many scales, while, perhaps, the rest are under the counter. If the system required the scale to bear the official stamp, the purchaser would know that it was a proper scale, and that it would be safe to buy goods weighed on it. I hold that, in order to deal justly with the public, the system should be changed, otherwise the merchant should not be called on to pay for the stamp at all. Everybody is interested in having honest scales. The public is just as much interested as, if not more than, the seller. Consequently, I hold that every scale should be stamped free by the Government, and that the public should bear the whole expense. Some system to protect the public against the injustice I have spoken of should be adopted.

Mr. McNEILL. I should like to call the attention of the Minister to the fact that the selling of spring balances for private use is illegal. That seems to be a most extraordinary provision. If a poor man wishes to get a spring balance, which is the very cheapest style of a scale, costing about $4, for his own private use, it seems hard that it should be illegal for him to purchase it.

Mr. COSTIGAN. This is one of those cases in which it is impossible to please everybody. If a citizen has one of these spring balances, none of our officers has a right to interfere with or molest him. Parliament has passed a law to prevent the manufacture of scales which are not reliable. From the time you begin to use spring balances, the spring becomes weakened and they are no longer reliable, and therefore their manufacture is prohibited. We provide, however, for the manufacture of a cheap style of scale for housekeeping purposes, and provide a special rate for examination; in fact, we do all we can to meet the wants of the citizen.

Mr. McNEILL. It would be the proper thing to prevent the use of spring balances for the purposes of commerce, but not for private use. The hon. gentleman said that a private individual can have a spring balance, and he will not be interfered with; but it is made illegal for him to buy one or for a man to give him one.

Mr. COSTIGAN. They were all over the country before the law was passed.

Mr. McNEILL. They get worn out, and we cannot get new ones without infringing the law or inducing someone else to infringe it, If this class of scale is merely for private use, it is arbitrary to prevent a man purchasing it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to know if the Minister intends making any change in the system of inspecting weights and measures? How does he ascertain from each inspector the amount of money collected?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The stamps are given to the inspector, and he has to account for them. There is a good deal in what the hon. gentleman has said, but he is mistaken in supposing that any radical change is required in the law or regulations. The cases he referred to were those in which the officers violated the law. Let the hon. gentleman send me the name of the man he referred to, and I will deal with him. Every trader receives a circular informing him he is not to make any payment to the assistant inspector of weights and measures until the weights and measures are brought back and stamped.

To meet the expenses under the Adulteration of Food Act $25,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not going to object to this vote, because, under certain conditions, it may be a very valuable vote; but I would like the Minister to state, in a very general way, how this Act works, and whether we receive anything at all from it? I believe we do not, that it is an expense incurred by us pro bono publico.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Of course the Act is not long in force, and is more experimental than anything else. I think the hon. gentleman will admit, from the discussion of, and allusions to, this service in the press generally, that it is looked upon with a considerable amount of favor. True, there is no revenue derived from it; but it is an expenditure believed to be for a good purpose, and, I think, with a little change, we can bring about very satisfactory results all over the country. I propose that the Chief Analyst, who has been in communication with some of the Ontario associations, should, during the summer, put himself in communication with all such associations throughout the country, to gather information, so that, next Session, some important change may be made in the law regulating this branch of the service.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Have there been any seizures or convictions under this Act?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Prosecutions under the Act in some cases have failed on account of the interpretation given the Act by some of the courts, and it was proposed to introduce a short amendment this Session to remedy that weakness; but after an interview with the Dairymen's Association, and after representations made by other organisations throughout the country, it has been thought advisable, instead of patching up the Act, to let it stand until next Session, and then bring in a more perfect and complete amendment to the Act.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does this inspection of food include liquors, &c?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And do the officers analyse specimens of these in the different Provinces now?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Are the results given in the report?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The results are given in the bulletins published by the chief analyst from time to time. They are not embodied in the annual report of the department, but they will be brought down in a report. I have been discussing this matter with the Minister of Agriculture with a view to having them distributed in the same way as he distributes the information in connection with the Experimental Farms.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is hardly worth while having the analysis made unless the results are published.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The newspapers get hold of these bulletins, and publish the results.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The analysis of the drink of the people is almost more important than the analysis of the food, because we know that there is more adulteration of drinks than there is of food. This is a very serious matter, and I do not think any greater benefit could be conferred upon the people at large, than that a proper analysis should be made regularly of the beer and the liquors which the people drink, in order to ensure their purity. If the proposition, which the Minister of Finance used to support, in favor of total prohibition were carried, of course that would not be necessary. But, when a large quantity of liquor and beer enters into the daily consumption of the people, it is of the highest importance that it should be in as pure a state as possible. Do I understand from the Minister, that we will have the result of last year's analysis placed in our hands in some form?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. Last year the expenditure for the adulteration of food exceeded the estimate by $3,221. What was the cause of the excess?

Mr. COSTIGAN. We had some exceptional expenditure on buildings which we had to fit up for the assistant analysts. When the hon. gentleman sees that, in all the Provinces, we have to take samples and pay for them, of food and drugs and drinks, I think he will not be surprised that we expended last year a little more than the amount voted, but there is no danger of an over-expenditure this year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In your interest, Mr. Chairman, as well as in mine, I desire to call the attention of the hon. gentleman and the Minister of Public Works to the fact that, while it is very important that the liquor and the food of the people should be as pure as possible, it is also of some consequence that the air we breathe in this Chamber should not be more adulterated than it need be. Within the last week or two it has been growing gradually worse, and I hope those two hon. gentleman will put their heads together, and see if some remedy cannot be devised.

Mr. CHARLTON. We have had this question of the proper ventilation of this Chamber under discussion many times, and I am afraid that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works has not redeemed the promise he gave last year that the mode of supplying air to the Chamber should be changed, and that the air should no longer be brought in through the sewers, but from places where the air is pure. I think we still have the air brought in through these ducts which go to the edge of the cliff, and, as long as that is the case, the ventilation of this Chamber must necessarily be imperfect. No matter what air is brought into the Chamber, it will, as long as that system lasts, be something like the air we get in cellars and sepulchres.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) For a few weeks past we have had beautiful weather here, and yet we find that the front doors of this building are always closed. If the corridors were ventilated, if the windows were opened, we could have pure air brought in, but there seems to be a determination on the part of some one to keep both the doors and the windows closed. If those windows were opened between 6 and 8 o'clock, we would have purer air when we returned at 8, but we cannot expect impossibilities, and we cannot expect that the air will be pure when 200 or 300 men are sitting here constantly, and frequently as many more in the galleries, without proper ventilation being afforded.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is perfectly impossible for us to expect this Chamber to be pure when there is so much corruption in it.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). Hon. gentlemen forget that, if the doors and windows were opened, while it might be beneficial to members of the House, it would be very uncomfortable for some of the messengers about the corridors, and that would not do. I think it is very important that we should have some fresh air in this Chamber. I believe it would shorten the Sessions considerably, because we would all be in a better humor. It is a very important matter in connection with the health of members. Here we are poisoned with all the noxious gases which can be brought in. When the galleries are filled in the evening, the air contained in this Chamber will not last in a pure state for more than two or three minutes, and the carbonic acid gas which is exhaled from the galleries drops down upon us, and the result is that we are practically poisoned. I have no doubt that the lives of the representatives of the country are cut short by the impure air in this Chamber, and I think the country could not do better than to expend a few thousand dollars in giving us pure air, by building a new Chamber or by enlarging this Chamber, or by doing something to improve the present state of things.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Hon. gentlemen on both sides are perfectly right in saying that the air in this Chamber is vitiated, and, in fact, it is sometimes hardly possible to remain in the House; but the remedy is entirely in the hands of the House. During the Session, the authority that the Minister of Public Works exercises over these buildings on behalf of the Government is, to a very large extent, suspended, as far as the two Houses and the rooms occupied by members of Parliament are concerned, and it is left very much to members to improve the ventilation of the room. I spoke to the Speaker at the beginning of this Session in reference to this matter, and he gave orders that, at 6 o'clock, the windows and doors should be opened, so that we might have ventilation. That order is obeyed more or less, perhaps less, rather than more, at least I am afraid so. I think this little discussion will show the officers who have charge of the building that they must obey the orders, and must give us some of the air which we have in such abundant quantity outside. True, sometimes while the House is sitting, the doors or windows have been opened, and members have sent messengers to close them, although other members when they see them closed, might order them to be opened. We have done all that we could do in reference to the air ducts mentioned by my hon. friend opposite. Last year the question came up whether we should not build a new House of Commons.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. At any rate, some members spoke of it; I do not say that the whole House was of that opinion, but the question was broached of having a new House of Commons. The matter has been looked into, and it would require a very large sum of money, because we could not erect a House of Commons here without making the new building accord with the architecture of the present Parliament building. But another mode was suggested, and it has been studied, but, unfortunately, the chief architect of the department, Mr. Fuller, has been very ill during the last three or four months, indeed his life was despaired of; therefore, the plans he was preparing had to be laid aside for the present. The idea was, and is, to enlarge this House by throwing down the partitions between this House and the outside wall of the building. Then we would have a room perhaps 40 or 50 per cent. larger than this one, and we would have light and pure air on three sides of the new Chamber. There would be more room for the members now, and it would accommodate an increased representation which we may have in three or four years. That matter is now being studied, but I am afraid that if we had been ready to make the change this year, the Minister of Finance would have said that the finances would not allow the matter to be considered now. I think that during the recess I will be in a position to lay the matter before my colleagues, with the plans, and that next Session, if the idea is considered a desirable or necessary one, the plans may be laid before Parliament, and we may ask from the House such a vote of money as may be necessary. But, as I said, I have done what I could in the direction of ventilating the Chamber. The hon. gentleman knows himself that this room was badly built for its present purpose; it would have served better, I think, for a Library than for a House of Commons. We have no ventilation, no opening, except two doors on this floor. The openings are over our heads, therefore we cannot have the same ventilation nor as much fresh air as we could have if the openings were on the level of the floor. However, the matter is being considered, and I hope that next Session I will be able to lay before my colleagues and before Parliament, some scheme to meet the views of the House. I do not think such a scheme can be accomplished without a considerable sum of money, but it will not cost anything like a new building.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I would suggest that it might be of very great utility, after the House adjourns each night, for the doors and windows all to be opened; then the employés and messengers would run no risk of getting colds in their heads, as suggested by an hon. gentleman on this side of the House. We could then have a complete change of air in the room, so that when the House meets again the following day the atmosphere would be bearable.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think that the radical defect in the ventilation of this Chamber—of course the situation of the Chamber is such that it cannot be perfectly ventilated—is that the air brought into it is brought through those ducts. That is a matter against which I have been contending for years. It is almost impossible to get at a remedy, and as long as the air comes into this Chamber through ducts, that air will be to a certain extent poisonous, and unless we change that mode of ventilation, the Chamber will be radically defective, whether you carry out the proposal of the hon. Minister or not. Now, I have urged the erection of a tower or chimney in this court where the machinery is situated, for the purpose of drawing the air from a height of, perhaps, 100 feet, and feeding the air through that chimney into the Chamber, in place of drawing it through these ducts. We would then get pure air directly from the source of all pure air, instead of bringing it through these subterranean passages which are often foul and always mouldy, which serve as receptables, sometimes, I dare say, for dead dogs and dead cats and various substances of this kind, that would make us shudder if we thought of the air we are breathing and the place from which it comes. I hope the hon. Minister will give his attention to that difficult matter, so that we may have good ventilation in this Chamber, whatever else may be done.

Minor Revenues..... $800

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice in last year's accounts an item of $653.18 to D. O'Connor, as costs of collecting ordnance rents; reporting on ordnance lands, $20. Who is this D. O'Connor, and how does this item come in?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The item properly applies to the Department of the Interior, although that payment, I dare say, was made by my department. The hon. gentleman will remember that this item was discussed in the Public Accounts Committee. The accounts for arrearages, hydraulic rents, and other ordnance property, were placed in the hands of Mr. O'Connor for collection. He collected a large amount of these old debts and received that amount on account of these collections.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How much did he collect?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I do not know the exact amount; but I can state that the arrangement made with Mr. O'Connor was the same, and the percentage allowed him for collecting, was just the same as that given by the previous Governement to the same gentleman for the same service.

Mr. McMULLEN. I cannot understand why in Ottawa civil servants cannot collect these hydraulic rents, and, in my opinion, it should be done by some of our officials instead of by a lawyer. I know that the name of this gentleman, Mr. D. O'Connor, appears on almost every page of the Auditor General's Report, and when the different items are added up they amount to $18,000 or $20,000. It is a mere excuse to say that it is necessary to employ a lawyer to collect these rents, when it could be done by civil servants who are walking round with nothing to do. It is time this practice was stopped. It is quite evident that Mr. O'Connor is a particulnr pet and is encouraged and paid for some particular purpose. Is this the same man who appeared the other day and took an active part at the presentation to the Minister of Public Works? I believe he was the man.

Mr. COSTIGAN. That is simply an assertion. The hon. gentleman says there is no necessity to employ Mr. O'Connor because there are sufficient clerks in the Government employ to make the collections. Without being discourteous to the hon. gentleman, I may say that these arrears have existed for years; that the Government in power from 1874 to 1878 found the same difficulty in collecting the arrearages the present Government has found, and no clerk was able to collect them during the administration of the previous Government. These arrears are accumulating, and we are endeavoring to bring about a settlement for the payment of those arrears, which amount to a very considerable sum. A considerable sum has been paid in by Mr. O'Connor on account of the collections. By threatening prosecutions the parties made a settlement, and we have already obtained a considerable amount, and the item of $600 is on account of services in connection with this matter.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The amount charged is given, but not the amount collected. I remember a case in a Provincial Legislature where a man was employed to collect a certain dog tax. He charged a certain sum for commission, and when interrogated as to the receipts, he said the receipts would not pay the commission.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I will bring down the amount of the collections.

Mr. McMULLEN. Both in the Public Accounts Committee and here, whenever fault is found with an item of expenditure, Ministers immediately say that the previous Government did the same thing. There must be a stop put to that. I am not here to justify the action of the previous Government if they acted wrongly. What we have to do is to criticise the actions of this Government, and when we find an item of this kind, it is no answer or explanation to say that the previous Government did the same thing. It is time there was an end to the giving of such answers with respect to the expenditure of public money.

Collection of Slide and Boom Dues..... $7,500

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe that this vote is reduced to nearly one-third of the previous amount. Of course it is desirable that there should be decreases wherever possible; but I should like to know whether a complete change of system has occurred, or whether this large decrease has been found to be practicable, as compared with $20,000 previously voted. The presumption is one of two things: either that there has been a change of system, or that the previous expenditure was altogether too large. What is the cause of this very remarkable decrease, and does any part of it appear in the next item?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No. The reason why the Government have asked for this small sum is, that negotiations are in progress between the Finance Minister and the Governments of Quebec and Ontario, with a view to reconsidering the arrangement entered into before Confederation. This amount is to carry on the service until the arrangement has been completed, when this matter will be taken entirely out of the hands of my department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course I have no objection to this reduction, and I have always thought that it would be better if this subject were in the hands of the provincial authorities. What revenue was obtained last year?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I can bring down the information.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If we are going to hand over this matter, why should we pay anything for the service? What is it proposed to do with the $7,500?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Officers have been appointed to discharge these duties, on an understanding arrived at between the three Governments. It is now proposed, and an arrangement is pretty nearly completed between the Minister of Finance and the Ontario and Quebec Governments, to discontinue the existing arrangement, but until it is discontinued we must maintain the offices and pay the officials.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I hope we are not going to be saddled with a heap of charges for superannuating these officers who do not belong to us, because, this being really a provincial work, the Provincial Governments should take this business over and look after the officers. Once or twice when such changes have been made, I have noticed they have resulted in a very considerable addition to the Superannuation Fund.

Mr. FOSTER. The Dominion Government have some officers of their own in that joint service, employed in the collection of slide and boom dues. Then these two Provincial Governments have some officers employed in the collection of timber dues. The rule has been that all the officers have been paid out of a common fund and the two Provinces have paid each one-third, being the share of each Province, towards the general expense. That was an arrangement not altogether palatable to the Provincial Governments or the Dominion Government, and when the delegates were here in the course of the autumn we came to the conclusion to abolish that system. The Dominion Government and the Provincial Governments are now considering the disposition of these officers. Some of them will, no doubt, be required by the Provincial Governments, and they will probably look after their proportion. Some others will be needed for that part of the work which belongs to the Dominion Government, and I do not think any difficulty will be encountered in making an arrangement, without entailing very much cost.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We have in the Auditor General's Report a statement of the arrearages, but we have not the amount collected. These arrearages require some explanation. Under the head of slide and boom dues, we have: Due 30th June, 1885, $40,000; due 30th June, 1888, $71,000. Some of these arrearages run back for a great number of years, and, no doubt, are out of date, and will never be recovered. If we pay salaries to these collectors of revenue on slides and booms, and that such arrears occur, the department ought to be able to give some explanation. I cannot see why, during three years, we should have increased the arrears by $31,000. There is evidently some insuperable difficulty in collecting those arrears, or some indifference or supineness on the part of the officers, and I think Parliament has a right to know.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Instructions have been given to the officers to press for the payment of these arrears.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think it is intolerable that they are not pressed for. It is not fair to the other taxpayers of the country.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). The amount of revenue received from the slides and booms will be found in the Auditor General's Report, page G-112, and it amounted to $46,651.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What my hon. friend says is quite true. If you turn to the Public Accounts you find that in 1888, $66,442 accrued from this source of revenue, but we only collected $46,000 out of that, while our annual expenditure appears to have gone up to $100,000, all told. There were nearly one-third of the revenues which actually accrued that were not collected. I think it reflects considerably on the management of the department that such a state of things should exist, and the hon. Minister might be prepared to explain. We will say nothing about back balances, but he ought to explain why this $20,000 was not collected last year.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I know of no reasons why the payments were not made, but finding that such a large amount were in arrears, I gave instruction to the officers to press for payment.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As I understand, the officers have full power to seize the timber and to hold it until every cent is paid. The tolls amount to a very small percentage of the value of the timber. It appears to me that with such excellent security in hand there ought not to be—whatever may be said as to bad claims—such a large deficit in the collection as $20,000 for the last year, 1888.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I believe we will get that before long.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What we want to know is why it has not been obtained.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I will enquire if there is any particular reason why it has not been collected, and I will give it to the hon. gentleman on Monday.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, but I would point out that this is precisely the sort of question which the Minister might expect when he brings down these estimates, and he ought be prepared with information to answer it. I will not press the matter, because we have other opportunities of bringing it up again. A loss of $20,000 out of a total revenue of $66,000, where you have got every full and ample means for collecting it, seems to me rather a doubtful proceeding.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). One reason why the balances occur is this: A good deal of the revenue derived from slides and booms is earned during the months prior to the 1st of July. These amounts are chargeable upon the timber, and are collected only when the timber goes to Quebec, and is disposed of, so that it would be natural that there would be a considerable balance at the end of each financial year, accruing to the department for that particular service, whilst, at the same time, I do not think that would at all imply that the balance, or any portion of it, remaining unpaid, would be lost to the revenue. My hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) will understand what I mean. The amounts are not collected at the moment the timber is cleared here at Ottawa, but when it reaches Quebec, and usually not until the timber is sold. The timber may remain undisposed of sometimes for over a year, and we are not to imply from this, that the revenue is going to lose anything by these balances going over.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That may be a very excellent explanation on one point, but the fact remains, that the balance due on the 30th June, 1888, was $105,883, showing that this plan of collecting back balances has not worked very well all through.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Perhaps not, but it will act to a great extent for the balances due.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It will account for the way in which the balance is allowed to creep up from year to year. We find that now the balances unpaid amount to nearly two years receipts, and that balance keeps increasing. On the 1st July, 1887, the balance was $87,130, and on the 30th June, 1888, $105,883.

Mr. LAURIER. The explanation of the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. White) might apply to the deficit in the collection from one year to the other, but there are arrears going back as far as 1871.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I quite admit that this does not account for the whole thing, but it accounts for it to a very great extent. There are considerable balances that remain over for a considerable number of years, and my hon. friend, when he was Minister of Inland Revenue, knows how difficult it was to collect some of these amounts. There were certain contentions on the part of some of those against whom these accounts were held that they were not liable, and my hon. friend remember the difficulty there was in this connection.

Mr. LAURIER. This is not a novel discussion, and I have heard it year after year, but I notice there has not been any improvement in the system. The system is certainly wrong when the balances are allowed to increase from year to year. There must be something wrong, which cannot be defended at all.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I think myself the system is wrong.

Mr. WALDIE. I do not see why it is necessary to employ legal assistance to collect these arrears, as I understand before the timber is cleared at Quebec the dues have to be paid, and it is in the hands of the officers there to enforce payment. I know they collect in some instances, and I do not see why they should not do so in all.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). While on the subject of arrearages, I would like to invite the attention of the Government to an explanation on some other point. I see at page "G-152" of the Auditor's General's Report, under the head of "arrears due for interests and investments," that there is $14,548 interest to the 30th June, 1888. This is under correspondence. Then there is the Bank of Liverpool, interest on $30,000, for nine years, at 4 per cent; this is before the courts. Then there are the following items under Miscellaneous Consolidated Fund:

Quebec Turnpike Trust	$20,000 00
McGill College	7,990 00
Upper Canada Bank stock	750 00
Earl of Selkirk's mortgage	13,900 00
H. L. Boulton's mortgage	3,000 80
Total	$45,640 80

Then there are the Montreal Turnpike bonds, $67,200; the North Shore Railway, $970,000, two years and 263 days' interest at 5 per cent.; Quebec Harbor debentures; St. John Bridge and Railway Extension Co., interest due to 30th June, $17,356—correspondence going on, and the company remitted $10,000 on account; and Three Rivers Harbor debentures, one year. Perhaps some members of the Government will explain to us why these accounts are allowed to remain so long.

Mr. FOSTER. Some of these, I suppose, fairly well explain themselves; some of them I know nothing about at all. The Quebec Turnpike Trust and the Montreal Turnpike Trust bonds are two items which, I suppose, are in connection with the settlement of the accounts between the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec and the Dominion, which are now in process of settlement. With reference to the Upper Canada Bank stock, I suppose that has relation to that old bank matter which has been lying so long. I do not know what these two mortgages are, but now that my attention has been called to them, I will look into them.

Mr. ELLIS. With regard to the Albert Railway Co.'s account, I moved in the Public Accounts Committee for the vouchers for the payments, but there seemed to be no vouchers. The common report is that the money was paid over to some clerk in a dry goods house in St. John, and that the sum which the First Minister stated was to pay laborers was paid to the directors. The common report about St. John is that the directors paid themselves for five years' services out of the money given to them by the Government. In the meantime the railway company failed, and the railway has passed out of the hands of the original company into the hands of some third party. There is no probability of any interest ever being collected; but there should be some satisfaction given to the country as to whom the money was paid.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would just call the attention of the Minister of Inland Revenue to this circumstance: that, although there has been a difficulty about collecting those arrears, in 1878 the total tolls accrued amounted to $78,449 and the total amount deposited to the credit of the Receiver General was $98,364, showing that we not only collected all the tolls, for the year, but had $20,000 to the good. There were large arrears when we came into office, but we brought them down considerably. So that I think, with the exercise of due diligence on the part of the Minister, it would be possible to collect as much in the year as accrued due.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I hope the hon. gentleman will let this item stand until these arrearages are explained. The matter is more serious than we had imagined. I find that in the Ottawa agency, in hydraulic and other rents, there is about $60,000 due to the Government, and that the arrears of slide and boom dues have been accumulating for a number of years. If the Auditor General's Report is to be relied on, some of the largest amounts due to the Government have been going on since 1878. In Three Rivers there have been nearly $15,000 of arrears which have accumulated since 1885. There are some firms who are $13,000 in arrear for hydraulic and other rents, and $9,000 or $10,000 in slide and boom dues. It is impossible that this state of matters can continue. The hon. gentleman must see that it is unfair and unjust to the country at large as well as to those who are compelled to pay their dues. One man is compelled to pay, and another is let off. What is the reason? Is it political favoritism, or what is it? It is easy to collect the dues, because they form a lien on the timber as it comes down the slides, and if a man is in arrears for one or two years, his timber should not be allowed to come down until they are paid. I think the item should be allowed to stand until we get a statement on Monday. If it passes this year without any explanation being given, I give the hon. gentleman notice that if these arrearages come up in another year, I will challenge the opinion of the House upon them by a formal vote, because I think it is disgraceful to the department to allow such arrearages to accumulate from year to year.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice by the Auditor General's Report—I do not know whether this is a member of this House or not—that Perley & Pattee are in arrear to the amount of $40,000 altogether. I think it is unfair that the Committee should be asked to pass this item without having a fuller explanation of it. Have those accounts in the Auditor General's Report been settled?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The same question came up in the Public Accounts Committee, and I stated the difficulties found in bringing about a settlement, difficulties which had existed for years on account of claims put in. I stated that these arrearages ought to be paid, and that if I could not collect moneys through the ordinary course, I would hand the matter over to the Department of Justice. That was done, but legal proceedings were not necessary, because negotiations took place between the Minister of Public Works and these gentlemen, which resulted in a proposition satisfactory to both parties, and which would bring about a payment of those arrears.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We will accept the proposition on the distinct understanding that discussion may be had on this subject when any other items are proposed.

Lévis Graving Dock repairs $4,000

Mr. JONES (Halifax). These items seem heavy for new works. We were given to understand last year that the expenses of the Lévis graving dock, when completed, would be very small, indeed. The returns from the Esquimalt graving dock are about $5,000. The Minister of Public Works explained that he had not, at the moment, the returns for the Lévis graving dock, but promised to bring them down shortly. The item here for the working of the dock seems heavy, and the repairs, considering it is a new work, are excessively heavy.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The $5,225 are for the repairs of the Esquimalt graving dock; it consists of coal, 350 tons, for the working of the machine; watering, 350 days, at $2.50; waste, oil, tallow, repairs and renewals, $2,000. The $2,000 is only an approximate sum, and we may have to pay a little more or less. For the Lévis dock last year we asked a certain sum only in the same way. It was an experiment, we did not know what it would cost, and, therefore, had to ask a certain sum, in order that we might know afterwards what amount would be required. The work there has been left for the season under the direction of the harbor commissioners, my department being, of course, responsible. The staff includes a superintendent, dockmaster, one engineer, for 12 months, and another for 8 months, then the two foremen and the watchman. Then, of course, there are the laborers that are required, in addition, during the season of navigation, for repairing purposes, $2,000. That is as regards the staff As regards repairs, we have, under that title, coal, waste, oil and tallow, and materials for repairs, and contingencies. We will be able, next season, after the experience of a year, to say exactly how much of these should be dropped or how much added. The hon. gentleman asked me about the return. I have not a return as complete as I would wish to put before the House, but I will tell him now what was the expenditure and the revenue of last year. The revenue of the previous year had been $21,902. We had a number of vessels in the dock, and one large steamer remained in it all winter. She paid $16,000 or so for having occupied the dock. This year we have had very little revenue, because very few vessels used the dock up to the 31st December. The revenue was only $2,349.10 for that year, against an expenditure of $7,108.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the Lévis dock is under the charge of the harbor commissioners at Quebec?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Lévis dock was attended to last year under the management of the harbor commissioners, through my department, because I was not ready to assume the work myself. I had not the officials I required, who had experience of such work, and the hon. gentleman will admit that the dockmaster must be a first class man. We had a very good one in British Columbia, Capt. Devereaux. The one in Quebec I do not know, but the chief engineer is preparing for me a report on the work for the season, in order that we may be in a position to decide what is to be done.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I hope the hon. gentleman does not propose to work the dock under the harbor commissioners.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No, but under the direction of my own department. I did it as I did the work last season on the channel between Montreal and Quebec. The work had already been under the commissioners, and I made arrangements with them that the work would continue so for the season, they giving official information to my department, and my officers looking after the expenditure. But from the 1st of January that has ceased altogether, I have assumed for my department the control of that work, and any work will henceforth be conducted directly through my department.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I) Has the capital expenditure ceased upon the Esquimalt graving dock.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I see that last year you spent $90,000 on this. What was the reason for that?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I suppose it was because the contracts were being completed.

Mr. MARA. Her Majesty's men of-war are docked free of charge, except in regard to daily expenses, and, of course, the expenses will appear great in proportion to the receipts.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would ask the Minister what is being done, if anything, in the construction of the wharf or harbor at Cape Tormentine. A harbor has been built at Cape Traverse, and the hon. gentleman commenced to build one at Cape Tormentine, but the contractors threw up their contract, and I understand that the place was not very well chosen and should have been put further westward. What has been done, or what is being done, as to the letting of that contract?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I did not expect this question, as it is not under this heading, but I will give an answer to the hon. gentleman on the first occasion we meet. I gave the information some days ago when we were on the Estimates.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I was not in the House.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will refer to the Hansard, and if he wants any further information, I will give it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What will be the probable receipts from the Lévis graving dock?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have already stated that, during the season before last, the revenue from that dock was $21,902.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). In regard to Cape Tormentine, I may state that the contract was let for the second time last year, and the contractor made good progress with it in the latter part of the year. I think the wharf was built out from the shore some 600 feet or 700 feet.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is it built on the same location as the first wharf?

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). Yes. A very careful survey was made of the whole locality at that time. I saw the plans in the Department of Public Works, and I think an examination of the plans would convince anyone that the location was well selected.

Telegraph Line between P.E I. and the Mainland.... $2,000

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That is the ordinary vote, according to the terms of Confederation.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Have the Government received any report, or has their attention been drawn to a new cable which has been patented by Capt. Trott and Mr. Hamilton, the engineer of the telegraph ship at Halifax? Instead of this being covered with wire, it is covered with hemp, and I am led to believe that it only weighs about half as much as the old-fashioned cable, though it costs nearly the same amount; but, from the information which they have in regard to hemp, which has been under water for a long time, its durability appears to be very much greater than that of the old cable. The parties who have the patent have already manufactured some 50 or 60 miles, and have laid that in the Atlantic in connection with the Anglo-American Cable Company, where it has been in successful operation for some time. There has also been a cable of this kind working, for some time, across Halifax harbor to Dartmouth. The great advantage which seems to exist in connection with this cable is its durability. It is said that the length of time which it will last has yet to be determined, but the promoters have already found hemp which has been under water for a great number of years without apparent injury. I think it would be important for the Government, in view of any cable operations, or any assistance which they may be offering to any cable enterprises, to investigate this new cable.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I understand that Mr. Gisborne, the superintendent of our telegraph system and a very distinguished electrician, is kept au fait of these matters. If we require, as we may, to lay down a cable or cables, the best cables which will cost the least and which will be as good will be selected; but certainly I would not tell the hon. gentleman that though one cable may be less expensive than another, that should be a reason for us to adopt it, unless experience has shown that the cable which may be obtained at a less price is as good and durable as that which we have now. We will probably have three or four small cables to lay on the north coast before we reach Anticosti. If, as we are told, there is a company being formed to build or stretch a cable between Great Britain and Belle Isle, the question will arise whether we should extend our system from the east end of Anticosti to Belle Isle by a cable. If that occurs, I have no doubt we will find at once that our telegraphic system by the north coast will be a paying concern; but, until we are sure that that company will be in a position to begin their work and stretch their cable, it is not our intention to ask for a vote of money from Parliament to extend our lines in that direction.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I am not expressing any want of confidence in Mr. Gisborne, who, I believe, is a very distinguished electrician, but sometimes people are prejudiced against new patents and new enterprises and discoveries, and have their attention drawn entirely to one class of cables. Therefore, I venture to recommend the Government, even in the event of such a high authority as Mr. Gisborne recommending their adhesion to the old cable, to take means to satisfy themselves in regard to it, and, in that case, I think they would arrive at the conclusion that this cable would be of great importance, even in reference to durability.

Telegraph Lines, N.W.T. $21,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose this is only for maintenance?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This is only in regard to what we own?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We have several telegraphs in the North-West Territories, north of the Canadian Pacific Railway, some in the west going as far as Edmonton, and we have some in the east going as far as Saskatoon and Prince Albert. These lines, of course, later on, may be transferred or sold to some railway company, perhaps to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company themselves. I tried to have the company assume them at a fair price, but they were not tempted.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is there any sort of revenue derived from these, and if so, is it a progressive revenue?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes, but I cannot tell how much.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is there a reasonable chance, within a fair space of time, of these becoming self-supporting?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think so. I think those of the North-West Territories are likely to pay as well as those on the north coast of the St. Lawrence. In British Columbia it may take more time.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Is there any new arrangement with regard to the Cape Race light? I see some new arrangement has been proposed between the Dominion and the British Government.

Mr. FOSTER. That has been handed over to the Canadian Government, together with the revenue fund which had accrued about $110,000.

Committee rose, and it being Six o clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

INDEPENDENT ORDER OF THE FORESTERS.

Mr. JAMIESON moved that the House concur in amendments made by the Senate to Bill (No. 74) to incorporate the Supreme Court of the Independent Order of the Foresters. He said: The Senate have amended sections 3 and 7, and recast them. They amended section 3 so that instead of giving the Supreme Court power to regulate the incorporation of subordinate courts, they provide that the trustees shall file a declaration in the registry office for the registry division within which the subordinate court is being established. In addition to that, they provide for the incorporation of the trustee of the court, instead of the court itself. Section 7 is also changed slightly. In the event of the dissolution of a subordinate court, it is made optional with the Supreme Court to take over the property, and if it does take over the property, it takes it subject to the debts. In that event there is a recourse given by creditors against the supreme body for the payment of the debts.

Mr. HALL. I have looked over the amendments carefully, and concur in what has been stated by the promoter of the Bill. They cannot be said to be unimportant, but they are such that this House can with safety concur with them.

Motion agreed to, and amendments concurred in.

UNION RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) moved that the House concur in amendments made by the Senate to Bill (No. 79) to incorporate the Union Railway Company.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have looked at these amendments, and I think they are not material. There is a clause by which the bonds to be issued are divided into classes, that is to say, so much for the main line and so much for the bridges. The clause that has disappeared from the Bill leaves it under the provisions of the general Railway Act.

Motion agreed to, and amendments concurred in.

DIVORCE—G. M. BAGWELL.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 123) for the relief of George McDonald Bagwell.

Motion agreed to, on a division, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 3,

Mr. DAVIES. I want to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the form these Bills take when they come before this House. I do not object to them for any special reason, but when the Senate passed these Bills dissolving marriage for the crime of adultery, they declared "that the marriage between the parties is dissolved, and shall henceforth be null and void, to all intents and purposes." That is the form. They then go on to make special provision that the party who sues for the divorce may marry again and that the issue of the second marriage shall be legitimate. These clauses, I presume, are unnecessary, although I do not object to their insertion as a matter of precaution, but it seems to me that as the Bills are now passed permission is given to the guilty party also to marry afterwards. That is entirely contrary to the practice in England, and I think it is a provision which should not be passed. If one or other party commit adultery and the marriage is dissolved at the instance of the innocent party, the guilty party should not be allowed to marry again. Such permission is contrary to all prudence and justice. I call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that all our Bills are framed in the same way. It appears to be unfair and bad legislation.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think there is a great deal of force in the statement of the hon. gentleman, and, with the permission of the House, I will consider it before the third reading, and discuss with my colleagues as to whether there should be a change.

Bill reported.

DIVORCE—IN COMMITTEE.

Bill (No. 124) for the relief of Arthur Wand (from the Senate).—(Mr. Small.)

Bill (No. 125) for the relief of Henry Middleton (from the Senate).—(Mr. Small.)

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

Post Offices..... $2,959,710

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to say a few words with respect to postmasters' salaries. In looking over the list, I find a great many small postmasters throughout the country receive little or nothing for their services. During the Session a Bill has been brought in and passed, for the purpose of increasing the salary of the postmaster at Toronto to $4,000. I hold there should be a general readjustment of the salaries paid to postmasters throughout the Dominion. In my own constituency there are several postmasters who receive only $12 or $15 a year. It is a gross injustice to country postmasters to ask them to work for the public at a pittance, while, at the same time, a city postmaster receives $4,000 a year. In my own town, where we have one of the most efficient and faithful servants in the Dominion as postmaster, and who attends to the office himself, and keeps one of his family there, this postmaster receives only $1,000. In the town of Harriston, where there is a very faithful and efficient postmaster, who has been employed for many years, this public officer receives only $900 a year, and he has to be in the post office from 5 o'clock in the morning till 10 o'clock at night. A great injustice is done to these postmasters, who have discharged faithfully and efficiently their duties in the country post offices, and who in many cases receive not more than $12 or $15 a year, while the salary of a city postmaster is increased to $4,000. I acknowledge that the duties of the city postmaster are, perhaps, more responsible than the duties of the country or town postmaster, but I contend that $2,000 a year would be an ample allowance to any officer for discharging the duties of a city post office. The office does not require any extra ability, and the postmasters in Toronto and Montreal would be well paid at $2,000. It is wrong to ask country postmasters to work for virtually nothing. I know some post offices in my own riding where, out of receipts amounting to $100 or $120, the postmaster receives only $20 or $25, or only one-fourth of the receipts as salary. I repeat that there should be a readjustment of the whole system by which country postmasters are paid. I am sure the Postmaster General, who has recently been installed in his position, feels the necessity of some change being made in the system and of allowing them something more than they at present receive. I know a postmaster at an office which has been in existence over 25 years—and he is an excellent man, who has discharged his duties faithfully, and who keeps the post office open during regular hours, and sometimes at night—who receives $36 a year for the whole service. That post office is in a very important central district, and serves a part of two counties. I was talking to the postmaster recently, and he said he had a very strong inclination to give up the position. There are undoubtedly great complaints respecting the miserable allowance given to country and village postmasters, compared with the ample salaries paid to similar officials in cities. There should be some change made in regard to this matter, and I deemed it to be my duty to bring it before the House.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I desire to ask the Postmaster General whether any appointment to the position of assistant postmaster at Kingston has been made. I think the hon. gentleman will remember that a little over a year ago the assistant postmaster suddenly left that city. I would like to know whether any man has been apppointed in his place, and if so, who is he?

Mr. HAGGART. I cannot tell at present. There has been no appointment since I took charge of the office.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I called the attention of the Postmaster General to this because, if he will turn up his report, he will find that in Kingston and in post offices in the neighborhood some twenty-six letters containing money were mislaid or taken from the post offices, and the probability is that the greater portion of those were mislaid at Kingston or abstracted from the post office there. It will be remembered that the attention of the House was called, last Session, to the fact that the assistant postmaster of Kingston was a man named William Shannon, a brother of the postmaster, James Shannon, that irregularities had existed for a long time at that office, and, ultimately, the assistant postmaster was discovered in the act of purloining letters with money in them. It was represented to us then that those letters contained only a few postage stamps and a few cents of money, but, on looking over the matter carefully, I find that in Kingston, and the adjacent post offices, somewhere in the neighborhood of $300 was supposed to have been lost. I complain that when the assistant postmaster was discovered stealing the letters, that the inspector so far neglected his duty as to allow this man Shannon to escape without being arrested. I am informed that he not only remained in Kingston a few days, but that, after going away, he was permitted to come back to the city of Kingston for a day or two, and there was no arrest made. That is very different from the manner in which the Government treated other assistant postmasters. I suppose the Postmaster General will remember that when an assistant postmaster in St. Thomas was found guilty, some years ago, of taking letters, he was not permitted to escape, but he was arrested and tried summarily before the police judge, and condemned to penitentiary for five years. I desire to press on the Postmaster General that if the assistant postmaster at Kingston was permitted to leave the country without being punished for his crime, it is hard on the former assistant postmaster at St. Thomas, who has been in the penitentiary for nearly four years, that the Minister of Justice should refuse a remission of one year on his sentence, in answer to petitions sent in here requesting that the term of his sentence should be commuted. I believe it is right that this man should be punished, but if he has to serve in the penitentiary for five years for stealing four letters, the man Shannon, at Kingston, who, from the return brought down by the Postmaster General, appears to have been implicated in the theft of twenty-six or thirty letters containing $300, should not be allowed to escape. When this matter came before the House last year it was very unstisfactorily treated by the First Minister and by the Postmaster General of the day. I now again call the attention of the House to the fact that while—as the member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has said—the Government have treated postmasters in certain places in one way, they have treated other post office officials in other places in another way. If Mr. Shannon was allowed to escape,through the connivance of the inspector and a desire on the part of the Government to treat him leniently on account of his brother being postmaster and having served a useful purpose to the Conservative party in years gone by, it is very unfair that this young man should be incarcerated in Kingston for the full term of his sentence. It may be said that this young man ought to have been committed for 15 or 20 years, but if so, why was Shannon allowed to go scot-free. We should treat all our officials in the same way and under the same circumstances .I think it is a hardship that this young man to whom I refer, should be compelled to serve out the full term of his sentence. I do hope that the Government will see the justice of this case and deal more leniently towards that young man.

Mr. HAGGART. Most gentlemen in the House will remember that the Kingston matter was thoroughly threshed out here last Session. I am of the opinion of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, that I do not know any reason why that assistant postmaster should have escaped the punishment that was meted out to the other party I think for the crimes which the hon. gentleman says he has been guilty of, if caught, he ought to receive the same punishment as the other one.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I see that a notice is put out that all the mails for England are henceforth to be forwarded by New York. Is that owing to a determination arrived at by the Government not to send any more mails by Montreal or Halifax ?

Mr. HAGGART. No. The contract with the Allan Company was supposed to have expired on April 12th. A notice was given to the company itself and to the different postmasters that, in default of the Allan Company taking the mails, they should be sent by New York. The Allan Company contend that the contract extends until the arrangements are made for carrying the mails by the fast line of steamers. That arrangement is not yet completed, but I think there is no doubt that an arrangement will be made by the Allan Company to carry the mails as usual.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I understand that the Allan Company do not refuse to carry the mails ?

Mr. HAGGART. Oh, no.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Under these circumstances, was it necessary to advertise that all the mails should go by New York, if the Allan Company were willing to continue to carry them until a new arrangement should be made with the Government ?

Mr. HAGGART. It was only in the event of their refusal that the mails should be carried by New York.

Mr. EDGAR. I would like to ask the Postmaster General whether he is going to take any action in reference to the post office at Pickering, in my riding. Some years ago, an enquiry was made by the inspector, at the instance of the Government, into the conduct of the present postmaster, when he was the deputy postmaster, and I understand that the inspector made a report unfavorable to him. Strange to say, in the face of that report, he was appointed to fill the vacancy of postmaster when it occurred a short time afterwards, and, as was to be expected, the people there have ever since been finding fault with his appointment and his conduct. The Postmaster General will say whether I am right or not, when I say that a petition has lately been forwarded to him, setting forth very good grounds for the dismissal of this postmaster. It is a matter that the people of that locality, irrespective of party, are very anxious about.

Mr. HAGGART. It was only a few days ago, that I got a letter from the hon. gentleman, stating the facts which he has related to the House. My deputy stated that he had a report on the subject, but I ordered him to make enquiries and get a further report from the inspector. As soon as I get it, I intend to send it to the hon. gentleman. I have not yet had time to look into the matter. That was the first time my attention was drawn to it.

Mr. EDGAR. Am I not correct that a petition has been presented to the Postmaster General, setting forth grounds for his removal.

Mr. HAGGART. There was a petition, and I think it was forwarded to the inspector to report upon.

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to draw the attention of the Postmaster General to the point I mentioned a moment ago. For instance, in my riding in one post office the receipts were $150, and all that is paid to the postmaster is $27. That post office has been in existence for twenty-five years; it is in a very important locality, and serves a great many people. In the post office of Egerton the receipts are $161, and all the postmaster gets for his services is $24. There is a large section served by that post office, and it has been in existence over twenty-five years. The man in charge of it, a short time ago, told me that he had a good notion to give it up, as the amount of trouble he was put to was in excess of what he received. I do not know that I would have brought this matter up unless I saw other increases made which are unnecessary. It is absurd to pay a man in Toronto $4,000 a year, and to ask postmasters in country districts to perform their duties for practically nothing. At the Harriston post office the receipts are $3,189, and the postmaster, who is a most efficient officer, and a man of high standing in society, only gets $940, and I know he is in his office from 5 o'clock in the morning till 10 at night, and he has to keep one of his family there also. I contend that the pay that is given to country postmasters should, as a general rule, be increased, and the pay of city postmasters should be reduced. I notice also that the arrearages are increasing. Last year the amount in arrear in the hands of postmasters was $19,614.80, and this year it has run up to $21,795.29. I notice the names of some men who have been in arrears for several years. I would like to know why they are not called on to pay up, and whether any attempt is being made to compel them to pay up more promptly.

Mr. HAGGART. In reference to the first question, the salaries of postmasters are paid on a principle. They receive up to the first $800, 40 per cent, and on sums above that 20 per cent. The rent and fuel allowances and the allowances for forwarding are fixed by the inspector on a principle also. It may appear from the accounts the hon.

gentleman has named that those postmasters are not getting enough, but the rates were fixed a year and a-half ago, and if the receipts have increased, the comparison does not hold. The salaries of all the postmasters in the Dominion have been gone through, and are fixed on that principle. As to the salary of the postmaster in Toronto, we had that out some time ago, and the House passed its verdict upon it. As to the other question concerning arrears, a good many have been in the books for many years, and it has been found impossible sometimes to collect the amounts due. The postmasters were perhaps defaulters, had left no estate, and left the country. We are very particular now with the postmaster. The moment he is in default, he is brought up with short term, and if he does not make the amount good in a short time, he is dismissed.

Mr. TROW. I question very much the justness of the system adopted in the payment of postmasters. I can name one instance in the town of Waterloo, where the revenue is no criterion of the work done, for the simple reason that there are no less than five insurance companies, whose stamps are sent to the respective offices when the yearly or half yearly premiums are paid. The result is that about three-fourths of the postage rates of these insurance companies may not be purchased in the town they reside in. As a consequence, the revenue does not come to these particular offices, but comes from abroad with the letters.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think the system of paying postmasters should be changed, and the whole system recast. Some additional sum should be allowed those who are doing very desirable service. It is absurd to expect a man to keep a post office, and make a monthly return for $12 a year. In looking over the Auditor General's report, I see there are a number keeping post offices for as low as $12 and $10 a year. No one should be asked to keep a post office for less than $25 or $30 a year. The department does not pay running expenses. If that is the case, why should country postmasters be asked to discharge the duties of an office where the receipts are $100 for $25 or a little over? They must be the worst paid lot in the Post Office Department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How is it the Postmaster General proposes to reduce the Canadian Pacific Railway from $110,000 to $105,000 in Ontario? I notice that in the Supplementary Estimates for the present year a large increase is going to be asked for the Canadian Pacific Railway; but $22,000 of it are for Ontario. Are we to, understand that $105,000 will meet the expense under the head of mail service for the Canadian Pacific Railway for 1890, although the hon. gentleman finds it necessary to ask for $22,000 additional to the Estimates provided for the current year?

Mr. HAGGART. It is owing to an arrangement made with the late Postmaster General. They found that the car accommodation for the carrying of the mail was not nearly sufficient, and they got cars built with half additional accommodation, on the understanding that the rates would be increased in like proportion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then, I presume, this apparent decrease of $5,000 in the Supplementary Estimates for 1890 will disappear, and be replaced by a large increase?

Mr. HAGGART. By an increase of nearly $60,000 for the whole Dominion.

Mr. McMULLEN. Has a postmaster been appointed at Goderich yet?

Mr. HAGGART. Not as yet. An officer of the department is taking charge of the post office there. The late postmaster died only a short time ago.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I may take an opportunity of saying a word or two as regards the deficit on this service. For the last year the deficit is about $729,000. To that decrease, if you want to estimate the matter correctly, you are obliged to add the cost of the post office at headquarters, which, with contingencies, amounts to about $259,000. Of course, nobody can blame the present Postmaster General for that, and it is possible, looking at the enormous demands made on the post office from all sides, that the department is not to blame for it either, but the Postmaster General will see that, putting the expenses of the head office in connection with the deficit, we have an annual deficit of about $1,000,000 per year. The exact amount would be about $950,000, all told. I desire to enquire of the Postmaster General whether he has yet had time to consider the question, and whether he thinks there is any reasonable chance, of reducing that deficiency to any considerable extent in the ensuing year?

Mr. HAGGART. I had great difficulty in getting the Bill through the House for the purpose of increasing the rate on drop letters and registration. The increase I calculated to make from those two items would be in the neighborhood of $140,000. That is nearly eaten up by the extra amount we pay the Canadian Pacific Railway for carrying our mails. As long as newspapers and periodicals go free through the post, the reducing of the deficit is a good way off.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I would just state one means of saving which the hon. Minister might put into effect. It is to be regretted that the Government are not more careful in the manner in which they advertise in the newspapers. I hold a newspaper printed in Yarmouth, N.S.—you can see the size of it—which is full of advertisements asking for mail contracts. Just fancy six Government "ads" in this little paper. It is printed in Yarmouth on Monday evening, and has no circulation out of that town at all, probably not more than 50 or 100 copies are printed. It is printed in connection with the Times, in the same place, and no doubt is published just to get the Government patronage. This little newspaper alone has got no less than $259 worth of "ads" of the Government. That is just so much money thrown away. There are no other "ads" in this paper. If the Postmaster General wants to have good postmasters, and give more salary, he might be more economic in the expenditure of money in "ads." $44,520 were expended last year for advertising in newspapers in the Dominion. I believe that newspapers should be encouraged, being an old newspaper man myself, but I do not like to see the public money squandered as it has been squandered by this Government in simply giving pap to newspapers which support the Government. I think this useless expenditure could be cut off, and this is only one sample of the profligacy of the Government in regard to advertising in newspapers.

Mr. HAGGART. The attention of the Government has been drawn to that matter, and it has been stopped altogether. I have never given an order for advertising in any newspaper. Of course there are papers on the official list which are entitled to advertisements, and they receive them.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. How is the official list made up? Is it made up of newspapers which have the largest circulation, or is it made up exclusively of newspapers which support the Government, because this advertising should be given out on business principles.

Mr. HAGGART. I suppose that is the ground upon which they are selected.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. What: the fact that they support the Government?

Mr. HAGGART. No; on business principles.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The Auditor General's Report shows that no Reform newspapers get any of this pap. I should be sorry if I understand the hon. gentleman to say that advertising in the newspapers is to be stopped altogether.

Mr. HAGGART. I did not say that; but orders have been given that no more advertisements shall appear in that paper.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. There is another little paper published in Ottawa, the Ottawa Investigator.

Mr. HAGGART. That is also shut off.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. That paper received $228.45 last year, and you can see the size of the Investigator by the copy which I hold in my hand. That paper was published——

An hon. MEMBER. Once a month.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. No; not once a month, but once a year. It used to be brought out at the commencement of every Session of Parliament. One year it have the portrait of the Secretary of State and the history of his life, and I believe the last one had the portrait and the life of the Minister of Inland Revenue.

An hon. MEMBER. And that killed it.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Yes, perhaps that killed the paper and the man too, for he disappeared from Ottawa altogether very shortly afterwards. However, the Government paid $228 for that portrait and that paper. I am glad to hear that the Minister has put his foot down on that, but I do not think he should stop advertising altogether, because judicious advertising is essential for the Post Office Department, as it is in business matters.

Mr. McMULLEN. There is a question in reference to the Halifax Herald and the Halifax Mail. These two papers are published in the same office, and I understand the Herald is the morning edition and the Mail the evening edition. They are practically the same newspaper, but last year they received together $10,431. I should like to know if the Postmaster General has cancelled the advertisements in these newspapers, as he states he has in the paper referred to by my hon. friend.

Mr. HAGGART. I have not heard anything about those newspapers.

Mr. McMULLEN. I observe that the Liberal paper in Halifax got $2.20 last year.

An hon. MEMBER. That was two dollars too much.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The Postmaster General tells us that the salary of the country postmasters is regulated on principle. I think the country postmasters are aware of the principle, and I do not think they will all endorse that principle or that I will endorse it. There is no doubt that exceptions often prove the rule. We find postmasters in the cities and large towns whose time is taken up by their work and who receive very large salaries. No doubt they are doing very good work, but, in the country places, the postmaster or some of his family have to remain in the post office during the day. Their time is taken up, and they are paid on principle. I fancy that the postmasters will not get very rich on this principle, because, in many places, although the offices are required for the convenience of the people, they receive very little salary. In sixteen offices in the county which I represent, in the rural portions of the riding, the officers receive altogether $355.50 a year, or an average salary of $22.21 a year; and yet the Postmaster General will state that these postmasters are paid on principle. It is a peculiar principle which will give $4,000 a year to the postmaster in Toronto, and in a country place will give the postmaster only $22 a year. I think that, at all events, there ought to be a leveling up to some extent. That principle is carried out with a vengeance, and I think there might be a change and that, where the revenues are small but the offices have to be maintained in the interests of the public, a larger allowance should be given to the postmasters. I think the Postmaster General, who has shown such a great desire to promote the interests of the people over whom he presides, will, on consideration, see the reasonableness of what I say.

Mr. STEVENSON. Carried.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It is not carried yet, but I believe my hon. friend would vote for this improvement if it was not directed against the Government, but he does not like to do that as long as he has some locks to be built in his county. I think the Postmaster General should consider this matter. I am not bringing it up to embarrass him or to assist any of my friends. The Liberal party do not care for office. They are desirous only of the good of the country, and, as long as the good of the country is obtained, we do not care who governs it. We do not seek power because we love power. We are satisfied if justice is done to all classes of the community. The Postmaster General came into this House at the same time that I did myself, and I should like to see one of the men of 1872 do justice to the people who are under his care, instead of increasing the salaries of those who are now overpaid for the work they do. I do not know on what ground he can justify the increase he has asked for. I hope the Postmaster General will stamp himself as being one of those who desires to do what is right to those who are underpaid now, whom he must admit are underpaid, and whom everybody understands well are underpaid. It would be well for him to curb the expense—I won't say extravagance; I do not suppose there is any extravagance since he came into the office. I believe he unloads all the extravagances on his predecessor. That is a good way to do it, and it may be correct enough, but his predecessor managed the affairs of the office very well. He ran the office as a party machine, to some extent. I remember there was a post office established in my riding, and the salary of the postmaster was to be $10; the Minister would not name the postmaster on my recommendation until he saw what the party wanted in the matter. He did not like even $10 to go out of the party. It was going to be ruin and starvation to somebody if $10 went out of the party. The member that was elected by the people to speak for the people, was not to be consulted, but the party was to be consulted lest $10 should go out of the party.

Mr. McMULLEN. I want an answer from the Minister with regard to the Halifax Herald. I also see that the Moncton Times got $10,973 for printing; the St. John Sun got $14,000, and altogether these and the other papers have drawn from the Post Office Department about $35,000 last year.

Mr. HAGGART. How much from the Post Office Department?

Mr. McMULLEN. It does not say what the printing is for, but they got that amount of money.

Mr. KIRK. I notice, as far as Nova Scotia is concerned, that a great deal of complaint is made with regard to the small allowances to country postmasters. In some instances it is almost impossible to get a man to keep the post office in Nova Scotia because the salary is so small. In my county there is a post office that has been vacant for the last four or five years, because the salary was so small that no one could be got to take the office. Some one has said that the salaries should not be regulated according to the amount of revenue derived from the office. I agree with that opinion. The salary should be regulated according to the special circumstances of the case. There was a case in my own county where the postmaster receives but $20 a year.

Besides serving the public of the settlement from the office, he has to receive and despatch mail bags every night, and sometimes in the winter season and in stormy weather, he has to remain up until three or four o'clock in the morning until the mail arrives.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Why does he not resign?

Mr. KIRK. I am coming to that. It is only two or three years since the present postmaster was appointed. The former Postmaster General has put in the Auditor General's Report $160 for arrears for keeping that office. The incumbent notified the Government that he would not keep the office for the money that he was receiving; he gave notice a number of years before he finally abandoned the office. But he kept on performing the work and discharging the duties of the office for a number of years, retaining the amount that the Dominion gave as his salary, and when the Government finally took the office from him he refused to pay back anything. There was, I believe, $100 or $160 due the Government, which he refused to pay, simply because he considered that he was entitled to the money, because he had notified the Government years before that unless they paid him so much, he would not keep the office. But finally the office was taken away and another man was appointed, I think, with an addition of $5 a year to his salary. But the new man lives a considerable distance from the road, and the courrier instead of taking the bag into the offices, pitches it down alongside the road as he passes, and lets it lie there until the postmaster thinks proper to send for it; and sometimes it remains there all night. Then the postmaster, on his part, hangs the bag on a stake for the courrier to pick up when he passes along. This is the way the work is done now, and the people have to travel some distance from the road in order to get their mail. The place I refer to is the office at South End Lochaber, in the County of Guysborough. In this case I think the Postmaster General should increase the salary to enable the postmaster to attend to his duties properly. $40 a year would not be sufficient for the work he has to do.

Mr. HAGGART. In answer to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who accused the Postmaster General of making large payments to the Morning Herald of Halifax, and to the paper published in Moncton, let me inform the hon. gentleman that if he looks at the accounts, he will find that the whole amount the Post Office Department paid to the Halifax Morning Herald consisted of two sums, $9.80 and $22.40. The Halifax Evening Mail got $21.20.

Mr. McMULLEN. I challenge the hon. gentleman to turn up the Auditor General's Report, for he will find that the papers got the amount I have mentioned for printing. They may not have got it from the Post Office Department, but they got it from other departments.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I would like to point out another way by which economy could be effected. I see that the Government, as a whole, including, of course, the Post Office Department, paid $597 for Ottawa Citizens last year. Now, while we are discussing this question of economy, and a good many members of the Government are here, perhaps they would answer for their respective departments what they do with so many Ottawa Citizens. I do not remember the price of the Citizen, but I think it is not more than $4 a year. That would give 149 copies of the Daily Citizen delivered to the Government every day in the year. I should like to know what they do with them. Does every clerk and messenger around the buildings enter his name for the Morning Citizen and have it charged to the Government? And we have the same occurring with respect to other papers throughout the country. For the Brantford Courier, a newspaper not known outside of Brantford, the Government subscribes $150 a year. The subscription price is $3. For the Halifax Herald $239 is subscribed.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the hon. gentleman must have been out of the House when the discussion took place about this newspaper business, as we were going over the items of civil government. The discussion was carried on with a good deal of vigor for some time, and I took occasion to make a statement to the House which, no doubt, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) will remember, that we had looked carefully into the matter and had come to the conclusion that too much was expended on newspapers; that the whole matter had been revised, and I hoped when the accounts came down next year the House would see a very great reduction has been made. That statement appeared to be accepted by the House, and I do not think we should waste any more time over the matter.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I was not aware that the matter had been discussed, and I am glad to know that the Finance Minister is going to economise in that direction.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Some years ago, a petition was presented to the department, praying for the opening of a post office at Corinth, and in reply, the Postmaster General wrote me a letter, stating that an office would be established there. That occurred three or four years ago, and to this day an office has not been established. I asked in the following Session why the delay had taken place, and why the office had not been established, but I obtained no satisfactory answer. I am frequently asked by the people of that section when the promise made by the Postmaster General in the letter which he sent to me, and which I caused to be published in the newspapers of the day, would be carried out. The honor of the Crown is pledged to the opening of that office, and we desire to know whether the Postmaster General is going to redeem the honor of the Crown, or allow it to be trailed in the mire. I state now that the office is required at a place called Corinth, in the township of Bentinck, that it would be 2½ miles from any office now established, that it would serve a large number of people in the place, which contains a store, a schoolhouse and a church, and it is very much required by the people living there. I believe it would not entail much expense, because a mail goes within 2½ miles of the place now, and it would be a great convenience to the people. I hope the Postmaster General, now that I have brought the matter to his attention, will look into the petition presented and have the office established without delay. It would be doing himself credit to maintain the honor of Her Majesty. Sometimes we hear the Tories boast of their loyalty and speak of the love and reverence they have for the Crown, and the word of the Crown, as expressed by an officer of the Crown, a member of the Dominion Government, should not be allowed to appear before the people as being of no avail in this country. It is the duty of the Government to see that such a state of things does not prevail. It might be possible the Government thought at that time that if they postponed establishing the office until after the elections, they might be able to appoint one of their own friends as postmaster, at a salary of say $10. No doubt they wanted to keep the money in the party's pocket even at the inconvenience of the people there. I hope the Postmaster General in the interest of the people of that section and of the people he is elected to serve, and whom I think he is willing to serve, will open the post office in question, as it will be a great convenience to the locality.

Mr. HAGGART. I have hardly got the names of the post offices at present established, and I forget the names of those proposed to be established. I will, however, look into the matter at the department, and if the petition is well recommended, if there is a suitable place, and if a suitable person can be obtained as postmaster, I shall endeavor to comply with it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would suggest to the Postmaster General that he pick up these names a little more quickly, and then I will consider him a suitable Postmaster General; but if he fails to do that, and to open this post office, then I think we shall have a change at the top.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). What is the cause of the decrease in the item for New Brunswick?

Mr. HAGGART. The decrease is in steamboats and sailing craft. There is a transfer of some of the service, which previously appeared under the head of post offices, to mail subsidies. Under the new Bill the Postmaster General takes to himself power to pay for actual work done, and not for work done in the form of subsidy.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). There is a vote for an assistant inspector. Has one been appointed?

Mr. HAGGART. Not yet.

Mr. ELLIS. Has the hon. gentleman had under consideration the granting of a gratuity to the family of John Campbell, post office clerk on the New Brunswick division, who was killed while in the discharge of his duty?

Mr. HAGGART. He was burned on the car in the discharge of his duty. No claim has been put in to the department for a gratuity.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). He was burnt to death while discharging his duty on the Maine Central Railway. He has left a family, and they should receive some gratuity. He was a long time in the service, and he was discharging his duty when he met with his death.

Mr. HAGGART. There is a rule, that a couple of months salary is given to the nearest relative. No claim has yet been received by the department.

Mr. KIRK. I should like to ask the Postmaster General whether the appointment recommended by me of a postmaster at Oyster Point has been made. The recommendation was made early in the Session. I made an enquiry across the floor of the House, and the Postmaster General said the matter had been referred to the Post Office Inspector at Halifax, which I thought a rather singular proceeding.

Mr. HAGGART. I think the matter was referred to the Post Office Inspector at Halifax to report upon. If he has reported, his report has not been brought to my attention. I will look into the matter.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I desire to call attention to the carriage of the mails in Prince Edward Island in the autumn. Last year when navigation closed, and the steamboat was put on between Pictou and Georgetown, there were no means of carrying the mails across the straits to Charlottetown. A memorial was sent to the hon. gentleman from the Board of Trade and other residents of the town asking for a special train, and the hon. gentleman put it on late in the season. I want to ask him so as to make sure whether there will be any trouble in this train running next year as soon as navigation closes, for there is an absolute necessity for a train at that time more than at any other time in the year.

Mr. HAGGART. I know there was a difficulty at the beginning of the season last year. The delay arose from my trying to make the best arrangements I possibly could with the railway department. I had to come to their terms, and as soon as I saw that I could not do better I put on the train. I will take care that no trouble occurs again.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I want to know what is the cause of this reduction in the British Columbia expenses of nearly $14,000. Am I to understand that that is a permanent reduction, or that it is due to some temporary arrangement, and that we will have it all back again in the supplementary estimates?

Mr. HAGGART. It is part of the transfer of the subsidies that are paid to the different steamers. They are charged to a different account. I think, however, that the subsidies are reduced.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I wish to call the attention of the Minister to the salaries of officials in British Columbia and Manitoba. I see that in Manitoba and British Columbia there is put opposite the name of each official a certain sum for provisional allowance. This may have been necessary years ago, but I do not understand that it is necessary now to make a special allowance on account of the extra cost of living, on which ground it was originally granted to the officials in these two Provinces. I understood from the Minister of Inland Revenue to-day that so far as his officials are concerned, he has put them on the same footing as the officers in the other Provinces. I wish to ask the Postmaster General how he justifies the continuance of the extra allowance to post office officials in these two Provinces?

Mr. HAGGART. The provisional allowance to all the employés of the post office in these Provinces is at a rate of 20 per cent. on their salaries, and I found that to be the practice when I came into office. It is the intention of the Government to reduce it, but the post office employés, I think, as a rule, do not receive the same salaries as the other officials, and it is pretty hard to make a reduction.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have no doubt it is pretty hard to make a reduction, but I want to see the same principle applied to the officials in all the Provinces alike. It seems to me that if in small towns in these two Provinces extra salaries are paid, the salaries of the officials in other Provinces should be raised up to that standard, or the others should be reduced. The reason for granting this additional allowance in Manitoba and British Columbia seems to have ceased since the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. They can live as cheaply there as they can anywhere else.

Mr. HAGGART. I have made a careful enquiry into that and find it is impossible for the officials to live in Manitoba and British Columbia at the same rate as in the eastern Provinces. In most of these places, notably in the post office at Victoria, I have cut down this extra allowance and any person who gets promotion I make it a sine qua non that the provisional allowance shall cease. I have greatly reduced this allowance and I hope in another year to get rid of it altogether.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I understood from the Minister of Inland Revenue that he cut off this extra allowance from the officers in his department. I do not see why the officers of the Post Office Department should be treated differently from those in the Inland Revenue.

Mr. PRIOR. I am sorry to hear the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), state that living is as cheap on the Pacific coast as it is in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island, because I can positively state that I know it is not. Time and time again the members for British Columbia have pointed out in this House that living is much higher in British Columbia than it is in the eastern Provinces, and I know that the hon. gentlemen at the head of the different departments have these statements corroborated by the reports that have been sent to them from our Province. Any person who has studied the matter at all knows perfectly well that living is a great deal more expensive on the Pacific coast than it is on the eastern side of the continent. I am glad to have heard the Postmaster General make the statement that he thought he was only doing right in giving a provisional allowance to the officials in British Columbia, for I know that these men could not possibly live on their salaries unless they get this allowance. I do not suppose that the member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) wishes employés of the Government to work for less than a fair remuneration. At present the employés in British Columbia only get enough to live upon, and in fact I do not think you could get men to work there at all unless you gave this provisional allowance.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The officials in the eastern Provinces are complaining of the smallness of their salaries too. I do not know where the hon. gentleman gets his information that living is more expensive out there than it is in the Maritime Provinces, but perhaps the officials live in a more swell style there. I know officials of the post office in the the Province from which I come who have hard work to make both ends meet, their salaries are so small. I do not see any reason why a special allowance should be made to the officials in Manitoba and I believe we should have the same rule all over the Dominion. If it is necessary to give large salaries out there let the Government give the same salaries to officials in the other Provinces as well. I believe that years ago when the cost of living was high in Manitoba and British Columbia there was a reason for this, but now they have communication in Manitoba and British Columbia by the Canadian Pacific Railway and in the latter Province with the States of the American Union to the south. There is no difficulty in getting in supplies. I have yet to learn that the cost of living is so much greater in Manitoba than it is in the other Provinces.

Mr. PRIOR. That may be, but the fact remains that all wages and salaries are far higher on the Pacific coast than they are here. Take for instance the wages of laboring men out there. I know that in the town of Victoria bricklayers get $6 a day, and you cannot get them for love or money to work for less. It is not only so in the town of Victoria, but in the adjacent towns in the States, which are booming, they can get an equally high rate of wages. The same rule applies to almost every trade, and the whole scale of wages is higher on the Pacific coast. Men who have lived in British Columbia and have lived down here all agree that expenses are greater on the Pacific coast than they are in this part of the Dominion.

Mr. McDOWALL. I can endorse what the member for Victoria said with regard to the cost of living in the North-West and also in British Columbia; and I can state positively that it is much more expensive there than it is in the eastern Provinces. I have practical experience of living down here and also in the North-West, and I can state this from experience. I know that the post office officials in the North-West have a hard time to make both ends meet on the salaries they receive, for everything they use is more expensive. In some places they have no gas, and they have to buy coal oil which is more expensive.

An hon. MEMBER. There is plenty of gas down here.

Mr. KIRK. What do they pay for coal oil there?

Mr. McDOWALL. Ninety cents a gallon. Everything is much more expensive up there, and when you come to consider the cost of freight it is not to be wondered at. The salaries of the officials may appear high to hon. gentlemen down here, but in the North-West they find they have hard work to live on them.

Mr. LISTER. I think it is unnecessary for hon. gentlemen to allege that the salaries of officials in Manitoba, British Columbia and the North-West should be greater than in any of the other Provinces in this Dominion. In the North-West they raise wheat and export it, they raise beef and export it, and I venture to say that in the towns and villages of the North-West you can get board as cheap as in the eastern Provinces. If all those officials out there were to resign to-morrow the Postmaster General would have not the least difficulty in filling up their positions.

Mr. PRIOR. We would not want that class of men.

Mr. LISTER. I am very glad to hear the Postmaster General say that this matter is to receive his consideration, and before this House meets again, I hope the proper reductions will be made.

Dominion Lands..... $185,748 25

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is one of those items which ought to have the serious consideration of the House. When we come to put together the sum for Dominion lands chargeable to capital, the sum chargeable to income and the amount charged to civil government in connection with their administration, we find that we are paying about $420,000 a year, while the total annual receipts from all sources amount to something under $220,000. Now, when we remember what was promised to this House, when we remember how continually hon. gentlemen opposite were in the habit of asserting that we would receive, not a sum equal to our own expenses, but a sum that would leave us with a net profit of $58,000,000 or $70,000,000 by 1890 or 1891, we have a very good right to complain of the fact that we are called upon to spend about $420,000 a year while our total receipts barely amount to $200,000. I must say that a large number of these offices appear to be made merely to provide employment for persons whom, for various reasons, it is not convenient to appoint here. The great mass of this money must necessarily be wasted; and these votes are about as loud a condemnation of the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite as could be made. Over and over again the predecessors of the Finance Minister, over and over again the First Minister himself, have declared from one end of this country to the other, that they were going to defray the whole expense of the Canadian Pacific Railway out of the moneys to be received from the administration of these lands; and yet we find that out of all the enormous resources of the North-West, we cannot scrape together enough to pay one-half of the annual expenses of management.

Mr. McMULLEN. Before this item is carried I would again call attention to the enormous expense connected with the North-West. I see that the Land Board at Winnipeg cost over $30,000 last year. I hold that that board is quite unnecessary. Last year the revenue of the Department of the Interior from all sources was $217,083, and the expenditure in Winnipeg and west of Winnipeg was $149,646, leaving a balance that came to Ottawa of $67,437. The expenses at Ottawa were $100,387. Taking the $67,439 from that, we find that it leaves a net loss in the management of North-West lands, ranches, mines, minerals and everything else, of $32,950. Now, it is absurd to say that it is necessary that we should have the enormous number of officials we have in the North-West. I notice among the items of last year a salary of $3,500 to Rufus Stevenson as Inspector of Colonisation Companies; then we have seven or eight homestead inspectors; we have a man named Mr. Smith who gets $5,000 a year as chief land commissioner in the city of Winnipeg; and we have a large number of other officials who are drawing large salaries and virtually doing nothing. We have five or six registrars and an inspector of registry offices, all drawing large salaries, and the entire receipts for registrations last year were only about $7,000. Any person who has gone through the North-West and knows anything about it must come to the conclusion that its affairs are most extravagantly managed. When we put together the items of management of the North-West in connection with the Department of the Interior, the feeding of the Indians, and the Mounted Police, we find that we are spending an enormous amount of money annually in place of having the large amount of revenue that was promised us by the First Minister and the different Finance Ministers. We were to receive, in 1889 according to one $53,000,000, another $70,000,000, another $59,000,000; but all these millions have dwindled away, and in place of getting any returns, we are virtually about $33,000 short of paying the annual expenses. I say this condition of things is absurd, and there is no department to which the pruning knife should be applied more vigorously than the Department of the Interior. It is high time that a thorough and vigorous criticism of these expenditures should be gone into; and we should insist on the Government removing from office a whole host of these unnecessary officials.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I perfectly agree with both the hon. gentlemen who have just spoken, that the expectations with regard to our sales of lands have not been realised; but they must recollect that although we have not sold as large a quantity of land as we expected to do, we have given to railways a great many million acres, and although we are not selling the lands, the railways are selling them, and we have the railways for the lands. At the commencement of this Session this question came up on the estimates for civil government. Hon. gentlemen are aware that I am not so well acquainted with the Department of the Interior as I am with the Indian Department, with which I was more particularly connected. But I have prepared, with the aid of my officers, a memorandum in reference to the business of the North-West, and if hon. gentleman will bear with me for a short time, I think I shall be able to convince them before I get through that the expenditure is not excessive compared with the work we have to attend to. Certainly, as far as I have been able to gather, the expenditure compares most favorably with the expenditure incurred by hon. gentlemen opposite when they had charge of the North-West. Hon. gentlemen must bear in mind that the sale of lands is not the entire business that the Department of the Interior has to look after. We have officials who must look after the general business of the country; inspectors have duties to perform which we could not get along without, and land agencies are scattered over that large territory. The hon. member for Bothwell, in the course of the discussion which took place when the civil government estimates were under discussion, compared the operations of the Department of the Interior with those of the Illinois Central Railway, and stated that the sales of lands by that railway were double the sales made by the Department of the Interior, while the expenses of administration in the case of the railway were not 10 per cent. of those of the department. I do not know where the hon. gentleman got his information respecting the Illinois Central Railway, but I submit that the comparison is in no respect a fair one. If the business of the Interior Department were now chiefly the sale of lands, as it was at the time the hon. gentleman was head of the department, there might be some reason in what he says, but I need scarcely state to this House that for the last six years, that is to say, from 1883 up to the present time, there have been but few sales of Dominion lands in the ordinary sense of the term, for all the odd-numbered sections within the Canadian Pacific Railway belt and within the territory traversed by the Manitoba South-Western Railway, the Manitoba North-Western Railway and the South-Western branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway have been reserved from ordinary sale, and have been granted either to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company as a part of its subsidy under the statute, or to one or other of the colonisation railways mentioned, in lieu of money assistance in aid of construction. The revenue of the department is therefore almost solely derived from timber dues and pre-emption payments. The hon. gentleman has also stated that the expenditure of the Department of the Interior, including the office at Winnipeg, was about $50,000, in 1877-78; and upon this presumption he bases the statement, first, that there had been a fourfold increase in the expenditure since that time, and, second, that there had been no corresponding increase in the public service to warrant this very large expenditure. Now, Sir, either the hon. gentleman was not careful to inform himself as to the facts or else he was laboring under a very serious misapprehension when he stated that the expenditure of the department over which he presided from 1876 to 1878 was only about $50,000, including the expenditure in the Winnipeg Branch; for on reference to the accounts I find that in 1876-77 the expenditure on Civil Government alone amounted to $36,409, and the expenditure under the head of what is now called Dominion Lands come, that is to say, the cost of the service of the Department in Manitoba was $35,604, or a total of over $72,000. In 1877-78 the expenditure under Civil Government had risen to $38,356, and the cost of the management of Dominion lands in Manitoba to $44,339, or a total of over $82,600; and in 1878-79, the last year mentioned by the hon. gentleman, and under estimates framed by him, the expenditure was $47,152 on Civil Government account, and $42,260 on account of management in Manitoba, being altogether $89,412. I should like the House and the hon. gentleman to clearly understand that these are figures extracted from the accounts and records of the department, and that although in the hon. gentleman's time the expenditure on surveys was not kept in a separate account, yet the cost of that work has since been calculated with great care and a good deal of labor, and the cost of the surveys has therefore been entirely left out of consideration in the statement of expenditure which I have just made. Now, so far as Civil Government is concerned, I beg to inform the hon. gentleman that since 1878 the expenditure has not quite doubled, and it is the cost of administration in Manitoba and the North-West alone that has increased in the proportion mentioned by the hon. gentleman. Now, if it were correct, as the hon. gentleman has stated, that there is no corresponding increase in the public service to warrant this difference, the matter would be one of more serious consequence. Let me remind him, however, that during the first year of his administration there were, in the whole country west of Lake Superior, just two land agencies in addition to the head office in Winnipeg, namely the agency at Emerson and that at Portage la Prairie, while during the last year of his administration there were but four agencies in the Province, the two already mentioned, one in the Pembina Mountain country and one in the Little Saskatchewan district; whereas, to-day, there are seventeen agencies, covering the whole country between the eastern boundary of the Province of Manitoba and the Pacific coast, within each of which there is a large area of surveyed land. It is quite true that from several of these agencies there has so far been comparatively little revenue, indeed the question of revenue from public lands has, for several years past, become a secondary consideration, and the convenience of the public, especially that portion of the public who, as actual settlers, are taking up homestead lands, has been the chief point aimed at by the Government. Now, Sir, contrast this condition of affairs with what we find to be the facts in relation to Manitoba during the period when my hon. friend from Bothwell was Minister of the Interior. There was then no distinction between even and odd sections, and nothing to prevent speculators from taking up lands in large blocks, at the nominal price of $1 per acre, without any condition whatever as to residence or improvement. It is true that then, as now, the law limited the area which could be purchased by one individual to 640 acres, but the hon. gentleman is well aware that means were found to overcome this provision of the law, and that large areas of land in the neighborhood of Winnipeg, in the Pembina Mountain country and in the Little Saskatchewan district were bought up by speculators, who hold them to the present day, to the serious detriment of settlement.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The lands in the neighborhood of Winnipeg were chiefly half-breed lands.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Not in the immediate vicinity of Winnipeg.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) The half-breed grants lay around Winnipeg.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The hon. gentleman has also ventured the statement that there is no such machinery in connection with the Department of the Interior at Washington as that in connection with the commissioner's office in Winnipeg. It is surprising to find the hon. gentleman so poorly informed on a matter of this consequence. It is within the knowledge of a great many of the members of this House, and it is the fact, that there is a land commissioner in connection with the Interior Department of the United States with exactly similar powers, and charged with exactly the same kind of duties, as the land commissioner at Winnipeg. The only difference is that the land commissioner in the United States has his office at Washington, while the land commissioner of the Department of the Interior has his office in Winnipeg. This difference, I imagine, most hon. members will be prepared to admit is, as regards every point, in favor of the system we pursue in Canada. I have no doubt that in the United States the same arrangement as is made here would prevail in respect of the location of the commissioner's office, were it not that the territory over which the Department of the Interior there exercises jurisdiction extends all the way from Florida, Louisiana, Texas and New Mexico on the south, to the 49th parallel on the north, and includes the States and Territories of Alabama, Arkansas, Arizona, California, Colorado, Dakota, Florida, Illinois, Idaho, Iowa, Indiana, Kansas, Louisiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, Ohio, Oregon, Utah, Washington, Wisconsin and Wyoming. Washington, therefore, is as central a position as could have been selected. As to how well the commissioner's office and the Department of the Interior at Washington fulfil the just expectations of the public, and the good opinion which the hon. gentleman seems to entertain of them, I refer him to the annual report of the commissioner of the General Land office for the year 1888, on page 7 of which he will find the statement that at the end of the fiscal year 1889, assuming the rate of progress which characterised that department in the previous year to be still maintained, there will remain at least 233,624 cases undisposed of among which were, at the date of the report, 45,375 final homestead entries awaiting examination, in which class of entries, as the commissioner states, the homesteader is required by law to show five years' residence on his homestead before he can submit his case to the commissioner's office or demand a patent for his land. "Hence," says the commissioner, "the delay suffered by this class of entrymen is the more grievous." The hon. gentleman and his friends behind him are entitled to all the credit which they may think is due to the management of the public lands of a country to which they are continually directing the eyes of this House and of the people of Canada. The hon. member for Bothwell has also submitted to the House a statement in which he professes to show how delays may occur in the settlement of cases submitted to the commissioner and decided by him when that decision is not accepted as final. It would be much more satisfactory if the hon. gentleman would state the cases in regard to which I understand him to complain. To his general affirmation of the possibility of delays under the system in force, I take pleasure in replying that the cases which he has conjured up have, to the best of my knowledge and belief, no foundation in fact. After paying the most careful attention to the affairs of the department during the months I have been in office, and having lived in the North-West for ten years among the people who are affected by the administration of the Department of the Interior, I am prepared to challenge comparison between the methods of doing business which are adopted in it, and the promptness with which it disposes of all cases, with the methods and promptness of any other department of the Government of this country and the United States, or of any commercial institution in this country of any considerable size. It is quite true as the hon. gentleman says, that when a settler is dissatisfied with the decision of the commissioner, he has the right to appeal and he does appeal to the Minister of the Interior. Surely, however, the hon. gentleman would not contend that because a citizen of this country has and exercises such a right as that, the Government and the department are wrong in placing facilities within the reach of the settlers for finally disposing of their cases without appeal to the Minister of the Interior. I tell the hon. gentleman that it would be out of his power, as it would be out of the power of any single human being, to himself dispose of every case of contest or conflict which arises in a country of the extent and containing the population now to be found within the boundaries of Manitoba and the North-West Territories. One would imagine from the way in which the hon. gentleman has spoken that there was no institution in his day corresponding with the office of the commissioner at the present day. The officer, it is true, was known by a different name, that is to say, he was known as the chief agent, but his duties were precisely the same, although necessarily on a very much smaller scale, and therefore involving very much less responsibility. This officer had a staff about him to assist him in the discharge of his duties very much larger in proportion to the volume of the business at that time, than the staff in the Commissioner's Office at the present day. I find that so far back as the 15th December, 1876, an Order in Council was passed at the instance of the hon. gentleman himself, providing that the report of the Department of Justice should be final in relation to all claims under the Manitoba Act, and in the course of the report making this recommendation the hon. gentleman pointed out that it was impossible for Ministers to devote the time necessary to investigate the masses of papers connected with the claims submitted. Now, I may mention to the House that the total number of such cases disposed of by the Department of the Interior during the two years during which the hon. gentleman was head of the department, as shown by the published reports of the department, was 176 in 1875, 330 in 1877 and 438 in 1878. As an evidence of the vigor with which my hon. friend and his colleagues dealt with these cases, I may say that out of 3,258 claims made to land by virtue of occupation at the time of the transfer, and on account of which patents have been issued, they disposed of but something like 1,200 cases during their whole term of office. Be it remembered, too, that these were cases about which there was little or no dispute, and that they left to their successors in office the pleasing duty of disposing of all those about which there was difficulty and doubt, and further that these difficulties and doubts were greatly multiplied on account of the long period of time which had elapsed between the taking over of the country and the date at which a final settlement was attempted. Not satisfied with an officer under the title of chief agent, in charge of the little strip of country which was then open for settlement, who had a salary of $2,400 a year, with an assistant, Mr. Whitcher, who had a salary of $2,000, and still another assistant, Mr. Belch, who had a salary of $1,500, they had the Chief Justice of the Province appointed as a Commissioner to inquire into disputed cases under the Manitoba Act, and I need scarcely say that he did not perform his duties for nothing, in fact, if I remember rightly, he was paid a salary of $1,000 a year for this particular service, in addition to his salary as chief justice. I had almost forgotten to say that during the last year my hon. friend was in office he appointed an agent at Prince Albert, but as in that year he had only commenced to make surveys, and as everyone knows, it takes considerable time after the surveys have actually been made before the land can be put in the market, it was a long time after his appointment before this gentleman did anything beyond drawing his pay. The hon. member for North Wellington has also, in the course of this discussion, compared the receipts on account of public lands and the expenditure in the same relation during the past year, stating that the cost of the Land Board at Winnipeg is $180,000, without contingencies. As an hon. gentleman who chooses to look at the figures can see for himself, the cost of what the hon. member for North Wellington calls the Land Board at Winnipeg really includes the cost of every one of the seventeen agencies of the department in Manitoba, the North-West Territories and British Columbia, the cost of extra clerks at the head office in Ottawa, and the cost of advertising, copying, &c. He says that to this sum must be added contingencies, and that they will be over $22,000. Where he gets his information on this point I am completely at a loss to comprehend, for the Estimates show specifically that travelling expenses, fuel, rent, stationery and printing, and every possible outlay which is usually classed under the head of contingencies, is included in the Estimate. The hon. gentleman also says that the revenue of the department for the year amounted to $217,083, saying that these figures are taken from page 48 of the Public Accounts. I called the hon. gentleman's attention at the time to the fact that this was exclusive of scrip, which the department is compelled to receive in payment of lands at its face value. This scrip consists partly of warrants issued to members of the military expedition to the Red River, partly of the consideration granted to half-breed heads of families, original white settlers and children of the half-breeds residing in the Province of Manitoba and the North-West Territories at the time of the transfer, and partly of compensation to volunteers who took part in the suppression of the rebellion in 1885. There is no reason why this scrip should not be classed as cash. It is a promise to pay on the part of the Dominion Government, and the only difference between a scrip note for ten dollars and a Dominion ten dollar bill is that the one is redeemable in gold and the other in land. I think that in all fairness the revenue derived from the public lands should be credited with payments made in scrip just as if they had been made in cash. The hon. member for North Wellington, at another stage of this discussion, went into an examination, item by item, of the outside service of the department, and he commenced by counting, as a portion of that expenditure, the salaries and expenses of registrars in the North-West Territories. Why that expenditure should be particularly charged against the Department of the Interior and the public lands, I cannot myself understand. The hon. member for Bothwell himself introduced a Bill into this House in 1878, providing for the registration of titles in the North-West Territories, under what is known as the Torrens' system. Subsequently the Minister of Justice in this Government not only introduced, but obtained the passage of such a measure. I have reason to believe that it was not the intention originally to put upon the officers of the Department of the Interior the additional labor of administering this law, but the obvious convenience of the arrangement finally decided the matter in this way. If, for instance, the Department of Justice had been charged with this duty, would the hon. gentleman have considered it a fair thing to charge the expenditure on account of registrars to the Department of the Interior? He might just as well charge the cost of administering justice in the North-West to the Department of the Interior. On this subject I may say, however, that while it could not be expected that a service of this sort, applied to an immense territory like the North-West, a proportion of which is sparsely populated, could at first be self-sustaining. The revenue for the first year during which the system was in operation, that is to say, during the year 1887, was within $2,400 of the expenditure; and although I have not been able to obtain the figures for 1888, I am informed by the responsible officers of the department that the revenue of about equal to the expenditure. It will be somewhat interesting to compare for a moment what I have already referred to as to the practice of the hon gentlemen opposite during that period when they had the opportunity is practising, and their preaching now that they are in opposition and irresponsible, with the practice of the present Government during the period they have been responsible for the management of the public lands of the North-West. Let us assume, to begin with, the basis on which hon. gentlemen themselves have challenged comparison, that is to say, the cash basis. And let us also assume that the hon. member for South Oxford is right in insisting that the expenditure for surveys should be charged against the receipts from the public lands, instead of being charged as at present to the capital account, and what do we find? That in the five years of their administration they spent for Civil Government, management of lands in the North-West, extra clerks at head office and surveys, $1,063,377, and received $93,005. In other words, that which they now call the legitimate cost of administration was at the rate of $1,143 for every $100 of revenue; whereas, during the ten years of the administration of the present Government since 1878, the total expenditure on account of Civil Government, management of lands in the North-West, extra clerks at the head office, and surveys, has been $5,060,188 and the total cash revenue $4,961,215, or about $100 of cash revenue for every $100 of expenditure. I submit, however, that the fairer plan would be to include in the receipts both cash and scrip, from which it appears that during the five years in which the Liberals managed the affairs of this country, the total expenditure for Civil Government, management of lands in the North-West, extra clerks at headquarters, and surveys, was, as stated, $1,063,377, against a revenue of $350,440 ($257,454 of which was scrip) or $303 of expenditure for every $100 of receipts; while during the 10 years covered by the administration of this Government, total expenditure, as already mentioned was $5,060,188, while the receipts were: being but $79 of expenditure for every $100 of receipts.

Cash	$4,961,215
Scrip	1,414,613
Or a total of	$6,375,828

Mr. LISTER. I call the attention of the House that the hon. gentleman is violating the rules. On our side I have seen hon. gentlemen stopped who were only attempting to read a few lines, as guilty of a violation of a rule of this House.

Mr. DEWDNEY. These are all statistics.

Mr. LISTER. No; they are not. The hon. gentleman is reading his speech for the newspapers.

Mr. DEWDNEY. No, I am comparing the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite with our own. It was not until I began to read a portion of this memorandum which was unfavorable to the former Government of hon. gentlemen opposite, that the hon. member for Lambton (Mr.

Lister) rose to stop me. However, if the hon. gentlemen do not wish me to go on, of course I will stop.

Mr. LISTER. I do not want to interfere with the hon. gentleman at all, but I want the rule to be applied to both sides of this House. If we are not permitted to read any portion of our speeches, I certainly object to any hon. gentleman on the other side reading the whole of his speech, particularly a Minister.

Mr. BOWELL. Go on with your speech.

Mr. DAWSON. It was a common thing some years ago for hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side to read their speeches.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Even according to this showing, hon. gentlemen opposite should be very chary of criticising on the ground of cost, the administration of the present Government in the North-West. But, Sir, this Government decided, at a very early stage in its history, and this House has approved of that decision, that the cost of survey is not a fair charge against the receipts from the public lands from year to year. Part of the agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the construction of the road which now unites every section of this wide country was that a grant should be made to them of 25,000,000 acres of land, and upon the completion of construction the company was entitled to a conveyance of so much of this land as was included within the 48-mile belt along the line of railway. In order to put the Government in a position to carry out this part of the contract, it was necessary that the land should be surveyed, and surveyed far in advance of the actual present requirements of settlement. Any one who chooses to look at the map published by the Department of the Interior on the 31st August, 1885, which I am informed was widely distributed among members of this House, will observe that all the lands within the railway belt and for a considerable distance on each side of that belt have already been sub-divided and set out for settlement. The same is true in regard to the lands along the North and South Saskatchewan, the Battle River, the Belly River, and, to some extent, the Red Deer River, and considerable sub-division work has also been done along the line of the highway leading from Edmonton to Calgary. This work has been done in a substantial and permanent way, a point upon which I can speak with some authority, because I have gone over the greater portion of that country and have seen the work for myself, and with my own past experience as a member of the surveying profession I claim to be able to come to fairly sound conclusions on a subject of this sort. Altogether there have been surveyed and set out for settlement 71,810,012 acres, or 438,564 farms of 160 acres each, capable of maintaining a purely agricultural population, on the basis of five souls to a homestead, of 2,192,820 persons. On examination of the statistics furnished by the annual report of the Department of the Interior, I find that of this area 4,792,292 acres, or about 30,000 farms of 160 acres each, had been set out for settlement by the Conservative Government previous to June, 1873, and that from 1874 to 1878, inclusive, only 5,861,993 acres, or 36,637 farms of 160 acres each, had been sub-divided all the rest of this work having been done by the Conservative Administration either prior to 1874 or after 1878. A map was prepared under instructions from the right hon. the First Minister, and exhibited in this House a few years ago, showing in one color—the very appropriate color of rouge—the survey work performed by hon. gentlemen opposite, while in another color—the equally appropriate one of blue—was shown the work of this kind done under the Conservative Administration. I would like very much to have a similar map now, to show the work that has been done respectively by the hon. gentlemen in the Liberal Government who have occupied this position at various times, and those belonging to a Conservative Government. I have thought it worth while to lay a copy of this map on the Table once more, so that hon. gentlemen may have the opportunity of seeing for themselves just what it shows. I may add that when the Conservatives returned to power in 1878, they found that the very little survey work performed during the days when they were in Opposition consisted almost wholly of the sub division of townships, the outlines of which had already been run, and that when settlement began to extend westward in 1879, and 1880, no outlines had been run and no sub-division work of any kind could well be performed until the lapse of two or three years, during which time the outline surveys necessary before sub-division can be performed had to proceed. For the 5,861,993 acres surveyed in the five years when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, $711,642 were paid, being at the rate of 12·14 cents per acre, while the average cost of all the surveys performed during the ten years of the present Government, has been 4½ cents per acre, or less than one-third. In this calculation, too, is included a very large amount of outline work, which hon. gentlemen understand perfectly well is the most expensive of all work, whereas in the cost of 12·14 cents per acre for the period of the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, the chief cost was in sub-division work.

Mr. BARRON. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the Minister has no right to read his speech.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I have a few more statistics here, and I would like to go through with them.

Mr. BARRON. I call attention to this rule:

"It is a rule in both Houses of Parliament that members must address the House orally and not read from a written previously-prepared speech; for the reason as stated by Mr. Fox in 1806, that 'if the practice of reading written speeches should prevail members might read speeches that were written by other people and the time of the House be taken up in considering the arguments of persons who were not deserving of their attention.' It is the invariable practice to discountenance all such written speeches, and it is the duty of the Speaker to interfere when his attention is directed to the fact. Members may, however, make use of notes in delivering a speech."

Mr. DAWSON. It is not a speech, but simply a statement of figures.

Mr. DEWDNEY. This memorandum contains only some information I have collected in the department. I had nothing to do with the department until recently, and I wish to give this statement because a very large number of hon. gentlemen must have been misinformed, if they took for gospel the statements made by some hon. gentlemen opposite at the commencement of the Session. They no doubt felt, as I felt, that the Administration of the North-West made a very bad showing; but since I have taken the trouble to look into the matter and have arranged this memorandum which I am anxious to give to the House, I have come to a different conclusion, and I believe hon. gentlemen when they study these statistics will come to the same conclusion, that we have done the best we could, that the affairs of the North-West have not been extravagantly managed, and that the money we come down and ask to-day is not an extravagant sum. However, Sir, I take the ground, and take it strongly, that in view of the fact that so much sub division work has been done, in a permanent manner, in advance of the needs of settlement in many cases, and that all the country which is likely to be required for settlement for many years to come has been outlined, so that at any time a surveyor can go into any part of the North-West and make a sub-division for the purposes of settlement on three months' notice, it is only fair and reasonable that this large cost should be charged to capital account, and that figures professing to show the cost of administration should not include the cost of survey. As already explained, the cost of survey from the very commencement has been carefully extracted from the books and accounts of the Department of the Interior, and we now know definitely what the cost of administration of the public lands in the North-West has been, year by year, since the date of the acquisition of the country, apart altogether from the cost of survey. For the five years of Liberal Administration the cost of Civil Government at Ottawa was $204,470, and the total revenue including cash and scrip, was $350,440, in other words the cost of Civil Government alone was 58 per cent. of the total receipts. During the 10 years of Conservative Administration since 1878, the cost of Civil Government at Ottawa has been $756,778, and the total revenue $6,375,828, or, in other words, the cost of Civil Government has been but 11 per cent. of the gross revenue. For the corresponding periods of five and ten years, the cost of management in the North-West, and extra clerks at headquarters has been $147,264, and $1,295,291, against total revenues of $350,440 and $6,375,828 respectively, that is to say, during the period of five years for which hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible, the cost of management which is now charged to Dominion lands income, was 42 per cent. of the revenue, while for the ten years of Conservative rule it has been but 20 per cent. of the revenue. Adding together the cost of Civil Government, and management in Manitoba and the North-West, the total expenditure during the five years of Liberal Administration was $351,735, against a total revenue of $350,440, or 100 per cent. of the revenue, whereas during the ten years of Conservative Administration the cost of Civil Government and management in Manitoba and the North-West has been $2,052,070 against a total revenue of $6,375,828, that is to say, instead of swallowing up the whole revenue it has been but 32 per cent. of it. If you are very anxious to have this matter regarded from a purely cash basis, hon. gentlemen opposite may find some consolation in the information that during their five years in office the cost of Civil Government at Ottawa, which has already been stated to be $204,470, was 219 per cent. of the cash revenue, which was $93,005; while for the ten years of Conservative Administration the cost of Civil Government at Ottawa has been only 15 per cent. of the cash revenue. Just mark the difference, Sir, for every $100 which they drew from North-West lands in actual cash, they spent on Civil Government alone $219 in actual cash; while this Government, for every $100 of cash revenue, has spent in cash—$219? No, Sir, not even $19, without the $200; only $15. Then let us take the cost of management in Manitoba, and let us compare the figures in that respect, on the cash basis. During their period in office, as already stated, they drew a cash revenue from the North-West of $93,005, and they spent upon their outside service and extra clerk at headquarters $147,264, or 158 per cent. of their revenue, while the Conservative Administration has during the past ten years expended on the same service only $26 for every $100 received in actual cash. This discrepancy between income and expenditure calculated on the cash basis is not quite so great in this case as it is in regard to Civil Government; but the difference between 158 per cent. and 26 per cent. is considerable, in fact six times 26 is 156, as any schoolboy knows, and 156 is a little short of 158. Similarly, Sir, for every $100 of revenue they collected in cash they spent $765 upon surveys, whereas this Government, although it has practically surveyed the whole country, having outlined the whole of it and sub-divided the most of it, so that the needs of settlement can be met in the future with comparatively little expense to the country, has only expended in surveys—765 per cent. of the revenue? No, not even 65 per cent; only 60 per cent. the exact figures being, Sir, 60 per cent. of the cash revenue. The contrast between 765 per cent. and 60 per cent. is one of which my hon. friends on the other side are not likely to say much. Then, still on the basis of the actual cash revenue, let us add together the cost of Civil Government and that of outside management, and we find that hon. gentlemen opposite when they had the opportunity spent 378 per cent. of all the cash they received upon these services, whereas this Government has spent but 41 per cent. of its cash revenue in the past ten years upon these services, and hopes to do a good deal better in the future. I may add, Sir, that in their time the proportion of expenditure to revenue was never higher than 2,506 per cent. in any one year, and never less than 54 per cent, including Civil Government, outside management and surveys; whereas the highest proportion under the present Government was in 1880, when about half a million was spent upon surveys, 226 per cent., and the lowest in any year was 36 per cent., with the average being greatly increased in favor of revenue and greatly diminished as regards expenditure. These figures, Sir, I submit for the information of the House, in fulfilment of the promise which I made during the discussion which took place on the motion of the hon. member for Western Assiniboia, for all memorials addressed to the Government by the Legislative Assembly of the North-West Territories, which sat recently at Regina. I regret that my hon. friends on the other side of the House find it consistent with their conception of the duty which they owe to their country to keep on insisting that the land regulations and mining regulations which affect the North-West are bad, and telling the people in the same breath that similar regulations in the United States are good, and liberal, and everything that is desirable. I challenge hon. gentlemen to be more specific in their statements, and I defy them to show that in any one particular the land regulations governing the disposal of homesteads and pre emptions in the North-West are not incomparably more liberal and better in every way than the regulations under which similar lands are disposed of in the United States. Let us see for example what the Secretary of the Interior for the United States says in his last report to Congress, being for the year ending on the 30th June last, in relation to the land business of the United States. On page 7 of his report he says:

"The most pressing information exhibited in this report relates to the accumulated business of the land office. The Commissioner states that a thorough examination has been made of all the unfinished business in his office and that the results presented may be accepted as accurate. This information carries a heavy reproach against the Government, and seems to call for action which shall relieve the condition exhibited."

He explains that many contests must necessarily arise in relation to cases before the department, and that, at best, different causes of delay will protract the issue of the final evidence of title. He says:

"It is obvious, however, that it is of great importance to all honest and rightful claimants that the evidence of their title should be speedily issued. Yet how dreary is the prospect opened to the settler by the figures now exhibited of the arrears of business.

"Of final entries, there were pending on the 30th of June last 238,156; and the number of such entries made during the last year was 70,488. This latter number exceeds all the final entries disposed of by patent during the last year; so that instead of a diminishment of arrearages, the accumulation of cases has increased. The Commissioner expresses the hope that it will be possible to dispose of 75,000 of these cases during the current year: a number which will not diminish sensibly the mass, if, as may be reasonably expected, so many final entries shall be made during the current as during the past year. No reasonable expectation is, therefore, held out to the settler who has met all the requirements of the law, that he can receive the evidence of his title for nearly four years after his proof shall have been submitted. When it is also considered that, in many instances, defects of proof will require further action on his part, to be followed by further delays in securing a final disposition, the default of the Government to its citizens becomes glaring and painful."

I am glad to be able to inform the House that on the average no settler of Dominion lands in the Canadian North-West experiences a delay of more than four months, as compared with four years in the United States, between the time of submitting his final proof to the day when his patent is actually placed in his hands. Remember, Sir, this is not a criticism of the condition of the Department of the Interior at Ottawa by the hon. member for South Norfolk, but the frank and candid admission of the head of the Interior Department at Washington to the Congress of the United States and to his fellow citizens. Further on he says:

"Of miscellaneous selections and pending claims, the Commissioner reports railroad selections aggregating 25,429,866.11 acres as unadjusted and undisposed of at the end of the year; besides 731,857.59 acres in State selections under swamp-land grants, and 1,850 000 in State selections for educational and internal improvement purposes."

Mr. Villas does not claim for the United States' system the perfection which my hon. friend from South Norfolk seems to see in it; on the contrary he says:

"That some efficacious changes of method ought to be devised and put in operation at the earliest day to afford to the public the relief to which they are entitled from their Government."

And although he agrees with the Commissioner that an increased force of his office is necessary, he submits that a thorough and radical reorganisation of the Land Office ought to be the first step taken; and as if this were not enough he winds up his appeal for reform in the following words:—

"If this business were in the hands of any private establishment of capacity and intelligence it would be no unreasonable expectation that by proper organization and provision for its needs, the congestion might be relieved and its affairs transacted with prompt efficiency in the period of a couple of years. As it is, a backward glance over the long course of time through which its business has become more and more entangled and involved, gives little promise for the future. The inadequate salaries paid its responsible officers and chiefs of divisions, their brief and uncertain tenure, the position of private interest to public duty, and the want of adequate co-operative legislation so many times recommended without avail, constitute elements of weakness which cannot but tend hereafter, as heretofore, to render the performances of the office unequal to the demands upon it. It ought to be made the subject of single and special examination by some commission or Committee of Congress in co-operation with the officers of the bureau and the department, by which, perhaps, a scheme of relief may be devised, adequate to the circumstances and possible of adoption."

Mr. SOMERVILLE I would suggest that as there are no figures in this the Minister might save time by handing it into the Hansard.

The CHAIRMAN. The hon. gentleman is reading an extract from a report of a department at Washington.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), as already pointed out, has stated that there is no machinery in the United States system corresponding with our Commissioner's Office in Winnipeg. Is there not indeed? Let us see what Mr. Villas, the Secretary of the Interior in Mr. Cleveland's Government, has to say upon this subject. Under the head of "Appeals and Contests," page 9 of his last report he says:

"The judicial functions of the Commissioner in review of the action of local land officers and of the Secretary of the Interior on appeal from the Commissioner or, more rarely, in original exercise of the supervisory jurisdiction imposed by law over the public lands, have gradually expanded with the multiplication of interests, development of new questions and the growth of precedents into a strong semblance of the court of chancery, with much of the machinery, methods and peculiarities, mutatis mutandis, of that venerable tribunal; a likeness not lost in its consequence of expense and delay."

As a further proof of the efficiency of the homestead laws of the United States, I ask the hon. gentleman to refer to page 14 of the report of the Secretary of the Interior, from which quotations have already been made, from which it will be seen that no less than 29,729,761 acres have been actually restored to the Government of the United States during the past four years for abandonment, illegality and other causes. We have heard something, Sir, about the alleged delays in dealing with the claims of half-breeds in the North-West Territories. What does Mr. Villas say in regard to a similar class of claims, the claims by occupation arising under Mexican cessions, and of lands within the territories of the United States, and similar cases in Louisiana and Florida which are alledged to rest upon French or Spanish grants at law? Why, he says that though the Department of the Interior at Washington has persistently urged these matters upon the attention of Congress, no subject furnishes greater discouragement of further recommendation to that body by reason of its neglect of all the interests involved. This is not a surprising statement in view of the fact that, as he says, not a few of these claims date back to the last century and some even beyond:

"It is a reproach to the Government, he says, that after nearly forty years the South-Western Territories should lie under the shadow of clouds which portend such lightning strokes to individuals and devastation to public interests."

No wonder that he finishes up by exclaiming:

"But the right of wrong of particular cases has become a thing almost of comparative indifference in view of the overwhelming and menacing wrong of their not being decided at all."

It will also be interesting, especially to hon. gentlemen opposite, to learn as we do on the authority of the report of the Land Office officials at Devil's Lake, Dakota:

"The actual and presumptive cases of land being appropriated by aliens who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, but who make final proof under the pre-emption law without having done so, many of whom never do take out their final citizenship papers (this being especially true of Canadians, who cross the line, settle upon, acquire and sell land, and return to their homes without becoming citizens of the United States) would suggest a change in the law in that respect."

I will not detain the House any longer with these extracts, and I will only apologise for having delayed the time of the House to this great length; but I feel that it was my duty to the House, as I feel it my duty to the country, to show that the statements which were made in the House at the commencement of this Session were certainly not borne out by facts. I am sure that hon. gentlemen will think so if they study the report which I have read this evening.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has been a long time in incubation. The speech which the hon. gentleman has made to-night—if you may call it a speech, but I think he said it was a report from his department—would have been better if put before the House in the form of a report than in the form of a speech from the hon. gentleman. It would have been more appropriate if the portion misrepresenting myself and the members of the Government who were in office some 12 years ago, had been omitted. The hon. gentleman has undertaken to institute a comparison as to the cost of the administration of the Interior Department in 1876 and in 1878, and the cost of the Department of the Interior to-day. The hon. gentleman says that the Department of the Interior cost from $36,000 to $38,000 at that time, and that it now costs $82,000. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman omitted to inform the House in the statement which he made, that in 1876 and 1878 the Department of the Interior, also had an Indian Branch, that it included the department now called the Department of Indian Affairs, that the Indian Department at the present time has cost $42,415, so that the Department of Indian Affairs to-day has cost $4,000 more than the entire Department of the Interior including public lands and Indian Affairs did in 1878. So it appears that even taking the hon. gentleman's own statement the Department of the Interior has cost $86,000 more than it did in 1878. Well, Sir, that $86,000 is not all, because I find that the hon. gentleman has transferred to the North-West an expenditure of $35,000 for the extra sessional clerks who are employed in the office here. If the hon. gentleman would add this $ 5,000 to the $82,000 and to the $42,000, he will have much more than four times the cost of the Department of the Interior to-day compared with that department in 1876. I understated the facts at the beginning of this Session when I stated that the Department of the Interior cost about four times what it did at that time. The hon. gentleman says that the Department of Indian Affairs of the North-West and the Public Lands Office in 1878 cost about $40,000. My recollection is, although I have not carefully looked into the figures for many years, that the cost of one was something over $18,000 and the cost of the other $20,000. I find that the hon. gentleman's Land Branch at Winnipeg cost $54,100; that to provide for clerks, forest rangers and so forth he asked for the sum of nearly $40,000; to provide for the travelling expenses of persons employed in Crown timber agencies and for inspection of ranches and so on he asks $48,830, and that altogether the hon. gentleman is asking for salaries and travelling expenses connected with his department—leaving out altogether the Indian branch of the North-West—$135,700 this year. Now, let the hon. members of this Committee look at the facts. Here are $82,762 that the hon. gentleman asks for the Department of the Interior, excluding the Indian branch; here is the hon gentleman who is at the head of that Indian branch asking $42,450 for the expenses of management of that branch here, and the hon. gentleman is asking in connection with his department in the North-West, $185,748, omitting altogether the expenses of the Indian branch of the North-West Territories. I find that the general expenses of the North-West are charged in the Indian vote at $152,486, so that the branch which the hon. gentleman says cost in Ottawa and in the North-West Territories something like $80,000 in 1876 is to-day costing $185,000, $152,486, $11,218, over $42,000, and $82,000, making altogether not far short of half a million; or, in exact figures, including the Minister's salary, $481,664. And yet the hon. gentleman says that when I stated that the expenses were now more than four times what they were in 1876, I had exaggerated the facts. The hon. gentleman and his department by a peculiar system of bookkeeping and by dividing up these expenses, have sought to conceal the facts, and they have concealed them from those members who have not taken the trouble to investigate them. But I say, with a full sense of the responsibility of my statement, that the expense connected with these two branches of the Government to-day are more than double what it ought to be, and that any member of this House having ordinary capacity and industry, who would undertake the management of these departments, could produce greater efficiency for less than one-half of the sum of money now expended. The hon. gentleman has also told us of the cost of the United States system, and of the advantage of the system which he has adopted over that which prevails in the neighboring republic. Well, Sir, I have nothing to do with the defense of the American system. All I have said, and I say it again, is that the Illinois Central Railway Company in one year of its existence, has sold more public lands, and given more patents for those lands than the Government of Canada has in the whole North-West Territories in any one year, and it has done so at, I will not say one-tenth, but one-twentieth of the expense this Government has incurred. No man carrying on a large business would maintain in his place twenty-four hours a man who would manage his business so inefficiently and extravagantly as this Government during the past ten years have managed the affairs of the North-West Territories. The hon. gentleman says that the Government of which I was a member were so extravagant that we appointed a man as land agent on the North Saskatchewan three years, he might have said four years, before he had anything to do. We did not appoint him an hour before he had anything to do. When we sent surveyors to survey that settlement, we also sent an agent to enquire into the rights of the settlers who were there, so that their locations could be entered into the land book immediately on the completion of the survey; and the agent had plenty of work to employ him during the time the survey was going on. But when the survey was completed, we were out of office; we left office on the 17th of October, and the survey was not completed until the 27th of October, and the report of the survey was received a little later. What did the hon. gentlemen do when they came into office? They left this man three years without instructions; he wrote to them asking for instructions, and his communications are before the House; they left him without books; there was no opportunity for the people to make entries; and it was not until they were on the eve of insurrection, and until they were meeting in council with the half-breeds, that those gentlemen chose to hand over the books to Mr. Duck, and enable him to open the office at Prince Albert. It is true that he was there three or four years with nothing to do; but why? Because hon. gentlemen opposite neglected their duty; because they were much more anxious to look after their party interests at Ottawa and wherever there were votes to be made, than they were to look after the interests of the population in that distant country who had no power to exercise any influence on their own behalf; and it was not until the half-breed population were in arms that these hon. gentlemen attempted to discharge their duties. We had clergymen from that country and representatives of the North-West Council importuning the Government and warning them of the difficulty that would arise if they failed to discharge their duty, and it was not until arms were taken and property destroyed and life lost, that they woke up to the situation and gave Mr. Duck something to do.

Mr. DEWDNEY. He was appointed long before that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes; and the work was there for him to do.

Mr. DEWDNEY. And he was doing the work; I was in his office, and he had books and everything else.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman is mistaken. I suppose the hon. gentleman slept in his gubernatorial chair; we have no communication from him, but we have letters from Mr. Duck, which can be found in the proceedings of this House; and any hon. gentleman who chooses to read them will see that he wrote again and again for instructions. He was appointed in 1878, and he did not receive the books to enable him to open his office until 1881 or 1882, and he might have been there till this time without having anything to do if there had been no rebellion. The hon. gentleman has told us about the delays which took place, and the expenses which were incurred in the immediate vicinity of Winnipeg in locating the half-breeds there and settling their claims. Why, Sir, there were people whose claims were being settled, first by the Lieutenant Governor, whom we constantly urged to the discharge of this duty, but who left his office before the duty was completed, and we transferred the work to Chief Justice Wood. What was the work assigned to him? Was it the ordinary work of a land dispute that arose after the surveys were made? Not at all. There were people who lived in the country before there were any surveys, before it was acquired by us. When the surveys came to be made two parties were found claiming the same lot, and their claims had to be investigated, and we appointed Chief Justice Wood to make that investigation, and to report in order to secure a satisfactory settlement. But if there was delay in locating the half-breeds whose fault was that? When the Government that preceded us in office ordered the census to be made, in order to provide for the distribution of the 1,400,000 acres, they took the census of the entire half-breed population without discriminating between children and the heads of families. What was the result? The present Prime Minister, who was Minister of Justice, reported that the heads of families were not included in the grant to the children of half-breeds, and there was no census upon which to make the distribution, so that a new census had to be taken. But a large proportion of those half-breeds were scattered over the North-West Territories, and it was impossible to ascertain where they were; and so the work which the hon. gentlemen could easily have done, if they had paid the least attention to the interpretation of the statute which they invited Parliament to pass, when we came in it was found a source of infinite trouble, which might have been done with ease if it had been properly done in the first instance; and it was because they did not give it any attention that the census was taken in such a way that the distribution of the land could not take place. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman has told us of the very large percentage of increase of the population, and of the resources of the country since his friends have come into office. That reminds me of the story of the man who said, when he was seeking to get credit, that his personal property had increased a thousandfold during twelve months, and who, when asked how that happened, said that he had purchased a sow, and she had had ten pigs since he bought her; and so the hon. gentleman tells us that because there was a small population there when we were in power, and the population is larger now, therefore there has been a very great increase, and that increase is due to the extraordinary efficiency of the policy of the Administration. The hon. gentleman has told us how much land they surveyed, and how little we surveyed. But why should we have surveyed more? What was the object of carrying on surveys years in advance of settlement? Our object was to secure the settlement of the country with as little expense to the treasury as possible, and we saw that an ample quantity of land was surveyed, to afford facilities for settlement, but hon. gentlemen opposite have gone on surveying an extensive territory that will not be settled for centuries, at the present rate of settlement. The boundaries will be obliterated; the surveys will have to be made over again; the stakes will have disappeared, and a large proportion of the country will require to be re-surveyed before settlement actually takes place. We abstained deliberately from surveying, because it was not in the public interest. The hon. gentleman's colleagues caused a large extent of territory, unsurveyed, to be surveyed, in that country, not because they believed it would be to the advantage of the country, but because it was desired to give employment and to bestow patronage upon friends who had supported them in the elections. And they did it in this way at the expense of the public treasury, and to the detriment of the public interest. The hon. gentleman has told the House that the expenses were greater, in proportion to revenue, under Mackenzie's Administration than they have been under the present Administration. That was a necessary consequence of the condition of the country at that particular time. There was no railway, either in Canadian or American territory, reaching within hundreds of miles of Manitoba, either from the south or from the east. The country was far more inaccessible than it is now, and yet we find that the number of people who have gone in since is a smaller average per year than the population that went in during 1877 and 1878; and that the issue of patents in 1877 and 1878 was larger than for some years succeeding. The hon. gentleman says that they have only appointed the land agents as they were required. Well, the Government have done this: they have adopted a policy of undertaking to encourage settlers to go far beyond the limits of Manitoba and far away from those districts, into places not easily accessible; and the result is that, without any advantage to the country at large, there has been a very serious addition to the cost of carrying on the settlement of the country. The hon. gentleman has given us a number of comparisons with regard to the expenses of the Government and with regard to the amount of revenue that has been received. The hon. gentleman has charged a very considerable proportion of the expenditure to capital account that were not so charged in our day, and, what is more, the hon. gentleman's leader told the House and the country in 1881 that by this time there would be upwards of $60,000,000 of revenue in excess of the actual cost incurred. It is clear, from the statement of the First Minister, that he expected in a few years that the amount of sales would extend, and that settlement would go on much more rapidly than it has. What do we find? At the present day, when we take into account the cost of survey and of maintaining these various departments of the Government in the Territories, the amount of revenues that have been derived as yet have not been in excess of the amount of expenditure. In every department there has been an enormous increase in the cost of carrying on the Government, without any adequate increase in the amount of public services rendered. It is impossible that the hon. gentleman can say the contrary, because the demands of the Government for the purpose of meeting the current expenses from year to year, and the reports of the condition of the country, and the progress of settlement, show that the statement I make is wholly within the mark.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I wish to call the attention of the Committee to a specimen of the way in which the public money is expended in advancing the settlement of the North-West. In 1886-87, the Government had as an official, Mr. Rufus Stephenson, Inspector of Colonisation Companies, with a salary of $3,000 a year, and travelling expenses, $1,278.50. Mr. Stephenson had for assistant, W. J. Boucher, who received $388.50 salary, and travelling expenses $641 85. Another assistant, Mr. F. J. Clarke, received $100. Altogether there was paid for the inspection of Colonisation Companies, in 1886-87, $5,378.85. The House will be surprised to learn that the total receipts from the companies in 1886-87 amounted to the magnificent sum of $903.63, showing a loss of $4,475.50. No reasonable man would suppose that the Government, knowing this, would have left unchanged this system of spending money, and retained the services of Messrs. Stephenson, Clarke and Boucher; but they did not see it in that light; and in the next year Mr. Stephenson again acted in this capacity. He was paid his salary of $3,000, and expenses, $2,035.98, making a total of $5,035.98, and the total receipts from Colonisation Companies amounted to $470, showing a net loss of $4,565.98. Any one would have thought that these two years of public experience would have induced the Government to set Mr. Stephenson aside, and decide that his services were no longer required in the interests of this country. But we find, on the 24th February of this year, that Mr. Brien put the question:

"Whether Mr. Rufus Stephenson, late Inspector of Colonisation Societies, has been employed by the Government in any capacity since the 30th June last? If so, what were his duties? What was his salary? How much has he received, either as salary or travelling expenses, between the 30th June, 1888, and 1st day of February, 1889?"

To which Mr. Dewdney replied as follows:—

"In November last Mr. Stephenson was asked to undertake the inspection of several colonies. The 'Commercial,' situated near Kinbrae; the 'London Artisans' Colony, near Moosomin; and the Primitive Methodists, if time would permit of his visiting the latter. He was subsequently asked to inspect the 'Church' Colony, near Churchbridge station, on the line of the Manitoba and North-Western Railway. We have reports from him on all except the Methodist Colony. He is to be paid $10 a day and travelling expenses. He has not received any salary between the above dates. $500 was advanced him on account of travelling expenses."

I think this statement which I have made shows clearly that the Minister of the Interior and those who preceded him in the administration of the department over which he now presides, have not been actuated by a desire to promote the welfare of the country and the economical management of the finances of the country, but by a desire in far too many cases to promote the interests of some hanger on of the Government, some man like Rufus Stephenson, who is a pet of the Government and who lives in the same town with Mr. Henry Smyth, who received last year $1,500 on immigration account, for which I believe he did nothing. This shows that these gentlemen are simply determined to keep on the pay-list men who render no services at all and whose work is no profit to the country. It is nonsense for the Minister of the Interior to tell the House that they are endeavoring to economise. They are not endeavoring to economise. They are extravagant in every department of the public service, and in no department can we find as much extravagance as there is in the department presided over by the Minister of the Interior

Mr. McMULLEN. The Minister of the Interior has referred to a statement which I made to the House some time ago and has challenged the accuracy of that statement. I will quote from the Auditor General's report. We find that the Land Board at Winnipeg last year cost $30,745; travel of Superintendent of Mines, $2,299.38; travel of Inspector of Agencies, $1,270.46; travel of Inspector of Colonisation Companies, $2,035.98; contingencies of Land Board, $2,007.59; travelling expenses, $1,091 40; removal expenses, $2,727.68; special services paid at Winnipeg, $1,408.24; homestead inspection, $14,913 29; Inspector of Ranches, $1,202.23; Intelligence Officers, $2 051.21; Forest Rangers, $787.50; Half breed Commission, $9,384 08; then, expenses in Ottawa in connection with matters of the North-West, $10,619.77; Examiners for Land Surveyors, $880.70; legal expenses, $1,256.07; advertising, British Columbia, $327.69; Dominion Land Agencies, as per page E 73, Auditor General's Accounts, $52,158.57. The whole comes, as I stated before, to a total of $149,646.61. If you add to that contingencies at Ottawa, $22,127, and salaries at Ottawa, $78,060, and deduct from that the entire revenue as given by the Auditor General at page G 183, $217,083.07, you have a net loss of $32 950. I would call the attention of the Committee to another point which I stated before. The Minister of the Interior said just now that the receipts from the registry offices in the North-West were about equal to the salaries. We find that the salaries paid last year were $13,400, and the entire receipts for registration were $7,591, leaving a net loss of $5,804. If all the rest of the statements which the Minister has brought before the House, compiled no doubt by some clerk in his office, are as correct as that, he has made a very erroneous statement.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The hon gentleman did not understand what I said. I stated that the revenue for the first year, when this system was in operation, was within $2,400 of the expense, but I said that, from the information we have to-day with regard to the fees that are paid, the revenue is about equalling the expense. I did not refer to the figures of the previous year, but to those of the year just closed.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman is attempting to take advantage of the fact that this House has only the returns up to the 30th June last, and says now he is referring to this year. He did not say that this was in connection with the receipts up to this time, but he now tries to shield himself behind that statement when he is brought face to face with the Auditor General's Report. That is another way of sleeking over the facts, and is in accordance with the idea that an Inspector of Registry Offices should be employed at a salary of $4,000 a year to inspect five offices, and is on a par with the expenses in connection with Rufus Stephenson. There is a system of extravagance pursued in connection with the Department of the Interior and the North-West lands which is most disgraceful and should not be submitted to The North-West is nothing short of what the late leader of the Opposition called it, a happy hunting ground for the political hacks of hon. gentlemen opposite. Any gentleman whose services are not recognised by the constituencies in the old Provinces is sent off to the North-West on a happy hunting tour, and is paid a high salary. I defy the hon. gentleman from the Auditor General's Accounts to contradict my statement. The entire receipts from all sources in the North West last year were $217,000, and the expenditure in the North West, including agents, inspectors, ranch inspectors, registrars, &c., was $149,546, leaving a net sum of $67,437 to come to Ottawa; and the net cost in Ottawa, including salaries and contingencies in the office of the Department of the Interior, was $100,387, which shows a positive loss of $33,000 less $46. Now, I say this is a disgraceful condition of things, in face of the promises that were made us a few years ago when the people's representatives here were induced to vote an additional sum of 30 millions to complete the Canadian Pacific Railway. Glowing statements were then made by the then Minister of Finance of how many acres of land were going to be cultivated that would produce so many bushels of wheat and he even prophesied that there would be 640 million bushels to export, and that we would have an enormous revenue from the sale of lands. We also had the First Minister repeating these ridiculous statements. Where are they now? They have gone to nothing. There was nothing in these statements. They were mere wind, there was no substance in them. I say the whole system should be altered, and these people who are drawing salaries and doing nothing should be struck off the list, and these expenses should be cut down something within decent limits. But it is a positive disgrace to this Dominion to have so many men stamping round there virtually doing nothing, every one of these homestead inspectors getting $1,200 a year and $4 a day for travelling expenses. In addition to that, we provide them with a horse and a buckboard; they go out to the various farms to inspect them, and no doubt they receive the best of attendance and are charged nothing at all, but still their $4 a day for travelling expenses are charged to the Government.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Are you sure of that?

Mr. McMULLEN. We can show it. Turn up the accounts and you will see it. If you do not know it, it is time you did, because I know it. Not only that, but the hon. gentleman provides them with a horse and rig, and allowance, don't you? I know you do. These charges are made upon the country, and I say it is absurd for us to put up with them any longer.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) While the Minister was reading his ministerial statement to-night, endeavoring to induce the House to believe that matters were very pleasant, and going on agreeably in the North-West, and that the Government's administration of matters there deserves the approval of this House, I amused myself by extracting from the Public Accounts a few items of our expenditure there just to show what this country is paying for the Government of the North-West Territories. I find that in the matter of Dominion lands, from which we were told a few years ago we were to derive an enormous revenue, we have in the Estimates for the coming year an expenditure amounting to $438,000, made up of the expenses of the Department of the Interior, including Minister's salary, salaries of other officials and contingencies, $53,000; $100,000 for Dominion lands chargable to capital which we intend to expend; and $185,000 charged to income, making a total of $438,000. I find that the receipts for last year from these lands were $217,000, so we are going to lose the small item of $221,000 alone in the administration of the Dominion lands in the North-West. That is a very small and almost a contemptible item in comparison with the total expenditure in that country, and there seems to be no offset at all, no receipts at all. I find we spent about $100,000 on immigration; $941,000 on the Indians; $720,000 on the North-West Police; $145,000 on the Government of the North-West; $6,000 for the Government of Keewatin; for inspectors, registrars, and clerks in all the Territories, $15,000; North-West Council, $16,250, and $20,000 for Banff, making a total of $1,862,000. If you add to that the total lost of the administration of the Dominion lands, we find we are sinking the small item of about two million a year in the administration of the Government of that country. We all know that that estimate does not take into account the interest upon the millions that have been spent on the surveys that have been made in times gone by, it takes no account of the interest on the millions that have been spent on the Canadian Pacific Railway, which has been given to the company; it takes no account of the interest on the money spent to acquire the territory in the first instance—it is simply for the administration of those North-West Territories during the coming year. As a matter of fact we are going to sink about two millions this year. The fact is that about 8 or 10 years ago hon. gentlemen opposite had their heads turned with the promises made to them by the then Finance Minister, Sir Leonard Tilley, and the leader of the Government, Sir John A. Macdonald. They told us we were going to have 71 millions returned by 1890 for these lands, although they revised that statement to $58,300,000, they were so certain of the estimate that they would not take off $300,000. Here we stand to-day. Not only were those promises not fulfilled, but the balance is very largely on the other side. When these prophecies were indulged in by hon. gentlemen opposite, I say the head of the Government and the heads of their supporters were turned, and they made their expenditure upon a scale commensurate with the receipts which they stated they expected to receive. They indulged in a career of mad extravagance in that country, and here we are to-day, the overtaxed people of the other Provinces paying a sum of two or three million dollars a year for the administration of that territory. Still the Minister stands up, and, without the slightest attempt to economise, he challenges the House to the conclusion that he is administering the affairs of the country well. My hon. friend to my left has shown how foolish and ridiculous his comparison of the expenditure now is with the expenditure under the Mackenzie Government, when that great country was being opened up. Now we have got it opened up, and the expenditure, instead of decreasing, is increasing; and so far as I can see, under the administration of the hon. gentleman, we may look from year to year for a very large increase still. There seems to be no desire for economy on the part of the hon. gentleman; but I am very much mistaken if, in the near future, events which he cannot control will compel an economy which they refuse to exercise of their own mere motion.

Mr. LISTER. I desire to ask the Minister whether Mr. Rufus Stephenson is still in the employ of the Government, and if he is, what is he doing, and what salary is he receiving?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Mr. Rufus Stephenson is not now in the employ of the Government, and is receiving no salary.

Mr LISTER. When did he cease to be in the employ of the Government?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I cannot give you the exact date, at the commencement of the month, I think.

Mr. LISTER. Had he discharged the duties for which he was employed?

Mr. DEWDNEY. He had, completely.

Mr. LISTER. I think that it is time the Dominion Government dispensed with the services of Mr. Rufus Stephenson. From 1882 down to the present time, he has been in the employ of the Government and in the receipt of an enormous salary. He was appointed by the Government as inspector of colonisation companies, at a salary of $3,000 a year and with two or three assistants. He has nothing to do, and the Government have employed two or three clerks to help him to do it. The Minister of the Interior has made a new departure to-night. I have had the honor of holding a seat in this House for seven Sessions, and I have never yet seen an hon. gentleman on the Government benches rise and read a long speech prepared by an officer of his department.

An hon. MEMBER. The Secretary of State did.

Mr. LISTER. It seems that the Secretary of State did it. It would save a great deal of trouble if other Ministers would adopt the same course. The hon. gentleman was please to tell us that the speech he made to-night was prepared by an officer of his department, I assume it was prepared by his deputy Minister. I think under all the circumstances his deputy Minister might have had more honesty and more decency than to have put into his hands, to be read to this House, and to go to the country, a falsehood, so far as the previous administration were concerned. He put into the hands of the Minister of the Interior to be read here to-night a statement that the expense of this Government in the North-West was little more than that of the Mackenzie Administration, when it was, in point of fact, over $480,000 I do not blame the Minister so much, because I do not think he knows anything about his department, but I blame Mr. Burgess, a man who owes his position to the Liberal party, and who should not have forgotten what was due to them and should not have departed from the truth as he has done in the statement he has given to the Minister to read to this House. The hon. gentleman has told us he is not very much acquainted with the details of his department. For what did the Government take him into office? For what did they make him Minister of the Interior? Was it on account of his vast parliamentary experience, was it because he had served his country faithfully, honestly, and heroically in the past, or was it because he was the primary cause of the rebellion which has cost this country nearly $7,000,000? We heard only the other day, for the first time, that the Government assumed the responsibility for the rebellion. Up to that time the Government permitted it to be charged against the hon. gentleman who now occupies the position of Minister of the Interior, that it was on account of his malfeasance, and his neglect of duty that the rebellion was to be attributed.

Mr. HESSON. That is not correct.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman says that he is not acquainted with the duties of his office. This is a new mode of explaining the Estimates, it is a new mode for the purpose of satisfying the House for a Minister of the Crown to come here and read a statement prepared by his deputy, not to answer any questions asked, but an assault upon a previous Administration, which was not in question.

Mr. DEWDNEY. It was not an assault at all.

Mr. LISTER. It was an assault on the Mackenzie Administration, and that was not in question. What we seek to know is what the Government are now doing with the public funds, and it is no answer to rise and say that the amount is more or less than the expense by the previous Administration. It has been said here to-night, and there is no doubt about it, that the Minister of Finance is now applying the pruning knife to the various departments of this Government, and if he applies that knife to the administration of the North-West Territories, he will find the most enormous extravagance and corruption pervading every part of the Territories. It has been said that the North-West Territories is a place for needy followers of the Government to draw salaries and make a living, which they are not able to make in other parts of the Dominion. We have one instance of that in the case of Mr. Stephenson. Mr. Stephenson's work did not occupy him two months of the whole year. It was a summer jaunt for him, and for it he received from this liberal Government $3,000 a year and expenses, and was provided with two assistants. What were the predictions of the hon. gentleman? The predictions as to this country were as visionary as they always are when the Government are asking this House for some favor or some grant. The hon. gentleman whom this Minister of the Interior followed told this House they would export from that country within 10 years 640,000,000 bushels of wheat, that the country would be densely settled in that time; and that was said for the purpose of inducing this House to grant enormous subsidies to the Canadian Pacific Railway. What has been the result? A beggarly 150,000 people occupy that country, and we are spending there double the sums we receive from it. So far as the hon. gentleman is concerned, it is perfectly evident that he is not acquainted with the duties of his office; but so far as this House is concerned, hon. gentlemen have a right to expect from him a full, concise and clear statement as to the administration of the affairs of that office. I say he has not given to this House such a statement, but he has given to the House a statement prepared by an officer of his department, which is false in many particulars.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I will only say a few words with respect to the remarks which the hon. gentleman thought proper to make with respect to my deputy. I should like to know to whom a new Minister taking charge of a department should go for information? I think the Deputy Minister is the proper gentleman to whom he should apply, and that he is the proper party who should give the Minister information. I take the whole responsibility for this memorandum. It was made at my suggestion, and I gave him my views and what I required. If there is anything in it which hon. gentlemen think reflects on them, I did not intend that it should reflect on them. All I claimed to lay before this House—and I think I have a perfect right to do so—was a comparison with the administration of a similar department in the United States, and also a comparison of the administration of the department when it was administered by hon. gentlemen opposite as compared with the way it has been administered during the last few years. That is the reason I gave this information, and I do not think blame is attachable to my deputy. In regard to not being acquainted with the details of my department, I do not pretend to be so much acquainted with them as I hope to be in the course of another year, but if there is any information which hon. gentlemen opposite want to obtain in regard to this vote which is now before the Committee, I am prepared, and I desire to give it. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is not in his place. If he was, I should like to have asked him to correct himself, or I would correct him, with respect to the travelling allowances made to the homestead inspectors. There was an Order in Council passed under which no officer in the North-West can receive more than $3.50 per day. In looking through the Public Accounts I have not yet come across the homestead inspectors, but the superintendent of mines, who is an official in a higher capacity than a homestead inspector, and the inspector of agencies, both charge at the rate of $3.50 a day. I am quite sure the Auditor General would not pay more than that sum, so the hon. gentleman is wrong in that particular.

Mr. LISTER. I may say that of course when the hon. gentleman made the statement as he did, I took it for granted that he assumed all responsibility for what he contained. But I say furthermore, that so far as the Deputy Minister is concerned, it was a contemptible statement for him to put into the hands of the Minister.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. With respect to the course pursued by the Minister of the Interior in coming down here and reading a carefully prepared statement got up for him by his department, and having the character of a reply to remarks made in regard to the administration of that department by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) many weeks ago, two months ago, I would just say this: The Minister of the Interior will see that for public convenience, if he deems it necessary to demand such a document from his department, instead of coming here and reading a statement of that kind, which no mortal man could follow by any possibility, read as it was here, embodying a vast mass of calculations and statistics, it would be much more convenient and more in accordance with the practice of Parliament, that it should be brought down in the shape of a report, ordered by the hon. gentleman and signed with his name. Some course of that kind should be adopted if the hon. gentleman should consider the interests of the public service demand such a document; and it should be brought down and printed and communicated to members of the House. I think that might be fairly done. Besides, my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Mills, Bothwell) the party aimed at and the party repeatedly referred to in this long report that we have had to-night, would have had an opportunity of examining the various facts and statistics which the department has put together, and have had an opportunity to reply to them if he had deemed it worth while or necessary to reply. I think if any of the Ministers find it necessary to reply to a speech in Parliament in this fashion, because this is a reply to a speech in Parliament made many weeks ago, that course should be adopted. I am not complaining of the hon. gentleman replying, but I do not think the mode he took was a well advised one. As to the conduct of the deputy, I may point this out to the hon. gentleman: It appears to me that it was an improper thing for him, knowing better as he did, to have mixed up together the Indian Department expenditure and the expenditure for the Department of the Interior proper, which the Minister will see by referring to the Public Accounts for 1878, were not connected then. That fact of itself vitiated the whole comparison that was made between the expenditure during the administration of my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) and the expenditure that is now going on. My point is this, that if Ministers deem it necessary to reply to statements made in this House by reading a formal report they had better put it in print and communicate it to the whole House, so that an opportunity may be had to review and investigate it. The hon. gentleman has brought down this statement at a late period of the Session. It will be printed in our Hansard to-morrow and of course my hon. friend (Mr. Mills), if he deems it necessary to go over it, can reply to it in minute detail, but it will mean a very long debate later on, perhaps on Concurrence, or perhaps when items similar to this are brought down in the Supplementary Estimates. I do not object to this, but it is the necessary consequence of the course the Minister has pursued this evening. To all the Ministers I may say that if they find it necessary to do that, it ought to be done in the regular way and not in the way adopted by my hon. friend to-night.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) stated that he would go into this matter again before the Session was over. It was on account of that that I prepared myself, and my idea was that this was a proper time to bring it up.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the rule which I suggested will be found much more convenient for all parties. Might I ask the Minister what are the precise duties of the superintendent of the mines, for whose salary this amount is asked?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Mr. Pearce was appointed superintendent some few years ago, when his duties were expected to be extensive. He was appointed in a great measure to supervise the mines in the railway belt of British Columbia. He resides at Calgary now and has supervision of the mines on this side as well; he is also a member of the Land Board.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As I understand it this gentleman is appointed to supervise the mines of British Columbia. I believe that we have no mines in British Columbia.

Mr. DEWDNEY. This is hardly correct. It appears that by the late decision we do not own the precious metals, but I think the far more valuable mines, of base metals, such as coal, iron, copper and lead are owned by us.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does not the recent decision take away the mines from us altogether?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Only the precious metals. As far as I gather it has deprived us of only the gold and silver.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And that only?

Mr. DEWDNEY. That is all there was in dispute.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I suppose we are to understand that the effect of the decision was that Canada simply took the interests of an ordinary proprietor and that the Government of British Columbia retain all the right that the Crown shall retain against the private individual.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We presume it to be so, but we have no information except the definite result.

Mr. LISTER. Why is the salary of the secretary to the land commissioner increased?

Mr. DEWDNEY. A year or two ago Mr. Burpé's salary stood at the same amount which it is proposed to increase it to now. It was reduced to $1,800 on account of his ill-health. He is now completely restored to health and is attending the duties of his office, and it was thought advisable to increase his salary.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the assistant secretary's salary been increased for the same reason. Has he been ill and restored again?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Mr. Ruttan's, the assistant secretary's salary, has been increased by $100 on account of the efficient manner in which he has discharged the duties of his office, on the recommendation of the commissioner.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How many officers have you got as Dominion lands agents?

Mr. DEWDNEY. There are fifteen. Mr. Whitcher, the head land agent at Winnipeg, gets $2,400; all others get $1,200.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. These range over the whole of the North-West?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes. Mr. Whitcher resides in Winnipeg, Mr. Hiam at Brandon, Mr. Pentland at Birtle, Mr. Young at Manitou, Mr. Flesher at Deloraine, Mr. Hilliard at Minnedosa, Mr Stevenson at Regina, Mr. Rowe at Calgary, Mr. Gauvreau at Edmonton, Mr. McHugh at Carlyle, Mr Brokovski at Battleford, Mr. Kirby at Lethbridge, Mr. Nash at Banff, Mr. Rochester at Medicine Hat.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). One would suppose that the hon. gentleman would not find population enough in the North-West to fill all these places?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. One thing is pretty clear, that if you deduct the Mounted Police and all who live by them, the Canadian Pacific Railway employees and those who live by them, and the Dominion employees, and those who live by them, from the white population of the North-West Territories, it would be a very pitiful remainder that we would see.

Mr. DEWDNEY. That is always the case in a new country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not in countries in which a hundred millions of the public funds are expended, which we were told would produce a great settlement there.

Mr. CHARLTON. How many Crown timber agents have you in the North-West, and who are they?

Mr. DEWDNEY. There are four. A Mr. Stephenson——

Mr. LISTER. Another Stephenson, besides the one who is a Dominion lands agent?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes.

Mr. CHARLTON. Both sons of the inspecter of colonisation companies?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I do not know who the land agent is at all. I think the Crown timber agent is a son of Mr. Rufus Stephenson.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have in my desk a petition—a copy of which I think was sent to the Department of the Interior—from some of the settlers about Battleford—and I suppose similar representations have been made from other districts—complaining of the charge the Government makes for cutting dead timber, and using it for firewood, also complaining of the amount they require to pay for timber for fencing their lands. They state, what I have no doubt is the fact, that a large number of people have been driven out of that country by the timber regulations. Here are people, hardly able to purchase the absolute necessaries of life, compelled in that cold climate to pay large sums of money for the privilege of getting the necessary firewood to keep them warm in the winter season. How can you expect that poor people will be contented to remain in the country under those circumstances?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I have come to the same conclusion as the gentlemen who sent the petition. A short time ago, the members from Manitoba and the North-West called on me, and among other matters we went into that subject, and I agreed to take the duty off the burnt and dry firewood, and that has been done now for six weeks.

Mr. WATSON. That is a change which will be very popular all through Manitoba and the North West. It has been one of the great grievances, as the hon. gentleman knows, that the Government should make this change for dead and fallen timber. Ever since I have been in this House I have called the attention of the Government to that matter, and I am glad to know that as soon as a man took charge of the Department of the Interior who had some experience in that country, he has seen fit to remove what I have always considered to be a very unjust tax. The timber is granted practically free, because I believe the regulation is that a person must take out a permit, which costs only 25 cents, and which simply prevents the holder from selling this timber as a business. Another matter to which I would like the Minister to give his attention is the license fee collected for the cutting of hay. I think the Government ought to do away with this license. I believe there never was a better regulation in the North-West than that which prevented any person cutting hay on the Hudson Bay Company's land until after the 20th July. Under the present system a person gets a permit to cut a certain number of loads of hay on a piece of land; in some cases these permits are duplicated and trebled, and persons are granted permits for double the quantity of hay that is on the land, so that the one who first comes is first served. The consequence is that they cut the hay too early in the season, before the grass comes to seed, and the hay land soon becomes practically spoiled. After cutting the hay off the ground too early in the season, for two or three seasons it practically spoils the hay lands; and if the Government would not allow anyone to cut hay, say, before the 20th July, which is a fair time for haying to commence, and then allow every person to cut hay, they would be conferring a benefit on the country. In some places this is considered a great grievance. It is not for the revenues derived from the fees charged that the Government are maintaining these licenses. This is a small grievance, no doubt, but at times it causes the people to leave the country, or not settle in it.

Mr. DEWDNEY. There is considerable difference of opinion with regard to the hay matter. There is a great deal in what the hon. gentleman says in reference to the cutting; but permits are liable to be given for more hay than there is in certain localities, because it varies so much according to the season. In some points it is necessary there should be some protection, because if you do not protect the poor settler, some man will come in with his teams, and machines, and cut the whole hay in the district. That has led to great complaints, and I was not able to make up my mind about the hay matter as I was with reference to the wood.

Forestry Commissioner—salary..... $2,000

Mr. LISTER. What are the duties of the forestry commissioner?

Mr. DEWDNEY. He was appointed for his experience in forestry matters, to report on the different districts in the North-West as to what should be done. His report is very interesting, and he has made some useful suggestions with regard to tree planting. The Experimental Farm have done more in that respect than anybody else in the North West, and the trees they planted last year have wintered very well.

Mr. CAMPBELL. We have paid Mr. Stephenson for living allowance 326 days, and I am prepared to say that a large proportion of that time he was in the town of Chatham. He charges $1,141 in addition to his salary of $3,000. This gentleman has been in the service of his country since 1882, and has been drawing about $5,000 a year; and his sons have also been in the employ of the Government. The whole family have been feeding at the country's crib the last four or five years. I am glad to hear that the Minister has cancelled his appointment, and I trust Mr. Stephenson's accounts will be looked into closely. Last year he put in a bill for the use of teams at $1 a day, and one of the managers of a colonisation company told me a few days ago that, during the time Mr. Stephenson was inspector, the moment he came to one colonisation company's ranche, they met him with their best team, drove him all around, "wined" him and dined him, and then drove him to the next company. So that he had no occasion to hire any teams. Yet he was paid $600 for use of teams.

Mr DAVIN. The hon. gentleman must be misinformed in regard to Mr. Stephenson being able to drive from one colonisation company to another. Now, anybody who knows anything of the location of the country knows that is impossible. I happen to know as a fact that Mr. Stephenson had to travel on the railway. If he came up to Temperance Point he would have to travel on the railway to Regina, and go north. That story bears on its face improbability, and could not possibly be true.

Mr. SCARTH. It is quite evident the hon gentleman does not know the North-West. The people there might be able to dine Mr. Stevenson, but certainly they were not able to "wine" him. If all the other statements of the hon. gentleman are on a par with this, they are statements which should not have been made in this House.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am informed by a gentleman whose word may be relied on, and who knows the North-West as well as the hon. members for East Assiniboia and Winnipeg. Mr. John Northwood, now at Chatham, and who formerly was in the North-West, and had a great deal to do with the Qu'Appelle Farm, stated this to me, and a few weeks ago in speaking about this account for hire of teams he stated to me the reason why they took such good care of Mr. Stephenson was that, when he came down after his first visit, he reported to the Government that the company had not treated him well, and the Government wrote up stating that, unless they treated the inspector better next year, they would hire a team for him and would charge it to the company, and after that they treated the inspector like a king. As soon as he reached the ranche they placed the best team they had at his service, in order to get a favorable report from him; and, when he had finished his work on that ranche, they drove him to the next ranche without any cost to him.

Mr. SCARTH. I will state from personal knowledge that, if the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Campbell) had gone through the hardships which Mr. Rufus Stephenson went through in that country, he would not have made the assertions he has.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Do not give us that; it is too thin.

Mr. SCARTH. The hon. gentleman says it is too thin, but it is much more thin for the hon. gentleman to make the statements he has made. I know that country far better than he does, and I know the hardships which a man has to suffer when he is travelling through it in winter. I have driven over 5,000 miles of that country myself, and I know the hardships which must be endured. This talk about the dining and wining of Mr. Stephenson there is nonsense; it is simply impossible.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Scarth) evidently has an idea that they cannot get wine into that country. If he would ask the Minister of the Interior, who was formerly the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West, and who issued a great number of permits, or if he would ask my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who, if the newspaper reports are to be believed, was once caught in regard to that matter, I think he would become aware that it is possible to get any quantity of liquor into the North-West, and, therefore, it cannot be doubted that the statement of my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Campbell) is perfectly correct.

Mr. SCARTH. It is utterly incorrect.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. How does the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Scarth) know that it is incorrect? Did he travel round with Mr. Rufus Stephenson?

Mr. SCARTH. I did not travel round with Mr. Rufus Stephenson.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Then how does the hon. gentleman know what Mr. Stephenson drank? I think the statement of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Scarth) has no foundation in fact. He has proved, on his own statement, that he knows nothing at all about it, whereas the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) gives his authority for saying that Mr. Rufus Stephenson was dined and wined there; and from what I knew of Mr. Rufus Stephenson—and I have known him for a good many years—I think it is not unlikely that he would enjoy being dined and wined. The idea which the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Scarth) suggests, that no such liquor can be got in there, is incorrect, as can be borne out by the Minister of the Interior, who granted an unlimited number of permits when he was Lieutenant Governor, more permits, I believe than there were inhabitants, and there was a great deal of fault-finding in regard to that, and I think my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) will agree with me that this system was not properly administered.

Mr. SCARTH. I may say that I know a great deal more of the North-West than the hon member for Kent (Mr. Campbell.) I know every colony in the North-West, and I repeat that the statement that Mr. Stephenson was wined in that country must be incorrect; and it is incorrect.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Why?

Mr. MACDOWALL. I take a somewhat different view of this question. The hon. member for Kent (Mr Campbell) has given us a second-hand story. I am a young member of the House, though I think I have been as long here as the hon. member for Kent, but I must say that, if we are to get through the work of the House, and to discuss the matters which are before us, we should do so from what we know ourselves, and not from old wives' stories, which we may have heard. The hon. gentleman says that Mr. Northwood told him this story, and he thinks, because Mr Northwood was interested in this stock ranche, though he lives at Chatham and lived there all along, that should give him great knowledge of the North-West. I regret to say that I think the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) has been led astray by these stories. In the North-West, there is not the enormous consumption of liquor that he seems to think, and as to being driven from one colonisation company's land to another, I think that is impossible, because these distances are, as they have been described, magnificent distances, and I do not think one company would undertake to drive a man 200 or 300 miles to another company's land. I think these statements are unfounded, and I think it is unjust to the North-West to put them in circulation.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I would ask if the statement of the member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) indicates that the consumption of liquor in the North-West is enormous, as the hon. member for Saskatchewan says?

Mr. MACDOWALL. I did not say so.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The member for Kent said that Mr. Stephenson got all he wanted of wine, and the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall) would lead the House to believe that, because Mr. Stephenson got all the wine he wanted, the consumption of liquor was enormous.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Scarth) has referred to the hardships he endured in travelling through that country in the winter time. We know that Mr. Stephenson did not travel in the winter.

Mr. SCARTH. Pardon me. Mr. Stephenson has been travelling there all through the past winter, and under great hardships.

Mr. LISTER. Then he cannot possibly have discharged his duties. I have known Mr. Stephenson to be here in Ottawa during several Sessions past. He has been here this Session, and he has been here during many other Sessions.

Mr. SCARTH. I am only speaking of this winter.

Mr. LISTER. When was Mr. Stephenson travelling there this winter?

Mr. SCARTH. Within the last three months.

Mr. CAMPBELL. He was appointed in November at $10 a day and expenses, and he has been back for about a month. But what we have been talking about is last year, and we find that he admits being there only up to the 23rd December. I am quite certain that he left Chatham about the 20th September, and I know he was back there before Christmas. He has charged 326 days at $3.50 a day, and I submit to the House whether a man who receives $3,000 salary ought not to pay his own board, especially when he boards at home half the time. I think this is a fraud on the Government and on the country, and I am glad to see that the Minister of the Interior has cancelled the appointment. There was no need for the appointment to be made at all. Surely with the large number of men in the service in the North-West, you could have found some more capable man than Mr. Stephenson to go around and inspect these companies, without appointing a man from Ontario As for the statement I made respecting Mr. Northwood, I believe it is correct in every particular. I believe it is true as true can be, because he is a man who had no interest in telling me that which was not so, and he was at that time particularly anxious to get a favorable report from the inspector of colonisation companies, and I believe they did dine him and wine him as they best knew how.

Mr. MACDOWALL. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) has uttered a curious anomaly. In referring to Mr. Northwood, he said he had no object to gain in stating the advantages of his company, and in the next two words he said the object he had to gain was to get a favorable report.

Mr. WATSON. The member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) stated he had an object, and he was warned by the Government that unless he treated Mr. Stephenson better the next time he came up there would be trouble. I know something about that country. They do not require a man to go 200 miles to inspect colonisation companies. There are two of them in my county, and the only way to go from one to the other is by driving about 15 or 20 miles, that is from Binscarth to Shell River Colony. There is no other means of going to the York Colony except by driving, which is about 50 miles from Binscarth. I believe Mr. Stephenson is well treated by these people, and that he makes very favorable reports as to the working of these companies. I know Mr. Stephenson, he is a jovial good fellow, and I think there is very strong evidence in favor of the statement of the hon. member for Kent that Mr. Stephenson was at home in Chatham the greater portion of the year. I do not believe he would stay in the North West unless he was wined and dined.

Mr. SCARTH. As the hon. gentleman says that Binscarth is in his own county, I would like to ask him if in that particular colony he thinks he would be wined and dined?

Mr. WATSON. I believe that Mr. Stephenson would be used there as well as he would be used elsewhere. I never went there, but I was well treated.

Mr. SCARTH. I would remind the hon. gentleman that the manager of Binscarth is a great supporter of the cause advocated by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson), and I do not think he would get any wine there.

Mr. WATSON. I happen to be in that position myself, and if there was any liquor there they would not offer it to me, knowing my principles. I would like to ask the Minister if he does not think it would be well to encourage tree culture by granting a homestead or pre-emption. I believe that the growing of trees has a good deal to do with the climate and with the rainfall in these prairie sections of the country. I am of the opinion that it would be well to encourage tree culture by granting tracts of land to the people, providing they would plant a certain number of acres in trees each year.

Mr. LISTER. Would the Minister state who this forestry commissioner is, and when he was appointed?

Mr. DEWDNEY. That is Mr. Morgan; I think he has been appointed two or three years.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Can the Minister state whether he has done anything? I have read his report, and I cannot find out that he has done anything at all.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Does he not give some account of his travels?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes; he tells us that he travels through the country during the summer. He says:

"The settled part of the country was then glowing with rich harvests, and the farmers seemed to have no anxiety outside that of having trees and shrubs to shelter and beautify their homes. Since then, the cold winds bearing the blighting breath of frost, came sweeping over the vast treeless plains, causing much loss and disappointment, and entailing great pecuniary loss to many of the hard working and industrious settlers."

It is very beautiful language, but I do not think we can afford to pay a man $2,000 for writing beautiful language. It is not necessary to tell intending immigrants "that the cold winds sweep over the plains, causing much loss and disappointment to the hard-working farmers." It is not desirable to pay $2,000 a year to a gentleman to write reports of this character concerning the nature of that climate. This appointment looks very much like a political job, and I say it is a shame and disgrace to keep him there at this salary.

Mr. MACDOWALL. The hon. gentleman thinks it is not worth while to pay $2,000 for traducing the country in those few words. I fancy the country has been paying a good deal more money to gentlemen who have traduced the country in a much more serious fashion.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The hon. gentleman accused me of making contradictory statements. I stated that Mr. Northwood had no object in telling me anything that was not correct. I said that he was anxious to use the inspector well in order to get as favorable a report from him as he could, and it was natural that they should all treat the inspector as well as they could, but Mr. Northwood had no object in telling me what was not true.

Mr. DEWDNEY. In answer to the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) I may say that I have considered the feasibility of offering some inducement for planting trees, but I have not yet decided to do so. The proposition of the hon. gentleman has been tried in the United States, and it was found there to be a failure and frauds were committed, and the regulation has been repealed. Therefore, I do not think it would be well for us to try the same experiment. But if anyone will enunciate some scheme by which we could induce the people to plant trees, I will be glad to adopt it. I think the Experimental Farm will do a good deal in this direction, and I think in a couple of years we shall see a good many trees planted at Indian Head, and when the people see the advantage of them, every farmer will plant trees for himself.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What kind of trees have been planted?

Mr. DEWDNEY. A large number of varieties, pines, firs, maples, ash and black walnut.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I) On what ground does the hon. gentleman justify asking for this vote of $2,000 for a forestery commissioner? His report shows that he has done nothing so far.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I am sorry to say that the gentleman who has occupied that position is now at the point of death, and I doubt whether he will keep the position another year. If we appoint a successor to him we shall try to find one who will be of some use.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is money so very plenty that you can afford to ask the House to vote thousands of dollars in the mere hope that something may be done by it? You have had a man appointed two or three years, you say he has done nothing, and now you ask a vote to appoint somebody else. Has there been any experiment made?

Mr. DEWDNEY. We propose to carry out the suggestion of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson).

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Does the Minister require a commissioner of forestry to carry out that suggestion?

Mr. DEWDNEY. He might be of some service.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I) In the absence of any explanation the House should refuse to pass this vote for $2,000. The hon. gentleman should not ask it unless he is satisfied that it is necessary in the public interest. We heard a good deal at the commencement of the Session about applying the pruning knife, but no attempt has been made to apply the knife to this expense. Extravagance runs riot in the hon. gentleman's department. He does not care, he hopes that something good may come of this expense. He might apply that statement to ten or twenty new officials. If all the departments were run on such a footing, where would the country land?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I desire to enquire from the Minister why the land commissioner is paid $5,000 a year, which is nearly $2,000 more than the salary of the deputy head of a department? This is a most extraordinary salary to pay for the services of the commissioner.

Mr. DEWDNEY. The hon. gentleman is aware that the predecessor of Mr. Smith, Mr. Walsh, was appointed at that salary, and it has been continued. I am sure from the work that is carried out in the office, a very experienced and specially good man is required, and I doubt, if the Government could get a man to carry out the duties for less salary.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I believe the hon. gentleman can obtain a man fully competent to discharge those duties for at least $2,000 less than this party is receiving. Surely if the hon. gentleman has a deputy at $3,200, he can get a party capable of acting as commissioner in that country for less than $5,000. I understand a large portion of Mr. Smith's time is taken up with his duties as general political manager for the Government in the North-West; that he is frequently called here for the purpose of consulting with the Premier in regard to the management of elections in that country; that he was here again and again immediately before the last general elections; that the duties he discharges in that respect are quite as onerous as those which devolve upon him as commissioner in the public service. It appears to me that this House will be wanting in its duty if it permits this officer to receive any such salary as that which he is receiving without dividing upon it.

Mr. SCARTH. The hon. gentleman probably forgets that the organs of his own party in Manitoba and the North-West admit, from one end of the country to the other, that Mr. Smith is thoroughly competent for the position he occupies, and has the confidence of the whole country.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). For which position?

Mr. SCARTH. For the position of Dominion Lands Commissioner. The hon. gentleman has said that he occupies another position. That statement is like a great many other statements the hon. gentleman makes. It is not founded on fact.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes; it is founded on fact.

Mr. SCARTH. The hon. gentleman has a right to say that it is, I happen to know that it is not. He is not general political manager in the North-West, and I believe the hon. member for Bothwell knows it thoroughly.

Mr. WATSON. Who is?

Mr. SCARTH. I am not aware that I am called upon to answer that question; Mr. Smith is not. Mr. Smith has a very vast acreage to manage in the North-West, and if there were in the position any man not so honest and responsible and as competent as Mr. Smith is, he might land the Government in great difficulties. I am satisfied the salary he receives is not too much for the duties he performs, and the manner in which he performs them.

Mr. LISTER. The commissioner receives a salary equal to that of a judge of a superior court, who has for years been preparing himself for the position. In so far as Mr. Smith is concerned: before his appointment he was political agent for the party, he was travelling round from point to point, and for all we knew he carried the boodle; at all events he appeared suspiciously in all quarters of Ontario when the elections were going on, and he was the recognised political agent of the party. Mr. Smith did not receive any training to particularly fit him for the position; yet he was appointed and that at a salary equal almost to the salary of the judges of the superior courts of the country. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Scarth) smiled when asked who was the political agent in the North-West and Manitoba. Of course, he would not admit it.

Mr. SCARTH. I denied that Mr. Smith is.

Mr. LISTER. That you were?

Mr. SCARTH. No.

Mr. LISTER. That is a matter of no consequence as you were not paid by this Government for it. The point to which we object is that the Government should pay Mr. Smith $5,000 for work not equal to the work done in the office by the deputy of the Minister of the Interior, or by almost any deputy under the Government. His responsibilities are not so great, his work is not so great, and he is paid enormously more. It is evident why he was appointed to that position, and why he is kept in it. Everyone in Ottawa knows, and the papers tell us, that he is constantly coming here during times of political excitement, no doubt to consult the leader of the Government, no doubt to advance the interests of the party in the North-West and to help hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I do not think the hon. gentleman should take any exception to the salary of the commissioner, because although he compares it with the salaries given to the judges, he must consider, if he knows anything of the work Mr. Smith has to perform, that he has to discharge onerous duties. There are many cases of disputed land claims coming before the Land Board, and it is necessary to have a thoroughly reliable man there and one possessing a knowledge of the duties of the office.

Mr. WATSON. I am not apt to find fault with Mr. Smith's salary in particular; I think he is receiving a very fair salary and is doing the work there very well. I contend that a man capable of earning $5,000 a year should be quite capable of finally deciding on claims placed before him. Mr. Smith has not the power as a land commissioner in Manitoba and the North-West that I should like to see him possess. I believe he should have power to settle almost all claims that come before him without submitting them to Ottawa. There is much delay caused by the board not having the power they should possess, and from claims having to be submitted to Ottawa. I repeat that if Mr. Smith is worth $5,000 a year, the salary paid to the best judges in the land, he ought to be sufficiently qualified to be entrusted with the final disposition of claims coming before him in Manitoba. I do not know whether Mr. Smith performs any other duties outside of those of land commissioner; but I have this to say that, as regards Mr Smith as land commissioner, he gives very good satisfaction and if he does anything more than that, if he does any outside transactions, such as being financial agent for the Government in Manitoba, I do not know anything about it. The member for Winnipeg (Mr. Scarth) is in a better position to inform us on that point than I am. He says Mr. Smith is not, and he should know and does know.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin.) The Minister should give the Committee some explanation with respect to the item of $46,818 for clerks, forest rangers, &c.

Mr. DEWDNEY. This is $8,000 more than was required last year. The increase is required to defray the cost of extra clerical assistance required from time to time during the year at the different agencies of Dominion lands.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What is the other $4,816 for? I may say that formerly, when the hon. gentleman who now leads the Government sat on this side of the House, he insisted, when we asked for estimates for the public service, that we should give a detail of the names of the parties and the sums that were required. Now, we have a statement that $46,818 is required, but we have no means in the world of knowing what it is required for. We ought to have the names of these parties, their stations and the amount of salaries they receive and what their duties are.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I can give you all that.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman will see that every name and the salary attached to each, that the hon. the Minister could read out, is published at page 62 and 63 F of the Auditor General's Report. It does seem to be taking up the time of the House unnecessarily, that a report should be read over to get what is already published there.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman will see that there are certain land offices established in the North-West. The report shows the amount of business done at those offices. The Auditor General's Report does not show where these men are located, you see the name of the party and the salary received, but you do not know whether or not there might be five times as many persons employed in the office as the business of the office requires.

Mr. FOSTER. The Auditor General's Report gives the number of employés in each office.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It shows the parties generally that are in the public service in the North-West connected with public lands, but there are local land offices established all over the country. The hon. gentleman has read the names of three or four persons at the office at Brandon, and we should know what amount of business is done there to necessitate the employment of all these people. My impression is that the business is not sufficient to necessitate the employment of more than one employé. The hon. Minister in coming here and asking us to vote these sums of money, ought to come with a statement of the amount required for each of these offices, and then we would be able to vote intelligently, for we could see from the report the amount of business done at these offices.

Mr. LISTER. Can the hon. gentleman distinguish how much of this sum of $48,850 is for travelling expenses, how much for contingencies, and how much for printing and stationery?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I cannot state just now. I will get you a statement of that. I would like to state that I have informed myself with regard to tree culture. The Act is not stopped in the United States.

Mr. LISTER. What are these extra clerks required for?

Mr. DEWDNEY. They are required in the office.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the use of this enormous host of extra clerks? We surely have clerks enough, without having to employ several hundred extra clerks, to whom we have to pay $28,000?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The returns have to be copied.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do we require to pay $28,000 to get a few returns? It is a most enormous charge. The only return we have got is this paltry sum of $94,000 as the total receipts for sales of land in the North-West, and we were promised a return of $7,000,000 or $8,000,000 a year. The whole of this business shows how badly the Government were informed, and the gross frauds that were perpetrated on this country by Ministers of the Crown when they induced the country to plunge into huge expenditure in the North-West, under the promise of the Government, over and over again, that they would reimburse themselves out of the money derived from the sales of lands. Here we have been for an hour trying to probe the hon. gentleman in charge of the department and to ascertain as well as we can whether there is the remotest chance of our obtaining from the sales of lands in the North-West enough to meet our expenditure. It is quite clear that for every dollar we receive we spend two in that department alone, without including other incidental expenses. We find the hon. gentleman's department has got 71 officers, deputy heads, chief clerks and the rest employed, besides these extra clerks. $82,672 are required for the Department of the Interior, besides this $28,900 for extra clerks, making $111,000; and all this expenditure for the purpose of collecting $94,000. The thing is perfectly absurd, and it behooves the hon. gentleman and his department, instead of coming down here and spending an hour or thereabouts in reading a long lecture in answer to the criticism made weeks ago by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), to give some sort of intelligible reason why these $28,000 are wanted.

Mr. DEWDNEY. If the hon. gentleman will come to my office, he will see that all these clerks are working from 10 a.m to 4 p.m every day, as hard as any clerks are worked in any office in the Dominion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What on earth are they doing?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The extra clerks are employed the whole time with North-West work, the returns from the land offices have to be filed; the accounts audited, the reports examined, and so on. If I can find that we can do with less clerks, I will remove those that are not required. In two or three weeks we propose to move into the new building, where I will be able to have a better supervision than I have in our present quarters.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How in the name of wonder would any land company expect its business to prosper, if it required to expend, as we have in the last two years, something like $888,000 for the service of the department, and barely collect $420,000. There must be an intolerable amount of red tape, and circumlocution, about the office to keep all these clerks employed. A good many of them must be occupied in perfectly useless occupations, such as duplicating returns, reports, &c. I have always felt, myself, that this attempt to govern the North-West from Ottawa was in many respects a huge mistake. I know something of the charges for managing large quantities of land in the United States by the railway companies; and I am sure, if the hon. gentleman would make enquiries, he would find their charges for administering large quantities of land, and administering them well, will not compare at all with the charges we are inflicting on the people. The reports of the Department of Agriculture are simply worthless. We have absolute proof that they are, for they assure us that 166 000 settlers had entered, while the census of last year showed that 44,000 did not remain. That is the evidence given to us from their own returns and from their own census returns. We know that, in all human probability, not more than 2,000 or 3,000 settlers, with their families, go in there in two or three years. Even this year, though it is said there is a very much greater immigration than usual, I doubt very much if more than 2,000 families, that is 10,000 people, will be found to have gone into the Territory which is under the hon. gentleman's department, though it is possible that more may go into Manitoba. The number who have settled in the Territories certainly, do not warrant the employment of this huge staff, as far as we can see, and we have a right to ask the hon. gentleman why he cannot get on with less. He says they are all employed, but how can they be all employed? I do not suppose that, all told, there can be more than a few hundred additional settlers for whom he has to provide patents for homesteads. I would be very glad indeed to believe that a large number of immigrants were settling there, but the returns of the Government do not show it

Mr. DEWDNEY. Immigration is going on very rapidly this spring, but for the last few years we have not received, I admit, the addition to the population which we expected. Now, however, the country has taken a start, and I have no doubt that condition of affairs in regard to settlement will improve. As to the lands we sell on time, and as to homesteads, every homesteader has to make his entry, and that means a large amount of business for the department. I think it is not fair to argue in the way which the hon. gentleman does in regard to the bad showing which we have on account of receipts. We have the work to do although we do not get the money, and the only reason for that is that we have not made the sales of land which we expected to make. We cannot expect to make those sales when we have given away the lands to the railway companies who are practically in competition with us, and they have their agents pressing the sales of their land, and they sell on long terms, so that we cannot expect to get as large an amount of money from the sales of land as we anticipated.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Why do you want so large a staff?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The work is all the same, whether we sell a quarter-section or allow a quarter-section to be homesteaded.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). How many extra clerks are employed in the department here?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I cannot say exactly, but I think about 150 or 155.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What conceivable work can there be for 155 clerks to do?

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I see that these extra clerks cost last year $62,000.

Mr. SCARTH. I think the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) will admit that the comparison between the land companies and the Government is not a fair one, because the land companies get revenue for every acre of land they have. They sell all their land, while the Government have not only sales of land but large grants to railways, and they have also all the homestead lands for which they get no revenue except the $10 entrance fee. I think the hon. gentleman himself will admit that the comparison he makes between the Government and the land companies is not a fair one.

Mr. LISTER. The Minister stated that the $28,000 for extra clerks at Ottawa was for copying and matters of that kind. I suppose the duties of these extra clerks is to copy documents in the department?

Mr. DEWDNEY. They have various kinds of work.

Mr. LISTER. Then you have another item for advertising, copying, &c, $7,000.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is for the returns that you ask for.

Mr. LISTER. It does not say so, and there are very few returns this Session. I do not think twenty returns have come down this Session.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think we should not pass this vote without impressing upon the Minister that next Session he must give to the House more distinct and explicit information than we have now. Many questions have been put to-night which the Minister has been unable to answer. I admit that he has been only recently installed in his position, and it may take a little time for him to master the details and to answer the questions in regard to his department, especially when the department has been split up between the office here and the office in the North-West; but I believe there is an amount of extravagance in the management of that department which compels us to ask for more explanation than we have, before we pass the item. I put a question, and my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister) put a question to the Minister, as to what a certain man had done for the $2,000 paid to him. The Minister could not tell us, but he asked us to vote that amount over again for a man who has, for years past, been drawing his salary and doing nothing. I put a question as to how it is that we pay a man in Winnipeg on another ground, and the Minister could not answer that. We must insist upon receiving more information than we have. We have been wading through a volume of expenditure for the last three hours, and we have had no such information as we should receive from a man at the head of a department. There is an amount of extravagance that cannot be explained. There are a lot of officials who are drawing salaries and doing nothing for them. There was the poor man—whose case we discussed yesterday—whom the Minister of Customs dismissed, who was getting $400 a year, and had served for a quarter of a century, and was kicked out on the street after paying all the time to the superannuation fund, without getting anything at all. I should like to ask if these people are contributors to the superannuation fund?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Not the outside service.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The policy of the Government has resulted in a scandalous and disgraceful failure. From first to last, the North-West Territories, and Manitoba also, have been used not to promote settlement there. The whole interest of this country was wrapt up in developing that country, and planting there a large population as we would have planted, if my hon. friend from Bothwell had remained at the head of that department, by this time 600,000 or 700,000 souls in that country, with a large and profitable trade. We would have had the Canadian Pacific Railway on a sound commercial basis. But, to-day, we have expended one hundred millions of the public money, and we have positively not added fifty thousand souls since 1881 to the population of Manitoba and the North-West. That is about the position which we are in to-day, after expending one hundred million dollars. We find that every promise which was solemnly made to us, and on the faith of which this country was committed to engagements which are now weighing it down, and which are as a millstone around the neck of every man, woman and child in the older Provinces of Canada, have not only not been redeemed, but we find that the Government are not able even to pay the ordinary expenses incident to the management of the North-West. We find that these are not only not redeemed, but that the gentlemen who are now in charge are absolutely unable to pay the ordinary expenses out of the resources of the North-West. That is the position we find ourselves in. Can any hon. gentleman wonder if we complain, can hon. gentlemen wonder that we recall these promises, that we recall to the minds of the people of the country how grossly and shamelessly they were deceived?—and more particularly when we look across the border and see that Dakota alongside, a country which is not any better than Manitoba, which has no greater advantages than Manitoba, in which the United States, I believe, has not spent a dollar of public money, still we find there a population of 600,000 or 700,000 souls. Now, the truth of the matter I take to be this: that instead of concentrating their resources, instead of endeavoring to develop a tolerable closely peopled district there, the Government committed the fatal mistake of allowing whatever immigration we had to be scattered all over the country. The consequence is that we find this money is frittered away, that an enormous number of agents are wanted, enormous expenditure is incurred, whereas if the population had been properly scattered as it ought to have been, and as it ought to be now, if the Government could do it, all this enormous waste would have been spared, and we would have been ten times better off. Now, it is our duty to call the attention of the people of Canada to the fact of the failure that has been made. Unless the failure is distinctly recognised, there is very little chance of anything better being done. I hope myself—although after what we have seen I do not venture to hope very strongly—that so far as Manitoba is concerned, there is a chance of something better being done. I am aware that there is a large immigration going on there, and at any rate from certain parts of Ontario, and I presume, now that we have got rid of the railway monopoly, and now that Mr. Greenway, who understands the country well, is given some little chance of being allowed to develop the country as he wanted, and has convinced the Government that it will not do to attempt to trample on the rights and liberties of the people of Manitoba, I am in hopes that something better will be done there. But all that does not in the slightest degree account for the expense that the hon. gentleman has been asking us for, and that does not account at all for such a vote as this in particular, this demand for 40 or 50 extra clerks to help the 70 clerks that he has got in the Department of the Interior. I say that 70 men ought to do ten times the work that can possibly be required to be done at headquarters, at any rate with respect to carrying on the necessary correspondence, and preparing the necessary papers, and all that kind of a thing.

Mr. DALY. I suppose the hon. gentleman has made the usual fling that he has had for several years at the North-West. He has been gracious enough to acknowledge that there are certain people going to Manitoba. It may be that the hon. gentleman has land there to sell, which he expects will increase in value by the fact of people going there. He does not acknowledge that people are going to the North-West, but they are going into Manitoba. Now, he said that during the time that his hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) administered the affairs of that country, it was prosperous, and that if he had continued to administer its affairs, that country would have been more prosperous. Now, Sir, I want the hon. gentleman to understand that there never was a time when the administration was so rotten and corrupt as it was during the time of the administration of the hon. member for Bothwell—never was so rotten on God's earth as it was at that time. Let the hon. gentleman remember the water stretches: take the Fort Frances locks—I say that during that time great rottenness existed in the affairs of the Department of the Interior as regards the North West, more than there has ever been since or ever will be. That is the fact and I can prove it. He knows it. Why, Sir, he refers to Mr. Greenway. Mr. Greenway dare not open a constituency in Manitoba to-day. The man that was elected last July——

An hon. MEMBER. Ha, ha!

Mr. DALY. He laughs, "ha, ha, ha!" We have heard that laugh before. I say that Mr. Greenway cannot open a constituency to-day. Mr. Jones, his treasurer, has had to come down to Ontario, his business connections brought him down here. The fact is that Mr. Greenway cannot open Winnipeg North, he cannot open a single constituency in the whole Province of Manitoba to-day, simply because he knows that the man whom he puts up would be defeated. We have had the same arguments presented to the people of Manitoba that the hon. gentleman has presented to this House, and that he has presented to the people of Ontario, and the people of Manitoba found that they were rotten, they have found that these hon. gentlemen are hypocrites, and I brand that hon. gentleman as the worst enemy to Manitoba and the North-West that stands in Canada to-day, and I will tell you the reason of it. He bought land years ago at $1 an acre, and he has not got the money out of it that he expected to get. But I want that hon. gentleman to understand that that land to-day is worth $9 for every dollar that it was worth nine years ago.

Mr. LAURIER. I must protest; the hon. gentleman is departing from the question under discussion.

Mr. DALY. But you have departed from it, you cannot have all this thing to yourself. I respect Mr. Laurier—I beg your pardon, the hon. member for Quebec East—I respect you, you are a gentleman; but I want you to understand that that hon. gentleman from Oxford is everlastingly, on every possible occasion he can get in this House, trying to deprecate our country, and I stand here as a representative of that country to tell him that I will not listen to it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You will have to listen to it.

Mr. DALY. Yes, no doubt; and we will listen to it probably for two years longer, but it won't have any effect upon the country. But I want to say this: that so far as regards the administration of our affairs to-day, the hon. gentleman who occupies the position of the Minister of the Interior has done all that he reasonably could do during the time he has held office, and I believe that his duties will increase from year to year. Now, the hon. gentleman has taken exception to the number of extra clerks. I, myself, have found that he needs them. I have written to the Minister on an average of two or three letters a day, and if each of the other members from Manitoba write as many as I do, you see it will entail a certain amount of extra correspondence and a certain amount of work in the Department of the Interior. Then if you take the number of men that are writing to the department from all over the North-West, if you take the number of land agents, the number of railway companies that have been organised there, you will understand that there is an immense correspondence; and if the hon. member for Bothwell held a position that the Minister of the Interior holds to-day, he would not be able to carry on the department at less expense than does that hon. gentleman. I want the hon. member for South Oxford to understand that notwithstanding anything he may say, notwithstanding anything that hon. gentlemen opposite may say, that country is going to prosper, is going ahead in a ratio to-day that Dakota will never exceed The hon. gentleman on every possible occasion holds out to the people of Canada that they should not go to the North-West, that they should not go to Manitoba, but that they should go to Dakota. All I can say is: God help the man that goes to Dakota.

An hon. MEMBER. He never said so.

Mr. DALY. Yes; he has said so. In the Committee the other day we had the same thing. Hon. gentlemen opposite in Committee tried to hold out that Dakota was a better place than Manitoba for our people to go to. They took exception to the fact that the Government had employed a man to go amongst the people and represent to them that Manitoba was the place to go to in case they chose to emigrate from Ontario. Now, Sir, I say the Government were perfectly justified in that matter. We have got to look to the fact that if our people in Ontario or Quebec feel that they cannot do well there, and they want to emigrate, they want to go to greater Canada—to Manitoba or the North-West—not to Dakota. I would tell the hon. gentleman for his satisfaction, that there are thousands of people who have gone to Dakota through the agency of the American railway companies, who wish to God they had never gone there, who were starving, and who have starved during last winter, and who are now going over the border. I say the Government cannot expend any money in a better way than by developing the North-West, and if the Department of the Interior to day has 159 or 160 clerks as the hon. gentleman says, if the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) or the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) will go to that department, they will find that they are employed in their legitimate work, for of course the work has developed year by year. It may be that we have not got the number of immigrants we expected, but we have men in that country who have gone in, probably with scarcely a dollar in their pockets, and yet we find they have developed the country, they have increased their earnings, and they have done in that country in five years, what they could not have done in any other part of Canada in twenty-five years.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think it is a quite sufficient answer to all the tirade of abuse the hon. gentleman has indulged in, and to his criticism of the action of this House with respect to the estimates of the Department of the Interior, to repeat the receipts and expenditure. The revenue received from that country during the last year was $217,000, while the expenditure was over $250,000. It is quite clear that we are paying more for salaries for clerks and officers than is proper, for the revenue we receive. The hon gentleman who has had his wrath pent up for some time, sought this opportunity to attack the hon. member for South Oxford. It is quite clear to any public man, or to any man who understands business, on a consideration of the receipts and expenditure, that the whole system is in an abominably rotten system, notwithstanding the statements made by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. LISTER. The Minister of the Interior in his estimates inserts $28,000 for extra clerks, $7,000 for copying. This is supposed to be for the preparation of returns brought down to this House. I call the attention of the Minister to page 75 of the Estimates, where he will find item 186, payment for extra clerks for services rendered in the preparation of returns ordered by Parliament, $5,000. So we have extra clerks receiving $28,000, we have the item of $7,000, and we have the item of $5,000, making in all $40,000 paid in the department.

Mr. TAYLOR. That covers all the departments, and does not refer to the Department of the Interior.

Mr. LISTER. That $5,000 is for the returns brought down to this House in all departments, and no portion of the $7,000 is expended for bringing down returns here. I was somewhat surprised by the speech of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly). He was not in his usual good temper this evening when he made an attack on the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). One would think, to see the hon. gentleman jump up if a word is said in regard to that country, that no one has the right to say anything about Manitoba and the North-West. The hon. gentleman will remember that the hon. member had a good deal to do with the Government of the country, with the early development of the country. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) is a recent importation into that country, four, five, or six years at most.

Mr. DALY. Eight years.

Mr. LISTER. Eight years at most. So he has gone in since the other Government was in power; and, let him talk as he will, every person in Canada desires to see that great Territory developed, and we hope it will develop in the future. But we have no right to shut our eyes to the facts as they are to-day, and while we contend and believe that our country is far superior to the country to the south of us, we have the spectacle before us that the population has not increased in the manner we have the right to expect, while it has increased with marvellous rapidity in the country to the south of us. Why is it? Is it because it is better governed or more honestly governed? It cannot be because it is a better country.

Mr. HESSON. They have 60,000,000 of people to draw from.

Mr. LISTER. You will find in the States whole townships peopled by Canadians. We have the fact that in Manitoba, with everything to attract settlers, we have a miserable 140,000 settlers altogether in the Territories and Manitoba.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I should like to call the hon. gentleman to order for calling the population of the North-West "miserable."

Mr. LISTER. 140,000 white people is all the population we have in that country. Why is it? Is it on account of the bad Government of the country, is it on account of the Government that has created monopolies which have destroyed the country?

Mr. HESSON. It is on account of the bad speeches from the other side of the House.

Mr. LISTER. I can understand why the hon. gentleman has just spoken. I should like to recall the time when that hon. gentleman ever voted against anything this Government proposed, be it ever so bad; and he never will vote against it. He cries like the babies do for Castoria. The Government have the hon. gentleman bound hand and foot; he has two sons in the public service and we do not know how many more he will ask to have put into Government positions, and he will wind up by asking a position for himself.

Mr. HESSON. You have not a decent son to put in.

Mr. LISTER. If the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has invested his money in the North West, perhaps it is a good deal more than any hon. gentleman opposite has done. It shows, at all events, that he has faith in the future of the country; and if his lands are worth $9 an acre, so much the better for him. But hon. gentlemen opposite instead of going to Manitoba, spend their money in Texas in cattle ranches, which have not turned out very profitably, I understand; and when they want to spend their own money and take their friends in again, they will probably go to Manitoba and the North-West.

Mr. SCARTH. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has, on several occasions, made a comparison between Manitoba and Dakota, and has been followed by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) I think the hon. member for South Oxford must know that Dakota has twice the area of Manitoba, and has also very large mining interests, which we have not, and a large proportion of its population is a mining population. But, apart from that, the hon. gentleman always forgets to state that when Manitoba was locked up, when it had no railway communication whatever, when it was a part of the Hudson Bay Company's Territory, Dakota was in touch with railway communication, and had been so for nearly nine years before Manitoba obtained that advantage. I do not intend to detain the House. I just want to point out that when Manitoba and the North-West was comparatively unknown, Dakota and Montana had railway communication. I think the hon. gentleman should state those two facts when he compares the increase of population in Manitoba with the increase in Dakota and the North-West States.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to suggest that we ought to do a little business now. We have had a pretty good fling.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). On both sides of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, on both sides of the House; and I think we ought to get a little business done now.

Mr. LISTER.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You cannot possibly take many more items to-night.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to take four or five with regard to steamboat subsidies.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What I want to point out is that the statement is a deliberate falsehood by whomsoever made, that I or any other man on this side of the House have ever preferred Dakota to Canada. I say it is a deliberate falsehood made from the basest possible motives if any man states so. What we have stated, and what I state here again, is this that in my judgment a large part of Manitoba is better than Dakota. I have always maintained that, but I say, that to my own positive knowledge one-half at any rate of the northern portion of Dakota over a stretch of 60 miles by at least 150 miles, has been filled, and is filling steadily for the last eight or nine years, with Canadians who would have much preferred going to Manitoba but who were driven out of Manitoba by the evil policy of the present Government, by their villainous National Policy, by their villainous railway policy, and by their still more villainous land policy. That is what I maintain on the point.

Mr. DALY. One-half the people who have gone out there cannot come back to Canada. They dare not come back.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think that if there has been a slander uttered with regard to any portion of the Canadian people, it is the statement made at this moment against Canadians who have sought homes in Dakota and the western States of the Union. I do not believe that any hon. gentleman on that side of the House, beside the hon. gentleman who has made the statement, will say that the two or three hundred thousand Canadians who are now residing in Dakato are criminals, and dare not return to Canada.

Mr. DALY. Take that back; I do not impute they are criminals.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman said that they dared not come back to this country.

Mr. DALY. Exactly.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And the hon. gentleman has repeated over and over again the slander, that had its origin on that side of the House, that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have advertised and have recommended to the people of this country Texas and Arkansas and Dakota. I say that this statement is wholly without foundation in fact. I say that the gentleman, whether inside of this House or outside of this House, who utters that statement is an unveracious calumniator of the gentlemen who sit on this side of the House. We were told that the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) had recommended Texas. I say that there is not an hon. gentleman on that side of the House that can turn to any sentence or to a syllable of a sentence ever uttered by the hon. member for East York that recommended Texas as a place of settlement for the people of this country. Let any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House stand up and repeat that statement and produce the evidence.

Mr. TAYLOR. His name was never used in that connection.

An hon. MEMBER. It was the member for West Durham.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The name of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) was never used in that connection. It was the hon. member for East York. The hon. member for West Durham was charged as recommending Kansas as a place of settlement, and that statement is as devoid of truth as the statement made with reference to the hon. member for East York. I defy any hon. gentleman on that side of the House to turn up a sentence of any speech made by the hon. member for West Durham, where Kansas is recommended as a place of settlement. That had its origin in the misstatement made by hon. gentlemen on that side of the House. Why, at the very time that these hon. gentlemen had been uttering those calumnies against hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, the Minister of Agriculture in the pamphlets which were being issued at the expense of the country, advertised lands for sale on the American side of the border. I see the member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) holds up a pamphlet with Mr. Blake's portrait upon it. Who published that pamphlet? Why, Sir, the person who was the editor of their organ for years, and I dare say he published it at expense, if not of the hon. gentlemen opposite, at the expense of the public Treasury. Those hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches have driven the people out of Manitoba. The Canadian people went from Ontario and from Quebec to settle in the North-West, but by the policy of the Government, they were driven across the border. Dakota was filled up from Manitoba.

Mr. McNEILL. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says "no." I say it is true. Look at the report of the Minister of Agriculture. What is the report made by the predecessor of the hon. gentleman who at this moment holds the office? Why, Sir, in their report they represented a population going into Manitoba more than twice over what is to be found in Manitoba at the present moment. Where have all those people gone? Have they all perished? Why hon. gentlemen know they have crossed the border and live on the American side of the boundary. These hon. gentlemen say that we are striving to prevent the growth of Manitoba. That is not so. We say that the country is a good country, but it has been scandalously governed.

Mr. BOWELL. "No D. M."

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And no "M. B." or no whatever else you like. The hon. gentleman says, "no D. M." I opposed and I would oppose to-day any scheme of jobbery or any improper transaction.

Mr. BOWELL. Quite right.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says "quite right," and I suppose the hon. gentleman says "no" and signs his initial to every document of which he does not approve. If I were in the hon. gentleman's shoes I would not have signed "M. B.;" I would not sign it for blind shares. I did not engage in any transaction of that sort.

Mr. BOWELL. Do you say that I did? Because if you do I say that you are telling an untruth and I will use stronger words if necessary.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Be a little cool. The hon. gentleman is not usually very civil, but he might try and be civil now.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not propose to take it from you. You must not think that because you are protected behind the Rules of Parliament you can insult gentlemen in this House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The proper thing would be for the hon. gentleman to keep his seat. No doubt he feels a little uncomfortable, but it would be more dignified if he would sit down.

Mr. BOWELL. Not while you are indulging in insolence and impudence and falsehood.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Let the Minister of Customs take his punishment like a man.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We know very well the policy of slander in which those gentlemen on that side of the House have indulged.

Mr. TAYLOR. I rise to a point of order. I would ask the Chairman is the item under discussion being discussed now?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The item under discussion is the speech of the hon. member from Selkirk (Mr. Daly). That is the item.

Mr. DALY. The member for Selkirk will rise again when you get through.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Sproule). I must say that both sides have indulged in considerable latitude in this debate, and that the discussion ought to be confined to the particular item before the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. The Chairman has ruled that the item is not being discussed.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I did not so understand the Chairman's ruling.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the hon. member for Bothwell will be inclined, now he has got out some pretty hard words, to let this matter drop.

Steam communication with the Magdalen Islands... $10,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What do you want an increase there for?

Mr. FOSTER. This is no increase. These subsidies have been paid interchangeably, some by the Post Office Department, and some by the Department of Finance. It is proposed now, under the Bill that the Postmaster General has before the House, that he shall pay, according to certain rates, for the mail that is taken on all these steamers, and the rest is furnished by the Finance Department.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I see that the subsidy of $7,500 for steam communication between Halifax and St. John is taken away this year. That is a very important line of communication.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend will have a chance to discuss that when the Supplementary Estimates come down.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I see that the item of $2,000 for steam communication between Halifax and St. Pierre has been dropped. I hope the Minister will be able to tell me that that will also be considered in the Supplementary Estimates. It is a very useful line, and it would be a pity if it should be withdrawn just now.

Steam communication between Prince Edward Island and the Mainland..... $5,000

Mr. ROBERTSON. Has the hon. gentleman made any provision for service between Pictou and King's County.

Mr. FOSTER. It is exactly the same service as that of last year, but at a lower rate.

Mr. ROBERTSON. But there is no service for King's County?

Mr. FOSTER. There has not been for years.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I think it is unfair that King's County should be called on to pay a portion of this subsidy and that it should receive no part of it. I think the Minister should make provision for a small subsidy there, in order that we might get a daily boat from Georgetown to Pictou. It would be a great benefit to Pictou, as well as to King's County and to the trade on the Intercolonial Railway; and as he has been able to make a reduction of $5,000 in the subsidy, I think he might afford to grant a subsidy for the eastern county. Perhaps he will yet consider the matter in the Supplementary Estimates. I know that there are a number of business men in the county who are desirous of putting on a boat if they only get a little encouragement by a small subsidy. The Stanley runs there in winter, but as soon as she is able she goes to the other ports.

Mr. FOSTER. There have been communications with various parties with reference to the subsidy of which the hon. gentleman speaks, but the Government cannot see their way this year to grant a subsidy.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Perhaps the Minister will take it into consideration in the coming year.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, yes.

Steam communication between St. John and Ports in Basin of Minas.....$3,000

Mr. ELLIS. Why is there a reduction in this item?

Mr. FOSTER. In accordance with the general policy to shorten a number of these, and I believe it is sufficient to carry on the service.

Mr. ELLIS. The performance of that service seems to be done very irregularly, and there ought to be some check kept on the trips. When the boat takes a trip, it ought to be checked.

Mr. FOSTER. She is paid only by trips, but not to exceed a certain amount.

Resolutions reported.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 1:50 a.m. (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 15th April, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ROYAL ASSENT TO BILLS.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have received a communication from the Governor General's Secretary to the effect that the Hon. Mr. Strong, acting as deputy to His Excellency, will proceed to the Senate Chamber, to-morrow, at four o'clock, for the purpose of giving assent to certain Bills which have passed the Senate and House of Commons.

TORONTO BOARD OF TRADE.

Mr. SMALL moved:

That all the rules and orders of this House be suspended as regards the Bill (No. 135) from the Senate, entitled "An Act further to amend the several Acts relating to the Board of Trade of the city of Toronto," and that the said Bill be now read the first, the second, and the third time and passed.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman will please explain the reason why he wants this.

Mr. SMALL. The Toronto Board of Trade is at present engaged in erecting a building at a cost of $400,000, and it has recently discovered that it can hold real estate only to the extent of $250,000; and, as the matter is urgent, the Bill was passed in the Senate, and concurrent legislation is required in this House.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Under the circumstances, I suppose this Bill ought to carry.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first, second, and third times, and passed.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. DEWDNEY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 136) to consolidate and amend the North-West Territories Acts. He said: This Bill proposes to consolidate the three Acts on our Statute-book in reference to the North West Territories, chapter 50 of the Revised Statutes, the short Act passed in 1887, and the Act of last Session constituting the Legislative Assembly for the Territories. The Bill is substantially for the consolidation of the present law, and proposes to give enlarged powers to the Legislative Assembly. That is the principal amendment. There is also an amendment giving the Legislative Assembly power to deal with the question of the sale of liquor to the same extent as the Local Houses in other Provinces, and retaining until the new Legislature meets, the present liquor law.

Mr. LAURIER. I protest most emphatically against the introduction of such a Bill at this period. The hon. gentleman cannot expect the House now to go into the subject of consolidation. If there are urgent amendments required in the North-West Territories, I am not prepared to say that we should not grant those amendments, but it is impossible at this late period to give the Bill the hon. gentleman proposes to introduce, the attention it requires, and, as far as this side of the House is concerned, we will not consent to legislation of this kind at present.

Mr. DAVIN. From the explanation given by the hon. Minister of the Interior, it seems to me that the amendments are so simple and so obviously needed——

Mr. LAURIER. I say nothing as to the amendments, but the hon. gentleman said he was going to consolidate the whole legislation. This is what I object to. As to the amendments, we shall deal with them when they are brought down; but my hon. friend must admit that it is impossible at this time of the Session to take up an Act consolidating the whole legislation of the North-West Territories.

Mr. DAVIN. I cannot agree with my hon. friend, because the amendments, after all, as I understand them, are of such a nature that the consolidation will not be an elaborate affair. The North-West Territories Acts which require consolidation are not numerous, and I hope that the leader of the Opposition will not take an attitude so hostile to the interests of the North West as he has suggested it is his intention to take.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the Government had any important legislation to present in regard to the North-West Territories, it ought to have been before the House a long time ago. We have been in Session two and a half months. The hon. gentleman expected to bring the Session to a close within the week, and, at the last week, he proposes to introduce a Bill for the first time. Surely the officers of the hon. gentleman's department, if the legislation were necessary, must have informed him of its necessity long ago; and if they failed in their duty in that respect, the measure can stand over until another Session. It is a most monstrous proceeding that would not be tolerated by the strongest Government that ever sat in England—the introduction, at the last moment of a Session, of a measure for the consideration of the House. I have called the attention of the House over and over again, to the fact that during the last fifty years every important measure of an English Administration, whether Tory or Reform, was introduced the first month of the Session, although their Sessions last seven months. Yet the hon. gentleman proposes, the last week of the Session, to introduce a measure for the first time. Such a proceeding is intolerable. The hon. gentleman treats the House as if its business were simply to record whatever the Government chooses to submit to it, without any serious consideration. I do not believe hon. gentlemen on this side are prepared to so interpret their duties.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I should be sorry to see this Bill withdrawn. There are certain matters that need attention, and although the hon. gentleman who has just spoken may not have a long time to look over the Bill before it comes up for discussion, still, with his knowledge of the country, he will be ready promptly to grasp the questions touched upon, and I am sure it will be a great benefit to the North-West that the Bill should be proceeded with.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Whether a benefit or not, it was the duty of the Government to inform themselves that this was an important measure, and to bring it down at the proper time. I do not think it is possible that sufficient consideration can be given to the Bill, unless the Government are prepared to keep the House sitting for a very much longer time than now anticipated; and, in any case, the practice of bringing down a Government Bill four days before the time the Government declare it was their desire to adjourn is a practice which cannot be defended on any precedent or ground whatever, except that of extreme urgency, in which case we would not desire to fetter the hands of the Government.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is not usual to oppose a Bill on the first reading; and I think my hon. friends opposite have been unduly alarmed at the word "consolidation" which my hon. colleague used in presenting this Bill. The fact is that the amendments he proposes to make in the North-West Territories Act are few and simple. He stated them, I think, as being only three. It will be desirable to have the three Acts relating to the North-West Territories—not the whole legislation, as the hon. gentleman for Quebec (Mr. Laurier) has said, relating to the North-West—consolidated, as they would be by passing this Bill, because that would avoid an incoherent kind of legislation which it would be very difficult for the North West Legislature to administer. But, as I have said, the amendments are very simple, and I think, when the Bill is printed and laid before hon. gentlemen, they will not find it so formidable or requiring so much attention as the word "consolidation" seems to lead them to imagine. I do not think we are open to the reproach of delaying this Bill until within the last four days of the Session. There is not, on either side, the slightest idea that the House will close before the end of next week at the earliest, and, if the task of consolidating these three Statutes is too formidable a one, it may be thought desirable that legislation should be confined to the amendment of the Acts at this Session. I think, however, that the Bill should be now advanced a stage, and laid before the House, so that it may see whether it is of such a formidable character as is supposed.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

GENERAL INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No 137) further to amend the General Inspection Act. He said: The amendments are not many, and I do not think they will cause much discussion. The first is to give power to the inspectors to appoint deputy inspectors of grain in the North-West and Manitoba, who are to be deprived of having any interest in the purchase of grain. Further, in regard to wheat, at present the wheat produced east and west of Port Arthur is governed by different standards, but this Bill provides that a Board of Examiners shall be selected from Port Arthur westward. This is in compliance with the request made by the representatives of Manitoba and the North-West, and the Boards of Trade in that country, and I think it is a most reasonable one. In addition to that, there is a short amendment proposing to change the inspection fees on pearl ash and potash, and so forth, from 10 cents per 100 lbs. to 20 cents. There is an inspector in Montreal, who keeps an office there for the discharge of that particular duty, and he has established a credit for his inspection which gives it great value in the country. All this pearl ash and potash goes through his hands for inspection, but it has been found that the fee of 10 cents per 100 lbs. is not sufficient to keep up his office and give him any remuneration. Last year, he applied to the Government to pass an Order in Council allowing him to collect a higher amount. Of course, that could not be done, because no Order in Council could override an Act of Parliament, but the parties interested in the trade asked for such a change, and all agreed to pay him 20 cents instead of 10 cents per 100 lbs. I told him that we could not give him the authority to collect any more than 10 cents, and that, if he did collect more, there might be a refund demanded. However, the trade has paid him 20 cents, recognising the fairness of the demand, and this amendment proposes to legalise it.

Mr. LAURIER. I must enter the same protest to this Bill as I did a moment ago to the Bill introduced by the Minister of the Interior. This legislation of the hon. gentleman is most important, and should not have been introduced at this late period of the Session, but should be brought in during the very early days of the Session, so that it might have been before the public long enough to give them the opportunity of looking into it, and making up their minds upon it. The hon. gentleman proposes to introduce an alteration in the recognised grades of wheat. I do not say the change is not wanted. It may be wanted. For some years, I believe, it has been said that there should be a change, but I am not able to say now, whether the alterations which are proposed are those which are required to suit the trade or not. The hon. gentleman says this amendment is demanded by the Boards of Trade of the west. So it may be, but the Boards of Trade of the east should also have an opportunity to speak on the subject, and the proposed alteration should be brought at an early period of the Session, so that the public should have had an opportunity to see it and offer any comments they desired upon it. The hon. gentleman must admit, and the whole House must admit, that it is not fair to the House, or to the country, to introduce important measures such as this, in the very last days of the Session. We expected that the Session would close at Easter. That hope is no longer entertained, but we have heard the remark made by the Minister of Justice, that we may close at the end of next week. Is it possible, in two weeks, for these amendments to receive the attention which they deserve. I again protest against this legislation being introduced at such a late date, and I hope it will not be proceeded with.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. gentleman may not have heard me correctly, but this is not a question of change of standards. That power is given under the present law. The only question is whether the standard should be fixed by a board from the western section or not. It is simply to provide for the organisation of a Board of Examiners to fix the standard. Of course, we are glad to receive the views of all these Boards of Trade on these questions, and that is one of the reasons for the delay. The Bill was under consideration by the Government in the early part of the Session. The Boards of Trade throughout the Dominion did not agree, and it is only recently the Winnipeg Board of Trade came here to make their representations.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DIVORCE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 123) for the relief of George McDonald Bagwell (on a division).—(Mr. Brown.)

Bill (No. 124) for the relief of Arthur Wand (on a division).—(Mr. Small.)

Bill (No. 125) for the relief of Henry Middleton (on a division).—(Mr. Small.)

DIVORCE—W. G. LOWRY.

Mr. SMALL moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 119) for the relief of William Gordon Lowry.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Before you leave the Chair, I have to call the attention of the House again to this Bill. I stated when the Bill passed the second reading that I would do so, and that I should have to oppose the Bill unless it were based upon a different case from that which was presented when it came here from the Senate. I find that the Bill does not present, on the evidence taken before the Select Committee on Private Bills, any new case, and that the evidence there taken has been confined to an exoneration of the petitioner from the charge or suspicion of collusion with his wife as regards any application for a divorce, and as regards the elicitation of any evidence for the purpose of sustaining the application. I think that, so far as that point goes, the evidence is satisfactory to show that the petitioner was not guilty of any collusion. The case, however, still rests solely upon the admission of the wife, obtained, as was shown by the hon. members who addressed the House on it about two weeks ago, under very peculiar circumstances. In the first place, the admission was solicited by the husband and by a witness whom he took with him for the purpose of being a witness, the admission on the part of the wife being made under circumstances in which it was her interest to make it, because it was apparent that she was desirous of obtaining a divorce, fully as desirous as the husband was to get one, because it is apparent that at that time she had not only formed the desire of marrying again if possible, but had selected the person with whom she wished to unite in matrimony. Under these circumstances she made the admission which was necessary, apparently, in the judgment of those concerned, to obtain a divorce. This is the only evidence relied upon in this case, and it seems to me that under the true English interpretation as to the opportunity for an offence to have been committed with the man Wilson with whom it is charged as having been committed, and taking all the circumstances into consideration, there is no presumption whatever that the offence was then committed, and that the case rests, as it did at the outset, simply upon the evidence of the wife's admission, made under circumstances which make that admission of very little value. I can only say, speaking as one who is acquainted with the practice in divorce courts, that no divorce, in courts whose procedure I am acquainted with in cases of this kind, would be granted upon this evidence. I am not aware of any case in which it has been granted upon such evidence elsewhere, and I am assured by those gentlemen who are accustomed to the judicial practice from day to day in cases of judicial separation, that the evidence here would not be deemed sufficient for that purpose in their courts. Under these circumstances I feel bound to move that you do not now leave the Chair, but that the further consideration of the Bill be deferred to this day six months.

Mr. SMALL. I believe it is the practice in the English House of Lords to grant a divorce on the admission of one of the parties, when the surrounding circumstances are such as would warrant it. I think the evidence given by the blacksmith in the house where the respondent and Mr. Wilson met, is quite sufficient to warrant us in granting relief to the petitioner in this case. Those who have read the evidence clearly come to that conclusion.

Mr. JAMIESON. I desire to make some remarks on the motion before the House. Inasmuch as the Bill has reached the present stage, according to regular procedure of both Houses of Parliament, I think it is entitled to a considerable amount of consideration at the hands of the members of this House. These Bills stand in a somewhat different position from other Bills which come before Parliament, more especially public Bills. In cases of this kind the petitioner has no other alternative but to resort to Parliament for the purpose of obtaining relief, when he deems himself entitled to relief. Consequently, he is put to a good deal of expense, and it behooves members of this House to approach the consideration of Bills of this kind with a great deal of judgment and to exercise care in determining them. Reference was made the other evening to the vote on this Bill in the Senate. I must say, without charging the Minister of Justice with anything wrong in the matter, that he was rather disingenuous in making the statement in this House that this Bill had passed the Senate by a very narrow majority. As a matter of fact, it passed the Senate by a vote of 28 to 4. It is quite true there were 23 votes cast against it in the Senate, but 19 of these votes were cast by Senators who, under all circumstances, vote against measures of this kind, so that practically the vote in the Senate stood 28 to 4, or almost unanimous. I may say too, that the facts were carefully scrutinized and examined by the Senate, and that body is so accustomed to deal with questions of this kind, that I think its judgment may be relied upon to a very great extent. The Bill was attacked in the Senate, and when I saw it attacked there, I came to the conclusion that it would also be attacked in this House, and the gentlemen who attacked the Bill there did not appear to me to attack it fairly or on its merits. The Bill was defended in the Senate by the chairman of the Divorce Committee, and in referring to the attack made upon the Bill, the hon. gentleman said:

"As chairman of the Committee it becomes me to say a few words in respect to this case The evidence is short and the proof is, to my mind, conclusive. My hon. friend, from whom I am exceedingly sorry to differ on this occasion, had not the advantage of hearing the witnesses give their testimony."

That was the language of Senator Gowan, a gentleman who occupied a seat on the Bench of Ontario for over thirty years and whose experience and judgment are almost unquestionable. He further said:

"The petitioner in this case is a young farmer, twenty-four or twenty-five years of age, a very respectable looking young man, and his demeanor in giving his evidence most favorably impressed me, as it did, I think, every member of the Committee. And so with regard to every witness that was examined before us."

I might refer to the discussion that took place in the Senate, but I do not desire to do so at the present moment. With respect to the evidence, the Bill was referred to the Private Bills Committee of this House, so far as I understood the matter, largely with a view to having the evidence as to collusion cleared up, and, I think, in the judgment of every member of that committee, it was established beyond question that there was no collusion between these parties. In regard to the facts of the case, I have just a word or two to say. We are told that it is not proper to grant a divorce upon the admission of the parties. As a lawyer, I have always been led to understand that a party's own admission of guilt was the very highest kind of evidence. In this case, it could not possibly be for the interest of this woman to admit her own degradation; consequently, her admission should be relied upon, if nothing else were shown to this House. But, in addition to that, we have collateral evidence which goes very far to show her admission of guilt was true. The Minister of Justice says it has not been the custom to grant divorces on the bare admission of the parties. I would refer the hon. gentleman to the Joynt's case which came last year before the House of Lords. In that case the only evidence, in addition to the admission of the respondent in the case, was the fact that she had been seen by a policeman to enter the house of the adulterer. I leave it to any hon. gentleman who had read the evidence to say whether this case is not a very much stronger one than the Joynt's case, as shown by the evidence before the House of Lords. In this case we have evidence that the young woman had immoral connection with the young man Wilson before her marriage. We have it further in evidence that some seven months after marriage she was delivered of a child; in addition to that we have evidence that she admitted to her husband the fact that she had had improper connection with Wilson. In addition it was proved that some months after marriage she met this man Wilson at the house of Mr. Wright, who was called in this case, and that they spent from ten o'clock in the evening to one o'clock in the morning together. I do not desire to prolong the discussion, but, taking all these facts together, a very strong case has been made out for the relief of this unfortunate young man whose prospects in life have been blighted in this manner.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would somewhat resent the observation of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson), that I had been disingenuous in stating that this Bill has passed by a narrow majority in the Senate, if I thought the hon. gentleman understood the word he made use of. On the occasion when this Bill was before the Senate there was an ample discussion of the facts bearing on the case, and then there was a division taken, the lists of which I can place in the hands of hon. members in a few minutes; every phase of the evidence was fully discussed and the majority in favor of the Bill did not exceed five, two Senators excusing themselves from voting because they had not read the evidence.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I wish to make one observation, and one only. I understood the member for Lanark (Mr. (Jamieson) to say that the circumstances of the meeting were more than suspicious, and that from this he was led to the conclusion that there had been undue familiarity. I have read that evidence closely and I do not think the evidence taken before our Private Bills Committee strengthens by one iota the evidence taken before the Senate Committee. On the contrary there is nothing in the evidence from which you can draw a legitimate conclusion that they were together for half an hour. The man who said they were together in the kitchen said he was asleep, and he did not know what time they might have been there. His evidence was that he could not form an exact idea of the time, and he could give no reason for coming to the conclusion that they were together for twenty minutes. Of course we can grant the divorce, but all I can say is that if we do we grant it on the flimsiest of evidence.

House divided on amendment of Sir John Thompson.

Amendment negatived, Bill considered in Committee, and read the third time, reported and passed on a division.

INDIAN AGENT AT CAUGHNAWAGA.

Mr. DOYON asked, Whether the salary of A. Brosseau, Indian agent at Caughnawaga, was increased during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1888; if so, at what date, by what amount, and for what reasons?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Mr. Brosseau's salary was increased on the 10th of July, 1887, by $200 per annum, owing to increase in the duties of his office.

BRITISH COLUMBIA MINERALS.

Mr. BARNARD asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government, in order to encourage the development of the mineral resources of British Columbia, to place quartz-mining, reducing, or smelting machinery on the free list, for a short period?

Mr. FOSTER. That is a question which it is impossible for me to answer.

REPAIRS TO THE WHARF OF STE. ANNE DE LA POCATIÈRE.

Mr. DESSAINT (translation) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make, in the course of the coming summer, the necessary repairs to the wharf at Ste. Anne de la Pocatière, in the County of Kamouraska?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. gentleman, I may state that I have enquired at the department whether there were particulars relating to that matter. I was told there was not. I shall enquire about the circumstances and see what we can do.

NEW DEPARTMENTAL BUILDING, OTTAWA.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Has the contract for painting the new departmental building on Wellington street been let? If so, was it by tender, for what amount and to whom awarded? How many tenders were received, and was it given to the lowest; if not, why not?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am informed by my chief architect that there is very little painting connected with the building, and what there is is included in the contract of Mr. Charlebois, who was the lowest tenderer for the whole work The oiling and varnishing, of which there is a good deal, is also included in the contract.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What amount?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I don't know; it is a portion of the contract.

GRAND NARROWS BRIDGE.

Mr. FLYNN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to bring to the notice of the First Minister (whom I do not see in the House now) the promise he made here on the 5th April last, in discussing an item of $400,000 for a bridge across the Grand Narrows, to bring down the papers connected therewith. That promise was made a week ago last Monday, and subsequently the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) repeated the request, and the First Minister again said he would bring down the papers next day. The papers have not been brought down yet. This is a very important question, and we are now nearing the close of the Session. I do not see why the papers should not be brought down before this.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I know that the leader of the Government took a note of this, and promised to bring down the papers, and I have no doubt they will be brought down without delay.

TARIFF CHANGES.

Mr. LAURIER. I would like to enquire of the Minister of Finance if he is prepared to set a day when he will ask the Committee of Ways and Means to sit, and whether we are to have any changes in the tariff?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not prepared to-day to answer that question.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 121) to amend the Summary Trials Act.—(Sir John Thompson.)

SUMMARY CONVICTIONS ACT.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 126) to amend the Summary Convictions Act, chapter 178 of the Revised Statutes, and the Act amending the same.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This section repeals the first section of last year's Act, and merely has the effect of striking out the provision about costs.

On section 2,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We adopted, last Session, an amendment to the Summary Convictions Act, and in the Senate the Bill was amended in such a way as to provide for the recovery of costs in certain cases. The provision made by the Senate was, that the fees should be as nearly as possible the costs in proceedings before justices in civil cases in like matters, and I promised, when the amendments were agreed to in this House, that this Session we would adopt a schedule of fees. For that purpose, I have prepared this measure. The fees provided for are those in use now in Ontario, in summary conviction cases, before justices of the peace, under provincial statutes.

On section 6,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The period of limitation now prescribed by the statute is three months. That is the shortest period of limitation that I know of, and I propose that it shall be extended all through Canada to twelve months.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I prefer the shorter term.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Twelve months does not seem to me to be too long, and very few statutes have prescribed a shorter term.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). It keeps it hanging over the head of the man all that time.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Very many of these offences are not discovered until after three months have expired.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). My impression is that they are generally put through pretty quick under the Summary Convictions Act, except where the party evades service. But if the complaint is made, and the warrant is issued, then he may be proceeded against any time afterwards.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We have had cases repeatedly in which justice has been entirely defeated, owing to the shortness of the period of limitation, and to the fact that, while proceedings were being taken, and proof being obtained, the time had expired. But we have no objection to make it six months. I presume it could be made uniform.

Bill reported.

EXPROPRIATION OF LANDS.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 131) respecting the Expropriation of Lands.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There are a few amendments required in this Act, and it was thought that it would make them plainer, and more convenient, if the Act was consolidated. We intend to repeal the old Act, and re-enact it with some amendments.

On section 9,

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I suppose the hon. Minister has considered the question as to how we can exercise the power of general expropriation. Of course in building railways, where we have the power to incorporate, we must have the power to expropriate or to authorise expropriation; but that is an entirely different matter from a general provision in regard to expropriation. I do not see any power given to the Parliament of Canada for general expropriation except for one purpose, namely, that of taking lands for purposes of defence.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It can only be done for the purpose of any public work we are authorised to carry on. It is only for works we have a right to construct that this power can be used, and I will see that it is limited to that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The power is stated in the 107th section of the British North America Act, and it is limited to purposes of defence.

On section 16,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This is a new clause shown to be necessary by recent proceedings with respect to the construction of railways. It provides that in certain events the Exchequer Court may, after due notice, appoint a guardian with authority to sell and convey the property.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the property is situated within the limits of a Province, how can we confer ability or remove present disability to enable anyone to convey land, or how can we remove present incapacity or change the capacity of a party? Surely this is a civil right, and, if a railway company, incorporated by this Parliament, chooses to expropriate lands, they must conform with the laws of the Province in which they are situated, and deal with the parties who have the capacity under the laws of the Province. We may legislate on this subject in the Territories, but I confess I do not see how it can be done with regard to Provinces.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Sections 16 and 17 had better stand in order that I may consider this point further.

On section 22,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This is a new section and affords the means of overcoming the resistance to the officers of the Crown entering upon land without bringing such officers into actual collision with the persons resisting. There is a provision something like this in the Railway Act, but no company is allowed to exercise such power without payment of the compensation, or the securing of the right by paying the money into court. The supposition is that there is no security so good for compensation as the public Treasury, and, therefore, the Crown is not to be compelled to make payment before taking possession.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Suppose persons claim adverse titles to the lands.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This clause is merely to prevent violent resistance. There are ample provisions to protect the rights of parties concerned.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have a case in the Exchequer Court in which the Crown are occupying a piece of land on the Prince Edward Island Railway, and the person defending the suit alleges certain equitable reasons why the Crown should not be permitted to oust him. The person, under the present law, would remain in possession until the Crown expropriates the land, but if this section passes there will be no necessity to bring the question before a court at all. The Crown would simply issue its warrant to oust him by force.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The present law would cover that case. We can, by filing the plan, oust him and leave him to his recourse against the Crown in the Exchequer Court, either by expropriation proceedings or petition of right. We have the right to expropriate his property, and this section is merely to say that he shall not resist.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In nine cases out of ten that would work as the hon. Minister suggests, but this case I quote is the tenth case.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We may possibly limit the operation of this section to cases of construction of public works, and not for the recovery of lands when the public work has been erected.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does this enable the Crown to turn a man out of his house, or is it for the possession of land alone?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We can take his house for any public work, under the present law. I think with my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies), that it ought only to be for a construction of a work that we should exercise this summary process.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Suppose any Local Legislature were to legislate on this subject and would provide by general law the terms upon which property would be expropriated for any public purpose, and make that applicable to Dominion works; does the hon. gentleman think that this law would operate?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would not think they had any power to do that, because I think they have no power to pass legislation relating to the expropriation of lands for public works under the control of this Parliament. I would think their powers of legislation with regard to expropriation were confined to works which they could undertake themselves.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Of course the right of eminent domain, strictly so-called, could be only exercised by the Government which has the right to exercise it; but where you make general provision for general expropriation and compensation, it seems to me the Government should undertake to protect the civil rights of its citizens by stating on what terms the property might be taken, if those terms were such as not to interfere with the liberty of the Government here, and if they did not impose any conditions greater than they did for their own public purposes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is open to argument at least whether it would not be well to qualify that section by declaring that the judge may issue his warrant after having called upon the party to show cause why it should not issue. It might be made the means of oppression, without giving the defendant some chance to show cause why he resisted.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We will let the section stand in the meantime.

Committee rose and reported progress, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

MENNONITE IMMIGRANTS—LOANS.

Mr. CARLING moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider resolution (p. 1146) respecting the amount due on certain loans made to Mennonites in Ontario for assistance to Mennonite immigrants.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. CARLING. In 1875, a loan was made to Mennonites in Ontario to induce a number of their poorer brethren to settle in the North-West, and bonds were given by a number of gentlemen in Ontario, in the County of Waterloo, that this money should be repaid with interest at 6 per cent. No money was to be asked for from them until after four years, and then it was to be refunded, and interest at 6 per cent. was to be paid until the whole sum was paid back. The Mennonites met with a series of reverses, there were devastating floods in that part of the Province in which they were settled, which caused a great deal of loss and hardship to them, a number of them were unable to pay the money loaned, and this was secured to the Government by these gentlemen in the Province of Ontario. They applied at numerous times to have some relief, but they have paid up the whole of the principal to the Government with 4 per cent. from the time the money was loaned until the 1st of July, 1888. The resolution I now move is to accept the principal and 4 per cent. interest from the time the money was loaned until the 1st of July 1888, in full discharge of the debt.

Mr. WATSON. Is it the Mennonites who benefit from this reduction of interest, or is it the persons who advanced the money to the Government in their behalf?

Mr. CARLING. The Government dealt entirely with the committee of gentlemen who undertook the repayment of this money. This committee reported that a number of the Mennonites who settled there were unable to pay, and they were obliged to meet the payments for them. Mr. Shantz, who was chairman of the committee, a highly respectable gentleman, a man who has taken great interest in immigration, and is well known in Ontario, represented to the Government, for this committee, the state of the case, and, after full consideration, the Government thought it well to accept the amount they have offered.

Mr. BOWMAN. My hon. friend (Mr. Watson) asked whether the persons who obtained this loan were to get the benefit of this reduction, or the persons who went security for them in the County of Waterloo. I have a pretty full knowledge of the circumstances under which this loan was obtained, and am well acquainted with nearly every one of the persons who secured this loan. I can assure the hon. gentleman that not one of these persons who went security for this loan will benefit to the extent of one cent by this reduction. On the contrary, these very same persons assisted their co-religionists in Manitoba in two ways, besides going security for them. They assisted them by loaning them a large amount of money in addition to the loan which they got from the Government, and, in another way, they aided them by large subscriptions to contribute towards their expenses in settling in Manitoba, without getting a dollar of it back again.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. CARLING moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 138) respecting a loan therein mentioned to certain Mennonite immigrants.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the hon. gentleman ought to tell us why this measure was not introduced earlier in the Session.

Mr. CARLING. It was intended to introduce it early in the Session, but for some reason or other, it was delayed. I do not think there can be any objection to this measure.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The reason I put the question is, because I think that when the Government have nine months out of the year, when the House is not in Session, in which to prepare their measures, they ought to be ready with them early in the Session. Although they ought not to be precluded from introducing a measure arising out of unforeseen matter, still the House is entitled to have those measures submitted at the earliest possible period of the Session. If the hon. gentleman had done this, there is no reason in the world why the business of the House should not have been concluded this week. It is only because measures are introduced now at the very last moment of the Session that we are delayed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think that is very unjust. I do not think that in any Session of my recollection, and I am quite sure not in my hon. friend's recollection, has the business in the hands of the Government been earlier introduced, or more steadily pressed.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Three Government measures were introduced to-day for the first time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What of that? There was plenty of Government work before you all the time.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Not at all.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, you had. On every Government day there was plenty of work for the House to do. The House has been fully employed, and earlier than in any other Session, and since we asked for additional days, we have employed the House busily on Government measures. If there is any cause of complaint, I think the blame must be shared by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would just say to the hon. gentleman that the practice in England is to introduce Government measures in the first month of the Session, and this is done, as a rule, in order that the country may know what is contained in the measures of the Government, and that the members of the House may be able to consult their constituents in reference to them. Now we have no opportunity of consulting our constituents upon any one of the measures of the Government now introduced. It is quite unfair that the Opposition should be asked to quietly consent to the introduction of three important measures at this late period of the Session. The First Minister has said that there is enough remaining to do on the paper, and these Bills are very important, particularly that relating to the Inland Revenue, which will affect every part of the Dominion, and one which a great many men would desire to consider before it became law. It is unfair that the Opposition should be asked quietly to consent to the introduction of these important measures now, to be rushed through and become law, while many men in the Dominion, better versed in the particulars than the Minister himself, or perhaps any hon. member on this side of the House, are not afforded an opportunity of expressing their views. If the public are to be allowed an opportunity of criticising Government measures with that intelligence and experience which many men are able to bring to bear on such questions, they should be introduced long before this late hour. This course is unfair to hon. members on this side of the House, because we cannot give the measures that careful criticism we should bestow upon them, and if the Government were to discharge their duties thoroughly, these Bills would have been in the hands of the House long before this period. It is unfair to us and unfair to the country. If the Minister of Inland Revenue was in a condition of health, or in any other condition to unfit him introducing that Bill, the duty should have been committed to some other Minister, instead of introducing it on this, the last Monday, when the Government have already intimated their desire to close at Easter. It is unfair to expect the Opposition to consent to such an injustice; I do not feel disposed to do so.

Mr. HESSON. If the hon. gentleman would take the trouble to look over Hansard, he would find he had occupied a very large portion of the time of the House this Session. I do not think it would have been possible for the Government to have brought forward their measures with greater rapidity, unless that hon. gentleman had occupied less of the time of the House. I do not think there is anything in the Bill now before the House which is objectionable, and I consider it should pass with the usual explanation from its introducer. As to delay, there are many hon. gentlemen who have occupied more time, perhaps, than was absolutely necessary in the interests of the country, or that was necessary for fair criticism of the items before the House. We all know that we might have spent Easter at home, except for the numerous occasions when the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) occupied the time of the House with unreasonable criticisms.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT.

House resolved itself into Committee to consider resolution to amend the Inland Revenue Act, and to make better provision for the working of the said Act (page 1221).—(Mr. Costigan.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. COSTIGAN. I desire to substitute $1.50 per thousand instead of $1.75 per thousand as the excise duty on cigarettes weighing not more than three pounds per thousand. The duty of $1.50 per thousand would exactly equal, according to the present system of manufacturing cigarettes, a duty of 60 cents per pound. Cigarettes pay the largest duty of any tobacco, and as we have no desire to increase the duty, we propose the amount should remain at $1.50.

Resolution reported, and concurred in.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 139) further to amend the Inland Revenue Act. He said: The changes proposed deal entirely with departmental matters. The legislation in the North-West Territories makes it necessary to ask for certain changes in connection with the issue of writs of assistance. In prosecutions under the Inland Revenue Act it is provided under the present law that these prosecutions must be taken up and proceeded with under the Summary Convictions Act, and that limits the time for prosecuting to three months. The Customs Department found it necessary to extend the time to twelve months, and the same is asked with respect to the Inland Revenue. It has been found that the time expired before the necessary information was obtained and prosecutions instituted. Some other clauses of the Bill deal with the matter of ascertaining the duty payable upon malt, that is, the gauging of the malt. The present gauge is compulsory as taken from the kiln. The floors of the kilns are found in many cases to be unequal and uneven, and the gauge is, in many cases, unreliable, and, therefore, we take power that, while having the right to take the measurements of the kiln, we have also power to weigh the malt so as to ascertain the exact quantity upon which duty should be paid. The next change is to take the power to collect 15 cents per gallon upon certain products manufactured from spirits in bond. The reason for that is that last year, when amending the law with regard to the manufacture of methylated spirits, which we found had been abused, we struck too much out of the Act. This simply re-enacts that portion which we struck out, and is necessary to enable us to collect the duty, and the House will see that in this case it dates back to the time of the repeal of the Act. This is done with the consent of the manufacturers, who have actually paid the duty in good faith. We simply wish to legalise what they have paid. The other clause provides for the collection of duty on cigarettes by the thousand, instead of by weight as is the case at present. This change will be a matter of convenience to the department and to the manufacturers, without changing, lessening, or increasing the duties levied.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE—PENSIONS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved second reading of Bill (No. 118) to authorise the granting of pensions to members of the North-West Mounted Police force. He said: I gave an explanation of the objects of this Bill when the resolution upon which it is founded was before the House. The intention of it is to give some inducement to the members of the North-West Mounted Police whom we desire to retain in the service, to re-enlist in the force. I explained that it was of very great importance that the men who are best qualified to perform the various and complicated duties of mounted policemen should be retained in the force, and that at the end of the five years, which is the term of enlistment, those men who may be valuable members of the force and who are yet, for various reasons, not fit to be commissioned officers, should be induced to remain. It takes some years before an enlisted policeman really learns his work. The House must not consider that these men are to be looked upon as mere soldiers—as a mere fighting commodity to use in case of war, or rumors of war, or serious outbreaks—they are peace officers, they serve processes, and they must be all educated men; in fact they are all educated men. Besides this, the physical standard required from recruits is very high, and at least fifty per cent. of the recruits are rejected because they do not come up to this standard. A young man joining the force at first is of exceedingly little use until he learns his business. Suppose an emigrant—one of those crofters, for instance, and I think those crofters are all educated men, because they are Scotchmen—but suppose one of those men is enlisted and sent out to the North-West, he would be quite helpless at first in that strange country. As the hon. gentleman at whom I am looking (Mr. Watson), knows, these emigrants have to be looked after when they come here first; someone has to show them how to settle, and where to settle, and what to do, and it is the same way with the police recruit. He has to be trained to his business. There are some men we do not desire to re-enlist after their five years' term is served, although very often they wish to remain. This class of men have no confidence in themselves to make out a living; but the really good men, if they have no prospect of a provision for them in life, leave the service at the end of five years. The object of this measure is to promote the efficiency of the force, and to retain the men whom it is desirable to retain. The difference between the five years' man, who has shown aptitude for the performance of his duty, and the recruit, is the difference between skilled and unskilled labor. As I mentioned, the expense to the country will not be much when you consider that everyone of those men who served five years in that service is worth two or three recruits. The Bill provides that pensions for life shall be given to men who have served not less than fifteen years and who have become incapacited by infirmity of mind or body. This must be on a medical certificate, but those who have served for twenty-five years or more shall be pensioned without a medical certificate. We do not want to enlist men under twenty, although we are obliged to enlist them at eighteen. If they are five years in the service, and they enter at twenty, they are twenty-five years old when their term is up; and if they enlist again for five years, that brings their age up to thirty. They are ten years in the service, and they have really lost their chance of settling in civil employment, but they are then the most fitted to remain in the service. As regards the cost this proposition will entail, I will recite the quotation that I made from the report when I introduced the resolution. The following statement shows the number of men now serving in the force who, in the event of incapacity of mind or body, would be entitled to pensions during the next eight years: In 1888, 1; in 1889, 4; in 1890, 5; in 1891, 2; in 1892, 2; in 1893, 3; in 1894, 7; in 1895, 0; in all, 24 men, up to 1895. With regard to those men who will serve twenty-five years, the memorandum is as follows:—

"The present state of the health of the men included in the above summary justifies the expectation that very few of them will be incapacitated prior to having completed twenty-five years' service. Should all remain for that period, the following will become entitled to long service pension between 1898 and 1905:—In 1898, one man; in 1899, four; in 1900, five; in 1901, two; in 1902, two; in 1903, three; in 1904, seven; and in 1905, none."

This force is a very small body, consisting of a thousand men, who are to keep watch and ward over the whole of the North-West—who are to patrol the frontier of Manitoba, and to be ready to do the same thing in British Columbia, as was done last year. Their duties are very severe and complicated. They are employed to repress crime, smuggling, cattle raiding, stealing—to protect the white man from the Indian, and the Indian from the white man. Their duties extend all over that territory, and they are doing very successfully a work which it takes 15,000 men to do in the United States. There are 30,000 men employed in the United States, of whom 23,000 are regularly enlisted. These are not all on the frontier, but fully half of them are on the western and northern frontier, watching the Indians; and I must say that very friendly relations subsist between them and our men in connection with the suppression of crime there. For these reasons, I move the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would ask the hon. gentleman whether he did not long ago reduce the pay of the police?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They are not receiving what they did a few years ago.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, they are receiving the same.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The House will, no doubt, consider very carefully the observations which have fallen from the leader of the Government, with respect to the usefulness and the character of the Mounted Police force. I have no doubt he has given a very fair description of the educational attainments and respectability of the men who compose that very important branch of the North-West service, and I have no doubt that that corp is very necessary in the present condition of the country. Admitting all that, it may be questioned whether the necessity has arisen for the step which the right hon. gentleman asks this House to take to-night. While admitting that a trained man who has been five or ten years in the service would understand his duties better, and would be more useful and reliable in the majority of cases than a new man, I claim, at the same time, that people equal to all that the occasion would require, could be had under any circumstances, to fill any vacancies that might occur. The hon. gentleman admitted to-night, that so far from having any difficulty in filling up the Mounted Police force, they had more applicants than they could accept. In this condition of affairs, it would appear that the necessity of offering greater inducements to men to join the service is not so clear. Then, again, in providing for these retiring allowances or pensions, the Bill is introducing a principle, which, if once admitted, may lead to very serious results in the burden which it will impose on the taxpayers of the Dominion. If the Government propose to adopt the system of pensioning the Mounted Police, I do not see where they can stop. They surely will have to introduce it into their military organisations, their "A" and "B" Batteries, all their schools of military instruction from one end of the country to the other. Those people who have entered the batteries, and have served a number of years, will be able, in my judgment, to establish just as strong a claim on the country for pensions as the Mounted Police. The hon. gentleman has given us the number of Mounted Police who would probably be pensioned up to 1900, amounting to 24. That is not such a large number, but the objection lies in what the introduction of this new principle is going to lead to. Under these circumstances, I think it would be very unwise for us to agree to this Bill, and, therefore, I move in amendment:

That this Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved, with due regard to the rights of those who have already been placed on the pension list, that a percentage of the salaries shall be retained and placed to credit of employés of the Government, which shall be payable to them, with interest, on their leaving the service, or to their families, in case of their death in the service.

Under this proposal, the Government would have it in their power to make a certain provision for these men, provided a certain amount were deducted from their pay during the time they were employed; and if there is any branch of the service where this principle could be introduced effectively, it is the Mounted Police. Those who compose that body are usually young men; they have no family incumbrances, and all their wants are paid for by the Government; they could, therefore, very conveniently lay aside a certain amount for their pension, which would be returned to them when they left the service, or to their families, in the event of their death in the service. I think this principle would be generally considered much more reasonable and acceptable to the country than the pension proposed by the hon. gentleman in this Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think this amendment, as drawn, is quite in order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is a resolution affecting the whole Civil Service. It provides that, with due regard to those on the pension list, all Government employés shall have a certain amount subtracted from their pay, and funded for their families.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What I understand the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) proposed was, that the Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved that, if the Government desired to make provision for those parties, they should retain a portion of their salaries to be paid over to them with interest. If the resolution does not express that, my hon. friend can alter it. The principle my hon. friend submits is perfectly clear, and it will be perfectly regular if he puts it in that form. The right hon. gentleman has himself declared that these policemen should be provided for. Now, the hon. gentleman proposes to provide for the pensioning of a number of men who have been some years in the public service. These men entered the force without such provision having been made. The good faith of the country had not been in any way pledged that they should be pensioned on retirement from the service. The right hon. gentleman has also, on a former occasion—although he seems to have forgotten it—reduced the pay of these policemen. The hon. gentleman, if I recollect rightly, declared then that the wages paid were greater than necessary to induce persons to enter the service, that a sufficient number could be secured at a lower rate of pay, and accordingly the pay was reduced, and the number of the service increased. Now we find that the hon. gentleman, who then reduced the pay about 30 per cent., proposes to create a pension list. Surely he does not deem it necessary to provide for the pensioning of this whole force, upon condition that the men remain a certain number of years in it.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question now before the House is with reference to the point of order raised, as to whether this amendment ought to be allowed or not. I have not put the question, I have not asked the House whether they will adopt the amendment or not, and I would like to hear hon. gentlemen express their opinion on the point of order.

Mr. LAURIER. This amendment is perfectly in order. The proposition of the right hon. gentleman is to place these men on the pension list. The amendment provides that, instead, the contrary should be affirmed, and that it would be preferable to keep from the salaries of these men a certain percentage, which would be returned to them, with interest, on their leaving the force, or to their families, in case of death. This proposition is quite germane to the proposition of the hon. gentleman. This is not a new proposition. It has been already several times laid before the House, not only with regard to this force, but with regard to the Civil Service.

Mr. DAVIN. The principle of this Bill is to provide a pension for constables who are incapacitated, or who, from sufficient reason, are retired. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) comes forward with an amendment to the second reading which should properly be brought forward when the Bill is in committee. It is an alternative proposition. The right hon. gentleman proposes to provide for retiring suitably by pension, and the hon. member for Halifax proposes to lay out a fund by deducting so much out of every salary. It would, therefore, be properly introduced by an amendment in committee.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) proposes that the Bill be not now read the second time, but that something else be affirmed. You can affirm what you please, if it is an alternative proposition. If this motion were carried, it would be the duty of the Government, or someone else, to introduce a measure which would be based on a principle different from the principle of the Bill. The Bill proposes to make an additional charge on the Treasury. The amendment proposes that there shall be no additional charge on the Treasury, but that there shall be a certain amount retained in order to make this fund.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Surely the hon. gentleman will not say that, on a motion to postpone the reading of a Bill, you can put in any resolution you like?

Mr. LAURIER. If it is germane.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. For instance, you could not propose that the Bill be not now read the second time, but that the salary of the Governor General be reduced.

Mr. LAURIER. That would not be germane.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think there are some words missing in this amendment, and I will send it back to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) before deciding.

Mr. FISHER. If the Bill were read a second time, this amendment could not, I think, be introduced in committee, because it would not be according to the principle of the Bill. It provides a different way of maintaining these officers after they have ceased to be efficient, or their families after the officers are dead. The Bill of the First Minister provides for the ordinary mode of pension, and, if that principle were accepted by the Bill being read a second time, it seems to me the proposition of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) would not be in order, as being radically opposed to the principle of the Bill.

Mr. McMULLEN. Before we pass the second reading of the Bill, I claim to have an opportunity of expressing my opinion on the whole pension system.

Mr. SPEAKER. The amendment is not yet properly before the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The amendment is contrary to all parliamentary rules.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The amendment which I move is this:

That the Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be resolved: That a percentage of the salaries of the North-West Mounted Police shall be deducted and paid to such persons on their leaving the service, or to their families in the case of their death in the service.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That would simply break up the force. If a resolution was passed providing that these men are to receive nominally the pay of 75 cents a day, and that there is to be a percentage taken out of that, you would get no men for that force. The hon. gentleman speaks as if we could get any number of men for that force. That is not the case. There are a great number of recruits —there are a great number of gentlemen's sons, to use the ordinary pseudonym—who go into the force, but, in order to keep up the force, you have not only to get recruits, but to induce men who have proved themselves competent, who are good, efficient men, to remain in the force after they are properly trained and are fully fit for their work. The Government can have no object, and I can have no object, in desiring to increase the expense of that force, but I am satisfied, and all those who have really considered the question, including the officers in command, agree that it is of the very greatest importance, and that it is the wisest economy to keep these skilled men in the force, and not to have a body of recruits who are unfit for the work until they are properly trained. It is better, by giving a very small inducement of this kind to enable the skilled labor to look forward to some reward at the end of twenty-five long years service. That, I think, is a wise provision.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I resume the observations I was making a few moments ago in reference to this force. I am opposed to this principle. I think it is wholly at variance with the democratic tendencies of our population, and I am sure that the people of this country will not be satisfied to have 1,000 men pensioned on this country for an indefinite time to come. I said that the hon. gentleman had reduced the pay of this force some years ago. He seemed to think I was in error on that matter. I stated that the hon. gentleman did so because, as he informed the House, he had no difficulty in obtaining at a lower rate of wages, all the men that were necessary in order to keep up the force to the required number. On that occasion the hon. gentleman said;

"There is to be a reduction in the pay of the force of $8,000 a year. The men now receive 40 cents during the first year, and 50 cents per day during the other four years of their service. The late rates were 50 cents per day during the first year, and 75 cents a day during the remaining four year of the term."

So that when the hon. gentleman actually reduced, after the first year, the pay of the men in the police force by 33 per cent., he reduced it from 75 cents to 50 cents a day, and he gave, as a reason, that 50 cents was quite adequate pay to secure all the men that were required in this particular force. Now, the hon. gentleman proposes to do—what? He proposes that after these men have been a certain period in the service, we shall pension them off for the remainder of their lives. He tells us that if they entered the service at the age of from fifteen to twenty years, at the end of twenty-five years they would be entitled to be pensioned earlier than if they became unfit in the service from loss of health or other cause. Now, if they enter the service at twenty years of age, at the end of twenty-five years they will be forty-five years of age, and they are to be pensioned on the country for the remainder of their lives. I do not think, notwithstanding all that the hon. gentleman has said, that I can agree with the view that a man who has been ten or fifteen years in the service, is worth three men who have been there a shorter period. Now, if a young man who enters the service is fit for it, if he is sober, steady, and attentive to his duties, I have no doubt that, at the end of three years, he will be quite as efficient as he is ever likely to become—in fact, from all that I can judge of the force, the efficiency of those in the service does not increase with the term of their service, and I think, that being the case, the hon. gentleman ought not to persist in this Bill. It is wholly contrary to the wishes and the feeling of the people of this country. The only effect of putting this Bill upon the Statute-book will be to cause serious trouble in the future; for I have no doubt whatever that the people will not permit any Government to control the affairs of this country who undertakes to pension so large a number in the public service. Why, the hon. gentleman tells us that a great many of these men are not citizens of this country at all. They do not belong here; they are not natives of Canada. They are sons of English gentlemen, who have gone into the North-West to spend some time, and they are engaged on this police force. Now, to pension men who, at the end of their service, are likely to leave the country and to draw a certain sum from the public revenue for the remainder of their lives, after they attain the age of forty-five, is a proposition that I do not think will meet with favor by the public of this country.

I am sure that almost everywhere the system of pensioning and superannuation is unpopular. The people of this country are not satisfied with it. They think that those who are paid fairly well out of the public Treasury for their public services ought to provide for their own future by practicing economy, precisely the same as those who are engaged in the ordinary pursuits of private life; and the proposal of the hon. gentleman will only tend to make it impossible that judges, or any other persons in the service of the public, will be able to receive in the future any retiring allowance or pension whatever. The hon. gentleman, by undertaking to extend the pension list, will only make it impossible, in this country, to grant a pension to any person, however necessary the adoption of such a policy might be.

Mr. DAVIN. I think it must be obvious to the House that my hon. friends in the Reform ranks who have been speaking on this subject, do not really know it as profoundly as most other subjects which they discuss. I think that the way my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Jones) if I may say so, botched his amendment, is emblematic of the way, if they had their will, that they would botch the Mounted Police. The hon. member for Halifax declares that this Bill is not necessary. Whether it is necessary or not, is a matter of fact. There are just two sections of the community who are capable of giving an opinion on this subject. The Government, dealing with that question, dealing with the management of the Mounted Police, knowing by reports what goes on in the Territories, can give an authoritative opinion; and the people living in the Territories, and meeting the Mounted Police force, observing it every day, and knowing what are the inducements that cause the mounted policemen to enter and leave the force, they also can give an authoritative opinion. My hon. friend from Halifax who could give us an authoritative opinion on shipping or on a cognate question, I rather think is hardly in a position to ask the question whether this measure is necessary or not. Now, as a fact, what the right hon. gentleman stated is palpable to everybody who closely observes the Mounted Police. The best men, the men that are most useful in the force, leave it after five years, when they are at the acme of their efficiency. Why do they leave it? Because the pay is not sufficient to keep them there. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) calculated that after a man spent 25 years in the force he would be about 43 or 45 years old, according as he entered it at 18 or 20 years of age. After a man spends 25 years in that force, he may be one of the most useful men we could possibly have in that force, but you know very well that if that man were to enter civil life, he would enter it under great disability. The man who spends 10, or 15 or 25 years in the Mounted Police may be efficient as a mounted policeman, but he re-enters civil life handicapped. They know that. What, then, are these men to do? The mounted policeman, when he has been five years in the service, asks himself whether he shall or shall not enlist again. He says to himself: If I enlist again, I shall spend 10 or 15 years of my life in this service. The pittance I am paid will not enable me to save much money, and at the end of that time I may go forth into civil life handicapped; whereas if I now leave the Mounted Police force, I have got a knowledge of the territory, I can get a situation, and can make my way. Why, Sir, this proposal of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, if he will excuse me for saying it, bears absurdity on its forehead. Why, these men are only getting 50 cents a day, and he asks you to deduct from this paltry pay, a sum sufficient to provide for them and their families in the future. Of course, this system of pensioning employees of the Government, and deducting so much from their pay or allowance is a good system when they are paid liberal salaries, but to do so when a man's pay is 50 or 75 cents a day would be very absurd indeed. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) said that men could easily be had. So they can. But what is a mounted policeman? An efficient mounted policeman is a man drilled like a soldier, he is a man drilled to do soldiers' work if necessary, he is a man trained to go from one part of the country to another in search of horse thieves and all sorts of breakers of the law; and men who have just entered the force and men who are willing to enter the force, these men for the first twelve months, or for the first two years for that matter, are very useless in the force. They spend most of their time drilling, and if they are required to be sent from one part of the country to another part, they do not know the country. As to the statement of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), that this House should not adopt this measure because the Government could always get men, that is a fallacy, because the men you can get are not efficient; you have to take them and train them. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), used what seems to me to be a very curious argument. He said this little Bill, if passed, would probably lay the axe to the root of all pensions whatever; that it would create such a commotion in the country and would raise such an indignation in the minds of the people against pensions that we would not be able to pension our judges and the whole pension system would be swept away. Of course that is absurd, and I think I will show it is absurd. What amount would the Government be called upon to pay during the eight years following 1898, when the first man, according to the classification, would be ready to receive a pension? They would not be called upon to pay more than $9,000. And yet we are told that it would create such a commotion that we would not be able to pension our judges.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How do you make that calculation?

Mr. DAVIN. You can easily calculate it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Every man would receive it in years.

Mr. DAVIN. I have made the calculation, and you will find it to be perfectly correct. The pension of a constable will vary from 22 cents per day for 15 years service to 50 cents for 27 years service; the pension of a sergeant would vary from 30 cents for 15 years service to 66 cents for 27 years service; that of a staff-sergeant from 27½ cents for 15 years service to $1 for 27 years service. How do these sums compare with those paid in other services? We have the service in Australia and the service of the Irish constabulary. The pensions of the Irish constabulary are calculated on full pay, including the constable's rations or subsistence. The calculation in this Bill of the right hon. gentleman is made on the bare pay of the mounted policeman. Liberal provision, again, is made for the Irish constabulary when incapacitated from infirmity of body or mind after five years' service. This Bill is not sufficiently liberal in my opinion. Instead of providing for incapacity after 15 years service I should prefer that it provided for incapacity after 10 years service. In New Zealand and New South Wales provision is made as follows: superannuation deduction is 3 per cent., but the pensions are very liberal. For 15 years and under 20 years service the amount must not exceed half pay, for 20 years and under 25 years service it must not exceed two-thirds pay, for 25 years service and under 30 years it must not exceed three-fourths pay, and for 30 years service full pay is granted. So, if we compare the Bill of the right hon. gentleman with the provisions made in other countries where police forces are in use, we find that, instead of the Bill being a very liberal one in pensioning the Mounted Police, it is a very moderate one indeed in its provisions. The services that these men render the country are of a very various, laborious and sometimes dangerous character, and I think it would be a great mistake on our part if when we come to deal with the question of giving them inducements to remain in the force and be efficient constables, we approach the question in a niggardly manner. These men, as the right hon. gentleman has very properly described them, are really in physique about the finest body of men in the world. The standard is very high, and for the very reason that so many are anxious to enter the force, we are able to keep it up to a high mark, and in consequence of that you cannot find a weak or weedy man in the whole police force in the North-West. As to their intelligence, they are very well educated, some exceedingly well educated men, and for the services they have to perform this is a matter of very great importance. When such men think of their future they naturally shrink from continuing to perform those laborious services and continuing in such a service if in 15 or 20 years they have to leave the service without, by reason of the smallness of their pay, having accumulated anything for the future and without receiving any stay such as a pension would provide. I happen to know that men in the force have looked forward to a measure of this kind with great anxiety, and some of them have paused as to whether they would leave the service or not in the hope that such a Bill would be passed. The idea put forward by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mill), and endorsed by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), that men who have but recently joined the force are as efficient as the men who have been there for some time, is an idea of which they would be disabused if they spoke to any officer of the force or anyone who is familiar with the North-West Territories. If you take a man who has been to Prince Albert, Edmonton, Battleford, and travelled across the country, and who knows the Wood Mountain country, and been along the southern frontier, in fact knows the whole country, and compare him with a man who has recently joined the force, and who is unacquainted with the country, and who is not equal to the rigors of the service at that time, it is the comparison of one man who is the raw material with another who is the manufactured article.

Mr. LAURIER. You want protection.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, we go the whole hog. We believe in the manufactured article. This Bill provides what justice demands. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) said that no faith was pledged to these men. The right hon. gentleman does not proceed as if faith had been pledged to the men. There is no such idea underlying this proposition; there is no such absurd notion underlying the Bill. We are not thinking whether faith is pledged to them or not. What we are thinking of is this: Is this provision a measure that justice demands? Not only is it a measure that justice demands, but it is a measure that expediency and efficiency demand.

Some hon. MEMBERS, No.

Mr. DAVIN. I hear some hon. gentlemen say "no," but they know nothing about it. We in the North-West who do know something about it say that this Bill will add 30 per cent. to the efficiency of the North-West Mounted Police. Instead of having men you have trained for five years, and out of whom you have probably got only two and a-half years' efficient work, leaving the service for which they were admirably fitted to continue in to the advantage of the country, and going into civil life; when this Bill becomes law, as I am sure it will, those men will remain in the service. If you were to speak to any of the men who have commanded that force, from Colonel Macleod down to Commissioner Herchmer, they will tell you that their great difficulty was to get efficient men to remain in the force. I have no doubt whatever that not only do the men look forward to this Bill with anxious hope, but that those who are in command of the force, and who are responsible for its efficiency, look forward to its passing as a means of keeping the best men in the service. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) said that this Bill was contrary to the democratic tendencies of this country. I have yet to learn that democratic tendencies are necessarily opposed to providing pensions for men who have served the country. I suppose the country below the line is democratic enough, but yet we hear of their pension Bills and of the enormous pensions which they pay. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) who looks to the United States with so much reverence, and all these gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House, who sit so to speak at the feet of the Republican Gamaliel, surely ought be ready to take a hint from the democracy below the line as to pensions. The whole reasoning of my hon. friends from Halifax (Mr. Jones) and Bothwell (Mr. Mills), is a reasoning of mistaken facts and defective analogies. The hon. member for Halifax used one analogy after another for which there was no base, and my hon. friend from Bothwell declared that pensions are contrary to democratic tendencies although below the line where you have a democracy that he worships, pensions are in vogue. But we are not wholly a democratic country, although Lord Dufferin stated that we were more democratic than our friends below the line. We are members of a great Empire. No doubt we have a strong democratic streak running through our community, but we are also an Imperial people. We are also proud of being citizens of a great Empire and I have shown you that in various parts of that Empire, in Ireland, in New Zealand and in New South Wales the pensions are provided for the police. The hon. member for Halifax declared that the result of this Bill would be that this system would press very heavily on the taxpayers. If he will do what he did in regard to his amendment; if he will get first the hon. member for Bothwell, and then the hon. member for Queen's P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), and then the leader of the Opposition, to assist him in making a calculation, as he got them to assist him in making an amendment, he will find that this would not press very heavily on the taxpayers. I think I have shown that there is no basis whatever for the various representations of the member for Halifax. I do not want to be offensive—I could not possibly be offensive—but I must say that the contention of my hon. friend is an ignorant contention.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. DAVIN. I will take that back if it is in the least offensive, but I shall have to say that his is a contention based on defective knowledge.

Mr. WATSON. As I come from the west and have some knowledge of the North-West Mounted Police when they are enlisted, while they are in the service, and after they have been dismissed from the service, I beg leave to differ with some statements made by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. The reason that he adduces that a long service in the police unfits men for active pursuits in life is the very reason why I oppose the passing by this Parliament of any legislation which will induce those men to remain in the force for the long term of 25 years. I know a number of those mounted policemen who have discontinued service after 15 or 20 years in the force, and I know that those men are practically unfitted to cope with others in the ordinary avocations of civil life. They are men who acquired indolent habits while in the force, who have little or no business aptitude, and the result is they are unfitted for any other service. For that reason I strongly oppose any system by which these men will be induced to remain long in the service. I have nothing but praise for the ability of the men who are in the police force. They are smart, intelligent men, and they are that for the simple reason that some three men apply to get into the mounted police force for the one who is accepted.

There are any amount of men who wish to join the police force and with the choice the Government has, and the careful inspection which they make, it must be taken for granted that the Mounted Police force is made up of the very best young men we have in Canada. I think this can hardly be denied, because the other night when we were going through the Estimates we found that $2 each was paid for the inspection of recruits, and that three candidates presented themselves for every one who was accepted. There is this other reason why I would prefer the term of service to be for a short rather than a lengthened period. At present, we have at the end of every five years first class drilled soldiers. It has been stated that twelve months after a recruit joins the force he is being drilled, but there are men in course of being drilled, and who are recruits, and are yet quite efficient for the duties in which they are employed. They do not all require to be thoroughly drilled men, because they have got work requiring other qualifications. There is a certain number of teamsters among the force, and the young men are quite competent to act as teamsters for some time after they enlist. I am sure the Government have seen, during the last rebellion, the benefit of having a number of discharged mounted policemen in the North-West. If you adopt this pension system you have simply got 1,000 policemen at the end of 25 years, and they will be men who are getting old and feeble; but, by adopting the system of enlisting new recruits every five years, you will have at the end of 25 years, not 1,000, but 5,000 well drilled men, who are thoroughly competent to take their part in any trouble which we might have in the North-West. I hope, in the near future, that it will not be necessary to retain so many as 1,000 mounted policemen in the North-West. I believe that when the settlements grow up there, and they are growing very rapidly, the entire protection of the country will be taken in hand by the Local Governments. For these reasons I would strongly oppose any system of pensioning these men, and unfitting them for active life in other pursuits.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) seems to take it for granted, if we may judge from a remark which he made, that people who do not live in the North-West are not able to judge of the probability of our being able to secure such men as we may require for service in the Mounted Police force. One does not require to be a dweller in the North-West to decide that. The ranks of the Mounted Police are not recruited in the North-West, but in older Canada, and we know how easily recruits can be obtained for that service. My hon. friend has pointed out that when a call is made for men, three times the number called for apply for the places. There is, therefore, no urgency for this measure. Then, my hon. friend from Assiniboia said that if we adopted the Bill, the efficiency of the force would be increased 30 per cent. What does he mean by the efficiency of the force? I suppose he must have reference to the work to be performed; but we did not hear the hon. First Minister state that he intends to reduce the force by 300 men simultaneously with the passage of this Bill; and if my hon. friend's contention is right, it would follow that the duties would be discharged by 700 men just as efficiently as they are by 1,000 men. Therefore, failing to hear that the hon. First Minister intends to reduce the force, we take it for granted that the hon. member's view is not shared in by the First Minister. The only argument I have heard for the Bill is that advanced by the First Minister, that the men being enlisted for a long period would become more efficient. If that statement were well founded it would carry weight, but I am inclined to believe that all the efficiency required can be secured in the term of five years, and I agree with the hon. member for Marquette that it is probably a mistaken policy in the interest of the North-West to offer inducements to these men to remain in the force 20 or 25 years. I am rather inclined to agree with him, bringing common sense to bear on the subject, that you can secure as efficient a force under five years enlistment as you could under 25 years; and if during that time, under the proposition of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) the men laid up a little capital by which they could take up land and settle in the country, we should have a number of men well fitted to become permanent settlers. Then we have an additional advantage as he has pointed out by this very system which is claimed for our volunteer force. When fault is found that young men enlist, and after remaining a short time leave the force, and new men continually come in to take their places, the reply is that the effect of that is good, because instead of the available men being confined to the ranks of the militia, we have this vast body who have passed through the force receiving their training and taken up civil occupations in different parts of the country. It appears to me, therefore, that the argument is against the First Minister as to the desirability of inducing the men to remain 25 years in the service. Then, the argument of the hon. member for Halifax comes in, that if there be those in the force who are not so improvident as others, this proposition would receive their thanks. I think what has been pointed out by the hon. member for Bothwell is a conclusive answer to the claim for the necessity of this Bill. The hon. First Minister stated not long ago that it was possible, in the public interest, to reduce the pay given to recruits in that force 33⅓ per cent., which is proof beyond question as to our being able at all times to maintain an efficient force there. If we introduce this system, as the hon. member for Halifax pointed out, where is it to stop? If it is right to apply this principle to the Mounted Police, why is it not right to apply it to the men who manages our batteries, and who are connected with other parts of the service in this country? I think we would do well to hesitate before we make this new departure. I am inclined to think that even the First Minister himself, on reflection, may see that the weight of argument is rather against his proposition.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) The efficiency of the force seems to be what we all mainly desire to attain; and it seems to be conceded on all sides that the inducements at present offered secure the results we desire. It is stated by the hon. member for Marquette that three men offer for every recruit required, and it seems, therefore, that it is not necessary to offer greater inducements in order to increase the efficiency of the force. But the hon. member for Assiniboia says that we must not form our own judgment on this matter, but we must be guided by the judgment formed by the Government. That would be very well, but which judgment are we to accept, the judgment of the Government to-day or its judgment the other day? We have had two systems in force for the maintenance of the North-West Mounted Police. We had one system from 1873 to 1881, under which a much larger percentage of pay was allotted to the men than they are allowed to-day. What was the result? We reduced the pay, and have gone on under the reduced pay since 1881, and we find that since that time the force has been efficient. I will read you an extract from a speech made by the hon. First Minister after he had had eight years experience of paying the men a larger sum than he pays them now. He said:

"The pay was originally very large, fixed at a time when it was new, and when the difficulties of going through an unknown country were perhaps exaggerated. But the pay was so good that there was a rush of men to the force; we found great pressure brought to send up gentlemen's sons—educated men, of broken habits—and the force was to some extent made to serve the purpose of an inebriate asylum. Under the present system we find that we can get good men, equal to the members of any constabulary force."

Here the House is met with a pronunciamento of the leader of the Government, that under the system of lower pay which has now been going on for eight years we can get capital men equal to those in any constabulary in the world, and that under the system of larger pay we had men of broken habits, and that the force was to some extent made to serve the purpose of an inebriate asylum. That was the result before; the hon. gentleman does not want to return to it; and if, under the present system, three times the number of men offer that he requires, what is the use of adding this additional burden to the burdens already resting upon this overburdened new country? I object to the Bill altogether, and I think the proposition made by the hon. member for Halifax better meets the case.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken in regard to our being able to get three times more men than we want. That is not the case, nor anything like it. We can keep up the force. That there are three times as many men offering as we would take, I have no doubt; but I can only take the good men who are fit for their work, and we have no plethora of men who are fit to be accepted. The maximum pay is the same as formerly, 75 cents per day; that is to say, Parliament has authorised the Government to give to the extent of 75 cents a day to every constable. Formerly the pay began at 50 cents and then increased regularly, until, at the end of five years, it reached 70 cents; and if the men re-enlisted they were to get 75 cents. Well, we reduced the entrance pay from 50 cents to 40 cents. That is the saving that was made. Then, the minimum being 40 cents, the pay increased annually until it reached the maximum of 75 cents. The reduction was made from 50 cents entrance pay to 40 cents. Year by year it grew up to 70 cents, until the term of first enlistment expired, when the men received, if they re-enlisted, 75 cents.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). What I object to mainly is the principle underlying this superannuation Bill. The question is: Where are we to stop? What claim have those parties to receive a pension from the people of this country more than other people who are working outside the Government. Surely these men are not doing more in the interests of the country than the thousands of laborers, mechanics and clerks employed in the various institutions of the country, and I never could understand why we should spend the hard-earned money of the people in the payment of pensions. I take the position, that this is only an extension of the present established superannuation iniquity—for this is the most apt term I can give it. It is undoubtedly an iniquity to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars—the hard-earned money of the people—in pensioning a class who received very good pay while in the service. If these Government officials are not sufficiently well paid, I have no objection to pay them or anyone else who serves his country, a sufficient sum. Let them be paid 50 cents, or 75 cents; but after they have served the country many years and become disabled, they should step out just as any other clerks do, in other offices in the country. To ask the people to put their hands into their pockets to pay for the services of men, when they can serve their country no longer, is unjust. We are spending $150,000 every year in superannuation allowances to parties who no longer are giving their country any return for what they receive. This Bill would lead to abuse, just as the present superannuation law leads to abuse. No matter who will have the administration of this superannuation allowance, the system is bound to lead to abuse. Allow me to give you a few instances. I need go no further than the position of Clerk or Deputy Clerk of this House. We find that the honorable and esteemed gentleman who fills the position of Clerk with such ability receives $3,400 a year. I have no objection to his receiving that, or $4,000, if, in the judgment of hon. members, his services are worth that to the country. But outside of him, there is Mr. Alfred Patrick, superannuated clerk, receiving no less than $2,380 a year, without doing a single stroke of work. Then, Mr. Leprohon, who was Assistant Clerk, draws pay to the extent of $1,544 annually, and has drawn to 1st January, 1889, $10,164, and he was superannuated because, through sickness or some other cause, he was no longer able to serve in this House. There is another superannuated clerk, E. U. Piché, who draws $400 a year. Just think of it—$3,400 for the Clerk, $2,800 for the Assistant Clerk, $1,544 for the superannuated Assistant Clerk, $2,380 for the superannuated Clerk, and $400 for another superannuated Assistant Clerk—or not less than $10,524 paid by this Government for the purpose of filling up two positions. I ask any sensible man if such a system is in the interests of the people who pay the taxes? Let me give you another instance. In 1878—and I suppose hon. gentlemen will say this person was superannuated under the late Government, but I care not under whose Government he was superannuated, when such a system is placed in the hands of any Government, abuses are bound to arise through the pressure of the friends of the Government—Gilbert McMicken was Receiver General in Winnipeg. He became sick and was superannuated, and he now draws annually $1,579 from the superannuation fund; but since he received that amount he recovered his health, and who would not? $1,579 was the best medicine he could receive to restore his energies. His energies came back and he stepped out into the political arena of Manitoba, and ran for member for that Province, because he was too sick to keep the Government position he formerly occupied. He was elected a member of the Manitoba Legislature, and was appointed Speaker. He drew $1,000 as Speaker of the House, and $400 as member, and he receives from this Government $1,579, on the ground that he was not able to do anything. Is this not an anomaly? Let me give you another case. In 1878 John Gordon of the London post office, a man who had served in the post office 35 years, who was in the full vigor of his health, and better able to discharge his duties than at any other period, passed out because his place was required, it was said for the efficiency of the post office, but the efficiency consisted in getting another person in his stead. Mr. Gordon has drawn ever since his retirement $594 a year, or in all $4,800 during those eight years, and is now busily occupied doing other business. Let me give you another instance. You all remember Alex. McNab, who was Chief Engineer of the Prince Edward Island Railway. Well, he bungled that railway to such an extent that the people almost rose up against him. He was only 45 years of age when he was superannuated. He took ill with colic, or something else, for the purpose of receiving the superannuation allowance, and the Government came to his rescue, and gave him $1,715 a year superannuation allowance. Since that time, he has been as well as I have been, or as any other person in that part of the country; and rumor has it that he became an engineer of another railway and lived out of Canada a portion of that time, and yet, down to the present, he has drawn from the country for superannuation $13,862. Any system which leads to such abuses should not be tolerated, and the Act should be removed from the Statute-book, though without prejudicing anyone who is under its operation at present. There was another case which happened in 1879. Mr. Thomas Charles Patteson was the celebrated editor of the Mail, who wrote in favor of the present leader of the Government during the years the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was in power. When the present Government came back into power, Thomas Charles Patteson said to the leader of the Government: "It is largely through my able editorials that our party has come back, and I want something at your hands." "What do you want?" says the leader of the Government. "I want the Toronto postmastership." "But," says the leader of the Government, "Joseph Lesslie has been the Toronto postmaster for 35 years, and he fills the office with credit to himself and with satisfaction to everyone in the city of Toronto." "But I want it," says Mr. Patteson. Well, what was the result? Joseph Lesslie was asked to resign. He opposed that request, and said: "I am as capable of performing the duties of my office as I was 10 or 15 or 20 years ago," but the pressure was brought to bear, and Joseph Lesslie resigned. He draws $2,480 a year from the Superannuation fund, or, since his superannuation, he has taken $24,208 from that fund; while Thomas Charles Patteson draws a salary of $3,000 and the result is that in nine years, the Toronto post office has cost this country $50,000 for the postmasters, which is altogether the result of this iniquitous system of superannuating individuals who are able to discharge their duties, and placing others in their positions. That system is not in the interest of this country, and, when the farmers and the laborers and the mechanics know that this is the system which is established in this country, I believe they will rise up as one man and insist on its discontinuance. I hope the time is not far distant when greater wisdom will prevail and less partisanship, when we may remove from the Statute-book such abuses as I have referred to, and this measure is but an extension of the abuse. I do not oppose the Dominion police. They are a fine body of able and useful men, and they require certain physical qualifications in order to fill that position. If 50 cents or 75 cents a day is not sufficient for them, come down with a Bill giving them sufficient pay for their labor and I will support it, but I will strongly oppose the extension of this principle, and I am very much mistaken if the people of the country will not oppose it as much as I do.

Gen. LAURIE. In following the remarks of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald), I find that he wandered considerably from the subject before the House. He went into the general question of superannuation. I do not propose to follow him into that question at all, but I propose to touch on one or two remarks which he made on this subject, and they were very few. He asks what claim these men have on us, what right have we to give them this, what right have they to ask it? That is not the question before the House. It is not that the members of the Mounted Police have asked for this, but it is that the Government who control that body and know what they require, who know the necessity of the existence of that body, and who have to handle it and to manage it, find the necessity of asking for this measure. The hon. gentleman says that, if 75 cents a day will not bring these men into the force, we should give them $1, but we are told on this side of the House that we can get three men for every one we now have. I think it was the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) who said so.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I said that I had heard the member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) make the statement, and I accepted his statement.

Gen. LAURIE. Well, you endorsed it, and I will take the two of you.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I). The First Minister said so also.

Gen. LAURIE. The question is not what recruits we can get, but can we keep them when we have got them? I speak with some little experience of service with military and semi-military bodies both in the British army and in foreign armies, and the difficulty in all those is not to get the recruit, but to keep the soldier after you have trained him. Take the continental armies. Take the German army, where every soldier has to serve under the system of conscription for two or three years. Take the French army, where every man has to serve five years with the colors. There they find that that is not enough to maintain the army in efficiency, and that they must have men of longer service, in order to keep up the backbone of the army. The result is that, though in France they have no system of pensions, they arrange by a mode of commutation from men who are not willing to serve, and out of that they pay a handsome bounty to men who are willing to serve the second time. Though their men are only enlisted in the army for four or five years, they encourage them to remain for 15 or 20 years in the service in that way. The Germans also find it necessary to encourage men to stay in the service, and the great complaint in all the European armies is that the service is too short to make the men efficient. It takes three years to make a soldier, and that is when he is serving all the time in the ranks, but, in the North-West Mounted Police, where a man has to be a soldier and a policeman as well, where he has to act individually in most cases, as well as acting with the troop in the field, it must take a longer time to make a constable and a soldier than to make a soldier when he is acting in the ranks. In the British army we have tried a system, which is something of the kind which the hon. gentleman proposes, of deducting a percentage from the pay of the soldiers. That is what is called deferred pay, and the experience of that is that nothing works much worse. The soldier looks forward to the amount reserved being put into his hands at a certain time, and he takes the first opportunity to leave the army, and as a rule, he spends the money at once, being, as my hon. friend has said, not used to civil life after serving in the force. My hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Watson) says it is a great advantage to have so many pass through the force so that, when necessary, we may have them at command for service. I do not think we are calculating on having a great war in the North-West, and I do not think we need a great reserve. I believe it is far better for us to have 1,000 efficient men than to have 1,000 inefficient men, and 1,000 or 2,000 whom we might call upon when we might require them. Let us have a body of men perfectly trained instead of a portion partially trained and a portion trained who probably have forgotten their training. When the British army attempted to organise the reserve system first, they found that they had neither reserves nor soldiers, and that would be our experience. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says we would have a 1,000 pensioners on our hands. Does he assume that a 1,000 men will serve for 25 years? I have never heard such an extraordinary idea propounded.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) They are to be pensioned at 15 years under certain circumstances.

Gen. LAURIE. Yes; but does the hon. gentleman think all these men will remain in the service for 15 years? Does he not think there may be some inducements for them to leave other than that of completing their term of service? Surely the Government will protect themselves by enlisting a man only for five years, allowing him to be re-engaged if he is a good man. The bargain is not all on one side. It is for the benefit of the country as well as for the individual. I take it that this measure of the Government is intended to get the very best service out of a man that can be got. I find that the Government were criticised because they cut down the pay between 1873 and 1881, and they are now criticised because, finding that they were unable to get good men and keep them, they propose a pension. This service changes like any sphere of civil life, and we must be prepared to accommodate ourselves to the practices of men in civil life from whom we draw our recruits. I shall support this measure of the Government, because I believe it is wise and judicious.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have always opposed in this House the tendency to increase our superannuation list, and I shall do the same in this case. Now, the complete answer to the proposition to create a superannuation system in the North-West Mounted Police, is the statement of the First Minister some years ago, that we were well able to keep the force in an efficient order, even if we reduced the pay. The pay to-day is 75 cents, with clothing and food, and I think the class of men forming the North-West Mounted Police, is a class that could not possibly make any more money in any other calling in life. I am satisfied that taking them all through, the majority of them could not save the amount they are saving in the Mounted Police, if they were engaged in any other calling. The hon. member who has just taken his seat (General Laurie) has referred to the army of Great Britain, pointing out how necessary it was that a retiring allowance should be granted to them. But we must take into consideration that the pay received by soldiers in the British army is a mere pittance compared with what we pay our men. A man in the British army gets 1s. 4d. per day, while we are paying our men 75 cents. We are paying them all they are worth, and I contend that when we are paying fully as much as they could get in any other calling it is not necessary to ask the country to grant them an allowance when they leave the force. Our experience in regard to superannuation is that it has been a positive abuse. If we consent to the passage of this Bill to grant a retiring allowance to the Mounted Police, I am satisfied that it will be abused just the same as our superannuation system has been abused. We have in this country at the present time 450 superannuated officers of the Civil Service, who are strutting round and drawing about $160,000 a year of the country's funds, and if we consent to this proposition of the Government we will have quite a number of these people taking advantage of it to retire from the service and they will thenceforward become a drain upon the resources of this country. I fully concur with the opinion of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) that it is unwise to encourage the people to continue in the service beyond say 10 or 15 years. I believe that we can get plenty of men who would be glad to go out there for exploring purposes, for the purpose of seeing the country and making a little money at the same time; and after a number of years' service they will be glad to retire and take up their home in that country. I have no doubt that a great many of those now in the Mounted Police went there in the first place for that purpose, and every year they will leave the service and become settlers, and we hope that more will do so, because it is not desirable that we should have men putting in 25 years in that service, and then be turned out virtually useless. I hope, also, that in place of keeping up that force to 1,000 men, we will be able gradually to reduce it. There is no necessity to-day for 1,000 Mounted Police. I believe we could do with one-half that number to-day. We ought to be able annually to reduce the number. We raised the force to the present number only at the close of the rebellion. Prior to that rebellion we did not find that there was any need for more than 500 men. There are no more Indians and half-breeds in the North-West now than there were prior to the last rebellion, when 500 men were able to keep the peace in that country, and I do not see why the same number are not able to keep the Indians and half-breeds in peace now. Besides that, we now have a railway running up to that country, and we would be able to send in at short notice any number of men to put down any rising of the North-West that might occur. I do not think it is necessary that we should pay $860,000 a year for that force, and in addition to that, provide a pension to those who may leave it after serving a certain time. I am opposed to the whole system. Our past experience has shown that the system is grossly abused, that men are pensioned who never should be on the pension list, and I am satisfied that if we extend it to the North-West Mounted Police, it would be abused in the same way. It is our duty to reject the system, and get rid of the present superannuation list as soon as we can, and get down to a basis where we will not have to call upon the people of this country to pay away money in this useless and unnecessary way. I am satisfied that this is wrong, and that we can keep the force fully efficient without pensioning them at all, and if any emergency arises when it is necessary to increase the force in order to keep the peace, we have a magnificent accommodation in the way of a railway, by which we can send to the North-West any number of men from the volunteer force. I believe that in place of keeping up the force to 1,000 men, we ought to begin annually to reduce it at least by 100 men, with the object of getting rid of the whole expense at the end of 10 years.

Amendment negatived, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I observe that this Bill will go into operation in 1888. Will it include those incapacitated and those who resigned from the force last year?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; it only refers to men who are in the force after the passing of this Act. Any men who are in the force when the Act comes into operation will have the benefit of the time they have been in the force since they enlisted.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then, any person who left the force last year from being incapacitated and who had then served 15 years would not have the benefit of this Act?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; these clauses are all taken from the Irish Police Act and have been found to operate very efficiently.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT AMENDMENT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the third reading of Bill (No. 4) further to amend the Revised Statutes, Chapter 5, respecting the Electoral Franchise.

Mr. CHARLTON. I propose to suggest to the Government a slight alteration in this Bill and to move an amendment to that effect. I think this modification should meet with the approbation of the Minister of Justice and the leader of the Government. There is no question, although I am afraid the First Minister is not aware of the fact, that the country is thoroughly disgusted with this Bill. I believe that is evinced very clearly by the articles that appear in the newspapers supporting the hon. gentleman. I have, for instance, in my hand an editorial clipped from the Hamilton Spectator, of the 24th January, as follows:—

"A little while ago we were told that, being interviewed by a labor delegation of Toronto, Sir John A. Macdonald intimated that the Dominion Government might, during the coming Session, amend the Franchise Act in the generel direction of manhood suffrage."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is a mistake.

Mr. CHARLTON. The editorial continues:

"Now we are told that Sir John said nothing of the kind; that he said precisely the other thing—that no step whatever will be taken toward manhood suffrage. We have no means of knowing which of these stories is the correct one; but it is to be hoped that the first report is the true one. It is the habit of Conservatives to say that the Dominion Franchise Act gives the people 'practically manhood suffrage.' We think that is so; but would like to see the 'practical manhood suffrage' divested of the cumbrous, expensive and most unsatisfactory accompaniments of revising barristers and voters' lists, and attendance at courts, and all the time-wasting, costly and bothersome nonsense which the existing regulations make necessary. If the present Act gives 'practical manhood suffrage,' there can be no harm in giving theoretical manhood suffrage as well. If every man can vote under the present rules, no man can vote under any other rules or under no rules whatever. There is no need whatever for voters' lists. A system of registration would be quite sufficient and more effective than any test system that could be devised. The registration would be necessary only on the eve of an election, and could be ordered at the time of the issuing of the election writ. Then all the expensive work involved in making and changing voters' lists would be unnecessary. The Government which gave Canada the present Dominion Franchise Act can give Canada manhood suffrage without stretching its conscience or its conservatism one hair's breadth further, and it is to be hoped that it will do it."

That is a quotation from the Hamilton Spectator, as straight a Conservative journal as there is in the Dominion of Canada. I have here an article from the Toronto Telegram of the 8th of April last, and the Telegram is also a paper which supports my right hon. friend in main, although it professes to be independent. The article is as follows:—

"NEEDLESS AND EXPENSIVE.

"A Committee of the Commons and Senate has been this Session endeavoring to limit the expense connected with legislation at Ottawa. Hon. George Foster has also been devising means with the same end in view, and it is said one of his schemes contemplates a sweeping reduction in all official salaries. If an honest effort is made the sessional expense can be largely reduced. There is no doubt either but that many official salaries could be cut down or abolished altogether without the public interest suffering. But a still greater saving can be effected by the abolition of the Federal Franchise Act. That Act has cost the country half a million dollars, and only one voters' list has yet been issued under it. In Dominion and Scott Act elections, held under its provisions, voters' lists from three to four years old are used. If a new list were issued every year the annual expense would fall little short of $500,000. The Act is entirely unnecessary. The municipal councils furnished more accurate voters' lists than the officials appointed under the Dominion statute possibly can furnish. In fact the latter are compelled to go to the assessment rolls for most of their information. The Dominion Franchise Act gives us a second and altogether unnecessary voters' list, and the abolition of that Act would save a heavy annual expenditure. Abolish it."

Now, Mr. Speaker, these articles from Conservative journals indicate the state of sentiment in the country and it is my belief that at least three-fourths of the voters of Canada who support the right hon. gentleman are tired and disgusted with this Act. I believe, Sir, that there are not ten members of this House, sitting here to-night, who would vote for this Act if they voted on their convictions. But the right hon. gentleman and his followers are something in the condition of the man, of whom Abe Lincoln relates the story, who called for help one day to a passerby on the road; the man was holding a hog by the tail against a tree and he said to the passerby: "Come here and help me." The man said: "What do you want?" and the other replied: "I want you to help me to let go of this hog." That is the trouble with the right hon. gentleman. He has got this hog, or rather this elephant, and his friends would be glad to get rid of it, but the difficulty is to find out how to let go of the animal. I propose to assist my right hon. friend in letting go of this elephant in a limited sense, and it will be a step to getting rid of the elephant altogether. This Franchise Act is entirely useless. There is hardly a member who supports my hon. friends who is not subject to an expense of five or six hundred dollars for the revision of voters' lists in his riding. I know that $500 is less than the actual average cash outlay required by this measure from every member who supports the right hon. gentleman on the other side of the House. It is cruel legislation on his part to submit them to this expenditure.

Mr. RYKERT. Did you pay that?

Mr. CHARLTON. I pay more than that. In my riding, a Reform riding and considered a sure riding, I may tell the gentleman, in confidence, that the legitimate expenses of the Franchise Act in 1886 cost me $750, and it did not cost the hon. gentleman from Lincoln anything less.

Mr. RYKERT. Oh, yes; a great deal less.

Mr. CHARLTON. This is a useless and unnecessary expense, and the fact that it is not a satisfactory measure is fairly and clearly evinced by the delay of the Government in issuing a second list. The operation of this measure was so unsatisfactory, and the expenses were so enormous, that, after the first list was created, they gave us a pause of three years before they made any attempt to give us a second list. The first list cost us $420,000. The Government have already paid for that list $414,000, and there are something over $5,000 in bills yet to be settled. I venture to say that the members of this House paid not less than $150,000 in expenses in connection with the revision of that list, and I venture to say that the public were damaged to the extent of not less than $500,000 in loss of time and in dancing attendance on the courts. We have an expense to the country in connection with that voters' list, directly and indirectly, of about $1,100,000, and that is an expense which must be incurred every time for the purpose of creating a list, inferior in every respect to the list formed by municipal officers for provincial franchise purposes. We have had the character of this Bill debated over and over again and I propose to say only a few words about it to-night. There is not a franchise in any English commonwealth under the sun that has the characteristics that this Bill has. The officer appointed for the purpose of forming these lists in Canada is a Government appointee; he holds his office during the pleasure of the Government, and there is not another commonwealth where the English language is spoken where the revising barrister is an appointee of the Government. The revision of this list is an act performed by the appointee of the Government, whereas in every English colony, and in England itself, the revision of the voters' list is a legal act performed by an appointee of the courts. In England the lists are formed by municipal officers. The lists are revised by a revising barrister appointed by the courts, and in the forming of the lists and in the revision of the lists the Government can interfere in no way whatever. In all the colonies the lists are formed and revised in substantially the same way. In all the States of the American Union the lists are formed and the registration is made by municipal officers. The revision is made by municipal officers in every State except Oregon, where it is made by county judges, and the expenses in all cases are light and the list is formed just on the eve of the election or within a few days of the time that the people are to go to the polls. In Canada we have been voting in elections and bye elections on a list three years old, and we have a system of making the lists which in no case can cause it to be a list formed about the time that an election is held. With regard to the character of the list and with regard to the character of the qualifications I may say a few words. In the United States after a colonial experience of 150 years, and after an experience under a Confederation Act of ten years following that colonial experience—after all the accumulated experience of this period, the constitutional convention of the United States sat two years to consider the terms of their constitution and the matter of the franchise upon which the President of the United States and the members of Congress were elected was considered for six months, and five distinct plans were considered. The first proposal was that the members of Congress should be elected by the State Legislatures; the second was that the people of the State were to nominate a certain number of candidates and from these nominations the State Legislatures were to select the quota that the State was entitled to; the third plan was that they were to be elected in such a manner as the State Legislatures of the various States would direct; the fourth plan was that there should be a uniform proprietory freehold suffrage throughout the United States fixed by Congress; and the fifth plan was that the qualification for an elector of a United States Congressman should be in every State the qualification which was required for an elector for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. After six months discussion and thorough consideration of these five distinct plans, the United States Constitutional Convention adopted the last named plan. At this time the franchises in the various States were diverse in their character.

Mr. RYKERT. Yankee all the time.

Mr. CHARLTON. My hon. friend from Lincoln says, "Yankee all the time." I can tell him that the experience of a great nation which has grown from 3,000,000 to 60,000,000 inhabitants, which commands the respect and admiration of the world, is an experience worthy of consideration, and that this system, which has been in operation and has worked with satisfaction and without friction for 100 years, is worthy of consideration; and if under democratic institutions the system has worked well in one country, it will work well in another. But gentlemen like the hon. member for Lincoln, no matter what example we may offer, if you only tell them that it comes from the United States, regard that sufficient for its condemnation.

Mr. RYKERT. What about the Wrecking Bill?

Mr. CHARLTON. The experience in the United States in this matter has been a satisfactory one. In 1886, after nearly twenty years' experience under the same system, and without a single request for a change, without a single expression of discontent, without a single desire expressed on the part of anyone in this broad Dominion of Canada, this Parliament threw aside that system, and adopted the system we have in vogue to-day. There was no demand for the change, and there has been no satisfaction with the change since it has been made; it has failed to meet expectations, it has failed to command respect or approval, it is unacceptable in any sense to the people of this Dominion; it is costly and cumbersome; in fact, Sir, it can be justly termed a piece of legislative abortion. Now, I hold that in this Dominion every man is a taxpayer; every man contributes to the revenue of this country, and contributes to a large degree, by the payment of Customs and Excise duties; and I hold that every one who is a British subject, and who has reached the age of manhood, being a taxpayer, ought to be entitled to the right of voting in this country. In Ontario a law has been placed on the Statute book which grants manhood suffrage to that Province. It has been claimed for the Dominion Franchise Act that it gives a suffrage in the various Provinces which is wider than the provincial suffrages, and for that reason it was an Act which ought to commend itself to the approbation of all those Provinces. There was some force in that claim; but now that manhood suffrage prevails in the great Province of Ontario, any Dominion Franchise Act which gives a narrower suffrage will be unsatisfactory to the people of that Province. The unpopularity of the Act will be intensified by this change which has been made in the franchise of Ontario. Now, Sir, inasmuch as this Act, when it was first placed upon the Statute-book, recognised manhood suffrage where it existed, the Government has a precedent which warrants it in going to the extent of providing that any Province may move in the direction of manhood suffrage. I do not say that the Government should introduce manhood suffrage over the whole Dominion; but I do say, under the claim made for this Franchise Act, that it was broad and liberal, and more so than the franchise in vogue in the various Provinces of the Dominion, that this Franchise Act did recognise manhood suffrage wherever it existed in the Provinces at the time it was enacted, and, therefore, the Government can consistently go one step further, and adopt manhood suffrage for the House of Commons in all Provinces where it has been adopted for provincial purposes; and I shall invite the Ontario members of this House to place themselves on record as denying to the Province of Ontario, if they choose to do so, a franchise as broad and liberal in its character for the Dominion House as exists for the Ontario Assembly. Therefore, I move:—

That this Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be resolved: That, in the opinion of this House, inasmuch as the Franchise Act recognised manhood suffrage as it existed in two of the Provinces of this Dominion, at the time of the passage of the Act, therefore, in any Province where manhood suffrage has since been or may hereafter be adopted, the qualification under the Franchise Act shall be the same as under the provincial law of such Province, and the voters' list prepared in such Province for provincial purposes shall be used for Dominion elections.

Thereby saving in those Provinces all the useless expenditures that is now being incurred.

Amendment negatived,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) By the 10th section of the Franchise Act of 1885, all those who were entitled, under the respective franchises of British Columbia and Prince Edward Island, to vote in those Provinces, were entitled to have their names put on the Dominion list; and I propose that the arbitrary date which was inserted in that Act be changed, so as to provide that all those who are entitled to vote in British Columbia and Prince Edward Island, when the lists come to be made up, shall be entitled to have their names put on the lists. It is a ridiculous anomaly to have it provided in the statute that those who become of age before the 10th July, 1885, shall have the right to vote, and that those who come of age after shall not. I propose to substitute the first of June in each year before the lists are made up, so that a large number of our young men will not be excluded. I trust that those who have already voted that the Prince Edward Island young men who have the right to vote under the local franchise, should have the right to vote under the Dominion Franchise, will support this amendment. I beg to move in amendment:

That the Bill be not now read a third time, but be referred back to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions to amend the same by adding the following section: Section 10 of the said Act is hereby repealed and the following substituted:—

"10. In the Provinces of British Columbia and Prince Edward Island, respectively, besides the persons entitled to register as voters and to vote under this Act, every person, who, on the 1st of June, of each year, is of the age of 21 years, and is not by this Act disqualified, or by any law of the Dominion disqualified or prevented from voting, and is a British subject by birth or naturalisation, and a resident of the Province, and entitled to vote in the said Province, respectively, by the laws severally in force in the same, shall have the right to be registered as a voter on the voting list, so long as he is properly qualified to vote under the Provisions of the said laws respectively and no longer."

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I strictly object to these amendments intended to grant prerogatives to certain Provinces under the electoral law, that is to say, to the endeavors which are being made in view of giving to certain Provinces advantages or prerogatives which the other Provinces do not enjoy under that law. I consider that allowing a Province to vote under its electoral lists, especially when it has manhood suffrage, is a gross injustice to the only remaining Province under the control of the Dominion Government. Nearly all the Provinces of the Dominion have manhood suffrage except the Province of Quebec. The amendment moved aims at creating a prerogative in favor of Prince Edward Island and British Columbia, prerogatives which would give a right to vote to all men of twenty-one years of age, which, in the Province of Quebec, would have the limited suffrage. Mr. Speaker, should such an amendment be carried, the Province of Quebec would virtually be the only Province of the Dominion governed by the existing electoral system. And in the case of a Government whose majority would run the risk of being defeated in the general elections, that Government, whatever party they should belong to, would be tempted to influence the officers making the electoral lists in the Province of Quebec and would thus commit a partial injustice against the voters of that Province, so that our Province would be in the hands of the governing party in their efforts to get a Ministerial majority, in so far as it would be the only Province under the control of their officers. Mr. Speaker, the whole Dominion must undergo the existing Electoral Act, such as it is, without any amendment; or, if it is intended that the Government should use the local lists for the Federal elections, then the existing Electoral Act must simply be repealed and we must revert to the old system. I am opposed to all these prerogatives which certain parties are seeking to establish for the benefit of a few Provinces against another Province, because the Province of Quebec is the only Province now uncontrolled by manhood suffrage.

Mr. THÉRIEN. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, when this Bill was moved in this House the other night, I voted against the Government, and I belonged for one single moment to the third party, that of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). I do not object to the principle of the Bill, but I find its carrying out too expensive. I see now that certain members are expressing views in which I cannot share and are moving amendments which I cannot support. Therefore, I shall vote against these amendments.

Mr. WATSON. I am sure it must be the object of every member of the House to have a fair list prepared, and desire that the least trouble and expense should be incurred by the members of this House. I think there would be a great deal of trouble and expense incurred by taking these lists from the lists of 1885. There will be a great number of income voters who would not be entitled to vote according to that list, and a great deal of trouble will be incurred in getting those and others put off the list. Every member will also understand that a great number of names will remain on the list which should not be there, because it will be impossible to bring reasons before the revising officer in sufficient time to get them off. I do not desire to detain the House, and I, therefore, move:

That the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to Committee of the Whole in order to amend the same so as to provide that the parliamentary list for the present year shall be made up from the last assessment roll, from the provincial list and records, and from solemn declarations made upon personal knowledge.

I believe that amendment must commend itself to every member of this House, and I think it would be a very fair provision. It would be very unfair to take the last list of the Dominion electors made four years ago as the basis of the next list of voters.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am sure that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House will find the present list as inconvenient to them as we shall find it on this side. The lists which are now to be made the basis of the preliminary lists are about four years old. There will be a number of names to be struck off and a number to be added, and it would be much better to use the last assessment roll as the basis. There will be very little difficulty in using the assessment roll, and I think it will be a great convenience to hon. gentlemen opposite as well as to us on this side of the House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I cannot understand why gentlemen who are desirous, as I must presume the mover and seconder of this amendment are, to have a full list made, should desire to disregard the best means of obtaining a full list, and that is taking the present list as a basis. We have still a list which contains one half, at the very least, of those who are entitled to be on the new list. This proposal is that we shall disregard that list, and shall set about making an entirely new list from the municipal lists and from declarations. That would result in making the revising barrister disregard some part of the work which has been already done, and which is there at his hand, and would compel everyone who is on that list at present to make a declaration unless he happens to be on the assessment roll. It has been stated, time and again, that the assessment rolls are not made fairly in the interests of both parties. While that suspicion exists, it would not be fair for us to deprive these men of the right they have secured of being on the list, or to send them to make the proof, as would be necessary under this amendment.

Amendment negatived, and Bill read the third time and passed.

POST OFFICE ACT.

Mr. HAGGART moved third reading of Bill (No. 93) to amend the Post Office Act.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I move in amendment:

That the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be re-committed to Committee of the Whole for the purpose of providing that the registration fee on letters shall not exceed two cents.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The Postmaster General the other night, in the course of his observations, informed the House that he expected to derive $140,000 to $150,000 increase in the revenue from post offices by doubling the rate on drop letters.

Mr. HAGGART. From registration and drop letters both.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Then I misunderstood the hon. gentleman. However, be that as it may, the increase derivable from drop letters in cities where they are delivered free, will be a very important item, and in my judgment it will bear very unfairly on the business community. In the first place, I think that the hon. gentleman will be disappointed in realising the amount which he expects under the change, because, as was pointed out the other night, I feel quite certain that instead of dropping letters into the post office at one cent, as has been the custom heretofore, under the operation of this Act, parties will hire persons to send them around. I looked over the Postmaster General's return to see how it would affect some of the cities where free delivery is provided. I took the Halifax post office first, which has a revenue of $50,310, against an expenditure of $31,837, leaving an apparent surplus in the Halifax post office of $18,473. The drop letters, according to the Postmaster General's return are 6,731 per week, or 350,000 per year, which, at one cent, would make $3,500. The letter carriers in Halifax cost $3,000; so that under the present arrangement the drop letters pay very nearly one-half the amount which is required to pay for delivering the whole matter in the city of Halifax. Independently of the drop letters which I have already mentioned, there are 1,191,000 letters and newspapers which these letter carriers have to deliver, as well as the drop letters which I have already mentioned From that I think it will be seen that it would be very unfair to put the whole expense of the letter carriers on the drop letters, when, as I have already observed, they have to deliver 1,191,000 letters besides Then I will take the city of Montreal, where the expenses are $246,811, against receipts of $112,985, showing an apparent surplus between expenses and receipts of $133,826. The city delivery of drop letters, by returns, amounts to 52,624 per week, making 2,736,448 per anum, which yields a return on the present basis of $27,364, against the cost of the letter carriers of $40,000. But when it is taken into account that the letter carriers in Montreal have to deliver 5,747,000 letters and papers besides drop letters, I am sure it will appear that that portion of the service should contribute a certain portion towards the expenses of the letter carriers. I next take Toronto, where the receipts are $287,478 as against expenses of $101,324, showing a gain of $186,154. The drop letters, according to the Postmaster General's return, were 91,437 per week, which would amount to 4,756,596 a year, which, at one cent, would yield a revenue of $47,565. In Toronto the total cost of the letter carriers is $38,333, showing a gain of $9,232 between the drop letters alone and what it costs for the whole expense of letter carriers to deliver all the business letters in Toronto. And when I mention that the general delivery in Toronto of letters and papers, besides drop letters, amounts to 11,597,612, which are delivered by these letter carriers, I think it will show that the city has already contributed a very large amount towards the general expenses of the Post Office Department I might, were it not so late, go over the return of the Postmaster General and give evidences from other cities of the Dominionto show that they are all contributing largely and paying expenses in the delivery of drop letters; but I think I have given enough to show to the House that in those cities which I have mentioned, and notably in Toronto, there is a gain of over $9,000 between drop letters, which yield over $47,000, and the expense of the letter carriers to deliver the whole mail of the city of Toronto, $38,000. I think if the hon. Minister has analysed the whole delivery of the cities which are provided with free delivery, he will arrive at the conclusion that they already pay a very fair and reasonable proportion of the expenses of the Post Office Department. I do not know whether it is too late for the hon. gentleman to change his mind on that subject; however, I propose to invite the House, by resolution, to pass their opinion on that point. Therefore, I move:

That the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions to amend clause 21 of said Act by omitting all words in the 5th line after the words, "such letter."

That section provides that in cities where there is a free delivery, the rate shall be two cents; by the adoption of this, it would provide that drop letters should be one cent.

Mr. HAGGART. You must remember, in the first place, the state of the Post Office Department, and the amount it draws upon the consolidated revenue of the country. Our deficit last year was $782,000; to that has to be added $214,000, the cost of management at headquarters, or $996,000. To that has to be added, as you will see by the Supplementary Estimates of last year, a vote of $63,000 for the Canadian Pacific Railway, which leaves the Post Office drawing on the general revenue of the country to the extent of $1,259,000. Now, how does the change I propose affect the revenue? The total receipts from city drop letters is $100,000. I do not think the change would make a difference of more than $40,000 or $50,000. I have had a general statement prepared to show how the city post offices pay. I find that the total revenue above receipts is about $400,000. From that is to be deducted a share for transportation and mail subsidies, and the share of the payment on behalf of railway communication through the country, which will leave a large deficit to be made up by the city post offices alone. Is it fair to the rest of the community who are not sending letters that $1,000,000 should be taken out of their pockets for the purpose of accommodating people throughout the country who send letters? The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) forgets that I have increased the weight that may be sent for three cents from half an ounce to an ounce; that the accommodation costs the country 6 per cent. on $1,800,000. I propose that in cities where there are deliveries by carriers the rate shall be two cents, and that it shall remain as at present in other places. I also propose a better system of transportation of registered letters, and to effect these two changes I ask between $20,000 and $30,000 to make up the deficiency. If we are to have the efficiency of the department increased we must accommodate ourselves to slightly higher charges. The rates which I propose to be charged on drop letters is similar to that in operation in the United States and is not half that of Great Britain, which has the cheapest postal rate in the world. It is very easy for hon. gentlemen to make themselves popular by asking for reductions of rates, but they must remember they are placing a tax on people who do not send letters, that one cent in cities does not pay for delivery, and it is impossible to make it pay at that rate. I am merely distributing the burden as equitably as possible, and not increasing the rate by more than a very small percentage.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the Postmaster General has adopted a change which will commend itself to the attention of the people of the country. In cities where letters are delivered and where there are post offices every few yards, it is not too much that a little additional burden should be placed on the citizens. When we consider, moreover, that a very large number of people never write letters in the country districts and that those who do have to travel some distance to post them, it is entirely unreasonable to hold that those should pay a large share of the burden of maintaining the service. The proposition at first introduced of making drop letters 2 cents all over the country was not in my opinion a fair one, because in the country where the people are obliged to travel sometimes 5, 6 or 8 miles for a letter they have done a great deal towards paying for the cost when they reach the post office, but in cities where the letters are brought to the doors the people should pay something additional. It is quite evident there is a deficit in the Post Office Department, and if it must be made up I do not see any way in which it can be done more equitably than by the plan proposed by the Postmaster General. He should, however, go further, and, no doubt, the country would have sustained him in his action, had he imposed a charge of half a cent a pound on all newspapers and periodicals, daily, weekly or semi-weekly, passing through the post offices, because we shall be obliged to come to that in the end as the deficits are regularly increasing.

Amendment negatived on a division.

Mr. WATSON moved in amendment:

That the Speaker do not leave the Chair, but that the Bill be again referred to Committee of the Whole to provide that the fee for registration for tax or assessment notices mailed by the clerk shall not exceed two cents.

He said: This amendment is necessary in the interests of Manitoba. Under the Municipal Act is it necessary to register all municipal tax notices, and if this Bill were adopted without the amendment a heavy burthen would be cast upon the municipalities. These notices have no particular value, and there is no risk in carrying them by mail, but in order to insure delivery they require registration, and the fee should not be more then two cents.

Amendment negatived on a division, and Bill read the third time and passed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12:50 a.m. (Tuesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 16th April, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OCEAN MAIL SUBSIDIES.

Mr. LAURIER. I see that the Government have given notice of a resolution to be introduced to-morrow in connection with mail subsidies. I suppose the hon. gentleman will submit to the House the correspondence connected with that subject—the tenders, specifications, &c.

Mr. FOSTER. Full explanations will be given upon moving the resolution, so far as they can be given. With reference to the papers, I think it will be found that most of them are in such a condition, the negotiations are in such a condition, that it would be impossible to bring them down. If there are any papers which can be brought down, they will be laid on the Table.

Mr. LAURIER. If the Government now ask the House to pronounce upon the subject, the correspondence must be closed, and there can be no reason why the papers should not be brought down. I must say that we expect them to be brought down. The Government are very dilatory in bringing down papers. They often promise, and do not bring them down at all. Some time ago, when we had before the House an item in the Estimates concerning the construction of the Cape Breton Railway, the Government promised to bring down all the papers in connection with the construction of the bridge. The First Minister stated positively that the papers would be here on Tuesday last, and we have not got them yet.

Mr. FOSTER. Those papers are now ready and will be down to-day, or to-morrow at the latest.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. FOSTER moved second reading of Bill (No. 115) to amend the Railway Act.

Mr. LAURIER. The Government stated yesterday they would go into Supply.

Mr. FOSTER. This is a Bill of which I gave notice the other night, and I wish to have it transferred from Public Bills and Orders to Government Orders, and to have it read the second time and sent to the Railway Committee. The Bill has something to do with enabling municipalities to lay drains under certain railways.

Mr. LAURIER. I think the hon. gentleman should let this item stand, as I do not think anybody has yet seen the Bill.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). The intention of this Bill is to simplify the mode of crossing railway lines with drains, both municipal and private, authorised by a municipality. Perhaps it would be better for me to read some of the clauses of the Bill. As the law stands at present, all these matters have to be referred to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council for decision, but this Bill provides that:

"Notwithstanding anything in section fourteen of The Railway Act, it shall be the duty of every railway company under the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, and without any such contribution as is hereinafter referred to, to maintain and keep in repair all necessary drains, ditches, and water-courses in existence at the passing of this Act, in and for lands belonging to or held by such company."

That has reference only to the land held by the company. The next clause has reference to the case where a municipal council has decided, either on their own motion or on the application of any person, that it is necessary to carry a drain across the track of a railway company. It provides as follows:—

"Whenever the municipal council of any county, township, parish, or other municipality in Canada, either of its own motion or on the application of any inhabitant thereof, determines that it is necessary to construct a drain or ditch, for the purpose of draining lands in the municipality, across the lands and railway of any railway company, such drain or ditch shall, subject to the conditions hereinafter provided, be made and maintained across the line of such railway and lands, and on equitable terms to be settled as hereinafter provided."

The next clause provides that:

"Such council, hereinafter referred to as the applicant, may serve upon the company, by leaving the same with any agent or other officer in charge of the nearest station, a notice in writing of such decision, together with a description of the lands outside the railway to be benefitted by the proposed drainage, which notice shall be accompanied by plans and specifications, prepared and certified by a civil engineer or Dominion or provincial land surveyor, of that part or portion of the drain or ditch to be constructed across the company's lands and railway, and with an estimate, also so prepared and certified, of the cost of constructing the said drain or ditch across its property, and if the estimated cost of such construction does not exceed the sum of eight hundred dollars, the railway company shall, after the expiration of a reasonable time, construct that part or portion of the said drain or ditch across its lands and railway of the same size and dimensions as are specified on the plans and specifications furnished as aforesaid, unless it disputes in the manner hereinafter mentioned the propriety of the proposed work, or the correctness of such notice, plan, specification or estimate, in which case the dispute shall be enquired into and finally determined in the manner hereinafter provided."

This clause provides that, upon the application referred to by the municipality, the railway company shall be obliged to construct that portion of a drain which crosses their lands, provided it does not cost more than $800, and that, if they deem it unnecessary that the drain should be constructed across their lands, the matter shall be referred to another tribunal than the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. The Bill goes on to provide:

"If neither the applicant nor the company give notice of dispute as in the next section of this Act provided for, and if the company and the applicant do not agree as to whether the railway is to be benefitted by the proposed drainage, or, if benefitted, as to what contribution the applicant should pay towards the construction of the work, and if the whole cost of construction does not exceed the sum of $800, as estimated by a civil engineer or Dominion or provincial land surveyor as aforesaid, then the applicant may tender the railway company the sum that the applicant thinks is fair and just as its portion of the said cost of construction, and may offer to bear afterwards such proportion of the maintenance as it may think just and fair, and if the railway company does not accept the amount so tendered, or if it disputes that the offer is for the proper proportion of future maintenance, then the proportion of the cost of construction and maintenance, or of either as the case may be, that each shall pay or bear, or the question whether it shall be borne altogether by the applicant, shall be decided by arbitration, and any amount or amounts awarded by the arbitrator or arbitrators to be paid to the railway company in respect of such construction or maintenance, shall from time to time be collectable from the applicant as a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction for the amount or amounts so awarded to the company, or if the award determines upon the proportion of the cost of construction or maintenance payable by the applicant, without mentioning the amount, then such proportion shall be recoverable before any court of competent jurisdiction."

The fifth clause refers to the manner in which disputes are to be decided. It says :

"If any dispute, other than concerning the respective proportions of contribution which are to be settled by arbitration as aforesaid, shall arise between the applicant and the company, either in regard to the safety or suitability of the place designated for the work or the sufficiency or correctness of any plans, specifications or estimate, or the propriety of the proposed work, or the manner in which the same is to be maintained."

Then these matters are to be referred to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, but the other matters are to be determined by another tribunal, that is, by arbitration. The whole tenor of this Bill is that drains costing not more than a certain sum shall be constructed by a railway company across their lands, if it be deemed by the municipality in which those lands are situated, necessary, either for private or public purposes, that such drains should be constructed ; and if any dispute arises as to the proportion of the cost and maintenance to be borne by the railway company and the applicants, this Bill provides that the dispute shall be settled, not by the Committee of the Privy Council, but by arbitration, and it provides the mode by which those arbitrators are to be appointed. Then the sixth clause says that :

"Every railway company shall be subject to all general municipal regulations, not inconsistent with this Act, respecting the maintenance and repair of drains, ditches and water-courses in any county, parish, township, or other municipality in Canada through which the railway passes, unless exempted therefrom by the special Act of incorporation; Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall authorise any municipality by any rule or regulation to compel the use of the drains of the railway company for the purposes of general drainage other than is authorized by law."

I understand, from the promoter of this Bill, which originated in the Senate, and was there under the charge of Mr. McCallum, that difficulties had arisen under the Municipal Drainage Act in the Province of Ontario in cases where it was necessary to carry a public drain, or a private drain, across a railway track which was under the control and authority of the Local Legislature of that Province. This Bill is intended to provide a means by which these drains can be carried across the track, and that the railway company may be required to construct them and to bear the cost of the construction and maintenance without a reference to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have no doubt that this Bill will receive due attention at the hands of the Minister of Justice. I am totally at a loss to understand on what ground the promoters of the Bill should come here for the purpose of obtaining legislation. It is quite true that the hon. gentleman says that this Bill deals with railways incorporated by the Parliament of Canada, and not with those incorporated by the Province. I do not see how that can affect the jurisdiction of the Province in its municipal legislation. A railway incorporated by this Dominion is an artificial person. When it possesses land in the Province, the lands possessed by it do not differ from those held by any other proprietor. A railway company stands in the same position and is as much subject to the control of the general legislation of the Province as any other proprietor would be. If we choose to incorporate a railway company, and, in building up a grade, the company obstructs a water-course, and the result is that the water overflows the lands belonging to a municipality or to any private party, it could not be seriously argued that the Province would not have the same powers to authorise the municipality to compel the abatement of that nuisance or the proper drainage of the lands, and the proportionate contribution by the railway company, as it would have in the case of any other proprietor. There can be no possible difference. The fact that we create a corporation has nothing to do with the subject-matter upon which the hon. gentleman proposes to legislate. The moment we create that corporation and it goes into a Province and undertakes to possess itself of lands, it possesses those lands subject to the control of the Province precisely the same as if the corporation had been created by the Legislature of the Province. There can be no difference in that respect. The power to provide for the draining of lands, the question of property and civil rights, extend to property held by a railway and to the civil rights possessed by that railway in common with other proprietors, just the same as if that power were created by the Provincial Government. There can be no possible difference in this respect, and it does seem to me extraordinary that the promoters of this Bill should come to this House and seek legislation upon a subject where Local Legislatures have ample powers to grant the necessary relief to the municipalities for the removal of the grievance complained of.

Mr. LAURIER. I suppose that coming events cast their shadows before them, and when we see the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. White) taking charge of a Bill introduced by the Government, it is an indication of an event which would be to the credit of the hon. gentleman. I congratulate him in advance upon the diligence that he exhibits in view of his expected promotion. In relation to the Bill itself, I must say that I regret that it is being brought forward at this moment, more especially in view of the constitutional objection which has been raised by my hon. friend, and which ought to receive more discussion than it can receive now.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We were informed last night, I think by the First Minister, that Supply was to be the first order of the day, and now we find a measure brought in which, if discussed at all, may occupy a considerable time, inasmuch as my hon. friend has raised a constitutional question of some importance. So far as I could follow the hon. gentleman who seems to have it in charge, the provisions of the Bill are not quite so simple as might appear. I think that when an understanding is come to between the two sides of the House that you will proceed with a particular order, that understanding should be adhered to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It certainly was understood that we should go into Supply, and that is our intention. The reason why the Minister of Finance moved this now was in order that it may be sent to the Railway Committee. If it be a desirable Bill in itself—I believe it is wanted very much by the municipalities—I think my hon. friend will allow it to be read the second time now, and when it comes back we can discuss the constitutional point, and in the meantime go into Committee of Supply. No constitutional objection was raised in the other branch of the Legislature. If my hon. friend will allow it to go to committee now, we can discuss that point when the Bill comes back.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We have not seen the Bill at all.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). The Bill has been before the House for three weeks.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It has been printed for a long time. The committees will soon close, I hope, and I think my hon. friend had better allow the Bill to go to a committee at once. It can do no harm. When it comes back we will discuss whether we have a right to pass it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Had we not better settle that question now?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In the progress of business my hon. friend had better let it go.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). We are affirming the principle of the Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is a matter of everyday parliamentary practice, both here and in England, for the expedition of business, that a Bill gets its second reading in order to go to a committee, with the understanding that it is for that purpose only, and in no way involves the principle of the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

LABOR COMMISSION REPORT.

Mr. BOWELL laid upon the Table the report of the Royal Labor Commission on the relations of labor and capital in Canada, together with the evidence taken before the said commission.

Mr. MITCHELL. How many copies of that will be distributed for the information of our constituents?

Mr. BOWELL. There will be one copy distributed for each member, and if there is a sufficient number left, that can be duplicated if necessary.

GOOD FRIDAY—ADJOURNMENT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It was our intention that when the House adjourned on Thursday night it should stand adjourned until Saturday, and then sit again on Monday. But there has been considerable pressure, if I may use the word, from both sides, that when we adjourn on Thursday, we should stand adjourned until the Monday following.

Mr. MITCHELL. For once I entirely agree with the hon. gentleman, and I would be happy to support him in this matter. I only regret—and I say this in all sincerity—that I cannot always support him as sincerely in many of the motions he brings forward. I think it is only reasonable that we should not sit on Saturday. We have never done so yet, and there is no reason why we should do so now. The Government requires a day for the consideration of their important measures, and some of us would like to get home for a short visit.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think that some consideration ought to be shown to those members of this House who have been here since the first day of the Session, and who are anxious to get home as soon as possible. The practical result of adjourning over Saturday till Monday will be that very little work will be done on Monday. Many hon. members will not be back until late on that day. The Maritime Provinces members ought to receive some consideration in this respect, inasmuch as we are not able to go home at Easter, and we are anxious to keep on with the work until it is completed. That would keep us dangling about Ottawa for two or three days more. I do not think the proposition is a fair one.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I quite agree with the views expressed by the hon. member to my right (Mr. Davies). Perhaps on Thursday the hon. gentleman may see how near we may be reaching the end of the Session, and in that event it might be very inconvenient to adjourn over Saturday. I certainly think we should meet on Saturday. I must confess I have never seen the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) so anxious that the Government should have proper time for deliberation since the Session began.

Mr. MITCHELL. I rise to justify myself. I think I showed just as much desire to support the Administration on a very important measure, in which the hon. gentleman aided me. I refer to the Jesuits' Bill.

Mr. FLYNN. I regret very much that the leader of the Government has not adhered to the notice he gave the other day, that the House should sit on Saturday and not sit on Friday. No doubt some pressure has been brought to bear on the right hon. gentleman with a view to induce him to adjourn till Monday. As the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), has said, I think any change will be very unfair to us particularly, as many hon. members have had the opportunity of frequently returning home, and have, in fact, gone almost every Friday and returned on Monday. If the suggestion should be adopted we would have to remain another week. I think the members from the Lower Provinces have a right to expect that the original announcement should be adhered to, and I trust that will be the determination of the right hon. gentleman.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have not expressed any opinion on the point. I have merely stated to the House that a considerable number of members, including members of both sides of the House, had communicated to me that they desired an adjournment from Thursday to Monday, and I mentioned it in order to ascertain the feeling of the majority. I will not ask a division on the proposition just now, but I will adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and on Thursday, after due consideration, I will ask the opinion of the House upon it.

Mr. BLAKE. The division is geographical on this occasion.

BEAUHARNOIS CANAL.

Mr. BERGERON. I desire to communicate to the House a telegram which I received last night, and which reads as follows:—

"Beauharnois Canal will be ready to-morrow. Steamer Anderson came from Coteau to-night into canal.

"J. F. BÉIQUE,
"Superintendent."

This is the first canal of the St. Lawrence system open to navigation to-day, and I hope the Government and the engineer who may be called upon to decide the question as to whether to enlarge or deepen the canal, or build a canal on the north shore, will take this fact into consideration, as I understand that if built on the north side it could not have been open for a fortnight later.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government will give it due consideration; but perhaps the hon. gentleman may run for a constituency on the north shore next time.

SUPPLY—CUSTOMS SEIZURES.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. HOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I regret very sincerely that this important question to which I am now about to invite the attention of this House was not reached at an earlier period of the Session; but that it was not, is not my fault. As is generally known, a resolution relating to Customs reform was placed by me on an early day of the Session upon the Order Paper, and it was only dropped quite recently, when it became evident that an opportunity for its consideration would not occur if it were allowed to remain there. Had that resolution been reached, it was my intention to have presented a very full case to the House, illustrating the numerous points of objection or complaint against the present Customs system by reference to actual cases as well as to the utterances and opinions of leading newspapers and prominent merchants throughout the country; but on this occasion, and under existing circumstances, I shall limit myself, as far as possible, to a specification of some of the points of objection. I will be brief therefore, and I trust I may rely upon hon. members to accord me a patient hearing. Whenever reference is made in this House, by way of complaint, to existing Customs laws and regulations, we invariably have from the Government, in reply, the general statement that these laws are just what they should be, and that the public interest does not demand, nor the public itself desire, their amendment, or something to that effect, and there we are supposed to let the case rest. Only a few weeks since, during the first debate of the Session, the hon. Premier stated, in effect, that these laws, though severe, were necessarily so in the interest of our great National Policy, that they are a protection rather than an oppression to the honest importer, that the smuggler alone has reason to dread their operation, and that no complaints regarding them had been made to the Government. This, then, must be accepted as the position of the Government upon this important question, and stated, though it has been by such a high authority, yet in the discussion of the resolution which I shall place in your hands, Mr. Speaker, I must differ from all these propositions. My contention is, and I shall endeavor to make it good, that the existing Customs laws and regulations, as well as the methods which are resorted to by the department for their enforcement, are unnecessarily harsh and unjust, and that whilst not dealing in the most effective manner with offences and offenders against the revenue, they do press unduly and unfairly on the honest importer.

Mr. HOLTON. I was saying, Mr. Speaker, when His Excellency's Message arrived, that my contention—and I will endeavor to prove it—is, that the Customs laws and regulations, as well as the methods which are resorted to by the department for their enforcement, are unnecessarily harsh, and unjust; that, whilst not dealing in the most effective way with offences and offenders against the revenue, they do press unduly and unfairly upon the importer, and that complaints, loud and long, have been made, and are to day being made against the system. It may be true, as the Minister has stated, that Boards of Trade have not made representations to the Government, and that citizens have not petitioned on the subject, but they probably learned a long time since the utter uselessness of any such proceeding on their part. At the same time, it is true that Boards of Trade have discussed the question, that they have debated and adopted resolutions demanding Customs reform, that the press of the country, regardless of political bias, has for years been denouncing the present system, and the outrages committed under it in unmeasured terms, and that, in a recent important case tried in the highest court in the land, the system of which we now complain has been exposed and denounced. Surely the Government cannot plead ignorance of these things, nor can it forget the haste with which the Minister of Customs was despatched to Montreal, upon the eve of the last general election, to consult with and to appease the mercantile body of that city. On that occasion the Minister had conferences with the council of the Board of Trade, and with prominent merchants; he asked for and obtained suggestions in the direction of desired reform, and promised that, in the event of the Government being sustained at the polls, an adequate measure of reform would at the next Session be introduced by him and carried through Parliament. The Conservative candidates for the city of Montreal taking their cue, doubtless, from the Minister, adopted Customs reform as a plank in their platform, and upon their pledges in that direction they probably secured their return to this House. I say this knowingly, for the merchants of the city were thoroughly aroused at that time by recent revelations and scandals, and I doubt very much if without such pledges the hon. members for Montreal West (Sir Donald A. Smith) and Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) would have been elected. Well, the Government was sustained at the polls, but during the Session following the hon. the Minister of Customs proposed to Parliament no measure in fulfilment of his promises to the merchants of the country. Last Session, however, the Customs Act was thoroughly revised, but in no sense reformed; in fact, in many important particulars its provisions were made more severe and onerous, and to-day we have on our Statute-book a more one-sided, harsh and tyrannical Customs enactment than is to be found in any civilised country on the face of the globe. The law itself, together with the departmental regulations for its interpretation and enforcement constitute a system which is simply barbarous, and the only wonder is, that a free, self-governing people as Canadians pretend to be, should so long and so meekly submit to it. Gentlemen on the Treasury benches have for years resented with scorn any proposition looking towards extended trade relations with our neighbors to the south, they, in their professions are to be believed, do not want anything from the United States, but it was to that country they went for their unfortunate tariff system, as also for their present un-British Customs laws and methods, picking up the latter, however, only after they had been discarded by the American Government as an affront to the moral sense of the people. The Minister of Customs has many times asserted in this House, and, no doubt, we shall have a repetition from him of the statement on this occasion, that, under the interpretation and application of the present Customs laws and regulations, the honest merchant is amply protected and has nothing to fear. But my opinion, deliberately expressed, is that for every smuggler or actual offender against the revenue who is detected and dealt with, two honest men, if not more, fall into the traps and snares which the law and its agents deliberately set for them, and, though guilty of no improper intent, they are punished by fine and forfeiture, and by the still more severe penalty of having their names tarnished and themselves branded as smugglers. I say, Sir, that, under these laws, the honest importer has no chance whatever; his word, his invoice, his oath, his life-long reputation for integrity and fair dealing with his neighbor and with the Government all count for nothing when a charge of undervaluation is brought against him, even though his accusers are men who have plunder in view rather than the interests of the public service. Further, Sir, when the honest merchant, while acting in perfect good faith, and without the remotest desire to defraud the revenue of a single cent, has, unfortunately, got into one of these traps, he has not even the chance that is accorded to the rogue taken red-handed in his fraudulent practices, for while in the former case every dollar that can be squeezed out of the unfortunate is taken, in the case of the actual smuggler there is too frequently a compromise or quiet settlement. As I have already intimated, some of the points to which I desired to direct the attention of the House have been carefully considered and pronounced upon by the Supreme Court of Canada, and I cannot do better, therefore, than give some extracts from the exhaustive judgment of the Chief Justice in deciding the famous Ayer case. In rendering that judgment he said:

"I feel it the bounden duty of this court to investigate the matters connected with this case with the greatest possible care to ascertain if it can be possible, in the face of the action of the Customs authorities, and of a fair construction of the revenue laws applicable to this case, that mercantile and business men in the Dominion stand in such jeopardy, as they would be in if the contentions of the Crown can be sustained. If the law is so, I must so administer it, but before I can or will declare such to be the law, I must be satisfied beyond any doubt that such is the law. I am bound to say it is not easy to understand how honest business men desirous of making honest importations and carrying on business in this Dominion, could do more than it appears was done in this case, namely, to apply to the Customs officers to ascertain on what terms, and at what rate of duty the proposed goods could be imported into the country. * * *

"Nor can I conceive what honest and cautious Customs officials could do more than was done in this case, in reply to such an application, viz.: to state that when imported goods would be duly examined by the Customs authorities, and the correct rate of duty would be fixed.

"It would appear that when the goods were imported they were examined, samples taken and transmitted to the board of appraisers at Montreal and at Ottawa, the duty fixed, and the business commenced, and was continued thenceforward for a period of twenty odd years, until the seizure; that, too, without the slightest complaint of any irregularity, undervaluation or misdescription. * * *

"And no difficulties made until 1885, when Underhill, having been discharged by Ayer for alleged misconduct, came to Montreal, and combining with O'Hara and Brousseau, they appear to have concocted this scheme, to procure the confiscation of all the goods entered from 1882 to 1885 inclusive, and the forfeitures thereon, amounting to $385,313, from which they doubtless anticipated the realisation of enormous gains. These two officers appear, by the evidence of the Commissioner of Customs, to have acted on their own responsibility in making these seizures, and in their own interests, and undertook, with the assistance of the discreditable witnesses, Underhill and Flint, and for their joint pecuniary benefit, to cause this large amount of property to be seized, and which they now seek to have condemned, and enormous forfeitures adjudged against this unfortunate firm, who, from the start of their business in 1862 up to its close in 1884, so far as I can gather from the evidence, appear to have dealt with the Customs Department and acted throughout in an open, fair and business manner, without concealment or fraud.

"Notwithstanding this conduct on the part of the Ayers, and this action on the part of the Customs officials, which, in my mind, should exculpate them, if not legally, certainly, morally, from any imputation of fraud—they are now specifically charged with the disgraceful offence of smuggling. The conduct of O'Hara in thus conniving at the concealment of the books, and setting at defiance the order of the judge, the aiding of a witness to keep out of the way of the service of a subpœna by the claimants, the false suggestion of O'Hara—and as to this false suggestion, when asked if it was not made to deceive, he says: 'I suggested that, because the witness did not wish to come into court until called by the Crown, and I did not wish to afford any information to the other side' and the downright untruths admitted by Brousseau himself, the conduct of Brousseau in trafficking, or endeavoring to traffic in the proceeds, which he had evidently made up his mind he and Underhill, beyond all peradventure, were to make out of this seizure, and the equivocating and discreditable manner in which both of these officers gave their testimony,—all, in my opinion, open to the gravest censure.

"I regret, in the interests of justice and of the business community of the Dominion, who may have controversies with the Customs officials, to be compelled to make these observations in reference to persons holding responsible positions in the Customs Department at Montreal, whose duty it most certainly was to have obeyed the order of the Supreme Court instead of setting it at defiance, and if not to have aided, certainly not to have thrown obstacles, by false suggestions and false statements, with a view of preventing the service of subpœnas on witnesses the claimants desired to examine, and with reference to the conduct of these witnesses, considering the peculiar position in which they stood, it should have been marked with the greatest propriety, and with the same desire and disposition to answer all questions, as well those on the part of claimants as those on the part of the Crown, with fairness, truthfulness and honesty, which I regret to say was far from being the case. In other words, to have acted as public officers in the discharge of public duty—desirous only that justice should be done alike to the Crown and the claimants. Surely the public having controversies with the Customs are entitled to this measure of justice, and certainly that Customs officers should not act, as their conduct in this case would seem to indicate, viz., as partisans having a deep pecuniary interest in the result and with an apparent determination to effect at all hazards a condemnation."

The judgment closed in these words:

"The Crown, therefore, has failed to establish the charges in the information against the Ayer Company that the goods seized were illegally imported, or that they were undervalued, or that the entries did not correspond with the invoices, and that the oaths or affirmations made in entering them were untrue; and there being, therefore, no foundation for the seizure of the said goods, I order and adjudge that they be forthwith restored to the claimants, and the information in rem dismissed with costs.

"And the charges of undervaluation not being sustained, it follows that there were no goods illegally imported into Canada, and no unpaid duties for which the claimants are liable, and the information in personam, must also be dismissed with costs."

The costs payable by the Government under this judgment were considerably in excess of its share of the fines and forfeitures imposed last year for real or alleged breaches of the revenue laws. The Auditor General's Report of last year gave us a total of $98,360.75 of fines and forfeitures, of which $93,068.90 were paid to seizure officers, and on account of the expenses of seizures, leaving a balance to the public revenue of $5,291.85. So that I think I am safe in asserting that the costs which the Government will have to pay, or have paid, exceed by a considerable amount its share of the fines and forfeitures of last year. If time permitted, I would also refer to the Grinnell case, in which, as is probably known, large quantities of goods were seized for undervalution and improper entry, and all the penalties known to the law were sought to be imposed, to the great profit, of course, of certain officials. It was recently decided in this case, however, by the full bench of the Supreme Court, that the importer had acted throughout with the most perfect honesty, and that there was not even probable cause for suspecting the reverse. The court, therefore, dismissed the claims with full costs, and, in so doing, reflected very severely on the treatment meted out to honest importers by the Customs Department. These judgments, however, do not cover the whole question under consideration, and I will, therefore, point out, with all possible brevity, wherein the existing Customs laws and regulations are chiefly found to be oppressive to the importer, while not protecting honest trade and the revenue in the most effective manner. To begin with, we have a Customs Act wholly based on the assumption that every importer is a knave. Such a thing as an honest importation seems never to have occurred to the framers of this law. Why, Sir, the suspected felon is not more carefully tracked and shadowed than is the most upright merchant of the land in every transaction he may have with the Customs Department. Then, we have a tariff system which in many respects is so clouded with ambiguities as to be wholly unintelligible to the public as well as to the officials. Yet, when questions of valuation and classification for entry and duty arise, as they frequently do, the arbitrary ruling of the department invariably prevails, the unfortunate merchants' only appeal being to an arbitration board composed of three members, two of whom are appointed by the department. This, according to the peculiar notions of the Minister of Customs, may be fair and just and a very great protection to the honest importer, but the honest importer and public opinion favor an appeal to an arbitration board composed in the usual way; that is, to a board composed of three disinterested merchants, one to be appointed by each party, and the third by both, and their decision in all cases should be final. I submit, moreover, that where the authorities assume, arbitrarily, to fix the value of goods for entry and duty, those values should, in common fairness, be disclosed to the importer, before he is called upon to make his entry, and further, that the department, under such circumstances, should be bound by its own valuations. As it is now, a merchant may enter his goods at the very valuation fixed by the department, and yet, at any time within three years, be accused of fraud and undervaluation in connection with that very entry; and that this does frequently happen, the Minister well knows. The revenue could not possibly lose anything by such fair dealing as I now suggest, and what is of vastly greater importance, the merchant would be protected from the snares into which, no matter how honest he may be, he is in constant danger of falling. Another reform which I feel sure would be approved by the public is this: Where it is evident there is no dishonesty intended, there should be no penalty. Following the line of the argument of the court, in the two cases to which I refer, I think that no more should be required of the importer than to present an honest invoice of his goods, or to obtain their entry value from the Customs, if there be a difference in valuation between them, and then to tender all the duties which the tariff imposes upon such goods. But this wholesome method finds no favor with the Minister of Customs. He says to the merchant, whose only desire is to do all that the law requires of him: Enter your goods and take your chance of the score of traps and snares which, with the aid of a just law and an incomprehensible tariff, we have set for you; and under this system the grossest injustice has been done. I would like to refer, as illustrating some of the points to which I have just referred to a case of recent occurrence. Last year a merchant of Niagara Falls purchased in the United States a lot of paper hangings. On the arrival of his goods, and at the suggestion of a broker, he presented his invoice at the Custmos House to have the various articles checked and entered for duty. This was done by the entry clerk at the office, and the duties charged by him were duly paid. This was done alsoin subsequent importations by this merchant of similar goods. In every instance, the goods were examined by the Custom house officer and found correct. Some months subsequently, and after most of the goods had been sold, a special agent of the Customs from Ottawa and the collector of the port called upon this merchant and demanded to see his invoices for wall paper. These were immediately handed them. On comparing the invoices with the duplicate invoices, it was found that some of the goods, appraised and valued, as I have said, by the local Custom house officer, had been entered too high and some too low, and altogether it was found that, according to this new calculation, the merchant had paid 7, 8 or 9 cents too little for duties. He at once proposed paying the difference; but no, under threat of seizure of his whole stock, he was forced to deposit $65.95, which was far more than the value of the goods claimed to have been irregularly entered. He made the deposit with the expectation that his conduct throughout having been in perfect good faith, the money would be returned to him, but, after communicating with his representative in Parliament—the hon. member for Welland, I believe—and the Minister, he was informed that the money had been confiscated, and, later still, the Minister declined to re open the case. Well, if that was not pure and simple robbery, I would like the Minister's definition of it.

Mr. BOWELL. It might be if it were true.

Mr. HOLTON. I have every reason to believe that the statement I have given to the House is perfectly true.

Mr. BOWELL. I have not the slightest doubt as to that.

Mr. HOLTON. My information, I believe, is quite as reliable as the Minister's. I think, further, that the law relating to enclosures should be so modified that the importer should not be made to suffer because of the error of his agent or consignor abroad, when that is proved. Very grave injustice is being constantly done in this connection, and the law should be so amended as to give discretionary powers to collectors in such cases. But by far the most important and necessary reforms to which, I think, Parliament should direct its immediate attention, are the immediate total abolition of the moiety, or, as it is popularly and more properly called, the spoils system, and the reference of all cases of alleged frauds to the courts, where the party accused shall have a full, fair and public trial, a trial at which the ordinary rules of evidence shall prevail. As the case now stands, it is possible for a Customs officer, without responsibility of any kind for his action, to bring what charge he may please against an importer, to take his books and papers from him, and then, having deprived him of his means of defence, to hold him guilty of such a charge unless he can prove his innocence. In fact, the seizing officer, the accuser, the judge and the executioner may be one and the same person, and at the same moment may stand in the very disinterested position of a prospective two-thirds sharer in the moneys which are to be extracted from the victim; and oftentimes merchants, though perfectly honest but recognising their helplessness under these circumstances, quietly yield and pay the demand. We saw very clearly in the Ayers case, how the present spoils system can work even in court, where, the Ayers being on their defence and having been deprived of their books and papers, the seizing officers treated the orders of the court with contempt rather than produce the firm's books or testify in a way which would diminish in the slightest their prospects of making a tremendous haul. These men had no thought for the public service, but were simply after plunder, and plunder they were bound to have at the cost of truth and fair play; and what happened in that case may happen to any importer in the country, for the same men are in office, moved doubtless by the same lust for spoil, and with the department still at their back upholding the unholy system. It is simply an abomination, and the public so considers it; yet my friend the Minister of Customs hugs the nasty thing to his bosom as the dearest object of his affections, and the Prime Minister tells us that all this is done in the interest of the honest trader. I am, of course, aware of the Minister's objection to taking his cases into the courts, for experience has shown him that, in the face of proved facts, judges cannot be relied upon to look at things as he does, nor to be moved by the same yearning desire to enrich the favorite spy, informer and official at the expense of the revenue or of the unhappy mortal who has got into the toils. The Minister does not recognise the equity and morality of giving the man charged with offences against the revenue the same fair public trial that is accorded to the most dangerous and degraded felon in the land. The latter is held to be innocent until proved guilty, but with the Customs' victims the reverse is the rule, and all this, forsooth, in the interest of the honest importer. The Minister may lack confidence in the courts of the land, but that is no reason why this Parliament should refuse a reform which the public demand. I, for one, do not hesitate to acknowledge the importance and necessity of protecting the public revenue, and punishing severely all frauds upon it; but I do not admit that this public revenue is so much more sacred than the lives, the property and the rights of citizens, whose only recourse for their defence is to be found in the courts, that such an extraordinary, one-sided and tyrannical law should be necessary for its protection. There is but one other abuse to which I will now allude, and that is the habit of allowing officials to receive remuneration for their services as such from importers, and I will illustrate the offensiveness of that practice by a special reference to a very objectionable practice which obtains in Montreal, and perhaps elsewhere—one of the methods resorted to by the Customs Department, for no other reason that I can see than to harass the honest importer and to hamper trade, and to line the pockets of some pet official. A large number of importers are in the habit of receiving daily from the United States, perishable goods, such as fish, fruit, oysters, and so on, for immediate delivery. A very extensive business in these commodities is carried on, and, of course, it is in the very nature of the trade that an immediate delivery of the goods should be made. As a strict adherence to the rules governing ordinary importations would result, in consequence of the delay, in the total loss of the goods, the collector has, very wisely and properly, detailed one of his officers to visit the trains, examine the goods, and allow them to be delivered, but, as I think, very improperly and illegally—though the Minister has justified his course—he has authorised the official to charge a special fee for each of such entries, and that as a remuneration for the performance by the official of such duties. To the importer of these perishable articles this means an annual tax, ranging from $20 to $60 per annum, and perhaps upwards; but to the fortunate officer it means an addition of several thousand dollars to his salary. Now, Sir, this is nothing more or less than an unjust and illegal tax upon these merchants, and, from information in my possession, I do not hesitate to characterise its imposition, as a most offensive species of blackmailing. It operates in this way: An officer makes his account once a month to the merchants, whose refusal to pay, or if they question the legality of his action, means that his goods will be sent to the examining warehouse, to be dealt with in its order, that is to say, after a delay of four or five days, which means their deliberate destruction. I am aware that the Minister has approved of this imposition; yet, notwithstanding that, I repeat that the fees exacted by the officer constitutes an unjust, an unauthorised, and, therefore, an illegal tax.

Mr. BOWELL. Do I understand you to say that I had approved of the imposition of fees of that kind?

Mr. HOLTON. Yes; and it may save time, perhaps, if I give the Minister now my authority for that statement.

Mr. BOWELL. If you please.

Mr. HOLTON. The attention of the department was directed to this imposition a little less than two years ago, in May, 1887, by one of these importers in Montreal, Mr. David Crawford. On February 21, of that year, he addressed himself to the Collector of Customs in Montreal, protesting against this charge. On the 25th of the same month, Mr. Ryan replied in acknowledgment of that letter. On the 28th February, in the same year, Mr. Crawford addressed himself to the Commissioner of Customs, Mr. Johnson, and on March 15 he received this letter from Mr. Johnson:

"OTTAWA, 15th March, 1887.

"DAVID CRAWFORD, Esq., Montreal, Que.

"SIR,—Referring to yours of the 28th ultimo, covering correspondence with the Collector at Montreal, and of complaining of charges made by Assistant Appraiser Hatchette for extra service, I have the honor to state in reply that the matter has been enquired into and submitted to the Hon. Minister of Customs, who, having examined into the complaint and answer thereto, directs me to state in reply that he does not consider the fee charged for services required to be performed before or after regular office hours, unreasonable."

So I think, under these circumstances, I can truthfully repeat that it was with the authority and approval of the Minister; and I would repeat that the fees thus exacted by this officer constitute an unjust, an unauthorised, and therefore an illegal tax. My opinion further is that the principle of allowing revenue officers to receive, under any circumstances, from importers, a remuneration for the performance of their official duties, is vicious in itself, and wholly opposed to the public interest. With the material before me, and the information I have at hand, I could very easily extend my remarks to a considerable length; but feeling that I have said enough to establish my contention that these Customs laws and regulations are oppressive and should be amended, and having respect to the period of the Session in which we now find ourselves, I will close with only one further suggestion, and that is, to remind the Minister that he and his subordinates are, after all, the servants and not the masters of the people; and when he comes to understand that truth I feel certain that other reforms now suggested will follow. I beg, therefore, to move:

That the Speaker do not leave the Chair, but that it be resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Customs Act in such a manner that while securing every proper and necessary protection to the revenue, it will relieve the honest importer from the danger of oppression, and in the case of persons charged with violation of the Customs law, provide that no one shall be subject to fine or fines except after a fair and public trial; and provided further, that in no event shall the officers making seizures participate in the fine or forfeitures imposed for such offences.

Mr. BOWELL. I have very little to complain of as to the manner in which the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) has presented his case to the House. I frankly admit, before alluding to the cases to which he has referred, or before answering any of the arguments which he has advanced, that there is cause not only for diversity of opinion, but for differences of opinion, as to the manner in which the Customs laws should be carried out, and the revenue protected. I can readily understand that among those who have not had any practical knowledge of the working, particularly, of a protective tariff, and of the provisions of the law which it is necessary to enforce in order to secure a proper revenue and to protect the honest importer—there may be not only diversity of opinion, but there may be many arguments to sustain the position which has been taken by the gentleman who has just addressed the House. Having admitted that much, I must take exception to his introductory remarks in which he says that just before the last election I visited Montreal in great haste, in order to have a consultation with the Board of Trade, or to receive advice, or tender advice to the gentlemen composing that body. I have been in the habit, since I have had the honor of occupying the important position I now hold, in endeavoring to enforce the laws and regulations, which are onerous in their character, of visiting not only the Boards of Trade of Montreal and Toronto, but also in other sections of the country—not at the time of elections, however, but upon every occasion when complaints have been made to the department—and I have found I could come to a decision much better, more equitably, and more in accordance with the law, by visiting those who have entered complaints, and by having a friendly consultation with them. I have visited the Boards of Trade, not only of Montreal, but as far east as Halifax and as far west as Victoria, and upon all occasions, after consultation, we have come to an understanding as to the course that should be pursued, particularly in the administration of this, if I might use the expression, somewhat intricate law. With respect to the interview to which the hon. gentleman has referred—whether it was before the election or not I do not know, but I know I met a deputation, I think the executive committee of the Board of Trade of Montreal; and upon that occasion we discussed many of the clauses of the Customs Act and the mode by which they had been enforced by the Customs officials. I made no such promises as those to which the hon. gentleman referred. I do not say that the hon. gentleman has made those statements without believing them to be correct; I can only presume that he has taken statements made by irresponsible persons, and that appeared in the different newspapers in Montreal, at the time, in regard to what actually did take place at that interview. All that I promised the merchants at that time has been carried out since. Many amendments which they suggested I combated to the best of my ability, and I am vain enough to believe that, in some cases, I succeeded in showing them that their suggestions would be detrimental to the interest of the honest importer rather than beneficial to him. Although the hon. gentleman has not spoken so long, as I have no doubt he might have desired, upon this subject, he has said enough to necessitate my occupying a little more time than I would choose to do under other circumstances. I dissent in toto from the statement made that for every smuggler caught and punished, two at least of the honest importers receive worse treatment than does the smuggler; and I think a little attention to the working of the law and to the facts, if they were all before the hon. gentleman, would have led him to other conclusions. I do not propose to take up each case to which the hon. gentleman has referred, but while it is fresh in my memory I desire to reply particularly to his closing remarks in regard to the approval which, he says, I, as head of the department, gave to the exaction of fees by any officer in Montreal or elsewhere. I remember distinctly the case to which the hon. gentleman has called the attention of the House. I made enquiry as to what was the practice in Montreal, and instead of approving of the system of exacting fees from importers, I gave instructions positively that no officer should receive any fee from merchants; and if the hon. gentleman would turn to the rules and regulations which are now in force, but, unfortunately, which are not now before me, he will find they provide that no officer shall receive any fee for any service he may render to a merchant.

Mr. LAURIER. What about Mr. Johnson's letter?

Mr. BOWELL. Mr. Johnson's letter says nothing of the kind. There is a practice, and it has been in existence ever since Customs officers have been appointed in this country, of giving remuneration for extra services, either before the hour in the morning when official duties begin, or after the close of the Customs house at night. The Grand Trunk Company pays into the revenue between $15,000 and $20,000 annually towards covering such expenditure. Every railway, the Allan line and other ocean companies, and every steamboat on the inland lakes and waters, that requires the services of an officer after hours, to superintend the loading or unloading of goods so as not to have the vessels detained on their trip, pays so much per hour, or per month, as the case may be. The amount paid by the different railway companies and steamboat proprietors, ocean as well as inland, amounts annually to between $40,000 and $50,000. I admit that it is a grave question whether it would not be better to have day as well as night officials to conduct this business, instead of exacting the amount from the parties who now pay it. It is a question which has been under the consideration of the Government for some time. The principle is not a new one; it prevailed when I assumed office, and it continues at the present time. If the House should deem it advisable to take an extra appropriation annually, to the extent of $50,000, in order to enable the department to increase its staff and pay night as well as day hands, then we could do away, I have no doubt, with many of the complaints made, not only by the officers themselves, who wrangle about the amount they should receive, but also by those who have to pay this amount out of the proceeds of the enterprises in which they are engaged. That is a point, I repeat, which is very fairly open to discussion. But I desire to call the attention of the House to this fact, that that is one particular in which our system differs diametrically from that of the United States. There the fees, as I shall show before I close my remarks, are enormous. In some cases, with respect to small articles which are free under the tariff, these fees reach an amount equal to 50, 60, or 75 per cent. We have no such system in this country, and the only fee an officer or collector is entitled to receive from any importer when he desires to make an entry is 5 cents for the three forms upon which the entry is made, and that sum is paid into the revenue. Even as to that payment, the importer is not obliged to purchase the forms from the Custom house officer; they are simply kept as a matter of accommodation for the convenience of importers. And I desire to call the attention of the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) to the difference between the remunerating of an officer who performs duty after official hours, and the acceptance of fees, as the hon. gentleman put it to the House. I do not know any system that could be more abused than the system to which he has drawn attention, provided it prevailed in this country, and if it is practiced by any officer in Montreal it is contrary to the regulations of the department, as there is no authority for any Customs officer to receive fees. The statement having been made, however, I shall take the earliest opportunity to call the attention of the collector at Montreal to it, in order that he may ascertain whether such be the fact or not. The hon. gentleman said that the extent to which this has been carried out has been such as to add thousands of dollars to the salary of the officer, Mr. Hatchette, who performs this duty, or others who may perform it. If this be so, Mr. Hatchette is receiving money to which he has no right, for all he is entitled to receive is payment for whatever time he may give to importers before or after office hours, at so much per hour, or so much per month, as may be arranged. My hon. friend has placed a resolution before this House, which, to my mind, is somewhat novel in its character, and I am quite sure that anyone who will reflect for a moment, must come to the conclusion that the policy involved in this resolution is one utterly impracticable, or if not impracticable, it would add a great deal more to the discomfort of the honest importer, and particularly those who are accused and not guilty, than any system which prevails at present. One part of his resolution reads, that the desire is:

"To amend the Customs Act so as to relieve the honest importer from danger of oppression."

The present law provides for all that is involved in that sentence. If the importer is dissatisfied with the action of the seizing officer, or if he is dissatisfied with the ruling of the department, all he has to do is to appeal to the courts, and he can then obtain just that publicity which my hon. friend desires he should have. The resolution goes on to say:

"And in the case of persons charged with violation of the Customs law, to provide that no one shall be subject to fine or fines except after a fair public trial."

I notice that the hon. gentleman left out the words "should he demand it," as his resolution originally read. I infer from this, that if a man is caught red-handed in smuggling across the borders, or evading payment of duty on enclosures, or breaking the law by any other means, the case must be put into court and a judge asked to adjudicate upon it. I confess that I had the same idea for a long time. It was a principle which I tried to impress upon my own colleagues, but when I began to reflect upon the result of the adoption of a policy of that kind, I came to the conclusion that it could not be carried out. It may surprise members of this House when I tell them that the average of seizures for some years past has been from six to seven or eight hundred; some small and some large. Just fancy a man having goods which are perishable, seized when smuggling them across the border; there is no question as to the fact of their being smuggled, the man was caught in the act, but under this resolution, if it was carried out, before you could condemn, or sell, or dispose of those perishable articles, you would first have to employ a lawyer to carry the case into court,—and so it would be in all of those seven hundred cases a year, some of which are of the most trivial character, although others are very important. The law at present lays down clearly what the importer may do, in case he is interfered with, either directly or indirectly, in the transaction of his business. If the goods are seized, a report must be made by the Customs officer as soon as possible, to the department, and as soon as the notification of the seizure is received by the department, the person whose goods have been seized is immediately notified, and he is given a full month in which to put in his defence. Then the ruling of the department is given, and if he objects to that decision, he has thirty days within which to put in his defence, and he can then go into the Exchequer Court, to oppose the decision. All he requires to do is to say, I will not accept the decision of the department——

Mr. HOLTON. He can only go into court, if the Minister allows him.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken. If he will turn to the law, he will find that the person whose goods have been seized can object to the decision of the department; and, having objected, it is the duty of the Minister—except in certain cases where the notice of dissent has not been given in sufficient time—to put the case into court, before he can carry out his condemnation. There is no difficulty whatever in a man going into court, if he so desires it. During ten years experience I have no recollection of any importer, or anyone else, feeling himself aggrieved, being deprived of the right of going into court if he desired so to do.

Mr. HOLTON. If the Minister will allow me, I will refer him to clause 182 of the Act with regard to appeal to the courts. It says:

"If the owner or claimant of the thing seized or detained, or the person alleged to have incurred the penalty, within thirty days after being notified of the Minister's decision, gives him notice in writing that such decision will not be accepted, the Minister may refer the matter to the court."

The Act says that the Minister "may," and it is, therefore optional for the Minister to allow it.

Mr. BOWELL. Suppose the Minister refuses—which is never done—all that the person feeling himself aggrieved would have to do, would be to apply for a fiat to go into court, and it would be granted at once, as was done in the Ayer case. That permission has never been refused, nor is it the practice of any Government or of the Crown to refuse a fiat where there is any cause of complaint by a subject. We have allowed cases to go into court in which we knew the man had no case, and in which the correspondence showed that he had no case; but the person considered himself aggrieved, and when he asked for the privilege, it was at once accorded to him. The next contention of my hon. friend is, perhaps, the most important from his standpoint, and that is the question of doing away with the division of forfeitures, and what is termed the moiety system, to which I will refer in a few moments. One would have supposed, hearing the speech of my hon. friend, that this portion of the law to which he objects, was the creation of the present Government; that all these iniquitous clauses to which he refers, which legalise and allow so much of what he terms plundering—I cannot remember the other strong word which he used—to be perpetrated by the Customs officers and to be approved of by the Minister, were actually put upon the Statute-book by the present Government. If he will turn to the law which was enacted by my hon. friends opposite when they were in power, he will see that there are scarcely any changes made between that law and the law as it stands to day, except to simplify and, in many cases, to liberalise, instead of making more stringent, the provisions to which my hon. friend has referred. He may laugh, but I attribute that to the fact that he has not given this question that study and attention which he should have given to it before he attempted to deal with it. I should like to refer to a statement made by the Minister of Finance of the former Administration, the present member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), in reference to the "iniquity" which he pointed out to this House, if the reference is not against the rules of Parliament. I am not very often absent from this Chamber, but, unfortunately for myself, I happened to be absent when the administration of my department was attacked. The hon. gentleman represented that there had been an actual case in which a man's invoice had been raised from a cash value some 50 per cent. I am not prepared to say whether it was 50 or 75 per cent. I know nothing of the case; if it were mentioned to me, probably I could explain it to him, but if the hon. member from South Oxford will look at the Statute-book, he will find that when he was a member of the Government of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), he assisted to put on the Statute-book a law (40 Vic., chap. 10, sec. 32) in which the principle is laid down that it is not the cash value that is to guide in valuing an article for duty, but it must be the credit price of the article in the market where it is purchased; and if he will turn to the numerous circulars which were issued by the Minister of Customs at that time, he will find this provision of the law particularly pointed out, and that the officers were instructed to raise the invoices for duty, and to see that the articles entered for duty were valued on that principle. I also find that another very iniquitous provision, that the onus of proof shall be on the importer, appears in much stronger terms in the law (sec. 52) which these hon. gentlemen put on the Statute-book, than in the present Act.

Mr. HOLTON. I know it; I have read it.

Mr. BOWELL. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman knows it, but when he was denouncing the law, he left the impression on everyone listening to him that those provisions of the law had been enacted by the present Government, and not by those whom he is supporting, and whom, I have no doubt, from the peculiar conformation of his mind, he will support for all time to come.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Mr. BOWELL. We know the vilest sinner may return. We know what the hon. gentleman was in the good old times gone by; we know what he is at present. I look with some commiseration on him in the position he occupies now, and I look forward with a good deal of pleasure ——

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps you look to the time when you were with me opposing Sir Francis Hincks coming in.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not know that I should be led into a discussion of my reasons for opposing Sir Francis Hincks. I had my reasons then ——

Mr. PATERSON (Brant) What section are you reading?

Mr. BOWELL. It is a section in the political history of the country to which my hon. friend called attention; and I was just explaining that I had no other object than what I believed, at that time, to be in the best interests of the country, in the opposition I gave to Sir Francis Hincks, and I am bound to extend the same credit to my hon. friend. The only difference that existed at that time between the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and myself was that if Sir Francis Hincks came up to the expectations of those who placed him in office, I would have had no hesitation in giving him what support my humble ability would enable me to extend; and now that he is dead and gone, I will repeat what I said in the House afterwards, that my experience of Sir Francis Hincks, and the manner in which he took hold of the questions then agitating the country, justified me in the course I took.

Mr. MITCHELL. Hear, hear; I was his colleague at that time.

Mr. BOWELL. Now, Sir, let me return to the 52nd clause of the Act to which I referred, and which the Government of the hon. member for South Oxford placed on the Statute-book. That clause reads as follows:—

"The burden of proof that all the requirements of this Act, with regard to the entry of any goods, have been complied with and fulfilled, shall, in all cases, lie upon the parties whose duty it was to comply with and fulfil the same."

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Was that the first time it appeared in the statute?

Mr. BOWELL. I do not know anything about that. I dare say it was there before; if it was, they perpetuated it. If it was unfair then, I take it for granted that, if they shared the opinions of the hon. member for Chateauguay, they would have repealed it. I might here very properly remind that hon. gentleman of a most unjust and vexatious principle which obtained under the Act of 1877, for which his friends, as before stated, are responsible. By section 40 of such Act it was provided that:

"No evidence of the value of any goods imported into Canada, or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein, at the place whence and the time when they are to be deemed to have been exported to Canada, contradictory to or at variance with the value stated in the invoice produced to the collector, with the additions (if any) made to such value by the bill of entry, shall be received in any court in Canada, on the part of any party except the Crown."

The effect of such provision was often to compel a merchant, who had purchased, say, 50 tons of steel, at £20 per ton, on a falling market, and which, perhaps, was not shipped to Canada for some months after purchase—when, possibly, the price had declined to £15 per ton—to pay duty on £20, which was the price stated on his invoice. Yet, if between the date of purchase and the time of shipment the price had advanced to £25 per ton, his invoice would be thrown aside and duty would be demanded on the larger or market value. The present Government, becoming sensible of the unfairness of this principle, caused the passage of section 10 of the Tariff Act of 1879, which ensured the fair valuation of goods in such a contingency, and such section reads as follows:—

"The Governor in Council shall, from time to time, establish such regulations not inconsistent with law, as may be required to secure a just, faithful and impartial appraisal of all goods imported into Canada, and just and proper entries of the actual or fair market value thereof, and of the weights, measures or other quantities thereof, as each case may require; and such regulations, whether general or special, so made by the Governor in Council, shall have the full force and authority of law; and it shall be the duty of the appraisers of Canada and every of them, and every person who shall act as such appraiser, or of the Collector of Customs, as the case may be, by all reasonable ways and means in his or their power, to ascertain, estimate and appraise the true and fair market value and wholesale price (any invoice or affidavit thereto to the contrary notwithstanding) of the goods at the time of exportation, and in the principal markets of the country whence the same have been imported into Canada, and the proper weights, measures or other quantities, and the fair market value or wholesale price of every of them, as the case may require."

The hon. gentleman also stated, in reference to the amendments made to the Customs Act two years ago, that they were not amendments, but imposed still more onerous exactions and restrictions on the trade of the country, and on importers. If that be the case, it is somewhat singular that there was not a single division or objection taken, in this House, to the amendments I have suggested, after full explanations had been given of them On the contrary, those gentlemen who took an active part in the discussion of those clauses, and of the changes and amendments which were made, after they had heard my explanations, approved of every one of them, and every change which was made was in the direction of the protection of the honest importer, and to punish, if possible, the dishonest importer.

Mr. MITCHELL. Are not all these troubles of modern growth?

Mr. BOWELL. No. I will show the hon. gentleman that even when he was in power there were a good many seizures made.

Mr. MITCHELL. We never heard as many complaints.

Mr. BOWELL. Of course not, because there were not so many seizures, for the higher the tariff the greater the amount of smuggling. But I have failed yet to find that the honest importers ever found fault with the manner in which the laws have been carried out in regard to the punishment of those who have violated them. I know that the newspapers have taken up the cause of those who have been punished.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do not say so much against the newspapers now.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He is an old hand.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, I am, and I used to write just as I thought, as plainly and honestly as I knew how; and I was never taken into court, nor did I ever have to apologise for what I said. In reference to the clause relating to enclosures, to which the hon. gentleman called the attention of the House, and which he declared to be so iniquitous, if he will turn to the 50th clause of the Act of 1887, he will find that it reads as follows:—

"If any package is found to contain any goods not mentioned in the invoice, such goods shall be absolutely forfeited."

There is no discretion given to the Minister or the officer, but there is a simple declaration of the absolute forfeiture of the goods. That word "absolute" is not now in the Customs Act. Perhaps it is just as well, while I am dealing with this question, to dispose of the attack which was made in connection with the case of an importer at Niagara Falls, which my hon. friend declares to be, not in the words of the lieutenant of the Opposition, "legalised robbery," but an absolute robbery, without any legality whatever. Now, let us see what are the facts connected with this case. The importer of a certain kind of paper had been in the habit of importing wall paper as one quality, when, in fact, it was another quality. The hon. gentleman told us that he had as good information on the subject as I had. I have no doubt he thinks the information, which he probably received from the importer, equally reliable with that of the officers of Customs.

Mr. HOLTON. Quite so.

Mr BOWELL. If the hon. gentleman knew that the invoice which was presented for entry gave a misdescription of the goods, perhaps he would not say so It requires neither the oath of the officer nor that of the importer, to prove what an article is, when it is seen, and if the invoice indicated one class of paper called "brown blanks," when, in fact, the merchant imported another class called "white blanks," which latter is taxed at a higher rate of duty, it would be an easy matter to detect the fraud.

Mr. HOLTON. But your own officer at Niagara Falls classified that for duty and entry, at the importer's request, and the importer paid the duty which was asked.

Mr. BOWELL. I am coming to that point. It is quite true that when an importer presents to the Customs clerk an invoice, the Customs clerk looks at the face of such invoice, and marks opposite each item the rate of duty; but if upon examination by the appraiser, the article is found not to be that described in the invoice, how is the Customs clerk, who had nothing but the invoice to go by, to be held responsible for anything wrong? That is this case precisely. The merchant presented the invoice to the Customs officer to be rated for duty, that invoice described the goods as "brown blanks," and the officer rated them accordingly; but when they were examined by the appraiser they turned out to be another kind of paper altogether. Then the importer made an affidavit, in which he stated that he went to the collector and his officers and asked for their rating. The moment that representation was made to me I did as I do in other cases: ordered an investigation to be made, and I refused, because the affidavit of the importer was so strong, to take the mere statements or ipse dixit of the Customs officers who transacted the business, and compelled them to make their statements under oath. Mr. Peter Flynn, the collector—and those who know Mr. Flynn, of Niagara Falls, would never suspect him for a moment of telling an untruth, and he could have no possible object to gain in telling one—wrote, concerning the statement of the importer, as follows:—

"The importer has mentioned my name in his affidavit as having refused him information as to how he should enter the goods."

The importer had made the direct statement that he had applied to the collector for information as to the mode of procedure in passing the goods. Mr. Flynn continues:

"In reply to this part of the importer's evidence, I must say he never asked me a question in regard to this or any other entry made by him. Personally, I know nothing of the matter in dispute more than accompanying Mr. Watters."

Mr. Watters, by-the-bye, was not sent from Ottawa to transact this business. He is an officer stationed in the west, who, in the ordinary pursuit of looking after smuggled goods, went to this man's store to investigate this affair, and made the seizure of the goods. Then there is the evidence of Mr. Clarence Bartle, Customs officer, who stated distinctly and positively under oath that he gave no such instructions as those referred to by the importer. That evidence is substantiated by Mr. Preston, the broker—not a member of the Customs staff, but a gentleman who makes his living as a Customs broker. Upon these facts the Commissioner made his report as follows:—

"The evidence submitted in rebuttal of the charge consists only of the party's own affidavit, while many of the statements therein are contradicted by the sworn statements of the officers of the department, and of the broker employed to make the entries."

Employed not by us, I wish the House distinctly to understand. The report continues:

"Apart from this contradictory evidence, the fact remains that the paper hangings were not properly described in the entry made at the Customs, and that but about one-third of the proper duty was paid thereon. There is a clear violation of sections 35 and 119 of the Customs Act, for which the importer must be held responsible. This evasion of the payment of the proper duty he has under the law forfeited the goods, or the ascertained value thereof as per section 193, and the undersigned respectfully recommends that the seizure be confirmed, and the amount deposited, as representing the value of the goods, be forfeited to the Crown."

Such are the facts in the case to which my hon. friend has called the attention of the House, and which he has described as absolute robbery, when in fact the whole thing resolves itself into this: that a merchant imports a class of paper, has it misdescribed in the invoice, presents that misdescription to the Customs officer, in order to have the goods rated, and, on examination at the warehouse by the appraiser, it is found that the duty was paid on another class of paper altogether from that which was really imported, and which called for a higher rate of duty. Then, when the merchant's affidavit is made, that affidavit is contradicted by the statement of the collector and the affidavits of two Customs officers.

I shall now call the attention of the House for a few moments to the question of distribution of proceeds of seizures. My hon. friend from Chateauguay had two very strong objections to the law as it now exists. One was with regard to the provisions respecting enclosures, and the other to the distribution of the proceeds derived from seizures; and he tried to lead the House to believe that the regulations governing these matters were the creation of the present Government. I see the hon. gentleman smiles, but I propose to place the paternity of these regulations, whether they are good or bad—and I am not now denouncing them—upon the proper persons. If the hon. gentleman will turn to the Order in Council of the 1st July, 1876, he will find that one of the clauses reads as follows:—

"In case of seizure of goods or chattels which have been condemned and sold, according to law, an allowance of not more than one-third of the net proceeds of each shall be awarded to the seizing officer, and not more than one-third to the informer, if any. In case of seizures made without information, and which have resulted from special vigilance on the part of an officer, the informer's share, or a portion thereof, may be awarded to such officer, at the discretion of the Minister of Customs. When seizure of goods or chattels has been made, and released by order of the Minister of Customs, on the condition of the payment of a fine or penalty, where such fine or penalty is of the amount of $100, or over, it may be considered as the net proceeds of the seizure, and dealt with in the same manner as if the goods had been condemned and sold."

So that you could distribute two-thirds of the amount, without reference to the expenses. The next clause says:

"When the fine or penalty is under $100, the Minister of Customs may, at his discretion, award the whole, or any portion thereof, to the officers and informer, if any, as a reward for vigilance. In respect of fines or penalties recovered for violation of the revenue laws, in cases where there has been no seizure of goods or chattels, the Minister may, in his discretion, award such portion thereof to the officers concerned and informer, if any, as may appear to be equitable and judicious under the circumstances of each case."

These regulations are based upon and under the authority of the Act 31 Vic., chap. 6, section 113, which was passed, or if my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) prefers the phrase, remained upon the Statute-book in 1867.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then that provision was first passed in 1867.

Mr. BOWELL. I did not say so. I said the regulations were adopted by the Governor in Council in 1876, and these are the regulations under which I have been acting.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman spoke of these regulations having been passed in 1876, and no doubt he is quite correct, but does he remember what were the regulations prior to that date?

Mr. BOWELL. I do not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My recollection is that there were regulations before, which had been in existence from 1867 to 1876, regulating the division of these funds, and that this was a modification of those regulations.

Mr. BOWELL. I think my hon. friend is correct, because there is a clause in the law which provides that this may be done. Whether these regulations were modified, or made more restrictive than the former regulations, I am not prepared to say. I asked the Assistant Commissioner to investigate this question and see how far the earlier statutes agreed with the present law, and this is what he says:

"I find, upon tracing it back, that the wording is identical with the wording of the Act 31 Vic., section 113 (1867), with the exception that after the words 'Governor in Council' the words 'or the Minister of Customs' have been introduced. Upon tracing this back, I find this was done in the amended Act of 1877, and further, that it was there inserted in consequence of the Tariff Act of 1867 which gave the same power to the Minister of Customs as is therein contained, so that virtually the Acts of 1867, Customs and Tariff combined, gave precisely the same power as is now embodied in section 191 of the Revised Statutes."

My hon. friend referred to one matter in particular, that of increasing the value of goods for duty, as being onerous, and in regard to that subject—I do not say it offensively or intend it in that way—his whole speech would come very well from one who was employed to defend all the smugglers and violators of the law in the country. I do not believe that the hon. gentleman intended that, but certainly his speech could bear no other interpretation, and one would suppose also that this, so-called, iniquitous system of treating undervaluations arose under this Government. I hold in my hand circulars which were issued by my predecessor commencing with March 21, 1874, and ending a few months before those hon. gentlemen went out of office, calling the special attention of the Customs officials to the necessity of watching undervaluations. We all know the depression of trade which took place in the United States and in most parts of the world during 1874, 1875, 1876 and 1877, and, as trade became depressed, so in proportion did the values of goods fall and become depreciated in the markets in which they were produced. It is in such cases that in proportion to the surplus stock which manufacturers have on hand for the home market, so do they make a slaughter market of other countries into which they can send their goods; in order, first, to relieve their own market so as not to depreciate the price of the goods at home, and also to get rid of the stock without disaster to their own business. I find that, on March 21st, 1874, a few months after the hon. gentlemen opposite took office, a circular was issued by Mr. Bouchette, the then Commissioner of Customs, in which he says:

"The attention of the Minister of Customs has been called to the fact that different systems are practiced by collectors and other officers at the several ports and outports of the Dominion in the collection and protection of the revenue, causing much dissatisfaction among a large number of importers, who comply strictly with the revenue laws."

He goes on to point out the absolute necessity of uniformity—a very difficult thing to accomplish, as follows:—

"I am directed to request your careful attention:

"1st. To the necessity of a careful examination of invoices, not only with respect to their general correctness, but to the prices of the goods represented, especially the invoices of certain classes of Americain manufactures—such as machinery of various kinds, sewing machines, musical instruments, agricultural machines and implements, patent medicines, &c., &c.

"2. I am also to call your particular attention to the provisions of the "Act respecting the Customs," Section 29 and following Sections, providing for the proper appraisement of goods, and examination of packages, and to enjoin upon you and your officers whose duty it is to appraise goods, a strict compliance with the terms and conditions of the law; and you are to report monthly to this Department, all important particulars connected with the appraiser's duties, stating how many packages have been entered, and what proportion of such packages have been examined, with particulars of any illegalities which have been thereby discovered."

On the 20th July, 1874, the following Order was issued:

"The Minister of Customs having received certain evidence that manufacturing firms in the United States have adopted schedules of prices for their respective goods, specially adapted to purchasers for the Canadian market, at rates very much below those at which they sell to American purchasers, to the serious injury of Canadian manufacturers of the same articles——"

If I were to issue a circular containing this language at the present day, I should be accused of having done so in the interests of what, the hon. gentlemen term, iniquitous manufacturers and combines, which they say exist under the tariff. He goes on to say:

"I am desired to call your special attention thereto, with a view to your subjecting such goods to the most rigid examination, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the invoices are made at the 'fair market value,' in the producing or manufacturing country, and not at an exceptional rate adopted for this particular market. For example——"

Then he proceeds to particularise, a thing which would be iniquitous if I had done it, but which, I suppose, was all right when it was done by a free trade or revenue tariff Government:

"For example, a circular of a Pittsburg hardware manufacturing firm, with quotations of prices of bolts, nuts, hooks, rivets and various other articles, so specially reduced for Canadian purchasers, is in possession of the department, and where you have satisfactory proof of this description of undervaluation, you are to insist upon entry being made at the proper appraised valuation."

The system of appraisement existed then, just the same as it does to-day, with the exception of a Dominion Board, which now exists, and to which the merchant can appeal, if the appraisers at the ports where he transacts his business do what he thinks is not right in raising his invoices. In November, 1875, I find a circular issued, in which the Commissioner, under instructions from the Minister, calls the special attention of the officers to the conduct of the paper manufacturers of the United States in supplying paper, and entering the same for duty, "at ruinously low prices." The free trader of to-day will tell us that low prices are in the interest of the consumer who bears the burden. So they are, but it was in the interest of the revenue, which it was the duty of Mr. Burpee, then holding the position I now occupy, to see protected. His duty was precisely the same as mine, to see that the honest importer was protected, and that the provisions of the Customs Act and of the Tariff were literally carried out. He goes on to say:

"It is alleged that the sellers furnish their goods to be delivered in Canada duty paid, and free of all charges. Transactions of this nature are always liable to suspicion, and call for the closest scrutiny, not only of the article mentioned, but in every class of goods imported. In the present state of commerce in the United States, it is all important that the true principle of legal valuation for duty should be kept constantly in view, viz., the fair market value of the goods in the principal markets of the country where the same are purchased for consumption therein, not for exportation, or under any exceptional consideration whatever."

I will not weary the House by reading a score of circulars of this kind, which I might do; but I find that, on some occasions, the then Minister actually indicated the value at which certain articles should be entered. In the circular issued on the 16th November, 1875, he says:

"I have especially to draw your attention to the article of nails, respecting which a distinct scale of value cannot be given, but it is safe to say that the larger description of cut nails, say 10 dy. and over, should not be invoiced, even in the present low market, at less than $2 85 gold per keg of 100 lbs., and the smaller nails proportionately higher."

I am finding no fault with the issue of these circulars because it was his duty to do precisely what he did, and to ensure what I have been endeavoring to carry out, but I have done it with the aid, I believe, of a better system of protection than he had, and I believe I have succeeded in carrying it out more satisfactorily. On another occasion by circular, dated 10th August, 1887, the Minister cautions Collectors of Customs to be on their guard as to valuations given in invoices of cast iron pipe and iron bridge work; he says:

"Entries must in no case be accepted without your being satisfied as to the actual 'fair market value thereof in the principal markets of the country from whence imported,' in the strict sense intended by sections 31 and 32 of the Customs Act.

"Much of the cast iron pipe from the United States is stated to be manufactured from Scotch pig iron, upon the exportation of which from the United States a drawback is allowed the manufacturer of the original duty paid upon the iron, thus reducing the price at which it can be sold for exportation to this country, far below the actual fair market value, as understood by the Canadian Customs law. Therefore, the price paid cannot be the 'fair market value.'"

Again, on 10th November, 1877, the Minister of that day instructs his officers as follows:—

"The fact is becoming every day more apparent that goods purchased in the United States markets are invoiced for Canadian buyers at much lower rates than those which are charged to purchasers for home consumption, and I have to remind you, as you have been frequently informed, that the value for duty under our Customs law, is not the rate which may be agreed upon in consideration of the goods being for exportation to Canada, but that which is usually paid by purchasers in the United States. No special rate, whatever may be the consideration, can be recognised under our laws."

And, in the same circular the attention of collectors is called to the practice on the part of United States vendors, of deducting from the usual market value of their goods, the drawback allowed by the United States Government. On this subject the Minister says:

"This practice cannot be allowed. On receiving invoices from the United States you are to satisfy yourself whether such deduction has been made or not, and if made you are to add the amount to the foot of the invoice so as to bring it to the 'fair market value of the goods' in the place of purchase when sold for home consumption and not for exportation."

He then gives a list of two or three pages of articles to which he calls special attention. He enumerates all the articles which he contended were being imported by this method at an undervaluation, and with respect to which he declares that it was the duty of the officers to increase the value when invoices were presented for entry.

There is a circular as long ago as the 28th of July, 1874, in which he calls attention to that much vexed question of which we have heard so often, the duty upon packages,—the law he points out providing that packages which form the receptacle of the article as sold in the home market shall be subject to duty. I find the following instruction was given on this subject by my predecessor, as follows:—

"If it be the first receptacle: whether box, barrel, cask, case, bottle, tin or other covering immediately enclosing goods for purposes of sale, such receptacle is a package liable to duty."

It is only the package used exclusively for export which is free of duty. I have read these circulars in order to show the House that the system which the hon. member for Chateauguay says is so iniquitous, that is, the scanning narrowly and closely of invoices which are presented for duty, is the system which prevailed when his own friends were in power, and which must prevail in every country having the same Customs law that now obtains in this country. I want to show one instance of how this is carried out; and I propose to read a letter sent to Toronto in the month of February, 1888. The goods were to be supplied by a company in the United States, and the case is one of scores that have come under my notice. The American firm writes to Messrs. Nichols & Howland, of Toronto—I give the names so that the House may know who they are. They say:

"GENTLEMEN,—We have no doubt you considered us very slow in filling your order, and we have to plead guilty to that charge, but allow us to say that we have not been able to fill orders up to the present time, and in this case we desire to send you something nice. Please be patient until they arrive. Is there any way we can ship it safely so we can avoid for you such high duties? Please reply.

"Yours truly,
"CORTLAND DESK CO. (LIMITED),
"W. A. MILLER,
"Treasurer and Manager."

Then, fearing that they would not be understood, he adds this postscript:

"Since the fishery question,"——

I suppose he means since we got $5,000,000 from them.——

"—we Americans think we are doing nothing wrong if we beat the Queen out of a little duty."

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. BOWELL. When you, Mr. Speaker, left the Chair at six o'clock, I had stated, that if fees were collected in the manner suggested by the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), they were collected in violation of the rules and regulations of the department. Since the adjournment I have procured a copy of the rule, and I desire that it may be placed on record, in order that those who fancy that the department, the head, or the Commissioner, approve of any act of that kind on the part of their officers, may have their minds disabused. Here are the instructions to officers of Her Majesty's Customs in the Dominion of Canada, and they were approved by Order in Council on 14th June, 1875, when Hon. Isaac Burpee was Minister of Customs, and James Johnson, Commissioner. These are the rules which are still in force, and No. 1 reads as follows:—

"All officers of Customs, upon their admission to office, must take and subscribe an oath as required by law, not to take or receive any fee, perquisite, gratuity, reward or emolument, whether pecuniary or of any other sort or description whatever, either directly or indirectly, that is, either as a present or under the pretence of their making out documents which in their official capacity they are not required to do, or of paying for the same, or any other act, duty, matter or thing done or performed in the execution or discharge of any of the duties of their respective offices, other than their salaries or what may be legally allowed them, and any collector or other officer acting as such, shall promptly report any violation of this rule which may come to his knowledge, to the Commissioner."

I may add that within the last two or three years I dismissed an appraiser in Montreal for no other reason than because he had received presents and obtained credit on the strength of the position he held, from the merchants who were importers, and whose goods he had to assess for duty. I do not know, neither am I prepared to contradict the statement made by the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) that this rule has been violated. All I can say is, that if that rule, which is very strict, has been violated, the punishment which follows those who infringe it, will be meted out to the person who has accepted the fees in the manner in which it is said they are accepted.

Mr. HOLTON. The Minister will remember I stated that this officer received those fees with the approval of his superior.

Mr. BOWELL. I remember that you also stated that it was with my approval, because the Commissioner's letter says the matter had been fully investigated and the Minister had approved. What the Minister had approved was simply what I pointed out to the House before recess, and that was that the officer was entitled to certain remuneration per hour, or per month, for the performance of the particular service to which the hon. gentleman referred, but not to receive fees direct from merchants. I may add further, in explanation, that when money is received for extra services from railway companies, merchants, or others, who deem it necessary to have the services of an officer after hours, it is not paid to the officer himself, but to the Collector, who pays the man who performs the service. While upon this subject, I may refer, for a few moments, to the charge which has been made against the Customs Department of having exacted duty upon packages containing free goods, or in other words, imposing a duty upon the baskets which contain peaches brought into this country. I know that it has been a source of a good deal, not only of abuse but of amusement, on the part of those who look upon the exaction of duty upon these articles as a very small matter, and one to which the department or the Government should not descend. Well, I have this to point out, that it is not for the officers of the Customs Department, whose duty it is to carry out the law, to question as to whether the provisions of that law be absurd or whether they be onerous on the importers. Instead of abusing or condemning the officers who perform their duty, such condemnation should be aimed at the law or at the Government which retains it upon the Statute-book; and, I repeat, it is not fair to officers who are sworn to do their duty, to condemn them for having performed it. It was stated by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson), when the question was under discussion the other night, that the fees exacted on the American frontier, particularly in the west, were much higher and more onerous than the duty collected in Canada, or the duty which was imposed upon the packages containing free goods. The hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) smiled. He gave one of those ironical laughs in which he sometimes indulges, when the hon. gentleman called attention to the fact. Perhaps, after all, the hon. gentleman was laughing at something else, and if such was the case I withdraw my statement. I remember seeing a broad smile on the hon. gentleman's countenance, and I understood him to dissent in toto from the proposition made. During my absence, last summer, the question of duty upon peach baskets was brought before the department, and when I returned I found no little commotion, not only in the press but among many of our own friends, upon this question. I at once made enquiry as to what was the practice in the United States, and what order had been issued by the Commissioner and the then acting Minister of Customs. I found that the Commissioner had carried out the law literally as it stands on the Statute-book, and the acting Minister at the time had done precisely what I would have done had I been here—approved his conduct. I then asked the collector at the Falls and the Inspector of Customs to make enquiry as to what the practice was in the United States, and I found that although the United States authorities impose no duty upon packages containing free goods, yet the exactions in the way of fees are equal to a duty ranging from 25 to even 60 or 70 per cent. In order that the country may understand precisely the difference in the practice on the frontier between the two departments, I propose to read the letter of the collector, and also the report of the inspector upon this question. Mr. Peter Flynn, the collector at Niagara Falls, on 29th September, 1888, wrote me as follows:—

"In reply to your favor of 27th inst., I beg to inform you that the United States Customs do not collect duty on packages containing fruit, but they collect $1 on each entry of fruit, and all other non-dutiable goods; 25 cents is charged for manifest, 25 cents for blanks, and 50 cents for entry. Fifty cents of the dollar goes to the department at Washington, and the collector, as his perquisite, keeps the other half."

I have also here a letter from the collector at Hamilton on the same subject, but I will not trouble the House with it. The Inspector of Customs, Mr. Mewburn, wrote me as follows:—

"Re UNITED STATES CUSTOMS HOUSE FEES AT FRONTIER PORTS.

"At the inland port of Paris, Ont, a short time ago, in conversation with a railway official I was told that when a party shipped goods to the United States, in addition to the shipping or advance charges, a further charge for Custom house fees was made at the following places: Island Pond, $1.45; St. Albans, $1.55; Buffalo, 85 cents; Suspension Bridge, N.Y., $1; Rouse's Point, $1.50; Prescott, Canada, 70 cents; Fort Gratiot, $1.45, and Detroit, $1.45. I believe representations have been made to the Department at Ottawa on this subject. I beg leave, however, to submit to you a report covering procedure in the United States, and the system which prevails in Canada in relation to fees, &c.

"I find that the United States Government fees are on entry for consumption of goods imported in vehicles, railroad cars and boats of less than 5 tons:—

Receiving manifest	25 cents.
Entry of goods, including permit to land	50 do
Total	75 cents.

"At Detroit, I enclose sample forms A, B, C; these forms are required when the value is over $5, and for which a charge is made,

Say, entry fee	50 cents.
do blanks	20 do
Total	70 cents.

"The fee of 70 cents is charged if the goods come over, say, by waggon, or the ferry boat between Windsor and Detroit. If by railroad, then 25 cents additional for receiving a manifest. If, however, the value is less than $5, no entry fee is required; a stub book is used, and receipt given; see form "D," attached Detroit forms At Buffalo, Black Rock and Black Ferry, the Government fee is 50 cents, and collector charges 10 cents for a blank for free goods, and 20 cents if dutiable. The difference between Detroit and Buffalo is the former allows goods under $5 value to be entered without fees, the latter charges whether free or dutiable if the value is over $1. At Niagara Falls, N.Y, at the two Suspension Bridges I beg to call special attention. Certain parties residing in Canada were sometime ago allowed to cart sand from sand pits on this side to the other. The value of a load of sand at the pit is about 50 cents a load, when loaded ready to cart, about $1. These parties were allowed to make entry once a week or two weeks; say on one entry paying for entry, &c., $1. This has, however, been stopped, and the parties were called upon to pay $1 for every load for entry fees, so that if a party took over five loads of sand a day, he would have to pay $5 for fees, although sand is on the free list. The consequence is the parties sell to Americans living across the bridge who pay the fee themselves, but they as American citizens are allowed to make entry in the old way, once a week or once a month, which is manifestly injurious to our own people living in Canada. Within a short time a sand or gravel pit has been opened out near Lockport, N.Y., and I am told influences are being used with the collector to compel every load of sand to pay entry fees, so as to prevent sand being imported from Canada, in order to develop the sand pit at Lockport, N.Y. In reference to Duluth goods, I enclose you forms A, B, C, D, E. These are all required in making one entry; say one load mixed vegetables, value $3, duty 10 per cent.—30 cents. You will notice on the stub, receipt marked 'E.'

For duties	30c.
Entry of merchandise	50c.
Manifest	25c.

"I may, however, be permitted to say that the collectors might have charged 10 cents for each of the four blanks—40 cents instead of 25 cents and he would not have violated the United States Customs laws. The fee of 50 cents and 25 cents.—75 cents, is not retained by the collector, as perquisites, but is remitted to the United States Treasury. This, therefore, operates as an indirect addition to the United States tariff. I am not at all surprised at our people complaining of such indirect taxation in the shape of United States Customs fees.

"Our system in Canada is directly the contrary. No fees are charged with the exception of 5 cents for blanks if supplied by the collectors; at the ferries, if the value does not exceed $5 in value the amount is entered on the ferry book, and all the importer has to do is to sign the book, opposite the entry; over $5 entry is made at the head office without charge.

"I am told by the officials connected with the United States Customs Department that all these Government fees are to be done away with."

I hope the House is not wearied by my having delayed so long in pointing out the important difference between the treatment received by Canadian exporters to the United States, even on free goods, and comparing it with that which prevails in this country. In Canada the importer, as I have already stated, is not even obliged to pay the 5 cents for the form unless he applies for it, for he can obtain it in any other place that he thinks proper. There are many other regulations in connection with the Customs on the other side of the line to which I could call the attention of the House, but I shall forbear doing so on the present occasion. I want to point out as an illustration of this fact, that while the people in Canada are continually finding fault with Customs officials for being too exacting, they should not forget that the regulations on the other side of the line are much more onerous and vexatious than they are here. A person sitting in the gallery and listening to the speeches which are constantly being made on the other side of the House must come to one of two conclusions: either that our rules and regulations are much more objectionable and vexatious than the rules in the United States, or that gentlemen on the other side of the House are anxious to point out every little defect in order to create all the difficulty they can between this country and the neighboring Republic. My hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) in defence of that portion of his resolution which provides for the carrying of every case into court says that the Minister of Customs does not seem to have much confidence in the courts. Well, if I were to speak frankly I would say that, judging from my past experience, my hon. friend is not far wrong. It may be presumption on my part to say that cases which have gone before the courts have not been decided in accordance with what I believe to be Customs law or Customs usages. My hon. friend referred to the Grinnell case and to the Ayer case, and he might have gone a little further and referred to the Bertin case lately tried in Montreal. The Grinnell case was one which came within the meaning of that section of the Act which provides that parts of machinery brought into this country shall be valued for duty relatively to the value of the whole article when imported. We all know why that clause was placed on the Statute-books. If a completed article bore a rate of duty of 30 or 35 per cent., the practice was to bring it in piecemeal and put it together in Canada, and in order to prevent that kind of fraud the law was so framed as to make them pay duty on the parts of an article relatively to the value they bore to the whole article. The Grinnell parties objected to the ruling of the department. It was taken to the Exchequer Court, and Judge Gwynne, who is certainly as eminent as the Chief Justice himself, gave a decision in favor of the Customs Department, and in giving that judgment he went a great deal further than the Customs Department ever thought of going, because he not only declared that the Customs officials were correct in imposing the duty in the manner I have pointed out, but that they would have been justified had they added the royalty which is paid in the United States, and then imposed a duty on the full value of the article, though it had to be put together when it came into this country. The practice of the department has been this: When an article is brought into the country in different parts, we deduct the expense necessary to put it together and complete it in this country, and charge the duty on the residue. Mr. Justice Gwynne decided that we need not even have gone that far, but that we would have been justified in collecting a duty on the full value of the article as if it had been complete when it came into the country. The Ayer case was on all fours with the Grinnell case. The Ayers had been in the habit of importing their patent medicines in bulk, as in barrels, puncheons, or casks, and then bottling it, and labelling it in this country. In that case we decided precisely as we had done in the Grinnell case. Chief Justice Ritchie took a very strong view in opposition to the decision of the department, and delivered the judgment which my hon. friend read to-day, and which, I am bound to say, to my mind was not creditable to a judge occupying his position.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Order.

Mr. BOWELL. It may be in order to defend a judgment, and to read to the House a condemnation of officials by a judge, as the hon. gentleman opposite has done, and to denounce such officials as everything that is wrong and villainous; but it is apparently out of order, in the opinion of the member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) to question that condemnation, particularly if it comes from so eminent a gentleman as a judge on the bench. But I say to my hon. friend who called me to order, that if he had been in the witness box, as I was, and the judge had prevented him from telling the whole story, as I was prevented, he would feel precisely as I do in reference to that matter. It may be the rules of court to stop a witness from telling the whole truth; but I question very much whether it is either moral or correct or equitable. In reference to the other Montreal case, I will call the attention of the House to it for a few moments as it makes one doubt, in Customs matters particularly, whether magistrates or judges are always ready to mete out for violations of the Customs law that justice, which perhaps they would insist upon for the violation of other laws. We had complaints, very strong and repeated, from the city of Halifax, that it was impossible for the importers of wines of a certain quality, such as clarets and burgundies, from Bordeaux and certain other parts of France and the continent, to get them and pay the duty, as cheaply as they could be purchased, duty paid, in the city of Montreal. That was rather a serious charge. The officers were put on the alert, and they made a seizure. The magistrate, after hearing the case, dismissed it, but had some little qualms of conscience, because he made the importer pay his own costs, and the Government theirs. Now, I propose to read the facts in connection with this case, as reported to me, in order that the House and the country may see how difficult it is to punish an offender when taken into court:

"Bertin keeps a small club on St. Antoine street in this city, and in addition has been for the past eighteen months acting as a sort of an agent for a house in Bordeaux, called A Delmon & Co His practice was to obtain orders for certain wines and send them to Delmon & Co Delmon & Co would ship the wines and send out an invoice to Bertin covering the whole lot, and then a number of separate invoices for each individual to show that the consignment would be direct. Suspicion falling upon him, Customs officer Grose went to his house and seized his books and papers, from which it appeared that a special invoice had been asked for specially for the Customs; and on examination it was found that the prices mentioned on the one produced at the Customs house was considerably less than in the invoices made out for the parties direct, or in the account current sent from Delmon & Co. to Bertin.

"Five informations were made out under section 192 of the Customs Act.

"The case made out for the prosecution was, I think, very strong.

"From Bertin's own letter-book we showed that the transactions commenced by a deliberate request on his part in writing to Delmon & Co, when asking for a consignment of wines to be sent out at prices named, he wished a special invoice to be made out for use of the Customs. In this letter he asked that it should be made out in a specific form and with prices set opposite it lower than those Delmon & Co. were to charge. On the face of this letter he also stated that the invoice for the Customs would be null as between himself and Delmon & Co Letters in the same sense were found throughout the letter-book.

"Delmon & Co. accepted Mr. Bertin's request and, for these five entries sent out what purported to be an invoice with prices set opposite as requested by Bertin. None of these invoices used at the Customs were made out on the regular printed ruled invoiced heads that Delmon & Co. appeared to have used, and on which they made out their invoices when sending direct to the individuals Sometimes these Customs invoices were on plain paper, entirely written and hand-ruled, and sometimes they were on a letter-head paper.

"The proof then showed on procuring invoices sent to the various individuals, that the prices mentioned in the invoices used at the Customs were about 50 per cent. lower than that charged by Delmon & Co. to the individuals. We produced also (having found it in Bertin's possession) an account current between himself and Delmon & Co., by which it appeared that Bertin was charged with the prices mentioned in the invoices sent to the individuals, and not charged the lower amounts shown in the invoices produced at the Customs. It also appeared from these invoices that we found in the possession of individuals, that Delmon & Co. were in the habit of drawing drafts for the face amount of these invoices upon the individuals.

"This was the proof for the prosecution, and as far as documentary evidence could go, and documents found in Bertin's possession, one would think ought to be conclusive, the letter-book, the low-priced invoices to the Customs, the price or invoices sent to individuals, and the account current recognising the latter, there seemed to be little doubt as to the result of the judgment.

"The defence contended that the wines imported were very low priced, and a low class of wines, that Bertin was acting as agent for Delmon & Co., and got 20 per cent. commission on the prices mentioned in the invoices sent to individuals, which also included the duty, freight and charges.

"There was some proof, to which I objected, adduced that this wine was very inferior and of low class, and probably entered at the right price of duty."

This prosecution was not as to whether the wines were entered at an undervaluation, but it was a criminal prosecution on the ground that he had presented to the Customs a false invoice and not a correct one. The report continues:

"Two witnesses were brought to show that the prices they were to pay and mentioned in the invoices which they produced, included all charges, while one witness, who had been dealing with Mr. Bertin, said he understood that he had to pay duty and freight."

Which was not the case——

"A statement was produced to show that the price in the invoices sent the individuals could also include the freight and charge, and which statement is as follows:—Price of 50 gallons wine at Bordeaux, $20, charges, 30 per cent. Duty ..... $ 6 00
25 cents per gallon 12 50
Commission 4 00
Freight 2 00
Leakage 2 00
Insurance 0 25
Transportation 0 60
Brokerage 0 50
Interest 0 10
Exchange 0 20
$28 45

"Assuming the above charges, however, I make a calculation on the invoice produced by a man named Cizol. He was to pay for 4 bariques containing 48 gallons, $108.08.

The charges would be:—Duty 25 c. per gallon $48 00
The wine was entered at the Customs at $20 per hhd. or 90 francs per half barique, and 30 per c. on this would be 24 00
Bertin's commission at 20 per c 21 60
Freight 8 00
Leakage, &c 4 00
Total $105 60

"Deducting this from the amount of the invoice, it would leave $3.48 coming to Mr. Delmon for four bariques, or 60 cents a barique, or a trifle more than a cent a gallon. A somewhat similar result was shown in each of the other invoices that were produced by individuals."

And yet in the face of that evidence, the magistrate dismissed the case, but his qualms of conscience would not allow him to charge the Government with the costs to which this importer had to be put. I may here remark that, in relation to many classes of crime, there is but one opinion held by law abiding citizens: the universal verdict is that such offences must be stamped out, and the execution of the most severe laws is hailed with general satisfaction. Unfortunately for those who are charged with the administration of the Customs laws, there seems to be abroad among a large number of people, who give but casual consideration to the subject, a disposition to mildly reprobate the putting into execution of the inhibitive and penal sections of the Customs Act.

Let us take smuggling for example. This has been a common offence in all countries depending upon foreign trade for revenue. Strong repressive measures have been necessary for its prevention, and never more so than in our country at the present time, because of our proximity to the United States frontier and the facilities with which goods can be introduced into the Dominion, both by sea and by land from that country; and also because of the great temptation from high duties, and the hope of great profits to the smuggler. Under the old English laws, the punishment was of exceeding severity, bearing no reasonable proportion to the offence. Smuggling has never been looked upon as in itself a crime, and hence it has in no age encountered the restraining influences of morality and good conscience. It is of that class of offences which are criminal only because they are prohibited by law.

I give you that as a fair specimen of the frauds practiced on the Customs and the difficulties that present themselves in enforcing the law. Let me give you another that occurred in Montreal one or two years ago. When they were constructing the Montreal abattoir, they imported machinery for the construction of the abattoir, and entries were made for machinery valued at $500. The secretary of the company made affidavit to the correctness of the invoice as presented for duty. His books and the original invoices that were suppressed showed that $8,000 had been paid by the company for the very machinery which they had entered at $800. That case was brought before a magistrate of the district of Montreal. He took two or three months to deliver his judgment, and then dismissed the suit, on the ground that as the secretary-treasurer could have had no personal interest in the matter, he could not have been guilty of making a false affidavit; and this in face of evidence that, in addition to his being a paid servant of the company, he held $8,000 stock in it In the county of the hon. member for Northumberland, N.B., we had another case. A merchant of one of the towns in that county had employed a pilot to go to St Pierre to bring in certain quantities of liquor which he was to land upon a wharf and for which he was to receive a certain remuneration, the merchant taking all the responsibility after the liquor was landed. Subsequently the liquors were found, though a large portion of them had been hidden away in the woods. I came to the conclusion that this was a clear case, that the parties who induced the pilot to take his boat and commit the fraud of smuggling should be punished, and that a nominal fine of $100 should be imposed upon the owner of the boat. The case was taken before the grand jury, and what was their presentment? It was a condemnation of the Government for not having prosecuted the captain of the boat, the grand jury declaring we had no right to prosecute the man who was the principal and who had paid the pilot to commit the fraud. Let me refer to another case which occurred in Ontario. A man who had been actually caught in the act of smuggling, attempted to bribe the officer. The officer reported the fact to his collector The collector reported to headquarters. In the Audit Act, the punishment for attempting to bribe an officer is very severe, and I thought that was a good case in which to make an example of those who tamper with the honesty of the officials. The case went before a magistrate, and he came to the sage conclusion that, as the man did not take the money, the other party did not commit the bribery, but as the offering of the money was an attempt to bribe, which the law punishes by sending the offender to gaol and condemning him to pay a fine not exceeding a certain amount, the magistrate sent the accused to gaol for a few minutes and fined him a few cents.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Was he a Grit or Tory?

Mr. BOWELL. The Customs law is not political, but one which affects Liberal as well as Conservative, and which ought to be administered regardless of politics. These are not the only cases to which I could call the attention of the House, but I do not desire to continue this discussion any longer than necessary. I notice my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. Ferguson) made use of very strong language in reference to some seizures that had been made in his own county. I have no doubt that he had been told by those whose premises had been raided by these "pirates," as they are termed, that they had been very improperly and very badly used. I looked up these cases, and what are they? What is the fact in regard to these druggists whom the hon. gentleman desired to defend? The decision in the one case was come to because no defence was put in by the party, and is as follows:—

"No evidence having been received by or on behalf of the party from whom the seizure was made, in rebuttal of the charge, the undersigned would respectfully recommend that the seizure be confirmed, and the amount deposited on release of the goods be declared forfeited to the Crown."

That was one case in which the person received the regular notice but put in no defence, and, under such circumstances, the department could do nothing else than declare the goods forfeited. The other case was where the individual acknowledged the smuggling, paid the money and abandoned all claim to the goods. These are some of the cases to which reference was made, at Niagara, when the officers went to that port to search certain stores, the keepers of which had been represented to have been smuggling It is true that one of the drug shops searched for smuggled goods was found to have none, and consequently no penalty was imposed. I quite admit that that appears to be an indignity to an innocent man, but the duty of the officers and of the officials here is, when complaints are made, to investigate them, and the officers did their simple duty in ascertaining whether smuggling had been carried on or not.

The argument that the law should be altered because of alleged abuse of its provisions by incompetent officers is surely a lame one. As well might all law be abolished in districts where it might be badly administered by the magistracy. Why, instead of general fulminations against the whole body of Customs officers, do not hon. gentlemen specify the exact occasions and circumstances under which the powers given them by law have been abused by individual officers? It would then be possible to investigate such specific charges, and if the officer were found to have exceeded his duty, or in any way misused his powers, he could be dealt with.

Let me read the deliberate opinion of the official in charge of the United States Customs at New Orleans, as to the results of a change in the Customs laws of that country, such as hon. gentlemen opposite appear to advocate for Canada. Writing to the Secretary of the Treasury, under date 8th September, 1885, the official in question, Special Agent Neven says:

"Undervaluations have been on the increase since the passage of the Act of 22nd June, 1874. It was comparatively nothing before that time The law of 1863 relating to the seizure of books and papers was a great protection to the revenue, and was only objectionable in the manner of its enforcement by certain officers. Instead of correcting the abuse, the anti-moiety Act was conceived and became a law, at once destroying the importing trade in the hands of American merchants and turning it over to foreign manufacturers, and costing the revenue untold millions."

I have this to say to my hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Holton): He states that the merchants of this country are horrified at the actions of the department and the seizures that have been made, but that applies only to those who have been violating the law or have been guilty of smuggling in some way or other. The best evidence of such fact is that which I shall now lay before the House.

A short time since, the department, mainly through the assistance of one of the reputable wholesale houses of the Dominion, was enabled to lay bare a scandalous system of fraud, extending even to perjury and forgery, which had been successfully carried out for years, by a Toronto hardware firm.

The facts coming to the knowledge of the general business community, various urgent representations were made to me that the principals in these crimes should be made examples of in such a manner as to deter others from the continuance of similar practices.

I hold in my hand and will now read to the House, a petition from the business men of Montreal on the subject of the propriety of, and necessity for, the most rigorous prosecution of the firm in question. The petition is as follows:—

"Montreal, 25th January, 1888.

"Hon. Mackenzie Bowell,
"Minister of Customs,
"Ottawa.

"Sir,—We the undersigned merchants and importers of hardware in the city of Montreal, having heard of the irregular and fraudulent entries made by a certain firm in Toronto in the same line of business as ourselves, do petition that you will investigate the matter thoroughly, and have the entries of the said firm during the years 1886, 1887, as well as 1888, carefully examined. Our reason for thus urging the matter is that, for a long time past, we have been unable to compete in certain lines of goods with the house in question, thereby losing us not only the confidence of our customers, but in many instances a considerable amount of business. We hope that, in dealing with this matter, you will protect the interest of the honest importer by inflicting the full penalty which the law imposes for such irregularities against the revenue."

"We remain, yours respectfully,

FROTHINGHAM & WORKMAN,	C. C. SNOWDON & CO.,
CAVERHILL, LEARMONT & CO.,	HOWDEN, STARKE & CO.,
BENNY, MACPHERSON & CO.,	L. N. HÉBERT,

SEYBOLD, SON & CO.,	HENEY & LACROIX,
THOS DAVIDSON & CO.,	LEWIS BROS & CO.
R. & W. WARMINTON.

Possibly hon. gentlemen, having heard this testimony, will admit the cojency of the reasoning of the Montreal merchants, whose business interests have suffered so tangibly in this instance, and it must be borne in mind that the strong probability is that this particular case is only an exceptional discovery, and that similar systems of fraud, equally baneful in their results, are still, and have for long been, going on undiscovered and consequently unchecked. It can thus be, perhaps, understood that the offering of premiums to the proper class of Customs officers is essentially in the best interests of the Dominion.

Now, why did these firms deem it necessary to send such a petition as that to the Customs Department? For the reason that, when information was put before me, and I sent officers to investigate the matter, the newspapers at once commenced publishing a series of articles condemning the Customs Department for going into honest men's establishments, seizing their books, weakening the confidence of the people in them, and destroying their business. When it was found that a thorough investigation was being made, a charge was then made against the officers, because they were acting civilly to the guilty parties, that they were being purchased and tampered with, and that these persons were to be let off with a nominal penalty. Well, the penalty inflicted was some $9,000, and when a criminal prosecution was to be instituted, both partners in the business left for the United States.

Another indication of popular feeling in this direction is now before me. In reply to a question recently asked in this House, I informed an hon. gentleman that John A. Grose, one of the detectives employed on the Special Agent's staff, had stated his intention of resigning and entering upon some other employment. This person may be held to represent the very class of Customs employé whose high-handed and, as alleged, illegal and offensive conduct in connection with the making of seizures, would presumably make the merchantile community anxious that the vacancy caused by his retirement should not be filled. But what is the fact? I have here a recommendation, signed by 32 of the wholesale firms in Montreal, asking that this position be filled, and recommending a man for it. This memorial is as follows:—

"MONTREAL, January 30th, 1889.

"To the Hon. MACKENZIE BOWELL,
"Minister of Customs, Ottawa.

"We, the undersigned merchants of the city of Montreal, have much pleasure in recommending [I need not mention the name] for the vacant position of Special Customs Agent.

"We are,
"Your obedient servants,

I might here remind the House that Montreal has within the past five years, furnished many serious examples of fraudulent transactions in respect of Customs entries, and the local press there has teemed with extremely hostile criticisms of the methods adopted by the Special Agent's staff, to which the person in question was attached. It cannot, however, be denied that this memorial from the merchants of Montreal must be accepted as the best possible testimony to the fact that the success of the honest merchant is materially aided by the employment of special Customs officers who are capable of successfully circumventing and suppressing the various schemes which are resorted to in order to defraud the revenue of its just dues. If the actions of the Special Agent were of such a villainous character as has been represented, if the honest merchants had been interfered with to such an extent and had become so disgusted with the system as it has been stated they are, would the most wealthy class of the community of Montreal, who are deeply interested in seeing that every man should pay the duty properly, have petitioned to have that position again filled by a man in whom they had confidence? I think I am quite safe in saying that the merchants and the honest importers throughout the whole country approve of the system which has been in force in Canada for a long time. I do not desire to be understood to say that, where so many cases are coming before the department and complaints are being constantly made in regard to dishonest importers, there may not be cases of hardship. When those cases come before the department, they are always considered and dealt with as leniently as the law will permit. That reminds me of a charge which was made, I must admit to my surprise, by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) on a previous occasion, when, in speaking of these cases, he said:

"The case is referred of course to the head of the department, and the head of the department in nine cases out of ten will sustain the official whether the official is right or wrong.

"Mr FOSTER. No.

"Mr. CHARLTON. The system promotes tyrannical conduct on the part of the officials of the Government. It is in every respect a most vicious system, and these men will pay more attention to their own interest in the matter of making seizures than they will to the public interest."

I hesitate not to say that there is not a man in this House of the whole of the 214 members to whom I would not, if I had been in the House, have appealed more confidently in denial of that statement than to him. I told him I intended, when the question came up, to refer to the subject here, and I say distinctly that he of all men has no right to make that charge against the head of the department; he of all men in this House has had leniency shown him by the head of the department in dealing with penalties which had been imposed upon vessels in which he was interested. I do not desire to be understood as stating that he was a party to the violations of the law, but I do say that when representations were made by him on behalf of the captains of vessels which had violated the law, instead of enforcing the report made by the officials at the points at which the seizures were made, and the reports made upon them by the Commissioner and the Assistant Commissioner here, leniency was extended after a full investigation by myself into the cases in which he was interested; and, in some cases, captains were allowed to go without payment of any penalty other than the cost attached to their own negligence, while in other cases they have been refunded a part of the penalty which the officials had exacted from them. I may add that hon. gentlemen sometimes, in discussing this question, forget the facts connected with their own transactions and they forget also the difficulties that arise, not only in the investigation, but in coming to a correct conclusion as to the veracity of the parties who make the statements, whether they be officials or whether they be parties who have violated the law. There are many cases in which the officers do their duty to the letter, but there are circumstances attending the transaction which justify the head of the department in not imposing the penalties which are provided by the law. The very last case that I decided, in connection with a vessel which had paid a rather heavy penalty in the west, was one of those cases: it was one in which the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) was interested, and upon his representations, and upon the evidence of the captain, which was confirmed by the collector at Windsor, he had every dollar remitted to him except the expenses. And yet, in my absence, he declares to this House that in nine cases out of ten, whether right or wrong, the head of the department confirms the reports of his officers.

Now, I propose to call the attention of the House for a few moments to the moiety question, and will be as brief as possible. I must apologise to the House for occupying so much time, but I do so because this question has created a good deal of dissatisfaction, among those who had to pay penalties, more particularly; and I regret to say—perhaps I am wrong—but my impression is that politicians have taken it up in order to create a feeling, not against the officials particularly, but to injure the Government for enforcing the law. It has been in many directions of great advantage to Canadian legislators to avail themselves of the past experience of the United States. Notwithstanding our different systems of government, there are many subjects for legislation in respect of which the traditions and education of our own people tend to make the example of the United States of peculiar value, and in no direction can the experience of that country be more advantageously studied by Canadians, than in relation to revenue and tariff matters. I wish, therefore, to remind hon. gentlemen that in the year 1874, in consequence of pressure brought to bear upon Congress by prominent and interested business men, the provisions of their Customs law were repealed, under which moieties of fines, penalties or forfeitures were paid to officers of Customs. Up to the date of such repeal, United States Customs officers and informers were awarded one-half the proceeds of seizures and fines, the remaining one-half reverting to the Treasury. A great deal has been said in reference to the action of the United States Government in repealing what is termed the Moiety Act. This matter was fully investigated by Secretary Manning in 1885. He issued a circular to all his officials and to prominent merchants, asking their opinion as to the effect which the repeal of that Act had had upon the collection of the revenue and upon honest importers, and whether the result had been the diminishing of smuggling or its increase. In issuing this circular, he says:

"In order that I may have before me, in preparing my annual report to Congress, a correct appreciation of the results and the effects of our recent investigations of Custom house affairs, and in order that I may decide how much and what proportion, if any of the record shall be sent to Congress, I desire that careful and official replies to the following enquiries, with adequate completeness, of details of facts and figures be prepared for my use at the earliest practical day."

This is signed by Daniel Manning, Secretary of the United States Treasury It covers a great many subjects, but that to which I desire to refer is covered by the 17th question:

"Have the false reports by the appraisers been increased by the repeal, in 1874, of the moiety law, and by the Customs legislation of that date, modifying the existing law, and especially modifying that of 1863, respecting seizures of books and papers?"

Many answers are given to that question. I have them before me, and have made extracts which it may be interesting for me to read. Here is a joint memorandum placed before the secretary in 1884, and signed by the chief clerk, assistant clerk and the auditor of the New York Custom house. This memorandum will be found on page 596 of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of 1885, to which I call the attention of the House. It concludes as follows:—

"The solvency and the life of the Government are dependent upon the certainty of the collection of its revenues, and strict laws are an absolute necessity to ensure their payment into the national Treasury; and such statutes may be efficiently executed without injustice to the citizens who, having the welfare of this country at heart, would not knowingly commit a fraud upon it. Stringent laws are as essential to the honest taxpayers as to the Government, for smuggled and other fraudulent importations would not fail to destroy the business existence of loyal and conscientious merchants. No Government can afford laws that would be inimical to the interests of such citizens, and yet our Congress has a Bill before it, which, if it becomes law, will certainly encourage frauds upon the revenue and drive from trade and make bankrupt the honest importer, who, of course, could not compete in prices with those who might successfully evade the payment of the just impost."

Referring to Customs officers and the moiety system, they say:

"The Customs officer, of course, would execute the law; but deprive him of his just moiety, and he will and must avoid personal risk. The experiment of detecting frauds without moieties has been tried and found wanting (see the Act of 11th February, 1846) and in the absence of a proper equivalent to the seizing officer and with a high tariff in operation, smuggling and frauds upon the revenue will be encouraged and run riot in every port in the United States. * * *

"Moreover, he is under heavy bonds for the faithful collection of the revenue. Will any man in that office take the great responsibility of making seizures without a fair and equitable compensation? No. And it would be unreasonable and contrary to the laws of nature to expect it. An incentive or reward is a necessity to the sure punishment of offenders."

I may add that instances of that kind have come under my own knowledge. The one to which I called attention a few moments ago was an example, in which case the importer, having acknowledged that he had smuggled and paid the fine, then said that he had done so through coercion and had never been guilty of fraud. Quoting from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the Collection of Duties, 1885, we find on page 340, the joint opinions of Special Agents L. G. Martin and A. K. Tingle, to be as follows:—

"The consignment system as it now exists, has largely grown up since the enactment in 1874, of the law known as the Anti-Moiety Act. A careful examination of the provisions of this law will show to any unprejudiced mind that, if it was not designed for that object, its tendency is to create the very condition of affairs, as to values, which now exists. It practically ties the hands of the Government, and prevents the enforcement of the tariff laws, in that it prevents its officers from obtaining proofs necessary to establish a fraud by undervaluation. Proof of such frauds could be usually obtained under the old law by an examination of the books and papers of the importer, where such an examination was made without giving him an opportunity to sequester the papers. There is a provision of the Act of 1874 under which books and papers of an importer may be examined by the attorney of the Government after suit is commenced, but notice must be given to the importer of the particular books and papers desired, and this gives an opportunity to those who are dishonest to suppress proof of guilt.

"Under former laws, informers in Customs cases were assured of 25 per cent. of the sum realised by the Government for the information furnished. Under the present law their compensation is dependent upon many contingencies. If the fraud revealed consists of undervaluation, they are not sure of any reward, because of the difficulty of collecting even advanced duties, not to speak of the impossibility of securing forfeitures; and the amount in any case depends upon the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury and cannot exceed $5,000. When a great fraud has been successful, those having knowledge of it find it more profitable to treat with the guilty parties than with the Government."

The same officers in reply to the additional enquiries, on page 348 of the same report, say:—

"By the very condition of affairs as to values which now exists as stated in the second sentence of our reply to enquiry No. 17, we mean the prevalent practice of under-invoicing consigned goods, which has been for some years past and is now so general as to many lines of merchandise. We think that the comparative immunity from all risk of punishment either in pocket or in person enjoyed by importers since the passage of the Anti-Moiety Act has tended to encourage the fraudulent practices by which the revenue laws are so largely evaded."

It is under this consignment system the greatest frauds are perpetrated, as every merchant who pays his duty knows, and the instance of Bertin & Co., wine merchants, is a case in point, for, as I have shown, when they deducted the charges and duty on the consignment, there was left about 2 cents per gallon to send to the party from whom the wine was purchased in Bordeaux. On page 363 of the report, Special Agent A. M. Barney, of Galveston, Texas, says:

"* * * So far as my experience goes there has been no perceptible increase of false reports by appraisers, since the repeal of the so-called Moiety Law in 1874, although there has arisen since that time a distrust on the part of appraisers and others of their ability to force an increase in values honestly believed to be dutiable, as by the repeal of that Act the burden of proving intent has been thrown upon the Government, and the right to examine books, papers, invoices, &c., has been taken away from the Government, or so hedged about with difficulties as to render it inoperative and void. The repeal of the Moiety Act had also had the effect to decrease to a large extent the number and values of seizures for undervaluation and in smuggling cases. The United States seems to be the only civilised country on the globe that does not offer a premium for information in regard to an infraction of its laws.

On page 391 of the report Special Agent, N. W. Bingham, of Boston, Mass., says:

"I have already stated that, in my judgment, the repeal of the Moiety Law has resulted in largely increasing the undervaluation in invoices and entries, and has resulted, naturally, in the increase of incorrect reports by the appraisers, for the reason that the invoice, in the absence of contradictory evidence, would be taken as conclusive evidence of value. But the evils resulting from the repeal of the Moiety Law extend beyond this; they are not alone found in the encouragement given to illicit transactions whereby the appraising officers are deceived, but the encouragement to give information is withdrawn, except in matters of comparatively small importance, and with those who are willing to be published in the courts, and annually to Congress as informers, and the officers are deprived of the incentive to a special vigilance and the means of obtaining testimony from the books and papers of the importers."

On page 406 of the report, James B. Power, Special Agent at New York City, writes:

"The repeal of the Moiety law and the modification of the law authorising seizure of books and papers, restricted the power of Customs officers in the pursuit of fraud. While the Government still has the power to examine books and papers, this power can only be exercised under the sanction and authority of a justice of the United States Court, and the particular books and papers must be described before such sanction is given. Under the old law an officer could make an unexpected descent on a suspected importer, and having power to examine all books and papers, could discover fraud if any existed. While the power conferred by this law was arbitrary and liable to abuse, the honest merchant had nothing to apprehend from its operation. The repeal of the Moiety Law removed all incentive to the giving of information by clerks and other employés possessed of knowledge of fraudulent doings by their employers."

On page 504 of the report, Edmund D. White, Examiner in the Appraiser's Office at Boston, states:

"It would seem to be almost self-evident that the repeal of the Moiety Law removed a great and ever present stimulus to Customs officers, which added to the requirements of their oath and their sense of official obligations, to be not only true to their trusts but to exercise extra vigilance. I do not believe that its repeal made any difference with an honest appraiser like Mr. Rice at this port, but its general effect could be but in one direction, and that the wrong one."

On page 541 of the report B. B. Smalley, Collector of Customs at Burlington, Vt., says:

"In answer to interrogatory No. 17: In my opinion frauds on the revenue have been largely increased by the repeal of the Moiety Law. I think it would be for the interests of the Government to have it re-enacted with proper guards to prevent abuses under it."

On page 545, John Hitt, Special Deputy Collector at Chicago, Ill., says:

"The repeal of the Moiety Act, 22nd June, 1874, was a blunder of the first magnitude, so far as the revenue was concerned. The fact remains that public opinion did not sustain the methods adopted by Special Agent Jayne and other agents of the Treasury. The reaction resulted in the repeal of the Moiety Act. Since that repeal undervaluation has increased greatly at the great ports, if we may believe the testimony of the merchants here, who cannot import silks and many kinds of goods by reason of the system of agents of European manufacturers stationed in New York. * * * The conscience of the country is not sensitive in regard to frauds upon the Customs revenue. * * * The loss to the Revenue by this laxness of opinion is, in my opinion, many millions each year."

On page 557 of the report, Charles H. Ham, Appraiser at Chicago, Ill., states:

"Herewith I enclose a schedule covering the years from 1873 to 1877, inclusive. From the schedule it will be seen that, whereas in 1873 the seizures, &c., amounted to $773,370.09, in 1877 the total amount was only $120,131.09. I attribute this decrease to the discouraging effect of the legislation of 1874. The Civil Service Commission of 1871, known as the Curtis Commission, estimated that one-fourth of the revenue of the United States was lost in their collection."

"The Jay Commission (1877) quote this estimate; and they also say: Some facts submitted by the importers touching the offer of foreign manufacturers to deliver in New York goods at a lower rate than they can honestly be imported at, would not seem to indicate increasing strictness and success in protecting the revenue."

"Mr. Ham continues: The circumstances of this repeal of the Moiety Law show, I think, that it ought not to have been repealed, and go far to show that it ought to be re-enacted. 1st—It was repealed on the heels of a series of enormous frauds, which were discovered through its aid—the seizure of books and papers. 2nd—It was repealed against the protest of those Government officials who had found it an efficient means of punishing and detecting frauds. 3rd—It was repealed at the demand of the persons who had been proven guilty of its violation. At least I am informed and believe such to be the facts, and if these are facts the repeal legislation of 1874 was little less than infamous.

"I see no good reason why the Moiety Act covering power to seize books and papers should not be again made part of the machinery for collecting the Customs revenue, whether that revenue shall continue to be raised, as now, largely by ad valorem rates or, as I hope it will be, wholly by specific rates.

"I do not think that honest merchants ever have objected or ever would object to such a law as oppressive. It is to the interest of merchants that the revenue should be collected; not a part of it but all of it.

"A member of one of the large importing houses here said to me recently: 'I think the repeal of the Moieties Law under the circumstances (and he knew the circumstances as I have described them in this report) was a very iniquitous act.'

"To the question, 'Would you object to Government officials looking at your books?' he replied promptly: 'I am willing that Government agents should examine my books to the last detail.'"

On page 588 of the report, Edward L. Hedden, Collector of Customs, New York, says:

"I am of the opinion that the repeal of the Moiety Law has deprived the Government of millions of dollars of revenue, and has been one of the direct influences to cause undervaluations."

On page 675, N. G. Williams, Deputy Collector of Customs, New York, says:

"I believe that undervaluations of invoices greatly increased since the repeal of the Moiety Law. Although the law was denounced and made to appear as very unpopular, it is nevertheless true that it was beneficial to the best interests of the Government, and it afforded the honest importer appreciable protection against the dishonest practice of swindling importers. The sentiment against the law was stirred up and formulated by men inimical to the interests of the business men of the country. The practical effect of the repeal of the law has been to drive honest American importing houses out of the trade, so that to-day the vast bulk of the importing business is in the hands of foreign agents who have no respect for our revenue laws, and are mercenary to the last degree. I believe it is this class of men who are most guilty of corrupting officers in the revenue service. Congress should restore the law to the Statute-book."

On page 698, George N. Birdsall, Assistant Appraiser at New York, says:

"I am of the opinion that the repeal of the moiety provisions of the Act of 22nd June, 1874, has caused more undetected undervaluation, because it removed an extra incentive to work for their detection. This dishonest importers have availed themselves of, they knowing that, if the incentive is not there, the risk of detection is lessened."

Mr. BOWELL.

On page 861, T. B. Sanders, Deputy Commissioner of Navigation, Washington, says:

"The passage of the Anti-Moiety Act must necessarily have increased the temptation to defraud the revenue, and I have no doubt has actually led to violations of the revenue laws."

On page 426, George B. Church, Inspector of Customs, Ogdensburgh, N.Y., says:

"There seems to be no difference of opinion among those whose duty has brought them in contact with the operation of the Act of 22nd June, 1874. While this Act was passed as a reform measure, for the protection of the revenue, had it been enacted for the purpose of enabling dishonest people to evade the tariff laws, it could not have better accomplished that object."

It will be borne in mind that these various expressions of opinion, were given to the Secretary of the Treasury during the year 1885, and though some disposition was shown by the Government of the United States, the succeeding year, to move in the direction of re-enacting a Moiety Law, the matter is still unsettled there; therefore it is interesting to know the opinion of the present Supervising Special Agent of the United States Treasury, as to the difficulties which are at present being encountered in the collection of proper duties in that country. In his annual report to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated 26th November, 1887, he states:

"The faulty construction of the present tariff laws, the inadequate means prescribed for re-appraisements, and the restrictions upon prosecutions for forfeiture, imposed by the Act of 1874, known as the 'Anti-Moiety Act,' have made it impossible for the officers of the Government charged with the administration of the Tariff, to protect the revenue from fraud, or the honest merchant from unfair competition.

"From any point of view the present system is objectionable, and instead of securing uniform and fair appraisements, as the law contemplates, its effect is to obstruct the efforts of the local appraisers to secure that object, and it affords the means by which unscrupulous importers, combining together, are enabled to perpetuate a well established system of defrauding the revenue."

More recently, on 17th November, 1888, the same officer in his annual report states:

"While the chief officers of the Customs at the principal ports have generally co-operated heartily with the department in its efforts to enforce the laws and regulations, the unscrupulous still prosper at the expense of the public revenue and honest importers, and it is manifelt that justice and equality at the Custom houses cannot be secured to as. interested, without a radical revision of the Customs Revenue Laws and a reformation of existing administrative methods and machinery1

"All experience has shown that high ad valorem rates cannot be collected with fairness and uniformity under any system of administrative laws and regulations hitherto devised, much less under the present loose restrictive laws and inadequate and ineffective system of appraisement."

All the foregoing opinions have emanated from responsible officers of the United States Treasury Department, but I have before me replies addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury by three representative business corporations, which must be admitted to have great value as representing the probable views of the general business community, and I will ask the House to allow me to read the same. On page 295 of the Secretary of the Treasury's Report, on Revision of the Tariff, James Lees & Sons, woollen manufacturers, Bridgeport, Pa., state:

"We do say, however, the 'moiety' Act should not have been repealed. As the law now stands, you are compelled to show the intention on the part of an importer to defraud before you can convict. The court is even obliged to charge the jury—that the 'intention' to defraud must be shown. It is a very difficult matter to prove the intention of a person, so conviction is frequently impossible. We are large importers ourselves, and we find a great deal of very unfair competition on the part of those who have no regard for honest business methods and the sanctity of an oath"

On page 434, the manufacturers of Rhode Island, under date Providence R. I., 22nd October, 1885, say:

"As you kindly invite information as to the character and extent of current fraud by undervaluation, as well as concerning methods for its suppression, we would say that the conviction is very general among Rhode Island business men that this class of fraud prevails as to nearly all kinds of imports whereon ad valorem duties are assessed, and that its magnitude is heavy. Especially do the abuses prevail as to merchandise imported as actual property of foreign owners and handled solely for their account and profit. In our opinion, the suppression of such frauds was greatly weakened by the action of the Forty-third Congress concerning the law known as the 'Moiety Law,' to which action we will take the liberty to make further reference."

"Referring again to the 'Moiety Law,' important provisions of which were repealed by the 43rd Congress, we by no means assume the perfectness of that law as originally drawn, nor do we forget the grave abuses under it, but inasmuch as its foundation principle seems sound and in harmony with the general experience of other nations, we cannot but think that the repeal of its vital features, however the law may have needed amendment in some details, was a serious impairment of facility for the honest collection of Government dues. We believe that laws similar in principle and purpose to the 'Moiety Law' are calculated to greatly advance the end you seek to promote, in furnishing machinery indispensable to successful combat with the frauds under consideration."

"Proposed remedy for undervaluation.—While the present tariff, in our opinion, should not be changed, we think its efficacy for revenue purposes and the protection of manufacturers and honest importers may be increased by improved methods of administration, fortunately, as we think, within your special province, and by improved administrative legislation, which you, above all others, are powerful to induce. We recognise with gratitude the administrative reforms which you have already instituted for correcting the undervaluation of imported merchandise entered for Customs duties, and would respectfully urge you to exert your potent influence upon Congress for the repeal of the section of the 'anti-moieties' Act of 22nd June, 1874, whereby the burden of proof of intent to defraud in undervaluation is imposed upon the Government, and for the enactment of a law imposing effectual penalties for undervaluation.

"At the annual meeting of the National Association of wool manufacturers, in the city of New York, on the 7th October instant, the above paper was read at length, and by a resolution of the association was unanimously approved."

In 1886 a Bill was laid before the United States Senate dealing with tariff and revenue matters, and among other sections proposed for enactment we find the following:—

"Section 4. That one-half of all moneys which shall be hereafter paid into the Treasury of the United States from fines, penalties or forfeitures incurred for violation of the Customs revenue laws, shall constitute a fund from which may be paid from time to time, on the joint order of the Secretary of the Treasurery and the Secretary of State, who are hereby created a board for that purpose, such sums as they may in their discretion determine, to meritorious officers of the Customs or consular service who shall have been instrumental in the detection or punishment of frauds upon the Customs revenne, and the board thereby created shall annually make a report of their doings hereunder to Congress, stating in detail the names of parties to whom moneys have been paid, their positions in the public service, the nature of the services rendered, and amount paid to each."

In his report to Congress on 16th February, 1886, page 39, the Secretary of the Treasury, commenting upon the legislation on revenue subjects, then before, or to come before the House, wrote as follows, in opposition to the form in which section 4, above referred to, proposed to revert to the moiety system:—

"Section fourth: It is with some diffidence that I interpose any objection to the fourth section, which proposes that one-half of the proceeds of fines, penalties or forfeitures shall be deposited in the Treasury subject to the joint order of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of State, who are authorised to distribute this fund in their discretion 'to meritorious officers of the Customs or Consular service, who shall have been instrumental in the detection or punishment of frauds upon the revenue.' If this section should become a law, there will, I fear, be a practical difficulty in the practical execution thereof at the distant ports by a tribunal sitting at Washington. No work could be more vexing for an executive officer than the distribution of such a fund. Any such law, if deemed necessary and enacted by Congress, should as did the law of 1789, define exactly what portion of the proceeds of a forfeiture shall be paid to a seizing officer, and what portion shall be paid to an informer, or to informers by whose information the seizure was made and the forfeiture accomplished. Under the law of 1799, such questions were judicial questions determined by the court when called upon to distribute the proceeds of the forfeiture paid into the registrar of the court. The facts, being local, should be judicially examined in the same place where they arose, and be disposed of, if need be, by contentious litigation. The Bill (S.B. No. 1153) proposes not only to revive the moiety system, but to revive it in a most objectionable form."

This did not pass, but an annual sum of about $150,000 was voted and placed at the disposal of the Secretary of the Treasury to reward officers in his own discretion. These are opinions from all portions of the United States bearing testimony to the ill-effects which followed the repeal of the Moiety Act, so far as honest traders and the protection of the revenue were concerned. I place these upon record in order that they may be read by those who desire to refer to them, and if anyone desires to verify the extracts, I would refer him to the official record; he will find it in Mr. Manning's report (Secretary of Treasury) "On Collection of Duties," in 1885. Hon. members may say, and with a good deal of force—if the consensus of opinion on behalf of the wholesale merchants and the manufacturers, and the special agents whose duty it is to carry out the law, is of the character which I have pointed out, and which Mr. Manning puts upon record in his report—how is it that they have not changed the law? The same reasons have prevailed which influence many politicians in this country. There is a certain class who can always raise hornets' nests about the ears of those who endeavor to enforce the laws of the land, and for political reasons there have not been re-enacted in the United States, those aids to the uniform and efficient collection of revenue which their officers, after many years' experience, have proved should be re-enacted. But in the United States they place in their estimates every year about $150,000 to be distributed among those whom they call "meritorious officers." I question very much the propriety of a system of that kind. If the head of a department had a large sum placed at his disposal to be distributed among those officers who do their duty properly, as he views it, others who might do the work infinitely better, but against whom the person distributing the money might have a prejudice, would be excluded from participating in benefits which their services deserved. It would be highly dangerous, not only to the honest man who is endeavoringto perform his duties, but also in this, that it would place temptations to which they should not be subjected in the way of those who had the disposal of the money. I have here also a letter written by Charles E. Folger, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, which I commend to the anti-moiety agitators. It is as follows:—

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

"OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,

"WASHINGTON, D.C., 28th March, 1884.

"To the President:

"Respectfully referring to the resolution of the House of Representatives of 15th January, 1884, requesting the President to forward to the House information, including reports from consuls and others, concerning the undervaluation, false classification, and other irregular practices in the importation of foreign merchandise, and to recommend what legislation, if any, is needed to prevent such frauds on the revenue, I have the honor to submit copies of reports numbered 1 to 184, inclusive, taken from the files of this department, covering the information desired. To these should be added reports and decisions numbered 1 to 78, inclusive, relative to the undervaluation of wool and woollen yarns, contained in House Ex. Doc. 101, herewith submitted.

"These papers seem to furnish conclusive evidence of general and extensive undervaluation of imported merchandise subject to ad valorem duties. They show that this evil has been steadily growing since the passage of the law approved 22nd June, 1874, entitled: "An Act to amend the Customs revenue laws and to repeal moieties." This law, while providing for rewards to officers who may seize smuggled goods, withdrew the stimulus previously given to vigilant activity by Customs officers in detecting undervaluation and other fraudulent practices, and, at the same time, erected a barrier to the successful prosecution, in the courts, of this class of frauds.

"This was done by reversing the rule prescribed by section 909 of the Revised Statutes, under which the burden of proof, in case of seizure, rested upon the claimant of the goods, and requiring the Government to show affirmatively the fraudulent intent of the importer. The jury must bring in a distinct and separate finding upon this question. If no such intent on the part of the person entering the goods is found, no matter how great the undervaluation perpetrated by the foreign manufacturer, who is the owner of the goods, no fine, penalty, or forfeiture can be imposed.

"Since the passage of this Act, the Government has almost uniformly failed to obtain verdicts in litigated cases, however strong the evidence of fraud adduced upon the trial.

"Whatever may have been thought as to the need of protecting the rights of individuals by the enactment of this law, it is clear that its result has been to render the Government almost powerless to enforce the revenue laws in cases of fradulent undervaluation by foreign manufacturers or unscrupulous importers, and to work great injury to the interest of importers who refrain from engaging in this dishonest practice.

"Besides the serious loss to the revenue consequent upon undervaluation, as indicated in these reports, the practice has a demoralising influence upon our trade with foreign countries. The lack of safeguards against it offers a premium to dishonesty, and makes it impossible for an honorable manufacturer or dealer in Europe to compete with his less conscientious rival for the American trade, and the honest American merchant is precluded from importing lines of goods thus undervalued. When such practices go unpunished the foreign shipper is practically enabled to make his own tariff, subject only to the contingency of having the rate increased by the appraiser's advance upon his invoice valuation.

"It thus happens that when Congress enacts that the rate of duty on certain goods shall be 50 per cent. ad valorem, it is found that perhaps only 30 or 40 per cent. is actually paid, according to the boldness and skill of the shipper and his American agent in falsifying market values and deceiving the appraising officers.

"It is no reflection upon the integrity or ability of appraising officers to say that they are unable, unaided by penal laws, to cope with this evil. The most skilful expert cannot be depended upon to fix values with absolute correctness; and where, as is now the case with many classes of imported goods, the true market values are studiously concealed by European manufacturers, in order that no proper criterion for appraisements may be obtained, the difficulties confronting the appraisers are well nigh insuperable.

"Responsibility for a correct valuation should be placed upon the consignee who makes entry, and the fact that the invoice and entry are false should be deemed presumptive evidence of fraudulent intent, subjecting the goods to forfeiture unless innocence can be shown.

"So long as the ad valorem system exists, equality and uniformity in its administration can only be secured by providing adequate means to prevent undervaluations. Such means are not to be found in existing laws.

"I submit herewith a draft of a Bill, the passage of which would, in my opinion, go far towards remedying the evils complained of.

"Very respectfully,
"CHAS. J. FOLGER,
Secretary.

I propose now to deal with these enormous sums which my hon. friend says have been paid to our own officers, and while I am not surprised that he should have drawn the deductions which he did from the Auditor General's Report, I have to inform him that that is not a safe indication, either of the amount of the seizures or of the money paid for seizures made during the year for which they appear in the Public Accounts or Auditor General's Report. Before doing that it may be of interest for those who have paid any attention to this question to know what has been done in the way of seizures and the distribution of penalties since Confederation. I promised the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) that I would point out to him that during the time he was assisting in administering the affairs of this country seizures were made and the moieties were distributed under the same system that has been carried out during the time I have been in office.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the hon. gentleman also remark the fact that every time he has had a Customs Bill before this House I pointed out the evil of that system and tried to get it removed, but without success?

Mr. BOWELL. I do not know that such fact has anything to do with the question.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it has.

Mr. BOWELL. It perhaps has this to do with it: that it the system is so iniquitous as the hon. member says it is, he should have remedied it when he was in office. If it is wrong now it was wrong from 1868 to 1873.

Mr. MITCHELL. Granted.

Mr. BOWELL. Then I take it for granted that the system being of the character which my hon. friend has represented it to be, he did not do his duty when he was a member of the Government in not insisting on its repeal. I have always inferred from the pertinacity which characterises the hon. gentleman, that with his determination to insist on the adoption of any policy which he believes to be right, and with the force of character which he possesses, he certainly could have convinced his colleagues at that time that they ought at least to give up a system which was so unjust in its character and so injurious to the honest importers of the country.

Mr. MITCHELL. The abuse did not exist to the same extent at that time, and I probably had my hands full in my own department.

Mr. BOWELL. I have no doubt you had; I can realise that fact, because I know myself, and I am quite willing to admit, that with a department like the one of which the hon. gentleman had charge, or a department like my own, if we attend to it we have about as much as any man can do. I have here a memo. showing Customs revenue collected, and Crown seizures, receipts and expenditure, annually, for the Dominion, from Confederation to the 30th June, 1888. This statement fulfils a triple purpose: first, it shows the effect of a gradually increasing tariff upon the revenue of the country; next, it portrays clearly that in far greater ratio than the revenue increase stands, have the frauds upon the revenue multiplied; and lastly it indicates in unmistakeable terms the valuable results which have followed the appointment of specially qualified officers for the detection and prevention of frauds. While the revenue in the past twenty years has increased about 280 per cent., the volume of frauds detected has reached 1,000 per cent. in the same period. In this connection it is worthy of notice that during the three years between 1883—when the Special Agent's Branch was established—and 1885, there was paid into the revenue as seizure receipts a total of $310,853, of which $62,841 was collected by the Special Agent's Branch, as against a total of $147,170 in the preceding three years; while during the three years between 1886—when the Financial Inspector's position was created—and 1888, the aggregate seizure receipts have swollen, as compared with the three years immediately preceding, from $310,853 to $454,393. Of this latter amount $123,013 was collected by the Special Agent's Branch, and $61,170 by the Financial Inspector. Taking the six years from 1883 to 1888 and comparing them with the six years preceding, it is found that the receipts from seizures mounted up from $208,855 to $765,250, and of this latter sum there was collected by the combined efforts of the Special Agent's Branch and the Financial Inspector a total sum of $247,024. No more satisfactory indication could be had of the unchecked existence of fraudulent transactions during the years antecedent to 1883, and of the necessity for detailing suitable officers to devote attention to the discovery and reporting of such frauds, in order that they might be stamped out as far as possible, so that the operations of law-abiding merchants should not be hampered. The statement is as follows:—

Year.	Total Customs Revenue Collected.	Seizure Receipts.	Expenditure for Awards to Officers, Expenses, Refunds, &c.
1868	8,624,318	9,154	6,104
1869	8,370,754	10,180	7,340
1870	9,411,443	15,460	11,906
1871	11,870,553	25,169	14,364
1872	12,727,056	36,037	24,019
1873	13,044,941	16,863	11,915
1874	14,448,898	9,616	6,362
1875	15,386,113	17,380	11,455

Now, it would appear that a much larger amount was paid to the officers for seizures during the past year than is really the fact. Some of the moneys resulting from seizures have been in the Treasury for years, sometimes one, sometimes two, sometimes three years, for this reason: When there is a contested case, the money cannot be distributed until the case is settled, and in many cases, after the decision of the department has been given, the parties upon whom the penalties have been inflicted, pay without going into court, but ask for time. Scores and scores of cases are reopened many months after the decisions have been rendered, and opportunities given to parties to put in a defense, and to show that the seizure was not justifiable. The result has been that money which has lain in the Treasury for one or two years, is not finally disposed of for two or three years longer. I will give some examples of this. The amount awarded to officers and informers, etc., appears by the Auditor General's Report to have been in 1886-87, $82,924.86. Of this amount $24.70 had been in the Treasury since 1879-80, $344.80 since 1881-82, $71.04 since 1882-83, $96.43 since 1883-84, $3,360.92, since 1884-85, $36,699.06 since 1885-86, and $42,329.91 only was received during 1886-87, in which year the cases were finally settled and the money disposed of. It will thus be seen that of the moneys expended this year, $40,596.95, or about 50 per cent., was placed in the Treasury during the six preceding years to 1886-87. Then I may call the attention of the House to the fact that out of the money which has been placed to the credit of seizures, large remissions are made in consequence of the penalties being largely reduced; and to this fact I would invite the consideration of the hon. member for North Norfolk, who said that the head of the department always sustained the actions of his officers, whether they were right or wrong. There was remitted in 1886-87 no less than $28,430.21. This money was actually received as follows: In 1883-84, $35; in 1885-86, $7,894.26; and in 1886-87, $20,500.95. I give you that as an illustration. I have a number of other illustrations of the same kind, as well as the details of the division of moneys which has been made during the period in which I have been in office. I might say that in like manner, when we turn to 1887-88, when hon. gentlemen opposite, taking the Public Accounts as their guide, have been so shocked at the large amounts that have been paid to the officers and apparently so little left in the Treasury, I find that instead of only $5,292 remaining in the Treasury out of a total of $98,391 received on account of seizures, the facts are as follows: The amount awarded to officers and informers was $58,683, or $24,241 less than the preceding year, and the money from which such awards were paid was actually received as follows: In 1882-83, $14; in 1883-84, $153; in 1884-85, $2,055, in 1885-86, $5,352, in 1886-87, $21,451, and in 1887-88, $29,658. In this year, as in 1886-87, it will be observed that about 50 per cent. of the sum distributed was received during the three preceding years. I must also point out that in 1887-88 the remissions amounted to $26,781, which was actually received as follows: In 1883-84, $400, in 1884-85, $1,969, in 1886-87, $9,539, and in 1887-88, $14,873. Here again, if we assume, as is fairly reasonable, that the $7,605, paid out in 1887-88 for expenses and law costs, were taken from the receipts of the year, we establish the fact that there remained at the credit of the Receiver General not $5,292 as hon. gentlemen opposite would make it appear, but there actually was still lodged in the Treasury at the end of that year, of the proper receipts of the year, no less a sum than $46,225. It is not necessary that I should weary the House by reading the details of the parties to whom this money was paid.

Mr. MITCHELL. That would be interesting too.

Mr. BOWELL. Then I will put it on record so that the hon. gentleman can read it at his leisure. As making clearer the varying results of the efforts of the seizing officers, I will now place the House in possession of the following statement, giving the annual incomes of the officers more prominently connected with seizures, and giving also the average actual income of such officers for the past three years:

From the foregoing statement it is clear that during the past three years 13 seizing officers received an average income of over $1,600 and less than $2,000; that 4 others received in the same way over $2,000 and less than $3,000—while 7 officers realised between $3,000 and $4,500.

For reasons already given, it must be admitted by all who impartially consider the subject, that up to this latter limit the remuneration is only reasonable,—and we have then left for consideration only 3 officers, whose average receipts during the past three years have exceeded $4,500.

It is with reference to the apparent receipts of such officers that I should explain the fact, that while some particular officers appear to be, and really are the Seizing Officers,—and possibly the discoverers of the fraud--and those to whom, if successful, the award is paid,—it may nevertheless be the case that they have called in the assistance of other officers, to whom they would naturally have to pay such amount out of their award, as they might consider the aid to have been worth.

In this way, though such principal officers would appear in the Public Accounts as the recipients of the full amount for which they as Seizing Officers had signed,—the actual portion of such amount which they might have retained for their own share—supposing they required and utilised the assistance of other officers—would be considerably less than the amount actually paid over to them by the Department. For this reason the large payments to these three officers should in fairness be viewed as subject to considerable diminution. Judging by the outcry which has been raised by gentlemen opposite, one would suppose that all Customs officers were amassing wealth as the result of sharing in Customs seizures. I regret to be obliged to show that my hon. friends on the other side of the House, in their anxiety to make out a case, are striving to create in the public mind an impression which the facts do not in any way warrant. I will therefore briefly lay before the House a summary analysis of the seizure awards made during the past two years. It is as follows:—

These analyses are worthy of careful perusal, for the reason that they mirror very fairly the relative value to the country of the different grades of Customs officials. Taking the year 1886-87, it will be observed, primarily, that only 101 out of the total force of 1,100 permanant officials, derived any benefit from seizures. Then we trace with moderate accuracy, the preventive work of the lower grade officials who, in the regular course of events, come in direct contact with the ordinary smuggler. We find that one-third of the whole number of officers who shared in seizures were men whose salaries do not exceed $600 per annum, and to these men one-sixth of the whole awards to officers was paid,—the approximate average addition to their salaries being $205 each,—thus making their average annual incomes range from $600 to $805. We then come to the next higher grade,—men whose salaries are between $600 and $1,000—principally clerks and landing waiters, of whom possibly greater intelligence may be expected. We find that they number 27 out of the 62 officials who remain as participants after the lowest grade men have been disposed of. It appears that by this class one-eighth of the whole amount awarded has been secured, and the approximate average addition to their individual salaries has been $216,—thus making the smallest average salary among them $816, and the largest $1,216. Next in order come those officers whose salaries range from $1,000 to $1,400, and they number 15 out of the 35 participants yet unsatisfied. This grade of officers had divided among them one-thirteenth of the whole sum awarded, which increased their salaries, on an approximate average, by $245, thus making the minimum remuneration about $1,245, and the maximum $1,645. We have now only 20 officers left as participants, and of this number there are ten who form a group with salaries from $1,400 to $1,600. This group received $14,000 of the total of $47,957 awarded, which makes an average addition to their salaries of $1,402. Approximately this made the minimum salary among them $2,800 and the maximum $3,000. It should be remarked that this particular grade embraces nearly all the Appraisers in the service,—men who are supposed to be specially informed in their several lines of business, and capable of fixing the proper values of goods, and so checking frauds, which less well informed men would allow to pass. Most of them have been active business men,—and, granting that they possess the requisite qualifications for their positions, it cannot be argued that the maximum average sum received by this grade is anything but a fair remuneration for their services. In this group are also included the Supervising Special Agent, and the Financial Inspector, whose services in the correction of fraudulent practices have been especially valuable to the Dominion.

Next come 7 officers whose salaries range from $1,600 to $1,800, and among them was distributed slightly more than one-fourth of the total awards,—giving an approximate average addition to their salaries of $1,954, and thus raising the approximate average minimum and maximum remuneration to $3,554 and $3,754 respectively; in this group is included the Departmental Accountant, who was mainly instrumental during this particular year, in bringing to light and correcting some most serious and long continued systems of defrauding the revenue. Finally, we have left three officers with salaries over $1,800 and up to $2,000. The result of their efforts in the prevention of fraud was not quite so advantageous to the country as in the two preceding groups; and the additional remuneration received by them was consequently smaller. Applying here the average of awards we find that the approximate average additions to salaries was $916.70, and consequently the approximate average minimum remuneration in this grade would be about $2,716, and the maximum $2,916. The analysis of year 1887-88 shows that the awards to officers were less than in 1886-87 by the sum of $8,529.52, and they were participated in by about the same number of men, and in nearly the same average ratio for the three lower grades of officers—as in year 1886-87—say those receiving up to $600 per annum, those over $600 and up to $1,000, and those over $1,000 and up to $1,400. Among those officers receiving over $1,400 and up to $1,600, the approximate average individual share of seizure awards was reduced by $102 as compared with 1886-87, and the number of officers participating was one greater in 1887-88. In the group receiving from $1,600 to $1,800, though the number participating in the two years was the same, the approximate average individual shares were reduced to $573 as against $1,954 in the year 1886-87; while in the grade whose salaries range from $1,800 to $2,000 with the same number of participants in both years—the individual average was $202 less than in 1886-87. There is a very important point in connection with the distribution of moieties, which appears to be lost sight of by those who condemn the system; and that is the fact that the sums paid to officers who detect frauds, as a reward for their vigilance, is not taken out of the public revenue of the Dominion, but from dishonest offenders against the laws of their country who are fined for their offences; so that if the reasoning of the gentlemen opposite mean anything, it is that no incentive should be given to Customs officials to detect frauds, punish the offenders, and thereby protect the honest importer and dealer. I have pointed out these facts in order that the House may not be misled in reading the Public Acounts or the Auditor General's reports in reference to the distribution of these moneys, as it might appear that officers received much larger amounts in one year, in comparison with the seizures made, than the law or the regulations would justify. The House will observe that where this apparently occurs, the facts are that, the seizures have been made some years before, but the cases have not been finally disposed of until much time has elapsed. I have very few more remarks to make on this question, which is a very important one to the commercial community. From experience, and, I think I can say without egotism, from close attention to the department over which I preside, and to the effects which have been produced by a strict enforcement of the law without respect to parties, I am positive that the present system has tended to increase the revenue enormously, and that it has protected the honest importer and resulted in putting a stop, to a very large extent, to the frauds committed on the revenue and the country. I know that those who have not been behind the scenes and watched closely the operations of smugglers and the devices to which dishonest importers resort, come to the conclusion that the law is wrong and its enforcement vexatious, and that those who administer it are guilty of offenses which in the old times would have been punished by transportation to Van Dieman's Land. I must also state that I find very few evidences in the newspapers to show that they deal with this question in other than a partisan manner. This is not a political question, but a moral one, which must be dealt with to a greater or less extent, no matter who is in power. If the public would endeavor to estimate in their own minds the difficulties which present themselves in the enforcement of a Customs Act, particularly under a high tariff, I am sure there would be less condemnation of the Department and its officers. The only journal that has dealt with this question, as I consider, properly, is the Journal of Commerce, whose editor seems to have grasped the difficulties that surround the enforcement of Customs laws under a high protective tariff. That paper has pointed out in a very forcible manner, not only the difficulties which present themselves in carrying out the law, but the leniency which should be exercised by the officers whose duty it is to enforce the law. I find in its issue of the 1st of February of this year, in reply to some statements made by the president of the Board of Trade of Toronto, the following remarks:

"There is one subject referred to in Mr. Darling's speech, in respect of which it would be very difficult to carry out his suggestion. It would, we fear, be next to impossible to prove any pre-existent knowledge on the part of a special officer of the Customs concerning fraudulent practices brought to light, however long he may have been cognisant of the facts. And let him be ever so zealous and faithful in the discharge of his duties, the evidence is often of a merely circumstantial nature, and, until he has completed the chain, it would be worse than useless to divulge it. The department is, doubtless, seldom or never without some information of this kind, as furnished by its special officers, and no action can be taken without its authority. At the time of the heavy dry goods seizures some two years ago, the officers had just completed the necessary evidence, and even then certain parties stood defiant, knowing that complete proof as concerning themselves personally could not be adduced. The knowledge in possession of the department of more extensive manipulations was not sufficiently complete The parties defied all attempts at proof, and the Government was obliged to content itself with administering a partial lesson at the time, with putting a damper for a while, at least, to further attempts in that line, and securing to honest importers a fair field for their business operations."

In a subsequent issue the editor deals with this question again:—

"There are a few in every community whose best efforts are in the direction of methods from which the ordinary business man naturally shrinks. Every town has one or two representatives of this class—men who almost invariably get the best of a bargain—who manage to make money in times when other men are eating into their capital—who always have some "pull" by which they are able to obtain their goods at a lower price than their neighbors and to undersell them at all seasons. In ports of entry the wits of these men are ever directed towards circumventing the Customs officers. In large cities no watchfulness is proof against them, for no sooner is one gap closed—one leak detected and stopped up—than a new one breaks out in some wholly unexpected quarter. These men will not be satisfied with fair profits in a straightforward way; "excelsior" is the point they aim at, and to reach it they are studying day and night, in the home circle, in the warehouse, in the house of prayer."

No doubt the editor had in his mind an individual who was, hypocritically, at the head of all the Christian institutions of Montreal, while perpetrating the greatest frauds on the revenue, and not only on the revenue, but on his own partner, his brother, who was ill at the time. The article continues:

"No law, no rule, no restriction, will avail against them. It is for the purpose of preventing these keen-witted traffickers from competing unfairly with the importer who honestly observes the law, and compelling them to contribute proportionately to the revenue of the country, that the Customs Department is obliged to maintain that portion of its force which is least understood and appreciated, even by some of those for whose benefit it is employed."

Hon. gentlemen may be sure that the disposition of that portion of the business community who are inclined to defraud the revenue, will not in any way be altered by the mere passage of laws of an inhibitive or even penal character. It is an axiom among legal men, and experience has taught mere laymen, that cruel and brutal punishment, imprisonment for long periods, and even the death penalty, have not deterred the commission of crimes in any measure proportionate to the severity of the sentence. It must, therefore, be conceded that unless the most effective machinery be adopted to enforce respect for and compliance with the Customs law, it will perforce, and because of the popular prejudice to which reference has already been made, soon become an abortive measure. When proper weight is given to the arguments just advanced, and it is seen and understood that every consideration of public policy and regard for the commercial life of our most valuable business establishments and industries, demands the consistent and impartial, though severe, administration of the revenue laws, I am impelled to believe that the intelligent efforts of the Government to ensure that result will be heartily supported by all those who have the real good of our country at heart. These laws cannot be successfully enforced unless by the active co-operation of the various Customs officials throughout the country. A merely neutral or passive discharge of their duty would mean untold loss to the revenue and disaster to deserving and struggling business houses. Let us look to the schedule of salaries for Canadian Customs officials, which is appended to the Civil Service Act, and we shall find the salaries of the several grades of officers, who should be in a position to detect and prevent frauds, are as follows:—

	Scale of Salaries.
Inspectors	$1,600 to $2,500
Surveyors	1,200 to 2,500
Chief Clerks	1,200 to 2,500
Appraisers	800 to 2,000
Assistant Appraisers	600 to 1,500
Clerks	400 to 1,200
Tide Surveyors	800 to 1,000
Landing Waiters	400 to 1,000
Tide Waiters	400 to 600
Special Preventive Officers	600 to 1,200

Taking the ports of Montreal and New York as the respective examples, we find that in all the offices, except the very lowest, the salaries paid in New York are more than double those paid in the Customs service at Montreal. The most active officers in our service, holding the positions of appraisers, assistant appraisers and their immediate assistants, are men receiving from $1,000 to $1,800, while in New York the same class of officials receive from $1,800 to $4,000.

Taking the lower positions throughout the United States Customs service, it is found that generally the same disproportion in salaries exists; our men being paid in about the proportion of $600 to $1,000 received by corresponding officers on the other side of the border. This is notably the case at points where a river is the dividing line, as at Prescott and Sarnia.

The duties of officers on both sides are about alike, and the cost of living varies but little, but across the border there are generally twice the number of men, at salaries much larger, as already explained.

The right of Canadian officers to share in seizures is looked upon as being in some measure an offset to this inequality, but it frequently happens that officers do not, in several years, derive any additional income from this source. For reasons which must be apparent to hon. gentlemen, it is exceedingly difficult for any Minister of Customs, or Government, to ensure that men of proper value and intelligence shall hold in all cases the positions of responsibility and importance. It is the truest economy, in the Customs service especially, to try and secure for the really valuable and capable men, the highest possible remuneration; and as already explained, while the salaries now offered, coupled with the premium which is placed upon individual effort under our moiety system, enable us to secure and hold some good men, I am satisfied from intimate knowledge of the actual facts, that the withdrawal from such officers of the privilege of sharing in seizure awards would prove to be a signal misfortune to the country, and to honest men. Many of these hon. gentlemen who hold up their hands in deprecation of the sums paid to the most active and capable officers in the Customs service, think it only right and proper that much greater sums should be made annually by their ordinarily successful business or professional friends; and while I admit that the routine work of the Customs Department requires men of only average ability, it can safely be asserted that for the administrative duties, and for the proper appraisement of goods, and discovery and checking of frauds, you must imperatively have officers whose intelligence is equal to that of the business men with whom they have to deal. I have again to apologise to the House for the length of time I have taken, but I deemed it necessary to show as clearly as I could, that the charges made against the Customs Department and its officials are not justified, that in fact the enforcement of the law has been in the interest of the honest trader by punishing severely those who violate it; and if I deserve condemnation in any way it is for not having enforced more rigidly the penal provisions of the Customs Act. I have given to the House three or four instances of the result of going into the courts before magistrates to punish those who have violated the Act. In justice to one or two magistrates and judges, I must say that they have enforced the Act as it stands on the Statute-book, the foremost among those being the Chief Magistrate of the city of Windsor, in Ontario. For the benefit of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) who seems anxious to know, I will say that this gentleman is a Grit, but has evidently a sense of his duty and oath of office. I will not say anything against the others to whom I have referred. They may have taken a different view of the law. In the Eastern Townships, where cases have come before a gentleman who was formerly a member of this House, Judge Brooks, he did not hesitate to enforce the law strictly, as it was and is upon the Statute-book; and the result of the enforcement of these clauses there has been to deter, in a great measure, many of those who were carrying on the system of smuggling in the Eastern Townships, from pursuing their nefarious occupation. I have shown also, I think conclusively, that the repeal of the moiety system in the United States has not been productive of benefit to the morals of the importing community or to the revenue of that country. I have quoted a large number of statements—and I could have quadrupled them—from merchants and officials, showing that the repeal of the Moiety Act of 1874 resulted in an increase in the violations of the revenue law of the United States, and I have also shown that our merchants who are protected by the enforcement of the law are not dissatisfied, but are actually in favor of the law as it stands upon the Statute-book. One evidence of that is the fact that as soon as one of the Customs detectives had resigned his position on the staff, they petitioned to have another placed in his position in order that the laws might still be enforced. With these facts before the Government and before the House, I am of opinion, though I may be mistaken, that the honest merchants of this country, the manufacturers of the country who are interested in seeing the laws enforced, and more particularly the importers who contribute a large proportion of the revenue, would be injured by the abolition of the system which prevails at the present moment. Believing that to be the case, I have not deemed it advisable in the past to advise my colleagues to change the rules to any appreciable extent. I did go this far, at the instance of the Board of Trade of Montreal, in regard to whom my hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) said that their representations were treated with contempt and were never listened to. At their instance, I did prevent the distribution, among appraisers, of penalties which were imposed for undervaluations which were not necessarily fraudulent; as I believed it to be their duty under the law to examine goods, and, if they were undervalued, to carry out the rules and regulations enforced by my predecessor, without any other reward than their salaries. I put a stop to that, which they thought was a very important point, though I question the propriety of it myself after the experience of a year or two. I give that as an illustration that the representations of boards of trade and merchants who are interested, have not been treated by the head of the department or the Government with the contempt which the hon. gentleman asserts. I shall deem it my duty in future, as long as I occupy this position, or any other position in the Government, whenever representations are made which I consider is in the interest of the public to carry out, to recommend my colleagues to adopt any policy which may meet the views of those gentlemen. But there are suggestions made very often which, when they are considered, and when you have the opportunity of a quiet conversation with those who suggest them, are seen by those gentlemen themselves to be improper or undersirable to carry out. I have shown that a return to the moiety system proper in the United States, is only a question of time, and that to abolish it in Canada would be to do away with the incentive now existing, and to lessen the anxiety of officials to discover and follow up the fraud, as they would not incur odium and ill-will in the discharge of their ordinary routine duty without being rewarded for it. Consequently, unchecked frauds would increase, and honest business men would suffer all the more. Instead of energetic and capable Customs officers paid by the dishonest portion of the community, as at present, for their successful efforts in discovering and punishing irregularities, the public Treasury would be depleted by the loss of revenue which the proposed system would undoubtedly entail. It is, therefore, manifest that a continuance of the present system is calculated in every way to conserve the interests both of honest business houses and of the revenue of the country. It is beyond doubt the system which experience has proved to be the best, and it should be maintained. Mr. Speaker, I shall leave this question with the House, asking hon. members if, with these facts before them, they deem it advisable to vote for the motion which has been placed in your hands, the most absurd portion of which, with all respect to my hon. friend (Mr. Holton), is that which declares that no condemnation of goods shall take place until there has been a public trial. If that were to be adopted, we would have to appoint an extra judge or two - one probably in each Province— o look after the seizures, unless you decide to abolish the moiety system and allow everyone to bring into the country what goods he pleases; because a judge would have to adjudicate upon 600 or 700 seizures per annum. That is about the number we have to deal with, and many of them are of the most trivial character possible. For instance, a five-gallon can of coal oil is brought across the border, and, according to the proposition now made, that must be held in durance vile, and I suppose we would have to put a special officer in charge of it to prevent evaporation taking place, or to prevent its being extracted and water put in until a judge could adjudicate upon it. That is the proposition which hon. members will be asked to vote for. However, this motion being one condemning the Government, I expect that the hon. gentlemen opposite would vote for it irrespective of the principle which it might involve or whether it declared that green was blue or black was white.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I have had the pleasure of listening to the Minister of Customs to-day, and the House have been pleased to hear him, for he seldom speaks, and, the policy of his department having been attacked, it was fair that he should have time to reply. He has availed himself of the opportunity, however, to go into questions which are not under discussion at this time. He has sought to vindicate his department in some respects which have not been challenged. He has taken the opportunity to refer to such matters as the peach basket question and others which I shall not allude to at this time. There are two main propositions submitted in the resolution of the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), one affirming that, in cases of seizures, instead of the matter being determined by the Minister of Customs, it shall be determined by a judge, by some person who is totally disinterested and unconnected with the department, and the other proposition that it is desirable in the public interest that the participation in seizures now permitted to the seizing officer should be abandoned. To these two propositions I shall confine my remarks. The Minister in reply to the member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) took occasion to make a remark. He said he did not desire to do it offensively, and yet it is one of the remarks that scarcely can be made without giving offence, when he characterised the speech that he had delivered as such a speech that might be made by a friend of all the smugglers and dishonest traders in the country. He may not desire to have given offence, but that is not an expression that you can use very well without giving offence. Now if that remark may apply to any one who may entertain much the same views as my hon. friend from Chateauguay, then it would embrace many more than himself, for, as the hon. member for Chateauguay thinks, and as I am inclined to think, notwithstanding the Minister believes to the contrary, a large majority of the mercantile community of this country are in favor of the changes that are advocated by the hon. member for Chateauguay; and, therefore, he will place the majority, if I be right in my conjecture, of the importers, the merchants, the business men of this country, in the position of those who are on the side of the smuggler and the dishonest dealer. Now I may say frankly at the outset that I do not believe in such a charge as is hurled against the merchants and the importers of this country. Why, Sir, our Customs law— I do not say by the Minister's design has been so worked, its operations are such, the continual restrictions that are imposed, the amendments that are suggested, the continual tinkering at the Customs law drawing it tighter and tighter every year—all this seems to carry the conviction of the Customs Department that the importers, instead of being a class in the country that are to be viewed with the same respect as other intelligent and honorable classes in the community, are as a class wholly lost to all that is honorable, and are entirely bent upon seeking their gain, whether in a legal or an illegal manner. Sir, I do not believe that, I do not think it is the case. The motion of the hon. member for Chateauguay recites that he is desirous of having every precaution taken, with due regard to the collection of the revenue, to prevent smuggling or illicit dealing in any shape or manner. There is no desire on his part, there is no desire on my part, I believe there is no desire on the part of the gentlemen who may vote for this proposition, to allow those who are engaged in an illegal traffic, those who are engaged in smuggling, those who are engaged in avoiding the Customs duties—there is no desire that they should escape the fair operation of the Customs laws. Possibly it might be charged against us that we do not care as much for the revenue as the Minister might care. The Government, it might be urged, care more particularly for securing the full revenue than the members of the Opposition; but if you grant that, still the members of the Government cannot be more anxious for the protection of the honest importer and the honest dealer than we are, and Sir, it is absolutely necessary in the interest of the honest importer and the honest dealer that you have stringent laws faithfully administered in order to protect them. Sir, we are not waging war, we are not speaking against such regulations or precautions as must necessarily be taken. The Minister has attempted to shield himself this afternoon by quoting that some of the regulations under which the Customs law worked at the present time, were in force when the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was in power.

Mr. BOWELL. Not to shield myself.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Perhaps that is not a happy word, but he gave that as a reason why he did it.

Mr. BOWELL. No, not for any such reason. I meant to show that the same system prevailed while the hon. gentleman was in office as does now.

Mr. MITCHELL. It was clearly given as a case of "you are another."

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I accept what the hon. Minister says; but as the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) says it meant this—I have a very weak case, and I am not acting as the Opposition did when they were in power. We would have been more pleased if he had acted in all matters on the line in which these hon. gentlemen acted when they were in the Government; but it appears that he only followed the example of that administration in matters that satisfied him. Now, if he had followed that administration in the matter of leaving us a simple tariff designed for revenue alone, if he had been content to administer this country with the economy that these gentlemen did, when it would only require him to raise some 25 millions of money instead of 36 millions, then we would not have complained of the operation of these clauses any more frequently than we did of the operation of these clauses when my hon. friends were in power. But the last statement he gave shows very clearly how the matter stood. In the matter of fines and seizures, and the distribution to seizing officers under the Mackenzie Administration, I think the amount averaged something like $15,000 a year; but under the tariff of 1879, where he departed from the example of the Mackenzie Administration, the seizures and the distribution to seizing officers have run up to over $100,000 per annum. As the hon. gentleman was proceeding with his remarks he was pertinently asked this question, how it was that there were not anything like as many complaints made at that time, anything like the murmurings heard then, that are heard at the present time? Sir, there was no occasion for them. I do not remember that there was anything like the feeling in the country, that there was anything like the complaints urged at that time, that are being urged at the present time. It can be readily seen why that is so. What we complain of is not the vigilance of the Customs Department in protecting the revenue and thus protecting the honest importer. That is what we desire. But we complain that he has led the people to believe that these officers, possessed of the same human nature that we have, when we leave it in their power, under such a complicated tariff as we have at the present time, that the Customs officers themselves cannot understand or interpret, that the importers cannot understand or interpret, and that any mistake made on the part—not dishonestly—but when any mistake is made by them, a seizing officer can go into your store, into your warehouse, and take possession of your goods, —yes, and go back three years to make a seizure amounting to thousands, tens of thousands, hundreds of thousands of dollars, and that seizing officer, to make his case good, only has to be approved by the Minister of Customs, and to share in one-third of that amount—hon. gentlemen can see that that is a system that is liable to be abused under this condition of affairs. Sir, under a tariff simple in itself, there is less danger of an importer making a mistake; but now a merchant receives his invoice of a purchase of dry goods, for instance, in the old country, and he goes into the Custom house and asks how he is to enter these, and the officer tells him he thinks this article should come under that head and be subject to that duty; and I have heard instances where the appraiser has given his decision as to an article belonging to a certain class and coming under a certain line of duty; and when another article, another piece cut off precisely from the same article of goods, has been sent down to him, a few days intervening, it has been sent back with the declaration that it is another article, and is subject to another line of duty. Now, Sir, when a merchant makes an entry, the collector puts the article under some particular designation, to have it afterwards determined by the Customs Department, by the aid of the officer who makes this seizure, that it was not the right article, that it was not rightly classified, that it therefore had not paid the right amount of duty, and that was to be taken as a case of fraud, and the person to have his goods seized and to be fined, and one-third of the fine to go to the officer who makes the seizure. Sir, I think that both sides of this House will agree, and they ought to agree, when things have come to this pass, it is time at any rate seriously to consider this question. The hon. gentleman stated when the member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) pointed out that he had promised amendments on this line, reminding him that just before the last election he proceeded to Montreal where there was a great deal of dissatisfaction in regard to the operation of the Customs laws and endeavored to make matters smooth, the Minister of Customs said he remembered going to Montreal, but he had gone to a great many places, and he could not remember whether it was during election time or not. He did not know anything about it. Of course, we know the Minister of Customs is so absorbed in the duties of his office that if it were not for his colleagues he would not know when a general election came round. Of course he was in his office attending to his business. By looking at the public prints we find sometimes that they refresh our memories, and I have had placed in my hands one of the Montreal papers which alludes to the fact, and says that just before the last election, when there was a great deal of dissatisfaction among importers, that the Minister happened to go down to Montreal at that particular time. He has told us that he had a conference with the Boards of Trade of Halifax and Vancouver and Boards of Trade all over the country, and it was not strange that he should visit the Board of Trade of Montreal, and there as the happy coincidence that he was able to go there just prior to the general elections, by the merest chance in the world. But he was able to have a report circulated through the press which had a smoothing effect on the mercantile community at that time. But the mercantile community are not satisfied. They claim that promises made by the hon. gentleman have not been carried out. The Minister in his reply says he has carried out all he promised. We are forced to this conclusion that either members of the Board of Trade of Montreal who met the Minister gave out an inaccurate report to be circulated, or that the Minister has forgotten something of what occurred at that time. It is stated in one of the Montreal newspapers published in June, in an article referring to this event, as follows:—

"Complaint after complaint was made to Ottawa, but no satisfaction was forthcoming. Finally, the dissatisfaction of Montreal importers became so marked and emphatic that the Government had to take some notice of this, it is said more especially as the elections are coming shortly. Accordingly the Hon. Mr. Bowell, Minister of Customs, came down to Montreal and held a meeting with some members of the Board of Trade, of which meeting a report was prepared and given to the press. It was a cut and dried affair from the start. The following is a report of the meeting: 'The Hon. Mr. Bowell expressed himself as anxious to receive any suggestion from those present as to the amendments or improvements in the present Customs regulations.'"

We can readily understand that the Minister fairly hankered for amendements and suggestions to the Customs law. Session after Session he is going to amend it, and we can readily understand how anxious he was to receive suggestions. The report proceeds:

"He stated that he would give such suggestions as would be made his most serious consideration and would bring them under the notice of his colleagues. He said the Customs Department were willing and anxious to facilitate the importers, and with this object in view they would issue such rules as were most calculated to benefit merchants, while at the same time legitimate importers and the revenue were protected. The following suggestions were placed before the Minister: 1. That the Customs oath be dispensed with, the signature of the importer being affixed to the invoice being substituted. 2. That the system of allowing appraisers to share in the fines be abolished and that they be paid fixed and sufficient salaries."

The Minister knows whether that has been carried out or not.

Mr. BOWELL. I did not promise it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I thought I heard the Minister say that he had carried that out.

Mr. BOWELL. I understand the hon. gentleman to read that those were suggestions made to me. When he comes to that part in which he says I promised those changes, I will answer him.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I understood the hon. gentleman to say that he had prevented appraisers sharing seizures.

Mr. BOWELL. Except where there is fraud.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). But it still continues in case of fraud.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). For I find cases in 1887-88.

Mr. BOWELL. They may have been cases where seizures may have been made a year or two before.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Yes, quite so. The report continues:

"3. That when there is a difference of opinion between the importer and the Customs, the matter be referred to arbitrators, one to be chosen by the importer, one by the collector, and in case of disagreement the matter to be decided by a third arbitrator to be chosen by the two persons. Consideration and discussion ensued with the result that the Minister expressed a concurrence in the views and further suggested the propriety of removing the responsibility of decision from the head of the Customs Department to that of a judge or such officer as might be appointed for the purpose."

The Minister suggested that. Now he denies it. But that is the report given by the Board of Trade to the press of Montreal for circulation prior to the last general election; and the suggestion as to removing the decision from the Minister of Customs and placing it in the hands of a judge appears by this report to have been suggested by the Minister himself and not by the importers. With respect to the suggestion as to the arbitrators: has that been carried out? No. They suggest that the importer should appoint one arbitrator, the Customs Department another and that these two arbitrators should appoint another arbitrator. How does the law stand at the present time? If an importer objects to an appraisement he has the right to have arbitration. The local collector will notify him that he can appoint an arbitrator, the collector will appoint another and the appointment of the third rests with the Minister of Customs. The suggestion of the importers was that the importer should appoint one arbitrator, and the Customs Department another and that these two arbitrators should appoint a third. I, therefore, think the suggestions have not been carried out. I quote this to show that, if this be a correct report, had this proposition of the member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) that the final decision in matters of seizures should be removed from the head of the Customs Department and placed in one of the judges of the land, had not struck the Minister as being a ridiculous one at that particular time. The hon. gentleman professes to say to-night that it was a most ridiculous proposal, that a seizure could not be contracted until a legal decision was had in the matter, because he said it would result in practical ruin and injury to importers, especially in case of perishable articles. It is pointed out to me that the report from which I have been reading appeared in a Government paper. In the Customs law there is provision made for cases of that kind, and where perishable articles are seized the law allows the importer to deposit a sum of money in the hands of the collector equal to the value of the articles and they can then be used in any manner thought fit, and adjudications upon questions of seizure are frequently made after the articles have been consumed or disposed of. There could not, therefore, be any more difficulty in administering the law in the hands of a judge than under these circumstances; yet the Minister rested almost his whole case in trying to make this motion look ridiculous. I need not say more on this point than to point out that under the Customs regulations when an officer makes a seizure and that seizure has to be submitted to Ottawa, and the decision of the Minister of Customs has to be given in order to make it final, the importer is very much at the mercy of the department. But the Minister says that this does not make it final, that you can take the matter into court now, and he spoke as if it were an easy matter to take cases into court. He illustrated the fact that cases had been in court and he mentioned the Ayer case, the Grinnell case, and some others, but I can tell the hon. the Minister of Customs that it is not such an easy thing to get into court. As I understand the law, you cannot go into court until the Customs Department gives you permission to do so. That I think is provided for in section 182 of the Customs Act which says:

"If the owner or claimant of the thing seized or detained, or the person alleged to have incurred the penalty, within 30 days after being notified of the Minister's decision, gives him notice in writing that such decision will not be accepted, the Minister may refer the matter to the court."

The Minister "may refer," and, therefore, it is optional. I know a case in which a person was anxious to go into court, and he consulted several lawyers and experienced the greatest difficulty in knowing how he was to get into court until the time elapsed, and he never got his case into court at all. We do not plead here for men guilty of fraud, but if a man has his goods seized for what is termed undervaluation which, under this law is set down as a fraud, he being innocent of any intention to defraud, he having a receipt and invoice and entry showing correctly the price which he bought those goods for, yet with the arbitrary power placed in the hands of the Minister to raise that amount over and above the actual price; the importer can be adjudged by the Customs officer to have entered his goods below value, and those goods can be seized. Suppose he does go into court the department would plead, I suppose, that the value for duty for those goods had been fixed by the department under some departmental decision that had been given, but of which the importer was entirely ignorant.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no such rule and no such law.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What would be the law then?

Mr. BOWELL. I am speaking of what is the law.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What is the law?

Mr. BOWELL. If I understand you aright you say that the department can give a ruling and insist upon the duty being paid upon certain values, and that the importer would have no recourse; that he could not get into court, and if he did it would be on the values which had been fixed by the department. The department has no power except in particular cases which are provided for by a section which has been on the statute for years to absolutely declare or establish the value for duty. They can only be guided by the values in the market in which the goods are purchased.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I do not wish to misrepresent the Minister, but I certainly think they are doing this all the time.

Mr. BOWELL. No, no.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think it is being done continually and I know a case where seizures have been made and where I have the utmost confidence that the party made an honest entry, at the value at which he bought the goods, but the department over-ruled the entry and put on a new value.

Mr. BOWELL. That is quite correct. Many a time a man buys goods in a foreign market for exportation altogether below the price for which they are sold for home consumption.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think the Minister now agrees with what I stated before.

Mr. BOWELL. I am sorry you cannot draw the distinction.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I suppose if a case like this goes into court the Minister would plead against the man that he had entered the goods at the price he paid for them, but that they had been entered below the price that the Minister thinks ought to be entered for duty. Then Sir, if the decision even on the technical point would go against the importer who had taken this case into court, he is liable for the full amount of the value on all the goods of a similar kind which he bought during the previous three years, although those goods may have passed the Customs entry, though the entry had been approved of, though the importer's money had been taken and although he sold those goods to his customers at the regular advance, he would be liable not for the extra amount of the duty, but for the full value of all the goods themselves. It would, therefore, be ruin to a man, and he could not afford to go into the court and take his chances in such an event. I believe I am correct in that.

Mr. BOWELL. No, you are not. The hon. gentleman says he does not desire to misrepresent me, and I may tell him there is no such provision in the Customs Act. It is only in cases where fraud has been established that the penalty to which the hon. gentleman refers can be enforced. In case of undervaluation the law provides that the penalty is in proportion to the percentage of the undervaluation, and not the total value of the goods.

Mr. LISTER. Who has to judge as of the fraud?

Mr. BOWELL. The law declares what is a fraud, and if that is proved I suppose the judge will decide on it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Does not the Minister bring undervaluation under the head of fraud? Is not fraud assumed by the Customs Department for undervaluation?

Mr. BOWELL. Not in all cases.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No; but who is to judge on these matters? There again is the glorious uncertainty about those Customs laws.

Mr. BOWELL. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to explain the difference. If, after a seizure for undervaluation, correspondence is found between the importer and exporter showing that the exporter was asked to invoice the goods at certain prices below the price actually paid, or below the market price for which they are sold for home consumption, that would be evidence of fraud. If, on the contrary, a commercial agent comes to you and offers to sell you goods at a lower rate than they are sold for in the market from whence they are exported, and there is no evidence to show that you had any knowledge of this, then there is no fraud and you are not punished for fraud.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think I have known a case which I brought before the Minister himself and where he has been willing to admit that these parties were entirely innocent of the matter. He is the sole arbitrator who decides upon these matters, and let me point out that he has found fault with judgments rendered by our judges. He says that he candidly confessed that he will not agree to have these cases left to the courts, and he has given us instances in which he thinks the judges who adjudicate have given unjust decisions. In fact he thinks that the judges were all wrong. I think the case to which he refers were criminal prosecutions, but he did not cite any case as far as I remember where judgment was given by judges as to the value of the goods imported and as to whether there was fraud in the invoices that were submitted to the Customs Department. The Minister has so much confidence in his own integrity, his own uprightness, his own wisdom and his own judgment that he really prefers and thinks the interests of this country are much safer in his hands than they are in the hands of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada or of all the judges. I believe that in the Grinnell case in which he mentioned that Justice Gwynne had supported the contention of the Customs Department—if I am rightly informed in reference to the matter, and if I am wrong the Minister can set me right—there was an appeal taken from the decision of Mr. Justice Gwynne, sitting as judge of the Exchequer Court to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court reversed the decision of Mr. Justice Gwynne who was one of the judges, and did not dissent.

Mr. BOWELL. No.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Perhaps I am wrong, but I was so instructed.

Mr. BOWELL. They reversed the decision, but it was not acquiesced in by Judge Gwynne. He did dissent.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Well, he maintained his opinion, but the rest of the court were against him. Now, I think that the country, while it has all the confidence which might be desired in the Minister of Customs, would not hesitate to place confidence, perhaps not in some of the magistrates in some parts of the country, whose decisions the hon. Minister does not agree with, but in a judge hearing a case and determining it upon its merits. The hon. gentleman took occasion to tell us, in the case of a certain member of this House, that he had shown that gentleman more favor and more leniency than almost any other man in this country, and therefore it was very unjust to him to say that he always upheld the judgment of his officers, whether they were right or wrong. Well, that may be creditable to his mercy, but is that not a departure from the strict line of justice on the part of the Minister of Customs himself, who is superior to a judge of the Supreme Court? If he is there as a judge, he should not show leniency but only justice to those who come before him; but while I point out that the Minister himself is susceptible with his kind heart, to the appeals of those who come before him and plead their cases, I should judge from the tone and manner and temper in which he used those words, that if the individual in question, having made those remarks, should come before him on another occasion the leniency would be wanting, and the judge who was lenient in one case would not be lenient in another. Therefore, the hon. Minister of Customs is human, just as judges of the Supreme Court and others are, and if there is danger of their being in the wrong and giving a decision which is not in the best interest of the country or in the interest of justice, it is true that the Minister, with his large heart, open to impressions to be made upon it, may deal leniently with those who approach him, forgetting that he is acting as a judge, holding the scales with strict impartiality. With reference to the Ayer case, the rulings of the department are set forth by the chief justice of the highest court in Canada; and when you heard that judgment, with the comments on the way the Customs Department was administered, Sir, is it not time that this subject was brought before the Canadian Parliament, and the representatives of the Canadian people were asked whether it was not time there should be a change made in the administration of our Customs law? I will not repeat the charge; the Minister did not attempt to deny it; but this he did say, that he did not approve of the judgment, that it was not to the credit of the chief justice to give the decision he did. Why, Sir, he would review the decision of a judge of the Supreme Court, and declare his decision to be wrong, unjust, and detrimental to the interests of this country; and he did not hesitate to say that he would be sorry to see the decision of these matters taken from the Customs Department and placed in the control of the courts. If he is correctly reported at that meeting in Montreal, he has changed his views very much since that time with reference to leaving these matters to be decided by the department. As to allowing the seizing officers to participate in the penalties imposed, I wish to say a few words.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Does the Minister get a share?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant.) No; I do not think any one but the seizing officers get a share; I would be the last to suggest anything of that kind against the Minister. The Minister rests his case solely on the fact that he has read from Secretary Manning's report, in which collectors of Customs throughout the different parts of the United States, speak of it having been a mistake on the part of the United States Government to repeal that provison of the law which enabled them to give certain amounts to officers making seizures. The Minister made the answer himself. He said, hon. gentlemen opposite will say, if the representations made are true, that the repeal of that provision has led to smuggling, is demoralising trade, is defrauding the revenue to the extent that these gentlemen say, a very natural and pertinent question to ask is, why have they not re-enacted it? I say if we are to judge that those dire results have followed from the repeal of that law in the United States, the question will arise, why have they not re-enacted the clause? The Minister was equal to the occasion, and he tells us the reason. Over there, he says, they are subject to political influences the same as we are in this country, and it is not so easy to place a clause in a statute when you have the people opposed to it. Does the hon. gentleman not see what that remark involves? If there be political influence enough in the United States to prevent Congress re enacting that clause in the Customs law to allow seizing officers to participate in the seizures from smugglers and those engaged in a demoralising trade, does he not see the accusation he hurls against the business community of the United States, that the vast majority of them must be men who are engaged in an illicit trade and in defrauding the revenue, whose personal influence prevents the enacting of a provision against these frauds? Does the hon. gentleman think that the citizens of Canada will believe as ill of the commercial men of the United States as that a majority of them wish to have a system of demoralising trade and defrauding the revenue continued? No, Sir; and I think the hon. gentleman was hard pressed with his argument when he was forced to give that as a reason in answer to the natural question that if the repeal of that law has worked so injuriously, why has it not been re-enacted? Sir, they abandoned it years ago, and they have not seen fit to re-enact it; and I think we may take for granted that they found that it was in the interest of the public that it should be repealed, and that they have not found since that it is in the interest of the Government or of any class in the community that it should be re-enacted. When you consider that in one year over $100,000 was distributed amongst some seizing officers, you can imagine the temptation that there is to those who have this power placed in their hands, with this tempting bait before them, to administer the laws, not with an eye single to the protection of the honest importer or the collection of the revenue, but with a double eye, one glance of which is directed towards the prospective profits which they themselves should derive from the seizures; and when you see cases—I will not mention names, for the fault is in the system more than in the men—in which these vast sums are made, it is our fault if we continue the law on the Statute-book. The fault is to be found with us more than with the men who administer the law, which gives them the advantages they avail themselves of. I find that one officer who receives a salary of $900 received as his share of the seizures in one year $832.12, and in another year $841.53. He received each year about as much as a salary as his share of seizures. I find another clerk with a salary of $-00, who received in one year as his share of the seizures, $772.74. I find another with a salary of $1,000, who made $861.30 by way of seizures, and the next year had his salary raised, I suppose on account of his ability, to $1,200. That year his share of the seizures amounted to $1,922.23. I find another one with a salary of $1,600, who, in one year, received as his share of seizures, $6,020.84, and the year before he received $7,881.85. I find another who, with a salary of $1,800, received in one year as his share of seizures, $1,758. I find another with a salary of $1,000, receiving by way of seizure, $1,227, and another with a salary of $1,800—which surely was sufficient to engage any officer to perform his duty without further incentive—who received $6,040.11 for Customs seizures. It would take too long to go through the list, and the Public Accounts are in the hands of hon. members, who can look for themselves Let them look into the Auditor General's accounts. Let them look at the officers of Customs participating in these seizures to the extent of, in the course of two or three years—$10,000 and then ask whether it is necessary, in order to have a faithful officer, that he should, besides receiving pay as high as $1,800, receive this greater inducement to perform his duty? Has it come to this, that while we pay officers from $1,000 to $1,800 a year, they will not do their duty without the extra inducement being thrown out to them of sharing in a third of the fines? Let us suppose a case which is not, perhaps, unlikely. Let us suppose that one of these seizing officers has his eye upon a certain merchant, knowing that a mistake has been made in the entry—not fraudulently but unwittingly, and in good faith—and yet a mistake that would bring him under the action of the Customs Department. Let us suppose that officer allowing the merchant to go on, making entry after entry in the same way until there has been a vast amount of goods passed through the Customs by that gentleman in all sincerity, and sold at a fair margin of profit to his customers all over the country, and then when the amount has reached a sum which makes it worth while, the officer makes a seizure. He has a right to seize the books, take all the invoices and obtain a third of any fine imposed. There may be reasons why we should continue the system, but the reasons given by the hon Minister of Customs were not sufficient. The hon. gentleman can see this is a subject worthy of investigation, and I would ask the members before they vote on the proposition of the hon. member for Chateauguay that it is desirable that the final decision should be taken from the Minister of Customs in the matter of seizures and placed before one of the judges of the land, and the other proposition that it is in the interests of the country that we should repeal the regulations under which seizing officers participate in a share of the seizures, to consider the whole facts of the case and the disclosures made.

Mr. LISTER. I will only take up the time of the House a few minutes while I bring up a matter for the attention of the House. With regard to the subject under debate, I have this to say: So far as I know, the administration of the Customs Department by the officers, outside of the chief himself, has been scandalous in the extreme. In my town officers of the department have walked into the business places of the most respectable residents, seized their books, and in some cases imposed penalties for alleged infraction of revenue. I wish to bring before the attention of the House a case that only took place recently. In the department is a Mr. Watters, who, I believe, is a very respectable gentleman, who receives a very high salary indeed, and it appears that besides his salary he received last year something like $6,000 or $7,000 for his share of the seizures. Hon. gentlemen may question the propriety of a man occupying the position Mr. Watters holds participating at all in these seizures. Last year he came into the town and walked into the business places of half a dozen of our most reputable men. Amongst others he went into two places, whose proprietors deal largely in wall paper and furnishing, and demanded their invoices. Upon studying these invoices, he compelled one of these men to pay some $140, the full amount of one invoice, and another to pay something like $46, the full amount of another invoice. So far as these merchants are concerned, the amount collected from them in the first place was the full duty of wall paper purchased in the city of New York at the full market price, and brought into this country, and entered at the Customs at the price actually paid. They got the paper from the American Wall Paper Mills, 124-132 Pearl Street, Brooklyn, and they bought them on the following advertisement:—

"Gold papers, 4½ cents; embossed golds, 8½ cents.
"We offer the enclosed styles at above quotations. These prices are for single rolls, 8 yards long. All our goods are put up in double rolls, 16 yards long.
"Terms:—Immediate cash on receipt of goods, or five per cent. discount if cash accompanies order No deviation from this. If you want the discount, send money with first letter.
"These papers are positively not sold on regular wall paper terms.
"No freights allowed. Prices the same to all.
"Everything new, perfect, full length, and exactly same as samples.
"Please send in your order at once, as we are making a very limited stock of these goods.

"Very truly yours,
"ESTES & PROVOST,
"Proprietors."

They purchased their wall paper from these people upon the same terms as anybody else. They entered it at the Customs upon the honest invoice which they had received, and paid duty at the Customs on their goods. Mr. Watters, however, seized the goods and exacted from the merchants duty on full prices fixed by the Government on such goods. Representation was made to Ottawa, and upon the strength of that representation, the department, after months' delay, returned to these gentlemen the sum Mr. Watters had taken from them. I say that this is an improper administration of the law. They are casting suspicion upon the most honest business men of this country. Within an hour after that seizure had taken place, it was all round the town that the property of these men had been seized, and it affected to a greater or less extent their business reputation in that town. It was a scandalous and wanton invasion of the rights of a citizen. In no other country in the wide world is there such a law on the Statute-book or a law administered as this is. I hold in my hand the wall papers referred to, and, when I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that in New York the price of this wall paper is 4½ cents per roll, and that the duty here is 9½ cents per roll, or 212 per cent. on the original cost, you can understand how the people of this country are sweating under the policy of the present Government. As I said, the fine was returned, after months of waiting, after a gross wrong had been done to these men; and I protest here, in the name of the business men of this country, against such a law as this remaining on the Statute-book. I say it is a wrong and an injustice to all the honest business men of this country, and is it not monstrous to see that the horde of officers who are employed are participating in the seizures which are made throughout the country? There is a secret detective system going on which puts men in fear and trembling. No man, however honest he may be, has any security that some detective may not walk into his business place some day, destroy his reputation, and put him to trouble and expense; and, after all that is done, he may have an opportunity of vindicating his character. I repeat that there is no country in the wide world where such a system is in force. In the United States, the smallest article which is seized has to be condemned by the courts, and not in a private room, not in a Star Chamber in Washington or in Ottawa, but before the courts of the country. That is the way in which it is condemned, and, if the proof is sufficient to warrant that condemnation, the goods are sold for the benefit of the country. In no other country than this is the power placed in the hands of one man who happens to be at the head of a department to say that a fine shall be imposed. Protests have come from every quarter of this country, from Prince Edward Island to British Columbia, against the Customs law of this country, and it is time, in the interests of the public, that a law which is so obnoxious and so capable of injuring the business men of the country should no longer have a place on the Statute-book.

St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary. $89,514 79

Mr. LAURIER. I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to this item. Shortly after, I believe, the Minister of Justice had taken possession of his department, it is within the remembrance of all of us that an outrage took place in the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary. I remember, and no doubt the Minister remembers, that he promised to make an investigation not only in regard to the facts which led to this outrage, but in regard to the management of this penitentiary. It is a matter of notoriety that for several years past the administration of the penitentiary has not been as satisfactory as might have been expected. Upon several occasions, investigations have been held, but I must say that these investigations have never been conducted in a manner to satisfy the public that the truth has been arrived at, and the Minister himself promised to make an investigation. Last year, I requested the Minister to put the report on the Table of the House, and he promised to bring the evidence before the House. He has not yet done so. Still, I find no fault with him for not bringing the evidence before the House, because, in my judgment, the evidence which was then taken would be of little account in arriving at a solution as to the administration of the penitentiary, because, if I am correctly informed, the investigation then made by the hon. gentleman was of a very superficial character. It could not be otherwise, because, as I am informed, the evidence was not taken under oath, and consisted simply of putting a few questions to parties who chose to come before him and make complaints. I am informed that the first person who was asked to come and give evidence was a Senator, residing in that locality, who has always taken a deep interest in the management of the institution. He thought that the witnesses should be sworn, so that the whole investigation should be held under oath, but the Minister did not choose to comply with his request, and, therefore, the hon. gentleman who was ready to give his evidence as to the causes of the insurrection and other matters which had been in the past a subject of critical references, declined, when he found he could not give his evidence under oath, to testify at all, and thereupon I am informed the investigation proceeded in the manner which I have described. I think it all the more regrettable that the hon. gentleman did not deem it his duty on that occasion to go more fully into the investigation of the penitentiary. Since that time a complaint has been made to me by a person who was connected with the penitentiary at that time, and who was dismissed on account of that outbreak, and justly dismissed. A man by the name of Lefaivre was an employé of the penitentiary at that time, and upon the report of Mr. McCarthy he was dismissed for cowardice. I have in my hand a report made by Mr. McCarthy, addressed to the acting warden:—

"In compliance with your order, I hereby submit for consideration, a report of the conduct of some of the officers during and since the late mutiny of the convicts here. Messenger Lefaivre, acted apparently in a cowardly manner, during a revolt of the convicts, on Saturday the 24th of April last, when given a rifle by the chief keeper, and told by him to go through the deputy warden's garden, to where the convicts were about scaling the wall. He took the rifle but went out of the chief keeper's sight. He hastily returned to the armory and went home and did not appear again at the prison until Monday morning following."

Upon that the Minister dismissed Lefaivre for cowardice. The following letter was addressed to Mr. Ouimet, the acting warden:

"Referring to your letter of the 16th of May last, transmitting a report of the acting deputy warden, Mr. McCarthy, regarding the conduct of messenger Adolphe Lefaivre, during the revolt of the convicts of the 24th April last, I am to inform you that the Minister of Justice directs that messenger Lefaivre be dismissed."

I have never seen this man Lafaivre, but he has applied to me and represented that on several occasions he has asked the privilege of defending himself, of having an investigation, and being allowed to present his own case. That certainly seems to me to be a fair demand on the part of an officer dismissed for such a grave offence as cowardice. I understand that he has sent to the Minister letters from different persons, from the late warden and others, which goes very far towards establishing his innocence of the charge. Under such circumstances it seems to me to be justice to this man that he should have the privilege, which certainly cannot be denied to any man charged with an offence, of being heard in his own defence and having an investigation.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The outbreak in the St Vincent de Paul Penitentiary occurred in April, 1886, while Parliament was in Session. It was immediately followed by a full and careful investigation of the causes of the outbreak. The evidence elicited in that enquiry, conducted by the inspector of the penitentiaries, has been laid before the House, and I think it included all the details which could possibly be expected. At a subsequent period, when it was ascertained that the condition of the warden, from the injury which he had received during the outbreak, was such that his recovery was doubtful—when it was apparent that a reorganisation of the affairs of the prison would be necessary, I was asked in this House whether I would not make a thorough investigation by some other person than the inspector of penitentiaries as to the condition of the prison. It was undoubtedly called for because, as the hon. gentleman has said, complaints had been rife for a long period before the outbreak, and I felt I was only doing what my duty to the House required, when I said that another enquiry would take place by some other person than the inspector. With a view to redeeming that promise as fully as possible I went to the prison myself accompanied by one of my colleagues, the Secretary of State. We had then practically disposed of all the affairs connected with the reorganisation of the prison. It was apparent by that time that the late warden, Mr. Laviolette, would not recover sufficiently to undertake his duties again, and that it was a question whether we should retire him on the superannuation allowance which the law then provided, or whether we should make a special allowance for him in view of his service and his courageous conduct during the outbreak. By that time months had elapsed after the outbreak, all traces of it had disappeared, all matters relating to the cause of the outbreak had been investigated. Our visit took place in the summer of 1886, and the only matter in relation to which an enquiry could with profit be conducted, was as to how far the causes of the outbreak still existed, and what the condition of the prison was as regards discipline. It is a mistake to say that the enquiry was a superficial one. Every means at our disposal was resorted to, every officer of the prison, whether offering his testimony or not, was examined. He was not simply invited to give such testimony as he might think proper, but he was asked every question which we thought could possibly elicit any instructive information as to the condition of the prison past or present. In addition to that an opportunity was given to all the convicts who desired to make any statement in regard to the affairs of the prison in the past or as to its then condition, and, in pursuance of that, at least forty convicts, I think eighty, but to be within the mark I will say forty, came forward and made statements. The investigation commenced by the examination of Mr. Bellerose. Mr. Bellerose was not summoned, nor did he volunteer to give evidence, but I thought it proper, inasmuch as he had taken a great deal of interest in the affairs of the prison, that we should inform him when the enquiry would begin, and give him an opportunity to make in our presence—really we received him with as much courtesy as could possibly be extended to anybody—as full a statement as he could make in regard to the affairs of the prison, and we hoped he would at least make as full a statement as he had been accustomed to make elsewhere with regard to the affairs of the prison. He said immediately, in answer to my invitation to him to make as full a statement as he could make, that he thought he should be put upon his oath. My reply to that was, that I saw no occasion for putting him under oath, and that I did not see any occasion for putting other persons on their oath until some definite charge against the institution as it was then or against the officers then in charge should be promulgated. We had at that time no charge against anybody; we were simply there for the purpose of making as full an enquiry as possible, and the view which my colleague and I entertained was that, after inviting Mr. Bellerose, who had stigmatised the management of that institution and the conduct of the Government in regard to it in very severe terms, if he were then in a position to make any charge whatever which could form a definite subject of enquiry, we would proceed to examine witnesses under oath; but that it would be altogether premature on the occasion of a visit in connection with which no charge existed to begin to swear the first gentleman who came forward, and who came there as a resident in the vicinity, and merely as a person who had taken an interest in the management of the institution. I assured Mr. Bellerose that any statement which he might make would be received with as much credence by my colleague and by myself as if it were made under the sanction of an oath; and I said to him further that, if in the course of his statement any charges appeared which ought to form the subject of enquiry, we would take into consideration immediately the question as to whether evidence in regard to those charges should be taken under oath or not, but that we were there to receive not only a statement as to anything he knew in connection with the institution but to receive his own opinions likewise; and in order to give the utmost latitude, we would prefer that he should make a statement altogether irrespective of the administration of any oath. The answer which Mr. Bellerose made was, that if he were not sworn he would make no statement whatever, and upon that he left the room. We felt that we would have to proceed further, and we examined every person connected with the administration of the prison from the highest officer to the lowest. We began with the evidence of the warden himself, disabled though he was, and we went down to the lowest officer, and after that we endeavored to ascertain from the convicts themselves whether there was any ground of complaint existing as regards the institution. I regret very much that I have been unable to present the verbatim report of the evidence then taken. While I admit that I ought to have presented it, if it were feasible to do so, I do not feel culpable in view of the reason why the evidence has not been presented. In order to have the evidence complete to lay before Parliament, we engaged the services of a shorthand writer in English to take the statements the witnesses might be pleased to make in that tongue, and a French shorthand writer to take the evidence of those who spoke in French, and the great majority of them made their statements in French. I have on many occasions applied to the gentleman who took the notes in French for a transcription of his notes, and I have offered to pay him the most liberal rates for their transcription; but he has declined, for reasons, I believe, in connection with some other office or employment which he holds in the Province of Quebec, in relation to which he has some suspicion that employment on the part of the Dominion Government might attach some disqualification. I have not, therefore, in my department any of the evidence taken in French, and that is by far the greater portion of the evidence, and it is only for the reasons I have stated that I am unable to lay the evidence on the Table. The evidence in English I shall be glad to lay on the Table at any time at the suggestion of any member of the House, but in the absence of the French transcript I can only state, as I stated last year, what the effect of the evidence was. We were called there to make an enquiry as to how far the administration of the prison at that time was affected by any of the incidents of the past. We examined fully the warden as to the events of the past. It is well known to this House, I presume, because I have no doubt it was a subject of enquiry before I took office, that the warden, Mr. Laviolette, was not on the most harmonious terms with the principal officers of the institution. I have the utmost respect for Mr. Laviolette as a gentleman of honor and of courage, but I have not much respect for him as an administrator of an institution like that of St. Vincent de Paul. I think he displayed, at a trying time, a disregard for his life in the discharge of his duty, and on that account I proposed to Parliament in 1887 the most generous vote Parliament could give, and we pensioned him at the full allowance he was receiving while in office; but I do think, and I say it with deference to his feelings on account of the respect I feel for him, that in the administration of the affairs of this prison for some years previous to the unfortunate revolt, he was too much guided by the advice of irresponsible persons outside of the prison, and too much prejudiced in the administration of the affairs of the institution by what he heard and by influences from outside against the officers who were entitled to share his confidence, and who, I believe, were very well deserving of his confidence. The statement which Mr. Laviolette then made, and he was unfortunately still in a disabled condition, was as kind as could well have been expected considering his past relations to his officers. It was not altogether free from blame for them as regards past management, but there was no definite charge or complaint, and when he approached to a definite charge or complaint or reproach against them I must say he endeavored to soften it as much as possible in order if possible to prevent ill-feeling being entertained or reproach being cast upon the men who, he felt, were then to be charged with the administration of the prison. Well, Sir, the conclusion at which my colleague and myself came was, and it was upon the unanimous testimony of all the witnesses we heard, that whatever discouragement and want of cordiality and confidence had existed among the officers, leading probably to the outbreak, those causes had entirely ceased to operate. Mr. Laviolette, as I said, was laid aside and although he was asked to testify, it is true, about the administration of the prison before the outbreak which occurred in 1886, there was impressed upon everybody connected with the institution the feeling that the calamity which had just taken place ought to put an end to the differences of opinion and want of harmony which had previously existed. We had then placed Mr. Ouimet, the deputy warden, in charge of the prison, and, in 1887, when the Pension Act passed by which Mr. Laviolette retired from the wardenship, we promoted Mr. Ouimet permanently to be warden and Mr. McCarthy, chief keeper, to be deputy warden. The unanimous testimony of the witnesses, however, as I have said, was that, in so far as the outbreak was to be attributed to any disagreements in the administration of the prison, it was traceable to the want of harmony which existed among the officers and to the disposition on the part of the warden to encourage a system of spying upon the officers by each other and by the convicts. I need not say to the Committee that when the chief officer of a prison encourages prisoners to spy on the officers, and listens to their tales against officers, there is an end to all possibility of maintaining discipline, and the testimony, so far as we could gauge it, was that this result largely contributed to this unfortunate revolt. The testimony was unanimous that, under the administration of Mr. Ouimet, all the causes that could possibly lead to dissatisfaction and disagreement and want of harmony among officers or complaints on the parts of convicts had been removed; that Mr. Ouimet, while strict in the discharge of his duty, as he undoubtedly is, permitted no spying on the part of convicts, encouraged no tale-bearing, and at the same time administered the discipline of the prison and the justice of the prison, in so far as it lay in his hands, with great strictness and with great propriety. The officers nearly all stated that the prisoners had been encouraged in times past to insubordination by having their offences overlooked. If a prisoner was reported for breach of prison discipline the report was often disregarded. In some cases the report was disregarded because the prisoners were in the service of the warden to a certain extent for the purpose of making complaints against officers, and in some cases the breaches of discipline complained of by officers were breaches of discipline, it was alleged, at which the warden had connived. I forbear to say any more than I possibly can in the way of reproach against Mr. Laviolette, but I am bound to say that every officer and every prisoner whom he could examine on the subject indicated, that these were the primary causes of complaint and that they no longer existed. The best corroboration that we can possibly have of these statements is that from that period down to the present moment I have not heard of a single complaint against the mode in which that prison is administered. I leave out of the question altogether any criticisms which take place on the floor of Parliament, but I mean as regards such complaints as we had prior to the revolt; complaints coming from the officers and from the convicts and proved by the occasional outbreaks we had. Not a single incident of that kind has occurred since, and the fact that perfect peace and order have prevailed since Mr. Ouimet was installed as warden seems to me a satisfactory reason why the occurrences of the past should be forgotten, and why we should credit the statements made to my colleague and myself as to the causes which led to the outbreak, and as to the fact that these causes have been satisfactorily removed. I expressed a hope last year, if I could possibly do so, to lay the evidence on the Table, and as soon as I can I will do so. I did hope, and I do hope still, that the fact that these complaints have ceased with regard to the prison would be a reason why we should not enquire too closely into the affairs of the past, believing that an enquiry of that kind would only lead to recriminations against officers who have retired from their posts, and who, taking their whole conduct and whole career into consideration, deserve that any slight want of judgment on their part should be forgotten. As regards the particular complaint that the hon. gentleman has called to my notice about the messenger, it is this: when the enquiry was made as to the cause of the revolt and as to the particulars connected with it, we had not only the duty of ascertaining what the causes were, but we had to ascertain in what the culpability of any persons—officers or convicts—connected with the revolt was; and what conduct on the part of officers or convicts entitled them to some reward. In the case of a number of the convicts it was found that they had acted admirably; they had assisted in putting down the revolt; they had closed doors which prevented communication between different bodies of revolting prisoners, some of them had succored the officers, some of them had helped to give the alarm to the neighborhood and some of them had helped in the pursuit. It was felt that as regards some of the convicts we should be liberal in recommending them to His Excellency for commutation of sentence, and that was done. As regards some of the officers we thought they deserved liberal treatment for their conduct in helping to repress the revolt, and that was done. As regards some of the officers we felt they were culpable and deserved censure, and the censure was applied. With regard to the messenger, after the fullest investigation my officer could give to the matter, it was reported that he had been guilty of cowardice, inasmuch as instead of performing the duty assigned to him by his superior officer during the revolt he went to hide himself, and that action might have been attended with serious consequences indeed. That was the report of the warden and the deputy warden, and I felt we could not do less than to dismiss him, and I accordingly agreed in his dismissal. The hon. gentleman, it is true, has forwarded to me, and the ex-messenger himself has forwarded to me, a statement denying that he was guilty of cowardice, and demanding another investigation, but I think the Committee will see that I am in no position to accede to that request. What would be the result of an investigation of that kind? Even supposing that the messenger came before me and made it appear that his culpability was doubtful, and that is all that could be possibly expected in the face of the evidence against him, could I possibly restore him in violation of the discipline of the prison and against the authority of the officers who are there? I think I could not. In fact the officer himself seems to recognise that, because, in the complaint which he has made regarding his dismissal and the request for a further investigation, what he asks is: that he shall have the investigation in order that being retired he shall receive the gratuity which retiring officers receive under the Act. I am not in a position to give an officer a retiring gratuity unless he is retired on the ground of permanent disability to perform his duties, and the mere fact that he had been dismissed on even a doubtful complaint is no ground for giving him a gratuity. I feel that with regard to that officer (even if I thought the case doubtful) I could not in justice to the discipline of the prison restore him to his position, nor have I the power under the law to give him a gratuity. I have dispensed with the services of this messenger feeling that it was a case in which, to say the least, his usefulness in the prison was of a very doubtful character.

Mr LAURIER. The country no doubt would be glad to hear that order and peace now prevail in the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary, for it is but too true that for several years after the dismissal of Mr. Duchesneau, in 1879 or 1880, up to two years ago the administration of the penitentiary for one reason or another, which I need not mention, was of the most unsatisfactory character. I am not disposed to find fault at all with what the hon. gentleman now says, that upon whomsoever they have rested the blame of the state of things which formerly prevailed, there would be no interest to serve now by going back into recrimination. I must say, however, that if at present under the management of Mr. Ouimet order and peace prevail it is very largely due to the fact that the present incumbent of the office has the cordial support of the inspector, and I believe of the department. As far as I am concerned, after having read the evidence taken at the investigation on different occasions by Mr. Moylan, I have come to the conclusion and I believe it is correct, that if under the management of Mr. Laviolette a different state of things prevailed—if the administration then was unsatisfactory, it is largely due to the fact that Mr. Laviolette was not supported at headquarters as he might have expected to be supported in fairness to himself. The hon. gentleman has borne testimony to the character of Mr. Laviolette for courage and for manliness, and those who are acquainted with the facts will accept this testimony readily, but unfortunately the Minister cannot extend the same encomium to Mr. Laviolette's administrative ability. The hon. gentleman will agree with me I am sure, that if an investigation such as Mr. Laviolette believes himself entitled to, and such as the public in the Province demand, had taken place, if it had done nothing else but to vindicate the character of Mr Laviolette for administrative abilities, as his own conduct at the outbreak vindicated his character for bravery, the investigation would have been proper. If the character of Mr. Laviolette has been and still remains under a shadow, and if investigation could have cleared that shadow, it would have been a simple act of justice to him that this investigation should have taken place. The hon. gentleman said they would not take the investigation under oath, as was demanded by Senator Bellerose, and the hon. gentleman said, incidentally, that he thought Mr. Bellerose had taken too much interest in the administration of the penitentiary. As to that I will not say anything, because Mr. Bellerose is quite able to take care of himself, and will do so if he thinks fit. But if Mr. Bellerose would not consent to be examined except under oath, it was not simply because his own evidence was not as creditable in the estimation of the hon. gentleman himself; but Mr. Bellerose wanted the investigation to have that sacred character which would have more fully ensured its efficiency. He was not alone to be examined. There were several parties interested whose character was doubtful, or bad, and Mr. Bellerose believed it would have been more conducive to justice that the evidence should be taken under oath. The hon. gentleman thought proper not to have that done, because there were no charges of that kind before him. That is no doubt true, but at the same time the hon. gentleman has just stated that, after the investigation had been held, it was deemed advisable to go still further into the matter, and probe it further. If so, the probing should be as ample and deep as possible, and for this reason it seems to me that it would have been more satisfactory to the public at large to have the investigation held under the sanction of an oath, and if so the hon. gentleman would have been in a position to-day to speak with perhaps still more accuracy upon the affairs of the penitentiary. I have no disposition to criticise the administration of the penitentiary since the hon. gentleman has taken office, because it is only fair to him to say that since he has been in office the character of the penitentiary seems to have been changed. I do not know how it is internally, now, but this I say, and I give the hon. gentleman full credit for it, that the same complaints which circulated formerly do not exist now, and to that extent at all events the administration seems to have been reformed. Coming to the particular claim, of messenger Lefaivre, it strikes me that the hon. gentleman must himself admit that he has not done full justice to this man. A report has been made to him, it is true, but the simple rules of justice required that when this man demanded to be heard, an opportunity should have been given him to present what evidence he could in his own behalf. To be discharged, as he was under the charge of cowardice, was a very serious matter to him, and it is very natural that he should ask the privilege of clearing his character, not only for that purpose itself, but also for the laudable purpose of being restored to the position he formerly held, or, if he could not, being admitted to the consequence of good conduct to which he had been entitled. The hon. gentleman did not think proper to grant this man that privilege. Well, of course he is the master, and can do as his own sense dictates; but it seems to me he would admit that this man has not received at his hands the full justice to which he was entitled.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not going to discuss the question which has occupied the attention of the Committee for the last half hour, but I am going to call the attention of the Minister to an incident connected with this penitentiary which I called to his attention on a former occasion. I shall give a brief résumé of the facts which led to the incarceration in that building of an unfortunate negro boy. He was a waiter at the Windsor Hotel in Montreal, where he got into a quarrel with another colored man very much larger than himself. The next night he went and got an old pistol to take satisfaction out of the other negro. He got into a squabble again, and, unfortunately, in taking the pistol out of his pocket, the lock was defective and in place of shooting the other negro he shot a poor unfortunate man who lay on the settee in the saloon. When the boy was put on his trial, he had not a friend in the world, at any rate in this country, he was from the Southern States. But his case attracted the attention of several guests of the house, as well as of the proprietor, Mr. Sweet, who testified to the prompt way he performed his duties as a bell boy. Another guest of the House, Mr. Robert Kane, of Quebec, and myself, in company with Mr. Sweet, went to the court to give evidence as to the character and conduct of the boy while he was about the Windsor Hotel, as a well meaning, smart, diligent and attentive lad. Of course he had shot the man—there is no doubt about that—a man who was dying of consumption, and probably would not have lived very many weeks. The jury brought in a verdict of manslaughter, and he got the extraordinary heavy sentence from the late Judge Ramsay of 20 years in the penitentiary; and although I do not want to say anything disrespectful of the judge, as he has passed away, the universal feeling among those who heard the evidence was that it was a tremendous sentence. The boy went to the penitentiary, and I sent him a message that if he behaved himself, in the course of a few years I would take upon myself to bring his case under the notice of the Government, with a view of getting some remission of the extraordinarily heavy sentenced imposed. In the penitentiary he was put in the barber's shop, and given a good deal of latitude. But liberty is sweet to the whole of us, and, unfortunately for him, an opportunity presented to escape, which he took advantage of. He was pursued and overtaken within a mile of Montreal by the warden, Mr. Ouimet, and two keepers and, as most men would do under such circumstances, he tried to defend himself, and did some little injury to Mr. Ouimet and some to one of the keepers. The boy was taken back and had to suffer punishment and the loss of his good service marks. When the émeute occurred in the penitentiary, in which the warden was shot down and the convicts endeavored in vain to break through the walls, that boy, who saw the whole affair, closed the door and put the bar on before the prisoners could reach it, and had it not been for his doing so all the prisoners would probably have escaped. I felt it my duty to bring to the notice of the Minister of Justice the circumstances connected with this boy's imprisonment and what he did to restore order. The hon. gentleman said he would take the matter into consideration, and the result was that one-half of the term, ten years, was taken off. I get a letter from the boy about once a year, telling me he is behaving himself well, and the reports of the boy's conduct are such that I have asked the Minister of Justice to see whether he can give him his liberty. I think the time has arrived when the Government might favorably consider all the circumstances, and I brought this matter before the Committee with a view that we might have some share in the responsibility for the course the Minister of Justice may decide to pursue after he has taken it into consideration.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice an increase in the extent of the vote.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is an increase as to salaries, but they are all statutory increases. In the mis cellaneous there is an increase. We are asked for a shed and stables, for the warden's quarters, $1,500. Tools, &c., for shop, $1,100. Stone waggons, $80. Sleigh, $40, and some allowance to an organist. The stable is to be built by convict labor.

Mr. McMULLEN. A close investigation of the expenditure of the penitentiaries should be had every year. This year there is an increase in every one of the penitentiaries with the exception of Manitoba. In the one under discussion there are $41,430 paid for salaries to officers. That is a very large amount for a penitentiary containing 265 inmates. There are two chaplains, at $1,200 each. Some arrangement should be made that a certain per capita allowance should be allowed for each prisoner. Year by year there is an increased demand for expenditure. Then again there are many items of expenditure such as those which have been referred to by the hon. member for Oxford which, to my mind, are quite absurd.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There has been no increase in the salaries of the chaplains since I took office.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the number of Protestants there?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Speaking from memory, I think about 200 out of 266 are Catholics. The Catholic chaplain is paid $1,200 a year, and my predecessors considered that the Protestant chaplain should receive no less. It is true that his charge is much smaller, but the charge of both chaplains occupies their whole time. The Protestant chaplain has no other charge, neither has the Roman Catholic chaplain. It is true that the number of convicts at Kingston, where the same salaries are paid, is much larger, but the prisoners occupy the same time of the chaplains at St. Vincent de Paul. I think there has been no increase in the salaries of officers at St. Vincent de Paul since I took office three or four years ago, or, if there has been any, it has been in exchange for certain perquisites. It is true that, from year to year, we have asked for additional amounts for all these penitentiaries, but that is because the buildings are incomplete, and it has been thought desirable to use the prison labor in completing them. For that reason we have taken votes from year to year in order to perform the works which are necessary, but there has been no increase in the salaries, except in the way of perquisites, as I have already stated.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I believe the old Halifax penitentiary has been sold.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I see in the Public Accounts an item of expenditure on the Halifax penitentiary of $1,931. It is only put in the accounts of the present year, although in the Public Accounts Committee I found that the expenditure was made in February, 1887. That was at the time when an election was about to be held. It was in the dead of winter, and people were sent to that penitentiary to whitewash it and paint it, and to put in putty, and glue, and spouting, and masonry work, and carpenter work, and all for the sake of giving employment to people during the election time. I think the House should be aware that the Government spent nearly $2,000 at that time on a property which they subsequently sold, I believe, for about $10,000, merely in order to give employment to their own political friends, and to assist the election in Halifax. That was quite unnecessary and a complete waste of the public money.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The expenditure on the penitentiary works at Halifax are not, in any way, under my department.

Towards Immigration and Immigration Expenses... $48,610

Mr. McMULLEN. When this item was before the House on a previous occasion, considerable discussion took place in regard to immigration. There has been a great deal of looseness in the expenditure in that department. Anyone who will carefully go over the items will see that we have been spending a large amount of money under that head for which we have received no corresponding return. We have undoubtedly been making an extra effort to bring people to this country, but the evidence we have is that, when we have brought them here, they have not staid with us wherever they may have gone. We should persistently cut down our expenses in connection with immigration. Anyone who will carefully read the Auditor General's Report, and see the manner in which money is squandered in connection with this department, will come to the conclusion that we should almost wipe this out altogether, and adopt some more economical system. It may be necessary to have an agent in Liverpool, and possibly one in London to give information to those persons who desire to come to this country, but to have men dancing up and down through the British Islands and through the countries of Europe, at $4 or $5 a day for expenses, Sundays and every other day, appears to be absurd, and it is unreasonable to expect the people of this country to put up with such a system. Every year we have evidences of extravagance in connection with our expenditure, here in this country and across the water. On the other side, you find large sums paid out in very frivolous ways. For instance, Mr. John Dyke, of Liverpool, has drawn for travelling expenses alone $1,463,40 for himself, and $763 in addition. In all, for travelling expenses and rent for his office he has drawn $4,241,15 in addition to his salary. I cannot understand how one man in the city of Liverpool, discharging the duty of immigration agent, can possibly spend such an enormous amount of money as Mr. Dyke spent in travelling expenses. You can go through this account, and find the same thing from place to place. Then, on this side, we find that Mr. H. H. Smith of Winnipeg received payment for 500 Icelandic papers, $1,500; and so it goes on through the whole accounts. There appears to be a looseness and a recklessness through the whole thing which shows clearly, to my mind, that our expenditure for immigration is far beyond what is necessary. We have had some exhibitions before the Public Accounts Committee this year. We had Mr. Henry Smyth examined there, and it appeared that he got instructions to go to the north-western States, but, instead of that, we find him in Kansas and in Omaha, and in the South, and we do not know why he was there. Then there was Mr. Webster, who was paid $1,800 for services of that kind, when he was assisting in an election. I say it is absurd to expect the people to continue year after year paying out such an enormous amount of money virtually for nothing. Our immigration system is an absurdity, it is wrong, it exhibits gross extravagance, and, instead of getting better, it is fast getting worse. It is the duty of the members of this House to strongly urge upon the Minister of Agriculture the necessity of cutting down the items of this expense. If you want to keep one man on the other side of the Atlantic as a general agent, it should be stipulated that he should not go dancing round Europe and charging expenses in the way to which I have referred. The idea of one man in his office drawing an ample allowance in the way of salary, to spend $4,500 in the way of travelling expenses is absurd. There are too many items of that kind, and I hope this item of expense in connection with immigration, will be well criticised, because I am of opinion that it is money thrown away.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My hon. friend is right in saying that there is a great deal in this vote that deserves criticism. I was also present in the Public Accounts Committee and I heard Mr. Smyth testify that there was not a single item in his account which was right. There is no use talking to a man of business about an account being presented as a correct account, when the man who made it testifies himself that there was not a single item of it correct. Large items were entered by which it was clearly shown that the man was not in Kansas, but was in Chatham attending to election business. That kind of a thing reflects discredit on the department, and it utterly discredits any statement made by the person who presented the account. For one I am not satisfied at all that Mr. Smythe did the work attributed to him, or that he was away during more than one of the two or three trips for which he rendered an account. I think it is in the highest degree undesirable that this department should be used for the purpose of supplying men with situations who have rendered services of a very different kind to immigration services, to the Government of the day. I have no doubt whatever that Mr. Smyth got that appointment, not for the sake of the services he was to render to the department as immigration agent, but because he was a friend of the Government and had been unfortunate in his campaign. As for Mr. Webster, I think it is an entirely disreputable proceeding, that a man who was receiving pay from the department of immigration, should, to my knowledge, and to the knowledge of other members of this House, be constantly employed in by-elections. Wherever there is a by-election Mr. Webster is there. What services Mr. Webster performed there, I do not know. I suppose they are services that will not bear the light at all. I know that in half a dozen elections—and apparently the man seems to glory in the matter—during the time that he was in the employ of the Government, he is found to have taken part in those elections. Now, that is decidedly improper, and it reflects discredit upon the department which employs him as well as on Mr. Webster. Men who are being paid by the whole mass of the voters of this country, have no right to be working in favor of one political party or the other. When they become Government employés they should, in common decency, remember that they are servants of the whole people, and that they are not entitled to take part in election proceedings.

Mr. CARLING. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has made a charge against the department of employing of Mr. Smyth and Mr. Webster. I heard the hon. gentleman say the other day that Mr. Smyth was a "hanger-on." Now, I do not think that hon. gentleman was justified in making that statement. Mr. Smyth, as I said before in this House, has held all the prominent positions that a man could hold in his own constituency, having been town councillor, mayor of the town and member for that county for a number of years. He had sat in this House, and I think was respected by his colleagues who knew him. Mr. Smyth was engaged for six months only, although his time did extend for two or three weeks after that engagement; and he has not been in the employ of the Government since the autumn of 1887. I think that the charge that Mr. Smyth was a hanger-on, when he had only been in the employment of the Government six or seven months, is not warranted by the facts. I believe that he rendered good service to his country. He was not asked to go away to the United States and remain there, but to work in his own riding, and to checkmate the influences that were being brought to bear by the agents or runners of American railway and land companies to induce our people to go to the United States instead of going to our great North-West. I am satisfied that Mr. Smyth did render good service to the country, and that he prevented thousands of people from going to Dakota and induced them to go to our own North-West. Then, with regard to Mr. Webster, the hon. member says he was employed for political purposes. Mr. Webster is a well known farmer in the eastern part of Canada, and I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman knows him, because I believe he comes from the city of Kingston. I believe Mr. Webster has induced hundreds and thousands of people, who would otherwise have gone to the United States, to go to our own North-West. We have evidences of that, within the last few months, hundreds of people having left Toronto for the North-West, who had the idea of going to the United States. The hon. gentleman said something about a by-election. Well, I advised Mr. Webster to go to all public gatherings, wherever a large number of people were gathered together——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CARLING. Do hon. gentlemen mean to say that parties in Ontario, who are paid by the Local Government, are not canvassing and working for that Government?

Mr. McMULLEN. Name them.

Mr. CARLING. I can say myself that an officer of the Local Government——

Mr. McMULLEN. Name one.

Mr. CARLING. In the city of London, Mr. Hutchinson, County Attorney for the County of Middlesex.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CARLING. I thought you wanted me to name some one. I can say that Mr. Hutchinson, the County Attorney of the County of Middlesex, took the platform in the city of London and addressed the electors against Sir John A. Macdonald and myself. I am told that an officer of the Central Prison in Toronto was one of the scrutineers in the County of Haldimand in the last election. We know that all the license inspectors all over Ontario are election agents working in opposition to this Government, and in favor of the candidates of the Local Government. Mr. Webster was not instructed to take any part in the elections. He was not in the employment of the Government when he attended some of the elections. The hon. gentleman stated in the House a few nights ago that Mr. Webster was in the employment of the Government at the last Haldimand election. I stated that was not correct. The hon. gentleman said he could prove it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I did prove it before the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. CARLING. I would ask the hon. gentlemen that were in this House on that occasion if the hon. gentleman for North Wellington did not say that Mr. Webster was at the last Haldimand election.

Mr. McMULLEN. You can take advantage of the statement.

Mr. CARLING. I will read from Hansard what took place. The report is as follows:—

"Mr. CARLING. Do you know he was in Haldimand during the time he was employed by the Government?

"Mr. MULOCK. I am told he was.

"Mr. McMULLEN. We know he was by the Public Accounts, by the accounts that he sent in himself, and we will prove it by the Public Accounts Committee to-morrow. By an order of this House he sent in the return of his services and the different places where he had been, and in that return there is a charge for expenses from Kingston to Haldimand, and Haldimand back again to Kingston, during the election campaign.

"Mr. CARLING. What year was that in?

"Mr. McMULLEN. During the last election that took place in Haldimand.

"Mr. CARLING. I can only say to the hon. gentleman that he is quite mistaken. I say there is no account in the department for Mr. Webster for over a year. I state to this House that the hon. gentleman is making a statement that is totally untrue. Mr. Webster did not receive a dollar from the Government during the time of the last election in Haldimand."

I only stated that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), had made that statement, and I have quoted the report from Hansard. I think I have proved to the House that the statement made by the hon. gentleman a few moments ago was incorrect. Mr. Webster, I contend, has rendered good service to the country, and I am continuing him in the Government's employ, and it is my intention to do so, because I know he has been the cause of sending hundreds of our young men——

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Out of the country.

Mr. CARLING. Not out of the country, because they have gone to our own country, but they would possibly have been induced by American land and railway agents to go to the United States.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then you are employing agents to send men from one Province to another.

Mr. CARLING. No, I am not. The American Government have consular agents in nearly every city and town in the Dominion. Their land and railway companies have flooded this country with literature, to induce our young people to go to their country, and I thought it was high time we should take steps to check the action of American agents and induce our people to go to our own North-West, and show them it is equal and even a superior country to the Western States. I am satisfied that the Immigration Department has been conducted with due economy, notwithstanding what has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite. The member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) held the position of Finance Minister for five years, from 1874 to 1878. In 1874, $251,000 were expended by the Government of the hon. gentleman for immigration.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What if it was?

Mr. CARLING. In 1875 they expended $296,000; in 1876, $284,000; in 1887, $183,000; in 1878, $185,000, and the cost per immigrant per head during those years was $8 40, while during the next five years we brought it down to $3.52. We brought in 373,000 people,——

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How many did you keep in the country?

Mr. CARLING—as against 149,000 brought in by hon. gentlemen opposite, and the cost in our case was $3.52 as against $8.40 during the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite. During the last five years we have brought in 425,000 at a cost of $3.62 per head. Hon. gentlemen opposite need not, therefore, talk of extravagance since the present administration have been in power. Statements have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to the employment of Mr. Webster and Mr. Smyth, but I find during the five years they were in power from 35 to 30 gentlemen were employed as travelling agents. They included, E. Simays, J. Korman, J. H. Simonson, Gustave Bossange, James Wallace, G. R. Kingsmill, John Talbot, C. J. Beckman, M. de la Mothe, H. Matheson, H. J. Richards, Madam Von Koerber, W. W. Madden, Edw. Farrer, Paul de Cazes, A. Walmsley, H. Taylor, C. Lalime, R. Whiteford, Peter O'Leary, A. L. Borsen, S Johnasson, A. G. Nicholson, G. J. Whellams. The Government found it necessary to give employment to that large number of gentlemen in order to further immigration, and I think they were perfectly justified in doing so, and the expenditure amounted to no less than $1,250,000 for immigration purposes while hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, or a cost of $8.40 per head per immigrant, as compared with $3.50 or $3.60 since that time. I assure the Committee, that every economy has been used in the administration of my department, and that every reduction has been made that could consistently be made in order to keep down the expenses.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Under what possibility can the hon. gentleman contend that the accounts connected with his department and the facts he presents are worthy of a single instant's consideration. We had the opportunity of testing his statements by his own return as to immigration. His department was sifted most thoroughly in the Public Accounts Committee in regard to the statement that 166,000 people had been placed in the North-West during the period from 1881 to 1886. How then does it occur that of that number only 40,000 remained there? If there was a particle of truth in that statement, such was the maladministration of the Government and the Immigration Department that out of every batch of four people they pretended to have settled, they have driven three out of the country, and these three in every case become immigration agents of a most mischievous character, because when you bring men into the country and cannot keep them there, out they go to another country, and they invariably give a very bad account of the country to which they went and where they were unable to stay. There is no getting over this one fact, which is worth a thousand other facts as to the reliability of the hon. gentleman's statements. I showed when the Budget discussion was up that if the hon. gentleman's statement had any foundation in fact, if it were true that he brought 630,000 people into this country, I showed that he was instrumental in driving 700,000 people out of it. Here are the hon. gentleman's estimates of the population. The hon. gentleman declared, in answer to a question of mine, that there were 4,936,000 people in Canada; he declared that he had brought in according to his own estimate over 630,000 people, and as we had 4,324,000 by the census returns of 1881, it follows as clearly as anything can follow that adding the immigrants which he alleges were brought in, we have 5,000 less than we had in 1881, and if these immigrants were actual settlers we have lost 700,000 people. That is the result of the hon. gentleman's policy and of the enormous expenditure which he incurred for the purpose, as he alleges, of promoting immigration. I say that, under these circumstances, every penny of this vote is worse than wasted. If the hon. gentleman does succeed in bringing people in here, he brings them to turn out our own people, according to his own statement.

Mr. CARLING. You said you brought in 149,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Aye, and the most of them stayed that we brought in. There is another fact that has been ascertained that the exodus attained huge proportions after the hon. gentlemen came into power, and initiated their policy. There is not to-day, in all probability, one single rural district in Ontario (except two or three of the new settled counties) in which the rural population have not diminished. At any rate they have failed to retain their natural increase under the policy of hon. gentlemen.

Mr. HESSON. What evidence have you?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The evidence of the municipal statistics.

Mr. HESSON. What about the city of Toronto?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In a few cities no doubt there has been an increase, and probably Toronto has absorbed the population of a considerable portion of the district around.

Mr. HESSON. Every farm is occupied in Ontario to-day.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes; but it is not occupied as well as it was. In a great number of the rural constituencies the rural population is diminishing at the present moment. The returns show distinctly that the rural population has not increased in the space of seven or eight years, and in Ontario according to the statistics the rural population has not increased 10,000 souls. The fact is that the hon. gentleman's policy may have gathered together a certain number of people in our towns and cities, but a very considerable number of them are not desirable immigrants to come to this country; a very considerable number of them are a burthen on our resources and a tax on the charity of the people of Canada—the last kind of people whom it is desirable we should bring into this country to replace our own yeomanry. I make the statement, and I would call attention of the hon. members from Toronto to it, that 8,000 persons had received relief in Toronto in the last month or two of 1888. I have received from a gentleman who knows thoroughly the details of these matters, more than confirmation of the statements I made. I find that the Toronto Relief Society relieved 807 families, representing 4,035 souls and the details will be found in the Mail newspaper of the 12th November, 1888. I find that the Irish Protestant Benevolent Society relieved 100 families, representing 500 souls, and that the St. George's Society relieved more than 3,500 persons. If hon. gentlemen have sufficient arithmetical powers to add these figures together they will see that they exceed 8,000 souls. The truth of the matter is that the hon. gentlemen have been using this immigration money for political purposes, and the greater part of it has gone to pay their newspaper hacks, and to pay hacks like Mr. Webster and Mr. Smyth. The Minister of Agriculture had not one word to say in defence of the outrageous statements we heard in the Public Accounts Committee when Mr. Smyth, on being examined before us, was obliged to state that not one single date in his account was correct, and that at the date when he alleged he had paid out considerable sums of money, for all of which he was paid by the department, it was clearly proved that Smyth was in Chatham. What has the Minister of Agriculture to say in defence of this? What does he say in the face of his own letters of instruction to this patriot; this deserving servant of the public; this man who is an honor to his party and to his country—what does the Minister say when his own letter shows that was part of Mr. Smyth's duty, to preserve dates and vouchers, while the evidence in the Public Accounts Committee showed that not one single date was correct. I say that it is an outrage that the public money should go to men who cannot even present a decent account of the expenses they have incurred. I do not care what the officers of the Government of Ontario may do; that is no answer, that is no excuse, that is no defense for the hon. gentleman paying the public money to agents employed in by-elections throughout this country as is the case with Mr. Webster. I say that it is a dishonest abuse of the public money and that the hon. gentleman has no business to pay Mr. Webster or to employ such men to act as immigrant agents.

Mr. DENISON. I would ask the member for South Oxford where he got the fact that 8,000 families were relieved in Toronto; whether the calculations are from the official returns or whether they are made up by himself?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I received the account from one of the parties concerned. He gave me a total number of 4,035.

Mr. DENISON. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman is aware that a number of tramps go to the House of Industry.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is wholly apart from that. I received a number of small details having reference to the House of Industry and other places, but I did not think it worth while to include them. I only gave three items out of about a score.

Mr. DENISON. Of course if the hon. member counted as families paupers and those receiving aid as tramps that would increase the number.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My calculation was wholly apart from that.

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to settle this question with regard to Mr. Webster. The statement I made in the House some time ago was that I could prove by the Public Accounts that Mr. Webster was at the last election in Haldimand; that is, the last election of which we had an account in the Public Accounts.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no; you have said the last election.

Mr. McMULLEN. I said the last election for which we have a return in the Public Accounts and the Minister understood me in that way.

Mr. CARLING. No.

Mr. McMULLEN. He now tries to shield himself behind the fact that there were several elections in Haldimand and he tries to pin me down to the "last election." I said distinctly in my statement, and he has read my words, that I could prove from the Public Accounts that Mr. Webster was in Haldimand at the expense of this country as shown by the Public Accounts, and here is the proof from a certified copy of the account. On the 28th day of October when he was in the employ of this country——

Some hon. MEMBERS. What year?

Mr. McMULLEN. 1887-88, he bought a railroad ticket.

Some hon. MEMBERS. What year did you say?

Mr. McMULLEN. Hon. gentlemen should keep quiet. I know the point is a sore one and I know they do not like it, but I will give it to them. On the 28th October he bought a railroad ticket from Kingston, where he lives, to Ottawa for $4.10. On the 29th he bought another railway ticket from Ottawa to Drumbo for $10, and a sleeping car ticket from Ottawa to Toronto for $2; he bought a railway ticket on the same date from Drumbo to Dunnville for $2.25; then, on the 30th he bought a ticket from Dunnville to Cayuga, where he remained from the 28th of October until the 14th of November, and the election was on the 12th of November; on the 14th of November, he bought a return ticket from Cayuga to Kingston for $7, and the country paid the whole bill. The hon. gentleman would try to shield himself behind the statement that this was not at the last election, but I have stated distinctly that it was at the last election, and it was proved before the Public Accounts Committee. I must say that this business of Webster is a positive disgrace.

Mr. HESSON. He was not there at all.

Mr. McMULLEN. He was there, and he was there at the expense of this country, while we were paying him $2 a day and his travelling expenses, and the hon. gentleman and the Minister of Immigration dare to say that he was not there. The hon. Minister used to be known in western Canada as "Honest John," but I think we will have to change that and call him Boodling Jack, which will suit him better. There is no man in the opposite party who would do the boodling that he does, and would brazen it out and face the country as he does. There is no other man who would dare to come here and try to shield himself behind the fact that there were four elections held in Haldimand, when I have distinctly stated that I am referring to the last election as shown by the Public Accounts. I say that it is shameful for the Minister to stand up in this House and try to cram such a statement down our throats when the Public Accounts show that he secretly, intentionally and with forethought paid out the money of this country to Webster to go to Haldimand to canvass and work in the election there. We do not know how much more he carried there. When he came to Ottawa he got instructions from the hon. gentleman. There is no doubt he filled his pockets and paid him for going there and coming back. These accounts show clearly that a great deal of money is paid out to men for work in this way for which we get no value. Here is an item of $400 paid to Mr. McMillan for lectures on Canada. Then there is an item, J. H. Hubbard, disseminating information at exhibition, $243.35. Will the hon. gentleman tell me who he is?

Mr. CARLING. Mr. McMillan is now an agent of the Manitoba Government, a very respectable man, who went from Manitoba to the old country and rendered very good service there.

Mr. McMULLEN. How many lectures were delivered?

Mr. CARLING. I am not prepared to say how many lectures.

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to know where J. B. Brooks lectures, who received $250?

Mr. CARLING. He lectured in England, and he was sent from Manitoba. I cannot say the number of times he lectured. He was under direction of the High Commissioner's office, and I dare say I could ascertain the number of times he lectured.

Mr. McMULLEN. Will the hon. Minister tell me who Captain Clarke is, who received $920, and what has he been doing?

Mr. CARLING. Captain Clarke is a highly respectable gentleman from the city of Winnipeg, who went over to assist at the Indian and Colonial Exhibition, and was afterwards employed by the Government to attend the Glasgow exhibition, and rendered excellent service to the Government there.

Mr. DAVIN. I happened to be in England at the time this Mr. Brooks was lecturing, and I know he lectured in London, and I saw a notice of his lecture in one of the London papers.

Mr. McMULLEN. I see that T. Skinner has been paid $1,740 for 550 copies of the Canadian Gazette. What is that?

Mr. CARLING. The Canadian Gazette is a paper published in London, England, which advocates the cause of Canada as well as any paper in London could, and the High Commissioner thinks it necessary that a large number of copies of this paper should be sent to different prominent men in Europe, and distributed for the benefit of the Dominion.

Mr. McMULLEN. I see we pay him in addition $946.50 for advertising. I see that G. Vekeman has received $500 for distributing Flemish pamphlets. What were these?

Mr. CARLING. These were immigration pamphlets.

Mr. CASEY. I would like to ask the Minister where these Flemish pamphlets were distributed? Does the hon. gentleman know where the Flemish language is spoken and the pamphlet distributed, how much will pay for the special puffs given the High Commissioner in the Canadian Gazette, and what are the relations between the Canadian Gazette and the Government? The hon. gentleman has not shown much knowledge about the working of his department, but perhaps he does know what are the relations between it and the Canadian Gazette. I do not say that the High Commissioner does not deserve these enconiums. He is a man of great ability and intelligence, and has left his traces in the Government since he left it himself.

Mr. LARIVIÈRE. Last year we had over 300 Flemish emigrants who came to Winnipeg and settled in the Province of Manitoba, and not later than a week ago 150 more came from the same country, and settled in the Province of Manitoba.

Mr. McMULLEN. What has Professor Tanner done?

Mr. CARLING. He visited this country at the recommendation of influential people in England, and wrote an excellent pamphlet describing the advantages of the country for emigration, for the consideration of writing which we paid him the amount mentioned towards his travelling expenses.

Mr. CASEY. What are the relations between the Government and the Gazette? Is it a private enterprise or a Government enterprise?

Mr. CARLING. The paper is altogether a private enterprise. We pay this money as a subvention, the object being to advocate Canada as a field for emigration.

Mr. CASEY. We find $1,700 paid apart from the advertising, and a large amount paid for copies of the Gazette.

Mr. CARLING. We take a large number of the papers for distribution.

Mr. LARIVIÈRE. Does the Gazette publish any advertisement, such as "Rough on Rats?" We might get a few "rats" for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McMULLEN. With regard to the statement of the hon. member for Manitoba (Mr. LaRivière) that three hundred Belgians went to the North-West last year, only 255 came according to the immigration returns. Either the hon. gentleman's statement is not true, or the report is not true. Mr. John Dyke draws a large amount of money for the Newcastle show.

Mr. CARLING. Mr. Dyke attended at the request of the Government the exhibition, where he might have an opportunity of lecturing, and distributing literature among the people. Mr. Dyke has rendered excellent service to the country.

Mr. CASEY. As reference has been made to Mr. Hector Fabre, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman how many immigrants have come to Canada as the consequence of this service. We pay Mr. Fabre $3,000 for services in Paris, and $1,700 for services in London. It is well known that that gentleman was the editor of a newspaper which supported my hon. friend from East York when he was in power, and that he wished to be made a Senator.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, if you will allow me——

Mr. CASEY. No, I will not allow you.

Mr. FOSTER. I rise to a point of order. Mr. Hector Fabre is not paid out of this vote, and consequently has no connection with it. I think we had better wait till we come to the vote with which he is connected.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Auditor Genral's Report, he will find that Mr. Fabre was paid $1,900 out of this vote for a variety of things.

Mr. McMULLEN. He was paid $1,700.

Mr. RYKERT. Which is right?

Mr. CASEY. As my hon. friend has shown that Mr. Hector Fabre has been paid out of this vote, I think I am quite in order. As I said, that gentleman wished to be made a Senator when my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was in power. That is well known to everyone on this side and on the other side, except to those who have come in since. When the present Government came into power, he was made a Senator, and just afterwards they sent him on a sinecure mission to Paris, where he had $3,000 a year to draw and nothing to do. I think he sent out three immigrants. For $12,000 which he received in four years, he sent out three immigrants. Of course, a gentleman who worked so hard must be recompensed in every way possible, and, as my hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has pointed out, he has had pickings out of this vote for the London office to the extent of $1,700. By this time, I fancy the Minister of Agriculture has been posted as to the page in the Auditor General's Report which he ought to look at, and I will give him a chance to explain.

Mr. McMULLEN. I see that John Sumner of Carleton Place received $1,200 for services, and a living allowance of $1.50 a day, amounting to $549 more, or $1,749 in all. What was he doing?

Mr. CARLING. Mr. Sumner is employed on the Grand Trunk Railway to go with immigrants from Montreal to Toronto, and he has been so employed for a number of years. He has been employed since 1872.

Mr. McMULLEN. Does he pass up and down on the railway?

Mr. CARLING. He was employed from 1872, and during the time the hon. gentleman's friends were in power, to go to Toronto with the immigrants to see that they were properly cared for, and were properly handled when they got to Toronto.

Mr. McMULLEN. On the same page of the Auditor General's Report, C-156, I find the name of A. O. Kellam, Compton, Que.

Mr. CARLING. That gentleman was employed on the road between Halifax and Quebec and between Quebec and Montreal. He is not in the service now. He is dead.

Mr. McMULLEN. Was he attending by-elections?

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). There is an item which I would like the Minister to explain in reference to the duties and the results of Mr. Metcalfe's operations. He is, I believe, the local representative in the Conservative interest for Kingston. He is employed, as I understand, during the greater part of the summer, but he gets permission to leave his duties, which no doubt are very arduous, during the Session of the Local Legislature. I would like the Minister to explain to me what he has been doing and whether he has reported to him, and, if so, where I will be able to find his report?

Mr. CARLING. The hon. gentleman has stated that Mr. Metcalfe received permission to attend the Local Legislature. Mr. Metcalfe was employed from the 1st April until the 1st January. He has not been employed from the 1st January to the 1st April. He has been employed as an intelligence officer in the City of Winnipeg to assist in giving information to the large number of immigrants who go there each year. Some 20,000 or 30,000 immigrants arrive in Winnipeg, and we have an intelligence office near the station, of which Mr. Metcalfe has charge. He has done excellent work, and all parties who have been there from this part of the country can testify to the excellent work he has done.
