DEBATES

OF THE

HOUSE OF COMMONS

OF THE

DOMINION OF CANADA.

THIRD SESSION—SIXTH PARLIAMENT.

52° VICTORIÆ, 1889

VOL. XXVIII.

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM THE TWENTY-SIXTH DAY OF MARCH TO THE SECOND DAY OF MAY, INCLUSIVE, 1889.

House of Commons Debates

THIRD SESSION, SIXTH PARLIAMENT.-52 VIC.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 26th March, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 121) to amend the Summary Trials Act (from the Senate).—(Sir John Thompson.)

Bill (No. 122) respecting collection of certain tolls and dues mentioned therein (from the Senate).—(Sir John Thompson.)

THE MODUS VIVENDI.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the leader of the Government whether the report is true which we see in the newspapers, that the Government have agreed to the modus vivendi for the coming year; and, if so, whether the Orders in Council and further instructions relating thereto will be laid on the Table of the House? This is a very important question, and one in which the people take so much interest that I think the decision arrived at by the Government should be given in a formal way to this House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I can answer the hon. gentleman, "Yes." We have been in communication with the Government of Newfoundland on this matter with a view to have joint action, as I have mentioned before. On Friday or Saturday, I forget which, but I think it was Saturday last, we received a communication from the Government of Newfoundland to the effect that they decided to allow the modus vivendi to go into operation for the coming season, and this Government acted accordingly. The papers will be brought down.

BEHRING'S SEA FISHERIES.

Mr. MITCHELL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman if he has noticed the published report, or departmental order of the American Government, in relation to the Behring's Sea, and whether any correspondence has taken place in relation to that question which is likely to create so much dispute. I may state that I have heard a very great many opinions as to what the effect of that order of the American Government is, but my own impression is that the order is much more limited in extent than the general public seem to believe it is. I think it would be well if the Government should make some explanation on the subject so as to ease the public mind.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There has been no correspondence with the American Government on this subject. I can quite understand the hon. gentleman asking the question, because there is a great deal of misapprehension existing with regard to the matter. An Act was passed by Congress some years ago respecting the Behring's Sea, and it is a clause or provision of that Act of Congress that every year there shall be a proclamation issued warning the people as to the provisions of that statute. The present is only the ordinary proclamation which was issued last year, and probably the year before and for some years past. There is nothing in it to cause any alarm.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is there any new feature in it?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no new feature.

SUPPLY—THE JESUITS' ESTATES ACT.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I beg, Sir, to move in amendment:

That all after the word "That" be left out, and the following inserted in lieu thereof: Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved, that an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, setting forth: 1. That this House regards the power of disallowing the Acts of the Legislative Assemblies of the Provinces, vested in His Excellency in Council, as a prerogative essential to the national existence of the Dominion; 2. That this great power, while it should never be wantonly exercised, should be fearlessly used for the protection of the rights of a minority, for the preservation of the fundamental principles of the Constitution, and for safeguarding the general interests of the people; 3. That in the opinion of this House, the passage by the Legislature of the Province of Quebec of the Act intituled "An Act respecting the settlement of the Jesuits' Estates" is beyond the power of that Legislature. Firstly, because it endows from public funds a religious organisation, thereby violating the undoubted constitutional principle of the complete separation of Church and State and of the absolute equality of all denominations before the law. Secondly, because it recognises the usurpation of a right by a foreign authority, namely, His Holiness the Pope of Rome, to claim that his consent was necessary to empower the Provincial Legislature to dispose of a portion of the public domain, and also because the Act is made to depend upon the will, and the appropriation of the grant thereby made as subject to the control of the same authority. And, thirdly, because the endowment of the Society of Jesus, an alien, secret and politico-religious body, the expulsion of which from every Christian community wherein it has had a footing has been rendered necessary by its intolerant and mischievous intermeddling with the functions of civil government, is fraught with danger to the civil and religious liberties of the people of Canada. And this House, therefore, prays that His Excellency will be graciously pleased to disallow the said Act.

I should like to say, in the first place, that, in addressing the House upon this question, which I shall do as briefly as possible, I desire to avoid as far as may be what may be called its religious side, and to confine myself to its constitutional and political aspect. I would further say that I would not have undertaken the serious responsibility of bringing before the House a subject of so delicate a nature, attended with so many difficulties, and so likely to give rise to angry feelings, and possibly to acrimonious discussion, were it not for the very strong sense which I have of what is due to my own convictions on the subject, as well as to the convictions of those whom I represent in this House, and, I will venture to say, to the convictions of the majority of the people of Canada. Now, Sir, one word with regard to my own position in the matter. Had the resolution or any resolutions by my hon. friend the member for North Victoria (Mr. Barron) come before this House in such a shape as to meet the wishes of those who think as I do on this subject, or had they come at such a period in the Session as to have given reason for the probability of a discussion, I should not have interfered. I wish to say further, Sir, that though I was elected as a supporter of the present Administration, and a supporter of their policy so far as that policy could be known, yet, at the same time, during my election contest, and on several subsequent occasions, I said, with the full approbation of my supporters, and I think with the approbation of a great many who did not support me as well, speaking in anticipation of such an Act as that now under review, and speaking in anticipation —because, as we know, coming events cast their shadows before, and we had had on many occasions indications from various sources and in various quarters, of an attempt to do what I think is inconsistent with the rights and privileges of the people of this country—I said that in my place in Parliament I should, regardless of consequences, and regardless of whom it might make or whom it might mar, I should oppose any attempt on the part of any nationality, or any party, or any race, or any religion, to exercise powers, or claim privileges, not guaranteed by treaty, or not secured by subsequent legislation. I am, therefore, acting perfectly consistently in moving this resolution and in taking this step, and not only so, but I would be recreant to my own principles, and recreant to the pledge I gave to those who sent me here, were I to fail in doing so. This resolution which I am about to place in your hands, Mr. Speaker, is, I think, sufficiently explicit, and sufficiently comprehensive, to leave no doubts in the minds of everyone as to what it means. It declares in, I think, reasonable terms, the limit to which the power of disallowance on the part of the Dominion Government should go, and I think, in view of the history of the last twenty years, it ought to meet the approbation of the House by the declaration that without a full and fearless exercise of the prerogative vested in His Excellency the Governor General, by the British North America Act, it is impossible that this country can maintain anything like a national existence. I contend, Sir, that while it may be possibly true that an Act may even be within the four corners of the British North America Act, and although it may be within the literal interpretation of that Act, yet, that if it violates a fundamental principle of the Constitution—a supposition which is quite possible—or if it in any way interferes with the general interests of the Dominion, if it brings a principle to bear upon the public welfare which the majority of the people consider to be detrimental, even though the Act may originate within that Province, then, Sir, I say this Government has a right and ought to interfere. I say that this House has the right, as the grand inquest of the nation, to discuss any question of great, national importance, and especially a question like this which has created a degree of attention on the part of the people of this country, which certainly calls for legislative notice. In the resolution, Sir, I have endeavored, in brief terms, to point out how we consider that Act violates the Constitution, how it interferes with the rights and privileges of the people, and why it justifies interference as being an Act prejudicial to the general interests of the people. Were I not to say a single word in support of the resolution, I think it would stand before the House as a sufficient manifesto of the sentiment which I and others in this House entertain in regard to the Bill which we are now about to discuss. Now, Sir, we shall, of course, be met with the contention that the Act passed by the Legislature of Quebec is one entirely within the purview of that Assembly—one with which neither this Parliament nor the Government of the Dominion has anything to do. Before entering into a consideration of that question, it would be well briefly to review the history of the subject. We find, then, at the time of the Conquest the Society of Jesuits established and carrying on active operations in all that part of the American continent which was under the jurisdiction of His Most Christian Majesty the King of France; and far be it from me to say one word derogatory to the manner in which that society performed those great functions. We found them here in possession of estates derived from three sources—chiefly from grants direct from the Crown, from private individuals, and from purchases by funds out of their own resources; but all were held by them, and necessarily held by them, according to the constitution of the society, for the promotion of the objects they had in hand—these two, I think, mainly: the conversion of the heathen Indians, and the education of the people of New France. Far be it from me, Sir, to say anything derogatory to the manner in which the first, at any rate, of those works were carried on by the Jesuit missionaries; and I pity the man who can read without emotion of the hardships, the trials and the sufferings endured by the Jesuit missionaries in their efforts to Christianise the heathen. It is hard for us in these days of luxury and comfort to realise what hardships and sufferings those men went through—sufferings which too often met their only reward in a crown of martyrdom, and which would only be endured from the highest and noblest sense of duty. After the Conquest, the large estates which were possessed by the Jesuit Societies, as well as those possessed by other religious societies, were referred to in the Act of Capitulation; and so far as the terms of that Act go, that property was secured to them. But, Sir, when the Treaty of Paris came to be made, we find that the reservation made by the Act of Capitulation was not carried out. We find, on the contrary, that while all the rights of property of private individuals were reserved and maintained, those of the various religious communities were expressly exempted, and it was held that those properties had by operation of the law passed into the possession of the Crown. We need not pursue further the history of the estates of the other religious bodies, because we know, as a matter of fact, upon enquiry into the character and operations of these various societies—the Sulpicians and others—that their estates were handed back to them, and have remained in their undisturbed possession ever since. But with regard to the Jesuits a different view was taken; and is it surprising that a different view should be taken when we consider who and what the Jesuits of that day were? Although we can only speak in terms of admiration of the operations of those who were carrying on their work in New France; yet the society at large occupied a very different position, and, Mr. Speaker, had the heads of the society, elsewhere than in Canada, been single-minded and single-hearted, devoted men like Brébœuf and L'Allemand, the history of the last century would have been differently written; the name of Jesuit would not have become a bye-word of reproach throughout all the nations of Europe, and the great Gallican Church, once the bulwark of the French nation, renowned for its independence as well as its piety and learning, would not be dependent on the huge pretensions of ultramontane Rome. That sentiment, I dare say, will not meet with approval on the part of many members of this House. But those who have studied with care the history of Europe during the past three centuries, know that what I have stated is the truth, know that no one has ever more violently opposed the pretensions of the Jesuits than writers of the Roman Catholic Church itself; and in reference to that, I would say that one of the original grounds on which the society was subsequently suppressed was the fact of its interference with various other religious communities belonging to the Catholic Church. Well, Sir, we find that the Jesuits' Estates were not restored; and it is not surprising when we consider the position of the society. From the time of Queen Elizabeth downwards the Jesuits had been proscribed in the British realm, and why? Because it was found that they were enemies of the public peace, that they were determined by every possible means—means which I will not characterise here, because it is not essential to the argument to do so—to overthrow the Protestant succession as established in England; that they would lose no opportunity and hesitate at no means to accomplish that object. Fortunately for the liberties of Europe and the peace of the world their efforts were unsuccessful. At the same moment, if they had not been actually expelled, they were on the point of being expelled from every country in Europe, just at the time when the question of the legality of their estates came before the law officers of the Crown;—from Spain, the country where they had their origin, by the Government of His Most Catholic Majesty, the King of Spain; from Naples, under the very shadow of the Pontifical chair. In France, they were brought before the High Court of Paris, the highest tribunal in France, one might almost say in Europe, and there their transactions were a matter of judicial investigation, and the result of that investigation was, that they were suppressed and expelled from France; and, only a few years later, as everyone knows, in 1773, Pope Clement XIV, pronounced their supppression and abolition in terms which can leave no possible doubt as to his intention to do away with and abolish the society entirely. I say, considering all these things, considering the odor in which the society stood with regard to the Church of Rome itself, considering its actions with regard to the realm of England in times past, it is not surprising that the British Government felt mistrust towards the body they found established in their own country, and hesitated in giving them the means to carry on operations which they would be censurable if they had not regarded as dangerous to the state. Because, why should they suppose that a Jesuit in Canada would act from different principles or motives from what the same men did when they had access to the shores of England? But they did not confiscate the estates, and the term used in the Act is an improper one. They took the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, as to the title of these estates, and that opinion clearly established that the estates had lapsed to the Crown, and that the Crown of England had a right to do with them as it pleased. In 1865, the question of the title to these estates was referred to Sir James Marriot, Judge Advocate General, and in giving his opinion, he said:

"That the order never had in France any legal establishment as part of the civil and ecclesiastical constitution of the realm, having refused the conditions on which it was admitted, because those terms were radically subvertive of the whole order. Their title, therefore, to estates in Canada had no better qualification than those titles had by the laws and constitution of the realm of France previous to the Conquest. This society differed from other societies in that it had nowhere any corporate existence. All its property was vested in its General living at Rome, who was neither a French nor a British subject, and could not be either, and, therefore, could not avail himself of the 4th article of the Treaty, being neither an inhabitant of Canada nor a subject of the King of France."

Matters appear to have remained in statu quo until 1775, the year after the suppression of the society by the Pope, when, in the instructions to the Governor General, Sir Guy Carleton, it was ordered:

"That the society be suppressed and dissolved, and no longer continued as a body corporate or politic, and all their rights, possessions, and property shall be vested in us for such purposes as we may hereafter think fit to direct or appropriate."

Well, at the same time, all the other religious societies were permitted to retain possession of their property, and anyone will easily understand from what I have said the distinction the Government made between these various bodies. They judged the one by its historical record, and they judged, I think the people will say rightly, in assuming that it was not a society to which they could give encouragement or which they could permit to carry on operations such as the society had been carrying on previously. A similar statement was given later on by the Attorney General and the Assisstant Attorney General of Lower Canada, in which they said:

"The nature of their institution prevented them, individually, from taking anything under the capitulation of all Canada, and to their society under one head and domiciled at Rome, nothing was granted or could be legally or reasonably be supposed to be conveyed, but even that head, and with it the whole society, wheresoever dispersed, was finally dissolved and suppressed in 1773, so that the existence of the very few members of the order in this Province can in no shape be construed as forming a body, corporate or politic, capable of any of the powers inherent and enjoyed by communities. * * * As a derelict or vacant estate, His Majesty became vested in it by the clearest of titles, if the right of conquest alone was not sufficient, but even upon the footing of the proceedings in France and the judicial acts of the Sovereign Tribunals of that country, the estates in this Province would naturally fall to His Majesty and be subjected to his unlimited disposal, for, by those decisions, it was established, upon good, legal and constitutional grounds, that from the nature of the first establishment, or admission, of the society into France, being conditional, temporary and probational, they would, at all times, be liable to expulsion, and having never complied with, but rejected the terms of their admission, they were not even entitled to the name of a society; wherefore, and by reason of the abuses and destructive principles of their institution they were stripped of their property and possessions."

However, although the legal title was in His Majesty, as representing the Crown of Great Britain, according to this opinion, the Jesuits certainly had no reason to complain of harsh treatment, for they were allowed to remain in possession of their estates until 1800, when the last survivor of the Order in Canada died. It was not until after that, the Crown took possession of the property, and when they did take possession of the property, the Crown did not confiscate it for any purpose of their own, but, as far as they could, having the legal title, executed the equitable trusts attached to the title; and after much negotiation and a good deal of dispute, conveyed the title to the Province of Quebec, in trust for educational purposes. In that position the property remained until the passage of the Act we are now discussing. Now, I have rather gone out of the way in referring to the legal title of these estates, because in his correspondence Mr. Mercier expressly admits that the Jesuits have no legal title, that their claim was only a moral one; but I have referred to the legal question and to the action of the Government to show upon what very flimsy foundation even this moral claim rests. I contend there was no claim moral, legal, or equitable, on the part of the Jesuits; I contend that the property had absolutely passed into the possession of the Crown and that the Crown had the power to deal with it as they chose, an dthe disposition made of the property was one eminently consistent with the objects for which the property had been given to the society. Instead of making the property a present to Lord Amherst, as they had been pressed to do, they handed it over to the Province of Quebec for educational purposes, and thus, as far as possible, carried out the trusts which were attached to the title in this property. Having done so, the Crown parted with the interest they had in it, and the property became that of the Province, but only upon trust for educational purposes. That trust the Province accepted in 1831 by its own legislation, and I contend that having taken that trust, the Province have now no right or power to dispose of the property in the way suggested. Now, among the first of the grounds upon which we claim this Act should be disallowed is the ground that it violates a fundamental principle of the Constitution by endowing a religious society. It matters not by what means that endowment is made or how the money is to be divided, the fact remains that, even after the disposition which has been suggested as likely to take place, a portion of this money, at any rate, goes direct to the Jesuits, and forms a practical, distinct, and direct endowment of a religious society. That, I contend, violates a fundamental principle of our constitution, established in this country for years, namely, that all denominations shall be equal before the law, and that there shall be no vestige of a state church in any part of the Dominion. That principle was laid down in unmistakable terms when the Clergy Reserves of Upper Canada were secularized. Not merely did the secularization of the reserves establish that principle, but the Act by which that secularization was accomplished laid down the principle as well. That Act recites the necessity of:

"Removing all semblance of connection between Church and State."

The Rectory Act of 1850 says:

"Whereas the recognition of legal authority among all religious denominations is an admitted principle of colonial legislation, and whereas, in the state and condition of this Province, to which such a principle is peculiarly applicable, it is desirable that the same should receive the sanction of direct legislative authority, recognising and declaring the same as a fundamental principle of our civil policy."

It may be contended that was not an Act binding upon the Dominion, but it was an Act to which Upper and Lower Canada united gave their assent, and those who sat in Parliament then, the predecessors of hon. gentlemen now sitting here, representing the same constituencies, gave their assent to the principle, by their votes upon the Clergy Reserve Bill, that all religious denominations should hereafter cease to be state-supported. Is it a proposition to be tolerated, that while the right to the Clergy Reserves was thus set aside for the sake of an abstract principle, this society should be allowed to stand in a totally different position, and that they should receive compensation for estates to which they have no title, while similar rights are to be denied the other bodies to which I have alluded? Is it to be tolerated that the grants made by George III to the people of the Protestant faith in the Province are to be set aside as contrary to a principle, and yet the grants made to the Jesuits by the King of France are to be held sacred so as to allow compensation to be made to them? I do not think the people of this country will agree to that contention; but that is practically the conclusion to which we are asked to come in regard to this Bill. Another strong point in relation to this Bill is a matter peculiarly affecting the Province of Quebec. I have said that these lands were given to Canada in trust for educational purposes. That trust was accepted and recognised in 1831. The grant was accepted and confirmed by the Legislature at that time, and it was re-affirmed by the United Parliament of Canada in 1856, and again at a later period. The fund was specially set apart for superior education, and the reference which is made to that in the British North America Act clearly establishes that the Province of Ontario has an interest in that fund, and therefore that Province has something to say in regard to the disposition of it, because it is the same estate which is dealt with, and that estate has never been parted with, but has been kept as a separate trust for special purposes; and, by the British North America Act, that trust is accepted and is made a part of the Dominion. The Province of Ontario has a direct interest in that fund, and, therefore, that trust is not one which the Province of Quebec has a right to deal with in any way whatever. It is a direct breach of trust, and a breach of a contract which was entered into by themselves, and was broken without any reason being adduced, any proposition being made, or any ground being shown. On that ground it is claimed that the power of disallowance should be exercised on behalf of the minority, because this grant of $400,000 is taken directly from the funds of the Province to which all contribute alike; and to say that $60,000 is voted as a sort of compromise, or as a bribe to the Educational Board of the Protestants of the Province, does not affect it. They are bribed with their own money to agree to a grant to a religious institution, and, if it is a compromise, it is a compromise of truth and a compromise of principle. One other ground of objection, and a very strong ground of objection, arises from the terms of the Act, in which the leave of His Holiness the Pope of Rome is asked to dispose of the estate which the Province had no right to dispose of. Can they think they could better their right to dispose of that estate by asking the consent of the Pope? Can they imagine, when they have no right to dispose of it, that they can supply the defect in their title by asking the Pope of Rome to make it good? Mr. Mercier says, in his correspondence:

"Under these circumstances, I deem it my duty to ask Your Eminence if you see any serious objection to the Government's selling the property, pending a final settlement of the question of the Jesuits' Estates."

I must say that is a very remarkable sentence to be found coming from the representative of a Government in a British Legislature—

"The Government would look on the proceeds of the sale as a special deposit to be disposed of hereafter, in accordance with the agreements to be entered into between the parties interested, with the sanction of the Holy See."

And this is a sentence which shows that Mr. Mercier was so affected by the atmosphere of Rome, where he was at that time, as absolutely to have lost his head—

"As it will perhaps be necessary upon this matter to consult the Legislature of our Province, which is to be convened very shortly, I respectfully solicit an immediate reply."

It was perhaps necessary to consult the Provincial Legislature, but it was absolutely necessary to consult the Pope of Rome; and this is the answer which is made:

"The Pope allows the Government to retain the proceeds of the sale of the Jesuit Estates as a special deposit to be disposed of hereafter with the sanction of the Holy See."

It is contended, and very likely it will be contended in this House, that the grant of free religious liberty to the Roman Catholics of Quebec at the time of the Conquest carried with it the right of appeal to the Pope, that this is incidental to the right which was granted to them. I say that is untenable, and the British Government took very good care that no such ideas should enter into the minds of the people; because they took such good care to avoid that, that when the Quebec Act was passed in 1791, they made a distinct provision in regard to it. That Act is the charter of the religious as well as the civil liberties of the Roman Catholics of Quebec, and there we find the following words:—

"It is declared that His Majesty's subjects professing the religion of the Church of Rome, of and in the said Province of Quebec, may have, hold and enjoy the free exercise of the religion of the Church of Rome, subject to the King's supremacy declared and established by an Act made in the first year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, over all the dominion and countries which then did or thereafter should belong to the Imperial Crown of this Realm."

It is mere child's play to pretend, in the face of this Act under which the religious liberties of these people are granted, which would not otherwise have existed, this Act which set aside in their favor a great part of the Statute law of England, that they have any right to appeal to the Pope or to pretend that the Queen's supremacy does not exist, or that they have any privilege or any right in this country which is not controlled by the Act of Supremacy. In order still further to render it impossible that these people should entertain any idea that they were not subject to the control of England in regard to these matters, and to prevent any idea that they could appeal to the Pope of Rome in the past, or that they might take any such position at any time, I will quote the instructions given to Governor Murray in 1762, when he received the following admonition:—

"You are not to admit of any ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the See of Rome, or of any other foreign ecclesiastical jurisdiction in the Province under your jurisdiction."

And again, in 1775, Governor Carleton is reminded:

"That all appeals to or correspondence with any foreign ecclesiastical jurisdiction of what nature or kind soever, be absolutely forbidden under very severe penalties."

There can, therefore, be no doubt that the Act of Supremacy was in force, and that the rights and privileges guaranteed were controlled by the Act, and that for some years they were so controlled; because, if I am not mistaken, no appointments were made by the Pope for many years subsequent to the Conquest. Of course, as time went on, the restrictions were relaxed and many things were allowed to be done which were contrary to the Act of Supremacy, but it is quite evident that that was toleration and not a grant. It is quite evident, I think, from these facts, that it cannot be consonant with the religious liberty guaranteed by the Quebec Act, to allow an appeal to the Pope, or to recognise his jurisdiction as being of any authority in the affairs of the Provinces. I think, Mr. Speaker, it is a contention which hardly needs to be made in this House, it is a contention which need hardly more than be stated, that to pass an Act of Parliament by the Lieutenant Governor, the Assembly and the Legislative Council of a Province, and so expressed that the validity of that Act shall be dependent upon any foreign jurisdiction whatever—I say it is almost childish to contend that such an Act can be constitutional. I have heard it said that this correspondence forms no part of the Act. Well, if it is not intended to form part of the Act, what is it put there for? A clause of the Act expressly makes it a part of the Act; it would be a mere legal quibble to contend that it is no part of the Act, because without it the Act would be meaningless and would have no force at all. The agreement set forth in the correspondence is the very essence of the Act. It may be contended as a legal proposition that it is not part of the Act, but that is a proposition which will never commend itself to the common sense of the people at large. I say it is hardly worth while to argue that no Province, no Assembly, no Parliament under the British Crown, much less a Provincial Parliament, which has only a delegated power, can make an Act which is valid by the assent of any other power; because the affirmative implies also the negative, and if assent is necessary to make an Act valid, clearly inaction on the part of the referee would condemn the Act. The Act is made absolutely dependent upon the will of a foreign power. It matters not whether it is Pope or President, Kaiser or King, it does not matter who the authority is, it cannot be constitutional for the Parliament of this country to pass an Act which depends for its validity upon any foreign jurisdiction whatever. I have heard it contended that it would be a precisely analogous case were the Province of Ontario to make a grant to the Synod of the Diocese of Toronto, and that the distribution of the grant was made subject to the control of the Archbishop of Canterbury. Well, I think that such an Act would be absolutely invalid for the same reason, because the Provincial Legislature has no right to delegate its power to a foreign power, or to do anything that would diminish its own power, or the power of the Crown. But, moreover, there is no analogy between the two cases, because the Archbishop of Canterbury would still be a subject of the British Crown, whereas, in other cases, the foreign power is not so. But I do not think that the analogy is needed, because it cannot be contended that an Act is constitutional which depends for its validity upon the exercise of any foreign jurisdiction. But I will leave the constitutional question to be argued by the lawyers, if they think it worth while to spend their time in doing so; but I am very sure of this, that whatever the lawyers may say, the people of this country will be satisfied with the proposition that it is unconstitutional, and that it ought to be unconstitutional, for any Parliament in this country to pass an Act whose validity is made to depend upon the affirmation or the negation of any foreign jurisdiction, no matter what that jurisdiction may be. Now, Sir, in the resolution which I have read, we take another ground as one upon which this Act should be disallowed. We say it should be disallowed, because we contend that the endowment of the Society of Jesus, an alien, secret and politico-religious body, is fraught with danger to the civil and religious liberties of the people of Canada. Why do we say that? Because we find from the history of that society during the last 300 years, that wherever its operations have been known they have in various ways interfered with the functions of civil government, they have interfered with the independence of other religious bodies, and they have taught a system of morality which cannot be inculcated generally without destroying, not only the independence, but also the morality of the people. It may be said, perhaps it will be said, that all these are idle tales. It may be said that the principles and practices of this society are so altered, in conformity with modern usages and modern views, that the ideas which formerly prevailed, no longer have existence. But, unfortunately, there are too many modern writings, too many modern records, which contradict that view of the case, and make it impossible for us to believe that this society has so altered its principles, so departed from its previous practices, that it can now be recognised as a society which can be established and encouraged in this Dominion, or in any other country inhabited by Her Majesty's subjects. The weapons used by this society may possibly have changed. There may be the same difference between what the society was at the time of the Conquest, at the time when it was in its very worst position, at the time when the English Government were called upon to deal with it, and when the European Governments of Catholic countries, and also the Roman Catholic Church itself, were obliged to suppress it—I say, there is the same difference between the society in those days and the society as it manifests itself to-day, that there is between the muskets used by Wolfe on the Plains of Abraham and the rifles that were used by General Wolseley in Egypt; the weapons may be different, but the power behind them remains the same. If we may contrast the documents that we find in our library, if we may read the statements published within the last fifteen or twenty years, we find the same doctrines inculcated, we find there is no change such as would justify us in giving our assent to the establishment of this order in our country. Sir, a Jesuit is a being abnormal in his conditions; he has no family ties, no home nor country. He is subject absolutely to the will of his superior. I say that such a system, that such an order, being subject to an irresponsible power, must be dangerous, as it always has been dangerous, to every community in which it has existed. I admit there have been in this society men of high attainments, men of high moral worth, but that does not render the society less dangerous. It has not rendered it less dangerous in the past, that wherever that there was work to be done, whether the work was good or bad, there were always the right men to do it. It is because we know from their own writings, from their practice, from their history in times past, that such is the case, that we say that in this free country it is not desirable to allow the existence of a society which inculcates principles more or less repugnant, not only to our civilisation, but to every principle that unites communities in every condition of life. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, and for many others which might be adduced in respect to the constitutionality of the Act, we say it should be repealed; we say the Government should exercise with discretion this power of disallowance, but that it should disallow this Act; we say that the majority of the people of the Dominion desire that this should be done. I know that the vote on my resolution this evening, or to-night, or to-morrow, or whenever it may be taken, will imply a very strong contradiction to this statement; but, nevertheless, I am quite willing that the decision of this question should go from the jury of this House to the jury of the people, and I venture to say that the time has come judging not only by the passage of this Act, which is but one among a number of incidents, but by other events, when we have a right to say to hon. gentlemen in this House and to the people of this country, just as we said to our American cousins with respect to commercial affairs: "Canada is not for sale." So we say to them here, and we will say it elsewhere: "This Dominion must remain British and nothing else, and no power or authority, no jurisdiction, foreign, civil, religious or otherwise, shall be allowed to exercise power which will interfere with its affairs." Mr. Speaker, the resolution is in itself, I think, so comprehensive that it is not necessary I should further occupy the time of the House in enlarging upon it. As I said at the beginning, it is so clear and comprehensive that the country will understand what it means, and members of this House will understand what they are voting for; and such being the case, not desiring to prolong the discussion, not desiring to say one word more than is absolutely necessary to sustain the position I take in reference to this question, I beg to place this motion, Mr. Speaker, in your hands.

Mr. RYKERT. I think, Mr. Speaker, that if the predictions of the hon. gentleman are correct as regards the feelings of the country upon this question, then it is absolutely useless for me to say one word to this House. I entirely dissent from the proposition, or from the assertion of the hon. gentleman, that the great majority of the people of this country are in favor of the disallowance of this Act in question, and I unhesitatingly assert that the majority of the people of this Dominion are not in favor of its disallowance. The hon. gentleman has taken that ground; I cannot tell from what source he gets his information, except from the public press, but I venture to say that if the Province of Ontario were canvassed to-day, without prejudice, without religious bigotry, the people fully understanding the question, the vast majority of the people would dissent from the proposition of the hon. gentleman. We are told outside of this House, and inside of this House, that certain religious bodies and certain bodies in this country are in favor of disallowance. We are threatened, Sir, by the public papers and the public organs throughout this country with decapitation, and with being driven from Parliament if we dare, upon the floor of Parliament, to assert our right to declare that this Act is constitutional. I am told, Sir, and the public press repeats it day after day, that no Orangeman dare stand upon the floor of Parliament and speak in favor of allowing this Bill to go into operation. I, Sir, am an Orangeman, and I will dare so to speak. I speak as an Orangeman and I say: that I fulfil all the tenets of my order, and that I am just and right in supporting the Government in the course it has taken. I speak upon this question because we are told and threatened by papers that if we favor allowance we will be exterminated from the order. Sir, it is one of the first principles of the Orange Order that there should be civil and religious liberty for all. Allow me to quote one portion of the constitution of that order, and, when I do so, I do not think that any person will say that I am not justified in taking the stand I am taking here to-day. It says:

"Disclaiming an intolerant spirit, the Association demands as an indispensable qualification, without which the greatest and the wealthiest may seek admission in vain, that the candidate shall be deemed incapable of persecuting or injuring anyone on account of his religious speeches; the duty of every Orangeman being to aid and defend all loyal subjects of every religious persuasion in the enjoyment of their constitutional rights."

I say, Sir, that I fulfil the precepts of the order, in standing up to defend the action of the Government in refusing to disallow this Bill. I would be sorry to incur the hostility of a large portion of the people of the Province, as my hon. friend (Mr. O'Brien) says, but, Sir, I have upon another occasion had an opportunity of facing public opinion on a similar question, and I am prepared to go back to my constituents on this issue, and when I put the question fairly before them, and when they fully understand it, I have no doubt they will say I was right in supporting the Government, and that the Government was right in pursuing the course it did. I am not prepared to join this crusade, or this unholy alliance against my Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen; I am not prepared, Sir, as one professing strong Protestant views and professing the principles of the Protestant religion, to join in this crusade, and, as I said before, this unholy alliance against my Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen. Day after day we see the press endeavoring to inflame the public mind on this question; we see them day after day trying to stir up religious animosity and strife in every portion of this community, but that unfortunate spirit I am glad to say, has not yet reached the Orange Order. It has reached the public through a certain class of ministers in this country, who seem determined, at whatever cost, to drive Pope and Popery from this country. That seems to be the groundwork of the whole opposition of this class to which I refer, and I think I will be able to show, before I sit down, that that is their whole aim. I am familiar with the history of the past in this country, I am familiar with what took place prior to Confederation, when, Sir, in the old Parliament of Canada the great fight was against Lower Canadian domination. What was the cry then? It was: "We are trampled upon by our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen." Fortunately for this country, our people united at the time of Confederation, they threw aside their religious differences and joined together for the common good of their common country. Is it to be said that after twenty-one years of our existence, one section of the people of this country is to be found fighting against a large body of their Roman Catholic fellow-citizens and urging us to throw a stumbling block in the way of the progress of the Confederation. We must remember that in this country we have made great national progress by joining together and throwing aside those religious cries. We have done all that we could do to perpetuate a good feeling upon this continent, and I am happy to say, Sir, that the united action of Catholics and Protestants of Canada has led us to-day to a prosperous and progressing condition. I would like to know if we ought to accept the advice of my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) and send the firebrands throughout this country to array one religion against another. What must be the inevitable result of that? The result will be that it will drive every Protestant member of Parliament from the Province of Quebec, and I would not blame the Roman Catholics for that; I think they would be justified in doing so, if the Protestants of Ontario would adopt the same course in that Province and drive out every Roman Catholic member. But I believe that any person who takes a fair view of the question will not say that it is a right course to pursue I say, Sir, that this agitation is an attempt upon the part of a certain portion of the Protestants of Ontario, not to stand by the minority in Lower Canada, but over the heads of the Jesuits to attack the Roman Catholic faith. I am not here to-day to defend the Jesuits, nor am I here to speak of their past history, but I may be permitted, before I sit down, to quote one or two observations in connection with their past history from competent authorities, in opposition to what my hon. friend says. I did hope that upon the discussion of this question nothing of the history of the past would be imported, but that we might be allowed to consider it on its merits, as to whether the Government were right or wrong in refusing to disallow this Bill. The people of the Province of Ontario have been inflamed and fired, as I said before, by enthusiasts and fanatics upon this question. I will take the ground in opposition to them, and I think I will be able to show to the House and to the people of this country the position which those I have referred to occupy on this question. The first paper which seems to have taken up the crusade is the Mail. It was said a few days ago that the Globe had made a wonderful somersault, but I venture to assert that the Mail took a greater somersault on this question than the Globe. The Mail has occupied several different positions in the matter, and we find that in the wind-up it calls on the people of this country to "prevent the encroachment of the French into the Province of Ontario." Some time ago the Mail said, referring to the Provincial Legislature on the Jesuit question:

"They have exceeded their powers."

And it goes on to say:

"We are ready, however, to argue the question on the narrower ground and to maintain that in endowing religious propagandism out of the public taxes, the Legislature of Quebec has exceeded its powers."

Mark you, Sir, the Mail says that "the Legislature has exceeded its powers;" and what are we to do then, are we to disallow this Bill? No; you must not disallow it, but you must go to the courts to seek for a remedy. The Mail further says:

"Acts done in excess of legal powers do not call for the use of a veto; they are void, and will be declared void by the courts of law. A veto is a political, not a judicial power, and is given as a political safeguard. It is given to the national Government of Canada to guard the nation against action, on the part of any of its members, injurious to its interest as a whole, to its honor, or to its unity."

In this extract this paper takes the ground that the Act is ultra vires, that it is beyond the power of the Local Legislature, and as such it should be fought in the courts. Then the Mail takes another stand, and on the 22nd of March it says:

"A French Canadian contemporary says: 'The Mail rests its whole case against the Jesuits upon the alleged unconstitutionality of the Estates Act.' This is a mistake. The strongest objection to both Acts is that they are contrary to the public interest The prerogative of disallowance is frequently exercised on this high ground against measures that are perfectly constitutional and intra vires of the Provincial Legislatures."

Sir, if that be the case I will be prepared to show that it is not in accord with the views taken by those celebrated law journals of the Province of Ontario, which took altogether another ground, and which ground has convinced the Globe newspaper that it was wrong in pronouncing in favor of the allowance of the Act. You will see from this that the Mail commences by declaring the Act ultra vires and unconstitutional, and, in the end, that it demands the disallowance of the Bill upon the ground that it is against public policy. It is hard to tell upon what ground that paper chooses to take its stand upon this question. Day after day we have been favored with the history of the Jesuits and their rascalities and misdeeds in days gone by, of which my hon. friend speaks so feelingly; and the Mail newspaper usually winds up by calling on the Protestants of Ontario to put an end to the encroachment of Popery in this country. On the 14th of March, we find this language, which I commend to my friends from Lower Canada:

"If the British and Protestant element in Quebec will not save itself, we must try to save it for our own sakes. That the abandonment of Quebec to the Ultramontane and the Jesuit will be the death of Canadian nationality is clear enough. But Ontario will not be safe. Our eastern gate has already been opened by the perfidious hand of the vote-hunting politician, and French and Roman Catholic invasion is streaming through. The French priest, it is true, cannot formally import into Ontario his Church establishment and his system of tithes. But this matters little if he can thrust out the British population and plant in its room a population which will be under his sway, and from which he can wring practically any payments which he thinks fit. The assessor, moreover, will be his creature, and he will be able to distribute the burden of local taxation between the faithful and the heretic pretty much at his pleasure. He will, to all intents and purposes, detach eastern Ontario from the British and Protestant civilisation, of which it now forms a part, and annex it to the territory of the French race, which is also the dominion of the priest. No distortion of facts by sophistical rhetoric, no hypocritical protests against race feeling, will hide from us either the gravity or the imminence of this result."

After its long labor of the last three or four months in portraying the history and misdeeds of the Jesuits, this paper holds this question up as a sort of bugbear to frighten the people of Ontario into opposition to the Government, and finally winds up by coming out in its true colors and saying that they must prevent the encroachment of the Roman Catholic Church and the French Canadians in Ontario. Now, we find that for a long time the late organ of some hon. gentlemen opposite was very strong on this question. It discussed it from all points of view, both on its merits and on its constitutional aspects, and on several occasions it has taken a very strong stand in favor of the Bill being allowed, and in support of the contention of the present Government. But while this strain runs through all the editorials, you will find in them a strong feeling against the Dominion Government, and a desire to excite against that Government not only the Protestants of Ontario, but the Orangemen as a body. With that object in view it calls attention to the fact that on the 12th of July, which is a famous day in the history of Orangemen, the Tory Lieut. Governor of Quebec allowed the Jesuit Bill. That was done to inflame Orange feeling against this Government. It went on to say:

"These citations clearly show that the Liberals, if they were in office at Ottawa now, could not disallow the Jesuits' Estates Act without enormous inconsistency. With equal clearness these citations show that the Conservatives are not only free to disallow the Act, but are bound in consistency to disallow it if they believe it to be wrong in principle and unjust to the Protestant minority."

Then, on the 4th of March, it pointed out the danger that this country was running into, and that the result must be the breaking up of Confederation. It says:

"Again we ask, Should the Bill be allowed or disallowed? A Protestant of a practical turn of mind may well answer: 'I can't tell—it's six of one and half-a-dozen of the other.' The truth is that the people of Ontario are at the cross-roads where they must decide either to continue with or separate from a Quebec that is ever becoming more thoroughly Roman Catholic. If Ontarians wish to perpetuate the Confederation they will quietly accept Sir John's allowance of the Jesuits' Bill. If they can't stomach that allowance they may as well face the truth like honest men and acknowledge that they really do not think the Confederation worth preserving. The course of the Globe has been, and will be, perfectly straightforward. We do not mean to blame Sir John Macdonald——"

Do you believe that? I do not, for one.—

"We do not mean to blame Sir John Macdonald if he stands by his disallowance theories and vetoes the Bill. We will not in any way aid any persons who may endeavor to excite race and creed passions over the affair. If the people of Ontario hold great meetings to press for disallowance, and if they otherwise signify that they are sincerely desirous to enter upon a serious struggle with Quebec, we will advise them that the end can be nothing else than the destruction of the Confederation, and that it would be incomparably better for all concerned that the Federal compact should be quietly dissolved now than dissolved after and in consequence of a long, bitter conflict that would be, at best, a savage verbal struggle, and at worst one marked by riot, bloodshed and civil war."

These were the predictions of the late organ of the party of hon. gentlemen opposite, and, if the consequences were to be such as the Globe newspaper predicted, one would suppose that the Government of the country were justified in allowing that Bill. But, Sir, on the 16th of March, a day, I suppose, ever memorable in Room No. 6 in this House, we find that the Globe newspaper made the somersault, and I venture to assert that no public paper in this country ever made such a somersault. We have also the opinions of other papers. I will only read a few, and I do this, not with the view alone of being heard in this House, but I have to answer to my constituents, and I want to place my case before them should I ever ask them for their suffrages again. The London Advertiser of March 14, says:

"From the quotation given by Dr. Grant from Mr. Mercier's speech in moving the Quebec Legislature into Committee on the resolutions, it is clear that the purpose was not to acknowledge any authority in the Pope in the legislative affairs of the Province, but to secure finality in a dispute long pending."

The Hamilton Times of October 19, after waking up to the sudden conversion of the Globe, deals with the question from the constitutional point of view, and I commend its language to my hon. friend from Muskoka:

"By some it is claimed that the mention of the Pope's name as a party to the Bill renders it unconstitutional. We cannot decide so intricate a question as that, though it appears to us that the Pope stands in the same relation that contractor Onderdonk or any other foreigner would occupy with respect to the payment of public funds. So far as our light goes we should oppose the disallowance of the Bill, though we reserve the right to hear and consider evidence on the point that the Bill is unconstitutional. The idea that Ontario and the rest of the Dominion will have to supply the money to pay the Jesuits should not have weight in the discussion."

I may quote from another organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, the Belleville Ontario, of the 19th of March, which gives the Globe a certificate of character:

"The vacillating policy of the Toronto Globe of late years on almost every public question is without precedent in Canadian journalism. Its latest somersault on the Jesuit Bill is enough to restore the founder of this ever-powerful paper to life again. The Globe's flop over has caused a feeling among the Liberals at Ottawa little short of disgust for the men who at present are responsible for its policy, if such it can be called."

Now, Sir, I propose briefly to show—and this is a point my hon. friend has avoided—the feeling in the Province of Quebec on this important question; because, while I appreciate the effort of my hon. friend to defend the rights of the people of Ontario, I think also he might have had something to say with regard to the opinion of the minority in the Province of Quebec. We heard nothing from the hon. gentleman concerning the Bill of 1887. He steadily avoided that question, and confined his argument wholly to the Bill now under consideration. We are here to-day for the purpose of considering whether or not this Bill should be allowed or disallowed; but behind that question is another one. Should the Bill of 1887, incorporating this society, have been allowed or disallowed? The hon. gentleman said nothing about that. No one has spoken about it in Parliament or out of Parliament. It was allowed to pass, and thus we recognised, in not disallowing that measure, the right of the Province of Quebec to incorporate the Jesuits. Having done so, the question arises, is it just and right to go further, and supplement that measure by giving money to this order? What is the opinion of the people of the Province of Quebec on that subject? I can appeal to the leader of the Third party for his views. I find throughout the whole of this controversy on this question, that the newspaper controlled by my hon. friend (Mr. Mitchell), supported the Mercier Government. Although he pointed out that such an Act was inexpedient, he always took the ground that the Bill was a fair one in the interests of the country.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is good authority.

Mr. RYKERT. Very good, but I want to give a better one.

Mr. MITCHELL. Question.

Mr. RYKERT. I will give the authority of the Montreal Gazette, which I look upon as a good authority, expressing the opinion of the English-speaking people of the Province of Quebec very fairly. The Gazette has had several editorials on the question, from one of which I propose to quote a few observations, in order to satisfy, at any rate, the people of the Province of Ontario, that while they are so exercised about the rights of the minority in Quebec, the minority in that Province, which is well able to take care of itself, has taken no exception to the legislation passed:

"Excepting the Huntingdon Gleaner, we are not aware that any newspaper in this or any other Province of the Dominion interested itself in the matter. The Protestant Committee of the Council of Public Instruction silently acquiesced on securing its sixty thousand dollars. There was a slight ruffle as to how to apply the money, but that was all. The Protestant members of the Legislature did not take the trouble to divide the House upon it; the leading spirits of Mr. Mercier's Protestant following thought it a very reasonable measure, and not one word of dissent was heard from anybody, clerical or otherwise. The Bill in its various stages appeared in the telegraphic summaries of the newspapers of the Dominion, with no more emphasis than any bill to incorporate a trading company."

So that you see while this matter was being discussed in the Quebec Legislature, and while the people were made aware of what was going on from day to day, and the minority of Quebec had every opportunity of expressing their dissent and making known their opposition, if there was anything wrong in the Bill, no exception was taken by them either on constitutional grounds or on grounds of public policy. The Gazette goes on further to say that:

"They felt that the true claimant for this property was the Roman Catholic Church in general, and that church was represented by its ecclesiastical head, and not by a recently incorporated body of ecclesiastics governed by a foreign general, no matter how estimable they might be."

I commend this to the attention of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien):

"Now, in the face of these threats of extra provincial intervention, Roman Catholics, no matter what they think, must, in self-respect, close their ranks."

That is the opinion of a Protestant paper in the Province of Quebec.—

"If there be one principle clear in a Parliamentary Government, it is the right of the representatives of the people to dispose of the money of the people. It is one of these self-evident principles which, if men's minds were not heated by religious and political passion, no one would dream of disputing."

But there is another authority which I will cite, because I find that persons belonging to the same church are trying to foment discord and religious disturbance in Ontario on this question. I will cite the opinion of the Rev. Dr. Campbell, of the city of Montreal, Presbyterian clergyman, who discussed the question in all its merits. In a letter published some time ago he says:

"That is reason sufficient why we in Canada, Protestants and Roman Catholics alike, should be very slow to afford them any encouragement in our country. But we failed—we who should have vigorously protested against their establishment and endowment—to make our voices heard at the moment when our views might have influenced the situation. The Protestant representatives in the House of Assembly did not oppose the two measures as stoutly as they ought to have done, and the people failed to petition the Legislature against the Bills. Not having availed themselves of their constitutional rights while the measures were under discussion, they virtually put themselves out of court. It is not fair either to the local authorities or to those at Ottawa for us now to make an outcry. Mr. Mercier was justified in concluding, while the Bills were before the Assembly, that there was no very strong sentiment against them in the Province, or else the Legislature would have been flooded with petitions against them, as it always is when there are proposals before it directly affecting the people's pockets. Nor have we any right to feel greatly disappointed that the Federal authorities did not put themselves in an embarrassing position to shield us from the consequences of our own neglect of our interests, when they could urge a constitutional plea to rid themselves of responsibility in the matter."

That is the opinion of a gentleman whose opinion is worth having, and who addressed a letter some time ago to the Montreal Witness in which he expresses those views. But let us look at what was done in the Legislature. We find that in the Legislature, when the matter was under discussion, different members spoke upon the question. We find that Hon. Mr. Lynch, a Protestant member, spoke, and I have taken this extract from the paper to show that he who represented the interests of Protestants was fully alive to the importance of the question under discussion and expressed his opinion at the time:

"Notwithstanding what may be thought in some quarters, there is nothing in the Bill alarming in its character. We are living in an age where wisdom prevails, living in an age in which freedom is supposed to exist the world over, and nowhere in the dominions of Her Majesty does liberty prevail more than in the Province of Quebec. * * Is it possible that the intelligent public opinion of the Province of Quebec should deny those Jesuit Fathers the civil rights we have granted to every one else?"

Then we have the opinion of several gentlemen in the Upper House. Among them, Mr. Starnes, who said:

"I approve of the Bill as it is, for that question should have been settled long ago. Protestants and Catholics ought to be satisfied with the manner in which the question is now settled."

The Hon. David Ross also said:

"Some newspapers have shown me up as the friend of the Jesuits and as a bad Protestant, because I lent my assistance to the settlement of this question. I will answer it by saying that I am neither a friend nor an enemy of the Jesuits. We had to deal with a question of justice, and I gave it my support. The Protestants themselves entertain the belief that the Jesuits deserve some compensation for the estates taken away from them. Moreover, the Protestants whom I represent in the Cabinet, are well satisfied with the settlement of this question, as you have heard the hon councillor for Wellington express it, and with the indemnity which falls to their lot."

So that you will see Protestant public opinion to day in Quebec is strongly in favor of the Bill and the settlement made, and against disallowance. I am glad to see also that while the Orange body has seen fit to pass resolutions as a body in favor of disallowance, there are some Lodges in the Province which have had the courage of their convictions, which have stated the question broadly and have not seen fit to endorse the action of the Grand Lodge. I find at a meeting of L.O.L 152, Dorchester township, a strong resolution was passed condemning the Quebec Government for passing the Jesuits' Estates Bill, and expressing the opinion that a number of the Orange lodges had acted unwisely in condemning the Dominion Government for not disallowing the measure, as they firmly believed that if an injustice had been done, redress would be better secured by the various Protestant denominations taking united action in pressing the claims of the Protestant body. The resolution goes on further to express the hope that that course will be followed, so that the legal opinion may be tested. As I said a few minutes ago, an effort has been made to fire the public mind in the Province of Ontario by calling on the people to form organisations with a view of putting down the Roman Catholic religion in that Province and also throughout this country. We find that Mr. Hughes has taken a very active part in this matter. I mention him because, day after day, his name is cited as an authority on the subject, and only last night I find it reported that he addressed a meeting in the Pavilion in Toronto upon this important question. But, after reciting, as my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) has done, all the misdeeds of the Jesuits, he winds up by asking the people of this country to establish an organisation similar to one existing in Scotland, and proposes the following as the objects:—

"The objects of the Alliance are:—(a) The defence of our common Christianity; (b) the exposure of the errors of Popery and Infidelity; (c) the instruction of Roman Catholics in Bible truth; and (d) the maintenance and promotion of the great Scriptural principles of the Scottish Reformation.

"The membership of the Alliance is composed of persons of all the Protestant denominations, and various political opinions, who are thoroughly agreed that the Papacy is an enemy to national and social prosperity, and to personal freedom, and who are resolved to resist the aggressions in the Empire by every possible means."

So you will see that the sum and substance of the arguments of those people in the Province of Ontario is, first, to inflame the public mind by reciting historical reminiscences, and then to arouse a certain feeling in favor of the Protestant religion. I find, also, that the Rev. Mr. Ross says:

"The Church of Rome in the Province of Quebec is established and endowed in violation of the said principle. We hereby request the Dominion Government to take steps to secure the revision of the British North America Act, so as to lead to the disestablishment and disendowment of said church in said Province."

It is thus evident that nearly all these gentlemen run in the same direction. I am glad, however, to find that, conspicuous among many people in the Province of Ontario, are men of larger minds, men such as the Rev. Principal Grant, who has expressed himself on several occasions in regard to this matter, and has published a letter in the public press which I will do him the justice of quoting. He is as much interested in the welfare of Protestantism as anyone in the Province of Ontario, and he has seen fit to discuss this question on its merits and to publish his views in the press. He says:

"If the matter was to be settled at all, and before giving an opinion on that point, let us remember that the great majority of the people of Quebec are Roman Catholics. I do not see what else Mr. Mercier could have done than require the sanction of the Pope to the bargain. It may seem astonishing to Protestants that Roman Catholics should acknowledge a man living in Rome as the head of their church. But they do. Protestants must accept that fact in the same spirit in which all facts should be accepted."

So it is clear that he has not the same dread of the Pope exercising his clerical powers, as far as this Act is concerned, as some gentlemen have. He goes on:

"The grant of money to the Jesuits. But the money was not awarded, and has not been given to the Jesuits. It has been given to the Roman Catholic Church Doubtless the Jesuits will get some of it. Mr. Mercier, in his speech, quotes a letter, dated 11th October, 1884, from the Secretary of the Propaganda to the General of the Jesuits, promising on the part of the Pope that when the matter was settled they would get a share, the proportion to be subsequently determined."

The House will thus see that there are persons who regard this question from a different standpoint; as also, in this city of Ottawa, the Rev. Mr. Herridge, speaking on the question, stated that it was purely a question of money, and that he could see no reason why there should be any interference on the part of the Government with a Bill which was not, in his opinion, detrimental to the interests of the country or to the policy of the country. The fact is that the people are not thoroughly informed on this question, and in the papers from day to day the historical references are not correct. In fact, they are just as incorrect as some of those which my hon. friend (Mr. O'Brien) made to-day, as I shall point out later. The Ministerial Association in Toronto is composed of a number of men of all denominations, and they could not find out whether the Jesuit Order had ever been suppressed in this country or not, and, after searching for a week, they could not come to a conclusion. And yet these are the men who pretend to guide public opinion. I deny their right to do so, or I say, at all events, that, before they do so, they should first inform themselves as to the facts. Then I find that a resolution was moved by Dr. McVicar and seconded by Dr. Campbell, and what is asked by that resolution is to have a certified copy of the Bill sent to the Queen, and then they say she will disallow it. Why, they do not seem to understand the constitution of this country, when they think that an Act of the Province of Quebec can be sent to the Queen for disallowance, whereas it is only the Acts of this Parliament which are subject to disallowance by the Queen. They are in absolute ignorance of the provisions of the British North America Act. Now, I do not intend to defend the Jesuits, but I am going to quote a few authorities to show that, in this country, at all events, they are not as bad as my hon. friend (Mr. O'Brien) makes them out to be. In his speech, he said he did not propose to discuss the course of the Jesuits in this country, but only to refer to their misdeeds in the past. I will quote from one or two articles on that subject, because it is just as well to understand what Protestants think in regard to the Jesuits. As I said, I do not pretend to make any elaborate argument on the subject, or to defend the Jesuits or their acts, but I find that public men in this country, persons who have written on this question here and in England, are of one accord that the Jesuits of to-day are not the Jesuits of 100 years ago. That is where my hon. friend goes astray. He refers to their intriguing in Europe, and to their determination to upset every State in Europe, and to various acts of theirs which will not commend themselves to anyone; but he should have also referred to those authorities who took an entirely different view of the subject. In Parkman's work I find this testimony given to the Jesuits:

"The lives of these early Canadian Jesuits attest the earnestness of their faith and the intensity of their zeal; but it was a zeal bridled, curbed, and ruled by a guiding hand. Their marvellous training in equal measure kindled enthusiasm and controlled it, roused into action a mighty power, and made it as subservient as those great material forces which modern science has learned to awaken and to govern. They were drilled to a factitious humility, prone to find utterance in expressions of self-depreciation and self-scorn, which one may often judge unwisely when he condemns them as insincere. They were devoted believers, not only in the fundamental dogmas of Rome, but in those lesser matters of faith which heresy despises as idle and puerile superstitions. One great aim engrossed their lives. For the greater glory of God they would act or wait, dare, suffer or die, yet all in unquestioning subjection to the authority of the Superiors, in whom they recognised the agents of divine authority itself."

Then I find that Macaulay—and I do not suppose many in this House will question his authority—in his "History of England," spoke of these men as follows:—

"No religious community could produce a list of men so variously distinguished; none had extended its operations over so vast a space; yet in none had there been such perfect unity of feeling and action. There was no region of the globe, no walk of speculative or active life in which Jesuits were not to be found. They guided the councils of Kings. They deciphered Latin inscriptions. They observed the motions of Jupiter's satellites. They published whole libraries, controversy, casuistry, history, treatises on optics, alcaic odes, editions of the fathers, madrigals, catechisms and lampoons The liberal education of youth passed almost entirely into their hands, and was conducted by them with conspicuous ability. They appear to have discovered the precise point to which intellectual culture can be carried without the risk of intellectual emancipation. Enmity itself was compelled to own that, in the art of managing and forming the tender mind, they had no equals."

That seems to be entirely in opposition to the views which have been expressed by my hon. friend, and the various assertions as to their practices in the mother country. But we have an authority in this country which I think will also be received in this House. I refer not to the organ of the Third party, but to the Montreal Gazette, which, on the 25th June last, speaking of the Jesuits, and knowing well what they are in the Province of Quebec, says:

"There is probably no country in the world in which the Society of Jesus has enjoyed so fair a reputation and so large a share of goodwill from the people generally, without distinction of creed, as have fallen to their lot in Canada. Their piety, humanity and courage are associated with the most heroic and romantic periods in our annals. 'The story of their trials and triumphs on this continent, and especially within the limits of our own land, is one of the most interesting and instructive in the records of missionary labor.' If we except certain works and ambitions which marked some passages in their career, the members of the order in Canada have never forfeited that respect which is due to the faithful prosecution of noble aims."

So you see that we have testimony from the Province of Quebec that at least they have some friends in this country, and that they are not looked upon in the same light as they were in the mother country and on the continent. Now, Sir, one of the arguments of my hon. friend was that the Jesuits are hostile to the Roman Catholic Church. Well, I have read different sermons, that of Father Hand in Toronto and Father Whelan in Ottawa, and I find that they take the view that the Jesuits are in accord with the Church of Rome, as is evidenced by the telegram sent some time ago to Mr. Mercier. He read this telegram at Laprairie, on July 22, from Rome:

"You cannot be called a rebel against the Bishops of the Province of Quebec for having incorporated the Society of Jesus, when the Holy Father allowed its members to seek incorporation."

So you see that is evidence that they are entirely in accord with the Church of Rome, and are not in the same position as they were in 1773 when they were suppressed by the Pope. But there is another evidence which my hon. friend did not refer to. When they were restored in 1814 we find in the Pope's Bull that he does not refer to them in the same terms as my hon. friend. There we read:

"The Catholic world unanimously demands the restoration of the Society of Jesus. We daily receive the most earnest petitions to this effect from our venerable brethren the Archbishops and Bishops, and from other earnest persons."

This shows conclusively that they are in accord with the Roman Catholic Church, they are subservient to it, they are delegates of that Church in missionary works. Now, my hon. friend, in speaking of the Jesuits in England, has not told all that he might have told. It is true that by the Act of Supremacy, (1 Elizabeth) pains and penalties were placed upon them, but it might be a question whether that Act then applied to this country when it was not a portion of the British Empire. But that is set at rest by the Quebec Act of 1774. The next we hear of the Jesuits in England is the Act 10, George IV, to which my hon. friend did not refer. That Act was passed for the purpose of suppressing them gradually. I will presently show how they have been suppressed in England, and whether they are considered in England to be as obnoxious as my hon. friend represents. That Act is entitled an Act for the relief of His Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects, and was passed on the 13th of April, 1829 The statute says:

"Whereas by various Acts of Parliament certain restraints and disabilities are imposed on the Roman Catholic subjects of His Majesty, to which other subjects of His Majesty are not liable; and whereas it is expedient that such restraints and disabilities shall be from henceforth discontinued;

"And whereas Jesuits and members of other religious orders, communities, or societies of the Church of Rome, bound by monastic or religious vows, are resident within the United Kingdom, and it is expedient to make provision for the gradual suppression and final prohibition of the same therein; be it therefore enacted."

Now, mark you, Mr. Speaker, at that very time, long after the passage of the Quebec Act, we find an English Parliament declaring that it was wise to pass an Act for their gradual suppression. It goes on to say:

"That every Jesuit and every member of any other religious order, community, or society of the Church of Rome, bound by monastic or religious vows, who, at the time of the commencement of this Act, shall be within the United Kingdom, shall within six calendar months after the commencement of this Act, deliver to the Clerk of the Peace of the county or place where such person shall reside, or to his deputy, a notice or statement in the form, and containing the particulars required to be set forth in the schedule to this Act annexed;

"And be it further enacted: That if any Jesuit or member of any such religious order, community, or society as aforesaid, shall, after the commencement of this Act, come into this realm, he shall be deemed and taken to be guilty of misdemeanor, and, being there lawfully convicted, shall be sentenced and ordered to be banished from the United Kingdom for the term of his natural life.

"Provided always, and be it further enacted: That in case any natural-born subject of this realm, being at the time of the commencement of this Act, a Jesuit, or other member of such religious order, community, or society as aforesaid, shall, after the commencement of this Act, be out of the realm, it shall be lawful for such person to return or come into this realm; and upon such his return or coming into the realm he is hereby required, within the space of six calendar months after his first returning or coming into the United Kingdom, to deliver such notice or statement to the Clerk of the Peace of the county or place where he shall reside;

"Provided also, and be it further enacted: That, notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained, it shall be lawful for any one of His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, being a Protestant, by a license in writing, signed by him, to grant permission to any Jesuit, or member of any such religious order, community, or society, as aforesaid, to come into the United Kingdom and to remain therein for such period as the said Secretary of State shall think proper, not exceeding in any case the space of six calendar months."

Now, Sir, that Act was passed to show that there was a desire on the part of the English Government to suppress the Jesuits. At this very time there were hundreds of Jesuits in England, and surely the English Parliament is as desirous of protecting the great Protestant religion, surely the Archbishop of Canterbury and the other Bishops of the Church of England are as desirous as my hon. friend, to protect the Protestant religion; and if the Jesuits are as obnoxious as they were a hundred years ago, if their precepts and doctrines are as antagonistic to the best interests of the country as my hon. friend pretends, surely the English Government would say: We will put an end to them, and drive them out of the country. Now, Sir, what do we find? We find that a notorious gentleman who has figured in English parliamentary life, Mr. Whalley, in 1875, in the English House of Commons, brought up the question of suppression of the Jesuits. After they had been barely fifty years in the mother country, after a penal clause had been passed making it a crime for them to remain in the country more than six months, this gentleman declared, on the floor of Parliament, that the Jesuits had increased in number from 447 to 1,967. He called upon the English Parliament to drive them out of the country. And what did members say? They counted out the House, they laughed at him, and they left him there making a speech upon this question. Then, in order not to be outwitted, he placed a notice in the paper asking Mr. Disraeli, at that time at the head of the Government, what he intended to do? Mr. Disraeli said:

"There is no doubt that there are in this country members of the Society of Jesus, commonly called Jesuits, and there is also no doubt that their presence in this country is, under 10 Geo. IV., known as the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act, a misdemeanor. During, however the period which has elapsed since the passing of that Act, now nearly half a century, the Government of this country has, I believe, in no instance—none, at least, known to myself—proceeded against any Jesuit for committing a misdemeanor under its provisions, and, so far as Her Majesty's present advisers are influenced by the circumstances with which they are acquainted, the same policy will continue to prevail. At the same time, I beg it to be understood that the provisions of the Act are not looked upon by Her Majesty's Government as being obsolete, but, on the contrary, are reserved provisions of law which they are prepared to avail themselves of if necessary."

Now, that does not look like the English people being opposed to the Jesuits; it does not look as if they were undermining the State and the Protestant religion in England; on the contrary, they are performing a good work, and they are not the mischievous people that my hon. friend says they are now. But Mr. Whalley was not going to be outgeneralled again. He moved again on July 13, 1875, a motion for a committee, as follows:—

"To enquire into and report to this House as to the residence in this country, in contravention of the Act 10 Geo IV, of any persons being members of the Order of Jesus, commonly called Jesuits, and as to the names, present residence, and ostensible occupation of such persons; also, as to the amount and nature of any property vested in, or at the disposal of such persons for the purpose of promoting the objects of such society or order, and, so far as may be practicable, to enquire into and report as to the doctrine, discipline, canons, laws or usages under which such order is constituted, and by which it is directed and controlled"

What was the result of that motion? It was that he could not get a seconder for it. After making a speech and showing that the number of priests had increased from 447 in 1829 to 1,967 in 1875—these are exactly the figures he used at that time—notwithstanding the violent speech he made on that occasion, the people of England said: We have no fear of the Jesuits. To-day I venture to assert that if anyone will consult history, will look at the Order in England, will visit their colleges at Stoneyhurst and other places, they will find evidence of the fact that the greatest men to-day have been educated there, including Protestants, and men who are as strong in their Protestant faith as is the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). That is all I intend to say with respect to the Jesuits of England. I do not justify the acts of the Jesuits, but I do say that the men to-day are not the men of 100 years ago, that they do not possess the same feelings and intentions in regard to destruction of British power as they did in those days. To-day you will find those men are desirous of pursuing their holy work without the interference of politicians. The hon. gentleman has referred to the history of Canada. He has not, however, placed altogether a proper construction on the Act of 1774, 14 George III, c. 83. The hon. gentleman read section 5, but he might also have read section 8. Section 5, as stated by the hon. gentleman, goes on to say:

"Sec. 5 And for the more perfect security and ease of the minds of the inhabitants of the said Province, it is hereby declared that His Majesty's subjects, professing the religion of the Church of Rome, of and in the said Province of Quebec, may have, hold and enjoy the full exercise of the religion of the Church of Rome, subject to the King's supremacy declared and established by an Act made in the 1st year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, over all the dominions and countries which then did, or thereafter should belong to the Imperial Crown of the realm; and that the clergy of the said church may hold, receive and enjoy the accustomed dues and rights, with respect to such persons only as shall profess the said religion."

Even taking that language as it stands, it appears that the Roman Catholics have a right to carry on their church affairs in the same manner as they had hitherto done, so long as they did nothing contrary to the laws of England. But section 8 goes on to say:

"Sec. 8 That His Majesty's Canadian subjects, within the Province of Quebec, the religious orders and communities only excepted, may also hold and enjoy their property and possessions, together with all customs and usages relative thereto, and all other civil rights, in as large, ample and beneficial manner as if the said proclamation had not been made and as may consist with their allegiance to His Majesty."

So while the Imperial Government would not recognise the supremacy of the Pope in England, yet at the same time they gave the Roman Catholics power to carry on the affairs of the church so long as they did not conflict with the laws of England. The hon. gentleman has referred to the petition of Lord Amherst. I am glad he has referred to that petition, because I think if the hon. gentleman had read the whole history of the question, and read the opinions of the law officers of the Crown, he would have come to the conclusion that the Government were right in passing the law giving an annuity instead of land, because the officers of the Crown were not quite certain in regard to the title. It is true that Lord Amherst in 1770, after having performed signal services for England, petitioned the King to have the Jesuits' Estates transferred to him. The petition was referred to the Committee of the Lords of the Privy Council; they reported in favor of it, and it was referred to Lords Gray and Williams, who reported on May 18, 1790. If anyone will take the trouble to follow their report, he will see that, in their opinion, the subject was surrounded with grave doubts. It discussed the whole question in regard to the tenure of the Jesuits, it discussed the whole question as to where the land came from, and under what power the Jesuits held it; and we have the fact that at the close of their labors the commissioners appointed to investigate the title stood 6 to 2 on the question. But they recommended the Government to take possession of the land. The Government did so. In 1800 they took possession of the land in this country, they placed the sheriff in possession of it, but they would not give it to Lord Amherst's heirs, and they passed an Act in 1803 giving an annuity of £3,000 sterling a year instead of the lands asked for, which the law officers of the Crown recommended should be granted. If hon. members will look at the recital of the Act, they will observe that the words are very significant, and those words are such as to justify me in stating that the law officers of the Crown were not distinctly in favor of the validity of the Crown's title, but had grave doubts in regard to it. The recital goes on to say that:

"In consequence of difficulties arising from local circumstances His Majesty's intentions were not carried into effect."

So hon. gentlemen will see that while these lands were requested to be granted to Lord Amherst, yet when the subject was discussed by the law officers of the Crown such grave doubts surrounded the question that the Government would not grant the lands but granted a money allowance. The next we hear of the Jesuits was on the 17th September, 1791, when they were suppressed in Canada under Royal instructions. Those instructions we find in the Chisholm Papers, page 252. In 1791 we find these instructions:

"It is our will and pleasure—that the Society of Jesuits be suppressed and dissolved, and no longer continued as a body corporate or politic, and all their possessions and property shall be vested in us for such purposes as we may hereafter think fit to direct and appoint; but we think fit to declare our Royal intention to be that the present members of the said society as established at Quebec shall be allowed sufficient stipends and provisions during their natural lives."

But we have the very significant fact that after that proclamation was issued in 1791, they remained in possession of the estates ten or eleven years, during which they had control over them. We find in the report of the Attorney General and Solicitor-General of England they referred to the fact that Lord Haldimand allowed the Jesuits to remain in possession of the lands for that period. I am not surprised that Mr. Mercier said they had a moral claim, because they appear to have a moral, if not a legal, claim to the estates. Lord Goderich, in a despatch in 1831, sent to the Legislature in that year this question for their disposition. He says:

"The only practical question which remains for consideration is, whether the appropriation of these funds for the purpose of education should be directed by His Majesty or by the Provincial Legislature?

"The King cheerfully, and without reserve, confides that duty to the Legislature, in the full persuasion that they will make such a selection amongst the different plans for this purpose which may be presented to their notice, as may most effectually advance the interests of religion and sound learning amongst his subjects; and I cannot doubt that the Assembly will see the justice of continuing to maintain under the new distribution of these funds those scholastic establishments to which they are now applied."

We find following that, the Act 2nd William IV, cap 41, goes on to say:

"An Act to make provision for the appropriation of certains moneys arising out of the Estates of the late Order of Jesuits, and for other purposes."

"Reciting that His Majesty had been graciously pleased to confide without reserve to the Provincial Legislature the apportioning of the funds arising from the Estates of the late Order of Jesuits to the purposes of education exclusively. Enacted that all moneys arising out of the Estates of the late Order of Jesuits shall be placed in a separate chest in the vault wherein the public moneys of the Province are kept, and shall be applied to the purpose of education exclusively, in the manner provided by this Act, or by any Act or Acts which may hereafter be passed by the Provincial Legislature in that behalf, and not otherwise."

If my hon. friend will only consult this Act he will find that it was given exclusively to the Province of Quebec for educational purposes. Subsequent to this we find, and that my hon. friend has also admitted, that the incorporation of St. Mary's College was passed in 1852 by the old Parliament of Canada and that the Jesuit College which this Act incorporated still remains in existence, and is still doing its good work throughout the country, and no fault has been found with it. In 1856 we find that the Act 14-15 Victoria, chapter 54, says:

"1. The estates and property of the late Order of Jesuits whether in possession or reversive, including all sums funded or invested, is to be funded and invested as forming part thereof and the principal of all moneys which have arisen or shall arise from the sale or commutation of any part of said estate or property, are hereby appropriated to the purpose of this Act, and shall form a fund to be called 'The Lower Canada Superior Education Investment Fund' and shall be under the control and management of the Governor in Council for the purposes of this Act."

"Apportionment of fund among universities, colleges, seminaries, academies, high and superior schools, and as the Governor in Council shall approve."

So that my hon. friend will see that it would be utterly impossible to claim a portion for the Province of Ontario, because this Parliament has declared that the fund should be known as the "Lower Canada Superior Education Investment Fund." Section 5 of that Act says that the apportionment of the fund shall be amongst "universities, colleges, seminaries, academies, high and superior schools, and as the Governor in Council shall approve." But my hon. friend says they have no power to vote the money for ecclesiastical institutions. In this he would appear to be at variance with the Law Times and Law Journal. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have dealt thus far with the history of the question of the Jesuits, and pointed out to this House the different Acts bearing on the question in England and also in Canada. I wish now to turn my attention to another branch of the subject, and to see in what position we stand when we ask the Government to disallow this Bill. I hold that we have established a constitutional practice in this country, and that the records of Parliament are full of this practice. We have Mr. Todd and other eminent authorities writing on this subject, and I shall briefly allude to them in order that the people of the country may know, as we know in this House, that we have rules and constitutional government by which this Act must be construed, and by which this House must decide whether or not the Government was right or wrong in the course it pursued. At page 358, Todd says:

"The redress of grievances arising out of the operation of provincial laws, can only be constitutionally afforded by the Provincial Legislature by which such laws have been enacted: except in cases wherein the Acts complained of have been unlawfully passed, or are open to objection upon grounds that would justify the interference of the Governor General in Council, or the Dominion Parliament, with the law."

And at page 359 he continues:

"But in all such cases (appeals by petition to the Queen &c) the principle is affirmed that no interposition to the detriment, in any degree, of the established principle of self-government, in matters of local concern, would be permitted or approved, whether on the part of the Imperial or Dominion Government, in their several and appropriate spheres of action, or matters within the acknowledged competency of either tribunal."

You will see that Todd lays down the very sound principle that all matters of provincial concerns come within the jurisdiction of the Legislature and shall not be controlled by this Parliament. Again at page 343 Todd says:

"The British North America Act recognises and guarantees to every Province in the Confederation the right of local self-government, in all cases within the competency of the provincial authorities, and it does not contemplate or justify any interference with the exclusive powers which it entrusts to the Legislatures of the several Provinces; except in regard to Acts which transcend the lawful bounds of provincial jurisdiction or which assert a principle, or prefer a claim that might injuriously affect the interests of any other portions of the Dominion, as in the case of Acts which diminish rights of minorities in the particular Province in relation to education, that has been conferred by law in any Province prior to Confederation."

Now, I think the member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) has failed to point out that this Act asserts a principle in violation of the interest of the Dominion, or which affects the rights of the minority within the particular Provinces, because if we understand aright the minority of the Province of Quebec, who thoroughly understand their position and who thoroughly understand what the law was, are themselves prepared to accept at the hands of the Local Government the sum of $60,000 as full and just compensation to them for the amounts they were entitled to for their superior education fund, and that while we are so anxious to protect the minority in the Province of Quebec that minority, knowing more than we do, are perfectly satisfied. Todd again says:

"It was manifest that it was the intention of the Imperial Parliament to guard from invasion all rights and powers exclusively conferred upon the provincial authorities, and to provide that the reserved right of interference therewith by the Dominion Executive or Parliament should not be exercised in the interest of any political party or so as to impair the principle of local self-government."

And at page 363 in his work, he continues:

"It has been sometimes worked in repeal of Acts which contained provisions that were deemed to be contrary to sound principle of legislation, and, therefore, likely to prove injurious to the interests or welfare of the Dominion."

You will, therefore, find we have high constitutional authorities on this subject, and authorities which satisfy me that the Government were perfectly right in acting as it has done. We have also the opinions of eminent judges in this country, and my hon. friend has pointed out to judicial authorities in England, in support of his argument. I think that we should quote some of our own eminent authorities, in order to guide the House to a just conclusion on this matter. In the case of Severn against the Queen, Supreme Court Reports, volume 2, page 96, Chief Justice Richards says:

"Under our system of Government, the disallowing of statutes passed by a Local Legislature after due deliberation, asserting a right to exercise powers which they claim to possess under the British North America Act will always be considered a harsh exercise of power unless in cases of great and manifest necessity, or where the Act is so clearly beyond the power of the Legislature that the propriety of interfering could be at once recognised."

And Justice Taschereau said:

"There is no doubt of the prerogative right of the Crown to veto any Provincial Act, and that could even be applied to a law over which the Provincial Legislature had complete jurisdiction. But it is precisely on account of its extraordinary and exceptional character that the exercise of this prorogative will always be a delicate matter. It will be always very difficult for the Federal Government to substitute its opinion instead of the Legislative Assembly, in regard to matters within those Provinces, without exposing themselves to be reproached with checking the independence of Parliament in the Provinces. What would be the result if the Province chose to re-enact a law which had been disallowed? The cure might be worse than the disease and fully as grave complications might follow.

"It cannot, therefore, be argued that, because this right exists, we must adopt an interpretation which could lead to the necessity by having recourse by it."

Now, Mr. Speaker, that points out the fact that while this Government has the power to disallow Acts which are strictly within the power of the Local Legislature, yet that very judge declares that it is inexpedient and impolitic in this Government to set its opinion against that of the Local Legislature, because if it did so the Legislature would turn around and re-enact the Bill, and the result would be a conflict between the Provincial Government and the General Government, which all must deplore. We have also certain principles laid down by the right hon. leader of the Government, whom I look upon as a very high constitutional authority, and I think both this House and the country recognise him as such. At any rate, we know that the rules laid down by him in the year 1868 for the guidance of the Government on such questions, have been approved of by Mr. Mowat, the Premier of Ontario, a high legal authority, by the learned gentleman who sits opposite, the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), by the hon member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), and by other hon. gentlemen in this House. Those rules were as follows:—

"In deciding whether any Act of a Provincial Legislature should be disallowed, or sanctioned, the Government must not only consider whether it affects the interest of the whole Dominion or not, but also whether it be unconstitutional; whether it exceeds the jurisdiction conferred on the Local Legislature, and, in cases where the jurisdiction is concurrent, whether is clashes with the legislation of the General Parliament."

"As it is of importance that the course of local legislation should be interfered with as little as possible, and the power of disallowance exercised with as great caution, and only in cases where the law of general interests of the Dominon imperatively demand it, the undersigned recommends that the following course be pursued:—

"That on the receipt by Your Excellency of the Acts passed in any Province, they be referred to the Minister of Justice for report, and that he with all convenient speed, do report as to those Acts which he considers free from objection of any kind, and if such report be approved by Your Excellency in Council, that such approval be forthwith communicated to the Provincial Government.

"That he make a separate report, or separate reports, on those Acts which he may consider—

"1. As being altogether illegal or unconstitutional.

"2. As illegal or unconstitutional in part.

"3. In cases of concurrent jurisdiction as clashing with the legislation of the General Parliament

"4 As affecting the interests of the Dominion generally. And that in such report or reports he gives his reasons for his opinions."

These rules have been endorsed by all legal gentlemen in this House, and I think no person can deny that they embody the true and correct principle. We also find, by the Sessional Papers of 1877, page 102, that the hon. member for West Durham recommended that the question as to ultra vires, with reference to the Escheats Bill, should be referred to the Supreme Court. Again, in 1876, the hon. gentleman, in regard to an Act respecting the Legislative Assembly, said:

"It appears to the undersigned that several of the provisions are open to very serious questions as being ultra vires of a Local Legislature, but almost all of them are contained in an Act of the Legislature of Quebec, upon the same subject which was left in its operation. There are indeed some new provisions, but it could not be advisable upon the principle upon which the Quebec Act was allowed to advise the disallowance of the Act by reason of the insertion of these provisions, and the undersigned feels bound to recommend, that following the precedent referred to, the Act should be left in its operation; it being quite possible for those who may object to its constitutionality to raise their objections in the courts."

There we have two of the highest legal authorities in this country, as high almost as can be found in any country, the hon. First Minister and the hon. member for West Durham, laying down the principle that upon the question of the constitutionality of an Act the decision of the courts ought to be invoked. We find the Mail of 5th February endorsing that view in the following words:—

"There is nothing in the British North America Act to limit the exercise of the veto power. That it shall not be exercised merely on grounds of ordinary policy, unless the Provincial Legislature has exceeded its jurisdiction, is a good general rule, which once more we commend the Government for observing The authority given to the Provincial Legislature in certain classes of subjects, carries with it, like all authority, a liberty of error which must be respected, so long as the legal power is not exceeded and the error is not manifestly subversive legally or morally of the principle of the constitution or of the great objects of the State."

I have pointed out that the Mail in a former article contended that this Act was ultra vires, and, therefore, the courts should be invoked to decide upon its constitutionality; and we have affirmed that principle in this House over and over again. It was affirmed in regard to the Streams Bill, the consensus of opinion being that in regard to legislation which was claimed to be unconstitutional, the proper course for the Government to adopt was to let the measure go into operation, and leave those affected by it to contest its constitutionality before the courts. I commend to this House the opinion expressed by the hon. member for West Durham upon that question, and I think hon. gentlemen opposite will hardly dissent from it. It is a proposition which, I think, was well conceived, and which, though perhaps not accepted by the House at the time, was in entire accord with the views laid down in 1868 by the right hon leader of the Government. The hon. member for West Durham said :

"Can any member of this House, who is a real, live lover of the Federal system, find any possible objection to this proposition ? Where the law and the general interests of the Dominion imperatively demand it, then and then only shall the power of disallowance be exercised ; but it would impair the Federal principle and injuriously affect the autonomy of the institutions of our several Provinces were this power to be exercised on subjects which are within the exclusive control of the Local Legislatures on the ground that in the opinion of His Excellency's advisers, or of the Canadian Parliament, any such legislation is wrong. * * I admit that, under the constitution of Canada and the Provinces, the Local Legislatures have the power to deprive the subject of his property under these conditions, but I say that if we import into the Constitution of the Confederation a restriction upon that power and declare it, as a majority in this House propose this night to declare, we will declare it to be the right and duty of the Government, whenever the power is to be exercised, to nullify its exercise by disallowing such Acts."

On that occasion the Government declared that the Act should be disallowed, on the ground that it interfered with private rights; but the general principle laid down was that in all matters of unconstitutionality, the courts should be invoked and nobody else. We have also a case almost in point in this country, the case of the New Brunswick School Law. When that case arose, members of Parliament who were versed in constitutional law expressed opinions which would be entirely in accord with the action taken by the Government of the day. That school law was one to compel the Roman Catholics of New Brunswick to contribute to a system of education which they could not conscientiously avail themselves of. It was a law which affected a large class of the community, and which that class contended interfered with its rights. That Bill was allowed to go into operation, and was not interfered with by the Dominion Government for reasons given by the First Minister, who says :

"The Provincial Legislature has exclusive powers to make laws in relation to education. It may be that the Act in question may act unfavorably on the Catholics or other religious denominations, and if so it is for such religious bodies to appeal to the Provincial Legislature which has the sole power to grant redress.

"The assumption by the Provincial Legislature and Government of Canada of the right to seek the imposition of further limitations of the powers of the Provincial Parliaments is subversive of the Federal character of the Union, tending to the destruction of the powers and independence of the provincial law to the centralisation of all power in the Parliament of Canada.

"The people of New Brunswick cannot, and will not, surrender their rights of self-government within the limits of the constitution."

He went on further to say :

"In the case of measures not coming within either of these categories the Government would be unwarranted in interfering with local legislation.

"In the present case there was not a doubt that the New Brunswick Legislature had acted within its jurisdiction, and that the Act was constitutionally legal and could not be impugned on that ground.

"On the second ground which he had mentioned in which he considered the Dominion Government could interfere, it could not be held that the Act in any way prejudicially affected the whole Dominion, because it was a law settling the Common School system of the Province of New Brunswick alone.

"The Government of the Dominion could not act and they would have been guilty of a violent breach of the constitution if, because they hold a different opinion, they should set up their judgments against the solemn decision of a Province in a manner entirely within the control of that Province."

There is the decision of the First Minister, entirely in accord with that of Mr. Justice Taschereau. Judge Taschereau adopts almost the very language of the First Minister in the case I have referred to, the Queen vs. Severn. It seems to me that, that case is on all fours with the case before the House. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Costigan) moved the following resolution in this House in 1872:—

"That the Local Legislature of New Brunswick in its last Session, in 1871, adopted a law respecting Common Schools forbidding of any religious education to pupils, and that that prohibition is opposed to the sentiments of the entire population of the Dominion in general and to the religious convictions of the Roman Catholic population in particular ;—That the Roman Catholics of New Brunswick cannot, without acting unconscientiously, send their children to schools established under the law in question and are yet compelled like the remainder of the population, to pay taxes to be devoted to the maintenance of those schools ;—That the said law is unjust, and causes much uneasiness among the Roman Catholic population in general disseminated throughout the whole Dominion of Canada, and that such a state of affairs may prove the cause of disastrous results to all the Confederated Provinces ;—and praying His Excellency in consequence at the earliest possible period to disallow the said New Brunswick School Law ;

In that debate the whole question was thoroughly discussed The Globe thus commented on it:

"The question so far was exclusively a local one, and it would have been well if it could have been fought out and settled in New Brunswick, as it was in past years in Ontario and Quebec. But the Catholic minority determined to make an appeal to the Dominion Parliament, on the ground that by the Confederation Act they were secured in the rights which they allege have now been taken away."

The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) moved in amendment to that resolution of Mr. Costigan, declaring that it was expedient that the opinion of the law officers of the Crown should be taken :

"That this House regrets that the School Act recently passed in New Brunswick is unsatisfactory to a portion of the inhabitants of that Province, and hopes that it may be so modified during the next Session of the Legislature of New Brunswick, as to remove any just grounds of discontent that now exist; and this House deems it expedient that the opinion of the law officers of the Crown in England, and, if possible, the opinion of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, should be obtained as to the right of the New Brunswick Legislature to make such changes in the School Law, as deprived the Roman Catholics of the privileges they enjoyed at the time of the Union in respect of religious education in the Common Schools with the view of ascertaining whether the case comes within the terms of the 4th sub-section of the 93rd clause of the British North America Act, 1867, which authorises the Parliament of Canada to enact remedial laws for the due execution of the provisions respecting education in the said Act."

You see, therefore, the opinion of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) was that it was not expedient for the House to pass censure upon the Government and disallow that Bill, but on the contrary left the decision with the officers of the Crown. On 29th November, 1872, the law officers of the Crown reported as follows :—

"That we agree substantially with the opinion of the Minister of Justice of the Dominion, so far as appears from the papers before us."

Sir J. D. Coleridge and Sir G. Jessell said of it :

"Of course, it is quite possible that the new Statute of the Province may work in practice unfavorably to this or that denomination therein, and therefore to the Roman Catholics ; but we did not think that such a state of things is enough to bring into operation the restricting powers of appeal to the Governor in Council "

It seems to me that this New Brunswick case is much stronger than the one now before us. We had a minority in the Province of New Brunswick of Roman Catholics, who contended that the law passed was a great injustice to them. The First Minister said he recognised the injustice. The law officers of the Crown said the same thing when their opinion was taken in 1875, but they all agreed that the matter was of purely local concern. I would like to ask the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) if the views of the Catholic minority in the Province of New Brunswick should not be respected as well as those of the Protestant minority in Quebec, which is entirely satisfied with the action of the Government. In New Brunswick the Catholics felt that their rights were unjustly dealt with, the Government law officers of the Crown were of the same opinion, and the Government here were of the same opinion, but in spite of all that, they all agreed that it was a matter of purely local concern, with which we had nothing to do.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. RYKERT. When the House rose at six o'clock, I was endeavoring to show that in the question of the New Brunswick School Law, the Catholic minority in that Province, had made complaint, in reference to the legislation of that Province, that their rights had been seriously infringed upon. I endeavored to show that the Minister of Justice of that day, the right hon. the Premier of this country, had expressed his opinion upon that law, and had stated distinctly that while he sympathised with the Roman Catholics in that Province, yet that the action of the New Brunswick Legislature was entirely within its jurisdiction. I quoted also the authority of several gentlemen, among them the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake). I showed that he moved in amendment to have the matter referred to the law officers of the Crown and also expressed his opinion of the Act. I find that opinion reported in the Globe of May 19th, 1872:

"Mr. BLAKE said he had from time to time considered the constitution with reference to the state of the law in New Brunswick on the subject of schools, and he was free to confess that his opinion had fluctuated, and any expression he might now give was given with great doubt and hesitation. He was free to admit that there was much to support the view that had been put forward in the report of the Minister of Justice on the subject, and that the conclusion of that gentleman might have been fairly reached and might very possibly be correct; but he desired to point out to the House those circumstances with reference to the Act which led his mind very strongly—he would not say conclusively—to a different conclusion."

He moved in amendment that the question be referred to the law officers of the Crown, and they expressed their opinion that the legislation of New Brunswick was entirely within the jurisdiction of that Legislature. Then we have Mr. McDougall, who poses sometimes as a constitutional lawyer, who, upon that occasion, gave expression to his opinion as follows:—

"I agree that any interference with the powers that are given to the Local Legislature in the framing of laws unnecessarily through political or national, religious or other motive, except on the broadest public grounds, would be injudicious and improper."

In 1875, the question of the New Brunswick school law was again brought to the notice of this House. A resolution was moved by Mr. Cauchon, seconded by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), in which they recited the resolution of the previous year, and asked the intervention of the opinion of the law officers of the Crown. The resolution was as follows:—

"The House regrets that the School Act passed in New Brunswick is unsatisfactory to a portion of the inhabitants of that Province, and hopes that it may be so modified during the next session of the Legislature of New Brunswick as to remove any just grounds of dissatisfaction that now exist. That the House regrets that the hope expressed in the said resolution has not been realised and that an humble address be presented to Her Majesty embodying the resolution and praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to use her influence with the Legislature of New Brunswick to procure such a modification of the said Act as shall remove such grounds of discontent."

That matter was referred to the law officers of the Crown, and upon the 18th October, 1875, there was a despatch from Lord Carnarvon, in which he stated:

"That he laid it at the foot of the Throne, but that he could not advise Her Majesty to take any action in respect of it; that he could not advise the Queen to advise the Legislature of New Brunswick to legislate in any particular direction as that would be undue interference"

Further on he says:

"Holding, as I have already explained, that the constitution of Canada does not contemplate any interference with the provincial legislation, on a subject within the competence of the Local Legislature by the Dominion Parliament, or as a consequence by the Dominion Ministers."

So even the law officers of the Crown were of the opinion that, though sympathising with the minority in New Brunswick, they could not advise interference with that law or advise the Crown to disallow the Bill. On that occasion, the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), who sympathised very strongly with the minority in the Province of New Brunswick and felt that they had been unfairly dealt with, said:

"But there is a higher principle still which we have to adhere to, and that is to preserve in their integrity the principles of the constitution under which we live. If any personal act of mine, if anything I could do would assist to relieve those who believe they are living under a grievance in the Province of New Brunswick, that act would be gladly undertaken and zealously performed; but I have no right, and the House has no right to interfere with the legislation of a Province when that legislation is secured by an Imperial compact to which all the parties submitted in the Act of Confederation. * * * I have merely to say this, whatever may be our religious proclivities or feelings, whatever may be the feelings that actuate us in relation to local grievances, it is not well that we should endanger the safety of any one of the Provinces in relation to matters provided for in the British North America Act, which is our written Constitution. * * It is not desirable that we should make the way open or that anything should be done which would excite religious discussions and permeate religious animosities."

That was good advice, and that advice was followed by the House. Now, I come to consider a question which seems to have exercised the mind of the Globe newspaper, and that is the articles in the Law Journal and the Law Times. I have shown, I think, by constitutional authority, that the Act, if it be unconstitutional or ultra vires, should be allowed by the Government to take its course, and those who are injured by its operation or aggrieved by it should at once apply to the law courts for redress. The Law Journal has declared beyond all question that the Act is ultra vires, and, if that be so, according to the practice we have always adopted, the parties should apply to the courts for redress. The Law Journal says:

"It will, we think, be conceded, apart from any provisions in Imperial statutes, that it is ultra vires the constitutional power of a Colonial Legislature to confer on or delegate to any foreign sovereign, potentate, or tribunal, lawful jurisdiction or authority to determine, or ratify, the distribution of the moneys or properties of the Crown, or how money grants to the subjects of the Crown, within its colonial jurisdiction, are to be distributed. The Imperial Crown may in any proper case agree with another crown or nation to refer to a sovereign, or to arbitrators mutually agreed upon questions affecting its belligerent or territorial rights or claims; but this regality of the Imperial Crown is not possessed, nor can it be exercised, by a Colonial Government or Legislature. If it would be ultra vires of the Legislature of Ontario to delegate authority to a foreign power—say to the President of the United States—to distribute, or to ratify the distribution of, public moneys legally voted (the Clergy Reserve moneys, for instance), it follows that this delegation of authority to the Pope by the Legislature of Quebec must also be ultra vires. What would be unconstitutional in Ontario must be equally unconstitutional in Quebec"

The Law Journal lays down the proposition that the Act is ultra vires. If that be so, the authorities show clearly that they must go for redress to the courts; but what evidence have we in this instance that the Pope is, as they say, a foreign potentate? The Law Journal does not pretend to say how it is, except that, under the Statute of Elizabeth, there were certain documents, or mandates, or judgments issued or sent forth by the Pope, and that those should not be recognised by the authorities in England. But the Statute of Elizabeth was passed under different circumstances from those which exist now, and the position of the Pope to-day, bereft of his temporal power, is entirely different from what it was years ago. Instead of being a foreign power, he is in this case simply an arbiter between two parties in the Province of Quebec. At the time to which my hon. friend from Muskoka alludes, no doubt the Pope did exercise a controlling influence in Europe and over many nations, but now he is bereft of that power and is in a totally different position. The Law Journal says this matter is not yet settled, and should be relegated to the courts. That is the position which this Government and all preceding Governments have taken in regard to such a question. Then, as to the Law Times. In my judgment, the Law Times shows conclusively that it is quite constitutional for the Province to vote money in the way it has. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) is entirely at issue with the Law Times on that point. If he had read the article in the Law Times, he would have found that it holds that the voting of money to ecclesiastical institutions or powers is regarded by that newspaper in an entirely different way from that in which he regards it. I cannot understand, therefore, on what ground the Globe made its sudden summersault. The Law Times says it is constitutional to vote money for this purpose. Of course, the Law Times is in conflict with Mr. Wm. McDougall on that point, but I will refer to him later. The Law Times says:

"The constitutional question that arises is not the voting away of public money, be the pretext never so shallow, but the subordination of the sovereign to a foreign authority, and the placing of Her Majesty's public funds at the disposal of the same foreign authority. It is of course an unquestionable and fundamental proposition of law that the Legislature cannot deny the sovereignty of Her Majesty or acknowledge the sovereignty of any other person, especially as under the Constitution it derives its sole authority from an Act passed by the Imperial Parliament. But there is authority for saying that such a proceeding would be unconstitutional."

Then it goes on to refer to the case of the International Bridge Company and the Canada Southern Railway Company, reported in 28 Grant, page 14, showing that the action of Parliament would be unconstitutional in declaring that an Act of that kind could go into operation without the consent of a foreign power. It quotes the decision of Vice-Chancellor Proudfoot as follows:—

"If Canada has chosen to pass an Act in terms similar to the New York Act, it derives its validity from the Canadian Legislature, not from the Legislature that originally created it. No express clause was required to exclude the laws of one from operating in the territory of the other; the exclusion arose from the countries forming part of different nationalities with different sovereign powers. Each country has assented to the corporation created by it uniting with the corporation created by the other, and bringing into the union the rights and liabilities conferred or imposed upon it, and certainly Canada has not introduced the provisions of any Act of Congress passed subsequent to the union applying to the united company. Were the Canadian Parliament to endeavor to do so—to say that Canadian subjects and Canadian corporations are to be subject to legislation that might be passed by Congress—it would, I apprehend, be unconstitutional."

And upon that ground the Law Times argues that it is unconstitutional in having, as it says, delegated the power to the Pope to say whether the law shall go into operation or not. We have seen that the Act does not depend upon the action of the Pope at all, but the money voted by this Act for a particular purpose is left for the Pope to say how much shall go to one church or another, or to one university or another. Now, we have in our Canadian Parliament enactments which are somewhat at variance with the law as laid down by Mr. Justice Proudfoot. In the Niagara Frontier Bridge Company Act we have a clause to this effect:

"The said company shall not commence the actual erection of the said bridge until an Act of the Congress of the United States of America has been passed consenting to or approving the bridging of the said river, or until the executive of the United States of America has consented to and approved thereof."

We have enacted the same thing in the Niagara Frontier Bridge Company Act. I think I can safely say that the constitutional authorities of this country, who have expressed their opinion upon it, are as reliable and as deserving of our confidence as the expression of the opinion in the Law Times or other papers of the same kind. It seems to me that the Law Times could not have carefully considered the question, otherwise it would not have arrived at the conclusion I intend to point out. The hon. member for Muskoka states in his resolution that the Act is not legal, firstly:

"Because it endows from the public funds a religious organisation, thereby violating the unwritten but understood constitutional principle of a complete separation of church and state, and the absolutely equality of all denominations before the law."

We have an answer to that in the Law Times, which says:

"The policy of disallowing a Provincial Act must be determined by responsible Ministers of the Dominion. They are constitutionally answerable to Parliament and the people, and as has frequently been shown, the right to disallow Acts was not granted in order that unconstitutional or invalid legislation might be got rid of, but in order that the more important policy of the Dominion should not be interfered with by the Provinces. The whole course of English history shows a struggle with the ecclesiastical houses to prevent property from falling into their hands. The policy both in England and her colonies has been the same—to prevent the property of the nation from falling into mortmain. But it is a question, not of legality, but of policy, and with the policy of the Governments of the day we have nothing to do."

Whereas, on the other hand, the Mail says it is entirely a question of policy with which we have to do, yet the Law Times is of a contrary opinion:

"If a particular Province choose to depart from this policy and permit the absorption of property by ecclesiastical orders, it is undoubtedly acting within its constitutional rights. The Governor in Council would also be acting within his constitutional rights in opposing such a policy by disallowing all Acts tending thereto; but it is a question of policy as we have said, and not of law. The Act then must be looked at with regard only to its contents."

So that while the hon. member for Muskoka takes strong ground that no Legislature has a right to vote money for ecclesiastical purposes to seminaries or churches, or anything of the kind in the Province of Quebec, yet the Law Times says that they have got absolute power. Now, which authority are we to take? Are we to take that of the Law Times, or that of the hon. member for Muskoka, or are we to say that the Government acted strictly within its constitutional rights and privileges by saying: We will not interfere, because they had a perfect right to vote their money; at any rate it is a matter of purely local concern. Now, it is stated that the Pope is an alien, and as such has no right whatever to express an opinion upon this question. If we look at the Treaty of Paris we find that, to a large extent, his authority is recognised so far as is necessary for church purposes. The clause says:

"For her part, Her British Majesty agrees to grant to the inhabitants of Canada the liberty of the Catholic religion. Consequently she will give most precise and effective orders, so that her new Roman Catholic subjects may profess and practise their religion, according to the rites of the Roman Church, in so far as the laws of Great Britain permit."

Now, the law of Great Britain permits the Catholics to carry on the affairs of their church just as they please, so long as they do nothing in conflict with the laws of England. It seems to me, looking at the Law Times and Law Journal, that they agree with the proposition I laid down, that if an Act be ultra vires or unconstitutional, it should not be a subject of discussion, but one which the Government should leave entirely to the jurisdiction of the courts. Now, we have another authority in this House—Mr. Wicksteed, who has been for years the law officer for this House. He has expressed his opinion upon it, and I find in a communicated article this language:

"And as respects the article questioning the constitutionality of the said Act,—it does not seem to me that the English Acts cited in it can apply to Canada, which, when they were passed, was no part of the realm of England, and the inhabitants of which are by subsequent Acts of the Imperial Parliament, guaranteed the free exercise of the Roman Catholic religion, of which the Pope is the head, and his supremacy as such is part of its very essence. The later law derogates from and virtually repeals any former provision contrary to it. The English laws disqualifying Roman Catholics from holding certain offices were never in force in Canada. The money appropriated belonged to the Province, and is granted by its Legislature for the purposes for which the property from which it arises was given by the French King, and the Act of Appropriation is sanctioned by the assent of the Queen, who may, without impropriety, avail herself, in dealing with it, of the advice and assistance of the head of the church and of an ecclesiastical and educational corporation, which, if not legally the same, is morally the representative and successor of that to which the original grant was made, and which, with the Pope, will be bound to use the money in accordance with and solely by virtue of the powers given them by the Act."

So we find that nearly every authority learned in the law who has expressed an opinion, points clearly to the fact that the Government acted entirely within the constitution. But, Sir, these gentlemen who are so terribly annoyed because the Pope has been called in, and has chosen to say how that money belonging to the church shall be distributed, were not so particular a short time ago when the Pope's opinion was asked upon a more important question. In Ireland, not very long ago, when, as we know, dissensions were rampant, when the people of England were looking to Ireland with dismay, were not the people of England glad to have the Pope act as arbitrator? We have here a very important question, and I see nothing in the English courts, in the English Parliament, or in the English Government, protesting against this. On the contrary, they were glad to see the Pope give his opinion on that question. Also, when the question arose upon boycotting and paying rents, the matter was referred to the Pope, and the Pope issued—I do not know what you would call it—a pronunciamento, or whatever it may be, and sent that to Ireland. No fault was found with that. I wonder the hon. member for Muskoka did not find fault with that. He is opposed to Home Rule, as I am myself, but at the same time, he found no fault with the Pope being called in as arbiter to settle this most important of all questions. Now, let us see what the Pope says:

"On several occasions the Apostolic See has given to the people of Ireland (whom it has always regarded with special benevolence) suitable admonitions and advice, when circumstances required, as to how they might defend their rights without injury to justice or the public peace. Our Holy Father Leo XIII, fearing lest in that species of warfare that has been introduced amongst the Irish people into the contest between landlords and tenants, which is commonly called the Plan of Campaign, and in that kind of social interdict, called boycotting arising from the same contest, true sense of justice and charity might be perverted, ordered the Supreme Congregation of the Inquisition to subject the matter to serious and careful examination.

"Hence the following questions were proposed to their Eminences the Cardinals of the Congregation: Is it permissible, in the disputes between landowners and tenants in Ireland to use the means known as the Plan of Campaign and boycotting?"

"After long and mature deliberation their Eminences unanimously answered in the negative, and the decision was confirmed by the Holy Father on Wednesday, the 18th of the present month.

"The justice of this decision will be readily seen by any one who applies his mind to consider that a rent agreed on by mutual consent cannot, without violation of a contract, be diminished at the mere will of tenant, especially when there are tribunals appointed for settling such controversies and reducing unjust rent within the bounds of equity, after taking into account the causes which diminish the value of the land."

No objection was taken to that. The Pope took steps in these matters as between landlord and tenant, he denounced the plan of campaign, and declared that in his judgment the course taken by supporters and others in the Catholic Church was improper, and he advised them to take a different course. It seems to me that, looking at this question in all its lights, this House is justified in declaring that the Government have acted fairly with the Province of Quebec. Let me briefly refer to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). It states:

"Firstly, because it endows from public funds a religious organisation, thereby violating the unwritten but undoubted constitutional principle of the complete separation of church and state and of the absolute equality of all denominations before the law."

I think I have met that objection, and I have read the opinion of the Law Times, an authority which the hon. gentleman will not endeavor to controvert. The amendment further states:

"Secondly, because it recognises the usurpation of a right by a foreign authority, namely: His Holiness the Pope of Rome, to claim that his consent was necessary to empower the Provincial Legislature to dispose of a portion of the public domain, and also because the Act is made to depend upon the will, and the appropriation of the grant thereby made is subject to the control of the same authority."

Let anyone look at the Act and he will see that it says nothing with respect to the benefit of the Jesuits. The preamble of the Act shows there was a controversy going on between the church and the Province of Quebec in regard to claims respecting the Jesuits' estates, and with a view to settling that question negotiations were opened with the Pope in order to ascertain how it could be settled amicably. There is not a word in the whole of the correspondence or in the whole of the Act to show that it was a settlement with the Jesuits themselves, but only with regard to the Jesuits' estates. The hon. gentleman has forgotten that point. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) entirely fails to point out that there is one word in the Act respecting a settlement with the Jesuits, but that it is for a settlement in regard to the Jesuits' estates, which the Act says were confiscated by Imperial authority; and I have endeavored to show from history that there is considerable doubt with respect to the confiscation and as to whether the estates really were within the possession of the Crown. The Act itself says:

"Whereas it is expedient to put an end to the uneasiness which exists in this Province, in connection with the question of the Jesuits' estates, by settling it in a definite manner: Therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Legislature of Quebec, enacts as follows."

It is true that the head of the Jesuits was authorised by the Pope to enter into negotiations, but these negotiations were not with the Jesuits at all, and there is not one word in the Act to show it; it was for the purpose of settling a long standing question as to whether these estates belonged to the church or not. The hon. gentleman says that the Quebec Government are taking out of the Jesuits' estates money and handing it over to the church authorities, that $400,000 is to be placed at the disposal of the Pope and $60,000 at the disposal of the Protestant clergy. Such is not the fact, for there is not a word said about the Jesuits' estates. The Quebec Government has to take the money out of the consolidated revenue, and power is given them by the Legislature, in section 6 of the Act, to sell the estates and apply the money in any way it may think proper. Section 6 says:

"The Lieutenant Governor in Council is hereby authorised to dispose, in the manner he deems most advantageous to the Province, of the whole property, movable and immovable, interests and rights, generally whatsoever of the Province upon the said property known as the Jesuits' estate."

It, therefore, appears that the Lieutenant Governor in Council is authorised to pay out of any public moneys at his disposal, $400,000 under the conditions named, and may make any deed necessary for the full and entire execution of such agreement. The money, therefore, is taken out of the consolidated fund, and authority is taken to sell the Jesuits' estates and apply the proceeds as the Lieutenant Governor in Council may see fit. It appears to me that upon every ground advanced by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), this House is bound to answer his interrogations in the negative and to vote that the propositions made by the hon. gentleman are not in accord either with facts, or with history, or with constitutional law. He says further:

"Thirdly, because the endowment of the Society of Jesus, an alien, secret and politico-religious body, the expulsion of which from every Christian community wherein it had a footing, has been rendered necessary by its intolerant and unchristian intermeddling with the functions of civil government, is fraught with danger to the civil and religious liberties of the people of Canada."

The hon. gentleman forgot to say that there was St. Mary's College, which was a recognised corporation in the Province of Quebec. Yet he deliberately declares they are an alien corporation. What does the Act of 1887 say? It states distinctly that they were incorporated as a body and were recognised as a corporation by the Province of Quebec. Those are the facts, and I leave the House to judge as to their application. I have endeavored to show as briefly as possible, although I have necessarily occupied considerable time in doing so, that the rights of the minority are not interfered with, and I think I have shown that successfully; that the people have acquiesced in and approved both Acts, which is a fact beyond all question; that the feeling raised in Ontario is entirely uncalled for, the minority in Quebec asking for no such support for them. I have pointed out to the satisfaction of this House, I think, that a large amount of ignorance has been displayed by public men in Ontario in discussing this question, and that the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) was somewhat at fault in his history of the matter. I have also shown that the attacks on the Jesuits, that the historical references made to the past are not with a view so much to condemn the Jesuits as to stab the Roman Catholic Church. That is, at all events, my judgment. I gather that from the resolution passed at the different meetings and the course adopted, a course which in my judgment is not justifiable. I have pointed out that the Jesuits of to-day are not the Jesuits of 100 years ago, that the Province of Quebec are in sympathy with the Jesuits, and I have shown that they are not an alien corporation, and that they are not such people as they are sometimes considered to be in Canada. It is true they were suppressed in 1773, but they were restored in 1814, because the Roman Catholic Church felt that the Jesuits were not at that time the same class of men as they were before; that they did not act as others had acted according to history, but were influenced in their action simply by a desire to promote the best interests of the church. I have shown conclusively that they are entirely in accord with the Roman Catholic Church. I have also shown conclusively that according to our constitution the course taken by the Government was the only proper one, and in support of my statement I have the authority of the Law Times and the Law Journal. I have also shown conclusively that the Government was justified in voting money for ecclesiastical purposes, and had a perfect right to vote money for Laval University or any other seminary or similar institution, and that if they acted harshly towards any portion of the community it became a question of policy. I have also shown that the Province of Quebec were not bound to give $60,000 to the Protestants which was more than their proportion of the money. It does seem to me, Sir, that it is unwise and inexpedient that this House should discuss a question such as this from the standpoint of my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). I think that I have shown that from every point of view the Government was justified in taking the course they have done: that is to leave the matter to the courts to settle, whether or not it is ultra vires or unconstitutional. I, Sir, am going to be the last one to join in an unholy crusade against any portion of my fellow-countrymen. To-day, we are joined together for the purpose of building up this great Confederation into a magnificent nation. Is all that we have accomplished for the last twenty-one years to be set at naught? I, Sir, shall not be a party to such a course. While I feel as strong in my Protestant views as any man in this House, I recognise the foundation of Protestant principles: civil and religious liberty. As long as I occupy a seat in this House, even though I be threatened with extermination from my constituency, I shall endeavor to deal out equal justice to all my fellow-countrymen.

Mr. BARRON. Mr. Speaker, I wish I could content myself with simply giving an affirmative vote to the amendment of my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien); but, Sir, that has become impossible. Fortunately or unfortunately I do not know which, my name has been more or less intimately associated with the subject-matter of the hon. gentleman's amendment ever since the beginning of this Session, and I feel compelled to supplement the vote that I shall give with some explanation. I do that, Sir, even though my duty is a most unpleasant one and a most painful one indeed, especially so when I remember and am conscious of the fact that in voting and in speaking as I do I am weaning myself for the time being—and only for the time being I hope—from few or many, I don't say which, of the hon. gentlemen around me with whom I have been in such happy accord ever since I have had the honor of a seat in this House. Still more especially is it painful to me, Mr. Speaker, to speak as I do and to vote as I do, when I am conscious of the fact that I am separating myself from the hon. gentleman on this side of the House who leads me and who leads us, and for whom I, in common with hon. gentlemen on this side of the House as well as with many hon. gentlemen on that side of the House, have feelings not only of respect but of the deepest possible affection. But, Sir, even under those circumstances I enjoy the comfort which is that I know that hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House will, at least, give me credit for acting from sincere and honest conviction. Believing that I am in the right, I hope hon. gentlemen will give me their sympathetic attention while I speak to the amendment of the hon. member for Muskoka. I may be permitted in passing to make a few references to the remarks of the hon. member for Muskoka, after which I will come to the speech of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert). I do not refer so much to the remarks that the hon. gentleman from Muskoka made this afternoon as I do to his remarks of a day or two ago, upon the occasion when he gave notice to this House of his intention to introduce the amendment which he has placed, Mr. Speaker, in your hands to-day. I do not wish to be understood even inside or outside of the House as complaining at all of the course of the hon. member for Muskoka. It has been suggested to me that that hon. gentleman's course was in fact forestalling me and taking from me that course which I intended to pursue; but, Sir, I can tell this House that I was gratified beyond measure when the hon. gentleman rose in his seat a day or two ago and announced his intention of doing what he has done to-day. I recognise, and no one in this House can recognise more than I do, how grave and serious this question is, not only in the present but grave and serious in its consequences in future, and I would be foolish indeed if I presumed to think that I could give the question the weight and the importance of other hon. gentlemen in this House, I, who am comparatively young and especially so in comparison with the hon. member for Muskoka. I recognise, Sir, that someone older in years, older in experience, and older in position than I am should have taken this matter up, and I, therefore, say again, and I hope hon. gentlemen will believe me, that I was pleased and gratified when the hon. gentleman from Muskoka notified the House a day or two ago of his intention to move his amendment, I do not complain even of his words when he spoke, but I may be permitted to make some reference so as to explain away the inference that his words bore. He gave as his reasons for taking the course which he did, that, inasmuch as my resolution appeared so far down on the Order Paper that likely it would not be reached this Session, he thought it was his duty, under these circumstances, to move in the matter. The very best answer to the statement of the hon. gentleman is that my motion was reached, my motion was made and the papers have since been brought down so that it will be understood. I think that the course I took was right, not as has been suggested by people outside of this House, to evade the matter altogether. In speaking on this question I must be understood as having no feelings whatever against the Jesuit body or even against the Roman Catholics, amongst whom I am happy to say I number many, many friends. I have no sympathy with the clamor which is being made outside of this House, clamor, I may say, without reason. The Jesuits have been in some quarters assailed without argument, and I have no sympathy whatever with the course pursued in those quarters against the Jesuits and against the Roman Catholic body. All that has been said may be true or false; I care not. As far as my investigation and my reading has gone, I confess to believing that much that has been said is false. Even, Sir, taking the maxim, Finis determinat probitatem actûs, I believe that it bears no construction such as has been put upon it in certain quarters that "the end justifies the means." But, on the contrary, my reading and education has been such as to inspire me with admiration for the early Jesuit fathers. We need only recall Parkman's account (and he is by no means a very favorable historian toward Roman Catholicism) of the early Jesuit fathers, and we must be inspired and imbued with enthusiasm in our recollection of the work they accomplished in this country. We can recall, all of us, from history, the arrival, in this country, of the unfortunate Father Jogues, his capture by the Iroquois, his cruel and unheard of tortures, his determination to regenerate by baptism, notwithstanding his intense sufferings, his subsequent escape to France, his performing the sacred rites of the mass in his mutilated condition, his return to this country, his recapture and his fearful death at the hands of the father whose child he was trying to save by baptism. The only effect of that will be, the only result can be to inspire us with enthusiasm that such missionaries have lived in years gone by. I approach this grave and serious question entirely relieved from any bias whatever against the Jesuit fathers or against the Roman Catholic Church. Our admiration for them is one thing, our judgment regarding the constitutionality of this Act under discussion is another thing. Now, my first serious objection to the Act is that which has been mentioned by the hon. member for Muskoka. I claim, Sir, that the introduction into the Act of the mention of the Pope is such a serious encroachment upon the prerogative of the Crown, as to call for its disallowance at the hands of the Government. The sovereign is the caput principium et finis of all legislation; but in this particular case the Legislature of Quebec makes the Pope the end of its legislation. The Pope is given the right, notwithstanding what hon. gentlemen say, to negative this legislation entirely. Suppose the Pope did nothing, the Act would be a dead letter. It cannot be denied that the effect is to give a foreign potentate—and I shall show that the Pope is a foreign potentate—the right to disallow or negative this legislation; and if that is true, the converse must be true: if he has power to negative legislation, power to make an Act of Parliament a dead letter, it must follow logically that he has also the right to affirm legislation. And here we have introduced into a British Act of Parliament the power given to a foreign potentate, to negative or affirm legislation. Now, we are taught again and again that the right of assenting to or dissenting from an Act of Parliament is a right so peculiar to the prerogative of the Crown that the sovereign herself cannot delegate it. It is quite true that the Governor General is given the right to assent to or dissent from Acts of Parliament; so are the Lieutenant Governors of the different Provinces; but they have not the right to delegate that power to anybody else. Delegata est non potest delegare, is a maxim especially applicable to the Lieutenant Governors of the Provinces in cases of this kind. Now, to show that my contention is well founded, I want to refer to the Statutes. First, I will refer to the Statute of 1 Elizabeth, chapter 1, which has already been referred to, and clause 16 of which reads as follows:—

"That no foreign prince, person, prelate, state or potentate, spiritual or temporal, shall at any time after the last day of this Session of Parliament, use, enjoy or exercise any manner of power, jurisdiction, superiority, authority, pre-eminence, or privilege spiritual or ecclesiastical within this realm or within any other of your Majesty's dominions or countries that now be, or hereafter shall be, but from thenceforth the same shall be clearly abolished out of this realm, and all other Your Highness' dominions forever. Any statute, ordinance, custom, constitution or any other matter or cause whatsoever to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding."

The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), although he referred to that statute, did not for one moment contend that it was not in force in this country; but it has been said that because it is an old statute, therefore it is not applicable. Well, I want to read from the Treaty of Paris, and I will read only those portions which bear on my argument. His Britannic Majesty engaged:

"To grant the liberty of the Catholic religion to the inhabitants of Canada; and to give precise and effectual orders that his new Roman Catholic subjects might profess the worship of their religion according to the rites of the Romish Church, as far as the laws of Great Britain permitted."

I want to emphasise these last words, "as far as the laws of Great Britain permitted," because at the time of the making of that Treaty of Paris this Statute of Elizabeth was in force, so that the treaty did not negative the existence of that statute in this country, but, on the contrary, perpetuated it. Now, the hon. member for Lincoln said that there was a distinction between His Holiness the Pope as a foreign potentate, and as the head of the church. I grant you that; but does anyone mean to say that the Statute of Elizabeth is not directed, as all the statutes of Elizabeth were, to His Holiness the Pope? No one can argue to the contrary, if he is possessed of the least atom of historical knowledge. Everyone of the penal Statutes of Elizabeth was pointedly directed to His Holiness the Pope, and, therefore, the Treaty of Paris did not discontinue the Statute of Elizabeth or prevent its application to this country. If we want any further legislative authority, let us look at the Quebec Act of 1774, the 5th section of which reads as follows:—

"And for the more perfect security and ease of the minds of the inhabitants of the said Province, it is hereby declared that His Majesty's subjects professing the religion of the Church of Rome at and in the said Province of Quebec may have, hold and enjoy the free exercise of the religion of the Church of Rome, subject to the King's supremacy, declared and established by an Act, made in the first year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth over all the dominions and countries which then did or hereafter should belong to the Imperial Crown of the realm, and that the clergy of the said church may hold, receive and enjoy their accustomed dues and rights with respect to such persons only as shall profess the said religion."

There we have, first of all, the Statute of 1 Elizabeth positively, in a legislative way, disapproving of the Pope in any way exercising a jurisdiction; then we have the Treaty of Paris coming after that, not preventing the operation of that statute; and then we have the Quebec Act of 1774, specially perpetuating that statute in the Province of Quebec. Now, Sir, let me refer to the opinion of a great judge to show that what I say is correct. Mr. Justice Smith, in the case of Corse vs. Corse, reported in the Lower Canada Reports, page 314, said:

"As soon as Canada ceased to belong to France, the public law of France ceased to exist, and the public law of England came in."

Now, it may be said that my construction of that statute is a forced one, is not a fair one, is not consistent with the time in which we are living, in 1889, when it was passed in 1554; but I will read from an authority whose name is a household word, well known to every gentleman in this House. I refer to Mr. Todd, who was cited by the hon. member for Lincoln in his attempts to demonstrate the truth of some of his statements. He says:

"The Statute of 1 Elizabeth, chapter 1, known as the Act of Supremacy, declares that no foreign prince, person, prelate, or potentate, spiritual or temporal shall henceforth use, enjoy or exercise any power, jurisdiction——"

Now, Sir, I want to ask hon. members of this House, how it is possible, if that construction be a correct construction of the Statute of Elizabeth, and I challenge assertion to the contrary, to contend that that construction is not infringed upon by the Act passed in the Province of Quebec last Session? At the very least by it the Pope is exercising the jurisdiction of distributing moneys, if nothing else, which I say is a violation of the statute according to the universal construction thereof. Mr. Todd goes on to say:

"—or authority within the realm, or within any part of the Queen's Dominions: and that all such power or authority heretofore exercised shall be forever united and annexed to the Imperial Crown of this realm. This declaration remains in force to the present day, and it is the statutory warrant for the supremacy of the Crown, in all matters and causes civil or ecclesiastical, throughout the British Empire, as well as for the renunciation of the papal claims therein."

Now, it has been said in this House, and has been written to the press by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) that there is a distinction between the Pope in his spiritual capacity, as the head of the church, and the way he has been brought into this statute; but here we have the opinion of Mr. Todd that his right to exercise papal claims in this country ought not to and does not exist. But, Sir, I shall cite earlier authorities. I understand that some of the gentlemen who are opposed to this resolution rely upon the authority of Lord Thurlow. Now, I ask the attention of this House for a few minutes until I read his opinion regarding the statute:

"By the 1st of Elizabeth, I take it that there is no reason whatever, why the Roman Catholic religion should not have been exercised in this country as well as in that; confining it entirely to that Act, I know no reason to the contrary * * * * for the language of the Act is only this, that no foreigner whatever should have any jurisdiction, power or authority within the realm."

Then I will refer to the language of the celebrated Wedderburn:

"I can see, by the article of this bill, no more than a toleration. The toleration, such as it is, is subject to the King's supremacy, as declared and established by the Act of the 1st of Queen Elizabeth. Whatever necessity there be for the establishment of ecclesiastical persons, it is certain they can derive no authority from the See of Rome, without directly offending against this Act."

Then it may be argued that this statute is not in force now, by reason of some Provincial or Federal legislation which prevents its application in this country. No one who makes that contention could have read the British North America Act, because Imperial legislation, which was in force at the time of Confederation, could not since be repealed or destroyed by any Dominion or Provincial legislation. The 129th section of the British North America Act reads as follows:—

"Except as otherwise provided by this Act, all laws in force in Canada, Nova Scotia or New Brunswick at the Union, and all courts of civil and criminal jurisdiction, and all legal commissions, powers and authorities, and all officers, judicial, administrative, and ministerial, existing therein at the Union, shall continue in Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick respectively, as if the Union had not been made; subject nevertheless (except with respect to such as are enacted by or exist under Acts of the Parliament of Great Britain or of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland) to be repealed, abolished, or altered by the Parliament of Canada, or by the Legislature of the respective Provinces, according to the authority of the Parliament or of that Legislature under this Act."

Even if there had been legislation in any way detracting from the Statute 1st Elizabeth, which was undoubtedly in force at the time of Confederation, no legislation, either in this House or in the Province of Quebec, could in any way legally detract from or diminish the extent of the application of that statute. I think I have shown conclusively what is now the statute law of the land, namely, that resulting from the enactments of 1 Elizabeth. But I maintain that the common law, altogether apart from the statute, is such as to prevent the introduction of His Holiness the Pope into this legislation. Some of us can recollect the fact—I only from my reading—that, prior to 1850, the Pope attempted to divide England into different dioceses or divisions, but a statute was passed in 1850 to prevent him from doing so. This statute was the Ecclesiasticals Act of that year. Now, I want to refer to Mr. Todd again, who says, on page 313, that that statute passed in 1850 declaring that the Pope had no power as a foreign potentate, either in his individual capacity as head of the church or as a foreign potentate, to divide England into dioceses, had always been the common law of England.

Mr. Todd says:

"The Ecclesiastical Titles Act was in substance a declaration of the common law, which was affirmed before the Reformation, and ratified by Parliament some five hundred years ago."

If it was always the common law of the land, Sir, that the Pope could not divide England into dioceses, surely it must have been the common law of the land that he had not the right to distribute money, and that money the money of the State. I would like to know which is the most important—dividing a country into different parcels or dioceses with the view of placing church authorities over each, or distributing certain moneys? If it was the common law of the land that His Holiness the Pope could not divide England into dioceses, it must have been also the common law that he could not distribute moneys in the way provided by the statute aimed at by the amendment now before the Chair. That common law of England became the common law of Canada. On this point Sir Richard West gives his opinion, on the 20th June, 1720 (see Chalmer's Colonial Opinions, page 510):

"The common law of England is the common law of the plantations, and all statutes in affirmance of the common law passed in England, antecedent to the settlement of any colony, are in force in that colony, unless there is some private act to the contrary, though no statutes, made since these settlements, are there in force, unless the colonies are particularly mentioned."

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is a settlement not a conquest.

Mr. BARRON. No, but it matters not. I maintain on that authority that the common law of England was such at that time that no distribution of moneys could be made by the Pope in England, and that common law became part and parcel of the common law of this country. Some reference has been made to correspondence from officers of the Crown in England, or others in high authority regarding the right of His Holiness the Pope to exercise any jurisdiction in this country. I refer, in support of my view, to the Royal Instructions to the Duke of Richmond, on his appointment in 1818 as Governor in Chief of Upper and Lower Canada, with reference to the inhabitants of Lower Canada:

"That it is a toleration of the free exercise of the religion of the Church of Rome only to which they are entitled, but not to the powers and privileges of it as an established church. * * * * It is our will and pleasure that all appeals to a correspondence with any foreign ecclesiastical jurisdiction, of what nature or kind soever be absolutely forbidden under very severe penalties."

Then as to the royal supremacy, which cannot exist if this Statute is to become law, I will refer also to Mr. Todd who says at page 313:

"The source of the authority of the Crown in ecclesiastical matters and of its jurisdiction in the last resort all over ecclesiastical causes is to be found in the doctrine of the Royal Supremacy. This doctrine is a fundamental principle of the British Constitution. It was authoritatively asserted by Parliament at the era of the Reformation, and it is interwoven with the very essence of the monarchy itself."

Further on he says:

"While by previous enactment, ecclesiastical supremacy had been conferred upon the Crown, as a perpetual protest against the assumptions, by any foreign priest or potentate, of a right to exercise coercive power or pre-eminent jurisdiction of British subjects."

Now, I think I have fairly shown that, at all events, the statute law is against the introduction of the Pope into any matters in this country in the way this statute provides. I will refer now to what I believe to be the objectionable clauses, and I will ask how it is possible for anyone not to admit, in the face of the statute, that these clauses to which I refer certainly make this law an infringement of the law as it is defined by the Statute of Elizabeth. In reply to a letter of Mr. Mercier, Cardinal Simeoni says:

"I hasten to notify you that, having laid your request before the Holy Father at the audience yesterday, His Holiness was pleased to grant permission to sell the property which belonged to the Jesuit Fathers before they were suppressed, upon the express condition, however, that the sum to be received be deposited and left at the free disposal of the Holy See."

Then, in another place, Cardinal Simeoni replies to Mr. Mercier:

"The Pope allows the Government to retain the proceeds of the sale of the Jesuits' estates as a special deposit to be disposed of hereafter with the sanction of the Holy See."

Is it to be said in this British country that we are to be told by a foreign potentate that he allows the Government of this country—a British Government—to "retain the proceeds of the sale of the Jesuit estates as a special deposit to be disposed of hereafter with the sanction of the Holy See?" Yet, allowing this Act is tantamount to saying that we allow the Pope to assume this important position. In another place, Cardinal Simeoni, replying to the question:

"Should authority be given to any one to claim from the Government of the Province of Quebec the property which belonged to the Jesuit Fathers before the suppression of the society, and to whom and how should it be given?"

Says as follows:—

"Affirmatively in favor of the Fathers of the Society of Jesus and in accordance with the method prescribed in other places, that is to say, that the Fathers of the Society of Jesus treat in their own name with the civil government, in such a manner, however, as to leave full liberty to the Holy See to dispose of the property as it deems advisable, and, consequently, that they should be very careful that no condition or clause should be inserted in the official deed of the concession of such property which could in any manner affect the liberty of the Holy See."

Then in another place Mr Mercier appears to acknowledge all that the Pope, through his secretary, demands. He says:

"That the amount of the compensation fixed shall remain in the possession of the Government of the Province as a special deposit until the Pope has ratified the said settlement, and made known his wishes respecting the distribution of such amount in this country."

Now, the letters containing these sentences are a preamble to this statute. They are referred to by a section of this statute and are made part and parcel of the law of Quebec—a British Province—and that law is that nothing is to be done until the Pope has ratified the settlement and made known his wishes as to the distribution of the property. There is an admission on the part of a Premier of a British Province that a foreign potentate—for such I claim he is—has the power to ratify British legislation. If he has the power to ratify it, he has the power to nullify it, and that is a power which no one, whether he be the head of a church or not, should possess Then the statute goes on, in order to give it a sort of meritorious effect, to talk about restitution. In the very front of the statute, it speaks of restitution being necessary to be made to the Jesuit Society. What is restitution? You cannot restore anything to a person who was not at one time or other entitled to it, or to some one who is entitled to claim it on his behalf. I contend that the Jesuit Society, which was incorporated in 1887, has nothing whatever to do with the original Jesuit Society. Suppose a society is incorporated by charter in this Parliament, and for some reason or other it becomes extinct, and fifty years afterwards another society is formed under the same name, can anyone say, will anyone argue, that the society so formed can have any claim to the estates of the former society which has become extinct? Certainly not; and the same state of things exists here, and there can be no principle whatever of restitution involved. Sir, to contend the affirmative is to contend, not for the principle, but for the irony of restitution. I find that the Jesuit Society was incorporated in the year 1678 in France. I shall not trouble the House by reading at length the diploma or letters patent incorporating that society, but, with your consent and the consent of the House, I shall ask permission to hand it in.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read.

Mr. BARRON. On the 2nd August, 1761, that Society was dissolved in France, and, if the House is determined to have lengthy words read, I shall read the decrees of dissolution, contenting myself with the bold statement that the Society was incorporated as I have said. The Society was dissolved by the self-same Parliament which originally incorporated it, and the declaration of the King of France at Versailles was:

"Moreover, we ordain, that during one year from the date of the enrolment hereof, nothing shall be ordered, either definitely or provisionally, upon what may relate to the said institutes, constitutions and establishments of the houses of the said society, unless we shall otherwise so ordain."

Then on the 6th August 1761, by another sentence, the Parliament of France, with reference to the report to them made of the doctrine of the Jesuits, made the following provisions:—

"In like manner it is provisionally inhibited and forbidden unto the said priests, and others of the said society, to continue any lessons, either public or private, of theology, philosophy or of the humanities in the schools, colleges and seminaries within the jurisdiction of the court, under penalty of seizure of their temporalities, and under such other penalty as to right and justice shall appertain; and this, from and after the first day of October next, as well with respect to the houses of the said society which are situated at Paris as to those which are situated in the other towns, within the jurisdiction of the court, having within their limits schools or colleges other than those of the said society; and from the first day of April next, only with respect to those which are situated in towns within the jurisdiction of the court, where there are no other schools or colleges than those of the said society, or in which those of the said society shall be found to occupy any of the faculties of the arts or of theology in the university there established, and, nevertheless, in case the said priests, scholars, or others of the said society, shall claim to have obtained any letters patent duly verified in the court, to the effect of performing the said scholastic functions, the court permits the said priests, scholars, and others of the said society, to produce them before the court, all the chambers assembled, within the delays above prescribed, such order, upon view of the same, and upon the conclusion of the King's Attorney General, to be made by the court as to right shall appertain.

"The court most expressly inhibits and forbids all subjects of the King from frequenting, after the expiration of the said delays, the schools, boarding schools, seminaries, noviciates and missions of the said persons styling themselves Jesuits, and enjoins all students, boarders, seminarists and novices to quit the colleges, boarding houses, seminaries and noviciates of the said society, within the delays above fixed; and all fathers, mothers, tutors, curators or others having charge of the education of the said scholars, to withdraw them or to cause them to be withdrawn therefrom, and to concur, each in respect to himself, in carrying into effect this present decree, as good and faithful subjects of the King, zealous for his preservation. The court in like manner prohibits them from sending the said children to any colleges or schools of the said society, held without the limits of the jurisdiction of the court, or out of the kingdom. And as for the said scholars, the court declares all those who shall continue after the expiration of the said delays to frequent the said schools, boarding houses, colleges, seminaries, noviciates and instructions of the said persons styling themselves Jesuits, in whatever place they may be, incapable of taking or receiving any degrees in the universities, or any civil or municipal offices, or of discharging any such public functions. The said court reserving to itself to deliberate on Friday, the 8th day of January next, upon the precautions which it shall judge necessary to take upon the subject of the offenders, if any there be."

Then the society, having been dissolved by the same Parliament that brought it into existence, appears to have got a respite for a short time. But the letters patent were enregistered, and provided:

"Subject, nevertheless to this: That the respite contained in the said letters patent shall take place only to the first of April next, upon which day the provisional decree of the court of the sixth August last shall be executed ipso jure, and also without that the necessary proceedings to enable the court to render judgment on the appel comme d'abus, instituted by His Majesty's Attorney General, prove the bulls, briefs, constitutions, forms of vows, and other regulations relating to the said society, can be suspended, and in like manner without prejudice to the provisional execution of the said appel comme d'abus.

"And also subject to this: That the public or private lectures on theology, philosophy or the humanities, held and given by the priests or scholars in all the towns or places within the jurisdiction of the court, without distinction, cannot be provisionally continued after the expiration of the said respite, the whole under the pains contained in the provisional decree of the sixth August last."

Thus I maintain that the same Parliament which brought the Jesuit Society, as a corporate society, into existence, by its decree, dissolved the society. Then, we find that His Holiness the Pope, on the 20th July, 1773, dissolved the society by his celebrated brief Dominus ac Redemptor. I shall not ask the House to listen to the reading of that brief, which is not necessary for my purpose, and in any event it is familiar to the ear of most hon. gentlemen in this House. A year later, this society was suppressed by royal instructions to the Governor General as follows:—

"That the Society of Jesuits should be suppressed and dissolved, and no longer continue a body corporate and politic, and that all their rights, privileges and property, should be vested in the Crown, for such purposes as the Crown might hereafter think fit to direct and appoint, and the Royal intention was further declared to be that the present members of the said society as established at Quebec, should be allowed sufficient stipends and provisions during their natural lives."

In 1791 there are Royal Instructions to the same effect. The last Jesuit died in 1800; the present society came into corporate existence in 1887, so I maintain that the present society is not in any way connected with the former society; and the principle of restitution does not and can not apply. This Government, at least, should have returned the Bill, suggesting that it should be altered in some respects, and amongst others, the one to which I referred a few moments ago. Even the Bishops of Quebec, or some of them, admitted that the Jesuits were no longer in existence, and they, at the request of the Jesuits, made a claim to the property. I find the following in a petition over the signatures of Joseph, Bishop of Quebec, P. T. Turgeon, Coadjutor of Quebec, and J. S. Lartigue, Bishop of Montreal:

"Your petitioners humbly represent that the Order of Jesuits being extinct in this country, their natural successors are the Roman Catholic bishops of the diocese."

Then the very Act itself incorporating the Society of Jesuits in 1887, makes no claim whatsoever to their rights as owners of this particular property, so I think it cannot be maintained, on the merits, that they are entitled on any principle of restitution to this property. But it has been said that this property was taken from the Jesuits at the time of the Conquest. I deny that, because at the time of the Conquest it did not belong to the Jesuits. It had become Crown property, like any other Crown lands; therefore, when the statute now objected to says that the property was confiscated, it states that which is not the case, and the Federal Government should not have sanctioned that misstatement, but they should, at least, have returned the Act to the Government of Quebec to have it amended in the particular. Now, in some pamphlets issued by gentlemen who support the Jesuit Society, I find Twiss referred to as an authority on the law of nations. A gentleman who writes a very able argument in support of the Jesuit cause, has quoted from this authority as follows:—

"A victorious nation in acquiring the sovereignty de facto over a country, from which it has expelled its adversary, does not acquire any other rights than those which belonged to the expelled sovereign; and to those such as they are with all their limitations and modifications, he succeeds by right of war."

They also refer to De Vattell on the Law of Nations:

"The conqueror, who takes a town or province from his enemy cannot justly acquire over it any other rights than such as belonged to the sovereign against whom he has taken up arms. War authorises him to possess himself of what belongs to his enemy; if he deprives him of the sovereignty of that town or province, he acquires it such as it is, with all its limitations and modifications.

"One sovereign makes war upon another sovereign, and not against unarmed citizens. The conqueror seizes on the possessions of the state, the public property, while private individuals are allowed to retain theirs They suffer but indirectly by the war; and the conquest only subjects them to a new master."

Now, I agree with every word of that. Suppose the United States and Great Britain were to go to war—and I think hon. gentlemen in this House on both sides would have but very little doubt as to the result—it would not be said for one moment that Great Britain obtained any rights whatsoever over private property, but she would obtain just the same rights as the Executive of the United States have over private property. Now, at the time of the Conquest this property did not vest in the Jesuits at all; it had become extinct, it had become vacant property; therefore, when it is said outside the House, as it has been said inside, that for meritorious reasons, because the property was taken by a method of confiscation, therefore it should be returned to them—I say it was not taken by confiscation, because at the time that Canada was conquered by England this property was not the property of the Jesuits, but was the property of France, having become extinct. We find the opinions of Her Majesty's Attorney General and Solicitor General for the Crown, dated 18th May 1759, stating in regard to this property:

"As a derelict or vacant estate, His Majesty became vested in it by the clearest of titles, if the right of Conquest alone was not sufficient, but even upon the footing of the proceedings in France and the judicial acts of the sovereign tribunals in that country. The estates in this Province would naturally fall to His Majesty, and be subjected to his unlimited disposal, for by those decisions it was established upon good, legal and constitutional grounds, that from the nature of the first establishment or admission of the society into France, being conditional, temporary and probational, they were at all times liable to expulsion, and having never complied with, but rejected the terms of their admission, they were not even entitled to the name of a society; therefore, they were stript of their property and possessions, which they were ordered to quit upon ten days' notice, after having been compelled to give in a full statement of all they had, with the several title deeds, and documents or proofs in support of it. Sequestrators or guardians were appointed to the management of their estates, and in course of time and with a regularity proportioned to their importance, provision was made for the application of them in the various ways that law, reason, justice and policy dictated; and all this was done at the suit of the Crown."

Now, to show further that at the time of the conquest this was vacant property, I refer to Marriott's opinion, 12th May, 1765. He says:

"From all these premises, it seems conclusive that the titles of the society passed together with the dominions ceded to Great Britain (in which dominions those possessions were situated) attended with no better qualifications than those titles, had by the laws and constitution of the realm of France, previous to the conquest and cession of those countries."

I mention that this Quebec Act is objectionable in many important particulars, and is also objectionable in declaring that those estates were confiscated by the British Crown. I say such was not the fact, and is not borne out by the history of the estates. This property has always been treated as having escheated to the Crown, not as having been confiscated by reason of the Conquest. I find Lord Goderich on 7th July, 1831, spoke to this effect:

"His Majesty's Government do not deny that the Jesuits' estates were, on the dissolution of that order, appropriated to the education of the people, and readily admit that the revenue which may result from that property, should be regarded as inviolably and exclusively applicable to that object."

"And it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, that from and after the passing of this Act, all moneys arising out of the estates of the late order of Jesuits which now are in or may hereafter come into the hands of the Receiver General of this Province shall be placed in a separate chest in the vaults wherein the public moneys of the Province are kept, and shall be applied to the purposes of education exclusively, in a manner provided by this Act, or by any Act or Acts which may hereafter be passed by the Provincial Legislature in that behalf and not otherwise."

Then we have the petition of the bishops, to which I have already referred. Does anyone mean to say that if the Province became owners of this property by reason of confiscation, the bishops would say the Jesuits were no longer entitled to it, as they did say in their petition? It is quite clear, therefore, that the statute is incorrect in that particular, when it states that the property was acquired by confiscation. Then there is another point to which I desire to refer, and it is one which has not yet been touched upon, and it is this: It is the case that two or more of the properties were acquired by the Jesuits, not from the King of France and not by grants of the Parliament of France, but from private individuals. I do not think anyone will deny that within strict law, and I may say I am speaking from a legal standpoint altogether—and I do not desire to go into the merits or demerits of the Jesuit claim, but to speak of the question from a legal standpoint only,—no one, I think, will deny that it is good and proper law that when property is given to a corporation or society or body of men or to one or more men upon a certain and specific trust, the very moment that the trust is no longer capable of performance the property reverts to the heirs of the party from which the property originally came. That this trust was destroyed no one will question. It was destroyed by the Parliament of France. Then, if such be the case, the heirs of the donors are now entitled to the property, whoever they may be. But it may be said that I am building up a fictitious case, and, therefore, I will quote the language of the Rev. Father Flannery of St. Michael's Cathedral, of Toronto, on 17th February, 1889. He said:

"These lands were never given to them by the French Government or by any Government, but were the donations of private members of the church who left the lands in possession of the order for religious and educational purposes."

That trust having been destroyed, it will not be denied by any legal gentleman that the property reverts to the original donors. Why, we see only lately that the Seignory of Sillery was given to a certain body of Indians, and that the property has been taken away from them by this objectionable statute. We remember in 1882 in this House the First Minister, waxing eloquent over the contention that the Rivers and Streams Bill took away one person's property and gave it to another, he contended that the public interests were greatly affected, and that it was his duty for that reason to disallow that Bill. The premises he built did not exist; but if he was right in that action, he should have enquired more closely into the facts regarding this question to ascertain whether the rules he laid down for his own Government, and for succeeding Governments, did not apply to this particular case. If he was right in disallowing the Ontario Rivers and Streams Bill because, as he said, it took away the property of one man and gave it to another, a fortiori, he should have disapproved of this legislation because the trusts created by private donors have been destroyed from and lands have been taken away by the Parliament of Quebec, and handed over to other parties that have nothing more to do with them than the man in the moon. In order to show that I am not wrong in my view of this question, I quote a letter dated 20th June, 1879, over the signature of Mr. James McGill:

"It seems to us that it would have been proper by an advertisement to call upon the public for any dormant claims there may be on the Jesuits' estates."

I maintain, moreover, that under the British North America Act this Act is entirely unconstitutional. If I remember rightly (I will not read the particular section) it states that each Province of the Dominion shall have the right to deal with educational matters, reserving the rights of the minority in Quebec, and the minority in the Province of Ontario. No one has ever maintained that that Act gave to the different Provinces of the Dominion the right to make denominational grants, as has been done. There can be no doubt that the Jesuits are a religious institution; and are we to understand that the different Provinces have the right to make religious grants to the different religious bodies? I think not. I assert that if the leader of the Government had the very least respect for his own past record and his own past utterances, he would have disallowed this legislation just as quickly as he allowed it. Why, we have only to recall the case of the Rivers and Streams Bill of Ontario. In that case he built up the premises which did not exist. He claimed that it gave the right to take away the property of one man and give it to another; and that the general effect upon the whole country would be such that he had a right to disallow the Bill. I say that, applying that principle, he should have disallowed this Bill, and for the reasons given. If it is true that a portion of the property was given originally to the Indians of the Seignory of Sillery, then I say there are good reasons for disallowing this Bill, as, on the Premier's contention, there was for disallowing the Rivers and Streams Bill of Ontario; there was good reason to disallow this legislation, if for no other reason than that it took away from the Indians land given to them, as it is said, by France originally. I desire to refer to the remarks of the right hon. leader of the Government on the Rivers and Streams Bill disallowance; and I may mention that his remarks were coincided in by several hon. gentlemen, and especially by the present Postmaster General and the hon. member for North or South Simcoe. On that occasion the First Minister spoke as follows:—

"I declare that, in my opinion, all Bills should be disallowed if they affected general interests. Sir, we are not half a dozen Provinces. We are one great Dominion. If we commit an offence against the laws of property or any other atrocity in legislation, it will be widely known."

Can any subject be thought of that affects the people more generally than that of religion? Can any subject be thought of that will affect the people more generally than one respecting the Jesuits' Society. Without reflecting for one moment upon the society, let me point out that this Society of Jesus has been legislated against by the countries of Saragossa, La Palantine, Venice, Avignon, Portugal and Segovia, England, Japan, Hungary and Transylvania, Bordeaux, France, Holland, Tournon and Berne, Denmark, Bohemia, Russia, Naples, and in all Christendom by the Bull of Pope Clement XIV. I maintain that it cannot be said that a society legislated against in all these countries is not of general interest, but it might be said that "this was many years ago and that we are not now in the dark ages." I am quite willing to admit that, but I find that even since that society was restored by Pope Pius VII, in 1814, it has been legislated against by, and expelled from, Belgium, Russia, France, Portugal, Spain, Switzerland, Bavaria and the Italian towns. I refer to that not because I have the least unkind feeling against the Jesuit Society, but I maintain that it cannot be said that that society is not of general interest when we find it has been legislated against in all these different countries. Can it be said that the question is of the deepest possible interest right up to the imaginary line which divides the Province of Quebec from the Province of Ontario, and that the moment you step across to the Province of Ontario it has no interest at all? I certainly say no. Can it be said that anything which will be injurious to the Methodist body in Ontario, that the same body is not more or less affected by it in the Province of Prince Edward Island? No. The Baptist community, the Congregational community, and all other denominations, have a touch of sympathy throughout the whole Dominion. Therefore, I say that the words of the right hon. gentleman spoken in 1882 in this House in reference, to the River and Streams Bill, apply to this case. By the authority of the words that he used then, I hold it is a strong argument for this Bill being disallowed to-day. I do not like to charge the hon. Premier with making fish of one and fowl of the other in this matter, but his treatment of the Orange Incorporation Bill in this House cannot be forgotten. He takes only three days to intimate to the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec that he assents to and approves of this Bill, but he is dumb to the enquiry of the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario, to know if he would assent to and approve of the Orange Incorporation Bill, when one word from him, similar to that he gave Quebec, would have incorporated the Orange Society. If he assents and approves of this legislation it follows as a most positive sequitur that when he disallowed legislation in the Province of Ontario, and when he disallowed legislation in the Province of Manitoba, because he disapproved thereof, it must follow that by allowing this Statute to become law he does so because he approves of the same. I would like to give the hon. the Premier an opportunity, but I see he is not in the House just now, of denying what he is credited with having said at a certain meeting on the 20th June, 1886. On that occasion he is credited by his organ, La Minerve, with saying as follows:—

"To the calumnious hypocrites who represent him as the personification of religious fanaticism."

Sir John replied by saying:

"That he had never in his life set foot in an Orange lodge. * * * I am accused, said Sir John, of being a Protestant, and even of being a bad Protestant. In like manner I have been accused of being an Orangeman, although I have never set foot in a lodge.

I do not know whether to believe that or to believe the statement of one of his protégés regarding our Roman Catholic fellow-citizens, that he, or a member of his Government "had no confidence whatever in the breed." I have satisfied myself, at all events, that my conclusions are correct, that this Bill should have been disallowed, and, if possible, that it should be still disallowed, for the reason that it is strictly unconstitutional. Now that I see the Minister of Customs in his seat, I hope that he, occupying the prominent position he does in a certain order which has been mentioned by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), will not allow this opportunity to pass without giving to some hon. members on this side of the House who think as I do, the benefit of his views. I hope, Sir, they will be in accord with many of those who belong to the society of which I believe he is such——

Mr. BOWELL. An ornament.

Mr. BARRON. Yes; such a great ornament.

Mr. WALLACE. I am sure, Sir, that every member in this House must sympathise with the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Barron) when he declared how exceedingly painful it was for him to separate himself even for a few moments only from his beloved colleagues, and still more beloved leader. We can all sympathise with the hon. gentleman, and we can all sympathise with the party that is so painfully distracted at the present moment. I want to refer at the outset to a remark made by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) in the opening of his speech. He stated that a newspaper published in the interests of the Orange Order threatened any member of that order who will dare vote for the allowance of this Bill. I would say to the member for Lincoln, what perhaps he knows himself, that the Orange Order has only one organ in the Dominion, and, Sir, I defy him, and I defy any hon. member of this House to point to any such article in that organ of the Orange Association in Canada. I say, Sir, that that organ has, during this discussion which has agitated the public, the press and public meetings, and which agitation has assumed a pretty violent form in many places—I say that that organ of the Orange Association has set an example of moderation that might well be emulated by other organs, and also by some of the members of the sacred profession in their pulpits. I fancy, Sir, that the hon. gentleman instead of reading an article from the Sentinel was reading the Globe when it was thundering out its anathemas against the hon. gentlemen opposite if they dared to vote against disallowance. For myself, I propose to be able to discuss the very important amendment moved by the member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) without any race or religious prejudices or feelings, and purely from a Canadian standpoint. As a Canadian who has the strongest faith in the future of our country and who has watched with pride its rapid march in material progress—the united work of all races and of all religions—I hope that this question may be investigated on its merits and entirely apart from any religious feeling. We came to Canada from different countries, or we are the descendants of those who have come here to enjoy and exercise fully our religious convictions. We have flourished under our free institutions in Canada, and in order to do so we must be prepared to respect not only the rights of others, but also their feelings and, to a certain extent, their prejudices as well. Now, Mr. Speaker, two very important Acts have recently been passed by the Quebec Legislature. The first was the incorporation of the Society of Jesus in the year 1887, and in the following year the "Act respecting the Settlement of the Jesuits' Estates." These two Acts bring up the whole question of the Jesuit Order in Canada, as well, perhaps, as the Jesuit Order in other countries. Previous to the Conquest, in 1759, the Jesuits held property which they had received from various sources in trust, for two purposes: for the training and education of the French youth of the country, and also of the aboriginal inhabitants. Now, Sir, their position under the English régime depended upon the terms, first, of the capitulation to Lord Amherst in 1760, and, secondly, upon the terms of the cession to the English Crown by the Treaty of Paris in 1763. Article 32 of the Capitulation reads as follows:—

"The communities of nuns shall be preserved in their constitutions and privileges. They shall continue to observe their rules. They shall be exempted from lodging any military, and it shall be forbidden to trouble them in their religious exercises."

The reply of General Amherst to this request was "Granted." Then, article 33, of the Terms of Capitulation, was as follows:—

"The preceding article shall likewise be executed with regard to the communities of Jesuits and Recollets and of the House of St. Sulpice at Montreal. This last and the Jesuits shall preserve their right to nominate to certain curacies and missions as heretofore."

The answer of General Amherst was:

"Refused till the King's pleasure be known."

Now, it will be observed from these facts that the Recollets and the Jesuits received no particular or special rights under the Terms of Capitulation of 1760. The next place where these matters were negotiated and regulated was in the Treaty of Paris in 1763. The only stipulation in that treaty bearing on this question was as follows:—

"His Britannic Majesty agrees to grant the liberty of the Catholic religion to the inhabitants of Canada; he will consequently give the most effectual orders that his new Roman Catholic subjects may profess the worship of their religion according to the rites of the Roman Church, as far as the laws of Great Britain permit. His Britannic Majesty also agrees that the French inhabitants, or others who had been the subjects of the most Christian King in Canada, may retire with all safety and freedom whenever they think proper, and may sell their estates, provided it be to subjects of His Britannic Majesty, and bring away their effects as well as their persons, without being restrained in their emigration under any pretence whatever, except that of debts or of criminal prosecutions; the term limited for this emigration shall be fixed for the space of eighteen months, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty."

Therefore, it is plain that the right secured by the Treaty of Paris to the French Canadians was the liberty to worship according to the rites of the Roman Catholic Church, and the limit of the English law as it then stood. They received no further rights under that treaty. Then, Mr. Speaker, there is a great and important distinction between the Jesuits and the Recollets, Sulpicians and other orders established in Canada. The Recollets and Sulpicians were organised by French subjects in France. The Jesuit Order originated in Spain; it is of no nationality, and it has no law but the will of its General. The next change that took place with reference to the Order of Jesuits was under the Quebec Act of 1774, the result of which was given in the royal instructions to the Governor of Quebec in the year 1775. This made a new departure in the rules governing the Jesuits, and made a very wide distinction between the Recollets and the Sulpicians on the one hand and the Jesuits on the other. For instance, the orders to the Governor in 1775 stated:

"That the society of Romish priests, called the Seminaries of Quebec and Montreal, shall continue to possess and occupy their houses of residence and all other houses and lands to which they were lawfully entitled on the 31st September, 1759, and it shall be lawful for those societies to fill up vacancies and admit new members according to the rules of their foundation."

That was the regulation with regard to the other orders of the Roman Catholic Church. But, Sir, what do we find in reference to the Jesuit Order? An entirely different regulation was meted out to them, and it was as follows:—

"That the Society of the Jesuits be suppressed and dissolved and no longer continue as a body corporate and politic, and all their rights, possessions and property shall be vested in us, for such purposes as we may hereafter think fit to direct or appoint; but we think fit to declare our royal intention to be that the present members of the society, as established at Quebec, shall be allowed sufficient stipends and provisions during their natural lives."

Now, Sir, by order of the British Parliament, in the Royal Instructions given to the Governor of Canada in 1775, while the other orders of the Roman Catholic Church were permitted to remain in Canada, enjoy their property, and continue their work, the Jesuits were suppressed. This took place not only in Canada, but in various countries in Europe. We find that in 1759 the order was suppressed in Portugal; in 1764 it was suppressed in France; and in 1767 it was suppressed in that country where it first had its birth, in Spain; and not only was it suppressed in those countries of Europe, but in all the colonies and possessions of those countries throughout the entire world. Following those events, Pope Clement XIV, the head of the Roman Catholic Church, found that order to be so intolerant, so mischievous in its workings, so inimical to the peace not only of several Governments, but of the church itself, that he determined to suppress and abolish the order. We, therefore find in 1773 a brief from the Pope of Rome, and I will trouble the House while I read a few extracts from that brief. It is addressed to the Catholic Church throughout the world. His Holiness cites many instances of the suppression of religious orders by the Holy See; he recites the many favors and privileges conceded to the Jesuits, and then he says:

"There arose in the bosom of the society divers seeds of discord and dissension, not only among the companions but with other regular orders, the secular clergy, the academies, the universities, the public schools and lastly even with the Princes of the states in which the society was received."

The Pope then recites at some length these quarrels; the accusations, he says:

"multiplied without number, especially with regard to that insatiable avidity of temporal possessions with which it was reproached."

Then he gives an account of some unavailing efforts to reform the society, and adds:

"In vain did these Pontiffs endeavor by salutary constitutions to restore peace to the church, as well as with respect to secular affairs with which the company ought not to have interfered."

After reciting some further efforts he proceeds:

"After so many storms, tempests, and divisions, every good man looked forward with impatience to the happy day which was to restore peace and tranquility; but, under the reign of this same Clement XIII, complaints and quarrels were multiplied on every side, in some places dangerous seditions rose, tumults, d cords, dissensions, scandals, which, weakening or entirely breakingisthe bonds of Christian charity, excited the faithful to all the rage of party hatreds and enmities"

Then he says:

"After a mature deliberation, we do, of our certain knowledge and the fullness of our apostolical power, suppress and abolish the said company. * * *

"Our will and meaning is that the suppression and destruction of the said society and of all its parts shall have an immediate and instantaneous effect."

Previous to 1773, the society had been abolished by almost every Roman Catholic country in Europe, and, finally, that year it was suppressed in every part of the world by the head of the Roman Catholic Church itself. I think no stronger evidence could be given of the character of that order than the character given to it by Pope Clement XIV. Pope Clement would not have uttered a harsh word against the society if he could have avoided it. He knew the machinations of the order, and in this brief he states what he was compelled, though reluctantly, to do in the interests of the church and of society and of civil government. We are told, however, that the society was restored. True, it was restored; and I will refer briefly to one or two facts in connection with the society after its suppression. In Canada they were allowed, what they were not allowed in any country in Europe, to enjoy in peace and quietness the property they had acquired or which they had received in trust. In the countries of Europe, they were not only banished, but were deprived of all their properties of every kind whatsoever. Now, the British Government, after the death of the last member of the order in Canada, in 1800, took possession of the whole Jesuits' estates. The Crown held these properties until 1831, when, after some negotiations, they were handed over to the Government of the Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, with the stipulation that the revenues therefrom should be devoted exclusively to the higher education of the young. That stipulation has been carried out up to the present day. But now we find a different state of affairs. We find an Act of Parliament passed in 1887 incorporating this society, and in 1888 an Act giving them $400,000, also giving the Government of the Province of Quebec power to sell this property, which has been estimated and valued at $2,000,000, and to devote the proceeds to any purpose they may think proper:—not to the purposes of education, but to any purpose whatever. Another important feature in this matter is this? $60,000 are voted for the superior education of the Protestants in the Province of Quebec and $400,000 are voted to the Jesuits. A good deal has been said about the Pope's extraordinary powers in connection with the latter vote. The first point that I would call your attention to is this: That $400,000 is voted, not for the purposes of education, not for the purposes for which the British Government held the property, not for the purpose for which the property was handed, in the first place, in trust, but for any purpose the Quebec Legislature may choose. Not only $400,000, but the entire proceeds of the estates. While from year to year until now the revenues derived from them were devoted to superior education, now power is taken to sell the property and devote the proceeds for other secular purposes, and the $400,000 are to be divided as the Pope may determine. That money is not required in the Act to be devoted at all to the education of the young, but it may be devoted to any purpose. It may be devoted to the propagation of the Roman Catholic religion, or to any other purpose they may think fit. I have carefully looked over the British North America Act, under which the Dominion Parliament and the various Legislatures of this country carry on their operations, and I am unable to see one line of that Act in which power is given to a Local Legislature to vote money for the purposes of any church. Many years ago, when severe and bitter contests were going on in this country for the complete separation of the Church from the State, we thought in Canada that we had obtained that complete separation, and that all the churches stood on the same plane in the eye of the law; but if this Act is allowed to go in force, an end is put to that equality, and I think it would be a lamentable thing if a law should be passed in any Province giving greater power to one religious denomination than is given another. There are one or two features of this Act of incorporation and the moneys voted which, I think, are deserving of a little attention. We know there is no love between the Jesuit Order and certain other orders in the Roman Catholic Church, and we know through the legislation by which the Jesuits are incorporated, they are given only the right to exercise certain rights, not in the whole Province of Quebec, but only in certain portions. The second clause says:

"The corporation shall not have the right under this Act to possess educational establishments elsewhere than in the Archdioceses of Montreal and Ottawa, and in the Diocese of Three Rivers."

Still further on it says;

"The corporate seat of the corporation shall be in the city of Montreal and another place in this Province, within the present limits of the Archdioceses of Montreal and Ottawa, and of the Diocese of Three Rivers, which may be selected later on by a by-law of the corporation."

That means that in the archdiocese of Quebec, that diocese over which the Cardinal has control, the Jesuits are not allowed any privileges. They are not allowed to establish their headquarters or schools there. As a matter of fact, they are incorporated only in a part of the Province of Quebec. What is a still stranger feature is the fact that they are incorporated in the Archdiocese of Ottawa. I do not know much about the divisions and boundaries of the dioceses of the Roman Catholic Church, but I am informed that the Archdiocese of Ottawa includes three counties in the Province of Ontario. That it includes the city of Ottawa, and, therefore, the society which was incorporated by the Province of Quebec would be incorporated only in portions of the Province of Quebec and also in portions of the Province of Ontario. That would be one reason for disallowing the Act, that it incorporates a society not only in the Province of Quebec but also in portions of the Province of Ontario. It appears to me, from the reasons I have already adduced, from the reasons recorded in the resolution in your hand, and from other reasons, that it would have been better for the peace and happiness of the various portions of this community if this society had not been incorporated and had not received this endowment. In the first place, it diverts money from its lawful object. That money, has been, I belive, faithfully administered for the purpose of superior education since the Quebec Government got it in 1831. This Act also recognises the supremacy of the Pope over the Queen and over the Quebec Government; and it is also bringing into life—illegally, as I believe—a society which was legally suppressed by the British Government in 1775. As there was no Legislature in Canada until 1791, I believe that Act, not having been repealed, is still law in Canada to-day. I am against this Act for another reason, as I have already said, that I do not believe the Confederation Act gives any such power to vote any such money for any such purpose, and, therefore, though agreeing with the Government in its great policy, which has been so successful in this country, and has made this Canada of ours a great and prosperous Dominion, I shall be compelled to vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien).

Mr. COLBY. In addressing the House I shall endeavor to confine my remarks very closely to the question now before the Chair. I do not find it necessary, in the discussion of that question, from my standpoint at least, to go into the record, as other speakers have done, of that remarkable order of men, the Society of the Jesuit Fathers, of their beliefs or of their conduct a century or more ago. I do not think that necessary to a proper determination of the question now before the House. Nor shall I go into any close legal consideration of the case, as did the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Barron), because I think it must be decided upon other, and broader, and more liberal ideas than can be drawn from nice legal, fine-drawn, hair-spun distinctions; and I think such remarks would have been more applicable in the Quebec Legislature at the time when the Bill referred to was under discussion, than they are in this Parliament at this time. The proposition now before the House, as I understand it, carries an implied censure of the Government for not having disallowed the Act of the Quebec Legislature for the settlement of the Jesuits' estates, and a positive instruction to the Government to disallow it. I think we will all agree that the power of disallowance, which, by the Constitution is vested in the Governor General and his advisers, is a power which should be exercised with the greatest discretion; that, in the first place, it should appear, before an attempt is made to exercise that power, that the Government has the clearest possible right to exercise it; and then it should appear that there was an obvious necessity for its exercise. It is a serious matter to interfere with the deliberate will of a Local Legislature under any circumstances whatever—the clear and deliberate will of a Local Legislature. It is a more serious matter—for the gravity is vastly magnified—when the question upon which it is attempted to counteract their will and to nullify their legislation is one which touches the most sensitive feelings, the religious sympathies and convictions of the majority of the people in the Province which is to be affected. Now, there are certain things which we must recognise as existing facts. It is true that this order of the Jesuits was at one time suppressed; that is a historical fact. It is equally true—and that is a present and pregnant fact which we must recognise—that this order of the Jesuits has to-day, in the Province of Quebec, legal status, a status which is assured by the strongest legal sanctions of the Legislature, and which is assured by the highest sanction of the church and recognised by the whole body of the Roman Catholic Church. So that, an attack upon the order of the Jesuits in the Province of Quebec is an attack upon the Roman Catholic Church, upon the entire body of the Roman Catholic Church, and there should be no misapprehension upon that point. We must not delude ourselves into the belief that we are assaulting an obnoxious and a friendless power or entity that is entitled to the execration of all mankind. We must recognise the fact—and I do not know how it has come about, whether by a change in their practices or a change in their beliefs or otherwise; I have not gone into an enquiry into that point—but we must recognise it as a postiive fact that they are to-day under the ægis of the Supreme Pontiff and of the church, and are fraternally recognised to-day by the entire body of the church. Consequently, we must realise that if we nullify this Act of the Provincial Legislature as is proposed, we have not only to override a sentiment in Quebec, which is stronger in that Province than in any other in this Dominion, in favor of the maintenance of provincial rights, but we have to make up our minds to attack the solid sentiments of the majority of the people of that Province in their religious convictions, and in regard to that legislation which the majority believe to be their right and duty within the lines of the Constitution. I say, then, that we must carefully revise our position and see that we make no mistake. We must see that we have a clear, and positive, and undoubted right to do this thing; then we must see that there is an obvious necessity for doing this thing, and then we must consider, in view of the integrity of our country, in view of the peace, the prosperity, the harmony and the contentment of our people, the full, the possible, the certain consequences of adopting the course which is now proposed. We have a Constitution, it is true, which binds our Provinces together in a Confederation, but that is a paper bond. The moment you destroy mutual good-will between the people of this country, the moment you array the people of this country in hostility—personal and religious hostility—one against another, you have destroyed the only bond which can permanently hold us happily together. Now, I am going to limit my argument within very narrow lines, and I maintain that if this House agrees with me in these premises, the right to disallow must be very clear and the duty obvious, before we undertake this serious responsibility, before this House goes on a step further in the direction proposed. We had the deliberately and carefully considered opinions of the Minister of Justice, and all his colleagues in the Government, that the Act of the Quebec Legislature was wholly intra vires, and that there is no legal or constitutional power in the Dominion Government to disallow it. Does not that of itself create a doubt? Have we not also the opinion of men of eminent ability in this House and in this country, of high authority on constitutional questions, differing from the Government in politics, differing from them on most every point, yet who are in agreement with them on this point, that we have no right to disallow this Act? Then, I say, is there not sufficient ground to establish the only proposition I care to establish, that there is some doubt about it? Then, I say, if it is a doubtful right, we should not face the certain consequences, the disastrous consequences of disallowance. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have in the records in this Parliament a closely parallel case to this, and in many respects a stronger case than this, in which Parliament has recorded its deliberate opinion; I refer to the New Brunswick school question, which was precipitated upon Parliament within the memory of those of us who were members of the first Parliament of Canada, precipitated upon us at a very inconvenient period, just on the eve of the general elections of 1872, a question which raised discussions of a most alarming character, and which created a degree of anxiety in the minds of every member of the House, which has never been equalled in the 21 years of my experience in Parliament. At that time a Catholic minority of one of the Provinces of this Dominion came before Parliament, not with any abstract proposition, but with a clear and positive grievance. They made out a case which aroused the sympathies of Parliament to an extent that I have never seen them aroused before. There was not in Parliament, as the records will show, an individual member of this House, on either side, Protestant or Catholic, or of any nationality, or from any Province, who did not record his vote of censure against the authorities of New Brunswick by an expression of regret and a hope that the causes of discontent would be removed—I say not a single member of the House who did not record his vote in that sense except those who wanted to go further and give a positive remedy. The Catholic minority of New Brunswick came to us and said: "Before Confederation we had the right of enjoying our own separate schools; we were receiving Government assistance in support of our own schools; we were not compelled to send our children to the schools or to assist in maintaining the schools, which we thought dangerous to the morality and the religion of our pupils; we enjoyed that right long before Confederation; Government assisted those schools; we built the schoolhouses at our own expense, the Government made appropriations for the support of those schools; we had, in fact enjoyed a system of separate schools for many years before Confederation, and from Confederation up the year 1871, when, contrary to the determined opposition of the Catholic minority, composing two-fifths of the population of New Brunswick, contrary to their protestations, the Legislature of New Brunswick, by a vote which was carried in the Upper Chamber by a majority of one, reversed that system, and compelled us to support schools to which we could not send our children, they withdrew all support from the schools which we must sustain as conscientious men;" and they came to this Parliament and asked a remedy. They said to us: "We think this is a case clearly within the 93rd section of the Constitutional Act, and we ask for remedial legislation under the 4th sub-section or for disallowance; but if you are unwilling to apply either of these remedies, then we ask that you will memorialise the Imperial Parliament to revise the Constitution and place us where we ought to have been, place us where we supposed we were at the time of Confederation, place us as the minorities in Ontario and Quebec are placed in respect to separate schools, we care not what remedy you apply, but relieve us from the situation. Those different propositions were brought before the House, and every one of them was refused. We refused to disallow the Act. Why? Not because we did not believe that if fairness and equity alone were to prevail it ought to be disallowed; but because we had a doubt as to the right to exercise that veto. The Minister of Justice of the day expressed the opinion that we had no right to disallow it; and an hon. learned gentleman of highest authority in this House at that time, and of highest authority in this House and in this country on those matters at the present time—I allude to the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake)—expressed himself as having doubts on that question. On the other hand Hon. Mr. Dorion, now Chief Justice of Quebec, Hon. Mr. Fournier, now a judge of the Supreme Court, Hon. Mr. Holton, a high authority on constitutional law, and Hon. Mr. Joly, with thirty-four, voted to censure the Government for not having disallowed the Act. Parliament deliberately recorded its doubts by adopting the Mackenzie amendment, which asked the advice of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on that question. We felt it was a case where a remedy should be applied to remove an existing grievance, but we doubted our right to apply that remedy, and we expressed our doubt by adopting the Mackenzie amendment, and proposing a reference to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. We acknowledged the justice of their cause, they were coming to us for relief, the whole of the Catholic portion of the Province was aroused on that question, their clergy and leading men came to us, bringing every influence they could to bear, and yet we refused that remedy to the Catholic minority of the Province of New Brunswick. To-day we are asked, in a case of doubtful authority, to do for the Protestant minority of the Province of Quebec that which we refused to do in a similarly doubtful case for the Catholic minority of New Brunswick. So this House is asked in regard to the Protestant minority in Quebec, which made no strenuous resistance to the passing of the obnoxious Act by the Legislature of that Province, to intervene upon doubtful grounds, while we refused to intervene in behalf of a Catholic minority whose claims we acknowledged to be just claims, who used every influence and power they possessed, who fought the question in the Local Legislature inch by inch and then came here resting on their rights and claiming them and urging them in the most emphatic manner upon us. Now, I think we can hardly be expected to do that. If the former course was the right course, the course now proposed would be a glaringly wrong course. If we will not relieve actual grievances of the most serious character to persons aggrieved and who claimed they were aggrieved, and who begged our intervention, shall we intervene in behalf of those who do not claim, who do not state they have any grievances; shall we step out of our way to do this, to voluntarily do it when our right to do so is doubtful? I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that this House can deliberately come to any conclusion of that kind. When we remember the keen resentment which was expressed by all the organs of Protestant sentiment in New Brunswick because this Parliament had presumed to express regret that discontent existed there, and a hope that the School Act might be so amended as to give reasonable satisfaction to the Catholics of New Brunswick, which was the substance of the amendment which I had the honor to propose at that time, and which Parliament then adopted in order to alleviate the situation; when I say we call to mind the keen resentment with which this mild interference was received by the Protestants of New Brunswick, we may well imagine what an outbreak would occur in Quebec were the Protestant majority in this Parliament to cause the disallowance of an Act which was passed by the unanimous vote of the Legislature of Quebec; that Legislature having acted, as is believed by a majority of the people, within the line of their strict rights. I believe, Sir, that the paramount duty of whatever Government controls the destiny of Canada is to preserve the integrity of the Union within the lines of the Constitution. I believe it is their duty to avoid, so far as they can do it, keeping within the lines of their constitutional duty, every cause of offence to the various Provinces, because any conflict between provincial authority and the central power is pregnant with danger. The Constitution has already stood several severe strains. We have seen, I will not say by whose fault, in one Province of the Dominion, that Province swept by a sentiment favorable to an entire separation from this Dominion. We have seen in another Province the Government of the day and all existing things swept away by a spirit of nationalism, that felt in some way injured by the action of the central Government. We have seen the Province of Ontario agitated on account of an alleged infringement of provincial rights, and so also the Province of Manitoba.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). A real infringement.

Mr. COLBY. A real or fancied—I am not discussing that question now. All these were serious blows and injurious to the Constitution and to the country, and are to be deeply regretted. Those who desire the perpetuity of our system of Confederation should never make use of such questions for party purposes, except constrained by necessity, because they are not fair party weapons, and they tend to disorganise the country. I say the constitution has stood several strains of a serious kind; but there is one strain it has not been subjected to, and I hope it may never be subjected to it, and it is that where religious strife and altercation, where animosities and feelings of the kind which grow out of exasperated religious sentiment are evoked. We know, and I will not comment upon it, and people outside of this House must realise, that if we pass the resolution proposed it will precipitate a crisis the most dangerous that ever occurred in the history of this country, and the most dangerous that could possibly be imagined. I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, from the manifestations of feeling which are being expressed in certain parts of the Dominion, that the very zealous Protestants of some sections must have felt that the Protestant minority in the Province of Quebec have been very apathetic in the matter of the passage of this Jesuit Settlement Act. I believe there is nowhere in this Dominion a body of Protestants more willing to vindicate their rights, more willing to make sacrifices for the preservation of their rights than are the Protestants of the Province of Quebec. I do not believe they are disloyal to Protestant ideas. But the Protestants of the Province of Quebec have lived for many years in close relation and in close contact with their fellow-citizens of a different religion, and many prejudices which the one might otherwise feel against the other have been worn away by contact. The Protestants and the Catholics of the Province of Quebec, so far as I know their relations, live together happily upon mutually respecting terms, each respecting the other's rights, each respecting even the other's sensibilities and prejudices, and co-operating together, working together, for what they believe to be for the common interests, without jealousy, without friction, without over-sensitiveness, recognising the good things in each other; if they differ, quietly differing, and not making themselves ob noxious to each other. These are the relations which have grown out of long years of personal contact, living together side by side, meeting and knowing each other. That is a happy condition of affairs, but it is an actual condition of affairs in those parts of the Province with which I am personally acquainted. That is not a condition of affairs that the Protestants of Quebec desire to have disturbed. The Protestants of Quebec, and I think I fairly voice their sentiments, acknowledge the fact—if they do not acknowledge it to be so, it is a fact—that there never was a minority in any country treated with more justice, with more liberality, with more generosity than the Protestant minority of the Province of Quebec have been treated, irrespective of political parties. They have always had the control of affairs that most concerned them, those matters connected with education and other matters concerning which the Protestants were most interested aa Protestants, and they have had as much control over such questions as if they had had an entire Legislature of Protestants; they have not been meddled with, they have simply been permitted to manage their own affairs and they have not felt that they were in a minority in any instance that I recollect. Look at the political sentiment also. The Liberal party of Quebec elected as its leader for many years that noble man whom we all respect, Mr. Joly, a Protestant. They were not jealous, they had no objection on account of his Protestantism to serving under a leader whom they recognised as an able man whose views were in political accord with their own. The Conservative Government were equally liberal. Why, during the Conservative régime in Quebec, perhaps the most important office in the Cabinet had all along been held by a good old orthodox Presbyterian Treasurer, Mr. Robertson, and we were allowed during that régime, perhaps, an undue representation in the Government of the Province. We had two members, able and influential men, in a Cabinet of seven, which is certainly an undue proportion, and they were men of influence and men of character and ability. So that in all these respects we have nothing to complain of, and, perhaps, it is for that reason that we do not wish unnecessarily to provoke an issue which would result in the disturbance of those kindly relations. Then, again—and I know it influenced some men of high standing among the Protestants of that Province—we are finding Protestants and Catholics alike, Protestant and Catholic clergymen, standing on a common platform in the advocacy of matters which both think concern the well-being of the people. It is not very long ago, if I recollect aright, when His Eminence Cardinal Taschereau presided over a meeting held by Catholics and Protestants to consult with regard to the best legislation to be had on the subject of temperance. Leading men of both churches are working together to promote the best ends of the community as viewed from their common standpoint. That is a condition of affairs which had been recognised by many Protestants who are interested in the cause of temperance as one which should be perpetuated. I simply instance these things to illustrate the friendly sentiment, and to show the cordial relations existing between Protestants and Catholics in the Province of Quebec and the desirability from the point of view of either that those relations, friendly co-operative relations as they are, should not be disturbed. Again, let us consider what would have been the result if we had precipitated an agitation, if we had made the attack, or if we had raised this issue in which we were sure to be defeated. I may say here, which is a fact, that there is hardly a constituency in the Province of Quebec in which either the Roman Catholic electors are not in an actual majority, or in which they do not hold the balance of power. It is attributed to an hon. member of this House—I do not know how truly—that he said the other day with regard to the French Roman Catholics that they considered first their religion, second their nationality, and third their party, and I believe that this is truly said of them. We saw in the great change that was made at the last elections in the Province of Quebec what the national feeling when appealed to would exhibit. I think it is true that the religious sentiment is the highest with the French Canadian people, and if it is above nationality, if it is above party, if that sentiment is prepared to ally itself with one party or another party and that the question of party is a minor consideration, then in almost every constituency of the Province of Quebec the Protestants would be deprived of their just representation in the Legislature of the Province. There was nothing to be gained by raising an issue in which the result was a foregone conclusion and which issue could not by any possibility have resulted favorably to the Protestants. For these reasons what course was pursued? The Protestants of Quebec have never acknowledged that the Jesuit body had a legal claim to the restoration of those estates. The press has never acknowledged it, the public men have never acknowledged it, the pulpit has never acknowledged it. Further than that the Protestants of Quebec have never acknowledged that the Jesuits had a moral claim to the restoration of those estates, and they placed themselves deliberately on record by their speeches in the Legislature on that point. It was a most bitter and nauseous pill they had to swallow when the name of the Pope was foisted into that Act. But that objection was more a matter of sentiment than otherwise. Assuming that the thing was to be done, assuming that $400,000 was to be divided among certain Roman Catholic institutions, it certainly was desirable, from every standpoint, that that distribution should be final; that it should not be an ever-recurring question and a reference to the highest authority of the church, the only one power which could make that a final settlement had its advantages. There is no doubt about that. If it was acknowledged that a sum of money should be distributed among the Catholic institutions it was desirable that it should be so distributed as to satisfy those who would receive it, and it was desirable that it should be recognised as a final settlement, so that, from a practical standpoint, it might have been attended with certain wise and practical advantages if this reference were made; but I say that, as a matter of sentiment, it was not a pleasant thing to Protestants that the Pope should be consulted. Yet the Protestant press did nothing more than to record their protests against it. I do not think that any one who knows the editor of the Montreal Witness will suspect him to be a man who would not proclaim his Protestant principles if assailed, or who would truckle to Roman Catholics; and yet, if I recollect aright, the Montreal Witness, which is the most outspoken and the most advanced Protestant newspaper in the Province of Quebec, had but two mild editorials while this thing was going on. It published the reports of proceedings as news items, but it simply quietly objected to the proposition that the Jesuits had either a moral or a legal right to what they asked. It did not say to its readers: "Your rights have been assailed —agitate! agitate! arouse yourselves!" It said nothing of the kind. The pulpit is usually outspoken when the pulpit feels that rights dear to it are invaded; yet no man that I have heard of from the pulpit ever called upon his congregation or upon the people to agitate on this question. He expressed his views upon it; and there is no doubt as to the Protestant view on the subject; it is not the Catholic view of the question; and while the Protestants have never surrendered their views, they have placed them quietly on record, and they have contented themselves with that. I do not read all the newspapers of the country, but I do read that great organ of public opinion, the Montreal Herald, and I do not recollect that the Montreal Herald ever put in anything more than a mild protest. It did not call on the people to "agitate! agitate!" The Montreal Gazette was, perhaps, the most pronounced in its utterances on the question, but it merely expressed its views, and did not call upon the people to agitate the question. There were no petitions that I know of going up to the Legislature from any portion of the Protestant community, asking it not to pass that Bill. So, if the Protestants of Quebec may be fairly credited by the Protestants of Ontario and other Provinces as being men of equal ability with themselves, of equal fidelity to the principles of Christianity, of equal capacity to judge with regard to the fitness of things and what was right or wrong, what was opportune or inopportune, if they may be fairly credited with equal opportunities of judging, I think they should be spared the animadversions which some are inclined to cast on them. I think they understood the situation better, and I think they were as true to the principles of Christianity as the blatant men are now who are trying to agitate the country after the thing is done, and when there is no good object to be served. I think they are equally true, equally intelligent, equally devoted to the cause of Protestantism, and I think they are in a better position to know what is best for them, from their individual standpoint. At all events, if the Government are censurable for not having disallowed this Act, what opprobrium should not be cast on the Protestant minority of Quebec for not having protested against it, as the minority of New Brunswick did against the school law in that Province. It was because they felt and realised no actual grievance, and because they did not want, for a sentimental grievance, to fight in a hopeless cause, to arouse animosity, to disturb the relations which are beneficial and in the interest of the whole community. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not care to protract my remarks longer. I am a Protestant. The Roman Catholic Church—I will not speak of it as a religious body—I look upon to-day, speaking of it from a political standpoint and a political standpoint only—as one of the strongest if not the strongest bulwark we have in our country against what I conceive to be the most dangerous element abroad in the earth to-day. The Roman Catholic Church recognises the supremacy of authority; it teaches observance to law; it teaches respect for the good order and constituted authorities of society. It does that and there is need of such teaching; for the most dangerous enemy abroad to-day in this land and on this continent is a spirit of infidelity; is a spirit of anarchy, which has no respect for any institution, human or divine; which seeks to drag down all constituted authorities; emperors, kings, presidents from their seats; the Almighty from the throne of the universe, and lift up the goddess of Reason to the place of highest authority. This dangerous enemy, this insidious enemy, is infecting the popular mind, not so much in Canada—thanks, largely to the safeguards thrown about its people by the Roman Catholic Church—as in the neighboring Republic. If there is a danger in that country and in this more to be dreaded than all others it is to my mind that spirit of infidelity and anarchy, that destructive insidious spirit, and it can be best combated by that great spiritual power which upholds authority and law, whose very existence is dependent on the idea of authority, which cannot exist as a church or an institution of influence except upon the idea of authority and the observance of law, whose teachings are all in that direction. I do not believe it is in the interest of this Dominion to alienate, by any undue or unnecessary attacks, any one of the great powers upon which we must depend for the maintenance of our most cherished principles and institutions. I believe, Sir, that we have a duty to perform to each other, and that duty I have indicated. I did not intend to trespass on the House so long as I have done, but I thought it was proper that someone should represent what he conceives, at all events, to be the sentiment of the Protestant community in the Province of Quebec. I think the time is near at hand when it will be recognised by the two great religions of this country, the Protestant and the Roman Catholic, that the time for bickering has pased, that they have a common interest, and that for the promotion of that common interest they should stand shoulder to shoulder, work confidingly and in a friendly way together for the preservation of a common Christianity and all that is most dear and sacred to both, and thus, I conceive, will the best interests of this Dominion, and the best interests of civilisation on this continent, be promoted.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of making a speech on this question, I rise for the purpose of simply giving a few brief explanations for the vote that I shall give. I may say at the outset that for once during the present Session and the last preceding one or two Sessions, I am going to support the Administration. I do not do it because of any particular virtue in that Administration; nobody would believe me if I said I did; but I do it because I feel it to be to the interest of the smaller Provinces, a county in one of which I have the honor to represent. Sir, I am not going to enter into the merits of the question as to the whether the course Mr. Mercier pursued in dealing with the Jesuits' estates was a prudent course or not. Perhaps, if I had been a member of the Legislature of Quebec, representing a Protestant element in that Province, I might have doubted the propriety of that measure, and, perhaps, have voted against its passage. I have heard it stated to-night by some gentlemen that it was an improper thing to first charter the Jesuit Society. I have heard it next stated that it was an improper thing to pass the Bill voting the money, and that it was giving to a foreign power the right to dictate how the money of the people of the Province of Quebec was to be administered. These questions, I take it, are within the province of the Legislature of Quebec, and during the passage of that Jesuit Bill, occupying a public position as connected with a leading journal—I am proud to say it is recognised on the other side—I have taken somewhat of an interest in observing the effect it had amongst the Protestant element in that Province who are paying the money. Now, Sir, I may say this, and I think I will say it without fear of contradiction, that during the passage of the Bill incorporating the Jesuits' Society, there was scarcely a Protestant paper throughout the whole of the Province that raised one single objection against it. I will next say, when dealing with the financial feature of the question, that with the exception, so far as I can recollect, of two members out of the fifteen Protestant members in the Legislature of Quebec, not one of them raised their voices against the passage of the Bill, and those two did raise them in very moderate tones. And when it came to the question of dividing the House upon the point, these gentlemen called out, "carried on division." The Premier said: No, I will take the names upon it; and when they found that the names were to be taken, if I recollect the facts aright, they said "unanimous," and it was carried unanimously. Was there any excitement or any agitation on the part of the Protestant element of the Province of Quebec during that time? No. Months have elapsed, and it is only when some of the—shall I call them fanatics?—I think it would be a good name to give them—in the Province of Ontario raised, for what purpose I do not know, this agitation, that this question comes up A good many of them are friends of the right hon. the First Minister, and I fear he has often expressed the wish: "Save me from my friends." But whatever may have been their motive, it could have been no very good one, for there is no object to be gained by the agitation of this question, but to create trouble, dissension and bad feeling throughout the community. I re echo the sentiments of the hon. gentleman who last spoke, that Christian charity should prevail, and that in place of sowing dissension broadcast throughout this land, we ought to endeavor to harmonise in a community, so mixed as this, the different religious elements, in place of sowing discord among them and creating feelings such as have been created by these men to-day. If there are any people aggrieved in relation to this matter, who are they? Are they the Protestants of Ontario? What right have they to dictate to us, the Protestants of the Province of Quebec, as to how we shall dispose of our own money? I have heard the arguments they have used by those who sustained this motion, that this property was given for a special purpose. But how is this money voted? For what purpose is it given? Is it not given for the purposes of education, for that is the object for which those who receive it intend to appropriate it? Let any one come and reside in the Province of Quebec and become acquainted with the institutions which are to get this money, and he will find that they are promoting education among a large and the most numerous class of the people in the Province of Quebec in a manner that reflects credit upon their institutions. I am not a Roman Catholic, but I respect the Roman Catholics of the country. It will ever be my wish to live in harmony and peace with them, and wherever I can promote their interests fairly, giving due consideration to the interests of the Protestant community, they will always find, as they always have found during my past career, that I will do it. Our Provincial Legislature voted this money—and I will not say it was a wise thing to do, because it has raised a feeling which I regret has been raised, and which I will say now never ought to have been raised by the people of Ontario. It has raised that feeling, but as the money has been voted, I say it is the money of the people of the Province of Quebec, and the Protestants of the Province of Ontario have no excuse for their agitation. Years after the incorporation took place, and many months after the money was voted, they have no right to create that agitation, whatever may have been the motive for it. They have no right to interfere with the manner in which we, in the Province of Quebec, shall dispose of our own money. I represent and have some control over a leading organ of the press in that Province. I have taken very little part, through that paper, in this discussion, but throughout the whole of it, while I did not approve of Mr. Mercier's course in voting the money, I justified the action of this Government to-day in refusing to veto this Bill. When one of these Provinces, coming within the limits of the power given them by the British North America Act, chooses to dispose of its money in the way this money has been disposed of, I justify this Government in not interfering with the operation of the Act; and if they had interfered, they would have met with any censure which I, in my place here and through the newspaper which I control, could have passed on them. I am glad to say the Government have pursued the course they have. I am glad to say they have done the right thing. From the standpoint of a Maritime Province man, coming from one of the two or three smallest Provinces of this Dominion, it would be a sacrifice of the dearest interests and the greatest security which the British North America Act gives to the smaller Provinces if the Government had been allowed to interfere within the limits of the powers of the Legislatures of these Provinces in the way some hon. gentlemen desire they should. I have simply risen to state these few facts, in order to justify by this explanation the vote which I shall give. I feel that outside of everything else, I am a protectionist of my own Province. I desire to protect the rights of the smaller Provinces of this Dominion against the superior ones, and I think that the people of the Province of Ontario, where this agitation has entirely arisen, have gone beyond their limits in this matter. The agitation has been created in the Province of Ontario; it has been swelled into importance by the agitation, the ministerial agitation—I do not mean governmental; I mean ministerial in another sense. And for what purpose? Ought it to be the desire of any man who seeks to secure the future peace, harmony and prosperity of this country, to create dissensions between the Roman Catholics and Protestants, between the French Canadians and Ontarians? No, Sir. We ought to promote harmony if we can; we ought to endeavor to remove religious dissensions; we ought to endeavor to keep within the bounds of the political rights which the British North America Act has established for the different Provinces of the Dominion, and we ought to be especially careful that the larger Provinces, or the Dominion, should not attempt to assume a jurisdiction they have no right to exercise, and to infringe upon the privileges and rights of the smaller Provinces. With these few remarks, I shall endeavor to bring to a conclusion anything I have to say upon this matter, and I should not have spoken upon it were it not that I did not wish to give a silent vote on an important motion like this. I wish to say one thing more, and I hope the right hon. the First Minister will receive it in the spirit in which I give it. I do not think it is good policy for my right hon. friend to put up his followers behind him to defend the course the Administration will pursue in relation to this matter; and in place of protracting a discussion such as this, the right hon. gentleman or the gentleman in his Cabinet who occupies a prominent position in the Orange Association, which is largely at the bottom of this matter, or my respected friend the Minister of Justice, who is so able to do it, should rise and state the policy of the Government. I now call upon one or other of them, I do not care which —and I believe I have the right to do so, under the practice of the Imperial Parliament on such an occasion—to state what is the policy of the Administration on this matter. Let them come out frankly and state if they are prepared to stand by the course they have pursued of not touching the Bill, of not attempting to disallow it, but of letting it take its operation, emanating as it does from the power which had the constitutional right to pass it. I say, if one or other of those gentlemen will get up and make a declaration on this point, I believe they will squelch out the efforts which are being made to sow dissension throughout this land, and will put an end to this senseless debate which has been brought before this Parliement.

Mr. McCARTHY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think Sir John A. Macdonald will agree with me that we should go on and finish this to-night.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think there is any chance of finishing the debate to-night. I know there are a great many gentlemen who intend to speak, and that being the case, and as it is must stand over for another day I think it would be well to agree to the motion of my hon. friend.

Mr. LAURIER. Though it is rather early, still, as an important member like the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) is to speak next, I think it is only right, in courtesy to him, that we should adjourn.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. Will this debate go on to-morrow?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Has the hon. gentleman the hardihood to take away from private members the only day we have this week, yesterday being a holiday?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It was at the special request of the hon. gentleman that instead of taking last Wednesday for Government business we took to-morrow. He insisted upon it, and I gracefully yielded to his pressure.

Mr. MITCHELL. I asked that you should not take last Wednesday, but I did not agree that you should take this Wednesday away.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11:20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 27th March, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRIVATE BILLS—EXTENSION OF TIME.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved:

That as the time for the reception of reports from the Committee on Private Bills expires to-morrow, the same be extended to the 4th of April next, in accordance with the recommendation contained in the Tenth Report of the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph lines.

Motion agreed to.

INDIAN TREATIES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, Whether any new Indian Treaties have been concluded since the 1st day of July, 1888? 2. If so, what extent of land, in square miles, has been assigned in each case as a Reservation for the Indians included in such treaty? 3. How many Indians came under the operation of said treaty, or treaties, in each case? 4. What are the terms of said treaty, or treaties?

Mr. DEWDNEY. A treaty was made on the 11th of February of this year with two bands of Wood Cree Indians. About 11,000 square miles were surrendered, and 577 Indians were treated with. The number of acres to each family of five is the same as in Treaty No. 6, namely, 640 acres. The terms are similar to those of Treaty No. 6.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—MORTGAGE BONDS.

Mr. STE. MARIE asked, When will the Government produce the report ordered on the 4th March instant by this honorable House, on the motion of Mr. Ste. Marie, concerning the sale of fifteen million dollars of mortgage bonds by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The information asked for has not yet been received, but as soon as we have it the same will be laid on the table.

CAPE ENRAGE LIGHTHOUSE KEEPER.

Mr. WELDON (St. John) asked, Has there been any change of the lighthouse keeper of the Cape Enrage Light? If so, when was it made, and for what reason, and who is the present keeper? Has there been any investigation or enquiry as to the cause of the late fire which destroyed the engine house; when was such enquiry made, and what was the result of the enquiry?

Mr. TUPPER. By Order in Council of 29th March, 1888, Mr. W. J. Starratt was dismissed from the service, it appearing on an investigation held by the agent at St. John, that he had not given proper care and attention to the duties required; that on certain occasions the fog-alarm was not sounded during thick weather as required by the regulations, and that he had absented himself from his station without leave. Mr. James G. Barbour, of Waterside, Albert County, was appointed lighthouse keeper by Order in Council of 11th May, 1888. The old engine house was destroyed by fire on the 19th of December last, and the agent of the Department at St. John was instructed on the 22nd of December, to make enquiries and report fully as to the cause of the fire, and so on. A report was received on the 29th of December from the agent, stating that he did not consider that suspicion rested upon anyone, that the fire was accidental, having taken inside near the roof, and made strong headway before it was discovered. The engineer stated that he had incurred a personal loss of $100.

ARICHAT WEST BREAKWATER.

Mr. MACDOWALL (for Gen. LAURIE) asked, Whether the Department of Public Works has received any claim for compensation on account of property expropriated at the breakwater at Arichat West, in the county of Richmond, Cape Breton, for Miss Annabella Hubert; and if so, whether the claim can be favorably considered?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. A claim was received, and on enquiry it was ascertained that Miss Hubert was not the owner of the property in question; the agent of the Department of Justice, who examined the title, stating:

"It is plain that Miss Hubert has no title to the property in question; and as the works do not extend above the line of high water mark, no grant of a water lot for that spot having ever issued, and no damage being done to the premises, it is evident the parties actually owning those lands have likewise no right to claim damages."

This opinion was conveyed to Miss Hubert under date 8th November, 1886.

CORRECTION.

Mr. COOK. I notice in the Toronto World of the 22nd of March the following statement:—

"Mr. Cook's Bill to compel owners of elevators to provide proper precautions to prevent accidents, came to grief to-day in the Select Committee to which it had been referred. They came to the conclusion that the subject was one for provincial legislation."

I am not the author of the Bill. It was introduced by the member for North Ontario (Mr. Edgar).

Mr. MADILL. The Bill got the six months' hoist.

SUPPLY—JESUITS' ESTATES ACT.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster: "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply;" and the motion of Mr. O'Brien in amendment thereto.

Mr. McCARTHY. At the close of the sitting last evening I rose somewhat reluctantly, and only because I thought if I did not seize that opportunity, you, Sir, would call in the members, and the opportunity of addressing the House would be lost. I thought then, and I think now, that considering the nature of the motion which is before the House, it would not have been unreasonable for the Government, or some member of the Government, to have defended their action in the past in allowing the Bill under discussion, and to have given those reasons to us which, perhaps, would have justified their course, and, at all events, would have enabled those who differ from them to show wherein that difference lies. My hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) is entitled to the thanks of this House and country for bringing this matter before Parliament. It would have been, I think, an everlasting disgrace to us if, in this, a free Parliament and free country, there would be no member found out of the 200 odd who compose this House, to give voice to the opinions of a very large body of the people who have been aroused with regard to this measure. I say when my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) gave reasons why he thought this Bill should still be disallowed, notwithstanding the action of the Government, when he assailed the action of the Government upon constitutional grounds, and when to that was added the attack made by my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace), and the more elaborate attack, upon legal grounds, made by the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Barron), it does appear to me that it would have been ordinary courtesy to those hon. gentlemen, and to the House itself, that some defence should have been made from the Treasury benches. I hardly think that we can take seriously the defence which has been offered by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert). I do not for myself take it seriously. With regard to the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), the case is different. His remarks require attention, and from me they shall receive serious consideration. But, although my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) is a gentleman of long standing in the House, he frankly told us that he prayed, as I understood him, that he never again would have to present himself before his constituents to ask for a renewal of their confidence.

Mr. RYKERT. I did not say so.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

Mr. McCARTHY. I must have misunderstood the hon. gentleman, and, of course, take that back. Then my hon. friend, the other gentleman to whom I have referred (Mr. Colby), who spoke so feelingly and so ably, whose voice we are always glad to listen to, whose wisdom we all recognise, is possibly a prospective Minister; but, although that be so, I think it would still have been perhaps better if we had heard from an actual Minister, and not a prospective Minister, on a question of this importance. It may be that before this debate closes the House will hear from the Treasury benches upon this subject. Their silence so far in the discussion is, I consider, hardly giving us fair play. Fortified by the leaders opposite, fortified by the great number of hon. gentlemen who are going to support them in this House, I do think they should have allowed the small band here who are opposed to their action any possible advantage that could be given by the debate, and not have remained silent, but have given the reasons why the course of the Government should be sustained. However that may be, we must take the situation just as we find it, and I was not willing the discussion should close without giving the reasons why I am taking the course which I propose taking on this important matter, and in which I will have to separate myself from my political friends with whom it has been my pride and pleasure to act up to this time. The question must be considered in a two-fold aspect. It has to be considered as to its constitutionality in the narrower sense of the term, and as to its constitutionality in the wider sense of the term. If it is ultra vires the Legislature of Quebec, it ought to have been disallowed. If it is intra vires, if it is within the powers of the Legislature of that Province, then I still say it ought to have been disallowed. But the matters are so entirely separate and distinct—the one resting upon legal constitutional principles of one description, and the other depending upon considerations of a widely different character, that I have to ask the permission of the House to deal with these matters separately and distinctly. First, it is well we should clearly understand the character of the legislation which is assailed. It will not do to ignore the past; it will not do, as the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) did, to say it is not necessary to consider fine spun legal arguments, or to deal with the question in that way. All these questions have first to be considered from the legal point of view. We have a very large volume, not down to the present time, of the cases which have been disallowed, most of them because they were beyond the power of the Provincial Legislatures to enact. Therefore, the first question which the Minister of Justice had to report upon was whether this Act was constitutional in that sense of the term. The first question was whether it was within the powers of the Legislature of the Province. Then the other question came before himself and colleagues—a matter more of great public policy than of law—as to whether on these grounds the measure ought to have been disallowed. It is well to look at the Act, and although I have no doubt that all of us have read the Act and pretty well understand it, yet I will ask the House to bear with me while I give shortly a summary of what I consider to be the salient features of this most extraordinary piece of legislation. It commenced by a letter from the Premier of Quebec, in which he addressed His Eminence the Cardinal, who, I suppose, occupies somewhat the position of the Prime Minister of His Holiness the Pope. In that letter Mr. Mercier, having recited the history of the case, says:

"Under these circumstances, I deem it my duty to ask Your Eminence if you see any serious objection to the Government selling the property, pending a final settlement of the question of the Jesuits' Estates."

Here we have the Premier of one of our Provinces asking of His Holiness, or of the Secretary of the Propaganda, occupying the position to which I have referred, for permission, it being his duty, as he says, so to do, to sell the property—asking him to see if there is any serious objection in the way of the Government selling the property, pending the final settlement of the Jesuits' Estates. It is sufficiently startling to find such a recital in a British Act of Parliament, and I venture to say it is unheard of, I venture to say that, in all the legislation passed by the Parliaments of Great Britain or the Legislatures of any of the Colonies, you will search in vain to find any so humiliating a statement as this very first paragraph of the Bill presents to you. But that does not seem to excite surprise in the power to which it was addressed, because the answer is in this form:

"I hasten to notify you that, having laid your request before the Holy Father at the audience yesterday, His Holiness was pleased to grant permission to sell the property which belonged to the Jesuit Fathers before they were suppressed,——"

So the permission is given—

"—upon the express condition, however,——"

So the condition is annexed—

"—that the sum to be received be deposited and left at the free disposal of the Holy See."

Thus the Province of Quebec is permitted to legislate. The first step has been gained in the settlement of this important question. The free Parliament of Quebec, entrusted under the British North America Act with important powers, and representing a mixed community, a community with which the Supreme Pontiff of Rome has no power to interfere as a temporal power, asks, and the Supreme Pontiff graciously grants permission to that Legislature, to deal with what, I think I will show to the satisfaction of every member of this House before I close, was recognised as a portion of the public domain. Mr. Mercier did not see his way to allow this condition to be imposed. It could not be at the disposal of the Holy See, but—and to my mind it is a distinction without a difference—it was to be retained as a special deposit to be disposed of hereafter with the sanction of the Holy See. I do not know whether there is very much difference between these two provisions. It is a difference in words, but not a difference in fact or in substance, as the sequel has shown. Practically, it has been a gift to the Holy See, and has been distributed as to His Holiness the Pope seemed best. Then, having obtained this consent, as a condition precedent to the legislation, we find that negotiations were entered upon, and the result of these negotiations is that the lands of the Jesuits' Estates are to be left intact. That is another concession granted by the representative of the Holy See; and, instead of that, compensation in money is to be made, and the claim is presented, which we find amounts to $2,000,000. As $1,000,000 of that is the property of this Dominion, I do not think we have got rid of that claim yet. I do not suppose that the Province of Quebec could do more than make an arrangement in regard to that property which belonged to that Province; but, in regard to that which belongs to this Parliament or to this Dominion, I suppose, by-and-bye, we will have our First Minister asking leave—because what can be assented to by the authorities here as right in the Province of Quebec would not be wrong in regard to the property belonging to the Dominion—we may have the First Minister here asking that the portion of that property belonging to the Dominion shall be dealt with by permission of his Holiness at Rome. I find further in these documents the following:—

"I deem it my duty to ask your Eminence if you see any serious objection to the Government's selling the property, pending a final settlement of the question of the Jesuits' Estates."

There is no doubt at all about the meaning of this. There is no doubt about the understanding which is arrived at. Before the Government are put in full possession, and in order that they may be put in full possession of these estates, there is to be a compensation made, and, finally, the bargain is worked out, and the conditions of the bargain are, what? The conditions are that this arrangement is to be non-effective until it receives the sanction of His Holiness of Rome. It is to be ratified—that is the term used—but it means practically that it might be vetoed, and to make, no doubt, that there was no attempt at conciliation or at sparing the feelings of those who are known to entertain strong feelings on this subject, this matter was not submitted to His Holiness of Rome until it was brought before the Legislature of that Province. Whether that was by arrangement or not, I do not know. Whether it was paying proper respect or not to the Sovereign Pontiff to ask him to express his approval or disapproval, I do not pretend to judge, but the legislation of the Province is clearly made dependent upon the act of His Holiness the Pope of Rome. Not only so—and then I have finished my summary of the Act—but the sum of money which is granted, the $400,000 granted which is payable out of any money of the public revenue is to be distributed, in effect, though perhaps not in the terms of the contract, under and with the sanction of His Holiness of Rome. Now, that is shortly the meaning of this legislation. I will have finished with the Act when I make a further observation, and I make it now, perhaps, a little out of place, but it must not be altogether lost sight of. This Act in effect does away with the purposes for which the Jesuits' Estates were appropriated, and I think that is a matter of such great importance that I can only feel astonished at the calmness with which my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Colby) regards it, and the indifference with which it has been received among the Protestant portion of the Province of Quebec, as my hon. friend has stated. This Bill puts into the general fund the money which was granted for educational purposes. It misappropriates—I do not use the term in its technical sense, for I quite recognise the right of the Province to use the fund—but from a general standpoint it misappropriates this fund by providing that $400,000 may be paid thereout to a certain institution. Now, having said so much as to the Act, let me say a word or two as to the property, and that brings me to what might be a long history and a long statement, and I hope the House will not be impatient with me when I deal with this somewhat complicated matter, which I will endeavor to make as plain as I can. I do not accept the theory which I have seen put forward in some quarters, that the Jesuits held their estates in trust for educational purposes. As far as I have been able to examine the deeds—and I have examined the report made in the year 1824—these estates were given to them in fee simple for all time. So far as I can judge from the history of the body at that time, it was not an uncommon thing for the Jesuit Fathers to accumulate both lands and goods in very considerable quantities. I find that one of the accusations made against them was avarice; one of the causes of the suppression of their order shortly after that, was the complaint made by the other orders of the Church, that they were avaricious, and that they accumulated wealth unduly in their order, notwithstanding the vow of poverty which they had taken. But however that may be, I think it is quite plain that they did hold these estates for themselves. Now, then, just let me trace the story of events by which this country became subject to the British Crown. We must never forget—I am afraid that some of my friends from the Province of Quebec do sometimes forget—that this is a British country, that by the fortunes of war that event was decided and the greater half of North America passed under the British Crown; and that being so, effect had to be given to the laws to which the country then became subject. Now, what were those laws? Granting, Sir,—which is not quite accurate—that the Jesuits held these estates at the time of the Conquest—I spoke before of the manner in which they held them originally—but granting they held them at that date—which would not be accurate—when we have before us the decree of the Parliament of Paris, suppressing the Jesuit Order in the year 1762, taking from them their land; when we have that, it would not, I say, be strictly accurate to affirm, that at the time of the Definitive Treaty in 1763, these Jesuit Fathers held their estates as they certainly did aforetime. But even if they did, while admitting freely that this country, New France, having then a settled law, and passing under the British Crown as a conquered country, while I admit freely, that the British law did not, by virtue of the conquest, become the law of New France, I do say, it is beyond all doubt, that it was in the power of the conquering State to enact such laws as to the conquering State seemed proper, to change the civil law which then prevailed, and to introduce the common law of England. It is beyond all controversy that, the treaty having been agreed to on the 10th February, 1763, in the October following, the King did issue a proclamation that introduced at once into this country, the laws of Great Britain, and that those laws continued to be the laws of this country until, in 1774, the Quebec Act was passed, which restored to the French Canadian inhabitants, the civil law which they liked best, to which they were accustomed, and for which they had petitioned to the King and to the British Parliament. The constitutionality of the proclamation, the power of the King to introduce English law, is not now open to controversy, because the very self-same treaty underwent consideration in the celebrated case with which all lawyers who have made any attempt to master this subject are perfectly familiar; and it was upheld as constitutional, as a proper exercise of the prerogative power, and as being binding and efficacious to the full extent and limit of the command contained therein. Now, Sir, what was the effect of that? It will not be denied that at that time the Jesuits were an organisation which could not be tolerated, and were not tolerated, by the laws of England. I am not going now into any argument, any citation, to establish that point; it is beyond controversy. It was laid down by the law officers of the day—I have their citations here to establish it—it was laid down by Blackstone in his Commentaries, the first edition of which was published shortly before that period, that the Jesuit organisation was an illegal one, and then the moment British laws were introduced into this country, ipso facto the Jesuits' estates became forfeited to the Crown, and the title of the Crown to these estates has always been recognised from that period up, has always been considered as indefeasible. If sanction was wanted for it, we could find it by the action of the Parliaments of this country, upon petition of the French Canadian people of the country, who desired that the lands should be kept for educational purposes when it was proposed to give out of these lands, and perhaps the lands themselves, to General Amherst, who had been the general in command at the time of the cession. So not only have we, as I will prove, by the law that was enunciated by the law officers of the Crown, by the highest authorities of the day, but we have the action of our own Parliaments, the Parliament of the Province of Quebec before the Union, the Parliament of United Canada after the Union; and yet, Sir, here, 100 years afterwards, we find the Premier of the Province suing humbly to the Pope of Rome for liberty to sell the Jesuits' estates. Can humiliation go much further, if we are indeed a free people.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh! Oh!

Mr. McCARTHY. Some of my hon. friends laugh; I do not see any laughing matter in it, I cannot see why they should laugh about it. If the property is in the condition that I have proved it to be, I think the conclusion that I have stated follows from it; and if we are a free people, if the Act of Supremacy means anything, if we are not subject to his Holiness of Rome in temporal matters—I am not speaking of spiritual matters, I am speaking of the public domain of this country, I am talking about the temporal power, it was of that power that consent was asked to dispose of the estates—and so I say it is a humiliation to us as a free people to find that one of the Premiers of this Dominion has thought it necessary to obtain the sanction of any foreign authority to dispose of this property. It is argued that the Pope is no longer a foreign potentate; I think he is. His temporal power was never feared, it was the spiritual power which was struck at by the Act of Supremacy, not the temporal power of the Pope. It was the power that he claimed to excommunicate Sovereigns, to absolve their subjects from their allegiance—these were what was struck at by the Act of Supremacy, not his guns or his men, for guns and men he never had in numbers to alarm or affect any of the great powers of Europe. Now, Sir, am I right or am I wrong, in what I have stated?—because I desire to make no misstatement of this question. Let us see just what the law officers of the Crown stated at that time. We know how it was done. The law officers, I believe, at that time, were Mr. Thurlow, the Attorney General, and Mr. Wedderburn, Solicitor General, both distinguished lawyers, but neither of them perhaps, competent to give an opinion in matters of civil law. Sir James Marriott was skilled in civil law and in ecclesiastical law, and he was called upon for a report—merely for a report, because the responsibility still rested with the law officers of the Crown. Extracts of his report have been published, and we are more or less familiar with them, and his report established, and the law officers adopted his conclusion, that the Jesuit estates were at once forfeited to the Crown. That under the treaty there was no claim for either the Jesuits or for other religious communities; but, anxious as the Sovereign was—and, I say, if you will look back at the history of that period, no man with British blood will have cause to regret the conduct of the British authorities in those days or the manner of their disposition—the Sovereign said: The Jesuits are beyond the pale. We cannot listen, for one moment, to their holding their estates, but the other religious communities are to be permitted to remain in possession of their estates, and they are to remain there for the purpose of enabling us to judge whether it is necessary under the treaty (afterwards, under the Statute of 1774, they were continued in their possession), in order that effect might be given to that portion of the treaty, and that portion of the Act of Parliament, which guaranteed to the inhabitants of the conquered country their rights. I shall have to trouble the House with reference to the facts which govern the whole subsequent proceedings, and let me commence with the earliest date. On 13th August, 1763, in the instructions which were given by the Earl of Egremont to Governor Murray, we find these words:

"Though the King has, in the 4th article of the Definitive Treaty, agreed to grant the 'Liberty of the Catholic religion to the inhabitants of Canada;' and though His Majesty is far from entertaining the most distant thoughts of restraining his new Roman Catholic subjects from professing the worship of their religion according to the rites of the Romish Church, yet the condition expressed in the same article must always be remembered, viz:—'As far as the laws of Great Britain permit:' which laws prohibit absolutely all popish hierarchy in any of the dominions belonging to the Crown of Great Britain, and can only admit of a toleration of the exercise of that religion. This matter was clearly understood in the negotiation of the Definitive Treaty. The French Ministers proposed to insert the words comme ci-devant in order that the Romish religion should continue to be exercised in the same manner as under their Government; and they did not give up the point till they were plainly told that it would be deceiving them to admit those words, for the King had not the power to tolerate that religion in any other manner than 'as far as the laws of Great Britain permit.' These laws must be your guide in any disputes that may arise on this subject; but at the same time that I point out to you the necessity of adhering to them, and of attending with the utmost vigilance to the behaviour of the Priests, the King relies on your acting with all proper caution and prudence in regard to a matter of so delicate a nature as this of religion; and that you will, as far as you can consistently with your duty in the execution of the laws and with the safety of the country, avoid everything that can give the least unnecessary alarm or disgust to His Majesty's new subjects."

That is the foundation of all the subsequent proceedings. We find in 1765 these instructions further given, and they are found in the commission to the King's Receiver General, and read as follows:—

"And whereas the lands of several religious societies in the said Province, particularly those of the Society of the Jesuits, are, or will become, part of His Majesty's revenue, you are therefore to endeavor, by agreements to be made with the persons interested for the present in any of the said estates, to take the said estates into your charge, giving unto them respectively such competent allowance thereon for their lives, as you may judge proper, taking care that these lands may not be sequestered or alienated from His Majesty."

Again, in a letter from Lord Shelburne to Governor Carleton, November 14, 1767, we read:

"It has been represented to His Majesty that the Jesuits of Canada make large remittances to Italy, and that they imperceptibly diminish their effects for that purpose * * * Too much care cannot be taken that they do not embezzle an estate of which they enjoy only the life-rent and which must become on their demise a very considerable resource to the Province, in case His Majesty should be pleased to cede it for that purpose."

As to the effect which is to be given to the treaty, although perhaps I have said enough on that point, I want to fortify my position. I do not expect hon. gentlemen will be willing to take my ipse dixit in a matter of this kind, and I desire to establish from the public records the doctrines which were held by the law officers at the time, in order to make good my point. Sir James Marriott reported at great length, and the book is accessible to all, and no doubt many hon. members have taken advantage of it. He reports on this particular question, which hon. members can easily understand when we look at the terms of the treaty. Let me read from it:

"His Britannic Majesty agrees to grant the liberty of the Catholic religion to the inhabitants of Canada; he will consequently give the most effectual orders that his new Roman Catholic subjects may profess the worship of their religion according to the rites of the Roman Church as far as the law of Great Britain permit."

Now, we all see the difficulty that at once arose. The laws of Great Britain at that time hardly permitted the exercise of the Roman Catholic religion. The law officers of the Crown, however, decided that this was not to be treated as a dead letter, but that full effect in every way must be given to the treaty. The difficulty was in reconciling the profession of the Roman Catholic religion with the laws of Great Britain, which practically forbid the practice of that religion, and so the proposition is worked out. And how is it worked out? Sir James Marriott gave an opinion on this point as follows:—

"Now, I consider that the laws and constitution of this Kingdom, permit perfect freedom of the exercise of any religious worship in the colonies, but not of all sorts of doctrines, nor the maintenance of any foreign authority, civil or ecclesiastical, which doctrines and authority may affect the supremacy of the Crown or safety of Your Majesty and the realm; for a very great and necessary distinction, as it appears to me, must be taken between the profession of the worship of the Romish religion, according to the rites of it, and its principles of church government. To use the French word, the culte, or forms of worship or ritual are totally distinct from some of its doctrines The first can, may and ought, in my opinion, in good policy and justice to be tolerated, though the second cannot be tolerated."

Mr. Wedderburn, afterwards Lord Loughborough, gave an opinion on the same subject. Speaking more especially in regard to the Jesuits, he said:

"The establishment of the first (the Jesuits) is not only incompatible with the constitution of an English province, but with every other possible form of civil society. By the rule of their order the Jesuits are aliens in every government. They are not owners of their estates but trustes for purposes dependent upon the pleasure of a foreigner, the General of their order. Three great Catholic states have, upon grounds of policy, expelled them. It would be singular if the first Protestant state in Europe should protect an establishment that ere now must have ceased in Canada had the French Government continued. * * * It is therefore, equally just and expedient, in this instance, to assert the sovereignty of the King and to declare the lands of the Jesuits are vested in His Majesty, allowing at the same time to the Jesuits now residing in Canada liberal pensions out of the incomes of their estates."

This opinion was reported by him to the law officers of the Crown, and the opinion of the law officers of the Crown framed upon it is the foundation of what was afterwards embodied in regard to this subject in the Quebec Act. Then we find in the Quebec Act that while the religion of the inhabitants of the country was specially protected, that the religious communities were excepted therefrom and that they were left to be dealt with by the Crown, thereby leaving those matters just as they stood,—owing to the conquest, by virtue of that conquest and by virtue of that proclamation—leaving matters exactly as they stood with regard to the religions communities, and dealt with the people of the country as distinct and separable from their religious communities. Then let me read what was the outcome of the Quebec Act. It was passed in 1774, and in 1775 express instructions are given to Guy Carleton, the Captain General and the Governor in Chief of the Province of Canada, and these are the instructions:

"That the Society of Jesus be suppressed and dissolved, and no longer continued as a body corporate and politic, and all their rights, possessions, and property shall be vested in Us, for such purposes as we may hereafter think fit to direct or appoint; but we think fit to declare Our Royal intention to be, that the present members of the said Society as established at Quebec, shall be allowed sufficient stipends and provisions during their natural lives."

Now, can it be reasonably argued, that this estate of the Jesuits did not vest and pass to the Crown, and were not held by the Crown? I have spoken of this simply as a lawyer, I have spoken of it simply upon the grounds and with reference to the authorities which I find I offer no opinion of my own about it, and I simply state facts as I find them. Let me follow up a little farther to see what becomes of these matters. Sir James Marriott's opinion is again invoked, but I will not trouble the House with this long extract. Sufficient to say that it substantially agrees with his former opinion. In a few words, just to summarise what he states, he says:

"In a few words the Society of Jesus had not and cannot have any estate in Canada legally and completely vested in them at any time, and therefore could not and cannot transfer the same before nor after the term of eighteen months so as to make a good title to purchasers, either with or without the powers or ratification of the Father General who, as he could not retire, so he cannot retain any possessions in Canada, since the time limited for the sales of estates there agreeably to the terms of the treaty; because he is as incapable of becoming a British subject, as he was of being a French subject; nor can the individuals of the communities of the Jesuits in Canada, take or transfer what the Father General cannot take or transfer; nor can they, having but one common stock with all to other communities of their order in every part of the globe, hold immoveable possessions, to be applied for the joint benefit of those communities which are resident in foreign states; and which may become the enemies of His Majesty and his Government."

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is the third opinion as to how the estates are confiscated.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is the third opinion. It is in the same report to which I have referred, or rather it is the second opinion on this special question submitted to Sir James Marriott with regard to the Jesuits' properties. Now, in 1770, General Amherst, then Lord Amherst, I believe, petitioned the Crown to be compensated for the services which he had rendered the country in the conquest of Canada out of these estates; or rather he made a petition generally, and the King ordered and directed that the General should be compensated, and compensated out of the Jesuits' estates. I only state that to show that these estates were dealt with at that time beyond all peradventure as a part of the Crown lands. Now I would read one extract which shows the different manner in which the Jesuits were treated from the other religious communities; by-and-bye, perhaps, it may be my duty to point out why it was so, for I cannot very well, however much I would wish to avoid it, however much I would wish to do as my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Colby) did, ignore the past. I am afraid it will be impossible to treat this subject properly without some little reference to the historical facts we have relating to the Jesuit Order. But however that may be, we find that the Royal Instructions in 1772 were conveyed in this way:

"It was declared that for the present and until we can be fully informed of the true state of the religious communities, and how far they are or are not essential to the exercise of the religion of the Church of Rome as allowed in the said province, to permit those religious communities to remain in possession of their estates."

There, was a clear line of demarcation in dealing with the ordinary religious communities. I, perhaps, am not familiar enough with the language to state what that difference was, but there was a clear distinction drawn between the ordinary religious communities, if I may so express it, and the particular body which is now more especially under discussion. Now we have come down very nearly to 1791 or 1792. We have got things down to the period in which the Province was granted a species of representative government which continued up to the Union of 1840 or 1841; and we find, if we consult history, that there was a loud protest against the King appropriating this property. It was no denial of his right, but it was against the wisdom and fairness and justice of his handing over this property to the General who had conquered the country; the allegation being put up then, and then, so far as I know, for the first time, that this property had been really given to the Jesuits for the purpose, and in trust, for education. I think, Sir, that if you will consult Mr. Garneau's history, which I believe is the history most acceptable to my hon. friends from the Province of Quebec, that it will be found as early as 1800 that that matter was brought prominently before the Legislature, and from that time out the agitation in that view was kept up so briskly and so successfully, that in 1830 or in 1831 the Crown ceded and granted to the Province all these Jesuits' estates for the express purpose for which it had been asked, and that was for the purpose of education. The Province accepted the trust, the Province dealt with it on that footing; and if I may read the first section of the Act, chapter 41, William IV, passed in 1832, we find that by an Act of that Province it was stated:

"That all moneys arising out of the estates of the late Order of Jesuits which now are in, or may hereafter come in the hands of the Receiver General, shall be applied to the purposes of education exclusively."

Again, in 1846, 9 Victoria, chapter 59, another legislative declaration, this time by the united Provinces, says:

"That the revenue and interests arising from the real or funded property forming part of the estates of the late Order of the Jesuits and now at the disposal of the Legislature for educational purposes in Lower Canada, shall be, and are hereby declared to be applicable to such purposes, and to no other."

And, finally, in 1856, 19-20 Victoria, chapter 54, the legislation on the matter says:

"The estates and property of the late Order of the Jesuits, whether in possession or reversive, including all sums funded or invested, or to be funded or invested as forming part thereof are hereby appropriated for the purposes of this Act and shall form a fund to be called the Lower Canada Superior Education Investment Fund."

I think, if there ever was a title to an estate or property recognised by legislative action, clear in its origin, made more certain and more definite at every stage in which we find it cropping up from time to time, it is the title to the Jesuits' estates. When we are asking His Excellency the Governor General to disallow this Act, when we are taking upon ourselves the responsibility of saying yea or nay on that question, it is impossible that we can deny to ourselves the opportunity of scrutinising every syllable and every letter in it; and I find here:

"The Act of the Legislature, 48 Victoria, chapter 19, notwithstanding section 5 of the said Act, and notwithstanding any other Act to the contrary, shall apply to the said estates, the proceeds whereof may be applied also, notwithstanding any Act to the contrary, for the above mentioned purposes, or for any other purposes approved by the Legislature.

So that this special property, set apart for education in the Province of Quebec—not the education of the majority, to whom my friend behind me pays such humble court, but all the people of the Province of Quebec, the minority as well as the majority—has been swept away by this enactment; although, when the Premier was taxed in Quebec the other day with the question, his answer was by no means such as might have been expected, but was evasive, and not, I am afraid, altogether according to the record. If ever there was legislation which we could interfere with on such grounds, it is this;—property given by the Crown, for the express purpose of the education of the people of the Province; property which remained for that purpose from the year 1831, to the year 1888; property which a Parliament, elected under an excitement of race and revenge, has decided should be taken away from the minority, as well as the majority, and dedicated to other purposes and other uses. Well, Sir, I say—and that is my first proposition—if I have satisfied this House, that this property was public domain—and, if I am not able to satisfy the House of that, I am incapable of making any statement—then the proposition with which I started, is made out, that this Act uses Her Most Gracious Majesty's name as enacting that, her own estates, or the estates she had surrendered to the Province of Quebec, for the purposes of education, were not hers, not the Province's. All this history of the past is to be blotted out; it is to be all child's play; the Crown did not own, the Crown did not get, the Crown did not take, the Crown did not grant a rod, but went through a farce, when it dedicated the property for educational purposes, at first to the Province of Quebec, and again, to the United Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada. All that was humbug, nonsense, child's play; the property was all the time vested in either the Sovereign Pontiff, or in the Order of Jesuits; and, as a result, the Pope is applied to, as the only authority which could authorise the disposal of this property, which, most people had thought, belonged to the Crown, for permission to dispose of it. Let me do no injustice; let me read the words again:

"Under these circumstances, I deem it my duty to ask Your Eminence if you see any serious objection to the Government's selling the property, pending a final settlement of the question of the Jesuits' estates."

If the Supremacy Act is in force, and whether it is in force or not, I hold it to be, and I believe it can be established to be, a well settled principle of international law, that no foreign authority or power—I care not whether it be temporal or spiritual—can be allowed to interfere in the affairs of another country or another state; and if that be the rule of international law—as I think my hon. friends, if they choose to consult the authorities, will find it to be—how much more does that principle apply to the municipal law of the country, and to the law of Elizabeth, which has been handed down and made specially applicable to this country by the Quebec Act of 1774. How was it possible, I say, to tell that an Act of Parliament would be submitted to His Excellency the Governor General, that he was to pass upon it by the advice of his Minister of Justice, and that the Minister of Justice should send it back—how? Why, Sir, with a dozen other Bills of no more consequence than an Act incorporating a joint stock company or a railway company—no explanation, no justification, no reasons given. I regret that I have not heard the argument of the hon. Minister of Justice. I may do him an injustice; but I read here, that when an appeal was made from the Evangelical Alliance or some other body in Lower Canada—those people who my hon. friend says are willing that this legislation should stand—the hon. Minister of Justice reported that this was a fiscal matter. Sir, I do not understand the Queen's English if this can properly be described as a fiscal matter. But so it passed before His Excellency, and upon that His Excellency has acted; and I trust the opportunity will be afforded to His Excellency to reconsider that question, and see whether Her Majesty's name is thus to be trailed in the dust, is thus to be dishonored, and whether this legislation should not disappear from our Statute-books, whether it be provincial or federal. Well, I assail this, not merely upon that ground. I assail it upon other grounds. I say that either this Act is unconstitutional, that it is ultra vires of a Province, that it ought to have been disallowed upon that ground, because it violates a fundamental principle of this country, that all religions are free and equal before the law; or, if that be not so as a legal proposition, then, Sir, I claim that there should have been exercised that judgment, that discretion, that policy, which would at once stamp out in whatever Province it reared its head, the attempt which has been made here to establish a kind of State Church amongst us. Sir, is that law or is it not? We find that in the good old days a Protestant Church had to be despoiled; and for my part, Sir, I have never regretted that the Clergy Reserves were secularised, and I do not believe that anyone who belongs to that church can say that that measure has proved injurious to it. It placed it on a footing of equality with the other religious bodies throughout the Provinces; and I believe that church has grown and prospered far more as a church, holding no legal pretence of superiority over other religious bodies, than it would have done if it had continued to hold the Clergy Reserves, no matter how much wealth they might have added to its coffers. Now, what do we find in this Bill, enacted by the United Parliament of Canada—an Act referring to Upper Canada and to Lower Canada, and, so far as I know, to this very moment, the law of the Province of Quebec? First, we do know that the laws of the Provinces which were in force at the time of the British North America Act, remained in force until repealed. And what do we find?

"Whereas the recognition of legal equality among all religious denominations is an admitted principle of colonial legislation; and whereas, in the state and condition of this Province, to which such a principle is peculiarly applicable, it is desirable the same should receive the sanction of the direct legislative authority, recognising and declaring the same as a fundamental principle of civil policy."

Therefore the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession, without discrimination or preference, so long as the same be not made an excuse for acts of maliciousness, or a justification of practices inconsistent with the peace and safety of the Provinces, is, by the constitution and laws of these Provinces, allowed to all Her Majesty's subjects therein. There is a legislative declaration of what every man who lives in this country has always understood to be the law. Does this enactment of the Province of Quebec violate that principle? Is the grant of $400,000, to be distributed under the sanction of His Holiness of Rome, not a grant of public money to a particular church? I am not saying whether the church may or may not be the correct church; I am simply speaking of the legal principle. I ask, how is that? Let me give you an answer from the books of the Legislature when the Clergy Reserves were secularised. What were those reserves? They were lands belonging to the Crown, held in trust for the support and maintenance of the Protestant faith, and held to apply to the Church of England and the Presbyterian Church of Scotland. When these lands were secularised, it was declared that the Act was for the purpose of sweeping away the last vestige of connection between Church and State. The holding of these lands by the Crown for this purpose formed a connecting link between Church and State, which Parliament stated should be swept away, which the representatives of the Province of Quebec joined with those from the other Province in saying should be swept away. Will any man of common sense tell me that this grant of $400,000, given as it is given, is not a recognition of Church and State? How is it given?

"The aforesaid arrangements, entered into between the Premier and the Very Reverend Father Turgeon, are hereby ratified, and the Lieutenant Governor in Council is authorised to carry them out according to their form and tenor.

"The Lieutenant Governor in Council is authorised to pay, out of any public money at his disposal, the sum of four hundred thousand dollars, in the manner and under the conditions mentioned in the documents above cited, and to make any deed that he may deem necessary for the full and entire execution of such agreement."

Then the document I have just cited declares that this $400,000 is to be distributed under the sanction of His Holiness the Pope of Rome. Now, I have heard it said—I rather think I heard the First Minister applauding the sentence—that this was given for the purposes of education. Surely the First Minister has not read the Act, or he would never assent to a statement of that kind. Education—why, if it is possible to draw a distinction in an Act of Parliament, it is drawn here. While the $60,000, which is the supposed compensation to the minority, is expressly given for education—expressly tied up, and is not to go to any sectarian purposes—the other is left subject to the disposition of His Holiness of Rome. There is but one condition annexed, and that is that this money is to be spent within the Province of Quebec. That is the sole condition. We have had an indication in the press this morning that a bull or a brief, whatever be the correct ecclesiastical term, either has been or is to be issued, disposing of this money. Do you want any further evidence that the grant was made absolutely subject to the disposition of a particular religious body? If so, on what pretence, on what ground was it made. Was there a legal claim? Mr. Mercier says no. Was there a moral claim? I would like to know who will answer yes to this. Even my hon. friend behind me will not say that. He and his Protestant friends have always repudiated the idea of a moral claim. What pretence of a moral claim is there? Where is it? In whom is it? Why, the Jesuits of those days, if they held it individually, are extinct. They left no heirs. If they held it as a community, and undoubtedly that was the opinion of the law officers of the Crown—an opinion which I humbly venture to think was right—it belonged to the whole body. That was held by the Parliament of Paris in the great Trading Case, where the General Superior of the Order repudiated the liability contracted by one of the communities or one of the Jesuits. After full investigation, after an appeal to the highest tribunal, the tribunal of the Parliament of Paris—and hon. gentlemen, I am sure, from the Province of Quebec will not object to that—my hon. friend from Montreal (Mr. Curran) laughs. He is an Irishman and perhaps despises the Parliament of Paris. I confess I do not join with him, although I am an Irishman also. I rather think that must have been a very important appelate tribunal. At all events, if you will read the report of the Attorney General with regard to that, if you will read the proceedings, if you will remember that all the books of the order were for the first time brought into court in order that the order might escape liability, and repudiate responsibility, and make it appear that they were not bound to these merchants for the money that Father Lavalette owed—if you will look at all that, you will see the result was the court determined there was a solidarity amongst all the communities, and that the Jesuit property belonged to, and was at the disposal of, the General of the Order and was vested in him alone. I have taken the trouble to examine into the authority of the General of the Order, and if it were not too tedious, I would give some extracts which would abundantly establish that. I, therefore, contend there can be no pretence of a moral claim. Is the incorporated body of the other day the successors of these men of 1763? On what pretence? If I read the Act of Incorporation aright, I understand it to mean that the whole body of Jesuits throughout the world are incorporated by the Province of Quebec. The first clause of the Act is as follows:—

"The 'Society of Jesus' shall be a corporation, composed of the Reverend Fathers Henri Hudon, Adrien Turgeon, Léonard Lemire, George Kenny, Arthur Jones, and all persons who now or may hereafter form part of the said Society, in accordance with its rules, by-laws and regulations. Under the above name it shall have perpetual succession."

So that the Act of Incorporation, which I venture to think is not worth the paper it is written upon—and I trust it may be found so—actually incorporates the whole body of Jesuits, and only in that sense. They pretend to represent the body of 1763 which was suppressed in 1774, but I place no reliance on that suppression. I admit we cannot take notice, standing in an English country, governed by English laws, paying regard, as we are bound, to the Act of Supremacy, of that suppression. The English law officers of the Crown could not notice the suppression by the Pope of the Order of the Jesuits. I affirm that beyond all fear of contradiction. I say it is impossible, in an English community, to say that the Pope's bull or the Pope's brief dissolving a corporation could have the slightest possible effect. So that the matter stands in the way I have endeavored to point out, and I say, without fear of contradiction, that my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Colby) was right, when he said, there was not the shadow of foundation, or even the pretence of a moral claim. Under these circumstances, is there any possible standing ground for this Act? Does it not violate the rule of the separation of Church and State in this country, and the equality of all religions? I need not go through the second ground of this resolution, because I have sufficiently dealt with it; so I have now come, and I trust without undue delay, to the other branch of the argument which I desire to present. In all fairness to my hon. friends, I must say that, if there is, in the legal propositions which I have endeavored faintly to put forward, a reasonable doubt, I do not think that, standing alone, it would be becoming on the part of a Minister of the Crown, to disallow the measure, because that would place it, as you will see, in the hands of the Government here, to disallow, on pretence of ultra vires of the Local Legislature, enactments which might be open to question, and which the parties ought to have the benefit of the ruling of a court upon. But I have endeavored to point out, upon the grounds I have already stated, that this Act ought to have been disallowed as being beyond the power of a Local Legislature. I do not desire to be at all misunderstood. I do not pretend that the Crown of England, or the Crown of any other country, cannot submit matters to a foreign Power. We know it is done continually. We know that matters are settled by arbitration, and that generally, and almost always, it is done by calling in the arbitrament of a foreign Power; but I contend that, while the Sovereign Power can do that, the private subject cannot. There is a broad distinction. If I have a dispute with my hon. friend, I cannot submit that to the President of the United States, because the dispute would be between British subjects. And I say that a Province cannot do that, because it does not represent the plenary power of the Crown; and I say that even this Parliament cannot do it, and, of course, it does not stand in the same position as the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland. But on the grounds of policy, surely I am right. Surely there are not men enough in this House who will cast any doubt upon the clause of this resolution which declares that there should be a separation of Church and State, and absolute equality of all religions before the law. Surely, in this part of the nineteenth century, and in free Canada, we will not have to fight for a principle which we thought was determined for all time when the secularisation of the Clergy Reserves took place. Is it because this is a particular church? If it is right in the Province of Quebec to grant money to the Church of Rome, it would be equally right in the Province of Ontario to grant money for the maintenance of the Methodists or the Episcopalian body or Scotch Church; and, if we did that, there would be no hesitation—and properly so—in bringing before the House the complaint of the minority whose money would be spent in that way and for that purpose. We never find that, when the body to which I refer feels that its interests are at stake, and that injustice is being done, it has any hesitation or makes any delay at all in coming at once before Parliament and proclaiming its grievances. These people never say: We are afraid we will be stirring up religious strife, causing hard feelings, or putting race against race and Catholic against Protestant. No, they come here—as they have a right to do—and boldly put their case before Parliament, no matter what it may be; and they always manage to get justice, at all events. If Parliament think any doubt is to be cast upon this measure, if they find that this money is dedicated for educational purposes, I think in that case the point I am attempting to make would fail; but when I observe the definiteness of the provision under which the $60,000 is granted, I cannot see that any such purpose is intended with regard to the $400,000. I, therefore, say that that part of the case is made out. Let me now come to a question which I would have willingly avoided. Let me invite the attention of the House to the greater question which is before it. These are technical matters that I have dealt with so far—matters perhaps of moment, matters of great importance, but still, after all, they are more or less purely legal in the narrow sense of the word, or purely constitutional in the same narrow sense of the word. But I assail this legislation upon broader and higher grounds. I say that the incorporation of, and the grant of money to, the Jesuit body under any pretext or for any purpose, was an Act which should have at once been disallowed if it were passed by a Provincial Legislature. I put that upon the highest possible grounds. I think I have a right, and it is a right which I propose to exercise, to speak with freedom on this subject. I will assail no man's religion. I will not utter a word, which, properly understood, will give offence to the most sensitive on this subject; but I deny the right of my hon. friend behind me or any one else to gag me, and to say, You must remember that the Jesuit body is under the protecting ægis of His Holiness of Rome, and you must not speak of it except with bated breath. I deny that any such rule can apply to this free Parliament. It is not a question of religion. It is not a question whether the religion of the Church of Rome is better than the religion which I was brought up in, and which I profess. I am not to sit in judgment on my fellow members. They are quite right to worship their God in the manner they choose, as I am right in worshipping Him in the manner I choose, but I contend that the Church of Rome needs not the Jesuit body for its organisation or its support. It is true that, during the reign of certain Pontiffs, that order has received the support of the church. It is also true that, during the reign of other Pontiffs, it has been banned and sometimes dissolved. One case has been mentioned, and it was once before, if my hon. friend will go so far back, though it is perhaps unfair to bring it up here in judgment against them. The fact, however, proves that the order, or company, or society of which we are speaking, is not in any sense essential to the free, perfect and full enjoyment of the Roman Catholic religion. And what is the society, what is the object of its founder? I will quote from what appears to be a very fair statement in the Quarterly Review of 1874, containing a summary of what appears to have been the object of the founder. It was:

"To effect an organisation which would result in a thoroughly disciplined and mobilised body of men, moving like a highly trained military unit at the word of command, and standing ever ready under the proclaimed chieftainship of Jesus, to war against and smite by superior dexterity in arms, the foes adverse to the absolute ascendancy of the Papal system."

Let any person who knows anything about their history quarrel with that definition of the Order of Jesus. I should be glad to know wherein that definition is incorrect. They take a vow of implicit obedience to their chief. He says go, and they go; come, and they come. They are educated so as to have no will, and, to use the language of the Spiritual Exercises of the founder of the order himself, they ought to be:

"Like a corpse who has neither will nor understanding, or like a small crucifix which is turned about at the will of him who holds it, or like a staff in the hands of an old man, who uses it as may best assist or please him."

I believe I am citing nothing which is not reliable. I take this from the authorised version of the constitutions, as they are called, and it is to be found among the Spiritual Exercises determined by the founder. Let me give one extract upon this subject:

"It is so complete and entire that while every member of the society is obliged to obey the General as implicitly and blindly as if he were Jesus Christ, in all things whatsoever, without reserve, without exception, without question or examination, or even mental hesitation, to carry into execution anything he may prescribe with the same fullness of consent and submission that they feel in the belief of the dogmas of the Catholic faith itself, to be in his hands as passive as a corpse, or as a staff in the hands of an old man, or as Abraham when under the command of God, he was ordered to sacrifice his son, he must persuade himself on principle that all that he has ordered to do is right, and above all personal feeling and volition."

I am quoting from the decree of the Parliament of Paris. Much more might be adduced to the same effect. Those who have thought of this subject, those who have given it any consideration, have, no doubt, made up their mind one way or the other on it. Nothing, perhaps, is more true than the statement that is made in the report of the Attorney General of Paris, who was called upon to investigate the position of this body. Looking at them as one set of people are anxious to do, and they appear to be all right; look at them from the other side, and they hardly appear to the same advantage. I think it is only fair to say—I do not desire at all to be misunderstood—that the individual men are, perhaps, the élite of their order, highly educated, better educated, better men upon the whole, for their system of drill. The long probationary period they have to undergo, necessarily weeds out the weak ones and leaves only the strong and robust—intellectually as well as physically—and, I suppose, that amongst no equal number of men will the compeers of the Jesuits be found. I will read a note showing the view of the Attorney General of the Parliament of Paris, in his report:

"The constitutions have two faces——"

That reminds me of the shield of the hon. gentleman opposite, one side of which he presented on his visit to England to float our bonds, and the other side of which he shows to us when he comes back.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Both sides were perfectly correct.

Mr. McCARTHY. I accept that illustration also; that applies still more forcibly to what I am going to read—both sides here appear to be perfectly correct also:

"The constitutions have two faces, because they were formed into two intentions—on the one side, for the glory of God and the salvation of souls; and on the other side, for the glory of the society and its future extension. This causes the difference of opinion concerning them. Their admirers look only at the first aspect, and their detractors see only the second."

Now, I think that statement was one that I was bound to make, because I am not at all here as a Protestant bigot. I do not pretend to make any statement here as a Protestant. I was astonished to hear the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) speak as a Protestant. I do not speak as a Protestant, I speak as a representative of my constituency, entitled to discuss all subjects that are presented here, and without offence, as I trust I am doing on this occasion, to the feelings of any hon. member of this House. Now, let me give a slight idea of their organisation, of the vows which they take, of the obedience which their constitution inculcates, and which they are always willing to render. I will show what is said of them in modern times, because I have been told, and I admit the fact, that it is not fair to judge any order or body of men by their history of two or three hundred years ago. But I think I will be able to show that, down to a very recent period, there is in this body no change nor shadow of turning, that it is their boast that they are, and will continue, as long as they exist, to be under the same rules that the founder of the order, now the sainted Ignatius, established for them. Now, let us see what is said of them by comparatively recent writers. I regret that our library does not afford a very full catalogue of works in regard to this subject, and I have been compelled to rely upon authorities written 20 or 25 years ago. I will read such as I have, and the House will be able to judge of their pertinence to the order at present. Garnier-Pagé says:

"They know but one law, one faith, and one morality. That law, faith, and morality, they call authority. To a superior they submit life and conscience. To their order they sacrifice individuality. They are neither Frenchmen, Italians, Germans, nor Spaniards. They are not citizens of any country. They are Jesuits only. They have but one family, one fortune and one end; and all these are included in the word community."

Mr. LANDERKIN. A regular Tory Order.

Mr. McCARTHY. Very much like that: that is the only reason you do not belong to them, I am afraid. I am now quoting from the Quarterly Review, and if hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to read that article, and it is a fair criticism, so far as I am capable of judging, of the works of the Jesuits and the Jesuit writings which were under review, I think they will be satisfied. In the Quarterly Review of 1874 I was very glad to find that the popular delusion as to the poisoning of the Pope who dissolved the order, was exploded by the writer. Down to a very recent period, indeed, this had been believed on the authority of a high and distinguished German doctor, who wrote in 1872, and stated on undoubted authority that Pope Clement the Thirteenth had been poisoned by that order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McCARTHY. I say that a German doctor said so; and that this English authority in 1874 exploded that doctrine and showed that it did not rest on any solid foundation. I was very glad, and I am sure any hon. gentleman will be glad to find that that is so. But the author who dealt with the Jesuits in that impartial spirit may be perhaps entitled to some credence when he depicts, as he does in the following year, some doctrines held by the order. He endeavors to establish, and, in my humble judgment, he does establish, that the three principles upon which the order is established are justified, a Probabalism, Mental reservation, and that the end justifies the means. To argue that, would involve an enquiry foreign perhaps to this discussion. I am merely stating the conclusion at which the writer arrived, and every hon. member can form his own opinion as to whether that opinion is well or ill-founded. But, in practical matters, let us see what this order lays down. First, as to the duties of a judge, the writer says:

"We are told, also, it is by no means decided that a judge is bound never to accept money gifts from a party to a suit before him. If the gift were proffered with the view of influencing a prospective judgment, contrary to justice, the judge should, indeed, sternly refuse acceptance; 'but, the sentence having been already pronounced, it is a matter of controversy' whether he may not retain what might then seem a mere offering of gratitude from one benefited by the delivered sentence, even when this had been contrary to justice. Decisions of this character subvert fundamental notions as to right and wrong. Let us take the case of a person knowing all about a theft and accepting hush-money from the guilty party. According to received ideas, the compact would be criminal. Father Gury, however, decides that, provided the person bribed be not ex-officio bound to give information, the bargain would be quite lawful, 'as without injustice he might keep silence about the thief, in deference to his entreaties * * * therefore, espari, without injustice, silence might be observed in deference to gifts given or promised.'"

I need not tell hon. gentlemen who have paid any attention to the subject, that Father Gury is a comparatively modern writer, that his works were published under the Propaganda, and therefore under the highest authority, and his works are for morals, for teaching in the schools, and for the guidance of those who desire instruction of this kind. So far in regard to the judges. But there is also a law for witnesses, and the law for witnesses is even more dangerous than the law laid down for the judges. The writer says:

"The first point laid down is, that no obligation to make reparation can attach to any one who has given false witness from invincible ignorance, inadvertence, or delusion, a proposition which, though not wholly free from objections, we will not canvass. But Father Gury proceeds to consider the case of one who, with the view of supplying deeds that have been lost, and of promoting the success of indisputable right (the indisputableness of such right being left to the subjective test of individual appreciation), either reproduces, that is, forges, or tampers with a writing, a chirograph, or a deed of acknowledgment; and he concludes that, though a person acting thus 'would, indeed, sin venially on the score of a lie, the document produced not being the authentic one, on the strength of which judgement should rest; and though he might possibly incur a grave sin against charity toward himself by exposing his person to imminent peril of very severe penalties in the likely event of detection; nevertheless, he would be wholly free from all sin against mutual justice, and would consequently stand absolved from all obligations to make restitution.'"

Mr. CURRAN. Will the hon. gentleman give the authority?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am quoting from the Quarterly Review of 1875.

Mr. DESJARDINS. Who is the writer?

Mr. McCARTHY. I cannot tell.

Mr. CURRAN. Has the hon. gentleman consulted Father Gury in the original?

Mr. McCARTHY. I leave that for the hon. gentleman to do. I do not suppose a writer in a great magazine like the Quarterly Review misrepresents Father Gury; if the hon. gentleman thinks so, I rather imagine he will find himself mistaken. If he will take the trouble to read the article, which was not written in a spirit of hostility but rather of enquiry for the truth, I shall be glad. I have now done with that part of the subject. But I think there are people in this country, the fair sex, who ought to be protected. It seems there is a rule, a law for them also, and that breach of promise is not an improper act in certain events and in certain cases. The writer says:

"In the matter of plighted troth we learn from Gury, 'that he who has sworn it to a girl, rich and healthy * * is not bound by his oath should she happen to have become poor or fallen into bad health.' Again we are informed that a probable opinion, countenanced by St. Liguori, would allow an engagement to be broken off if a 'fat inheritance' should accrue, seriously modifying the status as to fortune of either party, and the case is thus illustrated: 'Edmund had betrothed himself to Helen, a girl of the same station and fortune as his own. As he was on the very point of celebrating his wedding, he acquired a fat inheritance from a deceased uncle. Wherefore, he repudiates Helen, that he may marry another with a fortune to match. It seems that Edmund should not be disturbed for this. Jilting is no unfrequent practice, but it is striking to find it justified in a handbook of morals, whenever 'faith could be kept only by the surrender of a big advantage which would be tantamount to great loss.'"

That is a comfortable doctrine for one side, but rather uncomfortable for the other.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is hard on the girls.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, as my hon. friend says, it is hard on the girls. I will pass over the next extract in consideration for the galleries. If this is anything like a proper statement of the moral teaching of the order, I hardly think it is one that ought not to be bonussed, to use a familiar term, by any of our Local Legislatures. But what as regards the history of this order? Is it disputed as an historical fact that they are responsible for the expulsion of the Huguenots? I trow not.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). It is disputed.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am astonished to learn it; I thought it would not be disputed. Is it doubted that they brought about the revocation of the Edict of Nantes? Is it doubted that they were responsible for the causing the Thirty Years' War? Is it seriously open to question that they had much to do with precipitating the Franco-German war? Of course, those hon. gentlemen who will not believe anything against the Jesuits will not believe that, but there is weighty evidence to show that they were concerned in precipitating that war, which, as we all know, occurred in comparatively modern times.

Mr. BERGERON. In whose interest?

Mr. McCARTHY. In the interest of the order and body to which they belong, in the interest of the church, of which they are the light horse—the Cossacks, the advanced guard. Now, I suppose Cardinal Manning's statement with regard to them will not be denied to be, at all events, an authentic statement; and Cardinal Manning, in his book of sermons published by Duffy of Paternoster Row, at page 187, says writing of the Jesuit Order:

"That it embodies the character of its founder, the same energy, perseverance and endurance, it is his own presence still prolonged, the same perpetuated order, even in the spirit and manner of its working, fixed, uniform and changeless."

That is within the life of the distinguished prelate who speaks of them as being the same as they were 300 years ago.

Mr. BERGERON. We do not deny that.

Mr. McCARTHY. No person will deny that. Then, it is useless to continue the argument, it is useless to make citations; but I do think that their expulsion from France in 1880 would be of interest to my hon. friends, and that it would not have been altogether treated as of no consequence. It is strictly true that France is now a Republic, enjoying a free Government, but it is perfectly clear that the Jesuits were expelled, and the gentleman who had charge of the educational department in France put forward those grounds for the reason for their expulsion. If I cite from past history I will be told: "Oh, the order may have changed;" and if I cite from modern days I dare say that there will be some other answer, but I do say this, and I think we ought all to be willing to accept it, that everybody else cannot always have been in the wrong, and the Jesuits always in the right. They have been expelled from every country time and time again.

Mr. BERGERON. But they are back again.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, they are back again.

Mr. AMYOT. They were not then expelled from Russia.

Mr. McCARTHY. They were, and I will give the hon. gentleman the date of their expulsion. Having been expelled from the Catholic countries, they found a harbor of refuge in Russia and Prussia, after being suppressed by the Sovereign Pontiff, and, having lived there under the protection of that Government, their education and training of those whom they brought up were found incompatible, as they were found elsewhere, and must always be found, according to their teachings, incompatible to any State Government or to any organised condition of society. These are the reasons which made not only the expulsion of the Jesuits from Russia necessary, but also brought about, as we find, the putting an end to "the concordat" which, up to a certain time, had existed between the Court of St. Petersburg and the Sovereign Pontiff at Rome. I will refer to what Mr. Ferry said, in introducing this measure in France for the expulsion of the Jesuits, and I am not going to read it all but just one or two particulars, because I do not care to deal with what may be termed even remotely the religious aspect of the question. I want to treat this simply from the position of State: whether as a matter of statesmanship, as a matter of policy it was proper to have admitted this Act to remain in force, or whether it is not proper and right that this Act should still be vetoed. The measure in the French Chamber, as explained, is chiefly directed against the Jesuits on the ground that "they are the enemies of the state, that their teachings are in opposition to the principles of government, and would suppress all freedom of education." Many other reasons were given against the Jesuits by Mr. Ferry, and the following among the rest. He quoted the decree of the Parliament of 1826 which recites:

"That the edicts by which Jesuits had been banished and dissolved, were founded upon the recognised incompatibility of their principles with the independence of every Government."

Mr. BERGERON. What are you reading from?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am reading from the published report of the debates that took place in Paris at the time of the expulsion of the Jesuits.

Mr. MULOCK. What report is it?

Mr. McCARTHY. It is a condensation of the report of the debates. Mr. Ferry then goes on to say, from the statement of the Archbishop of Paris, Mgr. Darboy:

"That the Jesuits were neither subject to the jurisdiction of the diocesans, nor obedient to the laws of the State."

And further:

"That the State is, in temporal matters, subordinate to the church, and has only the authority which an inferior tribunal possesses, for confirming the sentence of the superior; that in questions of marriage, burial, institutions for charitable purposes, liberty of conscience, and questions of the moral law, the spiritual power may intervene to correct or annul the civil laws."

Further, Mr. Ferry quoted from some passages from public works, showing:

"A detestable hostility to all the laws and institutions of modern society. These works distinctly taught the divine right of kings, and advocated the carrying on of religious wars. They attacked the revolution, and glorified the revocation of the Edict of Nantes; they calumniated Nicker and Turgot; they rejected the principle of the national sovereignty, and they taught that France was beaten in the late war because she had deserted the Pope. In these books universal suffrage and trial by jury were denounced as vexatious institutions, liberty of conscience and of worship were condemned, and the liberty of the press was asserted to be a principle that has never been admitted by a wise Government."

Whether those are principles which ought to be endorsed by this Parliament it will be for the House to judge.

Mr. BERGERON. Were they expelled then?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes.

Mr. BERGERON. But they are there now.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman has perhaps more information than I have on that subject, but that they were expelled is beyond question. I told the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) that they were expelled more than once from France. They were expelled from France in 1595, at the close of the War of the League. Now, I do think that in the stage of the debate it is not necessary to trouble the House by reading the decree of suppression of the Pope in 1773; but surely if the order has not changed, surely if they have remained as they were, there is ground for interference. I think that it was about the time of their expulsion from France, in 1762, when it was asked of them to change their mode of carrying on operations, and when the answer was: "We must continue to be as we are or cease to exist." I say that when those things are considered; this evidence of a statement made by the Pontiff with full knowledge of all the circumstances it is impossible to displace; there is no way of getting rid of that evidence. It cannot be impugned by the members of the church of which the Pontiff referred to was a distinguished ornament. It cannot be impugned by any candid person, because the character of Pope Clement was of the very highest order, and he stood conspicuously above his compeers. Now, a list was given—and, therefore, I need not repeat it—of the expulsion of the Jesuits from various countries. It is not to be lost sight of that they were expelled from Germany in 1872. They had been admitted into Prussia by Frederick II, and why were they expelled! It seems to me that the reason for their expulsion is particularly applicable to our position here, for there was in that country a mixed community of Protestants and Catholics. The Jesuits were admitted to this country, the corporation having been dissolved and their having been sent about their business by a decree to which I have referred. And having obtained a foothold in Prussia, what was the result? Let me read:

"But in North Germany they became very powerful, owing to the footing Frederick II had given them in Prussia, especially in the Rhine Provinces; and, gradually moulding the younger generation of clergy after the War of Liberation, succeeded in spreading ultramontane views amongst them, and so leading up to the difficulties of the civil government which issued in the Falk laws and their own expulsion."

Now, Sir, I have done with the extracts which I propose to make upon that subject, and I come to the more important part of the subject under consideration. It may be that all I have said is true, and that yet if this matter—I am arguing it now, of course, upon that theory—was in the legislative competence of the Province, it ought still to remain as law. I venture, Sir, to ask the House seriously to consider the position in which we stand. The worship of what is called local autonomy, which some gentlemen have become addicted to, is fraught, I venture to say, with great evil to this Dominion. Our allegiance is due to the Dominion of Canada. The separation into Provinces, the right of local self-government which we possess, is not to make us less citizens of the Dominion, is not to make us less anxious for the promotion of the welfare of the Dominion; and it is no argument to say that because a certain piece of legislation is within the power of a local Parliament, therefore that legislation is not to be disturbed. By the same Act of Parliament, by which power is conferred upon the Local Legislature, the duty and power—because where there is power there is a corresponding duty—are cast upon the Governor in Council to revise and review the acts of the legislative bodies. The Legislatures are not to be at liberty to run in different directions, to promote in one Province one nationality and one church, and in another Province another nationality and another church, or in any other way to run counter, because such courses must inevitably bring about the dissolution of Confederation. It is not because a Province is kept in check, it is not because its legislation is vetoed, that there is danger to our system. We can impose no law upon a Province; it is merely a negative power which the central Government possesses—a power to prevent evil laws, in the sense which I speak, in the wider field of the Dominion, viewed here from the centre—and this power ought to be, of course, prudently, wisely, but duly exercised when occasion may require. It must be exercised by Ministers who are responsible to this House. To my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake), we are indebted for the clear recognition of the principle that His Excellency the Governor General, in every act of allowance or disallowance, must find Ministers in this Parliament who have the confidence of this Parliament, and who are willing to accept the responsibility for that act. And that is the safeguard to the Constitution; that is the safeguard which will always make it impossible for any Minister here to advise His Excellency to disallow measures which ought to be permitted to go into operation. But if the other system is set up, if the alternative presented by my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Colby), is to be adopted; if you are to say that because a law has been passed within the legislative authority of the Province, therefore it must remain; we can easily see, Sir, that before long these Provinces, instead of coming nearer together, will go further and further apart. We can see that the only way of making a united Canada, and building up a national life and national sentiment in the Dominion, is by seeing that the laws of one Province are not offensive to the laws and institutions, and, it may be, to the feelings of another—I will go so far as to say that they must be to some extent taken into consideration. Not, by any means, that those considerations are always to govern, but they are matters worthy of the consideration of statesmen. If the Provinces were foreign powers, if they owed no local allegiance, if they were not subject to the control of a Governor who enjoyed the confidence of this House, the hostile legislation of one Province would be a fit subject of remonstrance from a friendly power. It may not be a very apt illustration, but at the moment it occurs to me that Napoleon III remonstrated during the time of Lord Palmerston, because he said that under the law of England persons who were known to intend his assassination were harbored in England. We know what the result of that was, that the English people rebelled against the interference of a foreign power. I do not know whether the same spirit dwells in their descendants here or not. This illustration shows what I mean. Under our system, no matter what the law may be, no matter how hostile the people of the adjoining Province of Ontario may consider this law to be, the answer which is given as the final and conclusive answer, without appeal or resort, is that it is passed by the Province of Quebec in the legislative power of that Province, and therefore it must go into operation. Now, take this particular Bill. If the view which I venture to hold is correct—and, Sir, I hold it after careful consideration—the view which is held by a large body of the people of the Province, men distinguished for learning, men distinguished for piety, men distinguished in all the walks of life, as to the character of this order; the view which is held, with the record before us of the expulsion of the order from every Christian state in Europe; I say, is it possible to imagine that the establishment of such an order as that is not a matter of concern to the people of the Province of Ontario and the rest of the Dominion? Putting the question on the lowest ground, is this order, thus subsidised, going to confine its operations within the limits of the Province of Quebec? True, the money is to be spent there, although I do not know how that is to be guaranteed. I find no machinery for ascertaining how the money is to be expended; but, assuming that the money is to be spent there in good faith, it only strengthens the order for incursions beyond the border. We know that some of its members—some of the very same gentlemen, I believe, who have been incorporated—do sometimes visit the Province of Ontario. It is idle, therefore, to say that you can establish such an order as that, and claim it is not a matter of common concern to the rest of the Dominion.

Mr. AMYOT. Do you object to that?

Mr. McCARTHY. I decidedly object to them, or I would not be standing here.

Mr. BERGERON. They are British subjects.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, I believe those at present in this country are; but, as I have already pointed out, the whole body, numbering perhaps 20,000 men, is incorporated by this little Bill of the Province of Quebec. The very words of the Bill are: "All who now are or may be of that order." I have heard it said: Oh, you are too late. Where were you when the incorporation Act was under consideration? Why did you not raise your voice then? Why did not the Protestants then strike at the root of the evil? I do not know, though I am pretty familiar with what is called the doctrine of estoppel, that any such doctrine can be applied to a people. I am not aware that the laches of a Government I have supported, or that the laches of hon. gentlemen on either side, are going to prevent the people from objecting, even if it be too late to object to the Act of Incorporation, to the Act of Endowment, honored by the official seal of the Legislature of the Province of Quebec. In my judgment the Act of Incorporation amounted to very little. The Jesuit body claimed to be incorporated before, and they did not care for incorporation, except for the purpose of holding lands in the Province. They claimed to be incorporated under the revival of the order by the Pope in 1814, and the only object of their incorration by the Act was to enable them to hold real estate, which is a matter not particularly concerning the rest of the Dominion. What does strike me, what has roused the people of the Province from which I have the honor to come, as they have never been aroused in my time, is that one of the Provinces has thought fit to recognise by its legislation, and its grant of public money, the order which they have been brought up to oppose, their reading as to which in later years has strengthened their early training in that respect. Is it the work of politicians? I think in that it is unique in its character. I believe on no platform, in no place has the voice of any public man in the Province been raised in promoting this agitation. It has come from the people. It is promoted, not by the so-called professional politician or any politician, but by the people. By the people it is supported, by the people it is maintained, and by the people it is bound to succeed, be it sooner or later. This is not going to end the controversy. The controversy, as it is said, has come to stay. The principle which this Bill involves and which this measure has drawn attention to, is perhaps the one which excites naturally the greatest indignation, and has called forth the greatest agitation. It is impossible to believe that the men who are at the bottom of this agitation are moved by any particular purpose, or particular view, or desiring aggrandisement. I was astonished to hear the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) denounce these men. They were, he said, mere ministers. Principal Cavan, a teacher of the Presbyterian body, a man with whom I have not the honor of personal acquaintance, a man who, so far as I know, in politics differs from me, but a man who, so far as I have heard, is entitled to the respect of every citizen where he lives and is known. Dr. Stafford, who ministered in this city for many years—men of that description are not thus lightly to be spoken of and to be sneered at because they have stepped out from the ordinary walk of their calling, and gone on the platform to uphold what they believe to be the rights of the citizens. I submit instead of that being a subject for sneering, instead of its being a subject which would call for the condemnation of my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), it is the best tribute to their sincerity. This spontaneous exhibition on the part of the people is genuine and heartfelt, because it is really intended and really meant. Now, these are the reasons why the Government should disallow this measure. I have but one other, which I spoke of before, and it is the question of religious equality. I listened with rapt attention to the—will I call it plaintive—appeal made by my hon. friend behind me. There is no censure, he said, which you can make upon this occasion, which will not fall with ten-fold force upon the Protestant minority of the Province of Quebec. Nothing that you can say here can remedy the laches which the Protestant minority displayed in not opposing the majority. I am not here to explain the cause of these laches. I do think we need not go very far for the reason, and I dare say before this debate closes we will learn it; and I call upon hon. members who represent the Protestant constituencies in Quebec, to tell us whether they accept the doctrine of my hon. friend behind me. I ask the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver), I call on the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher), I call on the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Wilson) to let us in Ontario understand whether there is the turtle dove, peacefulness, existing between the Protestant minority and the Catholic majority in the Province of Quebec which the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) depicted last night. I call on them to state here whether there is nothing but billing and cooing between these separate and distinctive parts into which that Province is divided. My hon. friend's language would seem to imply that. The Protestants enjoyed every Protestant liberty—really, they were allowed to manage their own little Protestant affairs as if there was no majority at all. They were in no way thwarted, interfered with, or troubled by this majority, and the instances he cited to us of this spirit of toleration on the part of the majority were, to my mind, unfortunate and unhappy. Mr. Joly was one. He was, I believe, the leader of the Liberal party, as my hon. friend has stated, but has my hon. friend forgotten modern history? Has he forgotten that Mr. Joly was deposed from his position, or resigned, because of the impossibility of acting? Has he forgotten that Mr. Joly actually resigned his seat, and that practically he was driven out of public life?

Mr. LAURIER. He was always opposed by the minority.

Mr. McCARTHY. Well, so much the worse for that minority. I say that minority has no reason to plume itself upon Mr. Joly's successor. Those who opposed him in former times must certainly now look back with regret.

Mr. MITCHELL. You mean Chapleau, Ross and the others. You cannot mean Mercier also.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not mean you, and that ought to be quite sufficient for my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), nor do I even mean his organ, the Herald. Another example cited was the Protestant paper, the Witness. The Witness had never said anything. I do not know how that may be. But is it true that the Witness was excommunicated, and remains still under the ban of the Church? Is it not true that the people of a certain religion cannot buy the Witness newspaper, under the pains and penalties that may follow thereon? That did not seem a very happy way of manifesting the toleration of the majority of the Province of Quebec. At last my hon. friend's argument culminated—will he pardon the world—in what appeared to me the acme of absurdity, when he said the Protestants recognised no right in the Jesuits of a legal kind. The Protestants disclaimed that there is any moral claim. The Protestants were opposed to the introduction of the name of His Holiness the Pope as—did he use the word pestiferous? or what was the word almost as strong—a bitter pill for them to swallow. But they did not do anything. The Act took away from them their education fund. By one short clause it is declared that the education fund hitherto belonging to Protestants and Catholics alike shall become a part of the general revenue of the country, and that out of the general revenue of the country $60,000 might be paid to the Protestant minority of the Province of Quebec; and not one word was raised against this Act of spoliation.

Mr LANGELIER (Quebec). Where is that to be found?

Mr. McCARTHY. In the latter part of the Act, if the hon. gentleman will read it.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). I have not seen it.

Mr. McCARTHY. I cannot make the hon. gentleman read it. And there is not one word from the Protestant minority. It is easy to understand how they get on, as he says, if they submit to all that injustice without a word of remonstrance. It is easy to understand how happy they can be if the Protestant minority are willing simply to take what they can get, a seat here occupied by my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Colby), with a seat in the other House given to the representative of the majority. My hon. friend tells us that no Protestant can be elected in the Province if the majority chose. If the Protestants come here from that Province only to carry out the behests of the other side, they are a deception. We do not realise their position, because we understand that they are representing the minority, but it appears that they are truly the representatives of the majority, and we are told that, if this cry is raised, if this body is assailed, if we venture to raise our voices in this Parliament, we are going to raise such a cry that the Protestant representatives from the Province of Quebec will lose their seats. I cannot believe that that is possible. I cannot believe that my hon. friend is right in thinking so; but even at that expense, even at the expense of the loss of my hon. friend from this House, which, together with that of other members, would be a calamity to the country, though I cannot believe that that would be the result of a fair, full, frank and calm discussion of this subject, although it is one which trenches upon feelings which are guarded most sensitively, still that would have to be borne. For these reasons, I venture to think, it will not be found that my hon. friend's statements are correct. As he made the statement, my eye caught the report in a newspaper that petitions were being signed in the city of Montreal, that already 3,000 names had been obtained to those petitions, and that more were coming in—petitions to the Governor General, calling upon him to disallow this measure. Does this look as if the Protestants of the Province of Quebec were desirous, and willing, and anxious that this legislation should remain unchanged, or does it not look as if the Protestant minority in that Province were given reasonable encouragement, that they would get justice—and no more than justice are they entitled to, and no more than justice I hope they will ever ask for—from the Parliament of this country? Then they will be up and doing, to do their share of this legislation. But in the Legislature of that Province, composed as it is now, they cannot expect it. There was no Protestant representative in the Cabinet of that Province until recently, and, when one was chosen, he had to be elected in spite of the vote of the Protestant minority. I can understand that, if there were a fighting man in that House like the hon. member who leads the Third party here, there might be a chance of obtaining something like justice, but men with that skill and ability, with parliamentary knowledge to back it, are not to be found every day, and we are not to judge the Protestant representatives of the Province of Quebec on that high standard. We were told that the Herald had not said anything about this iniquitous scheme, though the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mitchell) said that, if he had been there, he would not have approved of it. I have not heard anyone approve of it. It has gone without defence. The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) does not approve of it. Perhaps my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) does approve of it, in his great desire to have perfect religious liberty, and not to drive the French out of Ontario. My hon. friend candidly told us that he would not have approved of it. Then, what muzzled the great organ of public opinion? Was it because it was the organ of the Government? At one time that was the organ of the Protestants of the Province of Quebec.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will tell the hon. gentleman, if he wishes to know.

Mr. McCARTHY. I will let the hon. gentleman tell me when I get through. Perhaps then you will allow me to ask you a question or two.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will give you perfect liberty.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think we are encouraged to persevere in the course we have pursued, and the course we have taken, by the ebullition of popular feeling which we now see is aroused and is manifesting itself in the Province of Quebec. It cannot now be said that it is only the members from Ontario who have raised this cry and who are seeking for this disallowance.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is all it is.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then the petitions are very extraordinary, and I can hardly accept the contradiction of my hon. friend in the face of those petitions. I cannot do better than close in the language of Principal Cavan. I adopt every word which that distinguished gentleman uttered the other evening in reference to the question of disallowance. Speaking on this question, he says:

"He was quite willing to admit that within their own distinct limits the autonomy of the Provinces ought to be respected. Under the Act of Federation certain subjects were designated as belonging to the Dominion, and certain subjects were named as within the jurisdiction of the several Provinces, and while he had never committed himself to the principle, as a universal principle, that the central authority could not revise the Acts of the Provinces that were within their own limits; while he distinctly desired not to be committed to that principle; while he did hold that as a general thing it was a safe and wise principle, as long as the Province has kept fairly and definitely within its own limits, even though its action is not the wisest action, that the central authority should be very careful about revising it—he believed that occasions did arise when it was not simply permitted to the central authority, but that it was the bounden duty of the central authority to revise provincial legislation, legislation lying distinctly within the limits of the Provinces. He supposed on most subjects he would be regarded as thinking with the Liberal party, but if the Liberal party had even taken ground in opposition to that he must beg to be excused from following the Liberal party. He supposed that was a bold thing for a man who was neither lawyer nor politician to say, but was prepared to take the ground that the Jesuits' Estates Act was not within the limits of the Province of Quebec. So far as it dealt with education it was within those limits, so far as it dealt with money it was within those limits, but he thought he could show that it was marked by features which took it out of those limits, and making it a matter that the Dominion ought to deal with."

DERBY BRANCH RAILWAY.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, 1. Is the section of railway subsidised by Parliament completed, extending from the western end of the Derby Branch Railway to a connection with the Northern and Western Railway at Blackville, in the county of Northumberland? 2. If so, when was its completion accepted or recognised by the Government? 3. Is the said section of railway now in operation? If not, why not? 4. Has the Government taken any steps to have the said railway put in operation, and if so, what were they? 5. Has the Government had any negotiations or correspondence with the proprietors of the said railway, for the purpose of extending the traffic on the Derby Branch and securing for the public the advantages which the public were expected to receive when Parliament subsidised said line; and if so, what were they, and with what result?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. 1. Accepted as completed, the company having given a bond to replace the cedar cribwork with masonry when called upon by the Government to do so. 2. On the 26th October, 1887. 3. Have no knowledge as to the cause. 4. No. 5. Yes; they were in the nature of a proposition of leasing the Indiantown Branch to the company, it resulted in the Government preparing a lease for the execution, after which the company refused to execute, since which the Government have operated the Indiantown Branch.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

UNION RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) moved second reading of Bill (No. 79) to incorporate the Union Railway Company.

Mr. BRYSON. Before this Bill is read the third time I desire to make one or two observations in reference to it. It will be within the recollection of hon. gentlemen in this House that on the 17th of June, 1887, a Bill in favor of the Pontiac Railway Company, asking for an extension of time for the completion of that road to the town of Pembroke, was passed by this House. To my mind, if this Bill now before the House comes into operation, it may seriously interfere with the completion of the line of the Pontiac Railway. I may say at the outset that the line of the Pontiac Railway is now within a very short distance of the town of Pembroke, that the iron upon that road has been laid to within 14 miles of that town; and the difficulty which now exists with respect to the completion of that road is simply a matter of negotiation for a financial arrangement to raise money to build this bridge. That bridge, as the House is aware, received a consideration at the hands of this House last year of 15 per cent. of the actual cost, which was then estimated to be about $225,000. I contend that if this Bill be allowed to pass as it is at present drawn, and as the railway will touch certain villages in the county of North Renfrew, to a very great extent it will be a rival line to the Pontiac Railway. The greatest distance at any point between the Pontiac Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway does not exceed 17 miles; and I contend that the farmers of the townships of Westmeath and Ross cannot in any way be considered as suffering for the want of railway facilities. When people are living within 8 miles of a line of railway, with good roads, I consider there can be no hardship endured by them, and consequently this Bill ought to stand over for a time. In looking at the names of the petitioners for this Bill, I find that the gentlemen who are asking for the incorporation of this company reside in the town of Pembroke. If I were convinced that the promoters of this Bill were residents of these townships, I would look upon it differently. I may be permitted to refer to an argument used by the hon. member for North Renfrew in the Railway Committee—he contended that we would be depriving these people of a railway. Well, in looking over these names I find that not one of the gentlemen who are asking for incorporation, are residents of this portion of the country through which this line of railway would run. Therefore, I come to the conclusion that the promoters of this scheme are in a measure promoting a line of railway which will be a rival line to the Pontiac Railway, and may result disastrously to that line. Irrespective of the interests of the county which I have the honor to represent, a very large portion of the community in the county of Pontiac might for all time to come be deprived of a line of railway. It is contended with some force that the Ottawa River, lying between these two lines of railway, is a very serious embarrassment to the people of these townships that I have just named; but when you take into consideration that at the village of Portage du Fort we have a bridge for highway traffic, and two very good ferries at Lapasse and at the mouth of the Black River, which is immediately opposite the end of the iron on the Pontiac Railway, it will be seen that the people of the township of Westmeath, who are furthest from the line of railway, can suffer no serious injury by delay in building this road. I, therefore, move:

That the said Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to Committee of the Whole, in order to insert a clause providing that the Act shall not come into operation until 1st January, 1891.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I hope the House will not agree to the motion of my hon. friend. The matter was discussed in the Railway Committee the other day, and if such an amendment should be inserted the Railway Committee was the proper place to make it. The people who promote this Bill prefer withdrawing the Bill altogether, to having the proposed condition imposed. I cannot understand upon what grounds my hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Bryson) proposes that this provision should be incorporated in the Bill. The railway, the construction of which is proposed to be authorised by this Bill, will go through the townships of Westmeath and Ross, in the county of Renfrew. It does not touch the county of Pontiac until it reaches Portage du Fort, 30 miles from Pembroke, and there it crosses the Ottawa, but does not come into contact with the Pontiac Railway, and it is not, so far as I am able to judge, going to be a competing line to the detriment of the county of Pontiac with the Pontiac Railway. If anybody had any reason to complain of the road preventing the construction of the Pontiac Railway it would be the very people who are applying for this Act of incorporation, because if the Pontiac Railway is prevented from coming to Pembroke it would, of course, be disadvantageous to that town. There is nothing, however, in this Bill or in the scheme promoted by this Bill either to interfere with the people of Pontiac or that will prevent the Pontiac Railway reaching its terminal point of Pembroke. It is not proposed under the provisions of the Bill, to draw away from the Pontiac Railway one dollar of the subsidy that has been granted by Parliament to that road, and it is not going to interfere with the construction of the Pontiac Railway to its terminal point. Under these circumstances I hope the House will not consider for a moment the proposition of my hon. friend. I may say that these two townships to which I have referred are now without railway communication because they happen to lie along a tract which has on one side the Ottawa River and on the other Muskrat Lake, the latter being in some parts from one to two miles wide and ten to twelve miles long. So these two townships are wedged in between the lake and the river, with the Pontiac Railway lying to the north of the Ottawa River and the Canadian Pacific Railway to the south of the lake to which I have referred. What is proposed by the Bill is to give communication between Pembroke and Portage du Fort through the rich townships which I have mentioned. I repeat, that I hope the House will not entertain the proposition which my hon. friend has submitted.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This subject was discussed in the Railway Committee the other day, before it was decided to report the Bill to the House. The hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Bryson) made a strong appeal to the promoter of the Bill for the purpose of having the Bill delayed. The reason given was that the new railway in the county of Renfrew would be a competing line to the Pontiac road. The Pontiac Railway is on one side of the River Ottawa, and the proposed railway, in the county of Renfrew, is on the other side of the river. I understand the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Bryson) fears that if the proposed road is built in the county of Renfrew, starting at Pembroke and going to Portage du Fort, it will delay the building of the Pontiac road, and, perhaps, prevent its crossing the river at Pembroke. I must say that the distance between the two lines is from 18 to 20 miles, and there is a river between the two roads, and, therefore, I do not think the competition will be very great, because the people on one side of the river will not cross it to take the railway on the other. The only objection could be that the Pontiac road, being not yet completed, the proposed road might interfere with the crossing of the river. I think the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Bryson) does not give sufficient weight to the strength of his own road, and that he minimises the ability of its promoters to complete its line, and cross the Ottawa to Pembroke, even although the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. White) may obtain a charter for the road from Pembroke to Portage du Fort. I think, therefore, that the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Bryson) would act wisely not to oppose the Bill, and postpone the operation of its Act until 1st January, 1891. A year would certainly be occupied in organising, before contracts could be given out, and during that time, with the assistance of the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Bryson), his railway will have crossed the Ottawa, and have reached Pembroke. I think, therefore, that my hon. friend would do better not to insist on his amendment.

Amendment negatived on a division, Bill read the third time and passed.

QUEEN'S COLLEGE, KINGSTON.

House proceeded to consideration of amendments made by Senate to Bill (No. 46) to amend the Act respecting the Queen's College of Kingston.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What are these amendments?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. The only amendment made is to the clause allowing the corporation to hold real estate in the Province, subject, however, to the laws of any Province in which any real estate was acquired.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Has that been asked for?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. No; the Senate put it in of their own motion.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. To make the holding of the lands subject to provincial laws.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would ask as to whether that is not done to give this House jurisdiction over the subject?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. It was not asked; as to the jurisdiction of this House I would refer the hon. gentleman to the opinion in this morning's paper of the Hon. Mr. McDougall showing that we have jurisdiction in this matter.

Amendments concurred to.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 37) to amend the Act incorporating the Massawippi Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Colby.)

Bill (No. 63) to enable the City of Winnipeg to utilise the Assiniboine River water power.—(Mr. Watson.)

Bill (No 62) to incorporate the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company.—(Mr. Watson.)

Bill (No. 99) to incorporate the Three Rivers and Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Riopel.)

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK moved, that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 68) respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There are only a few minutes left of the hour for Private Bills, and as I am aware this Bill will be considerably discussed and amendments to it proposed, I do not see any object in going into committee on it now. I would ask my hon. friend to withdraw his motion.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I accede to the request of the right hon. gentleman, but as the time for Private Bills is coming to a close, I hope the Government will give us an opportunity to have the Bill discussed and not confine us to the hour on Friday night.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not know that I can do that. It will be the very first Bill on Friday and Monday as well, and there is no chance of its being thrown over.

Motion withdrawn.

SUPPLY—THE JESUITS' ESTATES ACT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I feel that in addressing the House upon this question and in presenting to it, at this stage of the debate, the reasons which, I believe, justified the Government in advising His Excellency not to exercise the power of disallowance as to the Jesuits' Estate Act of Quebec, I must ask more than the usual indulgence of the House. I shall be compelled, in the first place, to dwell at considerable length, on details which the House has already heard discussed; and I shall have to speak under a sense of the fact that with one large portion of the people of Canada nothing that I can say will be satisfactory, and that with another, and I hope the greater portion of the people of Canada, no defence of the Government is necessary. Nevertheless, considering the arraignment which the policy of the Government on this question has had, considering the interest which the measure has excited in all quarters of Canada, it is only becoming that I should ask the indulgence of the House in order that I may make a plain statement of the reasons which have induced us to give to His Excellency the advice for which we are to be held responsible to-night. I desire, before beginning a statement of these reasons, to take exception to a remark which was made by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), at the outset of his address, with reference to the position which members of the Government occupy in this debate. The hon. gentleman, in complaining that no member on the Treasury benches had risen to take part in the debate down to this stage, spoke of it almost as an act of discourtesy. He seemed to think that the mode in which the discussion should be carried on was a mere matter of politeness and a mere matter of fence. I do not so regard it I understand the position of the Government to be this: The case on behalf of the amendment was first presented forcibly and ably last night by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), sustained by an hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House (Mr. Barron); but I leave it to the sense of the House, whether, when the debate was adjourned at near midnight, any argument remained unanswered which called for an answer from the Treasury benches. But with regard to the hon. member's complaint on the ground of discourtesy, I have to appeal to the sense of fairness of the House in this particular. No member on either side of the House was unaware from the commencement of this debate, that the main argument on which the conduct of the Government would be assailed, would be presented by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I was the Minister, who, if there be a difference between colleagues as to the extent to which responsibility is shared, was primarily responsible, and I submit it to the sense of fairness of every member whether, before giving the reasons upon which I must stand or fall as regards the correctness of the advice which I gave to His Excellency it was not my right to hear my accuser? The hon. gentleman thinks otherwise, and the position he takes is this: That courtesy to him and to the gentlemen who will divide with him on this question to-night require that his arraignment of my report, his arraignment of the Government with regard to every subject of this discussion, should have been made after my mouth had been closed, and I had ceased to have a right to defend myself. If there is any fairness or courtesy in that position, I am willing to submit that I was wrong in reserving the remarks which I have to make until the hon. member for Simcoe had been heard. Now, in presenting the case which I have to present on behalf of the Government, I must ask your attention for a few moments again to the wearisome narration of the position which these lands occupied in the Province of Quebec. Not that that matter has not been discussed in every detail, but because in almost every detail I have essentially different opinions from those of my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and because, in some respects, the points upon which the merits of this case depend were lost sight of by the hon. member in the admirable address he made this afternoon. Why, I venture to say, without the slightest disrespect for the hon. member, for whose talents no one in this House has a higher respect than I, and I would be the last person to disparage any observations which he might address to us—I venture to say that the reason why this House ought not to ask His Excellency now to disallow that Act, if we had no better reason, is that the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy)—a master of legal argument—addressed the House for nearly three hours this afternoon, and presented a case in which, to say the least of it, the greatest doubt must exist—presented a case in which, for one whole hour, the hon. gentleman went from detail to detail, from step to step, for the purpose of proving—what? for the purpose of proving that the Jesuits of Quebec lost their legal title to the estates in question—a fact which is admitted in the preamble to the Act. He spent an hour more in discussing theological questions, and questions connected with the ecclesiastical history of England, which, in England itself and in every one of her colonies, have been kept asleep for the last two hundred years by the spirit of toleration on which alone a British country can be governed. Now, let me call the attention of the House to a brief statement with regard to the position of these estates, not for the purpose of showing that this society in the Province of Quebec, whatever its character and merits may have been, had a legal title to the property, but for the purpose of showing that this is not a question which we can decide, but is one which must and ought to have been left to that authority which the Constitution makes not only competent to deal with such questions but omnipotent in dealing with them, subject only to control in so far as the rights of the whole Dominion or the policy of the Empire may be involved. Now, Sir, the House will remember that, long before the cession of Canada to the Crown of Great Britain, the Jesuits had labored in the wilderness, and in the schools of Canada, and in the churches of Canada, and that, as a reward for their missionary zeal, for their talent as teachers, and for their services to this, one of the great colonies of France, that order had been erected into an incorporated body, under the most solemn acts which the King of France could pass under his hand, had been endowed with these estates by the King of France, and by private donors, who wished to place in their hands the means by which the work of Christianity and civilisation amongst the savages could be carried on, and by which the work of education amongst the youth of the Province of Quebec could be carried on. These were the terms on which they held their lands when the battle was fought on the Plains of Abraham, and the conqueror took possession of Canada under terms which are in the first place set forth in the capitulation of the city of Quebec, and afterwards in the capitulation of the city of Montreal, and under terms which are plainly defined by the law of nations, recognised by every civilised country in the world. What were these terms? By the law of nations, recognised, as I have said, in every civilised country in the world, the conquering power took possession of all the rights, privileges and property of the conquered monarch in the country, but he took no more. He took the sovereignty of the country, he took the King's fortifications in the country, he took the King's stores of arms and ammunition in the country, he took the King's lands in the country, he took the King's treasures in the country, but he had no right by the law of nations to lay his hand on the property, movable or immovable, of the humblest subject in the country. If he had despoiled private property it would have been an outrage which would have disgraced the British arms, and he would have committed an act, let me tell the House, which, irrespective of the law of nations, the conquering General stated in the Terms of Capitulation, begun at Quebec, repeated at Montreal, he would not do. It has been said in this debate that, by the Terms of Capitulation, the Jesuits of the Province of Quebec, and all their property, were placed at the mercy of the conqueror. I do not so read the Terms of Capitulation. Let me see article 34 of the Terms of Capitulation of Montreal:

"All the communities——"

And at that time the Jesuits were in community in the Province of Quebec——

"——and all the priests shall preserve their movables, the property and revenues of the seignories and other estates which they possess in the colony, of what nature soever they be, and the same estates shall be preserved in their privileges, rights, honors and exemptions."

That was the request made, and the answer given to that request was unequivocal—"Granted." And yet we are told that these estates, which came within the exact words of that provision as to the seignories and property, movable and immovable, of the priests and religious orders in the Province of Quebec, were reserved to the King's mercy. It is true that the preceding section 33 was refused until the King's pleasure should be known, and in that there was a distinct reference to the Jesuits, but that article referred, not to the property only of the Jesuits, but asked in addition to the provisions as to their property in section 34, that they should have all their constitutions and privileges, that their monasteries should not be entered by troops, and that safeguards should be given to them from military intrusion, and that they should preserve their rights to nominate to certain curacies and missions as theretofore. Those privileges, vague and undefined by the terms of the article, were met by the words: "Reserved until the King's pleasure be known," although the response to the article, dealing with the properties of these people, was the unequivocal one—"Granted." The conquering arms of England were used against the soldiers of France, but not against individuals, either religious or secular, either in France or in Canada. Now, we go a step further, and we read the Treaty of Peace. The war had gone on, and the treaty was not made until 1763, and let me read to the House a passage from the treaty, because the Terms of Capitulation are liable to be qualified by the final and definitive treaty at the close of the war. This provision was made by the treaty:

"His Most Christian Majesty cedes and guarantees to His Britannic Majesty in full right, Canada with all its dependencies, as well as the Island of Cape Breton, and all the other islands and coasts in the Gulf and River St. Lawrence, and, in general, everything that depends on the said countries, lands, islands, and coasts, with the sovereignty, property, possession, and all rights, acquired by treaty or otherwise, which the Most Christian King and the Crown of France have had till now over the said countries, islands, lands, places, coasts, and their inhabitants, so that the Most Christian King cedes and makes over the whole to the said King and to the Crown of Great Britain, and that in the most ample manner and form, without restriction, and without any liberty to depart from the said cession and guaranty under any pretence, or to disturb Great Britain in the possessions above mentioned."

Now, in return for that cession of Canada and Cape Breton and all the islands of the St. Lawrence, this solemn compact was made by His Britannic Majesty:

"His Britannic Majesty on his side agrees to grant the liberty of the Catholic religion to the inhabitants of Canada. He will consequently give the most precise and most effectual orders that his new Roman Catholic subjects may profess the worship of their religion, according to the rites of the Romish Church, as far as the laws of Great Britain permit. His Britannic Majesty further agrees that the French inhabitants, or others who had been subjects of the Most Christain King in Canada, may retire with all safety and freedom wherever they shall think proper, and may sell their estates, provided it be to subjects of His Britannic Majesty."

This House has been told that the essence of the whole clause is in the qualification, "as far as the laws of Great Britain permit," and we are told that that of itself introduced all the laws of England relating to public worship, the Supremacy Act, and everything of that kind which could be invoked.

Mr. McCARTHY. Not by me.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. member for Simcoe did not assert that it introduced the Supremacy Act, but the argument was made before he spoke in the debate, that that introduced all the restrictions on the exercise of religion; and we were told that it even introduced the Supremacy Act, under which, let me tell the House plainly, if it had been introduced in the Province of Quebec, no man could have exercised the Catholic religion at all. The very essence of the Supremacy Act is that no person—I am stripping the Act of all its verbiage, I am giving its essence, and at the same time quoting its exact words when I say, that the gist of the whole Act is this: That no person outside the realm of England shall have or exercise within the Queen's dominions—even spiritual superiority. If no spiritual superiority in Rome then no bishop in Canada; if no bishop in Canada, no priest in Canada; if no priest in Canada then no sacrament for the living or the dying in Canada. Every altar in Canada would have been thrown down by the very terms of a treaty in which His Britannic Majesty, in return for the cession of half the continent, solemnly promised not only that the people should have the right to exercise their religion, as they had been accustomed to do, but that he would give the most precise orders that freedom of worship should be carried out in every particular. Now, Sir, obviously the treaty meant no such thing; obviously His Britannic Majesty did not take with one hand the cession of this country, and hold out a false promise with the other. Obviously he meant that there should be perfect freedom of worship in Canada, the newly ceded country, subject only to the legislation which might be made upon this subject from time to time by the Parliament of Great Britain, certainly not that it was subject then to the laws as regards freedom of worship in Great Britain; for, let me remind the House, that instead of there being any freedom of worship in Great Britain at that time, the exercise of the Roman Catholic religion then amounted to the crime of high treason; and no dissenter, under the risk of long imprisonment, could enter a conventicle or a meeting-house; so that obviously it did not mean to introduce into the country ceded, the laws of Great Britain with regard to public worship or even with regard to supremacy at that time. But let me sugest to the House what the obvious meaning was, as quoted from the words of the Attorney General and the Solicitor General of England, and of the Prime Minister of England, in discussing this treaty stipulation, and what, upon its face, every sensible and unprejudiced man will say its meaning was; and that was this: "In so far as the laws of Great Britain permit freedom of worship in her colonies"—and the laws of Great Britain at that time did permit freedom of worship in her colonies—and likewise "in so far as the laws of Great Britain passed in future years might permit." Well, Sir, we pass on to the Quebec Act of a few years later, in 1774, and I come now certainly to a branch of the argument against us which my hon. friend from Simcoe did press upon us this afternoon, namely, that by the express term of that statute, the provisions of the Statute of Elizabeth with regard to the supremacy of the Queen, was enacted with regard to the Province of Quebec. Now, let me ask the House, for the purpose of considering how far passion has guided and swerved the reason of some of those who have spoken upon this question, to look at that statute, and they will find that the rights of the people of Canada and their freedom of religious worship are as fully guaranteed by the terms of the Quebec Act as they were by the terms of the Treaty of Paris itself. While it is true that one of the provisions of that Act declares that the statute made in the first year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth should apply over all the countries which then did, or thereafter should belong to the Imperial Crown of this realm, and should apply to the Province of Quebec, this is subject to a limited construction, because if it is to be read in its literal sense, it was an absolute prohibition of the practice of the Roman Catholic religion in the Province, an absolute prohibition under the penalties of high treason itself. But the Act left no such ambiguity to be dealt with by mere construction, because it goes on to limit the operation of the Statute relating to Royal Supremacy, by declaring that instead of the oath of abjuration which, by the terms of the statute of Elizabeth, all people professing the Catholic religion were to take, not only to abjure all foreign jurisdiction in relation to temporal matters, but all foreign jurisdiction in relation to spiritual matters as well: there is to be a new form of oath and a new statutory provision for the people of the Province, whereby they shall no longer be bound to abjure foreign jurisdiction in matters spiritual, and shall be entitled to all the privileges of British subjects, and all privileges of worship on taking an oath of allegiance merely, which applies only to the temporal affairs of the reigning sovereign. Therefore, instead of its being in any sense true that by the terms of the Quebec Act the restrictions of the Supremacy Act were imposed upon the Province by the express terms of that statute, the people of Quebec were relieved from the most odious provision of the Supremacy Act—the provision by which they were bound to swear against conscience, and in abnegation of their faith, that they would recognise the power of no foreign priest, even in spiritual matters. So much then for the Quebec Act of 1774, by which, I think, I have shown that there was a toleration extended in regard to the Province of Quebec which did not exist in the mother country, and which was utterly inconsistent with these old statutes, which, forsooth, 115 years afterwards, we are asked to advise His Excellency to apply to the Province of Quebec. Now, Sir, in 1791, 30 years after the conquest of Canada, the King of Great Britain issued a proclamation suppressing the Order of Jesuits in the colony. As history has told us, the estates which are even now in question, were looked upon with a covetous eye by Lord Amherst who had taken an active part in directing the armies of Great Britain. On this subject I need not go into details. This covetous attempt was frustrated, but suffice it to say, at this stage of the controversy, that the King of England, and I submit it to the legal sense of the House, the King of England had no power to revoke the terms of the charter of incorporation which the Jesuits of Canada had received from the King of France. I admit that the Parliament of Great Britain could have brought in the whole body of the common law, and could have applied to the colony all the penal statutes which the bigotry of that age might choose to invoke. But the King of England had probably no such prerogative. If the King grants a charter, the King himself, with all his power, cannot revoke it. It is only Parliament who can do that, and, in this instance, by the attempt, I venture to think, of the King to suppress that order, and to revoke that charter, he exceeded the authority which he possessed. But, Sir, we were told that by a royal proclamation all the common law of England was introduced into Canada. I doubt that that could be done. By the law of nations, recognised at every stage and period of English law, the laws of a conquered country prevail until the paramount authority of the conquering country imposes new laws upon it. But the monarch of a conquering country probably cannot of himself change those laws, cannot of himself do it under the constitution of Great Britain. But if there is a doubt upon that subject as to the general rule, I say this, that the King of England could not introduce the common law by his proclamation in violation of the treaty which he had made in 1763, and by the terms of the treaty he had reserved all those rights which touch this question, even in the remotest degree. Therefore, it is idle for us to discuss how far he might have made other branches of the common law applicable to this country. In the year 1800 the last Jesuit died, and I think that by the law of England, applicable, perhaps, at that time to this property in Canada, on the death of the last surviving member of the corporation the property escheated to the Crown, and the Crown could have taken possession of it as escheated lands. Steps were taken to assert this right on the part of the Crown; but the question had been complicated in the meantime by the fact that the Pope had suppressed the Company of Jesus nearly all over the world. By the terms of that suppression and by the terms of the civil law, which, it is contended still prevailed in the Province of Quebec, the properties, instead of reverting to the Crown, passed to the ordinaries of the dioceses in which they were situated. I do not mean to say that that is so: I present that to the House as one of the questions which has been raised, and which tends to make this case anything but a plain one. I will do more. I will admit the hon. member for Simcoe's contention, that the common law had in the meantime been introduced, that the civil law had been superseded, and that by the terms of the common law these estates had become escheated to the Crown. One of the questions, however, which has been constantly agitated ever since in the Province of Quebec is this—that if you are to subject this property to the rigor of the common law, you at least ought to give the benefit of that principle of the common law, which declares that whenever property of any kind has been escheated to the Crown some consideration should be shown to the persons who are morally entitled to it, and regard should be had to the use to which it was intended to be applied. By this rule of practice the escheat does not wholly result as an emolument to the Crown or as an augmentation of the revenue, but a liberal proportion is appropriated to the intention of the donors or to those who morally may be considered entitled to it. If that consideration were to prevail to any extent, the clergy, and it may be the Jesuits, on the reinstatement of the order, would have some kind of moral right to compensation respecting these estates. But let me call the attention of the House to this fact, which I think has been kept out of view, and which certainly the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Barron) who addressed the House last night, overlooked in his argument, that the very brief by which these properties were taken possession of on the part of the Crown, when they were eventually seized, does not allege the right of escheat, but declares the right by which the Crown intended to claim the properties to be the right of conquest—a right which, as I have said, is repudiated by the law of nations, was repudiated by the Crown officers of Great Britain at the time, and which, after all that has been said in this debate, has not had one word said in favor of it. That was the only title by which Great Britain claimed she had a right to these estates. Now, it is true likewise that subsequent statutes vested the title in the Province of Canada, and ultimately in due course of law, and as the result of statutes, the title to those lands became vested in the Province of Quebec,

As to the conclusion which the hon. member for Simcoe drew, that the Province had a good title to them, a perfect title under the law, I have not one word to say; and if this Act had come before us as legislation in recognition of a legal title, I would have felt bound to call the attention of my colleagues to the fact that a very great mistake had been committed, on which, perhaps, it might have been necessary to have advised the Provincial Legislature to reconsider its conclusions. But it is admitted by the Legislature of Quebec that a good title existed in the Province, and all that is said on the face of this Act or in the arguments in support of it, is this: That there existed a moral claim to some degree of compensation, little or much, which, to a greater or less extent, was binding upon the conscience of the Legislature of that Province. Now, Sir, the result of the existence of that claim—the result of the assertion of that moral right, whatever it may have been worth, was that, from year to year, when the Province went on to assert its right to those estates, and as the Province ventured to place piece after piece of the property on the market, it was met by a protest from the united hierarchy of Quebec, demanding that such properties should not be sold, should not be diverted from the original charitable and religious purposes for which they were intended, and so every step by which those estates were sought to be made useful to the revenues of the Province was contested in the most formal and solemn manner. It is recited in part of the preamble of this Act, that not many years ago, one of the most valuable parts of the property, being situate opposite the Basilica in the city of Quebec, was brought to market, and there was met by the solemn protest of all the hierarchy of the Province. In face of that protest, casting as it did, a cloud upon the title of the Province, involving as it seemed to do a dispute as to the right of the Government, and as to the title of the purchaser, that property had to be withdrawn from sale. Let me assure this House again that in presenting our case I am endeavoring to do so, not from my individual point of view at all, but simply from the point of view in which we may be asked to withhold or to give advice with respect to the great power of disallowing a provincial statute. Let me call attention then to all these details, and let me ask the House to keep in mind that state of affairs with respect to the property itself, with respect to the assertion of this claim, good or bad; with respect to the assertion of this moral right, worth little or much, and to remember the difficulty of marketing the property in the Province of Quebec under these circumstances. If the House will bear all this in mind, and then will read with me the statute which we are asked to disallow, I say that the provisions of that statute will cease to be obnoxious to any reasonable man, that they cannot be misunderstood and that they can hardly be misrepresented even by the most violent prejudice. The sale, as I have said, was forbidden. I am not driven at all to defend the policy of the Government of the Province, as to the propriety of opening up that question; as to the propriety of not insisting that these properties should be sold even if they should be sacrificed in the face of that formidable protest. That was for the Legislature of Quebec to say. The constitution has charged me with no duties and with no responsibilities, as to the weight of any legal or of any moral claim which the Legislature has thought proper to recognise. I may concur with gentlemen who have spoken this afternoon that it was unwise not to insist on the strict statutory title based on confiscation, severe though it may have been, but in this case the constitution has not made me the judge. It has not made me or my colleagues the arbiters between the two sets of opinions in the Province of Quebec; it has not clothed His Excellency with the power to step in and consider every question which arises among the people of the Province: it has vested that authority in the Provincial Legislature, which by a unanimous vote, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) last night declared that this was the true and proper solution of the question. Under those circumstances have I any right to exercise a superior and overruling judgment over the Province? Is that the theory upon which our constitution is to be worked out? This moral claim, as they choose to call it, may have been as weak as air, but it was considered weighty by the conscience and the judgment of those whom the constitution solemnly appointed to decide and after that it is not for us to say: "The Legislature arrived at a wrong conclusion." I can state the matter no more forcibly than in the very words of one of our opponents on this question, who declares that the authority given to the Provincial Legislatures over certain classes of subjects carries with it, like all authority, a liberty to error which must be respected so long as the legal power is not exceeded, and the error is not manifestly subversive legally or morally of the principles of the constitution or of the great objects of the state. As far, therefore, as we have to consider the power of the Legislature to recognise a moral obligation—leaving out of sight for a moment the theological questions which my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and I are to join issue on, with a view to the House passing judgment, as to which is the better theologian forsooth, and as to whose advice on the question of theology His Excellency the Governor General as the supreme theologian is to act—I contend that the Legislature had supreme authority to decide, and had a perfect right to decide, without veto or controlling authority at Ottawa, even though we thought they decided erroneously. Now, Sir, having asked the House to bear in mind the situation in which these properties stood in the Province of Quebec, the way in which an attempted sale was met by a protest which completely frustrated the sale, let me call the attention of the House to another state of facts as regards the various claimants upon this property. There were the Bishops of the Province who said: "As a result of the suppression of the Society of Jesus in this Province we were vested with all the estates as the ordinaries of the various dioceses in which these properties were situated." Nay, more, they said: "We have inherited their moral claim too, because when the means were striken from their hands of carrying on the missionary work and the work of education, we took it up and, by the sacrifice of our people's labors and treasures, we built up institutions of education all over this country." The Society of the Jesuits had in the meantime been re-instated and re-organised in the Province, and upon this point let me call the attention of the House to the argument of my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) which was that by the decree of suppression in France the order became extinct in Canada. He cited to prove that the decision of the Parliament of Paris, which merely decided that the Jesuits in France were liable for the debts of the Jesuits in Paraguay, because the properties of the two sets of men were held in solidarity. That decision has not the remotest effect upon the status of the Jesuits in Canada, who, themselves, were a body corporate under the most solemn instrument which the King of France could give them to indicate his will in that regard. I have mentioned that the bishops claimed that they represented the moral right, which, as I have said, the Legislature thought was worthy of compensation, and the Jesuits claimed it likewise. Look at this as a business matter. Look at this matter simply as relating to a piece of land in the city of Quebec, and tell me how, under these circumstances, the title was ever to be cleared of this dispute. Obviously not by compensating first one party and then the other, because under those circumstances the Legislature would have had to pay twice the value of the claim. It could be only settled by getting the two parties to arbitrate and to leave it to some person to settle their mutual, dispute, or by saying: "You must conform to the decision of some person who has authority over you both." Let me argue this question throughout, if we can, without feeling that we belong to different religious persuasions, without feeling that a religious question is mixed up with it at all; and, therefore, let us leave out for the moment any name which might excite the prejudices of some portions of the community. The Bishop of Quebec and the other contesting parties who struggled for compensation for this moral claim were all members of the same church, and by their membership recognised supreme authority in the head of that church to settle their disputes, even though the settlement should be against their will. The head of their church had that authority—not by any provision of the law of Quebec mind, not by any provision recognised by English law mind, but by the consent of the parties who were free to belong to that church and free to leave it, and while they did belong to it were subject to a spiritual superior. He had that power by their choice; he had the right to say to one or the other, no matter how small or how great the proportion might be that was divided between them: "You must submit; it is a fair settlement between you, and I, as your supreme arbiter bind you by my decision." The Government of Quebec, therefore, having made up its mind to recognise the moral claim, if for no other purpose, for purposes of public policy, found that they could not arrive at a solution of the question without some person to act between the claimants and to bind them both. It was only by a method like that that they could reach a solution—paying once, and once only, the value of this moral claim. Now, that being so, let me see what was done in pursuance of that method of settlement. The head of that church, so possessed with power to preclude the Jesuits from making any further claim, so possessed with power to preclude the bishops from making any further claim, authorised, in 1884—and this is an important fact, as the House will see when I proceed a little with the argument—authorised the Archbishop of Quebec to act as his attorney in the negotiations for the settlement. On the 7th of May, 1887, a document appears which has been one of the means of exciting hostility to this Act. On the 7th of May, 1887, the head of the church reserved to himself the right to settle the question with regard to the value of that moral claim and the division of the proceeds—reserved it to himself in virtue of his prerogatives as a potentate? Not at all. Reserved it to himself simply in the withdrawal of the authority which he had given to the Archbishop of Quebec, and left himself unrepresented in the Province by any attorney whomsoever. And, therefore, when it is said that the Pope reserved to himself the right to settle the question, he was not by any means claiming to reserve any right in the public domain in the Province, or any right to the appropriation of money of the Province. He was simply withdrawing the power which he had given to another person to settle the question, and saying: "Until a new authority is given, you will negotiate with me." The next step, Sir, was on the 17th of May, 1888, and that was in a letter which was written by Mr. Mercier, the First Minister of Quebec, and which, without an undue desire to defend the propriety of these negotiations, the policy of the Act, or any other step of the transaction, I think has been very much misunderstood in this discussion. That letter recites, among other things, that the Holy Father, by reserving to himself the settlement of that question, virtually had cancelled the authority, the only authority, which existed in the Province of Quebec, to negotiate with the Government. The First Minister said:

"My predecessors in the Government deemed it their duty, in 1876, believe, to order the demolition of the college and the division of the property into building lots, in view of an immediate sale, which, however, did not take place, owing to certain representations from exalted personages at the time.

"To avoid further difficulties, as I supposed, my predecessors let the matter lie and allowed the property to be so neglected that it has become a grazing ground and a receptacle for filth, so much so that it is openly said in Quebec that the matter has become a public scandal.

"Under these circumstances, I deem it my duty to ask Your Eminence if you see any serious objection to the Government's selling the property, pending a final settlement of the question of the Jesuits' estates."

My hon. friends so far misconceived that request as to represent it to be a petition on the part of the Government of the Province to a foreign potentate for permission to sell the property—a permission which they did not need, because by the law of the Province they had the power to sell it, and they had from year to year sold portions of it, and put the proceeds in the public Treasury. But in asking his consent to the sale of the property, they were asking that, when they brought it to the market again, they should not be met by the protests of the bishops whom he had the power to control; and, therefore, when the First Minister said: "Will you permit this property to be sold, pending a final settlement of the Jesuits' estates?"—he was simply asking that that protest should no longer be made, and that there should be a consent to the sale on the part of all who asserted any claim whatever, even though it were only the shadow of a moral claim. He said: "This is a receptacle for filth, so much so that it has become a public scandal; let us all agree that it shall be sold, pending a settlement of the Jesuits' estates." Surely that is only the ordinary transaction of everyday life, when a man has possession of real estate to which another sets up even an unfounded claim. He will say: "Rather than that this property should go to waste and be a public nuisance, better that we should all consent to sell it." Yet we are told that the First Minister went to the feet of a foreign potentate to enable him to exercise power which he ought to have found in the statutes of his own Province. He was not denying his legal title or power; but he was simply saying: "Give me your consent, so that this claim, whether little or much, shall no longer stand in the way of a sale for the benefit of all concerned." He said:

"The Government would look on the proceeds of the sale as a special deposit to be disposed of hereafter, in accordance with the agreements to be entered into between the parties interested, with the sanction of the Holy See."

Simply this, that all parties claiming the property, or any rights in respect of it, shall agree that the property shall be sold and the proceeds shall be kept inviolate, so that anybody having any claim against the property shall not be prejudiced, but shall have the same claim as before—precisely the same arrangement as any business man having property to sell would make with his adversary. The letter goes on to say:

"As it will perhaps be necessary, upon this matter, to consult the Legislature of our Province, which is to be convened very shortly, I respectfully solicit an immediate reply."

We were told in sarcastic tones to-day that it was absolutely necessary to go to the feet of the Sovereign Pontiff, but it might only perhaps be necessary to consult the Legislature of the Province of Quebec. I say when we know the facts with regard to that property, the criticism becomes unfair. The Government of the Province had already power to sell the estates by law, and, therefore, unless it were agreed upon with the head of the church that the property should be sold under these conditions, and an agreement were made to value this very claim, and to put aside the funds to meet it, there was no necessity to consult the Legislature at all. If the personage to whom that letter was addressed had declined the negotiations, it would not have been necessary to consult the Legislature, because the Provincial Government had all the legal authority the Legislature could give them. It was only in the event of a compromise being arrived at and the payment of money being involved, that it was necessary to consult the Legislature. And yet this letter has been put to the House, as if, forsooth, the fair and true meaning of it was that it was only perhaps necessary to consult the Legislature, but at all events it was necessary to consult the Holy See. Now, the answer to that letter was in these words:

"I hasten to notify you that, having laid your request before the Holy Father at the audience yesterday, His Holiness was pleased to grant permission to sell the property which belonged to the Jesuit Fathers before they were suppressed, upon the express condition, however, that the sum to be received be deposited and left at the free disposal of the Holy See."

The claimant representing this moral claim says: "I agree that you shall sell that lot in the city of Quebec, but if you sell it, place the fund to my credit in order that we may know where it is, when we arrive at a satisfactory conclusion as to what shall be done with it." The answer of the First Minister was that he declined to accede to that, but he proposed a reasonable alternative, that the Government retain the proceeds until this dispute should be settled. Thus what is declared to be an assumption of authority on the part of the Pope, actually in contravention of the Supremacy Act, and what we are told actually trails the Queen's honor in the dust, is that the Pope consents to the Quebec Government retaining the proceeds of the sale of the Jesuits' estates, subject to a future settlement of the dispute. The Government of Quebec, pending the settlement of the claims of these two litigants, which were to be held in suspense to be settled, not before the sale of the property but afterwards, retained custody of this fund; and when the authority representing these rival claimants agrees to this proposition, it is asserted, forsooth, that because he uses the word "allows," meaning evidently "consents," he has encroached on the prerogative of the Queen. In agreeing to the Government retaining the proceeds of the sale of the Jesuits' estates, he acted simply as the arbiter between the two contesting claimants. He allows this simply as the person who, as the head of the church to which the claimants belong, has, by their own choice, a right to give this consent; and yet when he consents to that, it is actually declared that he is asserting the prerogative of a foreign potentate in derogation of the prerogative of the Queen. I repeat that when we know the facts with regard to the situation of this property, and with regard to the position of the two rival claimants, it is impossible to misunderstand, and almost impossible for ingenuity to misrepresent, the preamble of this Act, as unfortunately it has been misrepresented during the long discussion which has taken place, since the Act was passed, in various parts of the country. The letter of Cardinal Simeoni, of the 27th March, 1888, contains this passage with regard to the conclusion arrived at:

"Affirmatively in favor of the Fathers of the Society of Jesus and in accordance with the method prescribed in other places, that is to say, that the Fathers of the Society of Jesus treat in their own name with the Civil Government, in such a manner, however, as to leave full liberty to the Holy See to dispose of the property as it deems advisable, and consequently that they should be very careful that no condition or clause should be inserted in the official deed of the concession of such property which could in any manner affect the liberty of the Holy See."

As I have said, down to that time, the power of attorney which enabled any one to negotiate with regard to this question had been withdrawn, and then there was simply a new authority given to a new attorney, namely, the fathers of the society, to treat with the Government of Quebec, and the stipulation, not that the property of the Province should be subject to any conditions, but that if there should be a conveyance made of it to any parties—to the Jesuits on the one side or the hierarchy on the other—in settlement of the claim, these parties should not take a deed which would preclude the Pope from giving a final decision as to the way in which the proceeds should be divided between them. Then, in his letter dated 1st May, 1888, the First Minister of the Province of Quebec distinctly stipulates that he is not recognising any civil or, as we would call it, any legal obligation, but merely the moral obligation in this respect. He says:

"6 That you will grant to the Government of the Province of Quebec a full, complete and perpetual concession of all the property which may have belonged in Canada, under whatever title, to the Fathers of the old society, and that you will renounce to all rights generally whatsoever upon such property and the revenues therefrom in favor of our Province, the whole, as well as in the name of the old Order of Jesuits, and of your present corporation as the name of the Pope, of the Sacred College of the Propaganda and of the Roman Catholic Church in general."

Then follows the clause to which above all others, exception is taken, and to which I shall ask the special attention of the House:

"7. That any agreement made between you and the Government of the Province will be binding only in so far as it shall be ratified by the Pope and the Legislature of this Province."

Now, when we look at the Act itself, when we see what the Government of Quebec asked the Legislature to do, when we see them ask the Legislature to vote, in extinction of this moral claim, whatever it was worth, the sum of $400,000, we cease to be surprised and to be deceived as regards the effect of that provision of the statute. The Ministry of Quebec were dealing with two rival claimants—the hierarchy and the Jesuit Society. They were dealing also with a third party, the Pope, who occupied the position of mediator by consent between these two, and the First Minister of Quebec stipulated that before the Province should be asked to pay one dollar of the money, it should have a conveyance, in the first place, from the fathers of the society, in the second place from the Pope himself, and, in the third place, from the Sacred College of the Propaganda and the Roman Catholic Church in general. He stipulated that before he should be bound to pay a dollar of that money, nay, even before he should ask the Legislature of Quebec to authorise him to pay a dollar, he should be in a position to say: "I have obtained a complete release from all the parties who forever after can assert the slightest right or title or the slightest claim, legally or morally, in regard to these estates." Why could he not do this? Could he have said: "I ask the Legislature of the Province of Quebec for authority to pay this money on obtaining a conveyance from the fathers of the society?" Would he not have left outstanding the rights of the hierarchy, who contested, every inch of the way, the rights of the fathers of the society to the proceeds of the settlement? Would he not have left outstanding still the possible claim of the authority superior to them all? I assert it, without fear, that the contention will not commend itself to the good sense of the House, that that provision No. 7, which is taken such great exception to, is a distinct provision against the authority of the Pope and not in favor of the authority of the Pope. In fact by that provision, the substance of the agreement was this: "While I am willing to offer to you $400,000, I am not willing to be bound by my offer until your master ratifies your agreement to accept it. I will not only not pay you a dollar of that $400,000 until every one of you gives me your conveyance, but until the greatest superior you have on earth gives me his deed; and until I get all that, I will not ask the Legislature of Quebec to give me authority to pay you a single dollar." And yet, because the Legislature of Quebec demanded, before it should put that money even at the disposition of the Governor in Council, that they should have everybody's rights foreclosed, and that the highest authority the claimants recognised on earth should give his deed also, and more, that the College of the Propaganda should also give its release, and that every step down to that point should be without prejudice to the rights of the Province of Quebec, we are told that this is an assertion of the prerogative of a foreign potentate. I am dealing with no merely legal theory upon this question. I am not devising any excuse for the legislation of Quebec. I say that the Legislature of Quebec so understood it. It was so explained to them. I hold before me a statement which the First Minister who introduced that Bill into the Legislature made to that Legislature, and upon which they passed the Bill. He says:

"In the first place we must not mistake the bearing of this declaration nor forget that it was inserted as a protection."

The Legislature of Quebec passed it as a protection on the statement of their First Minister. They passed that provision unanimously as such protection, and yet months after we are to put a different interpretation upon what their intention was, and to ask that His Excellency, a stranger to that Legislature, a stranger to their motives, should decide that that was not their true motive at all, that it was not a protection but a distinct challenge of the supremacy of Her Majesty Queen Victoria. Mr. Mercier said:

"Any serious objection to it, however slight, may disappear, for it is we, the Ministers, who insisted on it, in order not to give effect to the transaction, unless it was sanctioned by the religious authority, in the person of the Pope. And it is easy to understand why. In all important treaties made by mandatories (agents as we understand) ratification must be made by the principal, i.e., the mandator. Thus, for example, take what concerns me personally, what concerns Ministers,—what is it usual to state in resolutions and letters?—that the transaction will not avail unless sanctioned by the Legislature. Well, the Rev. Father Turgeon, who was charged by the Holy See to settle this question with us, is only an agent, a mandatory, an attorney. And so that there may be no misunderstanding, so that the transaction may be final, so that the settlement may no longer be open to discussion by the religious authorities, we insist that the Pope shall ratify the arrangement. There is no question of having the law sanctioned by the Pope. Let us not play upon words. The law will be sanctioned by the Lieutenant Governor, and it will take effect in the terms of the agreement. That is to say, Sir, that if the Pope does not ratify the arrangement there will be neither interest nor principal paid, but we shall then say to the religious authorities: 'You appointed an agent to settle this question; we came to an understanding, and if you do not ratify the act of your mandatory it is your own fault, for we, the inhabitants of the Province of Quebec, through the constituted authorities, have done our part, have kept our promise.' I am pleased to believe that the importance of the precaution taken by us will be understood. But once more, if there is any serious objection to that part (of the matter) it is very easy to come to an understanding. But in that case we must substitute something equivalent. What shall we put? We must, after all, put something to express that the transaction will not avail till the Pope ratifies it. Well, Sir, we said 'the Pope' intentionally. We did not say the Congregation of the Propaganda. We did not say the Secretary of State. We said the Pope. We desire that the ratification be given by the head of the church, in order that all those interested may be bound."

When we know that that was the intention of the Legislature of the Province, when we know it from the statutes, from the correspondence, and from all that we know of the facts regarding these estates, and when we know it also from the declaration of the First Minister of the Province in which the Act was passed—an explanation which was accepted by both sides of the House, for be it remembered, as the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) said last night, the Act was afterwards passed unanimously, and the First Minister was not asked, after his explanation, to substitute anything for that provision—we are now actually asked to advise His Excellency that all this had a different and an occult meaning, and that the Legislature of Quebec did not mean what the First Minister of that Province said it did in passing this Act. Then, in the letter of the 1st May, 1888, he goes on to say:

"That the amount of the compensation fixed shall remain in the possession of the Government of the Province as a special deposit until the Pope has ratified the said settlement, and made known his wishes respecting the distribution of such amount in this country."

Before I leave this stage of the transaction, I repeat that this was distinct legislation against any possible rights or claims on the part of the Pope, and that any Protestant Legislature in this country—I say more—the Parliament of the United Kingdom, if it had been called upon to pass a statute affecting property in regard to which there were foreign claimants, high or low, would have passed a provision to that effect, and achieving that result. I admit that the words which give offence to persons of various other persuasions throughout Canada and make distinct reference to the Pope, might not have appeared in the preamble to an Act of the United Kingdom. I admit that it would have been in better taste, in view of the great difference of opinion which exists in this country on matters of that kind, if that language had not appeared in the Act, and if the same result had been obtained, as the First Minister of Quebec says it might have been, in a different way; but the result, whatever may be the form of words used, is a proper result, guarding all the rights of the Province until everyone else had given up his claim. And, when it comes to a question of disallowance, we are here to advise disallowance or allowance, not upon the form of words, not upon the question of the draftsman's taste, but according to what we believe was the true meaning and intent of the Act itself. Now, let me again, before I leave the subject of the Act, call the attention of the House to the fact that all the argument which has been made with regard to the necessity for disallowance is based on objections to the preamble of the Act. In the history of disallowance in this country, in the history of the disallowance of our own statutes in the mother country—and we know that scores of them were disallowed—the records will be searched in vain to find one which was disallowed because the preamble was not agreeable to anybody. I do not pretend to dispute the statement of my hon. friend from Muskoka, (Mr. O'Brien), that the preamble is a part of the Act. So is the title a part of the Act, and so are the head-notes of sections; but has anyone ever heard of a Government being asked to disallow an Act because they did not like the wording of the title or of the head notes? The preamble is understood to be a part of the Act, for the purpose of interpreting the Act, but there is nothing in this Act for which interpretation is needed, and I distinguish, in referring to this, the most trivial and technical objection which could be taken to a statute, between those parts of the preamble which assert that certain correspondence has passed, such as this between the Premier and the Cardinal at Rome, and those preambles which recite certain agreements which the statute validates. Who can doubt that nine tenths of the agitation, and nine-tenths of the trouble, in reference to this measure have arisen from the fact that in March, 1888, there came from Rome a telegram stating that the Pope allowed the Government to retain the proceeds of the sale of the Jesuits' estates as a special deposit, forgetting that this was a part of other negotiations, which gave it an inoffensive meaning. Yes, nine-tenths of the agitation for disallowance has arisen from the fact that that telegram came from Rome and that this Act asserts that such a telegram did come, although within the four corners of the Act there is not a word based upon that telegram; and although all the statute does is to ratify and confirm an agreement between Father Turgeon and the Government of Quebec—the terms of which were that $400,000 should be paid as between the two litigants, and that, before any money should be within the power of the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec to dispose of, the two litigants should give up any claim whatsoever on the estates—I assert, without fear of contradiction among people who will consider this matter in a calm and business-like way, that that part of the preamble, which is the only part relevant to the purposes of the Act itself, is utterly harmless, entirely business-like, free from the slightest suspicion of derogating from any right of Her Majesty, and from the slightest suspicion of infringement of the Constitution. Now, it is said, and the House will remember with what gravity, and force, and eloquence it was urged upon the House this afternoon, that this statute denies the supremacy of the Queen. I have read to you all the passages which refer in the slightest degree to any person outside of Her Majesty's dominions. I have stated the facts, in regard to the position of this property, the negotiations which were had in regard to it, and I will leave it to the dispassionate judgment of the House, or of any man, Catholic or Protestant, in this country, whether the Act in the slightest degree, considered in the light of the surrounding circumstances, affects in any way the authority or the supremacy of Her Majesty, spiritual or temporal. Let me ask: What rights Her Majesty had in this property—as the spiritual or as the temporal sovereign? Absolutely none whatever—absolutely none whatever, excepting that she stood as the trustee for the Province of Quebec. Her own personal rights were not affected, her sovereign rights were not affected. These were no part of Her Majesty's domain, they were no part of Her Majesty's revenue. If they were, under this Act, all sold and turned into money to-morrow, not one dollar will ever pass into Her Majesty's Treasury, public or private, not one dollar will ever be disposed of under the advice of Her Majesty's Ministers. Her Majesty, with regard to those lands, had no interest, either as the spiritual or the temporal sovereign. Let me ask then in what particular that Act derogates from the authority of Her Majesty as head of her church, or as head of any religion in the British Empire? None whatever. It is purely a question of temporal concern, purely of the public domain of the Province of Quebec. My hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Barron) said last night that it derogated from her authority, inasmuch as it placed a portion of the public money in Quebec at the disposal of a foreigner. It does not, I submit, place the public money of the Province of Quebec at the disposal of a foreigner; it sets aside a sum of money for the extinguishment of a claim upon the public property of Quebec, and then calls upon those which are litigants in regard to it, to abide by the decision of their arbitrator in the matter. When that $400,000 shall have been paid from the Treasury of the Province of Quebec, Her Majesty has not the slightest right or interest with regard to the distribution of it. In the ordinary course it would be paid to one of the claimants on the property; but as there happen to be two, it is paid into the hands, or held subject to the order, of the person who has to settle the disputes between them. By what right can it be claimed that Her Majesty, or that her Government, either in England or the Province of Quebec, has a right to distribute a single dollar of that money? Surely the rights of the Crown and of the Province end when the Government there is able to say: "We have received the deed of all these outstanding claims for which we consent to pay the money;" and to contend after that that there is any royal or legislative right to control the subdivision of the money, would be like saying that after a grant of public lands had passed under the great seal, the Province had a right to say who should have interest in the land for all time to come. Now, I would be content if so much had not been said upon this subject as to mislead the judgment of hundreds of persons in this country, whose judgment upon any public question is well worth having—I would be content to rest the case there, and to say that no right of Her Majesty either as a temporal or a spiritual power, is in the least degree involved; but when we are taken so far afield upon the question as to go back into the legislation of 300 years ago, when we are asked to apply to this question the Supremacy Act, which could not have the slightest bearing upon it, even if it be in force in the Province of Quebec, I feel bound to follow out that argument to some extent for the purpose of showing how unreasonable the demand is that, under the British North America Act, and in this day of colonial rights and of self government, the federal authority in Canada, should undertake to control the legislation of one of its Provinces, according to the coercive legislation which used to exist in the mother country 300 years ago. I have reminded the House what privileges were, even as regards the Act of Supremacy, ceded to the people of Quebec by the Terms of Capitulation, by the terms of the treaty and by the terms of the Quebec Act. I have shown that absolute freedom of worship was extended by the Treaty of Paris and by the Quebec Act; I have shown the House, I think, what is the meaning of the reservation as to the laws of Great Britain as regards religion. Sir, in the year 1765, the law officers of the Crown made this statement on their responsibility to the Government:

"Her Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects residing in the countries in America ceded to Her Majesty by the Treaty of Paris are not subject, in the colonies, to the incapacities, deprivation of rights and penalties to which the Roman Catholic subjects in the Kingdom are subject."

The First Minister of that country, Lord North, then said the same thing in debate, a brief extract of which I will read to you:

"It has been the opinion of very many able lawyers that the best way to establish the happiness of the inhabitants is to give them their own laws, as far as relates to their own possessions. Their possessions were marked out to them at the time of the treaty; to give them those possessions without giving them laws to maintain those possessions would not be very wise. As to the free exercise of their religion, it likewise is no more than what is confirmed to them by treaty, as far as the laws of Great Britain can confirm it. Now, there is no doubt that the laws of Great Britain do permit the very full and free exercise of any religion different from that of the Church of England, in any of the colonies; therefore, I apprehend that we ought not to extend them to Canada."

Well, Sir, let us not, in dealing with this question of supremacy, be more restrictive on the people of our own country in favor of the authority of the sovereign, whom we all revere and whose powers and prerogatives we all wish to maintain, than the sovereigns of Great Britain have been themselves. What has been their action in respect to this question of the supremacy? Let me read to you a passage in Lord Thurlow's statement in the debates of 1774:

"I stated in the beginning that it did not affect to relate to Canada; but I said that the capitulation did reserve all their effects, movable and immovable. But even if it were otherwise, is it to be supposed that the tithes would accrue to the King? The tithe is collateral to the land, not sunk in it. To give the right to it is giving to the secular body as well as the regular clergy all they were in possession of before. It was always in my opinion an established fact, that the clergy (in Canada) were entitled to tithes though they might not have use for them." (Debates, 1774, page 71).

So that the people in the Province of Quebec, who are said to-day to be under the provisions of a Supremacy Act so severe, that they cannot recognise the superiority of a foreign bishop, were, in 1774, by Her Majesty's Attorney General, declared to be subject to their own laws so far that their clergy were entitled to collect tithes from the people, although perhaps not by authority of law. Well, seventy-six years ago, by a solemn Act of State, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Quebec was recognised by the Governor of the Province under royal instructions. We are told that the Act of Supremacy was in force; and yet that man was a bishop simply by the superiority of the first bishop of his church. He was a bishop because he had received from Rome the bulls which, under the statutes of Queen Elizabeth, it was high treason to bring into the country at all. That was the way in which the religious restrictions of the people of this country were treated upwards of seventy-five years ago by the Imperial authorities; but after the lapse of three-quarters of a century we are to be wiser and we are to enforce against a great section of our free people legislation reserving rights to the Crown which the Crown deliberately chose to ignore seventy-six years ago. In 1817 the Roman Catholic Bishop of Quebec received a mandamus, calling him as a bishop to the Legislative Council of the Province. He held his see by the will and under the bull of his superior bishop, and he was called by virtue of his office to be one of the rulers of the Province of Quebec. In 1839 Governor Colborne issued letters patent to incorporate the Roman Catholic Bishop of Quebec and all his successors, whomsoever they might be, appointed by the foreign superior and under bulls, which, according to the legislation that these hon. gentleman ask us to apply to Quebec to-day, it would be high treason to introduce into the country. In 1838 a Roman Catholic college was incorporated in the Province of Prince Edward Island, and the question was submitted to the law officers of the Crown fifty years ago, whether it was a violation of the supremacy of the Crown. It was a violation of the supremacy of the Crown fifty times over if anything within this Act of Quebec is a violation of that supremacy. But the law officers of the Crown advised that it was within the competency of the local powers as they then existed, and that it was no derogation of the Act of Supremacy, if that Act could be held to apply to that Province. But since that period, since the period when the officers in this country charged with the maintenance of the rights of the Crown began to be infinitely less restrictive than we are asked to be to-day, three-quarters of a century later, what a change has taken place in the colonies of British North America. We have been placed upon a different footing. We have received free institutions, we have received legislative powers, and by the voice of our Sovereign, by the voice of Her Parliament, by the policy of Her Ministers, as expressed in every act of State, it has been declared that, subject only to those matters which are of Imperial concern, we shall be as fully clothed with the rights of self-governing freemen in every part of Canada as are the subjects in the heart of England. Yet we are told now that we are under, not only the restrictive legislation of 300 years ago, but that no Legislature of Canada has power to repeal any such restrictive legislation, and that any restrictive legislation of that kind is beyond the competency of a Provincial Legislature. Why, we heard last night the singular statement that a Provincial Legislature has only a derived or delegated authority. I deny that statement as explicitly as it is courteous to deny any statement made by any hon. member of this House. I go further and I say that, within the limits of its authority and subject only to the power of disallowance, a Provincial Legislature is as absolute as is the Imperial Parliament itself. The Imperial Parliament is not restricted as to the subjects over which it can legislate, the Provincial Legislatures are restricted in regard to the subjects on which they can legislate, but in legislating upon these subjects a Provincial Legislature has all the rights which it is possible for the Imperial Parliament to confer. I say more: I say that a Provincial Legislature, legislating upon subjects which are given to it by the British North America Act, has the power to repeal an Imperial statute prior to the British North America Act affecting those subjects. It has been urged upon the House these two days that we had no power, and that the Act of 28 and 29 Victoria, called the Colonial Enactments Act, provided that no statute of a colony should have force as against an Imperial statute. But after the statute of 28 and 29 Victoria, the British North America Act was passed, and it gives us, as I have said, a division of powers between the two bodies, but it gives the two bodies in legislating in their respective spheres all the powers that the Imperial Legislature possessed. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Barron) was misled, I think, last night in his reference to the British North America Act. It is true that the British North America Act seems to contain in the 129th section a reservation in that behalf; it reads:

"Except as otherwise provided by this Act all laws in force in Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick at the union and all courts of civil and criminal jurisdiction and all legal commissions, powers and authorities and all officers, judicial, administrative and ministerial existing therein at the Union, shall continue in Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick respectively, as if the Union had not been made; subject nevertheless (except with respect to such as are enacted by or exist under Acts of the Parliament of Great Britain or of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland) to be repealed, abolished or altered by the Parliament of Canada or by the Legislature of the respective Provinces according to the authority of the Parliament or of that Legislature under this Act."

The hon. gentleman read it as being a restriction by the British North America Act against our repealing or modifying an Imperial statute relating to any subject under our control. I do not so regard it. I regard it as containing neither a grant of power nor a restriction as to our legislating upon Imperial statutes. But since that Act was passed, in which the Imperial Parliament virtually said: "We say nothing as to Imperial statutes;" we have had three distinct decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in regard to legislation by a Province upon a subject within its control, and declaring that the Provincial Legislature has power to repeal a statute of the Imperial Parliament. The first is the case of Harris against Davies, page 279, which was an appeal from New South Wales, and in which this was held with reference to a statute of James I, which had distinct force in that colony:

"Held that the Legislature of New South Wales had power to repeal the statute of James I, which according to its true construction placed an action for slander for words spoken, upon the same footing, as regards costs and other matters, as an action for written slander."

The statute of James I made distinct provision as to the amount of costs which the litigant could recover when he only obtained a verdict for a certain amount for slander; the Legislature passed an Act repugnant to that and the provisions of the Colonial Enactment Act were cited. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by Sir Barnes Peacock, who said:

"Their Lordships are of opinion that there are no sufficient grounds for reversing the judgment of the court below. Their Lordships are of opinion that the Colonial Legislature had the power to repeal the statute of James I if they thought fit, and they are also of opinion that looking at the first section of 11 Victoria, No. 13, it was the intention of the Legislature to place an action for words spoken, upon the same footing as regards costs and other matters as an action for written slander."

Mr. BARRON Have they a statute in that colony corresponding with the British North America Act?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes. I have examined that, and it conveys no larger grant of legislative powers than the British North America Act does to us. If the hon. gentleman will look in the same volume to the case of Powell vs. Apollo Candle Company, Limited, in which the law of New South Wales came up likewise, he will find that the conclusion which he urged as to the Colonial Legislature being a mere delegate of the Imperial Parliament was fully considered and discussed, and principally on reference to the case from Canada of Hodge vs. The Queen. The Judicial Committee said:

"Two cases have come before this board in which the powers of Colonial Legislatures have been a good deal considered, but these cases are of too late a date to have been known to the Supreme Court when their judgment was delivered. The first was the case of Regina vs. Burah (1), in which the question was whether a section of an Indian Act conferring upon the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal the power to determine whether the Act, or any part of it, should be applied to a certain district, was or was not ultra vires. In the judgment of this board, given by the Lord Chancellor, the legislation is declared to be intra vires, and the Lord Chancellor lays down the general law in these terms: 'The Indian Legislature has powers expressly limited by the Act of the Imperial Parliament which created it, and it can of course do nothing beyond the limits which circumscribe these powers. But when acting within those limits it is not in any sense an agent or delegate of the Imperial Parliament, but has, and was intended to have, plenary powers of legislation as large, and of the same nature, as those of Parliament itself.' The same doctrine has been laid down in a later case of Hodge vs. The Queen (2), where the question arose whether the Legislature of Ontario had or had not the power of entrusting to a local authority—a board of commissioners—the power of enacting regulations with respect to their Liquor License Act of 1877, of creating offences for the breach of those regulations, and annexing penalties thereto Their lordships held that they had that power. It was argued then, as it has been argued to-day, that the Local Legislature is in the nature of an agent or delegate, and, on the principle delegatus non potest delegare, the Local Legislature must exercise all its functions itself, and can delegate or entrust none of them to other persons or parties. But the judgment, after reciting that such had been the contention, goes on to say: 'It appears to their lordships, however, that the objection thus raised by the appellants is founded on an entire misconception of the true character and position of the Provincial Legislatures. They are in no sense delegates of or acting under any mandate from the Imperial Parliament. When the British North America Act enacted that there should be a Legislature for Ontario, and that its Legislative Assembly should have exclusive authority to make laws for the Province and for provincial purposes in relation to the matters enumerated in section 92, it conferred powers, not in any sense to be exercised by delegation from or as agents of the Imperial Parliament, but authority as plenary and as ample within the limits prescribed by section 92, as the Imperial Parliament in the plenitude of its power possessed or could bestow. Within these limits of subjects and areas the Local Legislature is supreme and has the same authority as the Imperial Parliament."

(1) 3 App. Cas., 889. (2) 9 App. Cases, 117.

Well, Sir, later on we had the not forgotten case of the Queen against Riel before the Privy Council in which this state of affairs was shown. There had been three Imperial statutes passed expressely for the regulation of the trial of offences in Rupert's Land, now known as the North-West Territories. The statutes of Canada contained provisions repugnant to those, and on the appeal to the Privy Council it was decided that the Parliament of Canada had the power to pass legislation changing those statutes and repealing them if necessary. I infer from this that in touching on a question of religious liberty, which is surely a civil right of the people of the Province, the Provincial Legislature is untrammelled in the exercise of its power by the Imperial legislation of centuries ago. I say, therefore, that, even though it can be contended that this statute was in any degree a derogation from the restrictions of the Supremacy Act—from the oppressive restrictions of the Supremacy Act—and if it should be seriously decided that the Supremacy Act prevails in British North America, that we have no freedom of religion, that no man has a right to dissent from the Church of England, that no man has a right to exercise the Catholic religion, that no man has a right to exercise submission to a superior, whether that superior be the president of a conference, the moderator of an assembly, or the first bishop of his church, then, I say, the first duty of this House, the first duty of every Legislature in the Provinces of Canada, would be to declare that we have in this 19th century the rights of freemen and the rights of religious liberty according to our consciences, and to say that that Act, 300 years old, and for 200 years and upwards ignored in the United Kingdom, shall not restrict the people of these Provinces in their right of belief, and freedom of worship and their right under the British North America Act to have a constitution similar in form to that which our fellow subjects in the United Kingdom enjoy. Let me see how far the Provinces, from time to time, in the exercise of their right of self-government conferred upon them, have insisted on that policy, and have insisted upon that right with the full recognition of the Imperial authorities, for let it be remembered that before 1867 our statutes had to go home and be revised by the Colonial Office under the advice of the Crown officers. Why, Sir, in the year 1850 the Roman Catholic bishops in the Province of Upper Canada were incorporated, and their successors from time to time canonically appointed. "Their successors," our friend from Simcoe will tell us, "oh, yes, but not successors recognising any authority from a foreign superior." Read the statute, and I will give up the argument if it does not say:

"In communion with the Church of Rome."

Therefore, in 1850, the Legislature of Upper Canada incorporated those bishops and gave them corporate powers, on the one condition which, according to the hon. member for Simcoe, it is unconstitutional we should allow in this country at all, namely, that they should be in communion with the See of Rome. In 1854, Sir, the same thing was done for all the bishops for all time to come in Lower Canada; and an Act for the division of the parishes of that Province for the purposes of public worship, under the supervision of those bishops, was authorised by the Province. In 1862 all the bishops of the Province of New Brunswick for all time to come were incorporated. You can look at the statutes of every Parliament in British America, and you will find precisely the same legislation; and the main of those corporate powers is that those who are to exercise them shall be bishops in communion with the Church of Rome. We have heard to-night, and we heard last night, about the laches of the people, who, we are told, were not to be precluded, not having objected to the Jesuits' Incorporation Act of 1887, from objecting to it now. Perhaps not. We were told that a great evil had been done, that a great class of public sinners in this country had been given powers of incorporation in 1887, and that it was not too late to rise in indignant protest. We were told that a people does not lose its right to object to provisions which are repugnant to an English statute of 300 years ago, which they contend and we deny, has any force, or ought to have any force, in this country, in regard to people of other religious beliefs at any rate. It is perhaps not too late. But they are not only a year behind the time; they are 37 years behind the time, because 37 years ago the Parliament of Canada incorporated a body of these Jesuits, for the actual purpose of teaching what the hon. member for North Simcoe calls their wicked tenets, in the Province of Quebec. In 1852, Sir, St. Mary's College, in the city of Montreal, to be taught by Jesuits, and the corporators of which were Jesuits, was incorporated by the Legislature of Canada; and in turning to the division list on that Act, as one of my hon. colleagues did last night, he showed me that 29 Protestants and 27 Catholics voted for it, and only 7 voted against it altogether in that whole Legislature. We had, Sir, 37 years ago religious toleration which would have frowned down the argument which was presented to this House this afternoon, if it had been clothed in ten times the ability and force with which we saw it paraded before the House to-day. Then, in 1868, a college for the same purpose at Sault au Recollet, in the Province of Quebec, was incorporated; and I ask members on both sides of this question, whether, down to a few weeks ago we have ever heard any remonstrance against the powers which were conferred on those bodies, or whether any section of the people of this country, or any one, high or low, of one denomination or another—and I speak of those who have been appealing to public opinion on this question from the pulpits with the profoundest respect—has ever objected to the teachings of those institutions, or uttered any reproach with regard to their conduct in this country, with regard to their loyalty, or with regard to the effects of their instruction or example on the youth of this country. Again addressing myself to the argument that it is not necessary for us in British North America to be more restrictive as regards the rights and powers of the Crown than the Crown has been in England, let me call the attention of the House to the fact that 80 years ago, in the heart of England, a magnificent institution of learning was placed under the control of this same order, in which they have been carrying on, every year since, the education of hundreds of English youths, and that that institution at Stoneyhurst has had added to it other like institutions all over England. Are we to say that the Act of Supremacy, the keen edge of which is not to be applied in Great Britain, or that the prohibitory legislation with regard to the Jesuit Order, which is not to be applied in Great Britain, must be applied to one section of the people in British North America, and applied under our federal system by the arbitrary power of disallowance with which His Excellency is entrusted? I might well reiterate, but I will not do further than refer to the eloquent and forcible argument which you, Sir (Mr. Colby) addressed to the House last night, in which you pointed out that we had lived to too late an age for any section of the people of this country to be willing to live under a government by which that kind of legislation would be applied. In the exercise of the immense powers, limited though the range of subjects may be, which are given to the Provincial Legislatures, there is no Provincial Legislature in Canada, which, legislating upon the subject of the civil and religious liberties of its people, would consent to have its powers curtailed by the Federal Government taking from the wall a rusty weapon which had hung idly there for 200 years. I will spare the patience of the House and not do what I intended to do, namely, quote legislation still in force with regard to all Her Majesty's domain, but a dead letter for scores of years—legislation which, if it were in force would put one-third of the people of this city into prison to-morrow, for the offence of heresy, the offence of non-conformity, the offence of not taking the sacrament, or for daring to profess the belief of Unitarians, some of these statutes being still actually unrepealed. But what is the use? The greatest writer on the subject of criminal law which the century has produced, Sir Fitzjames Stephens, has put the story well in two paragraphs, and his authority upon it will not be denied; the acceptability of his sentiments with regard to the United Kingdom will not be questioned; and he says this:

"For 200 years Government has been carried on——"

And he is speaking of government in the United Kingdom——"without prejudice to differences of opinion which in previous times were regarded as altogether fundamental."

For the last 200 years in England, I venture to say, government could not have been carried on if it had not been by practically ignoring legislation which previously was levelled at differences of opinion which were considered altogether fundamental. At that time a man who did not conform to the religion of his neighbors and the religion of the law was put out of the pale of the law altogether and treated as a public criminal. A great body of that legislation has never been repealed to this day; a great body of it is just as much in force in the Dominion of Canada against our freedom of opinion, against our freedom of worship, as the statutes which have been invoked yesterday and to-day; and yet when we read this lesson that for 200 years it has only been possible to carry on government in England by ignoring those differences of opinion which used to be aimed at by the criminal law and were considered as fundamental, we are, in this country, to look still at the old fundamental differences and curtail our liberties by the strong arm of the federal authority; and, in the exercise of federal power, we are to curtail the rights of our Legislatures to infringe upon, impugn, or make any enactment repugnant to this legislation which has been buried under the weight of public opinion for upwards of two centuries. Well, I forget to say, and I will digress from my argument for a moment to mention it, that, in 1871, by a statute of the Province of Quebec, there was an Act passed incorporating the whole Society of Jesus in the Province. The order was precisely the same society which was incorporated by the Act of 1887; and the only difference is the difference of legislative provisions as to the method of working their incorporation. From 1871 to 1887, no word of objection was raised in any part of the country to that incorporation, as to its constitutionality or effect, but because in 1889 we did not advise disallowance of an Act of precisely the same kind, we are to fall under the censure of this House. I have referred to the statement of Sir Fitzjames Stephens as to the value of this legislation to England, and I will cite another passage which, for its terseness and its force, is worthy the attention of hon. gentlemen. He says, referring to the legislation against the Jesuits in the year of George IV:

"These powers, I believe, have been considered, ever since they were passed, as an absolutely dead letter."

Later on, he says, as to ecclesiastical legislation:

"Our ancestors walked in darkness, and we have solved the problem, which was too hard for them, by recognising liberty of conscience as a principle of universal application."

Before I close my argument, I must address myself for a moment to a view which was put forward by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) as regards the effect of the statute on the fund for higher education in the Province of Quebec. He put forward as a reason why this Act should be disallowed, if no other reason existed, that it was a breach of trust, and that it misapplied, or, to use his own words, misappropriated the property which it related to. I think the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Langelier) was quite right in challenging him to read any part of the Act which sustained his argument, and the House observed that he did not respond to the challenge. Let me remind the House at the outset that, in regard to the sale of the property, the statute gives the Province no greater power than it had before. It is a statute as its title implies, for the settlement of the Jesuit claims. But the Province of Quebec before that, had, under its existing legislation, ample power of sale, and the Act makes no provision different from that which did exist as to what is to be done with the property or the money. One would suppose, listening to the argument of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) although he did not state it in so many words, there was a provision in the Act which declared that that trust should no longer apply to the property, that it might go into the consolidated revenue and be disposed of as the Government pleased. Not so. The last clause of the Act provides that when these properties are sold, they are to be subject to the disposition of the Legislature. Are we to infer and to advise disallowance on the ground of that inference, that the Legislature of the Province is going to betray its trust with regard to any property, when it has never made that declaration or never sought power to desert the trust? I will tell the House what is the absolute fact on this point: That the minority in the Province of Quebec, that those interested in higher education, that those interested in any way in the execution of the trust, have not suffered one whit or jot by the passage of the Act. The fact has been that the revenue from those estates has been paid from year to year into the consolidated revenue fund and not into the fund for higher education. The fact is likewise that the proceeds of large portions of that property which have already been sold have, from year to year, been placed to the credit of the consolidated revenue, and spent for the general purposes of the Province. From year to year, the Provincial Legislature, not out of the revenues of the Jesuits' estates or the proceeds of the Jesuits' estates, which were too small for that purpose, but out of its consolidated revenue, has made ample provision for the higher education of the Province; and after the argument made this afternoon about the way in which the minority would be prejudiced, and the supineness of the minority in submitting, as it was said they would be willing to submit, to this legislation, and the breach of trust, which was apparent on the Act itself, in the diversion of the only fund that exists for the higher education of the Province, the House will be surprised to learn that from year to year—I speak in general terms—the allowance in the Province of Quebec for the higher education made out of the consolidated revenue fund has been, on an average, more than three times the annual proceeds of the Jesuits' estates. Not a single school, high or low, in the Province of Quebec, has been sustained from those estates so far, because the fund was utterly insufficient. Ample provision was made out of the consolidated revenue fund, and yet we are told that when these estates disappear and go into the market, they go free from any trust, and that neither the majority nor the minority will have any security for higher education in the Province. It is sufficient for me to have shown the House that the Act purports to do nothing of the kind, that it sanctions nothing of the kind; but I think the argument has irresistible force when I show that these properties have not been considered a security for these purposes at all. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) challenged the propriety of my report upon this Act, when, after favoring the House with his long and interesting theological discourse, and after having excited to some extent the feelings and sympathy of the House, he declared that I had presented that statute to His Excellency as of no more importance than the eleven others accompanying it, which I had recommended should be left to their operation. Now, upon the importance or unimportance of the statutes it is not necessary for me to advise His Excellency, but I take the responsibility of having advised His Excellency that that Act was no less within the powers of the Legislature of Quebec than the other eleven which accompanied it. And when I have reminded the hon. gentleman that it is not a question of trust, that there is no diversion of trust by the authority of that Act, and that these estates have not been the source from which higher education has been supported, I think he will be almost inclined to agree with me that I was right after all in saying this was a fiscal matter within the control of the Province. But this is not the first time, although it is the first time this excitement has been raised with regard to it, that this society, who have been spoken of so severely in this debate, have been dealt with by the Province of Quebec. I have in my possession a list extending back over fifteen years of appropriations in the Supply Bills made by the Legislature of Quebec to support the higher education carried on by this society within that Province, and, according to the statement we have heard this afternoon, all that has been unconstitutional, and every one of these Supply Bills ought to have been disallowed, because, forsooth, they were ignoring the distinction between Church and State. I think it is rather late to treat this question as anything other than a fiscal question, and that the difference between the Supply Bills in all those fifteen years, and the Act which is now being discussed is simply a question of degree and of amount. The principle of supporting the higher education carried on by that society in that Province has been recognised, as I have said, every year in the Supply Bill, and, yet, for the first time, because this is a larger sum which is being dealt with, and larger because it deals with the rights or claims of that society to lands, we are asked to assert a principle which we were never asked before to assert in regard to them. Now, I desire to call the attention of the House for a moment to two other branches of the argument which were presented to it this afternoon. We were told that there was a restriction in the Act as regards the expenditure of the $60,000, but that there was no restriction as regards the expenditure of the $400,000. The $60,000 has been appropriated to a body which had no claim, legally or morally, and had never asserted any as regards the title to the Jesuits' estates. They have claimed to be interested in the appropriations which are made from time to time for higher education, and rightly so, and those claims have always been considered. I am not prepared to say, whether the proportion allotted to them in this Act is right or not. That is a question upon which the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), if he had a seat in the Legislature of the Province of Quebec, might have addressed the House with great force, but for us here to discuss the appropriation of money, and the proportions in which it is appropriated by a Province would be as absurd as for us to take the Supply Bill of the Province every year, and enter into a discussion of its different appropriations. The reason why, as I presume, the restriction has been imposed in regard to the $60,000, and not in regard to the $400,000, is that the $60,000 is voted for educational purposes purely and simply, and, while the $400,000 has every prospect of being so applied, because it is voted to a body whose business it is to teach, still it is paid to them in extinction of a claim which they had made to a part of the public domain of the Province. But we were told, and this is almost the last argument used by my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) but one to which I must advert, that the grant of money to this corporation was a church endowment which violated the principles of the separation of Church and State in this country. I pass by at this moment the position which any church occupies in this country. I do not intend to discuss how far, in any portion of the country, any church may be considered as now established; but I do say that it passes the power of ingenuity to show that the grant of money to a corporation of teachers and preachers is the endowment of a church in Canada. It is true that a church may be in part a society of preachers and teachers, but this society is not a church, and in the most illogical way in which a fallacy could be put on paper, this resolution asks the House to come to the conclusion that, because a society incorporated under a statute of the Province and employed in preaching and teaching the tenets of a certain religion receives a grant of money, that is the endowment of a church within the Province. I venture to say that there is no one in this country, who knows the facts upon which that resolution is based, and who reads that resolution, but must be surprised that it should receive the support, as it has done, of able and intelligent men in this House. Let me say to my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) that this is no more the endowment of a church, and that it is no more an interference with the separation of Church and State in this country than would be the endowment of a hospital or an orphanage or an asylum which was under the care of a religious organisation. We all cherish the principle that there should be no Church control over the State in any part of this country, but my hon. friend proposes something worse than that control. He proposes that we shall step into the domain of a Provincial Legislature, and shall say that no Provincial Legislature shall have the power to vote any money to any institution if it partakes of a religious character. It may profess any other kind of principle. It may profess any objectionable principle, and it is lawful to endow it, but, if it professes the Christian character, it is, forsooth, unconstitutional to allow such an Act to go into operation. I listened to the remarks which the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) addressed to the House on the third branch of his argument, as to the objectionable teachings of this society with some surprise, though I do not intend to-night to challenge his ample liberty to differ from me as to the correctness and propriety of those observations. I hoped that, in this discussion, he and those who will vote with him will not prove themselves any less friends of religious liberty than they have professed to be in the past, but I assume—I think I have a right to assume—that, when the case of the gentlemen who are opposed to the allowance of this Act is placed in the hands of an hon. member who is so able and so skilled in argument as he, we are not to be condemned for not asking His Excellency to disallow this Act, unless the reasons which he urged with such great force this afternoon are reasons which I could use in addressing His Excellency on the subject. Surely I have a right to assume that the hon. gentleman has put forward the best case he could, and I am not to be condemned unless I could avail myself of his reasons in asking His Excellency to disallow the Act. If I could picture myself going to His Excellency and asking for the disallowance of this Act, for the reasons which the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) presented in the latter part of his address, I would imagine myself just fit to be expelled from His Excellency's presence as quickly as possible. What would be the reasons which I should urge? I am not finding fault now with the strictures that the hon. gentleman made in regard to the society, but, forsooth, I am to go to His Excellency and ask him to disallow this Act because, in the year 1874, a Quarterly Review published an article denouncing the Jesuit Society and its teachings. Am I not right in taking the argument and the evidence which he produces to-day as the argument and the evidence which I should produce to His Excellency? If I were to go to His Excellency and say that the Quarterly Review, published in 1874, denounced in language as strong as could be the tenets and teachings of these people, His Excellency might ask me a number of perplexing questions, one of which was levelled at the hon. member for North Simcoe this afternoon without much profit to him. Let me suppose that His Excellency asked me: "Mr. Minister of Justice, who is the author?" My answer would have to be—surely I cannot do better than take the answer of the hon. member for Simcoe—my answer would have to be: "I really do not know who is the author; but, your Excellency, I am sure that nothing would be published in the Review which would not stand criticism." I am afraid that His Excellency might not be satisfied with that answer, and that he might put me another rather more puzzling question: "Mr. Minister of Justice, are you aware that these able and eloquent, but anonymous, publications in that Review have been refuted time and again until the slanders have been worn threadbare?" I would ask my hon. friend from Simcoe what I should answer to that question?

Mr. McCARTHY. Refuted where?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would like to ask him, has he ever read the answers to them? I would like to ask him, has he ever sought the answers to them? Because these are questions which His Excellency may ask me when I go to him with this advice. The hon. member asks me, where? Well, I tell him, in the first place, in publications so voluminous that I shall have to give him a catalogue of them; but in order to be precise, and not to be suspected of evading the question, I will tell him that in an English publication called the Month, step by step, as every one of these articles came out, the answer and the refutation came out, and that in the opinion of a great many people, these men were able to refute the articles triumphantly. I am not to pass judgment as to whether they were successful or otherwise, I have no right to speak my own opinions here, I am speaking for those with whom I am acting in concert. His Excellency might ask me whether having read these articles what conclusion I had come to as to the balance of arguments pro and con. If he did so, I should be unable to find, in the course of that admirable three hours interesting theological discussion which we had to day, a single hint as to my reply, and having read the attack in the Review, and the replies which were made, answer as I have done. I should have to tell His Excellency that unless he were to be guided by the opinion of a partisan on one side or the other, the best thing he could do would be to leave it either to his own conscience or to that conscience which the Constitution has provided for dealing with the subject—the conscience of the Legislature of the Province which had to deal with it. If His Excellency were to ask me: "Sir, in advising disallowance on the authority of the Quarterly Review,"—which I am afraid to the Colonial Office would not be a sound authority, would not be a satisfactory constitutional authority—"have you verified the quotations for yourself?" I ask the hon. member for Simcoe what I should answer then? What answer could he give to the House if I asked him now, whether he has verified a single one of those quotations—and I tell him that on the verity of the quotations half the controversy has turned. I tell him that it is claimed by those who have undertaken—I do not say they have succeeded—to refute them, that the tenets which they are accused of teaching, they have not taught; that the passages put forward as proofs were problems—doubtful cases, cases to distinguish between that which is the sin, which the confessor has to deal with, and that which, though against public morals or public propriety, the confessor has not to deal with. In dealing with casuistry, and when dealing with moral theology, some of the old writers quoted have suggested difficulties, and problems, and questions, and have given advice to confessors upon such subjects; but they have not put forward the tenets as to be taught to the youth of the country. I might be told by His Excellency that I might find in the studies of my own profession a similar case; that I might find the leading writers in my own profession, eminent men, stating that things which we recognise from day to day as hideous wrongs, are not offences against the criminal law of the country—some of them I could name, but which it would be almost indecent to name in a mixed assembly. And, Sir, could it be said of these writers who declared that such was the law, that these things, however abominable they may be, however contrary to public morals, are not against the law—could it be said that these eminent writers like Sir Fitzjames Stephen and others are teaching that such things are lawful and ought to be done in the country, and are putting them before the youth of the country as things that are right? Is there not a broad distinction between the two ideas? If the hon. member for North Simcoe had read the answers which have been made to the publications, which he quoted he would not have dared, as he is an honorable man, to have presented to the House the argument that he made this afternoon, without, at least, presenting the other side of it. If I were to advise His Excellency to disallow this Bill because of the objectionable teachings of this body, His Excellency might fairly say to me: "The Legislature of the united Provinces of Canada, 37 years ago, erected the society into a corporation to hold lands and to teach the youth of the country. Now, in looking over that 37 years of record, can you point me to one of the teachers or one of the taught who has been disloyal to his country? Has anyone been able to say: "This or that father has taught me immorality, this or that man is guilty of immorality in his teaching, this or that tenet was objectionable?" What reply should I have to give him? Well, Sir, if His Excellency went on and reminded me that the rules and constitutions of that order have been published for 45 years, and that before giving him advice of that kind I ought to be able to put my hand upon the passages of the rules and constitutions of that order which are objectionable on the grounds of public policy, I am afraid I should be unable to do so to an extent to justify the disallowance of this Act, and I am afraid I should not find in the speech of the hon. member for Simcoe much comfort in that respect. If I were to advise His Excellency to disallow the Act on the ground of the expulsion of the Huguenots, the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, the Franco-German war, the expulsion from France in 1818, the expulsion from other countries, I am afraid His Excellency might tell me that all the statements of fact were disputed, and that he might read me a lesson in ancient and modern history of which one of the deductions could be that in some of these countries, to say that the court was opposed to the Jesuits, or to say that the court was opposed to the Protestant reformers, was no discredit to either the Protestant reformers or to the Jesuits. I do not think, Sir, that I need dwell on that branch of the subject any longer. I think that whenever we touch these delicate and difficult questions which are in any way connected with the sentiments of religion, or of race, or of education, there are two principles which it is absolutely necessary to maintain, for the sake of the living together of the different members of this Confederation, for the sake of the preservation of the federal power, for the sake of the good-will, and kindly charity of all our people towards each other, and for the sake of the prospects of making a nation, as we can only do by living in harmony and ignoring those differences which used to be considered fundamental—these two principles surely must prevail, that as regards theological questions the State must have nothing to do with them, and that as regards the control which the federal power can exercise over Provincial Legislatures in matters touching the freedom of its people, the religion of its people, the appropriations of its people or the sentiments of its people, no section of this country, whether it be the great Province of Quebec or the humblest and smallest Province of this country, can be governed on the fashion of 300 years ago.

Mr. McNEILL. I am very reluctant to prolong this debate, but I feel that it would not be right if I did not say a word in explanation of the vote which I shall give. I repeat that I do not wish to prolong this debate, and have but a very few words to say, and in what I do say I hope I shall endeavor to say not one word that can add bitterness to the debate. We are here differing in race and differing in religion. We cannot see eye to eye in all things; we must differ and differ widely in our views upon many subjects: that is inevitable. But if we mean to do our duty by our country, if we mean to make this country, this Canada of ours, a great and prosperous nation we must first endeavor as far as in us lies to bear and forbear with one another and endeavor to act together as an united people. And, therefore, it was that I listened with a great deal of gratification to the speech of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) last night when he assured us of the kindly consideration with which our Roman Catholic friends, in the Province of Quebec, treated our Protestant friends there. I believe that speech going abroad in this country will do an immense amount of good. I believe it will remove a great many misconceptions, I believe it will cause a warmer feeling of friendship to exist between our Protestant friends and our Roman Catholic friends throughout this Dominion, and that, I think, will be a matter of incalculable benefit to this Dominion. We have no quarrel with our Roman Catholic friends, and, therefore, I was, I must say, surprised at the extraordinary statement made by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) last night when he said that those members who were discharging in this House a very onerous and painful duty desired to prevent their Roman Catholic fellow-countymen exercising their religion in this country, and in point of fact that they almost desired to drive them out of the land. That statement was not altogether what I would have expected from my hon. friend, and I think it was a statement hardly worthy of him.

Mr. RYKERT. I made no such statement, you cannot show it.

Mr. McNEILL. I am glad to find from what the hon. gentleman says that I misconceived him. I listened with a great deal of attention and I understood that was what he said, but I am only too glad to learn that that is not what he intended to say.

Mr. RYKERT. I did not say it.

Mr. McNEILL. If the opposition on our part to the endowment of the Jesuit Order be of any such character, if it be an attack upon the Roman Catholic faith and an attack upon our Roman Catholic friends in any shape and form, as I certainly think my hon. friend will admit he said it was, I would suppose that opposition to the incorporation of that body would be equally an attack upon the Roman Catholic religion and upon our Roman Catholic friends. But if that be the case, what are we to say of the conduct of His Eminence Cardinal Taschereau and the six bishops and archbishops of the Province of Quebec, who joined with him only the other day so to speak, in 1887, in petitioning the Legislature against the incorporation of this body. They, surely, are not to be looked upon as enemies of the Roman Catholic religion; they, surely, are not to be looked upon as persons outside of the pale of the Church and as persons who desired to prevent the Roman Catholic people of this country from the due exercise of their rights and privileges. But we find that Cardinal Taschereau and six bishops and archbishops of the Roman Catholic Church did petition the Legislature of Quebec not to incorporate the Jesuit Order. If that be the case, and it is a fact which cannot be gainsaid, I think these statements which have been made with respect to the course of my hon. friends who have felt it necessary to support the amendment, these accusations of intolerance against them, because they object to the further strengthening of the power of that body in this country, are somewhat far fetched. I do think that when the Minister of Justice, in the very able, the magnificent speech which he has just addressed to the House was dealing with this question, it would have been a little more seemly had he refrained from the statements in which he indulged in the latter part of his speech, and in which he seemed to assert that those who objected to the endowment of the Jesuit Order desired to have recourse to the prosecutions of the middle ages. The argument which my hon. friend the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), addressed with regard to the propriety of disallowing this Act, I do not speak of the legal argument, but I refer to the arguments which he presented in reference to the effect which the endowment of this body inflicted on the Dominion, and which were not founded on a reference to an article in the Quarterly Review, but included the statement that this was a society which had been found by almost every civilised state to be incompatible with the proper government of the country in which it existed—I think that this argument is one which should be met seriously, and not merely by the assertion or the implication that in every case in which those governments, Roman Catholic as well as Protestant, had found it necessary to suppress this society, the society was right and the government was wrong. I think the argument requires to be met more seriously. Now, Sir, the agitation and the excitement which has arisen in the Province of Ontario in reference to this matter is very natural. The people of Ontario have begun to feel in that Province of late years the ever increasing power of Jesuit pressure and influence. We have begun to experience in that Province some effects of the unceasing aggression which history shows to be one of the leading characteristics of those trained spiritual warriors of which we have heard so much during this debate. I give them all credit for their ability, I give them all credit for their many deeds of self sacrifice and heroism and for their learning and culture, but I beg to say that the Dominion of Canada is a Protestant country, and I think that while we give to all and desire to give to all who differ from us, the fullest rights and liberty for the exercise of their religious opinions, we have a right to remember that the Protestant majority in this country have some few rights and privileges also. I think that we have a right to expect that if the Jesuit Order find an asylum here in Canada which has been denied to them in many Catholic States, they should have at least some consideration for the religious sentiments of those who have extended this kindness towards them. But, Sir, I wish to ask what has been our experience in reference to this matter in the Province of Ontario. You cannot deal with this as a purely local question, for it is not a local question. The Jesuit Order is not confined to the Province of Quebec and because you endow the headquarters of the order there that does not make it a local matter. You cannot limit the operations of this order to the Province of Quebec, there is nothing local about it. What has been our experience in the Province of Ontario, which is not the Province of Quebec. What has been the conduct of this order of Jesuits in that Province? We have every reason to believe that they have not scrupuled in that Province to attack our Protestant institutions and to dictate as to the education of our Protestant children. Only a few years ago we were startled to learn that a work which is one of the best known, one of the most generally admired, and one of the most beautiful compositions in the English language, a work, too, by an author who is preeminent for the purity and morality of his writings—had been, as we believe at least, at their instance, struck from the curriculum of our high schools. Only so recently as the year 1886 we find that the same influence was at work in our common public schools and that an attempt was being made and successfully made to banish from those schools that which is the very sign and symbol of the Protestant faith, the Protestant bible; and to substitute for the book itself a collection of attenuated and mutilated extracts from it. We find, in fact, that an astute and subtle attack was being made against the very character of that book and that an attempt was being made to poison the minds of our children against it, and to represent it as a book unfitted to be placed in their hands. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would ask my Roman Catholic friends in this House and in this country, to place themselves in our position and to ask themselves whether they would not have resented such an attempt to interfere with the educational system in the Province of Quebec, and whether they would not have resented such an insidious attack upon their own religion? I would ask them to put themselves in the place of the Protestants of Ontario, and to tell me if they would not have viewed with alarm any action on the part of the state which was calculated to strengthen the hands of a society which they believed had been in this way interfering with the education of their childere and endeavoring to subvert their religious faith. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up the time of the House longer. I will only say that I intend to record my vote in favor of the resolution of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), and I will do so not so much as an expression of censure upon the conduct of the Government whose general policy I support with so much pleasure, and whose conduct in reference to this particular matter has been circumscribed by conditions of such deep importance to the Dominion; but rather because I disapprove altogether of the kind of legislation which we have had under our consideration. I believe it to be improper and dangerous legislation. I believe, in the first place—and as this debate has proceeded my opinion in that regard has been strengthened—that there has been a deliberate setting aside, with pomp and parade, of the principle that His Holiness the Pope of Rome should not interfere in our affairs of state. I think this is dangerous legislation for another reason. I think that in these days of party Government no more dangerous precedent could very well be laid down than that a political party should be enabled—it may be for purely party reasons—to endow a religious body with large sums of public money. It seems to me that if we admit such a principle as that, we open a door which it will be difficult to close; and it seems to me that the dangers against which the Act of Mortmain was levelled were insignificant as compared with the dangers which may be incurred if we admit such a principle as that—the principle that a political party shall be permitted at any moment that it pleases to endeavor to secure the assistance of a religious body by conferring upon it large sums of public money. I say that is a dangerous principle, and that is a principle which is involved in the legislation we are discussing. I shall support this resolution also as a solemn protest by a humble member of this House against consolidating the power in this Dominion of a society which, however able and however devoted its members may be, is yet a society which throughout all Christendom has proved to be unscrupulous and aggressive, a fomentor of discord, and a stirrer up of strife, and which I am afraid, from what we have already experienced in the Province of Ontario, is prepared to pursue here in Canada those self-same tactics which rendered necessary its suppression in almost every European state.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I beg to move the adjournment of the debate. There are many gentlemen on this side yet to speak on the subject.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. LAURIER. I hope hon. gentlemen will not have any objection to this motion. We adjourned rather early yesterday, and I think we can agree that the debate will be ended to-morrow.

Mr. MULOCK. We cannot promise.

Mr. LAURIER. We cannot promise, but I think we can do our best.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman knew that the hon. member for North Simcoe was going to speak a couple of hours, which would run the debate very late, and there would have been no opportunity of a reply by the Minister at two o'clock in the morning. That was the reason of adjourning yesterday. Surely we can go on to-night.

Mr. LAURIER. My hon. friend will speak at some length also, and it cannot be hoped that we shall reach a conclusion this evening.

Mr. MULOCK. I am sure the hon. First Minister will be consulting the wishes of a great many members if he will yield to the request of the hon. member for Bothwell. I doubt if persistence in the debate at this hour of the night will accomplish what he appears to desire to accomplish, a speedy termination of the debate. We are engaged now, irrespective of all party consideration, in dealing with a question of vast importance. Parliament has been spoken to by the country on the subject, and it is the duty of Parliament to give, and the country demands from Parliament, a full expression of opinion upon it; and at a quarter to twelve to-night, half an hour later than the hour last night, at which the First Minister said it was time to adjourn, is surely late enough. I, therefore, hope he will allow the debate to be adjourned.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think as a matter of fair play the request made by my hon. friend from Bothwell ought to be granted. We raised no objection to the request of the hon. Minister last night that the House should adjourn at an unusually early hour, in order to accommodate the hon. member for North Simcoe, and the same courtesy should be extended to a gentleman occupying the position in the House of the hon. member for Bothwell.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think under the circumstances, and under the pressure of the hon. gentleman who has moved the adjournment and of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, if it is understood that we will sit it out to morrow night——

Mr. LAURIER. We will sit as late as possible.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is understood we close to-morrow night.

Mr. MULOCK. We must not gag the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then we must go on, or make an arrangement of that kind.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman, I am sure, is quite certain that we have no desire to protract the discussion. We will do everything possible on our side to meet his views, which are to close to-morrow.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Under these circumstances, the hon. gentleman will feel that we intend no discourtesy if we ask the House to sit to-morrow night until the debate is concluded.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not wish to have the debate protracted any longer than necessary, but if it should happen to-morrow night that any hon. gentlemen desire to speak, I think they should have that privilege, and no arrangement should be made which will deprive them of the opportunity of doing so. No arrangements should be made which would have the effect of preventing them having an opportunity to do so. It is my intention, irrespective of any arrangement, to speak to the question briefly.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will be very glad to hear the hon. gentleman now.

Mr. MULOCK. I have no doubt. But it seems to me on a question of this importance every opportunity should be given to hon. members to give their views before the vote is taken.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I shall ask the House to sit to-morrow night until a vote is taken.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think we had better go on to-night. If the hon. gentleman had taken my suggestion last night and had one of his Cabinet make a bold statement of their policy and the reasons for it, the debate would have been closed last night.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11:55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 28th March, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 119) for the relief of William Gordon Lowry (from the Senate).—(Mr. Small.)

Bill (No. 123) for the relief of George McDonald Bagwell (from the Senate).—(Mr. Brown.)

Bill (No. 124) for the relief of Arthur Wand (from the Senate).—(Mr. Small.)

Bill (No. 125) for the relief of William Henry Middleton (from the Senate).—(Mr. Small.)

OFFICIAL DEBATES COMMITTEE.

Mr. DESJARDINS moved that the second report of the Special Committee of the Official Debates be concurred in. He said: The report is to recommend to the House that the prices charged to members for extra copies of Hansard be not the same prices as were charged under the contract by Messrs. MacLean, Roger & Co., but that the extra copies be furnished at cost price.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman let this stand until to-morrow? There may be some discussion on it.

Mr. DESJARDINS. Very well.

WESTERN COUNTIES RAILWAY.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 127) in reference to the Western Counties Railway. He said; The Minister of Railways is authorised by agreement with the company, which was confirmed in 1887 by statute, to construct the 20 miles between Annapolis and Pictou, if the company fail to construct it in the meantime. That authority is, no doubt, amply sufficient, as far as the company is concerned. This Bill is to make applicable the Expropriation Act and the other Railway Acts to that work. By the surveys which have been recently made, some slight diversion is made at two or three points, in order to straighten the line and make it more safe, and it may be necessary at certain points to expropriate property.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It has been a subject of general comment that with regard to the extension of the road, only eleven days have been given to parties to appear here, and to enter their contracts. Eleven days is too short a time for such an important contract.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

LABORERS ON THE CAPE BRETON RAILWAY.

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria, N.S.) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to pay the laborers who worked on the Cape Breton Railway for Simms & Slater and their subcontractors?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is not. The surety, upon receiving the deposit, gave bonds to pay all legal claims for wages.

BEHRING'S SEA.

Mr. PRIOR asked, 1. Whether the Government has received any official notification from the Government of the United States in regard to the proclamation alleged by the public press to have been issued by the President of the United States, closing Behring's Sea to all but Americans? 2. If so, whether the Government has entered its earnest protest against such action on the part of the United States?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government have received no official notification from the Government of the United States in regard to this proclamation. The Government have not entered a protest against such action on the part of the United States, as they do not think that the question affecting the navigation of Behring's Sea is involved in the proclamation. On that point, I must correct an error which I made yesterday in answering the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones). I stated then that the proclamation which was issued was merely a repetition of the proclamation required by law. I was at that time under the impression that the Act had been passed some years ago, and that it was an annual proclamation issued by the United States. I find on enquiry that the proclamation has been issued under the Act approved on March 2nd, 1889, which requires annual proclamation hereafter, and is merely to warn their own fishermen as well as others.

DERBY BRANCH, INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. MITCHELL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to call the attention of the First Minister to the fact that, in pursuance of the answers he gave to the questions I asked yesterday, in relation to the extension on the western end of the Derby Branch to the Northern and Western Railway—a distance of about eight miles—I am very anxious that the hon. gentleman should bring down the papers, so as to enable me to get at the real merits of the transaction and discuss the matter intelligently when the estimates relating to railways are up. My hon. friend will observe that since the 20th of February, I have had a notice on the Notice Paper for these papers. We are not likely to reach it in time to have any such discussion as I desire upon it, and I trust the right hon. gentleman will order the papers to be brought down. They are very brief, and their production will facilitate matters very much.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Had the hon. gentleman, when he brought up the question the other day, moved for these papers, his motion would have been granted. The answer from the department is that this section of the road was, at the time the last inspection was made, in good running condition, and that the Intercolonial Railway officials had many times informed the company that they are prepared to exchange traffic within convenient time. There is very little, if any, correspondence on the subject, as the matter has been discussed by personal interviews, but I will bring down what papers there are.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman will see how important it is that I should be able, as representing that county, to give an intelligent account of how the thing is being done.

TRENT VALLEY COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. BARRON. Will the right hon. gentleman inform the House if the Trent Valley Canal Commissioners have yet reported, and if they have not, when they are likely to report? Will he also state whether he is aware that one of these commissioners has left this country on a long visit to the old country, notwithstanding the fact that the work was finished some time ago?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No report has yet been received. I do not think there is any chance of a report being transmitted to the department this Session. How long after that it will be presented, I am not able to say. I am aware that one of the commissioners is now on the other side of the water, and how long he will be there I cannot tell.

SUPPLY—THE JESUITS' ESTATES ACT.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster: That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply; and the motion of Mr. O'Brien in amendment.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have watched with attention the proceedings in this debate, not with more attention to what has been said by hon. gentlemen who have taken part in the debate than to the manner in which it has so far been conducted. Since I have had a seat in Parliament, I do not remember any subject which has come before the House that has exhibited the tactical skill of the hon. the First Minister to greater advantage than this discussion. The hon. gentleman finds himself face to face with what may become a dangerous agitation, involving the Administration of which he is the head. That agitation was begun by a journal conducted with more than ordinary ability, and characterised by what may be called a spirit of aggressive Protestantism; and it has gradually drawn to its side a large portion of the press of this country, and a very great deal of discussion adverse to the conduct of the Government has taken place in public meetings at several places in the Province of Ontario. Well, the hon. gentleman, in order to meet the dangers of the position, seems to have divided his forces that he may be in a position to control both sides. He has appointed his lieutenants—the hon. the Minister of Justice to lead one section of the hon. gentleman's forces, and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to lead another section of those forces. So the hon. gentleman has made such arrangements as to bring back to the support of the Government any that might be inclined to go astray. If they are dissatisfied with the conduct of the First Minister, they are at all events not dissatisfied with the position taken by his ardent and faithful supporter, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). Now, the business of each of these two distinguished lieutenants is to look carefully after his own division of the grand Conservative army, and I have no doubt that these two hon. gentlemen have, in the estimation of their friends, discharged the duties assigned to them by their chief with a great deal of ability and a great deal of skill; and I am sure that the hon. gentleman must feel equally grateful to his colleague, the Minister of Justice, and to his supporter, the hon. member for North Simcoe. This is not the only feature of this discussion worthy of notice. There is the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), who moves this resolution, and makes a very ardent and somewhat unreasonable Protestant speech, and there is another hon. gentleman, who, so far as I know since I have been in Parliament, has never been found voting against the Administration, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), who is put up to answer the other ardent supporter of the Government, the hon. member for Muskoka. Then, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), speaking after these hon. gentlemen, and after the hon. the Deputy Speaker (Mr. Colby), tells the House that he will not take the trouble to answer the arguments which were addressed to the House by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert). He tells us that that hon. member does not fear his constituents, because he never expects to return to them, that he is soon to go to his reward, that he has in this House no abiding-place, that his labors as a supporter of the Administration, in this House, are drawing to a close, and that every day he is pitching his tent a day's march nearer the place where he expects to be. The hon. gentleman expects, according to the information afforded to the House by the hon member for North Simcoe, soon to be gathered, not to his fathers, but to the fathers, where scrap books will be no longer required, and where all anxiety, as to the future of an election, will be dispensed with. That is the position presented to the House by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in regard to the hon. member for Lincoln. Then the hon. member for North Simcoe told us of the position of another supporter of the Government, the Deputy Speaker of this House (Mr. Colby). He told us that the roseate speech of the Deputy Speaker, in regard to the perfect harmony existing between the two sections of the population in the Province of Quebec, was due to thankfulness either for favors received or for those which were to come. The hon. member said the Deputy Speaker was expectant of future promotion, but the hon. gentleman did not wish to hear from a Minister in futuro, but from one who was actually in possession of the Treasury benches.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He did hear it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In fact, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) gives a representation of the Deputy Speaker which reminds me of a statement in Lord Beaconfield's "Endymion." In describing one of the characters in that book, the author says he had a feeling in his bosom which he was not very sure whether it was gratitude or indigestion; and so the hon. member for North Simcoe says that the able speech made by the Deputy Speaker was the outcome of some motive, either of favor already received or of favor to be received from the Government, but he was not very sure which. Now, the hon. member for North Simcoe, while he described the motives which actuated those with whom he is associated on that side, and the feeling which induced them to speak in support of the position of the Government, failed to give us any information as to the motives by which he was actuated himself. I do not say that the hon. gentleman was looking forward to a seat upon the Treasury benches. I do not know that such a position would have any attractions for him. It is quite possible that it might not have; but I remember very well the support which that hon. gentleman has given the Government in past Sessions. I remember that Railway Commission

Bill which was introduced and supported by one who stood so near the Prime Minister, year by year, by which the Grand Trunk was paralysed and the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway were promoted, and I cannot bring myself to believe that the hon. gentleman would have taken the position he has in support of the amendment of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) if he thought the Government had any serious objection to the amendment. The hon. gentleman not only failed to give us any information with regard to his own motives of action, but he failed to make any allusion to the speech of an hon. gentleman who supported the amendment—the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). Now, that hon. gentleman has been in this House a very ardent supporter of the Administration. How is it that the hon. gentleman on this question arrays himself, along with the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), in opposition to the course that the Government has seen proper to pursue upon this Bill? Sir, rumor has gone abroad that the hon. gentleman is not without aspirations for a seat upon the Treasury benches; rumor has gone abroad that a round robin has been sent along the back benches, on that side of the House, in the hon. gentleman's interests, asking the Government to find a place for him upon the Treasury benches. It is said that the scarlet robe of the Minister of Customs has become somewhat faded by his long sitting upon the Treasury benches, and that he is no longer a fitting representative of a very large section of the Protestant population of the Province of Ontario; and so it is proposed—at all events, such is the rumor—to recuperate that section of the Government by adding the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). Well, Sir, the hon. member for West York is opposing the Administration of which so many of his friends desire that he should become a member. The hon. member shakes his head. I have no doubt that he is sincere in that shake. I do not think the hon. gentleman feels that he is opposing the Administration; I do not think he feels that by giving the vote he intends to give in support of the motion of the hon. member for Muskoka, he is doing any detriment to the Government of which he wishes to become an important member. The hon. gentleman, no doubt, feels that, as it is said all roads lead to Rome, so all lines of action upon this motion, on that side of the House, will lead towards the Treasury benches, because they are alike intended to protect and strengthen the right hon. gentleman and those associated with him in the Government of this country. I think the hon. member for West York is quite right, and perhaps quite consistent, in his support of the Administration by supporting the motion of the hon. member for Muskoka rather than the motion of the Minister of Finance. We have had the two sides of the Government presented on this question. The hon. member for North Simcoe talked of the two sides of the shield, and I never saw an instance in which there were two sides to a political shield more manifest, and, I may say, more admirably presented, than they have been on this occasion. Although we may admire the hon. Minister of Justice for the very able speech he made on one side, and the hon. member for North Simcoe, for the very ardent speech he made on the other, I think we must after all give credit to the skill and generalship of the Von Moltke who leads the Government, and who leads this House. This, Mr. Speaker, is a sort of introduction to the new plan of campaign——

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The preamble is not part of the Bill.

Mr. MILLS—which the Government have presented. The introduction is not without interest. Of course when, in a novel play, the actor is introduced to an audience, it is always interesting to those who understand it, and who are looking on, and who are anxious to see how it will end. Sir, the Minister of Justice last night made a very exhaustive speech in defence of the action of the Government, a speech in almost every word of which I cordially concur. When the hon. gentleman had completed that speech the hon. Premier was ready for a division. He did not see any necessity for any further discussion upon the subject. It had been fully and exhaustively discussed. Both sides of the Government shield had been presented to the House. The Government had made their defence before the country, and they say to the electors, You can follow the Minister of Justice and support the Government, or you can take the other side, and follow the hon. member for North Simcoe, and support the Government; and so, whichever way the matter may be arranged, it comes to supporting the Government after all. It is like the trade between the hunter and the Indian. It is: you take the owl and I will take the turkey; or, I will take the turkey and you take the owl. It goes to the Government, no matter what the choice may be. Well, Sir, the Prime Minister was no doubt ready for a division, but we were not, and is it to be wondered at? I expect, at all events, and no doubt the vast majority on this side of the House expect, to support the Government. But when one is in questionable company he always feels obliged to make some defence or explanation of his conduct; and I feel it necessary, in view of the political character of the gentlemen with whom I am to be associated in this vote, to give some account and some justification to the public for the course I intend to pursue. Now, we, on this side of the House, feel that this is a very important question. It is one which is calculated to arouse religious feeling, and religious prejudice; it is one in respect of which men, if they once become permeated with it, are likely to throw reason to the winds; and, therefore, in this incipient stage—if the incipient stage of the excitement and controversy is not passed—it is important that the Opposition, as well as the members and supporters of the Government, should have an opportunity of assigning to the public what is a sufficient reason for their own justification, and which I think will be regarded as a sufficient reason by the great mass of those who support them, for the course which they intend to adopt on this occasion. We have had most of the speaking so far done on one side. Our business in this discussion, Mr. Speaker, is to stand up for the right, to allay, so far as we can, the popular excitement, to correct the popular misapprehension as to the nature of the question put in issue by this Bill—not to become mere weathercocks which will indicate the strength of the gale which may be blowing from this or that particular direction. I have, and I have no doubt that every gentleman on this side of the House has, too much respect for the good sense and the good intentions of the people to undertake to convert this Jesuits' Estates Bill into a sort of "Ginx's Baby" for the purpose of creating religious excitement and for arousing religious animosities throughout the country. So, for these reasons, we propose fully to discuss this question, and I think the time occupied in such a discussion is not wasted. There is one advantage, amongst the many disadvantages of popular excitement, that under it people are more likely to listen, with attention to what is said, and you have an opportunity of imparting to them information upon a subject which they would not be likely to receive under other circumstances. That being the case, I think we are justified, notwithstanding our anxiety to bring this Session to a close, in taking whatever time may be necessary, to enter fully into the discussion of this subject, and to give to the people who sent us here all the information necessary to enable them to form an intelligent conclusion on the merits of the question in issue. Sir, this is a most important question. The motion that has been placed in your hands by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) is, in some respects, one of the most important that has ever been brought before Parliament. We have in this motion, in the name of toleration, a demand for intolerance, and we have, under the pretext of resisting encroachments upon constituted authority and the maintaining of the supremacy of the Crown, a motion asking for a violation of the Constitution. This motion is, in my opinion, laden with mischief, because it mingles religious prejudices and religious animosities with the consideration of the question. It mingles up stories of wrongs done and wrongs endured, as narrated in history, with fables and romances. I did not know when I heard the speech, especially the latter portion of the speech of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and the speech of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), whether they had derived their information from history or romance. I thought that the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment had studied the "Wandering Jew" more carefully than anything else, and that in all probability the political portion of his speech was derived from "Henry Esmond." In a country where you have 2,000,000 of Roman Catholics, and something less than 3,000,000 of Protestants, it is in the last degree mischievous to invade the political arena with religious discussions, and to endeavor to convert Parliament itself into an ecclesiastical council for the purpose of deciding what religious opinions ought to be encouraged, and what religious opinions ought to be suppressed. We must continue to be one people, or at all events a people of one country, and it is not desirable to make the people of Canada, like the Jews and Samaritans, the two sections of which would have no dealing with each other. There may be questions involving principles so vital to human progress, that the evils arising from undertaking to evade the question, the evils arising from acquiescence, would be greater than those which would flow from converting the country into two hostile camps; but it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this is not one of those occasions. In this case no such disagreeable choice is forced upon us. We have in this motion simply the question of the right of local self-government on the one side, and the assertion of a meddlesome interference and oversight on the other. We have in this motion, a proposition to set aside the judgment of a Province upon a question within its own jurisdiction, and to replace that judgment with that of a majority of the people, or a section of the people, in another Province. I do not think we can permit any such course to be adopted. If we were to do so, it would be practically an end to the system of federal government The hon. member for Muskoka and the hon. member for North Simcoe have quoted history upon this question. But the history or the controversial papers written by men of strong polemical tendencies, the more they are studied the more the readers are likely to be led astray, and especially is history misleading when it relates to a remote period and when the surrounding circumstances and the environing influences of our own day are altogether different from that of the age about which they were writing. The past never repeats itself. The hon. gentleman assumes that it does; his speech was based on that assumption. I say the present is always being taken up into the past in the form of permanent results, and the future will differ from the present by all the influences that are to be found in the events of the age immediately preceding. Were it not so you might take a thousand years out of the history of a people, without any change in its subsequent history. The thousand years before and a thousand years afterwards would fit together, for the intervening period would be of no account. That is not the course of historical events, and when an hon. gentleman undertakes to tell us what this and that party believed or did 100 years or 500 years ago, without taking into consideration the circumstances under which those doctrines were laid down, or those principles enunciated or undertaken to be applied, he is giving information which is calculated to mislead rather than to enlighten the people of the present day. I have no doubt that this question also is dangerous to public tranquility, from the consideration that it is a religious question. Men always feel they can go a long way when they think they are supporting their religious dogmas, or the religious dogmas of somebody else, and they will employ in the defence and in the promotion of those views, and those religious opinions and preferences, means which they would altogether set aside in the affairs of civil life. In order to consider with profit some of the legal and constitutional features of this question, and some of the legislation to which the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has referred, we have to take into account the limits of government in former periods. We must remember we have largely circumscribed the field of government. There was an age when the Government undertook to control the whole domain of human action, when private domestic relations, the religious and political affairs, were all brought under the control of Government, and when the affairs of life, whether private or public, were regulated by the united authority of Church and State. Sir, in order to fully understand the legislation to which the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) referred, we must remember that in the rise of the Teutonic kingdoms on the ruins of the Roman Empire, provincial churches were superseded by national churchs, eccclesiastical persons were included in the government, and while men came there with spears and shields, there came also bishops and leading men of the church, and they sat in council together, and legislated together, and dealt with ecclesiastical and religious, as well as with civil matters; and so the legislation in a large degree covered everything relating to questions of religion and conscience, as well as to political affairs. Under the circumstances it was as much an act of wrong-doing and as much a violation of the law of the land to dissent from the rites and the polity, the doctrine and the discipline, established by the laws relating to the church, as it was to disregard matters of civil authority. And so every case of dissent was regarded as a case of sedition. Men and churches, whether they were Protestants or whether they were Roman Catholics, under those circumstances, were intolerant. It was a necessary condition of the state of society then; they could not well be otherwise. If a man sought to set up a separate church establishment, it was as much against the law as if he had undertaken to set up a separate political tribunal, or a separate judicial institution; and so, as I have said already, the domain of government was extended over almost the entire field of political and religious opinion and action. This was the condition of things during the Tudor period in England, and it was the condition of things, in a large degree, though not to so great an extent, in the period of the Stuarts. Now, let me call the attention of hon. gentlemen on the opposite side, who have dealt with this Jesuit question to some facts of history—and I am not going to say anything in defence of this order, I am not going to enter upon any such discussion, but I wish to call the attention of the hon. gentlemen to the past, and I would like to ask them, would they be willing that their rights should be governed, and their action controlled and circumscribed, by the intolerant acts of the church or of a religious society of that day, with which they are now connected. Take the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and in her reign there were upwards of 200 Roman Catholics executed for sedition or treason. The charges against them were political charges. I am speaking now of those who were put upon trial, and the records of whose trials exist, and we find that fifteen were executed for denying the Queen's supremacy in ecclesiastical matters, that one hundred and twenty-six of those were executed for undertaking to exercise priestly functions, and that eleven were put to death for the pretended plot of Rheims. Every one of those parties were tried, as Sydney Smith points out, for a political offence; but what was the political offence? There was the established church; the Queen's advisers had stated what the doctrines and discipline of that church ought to be, and those men, by remaining members of another communion, set the law in regard to that establishment at defiance. But they were not the only ones who acted in this way. We find that the Nonconformists, Joan of Kent, and Peterson, and Tunwort and others, were executed on precisely the same principle, for holding opinions different from Elizabeth and her advisers. If hon gentlemen will refer to some of the histories of that period they find these parties are spoken of as conspiring against the Government, and as parties guilty of treason; both Nonconformists and Roman Catholics. But what was that offence? It was that they declined to accept the rites and discipline of the establishment that had been created by law. Cambden, in his Annals, mentions that, in his day, there were fifty gentlemen imprisoned in the Castle of York, the most of whom died of vermin, famine, hunger, thirst, dirt, damp, fever, whipping, and broken hearts, and that the only offence of those victims was, that they dissented from the religion of the Statute-book, and that of Her Majesty's spiritual advisers. Now, hon. gentlemen would not like to have the intolerance of that age quoted as a reason why they should not now be granted the rights of ordinary citizens. They would not like to have the religion of that period, and its enforcement by those who were of the same religious persuasion as they are, quoted, as an evidence of their intolerance. It was the necessary outcome of the age in which those people lived, for when you undertake to extend the authority of government over the religious and ecclesiastical, as well as over the civil affairs of life, when you insist upon conformity to the one, as well as the other, it was a necessary consequence, that those who dissented in their views from the establishment, should be in a very uncomfortable position. Now, one of those who was executed at that period for opposition, was the Jesuit Campion, and he, at his trial, said, that his only offence against the Government was that he had been guilty of holding a faith different from that held by the State. We would, no doubt, be ignoring history altogether it we did not see that many members of the Jesuit Order took an active part in the restoration of the Stuarts, and why was that? Because the Stuarts favored their religion, and the Stuarts would establish it. The universal opinion was that some religion or other must be established, and they did what was perfectly natural for anybody to do—they sought to establish their own religion. When James II became an avowed Roman Catholic, and when he was using his sovereign position for the purpose of the restoration of the Roman Catholic faith and for overturning that of the great majority of the nation, there were Protestants who were then as active as ever the Jesuits were in endeavoring to bring in King William and in effecting a change of government, giving to the country a parliamentary sovereignty instead of one based on the notion of Divine Right. So you find the Jesuits were in treaty again on the death of Queen Anne, or in the closing years of her life, to bring back the Pretender, because the dynasty was at an end, a new family was to be established on the throne, and the question was as to whether it was to be the Pretender or some member of the House of Hanover. If you take the history of the Stuart period in Scotland, and if you consider the relations of Mary, Queen of Scots with Knox, or of James VI with Knox, you will see that that great Reformer's opinion of duty of the sovereign and of the connection between the Church and State are wholly different to anything what we entertain to day. No Presbyterian to-day would care to have his political views measured by the political standard of John Knox. He knows that the world has been changed since that date. He knows that society has undergone great changes, and that what was regarded as right and proper at that period would be a wholly improper thing to-day. Toleration is of later growth; toleration grew as the state authority was contracted. There is no place where we hear so little with regard to religious interference in the affairs of state as in the republic beside us. Why is that? It is because the Government is extremely limited, and because every subject of that sort is excluded from the domain of political authority. So, to-day, we have a far greater amount of religious toleration, we have a more tolerant spirit abroad amongst every religious community, than existed in the former period, simply because we more fully appreciate the importance of confining the sphere of Government operation within narrower limits than did our forefathers. Now let us look at some of the political views of that question. I regard it as extremely dangerous to our constitutional system. The hon. gentleman has put forward, as the first branch of this amendment, a proposition which I do not see how any hon. gentleman who favors a Federal Government can uphold. He says that this House regards the power of disallowing the Acts of the Legislative Assemblies of the Provinces, vested in His Excellency in Council, as a prerogative essential to the national existence of the Dominion. Why, Sir, the United States has a national existence; it has lived for the past 113 years, and the President has no power of disallowing a State law, or in any way interfering with the authority of a State Legislature. Every measure is left to its operation. If it is ultra vires, the courts, and the courts only, can say so. But the hon. gentleman asks this House to declare that the whole machine of government in Canada would go to pieces unless the Government exercised this veto. But, Sir, there is no doubt whatever that it would be a gross abuse of the trust committed to them by our Constitution if they were to exercise it on the present occasion. Our constitutional system is similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom. What is the meaning of that? The United Kingdom has no federal organisation. Why, Sir, these words refer to the relation between the Executive and the Legislature. Our Constitution is similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom, in giving us responsible government; it gives us a Cabinet controlled by a majority of the House; and it gives us a House subject to an appeal to the country at any moment that the Crown thinks necessary. There is a certain sphere of exclusive action assigned to the Local Legislatures, and a certain sphere assigned to this Parliament. Let us suppose that a Local Legislature, within its own sphere, had certain important questions coming before it; suppose this question were one; suppose Mr. Mercier had said the Jesuits have a moral claim upon the Jesuits' estates, and that he had been beaten in the Local Legislature; that he had gone to the country on the question, and that a majority had been returned with him to the Legislature to carry out that particular measure; how long would your system of parliamentary government endure, if the Government here should, after that measure was carried, take sides with the minority and disallow it? Sir, the Local Government have a right to go to the country upon a public question, if the country is the proper tribunal to decide whether they are right or wrong, it is perfectly clear that it cannot be the constitutional rule that this House is the proper tribunal to decide. How long could parliamentary government endure if the Administration here were to exercise that species of supervision over the Legislatures upon whom responsible Government has been conferred. If we should act the part of ancient Downing street, and undertake to decide what is wise or unwise, why, Sir, your Government would be at an end. If you have local self-government conferred upon the people of the different Provinces, it is clear that the electors of those Provinces, within their constitutional authority, are the ultimate court of appeal for the purpose of deciding whether the political course of their Government is what it should be. They are the proper parties, and they alone. It is not to the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, but it is to the electors that the Local Legislatures are responsible for their acts within constitutional limits; and while they keep themselves within those constitutional limits, I hold that we have not, according to the spirit of our Constitution, a whit more right to interfere—to use this prerogative for the purpose of disallowing their acts—than we would have to interfere with the acts of the Legislature of the State of New York. They are a distinct political entity for all the purposes for which exclusive power is given to them; they are constitutionally beyond the control of this Government and this Parliament; if they have acted wisely, their own electors will sustain them; if, in the judgment of the electors, they have acted unwisely, they will condemn them, and will send to Parliament representatives who will repeal the law. By the judgment of their own masters they must stand or fall. But, Sir, it was hinted by the hon. member for North Simcoe, that these people were not fit to be trusted fully, and, therefore, this meddlesome oversight is necessary. If you take that position, your whole system of government is at an end. That system is based on the theory that the people of each Province are fit to be trusted, that they are competent, and that if the Government do wrong, the people will set them right. I see statements in the press and elsewhere, that this Government ought to exercise this power of disallowance. Have we a beneficent power given to the Government here, by which they may act absolutely and upon the theory that they never err, that the Local Legislatures are not to be trusted, and that this power is to be frequently exercised, in order to keep them right? What would we say in this House, if the Imperial Government were to interfere on any question wholly within the purview of our authority? Would we submit to that interference? You would have the whole country aroused; you would have it declared, that we would not submit to the meddlesome interference of Downing street; you would have the old question about parliamentary government revived again. I say, that what would be improper to be done by the Imperial Parliament against us would be improper to be done by us against the Local Legislatures. Now, we never can proceed upon the assumption that this Parliament is wiser, in matters within the purview of the Local Legislatures, than the Local Legislature or the Local Government are. The assumption in our Constitution is that authority is vested in those who are most competent to exercise it. Certain general matters are entrusted to us, because it was believed—in the public interest—that we could do better for the whole community than each section of the community could do for itself. It is upon that ground that the Union is established; but it is also assumed, in the reservation of certain powers to the Local Legislatures, that they are the most competent to discharge the duties connected with those powers. If they are the most competent, upon what ground can we interfere? What right would we have to interfere? Why, the very ground on which interference is asked in this case would, if it had been put forward when the Constitution was framed, have been sufficient to have kept the Province of Quebec out of the Union. Are you going to entrap them into a union by a form of constitution which seemingly gives them exclusive control over certain subjects, and then, after they have become members of the union, exercise a meddlesome oversight over their domestic affairs? That is what is proposed. I say that is an improper thing, and I repeat that you never can safely undertake, even where a Local Legislature goes wrong, to correct their errors, instead of leaving the correction of those mistakes to the electors where it constitutionally belongs. Now let me call your attention to a precedent or two on this subject.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

When this question was raised in connection with the New Brunswick School Bill, Lord Carnarvon said:

"That the Constitution of Canada does not contemplate any interference with provincial legislation, on a subject within the competence of the Local Legislature, by the Dominion Parliament, or, as a consequence, by the Dominion Government."

There is the limit Lord Carnarvon sets for that authority to disallow. He asks: Is the question one competent for the Local Legislature to deal with? If it is, your jurisdiction is excluded, your right to interfere is excluded. The Act may be unwise, but that is for them to judge, and not for you. You are not made a sort of second body to represent the people of a particular Province in provincial matters. In that same case, the law officers of the Crown, Sir J. D. Coleridge, the present Lord Chief Justice, and Sir George Jessell, afterwards the Master of the Rolls, one of the most distinguished judges of this century, said:

"Of course it is quite possible that the new statute of the Province may work in practice unfavorably to this or that denomination, and, therefore, to the Roman Catholics but we did not think that such a state of things is enough to bring into operation or restrict the power of appeal to the Governor General."

Now, here was an Act which, he said, might work unfairly and injure a particular class of the people who were complaining, but with which, as it was within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Province, although injustice might be worked, it was not the business of the federal authority to interfere. That is the doctrine clearly laid down in this case. In 1875, when the then hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) brought this matter before the House, we refused to comply with his wishes, we refused to seek to set aside the provincial legislation upon the subject; and when Bishop MacIntyre, of Prince Edward Island, asked the Government of my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie) to disallow the School Bill of that Province, which, he complained, was unfair to his people, we refused to interfere because we believed the matter to be wholly within the jurisdiction of the Legislature and Government of Prince Edward Island. What we then declined to do for the Roman Catholics we now decline to do against them. We are acting consistently; we are seeking to uphold on this, as on that occasion, the principle of provincial rights. The First Minister, in discussing the report on the School Bill of New Brunswick, laid down this proposition, that there were only two cases, in his opinion, in which the Government of the Dominion was justified in advising the disallowance of a local Act. The first was that the Act was unconstitutional and ultra vires, and the second, that it was injurious to the interests of the whole Dominion. Now, there is no doubt whatever about the soundness of the hon. gentleman's first proposition, and there is no doubt about the soundness of the second proposition, if there is no possibility of disputing the facts. The Government of the Dominion could not act, and they would have been guilty of a violent breach of the constitution if, because they held a different opinion from the Local Legislature, they should set up their judgment against the solemn decision of the Province in a matter entirely within the control of that Province. That was the position of the hon. gentleman on that important question, and with that position we never quarrelled; to the principle laid down on that occasion we unreservedly subscribed, and to that we have ever since adhered. Let us look for a moment at the federal principle. If the Government were completely federal, there would be no power of disallowance, and I have always been of opinion that the power to disallow was an unfortunate provision of our Constitution. I have always been of opinion that it would have been, on the whole, very much better to have left the question, as in the neighboring republic, entirely to the courts, rather than take the risk of the pressure which may be brought on an Administration, from time to time, to interfere in a way detrimental to the rights of the Provinces. The first question to be asked is: Is the Act in controversy within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Province? If it is, upon what grounds can its disallowance be called for? Where the Minister of Justice thinks an Act is ultra vires, and that serious wrong might be done by allowing it to come into operation, he may make it a subject of correspondence with the law officer of the Province, and if, after full discussion with that law officer, he is still of opinion that the Act is ultra vires, he may disallow the Act, instead of leaving it go into operation until pronounced void by the courts. Now, what the hon. gentleman who has made this motion proposes is to convert Parliament into a Court of Appeal. He proposes to make this House a court for the purposes of deciding the limits of local and federal jurisdiction. Well, this Parliament may have a question of that sort, when it undertakes itself to legislate, forced upon it, and it must, for its own purpose, decide whether the question is ultra vires or intra vires. The House, it seems to me, is a body ill suited to exercise judicial functions, and to undertake to say, in any question or proposition of this sort, what is the exclusive jurisdiction of the Province, and the exclusive jurisdiction of the Dominion. Now, when we look at the Constitution, we find that everything relating to property and civil rights is under the control of the Local Legislature, except in so far as the control of property and civil rights is specifically given to the Dominion in the provisions of section 91. I am inclined to think that we often forget how comprehensive those words are: "property and civil rights." Civil rights, barbarians of course have none. The civil right is a right regulated by the State. It is the exercise of a right, that belongs to the individual, in a way consistent with the rights and liberties of another individual. It may embrace religious as well as political creeds. The relations between parent and child, between guardian and ward, between master and servant, are all civil rights. The relations between the Churches and the State are civil rights. It is possible for a Local Legislature to say this religious body may be endowed by the State, and another shall not be endowed. There is nothing in the Constitution to prevent a Local Legislature endowing a church, if it sees proper to do so. In the exercise of those powers over property and civil rights, it may do so. It may regulate the observance of the Sabbath and the observance of holidays. It may make our school system secular or denominational, in so far as it is not prevented by a specific provision of the Constitution. It may make the school system wholly religious. The Province of Ontario to-morrow might make a provision doing away with public schools and adopting a system of denominational schools in its stead. I do not know any ground upon which we could interfere on the subject of the relations between Church and State in a Province, except it would be in saying that a person belonging to one denomination may have the elective franchise and another not. The hon. gentleman told us yesterday that the connection between Church and State was entirely abolished by the Act of 1854. The hon. gentleman sought to leave the impression on the House that that Act was a finality, that the Provinces were restrained in some way by that Act. Why, the Province of old Canada, which passed that Act, might the next year have repealed it, and have established the old Church of Scotland as the Established Church of Canada, or the Church of England, or the Methodists, or some other body. Of course, in my opinion, as an opponent of the connection of Church and State, it would be unfortunate to do any one of these things, but the power is not taken away simply because it would be unwise, or inexpedient to use it. Now, the Local Legislature in any Province may very widely depart from the order of things which existed at Confederation. Everyone who knows the history of this Union knows right well that, at the period of Confederation, there was a disposition on the part of Ontario to take one view of public policy, and on the part of Quebec to take another view. There were a number of questions upon which there was friction; and what was one of the objects of the dissolution of the old Legislative Union, and the establishment of the Federal Union in its place? It was to get rid of those difficulties, by allowing each Province to take its own course. Whether that was wise or unwise, whether it was the best in the interests of civilisation, or whether it would lead to a different result, each Legislature was free to decide for itself, within the limits fixed by the Constitution, what course it would adopt. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) yesterday concluded his speech by a quotation from a speech of Prof. Caven. I have not the pleasure of knowing Prof. Caven personally, but everything I have heard in regard to him has led me to the conclusion that he is one of the ablest thinkers in the Dominion, and that he is not a gentleman likely to form an erroneous conclusion when all facts are properly before him; but he lays down in that speech three propositions. One was that the appropriation of these funds in the Province of Quebec was a malversation of public funds. Now, that is not so. That is a total misapprehension of the state of the question. Quebec may have acted very unwisely in dealing with the funds as she did, but the Legislature of Quebec was as free to deal with the funds under the control of that Province as this Legislature is, or as a private party is to deal with the moneys and property belonging to him. Whether Quebec has used the moneys wisely or unwisely it is not necessary here to discuss. The fact is that the money was her own to do as she pleased with. It was under her sovereign control—for, for this purpose, she is sovereign—and it was no more a misappropriation of her money than it would be if we were to take moneys which we have been in the habit of devoting to one purpose, and were to withdraw them from that purpose, and to use them for some other and different purpose. We have had discussed here these three questions: To whom did this property belong? how was it acquired? how was the ownership lost? In part it is said to have been granted by the King of France, in part it consisted of private benefactions, and in part it was property purchased by the society with its own money. Now, as to the first two classes of property, they were given to the society to propagate the Roman Catholic religion. The society itself was not an end. It was not for the advantage of the society, as a society, that it was given, but it was given to the society as a means to an end, and that end was the propagation of the Roman Catholic faith, the society forming a part of that church. If the views of that society were in any respect at variance with the views of the church, then the property was not given for the promotion of those views. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said that the church to which he belonged had been despoiled of its estates when the Clergy Reserves were secularised. Why, the Clergy Reserves never belonged to the church. They were reserves, not grants. They belonged to the State. The State held them during its pleasure for a particular purpose, and, while that pleasure continued, the State applied the proceeds to that purpose. But there were 57 rectories, and those were grants, and, when the connection between Church and State by the Act of 1854 was declared to be abolished, those 57 rectories were not taken from the church. The church retained those rectories because they were its private property at the time this Act of 1854 was passed. Let me state some of the analogies which I think may be fairly used to illustrate the position of this Jesuit Society. That society had very much the same relation to the Roman Catholic Church in New France as the trustees of Queen's College have to the Presbyterian Church, or Victoria College to the Methodists, or the trustees of McMaster Hall to the Baptists.

Now, if any of these corporations failed, and the Crown took possession of the property which belonged to the extinct corporation, would any one of these denominations be quite satisfied with the result? For instance, if Queen's College was taken possession of by the Crown and its property sold, and the moneys put into the Consolidated Revenues of Ontario, would not the Presbyterian body assert a moral claim, in spite of the legal right which might belong to the Crown in respect of those properties? That is very much the position which the Jesuits and the Roman Catholic Church in Lower Canada took towards the Crown when the Crown appropriated these estates. It is said by the hon. gentleman that these are very improper people, that they have been intriguers, political intriguers, in every country in Europe, and that they are not to be trusted. Well, speaking from the ethical point of view, that reminds me very much of the position of a man who owes another and does not want to pay what he owes, and he says: I will not pay the man I owe because he is a drunken rascal and beats his wife, and, if I paid him the money, he would get drunk and would beat her again, and, as I am a moral man, I prefer to keep the money. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) yesterday went on to state the origin of the title of the Crown to this property. I do not attach any importance to this, for this reason, that the legal title of the Crown is not disputed by the Prime Minister of Quebec, although, historically, it is an interesting question as to how the Crown came into possession of these estates. The hon. gentleman yesterday stated four theories, three of which must be erroneous, as to the way in which the Crown acquired possession. He cites two of these from two separate reports of the Judge Advocate General, Marriott. The one was that the property had been confiscated by the King of France before the Conquest, and was part of the public domain belonging to the King of France at the time of the Conquest. The law officers of the Crown, the Attorney and Solicitor Generals, did not concur in that opinion, and did not act upon it. Then Mr. Marriott gave another opinion that these estates belonged to the General of the Order, and that as proprietor there was no provision made for his selling or disposing of them, that the only parties who had a right to hold estates in Canada were those who were British subjects, that the General of the Order was not a British subject, that no provision was made for selling except by those who wished to leave the country, and as the General of the Order had never been in the country, he could not sell, and so the property necessarily belonged to the Crown. This may be ingenious but it is not sound. Then there was also the title set up based on the Conquest, and there is the title set up by the extinguishment of the corporation by the Pope's bull. When we look at the papers we find a proclamation, dated in 1774, in which the Crown declares its intention to take possession of these estates in consequence of the dissolution of the order, and the proclamation seems to have been repeated again in the Royal Instructions given in 1791. It is said in the Royal Instructions:

"It is our will and pleasure that the Society of Jesus be suppressed and dissolved, and no longer continued as a body corporate or politic, and all their possessions and property shall be vested in us for such purposes as we may hereafter think fit to appoint, and direct and appoint."

That was in 1791, 30 years or more after the conquest. Now, I do not see myself on what legal principle the King could, at that time, or at any time after he had established a government in the country, assert any such title as that to the estates. He did not assert it at the Conquest. There was no formal possession claimed or taken. I find at a still later period, the next year, another and different ground is put forward as the ground of the King's title. It is in the fiat issued by the Governor of that day, and he says:

"Whereas all and every of the estates and property, movable or immovable, situated in Canada, which did heretofore belong to the late Order of Jesuits, have, since the year of our Lord 1760, been and are now by law vested in us."

So we find in that fiat the title is dated back to 1760, although in the Royal Instructions it is dated in 1791. But there is no doubt that the Crown went into possession in some way or other, and if the title was not a legal title, it in the first instance became a title by prescription against the order. I don't see any ground for asserting a title in the Crown, except by prescription. Mr. Mercier does not admit any legal title in the Order of Jesuits, but their moral claim he admits to exist. Now, let me call the attention of hon. gentlemen to certain articles in the capitulation of Montreal. I think it is clear, from these Articles of Capitulation, that the King was precluded from asserting any legal title as conqueror:

"Art. XXXII. The communities of Nuns shall be preserved in their constitution and privileges. They shall be exempted from lodging any military, and it shall be forbidden to trouble them in their religious exercises, or to enter their monasteries; safeguard shall even be given them if they desire them.

"Answer.—Granted.

"Art. XXXIII. The preceding article shall likewise be executed with regard to the communities of Jesuits and Recollets, and to the house of the priests of St. Sulpice at Montreal. This last, and the Jesuits, shall preserve their rights to nominate to certain curacies and missions as heretofore.

"Answer.—Refused till the King's pleasure be known.

"Art. XXXIV. All the communities, and all the priests shall preserve their movables, the property and revenues of the seignories and other estates which they possess in the colony of what nature soever they be, and the same estates shall be preserved in their privileges, rights, honors and exemptions.

"Answer.—Granted."

Now, I ask the attention of hon. gentleman to this, that all the communities spoken of are the Nuns, the Jesuits, the Recollets, and the priests of St. Sulpice. These are the four orders, and it is said in this article that all the communities and all the priests shall preserve their movable properties and revenues, seignories, &c., on this ground. Then this construction of this article is further confirmed by article 35:

"Art. XXXV. If the canons, priests, missionaries, the priests of the Seminary of the Foreign Mission, and of St. Sulpice, as well as the Jesuits and the Recollets, choose to go to France, passage shall be granted them in His Britannic Majesty's ships, and they shall all have leave to sell, in whole or in part, the estates and the movables which they possess in the colonies."

Now, there were two things allowed to these orders: To remain in the country and to remain in possession of the property under the 34th article, or to leave the country and sell the property before they left under article 35. If the property had been confiscated to the Crown, or had been taken possession of by the Crown, by the virtue of the Conquest, no such article as this would have been granted. But in both these cases there is a provision in the Articles of Capitulation preserving to these parties their rights, which made it impossible for the Crown to acquire a legal title to their estates any more than to the estates of any other portion of the community of the Province of Quebec. It is true the Crown did come into possession. That was largely due to the undue influence of General Amherst, who desired to get possession of these estates as a personal endowment for his services during the war. Now, it may be the Crown acquired a legal title to these estates by holding them, and if it did so, and the right of the Jesuits to assert their title was gone, then there remains only, as Mr. Mercier has spoken, a moral right to any interest in the property. I think that is a very proper question to consider in the Legislature of Quebec, it is not a question, it seems to me, with which we are called upon to deal, and I would not have referred to it if the hon. member for North Simcoe had not denied altogether any moral right in the matter, and treated this as an act of spoliation which justified our interference. Sir, if it were an act of spoliation, still I do not think that we have anything to do with it. From my point of view, from my interpretation of constitutional rights, from my notion of the use of this prerogative, it does seem to me that if it were a Protestant community, if it were an English Church, or a Presbyterian, or a Methodist, or a Baptist Church, that was in exactly in the same position, I do not think any Protestant member of this House would be disposed to deny that there was a moral right to some compensation for property which had been once owned and which had thus been taken away. The hon. gentleman has also pointed out that, we, he says, declared in favor of the absolute separation of Church and State. And if you pay a church anything, no matter if it is only a claim rightfully due, you have connection between Church and State. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Act of 1854, he will see that if that rule were admitted, the very Act which declares that it is desirable to disestablish or put an end to the connection between Church and State does the very thing he says should not be done. There was provision made for existing life interests of parties in the fund, and the present First Minister was the member of the Government who introduced that Bill and carried it through the Legislature. There was a proposition at that time that, in order to secure the immediate separation of Church and State so far as that question was concerned, there should be a commutation of the salaries or compensation due to the different parties, and this proposition was submitted; and the right hon. gentleman, so far as I can recollect, in the discussion said this in reply: If you pay those Ministers the amount to which they are entitled, computed upon their probability of life, they might take the money and go to Australia and South Africa, and might cease to perform those duties which entitle them to receive this money, and you pay over the money upon which the church has a moral claim by its claim to their services. You must take some means of securing the performance of those duties in behalf of which the money is voted. That was the position taken by the right hon. gentleman, and, I think, he entered into a correspondence—he will remember the matter better than I do, as he was the active party in the case—with the bishop of the Church of England, and with the moderator, or somebody else, on behalf of the Presbyterians, and arranged the commutation of those sums due to the clergy, and paid the money over to the church and not to the individuals.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, that is so.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the sum was $400,000 or more.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. More.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Very much more, I think And that very Act, under which the money was paid and which was declared to be for the purpose of putting an end to the connection between Church and State, upon the theory of the member for North Simcoe, actually established connection between Church and State. Then there is another consideration. So far as I remember the provisions of that Act, the right hon. gentleman made its provisions depend upon the successful carrying out of the arrangement by those parties who were interested in the matter. If it was treason for Mr. Mercier, and contrary to the Act of Supremacy, to enter into discussions with any outside person as to the settlement of the disputes in regard to the Jesuit matter, was it not equally improper to enter into a commutation arrangement with a party who was not a member of Parliament, who had not a seat in Parliament, and was not in any sense a representative? The right hon. gentleman entered into correspondence with the bishop and with other parties, and it was for the purpose of deciding—what? It was for the purpose of deciding whether commutation should be had with the church or not. The Legislature confirmed in advance what was done. Now, so far as this case is concerned, my point is this: No one pretends that the bishop or any other church dignitary was made a party to the enactment because he was a party to the terms of settlement. No more is the Pope a party in this Bill, but a party to a contract, which this Act subsequently brought forward was intended to carry out. Let me take another case. Supposing, in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Government had entered into a contract with Sir George Stephen, Sir Donald Smith, Mr. McIntyre, and Mr. Kennedy of New York, and certain parties in Paris. The right hon. gentleman might have set out the correspondence in the Bill, and then we would have a Bill in exactly similar terms to the provincial Act respecting the Jesuits' estates, and the right hon. gentleman would have had in that contract and Act the names of parties who were non-residents of this country. He might have had in it the name of some party at Frankfort.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Reinhardt.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, and the parties in Paris. The right hon. gentleman might have had all those names in the Act, and according to the view of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), if it had not been a violation of the Act of Supremacy to have dealt with foreign parties who might be regarded as capitalists, the right hon. gentleman might have been open to the suspicion of legislating for Canada not simply by the Queen and the two Houses, but by the aid of German, French and New York bankers. It is said by a writer in the Law Journal that this Act is ultra vires. The writer says:

"It is ultra vires the constitutional power of a Colonial Legislature to confer on or delegate to any foreign Sovereign, Potentate or Tribunal lawful jurisdiction or authority to determine or ratify the distribution of the moneys or properties of the Crown, or how money grants to the subjects of the Crown within its Colonial jurisdiction are to be distributed."

This, I have no doubt, is intended as a legal proposition, embracing this particular case or Act before us. Let me say that it is wholly beside it. There is here no foreign potentate; there is a foreign party interested. The foreign party is claiming a property, and that foreign party negotiated with Mr. Mercier prior to legislative action. Those negotiations were simply a contract with the Crown, prior to any legislation, and prior to the meeting of the Legislature. He did just what the bankers in Paris did in regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway, with this difference, that the Pope, as the head of the church, acting not personally, claimed the right, the moral right at all events, to this property. Mr. Mercier said: You have no legal right; I can only recognise a moral right. So there was no question of sovereign right, and there was in no way a violation of the Queen's supremacy by Mr. Mercier, who entered into negotiations and dealt with the Pope in the same way as he would deal with any other party having a claim against the Government, whether foreign or native, and Mr. Mercier, after an agreement was arrived at, went to the Legislature and sought to give effect to it. The Legislature, with its sovereign authority over the question, confirmed the agreement which thus had been entered into. Let me call the attention of the House to an opinion given by Lord Selborne on this point. In the case of Brown vs. Curé, &c., de Montreal, 6, Privy Council Appeals, 173, counsel said appeals to the Pope were in contravention of 1 Elizabeth. Lord Selborne observed:

"That statute is not understood to make it an offence at law for Roman Catholics, in this country or in Ireland, to carry appeals to the Pope. The Pope is a sort of arbitrator, taking a legal view of their position, whom they may consult upon the question."

That is the position, and the Roman Catholics in Canada do not violate the Supremacy Act in appealing to the Pope for the purpose of settling any ecclesiastical or spiritual question in which they are interested. I will place the dictum of Lord Selborne against the authority of the Toronto Law Journal, and I think those hon. gentlemen who were converted to that side by the powerful argument of the Toronto Law Journal, may be converted back again by the still higher authority of Lord Selborne. The Law Journal says:

"But the statutes of Elizabeth, the express words, abolish the usurped jurisdiction of the Bishop of Rome, heretofore unlawfully claimed and usurped within the realm and other the dominions to the Queen belonging."

I ask the indulgence of the House for a moment while I call its attention to the position of this question. It is necessary to look to some extent to the history of the question in order thoroughly to understand the pretensions of the Pope, and his relation to the church in questions of this sort. I will refer to the views that are expressed by Lord Selborne in his book on the English Establishment. He says it was the practice in various times, in order to maintain the ancient privileges of the church, not to permit of appeals to Rome, that it is shown by the constitution of Clarendon, and by earlier provisions of the law, that this was then the practice; but that when Stephen came to the Throne, and his brother, who was the Pope's Legate, was also the Bishop of Winchester, he introduced another practice and they permitted, and in fact authorised appeals to Rome, which were at fitful intervals continued down to the time of Henry VIII. The statutes that are found in the period of Henry VIII (and which were repealed under Mary), which put an end to the appeals to Rome, were re-enacted by this statute of Elizabeth. Let me call your attention just for a moment to indicate in a brief summary the provisions of these Acts. Henry the Eighth legislated in favor of ecclesiastical emancipation in this particular. Before his day, and up to the middle of his reign, appeals were taken to the Pope in testamentary acts, and on the questions of matrimony, divorce, tithes and oblations, and by the statute of the 24th year of Henry VIII, chap. 12, those appeals were abolished, and it was declared that hereafter they were all to be adjudicated by the King's temporal and spiritual courts. It will be seen that in every one of these cases there was involved some material interest. They were not purely spiritual cases, they grew up because the ecclesiastical law was applied to parties who made their wills, and so on, at the period of their deaths; and as the ecclesiastical law was not understood by the English lawyers, appeals were frequently taken on civil cases from England to Rome. By an Act of the 25th year of Henry VIII, cap. 19, it provided for the settlement of all those cases by the King's Majesty. It forbade the clergy, under penalty of fine and imprisonment, to make a constitution without the King's assent, and it forbade appeals to Rome other than those that were permitted by cap. 12 of an Act passed in the 24th year of Henry VIII. By an Act passed in the 25th year of his reign, cap. 20, he prevented the payment of annates, and the first fruits that were allowed still to continue after the former statute; that is, that the persons entering into an ecclesiastical office, to which a salary was attached, were obliged to pay the first year's salary to the Pope as apart of his revenue. After that it was declared that the archbishops and bishops were to be elected, presented, and consecrated within the realm of England. In the 25th of Henry VIII, cap. 21, exoneration from exactions by the See of Rome was secured, and they were declared to be independent of all foreign interference. The same statute forbade the payment of Peter's pence, and declared that neither the King, nor his subjects, shall sue to Rome for any dispensation or license. The Archbishop of Canterbury was to grant such in future, but he was never to do so unless he obtained the approval of the King in Council. The 5th and 6th of Edward VI, cap. 1, enacted the principle of uniformity, the use of the Book of Common Prayer, and enforced attendance at church on Sundays. All these statutes were repealed in the reign of Mary, and they were all re-enacted by this Act. The 1st of Elizabeth, cap. 1, declared that "All foreign jurisdiction is abolished, and all spiritual jurisdiction united to the Crown." All these measures amount simply to this, that as the Church was connected with the State, the administration of the affairs of the State, executive and judicial, were declared to belong to the Sovereign. They were vested in the Sovereign, and not one of them was to be invested in any other tribunal. As long as the power of the Sovereign extended over the religious community, and as long as strict observance of the laws of the establishment were enforced, those Acts of Supremacy, and all those other Acts, were rigidly enforced against the Roman Catholics. But, when it was once admitted, that dissent might be recognised as possible, without treason, sedition, revolution or disloyal intent, variation in divine services, in church polity, and in church rites, were overlooked, and were ultimately tolerated, and they were admitted not to fall within the penal provision of this statute of Elizabeth. It was so held by Lord Selborne, in the case I have mentioned. It is true, that the judgment of the Pope has not, in England, nor in Ireland to-day, so far as the Roman Catholics are concerned, the force of a judgment of an ordinary civil tribunal. There are no means, except those which belong to him, as the moral head, to enforce his conclusion; there are no means of enforcing obedience to his judgments, except excommunication or exclusion from the church's privileges, but that he may (as Lord Selborne said) be appealed to, and that he is a moral arbitrator, acting according to certain judicial principles, and that he has the right so to act, and that the Roman Catholics of the United Kingdom have a right so to appeal to him, is beyond all question. We have here submitted to us in this amendment, and in the speeches which have been delivered in its defence, a proposition as to whether the law is in that respect the same in this country, or whether the Roman Catholics of the Province of Quebec are more restricted in their rights than the Roman Catholics in the United Kingdom. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the rule which I have quoted from Lord Selborne came into being after the statute of Elizabeth was relaxed, when the dissent from the Establishment was permitted, and when a large portion of the population of the United Kingdom were privileged to worship in some other form or way than according to the Establishment without having their civil rights impaired or their liberties interfered with. Now, Quebec received its law from the King, subject to the terms granted in the capitulation. There was no statute of Elizabeth in force and that statute was not carried to any one of the colonies. I might quote the view of Lord Mansfield, whose authority is unquestioned both in judicial decisions and in a letter addressed to Mr. Grenville, the Prime Minister, in 1764, in which he says that the penal laws of the United Kingdom are never carried to a colony as part of the common law they take with them. If that is so in a colony settled by the people of England, it is much more so in the case of a colony that is secured by conquest. Such a law cannot operate, as the hon. the Minister of Justice pointed out last evening, unless it would be by the abrogation of all those rights that were ceded by capitulation and contained in the Treaty of 1763. Now, we have in the Act 14 George III, chapter 83, this provision:

"For the more perfect security and ease of the minds of the inhabitants of the said Province, it is hereby declared, that His Majesty's subjects professing the religion of the Church of Rome, of and in the said Province of Quebec, may have, hold, and enjoy the free exercise of the religion of the Church of Rome, subject to the King's supremacy, declared and established by an Act made in the first year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, over all the dominions and countries which then did, or thereafter should belong to the Imperial Crown of this realm; and that the clergy of the said church may hold, receive and enjoy their accustomed dues and rights with respect to such persons only as shall profess the said religion."

The whole Act of Elizabeth is not introduced by this, but only those provisions, I think sections 7 and 8, which relate solely to the question of the Sovereign's supremacy, and that supremacy is not affected, as Lord Selborne points out, by an appeal to the Pope as the spiritual head of the Roman Catholic Church, who, in deciding questions relating to the church over which he has jurisdiction not incompatible with the civil law, acts as a moral arbitrator. Of course, the position of the Roman Catholic Church in the Province of Quebec is not altogether that of a voluntary association; it has certain connections with the State. It is not true that we have an entire separation between Church and State in all the Provinces of this Dominion. The Roman Catholic Church in the Province of Quebec occupies a somewhat anomalous position. Under the Quebec Act and ever since, that church has been allowed to collect tithes from its members, but not from members of other religious persuasions. The collection of those tithes, for the purposes mentioned, imposes on the church certain obligations. For instance, a case has been decided in the Quebec courts in which a resident of a parish who had paid his church rates, insisted on the curé, with whom he had some difference, baptising his child, and the curé refused; and a judgment was given enforcing the rights of the parishioner as against his ecclesiastical superior. And so with regard to other matters, in so far as the church enjoys certain special advantages, the civil authorities have a right to see that the corresponding obligations are properly enforced whenever the question is raised. It was on this ground that judgment was given for the burying of Guibord within the ground usually regarded as consecrated. In discussing this question the court said:

"Nor do their Lordships think it necessary to pronounce any opinion upon the difficult questions which were raised in the argument before them touching the precise status at the present time of the Roman Catholic Church in Canada. It has, on the one hand, undoubtedly, since the cession, wanted some of the characteristics of an established church; whilst, on the other hand, it differs materially in several important particulars from such voluntary religious societies as the Anglican Church in the Colonies or the Roman Catholic Church in England. The payment of dîmes to the clergy of the Roman Catholic Church by its lay members, and the ratability of the latter to the maintenance of parochial cemeteries, are secured by law and statutes. These rights of the church must beget corresponding obligations, and it is obvious that this state of things may give rise to questions between the laity and the clergy which can only be determined by the municipal courts. It seems, however, to their Lordships to be unnecessary to pursue this question, because, even if this church were to be regarded merely as a private and voluntary religious society, resting only upon a concensical basis, Courts of Justice are still bound, when due complaint is made that a member of the society has been injured as to his rights, in any matter of a mixed spiritual and temporal character, to enquire into the laws or rules of the tribunal or authority which has inflicted the alleged injury.—207-208. Their Lordships conceive that if the Act be questioned in a Court of Justice, that Court has a right to enquire, and is bound to enquire, whether that Act was in accordance with the law and rules of discipline of the Roman Catholic Church which obtain in Lower Canada, and whether the sentence, if any, by which it is sought to be justified was regularly pronounced by any authority competent to pronounce it."

And so far, on account of its special rights, making it to a limited extent a State Church, it has imposed upon it certain obligations, and so far these may be brought before the ordinary civil tribunals for the purpose of their enforcement. But, beyond this, there is no connection; beyond this, it is purely a voluntary association, and it has the same right of appeal to the Pope as the spiritual head of the church that any other church would have to appeal to the constituted authority of that church. It is not a national, it is a Catholic Church, that is, its authority extends, regardless of political boundaries, over all those who profess its faith. Now, to deny that right, so far as Lord Selborne lays it down—and that is as far as it is asserted in this particular case—would be to say to those of the Roman Catholic persuasion: Although you may have your notions of church polity, which are not the same as ours, yet you are not at liberty to assert them; because you believe that a church may have boundaries wider than those of other churches, you are to be limited by political considerations to the limits of a particular state. I say that would be an intolerable rule. If the Presbyterian Church of Canada to-day chose to connect itself with that of the United States, I do not know any law that would prevent it establishing its ecclesiastical courts to which both bodies would be subject; and, in so far as the civil tribunal might be called on to adjudicate on questions relating to those courts, those questions might be disposed of in so far as they might be connected with the material affairs of either country. Now, let me call the attention of the hon. member for North Simcoe to this. The Government of England has legislated upon this subject. At the time of the American Revolution there was no Episcopal bishop in the colonies now the United States. After the revolution, the Episcopal churches of the independent colonies required spiritual heads; they required bishops in the Episcopal churches of the United States. How were they to get them? They were separated from England, and the English Parliament had no longer any jurisdiction over them. The result was that, after a good deal of hesitation, Parliament legislated, and passed the Act 26 George III, chapter 84, authorising the Archbishop of Canterbury to ordain bishops for the Episcopal churches within the independent Republic of the United States. There was Parliament itself, on account of the connection between Church and State, undertaking to exercise what might be regarded as a legislative and spiritual jurisdiction in a foreign country; and they hesitated so long, if I recollect rightly, that the Scotch bishops ordained the first bishops before the Act of Parliament came into operation. The United States never took any offence, so far as I know, at that Act, and never claimed that it was a usurpation of supremacy or an interference with their sovereignty. The Archbishop of Canterbury, in this respect, did everything that the Pope has done throughout Christendom in the ordination of bishops in the Roman Catholic Church. Now let me take another case. There was the appointment of a bishop at Jerusalem, for Syria and the countries of the east, by the English Church. Parliament authorised that appointment. It was the exercise, according to the hon. gentleman's view, of sovereign authority within the dominion of the Sultan of Turkey; and the only ground of embarrassment with them was whether the Greek Church, as well as the Church of England, being part of the general Catholic Church, would be offended and think that the English Church were interfering with their jurisdiction; and so the Archbishop of Canterbury addressed a letter to the Bishop of Jerusalem, warning him that he was to cultivate a spirit of Christian charity and of good understanding with the authorities of the Greek Church in that particular section of the country. But to set up the doctrine laid down by the hon. gentleman here, based on the Act of the Queen's supremacy, would be to deny to all churches having a particular form of church polity, the privilege of extending their views of Christianity over the habitable world. I would like to know, according to his view, how it would be possible to obey the Divine command to go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. The hon. gentleman would arrest every minister of the Gospel under that theory, who would undertake to preach beyond the limits of the country to which he belonged. I dare say some hon. gentleman will remember when the Methodist Episcopal body in this country formed a part of the Methodist body of the United States, when they had no bishop in Canada, when their conference was held in the State of New York——

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I remember that well.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell)—when their ministers were sent to the Province of Ontario, and when, on account of the sympathies of those ministers with liberal views and their opposition to the connection between Church and State, they were charged with being American emissaries in this country. But I never knew any one who pretended to say it was an act of sedition on their part to come into this country for the purpose of preaching the Gospel. If there had been a State Church in the United States, and had they been sent here by the President, the hon. gentleman might, perhaps, argue as he has on this question, but where are the estates of the church? Where are the possessions of the Pope that give him anything like temporal dominion? His authority rests solely upon the implicit acceptance of his teaching and his views by those who profess to be members of the society of which he is the head, and to say that he shall not ordain a minister or send him to this country, to say that the Roman Catholics in this country may not make him their arbitrator to decide questions of difference, to decide how property, which the only party competent to decide says rightly belongs to them, shall be distributed, would be to place Roman Catholics, not on a footing of equality, but on a footing of inferiority to those who are members of other churches. The hon. gentleman argued, from opinions expressed by a writer in the Quarterly, that the views entertained by the Jesuit Order were such as they are represented to be. Now, I do not know what their views may be. I do not care. I am not a keeper of their consciences, and so I do not interest myself in them; but I deny altogether that this Parliament has a right to constitute itself an ecclesiastical tribunal or council for the purpose of seeing whether their views are right or wrong. We may decide for ourselves in our individual capacities, but we are not endowed with any power of that sort, and I do not think any Protestant would care to be judged by any such rule. I was interested, in looking over the speeches made many years ago in the House of Common (England), when it was said that certain members of the Church of England were adopting Armenian views, and one speaker, Mr. Rouse, declared that these persons were emissaries of the Church of Rome. He said:

"I desire it may be considered how the See of Rome doth eat into our religion, and fret into the very banks and walls of it, the laws and statutes of this realm. I desire we may consider the increase of Armenianism, an error that makes the grace of God lackey after the will of man. I desire that we may look into the belly and bowels of this Trojan horse, to see if there be no men in it ready to open the gates to Romish tyranny, for an Armenian is the spawn of a papist, and if the warmth of favor come upon him, you shall see him turn into one of those frogs, that rose out of the bottomless pit: these men having kindled a fire in our neighbor country are now endeavoring to set this kingdom in a flame."

Now, we know that a large portion of the Protestant community in this country are Armenians; and if we are to judge by the public meetings and the discussions which have taken place on this question, they are as far from Roman Catholicism as any other section of the community. Anyone who remembers something of the history of Holland, will remember how Grotius, because he was an Armenian, was carried out of the country in a cask; and how John Barnaveldt was carried into another world on a scaffold because he was an Armenian, and for the very reasons given by Mr. Rouse that the doctrines they were teaching would necessarily lead to the restoration of Roman Catholicism. There is nothing, in my judgment, more mischievous than to undertake to pass judgment upon the religious opinions of any portion of the community in a popular assembly and make those opinions the pretext for withholding rights and for imposing disabilities. We have, irrespective of religious opinion in this House, occasionally given aid to Mission Schools. We have aided the Presbyterian Mission Schools, the Methodist Mission Schools, the English Church Mission Schools, the Roman Catholic Mission Schools, and I have never heard any one say that because we did so, as a matter of expediency for the present, and becauseit was better to establish these schools among the Indians, for the time being, than public schools, that this Government was connected with a church or in favor of any particular church on that account. I am not the least afraid that, if we have an open field and fair play, Protestantism is likely to suffer in this country, in consequence of the aggressions, or attributed aggressions of the Roman Catholic Church. I have no doubt whatever, that in a fair field Protestantism will be able to hold its own, and it will succeed just in proportion as it is actuated by the spirit of toleration and fairness, which will serve rather to draw men towards it and secure a favorable consideration for those religious views that it seeks to enunciate, rather than the spirit of intolerance which will repel men from it. How can we secure a fair hearing for our dogmas from our Roman Catholic friends if we do that which they think is unfair to them, and if we undertake to deny to them privileges that we maintain for ourselves? I am not disposed to confer upon any Roman Catholic institution in this country privileges that I would withhold from any Protestant institution of a similar character. I believe that the more clearly the line of separation is drawn between Church and State, the better it will be for all classes in this country, but I admit that I am unable to interfere or to assist in drawing that line in any Province except in the Province of which I am a member. I have the right to exercise my privileges as an elector, and if the policy that has been carried out is one that I think detrimental to the public interest I may, in that capacity, oppose it; but I have no right, from my place in this House, to undertake to do for the people of another Province what I can only do legitimately in my own Province, as an elector of that Province. And so, the more clearly we have impressed upon our minds the fact that each Province must take care of itself, that it must entirely separate the Church from the State for itself, that with that we have nothing to do, that, except by usurpation, we cannot interfere, the sooner we can have clearly impressed upon our minds this line of action, and the more steadily we adhere to it the better it will be for all parties concerned. The early founders of our Christian religion were men in rather poor circumstances, and occupying very humble social positions. Their influence, at the beginning, was with the humbler classes, with Jewish hucksters and with slaves of the Roman Empire. They gradually, in the course of three centuries, worked their way up through every grade of society until the Emperor himself became a convert to the Christian system. At first they had the best organised Government the world has ever seen, hostile to them. If they were able, by their industry, their zeal, their self-denial and their devotion, to what they believed to be the cause of religious truth, to overcome such obstacles and conquer such difficulties, there is no danger that Protestantism in this country, if its ministers are true to the profession of their faith—and, remember, that they are to know nothing else except Christ, and Him crucified—if they are true to their faith and their high calling, and preach the Gospel instead of politics, I am perfectly satisfied that Protestantism will have nothing to fear. I am as ready as any member of this House to resist encroachment. Why should it be otherwise? If I, as many others here are doing at this moment, take a position which many of our friends may not concur in, because they have been misinformed, if I would not be disposed to do wrong to serve the interests of my own friends, and those with whom I sympathise, why should I endanger my political position to promote the religion of a portion of the community which I believe to be, in many respects, erroneous? Let those answer who accuse us of pandering to the Roman Catholics. I do not pretend to judge for them.

I judge for myself. I accord to them the same freedom I claim for myself, and I would rather, a hundred-fold, be the victim of the wrongful judgment of others, than myself become the instrument of wrong to any portion of my fellow-countrymen.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. CHARLTON. I feel called upon, before recording the vote I shall give upon the motion now in your hands, to explain the reasons that will actuate me in voting for that motion. I feel that, in doing this, I am separating myself from the majority of my friends in this House, that I am acting with a minority, and probably with a very small minority, of its members; and, were I to look at this question purely from the standpoint of its value in votes, I should no doubt feel perfectly content to give a silent vote, and a vote with the majority. My convictions, however, forbid my voting in this way. I realise that the position I take is an unpopular one in this House. I realise, also, that the position I take will quite possibly send me to private life after the expiration of this Parliament but I feel bound from conviction of duty to take the course I propose to take in reference to this matter. Many of the gentlemen who have addressed the House upon this question have professed to be able to do so entirely independent of all feeling of a religious character. They have professed to be able to divest themselves of all prejudices or bias resulting from their religious belief. I do not know that I will claim to be able to do this. I presume that I am swayed and influenced in the course I take in this matter by my education, by my religious belief, and I approach the consideration of this question, I am free to admit, from the standpoint and influenced by the belief of a Protestant; and, although I shall endeavor to be, and I believe I shall succeed in being, impartial in this matter, I do not, I repeat, believe I shall be able to divest myself entirely of all influences that religious training and religious belief may be calculated to exert in reference to it. I feel that this is a question of very great importance, and one of far-reaching consequence, and I feel that it is a question upon which men should act from conviction, upon which men should act in the way they believe they are required to act in the best interests of their country and for the purpose of securing the best results as to the future welfare and the future well-being of that country. This question has been discussed from a legal standpoint fully and ably. The views of those who are opposed to the action of the Government in this matter, the views of those who will support the motion of my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), were most ably presented to the House and to the country by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). The defence of the Government was made in a brilliant and able effort by the Minister of Justice, and the effort of the Minister of Justice was ably seconded by the scholarly and profound argument of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). I shall not attempt to traverse the ground traversed by these gentlemen. My education perhaps does not fit me for an exhaustive disquisition upon the character of this measure from a legal standpoint, and I shall endeavor to present the case from a layman's standpoint, and to present the reasons which influence me in the course which I shall take upon this great question.

There is one feature of this case that has not yet been dwelt upon, at least, to any considerable extent—I refer to the peculiar ethnologic conditions of this Dominion. When the younger Pitt, in 1791, erected the two Provinces in Canada, granting to one Province the use of the French language, French laws, French customs and institutions, giving to the other Province the English language, English laws, and English institutions, avowedly for the purpose of creating two rival, jealous, and, in a sense, hostile Provinces, that the catastrophe that had occurred a few years before, when the thirteen colonies revolted from the British Crown, might not recur again; when, I say, that he erected these two Provinces upon these divergent lines for this avowed purpose, he certainly succeeded most admirably in creating two Provinces with mutual contrasts in language and in the essential characteristics of nationality. These Provinces are not only diverse in race and in language, but also in religion, and the dominant church in the Province of Quebec is a political factor of the very highest importance in this Dominion. It naturally exercises its power and its great influence for the purpose of forwarding its own interests and designs. It does this, Sir, with sleepless vigilance, it does it with consummate ability, and it has been enabled to exercise a most powerful influence upon the destinies and upon the politics of the Dominion of Canada. Now, Sir, as I say, this power is exerted for the furtherance of its purposes, as is most natural. I do not complain of this, I do not say that it is to be expected that any other course would be taken by the French Catholic Church of Canada, I would not say that it was in the interest of Canada, but it is not unnatural that the church should do this. The Minister of Justice last night, in the course of his speech on this question, in defending Mr. Mercier in the course he has taken in regard to the Jesuit estates, alluded to one fact which exemplifies, in the most vivid light imaginable, the great influence and power of that church in the Province of Quebec. He told us that the Jesuit estates held by the Government of Quebec to be Government property, held by them to be a property in which the Jesuits' fraternity had no legal right, to which they had no legal claim, notwithstanding the position of the Government in regard to these estates, the Government was unable to sell this property, that it had been offered for sale and no purchasers could be procured. Why, Sir? Because the power of this church was so great that men did not dare, or would not, as they were deterred by the influence of the church, purchase this property; the power of this church was so great that estates held by the Government to be the property of the Crown, to be a property to which the church and the Jesuit fraternity had no legal claims, could not be sold in consequence of the opposition of the church to their sale. Well, nothing could exemplify more vividly the great influence of this society than this fact referred to by the Minister of Justice.

Sir, I referred, a moment ago, to the peculiar ethnologic conditions of this Dominion. Now, no man, I presume, in this House or in this country, would for a moment assert that it was not in the interest of the country that homogeneity, that assimilation, should be promoted. But the question is, how can this result be obtained? How can the diverse races of this Dominion be made homogeneous, how can they be made to assimilate? It is desirable that such should be done. Every man who wishes to see the Dominion of Canada become a great nation, must desire to see the races occupying this country acting in concert, acting in harmony, and to a much greater extent than at present made homogeneous. I hold, Mr. Speaker, that any measure that will retard the realisation of this desire for the assimilation of these races, that any measure that will, on the contrary, have a tendency to set them wider asunder, that will have a tendency to create and foster animosities and the jealousies that are natural to the existence of two such races, is a measure that should be deprecated, is a measure that should be opposed by every lover of his country in this Dominion. Now, events as they are developed have hitherto had a tendency, in some respects, to put these two races wider apart, and this very tendency, in face of the desire of those who wish to see a homogeneous people and a great nation, this very tendency to drive these two races apart, awakens alarm in the breasts of tens of thousands of people in this country; and the desire to avert this tendency, the desire to bring the races nearer together, to secure greater harmony and action between them, is a patriotic desire, by whomsoever it may be entertained.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). As in Ireland.

Mr. CHARLTON. Not as in Ireland, but as in Canada, with the hopes of the future before us, with the desire to create a great nation, with a desire to have a nation, not inhabited by two races pulling in different directions, jealous of each other, and seeking, the one to crowd the other out of the race, not as in Ireland, but as we hope to see it in Canada, with every influence set aside that would work against the realisation of this dream. Now, Sir, there are in the agitation that exists to day, great forces beneath the surface; there are undercurrents that we do not see, the power of which, perhaps, we do not realise; there is an undercurrent that is proceeding from this very desire that this should be a homogeneous people, a desire to lift this nation up to a higher plane with a common purpose, to create a great free state. The question that agitates the mind of the people, that creates the interest in this matter which we are discussing here to-day, is, shall the Dominion of Canada be Saxon or shall it be Celtic? Or shall it be both Saxon and Celtic for all time to come? Shall the two races live together in harmony, or shall they live apart? Shall this be one country, or shall there be a disruption? The question is one of great magnitude, the question is one the importance of which cannot be over estimated, and the issue, Sir, is one that cannot be shirked. Now, these are British Provinces. The design was that these should be Anglo-Saxon commonwealths, and the tendency to foster an intense spirit of French nationality, a tendency made more pronounced by the fact that that nationality has a national church which naturally fosters that feeling in the promotion of its own interests, is a tendency that we must all deprecate, is a tendency that we do not wish to see aggravated, is a tendency that those who have the good of their country at heart would rather see mitigated if not removed.

Mr. AMYOT. Oh! oh!

Mr. CHARLTON. My hon. friend on my left laughs. Well, perhaps he would not wish to see it removed, perhaps he would rather see the difficulties intensified. I would rather see them removed; I would rather see these two races live in harmony, I would rather see them drawing closer together. I have every respect for the institutions of Quebec; I realise that the character of its institutions, the nature of its laws, and the cast of its society is, in some respects, mediæval rather than modern, but I have every sympathy for Quebec, and I have no desire to interfere with that Province in the least.

Mr. CURRAN. You do it all the same.

Mr. CHARLTON. Sir, I do not propose to do it all the same. I feel that if we desire to promote harmony between these races, the introduction of a society that sedulously fosters the seeds of discord, the history of which in every state of Christendom has shown that it is in its nature an organisation against constituted authority is a great misfortune—Sir, as a lover of this country, as a man desiring to see harmony in this country, I deprecate the introduction of that society into the political circles of Canada. It is for that reason that I, and thousands in this Dominion, deprecate the introduction of that society, deprecate the action of the Government in permitting the incorporation of that society and in permitting its endowment, foreseeing, as they believe they do foresee, in those actions future mischief and future disaster to this country. This is my belief.

Now, Sir, it is true that the Protestants of this country have been supine and nerveless for many years past as regards public questions. They have been for many years past without organisation to guard their own interests and liberties, and until quite recently there has been no distinctive and pronounced Protestant organ. Both the great political parties in this country have sought to obtain French Catholic support. The solidarity of the Catholic French party has enabled them to hold the balance of power; they have held it, they have exercised it for the advantage of their race and for the advantage of their religion, to some extent at least; and in the manipulation of this element, and in the influence wielded by this element, it reminds me at every turn of the history of the United States when the slave power—I make the comparison in no other sense except that they were a minority, and acted for their common interest—controlled the United States for 40 years, although they possessed only about one-third of the votes in the House of Representatives, controlled the United States because they acted in their own interests at every turn, and supported first one party and then the other as circumstances incident to their own requirement made it necessary to do. We have had the Protestants, as I have said, without an organ, without an organisation, and not awake to their interests, and it is only of recent days that the people are awakening to the danger which, in the estimation of many Protestants, threaten them in this country.

I make no apology for being an Anglo-Saxon. I do not consider it a disgrace, I do not consider it even a disadvantage. I look back to the history of the race with pride, I look back to the history of that mother of nations—England—and I think it is a glorious history. I think her institutions are good institutions and that she has been a blessing to the world, and I have no apology to make for saying that I believe it. I make no apology for saying that, so far as my own Province is concerned, I would resist the introduction of that system which is peculiar to your Province, Mr. Speaker. I make no apology for saying that, in my belief, civil and religious liberty should be carefully guarded, and any encroachment upon that civil and religious liberty should be resisted, resisted strongly, resisted vigorously, resisted with courage and resisted without compromise. As regards Quebec, of course there are certain things there that I would not select as a matter of choice. I do not, for instance, think it a very great advantage to pay tithes; I am unable to see any advantage in fabrique assessments, in a church absorbing the wealth of the country and in its property being exempted from taxation; but it is none of my business. I do not propose to interfere with it.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. If the hon. gentleman can see any blessing in that, he is at liberty to enjoy it. But I would interfere and resist any attempt to impose it upon a country where it was not in existence at the time; I would feel that to be my duty. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not say this in any offensive sense. Men disagree, men have different opinions, men differ in politics, and in religion, and in what they believe to be for the public interest, and they have a right to do so, and they will continue to do so until the end of time.

The Minister of Justice, last night, in referring to old English law, dwelt at very great length on the subject of obsolete laws. I almost imagined before he had concluded that there was scarcely a law in existence that was not obsolete, and that we were scarcely bound by anything on the Statute-book of England. But I think the Great Charter is not obsolete, that charter upon which we have built our liberties, upon which we have constructed British institutions, that charter under which we have responsible government and parliamentary representation, with the people, through their representatives, controlling the expenditure of the country. The Bill of Rights is not obsolete; it is in force yet. The supremacy of the Crown, as the embodiment of the power and majesty of the people, is not obsolete. The safeguards of liberty designed by our forefathers to preserve us from encroachments are not obsolete, and the spirit of liberty is not obsolete among the English-speaking race. And it is for this reason, that the spirit of liberty exists, that the safeguards of liberty are in force, that tens of thousands of men have risen in Canada within the last two months to oppose the endowment of that order, whose interests and character we are discussing in this debate, and whose character and record I hold it proper and necessary to discuss and examine in the broadest sense possible. I hold that the incorporation of this order lies at the root of all this trouble. And it is owing to the fact to which I called attention a few moments ago, that there existed among the Protestants a great degree of supineness, and nervelessness, and of blindness to their own interests and the interests of their country, that the incorporation of that order was not resented at the time and was not prevented. Why, a few years ago, in 1873, the Orange Order was incorporated by the Legislature of Ontario. The Lieutenant Governor of that Province, who was appointed by the right hon. gentleman opposite, withheld that Bill from assent; I am unable to say whether by private advices he was instructed to do so or not, but he withheld it. But we had here the incorporation of the Order of Jesuits two years ago without any withholding of the Bill from assent, without any interference on the part of the Government, and it seems to me a monstrous thing that so loyal an order as the Orange Order, for it is unquestionably loyal, should be denied incorporation and the Jesuits should be permitted incorporation. It reminds me of a story, to the effect that an Irishman, on landing in New York, was attacked by a dog, and endeavored to pick up one of the paving stones, whereupon, on failing to do so, he said: It is a queer free country this, where the dogs are let loose and the stones are chained down. This is a queer sort of justice that incorporates the Jesuit Order and denies incorporation to the Orangemen; and I think, while I opposed at the time the incorporation of the Orangemen, on the ground that it would produce dissensions and troubles, the same reasons should have held good in the case of the Jesuit Order as well. The Minister of Justice, last night, held that the Jesuit Order had, in effect, already been incorporated. He instanced the case of the incorporation of the St. Mary's College, which had Jesuit professors, and he contended that because the clergy, forsooth, were Jesuits, this was incorporation, in point of fact, of the Jesuit Order. If a college happened to have three or four infidel professors, would it be the incorporation of the infidel order, or if the college had a few Presbyterian professors, would it be the incorporation of the Presbyterian order? The assumption was preposterous. The Minister of Justice also said that the order had previously been incorporated. If the society was incorporated in a surreptitious manner it affords me reason for saying that it should not have been done, whether it was done or not.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the character of the Jesuit Order is a matter, in my opinion, which should receive the attention of this House, and the attention of this country. My hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, last night spoke somewhat sneeringly of Parliament resolving itself into a committee for the examination of theological questions, and my hon. friend, the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), asserted that Parliament had not the right to constitute itself an ecclesiastical council, to judge the Jesuits. Well, Sir, Parliament, in this matter, is neither constituting itself into a committee for the trial of a theological question, nor into an ecclesiastical council for the trial of the Jesuit Order, but Parliament is called upon, under the circumstances, to examine into the moral and the political tendencies of the order that is on trial before the people of this country. It has the right to do so, it has more than the right to do it; it is the bounden duty of Parliament to enquire as to the character of this organisation, to enquire as to whether those various charges made against this organisation in history for more than 300 years are true, or if any of these charges are true, whether it has proved to be an organisation detrimental to the interests of liberty, in every generation and in every age, or not, and if its antecedents are such as they are represented to be, it should be the duty of Parliament to examine thoroughly the question of whether that order is now what it was before. It is a question of the utmost importance; it is not a theological question; it is not an ecclesiastical question, but it is a question of the highest moment to the State. It is a question which should engage the attention of every statesman in the country; it is a question that has an intimate bearing upon the welfare of this country, and I propose, Sir, to examine that question. I propose to examine it, not that I think I am making myself a member of a committee to examine into theological tenets, not that I propose to make myself a member of an ecclesiastical committee to try a religious order, but I propose to look into the antecedents and character of this order, in order to see whether I believe that their establishment in Canada would be detrimental to the political interests of this country. I propose to examine the question in its political bearing, and in its political bearing alone. Now, Sir, this order had been in existence for nearly 250 years, when it was suppressed by the authority to which it professed to owe allegiance. I suppose the Pope was infallible then, and if Pope Clement XIV was infallible and if he suppressed the order of the Jesuits he probably had good reasons for doing so, and I think he had. I do not propose to call into question his infallibility. I do not propose to look into the question of the propriety of the step he took in dissolving that order, but I do propose to ask the attention of this House to some portions of the celebrated brief which Pope Clement XIV issued, and by which this order was disbanded. After declaring in his brief the purposes for which the order was instituted, and the various privileges granted by Paul III, and subsequent Popes, the brief of suppression goes on to say:

"Notwithstanding so many and so great favors, it appears from the Apostolical Constitutions that almost at the very moment of its institution there arose in the bosom of this society, divers seeds of discord and dissention, not only among the companions themselves, but with other irregular orders, the secular clergy, the academies, the universities, the public schools, and lastly, even with the princes of the states in which the society was received. These dissensions and disputes arose sometimes concerning the nature of their views, the time of admission to them, the power of expulsion, the right of admission to holy orders without a title, and without having taken the solemn vows, contrary to the tenor of the decrees of the Council of Trent, and of Pius V, our predecessor; sometimes concerning the absolute authority assumed by the General of the said order, and about matters relating to the good government and discipline of the order; sometimes concerning different points of doctrine, concerning their schools, or concerning such of their exemption privileges, as the ordinaries and other ecclesiastical or civil officers declared to be contrary to their rights and jurisdictions In short, accusations of the gravest nature, and very detrimental to the peace and tranquility of a Christian commonwealth have been continually brought against the said order. Hence arose that infinity of appeals and protests against this society, which so many sovereigns have laid at the foot of the Throne of our predecessors, Paul IV, Pius V, and Sixtus V. * * *

"After so many storms, troubles and divisions, every good man looked forward with impatience to the happy day which was to restore peace and tranquility. But under the reign of this same Clement XIII, the times became more full of difficulty and storm; complaints and quarrels were multiplied on every side; in some places dangerous seditions arose, tumults, discords, scandals which, weakening or entirely breaking the bounds of Christian charity, excited the faithful to all the rage of party hatred and enmities. Desolation and danger grew to such a height, that the very sovereigns, whose piety and liberality towards the society were so well known as to be looked upon as hereditary in their families—we mean our dearly beloved sons in Christ, the Kings of France, Spain, Portugal and Sicily—found themselves reduced to the necessity of expelling, and driving from their states, kingdoms, and provinces, these very companions of Jesus; persuaded that there remained no other remedy to so great evils; and, that this step was necessary, in order to prevent Christians from rising one against another, and from massacreing each other in the very bosom of our common mother, the Holy Church. They said, our dear sons in Jesus Christ having since considered, that even this remedy was not sufficient for reconciling the whole Christian world, unless that society was absolutely abolished and suppressed, made known their demands and wishes in this matter to our said predecessor, Clement XIII. They united their common prayers and authority, to obtain that this last method might be put in practice, as the only one capable of assuring the constant repose of their subjects, and the good of the Catholic Church in general. But the unexpected death of the aforesaid Pontiff, rendered this project abortive.

"As soon as by the Divine mercy and Providence we were raised to the chair of St. Peter, the same prayers, demands, and wishes were laid before us, and strengthened by the pressing solicitations of many bishops, and other persons of distinguished rank, learning, and piety. But, that we might choose the wisest course in a matter of so much moment we determined not to be so precipitate, but to take due time; not only to examine attentively, weigh carefully, and take counsel wisely, but also by unceasing prayers to ask of the Farther of lights His particular assistance; exhorting the faithful to co-operate with us by their prayers and good works in obtaining this needful succor."

After remarking on what the Council of Trent had decided, with respect to the clergy who were members of this society, the brief proceeds:

"Actuated by so many and important considerations, and, as we hope, aided by the presence and inspiration of the Holy Spirit; compelled also by the necessity of our office, which strictly obliges us to conciliate, maintain and confirm the peace and tranquility of the Christian Commonwealth, and remove every obstacle which may tend to trouble it; having further considered that the said Society of Jesus can no longer produce these abundant fruits and those great advantages, with a view to which it was instituted, approved by so many of our predecessors, and endowed with so many and extensive privileges: that, on the contrary, it was difficult, or to say impossible, that the church could recover a firm and lasting peace so long as the said society subsisted; in consequence hereof, and determined by the particular reasons we have alleged, and forced by other motives which prudence and the good government of the church have dictated it, the knowledge of which we keep to ourselves, conforming ourselves to the example of our predecessors, and particularly to that of Gregory X, in the General Council of Lyons; the rather as in the present case we are determining upon the fate of a society classed among the mendicant orders, both its constitution and privileges; after a mature deliberation, we do, out of our certain knowledge and the fulness of our apostolical power, suppress and abolish the said society; we deprive it of all power of action whatever, of its houses, schools, colleges, hospitals, lands, and in short, every other place whatever, in whatever kingdom or Province they may be situated; we abrogate and annul its statutes, rules, customs, decrees and constitutions, even though confirmed by oath and approved by the Holy See, or otherwise; in like manner we annul all and every its privileges, favors general or particular, the tenor whereof is, and is taken to be as fully and as amply expressed in this present brief, as if the same were inserted, word for word, in whatever clauses, form or decree, or under whatever sanction, their privileges may have been conceived. We declare every authority of all kinds, the General, the Provincials, and Visitors and other superiors of the said society, to be forever annulled and extinguished, of what nature soever the said authority may be, whether relating to things spiritual or temporal."

This, Sir, is a portion of the brief of Pope Clement XIV suppressing this order. Now, Sir, I want to enquire whether it will be asserted that His Holiness the Pope of Rome, in thus suppressing this order, and in using the language he did with regard to it, was acting in ignorance—whether in his infallibility he was mistaken as to the character of this order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, I am not very well posted as to the tenets of the church, if the Pope is not held to be infallible there is a popular misapprehension upon that point. If any one in this House wishes to cast discredit on his judgment or on the motives which actuated him in issuing this brief, I have nothing to say; but I believe the Pope, in suppressing this order, acted from reason and knowledge in saying what he did in this brief, and that, in issuing it, he acted in accordance with the desire of every king and every statesman in Europe. This order has been arraigned at the bar of history, and has been condemned; I believe it deserved suppression; and I believe that Pope Clement XIV, acting at the solicitation of the various kings of Europe, suppressed it for good and sufficient reasons. Now, my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), the other night, read an extract from Macaulay regarding this order, and, as in the case of a good many other extracts, stopped just where he should have gone on. I will take up the thread of the hon. gentleman's discourse, and proceed from where he left off. At that point Lord Macaulay proceeded to say:

"But with the admirable energy, disinterestedness, and self devotion, which were characteristic of the society, great vices were mingled. It was alleged, and not without foundation, that the ardent public spirit, which made the Jesuit regardless of his ease, of his liberty and of his life, made him also regardless of truth and of mercy; that no means which could promote the interest of his religion seemed to him unlawful, and that by the interest of his religion he too often meant the interest of his society. It was alleged that, in the most atrocious plots recorded in history, his agency could be distinctly traced; that, constant only in attachment to the fraternity to which he belonged, he was in some countries the most dangerous enemy of freedom, and in others the most dangerous enemy of order. The mighty victories which he boasted that he had achieved in the cause of the church were, in the judgment of many illustrious members of that church, rather apparent than real. He had indeed labored with a wonderful show of success to reduce the world under her laws; but he had done so by relaxing her laws to suit the temper of the world. Instead of toiling to elevate human nature to the noble standard fixed by Divine precept and example, he had lowered the standard till it was beneath the average level of human nature. He gloried in multitude of converts who had been baptised in the remote regions of the East; but it was reported that from some of those converts, the facts on which the whole theology of the Gospel depends had been cunningly concealed, and that others were permitted to avoid persecution by bowing down before the images of false gods, while internally repeating paters and aves. Nor was it only in heathen countries that such arts were said to be practiced. It was not strange that people of all ranks, and especially of the highest ranks, crowded to the confessionals in the Jesuit temples; for from these confessionals none went discontented away. There the priest was all things to all men. He showed just so much rigor as might not drive those who knelt at his spiritual tribunal to the Dominican or the Franciscan Church. If he had to deal with a mind truly devout, he spoke in the saintly tones of the primitive Fathers; but with that very large part of mankind who have religion enough to make them uneasy when they do wrong, and not religion enough to keep them from doing wrong, he followed a very different system. Since he could not reclaim them from guilt, it was his business to save them from remorse. He had at his command an immense dispensary of anodynes for wounded consciences. In the books of casuistry which had been written by his brethren, and printed with the approbation of his superiors, were to be found doctrines consolatory to transgressors of every class. There the bankrupt was taught how he might, without sin, secrete his goods from his creditors. The servant was taught how he might, without sin, run off with his master's plate. The pander was assured that a Christian man might innocently earn his living by carrying letters and messages between married women and their gallants. The high-spirited and punctilious gentlemen of France were gratified by a decision in favor of duelling. The Italians, accustomed to darker and baser modes of vengeance, were glad to learn that they might, without any crime, shoot at their enemies from behind hedges. To deceit was given a license sufficient to destroy the whole value of human contracts and of human testimony. In truth, if society continued to hold together, if life and property enjoyed any security, it was because common sense and common humanity restrained men from doing what the Society of Jesus assured them that they might with a safe conscience do, so strangely were good and evil intermixed in the character of these celebrated brethren; and the intermixture was the secret of their gigantic power. That power could never have belonged to mere hypocrites. It could never have belonged to rigid moralists. It was to be attained only by men sincerely enthusiastic in the pursuit of a great end, and, at the same time, unscrupulous as to the choice of means."

Now, Sir, I spoke of this order having been banished from various countries. It was banished from England in 1579, again in 1581, again in 1586, again in 1601, again in 1604, and again in 1791; and, Sir, in view of the character of British legislation with regard to the Society of Jesuits, its existence and its presence in any part of the British realm is a contempt of law. By the Catholic Emancipation Act, 10 George IV, chapter 7, certain political disabilities were removed from the Catholics of Great Britain. The Act recites the oath which Catholics were required to take before being invested with the rights of citizenship and the right to hold office; and this Act of 1829, which is not an obsolete law, but a law still in force, which is a law paramount over all colonial laws, contains an enactment with regard to the Jesuits; and I shall take the liberty of reading sections 28, 29, 30, 31, 33 and 34. I shall read them because they have an important bearing upon the case under discussion, because these articles, of this Emancipation Act, clearly prove that the incorporation of the Society of Jesuits is an unconstitutional Act in this country or in any other part of the British realm:

"Section 28. And whereas Jesuits and members of other religious orders, communities or societies of the Church of Rome bound by monastic or religious vows, are resident within the United Kingdom, and it is expedient to make provision for the gradual suppression and final prohibition of the same, therein, therefore be it enacted that every Jesuit and every member of any other religious order, community, or society of the Church of Rome, bound by monastic or religious vows, who, at the time of the commencement of this Act shall be within the United Kingdom shall, within six calendar months after the commencement of this Act, deliver to the clerk of peace of the county or place where such person shall reside or to his deputy, a notice or statement in the form and containing the particulars required to be set forth in the schedule to this Act annexed; which notice or statement such clerk of the peace, or his deputy, shall preserve and register amongst the records of such county or place without any fee, and shall forthwith transmit a copy of such notice or statement to the Chief Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant or other Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland, if such person shall reside in Ireland, or if, in Great Britain, to one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, and in case any person shall offend in the premises, he shall forfeit and pay to His Majesty, for every calendar month during which he shall remain in the United Kingdom, without having delivered such notice or statement as is hereinbefore required, the sum of fifty pounds.

"Section 29. And be it further enacted, that if any Jesuit, or member of any such religious order, community or society as aforesaid, shall, after the commencement of this Act, come into this realm, he shall be deemed and taken to be guilty of a misdemeanor and being thereof lawfully convicted shall be sentenced and ordered to be banished from the United Kingdom for the term of his natural life.

"Section 30. Provided always, and be it further enacted, that in case any natural born subject of this realm, being at the time of the commencement of this Act a Jesuit, or other member of any such religious order, community or society as aforesaid, shall, at the time of the commencement of this Act be out of the realm, it shall be lawful for such person to return or come into this realm; and upon his return or coming into the realm, he is hereby required, within the space of six calendar months, to deliver such notice or statement to the clerk of the peace of the county or place where he shall reside, or his deputy, for the purpose of being so registered and transmitted, as hereinbefore directed; and in case any such person shall neglect or refuse so to do, he shall for such offence forfeit and pay to His Majesty for every calendar month during which he shall remain in the United Kingdom without having delivered such notice or statement, the sum of fifty pounds.

"Section 31. Provided also, and be it further enacted, that notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained, it shall be lawful for any one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, being a Protestant, by a license in writing, signed by him, to grant permission to any Jesuit or member of any such religious order, community, or society as aforesaid, to come into the United Kingdom, and to remain therein for such period as the said Secretary of State shall think proper, not exceeding in any case, the space of six calendar months, and it shall also be lawful for any one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State to revoke any license granted before the expiration of the time mentioned therein, if he shall so think fit; and if any such person to whom such license shall have been granted shall not depart from the United Kingdom within twenty days after the expiration of the time mentioned in such license, or if such license shall have been revoked, then within twenty days after notice of such revocation shall have been given to him, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and being thereof lawfully convicted, shall be sentenced and ordered to be banished from the United Kingdom for the term of his natural life.

"Section 33. And be it further enacted that, in case any Jesuit, or member of any such religious order, community or society, as aforesaid, shall, after the commencement of this Act, within any part of the United Kingdom, admit any person to become a regular ecclesiastic, or brother, or member of any such religious order, community, or society, or be aiding or consenting thereto, or shall administer, or cause to be administered, or be aiding or assisting in the administering or taking any oath, vow, or engagement, purporting, or intended to bind the person taking the same to the rules, ordinances, or ceremonies of such religious order, community, or society, every person offending in the premises, in England, or Ireland, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and in Scotland shall be punished by fine and imprisonment.

"Section 34. And be it further enacted that, in case any person shall, after the commencement of this Act, within any part of this United Kingdom, be admitted, or become a Jesuit, or brother, or member of any other such religious order, community, or society, as aforesaid, such person shall be deemed and taken to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being thereof lawfully convicted, shall be sentenced and ordered to be banished from the United Kingdom for the term of his natural life."

Now, that is the statute which imposes penalties and a fine upon any foreigner who is a Jesuit for coming into the United Kingdom, and which imposes penalties and a fine upon any person who inducts a person into the order, and upon any person who becomes a member of the order. That is taken from the Catholic Emancipation Act of 1829. Now, I am unable to see, in the face of the provisions of that Act, how the incorporation of this order can be legal or constitutional either in Canada or in any other part of Her Majesty's realm. This case was referred to, some years ago, in a debate in the House of Commons. Mr. Disraeli who was then the First Minister of the Crown, stated, on the 10th of July, 1875, that:

"Although no proceedings had been taken against the Jesuits under the Act of 1829, he begged it to be understood that the provisions under the Act are not obsolete, but on the contrary are reserving powers of the law of which the government will be prepared to avail themselves if necessary."

And Mr. Gladstone, who was asked his opinion upon this matter, as to the legality of the residence of the Jesuits in England, referred his correspondents to this Act of Parliament, the provisions of which with regard to the Jesuit I have read. And the Law Journal of England, which contains an account of this matter, then adds:

"This Act, while it carried out the well known reform commemorated by its name, imposes restrictions on 'Jesuits and members of other religious orders, communities or societies of the Church of Rome bound by monastic or religious vows,' of which it recites it is 'expedient to provide for the gradual suppression and final prohibition.' Any of these persons, not including nuns, coming into the realm without a license which can last only six months, are, by section 29, declared guilty of a misdemeanor and may be sentenced to be banished for life. Similarly, any persons admitted within the kingdom to membership in any of the orders in question may, by section 34, be sentenced to banishment for life. If, although banished they do not go out of the country, the Sovereign in Council may have them conveyed to some place abroad. Moreover, if they are found in the country at the end of three months they may be convicted again and transported. Penal servitude is now substituted for transportation. Will this law be now enforced? Or will a charitable reserve be shown, entailing, as it naturally will do, further lawlessness."

Now, the treaty ceding Canada in 1763, provided for the freedom of the Catholic religion in this country, so far as the laws of Great Britain permitted the exercise of that religion, and the Act 14 George III, chapter 83, provided that the French Catholics in this country may exercise the religion of the Church of Rome subject to the King's supremacy. The right to exercise this provision is thus subject to the provisions of the law, and one of the provisions of that law I have called the attention of the House to with regard to the Jesuit organisation, contained in the Emancipation Act of 1829. It was claimed last night by the Minister of Justice that, at the time of the Conquest, the property of individuals was not forfeited or confiscated. It was claimed that the property of the Jesuits was not subject to forfeiture or confiscation under the terms of the Treaty of Paris ceding Canada to Great Britain. But I think it must be held that the Jesuit organisation would not be treated upon the basis of individuals, but as a corporation, and I find that the Act says:

"And be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that all His Majesty's Canadian subjects within the Province of Quebec, the religious orders and communities only excepted——"

Are to have these privileges. So that the religious orders and communities were, by the terms of the cession, expressly excepted from the privileges granted to the inhabitants of the Province of Quebec, or the Province of Canada.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What are you reading from?

Mr. CHARLTON. I am reading from 14 George III, chapter 83, the Quebec Act. All the rights possessed by the citizens of the Province of Quebec, or of old Canada, were rights delegated by the British Crown, rights expressly granted, rights clearly defined, and rights, in every case, subordinate to the supremacy of the Crown, and subordinate to the supremacy of Imperial law; and, if that Catholic Emancipation Act of 1829 contains, as I have shown, express provisions, making it a misdemeanor for a foreign Jesuit to come into England, making it a misdemeanor to induce a British subject into the Jesuit Order, making it a misdemeanor on the part of the person who inducts him and on the part of the person who is inducted, in face of the provisions of that law, I hold that it is simply preposterous to say that the incorporation of the Order of Jesuits in British America, is a constitutional Act. If the incorporation of this order is unconstitutional, it follows, as a matter of course, that all the Acts based upon that incorporation, are unconstitutional. If the incorporation is unconstitutional, the endowment is unconstitutional, and the Jesuits' Estates Act is an unconstitutional Act, if the Incorporation Act is so.

It has been made by British law, upon more occasions than one, an unconstitutional Act to procure judgments or determinations, &c., from the See of Rome, or any foreign potentate. This legislation was first initiated under Edward III, it was continued under Richard II, again under Henry VIII. By 24 Henry VIII, chapter 21, penalties are imposed for procuring inhibitions, judgments and other processes from the See of Rome within the King's dominions—not alone in England Ireland and Scotland, but in any part of the King's dominions The 24 Henry VIII, chapter 21, prohibits the King, his heirs and successors, kings of the realm, and all subjects of the realm or of the dominions of the Crown, for suing for licenses, dispensations, compositions, faculties, grants, rescripts, delegations, or any other instruments in writing from the Bishop of Rome, called the Pope, or from any person or persons having or pretending to have any authority by the same. "The King, his heirs and successors," being expressly named in the Act, the reigning sovereign is bound by the prohibition; and it is not within the constitutional power of a Colonial Legislature or Governor to absolve the Crown from its provisions, or to enact or assent to any Bill violating this or any other Imperial statute in force in the colony. The Crown can only be relieved from the prohibitions of the Act by the power that imposed them, namely, the Imperial Parliament. And in 13 Elizabeth, chapter 2, and 1 Elizabeth, chapter 1, it is provided in more express terms that:

"The usurped power and jurisdiction of the Bishop of Rome, heretofore unlawfully claimed and usurped within this realm, and other the dominions to the Queen's Majesty belonging,"

Shall not be exercised. Neither the Treaty of Surrender, nor the Act of 1774 did more than to grant the free exercise of the Catholic religion in Canada, so far as the laws of Great Britain permit. But we are told by the Minister of Justice that a Provincial Parliament can repeal Imperial statutes as concerns itself, if I understood him aright. I do not accept this definition of the law. I do not hold that the thing formed can say to that which formed it: what doest thou? and can set aside the mandate of the power which formed it. I find in the British North America Act a provision which is antagonistic to the statement of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice. The 129th section of that Act contains the following:—

"Except as otherwise provided by this Act, all laws in force in Canada, Nova Scotia or New Brunswick at the Union, and all courts of civil and criminal jurisdiction, and all legal commissions, powers and authorities, and all officers judicial, administrative and ministerial, existing therein at the Union, shall continue in Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick respectively, as if the Union had not been made; subject, nevertheless (except with respect to such as are enacted by or exist under Acts of the Parliament of Great Britain, or of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland) to be repealed, abolished or altered by the Parliament of Canada; or by the Legislature of the respective Provinces, according to the authority of the Parliament or of that Legislature under this Act."

So that, by this Constitution of British North America, by section 129, special exception is made as to this power in regard to such Acts as existed by the authority of the Parliament of Great Britain or the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland. I have here a case, if it is necessary to quote it, ex parte Renaud, which bears out this view. The judgment is too long to read unless it is desired, but I can send it to the Minister of Justice if he desires. I have laid down the premises, and I think they cannot be controverted that the recognition of any foreign potentate, prince or ecclesiastical, in any statute enacted within the dominions of the Crown of Great Britain, which recognises that power or its inhibitions, decress or processes, is an unconstitutional act. Now, the Estates Bill which we have under consideration does recognise His Holiness the Pope as a potentate. It treats with that potentate as to the terms of the settlement of a domestic matter in a Province of this Dominion. The Bill is passed subject to the approval of that potentate, as is shown by the language in this return of correspondence in connection with this matter. I find in the letter of Mr Mercier to Father Turgeon, dated the 1st May, 1888, in the seventh paragraph, the following language used:—

"That any agreement made between you and the Government of the Province will be binding only in so far as it shall be ratified by the Pope and the Legislature of this Province"

"By the Pope and Legislature of this Province". Sir, the Legislature not only passes a Bill subject to the Pope's approval, but this Act places public money at the disposal of His Holiness the Pope, as is shown in the same letter, in paragraph 8, which reads as follows:—

"That the amount of the compensation fixed shall remain in possession of the Government of the Province as a special deposit until the Pope has ratified said settlement, and made known his wishes respecting the distribution of such amount in this country."

Now, Sir, the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) told us the other night that this provision was a very bitter pill for the Protestants of Quebec I do not wonder that is the case. A pill that treats with His Holiness as to the terms of a domestic matter, that passes a Bill subject to the approval of His Holiness, that places public money at the disposal of His Holiness, must have been a bitter pill, as the hon. gentleman expressed it, for the Protestants of Quebec to swallow. But not only is the Bill open to these objections, but it distinctly submits the legislation of the Province of Quebec to the ratification of the Pope, as is shown by this return on page 13:

"It is also one way of commemorating, in the political history of the country, that glorious concordat, the effecting whereof would be associated with the name of your Government, as soon as the Holy Father has ratified it; that is, that the establishments of the Jesuit Fathers in this Province are always allowed, in accordance with their deserts, and if they ask for it, to participate in the grants which the Government of this Province allows to other institutions to encourage teaching, education, industries, arts and colonisation."

Now, Mr. Speaker, any law which is open to these objections, any law which calls in a foreign potentate to dictate with reference of the settlement of a domestic matter, which places moneys at his disposal, which submits legislation to his ratification, leaving him to accept or reject it—any Bill, I say, subject to these conditions, liable to these objections, is a Bill which, under the law I have quoted bearing upon the question of the Queen's supremacy in the British realms, is clearly unconstitutional and clearly contrary to the spirit and to the letter of the English law. The Minister of Justice told us last night that the only objections to this Bill were contained in the preamble. He did not deny that there were some objectionable features in the preamble of this Bill, but the preamble, he said, was not really a portion of the Bill, and consequently the Bill was not subject to that objection. But I find, Sir, that the Bill itself refers to this preamble, and if the hon. gentleman will turn to sections 1 and 2 of that Bill, he will find that those sections read as follows:—

"1. The aforesaid arrangements entered into between the Premier and the Reverend Father Turgeon are hereby ratified, and the Lieutenant Governor in Council is authorised to carry them out according to their forms and tenor."

Section 2 says:

"2. The Lieutenant Governor in Council is authorised to pay out of any public moneys at his disposal, the sum of $400 000 in the manner and under the conditions mentioned in the documents above cited, and to make any deeds that he may deem necessary for the full and entire execution of such agreement."

So the objectionable features contained in the preamble are embodied in the Bill, specially referred to in the Bill, confirmed in the Bill, and form in point of fact a portion of the Bill itself. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is asserted by Mr. Mercier, it is admitted, I believe, by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, it is not disputed, so far as I am aware, by anyone, that the Jesuits had no legal right to these estates. My hon. friend the member for Bothwell sought to break the force of the arguments with reference to the want of any legal claim on the part of the Jesuit Society, sought to break the force of the payment of money to the order of the Pope, by referring to the Clergy Reserve case, by speaking of the commutation of the Clergy Reserves having been paid by the Government of Canada to certain ecclesiastical bodies. Well, Sir, the cases are not parallel. No claim was set up in that instance that these ecclesiastical bodies had not a legal claim. On the contrary that claim was admitted, there was a commutation of this claim, and the money was paid to them under that commutation. But that is not a parallel claim to this present case, where there was no legal claim, where no legal demand could possibly be made on the part of the Jesuit organisation for the payment of money. Now, I have referred before to the fact of these estates being the property of the Crown. I have referred to the Act of 1774, which specially exempted the ecclesiastical corporations from participation in the rights and annuities that pertained to individuals, and the property of the corporations was undoubtedly the property of the Crown. Foreign corporations could not hold property in Canada; they could not hold property then, they could not hold property in Canada till a very recent period. The fact that this was a religious order that had been endowed with its lands by the King of France, places this corporation in such a position that its rights were forfeited when the conquest took place, and the forfeiture was completed when the order was expelled. We have an instance recorded, a case brought to trial within recent years, where it was decided that a foreign corporation could not hold property in the Province of Quebec except by virtue of special legislative action, the case of the Chaudière Gold Mining Co. vs. George Desbarats which was before the Privy Council in 1873. It was held:

"That, by the law of the Province of Quebec, corporations are under a disability to acquire lands without the permission of the Crown or the authority of the Legislature, that a foreign corporation could not purchase lands in said Province without such permission or authority, and had no action for damages against the vendor."

There can be no question about the loss of title by the Jesuit Order. In 1841, when this property was dealt with, it was the property of the Crown, and there can be no doubt that between 1841 and 1867, when the Provinces entered into Confederation, this particular property was appropriated to the schools of the Province of Quebec, and there can be no doubt that this property having been appropriated to the school funds of the Province, it was unconstitutional to divert it to other sources and use it for other purposes.

Now, there is another objection to this settlement which leads me to believe that it cannot be a final settlement. Other demands may be made. Subsequent events may show that the lands were sold for more than was anticipated The Jesuits may fall back on the estimation of the value made at one time which was about $400,000, and may claim more if the property sells for more. The correspondence, if carefully scrutinised, will lead one to the conclusion that we are not by any means in a position where we can be sure that this case is finally closed. There is one piece of property which is considered as part of the Jesuits' estates, the Champ de Mars, which is Dominion property. There is Laprairie Common, which has been passed over to the Jesuits but held to be Dominion property. It has been occupied by the Dominion Government as a parade ground for many years, and they have the right of possession at least. I assert my belief that the common of Laprairie is Dominion property, which has been granted to the Order of the Jesuits by the Province of Quebec. The correspondence with regard to this matter, if it is carefully scrutinised, will lead us to the opinion that it is far from being settled. I find in the letter from the Premier of Quebec to Father Turgeon, dated 1st May, the following clause:—

"That you will grant to the Government of the Province of Quebec in full, complete and perpetual concession of all the property which may have belonged in Canada, under whatever title, to the fathers of the old society, and that you will renounce to all rights generally whatsoever upon such property and the revenues therefrom in favor of our Province, the whole, as well in the name of the old Order of Jesuits, and of your present corporation as in the name of the Pope, of the Sacred College of the Propaganda and of the Roman Catholic Church in general."

To this letter the Rev. Father replied on 8th of May as follows:—

"The Government of the Province of Quebec will receive a full, complete and perpetual concession of all the property which may have belonged in Canada, by whatever title, to the fathers of the old society, and the Jesuit fathers will renounce all rights generally whatsoever upon such property and the revenues therefrom in favor of the Province, the whole, in the name of the Pope, of the Sacred College of the Propaganda and of the Roman Catholic Church in general."

What does that amount to? The Society of Jesus gives a quit claim for all its property to the Province of Quebec. Part of that property, the Champ de Mars, valued at $1,024,000 is the property of the Dominion; and we shall have in due time, perhaps, Mr. Mercier coming to Ottawa with a demand for the settlement of his claim against the Dominion Government for the value of the Champ de Mars because of this transaction, and because a quit claim was given by His Holiness the Pope in behalf of the Jesuits. If the argument of the Minister of Justice is correct, if the Jesuits have a title to this property that claim would be good; and if this Bill becomes law we are exposing ourselves to the possible contingency of having the Province of Quebec make a claim on the Dominion for the value of that portion of the Jesuits' estates known as the Champ de Mars. And then we have the other possibility of the Society of Jesus coming to the Dominion and demanding the value of the Laprairie Common, which has been granted it by the Province of Quebec, but which is probably the actual property of the Dominion of Canada. We are leaving ourselves open to further demands with respect to this matter; and I believe for this consideration, if there were no others, it would be proper and prudent to disallow this Bill. The other objection I have to this Bill is, that I hold it to be in the highest degree dangerous and improper to make grants to religious bodies. If you once open the door, if once you permit that species of operation to be commenced in this country, there is no human wisdom that can tell where it eventually will end. Can any one believe that this grant made to the Society of the Jesuits by the Province of Quebec has no connection whatever with political exigencies? Can anyone doubt that seeking political influence has something to do with this matter, and if it has been the motive in one case, may it not be the motive in another? Are we not opening the door to great evils that will be introduced if we permit this sort of influence to be inaugurated, if we permit an arrangement made between the Premier of the Province of Quebec and the Society of Jesus, by which the Jesuits are endowed with $400,000 upon a most doubtful claim—what may be the next thing? I believe upon the ground that this Bill paves the way to further demands for religious grants that may be successfully pressed when votes and influence are badly needed by some political party that it endangers the interests of this country, and for this, if for no other reason, this Act should be disallowed.

I have now concluded with the constitutional aspect of this case. I hold that the incorporation of the Society of Jesus is unconstitutional because the existence of that society is probibited by English law. In England the Jesuits' society is an illegal body; the initiation into the Society of Jesus of a member is illegal, it is illegal on the part of the man who does it, and it is illegal for the one initiated. They are under pains and penalties, it is an unconstitutional society, it is under the ban of English law; and that being the case, it is not an order that can be constitutionally incorporated in any part of the British realm. Then I hold that the Jesuits' Estates Act, being predicated upon, that Act, is itself necessarily unconstitutional. It is unconstitutional further in the fact that it calls in a foreign potentate, recognises him, places money at his disposal, places a piece of legislation at his disposal to ratify or to set aside, and in that respect it is clear that it is in contravention of British law and British supremacy. For these reasons I hold that the measure is clearly unconstitutional, and as such should be without delay disallowed by the Government of this Dominion.

But even if it was constitutional, even if the whole argument I have constructed so far was baseless and was swept away, and if this measure was shown to be constitutional, constitutional as regards the Bill, constitutional in being founded on a constitutional Act, permitting the incorporation of the Society of Jesus, yet I hold that, as a question of public policy, the measure should be disallowed. The position which the Liberals of this country occupy in this case is briefly this: They take high ground in defence of provincial rights; they take high ground upon the question of the Dominion Government interfering with provincial legislation. And I suppose, with their views upon this case, with their record, even though they did not approve of this Bill, even if they considered it was an improper Bill, they would not counsel and support the proposition to disallow the Bill, on the ground that it was interfering with provincial rights. But whether it is desirable that the Government should be debarred from the exercise of the prerogative of this disallowance, is an abstract question; whether it would be a good thing to reconstruct our constitution and to bar the Government from the exercise of that privilege or not, I do not venture to say, but I do say that the right exists and is clearly conferred on the Government. And further, the right has been repeatedly exercised. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), in the course of his argument said that the prerogative of disallowance was not essential to the maintenance of our constitution, and he said that in the United States no such prerogative of disallowance was permitted on the part of the Central Government, that the remedy there lay in an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. That is perfectly true. But the hon. gentleman is aware that there is a vast difference between the structure of the Dominion constitution and that of the United States. The principle of the United States Government I believe is that the State is sovereign, within its own proper sphere, and all the powers exercised by the Government of the United States are powers delegated by the States, which in their individual capacity as States ratified the original constitution, and must ratify all amendments to the same, and every power not thus specially delegated to the Central Government by the constitution is reserved to the States. What is the case in the Dominion of Canada? All powers not specially granted to the several Provinces by the British North American Act are reserved to the Dominion and any Act passed by a Provincial Legislature may be disallowed by the Privy Council. That is the difference between the two. We had in this country a Legislative Union and we parted with that and entered into Confederation, and whether it was wise or whether it was unwise to invest the Government at Ottawa with the power of disallowance or not, this Government can exercise the power, it has exercised the power, and it has in repeated instances put that power into operation. It has done it in the case of railway legislation in Manitoba, and it has done it in the case of the Streams Bill, and numerous other cases. I am willing to admit that this power should be exercised with the utmost caution; I am willing to admit that the plainest and most palpable reasons should exist for the exercise of this power, but I am ready to assert, Sir, that there has never been a case in the history of the Dominion of Canada where, upon broad constitutional grounds, and having due regard to the general interests of the great mass of the people of this country, it was more proper to disallow a Bill, than in this particular instance; and that the settlement of the Jesuits' Estates Act was, above all other measures that have ever come under the cognisance of this Government, a measure that should be disallowed. My hon. friend the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says that there are two classes of cases where disallowance is warrantable, and one is the case where the Bill is clearly unconstitutional. This is a case of that kind; this Bill is clearly unconstitutional in my opinion. He says the other case is where a Bill is not in the interest of the entire Dominion. Well, this case covers this Bill also. The Bill is clearly unconstitutional and it is clearly not in the interest of the Dominion, and so, by the hon. gentleman's own logic, this Bill should be disallowed. This power of veto is clearly a constitutional power which may be exercised by the Government, which the Government has the right to exercise, which the Government has exercised in former cases, and which, in my opinion, in view of the character of this Bill, and of the probable future consequences of allowing this Bill to become law, the Government ought, upon the highest ground of public interest, to disallow.

Now, as I said some time ago in considering this question of disallowance, in considering as to whether it is proper to do so or not, the Government were warranted in investigating the character of the Jesuits. I have a list here of the countries from which this order had been expelled before its suppression by Clement XIV. They were expelled from the following countries at the dates mentioned:—

Saragosa	1555	Moravia	1619
La Palintine	1555	Naples and Netherlands	1622
Venice	1568	China and India	1623

The order was restored by Pius VII on 7th August, 1814, and since that date this self same order has been expelled from the following countries:—

Belgium	1816	Switzerland	1847
French towns	1819	Bavaria	1848
Russia	1820	Naples and Papal States, Parma, Arch Duchy of Austria, Galica, Sardinia, Sicily	1848
Colleges in France	1828
France	1831
Portugal	1834	Paraguay	1858
Spain	1835	Italian towns	1859
France	1845

Now, we are told that the character of this order has changed, forsooth; that it is not the order it was when Clement XIV suppressed it; that it is not the order it was when nearly all the potentates of Europe agreed in demanding that it should be suppressed. "Oh, no," they say, "it is not the same order." How is it, then, that the States I have mentioned have expelled this order since it was restored in 1814? and be it remembered that fifteen of these States were Catholic States or communities. I think that is a significant fact. I doubt very much, whether, in view of that fact the argument can be made successfully, that the character of this order has been changed. What was the opinion of Cardinal Taschereau with regard to this order, when it was proposed to incorporate it two years ago? What was the opinion of Mr. Gladstone in regard to this order, so late as 1876? I find in the Contemporary Review, of June, 1876, that Mr. Gladstone has indicted the principles of which they are the professional exponents on these counts:

"(1) Its hostility to mental freedom at large; (2) its incompatibility with the thought and movement of modern civilisation; (3) its pretensions against the State; (4) its pretensions against parental and conjugal rights; (5) its jealousy, abated in some quarters, of the free circulation and use of the Holy Scripture; (6) the de facto alienation of the educated mind of the country in which it prevails; (7) its detrimental effects on the comparative strength and morality of the States in which it has sway; (8) its tendency to sap veracity in the individual mind."

Now, that is an arraignment by Mr. Gladstone of this order, the character of which we are considering to-day. In 1879 a discussion took place upon the character of this order in the French Chamber, and that discussion was referred to by my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) last night. Now, Sir, I do not intend to detain the House with the speech of M. Ferry and M. Bert (since Minister of Education), M. du Bodan, M. Le Prevost and others, but the substance of it amounted to this: that the Minister of Education sent and had examined the character of the Jesuits' text books, and the character of their teachings in their schools and colleges, and the investigation made in regard to the character of that order was such as to satisfy the French Assembly, and the Department of Education in France, that the Jesuits were an order that ought not to be allowed to have anything whatever to do with education in that republic. Their principles were recognised to be incompatible with the independence of every government. They were proved to hold the same doctrines that they had held during the last 300 years. They taught the Divine right of Kings; they taught that the liberty of the press was a dangerous thing; they advocated religious wars; they attacked the Revolution and glorified the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes; they calumniated Necker and Burgot; they rejected the principles of national sovereignty; trial by jury was denounced, and liberty of conscience and worship was condemned. In one of these works, by Charles Barthelemy, the following passage, in the chapter dealing with Protestant people, disposes of English morality:—

"In London and all over England, the holiness of marriage is destroyed, bigamy is frequent, the wife is not the companion but the slave of her husband; the conjugal tie is dissolved; the children are poisoned or sold."

The subjects treated in Father Humbert's work, published in 1840, "Instructions chrétiennes pour les jeunes gens et les jeunes filles," were found to be so monstrous and filthy, according to Mr. Bert, that though the work was put into the hands of young girls—objectionable passages could not be read in the French Assembly with ladies in the gallery. Without detaining the House with the evidence placed before the Legislative Assembly in France, by the Minister of Education and others, suffice it to say that upon that evidence the Jesuits were expelled from the educational institutions of that republic. I think, Sir, I am warranted in saying that we will consult the interests of this country, present and future, if we do not permit to be established in this Dominion that organisation whose whole history is a history of turmoil, of intrigue, of mischief and of attempts to pull down and destroy constitutional authority wherever they have been placed. Sir, we do not want an organisation in this country that will widen the breach that exists between the two great races in Canada; we do not want an organisation in this country, the influence exerted by which will be so detrimental to the best interests of this country present and future.

I have been requested, Mr. Speaker, before closing to read this resolution placed in my hands; a resolution adopted at a special meeting of the Protestant Ministerial Association in Montreal held this morning, it says:

"At a special meeting of the Protestant Ministerial Association of Montreal, held this morning, attention was drawn to certain statements made on the floor of the House of Commons, during the debate on the Jesuits' Estates Act, by the hon. member for Stanstead (C. C. Colby), who is reported to have stated that he represents the feelings of the Protestants of Quebec; that they have made no complaint; presented no petition and sought no redress from supposed wrongs, that, in fact, the Protestants have no grievances, but are treated with more justice, liberality and generosity than any minority in the world.

"Therefore be it resolved—

"That the Ministerial Association repudiate the hon. member's claim to represent the feelings of the Protestant community of the Province of Quebec. That it is entirely incorrect to say that no petitions have been presented against the measure in favor of the Jesuits, inasmuch as this Association presented a petition against the incorporation of the Jesuits in 1887, to the Legislature of Quebec, and petitions to the Governor General in Council for the disallowance of the Jesuits' Estates Act, have been presented from this Association, from the Rev. the Presbytery of Montreal, from the Dominion Evangelical Alliance, and by some 6,000 citizens from the city of Montreal and other parts of the Province of Quebec. The matter also engaging the earnest attention of the Evangelical Alliance at its Conference in Montreal in October last, and strong resolutions in protest were adopted.

"And so far from having no grievances, the Protestant minority has serious cause of complaint in relation to many matters, among which the following are specified: The division of taxes for educational purposes; the recent unsettling of the foundation of the Superior Education Fund; in the degradation of degrees conferred by Protestant Universities; in the matter of the marriage laws; in the law of compulsory tithing, and the erection of parishes for civil purposes, both creating motives for the removal of Protestants, and generally in the virtual establishment of one church to the disadvantage of all other churches.

"Furthermore, we declare that the Protestant community of the Province of Quebec are unwilling to be indebted to the generosity or liberality of their Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen, but demand simple justice and their equal rights as subjects of the Queen.

"It was resolved to transmit the foregoing statement to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Col. O'Brien), with the request that it be read to the House of Commons by himself, or some other member he may select.

"J. COOPER ANTLIFF, D.D.,
"President of the Montreal Protestant Association.
"WM. SMYTH,
"Secretary-Treasurer."

This is the communication, Sir, of the Protestant Ministerial Association of Montreal, duly signed by its officers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have but few words to say in conclusion. I wish, Sir, to refer to a statement made by my hon. friend the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that if ministers would preach the gospel instead of preaching politics, it would be very much more in the line of their duty, and more conducive to the public interests. I have heard this charge brought against ministers before—the charge of preaching politics. I remember, Sir, in the great struggle in the United States, when the life of the nation was at stake, and when the slave power was making gigantic efforts to strangle liberty in that country, that the ministers of the country who stood up in defence of righteousness and right, were accused of preaching politics, one of the charges brought against them was that they were stepping outside of their legitimate province. When they were preaching opposition to slavery and exhorting men to patriotism, whether they were preaching politics or not, they were performing a good work. I hold that, in every emergency, when the liberties of a country are at stake, the minister is a dumb dog who does not raise his voice, warning his fellow citizens, and seeking by every influence he possesses to promote the right and combat the wrong; and if ministers in this country to-day see it to be their duty to warn the country of dangers impending, to warn it of the crisis threatened to be precipitated upon it, I say let them do so; if they do not do so, they are recreant to their trust and duty.

Sir, I conclude what I have to say to-night by asserting that I believe this Jesuits' Estates Act is an unconstitutional Act, because the society is under the ban of British law; I believe further that it is an unconstitutional Act by reason of the reference contained in the Bill to His Holiness the Pope; I believe further that it is unconstitutional by reason of the diversion of school funds in the Province of Quebec from their legitimate and proper purpose. And in addition to these three counts of unconstitutionality, I believe that upon the highest grounds of public interest and public good, upon the ground of due consideration of the public weal, present and future, in this Dominion, that this Act should have been disallowed in conformity with the power possessed by the Government of this country.

Mr. MULOCK. I admit, Mr. Speaker, that it is with some hesitation that I venture to address this House, as I will but very briefly, upon a subject so grave and important as that now receiving our attention. I cannot conceive of any question that might be fraught with more serious consequences to the welfare of Canada than the question which is now agitating the country, and which ought to receive the best consideration of the people's representatives. When I think that the solution of this problem may, according to the determination of this House, have such different results, I have been amazed to find that hon. gentlemen, who I believe in their calmer moments are as true patriots as are to be found, should for the moment allow themselves to be carried away by bigotry or fanatical zeal and should suggest to this Parliament the adoption of a course that would in my judgment destroy the Union of the Provinces that now constitute Canada. What proposition has the hon. member for Muskoka laid before this House, and with what arguments and with what evidence has he sustained that proposition? Have his arguments and those of his friends justified them, and would they justify this House, in adopting the conclusion which he asks by this motion to adopt? Sir, the motion that has been placed in your hands by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) alleges that the Bill under discussion for the settlement of the Jesuits' estates, passed by the Legislature of Quebec, was beyond the jurisdiction of that Legislature, and the motion goes on to give reasons in support of that proposition of law. So we have the hon. member alleging, and undertaking to prove conclusively to the House and the country, that this Bill is ultra vires, and on that ground he asks us to recommend to His Excellency the Governor General to wipe it off the Statute-book. Now, Sir, has he proved beyond all reasonable doubt the premises on the truth of which, and only upon the establishment of the truth of which, Parliament would be justified in coming to the conclusion which he asks? His able chieftain, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) laid down this doctrine for our guidance. He said: I admit that Parliament should not on this occasion ask the Governor to disallow this Bill if there is a shadow of a doubt that it is not ultra vires. The hon. member for Muskoka says it is ultra vires. Now, I ask hon. gentlemen who call on Parliament to adopt this resolution, is it admitted beyond doubt that the Act is ultra vires? We listened last night to the able address of the Minister of Justice. Will anyone say that he did not do more than establish a doubt? Will anyone say that he did not cite authorities which convinced the vast majority of this House that the position taken by the hon. member for Muskoka and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is an untenable one, both in regard to the law of the case and in regard to the alleged facts on which they founded their charges. Taking the advice of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and applying it to what we have heard in this House, and without, and to what we know, of our own knowledge, of the law as well, I think we can fairly conclude that it has not been established beyond all doubt that the Bill is ultra vires. Even if it had been established beyond doubt that the Bill is ultra vires, there would, in this particular case, have been the very strongest possible reason why Parliament should not intervene and take the case out of the proper tribunals of the land. Is Parliament, a body of 215 men, representing widely different views, depending more or less upon the fickle populace; is this Parliament, composed of persons more or less prejudiced upon a question of this kind—and no 215 men could be gathered together in any country in the world among whom there would not be found prejudiced men when a question of religion is concerned—is this Parliament, I say, a fit tribunal to find on the law and the facts clearly and unmistakably in order to arrive at an absolute conclusion on a question such as this? Is there a man in Canada who would assert that it would be fair and just to submit such a question as this to the arbitrament of even my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), for whose honesty of purpose no one has a higher opinion than I? I might say, also, that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) indicated a bias which would hardly qualify him to be selected as an independent juryman to deal with this question. I might run over the list and point out many of the members who have expressed a strong bias on this question, and, therefore, I doubt whether Parliament would be safe in following their views and in determining how it should find on questions of fact and law. For these reasons I am of opinion that under no circumstances should Parliament determine this question, unless there is no other tribunal in the land that can deal with it. Could there be a tribunal more unfit to deal with such a question than an assembly such as this? I would ask the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) if he has thought of the consequences which would follow the adoption of this motion should it be carried. Suppose to-night the majority of the House should decide to carry this motion, that would be a withdrawal of the confidence of the country from the Government. What would then have to be the next step? The Government have taken a certain position upon this question, which I am glad to be able to endorse. They would have to tender their resignations to His Excellency, and either they would go to the country or the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) would be called upon to form a Cabinet. In either case there would have to be an appeal to the country upon the new issue. Has the hon. gentleman thought of what the issue would be which would be presented to the country on that occasion? Is any man in this House prepared to present to the people such an issue, and to say that it is in the interests of the people that there should be an issue raised of race and religion to determine who shall and who shall not prevail in this House? It cannot be denied that that would be the very next step if this motion were carried, and that step would mean the dividing of this country into two great camps. Who would be found in these camps? Our Roman Catholic brethren, as a whole, would take their place in one camp, and our Protestant friends in another. This is the inevitable issue if this proposition be carried. My hon. friend may pretend that he is but attacking a community of the Roman Catholic Church; but if he appreciates the true sentiment of the people of Canada to-day, he will find that it is not a question of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) and his little band against the Order of Jesuits, who perhaps may enjoy some degree of unpopularity, but it will be a question of Roman Catholics against Protestants. Could any one conceive an issue more disastrous to the country than that? I cannot. It would destroy Canada. And are we to precipitate such a condition of affairs when there is relief at our hands, when there is a fit tribunal to deal with this case whose judgment will be accepted loyally by all classes and creeds. Does the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) suppose that by the carrying of this motion he would accomplish the suppression of the Jesuits, if that is what he seeks? It would mean the defeat of this particular Bill, but what would follow? Do you not think, Sir, that the Legislature of the Province of Quebec, which enacted that measure nine months ago, if it were disallowed under the circumstances, would not be called together again, under the inspiring influence of this racial and religious war or at least religious war? Would they not, the Quebec Legislature, be assembled together again as quickly as the constitution admitted, and would not the first Act they would pass be a re-enactment of the Jesuit Bill? Then the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), if he carried the country, would rally his forces here, and would not his first duty, in obedience to the mandate of the majority of the people, be to call upon the Governor General to disallow the Bill again. So the repetition would go on, the public mind being more and more inflamed, and what the end would be no one can tell. Is that statesmanship? Is that patriotism? Is that in the interest of British institutions in Canada, or in any country on God's earth? I have heard the hon. gentleman speak of his love for the British flag and institutions. I know he is honest in every sentiment he expresses in that regard, but I grieve to think that he has forgotten he is living in the 19th century. He has forgotten that he has come to free Canada, he has forgotten that the greater Ireland is on this side of the water, and he thinks he still lives in old Ireland, where a minority wielded the power and where a minority was able to exercise its sway. Could he not have been generous enough to have told us at least one little consoling feature in connection with Roman Catholic institutions? Sir, I am no Roman Catholic, but I think the truth should be told, I think the whole truth should be told in discussing a question like this, and yet it did not occur to him to utter one word of justification on behalf of any of the Catholic Church, but he, and those who are with him, declared in all their arguments that the Catholic Church endangered every representative institution.

Mr. O'BRIEN. If the hon. gentleman will allow me for a moment, I defy him, from any word which I have uttered in this debate, to justify the statement he has just made.

Mr. MULOCK. I am only too glad to think that I misunderstood the hon gentleman. If I have not correctly interpreted his arguments, I would be only too glad humbly to apologise to him, and I wish I could say of all who have discussed this question that they have shown the same liberality as, in intent at all events, existed in the mind of my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien); but I think we must all admit that those who have advocated the measure he asks us to adopt, and even the last hon. member who spoke, my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), asserted that the Roman Catholic Church endangered civil liberty. If that is the case, could not one man among them all have given credit to the church for having at times been, as I submit, perhaps even too loyal to institutions, the de facto governments of the day, in times gone by? We have only to look back to the history of England in the last few months, and we find that His Holiness the Pope, who has no friend amongst them to day here, found the Marquis of Salisbury, or the Conservative Administration, only too glad to receive assistance from him in the form of the rescript he issued to the people of Ireland in order to induce them to submit to the constituted authority of the land. When His Holiness did that, he did an act which did not commend itself to his own clergy and his own flock in Ireland. He did it against the interest of the church itself in Ireland. He weakened his influence in that island, but he did it, as I understand, according to the well understood doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church, to be true and loyal in the support of the de facto Government of the day. I am no apologist for the Roman Catholic Church, but, when I hear a charge like this made, some little circumstance comes to my mind, and as a matter of justice I take the liberty of reminding those hon. gentlemen of doubtful memories of such a redeeming feature. Would our loyal friends who propose to set the heather on fire, to add to the inflammatory condition of the public mind to-day, who instead of meeting here in a judicial frame of mind and temperately telling the people what is best, be good enough for one moment to think of the grave trust cast upon them when Her Majesty placed in the hands of the people of Canada the British North America Act. Does not that Act say—I ignore clauses and technicalities—does not a broad minded, a liberal and a fair interpretation of that Act say that, whatever we do and whatever we legislate, we shall do all things to promote the peace, the order and the good government of the people of Canada? When Her Majesty gave us that constitution, she expected us to work out that constitution, and not to exercise our majority powers on the floor of Parliament to destroy peace, to destroy order, to destroy good government in Canada, and to destroy Canada. Under these circumstances, I say in conclusion what I said in the beginning, that I am amazed that, when there is one simple possible solution of this question, an appeal to the proper courts of the land, anyone should seek to solve it in this unfortunate way, in a way that would not be a solution but only an aggravation of the evil complained of. For a moment, look at the consequences of the other course. An appeal to the courts takes place, and, if anyone is dissatisfied with the result of that appeal, he can carry that appeal to the foot of the Throne, and there get the advice of Her Majesty, the fountain of wisdom, of justice and of truth. A judgment is then delivered which will be accepted with satisfaction and resignation by all classes and all creeds, a finality will be given to this question, and then peace, order and good government will prevail in the land. Therefore my voice and my vote are in that direction. Without sacrificing a bit of my Protestant sentiment, without sacrificing peace, order or good government in Canada, but assisting to place Canada on a sure, stable and sound foundation, I shall vote against the motion of my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr O'Brien), and I ask him and all those who desire the permanent peace of the country to transfer this case to the proper tribunals, the duly constituted courts of the land.

Mr. SCRIVER. After the very able and exhaustive discussion which has taken place in the House upon this very important question, and feeling my own unfitness to deal with it from a constitutional or legal point of view, I should not have presumed to say one word upon the subject, but for one fact. I should have contented myself with giving a silent vote, but for the fact that the evening before last my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Colby) in the very admirable and eloquent speech he made to this House, gave utterance to some sentiments with which I could not altogether agree, and which I consider it my bounden duty, as one of the representatives of the minority, which he also has the honor to represent, to controvert or to attempt to controvert. That hon. gentleman, not without due reason, spoke for the Protestant minority of the Province of Quebec—I say not without due reason, considering the distinguished position which he occupies in this House, considering the fact that he has long and honorably represented the County of Stanstead, considering his high character for candor, for honesty, for integrity, for intelligence, and the opportunity he has had to acquaint himself, not only with the minds of his constituents upon public questions generally, but with the minds of the people in that part of the Province—I say considering these things, the hon. gentleman spoke with an assumed authority, and an authority which he had a right to assume. More than that, his words were clothed in such beautiful language, and the sentiments which he uttered were so admirable, that I have no doubt they carried weight with them in this House, as they would in the country at large. With some things with which the member for Stanstead said the night before last, I can cordially agree. I agree with him in his statement that the relations between the two elements of population in the Province of Quebec, have been very cordial and pleasant. They are so still, and I would fain wish them to continue so. I think, perhaps, he painted the picture in somewhat roseate hues; the entire cordiality of which he spoke may not prevail in all parts of the Province, but certainly in the constituency which I have the honor to represent, and I believe in the constituencies known as the Eastern Townships, this cordial and friendly state of feeling prevails. I have the honor to represent a constituency divided almost equally between Protestants and Catholics, and they do not live in separate communities, Protestants in one section and Catholics in another, but with the exception of the western part of the county, they are very largely intermingled and in close neighborhood, and they are able to live in the friendly and cordial relations of which my hon. friend so eloquently spoke. If I might be permitted to say one word of a personal character, I would refer to the fact that although I am known, I think, as a good Protestant, I have had the honor to represent that constituency without interruption almost since Confederation, and I have enjoyed the almost unique honor, during that time, of having been elected five times by acclamation, which fact, I think, is a good evidence that the Catholics in my constituency are not governed by sectarian prejudices. I would agree further with my hon. friend from Stanstead that upon the whole the Protestant minority in the Province of Quebec have no reason to complain of their rights being invaded by any legislation resulting from the action of the majority in that Province. During two years from 1867 to 1869 I had the honor of representing the county which I now represent, in the Legislature of the Province of Quebec. Certainly during that time nothing transpired, either in the character of legislation or in the utterances of the members of that body, of which the most rigid and sincere Protestant could complain. Since that time until at least very recently, the same state of affairs has continued. But I regret to say that during the last two years events have transpired in the Province, perhaps not so much actual legislation on the part of the governing body, but at all events there have been utterances by representative men in that Province, disquieting to Protestants, and a disposition, as Protestants think, to give to the clerical authority an influence and almost a direction in the legislation of that Province, which has led to an uneasy feeling on the part of the Protestants generally, and a feeling that if they had not already been exposed to some trespass on their rights, there was danger in the future of a violation of some of the principles which they hold dear. They think they have seen in the character of some of the legislation, of some of the proceedings of the leading men of the Province of Quebec, a disposition, as I said, to give to the clerical power an influence which could only lead to one result and that is a closer union between Church and State than has hitherto existed or ought to exist in a colony of the British Empire. This feeling, I may say, has been intensified by something which has transpired in my own county. Municipal government has been interfered with in the county in which I live, in a manner which gives not only offence to the Protestants residing in that county, but causes them to fear that their rights of municipal self-government are in danger of being seriously interfered with. Under the law of the Province of Quebec (at all events in the French speaking counties of the Province) a Roman Catholic bishop has the right to erect territory into a parish in contradistinction from townships, and in consequence of that action, municipal division follows. This right was never attempted to be exercised in English speaking Protestant counties until very recently. But not very long ago this power was exercised in the county which I represent. The parish of St. Anicet was a part, originally, of the township of Godmanchester; it was erected, by ecclesiastical authority, into a parish, and, following that, it was constituted a parish by the Legislature of the Province of Quebec. Until that time, at all events, this clerical authority that I speak of had not been exercised in the Townships with the result that followed, in that particular instance. But more recently a portion of this parish of St. Anicet was erected into a parish and the electors of that parish, called St. Barbe, proceeded upon the supposition that it had, by that Act, been constituted a separate municipal organisation. They elected their mayor. Their mayor was refused a seat in the county council of the Province. He appealed to the courts, and his right to sit in that council as the representative of this new constituency was sustained by the courts. This fact has given rise to a great deal of dissatisfaction and uneasiness among my constituents at all events. So far as I can learn, that power has not been exercised in the Eastern Township counties proper, but, in every instance where an ecclesiastical parish has been erected in a township an Act of the Legislature of Quebec has been secured to constitute it into a municipal parish. And then we cannot conceal from ourselves that, during the past two or three years, there have been utterances on the part of some of the public men in the Province of Quebec, which were not in the direction of supporting the rights of the minority, and which were of a character to lead them to feel a great deal of uneasiness; utterances of this kind have been made over and over again which have led the Protestants of these counties, at all events of my county (and I think the same is true, though not to so great an extent, perhaps, of the other townships and counties), to entertain feelings of uneasiness and disquiet. And following upon this has been the legislation which we have been considering during two or three days past. There is a general feeling, an almost universal feeling, on the part of the Protestants I represent, that this legislation is not only unwise, not only in some of its features exceedingly offensive to their feelings as Protestants, but that it is for several causes, which have been set forth by those who have discussed the question and which I need not therefore repeat, unconstitutional. It is true, as the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) said, that remonstrances against this legislation were not sent to the Legislature of Quebec at the time the Bill was under discussion. But it is to be remembered, that large bodies proverbially move slowly. The Bill was introduced rather suddenly and carried through the House very quickly, and there was hardly time for anything like united action. Indeed the people seemed not to have awakened to the character and possible results of the legislation until some time after it became law. But my hon. friend was mistaken in saying that no remonstrance against this legislation had been made to the authorities here or to the authorities of the Province of Quebec.

Mr. COLBY. I did not say that; I think I did not intend to say that. My statement was simply this, and if you will allow me I will take this opportunity to interject a remark. The resolution which was read by the hon. gentleman just now from the Ministerial Association of Montreal put into my mouth words I never said, and passes strictures upon some sayings which they suppose I uttered. I made no statement with respect to representations being made or not being made to any Legislature at any time except during the pendency of the discussion of this Settlement Act in the Province of Quebec. I did not state, as they said I stated, that no representations were made against the Jesuits' Incorporation Bill. I did not state as those Ministers say I stated, that no representations had been made to this House in favor of disallowance. I simply did state that no representations that I was aware of, that no petitions and no representations had gone to the Legislature against the particular act of legislation which we are now here considering.

Mr. SCRIVER. I think in that statement the hon. gentleman was perfectly correct. So far as I know, no petitions or remonstrances were sent to the Legislature of Quebec when the Act was under discussion. The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), alluded as a proof of the disposition of the Protestant minority to accept this legislation, which he himself has characterised as a very bitter pill for them to swallow, and with that statement I fully agree, and I am afraid the bitterness will stay there for some time—that there was no general disposition on the part of the Protestant minority of the Province of Quebec not to accept this legislation, as at all events something not to be prevented or helped, to the fact that no vote was taken in the Legislature when the Bill was under discussion, that not a voice was raised against it, except the voices of two members of the House who spoke briefly on the question from the constitutional and legal point. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not consider it my place to criticise the conduct of those members of the Legislature of the Province of Quebec representing the same class of people as I represent with respect to that Bill or any other Bill, and whatever their motives were and whatever their views were, it is not my place here to pronounce any opinion with respect to them further than to say this: that I think they would have much better expressed the sentiments of the people who sent them there as their representatives if they had at all events raised their voices in remonstrance against the passage of such a law. But I do not propose to prolong my remarks on this occasion. I rose mainly, as I said at the outset, because I thought it my duty to state what is the fact, in opposition to what might have been inferred from the statement of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), that there is not a disposition on the part of the Protestants of the Province of Quebec generally—I think I may say that much—to accept this legislation as satisfactory or as a finality. I think there is a general disposition to consider it not only unwise but wrong, as in some sense an invasion of their rights, and as fraught with danger to their position as a minority in the Province. But I am quite sure of one thing, that they will not agitate the question of disallowing or nullifying this law in any other way than in a strictly constitutional manner, and if it does become a finality by reason of the failure of the Federal Government to disallow the Act, or by a decision of the highest legal tribunals of the land, should they be appealed to, as I trust they will be, to test its constitutionality, I say I have no doubt they will as good, loyal, peaceful subjects accept the law, and make the best of the situation. I would have preferred, had I had my choice in the matter, that the motion of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) had been couched in somewhat different language: indeed, I would have preferred that such a motion as he has made should not have been made at all. I would have greatly preferred that the motion should have assumed the character of advising this House, or moving that this House should express the opinion that the question should be submitted to the proper legal tribunal to decide as to its constitutionality or otherwise. I should have preferred voting for such a motion to voting for the motion which the hon gentleman has submitted, not that I do not agree mainly with its provisions, but because I think it was inexpedient, and that it cannot possibly result in anything practical, fated, as I believe it to be, to defeat in this House by a large majority. But holding the view which I do with regard to the legislation aimed at by the motion, I cannot see it to be anything else than my duty to vote for the resolution of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien).

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is not my intention to detain the House longer than a few moments with an explanation of the vote which I intend to give on this question. With the member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) I regret the manner in which this question has been brought before the House, and I would much rather that it had come in the shape in which that member has stated he would like to have seen it brought up. While I may say that I do not agree with portions of the resolution, I do not believe that differing from some of the recitals in it, is any reason why I should not vote for the main portion. I also regret the manner in which it has been brought before the House, because I cannot see that possibly any good effect or result can come of it, and if the suggestion made by the member for Huntingdon had been the substance of this resolution or if the subject had been treated in the manner he indicated, I think that the unfortunate turn of religious discussion which has apparently been brought around in this House and in the country by this question being brought up as it is at the present moment, would have been avoided. Now, Sir, I do not intend as I said to discuss this question at any length. We have heard the ablest legal minds in the House speak as to the constitutionality of the Act, and we all must see from the different opinions laid before the House by those able legal gentlemen that there is room for a layman to doubt whether or not this is a constitutional Act on the part of the Quebec Legislature. While I agree personally with the substance of most of the remarks made by the Minister of Justice, with regard to the treatment of Acts passed by the Provincial Legislatures, in the able speech that he delivered to this House last evening, there is one very material point to my mind, on which I do not agree with him and that is with reference to that portion of this Act appropriating the money, as he says, for educational purposes. That portion of his statement and argument I do not agree with. It does appear to my mind, from reading the Act and from the explanations that have been given, that this money has been given to a religious body and it is not stated in the Act to be for educational purposes. Then, as I understand it, the main portion of the resolution brought before the House is announcing the principle of religious equality and the complete separation of Church and State. That is a principle that I feel is necessary to be carried out to the fullest extent in this country for the material welfare and best interests of the people. Settled as it is by people of all nationalities and religious denominations of all kinds, I think it is very desirable that this principle should be carefully adhered to. As I cannot agree with the Minister of Justice in his statement with regard to that, I certainly feel called upon to vote for the motion now before the House. I regret, as I say, the religious aspect that this discussion has taken. I feel that it is unfortunate because throughout this country, for many years at least, we have had very little experience of religious cries or differences. In the section of the country in which I live, the Roman Catholics, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, and members of all religious denominations, live together in the greatest harmony. I do not see why this aspect of the question should be introduced here. It would make no difference to me, if this grant of money had been to an Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Methodist or Baptist body, I would feel compelled to take the same position on it if it was brought before the House. It is not because the money is granted by the Local Government to the Catholic Church that I object, but it is against the principle of granting money for any sectarian purposes that I wish to protest. That is the chief and almost the only reason why I cannot support the Government, but have to support the resolution of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien).

Mr. McMULLEN. It was not my intention to address the House, but I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion so far as it has gone, and I may say that I fully endorse the remarks of the hon. member from North York (Mr. Mulock). I regret exceedingly that the discussion has partaken of a character which is likely to cause very serious division between two great classes in this Dominion. Had the motion of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) been one that did not embody objectionable features from a Reform standpoint, I would have much preferred it. In the shape it is in now it is undoubtedly objectionable to those who sit upon this side of the House. As far as I am personally concerned I am just as strongly opposed to some of the doctrinal views of the Jesuit Order as any man that sits within this Chamber. I have no sympathy for them owing to their traditional record, which I believe is not very good. At the same time, Mr. Speaker, we live under a written constitution in this Dominion, and while I have sat and listened with a good deal of attention to the arguments that have been presented on both sides, I have failed to see that it has been clearly proved to the satisfaction of my mind that the Bill which we have under consideration is unconstitutional. Of course I am not a lawyer, I am but a layman; but when I consider that I have on one side the hon. the First Minister who, I have reason to believe, says that this Act is constitutional, that we have the Minister of Justice who declares that it is constitutional, and that we have also other legal gentlemen supporting the Government who have declared that it is constitutional;—I come to my own side of the House, and I find that I have the hon. the leader of the Opposition who, I believe, says that the Bill is a constitutional Bill, and within the power of the Province of Quebec to pass, I also have the ex-leader of the Reform Party who says he believes it is a constitutional Bill (I believe he is of that opinion), and I think I am correct in saying that the hon. the leader of the former Government, the member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), is prepared to say it is a constitutional Bill. I also have the statement of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) who declares that the Bill is a constitutional Bill and within the powers of the Provincial Government to pass; I have the opinion of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) a man of extended experience and a cultured legal mind who says the Bill is constitutional, and I think that I am also correct in stating that the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) considers it a constitutional Bill. I find all these legal gentlemen who have seats in this House, some of the best legal minds this Dominion contains, saying on the one hand that this is a constitutional Bill, within the powers of the Legislature of Quebec, and, on the other hand, I find the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) saying that it is not a constitutional Bill. But when I look over the legal history of that hon. gentleman I find that in almost every case in which he has argued upon constitutional principles he has failed, and I am bound to accept the opinions of the men who say that it is within the powers of the Legislature of Quebec to pass that Act. Now, as I said, I have no sympathy with the Jesuits, but at the same time, if the Legislature of Quebec has the right and the power to pass that Bill, I claim to be a loyal British subject, I claim to live under the written constitution that we have got, which permits the passage of an Act by the Local Legislature, even if it is an objectionable Act. I am perfectly willing to agitate for a revision of our Constitution, so that it would not permit the passage of Acts of that kind, but that is the only constitutional way to go to work. With regard to the effects of disallowance I agree heartily with the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). I can easily see that if the Government were forced to reconsider their Order in Council allowing the Bill we would not then reach the end of the trouble. The probabilities are that the Legislature of Quebec, if they are acting within their constitutional rights, would re-enact the Bill next year. Are we to have all this agitation again next year? Are we to meet and have the important time of this House spent in discussing whether the next Bill is within the power of the Quebec Legislature, or whether we should disallow it or not? I think it is better, under the circumstances, that we should settle this question as quickly as possible, and I believe the best and the constitutional way of settling it is to relegate the whole question to the courts, and let them decide whether the Act is constitutional or not. Some say there may be a difficulty in getting it before the courts I can see no difficulty whatever in doing so. I understand that the Mail newspaper of Toronto has had an action brought against it by the Jesuit Order for certain statements which it has made with regard to that order. The Mail newspaper, if it chooses, can carry that action to the Privy Council in England; it can force the Jesuit Order there and test the whole question in that very action. I must say I sympathise a great deal with its course myself; I am just as strong an advocate of religious liberty as any other member in this House; and if it is found that the Act is unconstitutional, that is an end of the whole difficulty. If the hon. member for North Simcoe, who is a man of extended legal knowledge, will show me that we can reach the object of our ambition in disallowing this Bill by the course he proposes to take in this House, I would not hesitate a moment to support him; but I cannot see that we can reach that point, because disallowance now means re-enacting in the Province of Quebec, which would bring disallowance again, and where would that stop? Are we to go on with this, like the Streams Bill, which was enacted and disallowed, enacted and disallowed, enacted and disallowed, three times. The result was that it had to go to the Supreme Court before it was settled after all. This is a question which would cause a tremendous amount of trouble in this country if it were carried on in that way. I must say, although I have no confidence in the Government—I say, in the interest of the country, not in the interest of the Government at all—the best course is to send this Bill where it will receive judicious handling at the hands of the Privy Council, which will settle the whole question at once, and relieve this House year after year from the discussion of a question, which is certainly a very awkward one for the House to deal with, and which we should not be called on to deal with. We make laws in this House; we do not administer them. This law has been made in the Province of Quebec; and if it is within the constitutional rights of that Province, much as we may deplore its results and its peculiar characteristics, it is not for us to say that the Province shall not have it. If it improperly imports the name of the Pope into this provincial enactment, or if anything else in it makes it unconstitutional, the courts will decide, and will rid the House of the question, and settle all the difficulty in the country. Under these circumstances, I shall not vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Muskoka unless before this debate is closed I can be convinced that by passing that motion we will be settling the whole difficulty. If I cannot be convinced of that, I cannot take the responsibility of what I see will inevitably follow, a condition of things such as has been pointed out by the hon. member for North York, and also by myself.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, it is not often that we on this side of the House can have the privilege of supporting the policy of the Government. In this instance, when the action of the Government is assailed by a number of their supporters, when their action has already caused an agitation which unfortunately is not unmixed with religious bitterness, not one word certainly will fall from my lips which would tend to fan those religious flames; and I may say at once, repeating what was said this afternoon by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), in the admirable speech he delivered, that the course of the Government receives, with a few exceptions which I respect, the entire support of the Liberal party. No other course, Mr. Speaker, than the course which we intend to take on this side of the House, would be consistent with the policy which we have been advocating for the last fifteen or twenty years—nay, ever since Confederation has been in existence. And, Sir, I hasten at once to congratulate the Government upon the fact that at last they have come to the true policy which they have often fought against, that the only basis upon which we can successfully carry on this Confederation is to recognise the principle of provincial rights. And I cannot but say also that if the Government to-day have to face this trouble in their own camp, if they have to meet this agitation which is now going on in the Province of Ontario, and of which the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said yesterday, we have not seen the last, it is due altogether to the vicious policy which has been followed by the Administration, and before the consequences of which they have at last to recede; it is due altogether to the manner in which they have governed this country, and to the means they have used to obtain a majority to support them. Sir, this is not a party question; it is at most a family quarrel; it is simply a domestic disturbance in the ranks of the Conservative party. A section of the Conservative party now require the Government to stand up or to stand down, whichever it may be, to the exigencies of the doctrine of disallowance, such as the Government has taught it, and such as the Government more than once called upon them to act upon. Well, there must always be a day of retribution, and that day I think is coming for the Government. The two chief Provinces of which this Confederation is composed are vastly dissimilar. One is French in origin; the other British. One is Catholic in religion; the other is Protestant. And in each are to be found the prejudices peculiar to the creed and race of each I say prejudices, and I use the word advisedly, nor do I use it in any contemptuous sense, for everybody must recognise the fact that wherever you find strong convictions, you generally find an exaggeration of feeling very apt to carry men beyond the legitimate consequence of their convictions. Now, ever since the year 1854, I charge against the Government and against the Conservative party that they have been able to retain power, almost without interruption, largely by pandering to the prejudices of the one Province and the prejudices of the other Province. In the good Catholic Province of Quebec, to which I belong, the party supporting the Administration have always represented themselves as the champions of the Roman Catholic cause. They have always denounced their opponents, the Liberals of French origin like myself, as men of dangerous doctrine and tendencies. They have always represented the Liberals of Ontario as men actuated in all their actions and inspirations by a hatred of everything French and Catholic. At the same time, in the good Protestant Province of Ontario, the same party has always been held up to the front as the party of unbending and uncompromising Protestantism, and the Conservative press to-day, represent hon. gentlemen on this side as basely pandering to the influence of the French people and of the Catholic persuasion. Now this game has been for a long time successful, but, perhaps, before going further, I may recall this fact, known by all those who are now listening to me, that the attitude of the Conservative party of Ontario has always been just what I represent it to be. It may not be so well known that, at the same time, the Liberals of Ontario are charged by the Conservatives of the Province of Quebec, not with pandering to the Catholic influence but with being hostile to Catholic influence—and so the charges work both ways. In one Province the Liberals are charged with one offence, and in the other with another. I could quote columns upon columns of the press which supports the right hon. gentleman to prove what I say, but I shall limit myself to one short paragraph. The school question in Ontario is a burning question. The hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill) yesterday spoke almost of nothing else. A few days ago there was in the Legislature of Ontario a debate upon this very question. The Government of Mr. Mowat were charged by the Conservative party with unduly favoring the teaching of the French language in the schools of Ontario. The debate was commented upon in the Province of Quebec, La Minerve, one of the papers which support the Administration, an organ of the Conservative party, referred as follows to this very debate:—

"The motion of the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) was followed by a most brilliant reply strongly conceived, broad in view and conclusive from the Hon. G. W. Ross, Minister of Public Instruction. Mr. Ross is a Grit of the clearest water, but we are too much accustomed to the gallophobic denunciation of that party and to the intemperance of their language, when the Province of Quebec is in question, not to rejoice at anything which remotely or approximately can look like a conversion."

You see the gist of this statement. It was charged that the language of Mr. Ross was an exception, whereas the charge made by the Conservative party in Ontario against the Administration for which Mr. Ross spoke, was the very thing which is given him here as an exception. So it has always been. The party has always had two faces—a rigid Protestant face turning towards the west, and a devout Catholic face turning towards the east. In the Province of Ontario, the rallying cry of the party has always been: "Protestants, beware! these Grits are weak Protestants!"

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, never.

Mr. LAURIER. Among the Protestants of Quebec, their cry has always been: "Catholics, beware! the Liberals are weak and bad Catholics!" This game has been successful for a long time, but it cannot always be successful, and I say the day of retribution is now coming. I say that this motion which we now have is in many senses much to be deprecated, and I endorse every word which fell the other day from the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). It seems to me that all he said then were words of wisdom, but at the same time I cannot resist the conviction that the Government of to-day are only reaping what they have been sowing. They have allowed a large class of the Protestant population of Ontario to look upon them as the champions of Protestantism. They have affirmed the doctrine of disallowance among that section of the party and now that section cries out: We have always looked upon you as the champions of Protestantism; here is legislation which we deem offensive to the Protestant interests and to the interests of the country at large, and we call upon you to exercise those powers of disallowance which you have so often exercised in the past. Well, as far as the Liberal party is concerned, their attitude upon this question was known before it was explained in this debate. The Liberal party always endeavors to meet those questions, not from the point of view of Catholicism or Protestantism, but from a point of view that could include all different religious interests. Among the many questions which divided the two parties, there is no one upon which the policy of the two parties has been so clearly cut as upon this. The Conservative party, led by the right hon. gentleman, have always held the doctrine that they have the right to review the legislation of any Local Legislature. We, on the other hand, have always pretended that the only way to carry out this Confederation is to admit the principle that within its sphere, within the sphere allotted to it by the Constitution, each Province is quite as independent of the control of the Dominion Parliament, as the Dominion Parliament is independent of the control of the Local Legislatures. On the contrary, the hon. gentleman has maintained again and again upon the floor of this House and by administrative acts that he claimed the power to review local legislation, to see whether it was right or wrong, and, if he found it clashing with his ideas of right, to set it aside. We all remember the famous Streams Bill. What was the language used on that occasion by the hon. gentleman? He claimed that it was a question of purely provincial character, that it was one which was clearly within the competence of the Legislature of Ontario, and yet the hon. gentleman took it upon himself to disallow it, and for what reason? For no other reason than that the Act clashed with his own opinions of what was right and what was wrong. He spoke as follows in regard to it:—

"But here, where we are one country and all together, and we go from one Province to another as we do from one county to another and from one town to another, is it to be borne that laws which bind civilised society together, which distinguish civilisation from barbarism, which protect life, reputation and property, should be dissimilar; that what should be a merit in one Province should be a crime in another, and that different laws should prevail."

Upon that occasion the hon. gentleman took upon himself to review the law of the Province, and, finding it was not consistent with what he believed to be right, he disallowed it. It shocked the tenderness of the right hon. gentleman's conscience that the Legislature of Ontario provided that Mr. Caldwell could not pass his logs through Mr. McLaren's improvements without paying toll, though the Privy Council afterwards decided that, without the law, Mr. Caldwell could have used those improvements without paying any tolls at all. The hon. gentleman now comes to the doctrine which has been very many times advocated on this side of the House, that he has not to consider whether this provincial legislation is good, bad or indifferent; it is altogether within the competence of the Local Legislature of Quebec, and therefore, says he, let it pass. Let us read the report of the Minister of Justice of the day on the Streams Bill and compare it with the report of the Minister of Justice upon the present occasion. The Minister of Justice then said:

"I think the power of the Local Legislature to take away the rights of one man and vest them in another, as is done by this Act, is exceedingly doubtful, but, assuming that such right does, in strictness, exist, I think it devolves upon this Government to see that such power is not exercised, in flagrant violation of private rights and natural justice, especially when, as in this case, in addition to interfering with private rights in the way alluded to, the Act overrides a decision of a court of competent jurisdiction, by declaring retrospectively that the law always was, and is, different from that laid down by the court."

Now, let us look at the report of the Minister of Justice in this present case. It is extremely short and sweet. The Minister of Justice simply says, referring to some petitions asking for disallowance:

"Before the petitions in question came before him for his consideration the undersigned had already recommended to Your Excellency, that the Act in question should be left to its operation. The memorials referred to have not convinced the undersigned that that recommendation should be changed. The subject-matter of the Act is one of provincial concern only, having relation to a fiscal matter entirely within the control of the Legislature of Quebec."

Well, Mr. Speaker, this is sound Liberal doctrine. This is the very doctrine which has been always maintained and supported on this side of the House, and once more I beg to tender my thanks and my congratulations to the hon. gentleman on having at last come to the true and only basis upon which this constitution of ours can be satisfactorily maintained and supported. It takes a long time, however, for a true principle to penetrate the perverted minds, as I might say, of the hon. gentlemen opposite. No' I beg their pardon, it does not always take so long a time; sometimes the operation is as fast as at others it is slow. Only three weeks ago, we tendered advice to the Administration as to the manner in which they should treat our friends to the South in reference to the modus vivendi. Our advice was treated with contempt, and it was stated by hon. gentlemen opposite that the proposal would be received with scorn by the people of this country; and yet, within three weeks, they have changed their minds and accepted the policy which we suggested. I can only say that, as long as the Administration continue to act in that way, first to reject the policy of the Opposition and then to steal our clothes and dress themselves in them, the country will not be the loser. I had hesitated, before I resolved to speak on his question, whether I should confine myself to this statement and then sit down, but I cannot ignore, no one who has at heart the interests of this country, the peace and harmony of this country, can ignore the agitation which is now going on in the Province of Ontario. Coming as I do, from the Province of Quebec, being a member of the Catholic persuasion and a supporter of the Government which passed this legislation, I cannot but view with deep concern the attempt which is now being made to arouse our Protestant fellow-citizens in the Province of Ontario against that legislation. Let me say this, which must be obvious to every hon. member, that, if we approach this question, or any question, from the point of view of the religious opinions which any of us profess, we are apt to stand upon very narrow, very unsafe, and very dangerous ground. I say dangerous ground because it is a matter of history, that it is always in the sacred name of religion that the most savage passions of mankind have been excited and some of the most shocking crimes have been committed. In this matter, I cannot forget the fact, as I have stated, that an attempt has been made to arouse the feelings of the Province of Ontario, but I hope that that attempt will not carry, and that a better sentiment will prevail; I hope that the temperate language of reason which we have heard to-day will be understood, and, though this legislation may be objectionable to some people, yet that everyone will understand that in these subjects we must make allowance for the feelings of others. What is the cause of the agitation which is now going on? What is the cause of this legislation which has been the source of so much turmoil? Sir, it is simply this: It is a matter of regret that the European nations, France and England, when they came to this continent brought with them not only their laws and institutions, not only their civilisation, but brought also their hatreds. At this moment, and for more than seventy years past, France and England have been at peace, and it was given to our generation to witness a spectacle which would have seemed almost improbable, not to say impossible, a few years before. We have seen France and England arrayed together against a common foe; and to us British subjects of French origin, British subjects who have learned to love England, who appreciate her benevolent rule, who would not go back to the allegiance of France, but who still ever cherish in our hearts the love of the land of our ancestors, no spectacle could be more consoling than to see the banners of France and England waving together on the banks of the Alma, on the heights of Inkermann and amid the ashes of Sebastopool. Such is the case to day. Such was not the case, however, at the time of the discovery of America, at the time of the establishment of English and French posts upon this continent. On the contrary, at that time French and English had been arrayed for generations and centuries in deadly feuds. They brought over these feuds with them, they brought over with them the enmity which had divided them in Europe, and here on this continent they sought each other across lakes and rivers, mountains and forests, and endeavored to inflict upon each other all the injury they possibly could. They had before them the boundless space of this virgin continent, but they entered into a deadly war for the possession of the miserable huts which constituted their first establishments. Well, the long duel, as we know, was settled on the Plains of Abraham. The war, however, was carried on for a year longer by the Chevalier de Lévis, and this continuation of the war had no material effect except to extract from the victor most generous terms of capitulation. These terms have been referred to, I need not refer to them again. The religious communities were granted all their possessions as freely as if they had remained under the domain of the French King. It was stated by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) when he opened this debate, that the Terms of Capitulation had been modified by the Treaty of Paris. For my part I am not able to see the difference, but if difference there be, I am quite willing to admit the interpretation of it which was given by the British Government itself. Respecting the treatment by the British Government of those communities which were promised special immunity, I can see no difference between their position under the French régime and their condition under the English régime. The British Government treated those communities and the whole population, for that matter, in religious concerns with the greatest generosity. All the religious communities, with the single exception of the Jesuits, were maintained in possession of their estates. There was an exception made of the Jesuits. What was the cause of it? Was it by the right of Conquest as asserted by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy)?

Mr. McCARTHY. Will the hon. gentleman excuse me. I did not make that assertion. It was by the introduction of the law at the Conquest, not by virtue of the Conquest at all —the introduction of the English law whereby the estates became forfeited to the Crown.

Mr. LAURIER. So be it; I accept the correction. I do not intend to discuss the legal aspects of this question, because, in my judgment, the legal aspect does not come in here. But even if, as stated by the hon. gentleman, the British Government took possession of these estates by virtue of the introduction of the English law into this country, still that might have applied as well to the other communities as to the Jesuit estates. Why was that exception made? Why were these other religious communities maintained in possession of their estates, and the Jesuits excepted? I think that the Minister of Justice yesterday gave the real key of the difficulty when he stated that it was the covetousness of Lord Amherst, who, in 1770, obtained from the King an actual promise of the grant of these estates. Had it not been afterwards for the abolition of the order by the Pope, I firmly believe the Jesuits would have continued in the enjoyment of their estates in the same manner as the other religious communities. But the order was abolished, and after the last Jesuit had departed this life, the British Government took possession of the estates. Then, as we know, the heirs of Lord Amherst claimed these estates in virtue of the promise which had been made in 1770 by the King. But the protests were so strong, not only from the old inhabitants but from the new inhabitants as well, not only from the old subjects of the King, but from the new subjects of the King, that the Government could not carry out its intentions of making a grant of these estates to the heirs of Lord Amherst. On the other hand, though the Government had taken possession of these estates, and though they were promised to General Amherst, the Government could not put them into the general fund, and they erected into a special fund. But there is this to be remembered, whether the laws of England were introduced into the colony or not, whether the old laws continued to be in force or not, the old French laws continued to prevail in the country just as before. And there is this also to be remembered, that under the laws of Quebec as they existed under the French régime, property of the nature of the Jesuits estates, when the order had been abolished, would have reverted to the Ordinary of the Diocese, property of that kind would have gone to the Bishop of Quebec or to the Bishop of Montreal. Such was the contention of the church at that time, and from that day up to this, the ecclesiastical authorities of the Province of Quebec have never ceased to claim that property as rightly belonging to them. There has been a continuation of the protests from that moment to the present. Protests were made in these dates:

"1. 4th February, 1793, by the citizens of Quebec. 2. 18th November, 1799, by His Grace Jean François Hubert, Bishop of Quebec. 3. About the year 1835, by His Grace Joseph Signaï (?), Bishop of Quebec; His Grace Pierre Flavien Turgeon, Bishop of Sydimo, Coadjutor of Quebec; His Grace Jean Jacques Lartigue, Bishop Telmasse, Grand Vicar of the district of Montreal. 4. January, 1845, by His Grace Joseph Signaï (?), Archbishop of Quebec, and by the Bishops of Montreal, Kingston and Toronto. 5. June, 1847, by the clergy of the dioceses of Montreal and Quebec. 6. January, 1874, by the Rev. Father Théophile Chavaux, Superior General of the Jesuits' Mission in Canada. 7. 9th October, 1878, by the Archbishop of Quebec and Bishops of Three Rivers, Rimouski, Montreal, Sherbrooke, Ottawa, St. Hyacinth and Chicoutimi. 8. 2nd January, 1885, by the Archbishop of Quebec."

So you see that from the moment the British Government took possession of these estates, the church authorities of the Province of Quebec never ceased to claim them as their own. Now, could that matter have remained in that condition? Could it be said in a Catholic country like the Province of Quebec, that such protests would remain unheeded? Time and again, as you are aware, the Government of Quebec attempted to dispose of these estates and to settle the question. Mr. Mercier is not the first man in office who attempted to deal with this question. Time and again his predecessors attempted to do the same thing. There was a reason for that. Those estates are valued to-day by Mr. Rivard, superintendent of the estates, at the sum of $1,200,000. They yield a revenue of only $22,000, less than 2 per cent. Some of the property is without any annual value. Take for instance, the old college of the Jesuits in Quebec, right in the centre of the city, opposite the Basilica. That property to-day does not give one cent of revenue, on the contrary it is a burden upon the Exchequer of the Province, whereas, were the property disposed of it would sell to advantage. Time and time again, the Government of Quebec have attempted to dispose of it, but every time the Government placed it in the market, the religious authorities came forward and claimed the property as their own, and rendered the attempts at sale abortive. Was that forever to remain thus? The question was opened more than once. Mr. DeBoucherville, in 1876, endeavored to enter into negotiations to settle the case with the religious authorities of the Province. He did not succeed. It has been asserted many times in the press, though the fact has never been stated officially, that Mr. Chapleau, when in office, entered into negotiations with the religious authorities, and went so far as to offer $500,000 for the removal of the claims of the religious authorities on these estates. Of this I do not know the exact truth. I can only speak from the rumors published in the press. But it is quite certain that Mr. Ross, who succeeded him as Premier a few years afterwards, entered into negotiations for the settlement of the estates. Nothing came of the negotiations, and why? Because it required some courage to deal with the question and to settle it, because it was certain that whoever dealt with it, would have to face much prejudice, as these events have proved. Mr. Mercier had the courage to grapple with this question and to settle it, and if nothing else in the career of Mr. Mercier remained to stamp him as a statesman, there would be this, that he had the courage to deal with this question, and this would give him that title. The question,

I think, had to be settled. In what manner was it settled? It was settled just in the manner which was most fair to all: it was settled by compromise. Mr. Mercier in effect said to the religious authorities: I hold these estates as the representative of the Crown; the right belongs to the Province of Quebec; our title to them is legal; I do not admit that you have a legal title to them, while on the other hand you pretend you have a legal title. Be that as it may, he said, let us make a sacrifice each of our pretensions; I hold the property and the whole of the estates, and you claim the whole of them; let us compromise, and let us settle the question forever. Now, I ask every man in this House, no matter what his prejudice may be, I ask the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) himself, in whose fairness I have the greatest confidence, was there ever a more fair method adopted of disposing of a public question than that which was adopted in this case? Of course, it is quite easy for the editor in his easy chair, it is quite easy for the publisher in his office, it is quite easy for the clergyman in his study to settle questions according to fixed theories; but the public man in office or in Opposition cannot settle a question according to fixed theories, but he has to consult the wishes, not only the wishes, aye, but the passions and the prejudices of the people with whom he has to deal. And, in a country like the Province of Quebec where there are more than 1,000,000 of Catholic inhabitants, with a regularly constituted hierarchy, with such a claim as the Catholic ecclesiastical authorities could present, was it to be said that this question should ever remain open and these lands never be disposed of for the advantage of the exchequer of the Province? It seems to me that upon that question I can appeal again with confidence to the testimony of all those who will approach the question with an unbiassed mind. After all, Mr. Speaker, there is but one way which has been invented yet to govern men satisfactorily, and it is to govern them according to the wishes which are expressed by public opinion. I do not mean to say that public opinion is always right, that public opinion always comes up to the standard of eternal justice or truth; I do not mean to say that public opinion always comes up to the standard of wordly wisdom, but if you govern the people according to public opinion you are sure to have peace and harmony in the land and when this question was settled it was settled according to the wishes of public opinion in the Province of Quebec and by so doing you have peace and harmony in the land. Now, if you are to attempt to override the well known wishes of the population of the Province of Quebec, instead of harmony and peace, you will have probably discord, the consequences of which I would fear to look at. Such is the reason why this question has been settled in the manner in which it has been settled. But it has been insisted by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and by some other hon. members also that this legislation was offensive from a Protestant point of view. Well, strange to say, the Protestant minority is represented in the Legislature of the Province of Quebec. They have, if I remember rightly, some 12 members of the Protestant persuasion in the Provincial Legislature. When this question came to be discussed two members only protested, and they protested very mildly. And they protested against what? Only against one single feature of the Act, against the fact that the name of His Holiness the Pope appeared in the preamble of the Act. Mr. Mercier gave them at that moment the very answer quoted yesterday by the Minister of Justice, and he told them: If you do not want the name of the Pope in this matter, will you suggest the name of any one to put in his place. It was a compromise with the religious authorities of the Province of Quebec, and I think Mr. Mercier acted fairly and prudently in dealing direct with the head of the Roman Catholic church. His arguments were so convincing that those objections were not pressed, the Act passed unanimously, and Mr. Mercier was enabled to speak in the following terms of the attitude of his Protestant colleagues:—

"I thank the Protestant members for the moderation with which they have discussed this question. It is a good omen. The unanimity which now prevails is a proof that the different races of which our population is composed, has lived in peace and harmony and approaches the most delicate question with that spirit of conciliation which accomplished wonders when it is properly directed."

Well, this legislation is not satisfactory to our Protestant friends, or to some of them at least from Ontario. Still if the Protestants of Quebec are satisfied, who can object? I understood that it was said a moment ago by the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver), that the Protestants of Quebec are not all satisfied. They may not all be satisfied indeed. It is very seldom that upon any question that may come up men of the same creed of the same race, will be entirely satisfied; but if anybody has a right to speak for the Protestant minority of the Province of Quebec, are they not those who are elected by the people of that Province to represent them in the Legislature, and if these do not choose to make any representation, if those on the contrary say that after all this question has been settled and approved, no one else has the right to complain. But the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), it appears has no confidence in those who represent his fellow countrymen in the Province of Quebec. If I am to believe what he said yesterday, he has but a poor opinion of those who have been entrusted by his fellow religionists in the Province to take charge of their interests in the Legislature. These were his words yesterday:

"Does this look as if the Protestants of the Province of Quebec were desirous, and willing, and anxious that this legislation should remain unchanged, or does it not look as if, if the Protestant minority in that Province were given reasonable encouragement, they would get justice—and no more than justice are they entitled to, and no more than justice I hope they will ever ask for—from the Parliament of this country. Then they will be up and doing, to get their share of this legislation, but in the Legislature of that Province, composed as it is now, they cannot expect it. There was no Protestant representative in the Cabinet of that Province until recently, and, when one was chosen, he had to be elected in spite of the vote of the Protestant minority."

Now, without going any further, I wish to take issue upon this point with the hon. gentleman from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), when he says here that Col. Rhodes was not elected in Megantic by the Protestant minority. The County of Megantic is a mixed county. Col. Rhodes, the Minister of Agriculture, was elected two or three months after this Act had been passed, and it was an issue upon which the electors had to pass. Col. Rhodes polled the majority of the French and Catholic votes, but I say that Col. Rhodes also polled the majority of the Protestant votes. As to this I do not give my own testimony. I have not yet had an occasion to look at the figures. But I give the testimony of Col. Rhodes himself, who, on the day of the election, telegraphed that he had been upheld by the majority of the Protestant electors of the County of Megantic. Then the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) goes on to say:

"I can understand that, if there were a fighting man in that House like the hon. member who leads the third party here, there might be a chance of obtaining something like justice, but men with that skill and ability, with parliamentary knowledge to back it, are not to be found every day, and we are not to judge the Protestant representatives of the Province of Quebec on that high standard."

And why not, Mr. Speaker, "of that high standard?" Can it be that the Protestants of the Province of Quebec, who have placed themselves at the head of the trade of the country, still are so backward in this respect that they cannot send to the Legislature a man of standing to represent them? Can it be that the Protestants of the Province of Quebec have to be taken under the fostering care of my hon. friend from Simcoe? Can it be that they cannot manage their own affairs? Can it be that they cannot look after their own interests? I have more confidence than my hon. friend in the ability of the Protestant representatives in the Province of Quebec, because I happen to know them personally, and I know they are men of merit, men of ability, and some of the greatest ability. But, Mr. Speaker, if that is the opinion which the hon. gentleman entertains of his own countrymen and co-religionists in the Province of Quebec; if he believes that they are not able to take care of their own interests, but that the Protestants of other Provinces must come to their rescue, perhaps he would be interested to know what is the opinion which is entertained by some of the Protestants of Quebec of those too zealous Protestants of the Province of Ontario who want to take up the cudgels on their behalf. I hold in my hand an extract from a paper published in the Eastern Townships, the Waterloo Advertiser, edited by a disciple and a life-long friend of the late Mr. Huntington, as good and as strong a Protestant as ever lived. This is how the paper speaks:

"Every patriotic Canadian must deplore the intemperate discussion that has been provoked by the Jesuits' Bill The measure has become law, and no amount of controversy can alter the fact It is altogether the domestic concern of the Province of Quebec, and any outside interference is simply meddlesome and impertinent. The parsons and the Orangemen of Ontario have joined hands to make war on the Catholics of Quebec. The Legislature has settled the old dispute over the Jesuits' estates in a manner satisfactory to the people. A source of irritation and discontent has been removed once for all. The Jesuits' Bill passed the Legislature, practically, without a dissenting voice. The chosen representatives of the Protestant minority accepted it as a fair settlement of a vexed question. The basis of settlement called for an expenditure of public funds, and to obviate any possibility of jealousy on the part of the Protestant minority a proportionate sum was at the same time voted for Protestant education. That was fair and just and it was so understood by the minority. The Protestant minority in this Province is quite able to take care of itself. In the purely domestic concerns of the Province it asks no assistance and expects no sympathy from outsiders. Taking it all in all, the minority has been fairly treated by the majority. There may have been friction at times, but there has not been in the history of the Province an instance in which the powers of the majority have been used to crush or injure the minority. If the Catholics and Protestants are able to get along together peaceably, why should Ontario interfere? The Protestant minority as a whole has not and does not complain of the Jesuits settlement. It is recognised by broad-minded and patriotic men as being the best thing that could have been done under the circumstances." * * *

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the opinion entertained in the Eastern Townships at least by one section of the people. Now, my hon. friend from Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) a moment ago referred to the treatment of the minority in the Province of Quebec. I have the greatest respect as my friend knows for everything which he utters, and I am sure he will agree with me in one thing—if the Protestant minority in the Province of Quebec have anything to complain of—and I listened to what might be called the list of grievances which we heard read to-day by the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), but if the Protestant minority have anything to complain of, I ask: Are they not themselves responsible for it? In all that list of grievances which were read is there an act of legislation against which they have ever protested? Have they not always supported the Conservative party which has always been in power, and has not every one of these items in the list which we have heard recited as a grievance, been passed by the Conservative party which the Protestants of Quebec always supported. Sir, I have simply to say this, speaking as a Canadian of French origin, that if my fellow-countrymen of British origin have any grievances, real or imaginary, let them come before the Legislature of Quebec; and although I have not a seat in that Legislature I can claim that I have some influence there, nay I do not want any influence, I know that the majority of the members in that House, the Conservative minority as well, would be ever ready to give them what remedial legislation they may think for their benefit. But up to a few days ago, I never heard that the Protestant minority had anything to complain of in the treatment which they have received from the majority of the Province of Quebec, and if they had any serious grievances, can it be told upon the floor of this Parliament that these grievances would not have been ventilated before the representatives of the people? I repeat what I said a moment ago. It is quite easy for the editor in his chair, or the clergyman in his study, or for any party who has no responsibility to the public at large—it is quite easy for them to determine questions by fixed theories, but it is another thing to fix them according to the will of the people, and I do not admit that there is any serious grievance so long as these grievances are not ventilated upon the floor of the House of the Provincial Parliament. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) also said something yesterday about Mr. Joly. He claimed that Mr. Joly had been ousted from public life. I do not know by whom, but I suppose he meant by the Liberal party.

Mr. McCARTHY. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." Mr. Joly has been in power for some eighteen months and he was ousted from power by the most dishonest warfare which every public man had to suffer in this country. Mr. Joly was ousted from power largely by a violation of the Constitution, perpetrated by this Parliament, and in which the hon. member for Simcoe was himself instrumental. If Mr. Joly had had anything like fair play, I believe that to this day he would have been in power in the Province of Quebec. Mr. Joly never had anything to suffer at the hands of the Liberal party; on the contrary, Mr. Joly is a man for whom we have the greatest respect. We have differed from him upon one question, and one question only, the question which arose out of the rebellion in the North West. Upon that question Mr. Joly took one course, and we took a different course. I am not to argue this question over again, but I have simply to say this to the hon. member for Simcoe, that in the last election which took place in Megantic, where a Protestant representative of the Cabinet of Mr. Mercier was before the people, and when this very question was to be tested at the polls, Mr. Joly came down and supported the candidate and the policy of the Government. It is evident, Mr. Speaker, from the discussion which we have had in this Parliament since yesterday, that though the Act is objectionable to some people—and I find no fault with the hon. member for Muskoka, I find no fault with my hon. friend from Simcoe, for holding the views they hold; I would not attribute to them other than the motive of conscience, that they are doing what they think for the best, they are representing what they deem to be in the interest of the people at large—but it is manifest to me that their judgment has been considerably biassed by the fact that the name of the Jesuits has been introduced in that legislation. It seems to me manifest that the appearance of that name has evoked a fresh outburst of hostility which that celebrated order has been subjected to in many lands and in many ages. Now, it is said that they are dangerous men. Suppose all that has been said were true, would that be any reason to refuse them the justice to which they are entitled? Suppose they were dangerous men, as it is represented they are; that might perhaps be a reason to refuse them civil rights, to refuse them recognition. But they were incorporated by the Province of Quebec two years ago, and the Act which incorporated them received the approval of one of those weak Protestants, according to the member for Simcoe, who represent the minority in the Legislature of Quebec. Mr. Lynch, a fellow Conservative of the hon. member for Simcoe, speaking on that occasion, used this remarkable language:

"Mr. Lynch, on the Bill to incorporate the Jesuits, said that notwithstanding what might be thought in some quarters, there was nothing in the Bill alarming in its character. We were living in an age when wisdom prevailed, living in an age where freedom was supposed to exist the world over, and nowhere in the Dominions of Her Majesty did liberty prevail more than in the Province of Quebec. In Committee, with a consideration of fairness which characterised members of the House, certain portions of the preamble were struck out. Now is it possible that the intelligent public opinion of the Province of Quebec should deny those Jesuit Fathers the civil rights which we have granted to everyone else? If there is any religious aspect to this question it should be settled elsewhere than in this House. If there is anything in this Bill against civil rights, let us strike it out. Until this is shown I am prepared to support this Bill."

And supported the Bill was, and became law. Under such circumstances, it seems to me that the explosion of bitterness which we have seen to-day and yesterday comes rather tardily. But, Sir, any man, be he friend or foe of the Jesuit Order, must at least give them credit for this, that they repel and deny all the charges which are made against them; they repel and deny the dangerous doctrines which are attributed to them. Now, I would not enter upon that question for one moment were it not for the remarks which fell to-day from my friend the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton); but I cannot allow such views as those which have been expressed to pass without some comment, though this is not the proper sphere or time either to defend or attack the Jesuits. Everyone familiar with French literature knows that Pascal, in his celebrated "Lettres Provinciales," has quoted several paragraphs, which he attributes to Jesuits, of very objectionable character. I have not been able for my part to discover those extracts; I have often sought for the text books; but could not find them, and I cannot say whether they are right or wrong. But I know this, that writers of as great eminence as Pascal have asserted over and over again that all the statements upon which Pascal based his accusations have been refuted, time and again, by members of the Jesuit Order. Now, the Jesuits, it is admitted, are a body of able men, and, it must be admitted also, are a body of pure men, and they are characterised by knowledge and high attainments; but they are men, they are fallible, and it would be strange indeed if in such a numerous order some were not found to write objectionable things. But suppose one of an order were found to write objectionable things, would it follow that the whole order ought to be held responsible, as was said by one member? So are you to conclude that, because one of the order happens to write objectionable things, the whole order are to be condemned? It would be just as it you were to condemn all the Protestant divines of Ontario because the Rev. Dr. Wild said, a few days ago, that to kill a Jesuit was no crime. I will not, Mr. Speaker, push this controversy any further. This is not the place, I say, to attack the Jesuits, nor the place to defend them. The place to attack the Jesuits, in so far as this Bill is concerned, was the Legislature of Quebec; but whether a man be a friend or a foe of the Jesuits, it seems to me that their history in Canada, whatever it may have been in other lands, has been such as to commend not only admiration, but the greatest admiration. They have been the pioneers of this country. In the language of a great historian, not a cape was turned, not a river was entered, but a Jesuit led the way. Every inch of the soil of Ontario was trodden by their weary feet at least 150 years before there was an English settler in that Province. Nay, the very soil of the Province has been consecrated by their blood, shed in their attempts to win over souls to the God of Protestants and Catholics alike. Of the Jesuits I have nothing more to say. The question, as I say, is not one fit for this audience; if it is to discussed it should be discussed elsewhere than here. But the resolution asserts that they have been expelled. The hon. member for Simcoe stated yesterday that they have been expelled from several countries; and the hon. member for North Norfolk stated to-day that they have been expelled from twenty different countries. Sir, this is true; but, what is equally true, they have never yet been expelled from a free country. They have been expelled from countries where the true principles of human freedom such as we understand them in British countries, were not understood. The hon. gentleman told us yesterday that they had been expelled from Germany in 1872. Why is it, in a British Assembly, that the example of Germany will be given to us to imitate? Does the hon. gentleman hold that because the Jesuits have been expelled from Germany—Germany ruled by a man of genius, but a despot after all—such an example should be followed here? We have been told that the Jesuits were expelled from France in 1880. Yes, they were; and to the shame of the French Republic be it said. But they are not the only men who were expelled by that Government. In 1880 six or seven different religious communities were expelled. Sisters of Charity were expelled—angels on earth, if there are any, women who renounce everything that life can give in order to give their life up to the daily maintenance and succor of those who are poor, helpless and suffering. Not only those religious communities, but the princes of the House of Orleans were also expelled from France—men who were the élite of France, men of whom more than forty years ago, Prince Metternich said, when they were in their boyhood: "They are young men such as there are few and princes such as there are none." The Duc d'Aumale, one of them, was expelled, one of the noblest soldiers of the French army, a man whose soul is so high that the only manner in which he requited the cruel treatment meted out to him was to make a gift to the ungrateful nation of the Chateau de Chantilly with all its art treasures. I have only this to say to an hon. gentleman who brings such arguments as these: I feel ten thousand times prouder of my native land, which can deal justly and generously with the Jesuits, than of the land of my ancestors, which though a republic, is to-day so retrogade in its constitution and practice of freedom, that it banishes those who do not come up to the standard of its own citizenship. In this matter, I am reminded that the hon. gentleman from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) yesterday stated that we of French origin sometimes forget that this is a British country. I have his words here and I want to quote them:

"We must never forget, said he, I am afraid that some of my friends from the Province of Quebec do sometimes forget that this is a British country, that by the fortunes of war that event was decided, and the greater half of this continent passed over to the British Crown."

What did the hon. gentleman mean by that? I wish he had said a little more or a little less. I wish he had not contended himself with making an insinuation, but that if he had a charge to make, he should have had the pluck and the courage to make it. I tell this to the hon. gentleman. I am of French origin and I am proud of my origin, and I know my fellow-countrymen of Anglo-Saxon race too well not to be aware that if I had not the pride of my origin in my heart they would never think of me but with the contempt which I should deserve. I am of French origin, but I am a British subject. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said, a moment ago, that there should be but one race here.

Mr. McCARTHY. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." Well, what would that race be? Is it the British lion that is to swallow the French lamb, or the French lamb that is to swallow the British lion? There can be more than one race, but there shall be but one nation. Scotland has not forgotten her origin, as far as I know, but Scotland is British. I do not intend to forget my origin, but I am a Canadian before everything. Let me state this further to my hon. friend, I have the pride of my origin; I feel the strength of the blood which flows in my veins, but, in the language of the Latin poet, I say:

"Homo sum; humani nihil a me alienum puto."

"I am a man; nothing that relates to man is foreign to my sympathy;" but, at the same time, though I would never forget the language of my race, the language which my mother taught me, I say to the hon. gentleman that if I had my choice to return to French allegiance, never would I consent to do so. I do not speak only my own feelings when I thus speak, but I voice the feelings of every one of my countrymen. I do not give utterance merely to the feelings of those who sit beside me, but I am sure I speak the feelings of those French Canadians who sit on the other side as well, when I say that if to-day a poll was taken in the Province of Quebec, or all through the Dominion of Canada, giving a choice between allegiance to England or allegiance to France, there would not be one single vote cast in favor of a return to the allegiance to France. We would remain British subjects; but because we are British subjects, is it to be expected that we shall turn traitors to our origin, traitors to everything that makes life valuable? What would be life if a man had not in his veins and in his heart a feeling for the blood of his own country? The hon. gentleman told us yesterday that he was an Irishman. Would he deny the land of his ancestors? Well, I would pity him from my heart if he would. But, after all, if ever we were to forget that we are of French origin I am sure we could not forget it in view of the agitation which is now going on in the Province of Ontario, because from day to day, from week to week, in a certain press, we have been appealed to—we of French origin—as Liberals of French origin—to vote for disallowance against the Jesuits' Act. From day to day in a certain press, the Liberals of the Province of Quebec have been appealed to to vote against the Government on this question; and in my hand I hold one of the last issues, in which after having recited all the villainies of which the Jesuits are accused, the editor continues as follows:—

"It is safe to say, therefore, that if the Liberals of England or of France were in the position of Mr. Laurier and his followers they would not hesitate a moment in killing this conspiracy in Quebec. Even if they did not hold the Acts to be absolutely unconstitutional they would certainly vote for their disallowance as being contrary to the public interest."

Well, as far as reference is made to the Liberals of France, I have no doubt the editor is quite correct. No doubt, if the Liberals of France had the power to vote on this question, they would certainly disallow this Act; but I have this to say, that I am not and we are not Liberals of the French school. I have not said it once but ten times and twenty times in my own Province, that I am a Liberal of the English school, that I and my friends have nothing in common with the Liberals of France. A short time ago, I was sorry to hear my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) express regret that there was no Protestant party, as far as I understood him. There are men in my own Province, men of my own persuasion, men of my own race, who entertain the same view as the hon. gentleman, and would desire to have a Catholic party. I have always raised my voice against that doctrine, and, as far back as 1877, speaking to a French audience in the French language in the city which I have the honor to represent now, the good old city of Quebec, I used to those who, like my hon. friend, would separate men upon the ground of creed, this language:

"You wish to organise all the Catholics in one party, without any other tie, without any other basis than the community of religion, but have you not reflected that, by that very fact, you will organise the Protestant population as one party, and that then, instead of the peace and harmony which exist to-day between the different elements of the Canadian population, you would bring on war, religious war, the most disastrous of all wars."

Those were my sentiments ten years ago; those are my sentiments to-day. My hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) stated that we should not allow this Act because the Jesuits are inimical to liberty. Such a statement would not surprise me in the mouth of a Liberal from France, but it does surprise me to hear it on the floor of this Parliament. Are we to be told that, because men are inimical to liberty, they shall not be given liberty? In our own doctrine and in our own view, liberty shines not only for the friends of liberty but also for the enemies of liberty. We make no difference whatever; and, as far as the Liberals of England are concerned, I am sure of one thing, that, if they were here, they would never vote as the editor of the Mail supposed they would. The Liberals of England have been for the last century and more the champions of freedom all over the world, and, if we have freedom to-day, as we understand it in this country, and in this age, it is largely due to the efforts of the Liberal party in England. They understood long ago that liberty is not only for the friends of liberty but for all. They understood long ago that the security of the State depends entirely upon the utmost freedom being given to all opinions; that no one is to be canvassed for his opinion, right or wrong, but that the utmost freedom shall be given to all opinions, and that the popular judgment will decide between the grain and the chaff, will select the one and reject the other. That is the principle which I have, in my humble way, endeavored to inculcate for many years amongst my fellow-countrymen of French origin. That, with a steadfast adherence to the broadest principles of constitutional freedom, is the guiding star which, in the station I now occupy and in any station I may have in life, I shall ever endeavor to follow.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. At this late hour, and after the subject before us has been so fully discussed, I do not feel myself warranted in addressing the House at any length, and I am too well pleased and satisfied with the course taken by my hon. friend who has just spoken in supporting the policy of the Government on this occasion to feel very indignant at the reproofs and reproaches thrown across the floor in the course of his speech. In fact it is a bitter pill for my hon. friend to be obliged to vote for us. He is obliged to do it. He dare not do otherwise. He could not face Quebec if he did anything else. So he takes his revenge by pitching into the Government generally, and that, I take it, is the means by which he reconciles it to his conscience to vote in favor of the Government. Like mine Ancient Pistol, "he eats his leek in earnest of revenge," and so he strays off to all kinds of irrelevant subjects. He brought in the Streams Bill, brought in the modus vivendi, he discussed the double-faced policy of the Conservative party, as he says, since 1854. As to that double-faced policy, I pardon my hon. friend for his great mistake in that regard. He is a young man. I cannot say of him, as the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) said of my hon. friend here, that he is a fledging politician, but he is a young man, and he forgets the history of Canada since 1854. Why, he said that, while we professed to be the friends of Lower Canada and the friends of the French race and the friends of Catholicism in the Province of Quebec, we were equally strong as the advocates of Protestantism in the Province of Upper Canada, that we were avowing ourselves in that Province as Englishmen, as Anglo-Saxons, and as being opposed to French domination. The hon. gentleman has forgotten the history of his country. He has forgotten that, for years, I was in a minority in my own Province. The hon. gentleman knows that I was attacked by the organ of the Liberal party in Upper Canada year after year as being recreant to Protestantism, as being recreant to the British race, as succumbing to French influence, as being the tool and the subservient slave of the French people. Why, who opposed the cry of representation by population but myself and my party; who supported the separate schools against the whole weight of the Liberal party of Ontario, headed at that time by the late Hon. George Brown, but myself and my party? The opposition to both those cries was unpopular, especially in regard to representation by population, which seemed to be fair. My opposition to representation by population, in the interests of Lower Canada, was held out as being unjust and unfair to my own race and Province. Why did I oppose it? The Liberal party and their leader—and he was a real leader of men—I mean the Hon. George Brown, was supported by his party in that policy, and he had at his command the able newspaper which he conducted and owned, the Globe,—abused and attacked me without stint because I opposed representation by population; and why did I oppose it? Because the leader of that party did not conceal the object for which he desired a majority in the United Legislature of Canada. He said that the French language must be put down. He said that the Anglo-Saxon race and English law must prevail, and that threat against our fellow-subjects in the Province of Lower Canada was so strongly pressed, and was so imminent, that I did not hesitate to incur the obloquy which was poured upon me for years, the result of which was that I was in the minority in my own Province during most of the time from 1854 to 1866. The hon. gentleman is rather ungrateful for the years and years during which I stood as the advocate for the Province of Lower Canada, of the French race, and of my Catholic fellow-countrymen. Aye, Sir, and more than that; although I was in a minority I had a very respectable Protestant Conservative support, and the main body of the Conservative support that I received in the Province of Ontario was from the Orange body. The majority of the Orange body was Conservative, and they stood by me. In the first place I had the Grand Master of the Orange body, the late George Benjamin, who, chief of the Orangemen as he was, never failed in voting with me for the protection of the Lower Canadians, their country, their race, and their religion, from the persistent and factious attacks that were made upon them by the Liberal party of Ontario. Well, after a while Mr. George Benjamin disappeared, I had the support of another Grand Master of the Orangemen in the present Minister of Customs. Orangeman as he was, chief of the Orangemen as he was, he never failed in doing full justice to Lower Canada, its rights, its religion and its interests. The hon gentleman then strayed off into the Streams Bill. Well, the hon. gentleman quoted what was said in the report on the Streams Bill. He forgot that the report and the action of the Government on the Streams Bill were based on the authority of a report of the Minister of Justice in the Government of which he was a member, which Government disallowed a Bill passed by the Legislature of Prince Edward Island on precisely the same grounds as the Streams Bill rejection was approved by us. Let the hon. gentleman look back, and he will find that the Government of that day notwithstanding their strong affection for provincial rights, disallowed a measure on the same grounds, first, because it was ex post facto, and, second, because it was lis pendens, and the subject already before the courts. Then my hon. friend says that although we are very slow in some things, we are very quick in others; that, for instance, there was the modus vivendi, which we had to decline to grant, although my hon. friend had moved it, and then a few days afterwards we had agreed to continue it. The hon. gentleman must not lay the flattering unction to his soul that his motion had anything to do in the world with the action of the Government on that point. I can prove it in the easiest and clearest possible way. The hon. gentleman will, perhaps, remember my speech on the occasion in answer to that motion. I asked the hon. gentleman to allow the matter to stand over, not to press that subject while a Government was just going out in the United States, and to wait and see—I only asked for six days—whether the incoming Government were going to be friendly or were going to adopt a non-intercourse policy. I said—the hon. gentleman must remember it—wait until we see if there is any evidence of hostility, if it is not going to be a non-intercourse Government, then it will be time enough to deal with that subject.

I could not tell the hon. gentleman at that time, but I can tell him now. His motion was made on the 26th of February. On the 4th of February the first communication to the colony of Newfoundland was made. My telegram was:

"Have temporarily suspended granting of licenses under modus vivendi until the course of new president known. Wish co-operation. Am writing."

So that the subject was under discussion between the Premier of Newfoundland and the Dominion of Canada long before we knew that my hon. friend was going to make his flourish. The papers I shall lay before the House, as I promised to do. The hon. gentleman held us responsible for a debate in the Province of Ontario the other day, when Mr. Craig made a motion and Mr. Meredith made a speech. Well, Mr. Speaker, all that I can say is this, those gentlemen are free agents, they can make speeches as they like. We are responsible here in the Dominion Parliament for what we do in the Dominion Parliament. Even here the hon. gentleman would not like to be held responsible for this resolution, because his great friend and supporter, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) happens to differ from him. These Conservative gentlemen in Toronto have taken their course. My hon. friend from North Norfolk is a supporter of the hon. gentleman, is a strong leader in the Liberal party. He has taken his course; the hon. gentleman was not bound by that, he has shown that he is not bound by it; and yet if we applied to him the same measure that he applies to us, we are to be held responsible, notwithstanding our own assertion, notwithstanding our own vote, notwithstanding our course of action—we are to be held responsible for the action of Conservatives in another and different sphere. My hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) the other day, in his very effective speech, a very satisfactory speech from my point of view, said that the Government ought to have spoken early in this matter. Well, Mr. Speaker, if we had disallowed the Bill, that would have been a true remark. If we had taken the responsibility of disallowing the Bill, of interfering with the legislation of the Province of Quebec, we ought to be called upon to state our reasons and to defend our course. But as a matter of course, the legislation of each Province is independent, subject to the restrictions in the Constitution It requires no defence for the Government of the day to allow an Act of the Local Legislature to go into operation. That is their duty as a general rule and there is no defence required. An attack must be made if they have improperly allowed an Act to go into operation. Now, in this case I have no doubt, notwithstanding the able arguments of the hon. member from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) that that measure was within the competence of the Provincial Legislature. My hon. friend who is a much higher authority than myself, the Minister of Justice, came to the same conclusion. I may say that we, laymen and lawyers in the Cabinet, were unanimous on the point; and if I had any doubt upon the subject the able and well reasoned argument and speech of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) would have removed all doubts from my mind. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman seemed to intimate that there has been a change of front on this subject. He is wrong. We have carried out fully, in our opinion, the principles laid down in a report submitted by myself as Minister of Justice in 1869. That report was communicated to all the Governments of the Provinces, and it laid down what we considered were the principles which should govern the exercise of the power of disallowance by the Governor General on the advice of his Cabinet, and although that was not formally approved, it has really been acted upon and continually quoted by both sides of this House and by both parties in the press, as being a fair description of the instances in which the power and right of disallowance should be exercised. Now, this Bill, Mr. Speaker, was either within the competence of the Legislature or it was not. If within the competence of the Legislature, it must as matter of course, be allowed to go into operation (I know some hon. gentlemen will not agree with the exception laid down in the report of 1868 and carried out ever since) unless in the opinion of the Government of the Dominion the Act, however much within the competence of the Province, was injurious to the Dominion as a whole. Of course, it is a great responsibilty for any Government to take that course and to decide that any provincial measure is against the interests of the Dominion. But the provision was put into the British North America Act to meet such cases, so that if in any case the Government of the Dominion should believe that an Act within the competence of a Province was injurious to the whole Dominion, it was their duty as well as their right to disallow that measure, and for doing so they are responsible to the Parliament of the Dominion, in which Parliament every Province has its representatives, who, of course, are prepared, as is their duty, to defend their provincial rights. That is the doctrine in pursuance of which we have assumed the responsibility of allowing this Bill, not disallowing it, and for which we are held responsible. If it is not within the competence of the Province, it does not at all follow that it is the duty of the Dominion Government to interfere. Look at the returns laid before Parliament, amounting now to two volumes. You see again and again reports in which the Ministers of Justice have stated that they believed certain clauses of different measures were ultra vires, yet as they had a beneficial tendency, or as they did not affect the interests of the rest of the Dominion, the attention of the Provincial Legislatures and Provincial Governments were called to it, with the suggestion that, if they thought well of it, they should amend the Act in those clauses and in those particulars where, in the opinion of the Minister of Justice and the Government here, they had exceeded their legitimate powers. It does not at all follow that because a Bill is ultra vires and is beyond the competence of the Legislature, it should be disallowed. On the contrary, as has been urged by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), and very correctly urged, it is just in those cases there is no necessity for disallowance, because there are the courts of law to appeal to. The allowance of a Bill which is ultra vires does not make it law. The courts can at once interfere and it is only in those cases where Acts are ultra vires, and where leaving them on the Statute-book would cause great injury to parties, that the right of disallowance should be exercised. Hon. members will readily understand that the moment an Act is passed by a Provincial Legislature people interested in the measure assume it is law, act on it, enter into large enterprises on it, and may be ruined if the Government did not immediately, with all convenient speed, interfere to protect those people from injury and ruin. In this case, as I have already said, we, the Government, including the legal members of it, had no doubt as to the fact that this Act was within the competence of the Local Legislature. And Sir, I think it was not left for us, we could not as a Government, against the decisions of the Legislature of Old Canada, and against the repeated legislation of the Province of Quebec since Confederation, set up our own opinion against the various Acts that have been passed. Why, 37 years ago, by the Legislature of United Canada, where the majority of the representatives of the people were Protestants, the St. Mary's College was incorporated with large powers. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says: because there were some few Jesuit professors, that did not make it a Jesuit college. Now, I tell the hon. gentleman that the corporators of the St. Mary's College were the Bishop of Montreal and six Jesuit priests. Just as Victoria College is a Methodist College and Queen's a Presbyterian institution, so St. Mary's College is a Jesuit teaching institution.

Mr. BLAKE. Everybody knew it was a Jesuit college.

Mr. BERGERON. It has never been disputed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Let me call the attention of the House to the division on that occasion. Let the hon. gentleman remember that the majority that voted for the Bill was 54 and only seven members, on the third reading, were opposed to it. There was a larger vote against it in the second reading, but, after a full discussion, on the third reading the division was as I have stated. Of the 54 who voted for the incorporation of St. Mary's College 29 were Protestants and 25 Catholics. I will read to the House some of the names to show that, although it was known at the time that it was a Jesuit institution, although the objection was taken and arguments were used somewhat like the arguments used on this occasion, yet there was then no fear of the Jesuit body, no fear of their insidious attempt to unsettle the Constitution of Canada, no fear that the crown of Canada was trembling on the head of Her Majesty, no fear that this country was going to suffer any injury of any kind, and this will be shown when I read to the House some of the names. Judge Badgley, the leading lay representative in the Church of England of Montreal; Hon. M. C. Cameron, a Free Church Presbyterian; Mr. Clapham, a Church of England man from Quebec; Hon. George Crawford, a strong North of Ireland Protestant, and I believe an Orangeman; Mr. Dawson of London, who everyone remembers as a strong Church of England man; Mr. Gamble, the special agent of Bishop Strachan in Parliament when the Clergy Reserves question was settled; Sir Francis Hincks, whom we all know; Mr. Langton, whom the older members of the House will remember; myself, the member for Kingston; Mr. McDougall (not the Honorable William), also a Protestant; Mr. Hamilton Merritt, whom we all know as a Liberal in Parliament and afterwards a member of the Government; Mr. Morrison, I am not sure whether that is Judge Morrison or his brother, Angus Morrison; Mr. Page, a prominent representative from the Province of Quebec; Mr. Patrick, of Prescott, whom we all remember as being a good Liberal; Col Prince, of Essex; Sir William Richards, then the Attorney-General; Mr. Ridout, the Conservative member for Toronto; Hon. William Robinson, whom we all remember as the brother of Sir John Robinson, the leader of the old family compact party; Dr. Rolph; Sir John Rose; Mr. Seymour, afterwards a Senator; Hon. James Shaw, afterwards a Senator; Mr. Stevenson, of Prince Edward; the late Mr. Thomas Street; the late the Hon. George O. Stuart, of Quebec; Mr. C. Wilson, of Middlesex; Mr. Wright, of West York, a leading Orangeman, and, as my friend from London can vouch, a staunch Protestant; those were the gentlemen who voted for this Bill, and the members who voted against the Bill were all from Ontario. That is a sufficient answer to my hon. friend from Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) that in 1852 not one single Protestant representative from the Province of Lower Canada—the Province of Quebec—voted against the Bill, and that is a full justification of the statement of my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Colby) when he said that Protestants of the Province of Quebec were not opposed to the legislation of that subject. We find that so long as 37 years ago the Jesuit college was established in Montreal. I voted for that, Mr. Speaker, and I never have had cause to regret my vote. That institution has gone on in its work of usefulness. We do not hear one single complaint of its teaching, or of any perversion of the youth, nor any disloyal doctrines, or any doctrines which have brought censure on the college. We hear that that institution has gone on and continues to go on doing its work well and devotedly. Now, Mr. Speaker, one would suppose from the speeches we hear now, and the articles which we see in the newspapers, that this was a new invasion of the Jesuits, that they are coming in like the Huns and the Vandals over this country to sweep away civilisation. Well, 37 years ago they were in active and useful operation in Canada, and in 1871, 18 years ago, the Legislature of the Province of Quebec passed an Act incorporating the Society of Jesus. This Act of 1887 is not the first Act of incorporation. It is an Act altering the provisions of the Act of 1871, and, instead of enlarging their powers, it diminishes the powers given them by the Act of 1871. This Act of 1871 passed the Legislature of Quebec, and we find that there was no protest from the Protestants in Parliament or out of Parliament. We do not find or hear that there was any objection to this Act. Now, because an agitation has grown up in the country—I do not know how or why—it is found that the Act of 1871 ought never to have been passed, that the Act of 1878 limiting this Act of 1871 ought not to be passed, and that both those Acts, as well as the measure we are now discussing, is deeply injurious to the people of all the Dominion of Canada. Now, Sir, this Act of 1871 provides:

"Whereas the Rev. Fathers Pierre Point, Superior, Firmin Vignon, Zéphirin Resther, and others, priests and religious members of the Company of Jesus, residing at Quebec, in the building of the 'Congrégation de Notre Dame,' form a body whose object is to perform the various functions of their office, in cities and in country places, such as the preaching of missions and retreats, and to assume the direction of religious congregations, brotherhoods and societies both of men and women; can also, at the request or with the permission of their lordships the Roman Catholic Bishops, or of any one of them, to devote themselves to other works for spiritual or moral purposes, by preaching, precepts and education; and, whereas, in order to consolidate their establishment and to favor its prosperity and progress, they have prayed for leave to form a corporate body enjoying civil and political rights; Therefore, Her Majesty by and with the advice and consent of the Legislature of Quebec, enacts as follows:

"1. The above named petitioners and all other persons who may in future be legally associated with them in virtue of the present Act, are hereby constituted a body politic, and shall form a corporation under the name of 'Les missionnaires de Notre Dame, S. J.'

"2. The said corporation shall, under the same name, have perpetual succession, and shall have all the rights, powers and privileges of other corporations, and particularly of those having a religious, spiritual or moral object. It may at all times admit other members and establish them in one or more places. It may also at all times and places by purchase, gift, devise, assignment, loan or in virtue of this Act, or by any other lawful means and legal title, acquire, possess, inherit, take, have, accept and receive any movable or immovable property whatever, for the usages and purposes of the said corporation, and the same may hypothecate, sell, lease, farm out, exchange, alienate, and finally dispose of lawfully, in whole or in part, for the same purposes."

And it goes on to say there must be the limit of $10,000 as to the extent of immovable property they should hold. How could the present Government, in the face of the solemn legislation of United Canada of 1852, and in the face of the legislation of the Province of Quebec in 1871—how could they now set up their own opinion and declare that this was a body that ought not to have existence in Canada? But, Sir, let us look on it as a matter of common sense. What harm have the Jesuits done, and have they done any? In 37 years, if their principles were so void of morality, if their morality was so doubtful, if their ambition was so inordinate they would have shown some evidence of it in 37 years or since their incorporation in 1871. They have gone on in their humble way acting like other Catholic orders in the Province of Quebec, doing their duty according to their lights. When you talk of their doctrines I have nothing to say about them; all we know is this, their doctrines whatever they are are such as to meet with the approbation of the Head of their Church or they would soon be informed of it in the authoritative way which the Head of that Church can govern all such religious bodies within the Catholic religion. Under these circumstances I say we would have been acting with a degree of presumption that I do not think any Canadian Government or any sensible Government in any country would think of exercising if we vetoed this Bill. We had no ground for doing so, we had the sanction of United Canada, as I said before for this Act; we had positive legislation acted upon in the Province of Quebec for eighteen long years, and that we should set up our own opinion is absurd. If we did we would have been justly subject to the condemnation of every thinking man in Canada. But, Sir, we are told all about the expulsion of the Jesuits and the Act of Supremacy, and the unfavorable legislation that took place in England long long ago. It is too late for us to discuss this subject to-night, or I would like very much to do so. But those laws practically have been obsolete in England. England is a very Conservative country, and its general policy has been, in the change of manners, in the advance of education and liberal ideas, not to rub out statute after statute whenever it may apparently infringe upon or be adverse to the thought of the day, but to allow them quietly to drop; and what is the consequence: Look at England. Are the people of England afraid of the insidious attempts of the Jesuit body to attack the supremacy of England? Are they afraid that the Queen's crown would tremble on her head? Sir, one of the greatest and finest educational institutions in the world is that of Stoneyhurst, which is altogether conducted as a Jesuit institution, where all the English Catholics, from the Duke of Norfolk down, are educated; and anybody who knows the situation of parties in England must know that if there be a loyal body of men in the whole world, if there be a loyal body of men within the dominions of Her Majesty, it is the English Catholics, headed by the Duke of Norfolk, their great chief. In England they are not afraid; and why should we be afraid? Why, Mr. Speaker, there are known to be at least 300 Jesuits in England, Jesuit priests teaching. The collateral body, I think, is above 1,000; and there are 180 in Ireland. Besides the College at Stoneyhurst, there is the College of Mount St. Mary, and Beaumont College; there are Jesuits teaching a collegiate institute at Canterbury; there is a collegiate school at Liverpool; and there is a Jesuit school in Jersey. The Jesuits are actively employed in educating the youth of England, and we do not find that there is a remonstrance anywhere. We do not find that the Acts which would affect their existence in England have ever been put in force. Why, it would be absurd. The Prince of Wales, the heir of Her Majesty, upon whose head the Crown of England will some day descend—though we all hope that Her Majesty may long continue to wear it—does not think his position as a Protestant sovereign will be affected by the fact that there are Jesuits in Canada or in England. At the requiem service at a Jesuit Church the other day, for the Archduke Rudulph, whose unhappy fate we all know, the Prince of Wales was present, and, strange to say, was so unconscious of the danger that he was running that after the service was over, he asked the superior, as a souvenir of the event, to make him a gift of his missal or mass book. And Canada is the only country in the world where there are Jesuits, which is afraid of their insidious attempts to unsettle the constitution. There are Jesuits by the thousands in the United States, and if Canada is in danger, they can overflow into Canada just as well from the United States as they can from England, or be educated in the country. And, as a Presbyterian clergyman said in the pulpit here, this, after all, is a mere matter of money; and that a religious excitement should be raised on a sum of money, and a small sum, shows how easily the public may be excited if only a cry is got up, especially on religious subjects. We know that public agitation may go on sometimes without reason, and to a great extent, one cannot but deeply regret that the hon. member for Muskoka felt it to be his duty to make this motion, which ought not to have been made—this motion which will be the cause of a great deal of discomfort in Canada. I look back, Mr. Speaker, and I remember the great social evils that religious evils have caused in this country. I remember when the whole country was roused on the Clergy Reserve question,

William Lyon Mackenzie said in the Parliament of Canada, after he came came back from his exile, that the proximate cause of the rebellion in Upper Canada was the Clergy Reserve question and the agitation upon it. One can also remember how neighbor was set against neighbor on the separate school question; and, therefore, I feel deeply that this country is injured, greatly injured—of course my hon. friend does not think so—by the projection of this subject in this popular assembly; and we cannot see what the result may be. I hope and believe it will fade away like other cries, and I am induced to do so when I look back at the events connected with the Papal Aggression Bill of 1850. I happened to be in England in 1850. Then the excitement was tremendous, caused chiefly by the letter written by Lord John Russell, the Durham letter, and by the very unwise conduct of Cardinal Wiseman in making the announcement in the way he did. I remember the excitement in England. Cardinal Wiseman, although having an English name, was a foreigner, a Spaniard; and when he flaunted the Papal decretals from over the Flaminian gate with a great deal of pomp and ceremony, it roused the sensibilities of the English people, and Lord John Russell took advantage of the excitement in order to make capital for himself. The agitation was so great in England that there was danger of a recurrence of the Lord George Gordon riots. As in those days, the streets and the doors were marked: "no Popery." Whenever I went along the streets I saw chalked on the houses: "No Popery." I think no one went so far as the celebrated clown Grimaldi in Lord George Gordon's days, when he wrote on his door: "No Religion." But we all remember the caustic cartoon in Punch, picturing Lord John Russell as a little boy in buttons, who wrote "No Popery" on the walls, and then ran away. What was the result of that cry? I was a younger man then than now, and I must say I was for a time carried away. The excitement was contagious, wherever I went, at the theatres and elsewhere, the cry was: "God save the Queen, and down with the Pope." You could not go in to a place of public amusement but the crouds would assemble, and it was found necessary to put guards on the banks and to protect Roman Catholic chapels. But Mr. Gladstone and some cooler heads——

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Sir James Graham.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; Mr. Gladstone, Sir James Graham, and some others opposed the measure, which had a most ignominious ending. Not one single prosecution took place under that Act. Not one single proceeding was taken under it, and a few years afterwards, in 1871, the Act was repealed in silence. Not a single observation was made to continue it in its wretched existence.

Mr. BLAKE. Everybody was ashamed of it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Everybody, as the hon. member for the West Durham (Mr. Blake) says, was ashamed of it. The Bill was scouted out of Parliament, although the excitement had been originally so enormous. I cannot convey to you the excitement that existed in England at that time. I hope and believe that when this matter is fully understood in the Province of Ontario, when the exhaustive speeches that were made upon it are read and discussed and weighed, the country will see that their apprehensions are unfounded, and that the country is safe. Why, there are in all the Dominion of Canada 71 Jesuits. Are they going to conquer the whole of Canada? Is Protestantism to be subdued? Is the Dominion to be seduced from its faith by 71 Jesuit priests? They are armed with a string of beads, a sash around their waists and a mass book or missal. What harm can they do? I told my reverend and eloquent friend, Dr. Potts of Toronto, that I would match him physically and spiritually, against any follower of Ignatius Loyola in the whole Dominion of Canada. Now, only think of it. The Jesuits claim, and claimed with an appearance of right, that the effect of their restoration should be to give them back all their own property. They contended for that, and they had the right to fight the best battle they could. Look at the papers. They said that the value of the property was $2,000,000, but they came down, however, graciously, and said they would take $1,000,000, or, to be accurate, I think, $900,000. But the Government of the Province of Quebec said: No, you cannot have that; you can only have $400,000—not a very large sum Why, Mr. Mercier has been granting, in the interest of his country, sums as big as that for railways here and there through Quebec. We do the same thing here. It is no very large sum. But not only did Mr. Mercier confine the vote to $400,000 but he said: You shall have not the whole of it; perhaps you shall have none of it. The other ecclesiastic institutions, Catholic colleges, said they had a right to their share. Now, it was a family matter, it was in foro domestico, and, as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) truly said, it was their own money, it was the property of the Province of Quebec and they could do with it as they liked. There is almost nosubject to which the Quebec Government could not apply these moneys under the general phrase of "property and civil rights." The lands themselves, if they came to the old Province of Canada by escheat, the moment that Upper and Lower Canada were severed, those lands, by the terms of the British North America Act, became, like any other public lands in the Province of Quebec, subject to be sold or kept or retained or applied for any purpose the Government of that Province chose. You cannot bind any Province to carry out the original intentions of the donors. This land became their property, and the representatives of the people, the legislators of the Province, have a right to apply their own property and the proceeds of their property for any purpose they have a right to deal with under the powers of the Act. How does it turn out? It was left to the Pope to settle in what proportion the different collegiate institutions should have this $400,000; and His Holiness, instead of being the special supporter of the Jesuit Order, instead of pressing their interests on the people of Canada, instead of giving them wealth in order to advance their insidious designs against the Crown and dignity of Canada, cut them down to the miserable sum of $160,000. He has given the rest of it to the other collegiate institutions and to the bishops for the purposes of higher education. I hear the argument stated that it is not stated, in so many words, that the money going to the Jesuits shall be devoted to educational purposes. Why, they are a teaching body in Canada exclusively now. There is not a single parish in the whole Province of Quebec which has a Jesuit as its curé; there is not a single parish in which the Jesuits have any control. They are a teaching body in the Province of Quebec. They have a mission in which education and Christianity go hand in hand among the Indians and the Esquimaux on the Labrador coast, where they are doing a great deal of good, where they are suffering the hardships and miseries which we read in Parkman they were always ready to suffer in the cause of religion and humanity. And, strange to say, if we go west, leaving the Eastern Province of Quebec, to the Province of Manitoba, we find there the College of St. Boniface with Archbishop Taché at its head, and the professors are six Jesuit priests. We do not hear of Manitoba raising up a cry against that institution. We know how easily popular excitement in a young country like that, full of ardent spirits, can be raised. I have occasion to know something about that. Well, they submit to the enormous wrong of having six Jesuit priests teaching in Manitoba with as much apathy as the Protestants in the Province of Quebec; and more than that, strange to say, there is the Anglican clergy under the charge of the Bishop of the Church of England, there is the Presbyterian clergy under the charge of the Presbyterian body, and they are so recreant to their Protestantism, they are so apathetic, that they have joined hand-in-hand in forming a common university, that common university giving degrees, and the governing body of that university is composed of Catholics, Presbyterians Anglicans. And all this cry is for some $160,000, which, at four per cent., amounts to some $6,000 a year. I cannot but remember the story of the Jew going into an eating house and being seduced by a slice of ham. When he came out, it so happened there was a crash of thunder, and he said: Good heavens, what a row about a little bit of pork. It is a little bit of pork, and as the poor Jew escaped being crushed by the thunderbolt, I have no doubt Canada will escape from the enormous sum of $6,000 a year. If this Bill had been introduced in other terms it would have been fortunate. I agree with those gentlemen who say that the framers of the Bill, by the way it is drawn and the insertion of these recitals, almost court the opposition of the member for Muskoka. I agree that that is so, and, if the Bill had not mentioned the Society of Jesus, it would have passed without any opposition. If the money had been given to the Sulpicians, the money had been given to the University of Laval, if if the money had been given to the bishops of the different dioceses for higher education, no one would have objected to it, this Bill would not have excited any attention; but, it is just because the Jesuits have got historically a bad name from Protestant history, and it was simply because their name was in the Bill that all this agitation has been aroused. This subject is not a new one. Years and years ago, long before Confederation, the subject was discussed in Parliament, and strong arguments were used against the recognition of the claim for Jesuits' estates, and the feeling of opposition was shown and emphasised in the sentence which was used by a worthy member of Parliament—a good Grit he was, by the way, and a very respectable and honest man, strange to say—but he exemplified the feeling of the country in one sentence. His speech was a very effective one. It was this: "Mr. Speaker, I don't like them there Jesites." That was the feeling. There was a prejudice against the Jesuits, and it is from that same prejudice that all this agitation has been aroused. Now, I can only repeat that the Government would have performed an act of tyranny if they had disallowed the Bill. Believing as we do that it is perfectly within the competence of that Legislature, and does not in any way affect any other portion of Her Majesty's dominions, there would be no excuse for our interfering, even according to the rigid principles which my hon. friend opposite thinks govern us. I agree strongly with the language used by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) Supposing this Bill had been disallowed, Mr. Mercier would have gained a great object. He would have been the champion of his church. The moment it was announced that this Bill was disallowed there would have been a summons for a meeting of the Legislature of Quebec. They would have passed that Bill unanimously, and would have sent it back here, and what would have been the consequence? No Government can be formed in Canada, either by myself, or by the hon. member who moves this resolution (Mr. O'Brien), or by my hon. friend who sits opposite (Mr. Laurier), having in view the disallowance of such a measure. What would be the consequence of a disallowance? Agitation, a quarrel—a racial and a religious war would be aroused. The best interests of the country would be prejudiced, our credit would be ruined abroad, and our social relations destroyed at home. I cannot sufficiently picture, in my faint language, the misery and the wretchedness which would have been heaped upon Canada if this question, having been agitated as it has been, and would be, had culminated in a series of disallowances of this Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I sympathise entirely with the desires of hon. gentlemen, and I do not propose to occupy the time of the House at any length, but this is not a question on which I intend to record my vote without explicitly declaring the reasons which actuate me on this occasion. As to the speech which has been made by the hon. the Premier, I think the hon. gentleman certainly had very little ground for charging my hon. friend the member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) with any irrelevancy in his remarks, at any rate as compared with the remarks in which the hon. gentleman himself indulged, for he most assuredly travelled over a wider range and went back over a greater number of years than my hon. friend required to traverse on his part. There is one remark which the hon. gentleman made, having reference to a gentleman who has long since departed from amongst us, which, to the best of my knowledge and to the knowledge of other hon. gentlemen here who knew him better than I did, was not a just or a fair remark for the Premier to have made. That was the statement that the late Hon. George Brown had declared—as I took down the hon. gentleman's words—that it was part of his policy to suppress the French language in Canada. If the hon. gentleman will show, if he will produce on the floor of this House any evidence that Mr. Brown did make use of such a statement, we will be willing to accept his assurance, but, although my acquaintance with Mr. Brown was not as long as that of the hon. gentleman, I knew him for a considerable number of years, and I cannot recollect having seen in his writings or heard from his lips any statement or any language at all warranting the assertion which has lately been made by the hon gentleman. In reference to some of the remarks made, and most justly made, by my hon. friend from Quebec (Mr. Laurier), that the policy of the present Government, in wantonly and needlessly interfering with provincial rights, was largely and principally responsible for the present agitation which we must all deplore, the hon. gentleman opposite took refuge in the old tu quoque argument that, in the time of my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Mackenzie), certain Bills had been disallowed; and he referred especially to one from Prince Edward Island which he asserted had been disallowed by us. My recollection is—and I have consulted my hon friend the member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) in regard to it—that it was reserved by the Lieutenant Governor of that Province, and that, as was done by the hon. gentleman himself, in a certain memorable instance, it was not disallowed, but was sent back to the Province to be considered by the Lieutenant Governor. Perhaps the hon. gentleman recollects that, on a certain occasion, a Bill for the incorporation of the Orange Order was sent to him under precisely similar circumstances, and that he—good Orangeman as he is—sent back that Bill because it had been reserved by the Lieutenant Governor who, he stated, had no business to act in that way without instructions.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; that is the case.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That was exactly the case in regard to the Bill from Prince Edward Island.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My impression was that it was the other way.

Mr. BLAKE. It was the case of a reserved Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The report was made by Mr. Scott?

Mr. BLAKE. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So that we followed the example of the hon. gentleman in that matter. Now, I have no objection whatever to say that I believe the report which the hon. gentleman made in 1869 gave a very full and fair account of the lines which we ought to have been governed in dealing with provincial rights. But since that time, as we all know, the hon. gentleman fell from grace, but we are glad to see by the statements made the other night by the Minister of Justice, that here again the hon. gentleman is coming back to the identical principles, and is framing his policy on those identical lines, which were advocated from this side of the House. As my hon. friend truly said, we are getting used to these sudden extraordinary conversions on the part of the hon. gentleman. My hon. friend pointed out to him that before three weeks have elapsed from the time when we advised the modus vivendi to be put in force, we find the hon. gentleman and his colleagues, by their act in Council, giving effect to the proposition made by my hon. friend. Let me recall to the hon. gentleman's mind the language with which he received that proposition. Unless my recollection is wholly at fault, we were told that it would be to go down on our knees to the great American nation, it would disgrace Canada, it was unworthy of a free people, unworthy of a free Government; yet in three weeks he accedes to the proposition.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, no. Look at Hansard.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will not irritate or aggravate the hon. gentleman by reciting all the other summersaults that he has performed in the last few years. But that is very far from being the only case in which the hon. gentleman recently has chosen, for reasons of his own, to take a leaf out of our books and to put on the Statute-book the exact policy which we have over and over again pointed out to him, and pointed out to this country, as the only one which can be followed in the interests of the people of Canada. As my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Mackenzie) reminds me, that is no new thing on the part of the hon. gentleman. Almost all his life his business has been to make capital by opposing as, long as he thought it safe, all the Liberal ideas, all the improvements, all the useful suggestions that were made; and then when there was a chance of obtaining a reasonable amount of profit, the hon. gentleman was prepared to adopt them; nor did he ever in all his life do so more remarkably than in the case of the adoption of the scheme of Confederation itself, which, to my certain knowledge—for I was a member of Parliament then—the hon. gentleman opposed with might and main, tooth and nail, until he was confronted with dissolution from which he knew he had not the ghost of a chance of emerging successfully. I will not spend any more time over the bygone proceedings of the hon. gentleman. I wish to say, however, a few words as to the question now in hand. I am in part disposed to agree with some of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this question in believing that this is not a light matter, that this may be attended with serious results indeed. I do not know, and none of us can tell, to what extent this agitation may ultimately spread. The vote that will be given to-night is a foregone conclusion, but it may well be that the end is not yet. Therefore, I hold that it is doubly our duty under these circumstances, speaking as men with a grave responsibility upon us, to declare why and wherefore we are not in a position at this moment to accept the motion recently made by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). As I have said, so far as the Government of Canada is concerned, this demand for interference with the legislation of the Province of Quebec is in a large degree due to the action which the Government have previously taken by their unjust interference with Acts passed by other Provincial Legislatures, passed by the Provincial Legislature of my own Province, passed by the Provincial Legislature of Manitoba, distinctly within their rights. The hon. gentlemen for their own reasons, and in pursuance of their own objects, chose to disallow these, and, therefore, they cannot blame their supporters if, under existing circumstances, they demand that they should put in force the same rule and law for the Province of Quebec that they have put in force for other Provinces of this Dominion. Sir, they chose to constitute themselves a court of appeal as to those Acts. I hold that the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was perfectly right in saying that when two gentlemen holding the position of the First Minister and the Minister of Customs and affiliating with the society to which they belong, believe that this Act was a bad one, if they thought there was anything objectionable in it, then they were bound by their own previous proceedings to disallow this Act and to take the consequence. Now, Sir, the position of three parties in this House is tolerably clearly defined. The position of the member for North Simcoe and his friends is clear enough. They maintain that we have a right to interfere and to sit in judgment on provincial legislation. They disapprove of this Act, and they consistently call upon the Government to disallow it. So the position of hon. gentlemen on this side is clearly defined. We have always declared that the Provinces had a full and perfect power to legislate on subjects which were formally assigned to them, and that on such subjects we ought not to interfere with them, even where some of us might believe that their action was unwise or indiscreet. But as to the Government, their position is wholly different. We find them on this occasion, as on almost all others, sometimes assuming one line and pursuing one policy, and sometimes on grounds, as they allege, of high moral conviction, disallowing an Act like that of the Province of Manitoba; but in cases like this, where there is too much at stake, we do not find the hon. gentlemen are troubled with any serious moral convictions which would lead them into collision with a powerful and united Province. Now, I do not in the least offer any opinion as to the legality of the proceedings. I am wholly in accord with the hon. member for West York (Mr. Mulock) and with other hon. gentlemen who have spoken here, in saying that if there be a question as to the legality of this Act, the proper place to settle it is the courts. I do not think this House is in any way constituted to act as a legal tribunal. I do not think the country would have confidence in us, acting as a legal tribunal, I am sure for one I would not. Now, we have two opinions from men eminent in their profession of the most possible opposite character on this question. There is no doubt whatever, I suppose, that there are very few questions of this nature on which legal gentlemen of the eminence of the Minister of Justice, or the hon. member for North Simcoe, or of the constitutional knowledge of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), cannot make out at first sight a very good and a very plausible case, but with that I have nothing to do. What we are concerned with here is the question whether it is advisable for us to make use of this extreme power which we possess, which the Government possess, under the British North America Act, to disallow this legislation. Sir, I have always observed this plain principle in respect to such proceedings: I say that the position which the Dominion of Canada and the Government of Canada occupy with respect to the Provinces, is identically the same as that which the Parliament and the Government of England occupy with respect to this Dominion Parliament, and that we should imitate the example of the English Government and English Parliament in abstaining from interfering with the Provinces. They have scrupulously abstained, in all but a very few cases, growing yearly less and less—almost none I may say within the last few years—from interfering with our legislation, and so we in turn are bound carefully to abstain from interfering with the legislation of the Provinces. The words used in the Act, as the hon. gentleman knows right well and as all hon. gentlemen I suppose know, are precisely and identically the same, and just the same powers are given to the English Government to disallow the Acts of this Parliament as is given to the Canadian Government to disallow provincial Acts, and it would be idle, it would be needless for me to waste the time of the House by reminding hon. members how they would resent any interference on the part of the British Government in a matter which came clearly and distinctly, as these I think come clearly and distinctly, within the jurisdiction of the Provincial Legislature. All I desire to say with respect to the Bill now in hand is this: With the incorporation of the Jesuits we have nothing to do. The hon. gentleman was perfectly right, as other hon. gentlemen were right, in calling the attention of the country and the House to the fact that over and over again other Acts of incorporation had been passed incorporating certain portions of this order. All, I say, we have to do with in these matters is the question, whether we were justified in interfering with this particular Act passed by Mr. Mercier. With respect to that question, I am bound to say that I myself entertain very great doubts of the wisdom and propriety of that Act. I doubt whether if I had lived in the Province of Quebec I would not have felt it to be my duty to have opposed it; but that is not the question, it is not what my opinion is and whether I approve of it or not, or whether it is justifiable on the whole. The question is this: Whether after the Legislature of Quebec has undertaken to deal with this subject, we, the Parliament of Canada, have a right to interfere with it? On that point, no more than the hon. gentleman do I entertain any doubt. I hold that it was fully within their constitutional rights, and I hold, therefore, that we have no business whatever to interfere with it or meddle with the disposal of the money entrusted to their care in any shape or way. If they have done wrong, let them answer for it to the people of the Province of Quebec, whom they specially represent. Let us not bring their Acts into controversy here, where, for various reasons, it is almost utterly impossible that we should come to a fair and equitable decision on the merits of any case passed on by a Provincial Legislature. More than that. Besides thinking it is beyond our right, I must add this, that I think it would be in the highest degree impolitic, in the highest degree contrary to good government, that it would impair the whole fabric of our Confederation if we took the advice of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) and proceed to disallow this Bill. I have seen, as well as the hon. gentleman, what the result of these religious feuds and discords sometimes is; and I say that I believe, if you were to disallow this Bill, most assuredly two results would flow from it: one would be that you would have a solid and united Lower Canada occupying to us approximately the same position that Ireland unhappily still holds in the British Parliament; and the other (if the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) desires especially to achieve that end) that you would make the Order of Jesuits the most powerful religious body in Quebec, and probably in North America. These two results would flow from the adoption of the idea of the hon. member for Muskoka and the disallowance of the Act on the grounds set forth in his motion. I, for one, will be no party under any circumstances or for any consideration to stirring up religious strife among my countrymen. So far as my power goes, so far as my voice and vote can go, I desire to have the rights of my own Province respected, and I desire to see the rights of a sister Province respected. I desire to maintain my own rights, my own religious belief, my own right to act as a free man in this country, and these rights which I claim for myself I will also not merely give to my fellow-countrymen, but I am ready to champion and obtain for them in every shape and way that I can possibly do so. If I had any doubt as to the correctness of my conviction I would find it in the fact that we have to-night for the first time in many years my venerated friend (Mr. Mackenzie) coming here to record his vote against a proposition which would set man against man and kindle the flames of religious bigotry from one end of this Dominion to the other.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 2 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 29th March, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

LANDS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. DEWDNEY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 128) respecting the reconveyance of certain lands to the Government of the Province of British Columbia. He said: This is a short Act, by which it is proposed to reconvey to British Columbia 45,000 acres of land, about which there was some misunderstanding, in the railway belt of British Columbia. At the time the arrangement was made about the railway belt, all the lands which had been appropriated by British Columbia previous to the arrangement were to be made up in some other way. An arrangement was made by which 1,300,000 acres of land were given in the Peace River district for those which had been already appropriated in British Columbia; but with regard to these 45,000 acres there was a misunderstanding. The title of these lands it was thought remained in the hands of the Dominion Government. It was subsequently found that such was not the case, and consequently this Bill is introduced for the purpose of getting over the difficulty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where are the lands?

Mr. DEWDNEY. They are on the south bank of the Fraser River, 50 or 60 miles north of New Westminster.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the quality of the land; is it agricultural land or timber land?

Mr. DEWDNEY. It is part agricultural and part timber.

Mr. COOK. Is it all in one block?

Mr. DEWDNEY. No; both Governments were dealing with a portion of this land, and a greater number of acres than 45,000 had been dealt with by the British Columbia Government. Mr. Robson was sent over this summer to endeavor, amongst other things, to arrange that matter, and we have agreed to transfer to them the 45,000 acres which they had already allowed settlement upon.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FISHERIES ACT.

Mr. TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 129) to amend the Fisheries Act. He said: The object of this Bill is to amend sub section 5 of section 8 of the Fisheries Act, and that amendment is introduced in consequence of recent litigation, or litigation which has been going on for a few years past, in which that section has been construed as excepting the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia from the power of the fishery officers to prevent the use of seines in the non-tidal waters of the rivers, so that, in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, under the decisions which have been given, we are powerless to protect the spawning grounds of the salmon. That is the only amendment proposed.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION.

Mr. TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 130) to amend the Steamboat Inspection Act. He said: There are two or three important provisions in this Bill. In the present Act we have embodied a formula in connection with the testing of boilers and engines, which is a peculiar feature of our legislation to-day, though, when it was adopted, it was applicable to the case. Under our present Act, the Inspection Board have no discretion to pass any boiler or engine that does not come within the corners of that provision. Everyone knows that, in recent years, great changes have been made in the construction of engines and boilers, but we are in this peculiar position to-day, because of the inability of our Board of Inspection to take any other course from time to time as the art of building these engines and boilers may progress, that vessels built in Great Britain, having a Board of Trade certificate, and being registered there, are unable to come under the Canadian flag because they are prohibited by this old rule in the statute in regard to the formula. The most important provision of this Bill is to enable the Governor in Council to make rules and regulations from time to time in regard to the inspection of boilers, and to provide that these shall have effect after publication in the Canada Gazette. Then it is proposed to repeal the clauses containing these rules and this formula, and this will place our Act in the same position as the Act in England, where the rules and regulations are framed under a general provision of that kind, and also in the position in which our Act was after Confederation took place. As regards other provisions of the Bill I may say, that in Halifax—and this is a case in point which suggested this amendment—we have a very fine steamship which was built in the old country and runs between Halifax and American ports in competition with American steamers, and this steamer is compelled, notwithstanding its possessing the British certificate, and notwithstanding its compliance with British laws, to submit to the inspection laws of the United States, dealing with steamers which are alleged not to be seaworthy, in the sense of our laws, when they run between ports in Canada and ports in the United States. I supposed at first that these foreign steamers could be brought under the general law, but I found that this was impossible, and therefore there is a provision to enable a steamship plying between ports in Canada and ports in the United States to be brought under the Steamboat Inspection Act. The other section is to change slightly the penal clause of one of the sections of the Steamboat Act, in reference to the carrying of a larger number of passengers than is allowed by the law.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). In fact it is intended to make the Act more elastic.

Mr. TUPPER. Exactly.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT AMENDMENTS.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 120) to amend chapter 11 of the Revised Statutes, intituled: An Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LAURIER. Although the hon. gentleman explained, the other day, the nature of this Bill, I would like to hear again the reasons which induced him to introduce this Bill, and what effect it is intended to have.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Bill embodies the resolution which we adopted the other day, and the object of it is to have two persons to sign every cheque, a signature and a counter-signature. That rule has been established in all the departments of the Public Service. It is not sufficient that the Deputy Minister shall sign a cheque, but some officer in every department has been appointed to countersign.

The provisions are statutory in regard to the two Houses of Parliament.

Mr. LAURIER. I suppose the object is to have greater security. Who is the second person who is to countersign the cheque?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The object of the provision is to meet the case of sickness or temporary absence of the clerk, and with regard to all other cheques the appointment of such persons is with the Treasury Board.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

TOLLS ON SLIDES AND BOOMS.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 122) respecting the collection of certain tolls and dues therein mentioned. He said: The control and management of the booms and slides, and all matters relating to that service, are vested in the Department of Public Works, and the collection of tolls, and the management of the canals and matters incident thereto, are vested, of course, in the Department of Railways and Canals. But the collection of the revenue for the booms and slides and for the canals, is vested by law in the Department of Inland Revenue. The result of that is that it necessitates in the Department of Inland Revenue the keeping up of a staff for that purpose, whereas the collection can be as well made in the department which has the management of the works. The object of this is to give the collection of the moneys to the department that has control of the works.

Mr. LAURIER. What will you do with the staff in the Inland Revenue Department? They will not have anything to do.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is not intended, as the hon. gentleman will see by section 4, that this arrangement shall affect any appropriation made by Parliament during the present Session in respect of the service to which this Act relates, but every such appropriation shall continue in force and under the control of the proper Ministers. When we come to the item of the appropriation, I think the Minister will be prepared to explain to the House what scheme he has for dispensing with the present staff.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, considered in Committee and reported.

SUMMARY TRIALS ACT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 121) to amend the Summary Trials Act (from the Senate).

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The present section makes this provision of the law extend to the Province of Prince Edward Island. I understand that those connected with the administration of justice there consider that, as regards the Summary Trials Act, the Province should be placed on the same footing as other Provinces, and, therefore, we propose to amend the section, so as to confine the provision that the jurisdiction shall be absolute and without consent to British Columbia and District of Keewatin, and Prince Edward Island shall stand in the same position as other Provinces.

Mr. LAURIER. I call the attention of the Minister to the fact that copies of the Senate Bills have not been distributed on this side of the House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. As the Bill has not been distributed, I ask that the Committee rise and report progress.

Committee rose and reported progress.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like to enquire from the Minister of Public Works whether he has made any investigation into the matter in dispute between himself and myself touching East Pictou River? I have looked over the various items, and I see no sum for East Pictou River especially, and, therefore, I presume the sum to which he referred must have been taken out of the general vote for dredging. Is that the case?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have given orders to the accountant of the department to prepare a statement of the different sums that have been expended, but I have not yet obtained the information. No doubt I shall have the details of the different sums expended on the river when we next go into Supply.

Mr. TUPPER. I should like to say, and perhaps it will afford information to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that in 1875 there was voted for East River of Pictou, $10,000; for Fraser River, removal of rocks, $2,000; for Detroit River, removal of rocks, $5,000; in 1876, Neebish Rapids, $10,000; 1877, Neebish Rapids, $8,000. In 1877 the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) asked Parliament to vote $1,500 for the removal of obstructions in Cowichan River, British Columbia. That river is not a navigable river, but the expenditure was for the purpose of rafting logs down it.

Mr. JONES. The hon. gentleman should have explained to the House that the expenditure at New Glasgow was for dredging the river there and not for any other purpose.

Mr. TUPPER. I did not say that the $10,000 was for removing rocks. The $10,000 was for the East River of Pictou, quite near where Mr. Carmichael lives. The difference being that the $10,000 was for dredging the shallow portion of the river at New Glasgow town, and the $500 was for removing rocks at a portion of the river not navigable, in order to bring the timber down to meet the shipping.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The last appropriation is for a part of the river not navigable, and the expenditure is represented as to be of no value.

Mr. TUPPER. The only case of a similar expenditure which I can find from a cursory examination, is in the Cowichan River, in British Columbia. The hon. gentleman may distinguish between the propriety of making a river navigable for the purpose of shipping, and the other case of removing rocks to bring the timber down to the shipping, and in that way, assist commerce, but I do not think that the House will make any distinction.

Mr. KIRK. There is a good deal of difference: one is to accommodate shipping, and the other is to accommodate lumbering. It is quite easy to spend a million dollars cleaning out rivers in this Dominion, to drive logs, but I think the principle should not be adopted. I know that in other parts of Nova Scotia those who are interested in lumbering clean out the streams in which they drive the logs, at their own expense. They form themselves into companies and spend their own money for that purpose.

Mr. TUPPER. Take the case of slides and booms for which we spend money.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In the case of slides and booms a revenue would be received, and the expenditure, in that event, would be justified. I would say to the Minister of Public Works that it appears to me that the principle of expending money to improve unnavigable rivers, in order to allow logs to float down, is vicious to the last degree, and that the House should dissent from it by their vote. I think the hon. gentleman would do well if he would lay down the principle that he would not be responsible in improving rivers for such purposes; but we can consider that question at another time, as the item is not before the House.

Repairs, Furniture, Heating, &c..... $463,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. With respect to this very large charge of $463,000 for public buildings, which includes the expenses for the furniture, &c., in this place and at Rideau Hall, I dare say it will be in the recollection of the Minister of Public Works that, a year ago, the principle was advocated and partially assented to, at any rate, by the Prime Minister, that in our future relations we should endeavor to fix some special sum which should be assigned for the purpose of maintaining the grounds, &c, about Rideau Hall, and that probably it would be better if that were left to the nobleman who might be appointed Governor General. I desire, in the first place, to enquire whether any such understanding as was then hinted at, has been come to. It is, of course, extremely undesirable that we should be always criticising here sums which are alleged to be expended for the benefit of His Excellency and the comfort of his family, but, on the other hand, it is our duty as representatives of the people to see that the public money is not wasted, and there is no doubt whatever that the expenditure on account of these grounds and the expenditure about Rideau Hall, both for furniture and keeping the place in order, has assumed large proportions which require our serious consideration. I would like to know from the Minister of Public Works whether any sort of understanding such as I speak of has been arrived at, or whether he thinks it could be arrived at?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As regards the understanding which the hon. gentleman speaks of, I do not deny that he may have made that suggestion, but I must say that there has been no such understanding with His Excellency the Governor General. I have no doubt that an understanding of that kind could be made, but it will require some little time for consideration, and I intend, during the recess, to try to come to some arrangement on that point. The arrangement existing for some years is that an officer of my department and an officer of the Governor's household were to go together every two or three months and ascertain what were the wants of the building. If any repairs were required, or any articles destroyed, necessary to be replaced, that was examined by those officers, and then a report was made to my department. On that an estimate was submitted to me, and whenever something would creep up that was not considered should be paid by the department, some understanding was arrived at between the department and the officer in question and that item would disappear from the request, so that the request would be limited to the ordinary repairs, or to the ordinary articles that had to be furnished. I have no doubt that, by comparing the expenses of the last two or three years, we might come to an understanding, as the hon. gentleman suggests, that there should be a lump sum voted, out of which the Governor General might have any repairs and improvements made. With regard to the expenditure about the grounds, it has been limited to as low a sum as has been possible under the circumstances. The hon. gentleman must see that we have asked only a small sum for grounds and for public buildings. My intention is, instead of employing a number of people to look after the grounds, as we have done for years past, to try to get the work done by contract, so that we can have one party responsible to my department, who would undertake to keep these grounds in proper order. In that way, I think we shall be able to save some money. I think that covers the ground of the hon. gentleman's enquiry.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not think it covers the ground at all, and I regret very much that the suggestion made in this House last year and the year previous, and, so far as I could judge, acquiesced in by the Government, has not been acted upon. In the last two years there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction expressed by members of this House as to the expenditure in and about Rideau Hall. It was thought there was a very large leakage there; it was thought there had been very great extravagance there last year and the year before. To such an extent did the dissatisfaction go that the matter was brought before the Public Accounts Committee, and the members of that committee endeavored to ascertain in what way the money was expended. The committee summoned before them the gardener, I believe, and a number of other officials about Rideau Hall, and tried to extract from them evidence to show what was the cause of these enormous expenditures, in order to find out whether there was any justification for them; and I express my own opinion only when I say that after the examination was at an end the committee was more in the dark than they were when it began, but the impression in their minds that very great extravagance existed was more than confirmed. Many hon. gentlemen were opposed to any examination at all; but the prevailing view in the committee was that the time had come when the expenditure should be thoroughly sifted. After the examination had taken place in the Public Accounts Committee, the matter was brought up in this House, and it was suggested to the Government that, inasmuch as there was about to be a change in the Governor General, it was a very good time to introduce a new and economical system. That opinion was very generally expressed on this side of the House, and was acquiesced in by the Ministers, and I thought it would have been carried out; but here we are entering upon the rule of a new Governor General, and the old system is to be continued. The hon. Minister of Public Works knows that this is not a pleasant matter to bring up; and everybody in the House knows, although the country may not know, that the Governor General himself is in no sense or way responsible for this expenditure. The charge was made in the Public Accounts Committee, that the Public Works Department made use of Rideau Hall as a cloak under which to hide a great deal of political expenditure, and I am bound to express the opinion, after hearing the witnesses before the committee, that that charge was true—that a large number of useless officials were kept in the employ of the Government for useless purposes, and their pay improperly charged to Rideau Hall. The expenditure last year, on Rideau Hall, amounted to $23.292, and the year before, to a very much larger sum; and, in the year preceding the elections, this expenditure is incurred very largely to further the political objects of the Government supporters in and about Ottawa. That was the charge made openly in the Public Accounts Committee; and I must say I feel grievously disappointed that the promise made by the Minister of Public Works, that he would see, before the new Governor General came, that some new and more economical system should be adopted, has not been carried out, but we are going on the same as before. Are we to go through another examination in the Public Accounts Committee? That is perfectly useless. The responsibility of this matter rests upon the shoulders of the Government, and, primarily, upon those of the Minister of Public Works. I very much regret that he has not carried his promise out, and it seems to me he does not intend to carry it out.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. Minister doubted the accuracy of my recollection of what passed last year. Now, I desire to read to him the express statement of the Premier made on the 22nd of May, 1888, and found in Hansard on page 1688. On concurrence I brought this matter up, expressing the opinion that a fixed vote for this purpose should be taken, and this is what the Premier replied:

"I go a great way with the hon. gentleman in his statement. I think the expenses have been increasing year after year. I do think they cannot do better than adopt the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman, that there should be some fixed sum for such supplies and works as ought to be defrayed by the Government. If any further sums are required by the Governor General, we can come down to Parliament."

Now, Sir, I think that is about as expressed a pledge as the Government can possibly make to the House, and I have a right to ask whether any steps were taken to fulfil it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to draw the attention of the House to this claim for the last ten years. I remember the discussion that took place in the Public Accounts Committee last year. The committee were given to understand that the Minister of Public Works, or some other member of the Government, would give this matter his serious attention and see if some change could not be made with regard to supplying Rideau Hall and curtailing the expenses of that establishment. As the hon. member for Queen's says, it is very unpleasant for the Opposition to be continuously called upon, in the discharge of their duty, to criticise this item; but we consider that a large amount of money is virtually thrown away in this expenditure. In order to place the House in possession of the facts in regard to the expenditure connected with that building for the last ten years, I will give the items commencing with 1879. On fire and light, including repairs of Rideau Hall, we spent each year as follows:—

1881	24,851.60
1882	32,904.52
1883	39,787,86
1884	44,657.31
1885	39,791.45
1886	35,215.40
1887	38,260.70
1888	31,928.71
Total	$419,164 78

Before the present Governor General came to Canada, it was suggested by hon. members on this side that a decided change should be made in this connection. It was suggested that we should put the building in good repair, put the furniture, if necessary, in good repair, put everything in proper condition, and that the Governor General should be expected to keep everything in and around Rideau Hall in repair at his own expense, with the exception of the building. I admit that we should keep the building in repair, but there is no excuse for the changes of all kinds, unnecessary repairs of all kinds, and the number of hired men kept around there doing nothing. The evidence produced before the committee last year showed plainly a system of extravagance carried on in connection with Rideau Hall that is positively disgraceful. I press upon the hon. Minister the absolute necessity of his making some change in the system such as was suggested last year. With regard to attendance and servants. A flower gardener and an assistant flower gardener are kept, a vegetable gardener and an assistant vegetable gardener, and any number of other hands We should not be asked to bear this expense. If the Governor General wants a garden, he should engage his own gardener. It is unfair that the people should be taxed to keep a lot of men standing around there, hardly doing anything except raising flowers and fiddle dandles and other nonsensical things for the purpose of making the place look nice and pleasant to the Governor General, to whom we are paying $50,000 a year, besides $8,000 for fire and light and $5,000 for travelling expenses. I believe the Minister of Public Works allows himself to be imposed upon by people who are pressing him to give them something to do, and Rideau Hall is the old stall to which they are all sent, and there they draw upon the resources of the country while they are doing some frivolous unnecessary work which could be very well dispensed with. Last year we found, on investigating the accounts, that a number of people were drawing $1.50 a day, and were carried to Rideau Hall and back on the street cars. They would not even walk to their work, and they were paid $1.50 for Sundays also. There is a looseness in the way this whole expenditure is handled that is positively appalling, resulting, in ten years, in the expenditure of half a million dollars to keep the place in repair, so that it might be in a condition fit for the Governor General to live in. The whole system ought to be changed, and we ought to arrange that the only expenditure the Government should be called on to meet would be the repairs of the building itself. We should employ no gardeners, or other men, except those necessary to keep the building in repair. If the Governor General wants vegetables let him pay a man to raise them. We have as good a right to furnish him with the bread on his table as with his potatoes. We have as good a right to be called on to furnish him with his beef as with his vegetables. It is absurd that we should be called upon to spend this enormous amount of money, and I insist that some change should be introduced by which a fixed sum annually would be placed at the credit either of the Governor General or somebody else who would be responsible, and thus avoid this continuous unnecessary drain. The hon. the Minister of Public Works is not treating the House fairly, by calling on us this year again to revote this expenditure and continue the rotten and extravagant system which has been carried on for a number of years. I do not say that this system did not exist under the previous Government. I do not care when it began, but I say it should be put a stop to without delay. I hope, therefore, the Minister of Public Works will not come down another year and ask us again to vote expenditures of this kind.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It appears to me the mistake was made in not having considered this matter before His Excellency came here. That was the time the matter was referred to in this House. It is a delicate matter, discussing these expenditures, when there is a party in occupation, and he has been led to believe that the system which has hitherto prevailed would continue during his occupation. I think the House will generally feel a delicacy in that respect, but if the Government had dealt with this matter before the present Governor General came here, and if the amount had been agreed upon, as was suggested by this side, and apparently concurred in by the Government, then all this discussion might very well have been avoided. They would have known exactly upon what footing they stood and how much money they had at their disposal, and the whole thing would not be required to be brought up every year. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman altogether in saying that the property should be kept up by the Governor General himself, but I think the Parliament will be unanimously disposed to vote a sufficient sum to meet reasonable and proper expense in that respect, both for repairs of the house and incidental expenses. Now, with regard to the present expenditure there, I do think that anyone looking at the returns of the Auditor General, and seeing that 23 men are put down as working at Rideau Hall all the year round, will be forced to the conclusion that there is something wrong somewhere. It appears to me to be utterly ridiculous that 23 men can find constant employment about Rideau Hall for the whole 12 months. I am afraid that there is a good deal in the contention which has been made on this side of the House that, whenever the Minister of Public Works finds himself pressed to give employment to a desirable supporter, he sends him in retreat for a while to Rideau Hall, where he can get fresh air and $2 a day as well. In this case, I think we might utilise the committee which the Government have appointed in reference to the more economical management of affairs in the two branches of the Legislature, which is composed of members of the Government and two members of the Opposition. I suggest that that committee should investigate the matter, present a report to this House and ascertain what would be required to bear all the proper charges which would fall upon the Governor General, and recommend a fixed sum which we would vote every year. I think that would be satisfactory and would be applicable to the next occupant of that position. At all events, it would remove this question from the arena of public discussion here year after year. I suggest to the hon. gentleman that the Government should take that course and should consider this whole matter before next Session.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I must frankly admit that I do not remember what the hon. gentleman stated the First Minister said on this subject. If I had heard it, I would have taken notice of it, but I did not notice it. Of course, if I had, I would have been bound by it, and, now that my attention is called to it, I shall certainly give effect to the promise of the First Minister during the recess, in order to meet the objections which have been made by the hon. gentleman. Of course, I take what has been said by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Jones, Halifax) as being more imaginary than otherwise, when he said that, if parties came to me and I could not find any refuge or any other employment for them, I would send them to Rideau Hall. That is very well said, but it is not so. There may be there, as in every other work throughout the Dominion, a leakage, and when that leakage is found, we try to stop it at once. This year I reduced the expenses there from $23,000 to $19,000, a reduction of $4,000, but I will take care to see what arrangements I may make with His Excellency with a view to his taking upon himself this expenditure, on a certain amount of money being paid to him, as we pay him now a certain amount for light and water and fuel, the Government, of course, taking care of the building and such portions of the grounds as we must take care of. The number of men employed has also been reduced, with the view of economising and of reducing the expenses. As to the large amount of money which has been expended on these buildings every year, I must say that it is owing to the fact that those buildings are old and require a great deal more expenditure to keep them up than would be required on a new building. Sometimes it is found that a portion of the paper, in one of the best rooms, has been torn or destroyed, and we have to restore that by putting new paper on. It is the same thing with the furniture. It gets soiled or broken, and new furniture has to be provided, or the old furniture, if it is still good, has to be repaired. All this costs a good deal of money, and, besides that, we have the water, and the allowance for fuel and light, which is granted to His Excellency. These, however, are fixed items, and I understand that hon. gentlemen would wish that we should make arrangements with His Excellency in such a way that a fixed sum would be paid for these items, and then, if something unforeseen occurred, we would come to Parliament for an additional sum, stating what it was for.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). That would be the better way.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think so. I did not observe the statement of the First Minister. I am seldom out of my place, but I did not notice it.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). We do not often find you asleep.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think, in 1868, there was a resolution passed by the House of Commons on this subject. The question was raised, whether the British Government had the right to fix the salary of any officer whom the Parliament of Canada had to pay. A proposition was made to reduce the salary of the Governor General to a smaller amount than that fixed by the British North America Act, ignoring the right of the Imperial Parliament to fix the amount of any salary, unless it undertook to pay it. Then a resolution was carried to pay the salary which had been fixed by that Act, but making a declaration that that salary should be in full of all the expenses of His Excellency's office. It was to that determination of the House at that time, that the First Minister referred last year. That is a standing resolution of this House, which, I suppose, is still binding on the Public Works Department.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not remember the second part of the resolution to which the hon. gentleman refers. Of course, I remember the first part, but, if the hon. gentleman says the other portion was carried, no doubt he remembers it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is no doubt that, whether the resolution contained those terms or not, the House was induced to grant an increase to the Governor General's salary from £7,000 to £10,000, on the express pledge given by the Prime Minister that if the House agreed to the increase there would be no et ceteras or extras of any kind. My hon. friend from Huron read the pledge which the First Minister gave the House last year. The First Minister went on to say:

"I cannot forget that when the salary was increased from £7,000 to £10,000 I myself gave a pledge, in answer to Mr. Holton, that the £10,000 was to cover everything."

Very well, I am not saying that the £10,000 is or is not sufficient to cover everything; I am not in a position to judge. The hon. gentleman is, or ought to be, in a position to say whether it is sufficient. The position I take is that if the sum is sufficient no extras of any description should be allowed. I do not think there is a disposition on the part of anybody to cut the Governor down to a sum below what ought to be paid him. Let him have everything that is considered reasonable, and such a sum as the Government, on their responsibility, are prepared to recommend to the House, and when he gets that, do not let us have any more of these extravagant expenses. Now, I want to repeat here that the Governor General is improperly held responsible by many people in this country for this extravagance. The people are not in a position to know that the Governor General is not in any way responsible for that. It is the Minister of Public Works, and it is those under him who use the Governor's office and work upon the grounds around there, as excuses for spending larger amounts of money than they have a right to do. The First Minister went on, last year, to supplement the statement I have read by saying:

"I am not going to look back on who commenced the system of extravagance in increasing the supplies, such as furniture, glass and plate, but by degrees all those supplies were furnished, and I have heard that some of those supplies mysteriously disappeared on the change of Governors. All that kind of thing had to be ended. I am sure that the remarks of the hon. gentleman of the party opposite will be of very great assistance to us when we are making new arrangements in the manner we contemplate doing."

Now, in the face of the positive assurance given by the First Minister that a most disgraceful state of matters had existed heretofore, that there had been a system of pilfering by which public stores had been abstracted from Rideau Hall, and that the Government intended at once to carry out the suggestion made from this side, by which that system was to cease, I submit that it is rather cool, at this time of day, to ask us to allow that system to continue. The hon. gentleman says that he never heard that pledge given. I am surprised that the First Minister should give that pledge, and make such serious charges against people stealing property from Rideau Hall, and that the Minister of Public Works never heard of it. Somebody is seriously to blame. The First Minister has deliberately charged that, on the change of Governors, there has been property stolen from the Hall. I do not make the charge at all, I take the authority of the First Minister for it, and I assume he did not make it without good ground. I submit that the extravagance which has existed there is not on the part of the Governor General at all, but the responsibility rests on the Department of Public Works. We have spent nearly half a million there in the past five years, and I think this will be startling to the taxpayers when they come to hear of it. I, for one, will protest against voting small sums for these purposes, because we are merely perpetuating the system under which extravagance has crept in from year to year. I think that we ought to adopt the suggestion made last year that a fixed sum should be voted to the Governor General to include all expenses. My hon. friend from Bothwell says that this resolution of the House is standing to this day, but it has been broken from year to year. If the Government, on their responsibility, say that the sum is not sufficient, let them propose a larger sum, and I am sure the House will vote it if it is required. But the whole system, as it exists now, is disgraceful.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. About the pilfering the hon. gentleman mentioned——

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I merely quoted the statement of the First Minister.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. At all events, he repeats it. I do not say there was pilfering, I do not know it, but my attention was called to the necessity of having an inventory made of the goods and furniture at Rideau Hall when there was a change of Governor. In the time of Lord Lorne an inventory was made by one of his officers and one of ours, and a copy of that was left with them and a copy with the department. Then when Lord Lorne ceased to be Governor, the inventory was made again, and what had disappeared was found to be breakages during the time that he had held office. When Lord Lansdowne came in, an inventory was also taken; likewise when the new Governor came in. So I think, if there had been leakage, or pilfering, a stop has been put to it. Of course I cannot do better than to say that the inventory was properly made, and that the amount of the property is now to be found there. As I stated just now, I think the change of system is desirable. In the meantime, of course, we require money to keep up the building until some better arrangements can be made.

Mr. McMULLEN. This question has been up now for several years, ever since I have been in this House. The Minister of Public Works is very courteous, and always replies to us, and gives us information in regard to matters in his department. I have always noticed his willingness to give any information that he can, and his forbearance in listening to all that we have to say. But although criticism has been made every year, we have just the same condition of things repeated over again. Now, last year the First Minister gave a solemn pledge to the House that some arrangements should be made whereby a decided change should take place in the matter of this expenditure. Now, here we are face to face with the same item, the same extravagance, the same thing over again. I would say that if there is anything more than another that is adding to the unpopularity of Her Majesty's representative in this country, it is the enormous extravagance that is carried on in connection with Rideau Hall. The Governor General is not at all responsible. It is unfair to think that Her Majesty's representative should be in the slightest degree held responsible; but, after all, there is the fact that over and above the salary of $50,000 paid to the Governor General, with $8,000 for fire and light and $5,000 for travelling expenses, the expenditure on Rideau Hall is about $30,000 a year. Every year there is evidence of extravagance in connection with this matter, and these statements being made to the people from every platform where questions of vital interests are discussed, questions with respect to the expenditure of money in regard to which the public have a right to obtain information, tend to make Her Majesty's representative unpopular and unsavory in the eyes of the people. simply because there appears to be such extravaga ce. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about a change of system and the adoption of a sum that would cover all the expenditure. I suppose if the sums spent during the last ten years were averaged, the Governor General would be perfectly willing to take that average and meet the expenditure himself. That, however, would be a very large sum. There was no necessity for one half of the expenditure to have been made, and to arrive at an average the annual sums voted during the last ten years is, I suppose, the basis upon which the calculation would be made, whereas I say that one-fourth the amount would have met all the necessary expenditures in keeping buildings and furniture in repair, and similar expenses. Perhaps the Minister of Public Works would state how many carpenters there are at present at Rideau Hall.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot say, but perhaps two or three.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have a note in my hands addressed to me, because, I suppose, it was thought that I took an interest in this matter. From this note, it appears that there are no less than six carpenters employed there at the present moment. I cannot understand what six carpenters are doing there all the time. Why, the structure must be of basswood or some other rotten material that would not last a year. I understand there are six carpenters, 14 to 20 laborers, and one inspector at Rideau Hall. What are these laborers doing? There is no gardening or digging to be done at this season, but still there are from 14 to 16 men engaged there in laboring work, in addition to six carpenters. We are paying about $80 a week for carpenters alone. I consider it to be my duty to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to this extravagance. It is a positive disgrace to think that the public money is squandered in this manner, and that on Rideau Hall there is, on an average, $41,000 to $45,000 virtually thrown away. I see the First Minister has just come into the House, and I hope he will give some explana ion of the promise he made a year ago in regard to Rideau Hall. I am sorry the hon. gentleman was not in when the question was first brought up, but I hope, before the item is carried, he will give some explanation as to why a change has not taken place in the direction indicated in his promise to the House when the matter was brought up last year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman had first better see what he stated.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will look it up, and endeavor to keep my promise. I may say that, since the advent of the present Governor General, there have been communications between the Minister of Public Works and his department, and the officers connected with the Governor General's establishment, with a view to regulate the expenditure. There has been no fixed arrangement made, but I know there is every disposition on the part of His Excellency, to aid in preventing the waste that has gone on, and which has occurred during some changes of the Governors General, by the disappearance of some of the appliances about the building, and some of the furniture, and so on.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The Minister of Public Works told us he knew nothing about it.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That is very unfair on the part of the hon. gentleman. I did not say that. The hon. gentleman is putting words into my mouth that I did not use. I said, we had taken care, in the time of Lord Lorne, and during the term of Lord Lansdowne, and on the advent of his successor, to have an inventory made of every article in Rideau Hall, and we thus guaranteed that the articles would not disappear, and the articles that were missing, were found either broken, or they had been replaced during the incumbency of the Governors.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I would be very sorry to mis represent the Minister of Public Works. When the question was brought up, and the hon. gentleman was reminded of the promise made by the First Minister, I certainly understood him to say—and I think it was so understood on this side of the House—that that was the first time he had heard of it.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think there was a promise, and I will point out what passed. I stated that the only way of avoiding this very disagreeable altercation coming up from time to time in regard to the expenses of Rideau Hall, would be for the Government to bring down a fixed sum, as they do in the case of charges for lighting and for travelling, and if anything more was required the Government, on their responsibility, should ask Parliament for it. As the First Minister will see if he reads my remarks and then his own answer to that, he assented. He declared that he would adopt the suggestion, and it was for that reason that I sent the Hansard across to him. My suggestion was that the Government should, at their own responsibility, fix a sum each year which should be expended for those miscellaneous purposes, and if more was required they could ask it from Parliament from time to time and give their reasons. To that suggestion the First Minister assented and promised that it should be done, but on cross-examining the Minister of Public Works we found he knew nothing at all about the promise made by the First Minister, had never heard of it in fact, and that he understood nothing in the direction we indicated had been done, although he explained to us that there were some pourparlers going on with officers of the household so as to fix a sum. Our point was that the Government should take the responsibility of bringing down a regular annual sum for this purpose.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This matter was discussed in the first Parliament, in 1868. There was a proposition to fix the salary of the Governor General at $35,000 a year, and there was an amendment moved that it should be $32,000. A Bill was passed fixing the salary at $35,000, and at the end of the Session it was reserved for Imperial consideration. That Bill was sent home, and the next year the hon. gentleman, who was then at the head of the Government, proposed:

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient, after the strong desire expressed by Her Majesty's Government, that the salary of the Governor General should be maintained at the fixed sum of £10,000."

That was the hon. gentleman's proposition, and there was some amendments to the effect that the salary should be fixed at £7,500, or that it should be retained at the sum fixed by the Bill of the previous year. Those two amendments were voted down, and the proposition of the First Minister was carried, fixing the salary of the Governor General at £10,000. The First Minister then said that this would include all expenses. That is my recollection of his statement, but I have not the report here.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman is quite right.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then, when we were discussing this question last year, I think the hon. gentleman referred to his report as having given his pledge at that time that that should be the amount of the expenses connected with the Governor General, and that he would see that this suggestion should be carried out.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No doubt the hon. gentleman is quite correct. At the time the sum of £10,000 sterling was fixed, it was understood across the floor, and stated in Parliament, that the $50,000 which was considered an equivalent to £10,000, should cover all expenses. I think that was pretty well carried out for some years, and up to the time that the Governor General before the last came here. With respect to the keeping of the grounds about Rideau Hall, which are expensive, the Governor General then said: "I do not want to keep them up; if the Government does not choose to keep them up, let them grow wild;" and it was thought by Parliament that was a reasonable request, and that the outside work should be done at the public expense, and not out of the Governor's salary. I think, with that exception, they kept pretty well within the limits, but I cannot say positively without looking back at the accounts. My hon. friend opposite (Mr. Mackenzie) knows how difficult he found it to restrain the esthetic tastes of some of the Governor Generals.

Mr. MACKENZIE. With reference to that, I think the right hon. gentleman will remember that after a circular was sent from Lord Carnarvon, furniture was supplied for the Governor General's house, at an expense of some $17,000. This was the commencement of the system, but I do not believe that it was intended to keep it up.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My friend, the Minister of Public Works was not here last year when we were discussing the matter, but now he will take a note of it, and endeavor to carry out the suggestion, which, I think, is a very proper one.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is a promise now.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is a renewal.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, a renewed note.

Mr. BLAKE. Do we understand that the right hon. gentleman has got the Minister of Public Works to endorse him now?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do we understand that it is to begin next year?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Time is not the essence of the contract.

Mr. BLAKE. When the Bill on notes comes up, we will abolish the days of grace for this promissory note.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman give the House any satisfactory assurance that he will adopt this policy which will prevent the expenditure of such enormous sums of public money in connection with Rideau Hall? I hold the Public Works Department responsible, and I wish to be understood as saying that neither the Governor General nor any of his staff is at all responsible.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If there is anyone responsible in the matter I am responsible, and there should be no responsibility whatever on His Excellency about that. If the request comes from Rideau Hall, an estimate is made, and if found correct, the system is that we pay for it. I intend as soon as Parliament will be over (and I suppose the hon. gentleman will not begrudge me a little holiday for a few days' rest) to see about this arrangement which the hon. gentleman speaks of. I will take up the matter and see how far we can arrange with His Excellency in the line of the discussion of to-day. It will then have to be settled by an Order in Council, and that Order in Council will be communicated to Parliament next Session.

Grounds, Public Buildings, Ottawa..... $7,000

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Does that include the expense for the greenhouse and conservatory?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes, the whole thing. I reduced the amount, as the hon. gentleman sees, because I think we will be able to do it by contract at a reduced expense.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). There was a statement made by an hon. gentleman last year respecting the use made of the greenhouse. Perhaps the Minister of Public Works will bring down a return showing the Ministers who have the advantages of the greenhouse in getting the plants for their tables occasionally during the season. It would be interesting to know this, because it appears some of them get all, and some, I believe, the Minister of Public Works among others—get none.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not know anything about that. The flowers are put in the beds in the grounds, in the winter they go into the conservatory, and in the spring they are brought out again and put on the grounds. That is all I can say about it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to draw the attention of the Minister to the expenditure on Major's Hill Park. It is becoming very much improved, but it is costing a large amount of money. I notice that last year $10,504.32 were spent upon it, and there are some very peculiar items, such as black slate, 1,515 loads, at $1.50 a load, $2,272.50. Will the Minister give us some explanation with regard to that item?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This was for the roads and avenues in the park. The hon. gentleman must remember that that park was got without improvements, that it was handed over by the city to the Government, and that the Government undertook to put it in order. This sum of $7,000 asked this year is to cover the balance of the improvements there, and next year we will only have to ask what will be absolutely necessary to keep the grounds in order.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think it is really a very expensive addition to the grounds which we have already, and one which we could very well have done without. I find that for gardeners and laborers $7,402.50 were spent last year. I fancy the expenses in connection with this are somewhat like the expenses in connection with Rideau Hall; a number of men must be put there who do virtually little or nothing. I have been through that place, and I notice that there is very good stone there; and if this stone had been broken up or gravel had been put down, it would have done as well as black slate. If that park were close to the grounds here it might be an advantage. I suppose the next vote the hon. gentleman will want will be for a bridge over the ravine to connect the park with these grounds. If we are going to use the Printing Department, we will have to have a more convenient way to reach it than by going around by Wellington street. Can the hon. Minister tell us about that?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In the plan there was a wire bridge to be put over the canal to connect Parliament grounds with Major's Hill; but we did not think the time had come to ask for a sum for that purpose. The intention would be to make it, not a carriage bridge, but only for foot passengers. It would really increase the value and the usefulness of both of these grounds; but we do not intend asking anything this year.

Mr. McMULLEN. Who is the person who was in charge of these laborers?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The officers of my department visit these grounds to see if they are in good order, and if the men are discharging their duty. I think the man in charge is one Garello.

Mr. McMULLEN. What pay does he get?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. $2.50 or $3 a day.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is he in charge all the year round?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes. There is a little conservatory there, and he has to look after the plants during the winter.

Heating, Public Buildings, Ottawa ..... $60,000.

Mr. JONES (Halifax.) The amount charged for heating seems large: 900 cords of wood and 1,100 tons of coal, for these buildings, which only require to be heated about six months, is a very large amount. A large portion of these buildings are only heated during the Session.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No doubt that amount is large, but I have ascertained that this cordwood as well as coal is all required. Though Parliament be not sitting, the furnaces are kept at work, because it would not do to leave a large portion of the building without heat two or three months during the winter.

Water, Public Buildings, Ottawa..... $20,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How is this increased?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This is the water for different buildings in the city. With the new buildings we require a larger supply.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The increase is 50 per cent.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has water gone up so much as that, or do you intend adding 50 per cent. to the number of officials in order that the extra supply may be consumed?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. You do not object to their drinking water? The parliamentary and departmental buildings on Parliament Hill, the Supreme Court, the Greenhouse, Rideau Hall, Geological Museum, the Post Office, the Custom House, &c., expend $12,000 in water. The new departmental buildings on Wellington street, Art Gallery and Fish Hatchery, cost $3,650. The leased buildings for the Indian Department, the Interior Department, Victoria Chambers, branch Post Office Department, Customs Department, Printing Bureau, &c., cost $4,000, making a total of $19,650.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How is it that while the parliamentary and departmental buildings, &c., cost $12,000, the same as last year, in all the other departments you have increased the amount from $1,500 to some $6,000?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Do the waterworks belong to the city of Ottawa?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I invite attention to the expenditure on Major's Hill Park, which I objected to last year. It seems that the Government spent $10,000 in ornamenting Major's Hill Park for the benefit of the citizens of Ottawa, and they are actually paying the city of Ottawa $199.54 for watering that place. It seems to me that when we spend such a large sum annually for the benefit of the city, the least the city could do would be to furnish the water free.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The charges that were lately shown to me for certain of these buildings amounted to $3,500. I had the matter examined by the Chief Mechanical Engineer, who reported that he thought $2,500 would be sufficient. That was offered to the Water Committee, but they were not disposed to accept it. The matter stood there until they finally sent word that they would agree to the amount we offered them. The hon. gentleman knows how difficult it is to get a water company or a city council to lower their rates. We are trying the best we can to reduce the rates, and, if last year we did not expend the whole of the grant, I do not think that should be brought against us this year when we are taking enough to meet the requirements of the different departments. If, after making the arrangements with the city, we find that, instead of $20,000, we can do with $17,000, so far so good; the money will not be expended, but we should have this vote at any rate.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The Minister of Public Works has not answered my objection. I objected to paying the city for water for the Major's Hill Park, upon which we are spending a large amount of money for the benefit of the city. I think the Government should not pay $200 a year to the city of Ottawa for water for that Park, when they are expending a great deal of money in improving that Park for the benefit of the city.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The arrangement with the city was, that we were to take back that Park, and other properties in this town, and that arrangement was brought before Parliament a few years ago, and agreed to.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It was a very improper arrangement.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We did not think so at the time, and I think it was a very good arrangement. I am sure that the city will not give us the water for the Park.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Minister has not dealt with the subject which I brought before him. I pointed out to the Minister that, while the estimate for the main public buildings in Ottawa—the Departmental Buildings, Supreme Court, City Post Office, Custom House, Drill Hall, Geological Museum, and Rideau Hall—remains as it was last year, the amount for the smaller public buildings which are scattered through the town, the Interior Department, Indian Affairs, Savings Bank Branch, Examining Warehouse, Fish Hatchery, and Major's Hill Park, is increased from $1,500 to $8,000, or an increase of $6,500. I think there should be some explanation of this enormous increase for these smaller buildings, while the larger buildings, containing, I suppose, nine-tenths of the public employés, remain at the same cost for water. It cannot be that the price of water has gone up, because, in that case, the increase would be apparent in the estimate for the main public buildings.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This is the statement which is given by my officers, who are responsible to me, as to what water is required, and what it will cost. If experience shows us next year that this is too large an amount, of course we will have to reduce it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman did not state what the estimate is for the new building.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We know what the estimate is, but we do not know what the expense will be.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The expenditure last year for that building was $488. Is the estimate for the new building $6,000?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No; the estimate for the new building and the Art Gallery and Fish Hatchery is $3,650.

Dominion Emigration Buildings—Repairs, Furniture, &c..... $2,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Where are these buildings situated? Are they on Wellington street?

Sir HECTOR LANGENIN. This is not for the buildings in Ottawa, but for the buildings all through the Dominion.

Harbors and Rivers, P. E. I..... $11,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not wish to detain the committee, but I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the unsatisfactory condition of the piers in Prince Edward Island, and it seems to me, from the sum which he is asking this year, that we are to go on the same way during the coming year as we have in the past. I regret that very much. I was in hopes that the hon. gentleman would have asked a larger sum from Parliament for this necessary work. I wish to remind the committee that some years ago the Government of this Dominion took over from the Government of Prince Edward Island a large number of wooden piers or structures—wharves, we called them—and assumed them as Dominion works. I am not going into the question whether that was a wise or an unwise policy on the part of the Government. The hon. gentleman then passed an Order in Council stating that $75,000 was the amount which the Government would allow, and that they would require a receipt in full from the Government of Prince Edward Island before they paid the money. The Local Government would not give the receipt, but the Local Government were in financial difficulties, and the hon. gentleman, with the commendable desire to extract the Local Government from their political difficulties, revoked the substance of that Minute of Council which he had passed, and granted an additional $50,000, conditionally on the Local Government signing a receipt in full. The Local Government would not sign the receipt in full, but my hon. friend, in the goodness of his heart, paid over the $50,000 at a critical moment, as he well knows, in order to get the Local Government out of their difficulties. So we stand now with $75,000 and $50,000 paid to the Local Government for these wharves. This settlement is unsatisfactory to all parties, but especially to the people of Prince Edward Island who use these wharves. What is the result? The result of the meddling and muddling is that the Local Government refused to acknowledge that the remaining piers which the Dominion Government refused to take over belonged to them, and that the piers which the Dominion Government have taken over have been kept in such a bad state of repair that they are of very little use to the people at all in some parts of the Island. At an early period of the Session, I pointed out to the hon. gentleman the condition in which these piers were. I did not go over them separately or in detail, but I have before me a statement which I will not take up the time of the committee by reading. The hon. gentleman does not appear to have any local officer to look after these piers, twenty-six or twenty-seven in number, and to keep them in reasonable repair. Now, whether the hon. gentleman was right or wrong in taking them over in the first instance, cannot now be questioned. They have become the property of the Dominion Government. The Dominion Government has received the fees charged for the shipping, paid by the people for landing goods on those wharves and shipping from them, which money goes into the Consolidated Revenue. I maintain it is simply disgraceful that these wharves, which are absolutely necessary for the exportation of the surplus crop the people produce, are not kept in such a state of repair as enables the people to use them. The hon. gentleman has only put $6,000 this year in the Estimates, the same as last year. He knows the sum was insufficient last year. He cannot expect this kind of a thing to go on. I may say to him that the wharves are of that character that unless they are kept in repair, in a year or two he will have to rebuild them entirely. It is a very foolish and unwise policy to let them get out of repair, for the expenditure of a dollar one year may save the expenditure of $5 the next year, and if the hon. gentleman allows this thing to go on he will have no wharves at all to repair. I am sure the hon. gentleman does not desire that the people should have no wharves at all, but they will have none unless he keeps them in a reasonable state of repair. I asked him the other day the name of the officer whose duty it was to examine and report on those piers. The hon. gentleman said he had some officer in St. John who took charge of all the Island works. I do not know who he is. He has no office in Charlottetown or Prince Edward Island, that I am aware of. If he goes there at all, his going and his coming are unknown to me, or to any one of my hon. colleagues. I would like to know who this person is, so that his conduct may be reported and commented upon in this House, as I would feel it my duty to comment upon it. All I can say now is to tell the hon. gentleman that the state of the wharves and piers under his charge, paid for and owned by the Dominion, is not creditable to his department. Now, I am perfectly convinced that if we had the hon. gentleman down there for one summer—I think it would do his health good to come down next summer when he takes his holidays, where he can breathe the fresh air, and enjoy the luxury of fresh fish—if he could see personally the condition in which those wharves are, he would not leave without giving personal orders to have them put in proper repair at once. I have any amount of complaints from people who use these wharves; I need not read them separately because they are all to the same tenor, that the wharves are not kept in proper repair.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the wharf at St. Mary's Bay, a very important wharf, situated in a large agricultural district. Last year that wharf was in such a state of disrepair that the inhabitants had to get together and repair it themselves. But the repairs they made were only temporary, and unless the Minister does something this year the wharf will be unfit for use next season. There are some very important wharves or piers in the county of King's that were not taken over by the Dominion Government at the same time that the others were taken. I would refer the Minister, especially to the one at the head of Murray River, to another at Aiken's Shore, and the wharf at the head of Grand River, in King's County. Now, at the time we entered Confederation a solemn promise was made us that all our principal wharves and harbors would be taken over by the Dominion Government. This promise was made by the Hon. Mr. Pope, who was Minister of Marine and Fisheries in this Government some years ago. This gentleman was one of the delegates of Prince Edward Island to the Conference, and on his return, speaking in our House of Assembly of the terms under which we entered Confederation, he stated that we were promised that our piers would be taken over by the Dominion Government and kept in good repair. Now, I do not know why these valuable works that I have mentioned, the wharf at Murray River, and the wharf at Grand River, and that at Aiken's Shore, shall be permitted to run down. I think, if the Minister will refer to the Public Accounts, he will see that the wharfage collected at those points under his charge, is sufficient to pay a respectable interest on the money invested. I know that two wharves in the village from which I come, must be paying an annual revenue of $250 or $300 a year, and that would pay a fair interest on the money that is put in the Estimates this year for repairing all the wharves in the Island. I am confident that if the hon. gentleman will take charge of the wharves at Murray River and at Grand River, the wharfage he will collect will pay him a very respectable interest on any sum that would be required to put them in repair, and unless he does take charge of them in a short time, they will be entirely gone. Now, before we entered Confederation we always had new works built when the necessity rose for the accommodation of the inhabitants of that Island. Let me point out to the Minister two new works in particular which are absolutely required. One is a work that has been carried on for some time at Bay Fortune, where a wharf or a breakwater is required. This place is situated in a large agricultural district, and if a pier was provided, it would save the farmers from going a long distance to reach another place where they can ship their produce. So necessary is that work that they have subscribed the sum of $500, which they have expended on this work, besides doing a great deal of other work themselves. A thousand dollars, or a couple of thousand additional spent upon this work, would be a vast benefit to the people, and I would ask the Minister to take this matter into his consideration and endeavor to help the people there in their efforts to get shipping accommodation. The second place to which I would draw his attention is Mount Stuart, at the head of the Hillsboro' River. A wharf is required at that point. The people have been petitioning the Local Government for years to build one there. The answer they get is that the Local Government have nothing to do with it, that it belongs to the Dominion Government. They have petitioned the Dominion Government for years, but they get no reply. Now we do not know which Government to approach. This is evidently a very unsatisfactory state of things. It is not a very great matter, and I am sure the two Governments might come to an arrangement, without any further trouble, and agree to which Government this work belongs, and keep the people no longer in suspense. A couple of thousand dollars would build a good pier there. I would like to see the Minister of Public Works build that pier this summer, or at least come to an arrangement with the Local Government so that the people would know which Government to apply to in the matter, and the money already expended could be refunded to the Government which takes charge of the work.

Mr. WELSH. I spoke in regard to this matter the other night, and I have little more to say. I think the management of affairs is disgraceful. The Marine Department receives the rents of the wharves, and returns are made to that department. These are pigeon-holed, and after six or twelve months the reports fall into the hands of the Minister of Public Works. I will give an instance. A report was sent to the Marine Department stating that so much money had been received from the wharf, and mentioning that it was of no further use for shipping purposes, for lack of repair, and desiring the order of the department to have it placed in proper repair. The Marine Department said: We know nothing about it; it is not true; we will not expend anything. Five or six months afterwards the report found its way into the Public Works Department, and of course it took some time for the red-tape to work before any action was taken; there has to be a great deal of consideration before any action is taken here. It is altogether a bad system. As to the amount I see in the Estimates, it will not do much more than pay the salaries of some of the fossils the department have round there looking after the wharves. I think it is a disgrace to the Government and the country that our piers and wharves should be in their present condition. On Wood Island breakwater, for 20 years, the Local Government laid out a large sum of money, and after we entered into Confederation the Dominion Government undertook that work and built a large addition to the breakwater; and I must say they have done good work there so far as the breakwater is concerned. But they have never dredged the harbor. They sent the dredge there once; but after she had got into a capital position, they took her away. I subsequently asked why she was not sent there, and the Government said there was not water enough for her. But there is enough water; the dredge has been in the harbor, but she never performed any work. We might as well have no dredge at all. In 1887 she was brought down to Charlottetown for repairs; she remained there that autumn. There was a slip built for her, and she was hauled on it. During the winter nothing was done on her. In 1888 she was repaired; and so she has not done any work from August, 1887, to the present time. The expense of repairing that dredge was $12,600. If you add incidentals and the wages of the captain, engineers and hands, the whole cost will be nearly $20,000, and I understand and believe that the amount of the contract given for constructing her, in the first place was $7,000. Had proper judgment been used, the dredge would have been taken to Pictou, and put on the slip there, and all the repairs could have been done in one month, at a cost of less than $5,000. However, coming back to the piers, I may say that important piers have absolutely fallen into the rivers, whereas, if $200 or $300 had been expended a couple of years ago, a very small sum would have kept them in repair, while now a large sum will be required, and some piers will have to be rebuilt. I have very little hopes of any attention being paid to these complaints. I had faith in the Minister of Public Works, but I have been deceived so much by his promises that I have very little faith now. I will give an instance as to the amount of confidence to be placed in the hon. gentleman. This happened with respect to Red Point wharf. I asked, in 1887, as will be seen by Hansard, page 756, as follows:—

"Mr. WELSH asked, Has any money been expended by the Government in the repairs of Red Point wharf, Hillsboro' River, P.E.I., during the past two years? If so, how much? Has that wharf been taken over from the Island Government by the Dominion? If not, how came the repairs to be made by the Dominion?

"Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I may say that I am informed by the chief engineer that no money had been expended by the Government in the repairs of Red Point wharf during the past two years."

I hunted over the papers because I knew well that some money had been expended on this wharf, and I knew it had not been taken over with the rest of the wharves of the Island; but during an election contest, at a meeting which I attended, the Provincial Secretary of the Island produced a telegram from the Minister of Public Works stating that the wharf would be repaired. It was not then a Government pier. I found they had taken it over—for political purposes, I suppose; I wish they would take a lot more over for any purpose they please, so long as they keep them in repair. The Minister of Public Works said no money had been spent on Red Point wharf, but I afterwards found that during one fiscal year $199.97 was spent on necessary repairs, and the total sum expended on that pier since it was taken over from the Local Government was $799.07. Now, how are you to get at the facts relating to those piers? I asked the Minister of Public Works whether any money had been expended on that wharf, and he gave me to understand that no money had been expended. Twelve months afterwards, when certain sessional papers had been distributed, I find that there had been $700 expended. What confidence can I place in any statement of the hon. gentleman made to me across the floor, or in his promises, when he not only gave me the promise that that work would be done, but he gave me his handwriting that such and such a thing would be done, and yet these works are neglected. What am I to do? I have asked the Minister that certain work should be done, and he has given me his promise for two years, and he has given me his handwriting, but he has failed to carry out his promise; I have asked questions across the floor, but he has led me astray. What am I to do? I shall move for a commission or a committee to examine into these matters. If I had the hon. gentleman in a house under my command—I will not say what I would do with him; if I did my language might be more forcible than polite. I recommend the Government, even at this eleventh hour, for their own credit, to place the piers and public works of Prince Edward Island in a proper state of repair, and see that they are attended to properly. The hon. gentleman has no difficulty in bringing down a vote for $30,000 for cutting a few tons of hay for Government House, and this has to be done, even though the whole of the Province of Prince Edward Island has to be starved to do it. I hope the Minister of Public Works will reform in regard to the attention paid to the public works of Prince Edward Island. He should get rid of a few of the fossils he has around him and put in their place young and active men. It is also high time that we had an inspector of wharves resident in the Island, for we have as many piers as has New Brunswick.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I may say that I hope these are not the only sums of money that we shall have to ask Parliament to vote for Prince Edward Island. We have the Supplementary Estimates yet, and I trust that the hon. gentleman may keep his recommendations for that time.

Mr. WELSH. All right.

Committee rose, and, it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

Harbors and Rivers, P.E.I $11,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I wish to call the attention of the hon. Minister to a statement made by my hon. friend from King's (Mr. Robertson) this afternoon, relative to the construction of the new pier at Mount Stuart. The question is important, because it raises the larger question whether the Dominion should put up piers in places of that kind, or the Local Government. A very large and influential public meeting was held a year ago at Mount Stuart for the purpose of taking steps to memoralise whichever Government ought to build the wharf. I was unable to be present myself, but I wrote to the secretary of the meeting that, in my opinion, the Local Government was the proper person to build it. Mount Stuart village comprises 1,000 to 1,500 inhabitants, and is situated at the head of the Hillsborough River, about 18 miles from Charlottetown. Of course, the river is a tidal river. I was not aware that the Dominion Government had at any time, or in any Province, constructed piers in places like that. I shall be very glad to learn that I was wrong in my opinion. I think it is very desirable that a conclusion should be arrived, at at an early day. The desirability of constructing the wharf is a matter about which there is no dispute. Public men on both sides admit its necessity. The inhabitants are very much interested in it and are constantly applying to the local members and the Dominion members to take steps to have it constructed. The impression prevails in Local Government circles that, owing to the decision given by the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of Holman & Green, the Dominion Government have the duty thrust upon them of constructing all piers and wharves in all tidal rivers. In that opinion I do not coincide, but as the Local Government hold very strong opinions upon the subject, I want to bring the matter to the notice of the department and have a conclusion arrived at if possible at once.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Was a petition sent?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, about three or four weeks before this House met. As to the fact that the wharf when constructed will be a paying wharf, I do not think there is any room for doubt. The question is what Government should build it? I hope this debate will not close without some expression of opinion, and without our being informed what the practice of the department has been, whether wharves have been constructed in other parts of the Dominion in places situated similarly to the one I have mentioned.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN, I do not know that river well enough to answer the hon. gentleman at once. Is it a wide river?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is about 20 or 23 miles in length. The mouth of the river is at Charlottetown. It is a navigable river up to about Mount Stuart, which is about 18 miles from Charlottetown. At Charlottetown the river is a mile wide, and at Mount Stuart, a quarter of a mile wide. It is a navigable, tidal river, up to the spot where it is asked that the wharf should be constructed. The buildings cluster around this bridge, which was built very many years ago by the Local Government, and people cannot ship above the bridge. It is below the bridge, where the river is about a quarter of a mile wide, that the inhabitants seek to have this wharf constructed. It is of great importance, not only to the inhabitants of that village, but to the people of the district surrounding it, that this wharf should be built.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will postpone my answer to the hon. gentleman, until I have examined into the matter. Of course we have built wharves on the Saguenay River, but that is a wide and a large river. However, I will enquire.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman be able to give me his opinion before concurrence?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN, Yes, I expect I may.

Mr. McINTYRE. I would ask the Minister a question in connection with the Souris breakwater. I would ask him why two foremen were employed in 1887 and 1888, and who was the timekeeper during the construction of this work?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot answer that now. If the hon. gentleman will send me his question in writing, I will endeavor to answer it when we meet again.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr McINTYRE. I thought it would be easy for the hon. gentleman to inform us why, on the expenditure of $6,000 for the repair of the breakwater, two foremen were employed, when originally in the building of the breakwater only one foreman was necessary, when an expenditure of $70,000 was required. I thought it was strange that two foremen should have been employed for a small repair.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a foreman and an assistant.

Mr. McINTYRE. There was no necessity for an assistant.

Mr. FOSTER. The assistant was only there twenty-six days.

Mr. McINTYRE. Perhaps I can let a little light in on the matter. As far as I can ascertain, I believe it is a fact that there was a little unpleasantness among the party there at that time. They all thought they were as good engineers as Mr. John Cantwell, so the two were looking for the job, and there was likely to be a division in the camp; and, in order to compromise matters, they appointed Mr. Stewart as an additional foreman. I do not object, nor does anyone that I know, to Mr. Stewart, because he is a capable man, but for an expenditure of $6,000 I think it is altogether wrong to appoint two foremen, when the work was originally constructed, in 1876 or 1887, or thereabouts, at the expenditure of $70,000, with only one foreman being employed. I think that all that can be granted for these public works in Prince Edward Island should be expended on the work itself, instead of on men who are required to superintend the work. One foreman was quite sufficient here, and I trust that no more of this kind of thing will be done on this breakwater, or anywhere else, because it it utterly indefensible that amounts voted for the maintenance and repairs of this work should be expended for the purpose of soothing the feelings of political friends. With regard to the pier at Mount Stewart, which has been petitioned for, I agree with all that has been said by the hon. member for Queen's County (Mr. Davies). There was a large meeting held last fall. I was prevented from attending it, but I understand there was a large and enthusiastic meeting, at which my colleague was present. I understand that this is a work which is very much needed, because they have never had a real wharf in that section of the country. They used to load all their produce off the bridge. The river is a navigable river, where large ships are loaded from this bridge, and now it cannot accommodate all that is required. There is another pier, of which I spoke last year, that is at Bay Fortune, in King's County. The people in that locality have constructed a large portion of the work on their own responsibility and at their own expense, and for two years they have been asking the Dominion Government for a small amount of money to complete the work; but their petitions have not been listened to at all. As far as our piers and wharves in Prince Edward Island are concerned, they ought to be looked after particularly, because, as everyone knows, Prince Edward Island is purely a farming country. We have no mineral deposits of any kind whatever, such as are to be found in the other Provinces We have also in the surrounding waters magnificent fisheries, and it is a matter of the greatest possible importance to our farmers to have wharves and piers from which to ship their produce, and it is also requisite that our fishermen should have their boats protected by breakwaters. It appears that some $77,000 have been paid for the piers which were taken over by the Dominion Government some few years ago. As far as these piers are concerned, the Dominion Government took over some 24 or 25 and left the rest on the hands of the Local Government. If they took a portion I don't see why they should not take the whole of these piers. Those which were taken over are not looked after by this Government, and the Local Government do not look after those which were left. They claim, either justly or unjustly, that all the piers belong to the Dominion Government, and between the two of them the piers are falling into ruin. Those taken over by the Dominion Government are not looked after much better than the others. There is a small expenditure made every few years on them, but really the total amount expended could be judiciously expended on one of those piers. As far as the piers are concerned it is a matter of the greatest possible concern to our farmers to ascertain whether this Government is going to take them or not, so that we may know whether they are to be kept up by the Local Government or the Dominion Government.

Mr. PERRY. I would like to ascertain from the Minister of Public Works if he can give the House any information as to the progress of the work commenced in 1885, in blasting rock in the harbor of Cascumpec, how much money has been spent on it, and the good that has been derived from it? I believe I am well informed when I state that some time last year they were obliged to abandon the blasting of the rock in which they had been engaged for two years, at an expense of ten or twelve thousand dollars, and they had to commence somewhere else. They found that they were wrong, and all this money was thrown away. There appears to me to be great neglect on the part of the department in allowing the public money to be squandered in that way. When I examine the report issued by the department of my hon. friend, I find that it gives no information at all; it is simply trifling with the public. Let me read what this report says of Cascumpec:

"Cascumpec, in Prince County, is on the north side of Foxley River, an arm of Cascumpec Bay, and is about 20 miles south of North Cape. The formation of a channel through the rocky bar obstructing the entrance to the harbor, which was commenced in 1885, was continued during the year."

It does not say what they have done, how many cubic yards have been taken out; it does not say whether this work, after two years experiment on it, at an expense of thousands of dollars, is likely to do any good or not. It does not say that they have abandoned the work and gone somewhere else. This report is trifling with the representatives of the people. It is not worth the paper upon which it is printed. I suppose my hon. friend does not know himself how many piers and wharves the Government of Canada have taken over from Prince Edward Island, and which are now the property of Canada. I asked him last year, and he did not know, and I do not suppose he knows this year any better. I find that out of the 24 wharves and piers taken over from Prince Edward Island, we have a report of only five or six. What has become of the rest? I suppose they are like that of West Point. After the Government has spent $5,000 on a public work they have abandoned it, and the work is broken up. Let me read what Mr. Perley, the Engineer in Chief, says. I do not suppose that my hon. friend even knows what Mr. Perley said:

"The wharf at West Point is of general benefit and of importance."

Well, I do not see that it is any benefit at all, because it is broken up, and the Government are too penurious to rebuild it. I suppose the Government is not very well pleased, because the tight little Province has sent no one here to help them. I cannot help that; I have no command over the political franchise of the people of Prince Edward Island. More than that, I find that my hon. friend the other day led me astray in this House, actually led me astray. That is a hard charge to make; but I was completely led astray by that hon. gentleman. I asked him the other day, if J. P. Brennan had been appointed assistant with Mr. Gillis as foreman in this blasting business. My hon. friend said no, Mr. Brennan had not been appointed assistant. I would like to know who is wrong, whether my hon. friend or the report of the Auditor General, because here is what the Auditor General says:

"Achille Jobin, foreman, five months, $450; John Gillis, foreman, one month, $90."

Pretty good pay, too—

"J. P. Brennan, assistant foreman, 15 days, $30."

Now, who am I to believe—the Department of Public Works, or the report of the Auditor General? If the Government have appointed Mr. Brennan as assistant foreman in blasting that rock, they have done wrong, in my opinion, because Mr. Brennan is already collector of Customs in Cascumpec. He is also owner and shareholder in several trading vessels, and the Department of Marine have thought proper to do away with the preventive officers there. They have done this, they say, on the score of economy. That is not the case. The $100 these two officers were receiving have been added to the salary of the Customs officer, and all this time there has been no preventive officer there to watch these vessels which this gentleman was trading with. The Minister of Customs told us the other day: We will re-appoint these men whenever the Customs Department requires it, whenever the safety of the revenue of the country requires it. I would like to ask my hon. friend, is it fair to have one of these deputy officers in that Island receiving the Customs dues of the Dominion of Canada, while he is an importer himself, while he is interested in vessels, and no preventive officer is there to see that the laws of the country are carried out? Instead of saving that $100, the money is paid to Mr. Brennan as deputy Custom house officer in Cascumpec. Now, we find that he has appended to his other title, that of assistant foreman to Mr. Gillis, at $3 or $4 a day. In looking over this account in the Auditor General's Report, we find that most of the articles which have been supplied in blasting this rock were got through this gentleman himself. No doubt the prices were pretty well up. He is a strong political partisan of the Government, and does a good business for the Government in times of election. Now, I would like my hon. friend to explain how it is that he told me the other day on the floor of this House that Mr. Brennan was not appointed assistant, while I find by the Auditor General's Report that he was actually appointed, was so employed and paid. Sir, my hon. friend's report in reference to these public works, is worthless. He does not know what position they are in; he cannot tell whether they require repairs or not; he has no officer there to examine and make a report upon them. I am not able to travel over the whole Province, small as it is, and ascertain in what condition these works are. I expected when I came here that documents would be laid upon the Table which would enable me to judge of the condition of the works. The $5,000 which he has placed in these Estimates is not nearly enough. The hon. gentleman knows very well that Tignish breakwater requires repair; he knows that there is a breakwater at Malpeque which requires repair; that the wharf at West Point, that will cost $6,000 or $7,000, ought to be rebuilt. He knows all that, and, forsooth, to repair 24 wharves, and to build one or two new ones which the Government have allowed to go to pieces, he asks this House to vote $6,000. I was almost going to say it was actually an insult. We have heard a good deal about the dredge. No doubt the dredge was at Tignish in 1886, and was busy there, it being the eve of the election; and it also did a little work there in 1887. However, it was taken away in August and sent to Charlottetown. It was hauled upon the blocks, and left there until last December, before it was prepared sufficiently to go to work. The repairs cost $12,000 while the original cost was $7,000. I should like to see detailed accounts, so that hon. members might have an opportunity of judging as to how much money has been wrung out of the people in repairing that vessel. It is, however, not much use for representatives of the Island to ask for anything. It is very little use to ask the Government to place sums in the Estimates for the repair of wharves and piers; it is no use asking the Government to lay on the Table of the House proper reports by which hon. members can judge as to the condition of the piers and public works. Let me read some extracts from the Minister's report. Take New London. The report says:

"New London or Greville Bay, is in Queen's County, about 10 miles south-east of the entrance into Richmond Bay. The works in this harbour were repaired where necessary."

This is all the information we have with respect to the works there. We will go a little further, and take Tignish. I should know something about that harbor and breakwater, because I was mainly instrumental in commencing the breakwater there under the very able and patriotic administration of my old friend, Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. The report says:

"Tignish, Prince County, is at the mouth of the Big Tignish River, and about 8 miles east of North Point. The dredge Prince Edward was engaged until 27th August, in deepening the channel at this place."

It does not show anything as to the work done, as to how many square yards of mud and rock were taken out of the harbor, or as to where the stuff was deposited; but I can tell the House that it was mainly deposited so near the entrance of the harbor that the harbor afterwards had 15 inches less water than it should have. There is no report of that fact. There is no report with respect to the breakwater, which cost over $20,000. We have not one line in the report, showing its present condition. I say these books which are brought here, and are called Blue-books, should be known as blank-books, for they contain nothing. When I had a seat in the Local Legislature of the Island, I used to say that these books were composed of a good deal of "fat," because the blank pages are paid for, as well as those printed. If the Minister cannot see his way clear to put us right on this matter, to furnish a fair and intelligent report, and not make such sad mistakes as are made in regard to matters, which statements are actually contradicted in official reports, and if he cannot satisfy the people of Prince Edward Island that he is prepared to maintain the public works in a proper repair, I say the sooner the ties of Confederation between the Dominion and Prince Edward Island are broken, and the tight little island is allowed to go and do for itself, the better. We are told that we pay nothing to the revenue, or only $275,000 a year; but I can tell the hon. gentleman that we pay a million dollars a year, and receive only $650,000.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

The CHAIRMAN. The hon. gentleman must speak to the question.

Mr. PERRY. I am only seeking justice for the Island, and for the fishermen of Gloucester, N.B. A large number of the fishermen come to fish near the breakwater, and unless the Government spend $1,000 or $1,500 to place this work in proper condition, the safety of the fishermen will be endangered. This work is not merely for the Province of Prince Edward Island, but for the benefit also of fishermen who come from Caraquet, Shippegan, and other places in New Brunswick. I feel very much interested in the fishermen, who have to endure great hardships to obtain a living, and enable them to pay the high duties imposed on their goods. I hope the Minister will be able to explain all these matters, and will place in the Supplementary Estimates a sufficient sum to place all these works in a proper condition. Let me hear no more of our breakwaters being allowed to float across the strait. The people of New Brunswick warmed their houses for months out of stuff for which the Government of Canada had paid, and which drifted over from the Island, and the Government were absolutely too penurious and negligent to put even a chain to prevent the stuff floating away, but they allowed thousands of dollars worth of it to drift away across the strait.

Mr. WELSH. I would suggest to the Minister of Public Works the necessity of appointing a resident engineer on the Island to look after the works. It would be a saving of public money, instead of appointing overseers to the various public works. Besides, I would recommend the Minister to give out the repairs to piers by public tender and to the lowest bidder, and that the work be carried out under the inspection of a resident engineer. Every member of the Government will, no doubt, see that this would be a desirable change, and that it would save an immense amount of public money which is now thrown away in repairs to piers.

Harbors and Rivers, N. B..... $24,500

Mr. WELDON (St. John). What is done with this money.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is used for the removing of snags and for the keeping in good order of towpaths. The tow-path was repaired, the obstructions were removed between Eel River and Tobique, between Woodstock and Salmon River, and between Salmon River and Grand Falls. Obstructions were removed on the Girdon and the east side of the river was repaired. At Grand Falls the channel was cleared of boulders and sand bars, and the breakwater was planked. At the river below the Grand Forks the tow-path was repaired and other obstructions were removed.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). It seems to me that there are enormous sums expended in this work. Is it done by tender or how?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes. The removal of the snags is done by the steamer that plies between St. John and Fredericton and where the steamer does not run it was done by days' work, and we appointed foremen to look after that and to do the work.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I would like to know how this money was expended. I have been up there and I only saw a little blasting near the Grand Falls; that is the only work I have seen done there at all. I find that between Grand Falls and Tobique $2,050 were expended for work and only $10 for powder.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have no further details than those I have given to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. GILLMOR. I hardly think that the Minister of Public Works understands the particulars of those appropriations. It just amounts to an expediture of the public moneys to clear out impediments in the river for people to drive their logs, and that has been going on from year to year. The principle of this expenditure cannot be made general all over the whole Dominion, because if it were the Government would have too much to do. This keeping up of tow-paths, blasting rocks, and building those side-booms is doing for those people on the St. John River what the people in the other parts of New Brunswick have to do for themselves. It is quite impossible to deal with all those rivers and spend the public money in that way. I am sure that if the Government understood the matter as well as those who live in that locality do, they will see that this is just an appropriation to help some private parties engaged in lumbering in those localities. There are other rivers all over the Provinces where those works have been constructed by the persons operating on the river. If the rule cannot be made general I think it would be well for the Government to withhold such appropriations as that, for if the expenditure is not made general it is unjust to other parties. It is unjust and unfair to tax lumbermen in other rivers and then have the taxes given to other localities for the purpose of aiding private enterprise. I am satisfied that if the Government understood this they would not continue that sort of thing.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I have been told, but of course I speak subject to correction, that some of these works are more injurious than otherwise. I see here an item for Missonnette. It is not a navigable river at all.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That is to provide for the completion of the works in connection with the wharf which is being constructed under contract for general landing and shipping purposes opposite the southern end of the highway bridge on the Kouchibougacis.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). It is a river that I never heard of being navigated. I would like to know what shipping is done there?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The note I have is that this wharf is to be 120 feet long and 30 feet wide.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Is it to be near the highway bridge?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). You would have to dredge the channel to enable the smallest schooner to get up there. A vessel could not go up that river under any circumstances as it is at present. What is to be the cost of the whole structure?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Nearly $5,000.

Mr. BLAKE. I hope there will be a vote in the Supplementary Estimates for dredging the channel to make the wharf useful.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My hon. friend from St. John says that vessels cannot navigate that river, and yet the Minister proposes to spend $5,000 in building a wharf which no vessels can approach. Really we ought to have some more explanation.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The wharf has nine or ten feet of water at the end; that is all I can say.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). This river is about six miles from Richibucto Harbor. There are mills on this river, and unless it has changed very much since I lived in that county, the logs coming down that river have to be brought to Richibucto Harbor to be loaded on vessels. I never heard of any vessel being in that river, and my own impression is that it is practically unnavigable owing to the lagoons at the mouth of the river. The people there are not a fishing people; they are farmers. I cannot, for the life of me, see what is the object of a wharf at that place.

Mr. ELLIS. What is the Minister going to do at the Negro Point breakwater in St. John Harbor? Was any money spent there last year?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The present vote of $5,000 is a revote out of the $10,000 voted last year. It is to complete the work of depositing large stones around the outer end of the breakwater, recommended by the chief engineer, to replace stones which were washed away by heavy seas during the winter of 1886-87, with the view of preventing further damage.

Mr. ELLIS. I asked the Minister in 1887 whether he thought that work was completed, and he said he thought it was. Will this complete it?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The stone at that period was washed away, and, of course, we had to ask more money, in order to prevent the damage being repeated. I may have said that it was completed then, but damage having occurred since, it was necessary to repair it.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I see the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry) here, and I would like to know if he can explain this vote for the wharf in the Kouchibougacis River?

Mr. LANDRY. I am not prepared to state what size of vessels can go up that stream; but I know that within the last year or two a company has been formed there and has built a mill in the vicinity of where the wharf is, and that company requires the accommodation of this wharf for the purpose of shipping its lumber, and it expects to ship it away by vessels that come in there.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). There are two mills on that river some distance above—water mills—and all the deals from these mills have to be floated down through the lagoons to the Richibucto Harbor. What mill is this?

Mr. LANDRY. It is a mill built below the bridge.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). It cannot be a water mill, because there is no water power there.

Mr. LANDRY. I think it has water power, but I know it has been constructed because it is in operation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As I understand, this expenditure of public money is to provide some private company with a convenient wharf to ship their logs from. All I can say is that if that be the practice of the Government, they will have their hands full. I know scores of lumber firms in the Province of Ontario, who have constructed works for the purpose of enabling them to ship their logs; and if this money is to be granted for the benefit of a particular logging firm in the Province of New Brunswick, it appears to me that all the lumber firms in the Province of Ontario who have constructed facilities for themselves will have reason to put in claims for compensation. Are these facilities to be provided for one Province and not for another?

Mr. LANDRY. I did not intend to convey to the House the impression that this wharf was built for the accommodation of this firm. All I said was that a mill had been built there, for the purpose of showing that the place was of more importance than the hon. gentleman who has spoken indicated, and the fact of a mill being built there was evidence that vessels do come up that stream. I have never lived there to the extent of knowing whether ships go up there or not, but there are several mills there, one not very far from the bridge, and the place is of considerable importance.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How far is this from the sea?

Mr. LANDRY. It is at least two miles. It is a wide river, at least three hundred feet wide, and there must be quite a depth of water there. I am not in a position to deny the statement of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) that there is not sufficient water to float a vessel, but I think he is mistaken.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Did the hon. gentleman ever see a vessel there?

Mr. LANDRY. I cannot recollect that I did.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I lived there when a boy, and in the whole course of my life I have never seen or heard of a vessel navigating that river, and I am under the impression that it is almost impossible for any vessel but a small boat to navigate it. To what firm does that mill belong?

Mr. LANDRY. I do not know the name of the firm, but one of the gentlemen connected with it is Mr. Lassere.

Mr. KIRK. Surely the Minister of Public Works had a report from the engineer with regard to the necessity of the work before he undertook to spend this money. I would like to know what trade has ever been there or whether trade can go there at all? The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry) cannot tell us. What is the necessity for the wharf? The hon. member for Kent tells us there is a lumber mill which is built there for general accommodation, but I do not think that would justify the Government in spending this money. This is just in keeping with the $700 for clearing out rocks from a river in Nova Scotia, a grant which should never have been given at all.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will the hon. the Minister of Public Works tell us upon what report he made this representation to the House?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. When a petition is sent in to have a public work done, an engineer is sent to examine the place and to report, and his report is submitted to Council. In this case, no doubt a report was made by the engineer who examined the place, and it was on his report this item is submitted.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). What engineer reported upon that, what petition was there for the work, and what was the report?

Sir HECTOR LANGENIN. I have not the report here.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). As far as I can judge this is simply a wharf to pile lumber on, which may be taken down in scows or rafted down. I know that the mill-owner there has brought his mill down to Richibucto so as to be able to ship his lumber dry. The wharf would be nothing else than a lumber yard for this mill or for some other purpose of that kind.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I hope the hon. gentleman will not press this vote until he is able to inform the House of the grounds on which he recommends it We are asked to vote a small sum, it is true, but it is a sum which involves a principle, and that principle is that the Government shall be bound to assume the construction of wharves, not only on navigable rivers, but in lagoons and bays not navigable, for the purpose of floating rafts down navigable streams. I submitted, not long ago, a question as to the duty of the Dominion Government to construct wharves on navigable streams, and I named a place where a large quantity of lumber is kept, and where a large number of schooners frequent. I thought that the place, being so far up a navigable stream, the Dominion would not construct a wharf there, but now I find the Government are constructing a wharf in a river which is not navigable but is nothing but a lagoon. The hon. gentleman would do well to let this item stand and inform himself of the grounds upon which he recommends the House to grant this sum.

Mr. LANDRY. It is hardly fair to call this a lagoon. Evidently the hon. gentleman has not seen the place. I have stated that it is a very wide stream, but I have never measured the depth. I would feel justified, however, in assuming, from what I have seen of it, that vessels can go up that stream. There are many mills there, and it is one of our important rivers. There are several mills at its head. The construction of the wharf was asked by a large number of people, and it is an important centre whose trade has much increased since the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) lived in that vicinity. There was a college a very short distance from there which had 100 pupils. There is a convent now in the vicinity, and it is quite an important district. It ranks second or third in importance in my county, and a large number of people requested me, by petition or letter, to urge the construction of this wharf, and it was done in the ordinary way by the proper request from the people themselves, through their representatives. I presented that not only one year but two or three years before I could get it, and I found that quite long enough for me. I feel confident that, if the facts are known, as they may possibly be ascertained by a report, it will be found that this is quite an important stream and quite capable of floating vessels of a reasonable size to come up there and take the lumber down. I do not state this of my own knowledge, but from information which I have.

Mr. LAURIER. I understand the hon. gentleman to say that he has been suing the Government for this grant for some years?

Mr. LANDRY. Yes, I have.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman says he never heard of any ships being in that river. Will he tell us what is the reason why he wants a pier built there, at a place where there have been no ships as far as he knows? He says there was a convent at the place. Is it for the convenience of the convent that the pier is to be built? If he has never heard of any ships going up to that spot, what is the reason for his asking the Government to place a pier there? Surely it cannot be to help navigation, and, if that is not the object, what is the object?

Mr. WELSH. The hon. gentleman from Kent (Mr. Landry) says he has known this place since he was a boy.

Mr. LANDRY. No.

Mr. WELSH. Well, in any case, I knew the place before he was a boy at all. I knew the Kouchibouguac in 1841, and I know there was a lagoon there where they used to raft the timber through from Kouchibouguac to Richibucto. There is only about 8 or 9 feet of water on the Kouchibouguac bar. If there is a harbor there, it is deserted. Is there anyone here who can spell the name of this place? The only way I could ever spell it was to chalk the letters over the beam. I have known no vessels at Miramichi and Richibucto.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Spell the word.

Mr. WELSH. No, spell it yourself. I have known vessels at Buctouche, and now I am coming pretty close to the hon. gentleman's home, and I think I know as much about his district as he does, and I can tell him the depth of water on the bar at Buctouche, and at Richibucto, and at Miramichi, and at Kouchibouguac. But what I want to know is what is the purpose of asking for money to build this wharf unless it is for the benefit of some lumberman to pile his lumber on. Is it to be for the benefit of the community in general? I say it is not; and I challenge my hon. friend (Mr. Landry) to show the contrary. I am very sorry to differ from him, but I shall oppose this vote unless it is shown that it is for the benefit of the taxpayers in general. I think it is a useless vote. I know there have been fishing boats in the lagoon, and, at one, time that was a great place for salmon. From my knowledge of the country nearly 50 years ago, when I was a boy—but what was he? I shall vote against this unless it is shown to be in the general interest.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). My hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Welsh) speaks of Kouchibouguac. There is a small river there where vessels go up to a place where ships were built, but there is the Kouchibouguacis, which means the small Kouchibouguac, and that is a stream on which I never heard of any vessel being. My hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Landry) has not only got this wharf, but he got a subsidy voted for a railway from Richibucto to St. Louis of about $50,000 from the Dominion, and I do not know how much from the Local Government, so I think this place is very well provided for, especially if we have to pay more for a wharf there.

Mr. LANDRY. I appreciate a good deal what the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Welsh) has said, but the only difficulty is that he was speaking of a different place altogether from that which we have been talking about. He has been speaking of a river several miles away from the one under discussion, and, of course, that makes quite a difference. I think what the hon. member from the city of St. John (Mr. Weldon) has said shows the additional importance of this place, besides what I mentioned as to the buildings there, including the convent, which occasioned some facetious remarks from the leader of the Opposition. The fact that a railway has been built there shows the importance of the place. If the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) went there now, he would find that the people of that county, which he knows so well, would not agree with him that they are getting too much, but would tell him that they have many requirements there which could be assisted by the Government, and that there is no occasion for being jealous in regard to what has been done. The railway to which he has referred was a necessity, and has been a benefit to the whole county. It was not bonused to any greater extent than other roads, and it was constructed immediately and has been in operation ever since. All this will show the Committee that this is a place of some importance. and that the expense of $3,000 for a wharf there ought not to be made so serious an objection.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Does this river flow into the sea or into the lagoon?

Mr. LANDRY. Into the sea. I do not know what the hon. gentleman means by a lagoon, but certainly the river empties into the sea.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). It goes into a lagoon which is formed by sand banks. Between the river and the sea is a sand bank which acts as a breakwater and protects this lagoon. No doubt at one time that was a great place for salmon and lobster fishing, but I can recollect, as long ago as my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Welsh), that deals were cut on that river, and more lumber was cut then than is cut to-day, and those deals were floated down to Richibucto and loaded there.

Mr. WELSH. If you build a wharf at that place, will there ever be a ship come there and load at that wharf? Will it be of any use for commercial purposes?

Mr. LANDRY. Yes.

Mr. WELSH. I say no, because the deals are floated down the river through the lagoon to Richibucto. I have had practical experience in this matter, and I will certainly oppose this grant when there are so many claims for public works in regard to which the public are crying out. When $40,000 and $50,000 worth of grain and oats and barley and pork and other cargoes have to wait at a wharf without any accommodation, as they have at Mount Stuart, it is a crying shame for the Government to pass this vote and neglect such a place as Mount Stuart.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In order to cut short the discussion, if the hon. gentleman will be kind enough to listen to what I say, we will withdraw this item, and if required, we will put it in the Supplementary Estimates, with the necessary amount.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Richibucto protection works, $1,000. Can the hon. Minister say what effect these works have had upon deepening the channel? That was one of the objects for which it was built.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There was a dam commenced in 1885, which has been repaired and refitted with brush and stone. This vote is required for completing work, which the chief engineer considers absolutely necessary for the protection of the improvement of the entrance.

Mr LANDRY. The work has already had a beneficial effect, but some dredging is required. We had dredging done a year ago, and some more is being done, and the wharf is having a very beneficial effect. I think without the breakwater it would be apt to fill up entirely.

Harbors and Rivers, Quebec..... $96,250

Mr. LAURIER. Ice piers at St. Anne de Sorel, $2,500. What is that work?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. These piers were begun three or four years ago, and are intended to prevent the daming and flooding of the country by ice in the spring freshets. The result has been very beneficial

Mr. LAURIER. Rivière du Lièvre, $30,000. This is for the purpose of making the river navigable?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes; and giving an outlet to the large country where the phosphate mines are situated. This river flows from the north some 18 miles below Ottawa, and may be claimed to be navigable in its present state, during its ordinary stages, for a distance of 20 miles. Its general width is from 300 feet to 600 feet. At low water it is navigable for vessels not exceeding 6 or 7 feet in draught. During the spring freshets the water rises nearly 15 feet.

Mr. LAURIER. River Nicolet, $8,000. We have had this in the Estimates from year to year, and I am afraid we are piling up a pretty large sum. I would not regret the money if there was any benefit.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is really a harbor of refuge, and also a commercial harbor. Two long piers have been built and we expect that with these additional works we will make the harbor useful for commercial purposes as well as a harbor of refuge for the vessels on the lake.

Mr. LAURIER. River Yamaska, stone protection to dam, $2,500. These Yamaska works have not produced any material benefit, so far as I am informed, though they have cost a good deal of money.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This is to place stone on the lower side of the dam. The fact is the work was not complete, and this will complete it and will make the dam water tight.

Mr. LAURIER. Sorel ice piers, $2,500. Are there two sets of piers at Sorel?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes; at Sorel, the hon. gentleman will remember, steamers come from all quarters to winter, and he knows the importance of the harbor. We had some two or three of these piers built, and this will complete the scheme by which we expect to afford protection to the vessels.

Mr. LAURIER. In regard to the item of $5,000 for works at Three Rivers, I would ask the hon. gentleman if they are to be on the St. Lawrence or the St. Maurice.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. On the St. Lawrence. The hon. gentleman will remember the wharf or pier where the Richelieu boats come, and between that and the east side, next to it, there is a large vacant space and then the harbor commissioner's wharf comes. The object of this vote is to fill the gap between the two, towards the cliff, and thus allow the cars to come to the harbor commissioner's wharf, thereby facilitating the trade of the port.

Mr. LAURIER. I think the hon. gentleman will have something more to do. He will have to furnish trade, or the wharves will be empty; and to do this he will have to change the policy of the country.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I) How much will be the total cost?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Just the amount of the vote.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How many vessels, besides the Richelieu steamers, call there in a year?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot say, but perhaps 15 or 20. They come there and load timber. There is also a large depot for coal. I may say the trade is increasing.

Mr. LAURIER. I can say for the hon. gentleman's constituency that there is a very large lumber trade there, and I am glad to say it is increasing; although it has been suffering for some years past, I believe it is now reviving. But I was under the impression that the accommodation they had already was amply sufficient for the trade that was being done there. The hon. gentleman thinks otherwise; at least he is providing for a new wharf to be built. I think he will have to adopt the policy of unrestricted reciprocity. Under it, no doubt, Three Rivers would become a large trading centre, as it was under the old treaty. If this work is to be done with a view to the ultimate carrying out of that policy, I congratulate the hon. gentleman on the step taken.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) My views in regard to wharves have somewhat changed since this debate began. I told the hon. Minister frankly that I was of the opinion that it was not proper to construct wharves at such points as he had hitherto constructed them. I find I am altogether wrong. In the early part of the debate I referred to the Hillsboro' River, where there are five times as many craft as at Three Rivers, and where there is constant steam communication between Charlottetown and Mount Stewart, a large steamer running there carrying passengers and freight, and I was under the impression that as the work was twenty miles up the river it was a local work. I find I was altogether wrong, and I ask the hon. gentleman to rescind the request, if this is a Dominion work, and to place a sum in the Estimates for Hillsboro' River. I hope Supply will not go through without something being done at that place. The hon. gentleman sees that the House cordially votes money for the construction of wharves in all these places where they are necessary for the promotion of trade, provided it is a tidal river and navigable, and we went even so far as to vote money for the construction of works in a lagoon, but that has been withdrawn. I hope the Minister will recollect Mount Stuart as coming within all the provisions which seem necessary to give a claim for the construction of a wharf by the Dominion Government. The hon. gentleman will perhaps take a note of this and consider it.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I not only will consider it, but I have taken a note of it.

Mr. ELLIS. As to the money voted last year for improvements on the Madawaska River, in the Province of Quebec, on what part of the river was it expended?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Up to 31st December some $400 had been expended in improving the Madawaska River for the descent of timber by the removal of logs, rocks and clay, so as to obtain a depth of three feet at low water and a minimum width of 50 feet. That is the only sum expended out of that vote.

Public Works, Ontario..... $98,250

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would remind the Minister of Public Works that I called his attention last year and the year before and in the early part of this Session to the state of the winding ground on the banks of the Sydenham River at Dresden. I pointed out that the banks are slipping into the river, that it was affecting the warehouses on the bank and that the winding ground required to be supported in order to prevent serious damage being done to private property. Has the hon. gentleman undertaken any improvements there, or what does he contemplate doing? I am satisfied that the parties would have good cause of action by petition of right against the Government for damages if the winding ground is not properly protected.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think the other day the hon. gentleman spoke to me on the subject. I took a note of it, and I have prepared some notes to be submitted to my colleagues.

Mr. CASEY. What is being done at Cobourg Harbor?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The vote is to make provision for projected works of repair, on the superstructure of the western pier at Cobourg Harbor. The chief engineer reported that it would be necessary to put it into proper order for the general purposes of the harbor.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What has been the total expenditure for Cobourg Harbor?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. From the 1st July, 1874, to the 30th June, 1888, the total is $163,000.

McGregor's Creek, to complete..... $2,250

Mr. CAMPBELL. Last year when this item was placed in the Estimates it also included Little Bear's Creek, and $7,750 was voted for that purpose. I notice this year that Little Bear Creek is struck out of the Estimate and only $2,250 asked for McGregor's Creek. I would like to ask the Minister why Little Bear's Creek has been excluded, and whether all this amount is to be expended on McGregor's Creek?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not see why the item has disappeared for Little Bear's Creek. McGregor's Creek is, I think, in the county of the hon. gentleman and the vote is to complete the projected pile works, 740 feet long, on the south bank of McGregor's Creek, as recommended by the chief engineer.

Mr. CASEY. I had the honor of being in the County of Kent during the last campaign, and I am aware that the projected works at Little Bear's Creek formed a considerable portion of the ammunition of the Conservative party in that campaign, and that my hon. friend from Kent had to face the proposed expenditure of considerable money there. I think that although my hon. friend was elected, the county should not be mulcted for the money that was promised during the campaign to be spent there by the Government. I would ask the Minister of Public Works if he has any plausible explanation to make for the disappearance from the Estimates of the appropriation for Little Bear's Creek.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. My chief engineer asked me only for money for McGregor's Creek. He never spoke to me about the other place.

Mr. CASEY. You ought to have spoken to him about it.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot say why the vote for Little Bear's Creek is not here.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The hon. Minister will see, if he looks at the Estimates last year, that Little Bear's Creek was included. As my hon. friend from Elgin (Mr. Casey) says it was quite a subject of discussion in the county during the last election, and I may say that it is a work that ought to be done. Little Bear's Creek was dredged out some two or three years ago, and made a navigable stream, but owing to some reasons, with which I need not trouble the House now, it has become partially filled up. It is the bounden duty of the Government, having made it a navigable stream, to also see that it is kept navigable. I think that the hon. the Minister ought to put an item in the Estimates for that purpose. I may say that it is a very important work. It lies in the Township of Dover, in the County of Kent, and opens up a very large and important section of the country. Boats of considerable size go up there, and it is a great convenience to people of that part of the country to be able to load their grain, logs and lumber on the banks of that stream. Last year there were over $100,000 worth of logs lying on the banks of that stream during the winter, expecting that the Government would do as they promised, dredge it out in the spring and make it navigable so that they would be able to get their logs down to market. Owing to the fact that the Government did not go on with the dredging as promised, this lumber could not be got out and it deteriorated in value to the consequent loss of the people. I do not think it is fair that this appropriation for Little Bear's Creek, after it having been placed in the Estimates last year and adopted by the House, should be withdrawn. Anyone knows that in that part of the country the lumbering interest is a very large interest, and it is of very great importance to the people to be able to get their lumber down that stream, and I trust, now that the matter has been called to the attention of the Minister, that he will see the necessity of placing $2,000 or $3,000 in the Supplementary Estimates for that purpose. I am sure it will meet the approval not only of this House, but of the country.

Mr. CASEY. I think the Minister of Public Works will have to account with the opponent of my hon. friend if he does not take his advice and put an item in the Estimates.

Belleville—to complete harbor works, the local authorities protecting the Island with cribwork to the extent of $6,000 ..... $4,000

Mr. CASEY. What is intended to be done?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This vote is for carrying on next year the works in connection with the dam 325 feet long which it is proposed to construct at the island in the River Moira, on the east side of the stream, on condition that the local authorities will undertake the protection of the island shores.

Toronto Harbor—work at eastern entrance, the city of Toronto having to contribute $100,000..... $20,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is this a vote on account of some great work we are beginning to undertake?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is to continue the works we have been carrying on there. We had to protect the island, and we had to construct works at the new entrance which had been opened there by the lake. We will probably require $25,000 or $30,000 more, so far as I can see now, but I do not ask the hon. gentleman to tie me down to that figure.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). When the grant of $50,000 was made last year, was there any provision that the city of Toronto should furnish a certain amount, and if so, did it furnish that amount?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes, $100,000. We do not expect to be able to spend the whole $50,000 during the fiscal year, and we ask for a revote of $20,000.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). We were led to understand that on our furnishing $50,000, the city would furnish $100,000 to complete the work. Now we are paying virtually $70,000 or $75,000 instead of our $50,000 as formerly agreed upon between the Government and the city. I think we should have a fuller explanation.

Mr. CASEY. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell us how the Government intend to protect the harbor?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think the harbor of Toronto is an exceptional one. The city is the largest in the Province of Ontario, and I thought, from the information of my engineer, that I should report that unless we made a large expenditure there to save the island the harbor of Toronto would be lost, which would be a great damage to the commerce of the country. The city had promised $100,000 as their contribution. There was some little difficulty in the matter, but as usual the city of Toronto showed that when they had made a promise they would keep it. They passed a by-law to provide the $100,000. We have expended very large sums since the beginning of this work. From 1875 down to 1877, $20,000 were expended; and from that period down to 1887, $575,000. In 1888, we spent $19,000, and the following year $14,400. We expect to spend about as much more up to the end of the fiscal year. That is the reason we now ask $20,000 more to continue the work.

Mr. CASEY. I do not wish to be understood as finding fault with the Government. I was simply asking information as to the plan on which the island is going to be protected.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We undertook these works on the plan the hon. gentleman knows well of the protection of the island—reducing the entrance on the east side and deepening the channel and the harbor. I have no doubt by next year we will have completed that work.

Mr. CASEY. What do you intend to do with the eastern gap?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. By building those two piers on either side, we will reduce the extent of the gap.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to draw attention to the difficulties which arose a year ago with regard to the expenditure of the money at the eastern gap. There was a breakwater built there, and I think the hon. gentleman will remember I drew his attention to the fact that blind bolts had been used, and the works were in such a flimsy condition that they were carried away by a storm. Who was in charge of this particular work, and how has the money been expended? The hon. gentleman will remember that a considerable amount of money was lost there, owing to the fact that whoever was in charge permitted the work to be done in an inefficient way.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is an officer of the Government there now, who, I know, has the confidence of the engineer.

Mr. CASEY. In two or three items the condition is that the locality would furnish a certain amount. Is it going to be the principle on which the Government will act in future regarding harbor accommodation and improvements, that the locality should pay something before the Government will do anything. I do not say that it is a bad principle; I rather think it is a good one. I remember that my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie) established that principle when he was Minister of Public Works.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In many cases we call upon the authorities to contribute, and sometimes the works are larger and we think they are not altogether works which the Government should undertake alone. We said that as this was a mixed affair, the city should contribute a share of the expense, or if the revenue was not sufficient to allow us to undertake such a large work alone. We follow that plan not only with regard to ports and piers, but also public buildings, requiring the local authorities to give us the site.

General repairs and improvements—Harbors and Rivers, Ontario $10,000

Mr. CAMPBELL. You will notice that the $4,000 appropriated for the River Thames entrance is not asked to be re-voted this year. I think that the Government are not treating the county properly in not going on with this work. It is a work of great importance to the town of Chatham, and has been asked for over and over again by the people there and also by the Board of Trade, Town and County Councils also Business Mens' Association. They have sent petitions asking that the bar at the mouth should be removed. Last year a deputation came down, and on former occasions deputations have come down and waited on the Government to urge that this work should be done. I have a letter from the Minister of Public Works addressed to Henry Smyth, as follows:—

"OTTAWA, 14th April, 1883.

"MY DEAR MR. SMYTH,—I am in receipt of your letters of the 15th, 17th and 24th of March, and the 2nd and 4th inst (the last enclosing a letter from Mr. Samuel Barfoot, president of the Chatham Navigation Company) on the subject of the improvement of the Thames River

"I have directed my officers to place a dredge at the mouth of the river not later than the first day of May, and as speedily as possible give your county the necessary navigation, and to forward me without delay, a report upon the other improvements which you ask, particularly those spoken of in the communication forwarded by you from Mr. Knight.

"You are aware that there will be no funds available for the permanent work to be done at the mouth of the river until the 1st July next.

"Yours very truly,

"HECTOR L. LANGEVIN."

That is dated the 14th April of last year, and the hon. gentleman promised then that the dredge would be at the mouth of the river not later than the first day of May. I may state that the election took place on the second day of May. This letter was circulated broadcast all over the country, and it performed a very important work during that campaign; but I am very sorry to say that the 1st May came and the 2nd May came, and there was no dredge placed there. There was no dredge placed there at all. We never saw the dredge, and we did not know what had become of it; and, on the 21st May, when the Estimates were going through the House, I called the Minister's attention to it, and asked that the long looked for dredge should be placed there at the earliest opportunity; and the Minister of Public Works was then good enough to say in reply to me:

"When I wrote that letter I expected that this vote would have been passed in the House before the 1st of May, and I would have then felt that I had the authority to go on and make some arrangements, knowing how pressing this matter was; but, unfortunately, delays took place, and, not having the money, I could not go on with the work. Now that it is voted, I will go on with the work."

There was a distinct promise on the 14th of April from the hon. the Minister of Public Works, and again on the 21st May, that the work would be proceeded with at the earliest possible date, but I am very sorry indeed to say that the work has not been proceeded with, that nothing more has been done towards that except sending an engineer from the department up there in November last year to again look over the work. This work is of the utmost importance to the prosperity not only of the Town of Chatham but of the County of Kent. It is a work which is urgently required. I believe, from the best information I have at present, that there is only 6 feet or 6½ feet of water on the bar at the mouth of the river, while, for twenty miles inland, there is 18 feet or 20 feet—plenty of water to float the largest vessels on the lakes except on the bar at the mouth of the river which keeps them out I do not think it is treating the county right, after making this solemn and distinct promise on more than one occasion, that there is no vote for this work this year. The matter is of so much importance that a petition was sent down, and I had the honor to present it to the Minister of Public Works a few days ago, signed by 1,047 people of all shades of political opinion, and the most prominent men in that part of the county, asking that this work should be proceeded with; and so great is the necessity for proceeding with this work that the people there feel that the prosperity of the whole town and county depends upon the early completion of this work. Unless it is proceeded with at an early date, there will be very great disarrangement caused to the business of that part of the country. The passenger boat, City of Chatham, sailing from Chatham to Detroit, was compelled to lay up in the month of September last year, because she could not get across the bar; and during a recent visit to the town of Chatham, I was urged to ascertain from the Government some definite information as to their intentions. At present they do not know whether to fit up that boat for the season's work or not. Unless the bar is removed, it would be impossible for the steamer to get across the bar, and the Canadian Pacific Railway, which is extending its line from London to Detroit, has been compelled to bring all its rails and ties by the way of Wallaceburg and the Erie and Huron Railway. Otherwise it could have brought all its material and had it unloaded in Chatham, where it would be far more convenient, and that would give a great deal of employment to the laborers and mechanics who are depending upon the loading and unloading of this material, but that company has been compelled to bring all its material in by the way of Wallaceburg. I am sure the Minister of Agriculture can testify to the great importance and necessity of this work being done. Further, the lumbermen in the Town of Chatham are also interested. They require to bring in their stocks of lumber early in the spring, as soon as navigation is open; but they do not know what to do, and, unless the bar is removed, they cannot bring their lumber in by water, but will have to bring it by way of the Erie and Huron Railway, unship it at Wallaceburg and send it thence to Chatham. Then, we have large brick manufacturers along the banks of the River Thames. They have contracts for large quantities of brick. One of them showed me a contract which he could make with Messrs. Hastings Bros, of Winnipeg, for 400,000 bricks, and he told me the demand for brick at Port Arthur and in Manitoba was almost unlimited, but the trouble was that, if the bar is not removed out of the river, it will be utterly impossible for them to accept any of those contracts. You will readily see how necessary it is that the intention of the Government should be known upon this point. I hope and believe that the Minister of Public Works intends to bring down in the Supplementary Estimates a sum for this important work, and the reason I bring it to his attention now is to have a definite answer upon that point. It is of the greatest importance that the intentions of the Government should be known now, so that these men will know what to do, and, therefore, I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works what is the intention of the Government in reference to this important matter. It has been before them for a long time, they know all the facts, they know the necessity of it, and they have promised it over and over again, and I hope it is not asking too much of the hon. Minister to ask him to let the House and the country know what they intend to do in the matter.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This work did not proceed, notwithstanding my letter or letters, because we could not obtain a dredge at a sufficiently early time in the season of 1888, and, therefore, we could not do it. But I may say that I have been examining the matter since, in order to see how far I could obtain the necessary dredge to do the work this year. Arrangements are now being made, and I hope the work will be begun in a short time, at all events at the proper season.

Mr. CASEY. Under this head of general improvements, I wish to call the attention to the Minister to the harbor of Port Stanley. He will remember that that harbor was leased to the London and Port Stanley Railway, which afterwards became the property of the Great Western Railway, and subsequently came into the hands of the Grand Trunk.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman would oblige me if he did not go into that matter now, as I am very tired, and he will have another opportunity.

Mr. CASEY. Will the hon. Minister say that he will give this matter his attention.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

General repairs and improvements—Harbors and Rivers, Manitoba..... $2,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where does the hon. gentleman mean to spend that money, and what is it to be used for?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is the ordinary vote to cover such expense as may be incurred in the fiscal year 1889-90.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does that mean the Red River?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes; and such small works as are not provided for in the general Estimates.

Mr. WATSON. I would like to call the attention of the Minister to the importance of some works that should have been gone on with for which this sum is far too small. The works are almost in a similar position, and of as much importance, as the dredging on the mouth of the Thames River. Something should be done with the St. Andrew's Rapids. Representations have been made to the Government, and deputations have visited Ottawa for the purpose of inducing the Government to do something for that work. They promised us some years ago to make a survey of the Red River, and to try, if possible, to put a sum in the Estimates to improve the St. Andrew's Rapids, and to improve the navigation of the Red River so as to allow lake vessels to come to the city of Winnipeg, which would be a great benefit, not only for the city of Winnipeg, but to the people interested in the lumber business throughout Manitoba. It would also be the means of assisting to develop the natural resources around Lake Winnipeg. There are some very good deposits of iron ore on islands in Lake Winnipeg, which could be developed if the navigation of the Red River was improved. The Americans on their side have spent a large sum of money improving the Red River up to the boundary line, but with the exception of one or two places between the boundary line and the city of Winnipeg, the St. Andrew's Rapids between the city of Winnipeg and Lake Winnipeg, the navigation of the Red River might be utilised from Fargo in the United States down to the head waters of Lake Winnipeg. I am sorry that the Government are not making an appropriation for the purpose of improving the Red River. It is a very important stream, and would open up and develop the resources which lay on the shore of Lake Winnipeg. I might also say in connection with this general vote that I would like to have seen the Government make some move with regard to improving the communication between Lake Winnipegosis and Lake Manitoba. That matter is also of great importance to the people of Manitoba, and to the people who own timber limits on Lake Winnipegosis. In that district there is large and valuable timber limits that the Government have disposed of, and at present I believe they are receiving no consideration for them on account of certain promises made to those parties when they received those timber limits, that the water communication between those lakes would be improved and made suitable for floating logs down, or running boats on the river. I hope the Minister of Public Works will see fit to have a sum placed in the Supplementary Estimates to go on with some of those works. This is a very small amount to place in the Estimates for general improvements in Manitoba.

Quarantine $68,664

Mr. ELLIS. Does the amount of $26,000 for quarantine St. John, N. B., refer to the building on Partridge Island?

Mr. CARLING. It is for salary and expenses at Partridge Island.

Mr. ELLIS. I do not know whether the Minister is aware that the buildings there are going entirely to decay, and if it were necessary to use them for any purpose they would prove to be entirely unfit. The matter came under my notice in this way: The school board of St. John has maintained a school on the Island, although there were only 8 or 10 pupils, and for the purpose of this school one of the rooms in the building was placed at the disposal of the board by the department. It became, however, so unfit for use that the board were compelled to entirely give up the school, and the report was that the rain came through the roof so that not a single room was fit for use. I suppose the Minister is aware of that fact, because the board was rather curtly treated by his department when they asked the department to place the building in a condition so that it could be used. It was an act of grace to maintain a school on the Island at all.

Mr. CARLING. My intention has been called to the state of the building, and the Minister of Public Works has been requested to make an examination and report with a view to have the building repaired at once.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). With respect to the item $3,400 for Halifax, I desire to enquire what amount has been put down for the chaplains of the station?

Mr. CARLING. $200 each.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Last year the vote was taken in the same way. I pointed out to the Minister that there was a Protestant and Catholic chaplain for the quarantine station at Halifax. The Protestant chaplain belonged to the parish in which the quarantine station was situated, but he moved away, and his successor has not been paid anything, while the Roman Catholic chaplain has been drawing his salary, and very properly so, ever since. The Minister then promised that this would be continued to the rector of the the parish in which the station is situated. Some of the parties have come to me about the matter on several occasions, and I addressed a communication to the department, reminding the Minister of the conversation in the House and privately, but I never received any reply. I should now like to understand from the Minister whether that sum is available for the rector of the Eastern Passage Church, the Protestant chaplain, as well as for the Roman Catholic chaplain, who has been drawing his salary for some time, because, although the matter was distinctly understood last year, I have been unable to obtain any information from the department since with regard to it. I want to know whether we can rely on the settlement of the matter in the future in this way.

Mr. CARLING. I regret very much that the correspondence with the department was not acknowledged; I am sure that I was not aware of it. I can say to the hon. gentleman that a clergyman has been appointed to act with the Catholic clergyman, but I cannot at the moment give his name. I will, however, give it to the hon. gentleman to-morrow.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I should like to have it before this item is carried.

Mr. CARLING. If the vote is allowed to pass, I will give the information to-morrow.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What information does the hon. gentleman want? It appears by the Auditor General's report that the Rev. Father Wood drew a salary of $100, but the Protestant chaplain has not been drawing a salary for two years. It lapsed under a change of rectors, and the people have applied to me on several occasions in regard to the matter, as the position properly belongs to the parish in which the station is situated. There is nothing more for the hon. gentleman to say than either to admit or deny whether the Protestant chaplain would be paid the same as the Roman Catholic chaplain or not. I do not think there is a great deal of duty for either chaplain to do, but they attend when required. I think the hon. Minister can tell me now whether he is prepared to place the Protestants in the same position as the Roman Catholics?

Mr. CARLING. The Rev. Dr. Partridge is acting with the Catholic clergyman now and has been appointed.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). That is sufficient; but it is a departure from the usual custom, which it would have been much better to have adhered to, because the Eastern Passage congregation is a poor one. It is among fishermen, and is directly opposite to the quarantine station, and the salary of the rector of the parish is small. Dr. Partridge is rector of St. George's, in the city, and is an excellent man in every respect; but his salary is much larger, and, being a city clergyman, he is five or six miles distant from the quarantine station, and can hardly be so available as the clergyman of the locality. The position belongs to the Eastern Passage parish, and I could not tell who is rector now. It has always belonged to the parish of the Eastern Passage, and I think it would be better to allow it to remain there instead of giving it to a city clergyman (a very proper and well qualified man, I must say) who has a larger salary. I cannot understand why the change should be made, particularly when the Minister promised last year that it should go in the way I have explained now.

Mr. CARLING. I do not recollect promising the hon. member that I would appoint a local clergyman. I think that I promised the hon. gentleman that a clergyman would be appointed in the place of the gentleman who acted before.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Of course you will understand that I do not take exception to Mr. Partridge. I only point out that it was an assistance to a poorer parish.

Mr. ELLIS. Why should there be any chaplain at all? I do not think there have been more than three persons in the quarantine hospital in Halifax for the last year. What is the good of paying $200 for clerical services when you have no one to attend the services.

Public Health $10,000

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I wish to ask what benefits and results are supposed to be obtainable from this grant?

Mr. CARLING. I think the hon. gentleman will find in the Auditor General's Report, which I see he has beside him, particulars of how the money has been expended.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I certainly see how some of the money has been expended but, to me, it does not seem completely satisfactory. I think the Minister ought to be able to explain the item, and to show that the money is well spent. I see, in the first place, that Dr. Montizambert, who is in charge of the quarantine hospital, receives a very liberal allowance of $2,300 a year salary, and, if we take into account the various items connected with this service, we will find that this amount has been increased last year to somewhere near $4,000. It may be that he performs services to the public which amply compensate the public for the amount of money paid, but we certainly ought not to be asked to vote this large sum of money without some explanation from the Minister as to what duties Dr. Montizambert performs. I think that instead of referring me to the Auditor General's Report the Minister should give some detailed report of the expenditure. I find also in the report that Dr. Playter receives the sum of $1,200 a year, and I think the Minister should give us some explanation of what services he renders. I am aware that Dr. Playter edits the Sanitary Journal, but I am not aware that the Sanitary Journal has a very general circulation. I can well understand that $1,200 is beneficial to the individual receiving it, but I am not aware of the beneficial effects of the Sanitary Journal. I can understand that it is a great assistance to him keeping up the journal, but I would like to know what return the Government get for this $1,200? Are they receiving a certain number of copies of this journal or do they grant this amount as a bonus?

Mr. CARLING. Dr. Playter was very strongly recommended by the medical gentlemen of this House some few years ago to take charge of this journal. The Government receives 100 copies of that journal, and it is, I believe, very freely distributed all over the country to the medical profession and to the different cities and towns, and I know that it is very highly appreciated by those who receive it. I believe that the journal has done a great deal of good and I have had many communications urging me to increase the grant to Dr. Playter instead of reducing it.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I understand you receive 100 copies. How often is the journal issued and how many copies do you receive during the year?

Mr. CARLING. It is a monthly journal.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Perhaps the Minister is able to explain to whom these journals are sent; by what means they are distributed and what advantages do they expect to derive from their distribution.

Mr. CARLING. This amount of money has been given in aid to the Sanitary Journal, and a certain number of copies monthly are sent to the department and these are distributed. It has been also, I believe, distributed very freely all over the country. This grant has been given for a number of years.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). How many years?

Mr. CARLING. Four or five years, I believe. The journal was thought to be very valuable by the profession, and the medical gentlemen in this House strongly urged this grant.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I desire to know who received these journals. Are they sent directly by Mr. Playter to any one whom he may wish to send them to, or are they distributed by the department?

Mr. CARLING. This amount of money is given in aid of the journal, and Doctor Playter sends them to whom he thinks proper. I believe it has been very freely circulated in all parts of Canada, in addition to the copies which have been given to the department, and which are forwarded to the different immigration and quarantine agencies and institutions throughout the country.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What is the object of this journal?

Mr. CARLING. It is to give the public the benefit of Dr. Playter's experience.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). This may be a satisfactory explanation, but certainly I cannot yet understand to what agencies these books are sent. They are, I suppose, sent direct by Mr. Playter to the various points, not through the department at all. He may send them to his various subscribers for aught I know. This item seems to be unreasonable. There is another item of $400 for the French sanitary journal. Is that distributed in the same manner as Mr. Playter's?

Mr. CARLING. I understand that it is.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin.) I think it is a useless expenditure. Hon. gentlemen on that side may laugh, but if it were their own money, they would hesitate very seriously before they would adopt a course of that kind. I believe this is nothing more nor less than a gift to this man Playter, and I believe there is no beneficial effect from the distribution of this sanitary journal at all. It is a question to me whether, if you searched the agencies in the different parts of the Dominion, you would find a hundred copies of it. If you would, it is not read, nor is it regarded by the medical profession as being of any particular value. My hon. friend said that a few years ago it was highly recommended by the medical men of this House. There may have been some who signed a recommendation to the Government to subsidise this sanitary journal in this way, but I have yet to find that it has been of any material benefit. It is useless, so far as any benefit to the profession arising from its perusal is concerned. Then, I would like to have some explanation of the large amount of $4,000 which is paid to the medical superintendent for salary and expenses.

Mr. SPROULE. As one of the medical men of the House who signed the recommendation to the Government, I wish to say that I think there were ten or twelve of us, including Dr. Brouse, the two Dr. Fergusons and Sir Charles Tupper, who came to the conclusion, after an examination of this pamphlet, that it was a useful and valuable one. We also recommended the department to grant some assistance for getting out a number of these monthly periodicals; and that they were distributed, I think there is no doubt, because they come both to the medical men and the boards of health in my part of the country, and they are considered valuable aids in looking after the sanitary condition of the country. It was also arranged at the time, I think, that assistance should be given to have a pamphlet for the same purpose distributed in the French language. I know that this work is a valuable one, Dr. Playter is most assiduous, and what he culls is from the best medical writers of the time.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Will the hon. gentleman explain the expenses of Mr. Montizambert, fares $165, Pullman and porters $45 ?

Mr. CARLING. Those were the expenses of Dr. Montizambert in attending the medical convention at Louisville in 1887-88. He was requested to visit that convention as a representative of Canada.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Will the hon. gentleman explain the item of Mr. Dyke, Liverpool, travelling expenses $489.69 ?

Mr. CARLING. Mr. Dyke is Government agent at Liverpool, and was employed in connection with the cattle quarantine in Great Britain ?

Mr. KIRK. What has been done towards stamping out cattle disease in Pictou, N.S. ?

Mr. CARLING. I think it has been stamped out. The officer of the department visited that district last autumn. He reported that a number of cattle were slaughtered, and that the disease no longer exists there.

Resolutions reported.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11:40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 1st April, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE OFFICIAL DEBATES.

Mr. DESJARDINS (translation) moved:

That the second report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of this House, brought down on the 22nd March last, be adopted.

Mr. CHOQUETTE (Translation.) moved in amendment:

That the said report be not now concurred in, but that it be referred back to the said committee with instructions to enquire into the justice and expediency of granting an indemnity to Messrs. A. E. Poirier, Remi Tremblay and Ernest Tremblay, who were discharged from their positions.

He said: Mr. Speaker, before the motion of the Chairman of the Debates Committee (Mr. Desjardins) be granted, I wish to return to the charge in support of a motion which I made last year. As I stated last year, when I made a similar motion, my intention is not to renew the debate which took place in this House in the matter of the translators who were dismissed, inasmuch as your decision was sustained by the House, but I think, as I stated then, that an indemnity ought to be given to these men who have been, to say the least, treated in rather a cruel manner. In bringing up again this question before the House, I am only acting upon the suggestion made by the hon. the First Minister, who, on the 17th of May last, when I brought forward this motion, asked me to withdraw it and make it at the beginning of the present Session. The hon. the First Minister stated then that he would make no promise, but that he would take the matter into consideration during the recess. I am convinced that the hon. the First Minister, who always keeps his word, must have kept this promise as all his others, and that he must have taken the matter into consideration. He ought to be in a position to give a definite answer, which I trust will be favorable to the young persons who have been hardly used. I have no intention, I repeat, Mr. Speaker, to reopen the debate, but it will suffice to recall the following facts: that these men were engaged as translators, that no fault was found with them as such, and that their work was carried out in an intelligent manner. It will be remarked that they came here last year at the beginning of the Session, to continue their work, that they waited here for five or six weeks for a decision on their fate, because no signification had been given them in an official manner that their services would no longer be required. Consequently they made an outlay in coming here; they took a house, they incurred considerable expense, and after five or six weeks of waiting these gentlemen were obliged to go back and endeavor to earn their living in another way. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is not right to treat officers of this House, against whom, I repeat, no complaint has been brought, and who have always performed their duties well, in a more unceremonious manner than is customary with ordinary workmen. It is well known that, according to the law in the Province of Quebec, it is not lawful to discharge mere domestic servants without giving them fifteen days notice or without paying them an equivalent. Now, in this case, not the slightest notice was given to these men. When you decided that their services were no longer required and the House ratified your decision, these men were obliged to go away without any other notice and without any compensation for their time and the considerable expense that they had been put to. I think that it would be but fair that an indemnity should be granted them, and that this report be sent back to the Debates Committee in order that a recommendation be inserted therein to the effect that they should be paid, if not the whole sessional allowance at least a portion of their expenses. As for the two Messieurs Tremblay I know that they took a house here, that they purchased the movables requisite for their housekeeping, and that after their dismissal they were obliged to throw up their houses, sacrifice at a low figure their effects and pay damages to their landlords. It is not exemplary damages but the real losses which should be paid, and I think that under the circumstances the House will be unanimous in yielding to the desire expressed by the hon. the First Minister to take the matter into consideration. Although no formal promise was then made that an indemnity should be paid them, I would wish that the Committee should decide what amount be granted them. I may say that the men are not greedy; they will be satisfied with a reasonable indemnity and the House will be only committing an act of justice in giving them a certain sum.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The report referred to, as I understand, appears at page 267 of the Votes and Proceedings, and is as follows:—

"The Committee beg leave to report the following Resolution as a recommendation: That Members desiring to procure copies of their speeches from the Queen's Printer may have them furnished in the numbers desired, either in quarto or octavo form, covered or not covered, as may be required, at the actual cost for paper and labor, not including composition, and that this rule may apply to all accounts for the present Session."

That being the resolution, the amendment has, consequently, not the slightest reference to it, and is out of order, as the report does not refer at all to the compensation of officers. Again, I see that the hon. gentleman has a notice of motion on the paper on the same subject, and on both these grounds I object to this amendment as being out of order.

Mr. LAURIER. Strictly speaking, it may be that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Choquette) is not quite in order, but he is certainly carrying out the suggestion which was made to him last Session by the Prime Minister. When my hon. friend made a similar motion then in amendment to the report, he was advised by the Prime Minister not to press it, but to bring it up this Session. My hon. friend has taken advantage of the suggestion to bring up the question in this form. It may be that the amendment is not absolutely relevant to the motion, but last year the Prime Minister gave the advice which my hon friend is now following. The discrepancy then was just the same.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I find that the hon. gentleman gave notice as long ago as the 25th February, of a motion for a Committee of the Whole:

"To enquire as to the justice and expediency of granting an indemnity to Messrs. A. E. Poirier, Rémi Tremblay and Ernest Tremblay, who were discharged last year from their positions as Hansard translators;"

And when we arrived at that motion, going over the list, the hon. gentleman was not ready to go on with the motion.

Mr. LAURIER. Pardon me; he was ready to go on upon several occasions, but the motion was not reached in time. It was when unopposed motions were called that it was reached.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; that is so.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Choquette) has taken the Premier's advice, but the Premier has taken the hon. gentleman's days.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). In this connection, I desire to call attention to the fact that on Friday last the debate in this House finished at about eleven o'clock. On Saturday morning about eleven or half-past eleven o'clock, I sent a written order to Mr. Senecal, in charge of the printing of the Debates, for some copies of the previous day's proceedings, and in reply, he says:

"Your order for 50 copies of the Debates of the 29th inst. was too late, as the daily Hansard was printed off."

This is dated on the 30th, the following morning. Now, I was going to say, that if we are to understand that copies of the Hansard cannot be had when they are ordered at eleven o'clock the day following the debate, of course members will not be able to know whether they can get them at all. I desire to bring that to the notice of the Government, in order that some time should be fixed, otherwise the reports would be of no value to the members of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. A similar motion is on the Order paper, and as it is not in accordance with the Rules or Parliamentary usage to take a motion out of its proper place and move it as an amendment to another question, I must, therefore, rule that it can not now be put to The House.

Amendment ruled out of order, and main motion agreed to.

MARINE HOSPITALS.

Sir DONALD A. SMITH asked, 1. The number of sick seamen cared for, and the aggregate number of days of hospital care given to them, in each of the ports of Montreal, Halifax, St. John and Quebec, respectively, during the last fiscal year? 2. The amount charged to the Sick and Distressed Mariners' Fund, in each case, as for hospital care in each port? 3. The aggregate rate per patient per diem in each port, as shown by the foregoing? 4. The causes why the average cost per patient per diem was so much greater in Quebec than in Montreal. or Halifax? 5. Whether any arrangement has been made with the managers of the Marine Hospital, Quebec, as contemplated by the "Act respecting Sick Mariners," section 6; and if so, what arrangement; and if not, why not? 6. Whether the Ministry consider the amount so charged to the fund, as for the care of sick mariners in the Marine Hospital of Quebec, to be "a reasonable compensation for the care and treatment of the sick mariners sent to such hospital," as provided for by the above-named section 6 of the Act? 7. What steps the Ministry intend taking to insure that the charge to the Sick Mariners' Fund, for hospital care and treatment, in the city of Quebec, shall not hereafter exceed the amount paid in Montreal and Halifax for similar services?

Mr. TUPPER. The number of sick seamen cared for, and the aggregate number of days of hospital care given to them in each of the ports of Montreal, Halifax, St. John and Quebec, respectively, during the last fiscal year, is as follows, viz.: Montreal, 170 seamen, 2,927 days; Halifax, 164 seamen, 3,882 days; St. John, 157 seamen, 4,429 days; Quebec, 318 seamen, 4,179 days. 2. The amount charged to the Sick and Distressed Mariners' Fund in each case, as for hospital care in each port, is as follows: Montreal, $2,634.30; Halifax, $3,493.80; St. John, $3,465.69; Quebec, $18,777 82. In the amount given as an expenditure for Marine and Immigrants' Hospital at Quebec, is included the cost for providing for immigrants and sick residents of Quebec, and a fair proportion would be as follows, viz.: for seamen, $5,680.19; for immigrants, $1,068.34; and for residents, $12,029.10. A grant of $1,866.67 was received from the Government of Quebec for support of residents, and $182.25 for rent of beach lots, &c., thus reducing the cost of maintenance to the Government of the Dominion to $16,723.70. 3. The aggregate rate for patients per diem in each port, as shown by the foregoing, is as follows, viz.: Montreal, 90 cents per diem; Halifax, 90 cents per diem; St. John, 78¼ cents per diem; Quebec, $1.36 per diem. 4. The causes why the average cost per patient per diem was so much greater in Quebec than in the other ports, is that the hospital has a large and expensive staff, and a large number of residents at Quebec is cared for in the hospital, and the amount contributed for the sick residents in Quebec is not in proportion to the number of days during which they are cared for, and the commissioner or trustees, visiting physicians, resident physicians, and the chaplains, are all paid salaries. 5. No arrangement has been made with the managers of the Marine Hospital at Quebec, as the hospital has been managed by trustees in the past, under the supervision of the Marine Department, and is supported by Dominion funds, and is a Dominion institution. 6. The amount charged to the fund for the care of the sick mariners in the Marine Hospital at Quebec, is considered large, but this expenditure is largely owing to the practice which has prevailed of taking in sick residents, for whom only a small sum is paid by the Government at Quebec, as it is not like a public hospital where the Government pays a fixed rate per diem without any further responsibility, or the treatment of sick mariners who are put there by arrangement. 7. The question of reducing the expenditure for the Marine Hospital at Quebec, is at present under consideration.

GRAZING LEASES.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. EDGAR) asked, Have any grazing leases in Alberta been cancelled since the 1st January? If so, are they "old leases" or leases under the amended form? Does the Government intend to compel the holders of old form leases to fulfil the conditions of the leases, or, as an alternative, to permit settlers to settle on the ranches, as provided for in the new form leases? Is the Government aware that the principal owners of these ranches are Englishmen residing in Great Britain?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Two leases under the amended form have been cancelled since the 1st January, 1889; and it may be added that on the 14th of the previous month, 27, of which four were on the old form, were also cancelled. 2. The Government are cancelling all leases, irrrespective of the form, when the conditions are not being fulfilled. So far it has not been necessary to give the two years' notice in any case, for which provision is made in the old form of lease, inasmuch as in every instance where it has been shown that the land is required for settlement, the lessees have invariably agreed to relinquish the necessary land without notice. 3. The Government are aware that a large amount of British capital is invested in ranches in the North-West.

DEFENCE OF AN INDIAN PRISONER IN COUNTY OF BRUCE.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Has the Government employed legal counsel to defend the Indian who is charged with shooting a white man at Allenford, county of Bruce, this winter? If so, whom did they employ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. A. B. Klein, barrister, of Walkerton.

ILLICIT MANUFACTURE OF WHISKEY.

Mr. RINFRET asked, What is the amount of the costs incurred and paid in the suits instituted against Messrs. Lafleur and Vézina, of Ste. Philomène, county of Lotbinière, and for suits against Messrs. Coté and Hamelin, of Grondines, county of Portneuf, for the illicit manufacture of whiskey in the year 1888?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Messrs. Casgrain, Auger and Hamel were paid $37.40 in the case of Vezina; $53.95 in the case of Coté; $18.50 in the case of Hamelin. I cannot find that any costs were paid in the Lafleur case, nor can such a case be found in the books of the Inland Revenue Department.

TELEGRAPH LINE TO ESQUIMAUX POINT.

Mr. FISET (translation) asked, Since when has work on the telegraph line, which is to go to Esquimaux Point, been begun? How many miles have been constructed in all, particularising the number built in the summer of 1888? What has been the cost per mile?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) In answer to the hon. member I can state that the work was begun in 1880. At the end of the year 1887 there were built 365¼ miles; the cost has been $166.38 per mile, one thing with another. In 1888 there were 418 miles built, at a cost of $139 per mile, taking an average.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY LAND AND MONEY SUBSIDY.

Mr. MACDOWALL asked, 1. At what date were the first maps published showing the intended route of the Canadian Pacific Railway? 2. At what date were the first maps published showing the present route of that railway? 3. What was the land grant per mile granted to the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway? 4. What the amount per mile of money bonus? 5. What is the quantity of land surrendered by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and how much per acre were they paid?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The answer I have to give to the hon. gentleman's questions is as follows:—(1) At what dates were the first maps published showing the intended route of the Canadian Pacific Railway? Answer. In 1872. (2) At what dates were the first maps published showing the present route of that railway? Answer. In 1882. (3) What was the land grant per mile granted to the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway? Answer. Central section, 900 miles at 12,500 acres per mile, 450 miles at 16,66$\frac{6}{100}$ acres per mile: Eastern section, 550 miles at 9,615$\frac{35}{100}$ acres per mile. (4) What the amount per mile of money bonus? Answer. Central section, 900 miles at $10,000 per mile, 450 miles at $13,333 per mile; Eastern section, 550 miles at $15,384.61 per mile. (5) What is the quantity of land surrendered by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and how much per acre were they paid? Answer. 5,793,014 acres.

LUMBER SHIPMENTS TO THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. WELDON (St. John) asked, Is any export duty exacted upon piling and small lumber shipped from the ports in New Brunswick to the United States? What is the rate of duty? And what amount collected during the past year?

Mr. BOWELL. There is no export duty collected or imposed upon small logs measuring not more than nine inches at the butt.

JOSEPH E. VINCENT.

Mr. LANGELIER (Montmorency) moved for:

Copies of correspondence between Joseph E. Vincent, of the city of Quebec, and the Customs Department, respecting the French version of the present tariff and the amendments thereto.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no such correspondence. The only letter received from this gentleman is by my private secretary, who answered it, and the letter was then thrown into the waste paper basket.

Motion withdrawn.

ROCK LAKE DAM.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK moved for :

Copies of all reports and recommendations, by engineers and others, respecting the erection of a dam now under construction at the opening of Rock Lake, in the Township of Storrington, in the County of Frontenac; the height to which it is proposed to dam back the water; the number of acres of land which will be flooded, and the other damage which will be caused by said dam; also copies of reports by the Department of Justice as to the legal right to erect the dam and cause said damage; also copies of all petitions and protests against the erection of the said dam.

He said : In making this motion I desire to call the attention of the Government and the Department of Railways and Canals to the serious mistake which, I believe, has been made in the erection of this dam, and to the serious effects which will follow if the work is proceeded with. The dam mentioned in this motion is at the opening of Rock Lake, a lake which falls into the Opinicon Lake, which is one of those feeding the Rideau Canal. An improvement in that water communciation was suggested by a petition, which was presented to the Government in 1884, when, instead of asking that these waters in these lakes should be raised, the petitioners asked the waters be lowered. I hold a draft of the original petition, which was presented to the Department of Railways and Canals from the ratepayers, asking :

"1st. To lower the waters of the following lakes; Knowlton, Mid, and Desert, Township of Loughborough, Buck and Mud Lake (Bedford), by clearing out the pasages between them and making a lock (cheap) between Mud Creek and Devil Lake (Bedford), of such a height as to make the highest level of water in said lakes the present summer level, and not higher, of Mud Lake (Bedford); also clear cut said passages to the same width as the locks on the Rideau Canal, and to such a depth that when the supply necessary for the Rideau Canal is drawn off, there may still remain the depth of wster upon the bottom of said passages as there is upon the sills of the locks on said Rideau Canal. Also to construct a lock (cheap) at the junction of Devil Lake and the Rideau Canal, North Crosby. The above improvements will open up a way for barges to the head of Knowlton Lake, giving the traffic of 486 miles of coast to the Rideau Canal—a largely increased water supply, both to the canal and the Gananoque River, and also enable the land owners to cultivate their meadow land and to work their mines, besides enabling a large quantity of firewood, now locked up, to come to Kingston, and thereby reduce the price of that commodity in the city.

"2nd. To make a shute or passage for ore, &c., from Buck to Devil Lake, in case a direct passage to the Rideau should prove, upon examination, to be expensive. 3rd. To purchase Hunter's mill right between Rock and Opinicon Lakes, and by a cheap lock make a passage from Opinicon Lake to Rock Lake, lowering the water to the summer level of Hunter's dam, and making the passage the same width, and having the same depth of water as the canal locks, also to clear out the stream between Rock Lake and Stone House Lake and raise the road bridge—for the same reasons as stated under No. 1.

This is the petition which was presented in 1884, signed by a large number of residents in the counties of Frontenac, Addington and Leeds, and it is one of the means to be adopted for getting a better water supply for the Rideau Canal, and also for the Gananoque River, for the benefit of mill owners in Gananoque. The object then was not to raise the waters in these lakes, but to open passages between them, so that there might be communication to benefit a large number of the mines in that locality, which export a large quantity of phosphate, and suffer great detriment in consequence of the long haul that has to be made. A meeting of the ratepayers, large and enthusiastic, was held the other night at the township of Loughborough, in the county of Addington, calling for the expenditure of money to be given for the building of a railway. But if they had this canal built, it would open no less than 486 miles of coast, which it would make tributary to the traffic carried on over the Rideau Canal; and when you consider that large mileage, it is evident there is a large amount of material in that county which could be brought to market if this waterway were constructed. That question was taken up, after Sir Charles Tupper left the department, by the present Minister of Railways, whom, we all regret to know, is very ill and unable to attend his department. He was so impressed with the desirability of the work, that he asked the Government for a grant of $20,000 to investigate into and make some of these improvements. $8,000 was given by Order in Council to the Gananoque River Improvement Company, and was expended in improving the supply of water to that river, but the rest was intended to carry out the idea mentioned in this petition. But what do we find? All that has been undertaken was to purchase the mill site of a man named Hunter, at the opening of Rock Lake, and, instead of making a passage in order to lower the water at Rock Lake, the engineer, or somebody else, constructed this dam in order to dam back the water, under the impression that they had a legal right to do so. But, according to all the information and evidence obtainable, I claim there is no such right. Upwards of 20 years ago, Mr. Hunter had a dam there which was used for the purpose of damming back the water in the spring, in order to float logs down, but the water was always lowered, and the dam taken away by the 1st June, so that no water remained there during the summer. The present dam is erected for the purpose of making a reservoir, and keeping back the water until August or September. No right was given by Mr. Hunter's dam for that purpose. The right he had was only to keep back the water in the spring, so that the Government have no legal right to dam back the water. I am told that it will overflow hundreds of acres of land. A roadway has been built by the township of Storrington some 600 feet long, and this roadway will be from 4 to 6 feet under water, unless this dam be removed. The hon. the Minister of Railways will see that this dam will have serious consequences to the people in the township of Storrington. The township council have petitioned against it. The people are much excited, and I really fear the same thing will take place as took place when the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was at the head of the Government. He then had a dam at Devil's Lake, and one night it disappeared in some mysterious manner, and the hon. gentleman very wisely never made any enquiries as to who took it away. The people were so indignant at its being put there; and the same thing may probably take place if the present Government proceed with the construction of this dam, and put in the stop logs, and keep back the water. I hope the Government will make investigations with a view to carry out the requests contained in this petition, and to find out the means of making connection between these lakes, so as to allow boats and barges to pass between them and so open up this country, to the benefit of the Rideau Canal. I may also say that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction in regard to the way in which that canal is managed at the far end, because the water has been kept up to a height which was not intended when the canal was originally built, and hundreds of acres of land have been drowned and damaged, and every year we have had many claims for damages to be settled. This is not right, because, by a little expenditure of money, the canal can be made fit for barges and boats drawing more water than those which pass through now. That can be done by a little dredging. If they were to move the head lock from Kingston Mills to Washburn, and were to dredge between Brewer's and Kingston Mills, they would have enough water to allow boats drawing 6 feet of water to pass, whereas now, according to the design of the Royal Engineers who built the canal, no boats of more than 4½ feet draft can pass. The estimate of the expenditure required for that is $60,000, and, by removing this lock from Kingston Mills to Washburn and dredging out the bed of the river, the Government could not only lower the water to a depth of 8 feet, but would reclaim 4,000 acres of land, the richest and most fertile in that country. That land would be readily saleable at $30 or $40 an acre, and would far more than pay the cost of the improvement. It has been said that a man who could make two blades of grass grow where one grew before would be a great man. By making this improvement, the Government would reclaim 4,000 acres of the richest land in Ontario, and I think it is their duty to take that course. Not only that, but they would stop the damage which is now done to the lands of the farmers living all round that level, some 20 miles in distance, who are suffering annually from the raising of the water. It has been raised to 7 feet 9 inches on the sill, and I hold in my hand the affidavit of the first lockmaster at Kingston Mills, who was there for 40 years, and he says that the practice was to keep 5 ft. 6 in. of water on the sills, and that no boat was allowed to pass through with a draft of more than 4½ feet. That is signed by Mr. John Brady, who was the first lockmaster at Kingston Mills, and was there for 40 years, and is still alive. If that rule were enforced, it would take away all the objection. The farmers complain because the water is kept 7 feet on the sills, and boats drawing 5 feet and 6 feet are allowed to pass through. The Government have no right to cause this damage, and if they require more water, they should spend money in dredging the canal and removing the lock at Kingston Mills to Washburn.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD Of course, there is no objection to bringing down these papers. It is an engineer's question, which the House cannot well understand until all the papers are laid before the House; and if there is no full report on the subject, I shall see that a report is prepared, giving the views of the Government engineer in charge of the canal, and shall see also whether his report is endorsed by the chief engineer, Mr. Page. I think, however, my hon. friend ought not to threaten the House and the Government with an act of violence in pulling down this dam unless it is removed. I draw a great distinction between this dam and the one my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Mackenzie), when he was Minister, allowed to be pulled down. I understand that was the Devil's Dam, and we are all anxious to get rid of that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) did not allow that dam to be pulled down. It was done without his knowledge or consent. He did not ask for a vote to repair it; that is all.

Motion agreed to.

ARREARS OF INDIAN ANNUITIES.

Mr. O'BRIEN moved for:

Copies of all correspondence, since the 1st January, 1888, between the Government of the Dominion and that of the Province of Ontario, relating to the arrears of annuities due to the Indians who surrendered their lands under the Robinson Treaty, and to the grant of a reserve to the Chippewa Band of Lake Temogamingue.

He said: I would ask the Minister of the Interior whether any arrangement has been come to, or is likely to be come to, in reference to the arrears of the annuities due under the Robinson Treaty and to the Temogamingue Reserve. An arrangement was arrived at to make the reservation, but, owing to a dispute between the Ontario Government and the Dominion Government, I understand that no reservation has been made. These people have been for years anxious to get a reserve there. They are in very poor circumstances, and have no resources except fishing and hunting. They are anxious to get this reserve, and I think it is very hard to keep them out of their right because these two Governments cannot come to an agreement. I understand that the reason why the reserve was not made, in the first instance, was that these people were overlooked, as they were in a distant part of the country, and now the reserve cannot be made because of the difference between the two Governments. Pressing representations have been made to me from every Chippewa band on the north shore of Lake Huron in reference to this reserve. They all make common cause with this band in regard to it. Of course, in regard to the other portion of the motion, as to the arrears under the Robinson Treaty, that is a different question, and that is a matter also causing great injustice to these people for the same reason. The two Governments cannot agree, and the matter remains unsettled, and so it goes on from year to year, but I would like the Minister to tell the House, so that I may inform the people, what likelihood there is of the arrears being settled, and also of this very small matter as to the Temogamingue band being arranged.

Mr. DAWSON. This matter of the arrears due to the Indians under the Robinson Treaty, is a very important one, and it has been up in the House year after year. No settlement, so far as we know, has been arrived at with the Government of Ontario whereby the Indians could get what has been so long due to them. There was a statement made in the House some years ago in reference to a motion of this kind, in which it was shown that the amounts due the Indians under the Robinson Treaty were as much as $800,000, or something approaching that, with interest added. This is a very large sum to be due these poor people on the north coasts of Lakes Huron and Superior, and it is very desirable that some arrangement should be made between the two Governments so that they might get a portion of what is due to them. I would never suggest that all that money should be paid at once to the Indians, but it might be funded for the purpose of education, for the purpose of helping them on in farming, and in many other ways, which would be of great advantage to them. Now, on the north coast of Lake Huron, at this very moment, a change is coming over the Indian population which should not be lost sight of. The opening of the Canadian Pacific Railway has let in immense numbers of white people, including white hunters, and the consequence is that the game is fast disappearing. Fish poachers are going in and setting pound nets in the little lakes and sweeping the fish out of them. The consequence is that the Indians, in the course of a few years, will be destitute, and the Government will have to provide for their subsistence, as they are now doing for the Indians in the North-West, unless something is done in the meantime to teach them agriculture and to establish industrial schools among them. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the Government of Ontario has been exceedingly friendly to the Indians for some time past. It has tried to keep fish poachers out of the territory, and it has shown every disposition to act in a friendly way towards them. Then, again, there is the case of the Indians of the Lake of the Woods. Now that the territory has been awarded to Ontario, of course Ontario will have to pay the annuities, and pay the arrears of the annuities, as I understand the matter, and pay all that has been paid to the Indians for the cession of that territory; so that the decision of the Privy Council has not been altogether in favor of Ontario. It appears to me that Ontario is now in for a capital of a million dollars in paying the annuities. It will have to provide for the payment of those Indians, and the arrears due to the Indians of the north coast of Lakes Huron and Superior, to whom the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) has so properly drawn attention, and whose case deserves the serious consideration of the Government.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I am sorry I was not in my seat when the mover of this resolution spoke. I think I informed him there was no correspondence with regard to the matters since 1883. The only correspondence relative to the reserve at Lake Temogamingue consists of a letter to the Under Secretary of State, requesting that the attention of His Honor the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario might be again invited to the matter. To that letter no reply has been received. The band interested in the reserve referred to, were not represented when the Treaty of 1850 was made with the Ojibbeways of Lake Huron, their chief leaving through fear—thinking it might be "bad medicine," I suppose—failed to be present. Consequently, no reserve was then allotted to them. The department was not, until the year 1880, made aware of the facts which, on investigation, were found to be substantially correct as stated by the Indians, and they have from that time participated in the annuities payable to the Lake Huron Indians under that treaty. But the land having passed to the Province at Confederation, the Dominion could not allot the band a reserve without the consent of the Ontario Government, which it has been endeavoring to obtain ever since, but without success.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Is there any possibility of this claim being enforced on the Ontario Government? Is it a matter of law or a matter of equity?—because it is rather hard for these people that they are not to be allowed the reserve upon which they were living happily. They made the surrender the same as the other Indians did, and they are entitled to the same consideration.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is a standing hardship that these Indians should be kept out of their money so long; but the cause is, as has been mentioned, the want of agreement between the Dominion Government and that of the Province. The difficulty was presented to my hon friend the member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), when he was Prime Minister. The Indians were then claiming their money, but no conclusion could be arrived at between the Dominion and the Province. I think my hon. friend put a sum in the Estimates to relieve the then necessities of the Indians, in part payment of their claims. Since that time I do not think any progress has been made in the settlement of this treaty; and, I understand, though I am not fully informed on the matter, that the reason why there is not arrangement between the Dominion and the Ontario Government is that the two Provincial Governments consider that this matter is involved in the settlement between Ontario and Quebec in some way or other. However, I hope we will shortly be able to come to some arrangement with the Province of Ontario. I may say that Mr. Mowat, the Premier, will be here this week to see me on business, and I will improve the opportunity to discuss this matter with him, along with other matters.

Mr. DAWSON. The arrangement was that they should be paid their annual annuities. None of the arrears were paid. The annuities had been paid regularly since that time, but there was no payment of what was past due, and it is what was due previous to that time, with interest, that they now claim. I think there were statements made some years ago of the amount due, and if the Minister of the Interior would include them in the return so as to give all the information possible, it would be very desirable.

Motion agreed to.

FISHING RIGHTS IN MATANE RIVER.

Mr. CASGRAIN moved for:

Copies of correspondence between the Government and the holders of fishing rights under permit in River Matane, and of correspondence on the same subject with the riparian proprietors, and reports on their opposition to permits, &c.

He said: I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Marine, and also the attention of the Minister of Justice, to the subject of this motion. It affects the private rights of certain riparian proprietors on the River Matane, and I believe the action taken by the Government in this matter is to a certain extent illegal, and that the riparian proprietors along that river have been deprived by the Government of fishing rights which they have enjoyed in that river since the earliest settlement of the country, under the French regime. These rights were granted by the French King to the Seigneur of Matane, and the specific right to fish in the waters of the River St. Lawrence were given to seigneur D'Amours in 1680. That right being vested in the seigneur, it was by him conceded to his tenants, and they enjoyed the right up to the time the Government took upon themselves to deprive them of that right and to bestow it on a private individual, Sir Alexander Galt. I have nothing to say against Sir Alexander Galt personally. He simply took advantage of the right to the fishing which the Government gave him, and it was given to him in acknowledgment of services which he had rendered to the Government as Fishery Commissioner. But that did not give him, in my opinion, any legal title whatever to the fishing in Matane River. That title, I hold, was vested in censitaires holding title from the seigneur; they possess such right to the fishing that it could not be vested in other individuals by any persons whatever. It can easily be understood that the laws that govern this particular case, the old laws of France, could not be altered by the Conquest. The right acquired from the Crown by private individuals, was not taken away from them by the right of conquest; on the contrary, the lands given by the Crown of France to the Seigneur of Matane, must be held to hold good, and the title does hold good, and so much is that the case, that the rights of the seigneur were acknowledged by the Crown of England, and especially his rights with regard to the fisheries as appears by the records of foi et hommage. I have taken some interest in the case of these censitaires, because I have felt they have been very harshly treated, and not only has the action of the Government, but the conduct of those who had the license to fish in the river, pressed heavily upon them. These riparian proprietors, being in the enjoyment of their rights, continued to fish in the river at the time when the first license was granted to Sir Alexander Galt. The consequence was, that they were soon summoned before the Justice of the Peace of the locality, and were fined for using a right which they, or their ancestors, had enjoyed from the time of the early settlement of the country. It was supposed that the Government might have assumed a different position in this matter; but, on the contrary, I find, by an answer given some time ago on the floor of the House by the Minister of Marine, that the Government have renewed the lease of the river fishing to Sir Alexander Galt for nine years, to the detriment of the riparian proprietors, and in spite of the remonstrances of the inhabitants. Whatever may be the legal opinion of the law officers of the Crown in this regard, one fact is clear, that those persons were in lawful possession and enjoyment of that right to the fishery, and that the Government should not have deprived them of that right by giving a license to a third party. I have taken the trouble to endeavor to induce the Government to change their position in this matter; but, I am sorry to say, that I could not succeed. In my opinion since the grant was made to the right of fishery in the River St. Lawrence opposite the seigniories, it is very clear that the Government now cannot take it away and give it to another man. The point upon which the Government relies, as far as I have been able to discern, in order to grant the license, is that it was a part of the River St. Lawrence and a part of the River Matane, which is called an estuary, and which forms a special locality upon which the Crown can assert its rights to granting licenses. It seems to me very strange that there could be any such particular spot intervening between fresh water and the tidal waters of the River St. Lawrence. If it is asserted on behalf of the Crown that they could grant a license for the river above the tidal waters, then I say, that long ago that position taken by the Government was settled in the case of the Queen against Robertson. I hold, therefore, that there is no possible right in the Crown to grant licenses in the River Matane above the tidal waters. Then if it is alleged that they could grant a license in the waters of the St.

Lawrence, as I have said before, the prior right of the seigneurs is a complete bar to the Crown granting any license. I am unable to understand, and those people who have enjoyed the right to fish are unable to understand, how it is that a favor of that description could be granted to Sir A. T. Galt, against what they consider their just rights. They think it a great hardship and a great wrong that they should be mulcted in fines and condemned to imprisonment for fishing in that river, after having enjoyed that right for a number of years as they did. That seems to me preposterous. Allow me to quote the opinion given in the case of the Queen vs. Robertson, which may be found in the Supreme Court Reports, page 68. It is as follows:—

"In fresh water rivers, that is above the ebb and flow of the tide, the owners of the soil on each side have the interest and the right of fishing, and it is an exclusive right extending to the centre of the stream opposite their respective lands, unless a special grant or prescription be shown."

I may add that this is not only the English law, but it is also the French law upon that point. Since the Local Governments and the Federal Government are, to a certain extent, at the present moment, extremely sensitive as to their respective rights in these fisheries, it seems to me that if there was any right belonging to the Federal Government to be exercised under the British North America Act, that ought to have been decided by the Supreme Court. That right of fishery in the inland waters seems to be vested in the Local Government of the Province of Quebec where the seigniory is situated; therefore, I say that the Federal Government ought to exercise extreme caution before granting any more licenses, or renewing the license to Sir A. T. Galt. I am sorry to say, Mr. Speaker, that I differ from the views entertained by the Minister of Justice in this matter, because I know that his opinions are extremely valuable, and that his judicial mind is such that I ought perhaps to submit to his legal opinion. However, in this matter the case appears to me to be so plain that I do not think there is any room for doubt. I do not at all see how this license should have been issued in favor of Sir A. T. Galt, because it is a grievance imposed upon a number of the persons of that locality. With the permission of the House I desire to amend this motion by adding to it the words: "And also all the leases that have been granted for this river."

Mr. FISET. (Translation.) It is with pleasure, Mr. Speaker, that I second this motion. It refers to a river in the county of Rimouski, which I have the honor of representing here; and, besides, it includes a question full of interest to private persons and of considerable public moment. The hon. mover of this motion, some years past, when I was not in Parliament, made a report to the hon. Minister of Justice on this subject. For this reason I thought it becoming to give way to him and to content myself with seconding the motion. Not wishing to be prolix, I will enter at once upon the subject. According to the Union Act, the Federal Government has only the right to improve the lakes and rivers, and not the absolute ownership in them. On this point, I may be permitted to read the following, which I find in the treatise of Mr. Joseph Doutre, "The Constitution of Canada," at page 164:

"I have, therefore, arrived at the following conclusion:—That it was not the intention of the British North America Act, 1867, to give to the Parliament of Canada any greater power than had been previously exercised by the separate Legislatures of the Provinces; that is, the general power for the regulation and protection of the fisheries.

"That the Act of Parliament of Canada, 31 Vict., c. 60, recognises that view, and, while it provides for the regulation and protection of the fisheries, it does not interfere with the private rights, only authorising the granting of leases in fresh water rivers, where such rights have not already accrued, and that any lease granted by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to fish in fresh water rivers which are not the property of the Dominion, or in which the soil is not in the Dominion, is illegal; that where the exclusive right to fish has been acquired by grant of the land through which the river flows, there is no authority given by the Canadian Act to grant a right to fish; and, also, that the ungranted land being in the Crown for the benefit of the people of New Brunswick, the exclusive right to fish follows as an incident, and in such case is in the Crown, as trustee for the people of the Province, and a license to fish in such stream is illegal."

I think that this citation is conclusive. But I have further arguments: The River Matane, in the county of Rimouski, is situate about 240 miles below Quebec. The seigniory in which it lies was granted in 1672 by the Intendant Talon to Mr. Mathieu D'Amours. And, if the House will kindly permit me, I shall read out the title to this seigniory in order to make it better understood, how those at this day ask the right to fish in the River Matane are only seeking the exercise of a right. In the "Cadastres abrégés des Seigneuries de Québec," vol. 2, No. 98, we read as follows:—

"This Seigniory was granted on the eighth of November, one thousand six hundred and seventy-two, by Mr. Talon, Intendant, to Mathieu D'Amours, and at that period consisted of one league in front by one league and a half in depth, at the place called Matane, viz.: half a league on either side of the River Matane.

"Subsequently, on the twenty-sixth of June, one thousand six hundred and seventy-seven, this grant was confirmed by Jacques Duchesneau, Intendant, &c., who gave D'Amours a title for the league in question with a further grant of one league by the same depth "à prendre du côté de la rivière Métis, avec le droit de pêche sur le dit fleuve St. Laurent, pour en jouir, etc, à titre de Fief et Seigneurie, etc., aux droit et redevances accoutumés, suivant la coutume de la prévoté et vicomté de Paris."

"This grant, it will be perceived, gives a frontage of two leagues on the River St. Lawrence.

"On the twelfth of January, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-one, Donald McKinnon rendered foi et homage for two leagues and a quarter of the Seigniory of Matane, which is described as containing two leagues and a half in front."

And now we come to the most important passage:

"On the sixteenth October, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, James Shepperd, the Sheriff of the District of Quebec, executed a deed of sale in favor of Simon Fraser, of the Fief and Seigniory of Matane, situate on the south shore of the River St. Lawrence, in the District of Quebec, 'containing in the whole two leagues and a half in front by a league and a half in depth, to wit: half a league on this side and two leagues beyond the River Matane, with haute, moyenne et basse Justice, and the right of fishing in the said River St. Lawrence.' The sale had taken place upon Laughlan Smith, curator to the estate of Donald McKinnon and had been effected on the eighth August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, for the sum of one hundred and sixty pounds current money of Lower Canada."

I humbly ask the House's pardon for taking the liberty of reading at length this passage. I know that a report has been presented to the Government by a very distinguished man; but in this report of his this passage is not quoted at length. I proceed:

"It is to be observed that by the original deed of concession two leagues only in front were granted, namely: half a league below the River Matane, and a league and a half above it; nevertheless, by the Sheriff's sale above mentioned two leagues are sold below the River Matane, and half a league above it.

"On the eighth March, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, the Earl of Dalhousie, the Governor General, granted to Jane McCallum and to her children, issue of her marriage with the late Simon Fraser, another league in front by the same depth; the said last-mentioned league, as appears by the description, being situate next to the half league above the River Matane.

"The present proprietor is at this day in possession of the whole three leagues and a half in front upon the River St Lawrence.

"From the above statement it will appear that the only extent granted below the River Matane, is a half a league, with a league and a half above the same river, the league granted by Letters Patent covering the same ground as the league granted by Duchesneau, in one thousand six hundred and seventy-seven, to D'Amours, beyond the league granted by Talon, to the same individual, in one thousand six hundred and seventy-two.

"No droit de Quint has accrued upon the seigniory within the last fifty years, the seigniory having descended by inheritance from Simon Fraser, who purchased it in one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, to the present proprietor, his son; Simon Fraser paid the droit de Quint upon his purchase in one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, on the twentieth day of February one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, to the then Receiver-General.

"Daniel McKinnon had become proprietor of the two leagues and a quarter for which he rendered foi et homage as above stated, by purchase from the representatives of Mathieu D'Amours, the original grantee."

In this way Mr. Mathieu D'Amours was the rightful owner of this seigniory which was later on ceded to Simon Fraser, and finally to Daniel McKinnon. The parcels of land sold fronting on the river have been sold with the same privileges attached as belonged to the seigniors, that is to say, with the right of hunting and fishing over the St. Lawrence and a fortiori over the River Matane. I have examined the titles of the various seigniories granted by the Kings of France to the seigniors of the Province of Quebec. Not one of them, perhaps, is more explicit than that referring to the River Matane. Let us see, now, upon what grounds the Government base their refusal to the proprietors of waterside lands of the right of hunting and fishing. They rely upon these words: "navigable and floatable rivers." Allow me to cite the opinion of one of the most eminent of jurists, whose authority gives weight in France, Mr. Laurent, in his treatise: "Principes de droit civil," vol. 6, page 7. He puts the following question:—

"When is a river navigable? The Code says nothing; but the meaning of the word navigable and the spirit of the law is sufficient to decide the question. Navigable means where is possible to navigate, and to navigate signifies to proceed by water either way, upwards or downwards. So that it is not sufficient that because one can cross from one bank to the other on a ferry boat that the river becomes a navigable one. Furthermore, it has been decided that a river is not a navigable one for the reason alone that the occupiers of the bank move about on it a few small boats for the transport of manure and the crops. In short the navigability implies the possibility of transporting men and material; it is because navigable rivers form a means of communication that the legislator has placed them within the public domain; if they cannot be made use of for the purposes of communication, the reason for which they are held to be public property no longer exists, and there is no effect without its corresponding cause. Whenever a river is not navigable it does not fall within the public domain."

Further on still, at page 19, he says:

"A river may be navigable in part and non-navigable in part."

This is the case with the Matane River.

"Will it belong to the public domain throughout its whole course? D'Agueseau maintained that the entire river is a appanage of the State domain. It is established in the Repertoire of Merlin that D'Agueseau wrote less as an impartial judge than as a special pleader for the rights of the domain. His opinion has not found favor. The contrary has been decided by the old law under the Code Napoleon. Applying the principles we have just laid down the correct decision is evident enough. If navigable rivers are under the control of the public, it is on account of their being navigable; in the case when they are not navigable throughout their entire course they only become public property from the point where they become navigable."

A little further on, at page 20, he says:

"For similar reasons the owners of water frontages will have the right of fishing in those waters; the exercise of this right not affecting injuriously their navigability."

After reading these lines one would say that the author had himself visited the Matane River, so closely do his remarks apply to the case in point. In fact this river is navigable as far as Fraser's wharf from the mouth. But at the place where salmon is caught by the line, from Fraser's wharf to Price's dam, it is not navigable even at high tide. I cannot understand how a man of such standing could send in to the department a report in which he stated that this river is navigable. For those who have seen it when I have, it is easy to determine that it is not navigable. As I have just said, from Fraser's wharf to Price's dam it is one succession of rapids. It is true that the high tide makes itself felt, but even with the high tide, the river is not even then navigable for any bateau or any schooner. Now what do we understand by the word "floatable"? Allow me again to cite the same author, who in France is regarded as a leading jurisconsult. This is what he says:

"There are rivers which are not navigable but which are floatable, that is to say, which although not bearing boats over their bottoms, yet serve to transport wood either in pockets or rafts or loose logs. Public opinion is founded on custom. Those rivers are never considered as floatable whose floating powers are limited to the floating of loose logs. We see no other reason for this distinction beyond the respect for the rights which attach to the water front proprietors on non-navigable streams. The legislator has wished to reconcile the interests of these proprietors with the interests of those engaged in transport by water. Their rights may be exercised without interfering with the floating facilities of the stream, therefore there was no necessity for placing under the protection of the State those rivers which float loose logs of wood; without necessity there is no public control."

Such is the opinion of this learned jurisconsult respecting floatable rivers, and what is understood by floatable streams. As will be seen in cases where the floating power is only sufficient for loose logs, not even for rafts, the river belongs to the proprietors of the front and is not reckoned as the property of the State. The strongest proof which I can adduce in this connection, to show that the river is not floatable, is the very fact that the Messieurs Price instead of transporting their sawn timber and deals, &c, by rafts, transport them overland by waggons, for they know full well that by rafting they would be exposed to serious loss. One last remark and I have done. It is further stated in this report which was presented to the Government some years ago, that the King's highway passes along the river's edge and that in consequence there are no river front proprietors. It is just the contrary. There is a road on each side of the river, a highway, but on one side are found frontage owners while on the other side are to be found proprietors who do not own the front, so that it cannot be said that the King's highway runs along the River Matane on both sides, and that there are no river front owners. For those who know the locality as I know it, it is impossible to understand how a man of such great pretentions was able to present to the Government a report which is nothing else but false. I might cite several more authors, and bring forward many more reasons for the purpose of establishing that the Matane River beyond its mouth is not navigable, but I think that I have said enough to convince this honorable House, and that it is sufficient for me in conclusion to put this simple question: How does it happen that the River Métis and the River Rimouski, both in the county of Rimouski, as is the River Matane, and each of them only thirty miles from the latter river, how does it happen, I say, that the Government does not withhold the right of fishing and hunting on these rivers, which are in precisely the same position as the Matane River is? The River Rimouski is navigable as far as its mouth; it is even floatable as far as Price's dam which cannot be said of the River Matane. So the River Métis is navigable at its mouth, but it is not floatable in its other portions. Nevertheless the Government have surrendered their rights over these two rivers. But as for the Matane River, the river front owners who possess the right of hunting and fishing by virtue of the titles which have been granted to them by the seigniors, find that they are deprived of the rights which the proprietors on the Rivers Rimouski and Métis enjoy. The Government lease this Matane River to a private person, who pays them $100 per annum, and by that very act they deprive the owners of the land of their lawful rights of hunting and fishing. Is it not plain that there is injustice somewhere, but I venture to hope that the Government so soon as they will take the trouble to inform themselves of the facts, will hasten to give back to the water front proprietors the incontestable rights which have been disregarded to this day.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

FISHERIES IN LUNENBURG COUNTY, N.S.

Mr. EISENHAUER moved for:

Return of all correspondence between the Department of Marine and Fisheries and Mr. C. C. Goddard, Overseer of River Fisheries in the county of Lunenburg, during 1888; also, his report to the department for the same year; also, the report of Mr. Rogers, the Inspector of Fisheries for Nova Scotia, for the year 1888.

He said: My object in making this motion is to ascertain, if I can, the parties who have been fined in the county of Lunenburg for violation of the Fisheries Act, and the parties from whom fines were exacted; and, also, to obtain, if I can, the reports of Fishery Overseer Rogers for 1887 and 1888. I am informed that Mr. Rogers made a special report on the sawdust question in 1887, but I do not see it in the Minister's report, so that it must have been suppressed, I imagine. I am also informed that his report was to the effect that, in his opinion, the sawdust was not at all injurious to the river fisheries. Now, it does seem very strange that the Government should have suppressed that report. If they have no confidence in their own official, I think he should be dismissed from the service and some other official appointed in his place, in whom they would have confidence. From the correspondence I have had with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I judge that some years ago Mr. Rogers reported differently from what he has done during the past two years. Perhaps the hon. Minister can explain the reason of this difference in his reports. With regard to River La Have filling up with sawdust, I do not think it is any different from what it was fifteen years ago. Vessels of large tonnage go up the river, and load and come down as they did fifteen to twenty years ago. I think that is proved conclusively. The navigable part of the river is not filling up, as the Government have been led to believe. Several of the largest lumbering mills there have closed down, as the hon. Minister well knows, and hundreds of men are thrown out of employment; and I am informed, by parties in the county, that quite a number of those men are now making their way to the States for want of employment. In correspondence which I received to-day from the Minister, he said that if it could be shown that the sawdust was not injurious they would not enforce the law. It devolves on the Government to satisfy themselves whether the sawdust is injurious or not; I do not think those in the lumber business should be called upon to do so. I think the Government should, themselves, appoint a commission to enquire thoroughly into that question, because the lumber industry is a very large one in Nova Scotia, especially in the county I represent, and those millers say that the expense of erecting furnaces for the burning of the sawdust would be greater than they could afford, and if they are obliged to keep their mills shut down, the consequences will be ruinous to a large portion of the lumber trade in the Province, and especially in that county. I do think the Government should take this matter into their serious consideration, and if they satisfy themselves that the sawdust is really injurious, then they should decide which would be the more injurious, to stop these large lumbering operations, or to allow the small injury that would be done to the fisheries by permitting the sawdust to be thrown into the river. I am informed that there are just as many fish, on the average, taken from the river now as there have been for years past. There were quite as many fish taken on the Port Medway River for several years past as were taken many years ago. There are quite a number of mills on this river and all the sawdust has been thrown into this river. Whether that is due to the stronger current in this river, I do not know. There may be some sawdust in the eddies and little nooks of the river, but I think there is as much fish there as there was twenty years ago. I think the Government have been discriminating in regard to the parties who have been fined, or from whom the fines have been exacted. I hold in my hand a letter written by my predecessor, the representative of the county in 1886, which I will read. It is addressed to one Benjamin Hubley:

"My Dear Sir,—I think I answered your letter some short time ago regarding sawdust, but, having a doubt, I will make sure of it by writing you now. I delayed, when first I received your letter, in order to make arrangements with the Government. I am sorry you paid the fine you speak of, as Mr. Goddard should have collected first from the Davisons, who were the real violators of the law, as the sawdust from their mills has really been doing the injury to navigation, and they are the best able to pay. I have written Mr. Goddard, giving him an idea of what I consider is right, and his unfairness in exacting fines from the small millers and poor men, and letting Davisons go. I will write Goddard to-day, and until you hear to the contrary, don't be an exception in saving the dust, but be careful not to throw mill rubbish or slabs in the river. I can realise how hard it is to save the dust, constructed as our old mills are."

I think we may gather from this letter that there was some discrimination in fining parties who threw sawdust into the river, and I think that is one reason why those fined complain so very much. I may say also that in the county I represent there is a large number of small mills with one saw, and it would be impossible for those people to consume their sawdust. It would not pay them to go to the expense of burning it, or getting rid of it in some other way. I think it is the duty of the Government to seriously consider this matter and satisfy themselves thoroughly whether the throwing of sawdust into the rivers is really injurious or not. The law has not been enforced with regard to all rivers. The Government take the right to exempt some from its operation, and I do not see how they can do that properly, unless a commission is appointed to see which rivers should be exempted.

Mr. TUPPER. With the consent of the hon. gentleman, I would suggest that the form of his motion be varied so as to make it read, so far as relates to sawdust, and I will have no objection to the motion with that change. The hon. gentleman is mistaken when he thinks there is any desire to suppress Mr. Rogers' report. It does not appear in the Fishery Report for the very good reason that the report has not yet been laid on the Table.

Mr. JONES (Halifax.) When will it be?

Mr TUPPER. Very shortly. It is printed, and is now being bound for distribution. When the report is brought down, it will not contain Mr. Rogers' views on the sawdust question, but I have no objection to bring down, at the request of the hon. gentleman, that portion of the report in full, and the House can decide whether it is worth printing or not. The report is very voluminous, and a large portion of it contains nothing new or of particular value to hon. gentlemen on either side. It is, perhaps, an epitome of arguments that have been used on the question for a long time, and that are familiar to nearly all of us. At any rate, the printing of that is a matter which I will leave to the Printing Committee, if desired. The report itself will be brought down. With reference to the hon. gentleman's remarks in connection with Lunenburg County, no doubt he is aware of the great indulgence exercised by the department, ever since the year 1876, towards the lumbering interests in that county. I am quite satisfied that a careful examination of the correspondence will show that there has been no desire to favor any one, but perhaps a desire to favor the lumbermen and to encourage their industry—often, however, at the expense of the valuable interests of the fishermen. The department has been embarrassed considerably by the arguments used on both sides. As a rule we have tried to carry out the law of the land, which has been on the statutes for a number of years. The hon. gentleman incidentally discussed a principle of this law, which we are bound to administer, and there may be much to be said on both sides of the question. I notice a Bill has been introduced by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey), who has raised that very important question as to whether this legislation regarding the pollution of rivers with sawdust should not be repealed; but I take it, until the House has repealed that Act, it will be the duty of the department, except in the case of streams exempted for special reasons, to enforce the law as we have enforced it in the past. The letter which the hon. gentleman read does not bear out the charge he made that the Government, in 1886, showed favoritism in this connection. Mr. Kaulbach, it is true, expressed in that letter his own individual views as to whether the fishery officer should not have proceeded against the rich lumberman before exacting the fine from the poor lumberman. That is simply his opinion. We are not in possession of all the facts; we do not know which party was proceeded against first, and which has the prior judgment. However, I do not think that affects the question which the hon. gentleman has raised, and it does not support the incidental statement he made that there was any favoritism shown in regard to this matter. I am certainly not aware of any case of that kind, and am prepared to show that since I have had anything to do with the department there has not been any attempt to favor a single millowner in this connection. On the contrary, in my official capacity, I have become very unpopular in a large number of counties very favorable to the Government, because I refused, as I did not see my way clear to meet the wishes of the people in those districts, to relax the law, and it is because I have endeavored to carry out this law that considerable dissatisfaction has been expressed in many quarters, both in counties friendly to the Government and others. In the Port Medway River, which is in the county represented by my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Freeman), the same instructions were given as were given in reference to the La Have In fact, I may state that all this sudden excitement in one portion of Canada only is due to the circular which I thought, in fairness, should be issued to the people interested, in the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia last fall, when I discovered that, probably owing to the views of the inspector in Nova Scotia whose name has been mentioned, that the sawdust does not injure the fishery interest, a great many lumbermen deposited sawdust in very considerable quantities in the rivers there, thinking they had the right to do so with impunity. And, consequently, I thought it would be fair to give them timely notice that this could not be done under the law, and that they must adapt their mills so as to dispose of their sawdust otherwise than by putting it into these rivers which were not exempted. I showed them the provisions of the Act, and told them that the law provided for the consideration of special facts, shown by petition to the Governor in Council, or to the Minister of Marine as Minister of Marine, pointing out the special circumstances which existed in connection with any particular river where the enforcement of the law would not serve any useful purpose. Since that circular was sent out, several petitions have been considered, and some streams have been exempted, and in regard to other streams the exemption has not been granted, or, where the exemption was not granted, the instruction was given by authority to the officer not to enforce the law, if a reasonable effort was made to keep out such quantities as could be kept out, of this sawdust or mill rubbish. As to the hon. gentleman's suggestion for a commission, I prefer the method which the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) has adopted in this matter. I prefer that the subject should be discussed on a proposition of that kind for the repeal of existing legislation, when the experience of all the fishery officers in the country can be used, as shown by the reports, and the opinions of scientific men can be discussed. The expense of such a commission as has been proposed, in order to effect any real purpose, would be enormous. The hon. gentleman mentions, for instance, that they should go to rivers and examine them. If he thinks for a moment that the commission would not only have to go through the rivers of the Province of Nova Scotia and examine them, but would have to go through all the Provinces of Canada and take evidence and make due enquiry, the difficulty, he must see, would be very great; and I suppose the hon. gentleman suggested that because he was of the opinion that in some streams it would be necessary to enforce the law while it might not be enforced in others; but there are other gentlemen who believe that the law should not be enforced in any stream at all. There is at present, though my hon. friend may not be aware of the fact, an enquiry being made into this subject in connection with the Ottawa River, a portion of which has been exempted from the operation of the Act for some years, and that investigation is now being made by very competent men. The papers will be brought down, and perhaps they will give the hon. gentleman some important information on this subject.

Mr. LAURIER. Perhaps my hon. friend will have no objection to amend the motion in the direction suggested by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and I hope the Minister will have no objection to amend it so as to include the list of the fines imposed under the Act.

Mr. TUPPER. For any particular year?

Mr. LAURIER. For 1887 and 1888.

Mr. TUPPER. Certainly, there is no objection to that.

Mr. LAURIER. My hon. friend has brought to the attention of the House, the point which has been referred to by the Minister, whether sawdust in rivers is injurious or not? I understand that that question is debated. Some affirm that it is injurious, and others affirm that it is not, and the object of my hon. friend is to decide which opinion is correct. However, the law assumes that it is injurious, and it is upon that assumption that the law is based. I quite admit that the Minister has no option but to carry out the law as he finds it, whether good or bad, but my hon. friend complains that a discrimination is made between offenders, and that the political complexion of the offender has a good deal to do with whether the law is enforced or not. The Minister repudiates that part of the statement, and I have nothing to say in regard to it, but probably the list which he will bring down may settle the question.

Mr. GILLMOR. This is a very serious question in regard to certain mills.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would ask the hon. gentleman to move the adjournment of the debate. I know that several members desire to speak upon it.

Mr. GILLMOR. I have nothing to say excepting that, if the law is carried out, you will do away with many mills in my Province.

Mr. KENNY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copies of all correspondence between the Federal Government, or any department thereof, and the Government of Prince Edward Island, or any of its officials, regarding the piers of Prince Edward Island or harbor improvements in the said Island.—(Mr. Robertson.)

Copies of all tenders for the supply of beef for the Blackfeet, Blood and Piegan Indian Agencies, and all papers and correspondence connected with the calling for such tenders, and the awarding of contracts for such supplies during the summer of 1888.—(Mr. Edgar.)

Copies of all correspondence between the Dominion Government and the Corporation of Pilots for and below the harbor of Quebec, respecting the change in the present tariff of pilotage dues on vessels for and below the harbor of Quebec.—(Mr. Langelier, Montmorency.)

Return of all reports upon the state and condition of each of the piers in Prince Edward Island taken over by the Dominion Government from the Prince Edward Island Government, together with a Return of all expenditure on each of the said piers since the 30th of June, 1888; and all correspondence relating to the state of repairs of said piers, and the repairs thereof during the year 1888.—(Mr. Welsh.)

Copies of all Orders in Council, or reports or correspondence relating to admission of mining machinery free of duty by the Government of British Columbia for the development of the mineral resources of that Province, or to the remission by the Dominion Government of duties paid thereon.—(Mr. Edwards.)

Copies of all petitions, correspondence and documents respecting the extension of McMahon street through the Ordnance land, in the city of Quebec, to D'Aiguillon street.—(Mr Langelier, Quebec.)

Correspondence between the Government and Mr. E. P. Wright, of Ottawa, relating to a claim of the latter for a refund of duties paid by said E. P. Wright upon mining machinery.—(Mr. Edwards.)

Copies of all Orders in Council, correspondence, agreements and settlements respecting the conveyance of the North Shore Railway to the Government by the Grand Trunk Railway Company and by the Government to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Langelier, Quebec.)

Return of all claims presented from 1st February, 1885, to 31st December, 1888, for drawback on goods manufactured for export, showing the names of all applicants, their places of business, the article on which drawback was claimed and the amount of each claim, distinguishing between the claims which have been allowed and those which have been disallowed, and those not yet decided, and giving the reason for each disallowance; also copies of all regulations made by the Customs or other department with reference to such claims, together with a copy of one allowed claim and of the sworn declaration of each exporter.—(Mr. Ellis.)

Copies of all tenders received for the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, with accompanying documents, including the approximate quantities on which such tenders were computed, and the gross amounts; and all correspondence, reports and Orders in Council, in relation to the same.—(Mr. Trow.)

Copies of all tenders received by the Department of Railways and Canals, in September and October, 1888, for the enlargement of the Cornwall and Galops Canal, including the approximate quantities on which such tenders were computed, and the gross amounts; and all correspondence, reports and Orders in Council, relating to the same, since the receipt of such tenders.—(Mr. Trow.)

Copies of all petitions, reports, Orders in Council and papers generally, in connection with the dismissal of J. M. Grover from the position of Postmaster of Morden, Manitoba.—(Mr. Guay.)

Return showing the entire cost of the St. Charles Branch Railway, including right of way, land damages, survey and engineering expenses, and all other items of expenditure of any kind, in the following order: Cost of survey, and to whom paid; cost of engineers' services, and to whom paid; cost of land damages, and to whom paid; cost of legal expenses, including conveyancing, and all legal services, and to whom paid; cost of all services rendered by any other party, of any other kind, paid by the Government; the entire cost of the line, including every item of expenditure of any kind connected therewith, and the amount of claims put in and not yet settled.—(Mr. McMullen.)

All the original cheques given in payment of all fees or expenses connected with the suit, the "St. Catharines Milling and Lumbering Company vs. The Queen."—(Mr. McMullen.)

Copies of all correspondence, reports, petitions and other documents, up to this date, between the Post Office Department and the Post Office Inspector for the district of Montreal, Mr. King, and any other persons, respecting a change in the location of the Post Office of Belle Vallée, in the County of St. John's.—(Mr. Bourassa.)

Return of Orders in Council relating to the division of the subsidy of $250,000 to the International Railway Company, between the different portions of the road, say, from the St. Lawrence to Lennoxville, from Lennoxville to Moose River and Mattawamkeag, from Mattawamkeag to Harvey's Station, and from Harvey to Salisbury, giving the number of miles in each division, and the amount apportioned thereto.—(Mr. Jones, Halifax.)

Return, 1st. Copies of the petition asking for the incorporation of the Témiscouata Railway Company. 2nd. Copies of all correspondence between the Government and this company respecting the granting of a subsidy or having reference to such subsidy.—(Mr. Dessaint.)

Return, 1. Giving the names and places of residence of the Commissioners appointed in 1883 for the purpose of examining and reporting upon the fitness and eligibility of persons appearing before them for examination and qualification as Inspectors of the hulls of freight and passenger steamers plying in Canadian waters; 2. Copies of the circular sent out inviting competitors to meet at Ottawa, and the date or dates so mentioned from time to time; 3. The names and places of residence of all persons who were so examined at each and every meeting of the said Commissioners up to date; 4. Copies of the recommendation or recommendations of any of the said Commissioners, or any one of them, respecting the said examination or the qualifications, or otherwise, of any or all who underwent such examination at the first or any subsequent meeting of the said Commissioners, or either of them; 5. The name and place of residence of each and every inspector of freight and passenger steamer hulls appointed by the Government from 1882 to date, indicating who were appointed after undergoing and passing the necessary examination, as well as giving the name and place of residence of each and every inspector of such hulls who was appointed without having successfully passed the said examination, together with the name and place of residence of any inspector so appointed since 1882 to date who had been dismissed or had resigned within the time specified, and the cause assigned for such dismissal or resignation; 6. The name and place of residence of any person appointed to fill any vacancy or addition as inspector of said hulls; and 7. Copies of all correspondence between the Minister of Marine and any person respecting any of the questions enumerated herein.—(Mr. Wilson, Elgin.)

Return of the survey made of the Annapolis and Liverpool Railway, with the report of the engineer, and all papers and correspondence connected therewith.—(Mr. Jones, Halifax.)

DEATH OF THE HON. J. H. POPE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have the distressing duty of announcing to the House the decease of the Hon. John Henry Pope, my friend and colleague. Although the event is not unexpected, yet the blow is so severe when it falls that I feel I cannot say more just now. I shall, therefore, Sir, move the adjournment of the House. I have no doubt that a fitting opportunity will be taken by myself and some hon. members of the House on both sides, to express the great regret which is felt at the loss which the House and the country have sustained by the death of Mr. Pope. In consequence of the great desire on both sides of the House, as I believe, to get through the business of the Session as speedily as possible, while I move now that the House adjourn until to-morrow, as there are some private Bills standing which ought to be moved, the Government will give them, with the consent of the House, the hour after 7:30 to-morrow, of which they are deprived to-day. I, therefore, move, seconded by the leader of the Opposition, that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. LAURIER. I certainly deem it my duty to second the motion of the right hon. gentleman. As he has stated, the death of Mr. Pope was not unexpected. In fact, it has been expected for some time, and, under the circumstances, it does not present to his friends the harrowing grief which the sudden termination of a useful career would be sure to produce. Still, I know that the country will realise that it is no ordinary or common life which has just been ended. As an opportunity will be given to say more on the subject on a future occasion, I shall say no more to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL. I feel deeply the event which has just occurred in connection with an old personal friend, and a gentleman who has occupied a prominent part in every great event in Canada for the last twenty-five years. He was a person who was universally respected for his ability, and he has left, in passing from the Cabinet, scarcely a man behind him there superior to himself in the particular line which he followed. The statement is true that we have expected this for two or three days past, and now I am sure that the country will agree with us in deeply regretting the decease of one who, if he had lived, would have continued to perform the useful services to the country which he has performed for many years past.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the House adjourns, I would like to ask the First Minister if it is the intention to go into Supply to-morrow?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, I think so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then I would ask the hon. gentleman to give the Minister of Finance notice, as that gentleman is not here, that I would like to have an answer to the question put to-day before we go into Supply, and that, on going into Supply, although I do not propose to move a motion, I propose to take up the time of the House for a short period in pointing out certain facts in connection with the recent 3 per cent. loan, of which I hope some explanation will be given.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 5:50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 2nd April, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

EXPROPRIATION OF LANDS.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 131) respecting the Expropriation of Lands.

Mr. MITCHELL. This is a very important Bill, and I would like the hon. Minister to give us some explanation about it.

Mr. SPEAKER. When a Bill comes down from the Senate it is customary to take the first reading pro forma; the discussion only takes place on the second reading.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

LOAN OF 1888.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, Whether Government considers that the language used in the prospectus of the 3 per cent. loan recently negotiated in London, whereby it is declared that "The Canadian Government intend to apply the sums annually required for the redemption of the national debt in purchases of the stock now offered," requires them to use the sinking funds therein referred to in the purchase of the said 3 per cent. loan, in case the said securities should be held at premium at the time of purchase? If not, on what ground can the said sinking funds be otherwise invested?

Mr. FOSTER. The Government considers that the language used in the prospectus of the 3 per cent. loan recently negotiated in London, whereby it is declared that "The Canadian Government intend to apply the sums annually required for the redemption of the national debt in purchases of the stock now offered," requires them to use the sinking funds therein referred to in the purchase of the said 3 per cent. loan, in case the said securities should be held at a premium at the time of purchase, unless such premium is considered unreasonable and produced by unfair competition.

PRINTING OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that the House of Commons Debates are not published at as early a period of the day as I think they should be published. They are delayed very much more now than they were at the time when the printing was done by contractors, and I do not understand why this should be the case. Last week, when we had the debate on the Jesuit question, the official report was delayed more than usual, and extended reports appeared in the Toronto morning papers, which were delivered here before the official report of the House of Commons was placed in the hands of members. That state of affairs is certainly not creditable to the printing bureau. If the Toronto daily papers can publish almost as extended reports as those of the official Debates up to one o'clock, a.m., and have those reports telegraphed to Toronto and published in the morning papers, and have them transmitted by mail here and placed in the hands of members before the official report of Debates is delivered to members, I think there must be something wrong. It was understood when the printing bureau was established that the change was made in the public interest, and that better facilities would be afforded for the publication of the Debates and all matters connected with the printing of Parliament. So far this Session this has not proved to be the case. We are met continually with delays in printing, not only with respect to the publication of the Debates, but with regard to other matters, and whatever member of the Government has charge of the printing bureau at this time, should give his attention to this matter, so that the interests of the House may be attended to in connection with the printing of Parliament.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish, in connection with this matter, to call the attention of the Government to the fact that there are 120 galleys of matter now standing in the Government printing office—I believe the entire debate on the Jesuits' Estate Bill. That amount of matter standing will certainly seriously impede the progress of the work and delay the publication of the Hansard still further. I do not know for what purpose this matter is kept standing; but if it is intended to publish an edition of the entire debate on the Jesuits' question, it should receive immediate attention. Undoubtedly that amount of matter standing in type will disarrange the operations of the printing bureau and throw the work still further behind, and this will furnish still further reason for complaint, in addition to those which the hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville) has assigned to-day.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will call the attention of the Minister of Customs, who has that branch of the Department of the Secretary of State under his care, to what has been stated by hon. members.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). I wish to call the attention of the Debates Committee to a matter respecting which the attention of the House has been called already, namely, the delay in the publication of the French edition of the Hansard. There has now been published over 900 pages of the English edition of the Debates, while the French edition has only reached 232 pages. If this state of things be continued any longer the French edition will be rendered practically useless. The French edition of the Debates is issued so long after the debate has actually taken place that the reports lose almost their entire interest. If we have to continue the Hansard, this defect should be remedied and the French edition published more regularly. I am informed that the cause of the delay is not due to the translators. I understand the translators have reached the debate on the Jesuits' Estates Act, and they are not, therefore, very much behind. The printing bureau, it appears, is at fault, and I think some very serious steps should be taken to remedy this state of things, which is perfectly absurd.

Mr. LAURIER. This subject was brought to the attention of the House a few weeks ago, and hon. members were promised that steps would be taken to remedy the evil. Now, after two weeks have elapsed, it appears that we occupy just the same position, and that all the fault lies with the printing bureau. The proposal for the establishment of a printing bureau, when submitted to the House, was looked upon with serious misgivings as to the benefits which would accrue, and up to the present time the results appear very much to verify what was stated on this side of the House at that time.

Mr. BÉCHARD. I regret that the chairman of the Debates Committee is not in his place, as he might be able to give some explanation as to the cause of the delay in the printing of the French edition of the Debates. When the question was brought before the House some time ago, we endeavored to ascertain the cause of the delay. There is one thing evident, that the delay cannot be attributed to the French translators, but to some other cause. In days gone by it was proved that the delay was due to the printers and to the same cause must be attributed the delay to-day. I think the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Langelier) has truly said that if the French edition should continue to be issued so late it is of little value to members of the House. I think money would be saved if the issue of the French edition, instead of being delayed until the fall every year, was entirely suppressed. It is supposed to help the members during the Session of Parliament, but we do not receive it in time during the Session to answer that purpose. I hope the chairman of the committee, who I now see in his place, will perhaps be able to give us some information on the matter.

Mr. DESJARDINS. When the first complaint was made in the House I wrote to the superintendent of the printing bureau, to call his attention to the fact that such a complaint had been made, and he said that he had met with some difficulties in the beginning because of the delay of the members in correcting their proofs so as that they might be sent to the French translators. I found out that the French translators were much in advance of the printers, and I called his attention to that, and since that time I have received proofs which show that there is a little more progress made than at the beginning, but not to the extent that it would be desirable. I am glad that the matter is called again to the attention of the House, for I think that there is something to be remedied. I do not know that; but the number of men in the office may be insufficient, or that there is something deficient in the manner of distributing the work, but certainly I think there is some remedy to be found.

Mr. LAURIER. The whole system is wrong, I am afraid; the whole printing bureau is wrong.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I have nothing to say about that. I am not in charge of that. As regards the printing of the French Hansard, I know that some delay must inevitably arise, but that delay should not be to the extent that we find it now.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). I was calling the attention of the House to the fact that the English translation of the Debates has now reached nearly 1,000 pages, whereas the French version has only reached 232 pages. I am told that the translation is not backwards, or that it is very little backwards, for the translators have translated up to the debate on the Jesuit question. If we are to have these French Debates at all, they should be translated and printed for distribution at such a time as to be useful. If they are distributed as they were last year, and as they are this year (for this year is worse than last year), then this is a pure waste of money, because the people do not read the Debates. There is no interest in reading the Debates when the publication does not take place for two or three months after the debate. If the printing bureau is not able to do the printing of this House better, then I think that the Debates Committee should see that the printing is done elsewhere, and done in such a way as to ensure that the Debates are published in time so as to have them of any use.

Mr. DESJARDINS. There ought be only eight days delay in any case, between the issue of the English revised copy and the French version; but for one reason or another the delay is much longer than that, and much longer than it ought to be.

Mr. MULOCK. I understand that some hon. member has suggested that it would be wise to print an edition of the debate on the Jesuits' Estates Bill, and that question pending has been the occasion of the delay complained of. If that be so it appears to me that that question ought to be disposed of at once. I cannot, for myself, see what public interest is to be gained by keeping alive this vexed question. Ordinarily, I would be in favor of the most complete publication of everything that occurs in Parliament, but, as has been stated by my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Somerville) the debate on that particular question was published with great promptitude and fullness in the daily papers of the country as the debate proceeded, and now that the issue in this House has been disposed of and a verdict rendered here, it is a question whether it would be in the public interest to aid in keeping alive the flames that have been started, or whether we should not consider that we have effectually disposed of the question so far as this House is concerned. My own opinion would be that, in the interests of the public, it is better for us not to place a brief in the hands of various persons interested in this question, by further publishing the speeches delivered on the floor of this House. I am sure that any person who is inclined to make mischief would be able to extract words and expressions delivered in the heat of debate which members might now regret. I think it would be a mistake in the interests of harmony for us to place such weapons in the hands of persons who might forget the interests of the country in seeking to promote the particular views that might be entertained by them. For these reasons, I think it would be far better for this House not to take any further steps in the direction indicated by some hon. gentlemen.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The question which I raised has nothing to do with the statement made by my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock). I stated that the publication of the English debate was delayed beyond all reason; and I instanced the report on the Jesuits' estates Act to show that the Toronto papers got ahead of our official record in publishing that debate.

Mr. TAYLOR. What Toronto papers?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. All the papers were alike ahead. I might say that this delay did not occur last week any more than other weeks in which we have had lengthened debates. Last Session when the House sat to two, or three, or four, or five o'clock in the morning, the Debates were published at an earlier time in the day than they are now when the House sits only to half-past twelve or one in the morning. That shows that there must be some great fault somewhere.

Mr. SPROULE. I decidedly dissent from the views enunciated by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), that we would do any harm by placing this discussion on the Jesuits' Estates Bill before the people more extensively than it has been up to the present time. I believe that a good deal of the excitement of the last few months has been occasioned by incorrect information in connection with this question. If we may judge by the criticisms from various parts of this country, which we see in the press, I think that we can come to no other conclusion than that the reports of the speeches that were made here were so limited, that people reading them could not fairly understand the force of the arguments on either side. The speeches that were made in this House on that question were careful and well considered speeches. They were logical, they were reasoning, and they were legal arguments, and, therefore, I think that the country would receive a great deal of benefit, if the Government printed large numbers of the Hansard containing those speeches, and distributed them extensively throughout the Dominion. I do not think that we can ever do harm by extending knowledge, but I think we could do a great deal of harm by endeavoring to curtail knowledge, if people were guided more by argument and less by prejudice and accidental circumstances, then they would, after a careful and intelligent consideration of this question, come to a different conclusion, many of them, from what they did.

Mr. AMYOT. I think that the French portion of the population would receive with great pleasure the French edition of that debate. They would like to read and to see how the question was discussed in this honorable House, and to see how well the interests of the Province has been defended. The publication of this debate would do well for Confederation's sake, because it would show that the rights of the interested parties have been well understood and defended in this Parliament. The French version of this debate would, I am sure, be very well accepted in the Province of Quebec.

Mr. CHARLTON. Perhaps the Government will tell us whether they have any purposes to serve in this matter, or what their intention is; 120 galleys of this matter are standing in the printing office for some purpose, and if there is no purpose in view, the type had better be distributed, and the work of the department allowed to go on.

Mr. TROW. The matter under discussion is that the French portion of the speeches delivered in this House were not published by the Hansard in proportion to that of the English. The complaint made was that the French Hansard was not published with sufficient expedition, but the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), and for Grey (Mr. Sproule), have discussed the matter in an entirely different form and spoken about some other subject, referring to the debate on the Jesuits' estates, which might be considered hereafter. It is quite foreign to this discussion to mention anything about that. Anything that may be in contemplation of the Government is not under discussion, but the complaint is that the French portion of the Hansard has not been delivered in the manner in which it should be delivered.

SUPPLY—LOAN OF 1888.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, in conformity with the notice that I gave to the First Minister yesterday, I wish, before you leave the Chair, to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Finance, and of the House, to a matter which appears to me to be of very considerable importance in relation to the late loan. After the answer which I have just received from the hon. the Finance Minister, I would, under ordinary circumstances, have thought it unnecessary to detain the House for the purposes of any explanation, but I am very anxious that that hon. gentleman should not be taken unawares, and, therefore, I think, under all the circumstances, it will be fairer to him and fairer to the House at large that I should state, as I propose to do briefly, my opinion in reference to certain statements contained in the prospectus of the late loan; what consequences are involved in this; and that I should give the hon. gentleman an opportunity, if he desires it, of offering any explanation that he may wish with reference to that matter. Before I proceed further, I dare say, Sir, the House will remember that in the course of the Budget speech, the hon. the Minister of Finance made a statement relative to the terms at which the late 3 per cent. loan was effected. Those terms were exceedingly favorable, as the hon. gentleman stated then. He was perfectly right in saying, on the terms made and stated by him, that that loan was one of the most favorable loans that had ever been made on the London Stock Exchange. The House will recollect, that I put several questions to the hon. gentleman on that occasion. I enquired in the first place, if any sinking fund attached, and the hon. gentleman informed me there was no sinking fund attached; which was technically quite correct. I asked the hon. gentleman further, as to the rumor which had reached me, that all our sinking funds were pledged in some fashion, for the redemption of this loan, and the hon. gentleman told me that he did not consider that this was implied in our prospectus. Now, Sir, the statement of the hon. gentleman, to which I will call the attention of the House, is this: That, in June last, our High Commissioner had effected a four million loan in London at 3 per cent., repayable in fifty years, without any sinking fund attached, and that he had succeeded in selling this loan for the sum, on an average, of £95 1s. sterling. That loan, I repeat, the Minister of Finance stated, was a very excellent loan, and upon that statement of the facts submitted by him, I fully concurred, and I fully concur now. However, on that occasion, as I say, I put a question to the hon. gentleman, which he answered, as can be seen by the report of the Budget speech. Subsequently I asked the hon. gentleman to put into my hands the prospectus of that loan, and I was shown that prospectus at the Public Accounts Committee. I subsequently received a copy of it, which copy I hold in my hands. I may say, however, that, on first reading that prospectus, I could not believe that it was possible that I had received a correct copy. I found in that prospectus a clause so remarkable, entailing, as I understand it, such consequences, and likely to result (if I am correct in my interpretation of it) in such grave loss to the people of this country, that I have thought it my duty, before proceeding further, to state to the Minister of Finance what my interpretation is with reference to the effect of this clause, in order that, if possible, the fears which I entertain may be removed, and that I may be spared the necessity of taking further action. As the hon. gentleman stated, there was no sinking fund eo nomine attached to this loan, but there is a short clause to which I wish to call his attention and the attention of the House. That clause is as follows:—

"With a view of rendering the sinking funds of the various loans more effective than heretofore, the Canadian Government intend to apply the sums annually required in the redemption of the National Debt in the purchase of the stock now offered. The amount at present annually applied to the redemption of the debt is about £350,000 sterling, and, as the sinking funds are accumulative, the amounts yearly increase."

Sir, that clause is an extremely remarkable one. It is remarkable not merely on account of what it contains, but also on account of what it does not contain Now, I have examined the various bonds, the various prospectuses, of all our other loans made since Confederation; I have given this matter, as its gravity required, the best consideration at my command. I have consulted with other gentlemen whose opinion is of weight, and I believe—I would be very glad to be corrected if I am wrong—that the effect of this extraordinary promise on the part of the Canadian Government to apply £350,000 a year, annually increasing, to the repurchase of our loan, has had practically this effect: Instead of having made a fifty-year loan, we have made a loan repayable in ten annual instalments averaging £400,000; and we are further bound to repurchase our own securities at the current market rates, even though they should be considerably above par. I will not at the moment comment on the remark made by the hon gentleman touching on undue combination; that would complicate the matter unnecessarily. But, Sir, what has been done, if I understand the meaning of these plain words, is that whereas we had thought we had made a 3 per cent. loan having fifty years to run, we have, to all intents and purposes, made a 3 per cent. loan, which, so far as the Dominion of Canada is concerned, has an average of a little more than five years to run, and must be paid back by us in ten annual instalments. I shall be very glad if the hon. gentleman is in a position to bring forward any explanation which can remove the impression on my mind; but, if I am correct in this, it is obvious that the hon. gentleman was grievously mistaken in declaring that this was a good loan; it is obvious that it was a most imprudent loan on the assumption I have stated, and that it exposes us to very great risk. Looking to the high character of Messrs. Barings, Glyn & Co., whose names are attached to this prospectus, I have thought it right, before going further, to make this brief statement of the facts of the case to the hon. Minister of Finance, and to invite him, if he has any explanations to make on the subject at present, to give them to the House, in the hope that they will prove sufficiently satisfactory to enable me to alter the opinion I now have as to this loan.

Mr. FOSTER. Unfortunately I was not present in the House last evening when my hon. friend made allusion to this matter, and, I suppose, outlined the nature of the remarks he intended to make. I had not, therefore, the advantage of understanding the line of his remarks, and since we have been in here to-day, I have had but a very short time to look over the papers which are under my hand. Therefore, I think, probably, it would be more satisfactory, if my hon. friend has no objection, that I should think this matter over, and make an early statement to the House with reference to it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Very well. I would suggest, then, as I understand that this loan was negotiated by the High Commissioner, who is here present——

Mr. FOSTER. The High Commissioner is not in the city, but I will communicate with him.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should prefer that that should be done. In that case, I think it would be expedient, if the hon. gentleman will undertake to do that with reasonable promptitude, to call on the High Commissioner to give him such a report as he would deem proper to lay on the Table of the House; and I would suggest that it be printed. My remarks, when reported in Hansard, will show clearly and distinctly what my opinion is. I may say to the hon. Finance Minister that I am in no way desirous, as the unusual course I have taken shows, of taking him at an advantage in this matter. On the contrary, I would prefer that he should have reasonable time to consider his answer, and that his answer, if he sees fit, should include the report of the High Commissioner, who, I believe, was the party to transact this loan. That, however, is for himself. He is not called on to do more than make an explanation; but I suppose the explanation will be forthcoming to-morrow.

Mr. FOSTER. I will make the explanation as soon as possible. I will not unnecessarily delay it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would be glad of that; because if the explanation be not satisfactory, it would be my duty to follow the matter up. If it be satisfactory, I will be only too happy to drop it.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Immigration Agent, Montreal.. .... $1,360

Mr. BAIN. What arrangements have you made with reference to supervising the children and female immigration department this season? Is it left in charge of a general agent?

Mr. CARLING. A number of the ladies of the city of Quebec have taken charge of any female immigrants that may come to Quebec.

Mr. BAIN. Are they in connection with the Montreal association in any way?

Mr. CARLING. No.

Mr. FISHER. Is there any grant to them the same as to the Montreal association?

Mr. CARLING. There has been no grant, but it is intended to recommend a small amount to assist in the carrying on of the work.

Mr. BAIN. Do you propose to continue the grant to the Montreal society, as formerly?

Mr. CARLING. Yes.

Mr. BAIN. I think they formerly kept an agent there.

Mr. CARLING. A thousand dollars here is granted the ladies of Montreal. Of course, the Government have no control of the management. We give the grant, and they make a report each year.

Mr. BAIN. My view of the matter is that it should remain in the hands of the Government. The supervision of the class of immigrants suited for the western Provinces should remain under the control of the Minister and his agents. I think it is patent, on the face of it, that only a certain portion of that immigration would find its way westward, for the natural reason that Montreal and the east would naturally look to their own interests first, and the western section would only receive those who had absolutely made up their minds to go west. I am not finding fault with the work of the ladies, because I am not aware of the details, but it strikes me it is very undesirable that their agency should be beyond the control of the Minister. It should be directly under his control, and he should place an agent in charge who would be responsible to the Government.

Mr. McDONALD (Huron). I would like to know what are the duties devolving upon Miss Richardson, the lady employed in connection with the Quebec agency?

Mr. CARLING. The services of Miss Richardson has been dispensed with, on account of the very large reduction made in the immigration vote.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What was she doing before?

Mr. CARLING. She was engaged in corresponding with ladies in the old country, and with people in different parts of Canada, in reference to places for domestic servants, and was taking a general interest in their welfare.

Mr. McDONALD (Huron). I find that last year this lady received $107.44 for ocean passage from Liverpool to Quebec. I do not see how that could be if her duties were only those of correspondence. She also received for fares and cabs $365.71, and for Pullmans $11.25. She received for hotel expenses $70.30, or altogether during the year she received $954.70. Now, if her services were what the Minister states, I do not see how she could draw such a large sum for the duties which appear in this report. I think she must have had some other duties to perform than those to which the Minister has alluded.

Mr. CARLING. Miss Richardson did pay visits to the older Provinces, and also to Manitoba. She visited England once or twice in the last few years, and her expenses were allowed. She has been corresponding with parties in the different Provinces, and we thought it advisable that she should visit the localities where the servants who had been brought out had been placed, in order to see how they were getting on, and whether their homes were satisfactory, so that she could report to the ladies in England who sent them out.

Mr. McDONALD (Huron). Her services are now dispensed with?

Mr. CARLING. Yes.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). Do I understand that the ladies in Quebec are now supposed to discharge the duties which Miss Richardson had charge of?

Mr. McMULLEN. I think it is the duty of the House to give careful attention to the items under the vote for immigration. We have for years been spending a large amount of money under that head, and it is quite clear that the results shown by the returns of immigration offices are not equal in value to the amount of money spent. We desire to cut down, as far as possible, unnecessary expenditure. It is the duty of this House to closely criticise the expenditure under this head, because I believe there is more waste in connection with that than in connection with any other item in the Public Accounts. If you take up these incidental expenses in Quebec, not for bringing in immigrants, but for payment to those employed as interpreters, clerks or assistants, you will find that we paid out last year

$5,245, and that is without taking into consideration the salary of the agent or of his clerk. I do not believe that it is at all necessary that the enormous expenditure for immigration should be continued. We have agents all over this country at large expense, and anyone who will criticise the Public Accounts will come to the conclusion that a large proportion of that expenditure is unnecessary, that a number of men are employed under the head of immigration who should not be continued in their offices, and that the country should not be called upon to pay these enormous amounts. I observe that the sum of $6,583 was paid in the Montreal agency. Of course, Montreal and Quebec are important points, but there are other points where I think it is unnecessary to make these expenditures. I find that, at Brandon, we are paying an agent $1,400 a year salary, and $366 for an assistant. The agent's name is Bennett, and we have D. Bennett as messenger and another Bennett as assistant in the office. I do not know whether they are relations of the agent or not. I do not think it is the desire of the Minister of Agriculture that items which are unnecessary should be continued, but it should be the earnest desire of the House to put a stop to this sort of expenditure; and I believe that, under the head of immigration, there has been more rottenness than under any other item of the public expenditure. We have seen something of that to-day in the Public Accounts Committee, and I suppose there is more to come. We should have extended and minute explanations on the part of the Minister in regard to all these items, and I would ask him now how many officials are employed in the Quebec office and what are their duties? Let us have that in the first place.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I desire to say a few words, as I am at issue with the hon. gentleman on this question. I think there cannot be too much attention paid to immigration. If the North-West is to be built up at all, we must have a live immigration service. The immigration agents in the North-West have done a great deal of good to those immigrants who have come there new to the country. They have put them in a way to secure their farms, and have saved the expense which a stranger in the country would naturally fall into. I think a little more money might be spent, and that the example of the United States might be followed, by having immigration agents on all the trains during the season, in order to induce the people to remain on Canadian territory. I believe that no money is better spent than that which is expended on this item, in giving the knowledge which is necessary to new immigrants who come in. There are a great many of these immigrants who are new to the country, and who, from want of knowledge of the new surroundings, are apt to waste the small amount of capital which they have unless they have this advice and assistance.

Mr. McMULLEN. I hope we shall have an answer to my question in reference to the Quebec agency.

Mr. CARLING. The agent at Quebec is Mr. Stafford; the assistant agent, Mr. Doyle; the book-keeper, Mr. Stein; the Norwegian interpreter, Mr. Andersen, and Mr. O'Reiley is the messenger. These are the permanent officers.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice there is an extra clerk, Mr. Powers, at $965 a year. Why is he employed?

Mr. CARLING. It was considered necessary by my predecessor, and is considered necessary by the agent at Quebec, that Mr. Powers should be employed. He is a very efficient man, and assists in keeping the accounts and the statements in regard to immigration.

Mr. AMYOT. I happen to know every one of those officers at the Quebec immigration office, and I may state that they are all very good officers, and do their duty. I would mention especially Mr. Stafford, Mr. Doyle, and Mr Stein, who are very useful officers. I would take this occasion for urging upon the Government the necessity of helping the movement now going on in Belgium and France, to direct an emigration of farmers to this country, of whom many are now coming. I know the Government have done something, but I think they could do more. They could bring into this country farmers who are in comfortable circumstances. Many of those who came last year brought with them from $5,000 to $10,000. They are a great source of wealth to the country at large. I am sure the Government will receive the thanks of the country, if they do more than they have done in the past to promote this class of immigration.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). I would like to know whether it is the intention of the Government to compel ocean steamers bringing immigrants to this country, to land them at Quebec. It must be within the recollection of the Minister that, last year, several steamers adopted the habit of landing their immigrants at Montreal, and an order was passed directing them to land the immigrants at Quebec, but for some reason they preferred to go to Montreal. Now, the Government have spent a large sum of money in erecting buildings at Quebec to provide accommodation for immigrants coming to this country; during the last two years the Government spent $50 000 to finish some buildings intended for that purpose, that had been erected on the new Louise Embankment. That building has been almost wholly unused during the last year, as the immigrants are carried up to Montreal and landed on a wharf where there is absolutely no accommodation for them, and no protection for them. Any thief may approach them, and the result has been that a good many of these immigrants have been robbed. I have been told by people connected with steamship offices that a good many immigrants last year were victimised in Montreal. We know that in New York city, as soon as immigrants land, they are taken care of by the Government and carefully guarded. Nobody is allowed to approach them for any purpose, not even to sell them tickets or exchange money; there is an exchange office in the immigration buildings at Castle Garden. It was intended to introduce the same system into this country, and that is the reason why the Government have gone to such a large expenditure of money in providing suitable accommodation for them at Quebec, which expenditure I consider was a very wise one. This system was inaugurated three years ago, but if the system which prevailed last year is to go on for another year, these buildings, which have cost so much money, will become perfectly useless. If the Minister of Agriculture has gone to Quebec since these buildings were erected, he must have seen that they afford just as good accommodation for immigrants as is to be found at Castle Garden, in some respects superior. I have seen and inspected the accommodation for immigrants at Castle Garden, and, as a rule, they are not so well provided for as they are at Quebec. These buildings have been erected on a large embankment, separated from the mainland by the new dock, so that these people are entirely protected from all those who might have designs upon them. They are in the hands of the immigration agents of the Government; and they have this great advantage which they have not in New York, that the Canadian Pacific Railway runs alongside of these buildings, so they can pass directly from the steamer through these buildings, and embark on the Canadian Pacific Railway, after passing through the formalities that are considered necessary. Of course, I only speak of immigrants, and not of ordinary passengers, and I desire to know if the Government intends to compel all steamers bringing immigrants, to land them at that place, provided at such a great expenditure of money, and, as I repeat, wisely provided; because I think it is very important that we should treat immigrants as well, if not better, than they are treated when they land in New York. If the system which has been going on last year, is continued during the coming year, I am satisfied that the immigrants will not be taken care of as well as they are in New York. In Montreal they are landed as ordinary passengers who are supposed to be able to take care of themselves, landed on the wharf where they become a prey to designing persons. There is another danger to which I would call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture, and that is the lack of quarantine arrangements at Montreal. There is great danger in the fact of immigrants landing at once in a great city like Montreal, that they may propagate epidemic diseases. I have been told by physicians that it was quite possible for immigrants to pass inspection without any disease being detected, but they still may have the germs of disease about them. If they are landed in a large city like Montreal immediately from the ocean steamers, there is great danger to the public health of this country. I, therefore, trust that the Minister of Agriculture will take proper steps to compel all the steamers bringing immigrants, to land them at these buildings in Quebec, which have been provided at so great an expenditure.

Mr. CARLING. I am glad to know that the hon. gentleman approves of the accommodation afforded at Quebec. I am sure the buildings have been prepared with every care to meet the requirements of immigrants who arrive there. With regard to an order being issued that immigrants must be landed at Quebec, it has been usual for steamers to land them there, and full provision was made by the Government for the immigrants at that point. The Beaver Line carries passengers from Liverpool at the same rate to Montreal as they do to Quebec, and the Allan Line and the Dominion Line state that if the Beaver Line carry passengers or immigrants from Liverpool to Montreal at the same rate as they do from Liverpool to Quebec, they will be obliged to do the same. I understand, however, and I have been informed to-day, that the Allan and Dominion Lines are going to land immigrants at Quebec, notwithstanding the Beaver Line has landed them at Montreal, at least for the beginning of the season. Of course, I think it is most likely that the several steamboat lines will come to some arrangement with respect to the landing of immigrants at Quebec; but if it is found necessary that a change should be made, the subject will be brought before the Government for consideration. I am not, however, prepared to say, to-day, that the Government should issue an order that immigrants must be landed at Quebec, although they may have been ticketed to Montreal.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). I do not see why we cannot do here what is done in the United States. In the States immigrants cannot arrive at any other places except those provided in advance by the Government. I do not speak now of ordinary passengers, who, of course, may land at any place where steamers may carry them, but I am speaking simply of immigrants. What I wish the Minister to do is, to adopt the practice pursued in the United States by the Government there. I am very much afraid, from the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture, that if the Government persevere in their line of action or, rather, inaction, we shall see the same results we saw last year. The Minister of Agriculture says he understands that the Allan Line and Dominion Line intend to bring their immigrants to Quebec, but the Beaver Line is going to land them in Montreal.

Mr. CARLING. I did not say that. I said that the Beaver Line did land their immigrants in Montreal last year, and the Dominion and Allan Lines felt that if the Beaver Line continued to do so, they would do so also. Whether the Beaver Line are going to land immigrants in Montreal or not this year, I am not aware; but I have been informed to-day that the Allan and Dominion Lines were going to land them at Quebec, for the beginning of the season, and I thought, under those circumstances, the Beaver Line was going to do so also.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). I was informed some time ago by one of the chief officers of the Dominion Line that it was a losing business for the Dominion Line, as well as for the Allan Line, to carry immigrants to Montreal; but they have been compelled to do so, for if one line carried immigrants to Montreal they were compelled to do so. Last year, and two years previously, the Beaver Line advertised all over Europe, not only over Great Britain and Ireland, but over the continent, that they would take immigrants to Montreal, stating that it was 180 miles further up than Quebec, at the same price as their competitors would carry them to Quebec. Immigrants, not knowing the trouble that would arise from their being landed at Montreal, thought they would be in a better position than if they were landed at Quebec, and the final result was that some parties lost carrying business which was a very paying business, one of the very best paying businesses of the steamship companies in the summer. The result was that last year the other lines came to the conclusion to land their own immigrants at Montreal, at whatever inconvenience. Of course, it was a question either of carrying immigrants or not carrying them. If the other lines land their immigrants at Montreal, I am afraid we shall see the same results of which I am complaining, that all the immigrants, within a short time, will have to be landed in Montreal and not in Quebec, at which latter point there is good accommodation provided for them by the Government.

Mr. SPROULE. Our people complain that the immigrants are not landed in Montreal and in Toronto, and they would very much prefer that the immigrants be landed at Toronto, because, as they state, when they have to pass through the Province of Quebec and through Montreal before they reach Ontario, the best classes of immigrants are frequently kept in those localities. The demand for immigrants in the west has been very large lately. The agents in Toronto and Hamilton have been unable to supply one fourth the number of people for whom applications have been made, and if that should continue to be the case, I think it would be much more satisfactory if the immigrants were all brought to Montreal or Toronto.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). This illustrates the difficulty. I think the Minister should take into consideration whether it is not desirable to establish one point, either Quebec or Montreal, as the point where immigrants should be received, and from which they should be distributed. Immigrants come to this country unfamiliar with the English language, coming perhaps from Scandinavia, Germany, or some other European country, and they get away from the supervision of the Government officers in charge at the Grand Trunk wharf, and at the Louise Embankment at Quebec. The moment they get outside of the supervision of the officials who are responsible, they are liable to be pounced upon by sharpers at every turn, in the exchanging of their money and other matters, and they are led away to lodging houses, and low places, where the parties keeping them have no mercy or feeling towards immigrants. The result is that we are liable to get our whole immigration system by the St. Lawrence discredited, and are liable to make the steamship lines running to New York the channel of immigration to this country; and, while we have difficulty in retaining control of our immigrants after they come here, it would be infinitely more difficult if they came to Canada by way of New York. This is a matter of very serious importance, and the Minister should consider whether something similar to Castle Garden should not be established here. I do not mean to say that it should be placed in Quebec or Montreal, but the Government should feel itself responsible for seeing that the immigrants are protected as soon as they land in our country, and that facilities are given them to reach the various points in the country for which they may be destined. Unless some such steps are taken, the efforts that are being made, and perhaps legitimately made, to reduce what I feel hitherto has been a wasteful and unsatisfactory expenditure, will result in the wrecking of our whole immigration system. In the United States the authorities take charge of the immigrants at Castle Garden; they do not allow outsiders to interfere with them, and they see through Government officials that the new-comers get justice and fair play. There is a double advantage in that. We have had for some time a very undesirable class coming to our country; and I will venture to say that if the records of some of the friendly societies of Montreal were examined, they would reveal a condition of things that would shock the senses of the citizens of this country, who think we are receiving a respectable class of immigrants for the money expended. If any man or woman can raise money sufficient to bring themselves to this country, they are permitted to come. But, I remember, just before the immigration season last year, in looking over some of the Montreal journals, I found it stated—I think it was in the Star—that a meeting was held at the Protestant House of Industry, of various societies interested in benevolent objects in that city, for the purpose of considering what steps should be taken to put a stop to the undesirable classes of immigrants drifting into that city, and becoming a burden on their resources. The delegate of the Y.M.C.A., Mr. Budge, on that occasion said they were tired of endeavoring to aid people who came there, confirmed criminals, who hopelessly drifted into crime and settled down on the community. Now, if we had an organised system, similar to the Castle Garden system, we should have a certain guarantee, through our own officials, that what we call the undesirable classes who are sent out by steamship agents, should be sent back; and we should have this advantage, that immigrants coming to this country, unfamiliar with the English language, would have some assurance that they would not be cheated by impostors, and that they would find their way with the least possible expense to themselves, and under the best circumstances, to their destination. If we do not do something of that kind, our immigration system is going to break down and be an utter failure. I feel very strongly the importance of establishing some one point at which these parties would be landed and seen to. That class who are able to pay their own way, and who have had correspondence before they come here, can take care of themselves, and go to whatever point they please. I do feel that the Minister ought to take this matter into consideration, and not allow these immigrants to land at Montreal or Quebec, without having proper regulations, both for their sakes and ours. I think this is a matter that we may look at fairly on its merits, and I feel exceedingly anxious that the Government should consider it. So far as Toronto and other western cities are concerned, an examination of the records of the different societies there will show that they have felt so discouraged at the class of immigrants which are sent out by the aid of societies in the old country, that they have cut themselves altogether apart from those societies. You will find resolutions and protests entered by the benevolent people in those cities, time and again, against the system of sending out unsatisfactory immigrants, chiefly through the aid of various benevolent societies in the old country. Now, I realise, and I think every man in the House who considers the subject, will realise that there is a difficulty there. We know how it is. Parties drift down into the criminal classes, not because they are morally wrong, but because they are weak; then they fall into the hands of some of these societies, and express repentance and anxiety to change their course and do better. I should be very sorry to say a word against the good work these societies are endeavoring to do in reclaiming those classes; but the fact is that before these people have been weaned from the vicious habits into which they have drifted, the societies often think that, if removed to a new country and put in new surroundings, they will do better. Possibly in some cases they may; but our experience heretofore has not been satisfactory in this respect, and I venture to say that anyone who takes an interest in the work done by the Young Men's Christian Association, and various other societies in our large cities, with the view of aiding the lapsed classes, will find that they have generally a surplus of that class on their hands, and that they do not know what to do with them. Now, I feel that the only way we can effectually meet all these difficulties is by having a thorough and effective supervision of the classes of immigrants who come to this country, for the purpose of protecting both ourselves and the immigrants, and I hope the Government will take the matter into their consideration.

Mr. MITCHELL. I just want to say one word in confirmation of what the hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Bain) has brought before the House. I think it is the duty of the Government—I do not say this for the purpose of finding any fault with the Immigration Department—to adopt some such system as that hon. gentleman has pointed out. They have got to fix upon one port or the other on the St. Lawrence to which the classes of immigrants referred to should come; and but one of two places could be selected, either Quebec or Montreal. Now, the Government have gone to a considerable expense at the port of Quebec, in fitting up a very complete and perfect establishment for the reception of these immigrants. It is in an isolated position, and convenient to where the steamboats land, so that the immigrants would not have more than 300 yards to walk from the steamboat dock to the immigrant sheds. There is no doubt that what my hon. friend from Wentworth says is true, that the course pursued in the harbor of New York is the correct one—that these people should be kept apart from influences which would be likely to lead them astray, or from the danger of being gulled by the sharks who float around the immigrants. It is the duty of the Government to lay down a policy, and to decide to land those immigrants either at Quebec or at Montreal. I am not going to venture an opinion as to where they ought to be landed; but I will say this, that at the port of Quebec the Government have facilities at the present moment, which have been provided at considerable expense to the country, and which are in full blast; and until they decide to select some other place, they should first make preparations to receive the immigrants there. Therefore, I think the Government should be prepared, before the vote passes, to announce what policy they will pursue in regard to this matter. Some policy should certainly be adopted to prevent our immigration getting a reputation which will deter the very class of immigrants we desire from coming amongst us.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am very glad my hon. friend from North Wentworth has brought this matter before the House. My hon. friend's remarks, as are his remarks always, are such as deserve the very serious consideration of the Minister of Agriculture. I have had occasion to make enquiries at several points in my own Province, as to the class of immigrants we have been receiving of late, and, though, no doubt, a great many are desirable persons, I have been informed, on authority which I believe cannot be disputed, that of late years especially, a great many immigrants have been brought to this country who are subsequently objects of charity. This is the very last class we should receive here, to build up a country like ours. I will not enter upon a consideration of the policy of encouraging immigration, while we are not able to keep our own people in this country; that is a question apart, and, perhaps, better discussed at another time. But this I will say, that, to my personal knowledge, a considerable number of immigrants are brought here on false pretences—I will not say by agents of the Government, but by parties who have an interest in bringing them here, such as steamship runners, and others of that class. They cluster in our great cities, and load down our charitable institutions. I was informed, by a gentleman of high standing, who takes an interest in these matters, that on a Christmas occasion, I think, in Toronto, no fewer than 8,000 persons were assisted in getting a Christmas dinner.

Mr. CARLING. Not all immigrants.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. By no means; I was just about to point that out. But it is a matter of great regret that such a fact should exist in any Canadian city, as that 8,000 persons should be willing or compelled to accept charity; but, according to this gentleman's statement, a large proportion of those people were immigrants; and I believe the records of the various benevolent societies, such as the St. Andrew's, St. Patrick's and St. George's societies, all go to prove the same thing, that, under our present system, a large number of people are brought on there who cannot support themselves, many of whom I strongly suspect have been shipped out here for the express purpose of getting rid of them, and preventing them becoming a burden at home. It is a very difficult thing for us to say that we will not allow other British subjects to land here; but we have a right to protect our own people; and Canada must not, and cannot be a dumping ground for a pauper population, no matter whether it hails from Ireland, Scotland, England or any other British country; and I think the time has come when the immigrants coming to Canada should be subject to examination, so that we would not be liable to imposition. I think that would be largely attained by the suggestion the hon. member for North Wentworth has made; and I believe the money so spent—and I do not suppose it would need to be a large amount—would be well and wisely spent in the interest of the country.

Mr. DENISON. I would like to ask the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), where his information came from; because I can hardly believe that 8,000 people were provided with dinner in Toronto on Christmas day?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It was given to me by the president of one of the charitable associations in Toronto, and I saw it repeated in some of the Toronto newspapers. Those were not all objects of charity in the ordinary sense; but they were still objects of charity in this, that they were willing to accept eleemosynary doles from their fellow citizens, and that is not what I should like to see any Canadian citizen accept.

Mr. COCKBURN. I am glad to hear the expression of hostility against pauperism; but if ladies and gentlemen will meet together in their good feelings, and advertise that all persons who call at a certain house or shop on Christmas morning will be sure to get a roast of beef and other necessaries to make a happy Christmas, I do not think we are to suppose that all the people who accept this free lunch or free dinner are to be ranked as paupers. I think there must be a gross mistake as to the pauperism of Toronto. There is no city throughout the whole of this continent that is making such progress in every point of material wealth as the city of Toronto, and to tell me that 8,000 paupers are to be found in that city is, I can simply say, a piece of information which I must regard as grossly exaggerated.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman ought to have noticed that I expressly stated they were not paupers in the ordinary sense of the term; but I repeated the statement as it was made to me. I am not responsible for it, except so far as calling attention to the fact that there is a great number of people in the Queen city who are not above receiving assistance from their fellow-citizens. Many of those people, no doubt, could not properly be called paupers. I do not pretend to say they were; but I state that I was informed that a number of persons were assisted—I cannot say whether last year or the year before—by generous citizens in Toronto.

Mr. McNEILL. The assertion was made last year to the effect that a very great number of emigrants were receiving assistance in Toronto, and that the charitable institutions in that city were overburdened by applications on behalf of these emigrants who were pouring into the country—these paupers who were being dumped on the fair soil of Canada. Well, the chairman of the Immigration Committee was requested by the Committee to ask the Mayor of Toronto for a return, so that we might have something definite to go upon and discover how much truth there was in this statement. That return was furnished and laid before the Committee this Session. We find that out of 88,000 emigrants who were landed here last year, some 432 were all that could be found to have received aid from the charitable institutions in Toronto, and in fact it appeared doubtful as to whether they even were receiving aid in the usual sense, as to whether that aid might mean that they were receiving work. It is well an assertion of this kind, when made on the floor of this House, should be sifted, and it is satisfactory to know that out of 88,000 emigrants who landed here last year, just 432 were found receiving assistance in one of the largest cities in the Dominion. If we consider that a like proportion are to be found in other cities in proportion to their population, I think that is a very fair showing for the work that has been done in the way of bringing emigrants to this country. It is clear proof that the class of emigrants brought here is a class well suited to the country. Many of these men who are receiving assistance in this way may be men well suited, but who may not have had as good a chance as others, to obtain employment. Hon. gentlemen ought to be very careful about making statements of this character on the floor of this House.

Mr. McDONALD (Huron). The hon. gentleman who has just spoken has told us that out of 88,000 emigrants who came to this country, only 400 odd received charity in Toronto. But the hon. gentleman must remember that the 88,000 did not pass through Toronto. Only 16,196 souls passed through Toronto, and 400 and odd out of that is quite a large percentage. The hon. gentleman would lead the House to believe that 88,000 passed through Toronto. That was a misleading statement, and I take this opportunity of correcting it.

Mr. TYRWHITT. I am glad to have this opportunity of testifying to the liberality and generosity of the people of Toronto at Christmas time. I happened to be walking through Toronto market last year on Christmas eve, when I met a wealthy resident of Toronto, a gentleman whom you all know, Mr. John Holderness, who was distributing charity. I stood and watched the proceedings. He ordered one of the butchers to take down one or two of the largest and best quarters of beef, and to every person that came along he said: "Take a piece;" and I am happy to say that I received assistance myself the same day. He gave me a couple of steaks, which I took home and disposed of.

Mr. MULOCK. I am glad to corroborate what has fallen from the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Tyrwhitt). It may be that 8,000 people received something in the nature of a Christmas present from the good and generous souls of the city of Toronto, and it may be that a few more, or less, were able to appreciate this just as the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Tyrwhitt) or others would. But I must say that we have in Toronto—I do not say more than in other parts of the Dominion—a class of people of generous disposition, of which any city may well be proud, and we keep up the good custom of Christmas eve, if only for the sake of good cheer, amongst the many charitable institutions presided over by ladies and gentlemen who have but one object in view, the good of their fellow-citizens. We have a vast number of those institutions, and they make it their object in Christmas time to throw a little comfort into the houses of those who are not so well able as themselves, perhaps, to supply their own wants, so that no one may feel he has gone without a Christmas dinner. We give 8,000 Christmas dinners generally for nothing, and I have had myself my Christmas dinner for nothing. It is a rare thing for us to provide our own Christmas dinners in Toronto.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I rise for the purpose of correcting a misapprehension into which the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill) has fallen in regard to the alleged return from the city of Toronto. Last year, before the Immigration and Colonisation Committee, the statement was made, taken from one of the Toronto papers, that a large number of persons had been employed by the Mayor of Toronto at very low wages in order to give them some means of subsistence. It was not alleged that these men, or any considerable portion of them, were recent immigrants, although the inference was endeavored to be drawn that they were people who had come recently to Canada and had been unable to obtain employment. I received instructions from the committee to communicate with the Mayor in order to ascertain how many of those who had been so employed had come to Canada within the last year. I did so; and received an acknowledgment of my communication, and was told that the statement would be sent to me, but up to the present I have not received it. The information my hon. friend has, is taken from a special return which was made by the officials of the Immigration Department at Toronto, of the number that were aided by the department in the way of furnishing meals and assistance. No information has been obtained at all in answer to the request I sent the Mayor of Toronto, so that we are unable to say that any of those who had been employed for the purpose of saving them from starvation during the winter of 1888, were immigrants recently arrived.

Mr. McMULLEN. What has the hon. the Minister to say with regard to the suggestion thrown out on this side of the House? I would draw the attention of the House to the fact that we employ two staffs of officials at Quebec and Montreal, 16 at Quebec and 6 at Montreal, the salaries last year of which amounted to $9,055. If the system suggested by the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Bain) were carried out, we might save a very large sum. We should have but one place, and it should be understood on the other side of the Atlantic that immigrants would be expected to arrive at this place and there receive all necessary attention and instructions. We would thus be able to wipe out the expenses connected with those two points.

Mr. CARLING. I thought I had explained to my hon. friend from Quebec, that the Government had provided every accommodation at Quebec for the immigrants arriving there, and that, up to last year, all immigrants had landed from the steamers at Quebec. Last year, however, the Beaver Line brought the immigrants to Montreal at the same rate as to Quebec, and no great inconvenience resulted from this change. The Allan Line and the Dominion Line protested very strongly against the Beaver Line bringing their immigrants to Montreal; and they said, if the Beaver Line did so they would have to do the same. That difficulty only arose last year, and not to any very great extent; but it is now being considered by the department. I understand now, as I have said, that the Allan and the Dominion Lines are going to deliver their immigrants at Quebec, at least for the beginning of the season. The Government have this matter under consideration.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). So far as the two great railway systems are concerned, the one connected with the Louise Embankment in Quebec city, and the other at Point Lévis, opposite, which necessitates, to a certain extent, two points, these two points must be under the supervision of the Government. I would not like to say there is any truth in the report, but I have heard a few ugly rumors in reference to the way some of our immigrants have been treated on landing at the Louise Embankment. I would suggest that the Minister should exercise a little sharp inspection at both points, and give those men to understand that they are not there to do just as they please, but that if they should fail in their duty they will not only discredit themselves but the Government of this country. In addition, I would like to ask him to consider the effect of our placing the immigration of females and children under the charge of the society in Quebec—a local society. I think the western men will feel that influences of that kind might be exercised, perhaps fairly, and perhaps the immigrants of those classes coming there will be well placed; but, if the Minister allows that branch of the service to be placed in charge of the ladies in the locality, who are not responsible to the Government, and over whom you can exercise no supervision, I think he will find that it will lead to serious embarrassments and difficulties. What I am anxious for, first, is that the Government should be responsible for the whole transaction; and, next, that they should make such regulations and protections for that class of immigrants as to prevent their being preyed upon by outside sharks, or misled or led away by local influences and local circumstances. I have a strong opinion that, if the Government would ask that Montreal society who are to receive this $1,000 grant, to make a return for any one year of the number of immigrants who have been more or less under their observation, and have drifted before the police magistrate and into the cells, it would be a revelation as to the class which has been sent out to this country as likely to be useful immigrants. I am not finding fault with the Government, but, unless they take a firm stand, and take the responsibility upon themselves, and see that their agents are thorough in their work, I am afraid that our system is shortly going to break down. There is another point. The assisted passages were abolished by the Government last season, at the pressure of public opinion, and probably correctly. We are now open to the fair competition of the port of New York, and I am exceedingly anxious that there should be no fair cause of complaint, on the part of the immigrants who come here, and who may be exposed to be fleeced, in consequence of neglect on the part of the agents, by the action of the sharks outside who have no mercy on the people who come to our shores. If I can say anything to impress upon the Government the necessity of making a thorough investigation of this matter, I feel that I shall have done as much good in that as it is possible to do in any one Session of my attendance here.

Mr. CARLING. I can assure my hon. friend that the Government are quite alive to the necessity of a thorough supervision over the immigration service in Quebec. We have a man of great experience there, in the person of Mr. Stafford. No better agent than Mr. Stafford could be selected, and he has full charge of the buildings, and of the immigrants who arrive there, and we do not allow any society to take any power away from that agent. I am satisfied that, under his care, and under the supervision of his officers, nothing will transpire which will be injurious to the immigrants or to the public.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I am only speaking on this matter because of certain rumors which I am not responsible for, and do not want to be responsible for; but there are some ugly reports abroad in reference to certain immigrants who have landed here. I am not finding fault with the Government, but I call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to that side of the question, so that, if anything of that kind has transpired, it may be remedied.

Mr. CARLING. I dare say rumors may have been sent abroad, but I can assure my hon. friend that, if anything of that kind is brought to the attention of the department, it will be thoroughly investigated. I am thoroughly alive to the importance of seeing that the immigrants who come here should be properly looked after.

Mr. McNEILL. I desire one word of explanation as to a statement I made a few moments ago. I stated that the figures I gave were on the authority of a return by the Mayor of Toronto, in reply to a request preferred to him to make such a return. I find I was technically incorrect, but I was virtually absolutely correct. The figures I gave were figures which, by the instructions of His Worship Mayor Clarke, the city relief officer, Taylor, recently prepared and furnished to the city press. That was the authority. When I heard Mr. Lowe speak of those figures, and mention that they were in a return furnished by the authority of the Mayor, I came to the conclusion that they were in reply to the communication referred to by my hon. friend. Practically it amounts to the same thing.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is there any very special necessity for an immigration agent at Hamilton? There may have been at one time, but I do not think there is now, because the stream of immigration, instead of coming into Ontario, is going out of it, and these agents in that Province should be called emigration agents instead of immigration agents.

Mr. CARLING. I think my hon. friend is mistaken in regard to Hamilton. A large number of people who come by way of Suspension Bridge stop at Hamilton. Some go by way of Toronto to the North-West, or to points in Ontario, and some remain there. We have a very efficient officer there, who gives every attention and assistance to those immigrants, and who sees that they are properly distributed to the points to which they should go. I think Hamilton is a very important point which should not be done away with. We have done away this last year with two or three agencies which we thought were not necessary.

Mr. McMULLEN. Where?

Mr. CARLING. They are shown in italic. The agencies at Qu'Appelle and at Emerson have been struck out, and the vote for immigration has been, as my hon. friend knows, very much reduced. Some two or three years ago, the amount asked was $350,000.

Mr. MITCHELL. That was when you gave assisted passages, which you never should have done.

Mr. CARLING. We have been reducing the vote since that, so that now the amount is less than $100,000.

Mr. McKAY. I may inform the hon. gentleman that Hamilton is a distributing point for those who enter from the American ports. They are distributed from that city all over the country—to the North-West and over certain parts of Ontario. If the hon. gentleman was at Hamilton station sometimes, and was to see the number of immigrants who are there, and who are sent off to various points, I think he would vary his opinion as to the importance of Hamilton as an immigration station.

Mr. MULOCK. Would the hon. gentleman say why he discontinued the agency at Qu'Appelle?

Mr. CARLING. I believe that the land in the neighborhood of Qu'Appelle has been taken up and settled upon, and immigrants now are more likely to go on to Regina, where a railway has been constructed and is likely to be extended to the Saskatchewan. We find that is a more important point than Qu'Appelle, which was at one time the most important point, because every one went in that direction to the North, but now Regina is the more important point.

Mr. MULOCK. When was the agency discontinued at Qu'Appelle?

Mr. CARLING. It was to be discontinued on the 1st of April this year.

Mr. MULOCK. Is the present agent to be appointed to some other position in the service?

Mr. CARLING. He is appointed to fill the vacancy in another agency.

Mr. DAVIN. I am sorry the Minister should have thought fit to take away the agent from Medicine Hat. I think he will find that the country around there is rapidly settling up, and that the agent would still be necessary there. I notice that very small amounts are spent on the agencies in the North-West, and from the tendency of the discussion here I should think that more might be spent in the west and less in the east.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to draw the attention of the House to the amount expended on immigration agencies in Canada. Last year the salaries altogether amounted to $46,237. I quite agree with the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), that there are a good many places in Canada where these agencies could be dispensed with. I am not prepared to say that Hamilton is one of these places, but I believe that there are other places, for instance, Ottawa, where no agency is needed. Last year the agency in this city cost $1,950, including salaries for the agent, an assistant, and a messenger. Now, we have an agent in Montreal, one in Kingston, one in Toronto and one in Hamilton, and I would like to know where there is any reason for maintaining an agency at an inland town like Ottawa, at an expense of $1,950 a year. Then we have an agency in London. I notice that we have a man there drawing $1,000 a year, and we are paying $366 for a messenger. Now, I cannot understand why it is thought necessary to keep an immigration agent in an inland town like London. I can easily understand why at Toronto, which is a distributing centre, it is necessary to have an agency where the immigrants should receive such instructions as would enable them to reach their destination, as the hon. member for Wentworth suggested should be the case in Montreal. I cannot see, either, that there is much necessity for an agent at Kingston, although there may be a few immigrants coming across from the United States. Then we have agents at inland places like Dunnville, Richmond, Sherbrooke, Deloraine, and places like those, where, in my opinion, there is no necessity whatever that the country should be called to pay large salaries to maintain agents. We have an agent at Moose Jaw, and one at Calgary. We have an expensive agency at Winnipeg, the service of which last year, including the agent's salary, amounted to $6,554.85. Put all these items together, and you find that in the several places we are paying over $46,000 a year for salaries, much of which I think is useless, and many of these agencies, I think, might well be dispensed with. It would be better to close up many of these offices, and confine our operations to the frontier towns and large distributing centres, such as Quebec, Montreal and Toronto, and close up agencies at cities like Ottawa and London, places where very few immigrants arrive. I can easily understand why the agents at these small towns try to show, in their annual reports, that they have done a good deal of work for the money they receive. I notice in some places we have extended reports from agents, showing the amount of work they have done, the number of immigrants they have received, and all that sort of thing, and this is done in order to show a pretext for keeping the office open in order that these men may continue to draw their salaries.

Mr. SCARTH. The hon. gentleman referred to Winnipeg as an out-of-the way place. We usually hear from hon. gentlemen opposite that we are getting no immigrants in Manitoba, that we are not progressing there at all. I would inform the hon. gentleman that Winnipeg is the centre of distribution for Manitoba and the North-West, as Toronto and Hamilton are for Ontario. The expenditure for Winnipeg, I think, is very small, considering the immense number of immigrants that come to that city with the view of settling in Manitoba and the North-West. The remark of the hon. gentleman affords me an opportunity of saying that I believe the expenditure for this purpose might be very profitably increased in Winnipeg. If these hon. gentlemen opposite wish to see Manitoba and the North-West filling up with inhabitants, they should help us to bring in immigrants, instead of carping at the small expenditure that we find in these estimates. We hear it said, from many points in Ontario, that they have got all the people they need, and do not want any more immigrants in that Province. But we want all the immigrants we can get, and all the expenditure we can get in the interest of immigration.

Mr. MULOCK. I think we can hardly admit the statement that the people of Ontario want no more immigrants. We do not grudge any good fortune to our friends in the North-West, or in any part of the Dominion, and we rejoice with them if their country is filling up; but it must not be inferred from that fact that we reject immigration of a proper kind in Ontario, and I think that the country cannot do better than to improve our system of agencies for dealing with immigrants. I have not followed this discussion very closely, but I do not think that the hon. gentleman will find any expression of opinion on this side of the House that would justify the conclusion being drawn that we are not in favor of the settlement of the North-West; on the contrary, I do not think any person who has the slightest regard for the welfare of the country is not most anxious that the North-West should be filled up at the earliest possible moment. While we are of that opinion, we are still desirous of seeing a wise economy prevail in the administration of the immigration service, and I presume that is the whole drift of the discussion—it is the intention, at all events.

Mr. MITCHELL. My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr Davin) made a remark awhile ago that I think needs a little explanation. He says there seems to be a disposition to curtail the expense for immigration purposes in the North-West, and increase it in the eastern portions of this Dominion—I presume he means some of the Maritime Provinces. Now, I would like to ask my hon. friend to point out an instance in the eastern portion of this Dominion where the expense for immigration could be lessened, that is at a point where an agency has been established for any length of time. If the hon. gentleman did not mean to say that, let him retract his unjust statement in regard to the Maritime Provinces, or else let him explain to what he refers.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I believe, as much as does the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), that the expenses of the country should be reduced, although I do not say quite so much about it. I differ from him, however, with regard to immigration agencies throughout the country. Whenever immigrants come to a point of distribution it is absolutely necessary that we should have a responsible agent to look after them. I have lived in the neighborhood of London almost since childhood, and this is one of the agencies to which the hon. gentleman took exception and thought useless, and urged that it should be abolished. I am perfectly acquainted with the immigration agent there and I know something of the work he has to do. It is one thing to bring a lot of men or women to a centre, and it is another thing to bring employers and them together. It is the duty of the immigration agent to do this, and I can bear witness to the industry of this agent in years gone by in this respect. The Minister of Agriculture knows as well as I do the labor which this man has gone through, and I can remember years and years ago, when immigration was larger that it is at the present time, the immense amount of work he performed in finding immigrants suitable employment; in fact there was a particular hotel, the Old Waterloo, where arrangements were made to furnish immigrants with board at the cheapest possible terms, and then those who wished to employ those parties went to the agent, who had a list of them made out, and engagements were made. We can all see the absolute necessity for this. These parties come here strangers, and if we have no agents to look after them and to see they are protected, they fall into the hands of those very sharpers to which the hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Bain) took exception in regard to Quebec. I have known the London agent for a great many years, and I repeat, he is indefatigable in finding employment for immigrants. I have met him again and again, dozens of times on the street, and he has written me letters again and again asking me if either I or my neighbors required help. Moreover, he has sent parties to my house, seven miles from the city, in the hope that I was requiring help, or perhaps that I could inform immigrants of any neighbors that wanted help. In the immigration season very seldom a day goes by but the agent or some of his clerks are asking information about parties who require help. A record is kept at the office, and I know people who go to the office day after day to enquire respecting immigrants; they register their names there, and ask that the help be sent out to them as soon as suitable parties are found. I understand this system is carried out throughout the country. I remember travelling on the railway in the county of Wellington, when a gentleman, with whom the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is, no doubt, well acquainted, Mr. Farrow, who farms 600 acres, was very much disappointed because, after a trip to the immigration office at Toronto, he had failed to obtain the help he required. Exception has been taken and fault found with the expenses in connection with the Winnipeg agency. I am not going to say that all the expense incurred is necessary, and that the management has been as efficient as possible, but, until proof to the contrary has been furnished, I am bound to assume that such is the case. When in Winnipeg two or three years ago I made particular examination with regard to the work there. I went to the immigration office, and Mr. Metcalfe pointed out the way in which the records were kept, and he showed that they had the record of every immigrant that came there, and they kept trace of them as to where they settled, and so on. I am not going to say that all this information can be furnished, for I understand the Deputy Minister could not furnish that information the other day; but if the work is done as laid out, no fault can be found with the system. It is absolutely necessary in a new country like ours, when we are inviting immigrants to come here from other countries, that we should have agents at distributing points who would look after the immigrants, see they are not imposed, upon, and endeavor to assist them in obtaining employment.

Mr. MULOCK. With respect to the item of $1,000 for the St. John agency: Do I understand that the Minister is quite satisfied that this is a wise expenditure?

Mr. CARLING. The agency at St. John, N B., has been established for a ong time, and it would be very wrong indeed to do away with it at such an important point. I am not prepared to say the number of immigrants that arrived there, but quite a number did arrive. As the hon. member for South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong) has said, it is important that we should have an agent there to look after them when they arrive. It would be very wrong indeed to abolish the agency at St. John.

Mr. MULOCK. Would the hon. gentleman say by what means immigrants arrive at St. John, by vessel or how?

Mr. CARLING. I cannot say the exact number that arrived. Some arrived by vessel, others by rail from Halifax, and St. John being a large city and an important point in New Brunswick, and a number of immigrants coming there, it is most important that we should have some officer to look after them on their arrival.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think we require an emigration agent at Miramachi just now to regulate their transport, as so many people are going out of that section of the country.

Mr. CARLING. Are you in favor of sending them out?

Mr. MITCHELL. No, I am in favor of retaining them; but the policy of your Administration is such that it is send ing them out by thousands.

Mr. MULOCK. The report of the agent at St. John up to 31st December, 1888, is incorporated in the report of the Minister of Agriculture, and at page 117, it is stated that the number of immigrants to be dealt with at the St. John office was 231, while the total number arriving in New Brunswick was 1,432. Does the Minister say that 231 immigrants are sufficient to require us to maintain an office at St. John? The hon. Minister told us he cancelled the agency at Qu'Appelle. Surely more than 231 immigrants arrived there? And if the number of immigrants is to be the basis on which an agency is to be retained or cancelled, then I ask why should the Qu'Appelle agency be cancelled and that at St. John retained?

Mr. CARLING. I do not think it necessary to answer that question again. I have already stated the reason why the agency at Qu'Appelle was abolished, and why I think the agency at St. John should be retained. St. John is an important city, and while only 200 immigrants arrived there last year, there may be 2,000 this year, for all we know. No doubt the country is in a prosperous condition, notwithstanding the statement of the hon. member for North umberland (Mr. Mitchell). With the chances of increased steamboat accommodation across the ocean, I have no doubt that St. John will increase as rapidly, if not more so, than any other city in the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope the Committee will understand that I am not altogether defending the maintenance of the immigration agency at St. John. If I received as many favors from the Government as the members for the city and county of St. John, I would feel bound to maintain the immigrant agency. I do not think it is of much importance, but I do not wish to say anything against it, because it is in New Brunswick.

Mr. MULOCK. I simply asked, at the beginning of this discussion, if the Minister of Agriculture thought the Government got value for this expenditure? I wish to emphasise this question by asking the hon. gentleman to bear it in mind for the future.

Mr. CARLING. The item would not be in the Estimates if we did not think we got value for it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to ask the Minister why he thinks it right that there should be this increase of one thousand dollars in the expenditure of the immigration office at Winnipeg. I have listened to the remarks of my friend from South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong) regarding the Hamilton and London offices, but that gentleman is so much in the habit of trampling on the toes of gentlemen on this side of the House that we do not take much notice of what he says. I think, however, we should have some explanation from the Minister with regard to this increase in the Winnipeg immigration office.

Mr. CARLING. With reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen), if my hon. friend from South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong) is trampling on the toes of hon. gentlemen opposite by telling the truth, I think that the oftener he does so the better. We have recommended that the agency at Emerson be done away with, and we thought it necessary to remove Mr. Têtu to Winnipeg. Mr. Têtu is a French agent, and we have found that a large number of the people from Lower Canada are going to the North-West, so that we have removed him to Winnipeg where his services will be very useful.

Mr. CASGRAIN. What is the salary of Mr. Têtu?

Mr. CARLING. $1,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Has he got the same position at Winnipeg as he had at Emerson?

Mr. CARLING. He is assistant to the Winnipeg agent.

Mr. WATSON. I would like to ask the hon. the Minister if he has at last discovered that this agent was of very little service at Emerson. It has been frequently explained that this gentleman was there for the purpose of ascertaining the number of immigrants who went to Manitoba, and his returns proved very unsatisfactory when laid before the Agriculture Committee. I believe it is right that members on this side of the House should criticise those items, but I would say, that so far as the Province of Manitoba and the North-West Territories are concerned, that I will approve of the Government increasing the expenditure for immigration purposes there, if the increased expenditure is properly applied. I believe it is the duty of the Government to assist as much as possible people in settling up Manitoba and the North-West, but I must say that the results of their policy in the past have not been satisfactory. I would wish to point out for the information of the Minister that the expenditure for immigration has not had the result of bringing immigrants from a foreign country, but that a large portion of the immigration this year to Manitoba is from the older Provinces of Canada. The appropriation for immigration purposes in Manitoba and the North-West Territories is very small, and I do not think that the expenditure exceeds more than $10,000 this year. I would like that the Government should try to induce as many foreigners to come into that country as possible. It is hard for a member on this side of the House to advocate any increase in the expenditure of the Department of Agriculture after such exhibitions as we have had of agents being employed by the Government, and receiving their money for doing nothing. We had an instance of that kind this forenoon, in the Public Accounts Committee. Mr. Webster is another gentleman who makes a report to the Government of immigration matters, and, I believe, that he is employed in a similar position to that as Mr. Smyth. While I am always in favor of speaking well of our country, I do not think it is well that our immigration agents should be allowed to give statements to the general public which are not true. Mr. Webster, in his report, tells of the work he has been doing for the department in Dakota, and that is a terrible place, and, according to Mr. Webster's report, it is not fit for a person to live in. When we remember, that this miserable, wretched country, is only across the line from Manitoba, some people may conclude that our country cannot be much better. I do not think that it is necessary to have such reports printed. We have a good, and a very good country, that its advantages over Dakota are worthy of being advertised to the people of the world. I wish to say, that I would like to see the Government spend a little more money in opening up more agencies in Manitoba and the North-West, instead of reducing the expenditure. There are some new sections of the country now opening up for settlement, such as the Lake Dauphin district, which is a splendid tract of country. I think that it would be a very good expenditure if agencies were established at the terminus of the Manitoba and South-Western Railway and of the Manitoba North-Western Railway. It is important that settlers coming there to prospect with the intention of settling on the lands, or of inducing others to settle there, should be in charge of some agent who would show them through the country and point out to them the parts which are valuable for settlement. I believe that it would materially assist in the settlement of Manitoba and the North-West if we had agents at the points I have mentioned, and others which are just of as much importance. I believe that the work done by Mr. Graham, in Winnipeg, is giving very general satisfaction, but the trouble is that Mr. Graham has not got enough outside agents and he has to be all the time in Winnipeg. From what we have seen of the result of an expenditure made by the Local Government, under the immigration system they have inaugurated, I believe that it can only be a matter of regret that the work of the Dominion Government in this direction in the past has not proved more satisfactory. There are more settlers going into Manitoba this year from different parts than there have been during the past five years. I need not say what I think are the reasons for this, but one of the reasons, I believe, is the immigration policy adopted by the Local Government. They have agents in different places, they send exhibits all over, and they have a very fine exhibit in the city of Toronto opposite the Walker House, showing the agricultural and mineral products of Manitoba. The agent there goes out to the different sections of the Province of Ontario and delivers lectures before farmers' institutes. I believe that those agents of the Provincial Government are doing a good work. If good men were employed by this Government to do the work in a proper manner I should certainly approve of the Government making a large appropriation for immigration purposes, whereby they would assist in the early settlement of Manitoba and the North-West.

Mr. CARLING. I would say in reply to the hon. gentleman that no reduction has been made in the appropriation for the Province of Manitoba, with the exception of reducing the expenses for the Emerson agency. The agency at Winnipeg is still being continued, and perhaps its facilities have been increased for doing the work there. We are also continuing the agency at Brandon. I think that the hon. gentleman will find that the Dominion Government have rendered very great assistance in inducing immigrants from Ontario to go to Manitoba and the North-West. He has referred to Mr. Webster, who was employed by the Government to visit Dakota and Manitoba, and he has disputed some of the statements that gentleman has made. I believe that gentleman to be a true and thoroughly patriotic Canadian, who has no interest to serve but the good of his country, and the statements he has made he believes to be true. That gentleman has been summoned to appear before the Committee on Public Accounts, when I hope the hon. gentleman will make the statements which he has made here to-day; and if I am not mistaken, Mr. Webster will be able to convince the hon. gentleman and the Committee that the statements he has made are strictly accurate.

Mr. WATSON,

Mr. McMULLEN. There is one part of the hon. gentleman's statement which I will agree with, that Mr. Webster is a true and patriotic Canadian, only I would put in the place of Canadian, the word Tory.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I agree with the Minister in the propriety of abolishing the office at Emerson, but I have a decided objection to moving Mr. Têtu to Winnipeg, on the grounds the Minister has represented to us. I think both Ontario and Quebec immigrants who go to Manitoba are, as a rule, able to take care of themselves. Our experience of Mr. Têtu and of the kind of returns he made in former years, when we sifted them in the Immigration Committee, are not such as to satisfy me of his fitness for any immigration office. That operation of counting the immigrants that went into Manitoba —I may as well tell the truth about it—I believe was a downright swindle. I believe he was only a salary drawer at Emerson, and his official returns were utter failures; and I do protest against continuing him at Winnipeg simply to continue a salary drawer. If we are going to do anything to improve our immigration system, let us apply the pruning knife where there is an opportunity of doing some good, and let us not transfer a man from a place where he has been of no use to Winnipeg where he will be of as little use. I may as well say that I think it is a fraud on the Immigration Department to perform such an operation. I think the time has arrived when the Dominion Government, and the Government of Manitoba, may fairly consider how far they can combine their resources in the administration of immigration affairs in that Province. I am satisfied that there is no man in this House who is at all unwilling to expend even a large amount of money for immigration purposes in Manitoba and the North-West, if we can only secure some return for it; but as for transferring an officer who does nothing to advance the interest of immigration, I think the sooner that is stopped the better. I think there is reasonable ground, as the hon. member for Marquette suggests, for having in various localties some men who would have a certain reputation for local information, and who would be reliable, to aid parties in obtaining possession of lands and locating; but if we are going to accomplish anything in that direction, it is not by increasing our staff at Winnipeg. It is not at that point that immigrants require to be taken care of. Everyone acquainted with our immigration system for the last few years knows how thoroughly that system broke down; and while we are very anxious to have that country settled up, there is no use closing our eyes to the fact that the best part of the immigration that went into Manitoba and the North-West has been composed of people from the older Provinces without any effort on the part of the Government With regard to the employment of such agents as Mr. Henry Smyth and Mr. Webster, I think the Government might find better ways of rewarding their friends than by employing them in immigration positions. Perhaps that subject will come up again; but I may say that my experience of Mr. Webster leads me to believe that while he may be a very honest immigration agent, his chief value to the Government has been in connection with the missionary labors he has performed throughout Ontario whenever an election has been imminent or on hand. If his work has been satisfactory to the Government in that direction, I suppose we have to submit to be bled a little occasionally; but I think we may as well tell the truth about the way that immigration agency has been employed.

Mr. LA RIVIÈRE. I did not intend to take part in this debate, but owing to the way in which the question is now drifting, I am bound to say something, because one of the agencies in my own constituency is referred to. But before referring to that matter, I must say that I am somewhat astounded at the remarks made by the hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Bain). The hon. gentleman is complaining, and he is bound to complain, I suppose, being on that side of the House, that appointees of the Government are always at fault. I may tell him that this Mr. Têtu is an appointee of his own friends. While I regret exceedingly that the Government has had to withdraw the agency at Emerson, I agree at the same time with the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) that we ought perhaps to have more agencies in Manitoba than we have had hitherto; but I understand why the hon. Minister has thought advisable to withdraw the Emerson agency under existing circumstances, because the passengers coming into the Province are not coming through Emerson to-day; they are coming chiefly through Gretna and very few through West Lynne. It is true, West Lynne is close to Emerson, but an agency which is kept for the express object of receiving the immigrants had better perhaps be at the meeting point, that is, at Winnipeg. I do not agree with the hon. member for Wentworth that no agent should be appointed, on account of his nationality, as appears to be the case in regard to Mr. Têtu, because, I may tell the hon. gentleman, that we are actually receiving a very large immigration, speaking the French language, not simply from Lower Canada, but from the old country, France and Belgium; there are 150 Belgians now on their way to Manitoba, and therefore the Government are in duty bound to have officers in the immigration department who can understand their language. I presume that the object of the Minister in removing Mr. Têtu to Winnipeg is to have that officer there to meet those people, whose language he understands, and to facilitate their settlement in our Province. Anyone who has followed the progress of immigration in Manitoba will find that this is a very exceptional and a very good year for that Province. No less than 5,000 immigrants have already arrived, during the last month or so, in the city of Winnipeg, and they are not all coming from the eastern Provinces, as we are led to suppose. They come from the States, to a very large extent; they come from the old country too, and, therefore, I believe that it is to our advantage to spend as much money as possible in the Province of Manitoba for the advancement of immigration. I am not very sanguine that any success will be achieved by the present Local Government, and what success we have I do not think we can attribute to their efforts. I am somewhat scandalised at the remarks made by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson), in referring to this report on Dakota. The hon. gentleman appears to be sorry that an official of our Government should find out that Dakota offers less advantages than the Province of Manitoba.

Mr. WATSON. No.

Mr. LA RIVIÈRE. The hon. member says that the two countries are situated exactly alike and that the only difference between them is the division line——

Mr. WATSON. No.

Mr. LA RIVIÈRE—one being on the north and the other on the south. At any rate there is a difference between the Province of Manitoba and the present State of Dakota, and the difference is to the advantage of Manitoba. If it is not altogether in the quality of the soil, it is in the laws of the country; it is in the land regulations in force; it is in the quantity of snow that they have and that we have not; and it is in the frost and the blizzards they enjoy and which we have not. Therefore, I am not at all astonished that an official of our Government should have found out those things which are generally known in the west. It would be well that the report of the official sent up there should be published, so that the public at large may find out that Manitoba offers greater advantages to immigrants than the State of Dakota.

Committee rose, and, it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Assistant Agent, Vancouver..... $1,200

Mr. MARA. I would draw the attention of the hon. the Minister to the fact that the agent at Victoria only receives $1,000, while the agent at Vancouver receives $1,200. The officer in Victoria has held the position ten years, and yet receives less than the officer in Vancouver, who has only been newly appointed.

Mr. CARLING. We have not appointed a new agent at Vancouver, but we transferred the agent at Medicine Hat to that place at the same salary he had at Medicine Hat.

Mr. MARA. It appears like discrimination. Here are two towns side by side. In one the agent has held the position for ten years, and, consequently, must have been a good and efficient officer, and yet he only receives $1,000. While in the other, where the office is new, the agent receives $1,200. That does not appear to be right. Either the old officer should have his salary increased or the salary of the other should be cut down.

Mr. CARLING. The officer at Medicine Hat has been transferred from there to Vancouver. As a very large number of immigrants are going into Vancouver, it is important to have a man of experience there such as the agent at Medicine Hat.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Am I to understand that the duties at Vancouver are greater than those at Victoria?

Mr. CARLING. I think they are, and they will be much greater than they are at Victoria.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Had the hon. gentleman any reliable information given to him before making the appointment, as to the necessity of the appointment and the probable amount of work that would be required?

Mr. CARLING. I have had applications from the council of the town of Vancouver. Resolutions were passed by the municipality of Vancouver, and petitions were sent by the inhabitants there a year ago, asking the establishment of an agency there, on account of the large number of people coming in from the United States, to give such information as was required.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I hope, when we get these agents changed, we will be able to stop that leakage which I hear some hon. friends opposite state is taking place in that part of the country. It is a very discouraging feature of our immigration system, and it appears that British Columbia is no exception to the rule. There has been a very decided leakage, according to some statements made by these western men, and the returns show that the only immigration to British Columbia during the last year amounted to a little over 3,000, so that it should not take very many agents to manage that.

Mr. MARA. The appointment of an officer at Vancouver will do a great deal to stop the leakage referred to. He can stop intending settlers from taking the Sound steamers, which the agent at Victoria cannot do.

Mr. DAVIN. I think the Minister should act on the suggestion of the North-West Council, and arrange for special agents in the interest of the North-West in the outlying Provinces and in England. The Minister has got the memorial before him, and, as he is cutting down our agencies in the North-West, he might easily make that up by adopting the suggestion of the North-West Council,

Mr. TROW. I would like to ask the Minister where there are lands within a reasonable distance of Vancouver on which to locate the settlers when they arrive there?

Mr. CARLING. I am not prepared to say where the lands are. A good deal of the settlement has come from the United States by way of Vancouver, and we want it to be known to those who come, that the agricultural and mining interests of the country are suitable, though I cannot at present say exactly where the lands are which we propose to give them.

Mr. TROW. Will the Minister state what class of immigrants arrive there, what is their occupation or their employment, whether they are miners, or fishermen, or what?

Mr. MARA. The majority of the immigrants have been farmers, and a great many lumbermen have gone there also. There is a large quantity of excellent farming land in the delta of the Fraser as well as in the district of Chilliwack, and there are no better farming lands than in the Sumas country, Chilliwack, and on the lower portion of the Fraser. There are also many islands on the west coast and north of Vancouver Island, which are capable of receiving settlers. If there is no agent at Vancouver, these people take the steamer, as I have stated, for Puget Sound, and they are lost to the Province; but, when we have an agent there, information can be given by which these people will have their choice, either of remaining on the Fraser, or of going to the north, or to Vancouver Island. I may say further that settlers pay a lower rate for their passage to the coast than they do to the interior, and many can be induced to return by an agent who is able to give them reliable information there.

Mr. FISHER. I see that the Minister boasted this afternoon that he had lessened the expenditure at these points; but we find that the agent at Emerson has been removed to Winnipeg, and that there has been a corresponding increase in the expenditure at Winnipeg. Then the agent at Medicine Hat has been removed to Vancouver, and there is a new establishment there, so that the decrease which the hon. gentleman told us about this afternoon can only refer to the closing of the office at Qu'Appelle. I would like to ask if the Minister has not provided for Mr. Baker, who used to be the agent at Qu'Appelle, in the same generous manner as he has for the rest?

Mr. CARLING. I stated this afternoon that Mr. Baker had been transferred to another agency.

Mr. FISHER. Then they are all provided for?

Mr. CARLING. I stated that, as Mr. Têtu is a highly intelligent and efficient French Canadian, and a large number of French were going into Winnipeg, it was thought desirable to have someone there who thoroughly understood the French language. We have also information that there are many Belgians coming there this year; so we removed Mr. Têtu to Winnipeg, as an assistant to the present agent.

Mr. FISHER. Where has Mr. Baker gone?

Mr. CARLING. Mr. Bennett, the agent at Brandon, will be removed to Winnipeg, and Mr. Baker will take his place at Brandon.

Mr. FISHER. Is that an addition to the Winnipeg office?

Mr. CARLING. No; the agent at Winnipeg has asked for leave of absence, with the view of resigning, and Mr. Bennett will take his place.

Mr. FISHER. Will the agent at Winnipeg get a superannuation or a retiring allowance?

Mr. CARLING. No.

Mr. MULOCK. Are these agents allowed to absent themselves from their posts without leave from the department?

Mr. CARLING. No, they are not.

Mr. MULOCK. When was that rule adopted?

Mr. CARLING. That has always been the case, though, if they apply for leave and it is reasonable that they should obtain it, they get it.

Mr. MULOCK. Perhaps the hon. gentlemen will remember that, in 1888, reference was made to the case of this same Mr. Baker to whom the Minister has referred. On that occasion, it appeared that Mr. Baker had without leave, as the Minister said, absented himself from his office and had come to Russell county and had done a certain amount of immigration work there during the election, which was a Dominion by-election. On that occasion the Minister stated to the House that he did not know that this immigration agent had left his office, but that he had heard that he had appointed a substitute, which appeared to be quite right. The Minister, of course, did not know that this agent of his had left his place at a time when he ought to have been at Qu'Appelle, and came down here. But it seems to the Minister all right, and he gave the House to understand a year ago that it was quite permissable for an agent in his department to absent himself without leave. I am glad he has turned over a new leaf now, and that he is going to require them to attend to their business. But we have heard to-day, and before to-day, of many persons employed in the Department of the Minister of Agriculture, going round the country as agents during election time. We had his "good friend, Mr. Webster," who, he says, is so reliable a man, plying the business of immigration agent in ridings where there are elections going on. So with the case of Mr. Smyth, ex-M.P., so with Mr. Baker, ex M. P. They are stationed nominally at Qu'Appelle or Regina, but it does not seem to make any difference where they are stationed, because these are merely nominal offices, the same as you give a local habitation to a corporation, and that is everywhere. So these men travel the world over at their own sweet wills, wherever there is a by-election going on, and their travelling expenses are charged to the Immigration Department. Is that a proper way to use the funds of the Immigration Department? Is that honest? Is the hon. gentleman proud of that way of dealing with the public money? He knows that has happened, he knows it is happening. He knows that Mr. Baker absented himself without leave. Does the hon. gentleman not remember——

Mr. CARLING. If the hon. gentleman will allow me—I do not remember what took place that year, but I know that all officers of the Government are granted leave of absence during certain seasons of the year. At the seat of the Government, I think each officer is allowed three weeks leave of absence; that is customary in the departments, and the same custom prevails with respect to the agents. Mr. Baker might take his leave of absence then, applying for it, notifying the department of his intention to take his leave of absence, which he could obtain provided the work was properly carried on during his absence. Mr. Baker would not require to ask me for leave of absence, if he was taking holidays in the winter or in the summer time. Mr. Baker had a right to take his holidays, and I could not object.

Mr. MULOCK. Is there no regular period when they are to take their holidays?

Mr. CARLING. No regular period.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Baker, then, is allowed to take his holidays at a time when, of all times, he ought to be at the post of duty?

Mr. CARLING. I do not know that, because I do not think the time when he took his holidays was at a time when the business of his office was so very pressing.

Mr. MULOCK. It may not have been, but it was in the month of May, 1888. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Debates of last Session he will find that on the 2nd of May, 1888, it was admitted by the hon. gentleman himself that at that particular time Mr. Baker, the immigration agent at the town of Qu'Appelle, was in Russell County canvassing.

Mr. CARLING. Yes, he had a perfect right to be there.

Mr. MULOCK. He had a perfect right to absent himself at the time?

Mr. CARLING. I have already said that he had.

Mr. MULOCK. Was not that at a time when immigration was brisk?

Mr. CARLING. He had a right to ask his holidays at any season of the year, in winter or in summer. He did not get his holidays twice, I am safe in saying.

Mr. MULOCK. He had a perfect right to ask for holidays, and it was not a wise exercise of discretion to give them at a time when, of all times, he ought to have been at his duty. Of course the hon. gentleman can afford to disregard the public service in trying to promote the election of a political friend, but that is not in the public interest. The hon. gentleman thinks that the Immigration Department, and all the offices at his disposal, are to be used for campaign purposes to keep him there. I repeat that this is nothing more than a gross breach of trust. It is just what the Public Accounts Committee have shown, to-day, as the outcome of the hon gentleman's administration. Now, before the Session closes, we hear of one of the most fraudulent cases that could possibly take place, right under the hon. gentleman's own eyes, and the account is sent in for immigration work. The whole thing is a fraud, I believe every bit of it is a fraud. The Minister talks about his "friend, Mr. Webster." Where was Mr. Webster doing his immigration work? In Haldimand, in all the counties where by-elections were going on.

Mr. CARLING. Do you know he was in Haldimand during the time he was employed by the Government?

Mr. MULOCK. I am told he was.

Mr. McMULLEN. We know he was by the Public Accounts, by the accounts that he sent in himself, and we will prove it by the Public Accounts Committee to-morrow. By an order of this House he sent in the return of his services and the different places where he had been, and in that return there is a charge for expenses from Kingston to Haldimand, and Haldimand back again to Kingston, during the election campaign.

Mr. CARLING. What year was that in?

Mr. McMULLEN. During the last election that took place in Haldimand.

Mr. CARLING. I can only say to the hon. gentleman that he is quite mistaken. I say there is no account in the department for Mr. Webster for over a year. I state to this House that the hon. gentleman is making a statement that is totally untrue. Mr. Webster did not receive a dollar from the Govertment during the time of the last election in Haldimand.

Mr. McMULLEN. I challenge the hon. gentleman to appear before the next meeting of the Public Accounts Committee, and if I do not prove that in his own handwriting are receipts for moneys actually received from the department for expenses for going to the county of Haldimand to attend the election, that he was there during the election, that he left there two days before the election was over, and came back home, then I will take my statement back.

Mr. CARLING. Now, Mr. Speaker, I state here before the House that I challenge the hon. gentleman to make that statement before the Committee, because Mr. Webster was not employed by the Government during the last Haldimand election, and there has been no account rendered. The only account here is up to the 30th of April, 1888.

Mr. McMULLEN. He was in the service of the Government from the 30th of April.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. While on this question, I would like the Minister to explain what are the duties of travelling immigration agents like Mr. Webster and Mr. Smyth. Now, we had in the Public Accounts Committee, last week, Mr. Lowe, the Deputy Minister, giving evidence, and he declared that Mr. Smyth had a roving commission, that he was appointed as an agent for six months in a year. We had the accounts to show that he was paid $100 per month, and $2 per day and travelling expenses besides. Mr. Lowe declared before the Committee that Mr. Smyth had a roving commission to travel anywhere he pleased all over the North American continent. I think it would be well for the Minister to explain to this House just exactly what duties are required of these men who are given these roving commissions like Mr. Smyth and Mr. Webster. I do not know that this is a proper time to enter into a discussion in regard to Mr. Smyth's account, which has been investigated partly in the Public Accounts Committee to-day. But there may be another opportunity before the close of the Session, and, in the meantime, I would like the Minister to explain what are the duties required of men like Mr. Smith and Mr. Webster.

Mr. CARLING. I dare say the hon. gentleman has read the letter of instructions that was given to Mr. Smyth and Mr. Webster.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The letter was asked for to-day, but it has not been brought down.

Mr. CARLING. I will read the letter:

"OTTAWA, 30th April, 1887.

"SIR,—I have an instruction from the Minister of Agriculture to say to you, that in view of the actual circumstances in relation to settlement in Manitoba and the Canadian North-West, he desires to engage your services for a period of six months from this date, for the purpose of promoting immigration to Manitoba and the Canadian North-West.

"He desires you to meet, in as far as possible, the efforts which are being made by agents of the United States railway and land companies, who are actively distributing their pamphlets, maps and other publications in Canada, in order to neutralise them, in as far as possible, and also to divert such emigration as might be moved from the old Provinces of Canada by the influence of such publications, to the Canadian North-West, where it is believed the advantages are equal, if not superior.

"It is also the desire of the Minister that you should visit the adjoining North-Western States, and take the opportunity to visit some of the Canadian settlements which have been located in them, in order to ascertain the facts, in as far as possible, as to the state and prospects of such settlements, and what comparison they bear to similar conditions in Manitoba and the Canadian North-West, as regards the soil, climate and railway facilities, land laws and regulations, &c.

"The facts ascertained should be reported to the department for the information of the Minister, and you should utilise the facts you find, in order to give effect, in as far as you can, to the object of your mission.

"You will generally act under the verbal instructions conveyed to you by the Minister.

"The rate of pay for such services will be $100 per month, with an allowance of $2 per day for boarding expenses, and the cost of moving expenses, such as railway fares and other conveyances which you may find it necessary to use. All expenditures of this nature must be accompanied, as far as possible, with vouchers, and in all cases, the dates and names of railway stations between which tickets are purchased should be furnished in accordance with the requirements in such matters of the Audit Act.

"It is the desire of the Minister that you should make monthly reports of your operations, or more frequently, in the event of occurrences which you may consider it important for the Minister to know.

"I have, &c.,
(Signed) "J. LOWE,
"Acting Deputy Minister of Agriculture.

"HENRY SMYTH, Esq.,
"Chatham, Ontario."

That was the letter sent t Mr. Smyth to guide him in his travels in the North-West and in the Western States. I may say that we found in Canada a very large number of American railway agents and land agents doing everything possible to induce our people to go to the Western States, and I regret very much they have drawn such very fine pictures of Dakota and other Western States that a great many of our young men have been induced to go there. I felt it was the duty of the department to try to counteract that emigration, and to do so I selected a gentleman who had been a member of this House, who had had the confidence of a very important constituency for a number of years. The people who knew him best elected him as their representative twice, and he was defeated by a small majority, I believe, in 1887, and I thought a gentleman who had enjoyed the confidence of his neighbors and constituents, and who had been a faithful representative in this House, was qualified and competent to discharge the duties to which he was appointed. I believe he did his best to persuade the people of our own country, especially in the western part of it, and I know a very large quantity of immigration literature was distributed by him, especially in the western part of Canada. I have no doubt it had a very good effect, and we find now, that, through the speeches, and the canvassing, and the distribution of information to our people in Canada, the tide has turned to our country, instead to Dakota. I am not ashamed to stand here, and defend the appointment of Mr. Smyth. If Mr. Smyth has done anything wrong, it is for hon. gentlemen opposite to prove it. I do not think the salary of $100 a month, and $2 per day for travelling expenses, are a very extravagant charge. Hon. gentlemen opposite have brought this matter before a Committee of the House, and it is hardly fair for the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), and the hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville), when they have the case before a Committee, and have witnesses to try and prove a case against him, to bring forward the subject now. If they can establish a case against Mr. Smyth, it is not a matter for me, because I acted fairly and squarely with Mr. Smyth, and I expected that he did the same with the Government. The same remark applies to Mr. Webster. He is a most active and efficient man, and I think he has rendered great service to his country. I believe no better man could have been selected than Mr. Webster, and I instructed him to visit Minnesota, Dakota and the North-West, and he visited them, not as an officer of the Government, but as a farmer, and without letting the people of the districts know that he was employed by the Government, believing that under such circumstances he would be more apt to get the information he wanted. That information has been published in pamphlet form and distributed among members. Mr. Webster will be before the Committee, to-morrow, and if hon. gentlemen opposite have any charges to make against him, and if they can prove that he acted unfairly and made false statements, it is for those hon. gentlemen to make their charges to-morrow, and I shall guarantee that Mr. Webster will be able to satisfy the Committee that he acted honestly and faithfully to his country and has induced thousands to go to the North-West who would have gone to Dakota.

Mr. TAYLOR. I want to read a letter from a constituent of mine, whose opinion, I am sure when I mention his name, will be accepted by many members of this House who know the gentleman, as to what Mr. Webster is doing in regard to our North-West country. The letter is dated 14th March, 1889, and is dated from Limehurst and is signed by Henry Green. It says:

"GEO. TAYLOR, Esq., M.P.

"DEAR SIR,—Some days ago, Mr. W. A. Webster gave us a splendid lecture in R. W. Copeland's hall. The subject was: 'Our North-West.' His recommendation of this country, as a field for our young men in which to settle and to make money, was good. In my humble opinion, we should have in the field more such men as Mr. Webster, who would, I believe, tend to counteract those Grits who constantly, in the House and out of the House, are running down our country."

That is the opinion not only of the gentleman who is the writer of this letter, but, I believe, it is the opinion of a great many others.

Mr. MITCHELL. Give us the whole of the letter; do not spare your friends.

Mr. TAYLOR. It relates to the Budget, and not to Mr. Webster.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it is the hon. gentleman's duty to read the whole of it.

Mr. TAYLOR. It may be my duty, but I do not propose doing so. As we have this matter under investigation before the Public Accounts Committee, it is very unkind for the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) to say that the account is a bogus affair from beginning to end, when the hon. gentleman knows that Mr. Smyth swore that every dollar in the account had been expended in the interest of the Government. That was his statement. He acknowledged the fact that, as regards the details, the clerk who made out the account might have been mistaken, but so far as the amount was concerned every dollar had been expended. While the matter is being investigated by the Committee, it is very unfair, I say, for the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) to bring it here and say it is a bogus affair from beginning to end and an imposition on the Government and on the country.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I was going to say, when I was interrupted by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor)——

Mr. TAYLOR. I had the floor first.

Mr. SOMERVILLE—that the Minister of Agriculture evidently entertained a very high opinion of some of the gentlemen who have occupied positions in his department. He entertains a very high opinion of Mr. Webster. For my part I cannot say that I know much about Mr. Webster, but I must say that I know a great deal about Mr. Smyth. We have learned a great deal about Mr. Smyth to-day, and I must say that the Minister of Agriculture, after being present in the Public Accounts Committee and hearing Mr. Smyth's evidence with regard to his account, amounting to some fifteen hundred dollars for services said to have been rendered to the Agriculture Department, that if the Minister continues to entertain a high opinion of Mr. Smyth, after hearing the evidence that Mr. Smyth himself gave with regard to the correctness of that account, he must not set up his agents on a very high standard when he chooses to admire them. Every gentleman who was present on that Committee must have formed a different opinion. I only refer to the matter now because it has been already alluded to. I did not introduce the subject with regard to Mr. Smyth at all, except to ask the Minister what were the instructions given to those outside agents of the department. Now that the matter has been brought up, I think it is nothing but right that I should continue the debate that has been started on this question. We had Mr. Smyth before the Public Accounts Committee to-day, and he was examined with regard to the correctness of the account which he had rendered to the department for services. We had this man who stands so high in the esteem of the Minister of Agriculture, declaring that from the first charge in that account, which was made some time in the month of June, up to the last item charged at the end of November, that he could not certify to the correctness of one single charge that was made. He could say, as he did say, that the amount was right. He could state that he expended this money in the interest of the Government, but he could not say, as he declared in the presence of the Minister of Agriculture—he could not say that one single item in that account was correct as far as dates were concerned. The Minister of Agriculture read out to us to-night the instructions given to Mr. Smyth when he was appointed to this position, and these instructions declared that he must give day and date and vouchers to the Government for the expenditure of the money and for his expenses. Mr. Smyth did not do that. He gave dates, but how did he give those dates? He pretended to have a memorandum or a diary in which he kept an account of all his transactions.

Mr. CARLING. I wish to rise to a point of order. This case was before the Committee to-day and is to be before the Committee to-morrow. The evidence has not been concluded, nor reported to the House yet, and I think it is unfair for the hon. gentleman to state to this House that every member of that Committee condemned Mr. Smyth, when there was no vote taken or no decision of the Committee arrived at. We are yet waiting for further evidence and further deliberation on the part of the Committee.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I did not start this discussion at all.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RYKERT). I was going to call the member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville) to order for referring to proceedings now before the Public Accounts Committee. It is quite irregular and quite improper so to do. The rule laid down by Bourinot at page 448 is:

"Until a Committee report, it is irregular to refer to its proceedings in debate in the House. For instance, in the Session of 1873, Mr Huntington was proceeding to refer to certain papers and letters relative to an important matter under the consideration of a Select Committee: but the Speaker decided, in accordance with English precedents, that they could not be read in the House."

I am quite satisfied that the discussion is out of order and that the subject had no right to be referred to.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not rise for the purpose of disputing your ruling, Mr. Chairman, for I believe it is quite in accordance with previous rulings on the subject, but I think under the circumstances that either this whole item, or, at any rate, one portion of it should be reserved so as to afford an opportunity, before this matter is disposed of, for discussion; it bears on the whole conduct of the immigration branch of the Department of Agriculture, and there is no doubt that a discussion must be had upon it in this House. If a single item could be reserved and the rest proceeded with, I think that it would suit the convenience of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think that would be right at all. There can be a full discussion about these two gentlemen whose names have been mentioned either on Concurrence or on the report of the Committee of Public Accounts. It is quite absurd that some items must be stopped—allowed to lay over because some collateral point has arisen or some charge like this is brought against some Government employé. If that were done we would never get along in the world. This discussion is not relevant to the subject at all. We are discussing the comparative salaries of agents at Victoria and Vancouver, and this has no more reference to those subjects than the man in the moon has. It is a simple waste of time, and besides, it is breaking every parliamentary rule and every rule of common fairness to bring up charges against a party which are yet under consideration.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The charge has not been made against Mr. Smyth. The charge is made against the Government for wilfully squandering the public money and paying it out to a man who rendered no service for it.

The CHAIRMAN. It has nothing to do with the present matter.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We have had a good deal of ground, and very just ground, for complaining of the mode in which the money voted to the Government for immigration services has been used. One of those grounds (and one of the worst grounds) is that over and over again men have been employed by the department who, as we allege, are mere political hacks, who do no service to the country, and who have been used at every by-election through this country, and while under pay from this department, for political services to the Administration. Mr. Smyth's case, I am informed, is a notable instance of that. I do not know, however, that it comes under this item, but the right hon. gentleman will see that, apart from what is decided by the Committee, we have a right to discuss the mode in which the Government have been using the vote for the employment of certain parties improperly. The First Minister knows that I am in the right when I say that that comes under the purview of this Committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, not this Committee.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Oh, certainly. We have a perfect right to discuss how you disposed of the money voted last year. Over and over again, while I was sitting on the Treasury benches, it was done for hours together, and notably, I think, by the late Mr. Plumb. We have always taken the position that that can be done while we are voting money for the future year. What is the use of the Auditor General's Report if we are not entitled to discuss the mode in which you applied the money you got for the past year, and of which alone we have a perfect account. As regards what passed in the Public Accounts Committee, I hardly think my hon. friend (Mr. Somerville), except by consent of the House, can go any further, but he can bring up the question de novo when any item is under discussion cognate to this, or having reference to any similar services to those in which Mr. Smyth was employed. I think that is correct.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. To a certain extent the doctrine laid down by the hon. gentleman is true. There may be some general item which will bring up legitimately a discussion on the course of the Government, or the whole matter can be brought up on Concurrence.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not well, on Concurrence.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It can be brought up on the report of the Committee on Public Accounts. The hon. gentleman will see that, besides the unfairness of this proceeding, we would never get through if we were to have a lengthened discussion on every item, on the policy of the Government or on the alleged crimes of the present Administration.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That brings very forcibly into notice the complaint that I have made repeatedly, that we have got into the pernicious habit of lumping together some twenty or thirty items under one head. That was not the case formerly, and I do not think it ought to be the case now. If those items were separate there would be no difficulty about allowing one of them to remain over for discussion. What is the necessity of mixing up "salaries," "expenses of Canadian agencies," and "aids to women's protection societies" under one vote. That was the reason that I made the suggestion that one item might stand over, as I think it would be for the convenience of the House and for the convenience of the Government. It may be true that it is only on the last item that this discussion can arise.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I would like to enquire, Mr. Chairman, if a discussion on the expenses connected with travelling agents is in order. We are taking special votes for the agents, and we are taking special votes for the assistant agents, and while we take those votes we would be justified in supposing that the travelling agents should also be discussed, when they are figuring in the Public Accounts as travelling agents. If it is not proper to discuss this under the head of agents or assistant agents, tell me under which of these items it can arise? We desire to have, and we intend to have, a discussion on travelling agent W. A. Webster, and when can that come up?

Mr. CARLING. That is paid out of the last item.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then, I think, it would have been better that Mr. Webster should have appeared as a travelling agent, as the Public Accounts describe him, and then we would not have been stopped in discussing these estimates. It is a curious thing to lump his pay in the last item of charges towards immigration and immigration expenses. But I have not the slightest doubt the Committee will wait until that item is reached, and then the discussion will be had.

Mr. LAURIER. We have fallen into another pernicious habit, of rushing into Concurrence of these resolutions when we are close on prorogation, and if we follow the same practice this Session, we must take more time to discuss these items in Committee.

Mr. MITCHELL. The leader of the Opposition has just taken the word I intended to utter out of my mouth. Whenever the right hon. gentlemen is hard pressed, he refers to rules and practices that have been in use, and he tells us that we can have this matter up on Concurrence. We know that Concurrence is rushed through at the end of the Session at a galloping rate, and there is no opportunity then of discussing these matters. I can tell the hon. gentleman that he will get on far better with these items if he pursues a reasonable course, and does not put too strict an application on our rules and practices. What I would suggest about the present case is this: There are two items yet unpassed by the Committee under which we would have a right to discuss Mr. Webster's or Mr. Smyth's case. As Mr. Smyth's case is yet before the Committee on Public Accounts, I think you have correctly ruled that we should not discuss it; but I hold that the two items—contingencies, and the last item, towards immigration and immigration expenses—should be held over in order to enable gentlemen to discuss this matter. We are all anxious to bring the Session to a close, and if the hon. gentleman is not too strict in his application of the rules, he will get on a great deal better.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. First Minister has objected to any discussion on an item not yet reached. I contend that as this vote is all under one head (No. 52) any member has a right to speak with regard to any item under that head, and that if you reserve one item you have to reserve the whole vote.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman is right in one sense. This is one resolution, and the items may be discussed. I suppose if any hon. gentleman chose, he might commence at the foot and go on upwards to the first item; but it was agreed some years ago, apparently by both sides, that it was much more convenient to put in one resolution the supplies relating to a particular service; but to prevent any inconvenience, and in order to enable hon. members to discuss freely the different items, it was understood that they should be ready to discuss the votes one after the other as they went on. That is the only sensible way in which a reasonable discussion can be carried on. I would suggest that we go on, if it pleases the Committee, and pass all the items except the last one, and it will be understood that when we meet again the discussion shall be confined to that one item, and it is a general item under which this question can be discussed.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I understand, then that this item is to be reserved until the investigation in the Public Accounts Committee with regard to Mr. Smyth's account is completed?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; I have no objection to that.

Mr. MULOCK. The explanation offered by the First Minister, I think, is entirely satisfactory, and it really shows the House that the discussion has been in entire order. As this resolution is presented as a whole, though embracing a great many items, however unreasonable it might be that we should refer to an item that is not the subject matter of discussion, yet technically it is in order. The Minister of Agriculture himself referred to the doings of one of his agents, Mr. Baker.

Mr. CARLING. My attention was called to that.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman himself, in answer to a question from the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), began to discuss the case of Mr. Baker and his removal from Qu'Appelle to another place. The question was referred to again after dinner as an illustration of the grievances springing up in the department, and we have had a crop of Mr. Baker's employés engaging in this guerilla election warfare referred to here. If it is to be understood that one or two of these items shall stand over, this question may rest.

Mr. WATSON. Does the hon. gentleman intend giving up the work formerly done by Mr. Têtu, of keeping count of the immigrants?

Mr. CARLING. It is the intention to withdraw the agency.

Mr. WATSON. Is the work of keeping count of the immigrants coming in and going out of the country not to be continued?

Mr. CARLING. It will be discontinued.

Mr. WATSON. Does the hon. gentleman think that work a failure in the past, or unnecessary?

Mr. CARLING. The people who go to the North-West now go by way of the Canadian Pacific Railway and by Port Arthur. We do not think it any longer necessary to keep an agent there.

Mr. WATSON. He made a report of 7,000 going in last year and 2,000 going out. Will the hon. gentleman not consider that of any importance?

Contigencies--Canadian Agency. $16,000

Mr. FISHER. How do you make that reduction?

Mr. CARLING. There is a reduction at Medicine Hat, in connection with which agency there were contingencies, and there is a reduction at Qu'Appelle and Emerson, where the agencies have been discontinued. There are also reductions in other agencies.

Mr. McMULLEN. I can easily see, in looking over the Auditor General's Report, how the hon. Minister could easily make a reduction of $5,000. Will the hon. gentleman turn to page C—144 of the Auditor General's Report, and he will notice that in one item, the London agency, there are expenses, $444, for which there are no vouchers,

Mr. CARLING. The vouchers have been produced. They had not arrived at the time the Auditor General made up his report, but they have been produced since.

Mr. FISHER. It is very easy in contingencies to put down, in a rough way, a lesser sum, and then boast of the great reduction, but we should have some clear explanation as to how this reduction was arrived at. The hon. gentleman has accounted for it by the removal of the agency from Medicine Hat, but he has forgotten that if the agency has been removed from there, there has been a corresponding increase by the establishment of an agency at Vancouver. The reduction in contingencies by the abolition of the agencies at Emerson and Qu'Appelle will not effect more than a saving of $2,000, so that $3,000 remain to be accounted for.

Mr. CARLING. I cannot give the items, but I went through all the different agencies from Halifax to Vancouver, and saw that in a number of them I could reduce the contingencies, making a total reduction of $5,000. I am satisfied I can make that reduction, but I have not the particulars here of each case.

Mr. FISHER. Our general experience has been that reductions made in this way amount to nothing, and that by the end of the year the expenditure is just as great as it was before.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. On this question of contingencies, I would ask the Minister to turn to page 145 C of the Auditor General's Report, where he will find that for the Montreal agency Mr. J. J. Daley incurred an expenditure for cab hire in Montreal, of $1,220. I find that he made 617 trips, so he must have nearly two trips every day, including Sunday, or at all events, two trips a day for every working day. If the Minister wishes to curtail the expenses, he should buy Mr. Daley a conveyance and a horse, which would be much cheaper than spending $1,220 for one agent in one place during the six months in which he has to perform his work.

Mr. CARLING. That matter was enquired into, and we found that one horse could not do the work. It would require more than one horse. The return shows that there were 136 trips to the Bonaventure Station, at $1.50 per trip, and 63 trips to St. Martin's Junction at night, at $2.75, the former being two miles and the latter more than seven miles distant. There are other trips, which the hon. gentleman will find at page C-168 of the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. McMULLEN. We are glad that the Minister has decided to make a reduction in the amount of contingencies allowed to agents, but, in my short experience of parliamentary life, I have never known a Minister to state that it was his intention to make a reduction of $5,000 without giving some reasonable explanation of how he was going to make the reduction. The Minister says he is going to make that reduction, but he does not say how he is going to do it, and, when he is asked, he answers simply in a general way, that he is going to make reductions here and there. I think the House is entitled to more detailed information than that. If we had the Minister committed to a reduction on certain items, we could hold him to the fact that he had not fulfilled his promise, but he declines to do that, and simply says he will make that reduction.

Mr. CARLING. I say I will make that reduction of $5,000.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is to be hoped he will, because the expenditure under the head of contingencies is very absurd in many of these cases. Here is one which has been mentioned by my hon. friend, that one man should expend $1,220 for cab hire for his own service.

Mr. CARLING. Not for his own service.

Mr. McMULLEN. He expends $1,220 for cab hire and makes 617 trips. I say that is a perfect outrage, and it is preposterous to ask this Committee to quietly pass over items for contingencies of this character, and we have other such charges of an equally scandalous nature with this. In other places, when they get to know that a certain sum is allowed for cab-hire, or horse-hire, or travelling expenses, they, of course, will include a similar charge in their accounts in the following year, and they are all getting so thoroughly educated in reference to this matter that every item which can possibly be put in as incidental expenses is inserted by officers who are drawing enormous sums by way of salary. I see that in one office the enormous sum of $90 in charged for telephone, and there are other matters of the same kind. It is time to put a stop to these items in the account for immigration, and on this occasion I think we have had a criticism which ought to lead the hon. gentleman to understand that matters of this kind are not going to be passed over in the easy and indifferent way they have been passed over in days gone by.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Did I understand the Minister to say that some other arrangement has been made as to this matter in Montreal, or is it to be continued?

Mr. CARLING. I did not say that any other arrangement had been made, but, if any other arrangement can be made, it will be made. It seemed to be a large amount for cab-hire, but, when it was enquired into, I did not see so much objection to it as I did at first. However, I am determined to reduce that expense as much as I possibly can.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. On the same page of the Auditor General's Report, the hon. gentleman will find, under the Toronto agency, the item, J. A. Donaldson, fares $907.55. What does that mean?

Mr. CARLING. I think that is in regard to fares paid for sending immigrants to different points. That was at the time when we were giving assisted passages. It was not for cab-hire or anything of that kind, but for immigrants sent to different localities, and it was probably paid by the agent, Mr. Donaldson, who might have gone with them and looked after them to their destination.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The fares would not have to be paid at Toronto if they were assisted passages?

Mr. CARLING. It was usual, during the time that assisted passages were given, that, if the immigrants were not able to pay their fares to their destination, they were paid for them, but that is now done away with.

Mr. BRIEN. There is one feature which has not been touched upon yet, and that is with regard to these children who are brought out.

Mr. CARLING. Would it not be better for the hon. gentleman to leave that over until we come to the discussion of the last item, because any money which is paid in regard to that comes out of that last item, and we have agreed that the general discussion shall take place upon that.

Mr. BRIEN. If the Minister will allow me, I would rather say the few words I have to say now. I think this is the most objectionable class of the whole immigration.

Mr. CARLING. I have no desire to interfere with the hon. gentleman's speech, but it has been agreed by members on both sides that the discussion should take place on the last item, and any payments to these children come out of that vote.

Mr. BRIEN. That item does not come up at all.

Mr. CARLING. Not to-night.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I suppose that under the head of contingencies the expenditure for printing pamphlets would come up.

Mr. CARLING. That comes under the last item.

Mr. BRIEN. I presume I could take up the next item, then. I see there is $1,000 for the Women's Protective Immigration Association. I have reason for discussing this immigration of children which is not necessary here to mention, and unless it is really objectionable to the Committee I would like to do so now.

Mr. FOSTER. We are agreed, I think, to leave those items to be discussed under the head under which they properly come. We made the agreement. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) knows that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes; I was appealed to by the Minister. It is quite true there was an understanding that the discussion would be taken on the item to which that properly belonged. At the same time that does not bind the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BRIEN. There has been already more time wasted than I would have occupied. As I am a junior member of this House, I trust I may be pardoned if I infringe upon the custom. However, this system of assisting child immigration has been continued for 10 or 5 years. Some of these children are of the worst moral character, and very little can be made out of them. If this country is to be made a dumping ground for the outcast children of European countries, I think it is something that we ought not to submit to. I know this question has been discussed several times before the Immigration Committee and the Agricultural Committee. Contrary opinions have been expressed in regard to the matter. I have taken some pains to get at the facts, and from what I have learned I am very seriously opposed to this class of immigration. The evidence that I have been able to procure shows that these children are picked up on the streets, that they are taken from workhouses, and from the lowest dens that you can find on the European continent. In the report of the Minister of Agriculture for 1870 I find the following:—

"Miss Macpherson came to this country last summer, with a number of boys, whom she personally saw placed in situations. She brought out altogether 264. These boys had been picked off the streets, and from the 'dens' of London; they were without parents or relatives who cared for them; and were placed during the winter, in the 'Refuge and Home of Industry' in Commercial Street, Spitalfields, London, where their wants were provided for, and where they were educated and trained to habits of industry."

Now, Sir, the origin of these children is such that you never can make respectable citizens of them. In order to prove that, I will read from the report of Mr. Smith, the Government's own agent at Hamilton. I find that many of these children are taken from the notorious Whitechapel region. I will not mention any of the names of any of these children, but here is what the agent at Hamilton says of them:

"Out of 46, 22 are positively bad, and 26 are fairly good."

Of a girl aged 12, he says:

"Untruthful, and cannot be trusted. Inclined to pilfer. She is inclined to form immoral habits with the boys. Requires very close watching and cannot be trusted alone."

Of another one, a boy, he says:

"Thoroughly bad, deceitful and untruthful. Stubborn, filthy and dirty in bed. Remained till May, and cleared out to Toronto."

Of a girl aged 10, he says:

"Remained seven months. Source of great trouble through being in bad health. Troubled with urinal affections, weak bowels and skin diseases.

Of another boy, he says:

"Stupid, untruthful, dirty and filthy. Has an abscess in the leg. Naturally weak, never will be able to earn his living."

Mr. CARLING

Now, if that is the character of these children, I think the Government of this country ought no longer to allow these parties to bring any more of them over here, no matter how good their intentions may be. At present the standard of the people of this country for morality, intelligence and industry, is not exceeded by that of any other people in the world, and we ought to see to it that that standard is maintained. But it cannot be maintained while the Immigration Department allows the introduction of such very objectionable children, and, if it is continued, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) will have to belabor this House for several Sessions to obtain the passage of a Bill to protect the boys from the aggression of the girls, as he did in an opposite direction a few Sessions ago. The proportion of our foreign born population is only 22·29 per cent., but they furnish no less than 47·88 per cent. of the inmates of our insane asylums. The expense of supporting the asylums for insane and idiots last year in the Province of Ontario, was $557,359 or about two-thirds of the entire subsidy obtained from the Dominion Government. I am opposed to the general expenditure for immigration, and I think the Government will do well to adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), and do away with a large number of these inland agencies. But with respect to these children, my objection is still stronger, and I think their introduction should be prohibited, and that this lady should not be allowed to pursue her present course any longer, at least with the assistance of the Government. We had during last year about 2,000 children brought out, at an expense of $4,000. It is an entirely useless expenditure, and I think if the department will consider the interests of the country generally, they will put a stop to the introduction of children of so objectionable a character. I might proceed, and show by authorities who have given special attention to this matter that it is absolutely impossible for such children to become respectable citizens on account of their past associations. I will confine myself, however, to reading a short extract from a work written by the Chairman of the London School Board and the Chairman of the Howard Association. Speaking of the associations and surroundings in which these children are brought up, the writer says:

"From a sad and depressing life in a workhouse nursery the orphan is next removed to the workhouse school. Here, again, it is compelled to mingle with the depraved children of depraved parents, and, worst of all, to share when ill, the sick wards of the adult paupers, of whom a large proportion are the very refuse of the population and the worst of characters. As the ailments of the children are often comparatively slight, they have nothing to do during the weary days but to listen to the conversation of the adults, much of which is of such a character as no child ought ever be permitted to hear. It is asserted that this association exerts a sort of fascination upon the children, with a result which it is not difficult to imagine. One experienced workhouse visitor says in her report that the teachers often complain that they cannot prevent the children from endeavoring to catch cutaneous diseases from each other, in order to be sent to the sick wards, the attraction of which in this way is so great. Not only is the atmosphere of these workhouse schools pauperising, but the schools are actively educative in a bad way, for very many of the orphans' school-fellows are the children of thieves, tramps, and women of bad character, who enter the workhouse for brief periods, coming from haunts of vice and crime, to which, with their children they quickly return. Meanwhile, those who have been associated with them can hardly fail to have been affected not only with ophthalmia, and other loathsome bodily diseases, but also with loathsome ideas and evil thoughts. Our desolate, destitute orphans, having been thus legally trained to live without affection, to accept pauperism as their natural condition, and the poorhouse as their home, have been furnished with precociously wicked companions, well instructed in vice, and, at the most critical time of their life."

The difference in the habits and surroundings of children in the old country and this, and the question of the poor rates, tend to teach them idleness and prodigality instead of industry and frugality. I may add that in my opinion only one-half or one-quarter of the expenditures that are made by the Immigration Department are necessary.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). In this House during the last two or three Sessions I have heard it stated that these poor orphans are the most undesirable and improper class of immigrants. I have had some experience with them, not perhaps so extensive as the hon. gentleman has had with them, but I have had to do with them to some extent. In my immediate neighborhood I have been instrumental in placing 50 or 60 of these children during the last six or seven years, some dating back perhaps as far as ten years. All these were from the Marchmont Home, and they may be of a different class to those children referred to by the last speaker. With one single exception, no single boy or girl has manifested any immoral tendency beyond that of the average boy and girl residing in our own country, and I state from private and professional observation that they are as healthy boys and girls as any ever raised in our country. Whether they are better selected, or whether they have come from a better class in the old country, I am not prepared to say; but the facts are as I state them, and I know from the people with whom those children have been placed that ten times the number could be placed in that district if the home provided them. That is the best evidence I can give as to whether the children are worthy, deserving and useful. Some of the girls have married fairly well, and I am satisfied they will make industrious and worthy wives and mothers. Some boys have considerable sums in the savings bank in the city, to my personal knowledge. With respect to the question of boys running away and girls becoming bad, I think it does not say much for the moral tone of the people about Hamilton who took the children. The only two cases I know of were cases in which the children were badly treated, and too much hard work exacted from little boys. They wanted to get from them the work of grown men for little or nothing. They ran away, and by my special interference they went back to the home, and now they are living with other people who have taken them, and are doing very well. It is only fair that some one who has had these children under observation should say something in their defence. Whether it is desirable or not to bring these children into the country I am not going to argue, but that they are immoral in their tendencies, or have diseased constitutions I deny, and the anxiety of the people to obtain them is evidence not only that they are desirable but that they are a desired class of immigrants.

Mr. HESSON. As one knowing the facts in connection with the Stratford Home I feel it my duty to say a good word in behalf of the home and the children there. I observe from our local papers that some 74 children were recently brought in, and nearly all were told off before they came. The home has been in operation 6 or 7 years and has given entire satisfaction. The children have turned out remarkably well, indeed in a greater proportion than the ordinary class of children in the community, this being due no doubt to the attention they have received from Miss Macpherson and others and to the care exercised in their selection. Those brought in ranged from 9 to 16 years and the home has larger demand than it is able to supply. They have proved so satisfactory with us that I regret hon. members should have been obliged to find fault with the class of children brought into the country. I speak from what I know, and my colleague (Mr. Trow) made a similar statement in the House some time ago, and if he were present now no doubt he would support my statement. I know the children have the very best of care, that they are selected with great prudence and caution as regards their past life and history, and that an effort is made to get the most desirable class into the country.

Sir DONALD SMITH. With respect to the item of $1,000, to the Women's Protective Immigration Society, Montreal, I wish to say to the Minister that there is at least one institution in Montreal in connection with his department which, in my opinion, is worthy of the best consideration and the best support of the Government and of this House, and that is the society here spoken of, the Women's Protective Immigration Society of Montreal. I have given some attention to this society, and I believe the ladies who interest themselves in it are really doing good work. They are caring for, and looking after, respectable young women who come here and have not relatives who can care for them. They are placing them in domestic service and in other useful employments, and altogether I believe they are doing so much that if the Minister could see his way to add in the Supplementary Estimates another $1,000 to what is here given I am sure that money would be as well bestowed as any other equal sum given for the purposes of immigration.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). We should have some information with respect to the operations of this society. I have no doubt what the hon. gentleman says is correct; but the very first principle in connection with public expenditure is that the public are entitled to an explanation as to how the expenditure is made. The report itself is of the most meagre character. In saying this I am not impugning in any way the statements of the hon. gentleman with respect to the high social position of the ladies who supervise this society. There are certain other things in connection with this immigrant question in Montreal, which I think would make this society an extremely desirable source from which to obtain information in connection with that matter. I would like to know from the Minister if any more information has been conveyed to him, or if any other reports have been presented to him further than what has been published in the supplement of his report.

Mr. CARLING. The only report I have is that on page 146 of the report of the Minister. I may say that there are quite a number of domestics who have passed through that home, and who were provided for and looked after by those ladies. I am glad to hear the remarks from my worthy friend the member for Montreal West (Sir Donald A. Smith). I have heard different gentlemen from the city of Montreal speak of this home in the equally high terms which the hon. member for Montreal West has done. Representing, as he does, the city of Montreal and having his residence there, I think that his information ought to be very satisfactory to the House. The report presented here shows the number of persons who have passed through the home, and every one of those has been well taken care of.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). Could the hon. gentleman tell me where this money is expended? Is it in the city of Montreal or have they an agent at Quebec.

Mr. CARLING. They have no agent at Quebec. Of course they are in correspondence with Mr. Stafford, our agent at Quebec, and the ladies who have charge of the home at Quebec correspond with the ladies at Montreal. They have also, I believe, correspondence with parties all over the Dominion who apply for domestic servants, and the home is furnishing those domestics as they are required.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I do not understand why some more of the cities should not also be given grants in a similar way. Why ought not the people of Toronto and Hamilton have their efforts on behalf of those immigrants supplemented in this way. I do not want to be understood as being antagonistic to Montreal, but I want to understand on what system an exception is made in favor of Montreal, or how it is that this system is not extended to Toronto or Hamilton?

Mr. CARLING. Montreal and Quebec are at the head of the ocean navigation and it is considered of great importance that there should be committees of ladies at those points. They have organised themselves into committees, and they have communicated with the Government and we find that they have done much good to the immigrants. I am not aware whether similar applications have been made from Toronto, Hamilton or other cities, but I hardly think there is the same necessity there as there was in Montreal or Quebec. When the immigrants arrive from the steamers the ladies take charge of them and see that they are properly cared for.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I am only speaking from recollection, but I think I remember seeing a report in a Montreal paper as to a Mrs. Corneil who represented herself as an agent of this association, and if my recollection serves me right that report seemed to me as though it was written from Quebec and addressed to the parent association in Montreal. It occurred to me from some other correspondence that I saw that this home had an agent at Quebec, because there was a question between the Government agents and this lady as to what their relative duties and rights were. I do think that a more extensive report from this association would be valuable to us for another purpose. I understand from their report that they have a home in Mansfield street, Montreal, where they furnish a refuge for those girls who are unfortunately out of work, or who under other circumstances come to them. I think we might avail ourselves of this home in order to get information as to the class of immigration which filters into this country, and which we were discussing in the early part of the evening. I think they could furnish us with some interesting information as to the class of girls who come under their notice, since we see that the Young Men's Christian Association and the House of Industry complain bitterly about the character of some of the immigrants. It would be interesting for us to know how many of those immigrants found their way into the police court or into places of public punishment for any one year. I would suggest to the Minister that he would ask the ladies who interest themselves in this home to extend their report next Session so as to show what proportion of this undesirable class of immigrants bear to the number that go through their hands, giving us actual figures. I do believe that the first principle that ought to be recognised in connection with the granting of public funds is that Parliament should have information with reference to the details of the work which it accomplishes. In saying this I disclaim any wish to speak against this association, because I do not know anything against its internal economy. I do think that while in other places we have to provide for those local wants by grants from the Local Government, or by charity from philanthropic individuals (and I know that the people of Montreal are not behind hand in giving their share for such purposes)—I do think that if those grants are made here the principle ought to be extended to other large cities as well, and a full report of their work furnished to the Minister.

Mr. FISHER. In reply to the remarks of my hon. friend, and without having studied the matter, I may say that I had in my hand a report of this society which was much more extensive than the report which is published in the departmental paper. The society did issue a report to those interested in it, giving a large amount of information which is not contained in the report of the Minister. I do not know whether that report was submitted to the department or not, or whether this very condensed report here published was all that was supplied by the society, but I am well aware that I have seen a report which was submitted by the executive of this society to the members giving a great deal more information than is contained in this report published. I am speaking from memory, and of course not in a position to state what information it contained.

Harbors and Rivers, British Columbia $24,300

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The vote of $1,000 for Cowichan River will be applied to the work of clearing the channel of snags. It is to make it navigable and at the same time to prevent the flooding of the adjacent lands. The vote of $10,000 for Fraser River is to continue the work which was begun three years ago, and which has proved to be very satisfactory. There were different channels. Two of them have been closed, so that by collecting all the water in the main channel, the river has been scoured, and there is a greater depth of water. This vote is for that portion of the river above New Westminster. There are large mills there now, and vessels can go up to them, and we expect that by completing these works we shall enable the largest vessels that go to the inner harbors of British Columbia to reach those places. The vote of $300 for the River Somass is to be applied in removing snags with the object of improving the navigation of the river and preventing the flooding of the adjacent country; this river is in Vancouver Island.

Mr. PRIOR. I see there is nothing in the Estimates this year for the improvement of Victoria harbor. I am very sorry to see this omission, and I cannot understand how it is that the hon. Minister of Public Works has not seen fit to place a sum there. I can only come to the conclusion that the hon. gentleman, by some means or other, has arrived at the idea that the Government need not pay any more attention to the needs of Victoria. It may be that the hon. gentleman has been reading some of the many paragraphs that have been going the rounds of the newspapers lately, inserted, no doubt, by men who are interested in property in other parts of British Columbia, to the effect that Victoria's days of usefulness as a port, her days as the commercial and financial centre of British Columbia, are over, that she is now on the downward track, failing quickly into a state of decay, that her trade and commerce are leaving her, and that her business men are quietly sleeping their days away in the delightful climate they have the privilege to enjoy. I say the hon. gentleman may have read these statements and may have believed them, as, no doubt, others have done; but I am glad to be able to stand here and tell the hon. gentleman and this House that so far from that being the truth, Victoria to-day is progressing more rapidly and is enjoying a larger measure of prosperity than almost any other city in the Dominion of her size. At the present time substantial buildings of all kinds are going up in every direction, her mechanics and artisans are busy, her workshops and factories are running on full time, and I do not think there is a single merchant in Victoria who cannot point to his books with pride and show that, during 1888, his business has increased from 15 to 25 per cent. over that of any other year. I cannot blame the owners of property who are trying to boom up their lots. I cannot blame them for trying by any fair means to induce immigrants and capital to go to their district instead of to Victoria, but I must object to the action of any Government who directly, or indirectly, by the influence of money under their control, or by any of the many means the Government has power to use, whether it is their intention or not, give an undue advantage to one city over another. I do not for one moment believe that the hon. gentleman or the Government intend to do that, but that will be the result unless they give Victoria a fair share of the money they intend to expend in British Columbia. It has been said to me many a time: "Oh, you Victorians are jealous of Vancouver." I beg to deny that; there is not a word of truth in it. British Columbia is large enough for 20 big cities, and the more cities that grow up the better it will be for those there at present. I would like to ask this House, or any man who knows the facts, who owned most of the property in 1886, before Vancouver was started. Who are the men who own the most property in Vancouver to-day outside of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company? Why, Victorians. Who have been the men who have put in the most capital for starting the water works and other enterprises of that kind there? Victorians. Who have always been ready to invest their capital in any scheme connected with Vancouver when there was the slightest chance of there being any reasonable return? I say it was Victorians. Why should they be jealous of Vancouver? They are not so, and if any hon. gentleman believes they are, or that Victoria is on the downward track, as some newspapers try to make out, I will try to show them how far astray they are. Victoria has been up to the present time the principal commercial and financial city in British Columbia, and I believe most thoroughly that she will continue to hold that position. There is hardly an industry of any magnitude, there is hardly an enterprise of any size carried on in British Columbia to-day—whether mining, lumbering, or fishing, or cattle raising—in which you will not find a large amount of Victoria capital invested, and most of these industries have their head offices in Victoria. I do not believe there is to-day a city in the Dominion whose business men are, as a whole, more financially solid, or who do business on a better basis than the merchants of Victoria. Business failures have been almost unknown, not because the volume of trade is small, for I can point to houses in Victoria to-day who do business to the extent of over a million dollars a year, several of them ranging from $300,000 to $700,000 a year—not a bad showing for a new and rising town—but because business there is conducted on proper commercial principles. I have here some statistics showing the exports and imports of British Columbia and the duties paid in that Province, and with the permission of the House I will read a few of them in order that I may show hon. members how fast, how very fast, the city I have the honor to represent is being distanced in the race for wealth and importance. In the year 1888 just passed, the following were the figures: The exports from British Columbia were valued at $3,928,077. Of this amount Victoria is credited with $2,122,939, or 54 per cent. of the total; Nanaimo is credited with $1,240,393, or 31 per cent. of the total; Vancouver, $553,539, or 14 per cent. of the whole. The total imports into British Columbia were valued at $3,509,951. Of this amount Victoria is credited with $2,922,399, or 84 per cent. of the total. Vancouver is a new city, and cannot be expected to have made much progress as yet, so her imports are valued at only $280,900 or 7½ per cent. of the whole. The amounts paid into the Customs houses of British Columbia—and I think they will rather astonish hon. gentlemen who think Victoria is on the downward track—are as follows:—The total amount in 1888 was $861,465. Of this the sum paid into Victoria Customs house amounted to $761,137, or 88 per cent. of the total; and Vancouver received in Customs dues $50,518, or about 6 per cent. of the total. This does not look very much as if Victoria was going to the dogs, and it does not look as if it was a wise policy for the hon. gentleman who is at the head of public works to altogether ignore her harbor. Let us look into the savings bank accounts. The total deposits in the savings banks of British Columbia amount to $1,566,123. Of that the Victoria savings bank has on deposit $1,328,414, or 81 per cent. of the total. This is not a very bad showing for a population of 15,000 inhabitants. The tonnage entered and cleared in British Columbia ports amounted altogether to 2,065,320, of which Victoria is credited with 1,011,043 tons and Vancouver 592,691 tons. Now, I think I have given sufficient information to show this House that Victorians are far from being the easy going, happy-go-lucky sort of people some of the press would try to make them out to be, and I also hope I have shown enough to convince the hon. gentleman that it is his plain and manifest duty, and I hope it will be likewise his pleasure, to give Victoria, at least, a fair share of Dominion expenditure. If you will examine these figures which I have just quoted, you will find that in commercial importance Victoria stands the fifth city of the Dominion. She pays more duty to the department so ably presided over by the Minister of Customs than Quebec, Hamilton, London, Winnipeg, Ottawa or Windsor, and she does more business in proportion to her population than any city in the Dominion. The only cities that pay more duty than Victoria, are Toronto, Montreal, Halifax, and St. John. Now, I wish to be distinctly understood by hon. gentlemen representing other constituencies in British Columbia, that I do not now ask that the Minister of Public Works should take off any sums which are likely to be voted for other constituencies, because I think they get little enough as it is, but I do think Victoria should get a fair proportion. I only ask that she should receive her fair share, taking into consideration her commercial importance and the revenue she pays into the Dominion exchequer. It is of the greatest importance that the improvements in Victoria harbor should be carried on, but unless a good round sum is placed in the Estimates for that purpose, the money that has already been expended will have been simply thrown away. If the hon. gentleman will look into the matter he will find that nothing has been expended heretofore which was not absolutely necessary, and the only trouble is, that the work so ably begun is not half finished. In conclusion, I need only say that I sincerely hope the Minister of Public Works will place a sufficient sum in the Estimates to carry on the improvements in Victoria harbor. If he does not, the only conclusion the people of Victoria can come to, will be that the Government are determined, through some cause or other, to deliberately lend their aid to assist in building up other cities against a city which has paid more revenue than all the other parts of the Province put together. I do not believe that is the intention, but, as deeds speak louder than words, I hope to be gratified, when the Supplementary Estimates come down, by seeing that the hon. gentleman has placed a sum of at least $10,000 in the Estimates for the improvement of Victoria harbor.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I may say this to my hon. friend, that if we were disposed to forget Victoria, her representative in this House will remind us of all the good prospects of that city and of the importance of these works. The reason why we have not asked in these Estimates a new vote for the removal of the rocks, &c., in the harbor of Victoria is because we could not expend last year the amount of $12,500, and the balance of the previous year, on account of the accident which occurred at the beginning of November. Blasting operations were thus suspended until after the 1st of January of this year. Now, we have to continue the works as long as the season will allow, and to do as much as possible with the amount that has been voted. Besides that, the chief engineer says that a further grant of $6,000 is required to complete the removal of the shoal, boulders, &c., of Shoal Point, to 14 feet in depth at low water. The hon. gentleman speaks of something in the Supplementary Estimates. No doubt it is very pleasant to find a vote provided there. I cannot say to my hon. friend yet what he will find in the Supplementary Estimates, but I am sure, after what we have voted previously, that he will not suppose that we will give up the work just at the moment when we are to complete it. Having said so much I hope the hon. gentleman will wait until the Supplementary Estimates come down.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is not because I think British Columbia cannot urge its own claims, or that the hon. member has not done his duty that I rise, but, having been in that Province, it struck me that, comparing what had been done on the Pacific coast with what had been done on the Atlantic coast, our brethren on the Pacific coast had not got their fair share. Of course it is true that the traffic is very much greater on the Atlantic coast, and that there must be a much greater general expenditure there than on the Pacific coast; but, in regard to the matter of lights and other things of that kind, I think more should be done on the Pacific. I also agree with the hon. gentleman as to the city to which he refers. The statistics which he has given show that it is a very important city, and I think the House would agree with the Minister in supplementing the grant so as to provide for these improvements. Of course, that Province is a long way off, and we know that sometimes its representatives press their claims very strongly, but I think that, in regard to any matters concerning navigation and the saving of life and the safety of vessels, the Government have not granted them more than their share; in fact, I think they have granted them hardly their fair share.

Dredging—New Dredging Plant. $16,950

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What does the Minister propose to do with this amount?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is to provide for new dredging plant on the Government dredges.

Dredging, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick..... $40,000

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Can the hon. gentleman give any idea what harbors in Nova Scotia he proposes to dredge this year?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This vote is for the operation of the dredges in these three Provinces, for which we have a general vote of $40,000. I am not in a position to say where the dredges will be sent. They will be sent according to the wants of the different places. Last year we used these dredges at Cheticamp, Middle River, Pictou Railway Wharf, Port Hope, Wallace and Yarmouth Harbor.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Upon what principle does the Minister proceed with reference to the employment of these dredges? When a dredge is used by private individuals, do they pay for it?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Because, at page 79 of the report, I find in regard to the Cape Breton, the following:—

"This dredge did not commence work until the 3rd October, 1887, after its arrival at Wallace, Cumberland County, N.S., where it remained until the 5th November and improved the channel of the ferry at that place, and removed obstructions off the wharves of the Union Freestone and Wallace Greystone Companies."

In such cases, do the people owning these quarries pay for the use of the dredge?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes. If the dredge is used for a public wharf, we do the work at the expense of the Dominion, but, if it is for private wharves, if we can allow the dredge to work there while it is in the neighborhood, we make the parties pay the cost.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I notice that Pictou County has had a fair share of the dredging since Confederation. About one-fourth of the whole amount expended for dredging has been expended in that county. I see that $96,000 has been expended in Pictou County since Confederation out of a total of $440,000. I have no doubt that most of that expenditure is proper enough, but I hope the hon. gentleman will remember that there are other counties in Nova Scotia which require dredging as much as Pictou County, and, as that county has had one-fourth expended in it up to the present time, I hope the appropriation will be more generally distributed now than it has been in years past.

Mr. EISENHAUER. I made a motion a few days ago asking for copies of the report of the engineers. A discussion arose, and, at the request of the Minister of Public Works, the debate was adjourned. I see it has been placed at the foot of the Public Bills and Orders, and I am afraid it is not likely to be reached again this Session. I will, therefore, ask the Minister if there is any chance of our obtaining these reports?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If the hon. gentleman will be kind enough to remind me of that in writing, I will attend to it at once. I confess that I had lost sight of it.

Mr. EISENHAUER. It appears to me that the Government do not intend to appropriate one dollar for the County of Lunenburg, because we were told by the Minister of Public Works that the Government act on the first information they get. They must have had information as to the public buildings there, because they voted money for the site. I would like to ask the Minister why nothing further has been done in that work to-day. Had he any definite information before they voted the money for the site?

Mr. KIRK. Is the Minister able to tell where he intends to spend this money in dredging in Nova Scotia next summer?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That is exactly what I cannot say now. Applications are made from all quarters, they are submitted to the chief engineer, and he has to make a report on the different works, stating what are more pressing, those that may be done at the public expense, and those that might be done by private effort. Another consideration is the place where the dredges are, because sometimes we have to move the dredge from one place to another, and the cost of the tug to carry the dredge over amounts to a large sum: then we are obliged to leave that aside until the dredge comes into the neighborhood. In answer to the hon. member for Lunenburg, the hon. gentleman is mixing up public buildings and dredges, which is not fair. If the hon. gentleman would only do what I ask him to do, and put what he wants in writing, I will give him the information.

Mr. EISENHAUER. I made a motion a few days ago asking for the report of the engineer sent to Lunenburg to examine the harbor there, and there was some discussion on the bringing down of the report. The hon. gentleman will remember that it was at his request the other day that the debate was adjourned, with the understanding that he would examine into the matter and give us further information. I did not suppose he would want any further writings from me to remind him of bringing down the report. While I am on my feet, I would say that it seems to be a very easy thing for the Government, if they do not feel disposed to make a grant of public money in a county, to get a report that will suit them. I really cannot understand why these reports differ so much as I have reason to believe. I think if the Minister would go down there, or send some competent person who would make a correct report, he would come to the conclusion that we need a dredge there very badly. I would ask the hon. member to look at the article in the Free Press of last Saturday, and he will see the importance of the town of Lunenburg.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have not time to do that

Mr. ELLIS. The whole amount that the hon. Minister asks for dredging in the three Provinces, $40,000, is scarcely sufficient to dredge one harbor. Then again there is not a dredge fit for dredging in a tidal river. Dredges such as he now has, cannot be worked to advantage in tidal rivers, and I would suggest to him, as he has considerable knowledge of the matter and a great capacity to carry out his views, that he spend money to procure a dredge suitable to do work in a harbor like that of St. John. None of these dredges at present is good enough to do work on the coast or in the tidal rivers.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Certainly, I would like to have another dredge; but we do not think that we can ask Parliament this year to give us a vote for that purpose. The hon. gentleman remembers that a dredge was lost, and although we cannot get a new one this year, I do not know what we may do next year.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The present dredges are totally unfit for service on the Bay of Fundy, or in the tidal rivers. Considering the importance of both coasts of the Bay of Fundy, it seems to me that a suitable dredge should be procured to do work there.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I would ask the Minister where he intends to use the dredge in Prince Edward Island?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We will have reports on the different applications that are made, and the chief engineer will say which work can be undertaken now, having in view the position of the dredges, and the necessary expense.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I would like to inform the Minister that there has been no dredge in King's County, P.E.I., for the past eleven years. During the fifteen years since we entered Confederation, the dredge has only spent one summer and part of another in the county of King's, although it is a large county, and has as many harbors as any other. She has spent nearly all the time in the counties of Prince and Queen's. I would like to bring to the notice of the Minister the fact that Murray Harbor, Montague River and Grand River are very much in need of dredging. Murray Harbor lies well up into the County of King's, and a large amount of shipping is done in it. The river is somewhat crooked, and it is difficult for small vessels to enter it. Montague River has also a large amount of shipping, and so has Grand River. Those rivers are at the east end of the Island where King's County is, and are the last of the rivers or harbors that freeze up in the fall, and consequently vessels are very liable to get frozen in.

Mr. LAURIER. My hon. friend beside me a moment ago asked the Minister of Public Works, in connection with this vote for dredging in Nova Scotia, whether he intended this year to dredge the harbor of Lunenburg?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I did not hear the hon. gentleman ask that question. I may say that that harbor is on the list of those to be examined, to see whether we can do any dredging there this year out of this vote. I cannot say more than that we complete a list of the claims made, we examine what is wanted and ascertain what can be done. For example, if the work on a harbor would cost $20,000 or $25,000, we could not undertake to carry it out when $10,000 only was voted for the whole Province, and therefore we must regulate ourselves according to the amount voted. The desire of the Government is to employ the sum in the best way possible to promote the interests of the country.

Mr. LAURIER. This is hardly satisfactory to my hon. friend, who represents that this is not the first time this matter has been brought to the attention of the Government, on the contrary it has been brought up year after year. Under these circumstances, the hon. gentleman asked the Government whether they cannot, before the Session closes, give a definite answer to his request.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have taken note of it, and I will endeavor to give an answer definitely.

Mr. KIRK. I desire to ascertain whether I cannot get a promise from the Minister to send a dredge to St. Mary's River, Guysborough County, during the present summer. A dredge is very much needed there; it was applied for many years ago, and was recommended by the engineer of the department. The Government sent one there, but it was not suitable, and on removing it, they promised they would send a more suitable dredge. This was in 1872, and the Government have done nothing since. The trade is very much hampered in consequence. A steamer which plies between Halifax and Charlottetown, and is subsidised by the Local Government, is intended to call at that town, Sherbrooke; but it cannot call there at low water, and for that reason there is great necessity for dredging being done. I know the hon. gentleman will say that he will send the dredge where there is the greatest necessity. Now, I do not know whether he means necessity of trade or necessity of party, One of the leading Tories in Sherbrooke, interested in the deepening of the harbor, a few days ago wrote a letter to a Tory newspaper in Pictou County complaining that the Government had expended $40,000 in dredging the East River of Pictou while St. Mary's River had been utterly neglected, and he charged that the Government had done this in order to make it easy for the representative of Guysborough. I was not aware that the Government ever took into consideration the case of the member for Guysborough. It must have been done for their own convenience as it was not done for mine, and this Tory writer must be mistaken as to the Government's reason for omitting Sherbrooke and spending all the money at Pictou, and, therefore, in order to gratify this friend of theirs and to benefit the trade of the County of Guysborough, perhaps a dredge will be sent during the coming summer. Will the Minister promise?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have taken a note of it.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I desire to call the attention of the Minister to two harbors on Lake Erie which have bee n neglected for a very long time, and to such a great extent as to render them useless. I have frequently called the Minister's attention to the fact that something should be done to deepen Port Stanley, a useful harbor, so as to allow vessels when sailing on the lake to be able to make that harbor without running the great risk of rounding the point in order to get into the harbor. It may, perhaps, be said that the harbor is under the management of a railway company—the Great Western, now the Grand Trunk—and that therefore the company is responsible for its condition. Whether they are responsible or not, it is the duty of the Government to see that the harbor is placed in a reasonably efficient condition, which they have neglected to do. The Government allowed the London and Port Stanley Railway to take possession of the harbor. The position of vessels sailing up and down the lake is a dangerous one at the point in question, and neglect on the part of the Government in keeping the harbor in proper condition is an injury to the shipping. Another important harbor is that of Port Burwell. In 1874 the Government of that day expended in dredging, and other harbor works, $10,000 at that point. It was then capable of allowing vessels of considerable draught to enter. From that day to this not one cent has been expended by this Government since 1878, and the harbor has now, to a great extent, filled with sand, and a bar has stretched across the channel. Why the Government should have neglected these harbors I am unable to say. They may have an object, and they may feel they are justified in neglecting the interests of the people in that section of the country, but the shipping interests should be maintained, and vessels should not be compelled to risk life and property. Vessels coming down the lake in a storm find it impossible to enter these two harbors on account of their dangerous state. Wrecks and loss of life have occurred, and there is no shelter until they have rounded Long Point. Port Rowan Harbor is in as bad a condition. The Government have not spent any money on the harbors along the lake. I have been asked by the Minister of Public Works to wait and see the Supplementary Estimates. I have waited, and I have to call the attention of the House to this matter. If the Government have any interest or any desire to preserve property and protect life they will send a dredge to the point I have indicated, and make an effort to place the harbor in an efficient state, which so far they have neglected to do. I do not expect they will do so, as long as they remain in power. I do not expect anything at their hands, and I regret it, for the interest of the country requires it; but the Government are very slow to perform their duty unless they see there is some political support to be gained by doing it. I suppose we may expect that when they have a little advantage to gain they will pay attention to the wants of the people.

Dredging—Lake Manitoba..... $15,000

Mr. WATSON. I like to know what part of this appropriation is intended to be expended on the White Mud River?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The appropriation last year was for the Red River, White Mud River, and German Lake. We have not decided this year where this sum is to be employed. That is purely and simply for the work of the dredges inclusive of tugs, but where they will be put I am not in a position to say now.

Mr. WATSON. I would direct the attention of the Minister to the importance of continuing the work on the bar of the White Mud River at Lake Manitoba. It is the dredge Priestman I believe was there. The work is about half done, and it is very important that this channel should be widened, as the water is low in the lake, and there is only a small channel for a boat to come into the lake out of the river. Last year the dredge was employed between the mouth of the river and McCarthy's Landing. It is very important that the work should be continued at the mouth of the river, and that the channel now dredged to some three or four feet should be widened to ensure the safety of a boat passing out from the lake.

Slides and Booms..... $15,000

Mr. LAURIER. In reference to this, Mr. Chairman, there is a matter to which I would call the attention of the hon. Minister. I am informed—and I received information also by special request to bring to the attention of the Government—that in the Saguenay region, about Lake St. John, the slides of the works erected by the Government for floating timber are very advantageous indeed to the lumbermen but disastrous to farmers whose lands are inundated by these works. I find that this complaint is verified by the report laid upon the Table by the hon. gentleman himself. In the French version which I have in my hand there is a report of Mr. Guérin which substantiates those very complaints. At page 226 he says as follows:—

"Outre les cinq barrages sus-nommés il y en a un autre à la tête de la glissoire de Saint-Joseph d'Alma, sur la Petite-Décharge. Ce barrage est situé à plusieurs milles en aval du lac et se trouve à environ 20 pieds au-dessous de son niveau. Il n'affecte pas le niveau du lac, mais un fermier du nom d'Alexis Tremblay, de l'île d'Alma, se plaint que ce barrage refoule les eaux de la Petite-Décharge qui inondent sa terre. Lorsque je suis allé faire l'examen de cette localité, la crête du barrage était couverte d'une couche d'eau de 30 pouces.

"Il n'y a pas de doute que ce barrage refoule l'eau de la Petite-Décharge, et élève son niveau, mais jusqu'à quelles limites M. Tremblay peut-il réclamer des dommages, il est difficile de le dire, sans connaître le niveau de l'eau haute de la localité avant la construction du barrage ou avant que M. Tremblay possédât sa ferme. Nous n'avons pas de renseignements certains pour nous guider maintenant à ce sujet; mais il est manifeste que le montant des dommages doit être peu élevé, puisque la terre descend en pente vers la rivière à raison d'un pied dans seize, de sorte qu'une élévation de 10 pieds dans le chenal de la Petite-Décharge couvrirait seulement une lisière de 160 pieds sur les confins de l'extrémité de sa terre."

I understand that since that time complaint has been laid before the hon. gentleman not only by Mr. Tremblay but by several others and as far as I can see the complaint seems to be well founded. While we have voted money this year, and last year as well to, erect a pier in certain localities to protect against inundations, surely if by works erected by the Government damage is caused (be it ever so small) and farmers suffer from the inundation it seems to me to be the duty of the Government that those who suffer should be compensated for those damages in some way.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. My attention was called to this within the last four or five months, and I have given instructions that as soon as we can reach the place at the proper season we will have the complaints examined into. If the works are necessary for the object for which they were built, then the question will be what compensation may be given to those men, or to any others, who may suffer by them.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Is there any revenue from these slides and booms?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). How much?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Some give larger revenues than others. The slides on the Ottawa, on the St. Maurice, the Saguenay and the tributaries of the Ottawa all give a revenue, but the revenue from the Ottawa is by far the largest.

Roads and Bridges..... $45,000

Mr. COLTER. I wish to say a few words before these items are passed. There was an item in the Estimates last year as follows:—

"To pay one-half cost construction of a bridge across the Grand River at the village of York; the county council of Haldimand paying the other half."

That vote was made last year in consequence of the damage that had been done by the damming of the river at Dunnville. It was contended and conceded that the raising of the river so much at Dunnville caused the bridging at York to be much more expensive, and, therefore, this item of $10,000 was put in for the purpose of recouping the county council for the extra expense they had been put to, on account of this Government work. After this item had been put in there were some negotiations between the county and the Government, and some inducements were held out as I believe by the Government to the effect that instead of paying a lump sum for the damages done to the county by reason of their having built the bridge on the river at Cayuga, that the Government would build the bridge at York, in consideration of the county giving up any claims they might have by reason of the extra cost in erecting the two bridges. I would like to ask, if this item is to lapse, or if the Government has made or proposes to ask a grant in the Supplementary Estimates sufficient to complete the bridge. I have moved for the papers, but they have not yet been brought down. I believe the hon. Minister did promise some members of the county council, I do not know but he promised a public meeting as well, that this would receive careful consideration, and the people were led to believe that the claims of the county would be satisfied this Session. We claim that it is nothing more than a debt of long standing which is due to the county. The county council built this bridge at Cayuga, and raised it about 3 feet, and the river has been made much more difficult to bridge in consequence of the dam at Dunnville. This evil has existed for a long time, and I do not consider it proper that it should continue to exist any longer.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman has put the case as it is, no doubt. This sum of $10,000 was put in the Estimates for the purpose stated, to pay one-half the cost of the construction of a bridge across the Grand River in the village of York, the County Council of Haldimand paying the other half. After that was done, the request was made by the people and the council through the predecessor of the hon. gentleman; and, later on, they spoke of another project, stating that they had the same rights in regard to that as in regard to the other. Negotiations were made and correspondence passed on the basis that the Government should build one bridge, on the condition that all the claims of the council were to be given up. There was nothing put in the Estimates for this good reason: that the question was under the consideration of the Government, whether we would build one bridge and give up this item. I am not sure whether it will appear in the Supplementary Estimates, but, at all events, I have not lost sight of the matter, because I think there is a claim there that the Government will have to meet.

Mr. COLTER. I was present at a meeting of the county council within the last ten days, and at that time they were anxious that this matter should be settled. The project has been delayed in consequence of these negotiations, and the people are suffering by the delay, and I would ask the hon. Minister to facilitate the matter as much as possible.

Mr. WATSON. I would like to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works to the importance of assisting two bridges across the Assiniboine River. There is no vote in these Estimates for them, but I hope the hon. Minister will place one in the Supplementary Estimates.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Representations have been made, petitions have been sent, and letters have been received from the parties interested in these bridges, and the matters are now engaging my attention.

Mr. McMULLEN. I find by a return which I hold in my hand that the sum of $3,751 has been spent in front of the new building on Wellington street, in the city of Ottawa, since the 30th of June last, and that the sum of $7,633 were spent on roads immediately in the vicinity of the Parliament Buildings last year. This appears to me to be a very large expenditure, and I would like to hear what explanation the Minister has to give.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The road from one end to the other had to be put in proper order. We had to put new metal on it, and raise it. Then we had a special vote for paving that portion of the street between the east side of Elgin street and the west side of Metcalfe street. That has been paved with cedar blocks, and we think it will be a permanent improvement. As yet we have had only a few months experience of it, but we hope that by next spring our experience of the four seasons will show us whether or not the experiment is a proper one. The officers entrusted with the care of making that improvement studied the different qualities of pavements, and they were of opinion that this would be the best under the circumstances.

Mr. McMULLEN. If that was in the interest of the entire Province, to experiment as to the best material to use in a road, it would be no harm. But I can well remember that prior to the erection of the building the road was in just about as good condition as it is to-day. I would like to know what has been done with the material which was taken away from the road.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That was used in other portions of the road. The block pavement was also considered the best for deadening the noise of vehicles passing over the road in front of the new public building.

Mr. McMULLEN. I also notice by this return that there were two clerks in charge of this work, one at $2.50 a day, and another at $90 a month. I would like to know why it was necessary to keep two clerks in charge of that work.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. One man was required to look after the portion of the work that we made just opposite the new building. We required a special man to be there, and the other man was sent from one end of the road to the other to look after the work.

Telegraph Lines $8,300

Mr. LAURIER. Is this line towards Point aux Esquimaux completed?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is not. We have had it under construction for several years and will continue the work for a few years more, but the intention is to submit to my colleagues a scheme to complete the line to a certain point on the coast, and then cross over by cable to Anticosti, where we have land lines. These land lines will bring us to the east end of Anticosti where, if the cable which is spoken of to be completed from Great Britain to the coast of Labrador is built, we might join that cable by one of our own to that point, when these lines on the north coast and from one end to the other will become competing lines. That matter is now under consideration, and I am not in a position to say how far we may ask this in the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. LAURIER. How many miles were built last year?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Forty-one miles, and to the end of 1887, 365¼ miles.

Experimental Farm—Buildings, Fencing, &c.... $30,000

Mr. McMULLEN. How much has been expended altogether on that farm—lands, buildings and all?

Mr. CARLING. I have a return here showing the cost of construction of the buildings to 20th February, 1889. Total cost of buildings $72,874. I did not expect this question to come up, and have consequently not the other items.

Mr. McMULLEN. The expenditure in connection with this farm has been somewhat extravagant, and we have a right to know what amount has been so far expended on the whole. We have no desire to offer any opposition to any necessary expenditure, but I have looked over the item, and it appears to me there must be something over $200,000 spent in connection with that farm.

Mr. CARLING. I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken. The total cost, when completed, of the several works, the expenses of the land, buildings, implements, &c., will not exceed $250,000. In Ontario, on the farm at Guelph, up to the present, the expenditure has been over $400,000. I am quite sure we will keep within the estimate.

Mr. McMULLEN. But the number of acres is larger in Ontario than here?

Mr. CARLING. No; we have here about 500 acres. In Guelph they have 550 acres.

Mr. McMULLEN. But the experimental farm in Ontario is much longer in existence than ours. If the hon. gentleman will look he will find that when it was in existence two or three years nothing like $250,000 was spent on it.

Mr. CARLING. The total expenditure up to the present is $750,000, including capital expenditure.

Mr. McMULLEN. That model farm at Guelph has been in existence for twelve or fifteen years, and they have had some buildings twice burned down. I have looked over the items in connection with this model farm, and I think there are some very extravagant items there.

Mr. CARLING. Will the hon. gentleman name the items?

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, there are some items in connection with the purchase of horses that seem to me to be very extravagant. I would remind the hon. gentleman that if increases of this kind are to be made from year to year, as they have been made in connection with immigration, the result would be just as bad.

Mr. CARLING. There is not a horse on the farm that cannot be sold to-morrow for the amount which we paid for it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then the hon. gentleman must be the best jockey in Canada. I have owned a good many horses, but I never got one that I could sell for the price I gave for it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Does this vote cover all the farms?

Mr. CARLING. Yes.

Mr. FISHER. Upon what farms and buildings is this $30,000 to be expended?

Mr. CARLING. It will be divided between the Central Farm and the other four farm stations.

Mr. FISHER. What buildings will be put up on the Central Farm?

Mr. CARLING. I think there is to be an implement house and perhaps another small house for a laboring man. I think that is about all.

Mr. FISHER. How much of this money will be spent on the Central Farm?

Mr. CARLING. I find I have not got that information here.

Mr. GILLMOR. Can the hon. gentleman state about how many horses are employed on this farm during the summer?

Mr. CARLING. I think fourteen horses.

Mr. GILLMOR. What is done with them in the winter?

Mr. CARLING. They have been employed all the winter hauling manure for the Corporation of Ottawa.

Mr. FISHER. How much is to be expended on the Indian Head Farm in Manitoba?

Mr. CARLING. An estimate has been made, but the contract is not yet let.

Mr. FISHER. How much is to be expended on the farm in Nova Scotia?

Mr. CARLING. Some portion of the amount is to complete the building in Nova Scotia.

Mr. FISHER. Are the buildings on the other farms to be erected for the same purposes as those in the Central Farm here? Is the Minister going to keep cattle and stock at the other farms as well?

Mr. CARLING. Not to the same extent. Here we have a laboratory, a green-house, a propagating house, and other buildings, but on the other farms we will not have a necessity for those buildings. There will probably be three or four houses required at the different farm stations.

Mr. FISHER. Is it intended to keep stock at the different stations?

Mr. CARLING. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Last year, Prof. Saunders promised that he would issue bulletins, and he offered that, if we gave the names of some of the best farmers in different counties, the bulletins would be sent to them. I sent in a number of names of farmers in my county, and two or three times the bulletins were sent out to them, but then they were discontinued. I think it is a wise provision of the Government to send these bulletins out, and I must say that I think the farmers found there was a great deal of useful information given in those bulletins.

Mr. CARLING. There were not more than two or three bulletins issued last year. There is one very important bulletin now issued which will be placed in the hands of members to-morrow, and all these bulletins will be sent to the gentlemen my hon. friend (Mr. Campbell) refers to.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I understood that they were to be issued once a month.

Mr. CARLING. No; no special time was arranged, but they are issued as occasion requires.

Mr. McMULLEN. On reference to the Auditor General's Report, I find that there was paid for a pair of heavy draft horses $550, for a dark chestnut horse $250, for a light chestnut horse $235, and for another span of heavy draft horses $500, making in all about $1,500 for six horses. That appears to me to be a very heavy expenditure for horses on that farm.

Mr. CARLING. The hon. gentleman may think that is a high price to pay for horses, but it is considered advisable to have heavy draft horses for that farm. It is more advantageous to have horses weighing not less than 1,400 or 1,500 lbs. than lighter, and to get sound young horses of that character you have to pay that price. In fact, it is very difficult to get them even at that price. If the hon. gentleman goes to the farm and sees the horses which have been purchased at that price, I am sure he will agree with me that they can be sold to-morrow for the prices we have given for them.

Mr. FISHER. I think there is one fact which is not conducive to economy on this farm, and that is that, while it was stated that we were to expend $17,000 last year for a barn to accommodate cattle and stock, there are no cattle or stock on the farm yet, and that barn has not been of any use. Of course, there is no use crying over spilt milk, but I think the Minister would have done well to accept my advice to hasten slowly and not to be in such a hurry to expend so much money on buildings which have not yet been used. The result of this haste in the expenditure has been that the buildings have cost more than was necessary or advisable, and I hope the Minister will take warning, and, in regard to the other farms where he is now proceeding to erect barns, that he will look closely into the matter and not erect expensive buildings until he has proved the usefulness of these. I understand that he is proposing to establish stock at the different farms throughout the country. If it is not considered advisable to establish stock here, I think the Minister had better wait and try the experiment, first, at the Central Farm, and see what utility the country may obtain from that before he establishes stock on the other farms. My own impression is that for some time to come the Minister has on hand quite enough without making experiments with stock, until he has shown he is able to carry on experiments in other things; he had better not go into any further expenditure until he has proved the utility of the work he has already done. I have always thought from the commencement that there was a great deal of unnecessary expenditure in regard to the buildings, and that the idea of stock keeping on these farms was not a practical idea, and that the experiments which would result from the keeping of a large stock on two different farms, would not warrant the expenditure. I believe if it is necessary at all to try experiments in stock, only a few head should be kept, and they should be kept in small buildings, because the experiments would then be just as important and just as useful as if they were tried upon a larger scale. If the Minister undertakes to erect buildings on these other farms, and especially to build them through the architects of the Public Works Department, if we are to judge by their buildings on the Central Farm, he will find himself landed in an unnecessary expenditure which will not redound to the credit of his department, or to the advantage of the farming community.

Mr. CARLING. I do not think there has been any extravagance in the erection of the barn and the stable on the Central Experimental Farm here. I think the barn is one of the best in the country, substantial and well built. We require a great deal of barn room for the crops of the farm, and this last year it was completely filled from the barn floor to the attic, indeed there was not room enough. With regard to the purchasing of stock, we are not yet prepared to do so. We have only had the farm two years; it has been cleared, drained and cultivated, and we have been putting it into good order. I think the hon. gentleman, as a practical farmer, would not want me to keep stock without some pasturing on the farm. We have none yet, but we expect to have. We are building a silo this year for the purpose of saving the corn grown on the farm. At the same time we want a pasture, and we shall have one in a short time. I think the small amount of interest that is lost on the expenditure on the barn, will not be felt by the country. When we constructed that barn we had to make a good foundation, and the basement is ready for the stock whenever the farm is ready for it. In regard to the other farms, we are not putting up anything like as expensive barns upon them as we have done here, and it is not intended to go into any great expense in stock-raising on these farms—only to purchase a small number at the start. I dare say we may not purchase any stock for the outside farms this year, but we shall make the experiment at the Central Farm and then extend it to the other farms.

Mr. GILLMOR. I had the pleasure of seeing that barn, and it is one of the most beautiful barns that I ever saw. I was struck with one thing, and that was the very nice floor which was beautifully planed, but I could not see the propriety of planing a barn floor to be used for carts and to be trodden on by horses with iron corks.

Mr. FISHER. I must differ with the Minister with regard to the expensive character of the barn. I think it is a very expensive building. It has a wonderfully substantial foundation, and the Minister might put ten times as much crop into the barn as he did last year, without its having any effect upon the foundation. He says he does not see how he could keep stock until he has a pasture, and he also says that he filled his barns to overflowing last year. He might feed out his crop in the barn, and then he would not have to spend so much money in drawing manure from the city.

Mr. CARLING. We exchange the straw for manure, or we sell the straw, and we pay a very small price for the manure from the city. We have had six pairs of horses hauling manure all winter.

Mr. FISHER. It may be the Minister got a very high price for his straw, and paid a very small price for his manure. But I fancy he had to pay for drawing his straw into the city, and he had to pay for drawing his manure out of the city, and if he had kept an account of that I think he would have found himself at the wrong end of the horn at the end of the transaction. Here is an enormous expenditure put on that barn which has not been utilised by the keeping of stock upon the farm. I pointed out to the Minister, when he was building that barn, that he ought to have gone to work upon it slowly, and taken sufficient time to be able to modify his plans, if it was found desirable. A few minutes ago he gave me the extent of his modification. He says he is going to build a silo this year. If he had built his barn more deliberately he might have built the silo in the barn, and much more economical than by erecting another building for the silo.

Mr. CARLING. We would not have had so much room in the barn.

Mr. FISHER. Then you could have built the silo in the barn all at once much better than you could put it into another barn. Now, I would like to know what the Minister is going to do with the ensilage that he takes out of this silo. I do not think he will be able to sell that ensilage—at any rate I never knew of ensilage as an article of commerce in this country.

Mr. CARLING. It depends upon how many cattle we winter here, and it depends upon the size of the silo. We intend to keep stock the coming season.

Mr. FISHER. Do you provide any sum for the purchase of that stock?

Mr. CARLING. No.

Mr. FISHER. Then how are you going to get your stock?

Mr. CARLING. I say no, because it will be taken out of the general vote, and not out of this vote.

Mr. FISHER. Then the Minister is to have a general vote out of which he can draw for any object he pleases?

Mr. CARLING. I may purchase a few cattle out of the vote that has already been granted.

Mr. FISHER. You propose to feed the ensilage to half a dozen head of cattle, or a dozen head?

Mr. CARLING. It depends upon the number of cattle. If we construct this silo it will be made sufficiently large for the number of cattle we intend to winter.

Mr. FISHER. Then I hope the Minister will take good care to consult some farmer who understands the ensilage question, and the building of silos, and not trust to the architects of his department in such matters; because if he does he will find himself at the end of the season in a position either that he will not have ensilage for his cattle, or he will not have cattle for his ensilage. The Minister said the barn had been economically built, but there were dozens of others of equal accommodation that had cost less than half.

Mr. CARLING. Not so substantially built.

Mr. FISHER. Perhaps so, but I hold that an immense amount of money has been absolutely thrown away on the foundation.

Mr. CARLING. A good deal has been said about the cost of the barn. Is the hon. gentleman aware that the estimate taken for a new barn at the Guelph Farm, to replace one burnt, is $20,000?

Mr. FISHER. I do not know the capacity of the barn. There were about 100 head of cattle kept there, and the Minister is talking about keeping from 6 to 10 next winter.

Mr. CARLING. We have accommodation for about 70 head.

Mr. FISHER. But you have not 70 head there.

Mr. CARLING. We will get them by degrees.

Mr. FISHER. In the meantime the barn is useless. It must, moreover, be remembered that there is an agricultural college at Guelph in connection with the Model Farm. The Guelph Farm has been in existence 15 years, and during that time large expenses have been going on which are included in the amount to which the hon. gentleman has alluded as the price the barn is to cost. There is no foundation on which to make a comparison, and we cannot judge from the statements given by the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. McMULLEN. In the Auditor General's Report there is an item of $5,100, water supply from Ottawa. I find on the next page $20,000 paid for farm laborers, ditching, &c., and for teams and men $5,000, altogether $25,000. Is it necessary to expend this money to obtain water, and is it not possible to obtain water on the farm?

Mr. CARLING. We made an arrangement in the same way as the Guelph Farm did with the city of Guelph. The Guelph Farm made an arrangement to have the city water main taken to the farm, three miles distant, and they paid about the same money as we have been obliged to pay. We found it difficult to get water at the farm without great expense of digging, and it was cheaper to get it from the city We made an arrangement to carry out the main pipes for $4,000, and to supply the water to different buildings and have hydrants for fire protection. Altogether the cost will be $5,000.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). What do you pay the city annually?

Mr. CARLING. The arrangement is 8 cents per 1,000 Imperial gallons.

Mr. FISHER. The Minister has stated that they bought manure very cheaply at $1 a load.

Mr. CARLING. We paid that before we had our own horses, waggons and sleds; now we get it at about 40 cents a load.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). With respect to the item of $1,000, National Art Gallery, I would ask whether the amount has been spent on the building or in adding to the collection?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is to keep up the rooms, pay the officer who looks after the pictures and the messenger or guardian of the premises. Any balance is employed in purchasing a picture, if one is found satisfactory. We had a couple of pictures at the recent exhibition, and they are being examined to see if we should purchase them.

Maintenance and Repairs of Government Steamers...$137,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would state why he requires the additional $7,000 or $8,000.

Mr. TUPPER. The additional amount is for the steamer Druid. Certain portions of the machinery have broken down, being worn out, and it is necessary to make repairs. The reduction of $8,000 from $145,000 to $137,000, is in consequence of the changed intention respecting the use of the Stanley. The additional $7,000 is in connection with the repairs of the steamer Druid.

Mr. WELSH. I heard from a deputy minister in the hon. gentleman's department that they intended to convert the Druid into a screw ice boat. I would ask if that is a fact?

Mr. TUPPER. The cylinder, piston and cross head of this steamer have been quite worn out, and she being at present consuming a large amount of coal, the nautical adviser and the inspector have suggested that instead of replacing that portion of the machinery it would be a large saving to convert the Druid into a screw steamer, so that she would not only do the service more quickly and efficiently but also consume a good deal less coal. As the hon. gentleman knows we could not do without a steamer in her place and a large saving will be effected from this conversion, instead of abandoning the Druid and substituting a new boat at the cost of $100,000.

Mr. WELSH. The hon. gentlemen opposite laughed when I asked this question, but I think they will all acknowledge now that it is a very relevant question. I heard this stated, and the hon. Minister has now acknowledged it, and that was the reason I asked the question. I can tell the Minister that $70,000 will not make those changes he speaks of, and that they could build a better boat than ever the Druid will be when completed for half the money. At all events that is my opinion. I asked the question and I presume I had a right to do so.

Mr. AMYOT. In reference to this item of $6,060 for the examination of masters and mates, I wish to ask if there is any of the vote for the Quebec School of Navigation.

Mr. TUPPER. There is no increase or charge contemplated in connection with this vote. It is the ordinary vote.

Mr. AMYOT. Is it not the intention of the Government to grant something to the Quebec School of Navigation this year?

Mr. TUPPER. At present I am not aware of any intention of that kind.

Mr. AMYOT. It would be a very important matter to assist this school, because we could turn out some good captains there.

Mr. TUPPER. The subject has not come before me at all since I have been connected with the department.

Mr. AMYOT. I bring the matter to the attention of the hon. gentleman now, and I hope he will inaugurate a new era in this respect.

Wrecks, collection of information relating to disasters to shipping..... $1,500

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Last year I brought to the attention of the House the desirability of the Government taking charge of all investigations connected with disasters to shipping. I pointed out that when often these accidents occur, as they very frequently do, not only by carelessness but also from design, that the underwriters have great difficulty in dealing with the masters, and on many occasions they have been convinced in their own mind that there was an actual intention to cast the vessel away, that in some instances they have gone to the length of resting a case against the officer on their information of suspicion. In one or two instances, through some technical law points, they have failed in getting a conviction and the masters have threatened the underwriters with an action for defamation of character. These investigations can only be properly undertaken by the Government, and in my opinion they should be undertaken by the Government. Every loss that occurs should be investigated by the Government and the masters and parties connected with it should be properly dealt with. Until that is done, we shall never have that carefulness which is necessary among our coasting and seagoing vessels generally. I think it would be highly proper for the Government to take that matter in hand and to provide themselves with authority to investigate every loss, and deal with it according to the evidence that may be laid before the court of enquiry: punishing a master, if there is thought to be wilful negligence, by the suspension of his certificate (if he has one), or otherwise rendering him incapable of taking command of a vessel. Or, in case of proved design to wreck his vessel and lose the property, to deal with him in a criminal manner. It is one of those points which the mercantile community feel very strongly about, and I hope the Government will consider it and deal with it this year as the public interest demands.

Mr. TUPPER. I shall certainly take that matter into consideration and bring it before the attention of the Government. At first blush it strikes me that if we go through this, further than enquiring into the conduct of the master and mate which leads to the cancellation of his certificate, it might involve a much wider question. I merely express without mature deliberation the idea that when it comes to the enforcement of the criminal law it would widen into a question as to the responsibility of the Federal and Local Governments in the administration of the criminal law. It may be there can be found a distinction in connection with those maritime matters.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The Minister will remember that the Government have undertaken this in certain cases, and I only wish that the extension of this same principle would apply to this.

Mr. TUPPER. I certainly will consider that.

Montreal and Quebec River and Water Police..... $10,000

Mr. ELLIS. I called attention to this vote last year. It does not seem fair that one or two ports in the Dominion should have the police supported at the expense of the other portions of the country, which have also charges entailed upon the local authorities by reason of the fact of their having a marine force. I think there is a small tax levied on the ports of Montreal and Quebec, but the amount of revenue received is not equal to one-half of that expended. It certainly is a very unjust thing to ports like St. John and Halifax that the local authorities there have to provide this service, and that Montreal and Quebec should have an advantage over them in that respect.

Mr. TUPPER. I may state that this matter has been carefully considered by the Government since the Estimates were brought down. Recognising that the expenditure under this head had exceeded the receipts from the tax on shipping which is levied at the ports of Montreal and Quebec, the arguments to which the hon. gentleman has alluded have been considered sufficiently strong to induce the Government to reduce the expenditure to the amount realised from the tax, and if the House insists, I will reduce that vote now; but we are dealing somewhat suddenly with this vote, which has been granted year after year; and as the tax still exists, and the necessity of employing the force still remains, it might embarrass the Government to reduce the vote at once. As the matter has gone on since 1867 in this way, I think the House might accept the proposition I make, with a full sense of its responsibility, that an effort will be made to bring the expenditure within the vote.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the amount of the tax?

Mr. TUPPER. The receipts at Montreal amounted in the last fiscal year to $9,624, and at Quebec to $11,447. Of course there is a very large over-expenditure, as the hon. gentleman will see, but a great many arrangements will have to be made in the coming season to bring the expenditure down.

Mr. JONES (Halifax.) I would be disposed to accept the suggestion of the hon. Minister if he could give us a more positive assurance. He said every effort would be made. That is hardly an assurance that they intend to reduce the expenditure under all circumstances.

Mr. TUPPER. I would consent to a reduction of $15,000 at once, if that would suit the hon. gentleman, which would leave me a certain margin, with the understanding that an effort is to be made to bring the expenditure within the receipts.

Mr. LOVITT. I hope the hon. gentleman does not propose to raise the dues on shipping.

Mr. TUPPER. No, not at all.

Maintenance and Repairs to lights, fog-whistles, buoys and beacons, and humane establishments..... $287,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see that there is a nominal reduction of $42,000, but I also see that last year the expenditure for this service was only $263,000, so that $24,000 more appear to be wanted for 1889, than were spent in 1888.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will recollect that all along there has been a very wide margin allowed in connection with this service. I, in my humble judgment, believed the margin to be entirely too large, judging from the agent's estimates and the expenditure of the past few years; and, in view of that fact, instead of asking Parliament for the ordinary vote, I have brought it somewhat down, although I have still left a good margin in case of emergencies occurring, because in services having so wide a range we cannot fix the exact amount we might require.

Mr. EISENHAUER. I wish to call the attention of the Minister to a petition which I think was presented to the department three years ago asking for an automatic buoy to be placed at the eastern entrance of Lunenberg. Vessels engaged in fishing passing in and out of the harbor go by the eastern way, and there is no light on the mainland to guide them; there have been several vessels wrecked there in the last few years. The said buoy would not cost very much, and I hope the hon. gentleman will not forget to have one placed there during the coming season.

Mr. TUPPER. Since the hon. gentleman spoke to me of this the other day, I have looked into the matter, and find that Mr. Kaulbach pressed the Government very urgently with reference to this. From a hasty examination of the papers submitted by the hon. gentleman I certainly think there was a necessity in that very important harbor for the automatic buoy. I have not had time to go through all the papers which are very voluminous, including the hon. gentleman's correspondence and the correspondence of Mr. Kaulbach.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is there any reduction likely to be made in the cost of the service?

Mr. TUPPER. I think so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is as a matter of fact no reduction in the cost of the service for lighthouse and coast service. The total for 1888 is given at $489,000, which allows a margin of some $30,000 for this year. I do not object to a reasonable margin but what I want to understand is that there is no difference practically, and that the expenditure of the hon. gentleman is the same as that of his predecessor. Yet the hon. gentleman gave us to understand that there would be a saving of $50,000 in the department.

Mr. TUPPER. I hope so. I will explain how this will come about. I claim no particular credit of my own part for any saving. I have been too short a time in the department to make great reforms, but my predecessors had gradually reached this point in connection with the expenditure of these enormous sums. I will just allude to considerable changes in the style of our estimates as the hon. gentleman will see a little later on. There is a large decrease and some increases under some heads, and the endeavor of the department has been, with considerable success, to not take as large a vote and restrict the power and authority of many agents, who were allowed considerable latitude in times gone by and who were not very careful in watching the expenditure. Though the total vote may not show in round numbers an actual decrease, I think I could explain in going over many of the details that there has been a saving in the ordinary charges. We are increasing every year the number of buoys and beacons, and lights, and so on; and by watching this expenditure more closely and centralising the supervision, there is every indication that we will save considerable money. I stated on the authority of the officers of my department that the result already was such as to show a saving of $50,000 a year, not $50,000 less than the vote taken the year before, but $50,000 less than we would have voted had we proceeded at the rate we did formerly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will not discuss that point just now, but wait until we see next year. I notice that the Cape Race light, $7,000, was struck out. Have we ceased to use that?

Mr. TUPPER. That is included in the bulk vote, and I might have claimed that as one of the reasons for still increasing the charge in the general sum. We have taken over that light, and instead of asking the House to vote a sum separately, we insert it in the general vote of maintenance. The accounts next year will show we received $100,000 from the British Government in connection with our assumption of management of that light.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When did you receive the $100,000?

Mr. TUPPER. Some time in January, or perhaps later.

Mr. EISENHAUER. The lighthouse in the County of Lunenburg at Mahone Bay was burnt down in 1887, and there is nothing now to replace it but a lantern hung on a pole. The number of vessels going in and out of that port is increasing very considerably.

Mr. TUPPER. I will take a note of that.

Mr. ROBERTSON. What were the reasons for closing the light at Little Sand Bay?

Mr. TUPPER. It was in consequence of the report from the agent, and I think from the commander of one of the cruisers, that this place was so filled up with sand that it was impossible for vessels of ordinary draft to have access to it.

Mr. EISENHAUER. It is a bold shore and consequently could not fill up with sand.

Mr. TUPPER. The depth of the water was represented to me by the officer at Prince Edward Island, and, I think, by the commander of the cruiser as somewhat below four feet.

Mr. ROBERTSON. There was a breakwater built there for the accommodation of the shore fisheries, and there was a light placed there by the Local Government before we entered Confederation. It has been very inconvenient since that light has been removed.

Mr. TUPPER. I understand that, but we have refused constantly to keep up lights of that kind, though they might be of benefit to the fishermen and small boats; but, in view of the reports as to the boats which have access to this place, it seemed to me that it would be unfair to maintain this light and pay the salary of a man there from year to year. I can give the hon. gentleman the reports to look over if he desires.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I should not think the expense would be very great, and this being a bold shore, I think it is of as much service as the harbor lights.

Mr. TUPPER.

Meteorological Service..... $56,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How far north has this service been carried up to the present time?

Mr. TUPPER. I think Edmonton is the farthest point north.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And how many points are there on that line of latitude?

Mr. TUPPER. I must confess that this is a branch of the department in regard to which I cannot give the details, but I think there is only one.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I presume that any of these points would be of little practical value unless they were connected by telegraph, but I have been informed by some of the authorities at Washington that, if it was in any way possible to connect our system with some of the stations they have recently established in Alaska, the value of our service would be enormously increased. I should like to know if it would be possible for the Government to take any steps in that direction?

Mr. TUPPER. Mr. Carpmael, the superintendent of that service, has, for some time, been considering the question of the extension of the system in regard to British Columbia and Manitoba and the North-West Territories, particularly as to the issue of the probabilities, as there is a strong local demand for that. The only question that has embarrassed us is making the necessary telegraphic arrangements with the companies, and the sums that have been named up to the present time have been so enormous that I have not felt warranted in asking Parliament to vote the amount required.

Mr. FOSTER. We have many correspondent stations north of Edmonton, at the Hudson's Bay posts, but they are not telegraphic stations, and the information has to be sent by mail. That has been the course for years past.

Mr. ELLIS. If a system of exchange could be adopted with the United States, it would be of great advantage to the Eastern Provinces. I believe the American system ends at the St. Croix River. The Toronto probabilities are of very little value in reference to eastern storms. If the whole of the eastern coast could be warned from Washington by some arrangement for an exchange, we would get great value from such an arrangement.

Mr. TUPPER. I will bring that to the attention of the director of the service, Mr. Carpmael, and see if it is possible to make such an arrangement.

Mr. PRIOR. Was I right in understanding the Minister of Marine to say that he understood the necessity of extending the meteorological service to British Columbia? It is of the utmost importance, in view of the vast amount of shipping we have there, that it should be extended, and it would save a great many valuable lives and a great deal of property.

Mr. TUPPER. Of course, if the service is to be maintained at all, it must ultimately cover the whole of the Dominion of Canada as far as possible, and the only thing which blocks our way at present is the very important question of cost. We have been dealing with that for some time past, but we have reached no result up to the present which would justify us in asking Parliament to vote the money required.

Marine and Immigrant Hospital, Quebec..... $15,000

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Why does the Government require seven medical men at the Marine Hospital at Quebec?

Mr. TUPPER. A good many of these are only nominal, and are paid very small amounts. There is one resident physician there, Dr. Catellier, and we are making a reduction in a vote which has been in the Estimates, as I understand, right along. The expenditure has been and is out of proportion to the number of men who are properly chargeable to this fund, and we are now endeavoring to grapple with that matter and to expend only so much as we are bound to expend. The number of officers is due to the fact that this property was handed over before Confederation as a trust for this purpose, and these trustees and commissioners have received a nominal salary from the time of Confederation to the present day. It is now the idea of the Government not to replace these officers as the offices become vacant, and to reduce the expenditure as fast as possible.

Mr. MITCHELL. I may say, as having had some experience with the Marine Hospital at Quebec, that my hon. friend will do good service to the country by giving the matter his most diligent attention, and he will find that he will be able to reduce very largely this sum of $15,000.

Mr. TUPPER. I think we can, even this year.

Mr. MITCHELL. Under the old régime, when we came into Confederation, we left things as they were, because there were five or six hundred vessels coming into the harbor at Quebec in the course of two months. Now, the number is very much reduced, and the necessity of maintaining that staff at the hospital no longer exists. I think my hon. friend will be able to reduce that sum by one half. I am speaking now in the presence of the hon. gentleman who always looks after the interests of Quebec, the Minister of Public Works. It is very rarely that I say anything against Quebec, but I must say in relation to this Marine Hospital that when the tonnage has been reduced so enormously, when business is almost extinct, and when the large fleet of three or four hundred vessels that we have seen there at one time has been reduced to 20, or 30, or 40, I think the Minister of Marine will see the propriety of impressing upon the Minister of Public Works the necessity of letting him put the pruning knife into the Marine Hospital. I know the Minister of Marine is anxious to do what is right, and I know the difficulty he has to contend with when he attempts to cut anything down in Quebec, and I say this in order to strengthen his hands.

Marine Hospitals in Provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia $30,000

Mr. ELLIS. I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Marine to the condition of the Marine Hospital in St. John, the management of which is disgraceful to the country. In regard to finances I dare say for the last two years the expenditure is less than the receipts. But it has been shown during the year that the patients are practically starved in that institution. The diet table is one wholly unfit for men who are sick or even convalescent. At one time during the year two seamen from the hospital came to my office with the dinner provided for them, and I can say to the Minister as a matter of absolute fact that the potatoes were not fit to be eaten by well men, much less by men who are supposed to be sick. The meat they brought to me, while it was sweet enough, while they might cut it very well at sea when men were working, with their teeth, it certainly could not be eaten in any place where men were being treated for sickness. There is no attendance. The men are not attended to by any person except the keeper. They are farmed out at $3 a head to this keeper, whose business it is to expend as little as possible for the money he receives. The attendance is almost entirely of the sick people themselves upon themselves. The allowance which is given to the keeper for engineering, or for fire, practically goes into his own pocket. He hires no effective help. The food that is sent by charitable people around the city, as a matter of kindness to these sick men, is very often taken possession of by the keeper himself, under the plea that the doctor must know what sort of food is given to the people. I have the diet table here to which I will call the attention of the House. For breakfast, one pint of tea, eight ounces of bread, one ounce of butter. There is an alternate of porridge and milk. If a man takes porridge and milk he is not allowed tea and bread and butter. There is no coffee, no chocolate, none of those nourishing things, and no fruit at all. Dinner consists of beef, potatoes and soup, except on Friday, when there is codfish and potatoes. No tea, no liquid of any kind at the dinner. Supper is precisely the same as breakfast. There is an allowance of roast lamb or veal on Sunday, but no desert of any kind at any time.

Mr. DAVIN. That is the best régime

Mr. ELLIS. Provided that it was eatable. My hon. friend while in his usual health, no doubt, could eat the very toughest beef in the North-West, but if he was a sick man in the St. John hospital he could not eat the beef provided in that institution. The great trouble is that there is no supervision over the hospital. The hospital came into the charge of this Government at Confederation; it had been established by the Provincial Government, and there were commissioners who acted from month to month as an act of grace in visiting the institution and looking after it. Now that has been done away with entirely, no new commissioners were appointed, the old ones have no power, and consequently the institution has practically gone to the bad. The old physician, Dr. Botsford, a man who stood very high in his profession, went there largely as a matter of love, and I think that while he was alive the institution was in better condition than it is now. Since his death the physician appointed has other duties to perform, and he cannot visit the hospital when he is suddenly called upon, and although he has an assistant getting additional pay, it sometimes happens that the owners of vessels or the agents of vessels take a man to the hospital requiring early treatment, and he has to lie there three or four hours before he can get medical attendance, and then perhaps another medical man has to be called in. I am satisfied that the Minister of Marine himself, who appears to be a very humane man, if he knew the facts of the case, would not allow anything of that kind to continue. The facts are so glaring that they were stated openly in the public prints, and the Government organ at St. John dispatched its reporter to view the place. I can furnish the Minister with his report if he desires to see it, and I can furnish to him the names of responsible persons in St. John who are quite willing to corroborate the statements made. The reporter found the place was very dirty. He found in the kitchen dead rats lying about the floor, and he makes the sharp remark that they evidently had not been fed upon the hospital regulation diet table. I trust the Minister will go to work and institute a rigid examination into the management of the institution. I do think, as an absolute matter of fact, that it would be better to abolish the institution altogether than allow it to go on as it is. An arrangement could be made with the general public hospital at St. John to board the patients at so much a week. There have been in the institution perhaps 150 patients at a time, but the whole year round they only average 12. I really think for the same money they would get far better treatment if they were constantly under the eye of all the physicians of St. John.

Mr. TUPPER. Certainly what the hon. gentleman has said will engage my attention, especially as he has brought out some new matters. I saw the article in the press to which the hon. gentleman alludes, and I sent the article at once to the agent of the Department in St. John, Mr.

Harding, and the doctor, whom I understand to be a reputable physician in the city, although I do not know him personally. Their reports, which are in the department, can be brought down, but certainly to my mind they fully meet the charges that have been brought against the treatment of inmates of that hospital. Some additional points seem to have fallen from the hon. gentleman's lips that did not occur in the article, nor had they been dealt with particularly by the agent or the doctor in the reports to which I refer, but if my recollection serves me rightly—and it is some time since I read the report and the article—there was a reason for those charges. These two sailors to whom the hon. gentleman alludes had a quarrel with the keeper and with the doctor, and in the spirit of revenge they made these charges. They, at all events, drew the attention of the good citizens of St. John to the institution, and convinced a certain number of people that their charges were true. But if the statements of the doctor and the agent of the department, in addition to that of the keeper, after careful enquiry, are honest, and I have no reason to doubt them, the hon. gentleman will find, unless he has some personal knowledge of the matter, that the statement has been highly exaggerated.

Mr. ELLIS. No.

Mr. TUPPER. I hope such is the case; but the first opportunity I have of making a personal investigation as to the condition of the institution I will certainly take advantage of. In regard to the larger question which the hon. gentleman has brought up, I think the system is a very good one indeed. It has worked well in Halifax and Montreal, where the hospital is paid a per diem allowance for every man sent there, and there have been no complaints whatever with respect to the treatment of the men at those institutions. But if the hon. gentleman wishes to push the matter further it would be more satisfactory to him and to me to have the reports before us, and if he desires I will show them to him, but so far as they are concerned, they meet the statements in the press as to bad food and the bad condition in which the hospital is kept.

Mr. ELLIS. The hon. gentleman must himself see that such a diet table is not suitable for an institution of this kind. Further, if a certain amount is paid per head, the contractor will naturally endeavor to make as much money as possible out of it, and he will endeavor to keep the diet down to the very lowest limit. The very worst person indeed to whom the enquiry could have been referred was the Government agent at St. John, for, while he might be a very good agent, he would naturally be biased in regard to a question which reflected on himself.

Mr. TUPPER. He is not responsible for the management of the hospital.

Mr. ELLIS. I think he is.

Mr. TUPPER. No; he has only general superintendence over Government affairs at the port. The keeper is in charge of the hospital.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). That is the point of which we complain. Before Confederation the institution was under a board of commissioners composed of gentlemen interested in the shipping and commerce of the port, but only one now remains. Some person should be responsible, and the charge should not be left in the hands of the keeper. Of course he endeavors to make as much as he can out of the weekly allowance. Some few years ago the hospital was rebuilt, and it is a very good building with every convenient arrangement, and if it were brought under the control of the general public hospital it would be an advantage. I am satisfied from what I have seen and what took place at the time, that if an investigation had taken place by a disinterested person, the statements made in the press of the time and those made by my hon. colleague would be found to be well founded. I will read a letter from a Spanish captain, who was at the hospital. It is addressed to a lady who took an interest in the institution. It is as follows:—

"The man is not capable of writing out a statement of his case himself, but I have obtained from him an account of his treatment in that institution. He was a seaman on board the Spanish steamship Euskaro, and having received certain injuries in the discharge of his duty, was admitted to the hospital four months and a half ago. I arrived here on the 6th instant, and on the 8th I went to the hospital to see the man, he being a townsman of mine. I found he was looking in a bad and neglected way, his hair and whiskers not having been trimmed since his admittance; and I may say if the man had been incarcerated in a common gaol in my country he would not have been left in such a neglected condition. He complained of the food, saying that it was the same things day after day, without any change. For breakfast he had bread, butter and tea; and for dinner a little beef and potatoes; for tea they were given tea, butter and bread, and for a change they had fish on Fridays. At last his stomach refused to take the stuff, and he said he would have given anything for a change. He gave them $5 to procure a little variety, and for the next three days he was given at dinner a piece of chicken. After the day I was there (the 8th) he had nothing to complain about the food. On the 15th, it being fine weather, I took him on board my ship, and I will take him to Liverpool and send him to his family. They gave him back the $5 when he left the hospital. Trusting the foregoing may be of use to you in your kind efforts for benefiting the condition of the unfortunate patients in that hospital, and thanking you for the interest you have taken in the case, I am &c."

I will hand the letter with certain comments made on it to the Minister of Marine, and it goes to show that those sailors were not the only ones to complain. In our port, where a number of vessels are arriving all the time, this hospital is a most useful institution for the sailors who visit the port, and if it were under the general public hospital, which is an admirably conducted institution, and if it were placed in charge of Dr. William Bayard, who has charge of the General Hospital, and of the hospital staff, it would be well conducted.

Mr. MULOCK. What does it cost per head per day?

Mr. TUPPER Seventy-five cents.

Mr. MULOCK. Does this man pay all the expenses of maintaining the hospital?

Mr. TUPPER. No; this is a board allowance.

Mr. MULOCK. What does the property cost to maintain?

Mr. TUPPER. In St. John, $3,465.

Mr. MULOCK. It appears to me that no matter what supervision the Government endeavor to exercise, it will be wholly impossible to have justice done to the inmates as long as the present farming-out system obtains, because the keeper is interested in preparing such bills of fare as have been referred to, and no instructions from the head office can make an improvement.

Mr. TUPPER. The dietary scale is prepared by the doctor.

Mr. MULOCK. Is he a resident?

Mr. TUPPER. He is a resident of St. John.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes, but he is not a resident surgeon, and, therefore, cannot exercise proper supervision. How would the doctor be able to say whether there was bad food served out in months gone by. The only way to make improvement is by a radical change in the system and not by any superficial examination. In the meantime men will suffer so long as this system is kept in force. Seventy-five cents a day for each patient is a very good allowance, but I suppose they are few in numbers, and that it does not pay as well as if there were a large number. Any person in Ontario can send a patient to the general wards of the Toronto Hospital and have the patient boarded for forty cents per day.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have been waiting for the last half hour to say something on this matter, and I propose to say what I have got to say now with all due respect to other hon. gentlemen who seem anxious to speak. The seamen pay the tax for attendance at the Marine Hospital, and they have a right to proper maintenance and support. If the statements made by the hon. member for the County of St. John (Mr. Weldon), and the hon. gentleman from the City of St. John (Mr. Ellis), are true, they are not to the credit of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. I am sure the Minister would not allow this state of things to exist one minute, if he knew it, and now that he has had his attention called to it, I hope that he will take such steps as are necessary to have a reformation made in the matter. Those seamen pay the taxes for their maintenance, and they have a right to suitable accommodation and suitable food while they are in the hospital.

Mr. GILLMOR. The sailors pay ?

Mr. MITCHELL. I said the seamen pay.

Mr. GILLMOR. I merely wanted to understand that.

Mr. MITCHELL. If there are any of those eleemosynary institutions in this country which receive the money of the people and do not properly conduct the establishment in the way of giving the inmates proper support and proper food, the matter should be looked into at once. The statement of the members for the County and City of St. John lead us to believe that there are gross grievances in relation to the management of the hospital at St. John. If that is so, now that the attention of the Minister is called to it, he should have a proper report on the matter. If there has been mismanagement, the guilty people should be properly punished. I am sure that your zealous young Minister of Marine, wishing to make a reputation for himself, will not allow a blot of this kind to remain on the escutcheon of the department for any length of time, but that he will see and have it removed.

Mr. EISENHAUER. I think the hon. gentleman is incorrect in saying that the sailors pay the tax. The shipowners pay it.

Mr. MITCHELL. The sailors pay it, they are charged 20 cents per month for it.

Resolutions reported.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What does the hon. gentleman propose to take up to-morrow first ?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We will take up some Bills, probably the Franchise Bill, then some minor Bills and then the Estimates.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I may inform the Minister of Public Works that probably on going into the Estimates my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Flynn) will desire to make some observations in reference to the Cape Breton Railway, although I do not know that he intends to make a motion.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 1 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 3rd April, 1889.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 132) to amend the Revised Statutes respecting Interest (from the Senate).—(Sir John Thompson.)

W. A. WEBSTER.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, 1. Has W. A. Webster been continuously in the employ of the Government since the 1st July last? If so, at what salary, and how much per day for travelling expenses? 2. What amount has been paid him on account of services up to the 1st April instant?

Mr. CARLING. 1. No; Mr. Webster was temporarily employed from May 1st, 1887, to July 31st, 1888. He was re-employed from September 1st, 1888, until January 15th, 1889. He was re-employed on March 1st, 1889, until further notice. He was paid, while on service, $2 per day for salary, and an allowance of $2 per day for living expenses, together with actual moving expenses. 2. The total amount paid to Mr. Webster, to the present date, is $1,887.84, covering the period from May 1st, 1887, to April 30th, 1888: $730 for salary, also $730 for living expenses, and $427.84 for moving expenses. The latest date to which Mr. Webster has been paid for any services, or expenses, is April 30th, 1888.

BUOYING LAKE ST. PETER.

Mr. RINFRET asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to substitute a floating light for the buoy located opposite Yamachiche, in Lake St. Peter, on the River St. Lawrence?

Mr. TUPPER. This matter was only called to my attention by the hon. gentleman who asks the question, and I have asked for a report to be made upon the subject, and at present there is no particular reference to it in the department.

LAKE ST. JOHN RAILWAY.

Mr. COUTURE (for Mr. DE ST. GEORGES) (translation) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to grant, during this Session, a subsidy to the Lake St. John Railway Company, to enable the company to reach the City of Quebec by way of the Parishes of St. Ambroise and Charlebourg, instead of by using the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway as at present.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to give an answer to the hon. member. He must wait till the policy of the Government upon that matter is laid before the House before the end of the Session.

Mr. COUTURE (for Mr. DE ST. GEORGES) (translation) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to grant, during this Session, to the Lake St. John Railway Company, a subsidy to aid in the construction of a branch about ten miles in length, from St. Gabriel Station to St. Gabriel West, in the valley of River-aux-Pins.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) My answer to the hon. member is the same as that I have just given to the previous enquiry.

N. W. T.—MORMON SETTLEMENT.

Mr. DOYON (translation) asked, Whether the Government have had cognisance of the following despatch published in the newspaper, La Minerve, of the 28th March: "Some hundreds of Mormons have crossed the frontier and are grouped near Fort McLeod. The despatches say that they are now importing a large number of cattle for stock-raising, and that they are preparing for a large colony. This is very bad seed grain, and we do not want to see any comer of the North-West poisoned with it. Polygamy is forbidden by our laws, and whosoever practices it infringes them," &c. If so, what steps do they intend to take in the matter?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member, I may state the Government have no such information before them.

B. C.—MINING IN RAILWAY BELT.

Mr. MARA. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Minister of Justice whether the Privy Council have given a decision in the case submitted by the Government of British Columbia regarding the precious metals within the Railway Belt?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have received an intimation to-day that the decision is in favor of the Province.

Mr. MARA. I wish to make a suggestion to the Government with reference to this matter. I would say that whilst the decision of the Government is, I believe, satisfactory to the Province of British Columbia, it will also be in the interests of the whole Dominion, as it is far better that our mining laws should be administered by one, rather than by the two Governments. If the Federal and Local Governments had a dual control, it would necessitate having two staffs of officers, and two separate sets of mining laws and regulations. I would, however, impress upon the Government the advisability of entering into negotiations with the Provincial Government for the transfer or exchange of the land within the twenty-mile belt, for lands within the Peace River District.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is hardly in order in referring to this matter now.

Mr. MARA. My excuse for bringing the matter up now is that if I put a motion on the paper it would be impossible for it to be reached this Session.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman can bring this matter up on going into Supply as effectively, if not more effectively, than it can be brought before the House now.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 4) to further amend the Revised Statutes, chapter 5, respecting the Electoral Franchise.

Mr. LAURIER. I hope the hon. gentleman will give further explanations as regards the scope of this Bill, to those which he gave on the first reading.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I did not think it was necessary to repeat to the House the explanations which I gave in introducing the Bill, and which, I think, were sufficient to explain its provisions. The House will remember that the Bill which is now presented was introduced last Session with very slight differences. Instead of its being pressed upon the attention of the House, it was agreed that a temporary statute should be passed suspending the Revision Act for last year, and maintaining, of course, the existing lists. It was stated to the House at that time that provision would be made for printing the electoral lists, during the recess, in the printing bureau at Ottawa. That has been done, and the principal feature of this Bill is to make the lists, as printed and now ready in the Bureau of Printing, available for the revision of the present year. The Bill, therefore, provides, that as soon after the 1st of June as practicable; and availing himself of all the sources of information which the present law provides shall be made available, the revising officer shall proceed to make two supplementary lists. First, a supplementary list of those who are to be added to the list as now printed, and awaiting distribution in the bureau, and then a supplementary list of those who are to be struck off; that those supplementary lists so prepared by him, are to be transmitted to the proper officer in Ottawa, to be printed here as additions to, and corrections of the lists as now set up. These supplementary lists being struck off are to be forwarded to the revising officer in sufficient numbers to enable him to post them in the proper places and to distribute them throughout the polling districts to the proper persons. He thereupon appoints a day for making his revision, and he then takes up the supplementary lists, so prepared, of additions to and diminutions from the electoral lists, and proceeds with the revision in the way now prescribed. I may explain to the House that the appearance in the last page of the Bill of section 13 is an error of the draughtsman. He was desired to incorporate in the Bill, for submission to this House, the main features, with but a few exceptions, of the Bill of last year, and his attention was not called to the last section of the Bill of last year which had been adopted and went into force and is not required to be repeated this year. It is, therefore, proposed, if the Bill should meet the favorable consideration of Parliament, that the revision should take place this year upon the lists as now set up, and accordingly the electoral lists which I have described will be prepared immediately after the 1st of June. That is the main feature of the Bill. There are two or three other minor ones which it will be unnecessary, I presume, that I should explain on the second reading. We propose to adopt a new schedule of voters, in order to lessen the expense of printing, and that provision will be found on page 6 adopting some further provisions, as the House will know, as it was explained at a previous Session, which will result in very considerable diminution of the expenses of preparing the lists. There is also a provision in the Bill that persons who are disqualified by law from voting, for anything like corrupt practices, shall be likewise disqualified from being placed on the list. The object of that, as indeed is the policy of the present law, is to make the list itself final as far as possible and to avoid the confusion which might take place at the polling place in disqualifying a voter who may be correctly on the list but may not have the right to vote. If it were not for that, a person, although disqualified under the Election Act from voting, would not be disqualified from being placed on the list if he had the proper qualification, and he might present himself at the poll when there would be no opportunity of investigating the facts connected with his disqualification. We propose that the loss of qualification by reason of any act of the kind I have referred to shall result also in the deprivation of the right to be put on the list. The object of that is to make the list as far as possible final, and just as it is intended to be used at the polls. I think that the explanations I have made involve the disclosure of the important provisions of the Bill. Of course, I shall be glad to explain any further detail that may be found necessary.

Mr. EDGAR. I think that the most acceptable Bill that the Government could have brought in on this subject would have been one to repeal this Act altogether. I am inclined to think that the expenses of the machinery of that Act must have convinced the country how unwise a measure it was, and that the trouble which it gives to members and to the electors themselves must have convinced the members of this House on both sides that we would be very much better without this Franchise Act. More than that, when the Bill was passed it disfranchised a large number of electors in Ontario, in Manitoba, in Prince Edward Island and in British Columbia. It not only continues to do so in some of these Provinces, but in the Province of Ontario, on account of the recent legislation there which has so widely extended the privilege of the franchise as to make it practically manhood suffrage, there are an enormous number of the electors of that Province disqualified from voting at Dominion elections. I am surprised that I did not hear some suggestion from the Minister of Justice that he would extend the scope of the franchise to meet these difficulties. I admit, if the Bill is going on at all, that the amendments which he proposes in regard to the supplementary lists are necessary to carry out the new system of printing the lists which he has adopted. But there are some suggestions which I am going to take the liberty of making, and I hope the hon. Minister, with the frankness which usually characterises him, will consider whether he cannot adopt them or something like them. Now, I do not think anybody can justify the provision, which I see is to be re-enacted in section 15, that the preliminary list shall be made by the revising officer from the assessment rolls and all the information that he can obtain from that or any other source. Surely that never was right, and it is not right to re-enact it. I will leave it to the Minister of Justice whether a judicial proceeding of that kind should properly be covered by such language—that this judicial officer is to be at liberty to put names on the list, from any information he can obtain from any source whatever, hearsay or otherwise, and to put the public to the expense of contesting these names in the formal way provided in the final revision. Surely, it would be fairer all round, more business like, cheaper and more just, if we imposed some restrictions on the powers of the revising officer in connection with the preliminary list. I would suggest to the Minister that he should provide that the revising officer, in preparing the preliminary and supplemental lists, shall have regard to these two sources of information—first, the last revised voters' list, which is at present the basis of all his proceedings; and next, the last assessment rolls as finally revised for municipal purposes; and after that, for the purpose of ascertaining who has died since the last revision, that he shall procure a copy of the official list of deaths according to the latest mortuary statistics to be had, and shall strike out the names of those who have died. Beyond that he should have no other power to make any alterations, corrections or additions in the list, unless he does it on the basis of a statutory declaration made by persons who show a personal knowledge of the facts sufficient to justify the returning officer in adding or removing names or making corrections. I would suggest, also, that a time be fixed in this Act when the revising officer shall be bound to receive such statutory declarations, some time after the 1st of June when he is to go to work; and then some later date should be fixed up to which he can receive them, and beyond which he cannot receive them; so that everybody will have fair play. I would suggest that these statutory declarations should be open to the inspection of anyone interested at the office of the revising officer, just as the existing law provides in the case of the final revision. Now, I cannot see any reason against this. It is not an expensive proceeding; it takes a great deal of unpleasant responsibility from the shoulders of the revising officer; it prevents him being charged even with any sort of collusion or unfairness, as he might easily be if he chose names by hearsay or made corrections on hearsay evidence; and it will altogether give the public a certain amount of confidence in this law which they do not possess now. I hope the Minister of Justice will see the fairness of these propositions. I have drafted some amendments which might suit his views, but we can easily arrange those when the House is in committee. There is not a great deal to criticise in the details of the measure, because the Minister has explained them pretty fully. I see he has extended the time from the 1st of September to the 1st of October for finishing the preliminary list. That will throw it somewhat later, but I suppose there is no objection to that as long as it gives more time to get the preliminary list thoroughly prepared. Then I see he proposes in section 17 to charge 25 cents for copies of the list in each polling district, while the charge in the present Act is only 10 cents. I think it is a pity to increase the price, because under the present system of Government printing, surely the work is more economically done than it was before. In sub-section 2 of section 17, I think there is a clear error made by the draftsman of the Bill. It is proposed to restrict the number of lists which shall be sent by registered letter to officials. The present Act provides that those lists shall be sent to each member of a council. In this Bill these words are proposed to be struck out, and the lists are only to be sent to the mayor as a member of the council. I think it is a great pity to restrict them to the mayor in places where there is a mayor, and it is still more unfortunate not to let the members of the council have them where there is no mayor. They should certainly be sent to the reeves of villages and townships, because in Ontario there are no mayors except in cities and towns. I suppose that will be changed when we get into committee, for it is evidently an error. I do not think that the subject, in itself, calls for much more comment than I have made. There are some matters of detail which will be discussed in committee, but I hope the Minister will consider these suggestions.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think it is greatly to be regretted that the hon. the Minister cannot see his way clear to anticipate the inevitable result of this matter by two or three years and repeal the whole thing. I certainly believe a great majority of his own friends would approve of that course. The result, so far, of this measure has been to convince the vast majority of the Conservative party that this Bill is cumbersome, expensive and unnecessary. I know this to be the case in my own section of country. I have noticed editorials in party journals supporting the hon. gentleman which have unhesitatingly and in unqualified terms condemned the measure, and I do not believe there is a more absurd measure on the Statute-book of any country than this same Franchise Act. We have now in process of formation in various Provinces of the Dominion a better voters' list than would be formed under this Act—a voters' list in the course of formation by the officers of the people themselves, and in the formation of these lists the people of this Dominion are exercising the right specially delegated to them by the British North America Act. The mode in which the franchise should be exercised, and the question as to how it should be exercised in the various Provinces is, in my opinion, a matter that comes within the scope of the local authorities as pertaining to civil rights. The last Frachise Bill cost this country, in round numbers, $500,000; the present list will cost as much, or more. I assert that it is entirely unnecessary, and, in addition to this cost, it puts the people to a vast amount of trouble and expense in attending the Courts of Revision and seeing that their names are properly put upon the list. The whole thing is a matter of vexation, trouble and expense to all parties in the Dominion. I know this from personal observation, having had the experience attendant on the formation of one voters' list. There is no country in the world where such a policy exists as exists here; there is no reason for such a policy. In the formation of lists for municipal purposes, or for local or provincial purposes, there is no reason why the list that answers for the purpose of electing a member of a Local Legislature should not answer very well for the election of a member of the Dominion Legislature.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). You cannot elect to a township council on the same list.

Mr. CHARLTON. The same list answers both purposes. On the same list is a list of the voters eligible to vote for members of the Local Legislature, and for municipal councillors.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). No, not by any means.

Mr. CHARLTON. The policy of the Government is not a uniform policy. We have universal suffrage in some Provinces and qualifications in other Provinces, and the very principle upon which was based the enacting of this law was violated in its enactment. It was asserted that the law was necessary in order that we might have a uniform Dominion franchise, but when the Government proceeded to frame the law they gave us as great, if not greater, variety of qualifications in the various Provinces than exists in the provincial lists. I shall take the opportunity before this Act becomes law, to offer an amendment to the effect that in all Provinces where universal suffrage is established, the voters' lists of such Provinces shall be accepted for Dominion purposes; and I believe, if the hon. gentleman will consent to so amend his Bill as to provide for universal suffrage, that would at least minimise the objections against the measure and the vexations attendant upon the formation of the lists and the working out of the law. The best thing would be to sweep it away altogether, but the next best thing to that would be to adopt manhood suffrage. If the hon. gentleman cannot see his way to adopt universal suffrage in all the Provinces, let him adopt it in Provinces in which it now exists for provincial purposes. In that way he would simplify the operation of carrying the Act into force, he will reduce the expense, he will popularise the law, remove discontent, and make the Act much more acceptable to the people and much more in consonance with principles of good government.

Mr. COLTER. I would like to call the attention of this House to section 7 of the first Franchise Act, chapter 5 of the Revised Statutes. That section provides:

"In the case of farmer's sons or of the son of an owner of real property, other than a farmer, each such son, to entitle him to vote as such, under the foregoing provisions of this Act, must have been, from the time of his name having been placed on the list of voters to the time of the election for the electoral district in which he tenders his vote, and must then be, a resident in such electoral district as hereinbefore provided with his father, (or with his mother after the death of his father), being such owner as aforesaid."

Now, this section is absolutely inconsistent with section 42 of the Election Act, which provides that all persons on the list of voters shall be entitled to vote at the election. This legislative enactment in the Franchise law and this provision in the Election Act, are contradictory, and have given rise to quite expensive litigation. Under the circumstances, it must be very difficult for our courts to determine whether section 7 truly constitutes the law and the lists are not final, or whether the Election Act, which makes the lists final, is to be taken as the law. This is a point which should certainly, in the interests of the public generally, be cleared up. Then there are several other points that require to be made clear. There is the point with reference to aliens and persons who have gone to another country and taken the oath of allegiance. There is nothing in the oath provided to prevent those persons continuing on the franchise list as good voters. Some judges have decided in some way and some in the other. At any rate, in the Election Act, any person who swears he is a British subject by birth—and that is not inconsistent with his having been since naturalised in a foreign country—can take the oath and vote. It would be well to have some amendment made in that respect. There is another point. We have very often voters who at one particular stage possess a certain qualification and at another stage change that qualification. For instance, a man may be the owner of property within an electoral district. During the year he may sell that property, he may live on the interest of the money, or he may rent a farm and become a tenant. Now, according to the law, that man and all his sons as well are disfranchised, because he has become a tenant, and yet has not been a tenant one year. The law provides that he must be a tenant for a year before he can be placed on the list of voters, and his sons cannot qualify in any case as farmer's sons, because they cannot qualify as the sons of tenant unless the lease is a five years lease. There is another point to which I wish to call attention. It is said that the assessment roll is proof or evidence of value, but it is evidence of nothing else. The revising officer, or his clerk, is not obliged to adopt the assessment roll and incorporate the names placed thereon with the names on the revised Dominion voters' list, and in some cases he is unable to do so. Take the case of a tenant who appears as a tenant on the assessment roll. Prima facie he would appear to be qualified to vote, but that does not make him comply with the requirements of the Franchise Act. The mere fact that he is placed as a tenant on the assessment roll does not show that he is placed as a tenant for one year previous, and, therefore, the revising officer is not obliged to enter his name on the Dominion list. Again, there is no provision for using that assessment roll with reference to income voters, and the number of income voters, in all constituencies, is very large. Therefore, if we have to revise these voters' lists from the voters' lists of the Dominion, revised in 1886, the number of changes that will have to be made will be enormous. I know that in my own constituency there will be not less than 1,000 names to be added. I have some grounds on which to base this calculation. In 1887, it was expected that a revision would take place, and, between the revision of 1886 and the revision which we expected to occur in 1887, there were 350 names to be added, for one party only, in a constituency of an ordinary size. Supposing the other party to have had, at all events, 250 names, there would be a change of about 600 names in a purely farming community in one year. Therefore, I think I am within the mark when I say that there are quite 1,000 names to be added. If these people have to be qualified by statutory declarations, the labor will be enormous, and, therefore, I would suggest, for the consideration of the Minister of Justice, that the revising officer should take the Ontario list for 1888, or should take the assessment roll as it is with reference to tenants. He cannot take the assessment roll very well in regard to income voters, which refers to those who have an income of $300, because the only income voters who are assessed for income are those who have a considerable income, much more than sufficient to enable them to qualify. If the Ontario list of 1888 was taken by the revising officer with the Dominion list revised in 1886, the labor to the candidates, and to those working for the candidates, would be very much lessened. Then another suggestion which I would ask to be incorporated in some way in the Bill, is that after the revising officer shall have completed his work, the list, before being sent down to Ottawa as finally revised, should be for a certain number of days subject to inspection, in order that, if any clerical errors creep in inadvertently, those who are interested and those who have notes of these clerical errors can call the attention of the revising officer to them. By way of illustration, I may mention that in my own constituency I discovered that certain clerical errors had been made by the clerk of the revising officer quite innocently.

I called his attention to it, and he sent down here and procured the list to be returned to him to be corrected; but this did not dispose of all the errors that were made There were other errors made. For instance, the clerk may not take his notes very carefully when the court is being held, and he may enter an appeal as being allowed instead of disallowed, quite inadvertently; but, according to the present arrangement, the roll would come down to Ottawa with that error in it and without our being able to rectify or correct that mistake in any way. There is another point to which I would call the attention of the Minister of Justice. It is one which has come up in practical experience. Farmers' sons are allowed to qualify on the property of their mother only after the death of their father. If it should happen, as it does in many cases, that the farmer's sons are living on the property of the mother during the lifetime of the father, they are not able to qualify at all. I remember an instance where a man had deserted his wife, and she had brought up the family. They were living with her on the property which she had acquired by her own industry. Those sons were helping her to manage that property, and yet by the law as it exists—and there is no correction in that regard in the Bill now before the House—those sons were not entitled to vote because they were living on the property of the mother, the property which they had helped the mother to work, during the lifetime of the father. There are many objections which might be urged against the Bill. It is a very complicated Bill, and it is difficult to attend to all these provisions in regard to fancy franchises. However, I think it my duty to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to these matters that I have mentioned.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think this measure is a very important one, and one which should receive from the House and the Government greater consideration than has been for some time bestowed upon it. The House, a few years ago, undertook to change the policy which had prevailed for seventeen years, providing that the qualification of voters for election to this House should be the qualification adopted by the Legislatures of the different Provinces. No abuse or difficulty had ever grown out of that course. In adopting the policy which previously prevailed, we voluntarily adopted a provision which is also a provision of the American Constitution. It is well known that, in the United States, Congress has no power to declare what the qualification of electors for voting in regard to the House of Representatives shall be. The Constitution provides that whatever is the qualification for electors to the more popular branch in the State shall be the qualification for voting for members to be elected to the House of Representatives. The framers of the American Constitution proceeded upon an obvious principle—a principle which we have often discussed here, that our system of government, like theirs, or their system of government like ours, proceeds upon the assumption that the people are qualified for self-government, that the Local Legislatures will not abuse the powers conferred upon them, and that those who are qualified as voters for representatives in the Legislatures of the Province or the State are equally competent to elect members for the House of Representatives in the United States or for the House of Commons here. When I look back to the articles of Confederation which were agreed upon by the representatives of the different Provinces prior to Confederation taking place, which were altered afterwards by some authority, I do not know what, though perhaps the hon. gentleman opposite might explain, before the British North America Act was adopted, though certainly they were altered without the authority of anyone on this side of the Atlantic, I find that the very provision for which I am contending would, by those articles, have been made always a part of our constitution if faith had been kept, and if that plan of the constitution had been adopted by the Imperial Parliament which was agreed upon by the Quebec Convention. That convention goes even further, for I find that it was there expressly reserved to the Provinces to determine the boundaries of the different constituencies which were to elect members to the House of Commons. The framers of that plan of the constitution, of whom the present leader of the Government was one, went upon the assumption that this House represents the people of the different Provinces, and that, in the creation of the Federal Legislature, it was for the people through their representatives in these different Provinces, acting separately and distinctly from each other, to say what the qualification of the electors should be within their respective limits. If the articles of Confederation framed by the Quebec Convention had been incorporated into an Imperial Act just as they are, without any modification, it would not have been in the power of this House to have dealt with this question at all. It would have been for the Legislative Assembly of each Province to say what shall be the qualification of the electors within the limits of that Province; and that is the only rule consistent with the principle of representation by population. You will observe, that representation by population is not adopted with respect to the constituency. The constituencies may be unequal; they are unequal in the Province of Quebec to this hour; but there was no intention to break the inequality of the constituencies. There was a provision, not that each electoral district shall be equal and contain the same population—that is not the provision of the constitution; but it is, that each Province shall be represented in the House of Commons in proportion to its population. Quebec is to have 65 members, not that each electoral district in Quebec shall be equal, but that the Province of Quebec shall be represented here by 65 members, and all the other Provinces shall be represented in the same proportion, on the basis of population. Now, I think here is the mischief that is likely to arise from the course that was at that time determined upon, and, that until a very few years ago was voluntarily adhered to by the representatives of the people in this House. Sir, when we look at the whole political organisation of our community, from the school section up to this House, we find that all the machinery by which a proper voters' list can be prepared without serious expense to any portion of the community, rests wholly with the Local Legislature. Why, Sir, who prepared these lists? They were prepared according to the provisions of the law, by the representatives of the people in their municipal councils. The members of the council were assisted by the assessor and by the clerk of the municipality. The voters' list was prepared without difficulty. In the first place, the assessment was the basis of the voters' list; in the next place, the members who met together to prepare that list from the assessment roll, were men who were personally acquainted with the members of the community whose names they were called upon to put upon that list. It was scarcely possible, it is scarcely possible now, in the Province of Ontario at least, to omit from the voters' lists the names of parties, because those who put these names upon the lists are persons who are personally acquainted with the entire community for whom they prepare the lists. Then there is this further consideration—it is scarcely possible to find a council in which both political parties are not represented. I venture to say that 95 per cent. of all the municipal councils in the Province of Ontario to-day contain members of both parties; I believe it is the same in all the other Provinces, where municipal organisations are in existence. The result is that the voters' list is prepared by the community, by those who represent the different political sentiments of the community. There is no such thing as packing a voters' list. There is no necessity of incurring any serious expense in securing upon that list the names of all the electors. Why, Sir, during the whole of the 17 years that that law was in operation, I doubt whether there is a single representative in this Parliament, or in any of the preceding Parliaments, who was put to any expense whatever in the preparation of that list. Occasionally they might be called upon to lose a day to appear before the Court of Revision to add half a dozen names in that particular municipal district in which they reside. Beyond that they exercised no control, took no interest incurred to expense, and lost no time. But is that the condition of things at the present day? Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman put upon the Statute-book a measure, one reason assigned for which being the anxiety for uniformity. Was that principle of uniformity adhered to? Why, it was departed from in the majority of the Provinces of this Dominion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Pedantic uniformity.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman talks about a pedantic uniformity. Why, the adoption of that plan was a pedantic uniformity. The complaint the hon. gentleman made, if it were an honest complaint, was a pedantic complaint against the laws of the Provinces. The hon. gentleman knows, if he professes to follow the English practice, that in the mother country no reform is attempted unless there is an abuse to reform. What abuse did the hon. gentleman seek to reform? What mischief had grown up under the old system which necessitated legislation upon this subject? Why, there was no necessity for it whatever, there was no cause made out, there was no instance assigned of wrong being done. Yet the hon. gentleman, under pretext of securing uniformity, introduced his Bill, and when he introduced it he departed from the principle which had rendered such a measure necessary. Then we pointed out to him that the result would be that men who would be appointed to prepare these voters' lists over the whole country, would not be the men who were most familiar. If he had taken men who were familiar with the electors, who best knew them, who had been most frequently brought into contact with them in their homes, scattered over the entire electoral districts, there would be but a small fraction of these people with whom he was not acquainted. It would be necessary to take some other means than those which the hon. gentleman provided in his Bill to secure anything like a full and correct voters' list. But what has been the experience? There is not a member of this House who was a member before the last voters' list was prepared, who has not been put to expense, or whose friends on his behalf have not been put to expense, with the view of getting the qualified parties upon the list, to make it anything like a complete list. I know members who have been put to the expense of several hundred dollars, some of them over a thousand dollars, in the preparation of the last list. I leave out of the account the time—if you are to put a value upon the time—of men who go through a constituency for the purpose of seeing who are residing there whose names are not upon the assessment roll, whose names have not been transferred to the voters' list, but who are entitled to go upon it. I say if all these expenditures were taken into consideration a million dollars would not represent the cost of the voters' lists for a single year to the people of this Dominion. Then, Sir, we pointed out to the hon gentleman that these voters' lists would cost from $250,000 to $300,000 to the public in their collective capacity. The hon. gentleman pooh-poohed our representation. He said we exaggerated, grossly exaggerated, what would be the cost of the preparation of the voters' lists. Did we greatly exaggerate the cost? We could not get a complete statement of the actual cost from the hon. gentleman or from his colleague who had special charge of this whole matter. We were told it was so much up to such a date, that it had cost something more than that, and that the accounts had not come in; and so over a period of two years we were unable to obtain from the colleague of the hon. gentleman, a full statement of the actual cost. Now we find the cost had been something like half a million dollars, in fact the cost was too much for the hon. gentleman's courage; the Government did not fancy coming to the House and informing the country that our representations had been more than surpassed by the expenditure incurred. And yet, when we look at what the hon. gentleman has done since, we see what evils have grown up in connection with the whole system. I pointed out, looking at what had been done, and taking a township in my own constituency, there was a variation of from 5 to 10 per cent. a year in the voters' list, sometimes 5 and sometimes as many as 10 per cent. of change in the personnel of the voters in the municipality. The hon. gentleman said that was an overstatement of the change that had taken place in the country, that no serious evil could arise to our voters to have a voters' list prepared annually. The hon. gentleman did not, however, prepare a list annually, and I apprehend the chief reason was the enormous cost involved in preparation. What do we find from the statement made by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Colter)? That in his constituency, if a proper voters' list were framed in accordance with the provisions of the law, placing everybody entitled to vote on the list and omitting everybody who was not entitled to vote, there would be an addition of 1,000 names on the voters' list in that county. Under these circumstances, is it fair to say that a member returned represents the sentiment of those entitled to vote? Why, you have practically disfranchised a large number of persons by refusing to prepare a voters' list for constituencies which had been called upon to return members to this House. There is but one rational course for the House to adopt: it is to have the courage of its convictions, for I am satisfied that hon. gentlemen opposite are no more in love with this measure than we are, and to return to the condition of things that existed before. Let them provide that those who are entitled to vote at elections for members of the Local Legislature in the Province in which they reside, shall have the right to vote for the election of members to the House of Commons. That is a simple rule. The voters' list prepared by the officers of the municipalities should be accepted, which would be a perfectly fair course for members on both sides of the House, and members of both parties in the country. That is not the case now. Hon. gentlemen opposite have a Printing Bureau; the lists are being prepared in that bureau. How do we know how many members may have lists placed in their hands to send to their constituencies, a favor which is denied to members on this side of the House? How do we know but that an hon. gentleman may write to his constituents, and find out the political sentiments of electors, and communicate with them, sending them copies of the voters' list, under the name of blue-books, or in some other way, and in this way have an undue advantage, as compared with the members on this side of the House? I say that is possible. The centralisation of everything here renders abuse possible. The hon. gentleman knows we cannot have very much confidence in the Administration, remembering what was done in the case of the Gerrymander Bill, and in regard to Indian voters, how hon. gentlemen opposite placed on the voters' list men who are not entrusted with the management of their own affairs, men who were the wards of the Government, men who were receiving charity from the Government, and yet those men were held to be qualified to pass judgment upon the most important and abstruse political questions ever submitted to an intelligent electorate. What we desire is fair play, that the judgment of the country shall not be determined here by the action of the Government and by legislation instead of by the independent electors, and that is what in a great measure the hon. gentlemen has undertaken to do by this Bill. I have no objection to the hon. gentleman legislating to make himself popular, to his taking such measures in the public interest as shall secure the confidence of the people. If he can present to the country a more acceptable policy than we can present, then he is entitled to succeed, but let us have a fair electoral division, a fair election and a fair voters' list, and let the majority of the electors determine, when an appeal is made to them, what shall be the policy of the country. That cannot be done under the existing system. If the electoral sentiment is with the hon. gentleman it is by the merest accident, because if we consider all those measures adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite, we see that the leader of the Government has undertaken to secure a majority of the seats, no matter whether he has the majority of the electors to support him or not. That is the condition of things, and by this voters' list we have no opportunity of knowing who are legally qualified electors. Here are the electors in the abstract set out in the law, but when you look at the voters' list, the electors in the concrete, we find, as the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Colter) has said, there is 1,000 difference between the voters' list in one county and what the law says the list ought to contain. And so it is in every other constituency, and so it will continue so long as this measure remains on the Statute-book. The law, as it now stands, is a nuisance against which public sentiment has pronounced, and, as the representative body, we should take the first opportunity of abating that nuisance and compelling the adoption of what is in accordance with reason, justice and common sense.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman said that the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Colter) declared there were 1,000 electors in the single county of Haldimand deprived of their votes. It only shows, if that be so, that since 1886 there are 1,000 more voters, and the depletion of which the hon. gentleman and his friends have been complaining has not taken place in that county at all events. If there are 1,000 more voters there in 1889 than in 1886 there has been no exodus from the county of Haldimand. The speech of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) made me look back and think we were sitting in the Parliament that passed the Franchise Bill, because the speech just delivered was a repetition of the speech delivered by the hon. gentleman in that debate. I say in all seriousness that I think it would be very unfortunate if the progress of this Bill to amend the practical working of the law as it is, should be impeded by bringing up the general question as to what the franchise should be. The hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) and the hon. member for Haldimand, (Mr. Colter), took that line, and they both, I have no doubt, would agree with my hon. friend, Mr. Mills, to have either universal suffrage, or manhood suffrage, or the various suffrages as they exist in the different Provinces, adopted, as giving our electorate for the Dominion Parliament; that is their opinion, and it has been their opinion. But I do not think that question comes up this Session, and at this period of the Session, in connection with this measure of practical politics. I do not think there is any chance of our immediately going back to seek a renewal of confidence from our constituents. I think, especially after the strong vote of confidence given by the hon. gentlemen opposite to the present Government, that we can well consider that we are going to last for a year or two.

Mr. MITCHELL. You get some of that vote under protest, you know.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; but we got the vote.

Mr. MITCHELL. Oh, yes; you got the vote.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We got the vote anyhow, and the protest will stand for what it is worth. In the meantime I hope that we will not be drawn into a discussion of that great and important question, which, I think, when it is brought up on its own merits, for the purpose of altering our constitution and our parliamentary representation, shall receive full consideration. I know the strong feeling that the hon. gentlemen opposite entertain on that point, and I know that they will take care that before there is an appeal to the people that that question will be brought up. Meanwhile, this is a simple proposition to amend the law as it is, and I will invite the consideration of hon. gentlemen opposite to this Bill as it stands, and as a Bill simply amending the law as it is. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says that he will, this Session, and before this measure gets through the House, bring up the entire question. If he thinks it right to do so, or if any other hon. member thinks it right, we will have to discuss the general principle. I am not quite sure that the hon. gentleman will take my advice that it would just be as well to postpone that for another Session, and to discuss then, on its merits, the question: What ought be the representation of the people of Canada in the Dominion Parliament of Canada? In the meanwhile I would ask that we should not be induced to enter upon that large subject, which can produce no practical result this Session, but that we will discuss this Bill on its merits, as a Bill merely amending, and amending in no important principle, the Franchise Act as it now stands.

Mr. LAURIER. The right hon. gentleman has not at all rightly apprehended the position which has been taken on this side of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. LAURIER. No. The position which we take on this side of the House, and which has been taken by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and my hon. friend from Ontario (Mr. Edgar), was that if the Act is to remain on the Statute-book we have no objection whatever that it should be amended in the direction that has been suggested; and indeed my hon. friend from Ontario (Mr. Edgar) said that he would assist the Minister of Justice in that task. But above, and superior to that question, we have never abandoned the ground that we have taken from the first, that the Act is bad ab initio, and being bad ab initio we must persist in the protest we have always made against it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. And keep it as bad as possible.

Mr. LAURIER. It is as bad as possible, and I am afraid that the right hon. gentleman will not admit that. Neither the hon. gentleman, nor anyone on his side of the House has ever met the objection which has been once more made to this Act by my friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and which was to the effect that the only manner in which to view this question of the franchise is to look at it as a civil right which has to be determined according to the lights, education, and antecedents of the population in each Province. The tendency in this age—on this continent at all events, and in parts of the older continents also—is certainly in favor of manhood suffrage. Since this law has been on the Statute-book, that is within the last three years, the suffrage has been extended in the Province of Ontario to this extent of manhood suffrage, and it is now being extended in New Brunswick to the same extent. Manhood suffrage was already in existence in two other Provinces of the Dominion, and in the Province of Quebec, the franchise has been extended, not to the extent of manhood suffrage I admit, but to an extent largely in excess of the franchise provided by this Act. It is so also in Nova Scotia. We see that in all the Provinces now the franchise provided by this House is not up to the standard of the franchise in any one portion of the Dominion. What is the reason that we find such a diversity of franchises among the different Provinces and in the Dominion? The reason can only be what I have just stated, that it is a question which can be determined only according to the different complexions of each Province. Take my own Province of Quebec, for example. The hon. gentleman or his friends would not vote in favor of universal suffrage, and I myself, although I claim to be a Liberal of the Liberals, would not vote for manhood suffrage, at least in my own Province.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes; I make that statement frankly, and what is the reason? I have no objection at all that the Province of Ontario should have manhood suffrage if the Province of Ontario is satisfied with it, but I would not want the Province of Ontario to impose it upon the Province to which I belong, because the Province to which I belong does not want it. Neither would I have the Province to which I belong impose their views on the people of the Province of Ontario. I claim that in a matter of this kind you must take the Provinces with their views, and even with their prejudices such as they are. I have stated, a moment ago, that I would not vote myself for manhood suffrage. It may be a matter of prejudice with me, but, at all events, such are the convictions of the great majority of the people of the Province to which I belong. For all that I do not claim to be in my profession any more a Liberal than anybody else, but when I look at contemporary history it seems to me that the position which I take is borne out by these facts. Take for example, the land of my ancestors, France. It seems to me that the best Government that France ever had since the Revolution was the monarchical Government of Louis Philippe. This representative Government was carried out under a limited franchise—too limited in fact—yet the great fault of the French people was to change from that very limited franchise directly to manhood suffrage. That was a great fault and the result has shown it, because you gave the right of franchise to a population not prepared for it. The course followed in England was quite the reverse. They commenced to reform the franchise in 1832, and they gradually extended it from time to time and from period to period. They did not commit the fault that was committed by the French people, of changing from a limited franchise and giving to every person in the land manhood suffrage, but the people of England extended the franchise gradually as the education and the condition of the people warranted it. They are near manhood suffrage in England now, and my belief is that they will attain that end before long. At all events, they do not think in England, although they are just as liberal in England as we are on this continent, that it would be wise to adopt universal suffrage now, although I have no doubt it must come before long. Those are the views upon which my convictions rest. If we are to have a federative system of government such as we have for the last twenty years, with all its cumbrous machinery, it is simply because the feelings of the people are not the same in all the Provinces. For this reason it seems to me that the position we have taken on this side of the House with regard to the Federal Franchise Act is one which has never been successfully met. Our position is that the true principle which underlies this question is that you cannot impose the same franchise on the people of Ontario, or the people of Quebec, or the people of British Columbia, or the people of Prince Edward Island, or the people of the other Provinces, but that every one of these communities has itself to decide or to choose within the limits of each Province, and that each ought to be entrusted with the great responsibility of the franchise. Under such circumstances, I deem it my duty again to bring the question before the House and to test it once more. Therefore, I beg to move:

That the Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this House, the Electoral Franchise Act ought to, be repealed and it is preferable to revert to the plan of utilising for the elections of this House the provincial franchises and voters' lists.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before that motion is carried, I desire to make a remark or two. Whatever doubts we may sometimes have, in a parliamentary sense, of the perfect accuracy of the hon. First Minister's utterances, few of us who have followed recent events can doubt that he is perfectly sincere and accurate in stating that he is not just at present desirous of testing the popular feeling of the electors, particularly in his own Province. There might be considerable inconvenience on the part of brethren like himself and the Minister of Customs, and a good many other hon. gentlemen, in organising the Orange lodges which used to be the backbone of their party, and still are to a great extent; therefore, I am disposed to believe that the First Minister is perfectly sincere in saying that just now he does not want to test the feelings of a good many of his supporters throughout the Province of Ontario. However, I do not desire to prolong the discussion on this motion, which I believe entirely expresses, not only the views of the Liberal party, but a good many of the Conservatives throughout the Dominion, and notably in the Province of Ontario. I believe they are sick and tired of this Franchise Act. I believe everyone in this House who has had experience of it knows that it means a great deal of trouble and expense, and in the end results in very little good to the parties whom it was supposed it would benefit, except in those constituencies where there are men who are absolutely under the control of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, as it notably did effect the result of elections in certain special counties. But I want to call the attention of the First Minister to a point of constitutional practice, which I think he will hardly controvert. One thing is clear, that we ought always to have a voters' list which would fairly represent the electorate of this country, and it ought to be kept in force year by year. Under the pretext of avoiding the enormous expense which this system has incurred, this country has not been possessed of an electoral list to which an appeal could fairly be made, not for one year only but for two or three years. Not one of the bye-elections which have taken place within the last three years, have appealed to the real electorate of the constituencies; in not one single case has that electorate been represented by 15 or 20 per cent. Like other gentlemen, I have made some enquiries as to the voters who have been disfranchised each year that the list has not been revised, and I believe my hon. friend from Bothwell was correct in stating that every year that the voters' list is not revised, by the natural operation of death, and by the natural operation of growth, by which a number of young men every year become entitled to exercise the franchise, a large percentage, often amounting to 10 per cent., always, I think, equalling 5 per cent., are practically disfranchised; so that when we appeal to the country in these bye-elections under the present system, we do not appeal to the true electorate of the present time, but to an electorate of three or four years ago; and, I dare say, the House will remember that when we pressed, that when bye-elections take place, the voters' list should be revised, we were voted down. Now, if the hon. gentleman proposes to continue this system, it is his bounden duty to see, expense or no expense, that the voters' list is revised from year to year, or at any rate in all cases where there is reason to suppose there may be a bye-election. Otherwise, should a dissolution occur—and a dissolution may not be so utterly improbable as the hon. gentleman supposes—we would have to fight out the contest, not by an appeal to the electorate as it is, but as it existed three or four years ago; in other words, an appeal to the country when 20 or 25 per cent. of the electors are disfranchised. That is entirely an unconstitutional practice. I do not think there is any country enjoying representative institutions where such a thing would be permitted or has been practised, save in Canada. I know it is not in England, where the voters' list is revised every year. The hon. gentleman may, of course, plead, as he did before, that the expense of this system is so enormous that the country cannot afford it. There is a good deal of truth in that, and it goes to prove that his system is a mistake; and the only way to save the expense to the country and to correct the mistake, is to adopt the motion of my hon. friend.

Mr. MITCHELL. When this Franchise Act was under consideration, as, I dare say, many members of this House will recollect, I supported the general principle of the measure. What I supported was the principle that the regulation of the people who should control the election of members of this House should emanate from this Parliament. In other words, the contention of the Government side of the House was that this Parliament should pass a Franchise Act to provide who should have the right to vote for members of this House; the contention on the Opposition side was that the franchise of each of the several Provinces should be taken, and that the voters under those franchises should have the right to say who should sit in the Parliament of Canada. At that time my opinion was given very frankly and freely, that theoretically, and I thought it ought to be practically too, the members of this House should not be subject, as to who should elect them, to the legislation of any other body. I supported the right hon. gentleman in that principle, and I stood by him through the whole of that contest which occupied weeks and weeks. But Sir, almost every detail of his Bill, almost every section, I felt bound to oppose, because of the enormous expense they were likely to involve. It was predicted at that time that it would cost this country about half a million dollars a year for the creation and annual revision of the lists. My right hon. friend has found it necessary to abandon the annual revision in consequence of that enormous expense. He cannot deny that the creation of those lists has cost between $400,000 and $500,000; and the predictions of its cost made at that time have been fully realised. Now, Sir, after the experience we have had of this measure, I am bound to say that I have changed my opinion about the course that ought to be pursued, not from conviction, not from a theoretical policy, but from the absolute fact that the only way in which economy can be obtained in the formation of these lists is to take the municipal lists of the different parishes and adopt the policy of the different Provinces. I regret that we should have to do this, but I place at the door of the right hon. gentleman the necessity for this change of policy on my part. I charge him with sacrificing the correct principle for the necessities of the case. I charge him with having placed me in this position, that I have to come forward now and explain to the country why I have changed my policy on this question. I have not changed my conviction. I believe this House should be independent of any local influence or any local legislation which would change the Dominion Electoral Franchise, but the necessities of the case demand the economy of the country demands, that a different course should be pursued from what has been pursued by the right hon. gentleman. Therefore, I am bound to speak against my own convictions of what ought to be the proper theoretical policy.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL. Hon. gentlemen say "hear, hear." Do they approve of what I say, when I lay at the door of the right hon. gentleman the consequences of compelling men, against their own convictions, and for the purpose of economy, justice, equity and fair play, to adopt a policy which they do not exactly believe in, in order that they may accomplish the objects of right, and truth, and justice? I regret that I have to say this in relation to the Franchise Bill. I regret that every prediction of enormous expenditure, every prediction of the injustice which would arise out of the working of the measure, that was made at the time, at all events by myself, has been realised. These fancy franchises of the right hon. gentleman, have been a total failure. These Indian franchises, a portion of which he had to abandon, have been condemned by the country. The accumulated provisions of that Bill, which very few men, to-day, can understand, have led to innumerable difficulties, and to-day, after three years have elapsed, we are without any annual revision of the franchises having been made. A large portion of the people to-day, where an election takes place, have been disfranchised, and we could not get a fair representation of the votes of the people if a general election took place to-morrow. It is not improbable a general election may take place before very long. I do not think it is liable to occur from any volition on the other side, although we occasionally hear the defenders of the Government talk of general elections this summer. There is no fear of a general election this summer, or the next—not the slightest. My right hon. friend knows too well he dare not go to the country now, and I tell you, Sir, there is a great deal more danger that we may have six sittings of this Parliament, if the hon. gentleman is not ousted before that time, than that we will have any premature dissolution of the House. There have been times, and my hon. friend has availed himself of them, when he has prematurely dissolved Parliament, for his own purposes, when he thought he was in a position to go to the country. That is not his position to-day. He knows he dare not go to the country; and if he did, he knows he would have to fight many of those behind him. He knows the men behind him have ceased to have their confidence in him, which their votes would seem to imply.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MITCHELL. Hon. gentlemen say "no," but they know in their hearts they disapprove of the policy of the hon. gentleman, and do not sustain the views he entertains. At all events, there is one man in this House who does not approve of the hon. gentleman's course, and who is not afraid to tell him so. He does not appreciate the advice I give him. Well, it does not cost him much, but perhaps it is worth just as little as it costs; but whatever it may be worth I would advise the right hon. gentleman to take into consideration the advice I give him and to consider the discussion that took place on the passage of this Franchise law originally, and wipe out all these fancy franchises which he has created. Let him abolish this enormous expenditure in which he has involved the country, of $400,000 or $500,000 a year, which it costs to correct and remodel the lists. Let him adopt manhood suffrage, which is the simplest thing, or let him adopt the franchises of the different Provinces, which will cost not over $50,000, and thus save $400,000 or $500,000 a year. That is what I would advise my right hon. friend to do, and he might do worse than take my advice. The hon. gentleman does not care much about it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. I do think a great deal of it.

Mr. MITCHELL. But you show very little appreciation of it. I do not wish to take up the time of the House further. I have given expression to my opinion and to the reasons why I support the amendment. I do not support it on party grounds, but from necessity. I do not support it because I believe in it, but because I think it is necessary in the economy and interests of the country, and because it is the only means of enabling us to meet the enormous expenditure which the hon. gentleman's policy has brought upon the country.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). There can be no doubt that if the opinion of hon. members who support the Administration were consulted, and if they were not under party allegiance bound to support the policy of the Government, there would be a very general unanimity of opinion, on that side as well as this, that the time has arrived when this law should be repealed. The supporters of the Government have felt the inconvenience of it in many respects, as well as hon. members on this side. They have found it has entailed a large amount of work; they have found it has entailed inconvenience and expense, and they know very well that the whole thing has to be gone over again every year. It was that alone which prevented the lists from being completed for the last two years. Does any one suppose it was from any feeling of economy that the Government hesitated having the lists completed last year, and the year before? Not at all. It was simply owing to the fact that there was such a strong feeling and pressure from their own side of the House, as to the inconvenience, and trouble, and expense that would be involved generally, and the Government were forced, in deference to that feeling amongst their own supporters, to defer changing the lists until the present. When this Franchise Bill was introduced it was introduced with two objects. First, to obtain uniformity. That was the avowed policy of the administration. Secondly, to give a broader franchise to the people of the Dominion than they enjoyed at the time. Now, how do we stand in regard to those two points? As regards uniformity, the Government sacrificed that principle at the very inception of their measure, because, as we are aware, they gave to the Province of Prince Edward Island universal suffrage while they prescribed a different franchise for all the other Provinces. Then with regard to the broader measure of franchise which they were going to confer upon the electors, that is entirely changed. I admit at that time there was possibly something so far as that was concerned in that policy, although it would hardly justify the ground which the Government took. Still, so far as regards a comparison of the franchise which they introduced and the franchise then in force in the various Provinces, the Dominion franchise was in some measure more liberal. Since that time, however, all that has also changed. We have been told to-day of the changes which have taken place in the various Provinces. We have been told that, in the Province of Ontario, they have taken that great step in favor of universal suffrage; that in New Brunswick they have also made a most important concession; and, in my own Province of Nova Scotia, they have made a most important change and have carried the franchise far lower than the Dominion franchise. The Dominion Franchise Act provides that the income basis shall be $300 a year to entitle an elector to be placed on the list. In Nova Scotia, they have placed the income franchise at $250, and in order to meet the case of the fishermen and miners in Nova Scotia, they have reduced the property qualification to $150; and, in the mining districts, where these people are not the real legal occupants, or, as it were, leaseholders of the properties on which they lived, they have given them a right to vote if the property on which they live amounts to the value of $150 per annum. So, in this respect, as well as in regard to income, they have gone far beyond the franchise given by the Act which is now before the House for amendment. They have also admitted farmers' sons and schoolmasters and professors, and a class of people of that kind who should be on the list. Under these circumstances, I cannot see what object is to be gained by keeping this statute in force. We know what it cost us before. Does anyone expect that it will cost us less in the future? It cost us in the neighborhood of half a million of dollars to compile this list before, and from that experience we know that, when it is placed in the hands of the various revising barristers, and that there is so much trouble connected with it, it is not likely to cost us much less in the future. I ask hon members on both sides of the House if it is worth while, or is worth the cost, to expend half a million of dollars every year for this purpose, when we have our own local machinery which is more perfect and provides for a more extended franchise, without one cent of cost to the taxpayers of this country. Our municipal corporations, having charge of these lists, generally make them up on a system of great fairness to both sides. We have never, in Nova Scotia, had any cause to complain on that ground, because these councillors are generally elected from both sides, and it is very seldom that any advantage is gained in that way. In these municipal councils, the spirit of party does not enter as largely as it would when the result would be that they would have to go through the formality of making an application to a revising barrister, and to be represented by counsel for one party or the other. I think the members from Nova Scotia who are in the Cabinet, the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Marine, will bear me out in saying that the system in that Province under our municipal arrangements, has been eminently satisfactory and inexpensive. For these reasons, in addition to the question of cost, and the infinite trouble which will be involved in the revision of the list every year, I think the amendment should be adopted. Take a county like my own, which runs 100 miles down the eastern shore and 50 miles on the western shore, and 30 or 40 miles into the country, all having to be travelled by waggons, without railways to reach any portion of that county. Those people are so scattered along the coast that it is almost impossible to get the electors from those points to meet the revising barrister when he announces that he is going to hold his court at a certain place; and men who live at great distances along our fishing coasts, and have no means of transportation except by water, will not go to those places unless they are provided with means of transportation. It is said that this difficulty may be obviated under certain circumstances by a declaration being made, but, in these small districts, unless you have a legal gentleman accompanying the revising barrister to see that no improper exceptions are taken to applications made from the opposite side—because he is sure to need no looking after in regard to his own side—you will lose a large number of the electors under such circumstances. It is, therefore, important to consider the trouble as well as the cost, and I do think that the Government now should accept the opinion of the House on the subject. I am sure that, if no Government pressure was brought to bear upon the hon. members of this House, and they were asked to vote as they thought best in the interests of the country and not in the interests of a party, the vote would be almost unanimous in favor of going back to the provincial lists. This is a matter of so much importance that I think we should debate it thoroughly, and should let the country understand the fact that they have before them two propositions. The one is—because I suppose the Government will not propose continually to withhold the revision of the lists as they have done during the last three years—to revise these lists every year at the enormous expense to which I have referred, and the other is to go back to the provincial lists, made under our municipal institutions, which have always given satisfaction and which can be obtained without any expense. I think, when the people realise that, during a Parliament extending over five years, this will cost at least $400,000 a year, amounting to $2,000,000 in the course of the five years, they will feel sufficiently interested in the matter to indicate their views and their impressions to their representatives on both sides of the House. Under these circumstances I trust that the Minister of Justice will consider this matter again, and that the Government will consult the feelings of their own friends, as well as the opinions on this side of the House and in the country generally; for I believe if they were to go to their own supporters, as I have conversed with them time and again, they would find that they are in favor of going back to our provincial franchise.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). During the four years that this Bill has been in operation, we have been able to wit ness its effects and to view it in the light of experience. When the Bill was first introduced it was purely a matter of theory, but now we have had an opportunity of testing it, of seeing its practical effects. I think any person who has observed the mode in which this Bill has been carried out, and the cost it has been to the country, must feel that experience has shown that it is inadequate for the purpose for which it was destined, that it not only imposes an enormous expense upon the country, but that it has produced great difficulty, great labor, and much inconvenience to all the parties engaged in it. But this point was very clearly put by my hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. Jones), so that I need not enlarge upon it. But, referring to the motion made by my hon. friend in front of me (Mr. Laurier), I wish to say that when this Bill was before the House for the first time, I strongly supported the proposition that provincial lists should be made the basis of the Dominion lists. I believe that, so far as the exercise of the franchise is concerned, that subject is more properly in the hands of the Local Legislature. I believe that the Local Legislature of our Province of New Brunswick is better qualified to decide who are entitled to vote in that Province, than hon. gentlemen who sit here for British Columbia or Manitoba; and we in the Maritime Provinces are not as well qualified to decide who are entitled to exercise the franchise in British Columbia and Manitoba, as are the Local Legislatures of those Provinces. Moreover, we found that in the neighboring States, under a constitution somewhat similar to our own, the principle prevails that the State Legislature should control the franchise, both of those who are entitled to vote for representatives to the State Legislatures, and of those who are entitled to vote for representatives in Congress. For these and other reasons I advocated strongly, at that time, the adoption of the Provincial Francise. In addition, I believed that the Local Legislatures were desirous to extend the franchise from time to time, as the requirements of each Province seemed to dictate, and that the Local Legislature would limit the suffrage or extend it in such a manner as would be to the public weal. But this Bill was passed, and, as we pointed out, its operation has been attended with an enormous expense, and during the four years since that time a large portion of the people have been practically disfranchised. We have pointed out upon other occasions, cases where men who were entitled to be put upon the voters' list, by accident or otherwise have been omitted from the list, and although they were properly qualified, possessing more than one qualification, under the provisions of that Bill the Government have prevented them being put upon the list, and they have been deprived of the franchise; young men who have since obtained their majority and have obtained property, have been deprived of the exercise of the suffrage. Then there was the fact of the enormous expense, which no doubt, was the reason which induced the Government to allow the Act to remain a dead letter upon the Statutes during the last three years. I must say that had the resolution of my hon. friend been proposed last year, I should have been compelled to vote against it, for the reason that in the Province from which I come, the suffrage at that time was higher than that determined upon in the Franchise Bill, and numbers obtained the franchise who would not have obtained it under the provincial lists. The principle having been adopted and carried into effect I should have felt that I was not justified in depriving any person of the right of the franchise. But the circumstances have changed now, a change has taken place in our Province. As has been stated, in the Province of New Brunswick a most liberal Bill has been passed, extending the suffrage in some cases far beyond that of the present Electoral Franchise Act. That being so, I feel now that I am in such a position that I can heartily support the amendment offered by the leader of the Opposition. As I pointed out before, and as the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) has pointed out, the mode in which the voters' lists is made up under the provincial law entails but little expense to the country, and it seems to me that if no other motive could actuate hon. gentlemen in this House, they should have adopted a mode by which a large amount of money could be saved to this country; at the same time they would have avoided in the past a great deal of trouble and annoyance in getting up the voters' lists. I believe that these difficulties and these troubles will be greatly enhanced by the mode now proposed by which these lists are to be made at Ottawa. Mistakes have already occurred under the present system, but I believe that the proposition now before the House to have these lists made at Ottawa, will lead to a great many more mistakes. For all these reasons I believe that the proper way is to go back to the simple mode in which the provincial franchises were regulated in the different Provinces, and to leave the Local Legislature, which I believe is the proper authority, to regulate the franchise from time to time, as the necessities of the Province may require.

Mr. McMULLEN. When the Franchise Bill was first introduced, we saw in it a great many objectionable features, and we endeavored to remove them without success. On this occasion we want, in the first place, to enter our solemn and united protest against the continuation of a measure that has had a trial in the country, and that has virtually been condemned by every unbiassed mind in this Dominion. I fearlessly assert that if the question of the continuation of this Franchise Act was left to a vote to the people of this country, a very large majority would say that they prefer the municipal voters' list. Our municipal voters' lists are very carefully prepared. We do not have, as a rule, a municipality all Tories or all Reformers.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would just say, Mr. Speaker, that if the hon. gentlemen opposite think that by making a noise they are going to shorten this discussion, they are very much mistaken. Some years ago that effort was tried, and it only resulted in lengthening the Session to six months instead of three. If hon. gentlemen opposite think they are going to accomplish their object by interrupting those who address the House, they will find that the result will be the lengthening of this Session just as it was before, but perhaps without the extra $500. I was going on to say we have not all Tories or all Grits in the municipal councils. In one of the straight Reform townships in my riding there is a Conservative assessor, and to the credit of the Conservatives in another township, where there is a very strong Conservative majority, there is a Reform assessor. This shows that the political prejudices of the people are not so strong as those of hon. gentlemen opposite. Those hon. gentlemen think that, unless they have under their absolute control the preparation of the voters' list, their friends will not be dealt with justly. If they will take the experience of the last four years under the Franchise Act and compare the voters' list under that Act with the municipal voters' list, they will find that every man in any township, or town, or village who is entitled to be on the list and is not on the list is omitted because he has kept the fact that he is entitled to vote secret. I fully agree with the remarks of the leader of the Opposition, that under the system by which the municipal voters' lists are prepared they are more likely to be fair than are the lists under the present Act. When we consider the fact that the court revising the lists in the municipality is composed of five men chosen by the people themselves, regardless of their political views, simply elected as men who will act uprightly in the preparation and revision of the lists, it is clear that the interests of the electors are likely to be much better served. The best evidence of this is, that there are some Conservative townships which elect Reform officials and vice versa, so there is not that political antipathy which prevails amongst politicians, and it is well there is not. Again, the revision of the voters' lists takes place before the same judge before whom our present list comes if there is an appeal. The judge of the county is the last court of appeal when there is any person in a township, town or village, who wants to be placed on the list. The same appeal is had under the present municipal list that they would have under the present franchise list, if we continue it in existence. Its abolishment would undoubtedly save a large sum to the country. When the list was first introduced, it was stated that it would cost $1,000,000. The First Minister said it would not cost over $200,000, but we know it has cost over $400,000. In addition, the judges in many cases have been very poorly paid. They have gone through much hardship in going from place to place to hold revisions, and I know, in the western section of the Province, a great many judges have complained of being poorly paid. If that is the fact, we cannot expect to obtain much reduction on the expense for revision. The officials serving with the judges also claim that the pay they received was but a miserable pittance for the work they performed. I therefore contend that there is no hope of reducing the cost of the revision to a very much less sum than has been paid. Another matter of expense in connection with the list is this: At the time of the inception of the first voters' list a number of deputy judges were appointed in the several counties solely for the purpose of performing certain duties in connection with the revision of the list. From fifteen to twenty were so appointed, in some cases where they were not required; and I know counties which have a senior and a junior judge, and either could do the work, except the revision of the voters' list. In order to provide revising officers a number of junior judges were appointed solely in connection with the revision of the lists, and the country in this way is to-day called upon to pay $30,000 more than otherwise would be necessary in consequence of the Franchise Act. If the Dominion thought the municipal lists should be reprinted, as not being sufficiently explicit in their terms or in their descriptions, this might be done, and by taking the assessment roll and voters' list of each municipality, we would obtain a much more fair, better and more correct list than any ever produced by this Act or that could be obtained by amending the Act. In my own county, to-morrow, there will be a vote taken upon the Canada Temperance Act, and from six to eight counties altogether will be called upon to vote to-morrow upon that important question. It is highly desirable, in the interests of the people, and with such an important question to decide, that every man entitled to vote should be placed upon the voters' list. In Wellington the people will go to the polls, record their votes in favor of a continuation of the Act or the reverse, and there will be from 3,000 to 4,000 electors in that county alone who will not have the privilege of recording their votes upon the question. This is a very unfortunate state of things, and if we had a municipal voters' list in place of the present voters' list, every one of those men would be entitled to vote. We imagined, judging from the fact that the Government has left the question over for three years without a revision taking place, they would probably introduce an Act to sweep away the Franchise Act; they do not, apparently, feel disposed to do so, but are going to press upon the House, at this late period of the Session, the consideration of this most vital and important question. I contend it is a vital and important question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MULOCK. We had better adjourn while the hon. gentlemen perform.

Mr. SPEAKER. I beg hon. gentlemen to cease making a noise, or I shall deem it my duty to name them.

Mr. McMULLEN. This is a very important question, as it involves the representation of the people and the manner in which they shall perform their duties at the polls. The past history of the Act has shown a great deal of confusion in the public mind. Sometimes people have gone to different polling places. There are different polling places for the Dominion and the local elections, and it is highly desirable we should have a voters' list for all purposes as clearly framed as possible, and the people should vote at the same places for the Dominion elections as they do for local elections. If matters were simplified in that direction, the people would discharge their duties far more intelligently than at present. There is also objection to the form in which the voters' lists were issued last time. They were issued in sheet form, and in a great many cases these sheets became cut and torn in handling, and the names were rendered almost unintelligible before the votes were taken. On the other hand, the municipal lists are prepared in pamphlet form, and they will last from year to year without getting into such a condition as the Dominion lists did, so that you could hardly decipher the names on them. I contend that for this, and many other reasons, we should get rid altogether of this Franchise Bill. I do not think hon. gentlemen opposite will sustain any loss by it, for I do not believe there is a man in this House who can say that in his constituency, owing to the system adopted in the municipal voters' lists, any of his friends would be deprived of the franchise. If that is the fact, I ask why it is considered necessary that, in the present embarrassed, financial condition of the country, this House should be asked to consent to an annual expenditure of three or four hundred thousand dollars for revising voters' lists, where there is no necessity for it? If every man is now on the voters' lists, I ask, why not accept that list? If the Dominion Government want to have the power of revision under control of their own officers, I may point out that the same officers revise the two lists. I understand that before the introduction of this list there was some reason for it, because in some of the Provinces there was no list at all. I believe, however, that has been remedied, and that in every Province they have municipal lists now. That being the case I cannot see the wisdom of keeping up this voters' list at such trouble and such great expense to the country. We must know that every member of this House when he goes home—if this Franchise Act is enforced—instead of being able to attend to his business, will have to travel through his constituency from township to township to try and have this list put in order. That is trouble, annoyance and expense to the members who support the Government, as well as to those in opposition, because if the Conservative members do not pay attention, they may find that some of their friends may be struck off the roll. This is a trouble and expense which we can easily be relieved of by taking the municipal lists as we find them, in place of using those lists which are obnoxious to the members as well as to the people of the country. I believe that there is not a single place in the Dominion that would send in a petition for the maintenance of this Act. At every political demonstration which I have attended, whether of Conservatives or Reformers, they were all opposed to this Act. I hope the Government will decide, after mature deliberation, and, in consideration of the late stage of the Session at which we are asked to consider this question, will withdraw the Act. Before next Session they can prepare a list on the plan of the municipal voters' lists, and adopting that as the basis of representation. If you want to print that list here, I am satisfied that this side of the House would offer no opposition. I hope the Government will consider this suggestion.

Mr. CURRAN. I desire merely to say a few words on this question, as it has been stated that if we were to return to the system that was formerly in vogue no members of the community would be deprived of the right to vote. I think that those who know the history of recent legislation in the Province of Quebec admit that under the influence of the present Franchise Act of the Dominion Government a certain educational process has been going on, and at the last session of the Local Legislature a new Franchise law was passed which, whilst it has very many bad features, at the same time must be held to be in some respects an advance upon what existed there before. The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. McMullen) has stated that not one man in the Dominion of Canada would lose his vote if we were to return to the old system. That is entirely a mistake, because whilst in the Election law passed at the last session of the Legislature in Quebec a vote was given to farmers' sons, and to teachers, and to the sons of owners of real estate in cities, yet we have a large class of wage-earners who under that law are entirely excluded from the right to vote. In the large cities of our Province, Montreal, Quebec and, other places where manufacturing is carried on or where there is any large congregation of people, there is a vast number of the working class, young men, book-keepers, clerks, mechanics, laborers and others, who are earning $300 a year and upwards, but who do not keep house, and who board either with their parents or in some other place, and, under the present law in the Province of Quebec, that large class of wage-earners would be deprived of the right, which they hold to-day, of having their names inscribed upon the voters' lists, and of exercising the franchise at elections for the Dominion Parliament. Under those circumstances, I think it would be a step backwards if we were to deprive that large section of the working classes of their right to vote. They are as intelligent a body of men as can be found in any country; they are young men who, most of them, have been brought up in this country and educated here, and nearly all of whom read and write and follow the public discussions of the affairs of the country which take place in Parliament and in the press of every shade, politically. That class, which has a representative now on the floor of this House, would be deprived of the franchise if we adopted the Quebec provincial lists. I am sure that the names of no less than some thousands of young men in the city of Montreal alone would be wiped off the electoral lists if we went back to the old system. I think that whilst in the Province of Quebec, as has been truly said by the hon. the leader of the Opposition, the vast majority of the people are opposed to manhood suffrage, still I am convinced that there is no class of people in the whole Province of Quebec who are desirous that those men who give the very best evidence of their value to the community by earning $300 a year and upwards should be deprived of the franchise, and who would not be sorry to see those people wiped off the electoral lists. I, for one, cannot consent to that. I would be recreant to my duty here if I did not raise my voice and protest against that large class of persons in the Province of Quebec being deprived of the right to vote which was granted to them by this Parliament a few years ago. I pointed out that under this new law in the Province of Quebec, while a step has been made forward, and the classes which I have mentioned, including teachers, have had the right to vote granted to them, although they are not housekeepers, yet another step has been taken there which I think was not a wise one. They have wiped off the voters' lists the name of every man who holds a public office, whether under the Local Legislature or under the Dominion. That large class of persons are perfectly free to cast an honest and independent vote, now that we have the ballot, and they are an intelligent class who know the workings of the machinery of government; and unless we wish to brand them as persons who are not fit to vote honestly and uprightly, they should not be deprived of that right. If we adopt the amendment of the leader of the Opposition, all that class will be disfranchised, and I think it will be admitted on all hands that they are as independent a class as can be found in the community. Now, I think we should continue the present law, and give it a chance. It has not yet had a chance of showing its results. It is altogether too soon to talk of repealing it. Let us see what will be the effect of these amendments which are proposed in this Bill, and which, according to hon. gentlemen who have opposed the Bill, are in the right direction. The majority of the members of this House I believe will come to the conclusion that, so far as the Province of Quebec is concerned, the amendment proposed by the hon. leader of the Opposition would be a step backward instead of forward.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I certainly am not in sympathy with the views of the hon. member for Montreal Centre. I cannot agree with him, that the people of Quebec are not the best judges of how extended their franchise ought to be. He may not be in sympathy with the Local Legislature of that Province; he may feel that it is not legislating in the interest of the people; but I say that the representatives of the people in that Province are the proper ones to say who ought, and who ought not to vote. They are among the people, they have an opportunity to ascertain the views and opinions of the people, and the Act they passed ought to be satisfactory, not only to the hon. gentleman, but to the Province generally. He admits that they have made a step in advance; and, so far as I am able to understand it, I believe the franchise at present prevailing in Quebec is almost, if not quite, as liberal as the franchise of the Dominion. That being the case, what injury or wrong would be done to the people of Quebec, by our adopting the local franchise for Dominion elections? None at all. The hon. gentleman says, some wage-earners would be deprived of the opportunity of voting. I do not know how many are affected in that way, but I think it would be a limited number. Then, with respect to public officers being deprived of votes, I have no sympathy with his views. From our experience in Dominion affairs, I think it would be much better if they were not permitted to vote. I must say, to the credit of the public officers in the riding I have the honor to represent, that they abstained from voting, as they regarded it unseemly that individuals drawing pay from the Government of the day should go to the polls to record their votes either in favor of or against the Government. Therefore, I think the feeling in regard to them will amount to nothing. I think the amendment moved by my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, is in the right direction, and if these be all the objections the hon. member from Montreal Centre can offer against it, he should be found among those supporting it. We were told years ago, that this Act was a necessity in order that we might have a uniform franchise; we were told time and again, that it was unseemly that this Parliament should allow its members to be elected on a voters' list prepared by some other Parliament. I appeal to the members of this House to point to a single instance of any injustice or wrong having been done to any individual in any municipality, in the whole of the Dominion of Canada, in any election that took place under that system. If they cannot point to a single instance, then I ask, what was the necessity of changing from that system, which had been in existence for years, and adopting a Dominion franchise? If hon. gentlemen opposite could show that any wrong was done or that any agitation existed in the country for a Dominion franchise, then I could understand the necessity of passing an act, and allowing a reasonable amount of expenditure in connection with it; but up to the present time I have never heard a single expression from anyone to show that any such wrong existed prior to the passage of this Franchise Act. Is it not more reasonable to suppose, if we are going to have a voters' list efficiently and impartially prepared, which would be satisfactory to all parties concerned, that it would be better prepared by the various municipal officers, whose duties bring them every day more or less into contact with the electors? They would have better opportunities of knowing every individual who was entitled to be placed on the list, and every one who ought to be struck off. Is it reasonable to suppose that the revising barrister can sit in his office and be able to say what individuals in the different parts of the constituency ought to be struck off the list, and what individuals should be placed on it? If it be the wish of the Government, as I presume it is, that a fair list should be made, why not take the various municipal machinery in operation in every part of the Dominion, by means of which the lists can be prepared with hardly any expense. And these would be more efficient lists than any that can be prepared under the present system. No individual would then be deprived of his vote. Such is not the case under this law. Anyone who has had to go through the trouble of preparing lists will remember that after all the trouble to which he had been put, and after all the expense necessarily incurred, and after the lists had been finally prepared and revised, a very large number indeed of those who ought to have been upon the list were left out, and thus a great amount of dissatisfaction was created Every prospective candidate or representative must expect to be taxed very heavily in seeking out the necessary individuals to be placed upon the lists, and after every exertion had been made and an enormous expense incurred, it is found that the lists are generally incomplete. I hold it is the duty of the Government to adopt means to make the work as easy as possible of having every individual entitled to a vote placed upon the lists. No individual in a free country like this who is entitled to vote should, by any omissions on the part of the Government, be deprived of that right. Now, the present lists were prepared three or four years ago, and in every election that has taken place since we find that a very large number of the people who are entitled to exercise their franchise have been deprived of it through defects in the lists, and not through any fault of theirs. Many had moved into new municipalities, where they had purchased properties and lived one or two years, and yet when an election took place they were not permitted to record their votes, and through no fault of theirs. We all know that the reason these lists are not revised every year is that the Government dare not impose upon the country the annual expenditure of $500,000 which it costs to prepare and revise these lists. I would ask hon. gentlemen on the opposite side, who have gone through an election campaign, if they would dare go back to their constituents and say they were prepared to retain the Dominion lists in their present shape, and inflict upon the Dominion the enormous expenditure incurred in the preparation of these lists, when they cannot bring forward one single tittle of evidence to show any necessity for this expenditure. I would like to see any one of them rise and say he can go back to his constituents and defend this law. I have met those hon. gentlemen, time and again, on the platform, and have always found them as strong in their denunciation of the Act as I could possibly be myself. They were even stronger. They declared there was no necessity for it, and that no wrong had been inflicted by using the provincial lists, and that it was unnecessary to impose this expenditure upon the people. During the previous discussion on this law, hon. gentlemen opposite argued that the lists prepared by the municipalities were not free from partisanship, that the councils appointed men on political grounds, and that the assessors selected their assistants on political grounds, and that hence the Government wished to introduce an impartial system. Is that a reasonable assertion? The council select their assessors, the assessors select their clerks to prepare the lists, and the lists are presented to the county judge for revision. Is there any machinery that could possibly be devised by which we could obtain more impartial lists? Could any list be more reliable than those prepared by the various municipalities throughout the Dominion? Is it not better that we should have only one list in an election campaign, than have voters upon one list that are not on another, so that one half the time they do not know at which poll they must record their votes, or on which list their names are entered? This has been a great source of inconvenience and vexation.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE.—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 114) to incorporate the Title and Mortgage Guarantee Company of Canada.—(Sir Donald Smith.)

DIVORCE.—W. G. LOWRY.

Mr. SMALL moved second reading of Bill (No. 119) for the relief of William Gordon Lowry.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We are now coming to that kind of legislation which is more anomalous, as I think the House will agree, than any other kind of legislation which we are called to pass upon. If I might say so without disrespect, which I do not mean to the House, I would venture to say that Bills in relation to divorce are too frequently passed by the House without a full acquaintance on the part of members, generally, with the circumstances under which they are asked to vote. It is quite true that, in the other House, the evidence is very carefully taken, and I have no doubt, from the discussions which take place in that Chamber, that the cases are very carefully sifted; but I conceive that that does not relieve this House, and every member of it, of the responsibility which the House, and every member, has in allowing such Bills to pass. If we are to allow such legislation at all, as to which I have my own opinion, I submit that, in dealing with questions which are involved in these cases, it is just as imperatively the duty of every member of this House to know the evidence upon which he votes and to form an opinion upon it as it would be if he were performing the functions of a juror in a court of justice, because very important results arise from the conclusions to which we come in these matters. I do not know how I can better impress upon the House that plain duty which should be discharged than by asking the House to divide upon these Bills, and I shall certainly do so in relation to the first of them, which is now proposed for a second reading. No doubt some members have taken an interest in these Bills and will differ from me in the conclusion which I have arrived at I therefore make the remarks I do with all deference to their view and without presuming to say that they should be influenced by the view I take as a lawyer in reference to this first Bill. I will only express my opinion as to the matters of fact which are involved in it. I think this Bill asks for a divorce without any proof whatever of the fact on which the Bill is based, other than the mere admissions of the parties. The Bill is evidently promoted on the ground that the respondent has been guilty of adultery, but there is not the slightest evidence that she was so guilty except the admissions which were made by herself. There is no proof that there was ever an opportunity given for her to commit the offence excepting one, and that was the occasion on which she met the party with whom it is alleged that she committed the offence, and when there was nothing that would create a strong presumption that the offence was then committed. The only occasion, as far as it appears by the evidence, was at an interview brought about by a friend of the family or a friend of herself—I do not know which—who invited her to come to his house and invited the person with whom she is alleged to have committed the offence to meet her there, apparently for the purpose of explanation or in order to prevent further trouble or dispute between the families. On that occasion, she met this person in the kitchen, and remained there for some hours in conversation with him; but I submit to hon. gentlemen who have read the evidence that there is nothing in the time, or place, or circumstances of their meeting to lead to the presumption—as such presumption is often found in cases of that kind—that the offence was then committed. I, therefore, say that the case remains on the admission of the wife that she had committed the offence. It is true, no doubt, that the admissions of a party accused of an offence are proper evidence, but the weight of that evidence depends entirely upon the interest which the party may have had, and in this instance it is apparent that the real interest of the woman was in favor of making an admission. She desires a separation, of course, and her husband desires it as well. She did not live happily with him, and she left him. By the evidence, it is true, that that was without any provocation, and under circumstances which devolved the whole blame on her in the separation. She left him within three weeks or so after the marriage, and never lived with him afterwards. He remonstrated against that, and she expressed plainly to him her determination not to live with him again, and admitted then that she had been unchaste prior to her marriage. There was at that time no admission that the offence had been committed during marriage, and I need not remind the House that, as regards the antecedent events, they formed no ground for the passage of this Bill. But this important fact appears, by her statement to her husband then, that she was anxious for a divorce, indeed she avowed that she would marry this man named Wilson, with whom, it is alleged, she had previously cohabited; that she would marry him if she had an opportunity. It appears, then, that there was present to her mind the motive of a desire for divorce, and she seemed afterwards willing to help her husband in getting one. Subsequently she makes the admission that at that interview in the kitchen, she committed the offence, and she makes that admission in the presence of a witness. The witness was brought for the purpose of being a witness, but the wife refused to make the admission in the presence of her husband and the witness. The husband retired, and the witness pursued the enquiry and pressed upon the wife the necessity of making an admission if she were guilty of the offence, and she finally made the admission to him. These are the circumstances under which this case is presented, without, as I have said, any proof whatever of the act having been committed, but depending entirely upon the admissions of the wife, and those admissions made under a state of mind which, however discredible it may be to her, gave her an incentive for making the admission. Under the circumstances I think the House will be inclined to believe—I know the conclusion has been forced upon me—that the case is not free from suspicion of collusion between the husband and wife. It is true there is the bald statement which is always made in such cases, on the part of the husband, that no collusion does exist. I know nothing of the parties, I have not seen the witnesses, I can only vote on the case as it is before me, and from the case as it appears before me, I feel so impressed with the idea that there may have been collusion, and that the case is a weak one, resting on the admissions which the wife made, that I shall feel compelled on that ground, if no other existed, to vote against the Bill, and I feel bound to call the attention of the House particularly to this Bill. I may add that, notwithstanding the careful enquiry which takes place in the other Chamber in regard to such matters, a full debate took place on the Bill before it was passed, and 28 members of the Senate voted for the Bill and 23 against it. On that division, which was a close one, two Senators who were present asked to be relieved from voting, and abstained from voting on the ground that they had not seen copies of the evidence. As I said before, I do not wish the conclusion to which I have come to influence the judgment of other members; but I do feel that this is a case in which there is a peculiar responsibility upon us to examine carefully the principle upon which we shall proceed. I do not hesitate to say that the Bill is one for which I cannot vote.

Mr. JAMIESON. I desire to say a few words in reference to the Bill before the House, because I happen to know the most of the facts connected with the case. The applicant for this divorce resides in my constituency, and I should be expected to take some interest in the matter if the party is properly entitled to the relief which he seeks. On the evidence, I do not agree with the Minister of Justice in the conclusion he has come to. I think that a Bill of this character having been passed before a properly constituted committee of the Senate, and the evidence having been adduced before that committee and carefully investigated, and the committee having unanimously reported in favor of the Bill—these are strong circumstances which should induce us to vote for the second reading of this Bill in order that it may go before the Private Bills Committee of this House. I am quite aware that there was a discussion in the Senate on the second reading, or the third reading—I believe it was the third reading. I will just ask the hon. gentlemen who have given any attention to the evidence, to compare the statements made by the senators who took part in the discussion in opposition to this Bill, with the evidence which has come down in this House, and they will come to the conclusion that those who opposed the Bill in the Senate were either ignorant of the nature of the evidence, or they wilfully misrepresented that evidence. I have come to that conclusion after having carefully looked into the evidence which was taken before the Committee, and after having perused the speeches made by the hon. gentlemen. I take this to be one of the most painful cases which could come before any body having authority to grant relief of this character. It is not necessary for me to go into the evidence at length; I trust that hon. gentlemen have perused the evidence, although I confess that in this and in other cases, it seems a very difficult matter to get the evidence in a case of this kind, into our hands. It is sent down to this House ostensibly for the purpose of giving information to the members, but unfortunately, from some cause or other, the evidence very often disappears. I trust that in the future more care will be exercised in cases of this kind, so that members for whose use and benefit the evidence is printed and sent to this House, should be enabled to peruse it. I would say in reference to the evidence in this case, that, in my judgment, a very strong case for relief has been made out. I look upon it as one of the most unfortunate things that could have happened to this young man. I feel satisfied that if hon. members would carefully examine the evidence and weigh the facts, they will not for a single moment hesitate to vote for the second reading of the Bill. I do not desire to go into the evidence, but if hon. gentlemen will look at it they will find that this young man was basely deceived. What occurred afterwards, in my judgment, was ample evidence to support the charge which was made against the respondent in this case. I do not desire to enter more fully into the evidence, but I trust the House will see it is proper to allow this Bill to go to the Private Bills Committee, where the evidence can be carefully scrutinised and examined, and no doubt hon. gentlemen will agree with me that this is a case in which the rule ought to be followed.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman state if Judge Gowan was on that Committee, if he took part in the enquiry, and if he concurred in the finding.

Mr. JAMIESON. Yes, he was chairman. The Committee unanimously reported the Bill.

Mr. MULOCK. I understand the Minister of Justice has drawn his conclusion from the evidence that there is not sufficient proof of the alleged offence, and also that there may have been collusion. Then I understand the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Jamieson) to state that the Committee who heard the evidence were not of that opinion—

Mr. JAMIESON. Certainly not.

Mr. MULOCK—and that Judge Gowan, who has taken great interest in these matters, concurred in the finding. Under these circumstances, would it not be desirable to postpone adjudicating on the case until an investigation has been held by a Committee of this House? While it has been the custom in all uncontested cases to accept enquiries before the Senate Committee and not repeat the work, yet I do not understand there is anything binding upon the Private Bills Committee of this House, where there is any conflict of opinion and any doubt, not to take evidence under our own direction and with special direction to the points stated to be in doubt by the Minister of Justice. I think it fair and in the interest of all parties that, before giving final judgment, this House should investigate the case by its own Committee.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I agree with my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, that if there is any doubt we must be guided by fixed rules, and we must assume the responsibility of deciding these cases. I must say, after reading the evidence that, putting aside the confession alleged to have been made by the wife, the evidence is not such as would satisfy a court of divorce. If the evidence were at all clear, then the confession might perhaps be brought in; but this evidence is so weak I do not think any court would adjudicate upon it and grant a divorce. I admit, when we come to the question of confessions we have to be guided by rules laid down with respect to them. The practice adopted here is somewhat analogous to the practice established in the House of Lords before the court was established for the purpose of dealing with divorce cases. The rules were very clear that a confession was not sufficient evidence on which to obtain a divorce, and the ecclesiastical courts follow the same rule, and it wss quite evident that the reason on which the rule was founded was that it afforded opportunity of collusion; and in the Divorce Court in the Province from which I come, the court has rejected confessions in cases of this kind. It is true the law in England has been altered of late years, since the formation of the new Court of Probate; it is based on the principles of common law, rather than civil law, as regards the rules of evidence, and the common law provides that confessions are admitted, the same as any other evidence, and are sent to the jury. The reason for the rule which has prevailed in the House of Lords, and in ecclesiastical courts, does not exist in the Court of Probate, because there the judge presides, and if he comes to the conclusion on the evidence that there is collusion, he refuses the divorce. There is also a process by which the matter can be further enquired into, by the intervention of the Queen's Proctor. I do not, therefore, consider that in trying this question as a tribunal we should adopt the present practice of the Court of Probate, but we should rather follow the rule that has hitherto prevailed in the House of Lords and in the ordinary courts in ecclesiastical cases. Viewing the case in this light, and after reading the evidence carefully, I come to the conclusion that we should reject the Bill. The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) stated that the Committee of the Senate was unanimous, while the Minister of Justice has pointed to the close division in the Senate on the question. With either matter we have nothing to do. We are here to form an opinion on the evidence before us. Applying the rules which govern these cases to that evidence, we must endeavor to come to a correct conclusion in regard to it. Notwithstanding the serious position in which this young man will be placed, I do not think we can ignore the principle which should guide us in determining this case, and I concur with the Minister of Justice and feel myself most reluctantly compelled to vote against this Bill.

Mr. LISTER. As I understand the matter, the motion before the House is simply that this matter should be referred to a committee. I appreciate fully the powerful argument of the Minister of Justice, and if there is any good reason for believing that the parties are acting in collusion, the application made for divorce should be refused by this House. But the House owes something to the Senate, which is the court for the trial and decision of these cases. There is, to be sure, a very considerable responsibility resting upon members of this House, but heretofore we have always accepted the decision of the Senate as to these matters, and without paying very much attention to the evidence, we have concluded their consideration and recommendation to be sufficient to lead us to grant a divorce. So far as this case is concerned I think that, under all the circumstances, it should go to a committee of this House to investigate the evidence. It is a very hard thing indeed that this young man applying for a divorce should be ruled out in the way proposed. If there has been adultery committed, he should receive a divorce; and it is not courteous to the Senate, or doing justice to ourselves, to throw out the Bill without further consideration. It should be referred to a committee to hear the evidence, and consider the evidence laid before the other House. So far as that House is concerned, they have devoted themselves very thoroughly to the estimation of this class of cases. If there is one class of business more than another to which the Senate has given great care and attention, it is to these divorce cases, and when we are informed that a gentleman of the legal experience of Judge Gowan, chairman of the committee, has concurred in the finding of the committee, that opinion should be received with very great weight by members of this House. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) has said that the present practice in England is that the evidence of the wife shall be sufficient to obtain a divorce unless the judge is satisfied there is collusion. In this evidence there is nothing to show that the parties have been acting in collusion, and, such being the case, I feel bound to vote for the reference of this matter to a committee of this House.

Mr. TISDALE. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) has largely expressed what I would have said about this question and I will only supplement his remarks by two or three observations. There is one circumstance to which I would call the attention of the House, and it is a very important consideration, I think, in a matter of this kind. When you appeal from an arbitrator to a judge the judge very frequently relies, and relies almost entirely in doubtful points, on the impression that the arbitrator forms when hearing a witness. I think that is a fair illustration of our duties here as contrasted with those of the Senate. The Senate heard those witnesses and we did not, and in a doubtful case it would make all the difference in the world to me in forming an opinion as to whether I heard the witnesses or not. Therefore, what the hon. member for Lambton says is, I think, very pertinent to that view. The Senate is the tribunal which this class of legislation is delegated to, and, as the hon. gentleman says, they make very careful enquiry and hear the witnesses. I cannot agree with the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) that there is no other evidence but the confession of the wife. Surely, if he has read about the meeting that took place in the blacksmith's house, there is a strong inference there; and, to my mind, the manner in which the witness gave his evidence on that point would have much to do with the case. If the Senate send a Bill of this sort to this House there ought be no objection to referring it to the Private Bills Committee. I would regret very much, and I do not care what the majority in the Senate was, if after the Senate sent the Bill here we should not send it to the Private Bills Committee where it would be thoroughly considered.

Mr. KIRK. I would like to ask the Speaker whether the result of this Bill being carried on the second reading will be that it will go to Committee on Private Bills.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I believe the statement made by some hon. members that those who hear the evidence are in many cases more competent to judge of the weight that should be given to that evidence than those who only read it. Still it does not follow in all cases that we are not able to form a correct judgment from printed evidence. I think this case is one in which we can form a very fair judgment from reading the evidence and without hearing the witnesses at all. I do not see the particular object of referring this Bill to the Private Bills Committee, because I do not understand that the Committee takes any fresh evidence.

Mr. MULOCK. Certainly they can.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). If fresh evidence is taken before the Private Bills Committee it will have to go to the Senate to be reheard, or we will have the anomaly of this House agreeing to the Bill on evidence the Senate has never heard of. I am strongly inclined to agree with the position taken by the Minister of Justice and my friend from St. John on this question. The evidence appears to me to be of the slightest character possible. After reading the case over it seems to me that those who promoted the Bill do so largely on the grounds that there had been unchastity previous to the marriage, but we all know that is not a ground for divorce. The only ground on which we could grant this Bill is that there was adultery committed in the blacksmith's shop. On this we have only the evidence of one witness who states that he went there for the purpose of obtaining a confession from the wife of her guilt on that occasion. I must say that on reading the evidence carefully which he gave to the Committee, I have come to the conclusion that the evidence was not given as fully and as truly as I would like to enable me to form a judgment which would be absolutely correct. You must remember that in this case there was no opposition to the Bill and that there was no cross examination of the witness except the casual cross examination which the members of the Committee themselves conducted. The witness upon whose evidence, and upon whose evidence alone, this Bill can be granted, states that he went to the woman, and he said to her: "This scrape you have got into is a terrible thing. I asked her if she knew I was there as a witness, and I said I am brought here as a witness, and anything you tell me will come against you." It seems to me that this is a very curious way for a witness to give his examination. Afterwards the witness tells her this crime was committed by her, and asks her, "is it not so," and he says, "she admitted it was so." That is the sum and substance of the evidence on which the Bill is asked to be granted. It seems to me that we ought to look upon evidence of this kind with the greatest suspicion. I would not, myself, be inclined to vote against the Bill on the simple grounds that there was no other evidence than that confession, if that evidence were clear and full, and the circumstances pointed clearly to guilt, but in this case I submit it is not so. It occurs to me, from the evidence, that the probabilities are against the party having committed the guilt on the occasion of the meeting at the blacksmith's. In England, as we know the Queen's Proctor can intervene and very often does intervene in a doubtful case, but we have no Queen's Proctor here. The wife appears anxious that a divorce should be granted and I have come to the conclusion that beyond all reasonable doubt there was collusion between the parties although that was in a sense contradicted by the husband. In reading the evidence no reasonable man can come to any other conclusion than that both desired a divorce and the case rests entirely on the confession of the wife made to this witness who says he went to her as a witness and put the words in her mouth. I have come to the conclusion that there are no grounds for granting the divorce in question or for sending it to the Private Bills Committee, where the Bill would not be one bit more advanced than it is here.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

House resumed consideration of Bill (No. 4) further to amend the Revised Statutes, chap. 5, respecting the Electoral Franchise.—(Sir John Thompson.)

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I was endeavoring at six o'clock to point out to the Government the impropriety at the present time of going on with this Bill. I was endeavoring to show that the Act, in the experience we have had of it so far, has proven to be extremely expensive, and that the country is not favorable to its continuance any longer on the Statute-book; and I think the majority of the members of this House, as well as the majority of the people, will agree with me that it is of no benefit to the country. I have had frequent opportunities of meeting gentlemen on the Conservative side of politics in the country, and I have yet to find a single individual who would undertake to defend the Act on a platform during the campaign. That being the case, it is unreasonable that the First Minister should persevere in retaining it on the Statute book. It has been pointed out in the House to-day that if an election should be held in any constituency at the present time, a very large number of the voters who formerly lived there are not to be found there now. That shows the objectionableness of this Act. In various sections of the country where the Scott Act is in existence, the electors are at the present time being called upon to record their votes for or against the repeal of that Act, and in doing so they are compelled to use a voters' list three or four years old. The result is that perhaps 500 or 1,000 who were entitled to vote at the inauguration of the Scott Act are now out of the country, so that the expression of opinion will not be in any way satisfactory. Besides that, since the revision of the list, a large number of other people who have come there, and ought to be entitled to vote, are not permitted to vote. To-morrow there will be a vote taken in St. Thomas on the repeal of the Scott Act. I was credibly informed when I was last there, that in St. Thomas alone between 400 and 500 of the electors who voted when that Act came into force are now absent, and that, on account of the neglect to revise the lists, some 300 or 400 people who ought to be placed on the voters' lists and be entitled to vote, are not permitted to do so. It is utterly impossible for those who are doing the canvassing to ascertain the names of those who possess votes, so that the vote will not be a fair expression of the views of the people as to whether they are in favor of or opposed to the Scott Act. Sir, I challenge and defy any of the hon. gentlemen opposite to stand up and defend the Franchise Act and say that they are prepared to go and defend it before their constituents. When they are before the electors, they condemn the Act because of its being very cumbersome, and because of the enormous expense connected with it; and if the First Minister finds that his followers one and all condemn the Act when before the people, and that they dare not get up in the House and defend it in the interest of the country and of the purity of the franchise and of elections, it is very unreasonable in him to expect us to support it. Will he or any of his followers tell me that it is essential that this Act should continue on the Statute-book? Will he or any of his followers say that the elections have been better conducted, or that the voters' lists have been better prepared since it has been on the Statute-book than before? Such is not the case, and, therefore, I say it is the bounden duty of the Government to accept the amendment offered by the hon. leader of the Opposition, and allow each Province to arrange the franchise in the way most suitable and agreeable to itself. For these reasons I am bound to vote for the amendment.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is known to those who were members of the last Parliament that when the Act which is now under consideration was placed on the Statute-book, I was slightly opposed to it. It was, Sir, as you know, at that very time fully discussed. It was very strongly opposed as first introduced, and I think it was worthy of the character it received at the hands of many members of the House as one of the most iniquitous measures ever proposed in Parliament. As it finally passed through Committee to take its place among the statutes of the land, it was somewhat improved; some of its most objectionable features were removed. As the Bill was originally introduced, power was taken by the Government to appoint a person, not one of the judges of the land, but a barrister of five years' standing, and to place in his hands absolute power over the electorate of the country. He could virtually have put on the list whom he chose; he could, if unprincipled, have left off whom he chose; and there was no appeal from him. That provision was modified somewhat, the First Minister, whether willingly or unwillingly, conceding that when the revising barrister was other than a judge, there should be an appeal to the judge; but in the case of a judge, there is still no appeal. Many other objectionable features were wiped out, and the Act was made a great deal better than it was as first introduced, because as first introduced it was simply an assumption by the Government of the rights and liberties of the people, nothing more, nothing less. It is no wonder that it has become a part of the history of this country that the Liberal members of Parliament, who believe in the power being centred in the people, should have stayed away from their homes, and at the risk of their health, if not of their lives, in order to combat that measure until they succeeded in getting some of the most objectionable features in it eradicated. But even as it did pass into the Statute-book, we claim it was still a most vexatious measure. Not one request had been made to the Government, either directly or through any newspaper from one end of the Dominion to the other, asking for any change in our franchise at all; yet this Act was passed, and to put it into operation costs us about $500,000 annually. It was stated by the First Minister and others that it would cost nothing like that amount, that the cost would be comparatively trifling, and probably upon this assurance some members voted for the measure, who would not otherwise have done so. But now we have seen the Act put in force. We know the expense involved, and we know that it cost, the year we had it in operation, between $400,000 and $500,000; and since then it has been suspended and not in operation at all. The right hon. the First Minister said this afternoon that this was an inopportune time to discuss the measure at all, because the Government were simply introducing some simple amendments to the Act. Why, the Government placed upon the Statute-book an Act which is unworkable, and they have to come down now and try to make it workable. The very fact that it has been allowed from year to year to lie in abeyance, the very fact that an Act has been passed here suspending its operation from year to year, shows that it is an unworkable Act; and after all the expenses incurred, after all the time lost, the Minister of Justice comes down and is now trying to put the Act in workable shape. Well, the Minister of Justice claims as one of the main features in the amendments he proposes that it will lighten the cost of the working of this Act. A very laudable motive, indeed, but I can show him a more efficacious way—the way proposed by the leader of the Opposition. Let him wipe out the Act altogether, and there will be no expense at all. That would not only lighten the expense, but completely remove it. Would that produce a state of confusion and disorder? No; we would accomplish a saving of over $500,000 yearly, and return to the system that the people of this country have always approved of and never asked to have changed, and to which they wish to return now. These are some of the reasons why I think we can very strongly urge the House to support the amendment proposed by the leader of the Opposition. The hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) said he could not accept the amendment, because the Dominion franchise was lower than the franchise of the Province of Quebec. He said he could not think of disfranchising the mechanics and the workingmen of Montreal as we would do if we returned to the local franchise. I do not think the hon. gentleman is correct, judging by what I have heard from other members from the Province of Quebec, but assuming he is correct, I was not aware that there was any very strong feeling in the Province of Quebec to have an Act passed by this Legislature extending the franchise when that could be equally done by their Local Legislature if they desired it. However, if the hon. gentleman thinks he is right, that is his concern; but I wish to point out to the representative of Ontario constituencies that by retaining this Act upon the Statute-book, they will disfranchise hundreds of young men, wage earners and others of the Province of Ontario, and if the Ontario representatives are as careful to maintain the franchise of those who are entitled to it in their Province as the hon member for Montreal (Mr. Curran) professes to be with regard to his, there is but one course open to them and that is to eliminate this Franchise Act from our Dominion statutes and thus prevent the disfranchising of a large number of young men, wage-earners, who had the right of franchise conferred on them by the Province of Ontario last Session. I take the ground that the provincial lists should be used. I take the ground that this is a federal union, and that each Province shall decide how its proportion of members to this House shall be elected and who shall elect them. I believe in that principle, setting aside the question of expense altogether. Why, Sir, not an hon. gentleman on the opposite side, although this law has been attacked, has arisen to defend it except the hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Curran), and we heard the grounds on which he defended it. Why, the feelings of the hon. gentlemen opposite are known with reference to this matter. These gentlemen have on the public platform disclaimed responsibility for this law—those of them who were not members of the House when it was passed. They stated they had nothing to do with the passing of it, and did not believe in it. This amendment proposed by the leader of the Opposition will test the sincerity of these hon. gentlemen. I consider it right and necessary that we should have this discussion. When this law was placed upon the Statute-book, another Parliament was sitting; a great many members who are now in this House were not members then and not in a position to judge the merits of the Act. That Act has been allowed to lie unused from that date until now. It is now proposed to put it into operation. I may remark that the fact of leading the country without revised voters' lists for four years is little short of an outrage. What has been the result? Men who had removed out of the country, men whose whole interests were in the United States, have votes in Canadian constituencies, although they have ceased to hold any interest whatever in this country; and on the other hand there are hundreds of young men who have come of age and others entitled to vote, who are disfranchised because the Government have allowed this Act to remain inoperative while still retaining it on the Statute-book. Now that they are moving in the direction of making it operative again, we take the first opportunity of moving against it, and calling on this House to pronounce whether it should not be abolished; and it will not do for hon. members in the future, to say they are not responsible for the passing of this Act. They will now have to assume responsibility for this law, which they know costs nearly half a million of dollars of public money annually, and will continue to cost that, and which has caused endless inconvenience, expenditure, and trouble, besides restricting the franchise in many Provinces, disfranching men who have votes under Provincial laws, and who ought to have them in Dominion affairs. I make these remarks, because it is desirable this House should, on this, its first opportunity, express its opinion as to whether we ought to continue an Act which was never asked for, which curtails the liberties of the people, and costs annually something like $500,000. We are not so flush in our public funds that we can afford to throw away this amount for something which is not only unnecessary but which is absolutely injurious, and which hon. gentlemen opposite know in their hearts is injurious to this country. I have the greatest pleasure in voting for the amendment which proposes to repeal this Act which I never approved of, and which I have no higher opinion of now that I had when it was placed on the Statute-book.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). I do not want to keep the House very long by going into the merits of this celebrated Franchise Act. It would be useless to do so, because they have been dealt with by other hon. gentleman on this side, and the Act has not been defended on the other side of the House. The only hon. gentleman who has risen on the other side of the House, the member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), has confined his remarks principally to an attack upon the Province of Quebec. His charge is that the Province of Quebec, as far as her electoral law is concerned, is far behind the other Provinces, and the only argument which he has made in favor of keeping this law on the Statute book of the Dominion is that, if it is now repealed, though it might enlarge the franchise in other Provinces, it would reduce the franchise in the Province of Quebec. I am surprised to find that charge made by a representative of the Tory party of the Province of Quebec. Who is responsible for the electoral law in the Province of Quebec being behind that of the other Provinces? It is the Tory party. In the year 1875, we had the most pronounced Conservative Government ever seen in that Province. The de Boucherville Government was then in power. An Act was introduced by the leader of that Government in the Assembly, the Hon. Mr. Angers, now Lieut-Governor of the Province, to consolidate and amend the Electoral Law, and I then moved an amendment embodying several new franchises. It was a very modest amendment, considering what we have now adopted in other Provinces and considering what the Province of Quebec is reproached by the hon. gentlemen for not having adopted. It was an amendment proposing to give votes to all householders, all professional men, all teachers, all persons earning $400 a year, and all young men holding diplomas. That amendment was opposed most strenuously by every Tory in the House without any exception. I was denounced as a man who wanted to introduce revolution in the Province of Quebec, and I am not sure that the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) was not amongst those who attacked me on that occasion. All the Tory press attacked me for that proposal. The Minerve, the regular organ of the Tory party, attacked me for introducing an amendment which would give a vote to people who had scarcely a roof to live under. Now, we see the member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), who boasts that he is a dyed-in-the-wool Tory, reproaching the Government of the Province of Quebec for being backwards in regard to the Electoral Law. The hon. member is the last man who should make that reproach. On the occasion to which I refer, these amendments were opposed by every Tory member in the Local Legislature, and the only votes I got were those of the handful of Liberals we had at that time, numbering, I think, 10 or 12 in the Legislative Assembly. They all voted for my amendments to extend the franchise to a great many people who were deprived of it. I repeat it, if that reproach was a well founded one, the hon. gentleman should be the last to make it to our Province, because he and his party are responsible for the state of things in existence in that Province until we had a change of Government. The hon. gentleman says that, if the present law is repealed, the Province of Quebec will be in a very bad position. I do not like to hear such a reproach and such an argument from a gentleman coming from my own Province. I think every man should have enough pride in his own Province to induce him not to try to get his Province condemned by members from the other Provinces, and especially when such a condemnation is not deserved. The hon. gentleman is trying to enlist the sympathies of the laborers and the wage-earners of the Province of Quebec, because he says that, if the amendment were passed, many of them would be deprived of the right to vote. That statement is not well founded. Take the law as it is now. Before the amendments were made in the last Session of the Quebec Legislature, it was provided by our law that any man could vote who was the proprietor of real estate amounting to $300 in cities of more than 20,000 people, or $200 in the country districts, or who was a tenant or occupant of real estate worth $30 a year in those cities, or $20 in the country. I make bold to say that it would be impossible to find a married workman or wage-earner who would not have a vote either as proprietor or occupant or tenant under this law. Besides that, there are new franchises introduced during the late Session of the Quebec Legislature, giving votes to the sons of farmers and of owners of real estate, and to teachers without any property qualification. If you take the franchise as it is now in Quebec, after these amendments were made during the last Session of the Legislature in that Province, I am sure, speaking for the country parts of the Province, that the franchise possessed under the Dominion law will not be taken from one out of a thousand of those who are now in possession of it. In the cities, who is going to be deprived of the franchise who now has it under the Dominion law? The hon. member can scarcely find any. He may find a few dozen unmarried young men—very respectable young men—who are not keeping house; but anyone who is keeping house is sure to have the franchise under that law as he has under the present Dominion law. The reproach of the hon. gentleman is therefore completely unfounded. The hon. gentleman has also objected that the law of the Province of Quebec has deprived Government employés both federal and local, of the right to vote. The hon. gentleman ought to know at whose demand that law was passed. It was at the demand of the employés themselves and that was due to the system which has been followed in the past. I could give many instances in reference to the course which has been taken in regard to those employés. Only last week, I saw an employé of the Treasury Department who was first employed when I was there. He had the misfortune to be a Liberal, and he told me how glad he was that the law was passed. He said that during the last election he was known to be a Liberal, and as it was well known that he would register his vote in favor of the Opposition candidate, some Tory wire puller went to him and said: "I warn you that if you give your vote you will be summarily dismissed." This gentleman told him that he had a right to give his vote, that he was not meddling with the elections in any way to make himself obnoxious to the Government of the day (the Ross Government). The Tory wire puller repeated the threat that if he voted he would be immediately dismissed, and he did not vote. He said to me: "I never felt more humiliated, and if I had not had a family, I would have run the risk of being dismissed at once." Sir, these are the people who have been asking the Government of Quebec to pass the law which was passed during the last Session. We saw on a late occasion in the election which took place in the County of Laval, that all the employés of the penitentiary went in a body to vote for a man who would not have been elected but for this interference of federal employés. These are the reasons why that law was passed by the Quebec Legislature. The hon. member is not following one of the most important leaders of his party. The hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) knows what position Mr. de Boucherville occupies in the Conservative party in the Province of Quebec. Well, that law was approved by Mr. de Boucherville in the Legislative Council, although it was denounced by some other Conservative members; but that great and highly respected Conservative leader in the Province of Quebec approved with both hands the law which was intended to deprive the employés of the two Governments from the right of voting. As for my opinion of the Franchise Act, it is very well known, and I shall vote with much pleasure for the amendment.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec).

Mr. LA RIVIÈRE. From the remarks made by the last two members, I notice that they are praising the franchise system in their respective Provinces. I am very sorry that I cannot say as much concerning the system in my own Province. At the same time we see that a different franchise system exists in each Province, and if we were to adopt the amendment before the House, we would have a House composed of members who would be elected under diverse franchises. The main object in view in passing the Act we have now in force was to have a uniform system of franchise, but if the present law was repealed, that object would be lost. I say that the question of expense, though it may be large, should not be considered when the question is that of having, as far as practicable, a uniform system of representation for the whole Dominion. In the Province of Manitoba we have a system that is called the one man one vote. Only residents are qualified to vote in their respective localities. That may be considered well enough for a Local Legislature, but in a Legislature like this, having so many powers, not only over the liberties of individuals but over their properties, I believe the franchise should be much more extended than it is for Local Legislatures. If we adopted the local franchise for the House of Commons, a large number of electors would be deprived of their right to vote, and they would thus have no voice in the representation of their respective constituencies. In my own constituency there are over 1,000 electors owning large properties, but who, unfortunately, not being residents in the constituency, would be deprived of their vote if the law was made different from what it is to-day. I believe it would be a hardship to these electors to deprive them of their franchise by adopting the local franchise that now exists in that Province. This is not so much felt in the Local House, because during the local election these electors cannot very well vote in all the places where they are qualified; but as respects the House of Commons, I believe it would be a hardship. Therefore, I say that not only because the system at present in operation has been found effectual, but with the object of having a uniform franchise, we had better maintain the present law. Let us amend it if it is found defective, let us extend it if it is not found to be wide enough, but let us not throw away a good law which was put on the Statute-book for a good purpose.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I think the amendment proposed by the leader of the Opposition is one that should carry in this House. It should carry for many reasons. It should carry, in the first place, because the Franchise Act is unnecessary; it should carry again because the Franchise Act is very expensive; it should carry because the Franchise Act may become very mischievous in the way it is at present constituted. It is well known to every member of this House that the Franchise Act is not uniform in its character. The member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) indicated that he would support it because it was uniform. The hon. member should know that the Act is not uniform in its character, that the franchise under that Act is not the same in all the Provinces, but differs in two or three of them, I believe. So, if the hon. member wishes uniformity, he cannot oppose the amendment proposed by the leader of the Opposition. Now, the expenditure for printing the Act is something enormous, and the people of this country get nothing in return for it. I do not know a single redeeming feature in the expenditure of that money. I see by the report of the Auditor General that in 1887-88 we expended under the Franchise Act $69,970.35. Now, what in the world we expended that money for, is something I cannot understand. There has been no revision of the lists since 1886, and that revision cost us, if I mistake not, something in the neighborhood of $400,000, to be accurate $407,625.69, so that we have nearly half a million expended, probably more than that, by this Dominion for the Franchise Act. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, the opposition that was made to the Bill when it was introduced; you remember the long days and night sittings that we held over this Bill, and if there is anything that I look back upon in my career in Parliament with a feeling of pride, it is the contention we made on that occasion; it is the effort we made on that occasion to defend the people's rights, and save the people's money. I have sometimes regretted that we did not hold out longer. I have sometimes thought it would have been one of the best things we could have done in the interests of the country if we had continued the agitation. In travelling through the country I have met many candid thinking men who have come to the same conclusion. At the last election many gentlemen brought out to support the Government declared in their addresses that, if elected, they would vote for the repeal of the Franchise Act. I know of some instances in which that was the case. I do not know how many of those elected to support the Government made such pledges, but I am aware of some who did.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. LANDERKIN. They will be named, no doubt; the people will name them.

An hon. MEMBER. Are you frightened?

Mr. LANDERKIN. I stood before the country in opposition to the Franchise Act before, and was not frightened. I do not think I am frightened now. I am never frightened when I know I am right, and I know I am right in opposing the continuation of this Act. It would be in the interest of this House and country if the Act were repealed, and I do not know but that I am prepared to make another bold stand and continue the agitation against this Act. Some hon. gentlemen desire to have the Session brought speedily to a close. I am anxious for that, but I am not anxious to sacrifice the rights of the people in order to do so. I am not anxious to get away and leave an Act on the Statute-book that I consider bad and vicious and against the interests of the people. I am not going to consult my own convenience and close the Session before I have expressed my views on this Act, which I consider to be a bad one. I prefer the system we have followed since Confederation with respect to the voters' lists, a system which has cost nothing to the people who voted for members of the House of Commons. On the other hand half a million dollars have been thrown away on this Franchise Act. That sum given as a bonus would have double-tracked the Grand Trunk from Montreal to Toronto. Would that not have been of more advantage than a Franchise Act by which the Government have been able to get persons on the voters' lists who have no right there? In one township in my riding 31 bogus voters were allowed to remain on the list, simply because the solicitor was half an hour too late in posting letters objecting to those names. Those 31 bogus voters there were men who had no stake in the county; they had been put on the list by fraudulent means, by wrong representations, and every one of those 31 bogus voters voted on that occasion.

An hon. MEMBER. How many did you get?

Mr. LANDERKIN. I did not get a single one. I was elected by the freemen of this country. Moreover, I was elected by men opposed to this Franchise Act, and I will fight against the continuance of this Act so long as I am in this House, because it is unnecessary, because it is subversive of the rights of the people, because it may be mischievous in its effects, and may lead the Government to do acts which, under other circumstances, they would not do, or have their officers commit acts against the interests of free elections in this country. I presume we shall have the Minister of Public Works voting for the amendment of the leader of the Opposition. He is an honest looking Minister, and I think his honesty will compel him to vote for the amendment. I shall be very much surprised if, after consideration, that Minister is not found voting for it. I notice that very frequently during this Session he has told hon. members that he was unable to erect buildings that were very much required in different constituencies or do other works necessary to develop the wealth of the country. I do not know that he denies these requests so often when elections are near at hand as he has done this Session; but if he had half a million to spend on public works, it would be a benefit to the country. No one knows better than the Minister that half a million would do more good to the country than getting bogus voters on the list to sustain a corrupt administration of public affairs. I am in earnest in this matter, and if this Bill goes into committee I may continue my agitation as long as I did before. I do not think I will do so, but I will take the matter into serious consideration; and I will oppose the Bill at every stage, because I believe it is an unjust, an improper and an unfair measure, one unnecessary, uncalled for and one vicious in character, and one not uniform in character, as the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. La Rivière) pointed out. I hope the amendment will be adopted. From one end of the country to the other there is a desire to have this measure repealed. I believe a great many supporters of the Government would be glad if they did repeal it, viewing it from a party standpoint. It is an Act that gives great trouble to everyone in political life. It is very expensive to those in political life, and it compels hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to put their hands in their own pockets in order to obtain justice. It may be different, perhaps, with hon. gentlemen supporting the Administration; perhaps they may have other means of raising money and may compel the public to contribute to defeat the people by the use of their own money. These are some of the reasons why I oppose, and shall continuously oppose this Act. I do not know but we may be here far into the summer before the measure is passed from the way I feel on the question now.

Mr. WATSON. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. La Rivière), has referred to the franchise as now existing in Manitoba. As one favoring the most liberal interpretation being placed upon the qualification of voters for elections to the House of Commons, I am in favor of the franchise in Manitoba as compared with the present Franchise Bill in this House. The franchise in that part of the Dominion is more liberal than the franchise for the House of Commons. That is one reason why I desire to see the House adopt the amendment proposed by the leader of the Opposition. Another reason is the tremendous expense this Act has been to the country, and not only is there that enormous expense to the country directly chargeable to the Government but the cost indirectly is as much more. Under the Dominion Franchise Act we have three voters' lists before the people, namely, the municipal list, the Local Legislature list and the Dominion list, and this House should take into serious consideration whether it is well to burden the people with the expense of maintaining the machinery in operation for the purpose of enabling people to vote. I prefer the Manitoba franchise to the Dominion franchise, particularly on account of the fact that it is a one man one vote franchise. There might be objections to that in Local Legislature elections, but I do say that, so far as Dominion elections are concerned, the principle of "one man one vote" ought to be carried out. I say that I am entirely in favor of manhood suffrage, for while we raise our revenues on the system of taxation that we do at present, I hold that every man 21 years of age living in the Dominion of Canada should be entitled to vote for a representative in this House. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) has just stated that by the Act of the Local Legislature one thousand individuals in his county would be deprived of having a vote. I believe that if the election at which that hon. gentleman was elected had taken place in Provencher on a list prepared during the year previous to his election, that the chances are that that hon. gentleman would not be here to-day to speak in this House. I say that it is a disgrace to this country that any gentleman should be elected to a seat in this House in the year 1889 on a voters' list prepared four years before, in 1885. I say that this is more particularly the case in a new country where the settlement changes very rapidly, and I further hold that under the system of adopting the local franchise there would be less expense to the country and less trouble and annoyance to the people, and that they would have a better chance of sending the proper representative to Parliament.

Mr. COLTER. I had the pleasure of addressing the House for a few moments this afternoon.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Spoken.

Mr. COLTER. I am speaking on the amendment. I spoke on the main motion then and I suggested for the consideration of the Minister of Justice certain amendments which commend themselves very strongly to my mind. I would be anxious, however, and very anxious, to see the amendment moved by the hon. the leader of the Opposition carried, because it commends itself much more strongly to my mind than any improvement that could be made in the present Franchise Act of the Dominion. I think that a very great many members of this House have not taken into consideration the enormous difficulty which is going to attend the revision of this next year's list. We must remember that we have to use as a basis the list which was compiled in 1886. We have carried on from year to year, on this voters' list, people who have been disqualified, by death or otherwise, to a very large number indeed. In the estimate that I made this afternoon of one thousand who are disqualified by the operation of this Act at the present time, I know that I was within the mark The list which I mentioned to the extent of 350 voters prepared by one party in one year were all verified upon statutory declarations. This was the extent of the additions to be made by one party in one year, and if you come to consider the additions which would necessarily have to be made during the two succeeding years you will see that I am well within the mark in my estimate of 1,000. We have then to prepare ourselves in an ordinary agricultural constituency for the addition of at least 1,000 voters to the voters' lists, and we have to prepare ourselves as well for the striking off from this list of an equal number of voters who have become disqualified through removal or other causes. Let us take into consideration what expense this involves. Suppose we consider the simple drawing up of these declarations and say that the charge is only 50 cents for drawing each, then for a thousand the cost will be $500. In order to strike the names off the list we have to subpœna probably about 1,000 witnesses. If we allow 25 cents for subpœnaing each one we have the extra expense of $250 under that head alone. Then if we take into consideration the expenses of say 600 witnesses, which would not be more than enough, at $1.25 a day each we would have to pay for witnesses expenses $750. There are other smaller items of expense that have to be taken into consideration in connection with this revision, but these three items of expense which will devolve upon members of both political parties in addition to what is paid out of the public treasury will amount to about $1,500. I am sure that this calculation is within the mark and it shows that this is a very severe burthen imposed on those whose duty it is to see to the revision of the voters' list. We have to consider further that the time spent in revising the voters' lists next year will be double what it was at the revision in 1886. There will be more than double as many names to be taken into account and more than double as many appeals to be heard, and this will involve the sitting of the court for a large number of days. Business will be to a certain extent disorganised and there will be great indirect loss upon the people of this country. There are a great many other objections to this Bill, but I will merely enumerate one of them, which I found out from practical experience. We may have some revising barristers who differ in opinion from others as to the form of the statutory declaration, and that has been found to be the case in a great many instances. Some revising barristers will admit a very simple statutory declaration in order to qualify an income voter, while others require very minute details as to the sources from which the income is derived. We will suppose that there are a large number of those statutory declarations made up. They are submitted to one revising barrister and they are admitted as good and they may be submitted to another revising barrister and he pronounces them bad and rejects them all. We have in this way an implement for doing a wrong to the people of this country, and I say that this wrong ought not to be continued. I have had considerable experience in this matter and I must say that I am somewhat wedded to this old voters' list. I have run four elections in one division, so that I have the list pretty nearly off by heart and I would be reluctant to part with it, because on every one of those occasions I had the majority of legal voters. But I have this to say, that we have to prepare ourselves, no doubt, for a great deal of labor, a great deal of worry, and a great deal of expense in this revision, and I think that the House ought to pause before it imposes this unnecessary burthen upon those who are in political life. If we come to consider that the revision is properly carried out under the present Franchise Bill, and that it is properly carried out under the law as it would be in the Province of Ontario, we will find that if the amendment of the hon. the leader of the Opposition was sanctioned we would have practically the same result. I know that in the village in which I live we had under the revision in 1886 on the voters' list every man who was 21 years of age and who had lived there the required time. If he could not get on in one way he could get on in another, and it was practically manhood suffrage in my locality as well as throughout the county. We could obtain the same results without incurring such expense as has been incurred in the past, and we could accomplish the same results in future without having the expense imposed on the country or upon those whose duty it is to take an interest in the revising of those lists. I believe that if we were to take an ordinary agricultural constituency in Ontario and compare the list as it would be if thoroughly and completely revised under the present Act after all this expense had been incurred, with the list such as it would be if the amendment of my hon. friend were carried out, we would not find a difference of two per cent.; I doubt if we would find a difference of one per cent.; and both parties would be very glad indeed to be relieved of this great burden. But it may be thought by hon. gentlemen opposite that it is very much to their interest to have this Act, because in several cases they get the start of us in the revision of the lists, and probably they calculate that they may get the start of us again in the next revision. Well, we think we have learned something from experience and we think we can get along with the Franchise Act about as well as they can; but it will entail a very large amount of expense and care and labor in order to do this, and I believe those who sit on this side of the House will see that that work is done properly. There are a few other considerations which I would like to bring before this House. Look at the time that will be involved in this revision. We have practically begun the work now, and it will be continued with very little intermission until the lists are finally revised in October or November. We have to prepare the declarations, see that the names are put on the original list as prepared by the revising officer. This list has to be published and posted up throughout the county, then it is examined by various people, and a great deal of time is lost in doing so, and we come at last down to the final revision, and what do we find then? We find hundreds of neighbors going into the witness box and swearing against one another on various matters, causing a great deal of hard feeling and bitterness which is totally unnecessary. Under the present system of the Province, the law is very easily administered. I remember a remark made this afternoon by an hon. member, which set me thinking. It was that in most of the municipalities throughout the Province both political parties were represented in the council. I thought of my own constituency, in which of the eight municipalities there seven have divided councils, some of the members being Reformers and some Conservatives, and the only council which is not divided is wholly Conservative; yet in working the system we succeed very easily, and there is not much red tape in getting the lists revised. The assessor has to go around, and if he finds that a man has died or gone to the other side during the year, he drops his name from the assessment roll; it is his duty to do so. When that roll is returned, there are fourteen days in which it can be examined and appeals can be entered; and if any correction is to be made, it is made in an hour or two, without any expense, on the matter being represented to the council. The whole work is completed without either party being beholden to the other. If the Court of Revision has made a mistake or behaved in a partisan manner, an appeal can be made to the county judge. The Local Government have no interference whatever in the preparation of these lists, and they are very accurately, fairly and cheaply prepared. We also have in the Ontario law the very important provision of one man one vote, and I believe fully in that doctrine. Let us just consider this. I know one man in my county who polls no less than five votes, and he is not worth five dollars; and I know another man who is worth $200,000, and he is entitled to only one vote. The wealthy man lives in the centre of the county, where he owns a large quantity of real estate in one block. Suppose he lived at the corner of the county, his land might extend across the boundaries of three or four counties, and he might thus be enabled to have as many votes, whereas if his land were placed a mile north or a mile south, he might be entitled to only one. There is another difficulty in connection with this Franchise Act. We sometimes find a man whose income from various sources will amount to nearly $300, and if he wants a vote he is bound to work it up to that amount in some way. I know one man who was examined who made out his income to be $290. It was hard work to get it higher, although he took into consideration his various earnings; but a happy thought struck him. He happened to remember that he kept twenty hens which laid eggs, and that he sold the eggs, and he figured up that probably the sale of the eggs would make up the other ten dollars, and he swore to that, and the revising officer put his name on the list. The question arose, who was entitled to the credit? Were not the hens entitled to a good deal of the credit of getting him a vote? As this Act stands, it must cause a great deal of waste of the earnings of the people. If we had a franchise such as that in vogue in Ontario, we would do away with such unseemly scenes as this, and we would have something secured to the people which would give them their political rights, which would be unattended with expense to the country, and which would do away with a great deal of hard feeling among neighbors in connection with the preparation of the lists.

Mr. DALY. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) called the attention of this House to the working of the Local Voters' List Act in the Province of Manitoba. I think it would have been well if the hon. gentleman had left that matter alone. It is no doubt within the knowledge of the members of this House that we had a change in the Government of Manitoba during the year 1888. In 1887 the Government then in power promulgated an Act by which they appointed enumerators throughout the Province. Exception was taken to the appointment of those enumerators by the then Opposition. They said that the Government should have appointed the local assessors, the clerks of municipalities, and that it was unfair and unjust to the people that they should appoint partisan enumerators. But one short year afterwards the Greenway Government came into power—the Grit Government, the Liberal Government, those men in whom there is no guile; and what did we find? We found that instead of carrying out the objection they had made when in opposition, they repealed the old law and introduced a new one. They did not even appoint the local clerks of municipalities as enumerators but chose partisans throughout the length and breadth of Manitoba. As there are fourteen local constituencies in the district I represent I had something to do with those lists, and I found that every single appointment that was made consisted of a strict partisan. If the hon. gentleman who has just sat down expects to have trouble in revising the lists shortly, I can assure him he will not have one-half the trouble that we had in Manitoba doing the same work. Hon. gentlemen opposite object to the appointment of judges as revising officers. Well, our Liberal friends in Manitoba do not say whom they will appoint, but appoint the straightest partisans they can find, and we find it necessary to follow the local voters' lists very closely. We have to attend the courts of revision; we have to go to these enumerators, and we often find they leave off deliberately dozens of men who have been in the Province for years, but who, strange to say, were Conservatives and opponents of the Government, and they put names on the list which we had subsequently struck off, and equally strange to say these were all names of Reformers. One of the greatest inequalities in connection with our Manitoba Act is that certain men in the Province are disfranchised by it, for instance the officials of the Local and Dominion Governments. No man who holds a position under the Government, according to that Act, has the right to vote. But do they carry out that principle?

Mr. WATSON. Hear, hear.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman says, "hear, hear." He knows that all officials and employees of the Dominion or Local Governments who are in receipt of a salary to the amount of $350 shall not be entitled to vote. Thus a man who is amenable to influence, a man who is in receipt of $350 per annum shall not vote, while a man in receipt of $351 shall vote. The consequence was a number of our people were disfranchised who were entitled to vote.

Mr. WATSON. It is the other way. Any person receiving $350 or over cannot vote.

Mr. DALY. All officials and employés of the Dominion and Local Governments in receipt of a salary to the amount of $350 and upwards shall not vote, and other people in the pay of the Dominion Government are equally disfranchised. For instance, the men attending the Winnipeg Military School—men who are British subjects and of age, and who would be entitled to the manhood suffrage which the hon. gentleman is in favor of—just because they happen to wear the Queen's uniform—are disfranchised. I hope and trust this amendment will be voted down. I hope, so far as the Dominion franchise is concerned, that we will have a uniform franchise over the whole Dominion, because I can assure you, Sir, from the experience which we had in Manitoba, if we take what is given to us by the Grit Government there, we can never have fair play. We cannot expect any fair play from any Grit Government as soon as they get into power, and if those hon. gentlemen opposite, who are kicking so hard to-day and who were kicking in 1885, once got into power they would not have a word to say against this Act and it would remain the law of the Dominion as it is to-day. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down told us he had the experience of four elections in connection with the lists and would prefer that they should remain as they are. I would not like to be personal, but I think it would be betting on a certainty in declaring that the hon. gentleman will not raise his voice in this House again after the next election, and I think probably if this list was not revised he would have an opportunity in a few short months to run another election in Haldimand on the same list. In order to assist that hon. gentleman to run another election on the Dominion list, the Minister of Justice introduced these amendments, and I have not the slightest doubt that when the list is revised in the County of Haldimand, the hon. gentleman who formerly represented that constituency and whom we all honor will again represent it.

Mr. COLTER. In spite of the voters.

Mr. DALY. I want to ask the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) if he will stand up here and defend the course of the Government of the Province of Manitoba in respect to these lists? Why, Sir, their policy was condemned by the party organ in Winnipeg. The Free Press condemned them, and the Grit press throughout Manitoba condemned them, and the Government of the Dominion could do no greater act of kindness towards our Province than to allow the Dominion Act to remain on the Statutes. If members from other Provinces had the same experience as we have in Manitoba in connection with what our Reform friends would do when they get into power, I would say to them: Let our Act be changed and the position of affairs would be much worse than it is.

Mr. McDONALD (Huron). As we all have had our experience in connection with the Franchise Act, I wish to express mine before this debate is drawn to a close. The speech we have just heard was characteristic of the hon. gentleman who uttered it. He never rose yet in this House to my knowledge—and I have heard him on most occasions—except as an apologist for the Government. One would almost suppose he was a prospective Minister, and ambitious to speak in favor of the Government, and leave the subject under discussion wholly alone. During his speech of ten minutes or so, he said nothing about the subject under discussion, but appeared to have a crow to pick with my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Watson) concerning the franchise of Manitoba. We are, however, speaking of the franchise law of this Dominion, and in my opinion a more iniquitous Act was never placed on the Statute-book of any civilised country. An hon. gentleman has said that he fought the Act for four months in this House. I am almost sorry the Reform party spent so much time combatting it. If it had been allowed to pass on the Statute-book, as it was brought down, I am satisfied that before this the indignation of the people would have been such that the Government would have repealed the Act. To tell you, Sir, that it is expensive is only to tell what is known to every individual that has had anything at all to do with it. I have not heard in this House, or in any part of the country, a single Conservative call the Act a good one. I have discussed this question on different platforms with different Conservatives, and I have not heard one say it was an Act that could be recommended. I challenge any hon. member opposite to get up and say it is a good Act. Not one dare do so. My constituency was badly gerrymandered in 1882 by hon. gentlemen opposite—for a purpose. It was a concocted scheme of the Conservative party, which was carried out in the Dominion Parliament. The County of Huron was first divided into three ridings, South Huron, Centre Huron and North Huron. The Conservatives in my town had a meeting, and put their heads together to see if it was in the interests of the Conservative party that such a division should be made. They found that it was not, and they sent a deputation down here when the Bill was in Committee of the Whole. I knew exactly what their proposed arrangements were. They left on Thursday, and on the following Tuesday the divisions were made exactly as I had them when the deputation left the town. In 1886 the Franchise Bill was brought into operation in my county, and about 300 votes were placed upon the list which had no right to be there at all, but that was done by the system adopted of sending a certain individual around to gather up as many names as possible and make the declarations himself, and he was to receive so much for each name. To counteract this, my party had to seek to get these bad votes taken off, and it cost us about $2 for each vote that was put off, so that it would cost $750 for getting those votes put off in that riding. But one of the revising barristers, who was a supporter of the hon. gentleman, took a technical objection to the name of the party who objected to those whom we wanted to put off, on the ground that, instead of this name being written, it was printed, and he, therefore, ruled that all those notices were illegal. The consequence was that 150 names which had no right to be there were left on that list, and we had to fight against that great majority. Still, to the honor of a number of Conservatives in that riding be it said, they were so disgusted with that arrangement that I believe a number of their votes were given to me which I would not have received but for that technical objection of the revising barrister, which was looked upon with disgust by the intelligent and honest Conservatives of the riding. That revision cost the Government in my riding $2,762, and it must have cost the two parties there as much, in consequence of which I think it is the duty of Parliament to wipe this measure off the Statute-book and replace it with something which is more in the interest of the country. I shall, therefore, support the amendment of the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not think that the time spent in the consideration of this question has been altogether lost. This Bill was passed in 1885, after very mature consideration, and after very strong protests from this side of the House. It has been on the Statute-book now for four years, and I do not think we require any stronger evidence in support of the contention that it is an unwise measure than is supplied by the Act itself and by the action of the Government. This Act originally declared that the franchise should be settled every year: that there was to be an annual revision of the franchise. That revision took place in 1886, and cost this country directly, perhaps, more than $400,000. How much it cost the candidates and the public indirectly no one can tell; but I think it is within the mark to say that, indirectly, it cost the country not less than as much more; so that the revision of the Act the first time, in my opinion, cost the country not less than a million dollars. When the Bill was before the House, we pointed out to the Government what would happen, but they declared that no such result would follow; but the result did follow, and, though the Government declared the Bill would not cost what it did, yet, so unanimous were their friends in regard to its working, so ashamed were the Government of the cost, and so indefensible was the expense, that, after one year's experience, the Government suspended the Act, and it has remained suspended ever since. There is not an hon. gentleman from Ontario who dare stand up in this House and say this is a good measure; at all events there is not an hon. member who has done it.

An hon. MEMBER. Wait till the vote is taken.

Mr. MULOCK. I know how you vote. You do not vote as you think; but as you are told to vote. You do not vote under conviction, but under pressure. There is not an hon. member in this House who would not say, according to his conviction, that this Act is a nuisance, and an expense, and an injury, in fact that it defeats what it professed to accomplish: true, honest representation, and that the sooner it is done away with the better. The Act having been suspended for three years, the Government cannot do better now than to consent to repeal it. They may think that would be a back down, that it would be unworthy for them to recede from their position taken at that time, even in regard to such an unworkable Act as this. But, if I can show by precedent that it would not be contrary to their own record to back down, they should have no such hesitation. I ask them to admit that what we said in 1885 was true.

Mr. TAYLOR. Never.

Mr. MULOCK. Let us see what the precedents are; and, if I can prove to the hon. member for Leeds that the policy of his party is to back down in the face of public opinion, surely he will agree that they should follow their usual policy of backing down in this case as well. They have a distinct duty to perform, and that is to back down from the position they took in 1885, and I will give them good reason for doing that by referring to precedents. For about five years before the rebellion in the North-West, they were asked to compensate the half-breeds, to issue scrip to the half-breeds, but the Government said: No; never, never, would they do so. A rebellion broke out, and they backed down and issued scrip to the half-breeds. Then they captured Louis Riel, and they declared to their followers in Quebec, that they would put Louis Riel through the form of a trial, but that he should never suffer the extreme penalty of the law.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. We never did.

Mr. MULOCK. I would ask the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) to testify in regard to that. I will cite the gallant colonel from Bellechasse, in support of the fact, that the Minister of Militia and other members of the Cabinet assured him that Louis Riel would not be hanged; but a little afterwards they did hang him.

Mr. BOWELL. There was nothing of the kind.

Mr. MULOCK. That was a good precedent. You also said that it was a grand thing to support the monopoly in the North-West. You said the worst thing that could happen to Canada would be to allow free trade in railways in the North-West. It was of vital importance to the east that had been pouring its millions into works for the development of the west, that it should have this trade with the west, and that we were not going to allow the traffic with the North-West to pass to the United States. Oh, never! It was not to be tolerated for a moment; it would endanger British connection to allow the people in the North-West even to see the Yankees. As a matter of justice, what could be more unjust to the people of the east than to rob them of the fruit they had seen ripening before their eyes? Having declared all that, they backed down, in the face of public opinion, and they paid several millions of dollars for permission to do so. They promised the country that they would build a line to the Pacific Ocean for a certain sum of money, which was to be the outside sum, and as soon as they said that they began to dip into the Treasury for millions more. When they came to Parliament they said this was the last time of asking for money—just like the actors going around the country and advertising that this was their last appearance. Whenever the Government declared that it was their last request for money, then you might be sure that they were going to turn round the next day and ask for more, that they were even then getting their bills ready. Only the last year the Government said that the strict clauses of the Treaty of 1818 must not be departed from, that a treaty was a treaty, a law was a law, and binding upon the Yankees as well as upon the Canadians, and they were going to have the whole treaty, and nothing but the treaty. Mr. Chamberlain went to Washington and sent us up a treaty entirely modifying the Treaty of 1818. The Government backed down; they stated that this was the best thing in the world, and they recommended it to Parliament, and Parliament very properly adopted the new treaty. These are precedents that I am giving to encourage you to take the course that we invite you to take on the Franchise Bill. These precedents show that you have no fixed policy. Your wonderful National Policy is a policy of surrender. I want you to live up to your record, and be consistent throughout; and when your record fails you, give place to men who have a different record.

Mr. BOWELL. Is that all?

Mr. MULOCK. No; I have a few more precedents, if my case is not established. Perhaps the Minister of Customs would like to hear something of his own record. He declared that he was a protectionist, first, last and always; no reciprocity for him.

Mr. BOWELL. I never said such a thing in my life.

Mr. MULOCK. Never said so! Yet he always put up the tariff as high as he could. Did he ever get a chance to increase the tariff when he did not do it? Did he ever get a chance, even on the slightest pretext, of wringing money out of the unfortunate importer, that he did not do it? Only a little while ago in this House he admitted that last year he had strained the law, and had done an injustice to importers.

Mr. BOWELL. What was the duty?

Mr. MULOCK. Did not the hon. gentleman admit the other day when we were discussing the question of placing corn on the free list, that he had strained the construction of the law, and perhaps had himself misinterpreted the law, when he took the millet seed——

Mr. BOWELL. I did not say that.

Mr. MULOCK. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BOWELL. That is about as near as you can get to the truth.

Mr. MULOCK. I will tell the hon. gentleman what he did say, if it is permissible to refer to a past debate. He placed millet seed upon the dutiable list last June, did he not?

Mr. BOWELL. I did not.

Mr. MULOCK. You caused your officers to collect duty upon it, did you not?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. So we have got one point established. He caused his officers to collect duty upon millet seed last June, causing it to be held, through some construction of his regulation, as cereal instead of a grass; and the other day in the House, when we were discussing a certain motion, he admitted that he thought that he was wrong on that occasion. Is that not a correct representation of what was said?

Mr. BOWELL. No.

Mr. MULOCK. Will some hon. gentleman be good enough to give me his words? I say that is what the Hansard shows, as I could prove if I had it by me. With regard to green fruits and other grains, although he declared that the United States had placed a statutory invitation upon the Statute-book, and had asked us to shake hands with them in that line, the Minister of Customs year after year maintained a Customs duty upon the class of goods that I refer to. He may say that I cannot prove by any language he used, that he was against this reciprocity. But do we want any more convincing language than his action in collecting the duties and continuing these things on the dutiable list? After declaring by these acts of his that he would never allow these things to go on the free list, he backed down last spring. That is another precedent for the Government to follow in backing down again. Last year we spent three weeks discussing the question of reciprocity, and after every one of these hon. gentlemen, who are now trying to suppress the voice of public opinion speaking through me—every one of these hon. gentlemen declared on that occasion that they were the most loyal of the loyal, that come weal or woe to Canada, it was England and Canada, and nothing else, and nothing, no nothing, would justify them by voice or vote in supporting a Government that would discriminate in the slightest degree against the glorious old land, Great Britain. But at the very time they were uttering these words they were laying their plans to discriminate against Great Britain and, of all countries in the world, in favor of the United States. The discussion came to an end on Friday night, and on Saturday morning the thing was in type. While you were protesting your loyalty, the next morning, to our horror we, sitting on this side of the House, the party of true loyalty to Great Britain, the party that takes an intelligent view of this question, were horrified to find a proclamation issued by the Governor General—I suppose under the advice of the loyal members of the Government—recommending His Excellency to do what? To discriminate in favor of the United States and against Great Britain; and that proclamation became law under the protest of the party on this side of the House. We who could not permit that discrimination under those circumstances compelled you to withdraw that proclamation and to back down once more. Perhaps the Minister of Customs will now be convinced that he, at all events, ought to take the advice that I suggested in regard to the Franchise Act.

Mr. BOWELL. I should be, if I took your words to be true.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, I will give a later record of the Minister of Customs. It would be a pity for him not to keep up his record. On the 26th of February the Minister of Customs, along with the rest of the Government, and their followers, voted against continuing the modus vivendi this year. Within a couple of weeks they adopted the modus vivendi contrary to their voice and vote on the floor of Parliament. This was another back down. There was a by-election at Halton a short time ago, and the supporters of the Administration declared they would place green fruit upon the dutiable list. As soon as the election was over the Government backed down. A couple of years ago it was well understood the Government would make the member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) Deputy Speaker. They did not do so; I presume they backed down. I remember a short time ago, when the Local Legislature of Ontario was agitated on the Orange question, the Conservatives declared that if they once got down to Ottawa their friends here would see them through and give them Orange incorporation. They came here flying banners, beating drums and playing fifes to get the Order incorporated by the Government of the day. Did they get it? No; the Government backed down on that occasion. The Minister of Customs was Grand Master at that time, and had held the position for several years; he is not Grand Master now. I think the Government promised the millers good times. They have been asking for protection and the fulfilment of promises. But the Government have gone back on them; they cannot do anything for the millers; they have either gone back on the millers or the policy has gone back on the millers. Where are the millers now? They have been knocking at the door but to no purpose. We know that the Government promised to help the woollen goods manufacturers and give them substantial protection. What have they done for them? They have backed down on their promises. They have been coming every day almost begging the Minister of Finance to protect their interests, and I suppose he has wished he was back in the old quiet place which he occupied years ago. Hon. gentlemen opposite struck on a great scheme a couple of years ago by which they were going to develop a new industry under the National Policy, the manufacture of bogus butter and the protection of it. The National Policy was to work this all right, and a duty of 10 cents a pound on foreign bogus butter would enable bogus butter in this country to be better manufactured. The Government backed down on that question, because the member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) told them that the people did not want bogus butter even if it were protected 10 cents per pound. So he backed down, as the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown) remarked. Why, that hon. gentlemen was going to have his chicken Bill restored, and he backed down. Last year the Minister of Customs declared that never would he go in favor of reciprocity in wrecking; he declared it would ruin our wrecking plant and destroy a vast amount of capital invested in this great industry, and not for a moment would he consent to have such industry destroyed by any such legislation. The Government all stood by him. This year the Minister of Customs, who is not now at the head of the battalions that gather under King William, who is not so military as when he had a regiment to himself, backed down. And the Government broke up on the question, the Government were wrecked. The Senate, however, defeated the wrecking Bill. Probably they will be able to back down next year, and so the Government majority in both Houses will have a consistent character. The Minister of Militia declined to do anything for the battalions in North York and Simcoe. They went to the North-West to do the work while he stayed here to collect the glory. Some came back; they found the Minister of Militia all right here. He had fought for his country here all summer and he had got honors to himself from his country; these men came back from the toils of war, and having served their country honestly, they asked to be recognised according to the law of the land. The Government did not back down at once. Subterfuges were used, it was a sneaky back down, not an open one, but in the end the Government deliberately backed down. For the Minister of War had declared that these volunteers should not be recognised, that he had done the real fighting down here at Ottawa and those men had been merely instruments in the hand of the great master. True, he had never served in the war, he had never enlisted and he had never served even as a volunteer, and had no sympathy with the volunteers as a whole; yet the Minister of War drew as much pay as a thousand of these men, and he knew what was best for them, and the best thing was to send them back with their pockets empty. And he would have sent them back with their pockets empty except for public opinion. We had the Premier of Canada stating on the floor of Parliament that he would compel his Minister of Militia to back down, and all the Government side had to back down on that question. So these few precedents I have given will make it easy for the Government on this occasion to back down. I am sure the conciliatory manner in which I have presented the case will show the ease with which this can be done, and that it can be done without loss of grace and without loss of dignity, and that it will be in harmony with precedent, and moreover it will be for the interest of the country. If the Government do not back down they propose to spend $400,000 or $500,000. They never back down on expenditures, they keep increasing them. They are consistent whatever else they are, especially in spending money; and one feature on which the Conservatives may congratulate themselves is, that when they leave the public Treasury it will be a pretty empty one. They can say, I suppose, to themselves: For what are we in this House, if it is not for office and for our pockets? I am sure I know not. If they are going to spend half a million to put this Act in force, I ask if that is the best use to which they can apply the public money. Is there no other branch of the public service where this money is needed rather than in keeping this Act in force which is not to the advantage but entirely to the disadvantage of the people? Perhaps the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison), may be reckless in regard to the expenditure of money. It may serve his purpose to sit on the floor of this House and vote as he is told to vote, to neglect his duties and to interrupt and do as he is told, thinking that when I have succeeded, or when public opinion has succeeded, in creating a vacancy in the Cabinet he may be able to get the position of the Minister of Militia. Perhaps I may be carrying out his purpose and serving his purpose in the remarks I am making. I have not noticed him backing down on the Administration much. He has stood by them even when they came to deal with the service, which he, of all others, should assist to preserve, and we find him in the back ground, although he professes to be a militiaman. He has been receiving a salary as a militiaman, and a pretty good salary too, and he is one of the men who enjoys rewards, both from the service outside of the House and inside of the House, and having got a taste for it he wants more. Therefore, perhaps it may be serving his purposes when I am presenting this case before the Minister of Militia. I ask him, as he is figuring on getting into the Government, to give serious consideration to the proposition I would make. Does he think that the $500,000 could be better spent in keeping up that branch of the public service than in spending it on these voters' lists?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; certainly.

Mr. MULOCK. If he thinks that it can be better spent in maintaining the militia force efficiently he will vote against spending it in this way.

Mr. DENISON. We want both.

Mr. MULOCK. You said it would be better spent on the militia, and if there is not enough money for both let us have it for where it will be best applied. If the militia service is complete, if they have got all the clothing they require and of the best quality, and if they have got all the necessary facilities for drilling, perhaps we might find if we look into some of the other departments that the money is badly wanted there. I think we would find that the money could be much better spent in some other branches of the service than in carrying out the provisions of this Franchise Act. I am sorry that the House will lose the benefit of my reviewing the different departments, because I have got a cold and my voice is not good, but if I did so I am sure the hon. members would profit by what I would say and would have taken my advice into serious consideration. I maintain that if the money involved in the putting of this Act into force can be more wisely spent in other branches of the public service than in carrying out this Bill, where it is worse than wasted, that it is the duty of the House to so expend it. Some hon. gentlemen seem to care little for the expenditure of public money. This money that we are entrusted with is gathered out of the pockets of the people of Canada and they feel every dollar that they have to pay whether it be by indirect or direct taxation. I do not think that this House has heretofore shown that solicitous care in the expenditure of public money which it is bound to do. The expenditure of this vast sum of money for the purpose of this Franchise Act is wholly indefensible and is entirely unnecessary. I think that the argument of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) that it was desirable to have a uniform franchise could be easily dealt with by any member who was in this House when this Bill was first under discussion. Every one who was here then knows that it was not uniform, because it is a kind of manhood suffrage in Prince Edward Island and British Columbia and some other kind of franchise in the other Provinces. The pretense of uniformity which the Prime Minister urged as a reason for adopting the Act when he first introduced it, he abandoned at a very early stage.

An hon. MEMBER. Another backdown.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes; it was a case of backdown. Any hon. gentleman who was here in 1885 knows that the Dominion Franchise Act possessed no feature of uniformity except the uniform confusion which results from putting it into force throughout the Dominion. As one of the representatives in this House I desire to record my protest against such a waste of public money as is caused by keeping this Act in force. Quite irrespective altogether of the other objection, that it prevents the people from having a proper, equitable and fair representation in this House.

Mr. DENISON. I would say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not know why the member for North York (Mr. Mulock) singled me out for his remarks to-night. He made some reference to the pay which I draw. I think that pay is somewhat in the neighborhood of $4 a day for twelve days in the year, and if the hon. gentleman can be the means of getting it increased I will be very much pleased. I do not know that the hon. gentleman has any experience of volunteer life, but I think that before he criticises us he had better put on the uniform and do a little work himself.

Mr. WALDIE. I desire to express my views on this matter, and I think that I can plead that I have some experience of it when the House remembers that on this Franchise Bill four or five elections have taken place in the county which I represent. No doubt the Ministry of the day when they introduced that Bill intended the list to be revised annually, and in a country like this where changes are very frequent, where population changes from place to place and where there are great developments in certain sections of the country an electoral list necessarily changes to a greater extent than it would in older countries. The importance of revising the lists frequently is pressed upon the attention of the Legislature, and I think it should also be impressed upon the attention of the Ministers. No doubt the cost of the revision of that list astonished the gentlemen responsible for the expenditure of the public funds of this country. No doubt the statements when made by the Opposition that a large sum of money would be wasted upon this Franchise Act and that the result would not warrant the expenditure were not believed by the Ministry at the time, but those predictions have been realised and so great was the expenditure that the Government allowed three years to elapse without a revision taking place. It is proposed now that the revision shall take place on the same lines as the present list; that is by revising barristers and by using the old lists as a basis, and as I understand it is thought that the revision could be made cheaper by using the old lists as a basis than by adopting the assessment roll for beginning a new list. I think that before they get through with this revision taking the old list as a basis, they will discover that serious mistakes are made. I know to my own knowledge that a revising barrister refused to accept the evidence of a registered letter having been sent to a party whose name it was proposed to remove from the list unless proof was given that the address was the proper one. I know that in the last four years such changes have taken place in the residences of the voters on that list, ten per cent. of the names the residences are not known. I know from my experience of the recent election in my county that many letters which were sent out to where the voters were supposed to reside came back from the dead letter office months afterwards, never having reached the parties to whom they were addressed. Now, if these names are made the basis of the revised list, how is the revising officer to ascertain that they have been notified? If he cannot ascertain their residences, how is he to know that a registered letter has reached them? Will he insist on the expense of having each man hunted up and the notice served on him before his name is put on the list? If that is the case, I am sure the $500,000 will be trebled and quadrupled to the people of the country who have to look after these lists. The difficulty and expense of revising them has restrained the Government from revising from year to year, as was their intention and their duty. That expense will be increased, for they cannot repeat the policy which has been carried out during the past three years. The list may be revised in 1889 or 1890; then there will be a census taken in 1891; and they must revise the list again probably before another election takes place; so that instead of its costing this country $500,000, it will cost double that amount. I have a suggestion to make, with the object of saving a large expenditure and giving what a great many in this House and in the country think a better system; that is, for the interim elections which may occur before the next general election, that the Government should just amend the Act by wiping it out, and let the local lists govern those elections; and when a new census is taken and the constituencies are rearranged, they can then revise the voters' lists and save at least half a million dollars, if they think it necessary to have such lists as this Franchise Act gives. But I think if they adopt for the interim elections the local lists they will never return to the lists provided by this Franchise Act. I am entirely in favor of a residential qualification for voters, and the principle of one man one vote and only one, and I shall support an amendment in that direction if it is moved. I do think it is not in the interest of this country that this Franchise Bill should be adopted.

Mr. LAVERGNE. I did not intend to say anything on this question, but seeing that very few members from the Province of Quebec have been heard upon it, I think our silence might be taken as signifying that we have no objection to this Franchise Bill, whereas if there is a piece of legislation which I consider outrageous, it is this. As I do not expect to change a vote on this question, I will not go over all the arguments which have been presented; but I may say that our great objection to the Franchise Bill is the immense expense which it causes to the country and also to the people. As we all know, the expense falls on the shoulders of very few in every county; in many instances it falls on the shoulders of the candidate himself. I think the law might be amended, so that it would be just to every constituency. For instance, in the constituency I represent there are two counties in which there are 8,200 voters, and two revising officers to look after. One of these officers in the last election was of such a stamp that it was very hard to follow him. To show his way of operating, I may tell you that one day he would decide in one way against me, and the next day when I would make the same objection that was made against me, he would decide the other way. He would also make it a point in the local revisions, when he saw that we were following him, to stop on his way and send his clerk, and his clerk would adjourn the court to the next day so as to discourage the people who were sent there, to make costs and prevent witnesses from coming. We have been so disgusted with his conduct that even his own friends were bound to give up following him, and the consequence was that we succeeded in having perhaps a fair list. I would not make the Government responsible for the choice of this man, but in choosing him they were badly advised. They took for reviser a man who had been sent away from another county as an embezzler. He could not make a living in another county, and he came to our place, and a couple of years afterwards he was made our revising officer. I would not make the same complaint of the present reviser, but if we have a good man now, I think he must have been chosen by mistake. I have nothing more to say. My object in rising was to place myself on record, and not give a silent vote on this question. If this amendment is carried, I think it will give us about the same list of voters as we have now, because the franchise of Quebec is about the same as that of the Dominion, but it results in a great saving of money, trouble and time.

Mr. PLATT. The issue involved in the amendment does not require any lengthened discussion of the merits of the Franchise Bill of 1885 in order to enable members to decide how to vote on this occasion. The issue is an old one; it has been before the country; every member on both sides of the House has had experience of it; public opinion to a certain extent has been formed; and hon. gentlemen can judge from the feeling in their own constituencies what the feeling of the country is with regard to the continuation of the Act. I may say for the constituency I have the honor to represent that, in the first place, we do not want the Franchise Bill of 1885 any longer. We do not want the labor it imposes upon us, we want to avoid the expense and we do not want the list after it is formed, simply because we can get a better one for nothing. That is the argument used by both parties at home. My experience has been somewhat extended in this respect. I have run two elections since the Bill came into force. In the first contest not one of my opponents ventured to defend it. At the second election my opponent was forced to say that if elected he would vote to repeal the Act of 1885. To-night I am going to give a vote of greater force, perhaps, than I am usually able to give, for I will represent not only the majority, but voice the opinion of ninety-nine hundredths of my constituents.

Mr. BARRON. It seems to me that this House has not yet heard quite enough from the Ontario members regarding this unfortunate franchise law. It seems to me I heard of it before I came into this House. The hon. member for South

Victoria (Mr. Hudspeth), either last Session or the Session before, undertook to tell this House how it came that I had a seat here. He said I owed my seat not to any popularity of my own but to the extreme unpopularity of my opponent. I will not undertake here to criticise the good taste of the hon. gentleman in making such an allusion regarding my opponent, who is a particular friend of his, but will leave them to settle the matter between them. I will undertake to say, however that if there is one reason more than another why I have the honor to represent my constituency, it is the opposition to the iniquitous measure which the hon. the Minister of Justice wishes now to amend. I have often found on public platforms that the speakers who were opposed to me were opposed to the franchise law, but I found more than that. I found that even the strong Conservatives in my riding were individually and collectively opposed to the Act too. I will undertake to say, as reference has been made to the estimated cost of the Act, that it costs no less than a dollar a head for every man, woman and child in the riding I represent, and $5 for every head of a family. Yet we are told it is right and proper to continue a measure which costs the country no less than $500,000 to put it into operation, when a better franchise can be had without spending one dollar of money. Let me show in one particular how vicious this system is and how incorrect and unsafe in endeavoring to arrive at any correct franchise system. Why the judges whom you have appointed revising officers do not seem to be able to put a uniform and proper construction on the Act? The judge of the County Court at Peterboro', who was revising officer, thought it was the spirit of our legislation that every man should have a vote, and proceeded to put every name on the franchise list who was on the assessors roll. I drew his attention to the fact that there were men on the list as voters who did not possess the qualifications required by the Statute, but he would not undertake to strike them off, and our friends were put to an enormous expense in trying to prove that these people were not entitled to be on the list when the assessment roll alone proved it. The revising officer, however, would not strike them off, and thus many were on the list who, according to the Act, were not entitled to a vote. I will content myself with saying that every word which has been spoken on this side against this measure is well founded, and will be justified by the country. There never was a more unpopular measure introduced, and I take great pleasure in believing that I emphasise the opinion of the great majority of the people in my riding in voting for the amendment of the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I wish only to say a word or two with reference to the working of the Act in the county I have the honor to represent. The experience of its working has been larger perhaps in that county than any other in Ontario. We had, during the election held there, in May, 1887, 1,500 names on the voters' list made up by the municipalities which did not appear on the Dominion franchise lists, so that a large number of people who were entitled to vote were not allowed to vote at the Dominion elections. These people, who had all the necessary qualifications, were disfranchised simply because the lists under this Act had not been revised for three years. This shows the Act is unworkable. The fact that the Government have found it necessary to suspend its operation for the last three or four years shows the Government consider it unworkable. The enormous expense was sufficient to deter the Government from undertaking the work of revision. I have had an instance in the county I represent of the injustice of retaining upon the Statute-book an Act of that kind. To-morrow in the County of Kent a vote will be taken on the repeal of the Scott Act, and I will guarantee to say that there are 2,000 voters in that county who ought to have the right to record their votes for or against the Act, who will be prohibited from taking any part in the election to-morrow. Were it not for this Act, these 2,000 people, who have lived a long time in the county and have a large interest in it, would have the privilege of polling their votes on this Scott Act question. This law, the carrying out of which is so expensive that the Government found it necessary to stay the proceedings under it, should be no longer allowed to remain on the Statute-book. We had a few days ago a gentleman rising in his place and proposing a committee. What for? To see if the enormous expenditure of the Grvernment could not be curtailed, and I am surprised to find the Minister of Justice opposing an amendment which would save to the people at least $1,000,000. I have no hesitation in saying you can scarcely find a man in the County of Kent, Conservative or Reformer, who will not express the opinion that the Act should be repealed. I cannot see why, if in the face of all that has been said against the Act, in the face of the fact the Government have found it unworkable and were obliged to suspend it, they do not accept the reasonable, fair and honest proposition of the leader of the Opposition. I think that it is a proposition which ought to be accepted by every man who has the welfare and the interest of this Dominion at heart. Surely, we have not enough money to spare to enable us to throw away half a million or a million dollars next summer in revising these lists. We have the local voters' lists, and, as the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Colter) said, I do not believe, that you will find a difference of 1 per cent. in the composition of these two lists. When we have a list which, for all practical purposes, meets the wishes of the people, and gives the right to vote to everyone who should have the right to vote, and which does not cost the people of the Dominion a dollar, I cannot see the use of spending a million dollars more for this purpose. If this was going to save any money in the preparation of the local voters' lists, there might be some reason for it, but, when we know that the local voters' lists have to be prepared as usual, and that not a farthing will be saved in that way, we are doing wrong in proposing to spend, as I venture to say, either directly or indirectly, at least a million dollars on this Dominion list. I therefore, hope that the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition will be accepted by this House. For my own part, I take very great pleasure in supporting it, and, if it is voted down, I hope some other efforts will be made to amend or otherwise improve this Act which, as has already been stated, is the most iniquitous Act ever placed on the Statute book.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question; divide.

Mr. SPEAKER. Call in the members.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I should be ashamed to give a silent vote upon this matter——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I really think I gave enough time for the hon. member to get up before I said "call in the members."

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth) I shall bow to your decision without dispute.

House divided on amendment of Mr. Laurier:

Amendment negatived, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee).

On section 2,

Mr. DAWSON. I would suggest that an amendment should be made to section 9 of the Act by adding the words in the sixth line "and does not hold a location ticket."

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman is moving the amendment of which he has given notice in reference to location tickets given to Indians. I would ask him not to raise that question now. I do not propose to finish this Bill at one sitting, and an opportunity will be given to him to move the amendment at a later date.

Mr. EDGAR. I would suggest that the following words should be added in the sixteenth line of this clause, after the words "assessment rolls":—

"As finally revised for municipal purposes."

Because it is not quite clear whether you mean the rolls as brought in by the assessor or as finally revised for municipal purposes; but it ought to be the rolls finally revised for municipal purposes, because in the interpretation clause of the Act, in clause q of the second section, the term "assessment rolls as finally revised for municipal purposes" is made use of, and this section ought to be made to correspond with that clause.

Mr. CAMPBELL. In reference to this amendment, I can say that the assessment rolls will not be revised perhaps until the month of September. The revising officer has to commence his work somewhere about the first of June, so that if he is to base the list upon the last assessment roll it should not be the last revised assessment roll. This year the roll will be finished by the first of June, but not revised.

Mr. TISDALE. The intention of the Act is to take last year.

Mr. LISTER. That would make it much more difficult for the revising officer, because the assessment roll before revision will contain the names of almost every person entitled to vote under this Act. It will make the revising officer's work very easy indeed to take the last assessment roll and make up his list from that. If he goes a year back he will find many changes have been made within the year, the list will not be reliable, and will involve a great many appeals.

Mr. CURRAN. He is entitled under the next line to obtain information from any other source, so that he could consult the new roll to complete his lists.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is just a question of convenience. If the assessment was carefully done the number of names struck off would be very few indeed. But if you take the case of an assessment roll that has been revised, it is nearly 12 months old, and you have all the changes that have taken place during those 12 months to correct on your voters' lists. Then suppose a village municipality is created within the 12 months; you would have nothing to guide you at all in the revised roll.

Mr. COLTER. Practically the fact is that the assessor must have his roll returned by the first of May. Then there are 14 days given within which appeals can be made to the Court of Revision and revision takes place in all cases before the 1st of June. If the last revised assessment roll, as revised by the county judge, were taken, it would save a great deal of labor indeed. Of course it is still subject to revision before the judge. If on this roll as finally revised before the council, there are any mistakes, then it is still subject to revision, and that would save a large amount of trouble to all who are concerned in the revision. If the assessment roll for this particular year were taken, a very large amount of trouble would be saved; in fact it is all important that we should not have the assessment roll of 1888 as a guide for the revision in 1889.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is so much in that, I think my hon. friend will not press his amendment.

Mr. LISTER. The roll of a year old would be most inaccurate.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not take that view of it. The assessment is to be finally revised by the 1st of June; the revising officer does not start to make his preliminary list until the 1st of June, and he does not finish it under the law proposed here, until the 1st of October.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There could be no object at all in the amendment that he should prepare a list of voters in the preceding year, unless it were with the assessment roll of the present year. The theory is that he shall use these incomplete assessment rolls of the current year to revise.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). The date selected for the revision of the list is an unfortunate one for the Province of Quebec. The intention is to use the most recent information possible. In all the municipalities in the Province of Quebec which are regulated by the municipal code, the assessment rolls are only made in June and July, they are not completed before the end of July, so that they will not even be commenced when this revision of the lists is to be commenced. The result will be that a great many people who will have become qualified during the last year, will not appear on the assessment roll which will be used by the revising officer. If he does not use some other information, a good many people qualified will be disfranchised. Large cities are not regulated by the municipal code. Let us take the city of Quebec, for instance. Our assessment rolls are not completed and revised before he middle of August, and they cannot be commenced before the month of May. The actual work of the assessors only commences about the middle of May, and it takes fully a month or a month and a half for them to go through all the streets and asses all the properties. In Montreal I think the assessment rolls are made during the summer months, and they are not completed before the end of August. The result will be that in the Province of Quebec, if the date is not altered, the assessment rolls of the year will be of no use. It will be impossible to use them at all for the preparation of the lists. I think the date should be postponed unless there are great objections from the other Provinces. From what has been stated it seems that there will not be much objection to postponing the revision to a later period in Ontario. The only complaint in respect to that Province is that the revision takes place too early. There will be no harm if it is delayed.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I think the same rule prevails in New Brunswick where the assessment commences the 1st of July.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman will see that the provision is that it will begin as soon as possible after 1st of June. However, we will see before finally closing the Bill whether any change should be made, but the principle complained of is that we are beginning too late.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would suggest whether there is any necessity for fixing the date precisely the same in the different Provinces. There are different circumstances in the different Provinces. In Ontario it is more convenient to have the preparation of the voters' lists as soon as possible after the assessment, because the people are not very busy then. If you fix the period to suit the Province of Quebec, it would be mid-harvest in Ontario, and it would be very much more difficult to look after the final revision.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is not fixed with any rigidity.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In the preparation of voters' lists it is very important there should be a time within which the revising officer shall be compelled to have the list completed, because he might delay the list on the eve of a general election, and if there was a fixed period within which the list must be returned to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, it would remove any suspicion of improper conduct.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Minister of Justice says he will consider this matter as to dates. It would be well before we alter that provision to look back at the debates on the Franchise Bill, because this subject was very fully discussed as regards all the provisions, and I think as regards dates, this date, 1st of June, was found to be the one that was most generally applicable without inconvenience to the different Provinces. In the meantime, I think we had better revive our recollection of the discussion before we make any alterations.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). A date that might be suitable for Quebec might not suit Ontario, and that is why the same date should not apply to all the Provinces; but if under the new law it was stated that it should commence as soon as possible after the final revision of the roll in each division, it would prevent any trouble.

Mr. COLTER. In the 18th line the words are indistinct and they impose a very unenviable task on the returning officer. Those officers are only human, and they are liable to pressure, and the words "from any other source" are susceptible of a very wide interpretation. There should be some limitation to those words in order to avoid any scandal, because if the returning officer is questioned as to the reason that induced him to put on certain names, he is not obliged to furnish it. I think he should be obliged to do so. If some words were added after the word "source" to this effect "duly verified by statutory declaration or other legal evidence" it would remove the objection and difficulty. It is improper that a returning officer should be placed in the unenviable position of being pressed to admit certain names by personal or political friends without there being imposed some reasonable or proper check, and we ought to impose such check in the Act. I remember, during our revision, owing to some loose clauses of this kind, the revising officer was very much embarrassed and he wished his duties to be clearly defined, and it is only reasonable to suppose that in a matter of such magnitude he should not desire to receive promiscuous information from promiscuous sources, but that the information he should act upon in determining who should be voters should be information verified either by statutory declaration or by other legal evidence.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is a great difference between the means of information which ought to be received by the revising officer in making a revision, which I suppose is the subject of the hon. gentleman's argument, and in making up a mere draft like this, which is the draft of a list to be placed as a notice before any proceeding of a permanent character is to be taken. The hon. gentleman will see that it is intimated how this part of the work is to be done. The revising officer prepares a list of the electors from the assessment roll. He does all that without any statutory declaration, and he does it even although the assessment roll is unrevised. Everything of that kind is done informally with a view to making up the draft. But if you impose on the electors the necessity of having statutory declarations for the purpose of placing every name on the draft and deprive the revising officer of the power of using his own observation with respect for instance as to the death of parties, the expense and difficulty of making the revision will be very much increased and there will be left upon the roll, for the time when he sits for revision, a great many names that should not be there. For instance, a man may have died in his own neighborhood, and he may know that he is deceased. If the suggestion of the hon. gentleman were adopted, it would be necessary that some one should make a statutory declaration in order to have the name struck off. That would be unreasonable, it would be nobody's business to do it, and perhaps the revising officer might have been at his funeral and yet he would wait for some one to make a statutory declaration to remove the name. That would work with special hardship this year when we have so many changes in the electoral list. Considering that the officer is a judicial officer, and above all that this is a procedure providing for the preparation of a draft of the list, it is unreasonable that the revising officer should not be able to fortify himself from other sources of information. The hon. gentleman will observe that this has been the law heretofore.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not see much force in the remark of the hon. Minister of Justice. Take a revising officers' duties as they stand now. He takes the assessors roll, which we all admit is the proper basis, and he takes the last list however old it may be. Those are all the documents he proceeds on, and which are supplied to him by law. He is then allowed to take information from any other source. Could the Minister of Justice indicate what source he could take it from?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If a man had been buried in his sight he might strike the man's name off the list.

Mr. EDGAR. A better evidence than that would be the mortuary statistics, which are supplied the revising officers in England Can the Minister suggest the propriety of a returning officer accepting a list handed in without statutory declaration by John Smith, and refusing a list put in by John Brown? Where does he get his information? It must be hearsay only and not proper evidence of any kind. In Ontario, he is a judge, and he has no special and particular means of knowing from his own knowledge who to put upon that list, and if he attempts to add any names at all I say it is unfair to somebody and it is giving a preference to whoever gives him the information which he choses voluntarily to accept. This is placing a judge in an invidious position as well as placing the community at an unfair disadvantage. As the Minister of Justice says the people would have to give evidence when they would be put in the witness box, but why could they not make declarations as well as telling the judge or writing him a letter. If a couple of months are set apart for the judge to receive declarations those who are interested will make them, or if they neglect the party managers or whoever is interested will take care that they will be made. This would be fair all around and there is no other way of making it fair. I do not see any way of doing it properly unless there is a time mentioned when those declarations can be put in, as well as a date specified beyond which they cannot put them in to have any effect. That provision as it stands is a farce, and I have no hesitation in saying that I consider the looseness of that section as the greatest blot in the whole statute.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I happen to differ from the hon. gentleman and I think that the Act, could not be viewed as a Bill for extending the electoral franchise if that change is made. An hon. friend behind me says that that section was inserted at the instance of some hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. EDGAR. No, no.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot speak for that, but I think it is so. The hon. gentleman will see that if the preliminary list is to be based on the assessment list only, except where statutory declarations are put in, that is equivalent to saying that in the majority of cases the assessment is to be almost entirely the sole evidence of the franchise. Now, if the hon. gentleman will look over the list of qualifications he will see, for instance, that "farmers' sons" are not on the assessment roll.

Mr. EDGAR. Yes; they are.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They may be in Ontario, but that is only a small portion of the entire Dominion.

Mr. EDGAR. How can the revising officer find it all out?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He has to find such information as he can get from any source whatever.

Mr. LAURIER. Any evidence, written or unwritten.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Written or unwritten. The object of the clause is to get on the first roll every person who has, by any chance, a right or a seeming right to vote, and it is with the object of having every man who has a right to vote being put upon the list. There can be no reason why a revising officer should not get every information he can. The assessment roll will help him, or, for that matter, if he knows himself that a party has a right to vote he ought to put him on. As to the argument that it puts the revising officer in an invidious position, I have no doubt it would if he were acting as a judge in the case, but he is merely asked to make as extensive enquiries as he can and to put everybody on the list who has the semblance of a right to vote. The great fear is that if you don't do that a great many persons having the right to vote will be excluded. Afterwards let there be a strict consideration as to qualification, but as to the first step I think it is clear that there should be no specification of the sources of information. Let the revising officer get the best information he can, and if any one is on the list who should not be his name can be easily removed.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Must the returning officer accept this information from whatever source it comes?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He has to be the judge of that.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Does not the the right hon. gentleman see where that comes in. If he says that the revising officer "must receive" then he would get it right.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The revising officer in nearly every case is a judge. He is a high functionary and he has no personal interest.

Mr. EDGAR. He has a clerk.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The clerk has nothing to do with it, it is the revising officer that has to do with it. I think that the mere chance of a revising officer acting partially, or breaking his oath, or behaving in such a manner as would unfit him to be not only a revising officer but a judge at all—the mere chance that such a thing should happen is not sufficient grounds for altering this clause. We must give credit to our officers for acting with justice and the hon. gentleman knows from the experiment, however ungrateful to the hon. gentlemen opposite, that he must admit that the impartiality of the judges has not been impugned in any case so far as I am aware of.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think that an example or two is better than any amount of theory wi h regard to a matter of this sort. I know that in the county that I represent the revising officer there required some proof, and that when the list on both sides (both those politically opposed to me and my supporters) was furnished there was also furnished a declaration made by some person or other who was acquainted with the facts, that those persons possessed the qualifications, and when that statutory declaration accompanied the list, then the judge put the names upon the list. Now that was not done in the adjoining constituency in the County of Kent. The hon. gentleman I suppose remembers that there were about one thousand names contested in the County of Kent list, that all sorts of technical objections and difficulties were placed in the way, and I think if I remember rightly that there were between three and four hundred of those names struck off. The expense of that was enormous and the judge upon technical grounds ruled out the objections in the other case. I think an appeal was taken from the judge to a superior court and a mandamus was granted to compel him to consider those cases. The result was that after a great deal of trouble and almost a whole summer's work by two or three lawyers three hundred and odd names were taken off the list. How came these names on that list? They came on the list by a provision exactly the same as that we are now discussing. Why, then, ought we undertake to permit a list to be stuffed in that way? I venture to say that not a name that is improperly put on that list can be taken off without from two to five dollars expense, and you impose all that expense in addition to what is imposed on the public Treasury by the adoption of these loose words in this particular provision. I have given the instance in Kent as an example; what was the result of that? They were, in some cases the names of dead persons; the names of persons who had not attained their majority, the names of persons who were out of the constituency for years, and the names of some who were never in the constituency. In the municipality of East Tilbury two or three carloads of men, some of whom were never in the constituency before, were brought there and swore that they were the persons whose names were on the list, recorded their votes, and returned to Detroit. You could not prosecute those persons for perjury; you had no control over them; they were beyond your jurisdiction; What was done in that constituency may be done in others. Now, I think what this Parliament should do is to prepare a fair list, and if you do so, you want to take care that it is not made grossly inaccurate in the first instance. It is far easier to put a name on the list than to get it off, and it is no hardship, where a name is put on the list that it is not on the assessment roll, that the party should accompany the name with evidence of some sort that is sufficient to satisfy the judge that it should go on the list. The evidence should be of that character that would be taken in an ordinary tribunal. I do not say that technical accuracy should be required in the preparation of the documents, but the evidence should be such that an honest man acting as a revising officer would be satisfied that the party would be entitled to have his name on the list. If that were done, neither political party would be put to expense for the purpose of having the name taken off.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We must remember that at this stage of the enquiry, there are no facts and no proceedings at all. It has been suggested by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) that it is in the public interest that a declaration should be made; but no one is interested.

Mr. EDGAR. The public are interested.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Before a notice is put up, before anybody has even enquired what the assessment roll shall show, or what the last list of voters is. Nobody knows whose qualification is to be contested or asserted. When a man is deceased, what party is interested in having his name struck off?

Mr. EDGAR. Get the mortuary statistics.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. When the hon. gentleman speaks of mortuary statistics, I confess I do not know what he is referring to. In my own Province there is no such thing as mortuary statistics, or a register of the names of those who die. But I gave an instance of how information might be in the possession of the revising officer. Other sources of information that might be in his possession are the provincial electoral lists and the assessment rolls. In some of the Provinces similar qualifications to those we prescribe are being adopted. In the Province of Nova Scotia, for instance, the franchises we have in our Act are nearly all followed out, and if the electoral rolls are prepared under the Act of the present Session, they will give the revising officer a great deal of information on these very subjects.

Mr. EDGAR. They would be very good things to name.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It would be impossible to name them with any kind of uniformity. In that Province the Bill has only passed one House; I do not know that it will become law, and I think it is advisable that sources of information of that kind should be available, not that mere hearsay or assertions should be entertained by the revising officer. I do not think the hon. member for Bothwell gave the argument additional force by suggesting erroneous decisions under the present law, but he gave the other side of the argument a great deal of force when he showed that a list was stuffed with 400 bogus names which necessitated that witnesses should be called to get them struck off. Yet you would deprive the revising officer of the right to strike off the names even when he had the means of knowing that they should not be there.

Mr. LISTER. I think the hon. member for West Ontario and the hon. Minister of Justice are at cross purposes. The lists are prepared from the voters' lists and the last assessment rolls, and by information which the revising officer can obtain from any other source. Before the preparation of the lists at all, the two political parties have of course the last voters' list and the last assessment rolls, and they will seek to have the names which are on the assessment rolls put on the voters' lists in the first instance. By furnishing the revising officer with statutory declarations that a John Smith or Henry Jones is improperly put on the list, they prevent an appeal in future to have his name put on, and in that way expense is avoided. What my hon. friend claims is that where the revising officer is permitted to take his information from any other source, anyone might go to him and say that such and such people should be put on the list. He may put them on, or he may say: "I will take evidence to verify your statements." If he puts the names on, an appeal is required to get them off; and my hon. friend argues that they should only be put on on some evidence being furnished of the bonâ fides of the application. Where a judge has been appointed revising officer, I do not think there has been any difficulty. There has not been any in my county, because he required that all names put on in the first place should be sustained by evidence. That prevented an appeal afterwards, and all it involved was a declaration The object of this is the prompt preparation of the list, and in that I submit that the revising officer ought to be bound by a rule that would apply to everybody. It does not involve very much trouble, it would be fair to all parties, and it would relieve the revising officer of any imputation of wrong-doing. If a lot of names are put on, people will ask who authorised them to be put on. Half of them may have to be appealed against. If they were verified by an affidavit, that difficulty would be got over.

Mr. LAURIER. I will just put this to the consideration of the First Minister and the Minister of Justice. They will agree, I am sure, that the revising officer is a judicial officer; he has to determine rights appertaining to certain parties in the community, as to who is and who is not an elector. He is to act according to judicial rules as far as they can apply. The Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister would, I am sure, agree that if there is a principle of judicial procedure which is never disputed, it is this, that a judge, who is to adjudicate on the rights of others, can never act on his own knowledge, and the reason is obvious; it is because of the impairment of justice that might result if he did so. In this case, if the judge is allowed to act on his own knowledge, what may be the result? The result may be that taking the suggestions of people which are not responsible and who may be partisans and overzealous, a number of names will be put upon the list which would not be entitled to be there, and these names would afterwards have to be contested. Anybody who claims to be an elector has the right to make a suggestion to the judge according to this. The remark just made by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) shows the correctness of the suggestion we contend should be adopted. It is that the revising officer, if he happens to be a judge, will act judicially and not place a name upon the list unless there be some written evidence that the party has the right to be there. The hon. gentleman said a moment ago that the revising officer should have information written or unwritten. This is a very unsafe way of doing business.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. LAURIER. Which would lead to arbitrary consequences. The very safe practice introduced in the County of Lambton would avoid all difficulty.

Mr. DAWSON. It should not be lost sight of that there are vast districts in the Province of Ontario where there are no voters' lists, no assessment rolls and no mortuary statistics. How then is the judge to proceed? This clause is necessary and these expressions in it necessary to allow the judge to take such information as he can get and put the names of those entitled to vote on the list. There are many hundreds of miles extending along the lake shores where there is a large population now and where there are no municipalities or voters' lists or any lists, and where the population is flowing in every day and increasing rapidly. How are you going to make up the lists there if you do not give the judge the power to get information by the best means he can. I heard an hon. gentleman in speaking of his constituency say it was a hundred miles long and forty wide. I represent a constituency 1,100 miles long and 400 wide, and which contains, instead of 20,000 people, 70,000 people. Unless there be some such power as this given the judge to take all just and reasonable means he can, to get at those who are entitled to vote, you would render the Act utterly useless in such a district.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I cannot speak for constituencies like Algoma, but only for the constituency in which I unfortunately was revising barrister. I refer to North Victoria. I found a great difficulty in coming to any conclusion as to the information I should take. For instance I got letters and lists of 20 or 30 names asking to be put on. I consulted with the county judge, who was revising barrister for the South Riding. The county judges had several meetings at which they made rules, and I believe the uniform practice throughout Ontario was to insist upon evidence, such as a statutory declaration before any name would be put on the list. If you take the last assessment rolls and the lists of voters for provincial elections, you will have pretty nearly all the reliable information you can get; and then if there is any one who is left out, he should have a certain time to file a statutory declaration stating he is entitled to be on the list. I suggest this to the hon. Minister because it will be the practice anyway. You will find that nineteen twentieths of the revising officers will adopt a course of that kind, and it will be just as well, for the sake of uniformity to declare a rule which will be adopted by all the revising officers throughout the country. It will be no great hardship, if anyone finds his name not inserted on the list, to file a statutory declaration setting forth the facts which entitle him to be placed upon the roll. I have heard a great deal about the enormous expense of working this Act. There was a great deal of expense at the last revision of the lists, but I believe the Government have been considering ways and means in order to very much lessen that expense. I know the right hon. gentleman desires this House to control the votes for this House—I mean to say that he desires to settle a franchise for this House which the different Provinces will not be able to alter as they please. I do not suppose anyone would object to this, were it not on the ground of expense. A committee was appointed some time ago for the purpose of considering whether a great deal of the expense could not be cut down. The Government have taken the matter into their own hands, and, I understand, are going to print the lists themselves and do everything in their power to lessen the cost. No doubt, after this summer is over, we will know what will be the saving in that direction.

Mr. LANDERKIN. When was the committee formed?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Some time ago.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Where?

Mr. HUDSPETH. I will tell you by-and-bye. I merely say those are my views after a good deal of practical experience. It seems to me it would be a good idea to put into the Bill something to enable the different revising officers to act uniformly in this matter.

Mr. BARRON. I am glad indeed to hear my hon. friend from South Victoria (Mr. Hudspeth) speak on this Bill, because I know he has had a great deal of practical experience and is well able to speak on the subject. I do not think any greater proof could be offered to this House of the force of our objection to this section than that offered by my hon. friend. He tells us he received several letters and had personal interviews with different parties who thought their names should be on the list. The Minister of Justice tells us that the revising officer is to be permitted to act upon such information. Let it once go abroad that the revising officer is to start his preliminary list upon such information as that, and he will be inundated with such informations, and enormous expenses will be thrown upon the parties in order to get off the names which will thus be put on. In order to show how difficult it is to put a proper construction upon these words of the Statute, the Minister of Justice has stated that the revising officer is at liberty to put a name off the list if he knows of his own knowledge that the person is dead and buried, while Mr. Hodgins, who has published a work on this subject, says that the revising officer cannot act in that way as a revising barrister may act under a special provision of the Imperial Statute. Here it appears it must be done under evidence, and that no name can be struck off because of death or any other reason without such evidence. He is in the same position as that of a judge, who, as my hon. friend has stated, never proceeds on his own motion.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Is that view correct?

Mr. BARRON. I think it is.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Then this provision is quite safe.

Mr. BARRON. That is in reference to striking off a name. The Minister says that the revising officer may strike off a name if he knows the person to be dead, but the law says he cannot do so until he receives evidence that the person is dead. That shows the difficulty arising from these words which the hon. gentleman refuses to strike out of the section or to amend in any way.

Mr. DALY. In connection with this matter I would quote to the House the provision of our statute in Manitoba, which may throw some light on the subject, and may give the Minister of Justice some ideas in regard to it. Clause 18 of that statute says:

"The enumerator [corresponding to the revising officer here] being duly sworn, shall obtain a certified copy or certified copies of the last revised list or lists of electors in such electoral division or part of the same, whether said lists be for municipal or local or Dominion parliamentary purposes; and, with such copies and such other information as he can obtain from the assessment rolls, registry office or otherwise, he shall proceed to prepare a separate list of electors."

In addition to that, sub-section 5 of that section provides that:

"Any person claiming to be registered as an elector may, prior to the dating and the signing of the register, apply in writing to the enumerator to have his name so registered; such application may be in form AAA of this Act, and shall be supported by an affidavit duly sworn to before any person authorised to take affidavits."

I must agree with the Opposition in reference to this matter. We had considerable experience in Manitoba in reference to it last year, when some of the enumerators undertook to take the names which were supplied to them. On a revision before the judge, these lists were ordered to be produced, and the enumerators were asked from whom they got them, and we found that they came from the Government supporters. By this Act, it is declared that there must be a statutory declaration giving evidence that the person to be put on the list is entitled to be placed on the list, and I think if the Minister of Justice will consider the matter, he will find that he cannot adopt any better principle than the Legislature of Manitoba have adopted. This Act was amended by the present Government there when they came into power last year, but this clause remains, so that both parties are committed to it.

Mr. PRÉFONTAINE. Surely it must be the object of the Government to have the first list as correct as possible. If the revising officer is at liberty to take his information from any person, in a large city like Montreal one person may send to the judge 500 or 1,000 names, and it would be impossible in a city like that to ascertain whether those names were entitled to be there, and the revising officer would either have to put them on the list or leave them off. If he puts them on the list, who will be able to verify who are entitled to be there without incurring great expense? Thus a large portion of unqualified persons may be able to take part in an election. As to the question of settling the date, as far as possible, when the revising officer shall begin to make his list, I think the clause should be arranged in such a way as to take as the base of the list the last revised assessment roll, because, if you fix the 1st June—and I come again to the city of Montreal—the roll in Montreal is not begun until late in May and is never finished until August, and, in such a large city, where there are thousands of names on the assement roll, everyone can judge that the first list based on the roll of the previous year will not at all contain the electors of the city or of any electoral division for which the list is made. We had an example of that in the last election in Montreal East. The roll was some years old, and only 6,000 electors came to the poll out of 18,000. Why was that? It was because the first list had not been accurately prepared, and trouble had not been taken to see whether the persons on the list were really qualified. These two points should be settled unless the Government wish to have lists which are not accurate at all, and can be stuffed by a dishonest revising barrister. I do not mean to convey the idea that the judges who have been appointed in the Province of Quebec to act as revising barristers have been acting in that way, as far as my knowledge goes, it is the contrary, but it would be impossible for them to control that state of things. I remember that a judge of the district of Montreal was appointed the revising officer for the County of Yamaska. How could he know whether the information was right or wrong which he got from certain parties in that county, unless he went there himself and verified the statements, which he could not be supposed to do? If you want to keep the law as it is, the public in general will be left in a position of incertitude, and will not know how the list will be made, when one revising barrister insists upon having a statutory declaration, and another does not. The result will be that these officers will take such information as they think proper, and then there will be no end to the complication which will take place in the revision of these lists. These two points should be settled in these two clauses. It should be settled what shall form the basis of the list, that is, it should be the last revised assessment roll whenever it is revised, and the revising barrister should not begin his work before it is revised. Then with regard to the source of information, it should be settled by the law how the revising barrister is going to be guided in obtaining information upon which he decides who are to be electors.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The hon. gentleman for Chambly (Mr. Préfontaine) supposes a case that might occur in the city of Montreal. I can speak from experience and I can tell him that such a case did occur in the County of Kent. There were in the list 2,000 names that had no right whatever to be there, men who never lived in the county, men who did not own a dollar's worth of property in the county, boys 15 or 16 years of age, and the names of people who had been dead for many years—these were placed on that list by the returning officer. I must protest against such a clause as that, under which he may put on names in scores at his own will, and allowing him to take any information he can get. I instanced a case that occurred in the County of Kent where a person named Mason, who had only been in the county a short time, submits to the revising barrister the names of about 60 different persons in the County of Kent, men that he never saw and knew nothing about, and these names were put upon the list, and we had to go to work and endeavor to strike them off. The consequence was that there were over 1,800 appeals against the list as it was proposed. It is outrageous to put such power as that into the hands of a single man. I believe a great many of the revising barristers are men of character and ability, who would not stoop to such work as that, but I am sorry to say that they are not all of that class, and we have a jewel in the County of Kent that I would not trust an inch, because the way he conducted the preparation of that list stamps him in my mind as a person in whom no confidence can be placed. No matter what the standpoint of the revising barrister may be, I do not see that there could be any objections to limiting him to a statutory declaration. According to this clause he takes the last revised assessment roll. Now, that roll will contain the names of nearly every person who is entitled to vote. There may be a few exceptions. There may be, as the Minister of Justice said, some people who have died, but the cases will be very few indeed. The changes that will have to be made will be very few, and it is an easy matter to get a statutory declaration of any additional names that may require to go on. But I can see the injustice that will arise if the revising barrister may do as he has already done, put on one or two thousand names of Tom, Dick and Harry, all over the country, men who nobody knows anything about. After he has done this, I ask if it is fair, is it honest, that the other side should be compelled to go to an enormous expense to strike those names off? Why, in my county the revising barrister actually refused to hear an appeal. We did not ask him to strike off the names, we only asked him to hear the evidence that we could give him that these names had no right to appear on the list. But he would not hear us, and we had to go to the High Court at Toronto and get a mandamus to compel him to hear these appeals. Then when he was compelled to hear them in the town of Chatham, notwithstanding all the objections, all the difficulties and obstructions that he could place in our way, we succeeded in striking off no less than 360 names. We forced him to admit that 360 names had been placed upon that list which had no right to be there at all. Now, I say that such a state of things should not be allowed to exist, and the Government should not persist in placing a law upon the Statute-book giving to any revising barrister such power as that. Some limits should be placed upon his power. I believe in the County of Bothwell the revising barrister would not put on anybody without reasonable evidence that he was entitled to go on. That is all we ask. We do not object to any man going on, but we say that no revising barrister should have the power of putting on names at his own will and pleasure.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the hon. gentleman is building up arguments from a position of things that existed in the past, but which does not exist now. Under the old franchise law in Ontario, there was a much more contracted franchise than under the present law; therefore there was more room for putting on a large number of names. But under the present law, which is manhood suffrage, I think the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) and those who are associated with him, must admit that almost every man in the country entitled to vote will be on.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Not boys of 15.

Mr. SPROULE. There is no provision in this law to put on boys of 15. If we take the last assessment roll, which is returned to the council in May, and the list is commenced to be made in June, there cannot be a very extensive change within the 30 days; therefore, I assume that it must be pretty nearly correct. But there is a fault that would arise from the other system that would be found very difficult to combat, in the event of our making it compulsory to have a statutory declaration. It would be virtually having two revisions of the list. You must get a statutory declaration to put them on in the first instance, and afterwards, when the list comes to be revised, there must be another statutory declaration to put them on. When the primary list is made up, the assessment roll is returned from the hands of the assessor, who is sworn to do his duty; and the council who revise that list, are sworn to do their duty; so it seems to me that there cannot be any very great danger when the list is made up within 30 days thereafter.

Mr. WALDIE. There does not seem to be any difficulty in getting definite information from a legitimate source. You have the voters' list and assessment roll in every municipality in Ontario, and there are responsible and respectable officers from whom information could be obtained. If they cannot procure statutory declarations in the absence of commissioners, there are municipal officers and justices of the peace. Let this information be given by justices of the peace and municipal officers, but not by indefinite and irresponsible people who may not even live in the municipality. The point is that we want to prevent irresponsible people sending names to the judge, who either must refuse or accept them, and we do not want the judge to place one party at a disadvantage by accepting names, as compared with another party.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I had no idea that the mere sending to a revising officer of lists of persons claiming to be voters was a source of information under this Act. I think the suggestion which the hon. gentleman has given as to justices and others making assertion of that right, would itself be too loose, and would not be satisfactory to me if I had to perform the duty of revising officer. I would not consider the writing of a letter or the handing to me of a set of names would be at all a "source of information." I think we ought not to be governed in legislation by the mere circumstance that some one has decided otherwise. What I propose with respect to the main section is that it should stand. I think, by to-morrow, hon. gentlemen opposite will see that it is wise to leave considerable latitude to revising officers for the purpose of enabling them to have recourse to well known and authentic sources of information, such as the assessment rolls. I quite believe we should do something to prevent the idea that mere hearsay and mere assertion is sufficient in taking this information, and having elicited from the hon. gentlemen opposite the points on which they desire amendment to the main section, we will now pass to the sub-section, which I suppose will not be opposed.

Mr. WATSON. With respect to the question as to what should be evidence before the revising barrister, the clause of the Manitoba Act was read by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly), which is a very good Act, and there is virtue in it, and I may say there has been no trouble in connection with the enumerators in Manitoba. Where they require a statutory declaration, that declaration is made by the voter who wishes his name placed on the list. The person notified has to go before a justice of the peace, and the declaration is taken without cost, and is laid before the enumerator, and the name is placed on the list. I hope the Minister of Justice will place in this Act a clause similar to this contained in the Manitoba Act. From the experience of the member for South Victoria (Mr. Hudspeth), who has acted in the capacity of revising barrister, the House will do well to be guided by the suggestion thrown out. I know the revising barrister in my county would like to be placed in such a position that he could act fairly and honestly by all parties. Of course pressure can be brought to bear on revising barristers by his political friends, and he is asked to do wrong acts which he would decline to do if he was limited to the instructions laid down in the law, and if an affidavit was required to be made by any elector before his name was placed on the first list. In regard to the applications in Kent, where a man could go and place hundreds, even thousands of names on the list, it is impossible for anyone to bring evidence that they are not qualified voters; their names are probably not known, and it is almost impossible to bring evidence to satisfy a dishonest revising barrister and induce him to strike the names off. The requirement of an affidavit by an applicant who wishes to be placed on the voters list is the only fair and just method by which this law can be carried out.

Mr. MITCHELL. As it has reached half-past one o'clock and there has been so much discussion on this clause, I think the House should adjourn so as to give the Minister of Justice an opportunity to deliberate on this matter. The hon. gentleman knows that this Bill has created and always will create a great deal of trouble in the country, and that in this House it was fought for hours and days at its passage. There is a great difference of opinion as to what should be done with respect to this main section, and it would be well for the Minister to consider whether he could meet the reasonable suggestions of hon. gentlemen in order to have the matter settled.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have already agreed to do that, and what I suggested was to take the sub-sections of the clause.

Mr. BRIEN. I wish to say that although this clause may pass, the revising officer in my county—a gentleman who I believe wishes to do what is fair in the county—will not receive anything except a personal declaration. In our section of the country there were blanks sent out which contained forty or fifty names by a few men who obtained the best information they could, but many of those who were put on were only nineteen or twenty years of age. The judge thought there ought to be a statutory declaration and a personal one.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Adjourn.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not think there is a great deal more in the Act that will meet with controversy. I and my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Weldon, St. John) went over this Bill very carefully together and I am sure that the hon. gentlemen are anxious to facilitate the view of the Government with regard to the despatch of business. Of course we are objecting to this because we feel it is very objectionable, but we do not propose to object to anything that is not——

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That is not very objectionable.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, perhaps so.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. After that statement of the hon. gentleman I think that the Minister of Justice would be justified in asking that the Committee rise and report progress.

Mr. MULOCK. If the hon. gentleman wishes to know of any other objection, I have one which I think he might consider. It is quite possible that it should happen, and I know it to have happened, that when the revising barrister went on a circuit through the riding it was left to the clerk to finish the revision of the list and some clerical errors occurred. Of course they were wholly unintentional. I have prepared a clause to the effect that when the list is prepared and before it is sent to the Secretary of State, it should be posted in the revising officer's office for a period of time so that all parties might see it and have an opportunity of correcting any clerical error that might occur.

Mr. MITCHELL. There are one or two observations I would like to make before we adjourn. The right hon. gentleman has stated that he consents to the adjournment because he finds that there are no great objections to this Bill. I want to say that there are very great objections to this Bill. The Bill is a damnable one, that is what it is. It has created more trouble and dissension and disturbance in this House than any other Bill ever brought here. I tell my right hon. friend that there is no measure that he ever put before this House which excited my ire more than this. I think it is a Bill founded on iniquity and originating in corrupt intention for the purpose of perpetuating in power the right hon. gentleman, and we are bound to watch that Bill from start to finish. I rise to enter my protest against the statement the right hon. gentleman made that there are comparatively no objections to the Bill.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I suppose my hon. friend might not consider himself bound, but party discipline breaks up when you come to a question of this kind. The Franchise Bill is not a Bill that has received any favor on this side of the House and I am sure my friends from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and St. John (Mr. Weldon) only wish to be understood as speaking for themselves. The reason I rise is this: I do not want the First Minister, as I think he has done on other occasions, when such generous remarks have been made, and when opposition is afterwards offered—say that we are bound not to offer opposition. We do not view ourselves as bound. Those gentlemen may consider themselves bound, but if there are any objections they will be urged on the attention of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Very well, we will go on with the Bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, go on with the Bill, we can do that as well as you can.

Mr. EDGAR. With reference to the clause we have been considering and which the Minister of Justice said he would allow to stand with a view of considering the amendment, I wish to draw his attention to the fact that when the franchise law was first introduced under section 15 of the Acts of 1885 there was a provision that the revising officer should provide himself with the provincial lists as well as the others. I would suggest that this should be one of the means of the information now, especially after we have been three years without a revision. I think that the judge might apply to the provincial lists to guide him as well as to those other lists spoken of.

Mr. McMULLEN. Before passing away from this subsection I think that we should find the revising officer some specific principles by which he could be guided in putting the names on the voters' lists. If you leave the provision the same as it is in this Bill the revising officer will have any liberty he likes in putting those names on the lists.

Mr. LAURIER. I would point out to the hon. gentleman that the Minister of Justice has for consideration this section on which he is speaking. I would remind the First Minister that he has moved the adjournment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I take that back.

Several hon. MEMBERS. You cannot.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Can't I.

Mr. LAURIER. I think at this late hour of the night we should not have any ill-feeling on either side of the House. We are proceeding here like business men, and I think that we might take an adjournment at half-past one o'clock. We cannot always expect to agree on a matter of this kind, and I see no reason why we should continue to sit any longer.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I appeal to this House if my remarks at all justified the hon. members who spoke after me, and particularly the member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) in the language which he used. He spoke in the most insulting and unparliamentary manner without any cause whatever. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) said that he had gone over the Bill with his hon. friend next him (Mr. Weldon) and this he thought was the main clause, and he did not think there was much objection to the other clauses. I said: "Well under those circumstances I thought I would be justified in asking my hon. friend the Minister of Justice to move that the Committee should rise." The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) who had been asleep apparently before that, or at all events did not hear what was said, got up in the most insulting manner and said it was an infamous Bill and an abominable Bill, after the hon. gentleman had stated himself in this debate that he approved of the Bill and voted for it because it was a correct principle and it was only the expense that caused him to change his mind. Now he says it is the most wretched and abominable Bill ever brought before this House. This language of the hon. gentlemen is quite unjustifiable and I think that I had a right to resent it.

Mr. MITCHELL. The right hon. gentleman has chosen to refer to my statement, and he has entirely misrepresented me.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. MITCHELL. I say, "Oh, yes," though. I say he has entirely misrepresented my views on this Bill. What I said, and I repeat it, and he knows it to be true, and he dare not deny it was, that when the Bill was first introduced I told him I voted against the gentlemen on this side on the principle of the source from which the people who sat in this House should be elected, that I opposed the suggestion that the voters' lists should be subject to provincial legislation, and I believed that the members sent to this House should be sent by legislation controlled by this House alone. But I denounced the details of the Bill from the start to finish, with his Indian votes and his fancy franchises, created for the purpose of corruption, and I throw back in the right hon. gentleman's teeth the assertion that I have taken any different position to-day. His object in introducing the Bill into this House was not for the purpose of getting a fair expression of the people's opinion, but for controlling the votes. I tell him there has been no Bill that the corrupt Administration which he has for years controlled, and with which he has been connected, have introduced into this Dominion that has roused people more than this Franchise Bill. He says he will not adjourn. I can sit it out as well as he can, and I am prepared to do it.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman having spoken for his party, I may speak for the party with which I am connected. The hon. gentleman knows that we oppose toto cælo the Bill he has introduced, that we think it an obnoxious measure in many ways. As to the Bill before the House, what the hon. member for Bothwell meant was that, apart from this first clause, there was nothing in the Bill to which we take serious objection. We intend to criticise some provisions, but I do not know any that will warrant such a discussion as that which we have had to-day. The hon.

gentleman knows that while we will fight the Bill, we will do it fairly.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I move that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). When I spoke as I did, it was for a purpose. Some gentlemen around me went home when the First Minister said we could adjourn, supposing that the matter was over. I know the First Minister has not been easy over this discussion to-day. We regret that it has put him to inconvenience, but when he introduced a Bill which brings up the subject of the Franchise Act, he must expect that the whole question will be discussed. I did not want to take a hostile position to that of the hon. member for Bothwell; but I did not want the First Minister to-morrow, when amendments were being moved or the discussion was being prolonged, to take any advantage of what had been said to-night by saying that there was an understanding that this should not go on. That is the reason I spoke. I have no desire to sit up all night any more than others.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. So far as I am concerned, I shall defer to the suggestion that we should adjourn, notwithstanding the suggestion of the hon. member for Brant that there may be a longer discussion than some of his friends suppose. When the discussion began in the line of improving the Act and promoting its easy and clear working, it seemed to me that some of the amendments suggested were quite useful and such as we should adopt; I had already indicated to my friends the intention of proposing them in committee. But it seems to me that this indignation to-night has been due to an entire misconception of what the First Minister said. When the suggestion came from the hon. member for Bothwell and the hon. member for St. John as to a protracted discussion, the First Minister said he saw no objection to adjourning since there was no objection to the Bill. The remarks of the hon. member for Northumberland had reference to the Act, and those of the First Minister had reference to this Bill.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The observations I made for myself and for my hon. friend for St. John. We all on this side of the House are opposed to the principle of legislation of which this is an amendment, and we object to the amendment we have been discussing to-night on the same grounds that we objected to it when it is was in the original Bill. There were other features which in my opinion were objectionable, but I did not suppose they would involve a very long discussion. Nor did I suppose when I made the observations which I did, and which I think will be found to be strictly accurate, that I was in the slightest degree precluding any amendments which any hon. gentleman might think proper to make.

Mr. MITCHELL. Since everybody is making explanations, I may make some too. The reason I got up was the observation of the First Minister that I had pursued a course with reference to this Bill different from what I had pursued before, and it was for the purpose of setting myself right in not being placed in a false position that I got up and said what I did in order to refute the incorrect statements which the hon. First Minister made.

Committee rose and reported progress,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 1:40 a.m. (Thursday).

Mr. LAURIER.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 4th April, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DIVORCE—W. G. LOWRY.

Mr. SMALL moved:

That the Bill from the Senate entitled "An Act for the relief of Wm. Gordon Lowry" be placed on the Order Paper for second reading to-morrow.

He said: My object in making this motion is simply because I understand that a number of hon. gentlemen voted against granting relief to the petitioner in this case because they had not seen the evidence. I believe that they have since read the evidence.

Motion agreed to on a division.

N. W. T.—A. R. TRACEY.

Mr. DAVIN asked, 1. Whether the Government is aware that A. R. Tracey, of Medicine Hat, has been arrested, thrown into prison, his goods seized, fined $300, with $334 costs, for making beer sold freely in the North-West Territories, but for the making of which no license is given, with the alternative of paying fine and costs, or eight months in jail? 2. Before what judge or magistrate was A. R. Tracey tried? 3. Can the Government lay before the House the particulars of the costs? 4. If not to-day, on what day can this be done?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I see, that in addition to this question, my hon. friend has a motion on the paper on the same subject, and I may as well, if the hon. gentleman will allow me to, read the report on the matter, which will be a full answer to the question as well as to the motion for papers. This is a letter from Capt. Antrobus, superintendent of Mounted Police, and it is as follows:—

"NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE,
"HEADQUARTERS A DIVISION,
"MAPLE CREEK, March 21st, 1889.

"SIR,—In accordance with instructions received from the Commissioner this evening, I have the honor to forward a report on case Regina vs. Tracey, from the commencement.

"Inspector Moodie wrote me from Medicine Hat stating that Mr. Barrett, Inspector of Inland Revenue had laid information against A. R. Tracey for making malt beer, and asking me to go up and take the case.

"On the 26th February I left here for that purpose, and on the train met Mr. Barrett, who was going to Medicine Hat to give evidence against Tracey.

"On the following day Tracey was brought before myself and Inspector Moodie, when the following informations (which had been previously laid before Inspector Moodie) were gone into, Mr. Gulliher acting as Crown Prosecutor, having been retained by Mr. Barrett:

"1st charge.—Did unlawfully make malt and steep grain for the purpose of malting.

"2nd charge.—Illegally had brewing apparatus in his possession.

"3rd charge.—Had unlawfully in his possession a malt floor, kiln and other malting machinery, &c.

"4th charge.—Did unlawfully brew beer, or other fermented liquor.

"Tracey pleaded 'Not guilty' to the first charge, so the evidence of Mr. Barrett and others was taken. The evidence was clear and Tracey would have withdrawn his plea of 'not guilty' had he known he could do so.

"He pleaded guilty to all the other charges. In each case we deemed it advisable (they being the first of the kind tried in the Territories) to inflict the minimum fine with costs, or in default, imprisonment, and, in addition adjudged that all the plant, &c., on the premises be confiscated. All the papers in connection with the above having been sent to His Honor the Lieutenant Governor at Regina, I am unable to send you copies of them.

"I am informed by Inspector Moodie that arrangements have been made by which the fines will be paid in about a fortnight, if not sooner.

"Mr. Barrett told Tracey in my presence that if the fines were paid, he would recommend that the plant should be released.

"Since the trials, I have seen Mr. Barrett and he told me that his department had approved of the action taken in the above matter, and had authorised him to release the plant on payment by Tracey of the fine and costs.

"The costs of the four cases amount to $34.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"W. D. ANTROBUS,

Superintendent.

W. B. AIRD, Jr.

Mr. GUAY asked, What are the names and residences of the sureties of W. B. Aird, Jr., an officer in the Customs Department at the port of Killarney, Ont.?

Mr. BOWELL. The sureties that were given for Mr. Aird were Mr. Thos. John Ryan, of Sudbury, and Mr. Martial Lemieux, of Sudbury. The sureties were entered into on the 3rd September, 1888.

THE HEREFORD RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BERNIER asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to retain, out of the subsidy in money granted to the company known as "The Hereford Railway Company," a sum sufficient to pay the wages of the workmen employed in the construction of the railway, and also for the services of the volunteers called out to restore and maintain order? If not, what action do the Government intend to take in the matter?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With respect to that portion of the question which does not refer to the volunteers, I would say that it is not the intention of the Government to retain out of the subsidy granted to the company known as the "Hereford Railway Company," a sum sufficient to pay the wages of the men employed on the construction of that railway, as the company are, so far as it is known, able to pay their liabilities.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) In answer to the second part of the question put by the hon. gentleman, I beg to make the following statements: on November 21st last, an account was sent to the Militia Department for the conveyance of the volunteers called out for service on the Hereford Railway. This account was sent back by the Militia Department with the notification that the department did not consider they were responsible for those expenses, and that the said account ought to have been sent to the municipality, not to the Militia Department.

MANUFACTURERS' LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. LISTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would remind the First Minister that, some four weeks ago, I moved for a return relating to the Manufacturers' Life Insurance Company. The hon. gentleman admitted the importance of the motion, and promised that an investigation should be made into the subject of it. The return laid on the Table verifies the statement I then made, and I would ask the First Minister if anything has been done in the way of an investigation of the charges made by me.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Only that my time has been otherwise occupied, I intended to call attention to that subject. I will do so to morrow.

THE LATE HON. J. H. POPE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I hope the House will pardon me for calling attention for a few moments to the loss the House has sustained by the death of the late Minister of Railways. After the full, and, I may say, affectionate notice that has been given by the press, without distinction of politics, to the career of my hon. friend, I do not feel warranted in occupying the time of the House but for a few moments. My remarks, therefore, will be very short. The acquaintance between Mr. Pope and my-elf commenced as long ago as 1849, forty years ago. He was then a young man, and I was younger than I am at present, and we met on a rather memorable occasion. It was the assembly of the British American League, which met at Kingston, in consequence of the unhappy disturbances which took place at that time. Mr. Pope came as a young representative of the British inhabitants of the Eastern Townships. Looking back to the results of that meeting, which was called with a loyal intention of calming the public excitement which had been raised, threatening war between races, I can do so with some satisfaction. Mr. Pope took a very active part, for a young man, in the earnest efforts to confine the agitation which was then raging within constitutional limits. From that time our friendship has been without break, and without cloud, and (as probably the House knows) there, perhaps, were no two men in the world who were more allied to each other in sentiment, in feeling and in general action. The press has fully stated the position of Mr. Pope before he became a public man. Although he had no early advantages, he was known to have overcome that want. He was an active man of business, cool, calm and yet enterprising, uniting in himself what is not often united, great enterprise with great caution. The consequence was that every enterprise he undertook seemed to prosper, and has continued to prosper, I think, during the whole of his valuable life. He came to Parliament with a reputation already formed as being a man most likely to be a valuable representative. That expectation was not disappointed. He was one of the most influential, perhaps the most influential, representative, that ever came from the Eastern Townships. He was an Eastern Townships man; he fully understood the interests of that portion of the country; and he was looked up to, and continued to be looked up to, and supported by the other representatives of British race from that part of the country as being especially their leader. He was indeed a leader of men, having the great faculty of governing and leading men. The great faculties for business which he showed in his own affairs accompanied him to Parliament. Before he became a member of the Government he became a very prominent member of Parliament. Those who have only known him of late years, when the cares of office, declining health, and advancing years somewhat weighed upon him, cannot fully appreciate the great influence he had in Parliament. His geniality, his practical good sense, his kindliness of heart and demeanor, and his great sense of humor, untutored though it was, gave him a position in the House which was almost unexampled for a man struggling against those disadvantages to which I have alluded. You can scarcely understand how effectually he overcame them. I early learned to know his value, and was only too glad when I was able to persuade him, as I believed in the public interest, to give up his strong reluctance to take office, and come and help me in the arduous task of administering the affairs of this country. I was not disappointed, and I speak not only for myself, but for all the colleagues who now surround me, and I may say for all the colleagues whoever sat in council with him. No one can know the value of Mr. Pope who did not sit with him in council. His great administrative ability, his freedom from all narrowness or illiberality, his complete disinterestedness in his own affairs, his desire to do what was the best for his country, were so strong and so obvious to all his colleagues, that they yielded him a degree of influence which he had earned, which he deserved, and which I believe was of the greatest use and strength to the Government, as well as of great benefit to the country. His powers of administration were first shown in the Department of Agriculture. He was a practical farmer, a farmer on a large scale, and he brought such an intimate knowledge of the subject to the management of that department that, in our opinion at least, his administration was completely successful. The same intimate acquaintance with the subjects over which he had to deal was displayed by him when, also at my urgent request, he, with reluctance, changed from the Department of Agriculture to that of Railways and Canals. The engineers employed under him were surprised at his intimate knowledge of everything connected with a railway—its construction and the construction of all the works connected with it—the railway bed, the material that should be employed, and the numerous practical questions which arise in the construction of railways—he was perfectly acquainted with them all. He had built railways himself; so, with the administration and operation of railways he was perfectly familiar. But I would say more. Of course, I know that there are hon. gentlemen opposite to me who cannot have known as well as I and his colleagues do, what Mr. Pope's merits were. I do not desire to make one single remark that would draw a dissent from any of the hon. gentlemen opposite, who I know are desirous as myself to do honor to his memory. All, therefore, that I desire now to say is that we, his colleagues, greatly reverenced him, greatly prized his ability, and deeply regret his loss. He was not only respected and esteemed, but he was beloved by those who knew him, and it is pathetic to see the mourning of the subordinates of the two departments with which he had been connected. It was a mournful duty for myself and those of my colleagues who could be spared to be present at the great meeting and the subsequent banquet given in October last to Mr. Pope by those people whom he represented so long and who knew him so well. I never saw more genuine enthusiasm in my life than was displayed by the vast number of representative men who had gathered there from all quarters of the Eastern Townships to meet him and to greet him. It was also affecting to see—you could not avoid seeing that, as they heard his faltering accents, weakened by illness, and saw his emaciated form, it was written in the minds of the mass of the audience that they were listening to him for the last time. I can say no more than to repeat that I think the country has lost a great man. The Ministry, I know, have lost a colleague whose loss they will ever deplore, and whose place they will be ill able to supply, and as for myself, I have lost my best friend in the world.

Mr. LAURIER. Those who during his political life were the opponents of Mr. Pope will readily acquiesce in almost every word—I should say, perhaps, every word—which has just fallen from the lips of the Prime Minister. Although Mr. Pope had been more than thirty years in public life, and though for the last fifteen years he has been in a most prominent position, with ever increasing responsibilities, I think it is only due to him to say that the people who knew him well still little knew what a powerful mind his was. The hon. gentleman was born at a time when, and in a community where educational advantages were not as free as they are to-day. He never had any pretension to literary culture. His qualities were not of that kind which stamp themselves at once upon the gaze of an admiring crowd; but all those who came into contact with him, in any capacity whatever, could not but appreciate more and more the great practical resources always at his command. He was always abundantly endowed with that eminent quality, without which no quality, however brilliant, can be of any avail—that quality which we bring under the term of common sense, and by means of which, in all questions of smaller importance, where the outlines are obscured and which require solution, he always gave the solution which afterwards proved the very best. There is one trait of Mr. Pope's character which has always impressed me, and which the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House, omitted to mention: that was the great perseverance with which he was endowed. Not only was he endowed with those qualities of mind I have just stated, but also with that quality of perseverance without which no permanent success can ever be achieved. Whatever he undertook he never abandoned until he had prosecuted it to a successful end. Obstacles were no impediment to him. They never caused him to flinch, or quail, or swerve. They simply aroused him to enthusiasm. Though his nature was not, perhaps, enthusiastic, he became enthusiastic the moment he had to face an obstacle. Those qualities of mind and character could not but tell in the community in which he was brought up, and they soon told, and told permanently. The right hon. gentleman has rightly said that there never was a man in the Eastern Townships who had upon his fellowmen such a hold as Mr. Pope obtained. It has been my privilege on several occasions to visit the County of Compton on professional and political matters, and I have always been impressed with this. It has been my privilege to visit many counties in the course of my political life, in many parts of Canada, and I never saw any place where the representative had such a universal hold as Mr. Pope had over the County of Compton. All creeds and nationalities were his friends; they all looked up to him; and he leaves in that section of the country a vacuum which cannot very successfully be filled up, if ever it is to be filled up. Death is always a sad event. This is as old as the world, yet every blow that falls seems to fall as heavily on those who are still spared as if it were felt for the first time. I am quite sure that to the Conservative party, to whom Mr. Pope was a tower of strength, and the First Minister, with whom he was an intimate friend, even more intimate than we supposed, the loss must be irreparable, and his party, his friends, and his family are entitled to receive from all classes of the community the full measure of sympathy in their sad bereavement.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. HALL. Had it been known that this subject was to come up to-day, the members of the Eastern Townships, who were more intimately connected with Mr. Pope, would have felt it their sad duty to make more special reference to the loss they have sustained than they can to-day. That duty would naturally have fallen to the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby). In his temporary absence, I desire to say that I am sure the expressions which have fallen from the First Minister and the leader of the Opposition will be received with cordial unanimity not only by this House, but by the whole country. But in no part of it, I am sure, will these expressions of regret be more earnestly joined in, and the feeling of sorrow more deeply shared than in those eastern townships which the late Hon. M. Pope loved so well and so long and worthily represented. To the people of the Eastern Townships, with whom Mr. Pope was so intimately connected, in all their commercial and industrial enterprises, and of so many of whom he was the true and trusted friend, his loss is irreparable. Other leaders of men will be found, other statesmen may be found to replace him, but there are many in this House, and many more out of it, who, in the death of Mr. Pope, have lost a friend whose place can never be refilled.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Mr. FOSTER presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

STANLEY OF PRESTON.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, Supplementary Estimates of sums required for the Service of the Dominion, for the year ending 30th June, 1889; and in accordance with the provisions of "The British North America Act, 1867," he recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, 3rd April, 1889.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the Message and Estimates be referred to Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 4) further to amend the Revised Statutes, chap. 5, respecting the Electoral Franchise.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the Committee will allow me to revert to the first section, I will propose one which I think will be better suited for the purpose and more in accordance with the section of the Election Act in relation to disqualification. The section I propose is almost a transcript of section 98 of the Elections Act in so far as it bears on that subject. It is as follows:—

"No person found guilty of any corrupt practice under the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act shall, for the duration of seven years after the time when he is so found guilty, be entitled to be registered on any list of voters, subject, however, to the removal of such disqualification under the provisions of section 99 of the said Act."

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Of course the hon. Minister will amend the oath in order to cover a case of this sort, if the party's name should happen to get on the list.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That will have to be done in the Election Act.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then it will not be done at all unless the Minister brings in a Bill to amend the Election Act by amending the oath.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will look into that matter.

On section 2,

Mr. EDGAR. With reference to this section, we had a discussion, when we were last in committee, upon the question of obtaining the mortuary statistics, and some hon. members suggested a doubt whether it would be possible to get a complete return from the revising officer of the deaths which had taken place since the last list was made. Nothing can be more complete than the provisions in the Province of Ontario at least for that sort of statistics. By the Act for the registration of births, marriages and deaths, there is made the most complete possible provision for the returns of all deaths to the Registrar General. The occupier of the house in which a person dies has to make a return. Then the minister of any denomination who performs the burial service is bound either to have a certificate showing that the return has been made to the registrar of the division, or to send in a return himself, under heavy penalties. Then, in case there should be any failure in that, in case there should be no minister to perform the rite, or that the householder does not perform his duty, every duly qualified medical practitioner has to see that these certificates have been sent in, or has to send one in himself. There is a final check provided, and that is the caretaker or guardian of any cemetery or burial ground shall not allow any interment to take place unless the certificates are there, and if there is any neglect he has to make a return of the particulars. I think, therefore, in the Province of Ontario there can be no difficulty in getting very valuable and absolutely accurate information as to the deaths which have occurred since the last revision was made.

Mr. SPROULE. Speaking from some practical experience as a medical man in Ontario, I am satisfied that, in many localities, the law in that respect is entirely ignored both by the medical men and the ministers. No doubt there are places where the returns are properly made, but there are many localities, especially in the rural districts, where no attention whatever is paid to the matter.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). That may be the case in the locality with which the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) is acquainted, but there is a penalty attached to such neglect, and there should be an officer employed to compel parties to make this registration, and if they do not, to subject them to the fine which is provided by the law. I know that, through the western section of the Province, the law is observed either by the medical men or the other parties referred to by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Edgar), and the information is ample and sufficient. I think the suggestion which has been made is a good one, that the names of all parties who may be removed by death could be obtained in the way suggested.

Mr. SPROULE. That cannot be done, because the returns are not made.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The mortuary statistics will be one of the sources of information which the revising officer should be allowed to use. In regard to this section, what I propose will not go to the full extent which was urged upon us last night as to the restrictions on revising officers, but I think it goes a fair distance, and should be accepted as a compromise in that way. This is what I suggest:

"On or as soon as possible after the first day of June in each year, the revising officer, being duly sworn as hereinbefore provided, shall cause the list of voters of the preceding year to be compared with the last assessment rolls, and shall, with all the information he can obtain from that source, and from provincial, municipal, or other official lists, records and proceedings, and by means of solemn declarations made as hereinafter provided under the Statutes made in reference to Extra-Judicial Oaths, proceed to revise each list of voters then in force under this Act, for the electoral district, or portion of an electoral district for which he is appointed, and shall prepare two supplementary lists in like form as the original list, one entitled: 'Names to be added, and corrections to be made,' and the other, 'Names to be removed.'

"The solemn declaration in this section referred to may be made by any person claiming the right to registration in the electoral district or claiming that the name of some other person should be added to or struck from the roll, and shall be to the effect that, according to his personal knowledge, or according to the best of his knowledge and belief, the grounds of which shall be stated, the persons so named are entitled to be registered or should be removed from the roll. The grounds shall be stated in the declaration, and such declaration, unless it is made by a person claiming either that he, the declarant, is entitled to be placed on the roll, shall be made by an elector of the district. The revising officer shall receive all such declarations up to the time when he transmits the roll to the Queen's Printer or the Controller of Stationery, as provided by this Act."

Mr. EDGAR. As far as I can gather, there are three points in this amendment which I would like to see changed. One difficulty will be this: According to that amendment, a statutory declaration may be made by an elector, on his information and belief in a general way, verifying a list of 100 names.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. But stating the grounds.

Mr. EDGAR. Stating the grounds that he has known something. I think that, unless the elector himself makes the declaration, some personal knowledge should be shown. The revising officers of the Province of Ontario, before they acted at the last election, and with reference to the final revision, made some rules for their own guidance. Among them was a rule requiring that no name should be put on or struck off without a statutory declaration made upon personal knowledge in each case. That, I think, is the only fair way. If they are allowed to swear to their information, it is a mockery to say that they cannot be punished for making a false declaration; because a man may swear that he believes that John Smith is the owner of a certain lot, but if John Smith does not turn out to be the owner at all, this man certainly will come under the penalties of the Act. I think a personal knowledge is a reasonable requirement for the declarations. Then, I could not catch that any reference was made to mortuary statistics as a source of information.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The sources of information pointed out are municipal, provincial and other official records and proceedings.

Mr. EDGAR. Then, with reference to the time up to which this declaration may be received.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Down to the time that he transmits the list.

Mr. EDGAR. But that is an uncertain time. I think the public should know up to what date these can be received, and after what date they will not be received, because there is no fixed date for him to make these returns; he has got to do it on or before the first day of October. The time used to be the 1st of September, and I see it is proposed to be the 1st of October, so that he may do it at any time after the 1st of June. Nobody will know when it will be done. There should be some fixed rule. Let it be up to within a month of the last day, or the 1st of September. Then we will have uniformity, as uniformity is so desirable in some points of view.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. My object was to give as much time as possible, and we give him up to the last moment

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If you allow the names to be received up to the last moment, what time will be given for contesting the right to be upon the list?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is not the time to make the contestation. It is then that he sends them to the Queen's Printer. I propose that he shall receive them up to the moment of his transmitting them.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). There may be a difficulty when he could transmit them at any time. I think that either he should give notice, or that a time should be fixed.

Mr. LISTER. Some of the revising officers may be ready to make their returns to the Queen's Printer on the 5th, 6th or 7th of June. As soon as this Bill passes they will begin to make preparations. If a time could be fixed, say the 1st of July, and later, in the event of the list not being returned.

Mr. EDGAR. I see I was in error when I said that the 1st of October was the date on or before which the revising officer had to make his returns. That is the date when he shall publish the list after printing. The day is not fixed upon which he is to make his return, and I think that makes it all the more necessary that a reasonable time should be fixed.

Mr. COLTER. Would it not be possible, if this Committee does not see fit to fix a time within which these applications may be received, that the revising officer himself should publish in a newspaper printed in the district, the time up to which those declarations or applications would be received? Otherwise we might have people somewhat lax, relying upon an opportunity to put in these applications, and they may have gone off secretly without notice to the public. I think it is due to the public that there should be some notification given to them as to the particular date up to which these will be received. If the revising officer himself were to consult his own convenience and the convenience of those living in the electoral district, and were obliged to publish that time, I think it would meet the requirements of the public generally.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think it would be well enough to provide for an advertisement at that stage, although it increases the expense. But when we come to the section which provides a mode in which the official shall transmit the list to the Queen's Printer, we will then consider the propriety of fixing a date before which he shall not transmit them, that is to say, that he shall not transmit them before the 1st of August.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think if there is a time stated in the Act before which a return cannot be made, the whole community will soon become acquainted with that time.

Mr. COLTER. The revising officer may have five or six hundred applications, and he may be delayed a certain time in putting these on the roll, and the consequence will be that others can come in, according to the wording of the section. There are more coming in and delaying the revising officer day after day.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It will not be a very serious delay, I think. It is only clerical work after all, when he examines the declarations. But we must not measure the operations of the Act for all time by its operations in the coming season, when the work of revision, of course, will be very heavy. But the addition and changes in future years, even if they amount to 10 per cent., will not be so very laborious.

Mr. TISDALE. The object is to get on the roll everyone's name who is entitled to be placed there.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not think that after the time has arrived for the revising officer to make his return he should receive names. That should end the matter. It would lead to due diligence being observed. It is stated that he shall receive names up to the 1st of August, then he will receive names up to that time and not afterwards.

Mr. DAWSON. That might do very well for constituencies, excepting large unorganised districts such as Algoma, when the 1st of August would be altogether too soon.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Reasonable time should be afforded in all cases. In my opinion two months, from the 1st of June to the 1st of August, would be ample time, and I fully agree with the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that after that latter date the revising barrister should not accept any more names, because the people would very soon understand to present them within the time named. No doubt, in a few instances, parties would be injured, but they would be very few and would not outweigh the advantage of having a date fixed.

Mr. DAWSON. Two months would not be sufficient time in the district I represent—Algoma.

Mr. PLATT. I do not know that the people would be limited to two months, for they might commence six months earlier to do the work if they saw fit.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I hope a certain time will be fixed, and the 1st of August would be fair to both parties. If it were fixed in the Act, it would be very soon known that the time was limited within which names could be received, and, under the circumstances, it would be well to fix the time.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would just say further, in support of the observations I have just made, that there is this advantage in fixing a time before which the revising officer cannot make a return, and after which names cannot be received. If the time is fixed, it will stimulate the constituencies to diligence in getting the names before the revising officers. It will also prevent the revising officers being suspected. When a large number of names are handed in by one party, the opposite party seeks delay until they can see how many additional names can be handed in. When a date is fixed beyond which names will not be received, all parties are stimulated to diligence, and at the same time we prevent the revising officer being suspected in the discharge of his duties. It would be in every way better for all parties, and especially for those who feel themselves called upon to see that the voters' lists, as far as possible, are complete.

Mr. BARRON. The point suggested by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is one deserving of the greatest consideration. A difficulty arose in one case I know of, and gave great trouble; I do not now refer to North Victoria, where the member for South Victoria (Mr. Hudspeth) acted as returning officer, for everything went on most satisfactorily, and I only voice the sentiment of the people when I say that everything was satisfactory when he acted as returning officer. The same may be said of South Victoria. But in the case to which I refer, there was grave suspicion that the revising officer allowed names to come in after the time fixed for receiving them, and there was great feeling in the riding on that account; and if any method can be suggested with a view to prevent such a recurrence, it should be carried out.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). There is very much in what the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Platt) has said. There is no restriction as to the time when people may prepare lists of names which they wish to hand in to the revising officer. There is nothing to prevent parties from handing in names at any time up to 1st June. It would be very easy for either political party to work up names to hand in to the revising officer before that time. If some arrangement were entered into as regards the date, no advantage would accrue to one party over the other. The section which the Minister of Justice has prepared I think meets the case in every possible respect. If the parties are allowed up to the 1st of June, they will be able to supply the revising officers with all the information at their command.

Mr. DAWSON. To fix the 1st of June would be simply to disfranchise the district of Algoma. This date cannot be accepted unless exception is made for that district, the same as exception is made in regard to the time of holding elections.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I must confess I do not see the necessity for stipulating for a certain day, considering that all this is done to expedite the preparation of the lists. The difficulty of fixing a date in all sections of the country is very great. We are receiving communications from revising officers, not from Algoma alone, but from other distant regions, stating that it is impossible they can commence their work effectively on the 1st of June, and that they must be allowed a longer period. I point them to the fact that the Act is not rigid, and that it only says as soon as possible after the 1st of June; but if we fix the date and say that no names will be received after the 1st of August, we are fixing a time when the revising officers in some sections are only beginning their work. Thus we would be depriving some people of their right to be put on the list. Considering, moreover, that this is only the draft list, and that we are not in all future years to meet the difficulties that we shall have this year as regards the revision of the lists, I think we had better leave it free.

Mr. MULOCK. How would it do to let the revising officer give public notice of the time up to which he will receive names. If the one day does not suit in different parts of the Dominion, let the revising officer name a day that would suit his particular district, and then we will all know what is the last day up to which he will receive names.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That would increase very much the expenses. There is no use in advertising in one paper in the riding, because it only reaches one class and certain sections of the district, and in many cases the paper taken is only a weekly edition. If we provide for full and ample advertising we will increase the cost very materially indeed.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). It seems to me that the suggestion of my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Colter) is the only way in which the difficulty can be got over. The revising officer is not bound to commence on the 1st of June, but as soon after as possible. How will the time be fixed before he transmits the lists?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I agree that he shall not transmit it earlier than a certain day.

Mr. EDGAR. If that is done it is all right as far as that is concerned. There are some other objections as to the nature of the declaration. I see the Minister of Justice in the draft has underlined the words "information and belief," and I think that will very largely, if not altogether, do away with the advantage of having a solemn declaration. If the declaration is made upon information and belief, nobody could be liable to prosecution under the Act for a false declaration. I think the Minister of Justice should return to his original idea of having "a personal knowledge."

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I found on reading the draft that it only provided that the individual claiming to get on the list could make a declaration, and that there was no provision for a declaration from any other person who might wish to get names on the lists.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman confines the obligation of the declaration to the party himself.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is the way it was drawn up. I had it altered so that any other person could claim that names should be put on the list.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think another person should have a right to get names on the list, but the information should be of his own personal knowledge.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I go as far as is ever provided in relation to affidavits, that is to say, there must be personal knowledge or information and belief, stating the grounds thereof. I submit to my professional brethren that that is all that is required in regard to an affidavit. If you insist on an absolute statement based on personal knowledge on matters which depend to a great extent on facts which may not possibly be within the reach of the investigation of the person making a declaration, it would hardly do. It may be a matter of notoriety and belief, and yet, after all, only a matter of hearsay, that a man has got a deed of a farm on which he lives. If you oblige a person to swear that A. B. is the owner of that property and ought to go on the list, you subject the person who makes the declaration to the penalties of perjury, if the whole title is not as he supposes and as everybody in the neighborhood supposes. When you have to swear to title and to facts showing that certain persons are the sons of the owners, it seems to me that we ought be very careful how far we should go in matters of that kind. The argument, I think, is stronger still when we remember that in making up the assessment roll on which the list is to be founded to a great extent, the assessors act on mere information which they get on the streets and highways and do not require to have a statutory declaration for at all.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). They go around to make personal enquiries.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; they do not.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I admit the force of the argument of the Minister of Justice, but I think it would be better that a person should state his sources of information, and grounds of belief.

An hon. MEMBER. That is in the law.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The law only requires the "ground of belief," but I think that the "source of information" should be stated.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). At the last revision in the county of Kent, there were 1,800 names put on the list, and the great majority of these names were improperly on the list. They were put on by a declaration, prepared somewhat in the way provided by this Bill. There was, for instance, a Mr. Masson, who received his information from parties who were strangers to him, and he said that he was informed, and verily believed, that so-and-so was qualified to go on the list. If the hon. Minister were to allow declarations of that sort, there would be no protection whatever against names being improperly put on the list. A solemn declaration requires to be of such a character, that it will disclose the sources of information, and will inform the revising officer whether the sources of information are creditable and ought to be relied on, or not.

Mr. SPROULE. If, on the other hand, the declaration has got to be made according to personal knowledge it will keep a great many off the list who ought to be on. That is the objection we found in our county. When you come to people in the country and ask them to make a declaration, they are suspicious and they are afraid that there is something behind it. If you allow the reasonable latitude that has been laid down by the Minister of Justice, it would enable us to get all those who are entitled to be on the list without doing injustice to anyone.

Mr. EDGAR. I am satisfied, from reading the nature of the information, that it does not cover the suggestion laid by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Weldon), that the declaration ought to show the sources of information.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is provided for separately that the person shall state the qualification. I go as far as we can go without saying that the man who makes the declaration shall disclose the name of the person whom he got the information from. I do not think there is any necessity for that, but when he states the ground of his belief he shows for instance that the person is employed as a wage earner, that he receives such and such wages, and that he believes he is so continuously employed, that his income amounts to $300 a year. I do not see that we get any additional security by compelling him to say what the source of his information is.

Mr. COLTER. This proviso will give rise to a great deal of difficulty, indeed. I know that in my own county the revising officer did receive certain declarations of this class under protest on his first revision. He found, as a consequence, that a good many minors and others not qualified to vote were improperly put on the roll; we had a great deal of difficulty in connection with the subsequent revisions, and the revising officer has informed me that he will never receive such declarations again. In the county of Norfolk, too, the revising officer would not accept any but personal declarations; the same is true, I believe, of Welland. In most of the counties where the proposed declarations have been used, they have been found to be quite unsatisfactory. Every application to be placed on the roll, I submit, should be a personal application; and if a person is afraid, or is not sufficiently interested to make a declaration showing his qualification, when he is the only person who can give satisfactory evidence of that, there is no hardship in leaving him off the list. It might be otherwise with reference to removing from the list names of persons who have died or tenants who have moved away. In these cases the declaration could be made quite properly by others.

Mr. TISDALE. I think the hon. gentleman has a misconception of my meaning, or I have a misconception of his. This declaration is an increased security for the preliminary list. The hon. gentleman is speaking of the final list.

Mr. COLTER. No; I am speaking of the preliminary list.

Mr. TISDALE. Then, I think the hon. gentleman is misinformed as to the practice in my county; and I would say this, knowing something of the practice in Ontario, that I cannot understand hon. gentlemen opposite voting for the resolution they voted for yesterday, because the assessors who prepare the rolls which they want us to accept are not legal gentlemen like the revising officers, but partisans appointed by the two political parties. I am not saying that one is better than another; five out of seven in my county are Reformers, but they are partisans, and the Conservative assessors are the same. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite want to put us in the power of those assessors, whom you cannot compel, no matter what declaration you make, to put a name on the list, without an appeal to a judge. The Minister of Justice is offering a much more reasonable proposition. He says the revising officer, who is generally a judge, shall not have the power an assessor has. There is no way to compel an assessor to put a name on the roll, and to my certain knowledge the assessors have often refused to put names on. But there is a provision that the revising officer shall put no name on unless there is a personal declaration made, and such a declaration, as every hon. member knows, is such as is properly received in a court of justice. I think myself that the Minister of Justice has gone a little too far; at the same time, I quite appreciate that in this matter we on this side of the House should be almost more than fair; but in the face of the arguments, and the allegations, and the taunts we had to submit to yesterday, I do not see that we should accept the proposition that a partisan assessor, a comparatively ignorant man, who is not subjected to anything like the restrictions imposed on the revising officer, should have the decision as to what names shall go on the assessment roll, without being interfered with except on an appeal to a judge.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman, I think, is very unfair to the assessors, and his statement is scarcely consistent with the facts. Every assessor is sworn to discharge his duties faithfully; he fixes the value of property on oath, and he is liable to prosecution if he makes a false statement. If the assessment roll is taken, there are persons there the assessed value of whose property is below the qualification for voters, and the revising officer takes the names of those parties who possess the qualifications to which the assessor has sworn.

Mr. CURRAN. As to the sufficiency of the affidavit which the Minister of Justice requires, I think the hon. Minister has gone exactly to the length he should be required to go. We find that the requirements under the present section are precisely those required for arresting, on a capias, a debtor in the Province of Quebec, who is alleged to be about to abscond, or to be making away with his property with the intention to defraud. In that case, the deponent is required to swear that he has been credibly informed, has reason to believe, and verily and in his conscience believes, and he goes on to allege the reasons for that belief. That is the same provision as is found in the proposition of the hon. Minister of Justice; the allegation is not made on personal knowledge, but on information which leads the deponent to believe that the right person is named, and he gives the reason on which he bases that belief. Under these circumstances I think we could hardly ask the Minister of Justice to go further than he has done.

Mr. BARRON. In this matter I think it is better to judge by past experience. I think there is hardly a constituency in Ontario that has not had the same experience as we have had in South Victoria. At the outset of the revision, affidavits were prepared on information and belief, and were widely circulated throughout the Province. In South Victoria I know that one individual who had been in the riding for only a few months, undertook to swear on his knowledge and belief, to the qualifications of several hundred voters; and each one of these, by the proposition now before the House, would be entitled to vote. But these affidavits, on the first revision, were thrown out, and someone else who could swear to the fact was required to make the affidavit. It was discovered, instead of having all the names again before the revising officer that had been before him previously, only a very small percentage of them remained. Actually some of the men who were offered originally were not of age, and when asked to make the affidavit they could not do so. From past experience, we are opposed to allowing such a rule to come into force. It would be very unwise to allow voters to be put on the lists on the ground of opinion and belief.

Mr. CURRAN. He must give the ground for his belief

Mr. BARRON. He may say my reason is: so-and-so informed me.

Mr. CURRAN. The revising officer would throw that out

Mr. BARRON. I do not know that he would or not. It would be much better to have the uniform practice continued. I think the past has shown that all voters entitled to vote were placed on, and the innovation proposed would be very unwise and dangerous.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I regret the hon. the Minister has made the amendment in the direction he has. If he has made up his mind finally to allow third parties to make application for electors, perhaps the amendment he proposes may cover the ground; but I wish to draw his attention to the fact that the better class of revising officers in the Maritime Provinces, and I believe also in Ontario—the judicial revising officers—all determined at the last revision that the application must be made either by the applicant himself or by some person who would be called on to swear of his own personal knowledge that the person whose name he presented possessed the necessary qualification. That system was fair to everybody. I object most strenuously to permission being given either side to make wholesale applications covering twenty or thirty names. Those whose constituencies cover large districts know well that if a thousand names are put on, it is impossible to have them taken off. I am perfectly satisfied that the rule the returning officers adopted in Prince Edward Island left no room for fraud. If application was made by a man who swore he was entitled to vote, as a rule he had the right. In nine cases out of ten the applications were based on facts. But if a politician can make an application to have forty or two hundred men put on the list, I do not know where this is going to end. Both sides will adopt the system and personal applications will no longer be made. An enormous loss of time and money will result if any attempt is made to strike off names which should never have been put on the lists under that system. Take large cities, such as Halifax, St. John or Montreal. Suppose application was made by John Smith, claiming that the names of fifty John Smiths should be put on, how are you going to identify them? When a man makes a personal application for himself or another, you have some means of identification, and you have further the assurance that he has made the affidavit, but if at one sweep you must enter the application on behalf of fifty John Smiths and Macdonalds, you will open the door very wide to fraud. This provision will be taken advantage of by the agents of both parties, and the result will be vexation and expense to all who seek to have the list properly revised.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman is entirely astray in saying this is a new rule. It is the rule which was followed in our county when revising the lists.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I stated that in my own Province the rule was adopted by the returning officers of requiring affidavits, and I believe a similar rule was adopted in the other Maritime Provinces, and in Ontario as well.

Mr. SPROULE. The rule now proposed is the one which was carried out by the revising officer in my part of the country, and so far as I have heard, it was satisfactory to both parties. In the hon. gentleman's illustration of 1,000 names in his county being put on, he evidently exaggerates, because I do not think it is possible, in a locality where you have manhood suffrage, as was the case in Prince Edward Island, that you could find 1,000 names not on the list. On the other hand, if you compel personal declaration to be made in every instance, it will necessitate driving around the country and taking the parties, one at a time, where they can reach a magistrate, or somebody else, before whom they can make their declaration. Consequently, a large number who ought to be on the lists will not be put on. Had it not been that the very rule which we are trying to make law now, obtained in my part of the country, a great many would have been off the list who were put on, and everybody was satisfied, as far as I know.

Mr. WALDIE. The making of personal affidavits, in order to be put upon the preliminary list, is, I think, very desirable. If it is necessary to make a personal affidavit to get a name struck off the list, why not make it in the first place, and thus save all this trouble and expense afterwards. I know that the assessors are putting on nearly everyone as wage-earners, or as farmer's son, or as tenant, or as owner, and that affidavits are only necessary in the case of names not on the assessment rolls. It would be better to adopt this system, and thus have a correct list made out, than to have everybody placed on by political agents, and then have to remove the majority of those thus put on.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) has told us that, in his riding, the practice of requiring statutory declarations before names go on the lists, on personal knowledge, was not carried out at the last elections in 1886. Well, I suppose he must know what he is talking about, but, if that be the case in his riding, it was a practice which was not approved of by the revising officers who met in Toronto on the 27th December, 1886, for the purpose of considering the practice that should be followed, and to try and arrange a uniformity of practice in cases which were not provided for by statute. I have a copy of their proceedings here; they were published at the time. A resolution was moved by Judge Dean and seconded by Judge Kingsmill:

"That in the organised districts——"

And I suppose this should apply to the organised districts, and probably not to Algoma or other unorganised districts.

"That in the organised districts, no name not already on the list for the preceding year shall be entered thereupon which does not appear on the last revised assessment roll of Ontario, unless an application is made in writing by the person desiring to be put on the list, or by someone on his behalf, describing the grounds on which he claims that he should be put on the preliminary voters' list, and unless the application is filed with the revising officer, and the revising officer, in receiving such application, shall only act upon the same when it is supported by a statutory declaration made upon the personal knowledge of the attorney."

That is all we suggest now. It did no harm, but a great deal of good where it was followed out at the last revision in Ontario, and I think the unanimous consensus of opinion of the county judges of the Province of Ontario in regard to a matter which they had to administer themselves, ought to have very great weight with the members of this House.

For that reason, I really think the Minister of Justice would find that this would close the door to a great deal of opportunity for fraudulent practice.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I may have misunderstood the hon. gentleman, but does the Act as proposed to be amended by the Minister of Justice conform with the resolution of the judges?

Mr. EDGAR. No, it does not at all.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I agree entirely with the remarks made by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Edgar), that we should not put names on the list unless there is a statutory declaration, made by the parties themselves or by some person who can speak of his own knowledge, that they are entitled to be put on. I know that was the practice adopted by the better class of revising barristers the last time. In the county of Bothwell, the revising barrister followed that course strictly. He would not put any names on the preliminary list unless he had a statutory declaration from the party himself or from some party who could speak of his own personal knowledge that he was entitled to be put on. For instance, if I had persons in my employment and I knew what salary they were getting, I could speak of my own knowledge that they were receiving an income sufficient to entitle them to be placed on the list; and in that case he would receive a statutory declaration from me, and would put on two or three, or half a dozen names on my declaration. But, unfortunately, in the county of Kent, the revising barrister took a totally different course. He accepted a statutory declaration from Tom, Dick or Harry, that he was informed and verily believed that John Jones and William Smith, and Peter Mitchell and a hundred more were entitled to be put upon that list, and the result was that nearly 2,000 names were put on the list against which appeals had to be made. We sent in appeals against over 1,800 names on that preliminary list, and when we look back and see the enormous amount of cost in money, and time, and trouble which we spent in the county of Kent in order to get the list made right, you may excuse me for speaking up and trying to get the law so amended that it will not be in the power of that revising barrister or anyone else who chooses to take the same course to act in that way in the future. What objection can there be to this? In the first place, the revising barrister is obliged to take the last revised assessment roll. When he takes that roll, he will get nearly every name in the county which is entitled to be on the list, and the other names that will have to be added by statutory declarations will be very few, and they ought to be accompanied by statutory declarations. I think the object on both sides of the House is to allow every man who is entitled to vote to get his name on the list. For my part, I do not want to see any advantage taken, but I want to see a fair and square and honest list made; but I protest against placing it in the hands of any revising barrister to accept a declaration from any person who likes to send it in, and thereby put a great number of names on the list, and then compel those who want to see the list made pure to go to the expense of getting those names off. I think the Minister of Justice ought to accept this suggestion, and not to allow those who desired to go on the list to be placed there unless they make a statutory declaration.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). Speaking from the standpoint of the Province of Ontario, I may say that, after making allowance for those names which will be placed on the assessment roll by the assessors, there are two large classes that will chiefly be covered by the declarations we are now taking into account. Those are the wage-earning class, who are not referred to under the present municipal arrangement in Ontario unless they earn $400 to qualify them for the municipal franchise, and the sons of land-owners and farmers of less than 20 acres not occupying rented property. Where the limit is fixed at $300 in the case of wage-earners, I think personal knowledge of the amount of income these parties earn should be required in order to place them on the list. You may see a young man working in a locality, and someone says he is earning so much a month; but if you ask him to make his own declaration as to what he earns, it will be much more satisfactory than leaving it to any other party to make the declaration. In reference to the past, my own experience is different from that of my hon. friend from Grey. I know that in Wentworth, when we made our declarations, the revising officer required a declaration either from the person himself or from someone who was personally conversant with the facts. If a father asked that his sons should be put on the list, his statement was accepted as being within his knowledge and information; but I remember two applications which were made to the revising officer in that county, in which there was a large schedule of names certified to by one individual on his general knowledge and belief, and they were brought to him very late in the time fixed for receiving applications, and he said he felt compelled to decline to receive that list, and that list was declined and the parties were required to file separate declarations, either their own, or someone else on personal knowledge. Now, when we take this into account, that outside the work the assessors have to do, that is naturally connected with the real estate tenants of the country, there are these other classes, at least in the Province of Ontario, who will naturally find no place on the assessment roll, I think it becomes all the more important that we should require direct personal information.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I regret that this appears to be a point upon which we must continue to differ. I regret it, because I thought last night that we would be able to arrive at a compromise and a point of agreement. I know my hon. friends opposite are sincere in the earnestness with which they desire to have a restriction to personal knowledge. At the same time, I do not feel that I can go farther than I have proposed to do without adopting the strictness of requiring that the voter himself should in every case make a declaration; and when we have, as we have this year, a revision involving so many changes; and when we remember what was stated last night with regard to the expense and trouble of getting these statutory declarations, to say that in almost every riding we should have some hundreds of statutory declarations made; and when we remember also the inconvenience and difficulty of getting persons to make declarations before the election comes on, and when they take no interest in the matter, even though their rights are clear, I think that would be a serious step. I propose that my hon. friends opposite should think over the matter between this and the third reading and I shall probably do the same, and if we cannot agree upon it, we can take a vote.

Mr. COLTER. A few days ago I saw a printed circular, said to have been issued from the tower room, which was addressed to the Conservative associations throughout this country, urging Conservatives to put on the voters' lists all the names possible, and then followed this delicate suggestion, that when they are once on the list it is very difficult and expensive to get them off. The discussion that has been going on here illustrates that that doctrine has taken very deep root. When we find that facilities are given for stuffing the lists, we cannot believe that these facilities are likely to diminish the cost of preparing and revising these voters' lists. In fact it is much more expensive to remove these names than it is to get statutory declarations. Sometimes these people live a long distance away. They are asserted to be owners, they are believed to be owners, they are put upon the list, and afterwards we have to go to considerable expense in subpœnaing them in order to get them off the list. In some cases in my own county people were put upon the list fraudulently, and when we attempted to subpœna them, they evaded service. I remember in one case we had to subpœna a mother, but she refused to attend, and that fraudulent name was retained. I am giving this as an illustration; there were a good many other similar cases. We went to a good deal of pains and expense in order to purge the list in this particular way, but we found ourselves defeated. We are now simply asking that proper steps shall be taken to prevent these frauds, and I believe that it is the duty of Parliament to take proper steps. I hold it to be an immoral suggestion that if you will only take a little trouble and stretch your consciences a little, and put a good many names upon the list, then it will be difficult and expensive for your opponents to get these names off the list.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I much regret to hear the statement of the Minister of Justice, that he felt it incumbent upon him to refuse to make any further concessions, after the emphatic statement is made that fraud, in the past, has been inflicted upon many of those who had to do with the voters' lists. I think the statement of my hon friend from Kent (Mr. Campbell), that there were 2,000 individuals fraudulently placed upon the voters' lists, ought to be sufficient to convince the Minister that some means should be devised to prevent anything of that kind in the future. The Minister says it will involve an enormous expense. I cannot see any consistency in that statement When these names are placed upon the list, a large amount of expense will be necessary in order to strike them off, much more than would be necessary if every individual had to make a declaration himself. It is a notorious fact, that just as soon as you allow one individual to make a declaration for a large number, and allow those names to be handed in, you open the door for any amount of fraud. The statement made by my hon. friend from South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), and the charge that he made against the assessors of that county, was surprising to me. I am surprised to hear any man deliberately charge that the assessors appointed in his locality are, to a certain extent, perjurers in performing their duties. With all the assurance possible he declares from his place in this House that in one of the old counties in the Province of Ontario, not a single man who was sworn to do his duty, does it impartially. That may be the class of men in his riding, but it is not the class of men throughout the greater portion of the Province of Ontario. I say that the assessors generally do their duty honestly, and I repudiate upon their behalf the insinuation that he makes against the assessors in his own riding. Now, I cannot understand why the Minister is so desirous that there should be an open door so that any individual may hand in a large number of names, unless it be as the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Colter), said, that a circular had been sent out advising their faithful friends to see that every individual should be placed upon the assessment roll, because when they once get them there, it would take a great deal of trouble and expense to get them off. Is this the door that the Minister of Justice desires to leave open now, so that they may be able to carry out the advice that is given by that organisation? It certainly looks to me very much like a design on the part of our friends opposite to give every opportunity that this Franchise Bill, which is iniquitous in every sense now, should be rendered more so, and that they should take means whereby they may have greater facilities to defraud the electors and prevent a fair expression of their opinions at the polls. Now, it is my experience, and I think it has been the experience of the Members of Parliament, that it is absolutely necessary, in order to make the list an honest list, that a personal statutory declaration should be made by the party desiring to be placed upon the roll. That being the method adopted in the past by the judges, who were the best authorities, why cannot the Minister concede the suggestion made and adopt the course approved by these officers. Is he a judge superior to those who have the duties to perform? An hon. member, who had acted as a revising officer, last evening stated that such was the proper course, and, in fact, was the only course to prevent fraud. If the Minister is desirous of preventing fraud, why does he not adopt the course suggested by one of his own supporters, who has had practical experience in this matter? I cannot understand why he objects to allowing this amendment. If he wishes to do fairly by the electors, if he is anxious to save expense, as he professes to be, I certainly think he should adopt the course suggested, and allow this clause to stand over until he is able to come down and meet us in a fair spirit.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understand that the Minister of Justice has expressed himself in the sense that he has not finally closed the matter, that he leaves it an open question; but he suggests that we pass the section now, and when the Bill comes up for its third reading, he will, after consideration, have arrived at a final conclusion in regard to it. I do not understand that the question is finally settled, but that it will be kept over until the third reading of the Bill, and the Minister will have an open mind on the subject.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I understood the Minister to say that he would give us time to consider it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I said that I would consider it before the third reading.

Mr. MULOCK. To revert again to the point that a time should be stated beyond which names should not be added to the supplementary list, I understand the Minister objected to that suggestion on the ground of expense. I did not understand that the suggestion itself was not approved.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I said the advertising would be expensive.

Mr. MULOCK At all events, it is desirable that some official notification should be made as to the time when the revising officer was going to sign the list. I suggest that the revising officer should announce when he intends to sign the supplementary list, and that anyone should get a copy of the order on paying for it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I propose to fix a date before which the revising officer cannot transmit the list, so that everyone will know there is that time at least. I said it would not suit the whole Dominion to have a date after which the names should not be received; but I am quite willing to fix a date up to which they shall be received, and to provide that the list shall not be transmitted to the Queen's Printer before 1st August, or, it may be, later.

Mr. MULOCK. That is very well so far as it goes; but the revising officer may keep the list on hand, and some people may not happen to know that it has not been transmitted. It would not be unwise, in addition to the clause the Minister proposes to add, to require the revising officer, if he does not transmit the list on 1st August, to issue an order enlarging the time, so that the public may know up to what time the matter might be open.

Mr. BARRON. I draw attention to the great possibility, under the words "sources of information," of revising officers adopting different rules in almost every district. One revising officer may consider the sources of information sufficient, and another the reverse.

Mr. COLTER. I spoke last night to the Minister of Justice, and I believe he was willing to take into consideration a few amendments which I desire to submit for his consideration. One amendment is with respect to the status of voters.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I propose to adopt that, and abolish the necessity of the status being continued up to the time of the election.

Mr. COLTER. Another suggestion is with respect to this point: where property is held by the mother in the lifetime of the father, and occupied by the son of the mother during the lifetime of the father. There could very easily be a change made in that clause by striking out the words "after the death of his father, being owner of the farm, in respect to which the right of voting is claimed by or for him."

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have not had time to consider that suggestion yet. I think it can be done, and I will answer the hon. gentleman when we again go into Committee on the Bill. I should be glad to receive the amendment in the meantime.

Mr. COLTER. There is another suggestion, which interferes somewhat with the principle of the Bill, and it is this: to allow the sons of tenants without requiring them to be occupants or tenants for five years. It would simplify the Act, and simplify the working of the Act very much. I have prepared an amendment which I will submit to the hon. the Minister of Justice, if he will kindly consider it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will.

On sub-section 4,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I wish to add after the words "shall transmit to the Queen's Printer," the words "not sooner than the first day of August."

Mr. EDGAR. As I understand this amendment, the revising officer shall receive the names for putting on the lists up to the first day of August?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

On sub-section 5,

Mr. COLTER. I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to another point. We will suppose that there are a large number of tenants or occupants in the riding; the assessment is simply prima facie evidence of "value." Why ought it not be prima facie evidence of the ownership by those persons? Those on the assessment roll are liable to pay taxes, and if there is anything wrong in putting them on the preliminary list, the revising officer could correct it at the final revision. I propose to add after the word "value" in this section, the following:—

"And that those who are assessed as owners, tenants or occupants are entitled to be placed on the preliminary list of voters as possessing such qualification."

I think that this would lighten the labors of those concerned in the preparation of the list.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It really seems to me that this is the meaning of the section. For instance, when we say that it will be prima facie evidence of the "value," it surely means that it will be prima facie evidence of the value of A. B.'s property on which he is to go on the list.

Mr. COLTER. Suppose the revising officer finds a person entered as a tenant on the assessment roll, that does not prove conclusively that he has been a tenant for one year previous so as to qualify him under the Act. Prima facie he might be held to be a tenant for the year previous, for the purpose of the preminiary list, and if there is anything wrong in connection with the matter it can be changed on revision.

Mr. COLTER.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think it would meet the hon. gentleman's view if the words "and qualification" were added after the word "value."

Mr. COLTER. Yes, that would do.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I propose to repeal section 13, which provides for the appointment of a reviser's clerk In practice, it has been found that in some districts the revising officer has done the greater part of the duty himself, and the clerical expense has been small. In other sections the revising officers have imposed large duties on the clerks, and considerable sums have had to be paid. This destroys all uniformity in that particular, as we pay a clerk in one district a very much larger sum than in another. What I propose to do is to make an even allowance for each of the revising officers for clerical assistance, and let him get the clerical assistance where he likes.

Mr. EDGAR. I would like to ask the Minister of Justice under what authority the original list has been printed by the Queen's Printer. It is not the original list that the revising officer is going to use; it is some new original list.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No, it is the list of 1886. This Bill was introduced last year, and it was intended that it should fit into the scheme of printing which was then explained fully to the House.

Mr. EDGAR. The original list does not mean the original list; it means the copy printed here.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The original list does not mean any particular piece of paper; it means the list of voters.

Mr. EDGAR. I think an improvement might be made in this provision. It is certainly important that this list, as it comes back from the Queen's Printer, should be most carefully compared with the list signed by the revising officer which has been sent to the Queen's Printer. Therefore, I would suggest that in the fourth line of section 17 some such words as these, should be added—"after comparing and correcting the same with the list signed by him, he shall certify it," &c.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We will make the price of voters' lists not exceeding 10 cents, instead of 25 cents, and add "reeves" and "deputy reeves," to those to whom will be transmitted copies of the lists.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It will be advisable also, to add postmasters. They could post the lists up in their offices, where the people could read them when getting their mails.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.. That would make a great number of lists. However, we will return to this section, and see whether provision cannot be made in this respect.

On section 3,

Mr. BURDETT. I would suggest to the Minister of Justice that the post office address should not be the last post office address, but the post office address given in the list.

Mr. TISDALE. That would make it more certain.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have no objection to say: "the post office address mentioned in the list, or his last post office address." There are some addresses which are not known.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I would move that the following words be added:—

"No application to insert or reject names shall be dismissed on account of error in the name or names designated therein, provided such error is corrected on the day of revision."

Sometimes a man whose name is John is called James, but I do not think anyone should be rejected on that account, if on the revision day it is proved that the man should be on the list and his correct name can be given.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to consider that when we get through the Bill.

Mr. BURDETT. I think section 16 covers that.

On section 5,

Mr. COLTER. I mentioned last night that I thought it was proper that certain words should be added to this section, after the word "him," in the 46th line. I have submitted to the Minister of Justice an amendment, requiring the revising officer to notify the public that the lists are completed, subject to the correction of simply clerical errors, and that these clerical errors should be corrected in the presence of the parties, or of any who may choose to attend, publicly. I mentioned, at that time, a case in point. It would be very cheap, and very simple, to have this matter arranged, and I suggest that the Minister of Justice should take it into consideration.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We will try and make provision for that, but I would rather reserve that until the close of our work on the Bill, because it will be necessary to see how it fits into the main Act.

Mr. MULOCK. I intimated to the Minister yesterday that I had an amendment in the line suggested by my hon. friend (Mr. Colter), and I will send it to him.

Committee rose, and, it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 4) further to amend the Revised Statutes, chapter 5, respecting the Electoral Franchise.

On sub-section 2 of section 5,

Mr. DAVIES. This is a new provision. After the lists are printed and before they are verified, should it not be the duty of the revising officer to compare them?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Is this the final printing of the list?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Suppose errors are made in the printing of the lists, is there any provision in the Act by which mistakes that might occur in that way can be rectified—either by the omission of names from the list, or mistakes of the printer?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is something in that; but it was understood that before the Bill was finally passed we would try to make some provision for the correction of clerical errors.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). As I understand, the list, when printed, is the list that will be handed to the deputy returning officers?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The point I want to make is, that there should be a verification of the list after it finally leaves the printer's hands, so that if there were any mistake made, as it often happens that some names are dropped out, they could be reinserted.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This provides that after they are printed, they should be verified by the revising officer, and transmitted to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That is the verification before the printing. What I allude to, is the verification after the list is printed.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is no provision for that. We agreed to reserve the question of verification of clerical errors, and I will consider that at the same time. I think it would be desirable.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How is the revising officer to verify those lists? The Queen's Printer has to print them as he receives them from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and how are they to be verified?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is no method prescribed here for verifying after transmission from the Clerk of the Crown, but we are going to provide for verification.

On section 6,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I propose to drop that section. It was a proposal to reduce the number of electors in a polling sub-division to 250 instead of 300. That was asked for in the Printing Bureau, for some reasons connected with the number of names that it would be convenient to have on a sheet, but I think it would involve too much trouble in redistributing the polling districts.

On section 9,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I desire to refer to section 10 of the Act we are amending, which contains a special provision with respect to Prince Edward Island and British Columbia. Instead of 30th July, 1885, being the date up to which persons who had a right to vote, under the Island franchise, should continue to have the right to be placed on the list, it should be extended to the 1st of June in each year. The Act as it now stands provides that persons in the Island who are British subjects, and of full age and entitled to vote under the Island franchise, shall be entitled to be placed on the list, provided they were so entitled on 20th July, 1885. That was all right when the Act was passed. The intention was to give whoever was entitled to vote under the Island franchise, a right to be placed on the list as it was revised year by year.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand a serious difficulty has arisen, which has frustrated the intention of Parliament, as regards the operation of this section in Prince Edward Island. I understand the revising barrister ruled that those persons only are entitled to go on the list who, on 20th July, 1885, were qualified to vote; and I understand the fact to be, that in the Island very few persons were qualified to vote, because the law of the Province required that they should not only be persons assessed for poll tax, but persons who had paid poll tax, and the date fixed for the payment of poll tax was so early in the year, that it was not collected to any extent;—in fact, it had been levied, but not collected. What I was going to suggest was, that this section should include any person in the Province of Prince Edward Island who was a British subject, and was on 20th July, 1885, liable to be assessed for the payment of such poll tax, and so on.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Act is all right as it stands now to enable those qualified to vote under the Island law on a particular day, namely, 20th July, 1885. There is nothing wrong in the Act, because it confers upon every person who was entitled to vote under the Island law on 20th July, 1885, a right to have his name put on the electoral list. The only object is to extend that date, and I suggest 1st June in each year, as it is the date when the preliminary list is first made up. If the amendment were carried, the result would be this, that whenever a revision takes place in each year every person entitled to vote under the Island franchise would be entitled to be placed on the electoral list.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That would be a very serious extension of the franchise given to Prince Edward Island, and a departure from the principle of the Act. What I recommend is a section that would deal with the decision of the revising barrister, which had the effect of frustrating the intention of Parliament on that subject; but I did not expect to go so far as to give to the Island the provincial franchise when we had not recognised it in other Provinces.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That has been done. On the first revision held under this statute, every person who was entitled to vote in the Island under the provincial franchise on 1st July, 1885, was entitled to be placed upon the electoral list. It was all right for the first revision. That principle was conceded.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. What I understand is that the revising officer has given a decision which frustrated that even.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No; I never heard of any such decision. Every person who came forward to have his name placed on the list, if he proved before the returning officer he was entitled to vote on that day, he put his name right on. The difficulty arises that when the next revision takes place all those who became of age on the 20th day of July, or any day subsequent from 1885 to 1889, would be debarred from voting, while those who came of age previous to that would be entitled to vote. If you leave the Act as it is now, you would be creating most invidious distinctions in the Province, which cannot be the intention of the hon. gentleman. The intention of the Act was to give everybody there who was entitled to vote under the Island franchise on that date, the right of being put on the new electoral list. Now, as we are revising the Act, from year to year, that principle must be extended, or, otherwise, the hon. gentleman will see what a curious anomaly it will be. All the franchise voters will be entitled to vote who came of age before this arbitrary date, but if they came of age the following day they would not. If the hon. gentleman carries out the suggestion he made, he would be conferring the franchise on men who did not possess it under the local franchise, and he would withhold it from those who do so possess it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand the fact to be this: that on the 20th July, 1885, under the original Franchise Act, all those who were under the law of the Province entitled to vote, were entitled to be put on the list. I am informed it was held by the revising officer in Prince Edward Island, that it was not only necessary a voter should be subject to the poll tax, but that he should have paid it on the 20th July. None of them, or very few, had paid the poll tax, which had been levied only a short time before and was not collected. My information is that the intention of Parliament, as regards that class of persons, had been frustrated. The extension of that right, however, would involve a great anomaly between Prince Edward Island and the rest of the Dominion. The first principle of the Act was that there should be uniformity of franchise, and it is true that in Prince Edward Island there was an anomaly, but it was an anomaly in favor of a liberal extension to a class of persons who at that time had a right to vote in the Province. It was not the intention to recognise persons who afterwards occupied a similar position and should likewise have the right to vote under the law of the Province. That would be against the principle of the Bill. The object aimed at was that rights then accrued were not to be disturbed, but, as I understand the discussion in 1885, it was not the intention that the right should continue to others who would grow up to be in the position of poll tax payers. The hon. gentleman thinks I am misinformed as to the decision which was given by the revising officer, but we can discuss that at a later stage, it being, I presume, not necessary that any amendment should be given notice of.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I was a very close attendant at the revision court, and this is the first ever I heard of that decision being given. The revising officer simply decided, as he could not help deciding—for the language was plain, that everybody who, at the arbitrary date, was entitled to vote under the Island franchise, ought to have his name on the list—that the intention of the Act was carried out. The point was, that great numbers became of age subsequent to the arbitrary date, and they wanted to go on the list. The revising officer said: "I am powerless in that matter; Parliament has fixed an arbitrary date; and, unless you are entitled to vote at that time by the Island franchise, you cannot get on the list." My object is to extend that principle to those who came of age subsequent to 1885, and I believe, that if the hon. the Minister considers for a moment what a curious anomaly will otherwise exist, he will see my amendment is in the right direction.

Mr. SPROULE. You may say the same of the ordinary assessment roll, before it has been finally revised by the judge.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I may explain in a few words that what I wish, and what I think is the principle of the Act, is to give to the young men who came of age since 1885 the same rights that the young men who came of age before 1885 possess. I presume that the Minister will go into committee on this Bill again.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

On section 11,

Mr. BURDETT. I trust I may be pardoned for making a suggestion to the Minister of Justice with regard to the witnesses' fees. I understand that as the law is proposed to be changed, that any person by declaration "of information and belief" can put on any number of names. That possibly may be wrong or it may be right; there are arguments both for and against it; but the point I wish to raise is this: that where a person puts a number of names on the list, either on his own knowledge or on information and belief, and those names are attacked, the parties attacked ought to have notices served on them to come to court, and give their evidence, and the revising officer ought then to have power to say whether they should have witness fees, and if so, how much, and by whom they should be paid. For instance, if a man chooses to make a declaration, which is substantially untrue, and in consequence gets a number of faggot votes put on the list, he ought to be compelled to pay the cost of having those votes removed. And I submit that any person whose name is put on the list, ought to be compelled, at least if he is living within the riding, to come before the court; and the revising barrister, on deciding on the validity of his vote, should then say whether he is entitled to witness fees or not, just as all persons are obliged, in Ontario, to go before a Justice of the Peace, under the Summary Convictions Act, and give evidence, and the question of fees is in the discretion of the Justice. That would remove any complaints that might be made of persons illegally asking to have names put on the list. The present system works great hardships. I can give instances in which a great many names have been put on the list by men who cared very little how much expense and trouble they occasioned to others, and large sums had to be paid to get those names off the list. I hope the hon. Minister will insert a clause to compel parties to go to the court to give evidence to sustain their votes; and if the revising officer thinks that the person who asks a name to be put on is a man of straw, let him insist upon a deposit being paid sufficient to cover the fees; and let a penalty be imposed for putting on bad votes. I submit that this is a proper amendment to make in the interest of both parties and in the interest of justice, in order to have an honest roll.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. member was good enough to mention this matter to me, but I thought his object was sufficiently provided for in sub section 3 of section 25.

Mr. COLTER. That clause is not so interpreted in our county. I submit that it is not sufficiently definite.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Does it not provide that in the discretion of the revising officer, if the person whose name is objected to does not attend, his name is struck off?

Mr. COLTER. But the revising officer generally leans in favor of the vote. He has an alternative, and he may dismiss the appeal or strike the voters' name off. All the judges, I believe, and revising officers as well, always lean in favor of the name being retained on the list. I think there ought to be something more definite.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think it would not do to compel the revising officer to strike the name off, because it might be proved that the person had a right to vote; but in that case he ought to be subject to a penalty for contempt in failing to attend.

Mr. BURDETT. I understand that the Minister of Justice interprets the clause to mean that if the party has been subpœnaed and does not attend, the revising officer may strike his name off, and he ought to do it unless good reason is shown why he does not attend.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No. I say he ought to strike the name off or fine the party for contempt, unless there is evidence to the contrary.

Mr. COLTER. The doctrine of leaning in favor of the vote, I think, is a generally acknowledged doctrine by all who have anything to do with the revising of the voters' lists.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not think that presumption ought to prevail if the person applying to be put on the list has been summoned to support his application. I think there should not be any presumption in his favor; there ought to be substantial evidence to prove his qualification.

Mr. COLTER. The fact of the name being on the roll is prima facie evidence of its right to be there, and that has been the decision in every case. In not one case, where the party has been subpœnaed, has his name been struck off, unless there has been affirmative evidence given.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Does not the hon. gentleman agree with me that if a man's name is on the list, the burden of proof is to take it off, but that cannot prevail in the case of a witness who absent himself and prevents the question being tried. In that case the revising officer should exercise his discretion.

Mr. COLTER. Could it not be made mandatory on the revising officer to strike the name off where the party is guilty of contempt, unless he has reason to believe, from some source, that he has a justifiable excuse for not obeying the mandate of the court?

Mr. TISDALE. I can give an illustration of the result of the hon. gentleman's argument. In one instance, in Ontario, where that law prevails, they suspended half a township of men who had been freeholders for years, and because these men did not turn up, knowing as they did and everybody knowing, that they had held these farms for years, they were struck off the lists. The hon. gentleman is inconsistent, because this afternoon he induced the Minister of Justice to make the assessment roll, which in Ontario is the same as our list of voters, prevail not only as to value but as to the right of the people to vote. Now, as soon as we come to the Dominion Franchise roll, he turns round and wants to apply the opposite doctrine.

Mr. COLTER. I did provide for that particular exception in my remarks, and I think the Minister of Justice so understood me, that the name should primâ facie be struck off unless the revising officer had reason to believe the person who had disobeyed the subpœna was entitled to the vote, or unless the evidence of others was furnished him to that effect. These statutes should be made as clear as possible, and their interpretation as uniform as possible. As the case stands, some revising officers would strike off these people who are guilty of contempt on the ground that they were not entitled to any privileges in consequence of their conduct, while others would be guided rather by the doctrine of leaning in favor of the vote. The objection of the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) could be remedied in this way. I am adverse to bogus appeals, to appeals in such a way as to cast doubts unnecessarily. The appellant might be obliged to put up a certain sum of money, say $2, as a guarantee of good faith, in the hands of the revising officer, which the latter would apply as directed. In that way we would have no wanton appeals, but simple justice.

Committee rose and reported progress.

CERTIFICATES TO MASTERS AND MATES.

Mr. TUPPER moved that amendments made by the Senate to Bill (No. 26) to amend the Act respecting certificates to masters and mates of ships, chapter 73 of the Revised Statutes, be read the second time and concurred in. He said: The only amendment is to add the word "Bermuda," so as to include that island as well as the West Indies.

Motion agreed to, and amendments concurred in.

SAFETY OF SHIPS.

Mr. TUPPER moved second reading of Bill (No. 54) to amend the Revised Statutes, chapter 77, respecting the safety of ships. He said: This Bill is similar to that introduced last Session, with the exception of the first clause, which excited a certain amount of criticism in the old Bill. On consideration it was deemed expedient not to press those provisions which relate to the establishment of a load line for ships in Canada. The present Bill is, therefore, confined mainly to the improvement of the present Act, and contains the provisions in that regard which were in the former measure. The present Act, chapter 77, has certain provisions framed with the object of inducing the owners and masters of ships to take care that their ships are seaworthy. It has been found, however, in practice that as these sections which I propose to amend were drafted not precisely similar to the clause in the English Act, it is almost impossible to obtain a conviction on a prosecution under circumstances fully justifying it, considering the intention of the Act, so that in the sections of the Bill now before the House, while using the language of the Act, I propose to define "unseaworthiness," and the definition of that term I have taken from the English Act. The English Act in reference to the overloading of ships, after mentioning unseaworthy ships as open to detention, goes on to specify that detention may take place for overloading, or underloading, or improper loading, and in the present Bill I propose to use these words after the words "unseaworthy state." I have alluded to the third section. The second section is to be read in connection with the fifth section, and that relates to grain cargoes, and is taken from the English Act, chapter 43, of the Statutes of 1880. That relates chiefly to the use of shifting boards or other proper means for the prevention of the shifting of a grain cargo. I take it that there will be no objection to that. The Bill was before the House last Session, it has been on the Order paper for some time this year, and has been in the hands of shipping men throughout the country, and I am very glad to say that no objections have been urged to these very proper amendments to our law. The only persons who could properly object, I submit, would be those reckless owners who buy up unseaworthy crafts and send them to sea utterly reckless of how life is endangered. I have introduced a section into this Bill, in consequence of the representation of the collector at the port of St. John, pointing out the possibility of an evasion of the present law regarding deck loads. He mentions that that law has been evaded at that port, though, on enquiry, he was unable to give the name of any ship that had been guilty of the evasion. However, he stated that, under sub-section 1 of section 7 of the Act, it was possible, and had been done, for a ship to clear for a port in Africa, and to go to Europe, and so evade the law. I have not heard of any evasions of that kind in any other place, but I submit, that the clause will prevent the possibility of such an evasion taking place. Section 6 of the Bill is necessary in connection with the clause referring to grain cargoes, and enables the Custom officers to go on board of a ship, to find the way in which these cargoes are stowed, and it is somewhat similar to the Act in regard to port wardens. Section 8 is an adoption of the clause in the English Act relating to contracts of service, and it is properly included in this Bill. It provides that, in every contract, there shall be a condition implied, notwithstanding anything in the contract itself, of seaworthiness on the part of the ship, and that all reasonable means to insure that seaworthiness shall be taken.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do I understand that the hon. gentleman intends that all vessels of any size or description —for instance, small schooners of from thirty tons to seventy or eighty tons, carrying grain from one Province to another, as from Prince Edward Island to Richibucto or Shediac, or other ports on the north shore of New Brunswick—are to have shifting boards?

Mr. TUPPER. Neither in the Act on our Statute-book nor in the English Act is an exception made in regard to any vessel. It is necessary, in every case, that sufficient means shall be taken to preserve life. It is not necessary that a shifting board should be used in every case, but the necessary means must be taken, whether by sacks or bags or shifting boards. The same reason applies to every ship, no matter where it may go or what may be its size, whether it goes to Queen's, Prince Edward Island, or to any more distant place, that precautions shall be taken to ensure the safety of the ship and of the men who are on it. I understand that the construction of a ship with a shifting board involves a very trifling expense, and these shifting boards are now used by a large number of vessels both in the inland waters of Canada and in the coasting trade, especially in the carrying of grain. It is to make this general and to compel all owners to adopt those precautions, that this Bill is now introduced. The Act does not confine it to shifting boards, but says: "or other proper precautions to prevent the cargo from shifting." I think the hon. gentleman will agree with me that necessary precautions should be applied to all ships alike.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think, perhaps, my hon. friend the Minister of Marine has not considered this sufficiently. It may be all right to apply these measures to long voyages, like the Atlantic voyages, but when he applies them to vessels going for a three or four or five hours run from Prince Edward Island to the mainland, or on coasting voyages, I think the hon. gentleman would do well to consider the effect of such a provision upon the trade, before he introduces it. This practice of copying English legislation is getting to be a fad with the Ministry of the day. I do not apply that in any offensive sense to the measure of the hon. gentleman, but it is not necessary always that English legislation should be adopted here. It should only be adopted as far as it can be adapted to our own case. I think the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) has a good deal of force in it, and the Minister should consider that before he presses these amendments, because I doubt very much if it is well or in the interests of Canada for him to adopt that provision.

Mr. DAWSON. There are two classes or kinds of navigation in this Dominion. There is the navigation of the great lakes, and there is the navigation of the ocean, and they are very different in many respects. I shall say nothing in regard to ocean navigation, for there are many hon. members here who come from the Maritime Provinces who are much better qualified to speak on that subject than I can be. But with regard to the navigation of the great lakes, I may say that this Act, and the legislation which has already taken place on this subject, make, I should say, quite law enough. So far as legislation goes, the safety of ships, after the passing of this Bill, will be pretty well provided for. But what does all that amount to unless there can be some means adopted whereby the law will be enforced? I do not see any provision in this Bill for the enforcement of the law. Vessels go out on the great lakes overloaded, they go out improperly manned, without being properly provided with sails, ropes and anchors. A schooner loaded with wheat, for instance, starts from Port Arthur or some other port on the great lakes. She is so much loaded that there is scarcely two or three inches of what lake navigators call seaboard left; and the consequence is that if a storm comes up that vessel is immediately cut adrift when danger arises. A great many losses have occurred in that way. Now, I would suggest that the Custom house officers, at the different ports, should have power conferred upon them to prevent an overloaded, or unseaworthy vessel from going out. It often happens that vessels do go out, which, instead of being manned by sailors, are manned with landsmen, with men on board who have had no experience in navigation, and the result is that when the barge, or schooner, loaded with wheat, is cut adrift, they do not know what to do, and the consequence is the loss of the cargo and the loss of the men. It is very difficult always to get proper seamen on the great lakes, because there are no sailors there who make an exclusive profession of navigation. We have navigation for only six or seven months in the year, and during the remaining five or six months these men are obliged to do something else for a means of subsistence. Consequently, we cannot find as skilful men on the great lakes as on the ocean, where they are constantly engaged in navigation. But on the great lakes men who have only six months' experience are employed, and they are very often wanting in the requisite skill. Too often, also, people who get freight in schooners are not careful who they put on them. The steamers, as a rule, are well enough manned, but the schooners are generally very poorly provided for, both in equipment and in men. A case of that kind occurred some years ago at Port Arthur. A schooner, named the Jane Hurlburt, in the fall of the year, took on board some 30 or more navvies, and the vessel was put in tow of a steamer. She had neither sail nor oar, and they trusted entirely to the steamer to take her to her destination, which was not very far. It was late in the fall, and in passing one of the entrances to Nipigon Bay, a storm arose, blowing off the shore. The sea was not very heavy, and it was such a storm as any ordinary vessel, well manned, could have resisted. But that vessel began to fill, and the moment the sea got up the people on the steamer cut her adrift to save themselves, and down she went with all these poor people on board, of whom not one was saved. These navvies, who were going to their work, knew nothing of navigation, knew nothing of the danger they were incurring, and they were all lost. That is not a solitary instance Now, something should be done whereby it would be impossible for vessels of this kind to go out. The Customs officer at the port from which she sailed should have authority to say: You shall not go out in that miserable plight at this season of the year; you shall not go out improperly manned. No less than twelve cases involving great loss have occurred within a few years, and 300 lives were lost in the waters of Algoma; so it is a subject upon which my constituents feel very keenly, and to which I am bound to draw the attention of the Government. There are a great many vessels on the lakes nearly worn out. The present system is to build vessels of a larger class than have hitherto been used, because they are more profitable. The consequence is that the large fleet of schooners and other sailing vessels, with some steamers, has not been renewed for several years, and consequently the vessels now afloat are becoming very unseaworthy. During the ensuing summer, and for some time to come, a careful watch should be kept over these vessels to prevent loss of life and property. I draw the attention of the Minister to this matter, so that some means may be devised whereby these vessels will not be allowed to go out when they are overloaded. A very important point is to have them properly provided with anchors and chains, and with all the appliances which would enable the sailors to save them if they were cut adrift. I have a letter from a gentleman of St. Catharines, a Mr. Carey, who is the chairman of the Seamen's Committee of Workingmen for looking after the safety of sailors. I will not trouble you by reading his letter, but Mr. Carey tells me that vessels have come into port there without a single sailor on board. In one case, a vessel in tow of a steamer was left to two landsmen who knew so little of what they had to do that people had to go on board from the shore and tie the vessel to the wharf. Now, this is a state of things that should be guarded against in the future. Another point to which I wish to call attention, is the construction of vessels. Anybody is allowed to build a vessel and to put it afloat. There was a case occurred in the Georgian Bay, of a vessel built at Little Current on the Manitoulin Island. The vessel was called the Jane Miller, and she was put afloat top heavy, a small vessel with an enormous upper deck arrangement. I have here a few remarks made by an experienced mariner, a man who has been on the ocean, as well as on the great lakes, and who knows all about ships in every possible way. I will read what he says:

"The duties of the Inspector of Hulls should be expanded, or a special officer should be appointed to see that new vessels on the lakes are built with the necessary stability, that the centre of gravity bears its proper relation to the centre of flotation. At present there seems to be no legal limit to the height and weight of top hamper in the shape of cabins above the main deck. The fierce and sudden gales on the lakes require as good a model of vessel as on the sea coast. A vessel may perhaps be seaworth y under section 6, and yet, if of a bad model, turn over directly she is outside the harbor. In regard to the last portion of clause 2 of section 6, I fail to see that the action of a vessel leaving port in an unseaworthy state can under any circumstances be deemed reasonable or justifiable. A summer and fall "Plimsoll load mark" should be established. The system of towing barges on the open lakes in the fall of the year is bad. In my opinion no vessel should be towed after the 1st of September, unless she is a bona fide sailing vessel officered, manned and equipped in every particular under the Canadian Merchant Shipping Act, so that in the event of the hawser parting she may be able to keep herself off the shore, which at present many cannot do"

I need not add a word. That is the case as I have been asked to lay it before the Government by the Boards of Trade and people of Algoma who are largely engaged in shipping, and when this Act is amended as proposed it will be sufficient to prevent lives being sacrificed, providing means be devised whereby the law will be enforced.

Mr. WALDIE. This Act is intended to apply to centre board vessels sailing on the lakes. They do not require the same shifting boards as ocean vessels do, and planks passing from the keel to the deck make a shifting board in the vessel itself, in the case of a number of small vessels employed on the lakes. Does the Act provide for these cases?

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will see that it applies to all vessels, but it is not necessary that every ship should have shifting boards. In the case referred to by the hon. gentleman, such would not be required. The words are, shifting boards or some other precaution; in fact, some means of preventing the cargo from shifting, but not necessarily shifting boards.

Mr. SPROULE. I gladly endorse every word said regarding the necessity of further amending the law so as to provide greater means for the safety of life and property in shipping. The hon. gentleman has spoken the sentiments of a great many people who, in the past, have suffered from defective laws and defects in the vessels themselves, and in the loading of cargoes, which causes have brought about most serious disasters. One case, that of the Jane Ward, was caused by, or thought to have been caused by, the cargo being placed on the deck, there not being sufficient ballast below. I believe it was clearly understood that that was the cause of the loss of that vessel. Another defect that will be provided for, by the amendment proposed, is cargoes being carried without shifting boards. A schooner carrying corn from Chicago began rolling in the trough of the sea, from the cargo shifting from side to side, and ultimately foundered. In that case, had there been a provision in the law providing for shifting boards, the loss of the vessel, and of lives, would have been prevented. Another important matter to which the hon. gentleman for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) called attention, and which I think a very important one, is that some person should have the authority to retain a vessel going out of port, either without the cargo properly arranged or being overloaded. Many vessels go out with large excursion parties without possessing life boats and life-saving apparatus needed on board for the safety of so large a number of people. Moreover, vessels go out with a very much larger number of passengers than the law allows; but if you appeal to the collector of Customs he says: While I have the authority, I only get into trouble if I stop the practice; while I have the authority I am not instructed to invariably exercise it. Accordingly what is everyone's business is no one's business, and vessels are therefore allowed to go without possessing proper life-saving apparatus, or overloaded. The objection taken by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), I do not think is a valid one, namely, that a vessel going on a trip of four or five hours should not be expected to bear the expense that would be necessary to provide shifting boards for the cargo and so on. But the hon. gentleman forgets that grain is generally not taken a short distance in bulk in vessels.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, always.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood that it was usually put in sacks or something of that sort. If it is as stated by the hon. gentleman, I think the present provision should apply as much in that case as if the vessel was going 2,000 miles. I can take my own county facing on Georgian Bay, and while the distance from Owen Sound to Collingwood is only 50 miles, vessels frequently meet very disastrous storms and serious losses have occurred in that short distance, and the provisions of the law should apply as much to those vessels as to vessels going from Owen Sound to Port Arthur or Duluth. The principle involved is as good in one case as in the other. The suggestion of the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson), that some competent person should inspect vessels in course of construction is a very good one, because very frequently they are constructed without possessing the strength necessary to contend against the storms they have to encounter. There should be some provision compelling the collector of Customs at every port to see that every vessel that leaves the port is properly equipped, not only with men, but with life-saving apparatus, and this is the more necessary, because many people know nothing about the requirements of equipment, or in regard to life-saving apparatus. There should be some authority to look after steamers leaving the port.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I have no objection to any measure in any degree tending to provide for greater security for our shipping interests, and it is just possible that some of the clauses may be in the direction of improvement. The only objection that I raise to the Bill on its face is that it will be attended with very considerable expense to the owners of small vessels on account of providing, first, for shifting boards, and secondly for the inspection of vessels either leaving port or arriving at their destination. Any charge of that kind, no matter how small it may be, will be objected to by all who are interested in the coasting trade.

Mr. TUPPER. There is no provision for any cost for inspection.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Precisely so, but the Act relating to port wardens is continued in force. I see by one of the clauses it is provided that when a vessel arrives at a port of destination with a grain cargo any Customs house officer may proceed on board and examine into the mode in which their cargo is stowed.

Mr. TUPPER. But there is no charge.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman will observe that an ordinary Customs house officer would be a very incompetent man to see whether a cargo is properly stowed or not. It would be rendering the Bill a complete farce because any Customs house officer would know but little about the stowing of the cargo. The 9th clause provides that the Act relating to port wardens is to continue in force, therefore it will be necessary to provide that the port warden would be the proper person to inspect that vessel either before she leaves or at the port of arrival. The hon. gentleman will have to provide for that without any expense to the owner of the craft. When we go into committee I have some further matters which I will draw the hon. Minister's attention to and which we will consider more thoroughly.

Mr. TUPPER. I would remind the hon. gentleman that the port wardens are only at certain ports. I understand that inland, farther west than Montreal, there are no port wardens.

Mr. LOVITT. As I understand this Bill will apply more particularly to the inland waters than to the foreign trade, and I do not see any objection to this.

Mr. TUPPER. It does not affect our trade in any radical way, as we have the clause in the British Act relating to this in force.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 2,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The objection which I intend to make on section 5 will arise on this interpretation clause to some extent, and I, therefore, take the opportunity of stating my objections now. The idea of the hon. gentleman is, no doubt, a good one, and I suppose that this clause is a transcript of that known as the Plimsoll clause in the English Act. As the law now stands under the Port Warden's Act, any vessel loaded with grain that leaves any port in Canada, for any port outside the limits of Canada not on inland navigation, is obliged either to have shifting boards or that her cargo will be stowed in such a manner as to satisfy the port warden that she is properly loaded. The 12th, 13th, 14th and 15th clauses of the Port Warden's Act provide for this—one of these sections reads:

"That no vessel shall leave any port in Canada for a port outside of Canada, not including inland waters, unless she has obtained a certificate from the port warden that the grain cargo is properly loaded in every respect."

There is ample provision at present to prevent the improper loading of any ships sailing from Canada to foreign ports. The Bill now before the House, so far as it extends to the Maritime Provinces, is intended to apply to schooners or vessels leaving ports in New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, or Nova Scotia, for some other port in Canada. We must bear in mind that this is intended to apply to the coasting trade, because anything outside of that is already provided for in the Port Warden's Act. The hon. gentleman knows that from the Province from which I come, we ship each year immense quantities of oats on small schooners, for ports in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and he knows that all these cargoes were shipped in bulk. The practice has existed ever since I can remember, and I am sure ever since the coasting trade has existed in these Provinces, of shipping those grain cargoes in bulk. I do not recollect and I have never heard of any accident arising from that, even although they had no shifting boards. As a matter of fact, when a vessel leaves Prince Edward Island for Pictou or Shediac, or any port along the north coast of New Brunswick, she is only a few hours going over, and this provision will entail no doubt a good deal of expense on the owners of these vessels. They are not vessels which constantly carry a grain cargo and if they are obliged to put in shifting boards or any similar provision it will be very expensive. I do not think the experience in the past will justify the hon. Minister in stating to the House that this is a necessity. I would suggest to him that in this interpretation clause the word "oats" be omitted, and if so that would cover nine-tenths of the cases I refer to and would remove the objection that at present I have to the Bill.

Mr. TUPPER. The argument of the hon. gentleman goes to the extent that this legislation is inapplicable to a special class of shipping and particularly to ships engaged in carrying oats. I must candidly admit that if the legislation is improper and unjustifiable in regard to vessels carrying oats, then that section relating to the grain cargoes should not be pressed at all in any form, because it is impossible to distinguish between barley and other grains and oats. If I am unable to press upon the House the necessity of applying this law to ships engaged in carrying oats between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, I think the clause should go altogether. But, if the hon. gentleman will look at the legislation to which he referred, he will see that the distinction he made with regard to cargoes of oats is not well taken. The hon. gentleman argues that port wardens have compulsory powers in the maritime ports, and these vessels are under their supervision and control.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I said so far as vessels carrying grain from the Maritime Provinces to foreign ports are concerned.

Mr. TUPPER. Then I will grant that part of his case. But even in the case of vessels engaged in carrying grain cargoes from our ports, he will see that the law does not go so far as this Bill, because the port wardens can go to ships leaving port; the law is inapplicable to ships arriving. The Bill before the House, like English legislation, deals with ships both arriving and departing. The other provisions regarding the Port Wardens Act are applicable only to other Provinces than Ontario, and many of these provisions are optional; that is, it is only at the suggestion of underwriters or other persons interested in the cargo that the officers take action. Where no port warden exists, we have no remedy where a ship arrives underloaded or with her cargo improperly stowed. That explains also why we give Customs officers the same powers as port wardens, without going further and constituting port wardens at the different inland ports. Then the hon. gentleman states that there will be quite a tax. There is no doubt that, with regard to the expense of making provisions in regard to the safety of the lives of crews and passengers, all our legislation is unhappily framed if expence be objectionable. In regard to the inspection of boilers and hulls, and in all those cases in which our Parliament, as well as the legislatures of other countries, have stepped in between the owner and his property for the protection of life, some expense has undoubtedly been involved; but even on that ground I would meet the hon. gentleman. I submit that this is not a real tax or burden. All careful owners of ships, all men who are not merely stirred by the gambler's impulse in connection with this trade, now certainly do take great care to see to the safety of their ships and the lives of their crews. It is better for all concerned and it pays in the end. These precautions have not injured the shipping that deals in British ports; and no ship can go to the ports of Great Britain to-day without complying with legislation such as I am submitting to Parliament; and when we see the commerce of the mother country growing as it does every day, I think the argument that this would impose a tax is not well founded. As to small vessels, there is no distinction in the English legislation, and there should be no distinction. If it is wrong that the owners should risk the lives of their crews in large ships, surely the wrong is just as great in the case of small ships, and I am informed by practical men that the expense will be trifling, involving in the case of small schooners, something like $20 to alter them so as to prevent the shifting of the cargo. If there is less danger on a short voyage, the precautions need not be so great, and there is a latitude allowed in the case of grain cargoes in that regard. But if the hon. gentleman will look at the list of casualties to shipping, reported not only by the underwriters, but in our marine reports year after year, the distressing accidents occurring on the lakes will, I am sure, induce him to make it more necessary to all interested in shipping to take some precautions for the protection of life. I might mention the cases of some accidents which were due to the absence of the shifting board. In 1887 there were the cases of disasters to the Oriental, the California, the Asia, the Simcoe, the Zealand, the Columbia, the J. Miller and others, in which, not only large crews, but a great many passengers were lost. In view of the same circumstances facing us as faced the mother country previous to the adoption of this legislation, I think the hon. gentleman's objection that there will be a tax upon vessels engaged in carrying cargoes of oats from Prince Edward Island is not sufficient to induce the House either to make an exception in their case, or to take what would, to my mind, be the more logical course of rejecting the clause altogether.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have had a good deal of experience myself in the business to which my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) refers. Forty years ago I was in the habit of importing oats from Prince Edward Island, and from that up to twenty years ago, I have had a great deal of experience in this line. If the hon. Minister understood the business and knew what he was talking about—I don't say that with any disrespect to him—if he knew the character of the vessels, their size and style, and the working of them, he never would have introduced such a clause as this compelling these people to put in centre-boards. In all the experience I have had, and I have had a great deal, of this particular trade, I never knew a single accident occurring to a vessel on these short coasting voyages from the causes for which the hon. gentleman's preventive measures is supposed to remedy. On the other hand, the hon. gentleman speaks of the centre board being put in for $20.

Mr. TUPPER. I said shifting board.

Mr. MITCHELL. What do you mean by shifting boards?

Mr. TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman not know?

Mr. MITCHELL. I do, but I do not think you know, or you would not say it. I presume by shifting boards the hon. gentleman means the staunches which are put in with plank or boards attached to prevent the cargo from shifting from one side to the other. Lots of these little vessels have not more than 14 or 15 feet of beam, and have no necessity for any centre boards or shifting boards, as the hon. gentleman calls them. I never heard them called shifting boards before. There is no necessity for any such protection for the class of little vessels employed in the trade between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. The hon. gentleman talks of $20 as being a trifling sum. Why, to one of these traders, that would represent a large proportion of their profits. The hon. gentleman proposes to tax shipping industry between Prince Edward Island and the mainland without any reason. The great curse of this country is the useless legislation that is forced upon it. Every new Minister thinks that he must improve on his predecessor.

Mr. TUPPER. This is a Bill of my predecessor.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not care whose it is. Every new Minister thinks he has to improve on the legislation of his predecessor, and we happen sometimes to have deputy ministers who are never satisfied unless they are disturbing the legislation or trade of the country. That Bill is just as necessary as the fifth wheel to a coach. If my hon. friend knows of defective regulations with regard to shipping cargoes of grain to Europe, let him improve them.

Mr. TUPPER. We are doing that.

Mr. MITCHELL. No one will find fault with his attempts to secure greater safety to life on an ocean voyage, but to compel these people, on a voyage of from three to five hours, to pay this tax, is an unnecessary interference with the operations of commercial men which ought not to be countenanced by this House. I am speaking of a subject I know something about. I know the trade and the manner of conducting it. As a shipowner in former years myself, having bought hundreds of these cargoes, having personally inspected them, knowing personally the manner of conducting that business, I know that this Bill, as applied to that trade, is utterly unnecessary. My hon. friend makes a mistake when he applies these general laws relating to Atlantic voyages to voyages of four or five hours duration, and he would do well to inform himself before attempting to pass legislation of that kind and disturbing the existing trade of the country.

Mr. BAIRD. From my experience as a shipper, I am disposed to believe that these provisions which would apply to deep sea or foreign going vessels do not apply with the same aptness to coasting vessels, owing to the fact that the two vessels are entirely different in shape. The coasting vessel as now built, is generally of such a character that she can carry her entire cargo on her deck and sail safely, while the shape of the sea going vessel is narrow and deep, and she is inclined to bear over on her beam ends. I understand, in the case of the latter, that the danger largely arises from careless loading. But take the ordinary coaster, as she is now built, and bear in mind that one of the requirements of the coasting trade is that the vessel shall be shallow; bear in mind that the physical feature of the whole coast of North and South America is that we have shoal water harbors to encounter, and the American coastwise fleet are largely built with a very great beam, little depth, and considerable length. These vessels will carry, if necessary, their full load on deck and sail safely. A narrow and deep vessel on the coasting trade is almost utterly useless, that is a vessel shaped similar to a sea going vessel, giving the same proportions, and which would have to carry ballast. The coaster carrying ballast is entirely useless. If you load an ordinary coaster full of grain, and it will be found almost impossible to throw her on her beam ends, no matter what storm she may encounter. We must bear in mind that in these short voyages of a few hours, if the vessel is thrown down a little on her beam ends, she would still worry into a place of safety, while when the deep sea vessel, perhaps a few miles from land, falls into that position, it is impossible for her to recover; so that what would apply very aptly to deep water vessels does not apply with the same aptness to coasting vessels, and would become a very great burden. Ship-owners will tell you that preparing for a grain cargo in the harbor of New York is a large item of expense; fitting the vessels to receive the grain, fitting the shifting boards and all the necessary requirements is a large item, and unless the vessel is continued in that trade, it is considered unprofitable to fit her out for the grain trade of a single voyage. All gentlemen engaged in that trade will agree that taking a load of grain and then throwing away these preparations in order to take a cargo of another character is considered a great waste. A coasting vessel rarely takes her second cargo of grain. She delivers her cargo of grain, and her next load is coal or lumber or any other cargo she can get, and perhaps in a year's trade she will not have more than one or two little loads of grain. After careful investigation of this subject, I think it would almost be found impossible in the Atlantic coastwise trade to find a single case where a coastwise vessel came to grief in carrying a cargo of grain. I have had experience in carrying cargoes of corn from the port of New York to St. John and Halifax, and I never knew of a single instance where any precaution has been taken or considered necessary because of loading the vessel in bulk.

Mr. WALDIE. The inland trade of this country upon the lakes is largely with the United States, either in regard to cargoes going from Canada to United States ports, or cargoes coming from United States ports to Canadian ports. The Montreal trade, carried by way of Kingston to Collingwood or other ports on the lakes, is carried in vessels with centre boards. None of them have shifting boards. If this provision is passed, the Canadian vessel will be at a disadvantage in comparison with the American vessel, because it provides that the Canadian vessel is to be subject to inspection by a Customs officer at the port of arrival. My experience in regard to unloading vessels before the regular hours has been that we had to pay a fee to the Customs officer to allow us to unload, and I am certain that, whatever might be the intention in this Bill, we would have to pay a fee.

Mr. TUPPER. There is no authority for it.

Mr. WALDIE. I know that, but the fee is paid all the same. If this examination was made at the port of loading, before the vessel had departed, it would be reasonable and just, because it would afford a means of preventing an accident and of seeing that the vessel was in a seaworthy state before she sailed; but, when the examination is to be made at the port of arrival, I think it is unreasonable and unnecessary, and the effect of it will be to drive our Canadian schooners entirely out of the grain trade from Chicago to Collingwood, Midland and Kingston, and will leave that trade entirely in the hands of the Americans. I think such an act in regard to the large propellors that have mixed cargoes is much more needed than it is in regard to the schooners with centre-boards. The smaller vessels with centre-boards do not need this provision, and it would affect not only the through trade but the Lake Ontario trade, where there are short runs of a few hours, such as that from Toronto to Oswego. In those cases the vessels are filled with grain. They suit their cargo to the size of the vessel, and no shifting boards are required in these centre-board vessels. This Act, being made applicable to all kinds of vessels, is not the legislation which is required, and I do not think it should be passed. If it were passed, I am sure it would remain a dead letter.

Mr. CHARLTON. The necessity for shifting boards on the inland waters does not exist. All sailling vessels on the inland waters have centre-boards, and they are generally vessels of light draft and wide beam. Even without a centre-board, it would not be necessary to make this provision.

Mr. GILLMOR. Does not the centre-board extend the whole length of the keel.

M. CHARLTON. No. I would suggest to the Minister to amend sub-section 2 of section 4 by adding after the word "used" in the first line, "except on vessels having centre-boards."

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. gentleman's argument is that there is no danger of the cargo shifting when there is a centre-board. I am otherwise informed by the nautical officers of my department, but, if the hon. gentleman is right no amendment is needed, because there is a provision for other proper precautions to be taken.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is very indefinite. It is a fact that, in all the vessels sailing under the American flag on the lakes, this regulation in regard to shifting boards has never been made. They carry grain in bulk, and, as far as I know, no accident has ever occurred in consequence of that. It is entirely unnecessary to make any requirement that shifting boards should be used on inland waters. It puts our vessels at a disadvantage in competing with the American vessels for business.

Mr. WELSH. I object to one clause in this Bill. I have been engaged in the shipping trade for the last forty years, and I know that the original Act met with the approval of the English Board of Trade. For the last fifteen years, I think, we have been shipping our grain under the present Act, and there have been no accidents reported, as far as I know. Now, we are to bring our ships under the notice of the port warden, and to put shifting boards in, and to go to considerable expense, as the hon. member for Queen's Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) has stated, and I quite agree with his remarks all through. I object to this provision unless the Minister can show that there has been a loss of ships or a loss of life or a loss of property through the want of this provision, because this clause will entail great cost on our coasting vessels. It will cost them $40 or $50 or $60 to carry a cargo of grain a distance of 50 miles. You might as well compel the boats on the canal here to have shifting boards to carry a cargo across the river. If the hon. gentleman makes a provision that every ship clearing out of our ports to sea shall be seaworthy and fit to carry its cargo, I have no objection, but this is a tax imposed on the coasting trade, and is working for boodle on the part of the port wardens, and I for one will move that that clause shall be struck out.

Mr. TUPPER. Is not the hon. gentleman aware that vessels engaged in the coasting trade do use these shifting boards?

Mr. WELSH. Not one; I never knew of one.

Mr. TUPPER. I am informed to the contrary by men who have had considerable experience.

Mr. WELSH. I think I have had more experience than any man in this House. If the Minister of Marine can name one instance where there has been a loss of life or property, or damage done to cargoes, for the want of these shifting boards, and all this unnecessary formula in the coasting trade, then I will pay some attention to his wishes. But he has not shown that there was any call for it. Who has cried out for it? When any legislation is wanted there is a cry for it, it is ventilated in the press. But here is a thing that no one asked for, and you know the old proverb says that what is not worth asking for is not worth having. We have not asked for this, we don't want it, and we won't have it.

Mr. TUPPER. It is true the owners of vessels do not press for reforms which compel them to take extra precautions, although a great many vessel owners, as I am fully aware, already take these precautions. But as a rule, they do not ask Parliament to pass laws to make it compulsory under pain and penalties that they should do these things. But an earnest request for this legislation has come from a large body of men who have considerable interest in the matter, organised bodies of sailors, and particularly in the Marine Association of Ontario, have been continuously pressing this question on the attention of the Government and of the public. They have, in meeting after meeting, called attention to our own marine reports, pointing out disasters which were due to the owners of vessels sending unseaworthy ships to sea, or sending out ships in an unseaworthy condition, and pointing out disasters that have occurred from the absence of proper precautions, by shifting-boards or otherwise, to prevent the cargoes from shifting. Therefore, it cannot be said, that this legislation has merely come from a desire of the officials to legislate, or to copy British legislation. But as we are adopting British legislation at the demand of these men whose lives are involved, I think there is ample cause for the Bill.

Mr. WELSH. I do not object, if there is an application from any organised body of seamen or ship owners in the Dominion for the lake service, but I am not aware that there is such an agitation for the river service. My hon. friend will remember that Picton County which he represents, is only about thirty miles from Prince Edward Island, and he knows, or he ought to know, that there are, I suppose, 40 or 50 cargoes of grain shipped across from Prince Edward Island to Pictou and New Glasgow in the course of the summer. These schooners run over with grain and they bring back coal. Now, it is only 30 or 40 or 50 miles from Prince Edward Island, and would it not be a hard thing to put these vessel owners, whose freight only amounts to $40, to an expense of $40 to put in boards to prevent shifting, and then have to tear them all out when they want to bring back a cargo? I say it is a monstrous injustice. I want the Minister to consider how the men of Pictou look at it. If you want to put it in, put it in for the lakes above Montreal, but if you apply it anywhere else, I shall ask a vote on it.

Mr. SPROULE. Because the hon. gentleman has had an experience of 40 years in shipping, and because an accident did not happen during his experience, he thinks this provision is not needed. The hon. member for Queen's said something of a similar nature; but the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) cited no less than 45 cases.

Mr. WELSH. In inland waters; I am speaking of the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. SPROULE. This provision applies to the coasting trade, which is much like inland waters. Three or four different accidents occurred in the Georgian Bay and on the upper lakes, every one of which has been caused from the shifting of cargoes and improper loading. One was a schooner coming from Chicago with corn, and it was the belief, so far as information could be gathered, that the loss of that schooner was due to the cargo shifting and upsetting it. The steamer Simcoe was lost under somewhat similar circumstances in Lake Huron; and if I remember aright, the Jane Ward was lost in the same way. Now these are instances that come under the notice of men in everyday life. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) says he knows all about shipping. Well, he may, because he knows all about everything, but other people know about the value of human life as well as that hon. gentleman, or others who are engaged in this trade. There is an extensive trade being cultivated on the upper lakes, and large loads of grain are being brought down every week during navigation from Port Arthur to Owen Sound. A vessel will carry from 10,000 to 20,000 bushels, and in addition will have a large number of passengers, and still that vessel may have no proper provision for preventing the shifting of that grain, and in this way human life is endangered. The Minister of Marine is endeavoring to provide what experience has shown to be necessary in order to prevent the loss of life. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken says they have their port wardens in Prince Edward Island, but we have none in Owen Sound or Collingwood, we have no person whose duty it is to go on board a vessel and see that she is in a proper condition so as not to endanger human life. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Waldie) spoke of an experience in the upper lakes, I do not know whether he is an interested party or not. If he has experience he must have known that accidents have occurred from this very cause which I have mentioned. Notwithstanding what was said by my hon. friend as to the shifting of the boards, I think that is no guarantee, it is a theory that in practice has not been found to be correct, because if it had been correct these accidents that have occurred in the coasting trade in the inland waters, would not have occurred. This measure has been asked for year after year, and in giving it the Minister is only complying with requests that have been made from time to time to the various Ministers of Marine who have preceded him.

Mr. WALDIE. If this was to remedy the dangers that have been spoken of by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Sproule), I would not oppose it; but it is simply to put an expense upon the owner of the vessel and upon the cargo of the vessel after it has arrived at the port of destination. If the examination took place before the vessel left the port, there would be no objection to it.

Mr. TUPPER. Surely the hon. gentleman will not persist in saying that there is to be any tax of that kind. No officers would dare to impose a fee where none is authorised to be collected. I do not know why the hon. gentleman says that over and over again. I explained before that we do not propose to impose a single sixpence in that way. Some hon. members have urged that it would be a tax to compel the owners to take precautions to prevent their cargoes from shifting, but that would be an expense in their own interest.

Mr. WELSH. Who looks after the shipping of the ports? Because, as far as my experience goes, I have had to pay a tax on every ship I have ever loaded with grain, a tax of from $5 to $15, to the port warden for inspecting the ship and giving a certificate. I know the vessel is allowed to be cleared at the Customs without producing the port warden's certificate for a foreign port. I take it, and I think I fully understand the question, that if this Act goes into operation the port warden will be called in. and I suppose he will want his usual fee as allowed by the Dominion Act. Am I correct or not on this point?

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is correct to a certain extent. I am not speaking in regard to the Act relating to port wardens. I am quite aware that in certain cases, where a port warden is required, he is allowed certain fees; but the hon. gentleman pointed out that every collector would come on board the ship and demand a fee for inspection. I again repeat that the Act speaks for itself. Collectors when they board ships cannot collect any fee.

Mr. KENNY. The Minister has informed the Committee that those interested in marine matters on the inland waters have asked for this Bill. There seems to be a difference of opinion as regards the necessity of the measure among hon. gentlemen who are very much better informed than I am in all matters connected with inland navigation; but, as regards the Atlantic coasting trade, the Minister has not told us that any requests have been made for this Bill as regards those waters. I must say it will be a very heavy tax if our small coasting vessels are obliged to either line their craft or put in shifting boards for cargoes of grain. While I make that statement from my own knowledge of the business, I am aware that cargoes of grain shipped from Prince Edward Island in vessels of say 30, 50, 60, or 70 tons, very frequently use shifting boards, and those cargoes are often composed of different articles and the boards are used to keep them separate. But even when the cargo is exclusively oats, vessels coming to the port of Halifax, at least, sometimes use shifting boards. I do not say that that is inevitably the case, I say it is very frequently the case. I agree with the hon. member for Queen's, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Welsh) who stated that he thought a very great hardship would be imposed if small coasting vessels of 30 or 40 tons going to Pictou to load coal were obliged to put in shifting boards to make that short voyage. But if I understand the Bill aright, I do not think it proposes to oblige such vessels to use shifting boards. I should like the Minister to correct me if I am wrong. As I read the Bill it says: "Shifting boards or other proper precautions," to prevent grain cargoes from shifting.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the hon. gentleman will read the main section he will find the other precautions, "shipping grain in bags or in barrels."

Mr. KENNY. The bill says "or otherwise." Who is to decide that question? I suppose it is to be left to the officers of the Government to decide, in some places harbor masters or port wardens and at other points Custom officers. I really do not know if the Bill is necessary as regards the inland waters, and upon that point I do not express any opinion. I do not think it is necessary in our Atlantic waters or for our coasting trade, but I do not think at the same time, it would impose any very great tax on our coasting trade. If it does, I think we should take all the precautions we can to protect our coasters. We know that many of the vessels in the fall make one voyage only, and it would be too costly to fit them up with shifting boards for one voyage. Reference has been made to the expense, $50, $60 or $70. That would not be a very large amount for a voyage from New York to Liverpool, but it would be coasting, for a vessel carrying only a small cargo of oats from Prince Edward Island to the mainland of New Brunswick or Nova Scotia. The rate of freight as we all know is very low, and I will ask the Minister to do all he possibly can to protect these coasting vessels from any unnecessary expense. I cannot remember in my experience an instance where a small coasting vessel was lost owing to the cargo shifting. We have had disasters on the Atlantic from cargoes shifting, but I am not aware of a cargo of grain in a coasting vessel ever having shifted.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not want to place my opinion against the opinion of seafaring men from the eastern Provinces, but among the workingmen who sail the vessels and are employed on the vessels on the inland lakes there is a strong feeling, there is an agitation in fact in favor of a greater extent of protection for their lives, and so far as the Bill has relation to inland waters I will give it my hearty support. It does not, however, go far enough in that direction in some particulars. I do not see why a provision as to deck loads should not be made applicable to the inland waters. As I read the law at present and the amending Act, there is no provision preventing vessels on the inland waters from placing loads on the deck to any extent whatever. I should be very glad if the Minister of Marine could see his way to providing a load line for vessels on the inland waters. As British ships have this load line to-day, I do not see why Canadian shipowners should be allowed to drown their men with any greater freedom than is allowed in England. With respect to the objection to shifting boards on the ground of expense, gentlemen who have spoken in regard to the Atlantic coasting trade may have some good reason for objecting to it, but, as regards the inland waters, the lack of these is a fruitful source of loss of life, and I hope the Minister of Marine will adhere to this provision in regard to the inland waters.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). No doubt from the remarks offered these provisions are required for the inland waters, but the general opinion of hon. members from the Maritime Provinces acquainted with the coasting trade is that it is unnecessary as regards that trade and would involve a large expense. In the opinion of the hon. member for Queen's N.B., the hon. member for Halifax and the hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Welsh), all of whom have had experience in shipping matters, this would be a very harsh provision in regard to small vessels running between Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, carrying cargoes of oats from the island to those points. The provisions respecting the inland waters and those relating to the Atlantic coasting trade should constitute separate Bills. That respecting the inland waters would meet with general satisfaction. That relating to our coasting trade would be an interference with it, and it is not necessary.

Mr. MULOCK. I quite agree with the remarks of the Minister of Marine who, when asked if any petitions had been presented by ship-builders in favor of the Bill, replied that petitions had been received in favor of the Bill from those who navigated the vessels. Speaking only from public opinion in the inland portions of the Dominion, I entirely sympathise with the object aimed at by the Bill. I do not know whether the provisions are adequate to meet the case in point, and I do not intend to offer an opinion upon that question; but it is safe to say that the absence of the protection proposed has been the cause of the loss of many valuable lives on the inland waters. We are developing an immense inland fleet for the carrying of cargoes on our great inland seas, cargoes of shifting freight, such as wheat and grain. We are building up an enormous inland port of shipment for grain at the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, we also have a vast number of Canadian vessels carrying wheat from Duluth, Chicago and other American ports, and there is scarcely a limit to the extent to which that trade can be developed. It must be in the memory of many hon. gentlemen here, and I am sure that my hon. friend from Algoma (Mr. Dawson) will remember, the loss of great vessels owing entirely to the shifting of cargoes. I think, speaking from memory, the propeller Asia foundered in the Georgian Bay from that cause alone. It is impossible for those huge propellers carrying twenty or thirty thousand bushels of grain, in a heavy sea such as there sometimes is in the inland waters, to "wear" without being cast over on their beam ends, and in such a case, if the cargo shifts the vessel cannot right, and down she goes. It has been proved that in consequence of the enforcement of the British law, the risks from shifting cargoes have been reduced almost to nothing, and if they have had that experience on the salt water, why should we not have the same experience on our inland seas. For my part, whether any one has petitioned for this measure or not, we have the experience of the good done by a similar law in England, and if anything can be done in the same direction for the benefit of our people, it is the duty of the Minister, the duty of the Government, and the duty of this House, to do what can be done. It may be, and I dare say it is the case, that there should be a discrimination between what would be a proper regulation for vessels of large tonnage, whether propelled by steam or wind, and the case of the small schooners plying along our coast. There may be different rules to be applied, but the object aimed at by this Bill will, I think, have the sympathy of the public, and will be to the benefit of the owners and the navigators of the inland shipping.

Mr. FREEMAN. There certainly should be different rules, as has been stated, applied to ships on the seaboard and ships on the inland waters. On the southern coast of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island we have long ago learned the art of loading ships, but it appears that in the inland waters the present generation are just learning that science, and it would be greatly to be regretted if, because we understand that work, that our knowledge should in any way interfere with the proposal to ensure greater safety for life and security for cargoes. I do not see that we could be at all injured by this Bill. I would object to it very strongly if our coasting vessels were required by this Bill to put in any kind of shifting board, but there is nothing in the Act which I think would interfere with our present mode of loading ships on the seaboard. I venture to say that there is not a cargo of oats which comes from Prince Edward Island—and this kind of grain is mostly carried coastwise in Nova Scotia—that is not in some way or to some extent secured by shifting boards, and the coasters put in such shifting boards as they deem necessary for the safety of their cargo. I think, as I said before, that there is nothing in this Bill which will interfere with their carrying on their work as they have hitherto done. I have some forty or fifty years experience with vessels, and I do not know of a case in which a coasting vessel has been lost, or in which she has suffered damage by reason of the want of shifting boards. As has been well observed by the member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) this has occurred very frequently in ships crossing the Atlantic, but not in our coasting vessels.

Mr. MULOCK. They are vessels of larger tonnage.

Mr. FREEMAN. They are larger no doubt and sufficient care is not taken in stowing cargoes on the larger ships, but in the smaller ships we have no such accidents. If after a close examination there should be found anything in this Bill which would interfere with our coasting vessels it should be eliminated. As has been observed the profit of the little vessels of the Maritime Provinces for carrying oats is exceedingly small. They can scarcely sustain themselves on the freight they are getting now for carrying these cargoes and if any additional tax was imposed it would become very embarrassing indeed. It would also be a great annoyance to those vessels if officers could go aboard and indicate any kind of shifting board or the extent to which those shifting boards should be used. They might require stationary shifting boards, or indeed an officer inclined to be troublesome might put these vessels to a great deal of expense which would certainly be very much to be deplored. I think the hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Welsh) who is better acquainted with this matter than I am, although I claim to have some acquaintance with shipping and the carrying of cargoes, if he sees anything in this Bill that would interfere with our coasting trade and would point it out, I feel assured that the Minister would be very willing to correct the Bill in that regard. I am sure the hon. gentleman will not oppose any reform that the fresh-water sailors require. I think it would be very wrong indeed if he would interfere with the law being as stringent as possible to prevent them destroying life and destroying their cargoes. I am sure we have no desire to do anything of the kind, but let different rules be provided for the different interests. Don't allow us in the Maritime Provinces to be hampered because the men in the inland waters do not know how to take care of their cargoes. It is natural for us down there to know how to stow ships, and it is natural for us to protect our own men. It is as natural for us to protect our men who go on the salt water as it is to protect our families in the house. We look as much after the one as we do after the other. It is not only our interest but it is part of our conscience to do so, and we do not need to be forced to do it. But with regard to those gentlemen on the inland waters, give them laws, make them look after their ships, and sailors, and property, and compel them to do it if they will not do it of their own free will, as we do in the Maritime Provinces. I trust that there is nothing in this Bill to interfere with our coasting vessels, and if there is I should oppose the Bill. I do not see that the Bill interferes with us, and I will offer no opposition to it.

Mr. TUPPER. I have a proposition to make with reference to the suggestion at the earlier part of this discussion of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). There seems to be a strong desire to strike the word "oats" out of the definition so that Act would not apply to those cargoes. I am informed by gentlemen acquainted with the shipping trade on the inland waters, who are most anxious that this Bill should pass, that it affects them so slightly that they would be willing to accept that compromise, the word "oats" being struck out; and if that meets the sense of the House, we might adopt that course.

On section 3,

Mr. TUPPER. The only alteration this section makes in the law is in defining unseaworthiness.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). You make an agent responsible.

Mr. TUPPER. That is the English provision, and I felt delicate in changing it.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). When a ship comes into St. John, the agent never sees the vessel, but sends it to sea as soon as the captain says it is ready. Under this provision the agent would be obliged to go down and examine the vessel, and the result would be that he would charge a double commission.

Mr. TUPPER. That is the present law of course, and it seems to be right. If the agent sends a ship to sea without taking any step to ascertain whether it is seaworthy or not he should be punished as well as others.

Mr. WELSH. I think myself that the agent knows very little about a ship. They do not know whether it is in good order or bad order, and, therefore, I think it would be improper to hold them responsible. Make the owners and the masters liable. I think the Minister should add a clause to this Bill to provide that some person should be appointed to look after the ships. In England there is, in every shipping port, a board of trade whose duty it is to look after every ship that comes in and goes out of the port, and to see that it is seaworthy. In this Bill I see a clause which I do not like. If a vessel is to be fitted up to take a cargo the port warden should have instructions to see that she is in proper order before she takes the cargo on board.

Mr. TUPPER. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman should wait until we get through the Bill and then present that as a substantive clause.

Mr. WELSH. Very well; but you see the position you are putting a ship owner and master in. He takes his cargo from one port and he arrives at another, where he is subject to another officer coming on board who says to him: "Give me $5 or $10, or I will report you."

Mr. O'BRIEN. There were a number of petitions presented to this House by the Knights of Labor from all parts of the country, in the early part of the Session, everyone of which contained a special request to Parliament on the subject of the safety of sailors on the inland waters, and special stress was laid on the load line and some other particulars. It shows how much interest is felt in the subject when this important body should have taken the matter up as they did. I think the trouble on the inland waters is not so much from bad loading as from the class of vessels employed, and I think the Marine Department will have to go further than this Bill goes before they will satisfy the public as to the condition of the inland marine. It is from the build of the vessels much more than from the stowage of the cargo that the great disasters have occurred. That has arisen from the class of vessels which have been employed in navigating the canals and are built expressly for that purpose. We know those vessels are unfit for navigating the large lakes, and some day or other, and the sooner the better, the Marine Department will have to consider very carefully whether something cannot be done to have a much more closer inspection of the hulls upon the inland waters and adopt some rule for the certifying of vessels for the different branches of trade in which they are engaged. It is evident to anyone who knows anything about navigation that the class of vessels built to pass through the locks in canals never can be made suitable for navigating our great lakes.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I think the attention of the hon. the Minister was drawn to the Plimsoll Bill defining what a vessel should contain.

Mr. TUPPER. May I ask the hon. gentleman to reserve that question for discussion after these clauses are passed, because that is a portion of the Bill which was eliminated altogether.

Mr. EDGAR. Those lines are not.

Mr. TUPPER. I will explain the reason why it is impossible for us to do what the hon. gentleman requires, unless we are able to guarantee to the shipowners that when a ship is retained improperly they will be refunded all the damages incurred in consequence of the detention.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). This clause is loosely drawn. It may be in accordance with the English Act, but you leave undefined the expressions "overloading or unloading or unseaworthiness"—and those expressions convey very little definite idea as to the condition of the vessel. I fully agree that if we are to have that protection which is necessary on the inland lakes, we ought to have the clause made sufficiently compulsory. I sympathise with those who have been advocating the interests of shipowners and captains, but there are others who are equally interested. The Minister ought to explain what he means by "overloading or underloading or unseaworthy." Every class of the community is affected by this Bill. Our sailors are important to us, and they are as deeply interested as the owner or captain, and I hope the hon. gentleman will see that this clause is drawn so that it may be clearly understood.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The object of the hon. gentleman no doubt we all approve, and the discussion is limited to the question whether or not the language of the section is too vague. If a vessel goes to sea in an unseaworthy condition, the owner, master, or agent is liable to be prosecuted for a misdemeanor, but who is to determine whether her condition was unseaworthy or not? The magistrate before whom the owner may be prosecuted may be a man who knows nothing at all of the subject

Mr. TUPPER. This is not punishable by summary conviction.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman has already adopted a line of legislation which attains to a large extent the end he has in view, but by different machinery. The Port Warden's Act provides, in the 14th section, that vessels going to sea must previously be inspected by the port warden, who shall report as to whether she is in a fit state to proceed to sea or not.

Mr. TUPPER. That only applies to some ports.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But if the hon. gentleman would extend the operation of this law to vessels not included in it, it seems to me he would meet the end he has in view of preventing any ship going to sea in an unseaworthy condition. The port warden would examine her, and if she were in a fit condition to leave he would give his certificate to that effect. If not, she would be compelled to remain in port. The enlargement of the existing law would therefore meet the hon. gentleman's view better perhaps than the transcript of the Plimsoll Act. The Plimsoll Act in England is worked along with the machinery of the Board of Trade; but under this Bill, although you provide that a man who sends a ship to sea in an unworthy condition is punishable as for a misdemeanor, you provide no machinery to prevent his sending her to sea in that state. You may prosecute him afterwards, but there would be difficulty in proving that the vessel was in an unseaworthy condition when she left port.

Mr. TUPPER. There is no necessity to touch that Act at present, the only object of the section to which I am alluding being to remove the vagueness that the hon. gentleman from Elgin (Mr. Wilson) has pointed out, and to meet difficulties that have arisen in prosecutions under that section. All I am doing is extending the word "unseaworthy" so as to include what I have said here is taken from the English Act in this regard:

"If it is unseaworthy so that the life of any person is likely to be endangered thereby or by reason of overloading or underloading or improper loading or by reason of being insufficiently manned or from any other cause, is guilty of a misdemeanor."

That is the only object of this section. It does not change the officers or appoint new ones or give the officers further powers, but removes the vagueness which exists as to when an infraction of the law occurs. With reference to the remarks of the hon. member for South Elgin (Mr. Wilson) it is impossible to state the exact circumstances when a ship is insufficiently manned or unseaworthy, because that will depend altogether on the circumstances in each case. That kind of case is left, as every other case is, to the criminal procedure, and evidence must be adduced that the crew is insufficient. That will have to be shown in the ordinary way by men competent to testify, but we could not lay down a hard and fast line in that respect for every ship.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I agree with the Minister of Marine, that it is very difficult to lay down a general rule, and I observe that this section provides that no prosecution shall take place without the consent of the Minister of Marine, and that is to a certain extent a protection. In regard to the agent, section 6 of the old Act says that the agent must have taken all reasonable means to see that the ship was seaworthy, and was ignorant of the unseaworthiness.

Mr. TUPPER. That is in this Act in different language.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The business of the agents is not to ensure the seaworthiness of the vessel, but to look after her equipment and her cargo. The master of the vessel is the person to look after the seaworthiness. Probably the agent has never seen the vessel.

Mr. TUPPER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would prefer these words:

"Every person who sends or attempts to send or is a party to sending or attempting to sending."

The hon. gentleman says that the agent does not send the vessel to sea, and then he could not be punished.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I think the language of the old Act was better.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the language is all right as it is.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The word "person" would include the agent, and practically the agent sends the ship to sea. If my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Lovitt) sends a ship to sea, he would depend upon the master to see that the ship is seaworthy. The master would apply to the agent to ship his crew if he wanted any, but the agent has nothing to do with the seaworthiness of the vessel. I think the language of the old Act should be adopted in reference to the agent.

Mr. TUPPER. I think that is the loop hole through which every person has crawled in the past, and which I want to get rid of in this Act. Whether a ship or an old hulk is sent to sea, they plead ignorance and get scot-free. Under this language, no one could be punished who was not actively concerned is sending the ship to sea.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). It is the agent who sends the ship to sea.

Mr. KENNY. If the agent is guilty of gross carelessness, he should be punished.

Mr. WELDON (St John). If the agent is to be held responsible, my hon. friend from Yarmouth, for example, will have to pay a large commission, because an agent will not look after the seaworthiness of a ship for 2½ per cent. commission. If, in regard to any of the large ships at the port of St. John, the agent said to the master that he wanted to have the ship surveyed by the port warden, probably at a cost of $20 or $30, he would lose his commission.

Mr. TUPPER. The agent will not incur a penalty if he has nothing to do with sending the ship to sea. The class of agents we want to reach and to punish is the agent who sends a ship to sea in an unseaworthy condition without being able to prove that he used reasonable means to send her in a seaworthy condition. That man ought to be punished. If it is wrong for the owner to do that, it is equally wrong for the agent to do it with the co-operation of the owner, and this imposes upon the agent the duty of seeing that what is imposed upon him by the owner should not be anything which the owner would not dare to do.

Mr. LOVITT. I have nothing to say about the wording of this Act, which the legal gentlemen can attend to; but the agent pays the bills and loads the ship and sends her to sea. If any agent came to me and said a ship was not seaworthy, I should tell him to mind his own business. I am not objecting to this Act, and I think all this talk about it has been all wrong. No agent interferes with any vessel of mine, there is a Lloyd surveyor who looks after it. Whether the agent sends her to sea or any body else, I am not prepared to say.

Mr. EDGAR. Would it not simplify matters very much to follow the words of the English Act of 1876, and leave it "every person who sends or attempts to send"?

Mr. TUPPER. I do not object to that.

On sub-section 1, section 7,

Mr. TUPPER. This section concerning deck loads I am not particularly anxious about.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not object to this clause, but I would like to know why the provisions of the general Act as to deck loads are not applicable to ships in the inland waters; because it seems to me that overloading on decks is one of the most dangerous things in connection with lake navigation.

Mr. TUPPER. This was to meet the British legislation which only concerned the Atlantic at certain seasons of the year. As the hon. gentleman will see, between the months of October and March our ships cannot enter their ports unless complying with the law as it stands in the Act referred to. This is a similar provision, and the reason we do not extend it to inland waters is because the gales do not prevail at the same time on the lakes and in the Atlantic.

Mr. EDGAR. There are storms at certain seasons on the inland waters, and there is overloading on the decks. I want to know why there is not a provision for the inland waters?

Mr. TUPPER. In my limited experience there has been no representation calling attention to that matter from either Boards of Trade or from the Knights of Labor, or the Trades Congresses who are concerned in the lives of the sailors. They have drawn attention to other provisions, but so far as my recollection goes they have not urged any legislation regarding deck loads on the inland waters, or if so, their arguments have escaped my attention. But there is a great deal in what the hon. gentleman says, and it will require a careful report from experts and those familiar with navigation, if the legislation is to take place.

Mr. McNEILL. I can assure the Minister that the question of deck loads is one of great importance indeed. I may say that opposite the windows of my own house, a vessel was lost with 30 sailors, simply by reason of deck loads.

Mr. McKAY. There is just as much need of legislation regarding deck loads as there is for anything else. There is quite a feeling on this point existing among mariners who navigate vessels on the inland waters, and who think that their lives should be protected just as much from over loading on deck as from improper loading in holds. I think the Minister would do a good act if he would insert that provision.

Mr. DAWSON. I have a statement from the Chairman of the Knights of Labor, complaining of deck loads and saying that freight is sometimes piled 12 feet high on decks in inland waters, which renders it extremely dangerous to the men on board.

Mr. TUPPER. I think, I also, received a document from the Welland organisation calling attention to the subject of deck loads, but there is no suggestion in it as to what would be the proper months. In reply to the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Welsh) I might state that this clause is entirely due to a report from the Collector of Customs, St. John, N.B., wherein he states that while he is unable to give the names of vessels he can say they have evaded the present law, which simply says "from any port in Canada to any port in Europe," by clearing for Africa. Of course, they cannot go into a British port, but they go to ports in France or Spain and in that way evade the present Act.

Mr. EDGAR. Since the Minister stated he had not received information as to details, I have turned up some information I received from the same resource to which he referred. That organisation states that in their opinion all vessels should be prohibited from carrying deck loads higher than the rail top after the 1st September of each year. So they have considered the matter, and representations have been made to members of the House, and they say that piling deck loads of lumber or timber 12 or 15 feet high should be stopped. I should hope so. I suppose at this period of the Session it is not possible for sufficient consideration to be given to this matter so as to frame a provision with respect to deck loads, entirely suitable for the inland waters, but I should like an assurance from the Minister that he will have the matter considered and see what can be done at the earliest possible moment another Session.

Mr. TUPPER. I certainly will do so. While that organisation may have mentioned the months, which I had forgotten, I could not ask Parliament to act on that statement. I would, of course, have to receive the results of enquiries made by the proper officers before I could represent to Parliament that certain months would be the proper months.

Mr. ELLIS. I desire simply to point out that this regulation respecting deck loads interferes with a very important trade. I think the regulations with respect to deck loads on ocean vessels are entirely too rigid.

Mr. TUPPER. It is the law of the land.

Mr. WELDON. Two years ago the rates of insurance were 1 per cent. and 3 per cent. on deck loads. To-day the underwriters take both at the same rate.

Mr. LOVITT. Does not the hon. gentleman want to amend section 8 of the old Act?

Mr. TUPPER. The point is well taken. That is the clause relating to penalties, and it will have to be added.

Mr. BAIRD. I offer my strongest objection to the words "South America" being inserted after "West Indies." It will strike a dangerous blow to the carrying trade of New Brunswick. It must be borne in mind that the vessel best adapted for the carrying trade of South America is a broad beamed vessel of shallow draft, and one which can carry almost its entire cargo upon the deck, and if it is deprived of the privilege of carrying a deck load, that Act will drive the trade to American ports. We hope to build up a large carrying trade in lumber to South America, and the developments in that country go to show that it will become a large consumer of our lumber; and if development and consumption go on at the present ratio, I am advised that South America in the next twenty years will require the forests of North America to carry on her building operations. About a hundred million feet of lumber the product of Canada is transported in bond by rail to ports in the United States, chiefly Boston and Portland, and from there shipped to South America. We hope to divert that trade, and to build up for ourselves a large export trade with South America. This is a trade that has sprung up within the last few years, and, indeed, principally within the last two years, and we expect to do a large portion of this trade from St. John. The vessel best adapted is the broad beam coastwise schooner of perhaps 300 tons, which has a greater beam than a thousand ton foreign going vessel, but while she has a broad beam she has a draft of only 8 or 9 feet. She is able to carry the bulk of her load on deck, and is not restricted in this matter in ports in the United States, for in Portland and Boston she can carry her deck load without any restriction. Such a vessel of 300 tons could carry 400,000 feet of lumber. The restriction as to deck load would reduce that capacity about 20 per cent. At present a vessel sailing for Rosario would receive for freight, with a deck load, $8,000, which if reduced by 20 per cent would be brought down to $6,400. That would be the difference between loading at Portland or St. John. It is unreasonable to expect that the trade will thrive and prosper and develop as it has promised to do during the last two years, and particularly during the last few months, under such restrictions; but if we expect to do that trade we must be able to compete successfully with the people in the United States. If vessels cannot load as favorably at St. John as at Porland or Calais, they will go to the American ports. While I cannot appeal to the experience of the Minister, I appeal to his intelligence, and I ask him to give consideration to the question from this standpoint. If my statement cannot be contradicted, I hold that my request is a reasonable one, and the words "South America" should be left out of this Act.

Mr. TUPPER. I do not think the request is made at a reasonable time because the hon. gentleman's argument is contrary to the object and intention of the Act that has been on the Statute-book for some time, and had not been challenged until he now challenges it. His argument is against the provisions of section 7 and against the experience of those who are accustomed to this trade and who say that for a certain voyage at a certain time of the year it is dangerous in the extreme to sail ships with those deck loads. I do not think it is a fair time to make this suggestion when an amendment of this kind is proposed which does not change the present law but renders it more perfect. It is not the proper time to propose a radical change such as he proposes which is contrary to the spirit of both the Imperial Act and our Act in regard to these deck loads. As to the lower rate, and so on, for these voyages it is doubtless caused to a great extent by this legislation which prevents the ships sailing in these waters at dangerous times of the year with their cargoes stowed in a certain manner. I thank the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Lovitt) for his very important suggestion and I find we can adopt it by inserting in section 4 after sub-section 1 and section 7 the words "and section 8 of the said Act."

Mr. KENNY. As regards the remarks made by my hon. friend from Queen's, N.B. (Mr. Baird), it is important for us to consider that to-day in the United States these vessels, to which my hon. friend refers, can take any deck load that the master of the vessel thinks it is safe for him to carry, and that when we try to bring this trade to our own ports we are met with this legislation. It is evident that the model of vessels to which my hon. friend refers is very different from those which we have been building in the Province of Nova Scotia. I judge from the remarks he has made that they are specially built in New Brunswick to compete with the American vessels of the same model, and if in our own ports the owners of these vessels are more restricted in loading than they are in the United States, then of necessity those vessels will go to the United States ports and seek business there. I consider that the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Baird) is well worthy of consideration. It is very well for us to follow the English legislation, but we must remember that that English legislation was adopted long before vessels were specially built for this trade, which from what I have heard this evening appears to be a comparatively modern business. I think we should endeavor as far as possible to meet the suggestion of my hon. friend from Queen's, N.B.

Mr. TUPPER. Surely the hon. gentleman does not suppose that a radical change such as that which he proposes should be adopted without the slightest enquiry or any notice having been given, which would enable proper and due enquiry to be made?

Mr. ELLIS. Are you not extending your law to include ports which were not before included; you are therefore limiting the operations of our vessels and you are curtailing, to a certain extent, trade which they are now able to carry on, at various periods of the year.

Mr. TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman means that we should drop this sub-section 2 of course the argument is in order, but the hon. gentleman's argument is just as strong and he urges it with as great earnestness against the word "West Indies" in the present Act. If a vessel is not allowed to go to the West Indies but as he claims, is allowed to go to South America, it seems an extraordinary argument that while he approves of a certain cargo at a certain time of the year being carried to South America he argues against vessels being allowed to go to the West Indies. That argument is something very hard for one not in the coasting trade to understand.

Mr. McKAY. It seems to me there is something peculiar about this. The Dominion Government have had an agent in South America trying to build up a trade between the Dominion and that country, and now we are by this legislation trying to restrict that trade. I think that there is a good deal in what the member for Queen's (Mr. Baird) says in reference to this special trade in lumber between the port of St. John and South America, and it would be well worthy of consideration by the Minister.

Mr. TUPPER. We do not propose to restrict the trade at all. The hon. gentleman will see that it is deemed by nautical experts unsafe to take a cargo loaded in a certain way—the manner of the loading is specified in section 5 of the Act. The hon. gentleman does not suppose that for the purpose of making a trade with South America that we should repeal all these laws that have been framed with a view of preserving the safety of the ships and the cargo and the lives of the crew, and change it all because there is an opportunity to send more ships and more lumber to South America.

Mr. BAIRD. It is my impression that South America is not now restricted and as the hon. Minister put it, at certain seasons in the year these restrictions come into force. That season of the year is the very season when the whole business of South America is done and to adopt this provision, as I said before, will be simply to change our vessels from the port of St. John, N.B., to the ports of Portland and Boston. You can do that most successfully under the provisions of this Act if they are adopted. I say that a vessel will not load at the port of St. John, N.B., if 20 per cent. of her carrying capacity is taken away from her. You may talk about the safety of those vessels and you may say that the e laws apply in Great Britain, but you will find that our ships engaged in this trade are of different construction. Their vessels are narrow and deep and the law that would apply to them would not apply here at all. When you go to the ports in South America you will find that every river is guarded by a sand bar which is thrown up by the action of the ocean and you have to have shallow vessel to get over that. You will find that in the United States six millions of the tonnage coastwise is of vessels that have been specially built for this particular trade and you will find that the shallow vessel is worth three times what the deep water vessel is worth. In the United States, with their experience—having built up that great trade while they let their ocean carrying trade go altogether—they have guarded with jealous care their coastwise business and they have built it up to be the greatest home trade that can be found in the world, three times greater than the home carrying trade of the United Kingdom, and Canada comes and places herself under a set of laws which prevent her competing in that trade. It is more profitable than any deep-water trade. The coaster spends her money among our own people; the foreign trade vessel spends it abroad, and she may not return for two or three years. There is a vast difference between the two classes of vessels in their profitableness to the country to which they belong; and if we expect to be able to do the carrying trade alongside of such neighbors as those we have to-day, if we expect to carry the 100,000,000 feet of lumber that goes out of Canada in bond to the United States and is shipped from American ports, if we expect that the Short Line Railway is going to amount to anything, we have to carry on as good terms, or even on more favorable terms, than it is carried from Portland and Boston. Not one vessel owner in Canada will be found willing to load his vessel at St. John when he can go to Portland and be able to carry 20 per cent. more cargo, and do it with comparative safety. The idea of losing a vessel from these deck loads is all a matter of moonshine. Everyone who knows vessels knows that they are not lost from such causes. If Mr. Plimsoll could see an American built vessel he would condemn her at once, because he would say she had too small a draft of water; but we find that these vessels outrival us in age and in every way; we find that after they are twenty years old they are still doing their work well. Nothing has been said to show that the trade is not safely done, and it is growing to a wonderful extent; and unless we are prepared to do it on as favorable terms as our neighbors we shall have to leave it alone altogether.

Mr. TUPPER. I have to remind the Committee, as from the remarks of the hon. gentleman they would not imagine, that under the Bill and the amendments, ships are allowed during this particular period to go even to the West Indies and South America with their cargoes of lumber. But all that is said is that when sailing after the 15th of November or before the 16th of March in any year, a ship, if an open decked vessel, shall not permit any cargo to be above the deck rail more than six inches or above the deck more than four feet six inches. If that is a good and proper law, which Parliament in its wisdom has seen fit to place on the Statute-book, the provision I mention is equally necessary and proper.

Mr. ELLIS. But it is not wise.

Mr. TUPPER. I said I was not particularly in love with this section. It was suggested that it was necessary to make the Act on our Statute-book proper and sufficient, and if the navigation to the West Indies at that time of year is such as to require certain loading of lumber, surely the vessel should not be permitted to sail during the same season to South American ports. But I will not press that if the Committee does not favor it.

Mr. FREEMAN. I think the difference lies here, that the vessels for South American ports are of a different build altogether from other vessels; they are constructed to carry a cargo on deck, while others are deep in the hold, and cannot carry a cargo on deck. In former days American vessels carried more than half their cargo on deck, and there are American vessels still doing that, and they are insured as cheaply by the insurance companies as deep vessels are, and perform their voyages quite as successfully. In the United States as well as in our own country ships are now being built to suit particular trades; freights have become so low that that must be done; and vessels which have to go up the shallow rivers in South America require to be built with very little draft of water. If you send a a cargo there in a deep vessel, it has to be carried up the rivers in steamers or in flat-bottomed vessels. The whole matter lies in the fact that vessels are built specially for carrying deck loads, and others for carrying cargoes under the deck, and one class is as safe as the other.

Mr. RIOPEL. These last remarks go to show that for the purpose of protecting trade it would be necessary to do away with the latter part of the clause. I do not see that we could remove that part of the clause and do justice to the other portions of the trade. As several hon. gentlemen appear inclined to remove a portion of the clause for the sake of a particular class of trade, I would suggest that the whole clause be struck out.

Mr. LOVITT. We have all been arguing about the deck load system. Hon. gentlemen say that the deck load does not amount to anything, but it does for the underwriter. I do not think the underwriters have improved the English law; whether it is for us to frame a law like that, it is for us to decide.

On section 6,

Mr. JONES (Halifax). This section gives Customs house officers, who, under ordinary circumstances, can have very imperfect knowledge of the condition of a ship, too much power and authority. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman should insert a clause to enable the ship owner, in the event of his being dissatisfied with the decision of the Customs house officer, to have the right of appeal to the port warden or some other authority.

Mr. TUPPER. The Customs house officer has no authority at all except to go on board, inspect the ship, and make his report. The Minister has no power to take action except in the ordinary way, so that no injustice can be done to anyone. The evidence of the Custom house officer will be given in court and the owner of the ship will have every opportunity to bring up other evidence in rebuttal, when the court will be called on to decide between the two.

Mr. EDGAR. Before the Committee rises, I would like to hear from the hon. Minister of Marine whether he is not going to insert a provision analogous to the English provision with regard to load lines. In England these provisions have been retained after a severe struggle, and are found very useful. All British ships require them, and I would like to know what good reason the Minister can give why in our inland waters vessels should not be required to have load lines.

Mr. TUPPER. I am very glad the hon. gentleman has brought up this point. I am glad indeed to have been able to go as far as this Bill provides in the right direction, in the interest of a large number of mariners. But the question the hon. gentleman raises is one that has been carefully considered by my predecessor and myself. Last year provisions similar to this which he has suggested were inserted.

Mr. EDGAR. The Minister is wrong in that.

Mr. TUPPER. I am speaking of the load line. We may differ as to the way that is treated, but the provisions of the old Bill were framed with a view to establish a load line. The difficulty is this: It is not, possibly, an insurmountable difficulty, but it is a very great difficulty, as we have not the same protection in Canada for the capital invested as they have in England. In England they have experienced and trained officers at every port, and they go to each ship, and settle the load line, and say where it is to be, and their word is law for the time being. They can stop or detain a ship, no matter how valuable the cargo may be, if the rule in regard to the load line is not complied with. If they do that improperly, there is a redress in England, and the Board of Trade is responsible and indemnifies the owners, and very properly so. There is a very extensive and a very expensive machinery in connection with that. A judge sits with assessors, and a careful and minute investigation is made in regard to the facts, and, in the end, should the owner be able to show that his ship was improperly detained, he is indemnified. In one year £30,000 and costs were paid over to owners for the improper detention of ships by even these highly trained officers; but it is in consequence of that difficulty that this Government has not felt justified in asking Parliament to pass similar legislation here. We have an immense number of ports, and at present we do not feel that we could ask for the establishment of a fund by which owners could be indemnified for the improper detention of ships by officers of the Government.

Bill reported and read the third time and passed.

BELLEVILLE HARBOR.

Mr. TUPPER moved second reading of Bill (No. 116) respecting the Harbor of Belleville, in the Province of Ontario.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 8,

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What expenditure is contemplated under this Bill?

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will see that there is no change made in the present rates of dues. It is simply a transfer of these dues from the town to the commissioners.

Mr. BURDETT. I would like to have it understood that the Government is to take charge of the harbor and put it in proper repair and take the dues.

Mr. TUPPER. This Bill is simply putting the harbor of Belleville in commission in the same way as other harbors are.

Mr. BURDETT. Supposing the dues are not sufficient to do this work, should the Government borrow the money or the city?

Mr. TUPPER. I think the receipts are sufficient for the work.

Mr. BURDETT. In some instances, I think the tolls are too high, when there is so much competition between the railways and the vessels. I understand the commissioners will have power to regulate the tolls, but that they are not to be less than they are under the old Act.

Mr. TUPPER. They can reduce them.

Mr. BURDETT. There is an island in the mouth of the harbor, Mill Island, which is disappearing to some extent. It was formerly used by a lumbering company as a mill site, and, since the mill has been removed, the island is breaking away. I should like to know if the Government intend to look after that island to prevent its disappearance. I understand that a dam is to be built out to the island.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman ought to remember, as he lives in the city, that the appropriation made by Parliament last year was on condition that the city should expend a certain amount of money to protect the island to which he has referred. When the Government proceeded to dredge the harbor out of the appropriation which was made, the city not being in a position just then to advance the money, the Minister of Public Works stopped operations, as he had no power to go on. The present Bill, as my hon. friend knows, is introduced by the Government. Our friend from West Hastings (Mr. Corby) has not charge of the Bill. It is a Government Bill, to place the harbor of Belleville in precisely the same position as that of Three Rivers, and that of other harbors which are placed under the control of commissioners, with power to borrow money upon the income by fees of the harbor, to enable them to build the work which has been going on for some two or three years. I am well aware of the interest my hon.

friend has in the city of Belleville, and his knowledge of the manner in which this work has been conducted in the past, has necessitated the action which has been taken at the instance of the mayor and corporation, and every man in the city of Belleville who desires to see that harbor improved.

Mr. BURDETT. I am not disputing with the Minister of Customs as to the principle of the Bill. I quite agree that the city ought to keep its engagements with the Government and provide the money that they agreed to provide to improve the harbor. I see the name of the Minister of Marine is on the back of this Bill, but the Minister of Customs will remember that the name of the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Corby) is upon the back of the first Bill that was introduced relating to the same matter. I see no objection to the principle of the Bill at all. In future it will be well to understand that the Government has control over it, so that there will be no more bickerings in the city as there have been in the past.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

WESTERN COUNTIES RAILWAY.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 127) respecting the Western Counties Railway.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I mentioned the other day to the Minister of Justice, in connection with this Bill, the remarks which had been made very generally respecting the advertisement regarding the contract. The advertisement came out on the 19th March, and tenders were called for; notice was given that the specifications could be seen on the 28th of March, and that tenders would be received on the 8th of April, allowing eleven days. It did appear to those who had looked into the matter that eleven days was a very short time to allow competitors to examine plans and specifications for a work involving an expenditure of half a million dollars; and it did look upon the face of it, as if there was some intention on the part of the Government, or some predetermination of the part of the department, to give that work to some parties who had the favor of the Administration. It was not considered by those who were competent to speak upon the subject, that the time was sufficient for the competitors or contractors to come here, and examine the plans and specifications and put in their tenders. With regard to the Bill, of course, it is all right.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I did not know until the hon. gentleman mentioned it the other day, that the time had been as short as he said. I will make enquiries and be able to explain before the third reading of the Bill. There has been no predetermination, and I am not aware that any Minister has been aware that so short a period was allowed. The hon. gentleman remembers the explanation I gave when the Bill was introduced. We confirmed in 1887 the agreement with this company, which authorised the Minister of Railways to enter upon the work and spend the $500,000 which was provided for in the agreement for the completion of the railway between Annapolis and Digby. In order to remove any doubts it has been considered desirable that there should be a parliamentary authority, irrespective of the confirmation of the agreement for the execution of this work, and to make applicable the Expropriation Act, the Railways Act, and other enactments bearing upon the subject. It may be necessary, in order to accomplish some slight diversions, to expropriate some small pieces of land.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has this contract been awarded to which the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) referred? I suppose the First Minister has charge of that business at present.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the contract been awarded?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not know.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Because there is no doubt that so short a time as 11 days would make the tendering a farce.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will ascertain about that.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—CONVEYANCE OF LANDS.

Mr. DEWDNEY moved second reading of Bill (No. 128) to provide for the conveyance of certain lands in British Columbia.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will the Minister explain the reason why the Government are re-conveying these lands to the Province of British Columbia?

Mr. DEWDNEY. As I explained the other day, this is a small portion of land which it is proposed to re-convey to British Columbia, on account of a misunderstanding that arose at the time the railway belt was conveyed to the Dominion. British Columbia was entitled to the pre-emptions and land grants made at that time, and this portion about which some misunderstanding arose was in what are known as the Sumas lands. An arrangement had been made with Mr. Derby to reclaim a certain section of land there for which he was to receive 45,000 acres. He failed in his contract, and this was at a time subsequent to the arrangement with respect to the railway belt. It was supposed, when the settlement Bill was passed, an arrangement was made by Sir Alexander Campbell, who was sent over as a Commissioner to arrange this matter with the British Columbia Government, that this land had been included in the pre-emption lands for which the British Columbia Government transferred to us 3,000,000 acres in the Peace River country. It was subsequently found upon enquiry that these 45,000 acres in the Sumas district belonged to British Columbia. In the meantime we have been dealing with them as had the British Columbia Government. There were 200,000 acres reserved, out of which these 45,000 acres were to be selected, and by arrangement between the two Governments entries were allowed to be taken by the British Columbia Government and sales made, and the money was held subject to final arrangement. It was subsequently found that British Columbia had been dealing with more than 45,000 acres. When this was ascertained, the Government stopped it, and awaited the arrival of Mr. Robson last summer. When he arrived it was determined to allow the British Columbia Government to retain the amount of the land up to 45,000 acres which they had dealt with, and this Act is for the purpose of enabling them to issue patents, which they thought they had a right to do when they were dealing with it.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION ACT.

Mr. TUPPER moved second reading of Bill (No. 130) further to amend the Steamboat Inspection Act, chapter 78 of the Revised Statutes.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the reason for sub-section 2.

Mr. TUPPER. The necessity for this Act was shown in connection with the steamer now plying between Halifax and Boston, and owned in Canada. That steamer is subject to our inspection laws, and it is brought into competition with two American steamers, and it is subject also to the inspection laws of the United States at Boston, while we are unable to bring the American boats plying between our ports and Boston under the provisions of our Inspection Act, as the Act does not apply to steamboats plying between any port in Canada and any port out of Canada. The object of this Bill is to enable us to apply the Inspection Act to those steamers.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12:35 a. m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 5th April, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

LOAN OF 1888.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. Minister of Finance intimated that he would make a statement yesterday in reply to my remarks on the 3 per cent. loan. He was not able to do so, as the House did not go into Committee of Supply. Perhaps it would suit his convenience to make it now. It is not likely that there will be any debate on it.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose it is just as well to say what I have to say now as to wait until the House goes into Committee of Supply. I have read very carefully, and have considered, along with the officers of my department, the remarks that were made by my hon. friend from South Oxford the other night with reference to the loan of 1888, and the paragraph in the prospectus referring to purchases from that loan for sinking fund purposes. In order to understand the matter a little more clearly, perhaps it would be well to go back beyond the loan of 1888, and take cognisance of the fact that, as my hon. friend knows, our earlier loans had, in the different years in which they were negotiated, a sinking fund attached, by which the Government was obliged to set apart a certain amount of money each year, a percentage of the face of the loan, and with that to purchase securities under trustees, which were to be set off as against the particular loan; and these, together with the accruing interest from year to year, were to constitute a sinking fund, and a set off as regards each loan. So that, at the present time we are face to face with this fact, that, as a result of the conditions of former loans, we have to set apart on an average about $2,000,000 per year—that is, we have to buy out of securities what would be equal to $2,000,000 per year on an average to offset the loans having sinking fund attachments. There are certain limitations, of course, as to the kind of securities which can be purchased. We are precluded, as my hon. friend knows, from buying stocks of companies, which are liable to great changes, and which are not what you may call standard stocks; and the same consideration applies in almost as great a degree to municipal debentures. Then, the stocks of different Governments have also in a great many cases to be refused, because the conditions are not profitable, and they are not always considered safe; and with reference to British consols, the conditions of those are such that we have never bought them, and it would not be profitable for us to buy them, so that, as a matter of fact, we have, from the earliest period, invariably, I think, invested in our own stocks in purchasing to meet the sinking funds of the various loans; and at the present time, we are obliged to make purchases sufficient to offset to the amount of about $2,000,000, on an average, yearly. The prospectuses which were issued in connection with the other loans, had in them a clause which bound the Government to buy out of the loans, so long as they did not go above par; but left the option with the Government, when they went above par, to buy from these loans or not, as they chose. As a matter of fact, when our stocks in 1885, or about that period, came to be all above par, the sinking funds were still provided out of our own stocks, even though they went above par, and the last year we bought for that sinking fund out of 4 per cent. stocks as high as 114½ or thereabouts. The prospectus of 1888 of the loan now under discussion, carried out the same principle as was carried out in the prospectuses of the preceding loans, although I grant my hon. friend and the House that it was stated a little more explicitly, and perhaps carried with it a pledge a little more definite than the clauses of the preceding prospectuses. But there is this to be understood, that it had been the practice, from the earliest time, to pledge the Government to buy from stocks below par, or at par, and to use the option with reference to purchasing from our own stocks when they went above par; and here was a loan of which the minimum price was fixed at 92½, and which must perforce be a stock below par, and the clause in the prospectus simply expressed the intention of the Government to purchase for the sinking fund out of that stock which must necessarily be a stock below par. The Government does not hold that they are bound to purchase out of that stock for the purpose of a sinking fund, if that stock has appreciated unreasonably, or if it is apparent that there is a combination which exists for the purpose of raising the stock unduly, and it is not a difficult matter at all to judge as to whether the stock is being unduly appreciated or not. It is, of course, an advantage to buy from our own stocks generally, because we have no income tax to pay. Upon the stocks that we would buy of other Governments or colonies, I think in Great Britain we would have to pay an income tax, which would add a certain definite amount to their cost. Again, if we buy our own stocks, which are below par, it is a collateral advantage, and a decided advantage, in order to appreciate that particular stock and lay better conditions for the loan which is to succeed. So much may be stated as regards the considerations which make it necessary for us to buy a large amount for our sinking fund, as to the practice we have pursued heretofore, and as to the intention expressed by the Government, and which was simply an expression of intention, which does not bind the Government, if it be seen that there is an unreasonable appreciation. I think it is sufficient to state this fact in conclusion, which is stronger than any fancies we may indulge in with reference to the future. We have been buying out of that stock from the 1st of July of the current year. We have bought over $1,000,000 of that stock, and so far from there being any undue appreciation of the price or any evidence at all of putting up the price by combination, we have bought at a lower price than we received for the loan, £95 1s. We bought, for instance, on the 1st of July, 1888, at 94 5/16, 94⅛ and 94⅝. On the 1st of October, we bought at 92⅝; that is net, taking into account accrued interest. On November 1st, we bought at 93¾, and on the 1st of December at 92⅝. That, I think, shows that there is not very much to be apprehended in the way of undue appreciation of these stocks. This much is to be considered, that the buying for the sinking fund, under the old prospectuses as well as under this, had the very same effect of appreciating the stock. Of course, in the other we had a wide range of choice to buy. With reference to what my hon. friend said as to the exhaustion of the loan long before its fixed time or termination, that would hold with reference to most of our stocks. For instance, if we buy some classes of our Fours, which have to expire in 1903, we would exhaust the whole stock in 11 or 12 years before the expiry of the loan; but, of course, we would simply have reduced our debt by that much. I think this is a sufficient statement to make at present, and I may, in conclusion, add my own opinion, and the opinion of the officers of my department, who are careful, and, I think, thorough men, that, taking all things into consideration, there is no ground for the alarm which was rather foreshadowed by my hon. friend, and no ground for the possible conclusion, which was also foreshadowed by my hon. friend, that this may prove an unremunerative and costly loan. Taking it all in all, I believe it can be fairly maintained that it is the best loan we have yet put upon the British market.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. At present, I shall only say a few words on the subject. I fear that the hon. the Minister of Finance has not at all apprehended the probabilities—I do not speak of possibilities—that are involved in the arrangement which has been entered into. A good deal of what he has said is not really relevant to the question in hand. Several of the things he has said, I shall at a later period of the question, I am afraid, have to dispute Of course, it is quite true, and I am perfectly well aware of the fact, that it has been our habit to buy our own stocks, and it was very well that should be done under certain circumstances. But the hon. gentleman has failed entirely to appreciate the enormous difference between the engagement we have now entered into, and the engagement which was entered into before. This engagement is unlimited. It has no words of restriction whatever; it binds us to apply, not the ordinary sinking fund of one-half per cent. per annum, but a sinking fund which will begin at 10 per cent. per annum or thereabouts, to the purchase of our loan. The only point that the hon. gentleman made, and on which he appears to rely largely, is that, at this moment, we are able to buy the loan at 93½ and even lower. Well, I am afraid that will prove a very broken reed to lean upon. The hon. gentleman must be aware that the course of business is such that when a loan of the magnitude of £4,000,000 sterling is put on the English market, for a considerable period, ranging perhaps from three to eighteen months, a good deal of that is loose on the market and may, as in this case, even be repurchased at prices low or lower than we obtained. It is not during a year or six or eighteen months that the result of the hon. gentleman's arrangement is liable to be felt. It is later on that that will come into play. You can base no sort of conclusion on what can be done at present. It is when these loans have gone into the hands of permanent investors, and when they find we are compelled to expend this enormous sum from year to year, that the appreciation will begin, and that the evil results of what the hon. gentleman or his predecessor have done will become clearly manifest. Now, I do not wish to enter into the question of how far the hon. gentleman or the Government of Canada are justified, at their own will and pleasure, in importing words of qualification into a prospectus so clearly worded as this has been. There is a great deal to be considered before I can either affirm positively or positively dissent from the proposition of the hon. gentleman. I regret exceedingly that it should be necessary for a Minister of Finance of Canada, under any conceivable circumstances, to use words which have in them a savor of repudiation of an agreement which was published broadcast from one end of the United Kingdom to the other. I do not now accuse the Minister of desiring to do that. I reserve my opinion until I have further considered it. But there are complexities ahead of the hon. gentleman in regard to that loan which he does not appear at all to appreciate or understand. I tell him that he will find, when this matter comes to be more fully discussed, with all his experience and with all the evidence which he has collected, or which may have been put before him, as to our dealings with former loans under totally different conditions, they will fail entirely in an unprecedented condition of affairs like this. I promised not to keep the House long, and I will conclude by saying that I propose, at the earliest opportunity—not to-day, of course, that would be out of the question—on going into Committee of Supply, to put on record my opinion as to the risks we have run and the probable contingencies which are involved in this loan. I am sorry to say that the explanations I have heard from the hon. gentleman have not at all altered my opinion nor has he attempted, for that matter, to assail my opinion as to the meaning to be drawn from this particular clause in the prospectus. The only thing which he has said with a view to modify at all the plain meaning of these terms, is the declaration that, under certain contingencies, the Government do not intend to hold themselves bound by what appears to be the plain meaning of that prospectus.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. TUPPER moved the second reading of Bill (No. 129) to amend the Fisheries Act.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. TUPPER. The Bill consists of one clause, and it is exactly the clause which was passed in this House in a Bill dealing with this and other matters in 1883. It went to the Senate, and was passed by the Senate, but several amendments to other clauses were incorporated in the Bill, which were not approved of by this House, and, it being late in the Session, the Bill was dropped. This provision is to meet the circumstances arising out of a decision in New Brunswick, in the case of Delaney and Macdonald, previous to 1883. That decision was that sub-section 5 of section 8 of the Fisheries Act did not apply to the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and that left the department powerless to prevent the sweeping of salmon from the spawning beds in the Provinces by nets. The object of this section is to eliminate those words in the Act under which the court considered that an exception existed in the case of those two Provinces, so that now it may be impossible in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia, as elsewhere in Canada, to net for salmon in the inland waters.

Mr. KIRK. Does the Minister mean to say that, if this Bill becomes law, our salmon cannot be caught with nets in any waters except the tidal waters of the Dominion?

Mr. TUPPER. Yes; the catching of salmon in nets will be confined to tidal water.

Mr. KIRK. Does the hon. gentleman know what will be the effect of his Bill? Does he know the number of people in the Maritime Provinces which this provision will affect? He is disturbing an industry which will affect a great many people there, and he will raise a storm to which he will be obliged to yield very quickly. If the people of Nova Scotia are to be prohibited from catching salmon with nets except in tidal waters, it will be simply outrageous. On the River St. Mary's, for instance, on which I live, the people fish for salmon very largely with nets. Is this law to prevent them from catching salmon at all? I think it is a most outrageous proposal.

Mr. TUPPER. The outrage is largely imaginary. The object of the legislation is in favor of the Province that the hon. gentleman thinks will be so affected, because everyone who has a knowledge of salmon fishing is aware that the salmon, on their way to the spawning beds, should not be met by nets. It was a complete surprise to the department to find that the Act had been construed at that late day in the manner that it was, and the department had acted previously on an entirely different idea, holding that they had always been able, from the time the Act was passed, to prevent injury to the salmon fishery. There is only one opinion among all those conversant with the proper means of preserving these fisheries, and that is, that it is simply destruction for the salmon fishery to net them in the non-tidal waters and in the rivers where the salmon go for spawning. There is not a word of complaint from any of the Provinces with the course that has been taken, and I venture to say that if any other course was adopted, wherever the people enjoy the benefit of the present restrictions, there would be a great outcry against it. I may remind the hon. gentleman that his idea upon the subject may, on reflection, be considered not well founded, because there was not a dissenting voice in Parliament against this very clause when it was passed in 1883. The moment the fact was brought to the attention of the Government that that construction had been placed upon the Fisheries Act, Parliament, without demur, passed those very sections in the Bill to which I allude, and when the Bill went to the Senate, other clauses, dealing with other matters, were added to it, and when the Bill was returned to this House it was dropped. All I propose is to adopt that clause which was necessary, in the opinion of every official in the department, for the protection of the salmon industry in all the Provinces, and to which Parliament itself has already agreed.

Mr. ELLIS. It appears to me that the object of this legislation is to drive out the fishermen who earn their living, for the benefit of the fly-fishermen. The fact is that the whole legislation of the country, with regard to the salmon fisheries, is for the benefit of the rich men, and the people who buy up certain portions of land, and hold them, as against the industry of the country, and the sooner public opinion compels you to put a stop to that kind of thing the better. These fly-fishermen, these rich men, have got complete possession of the department over which the hon. gentleman presides, in so far as this matter is concerned. Now, what does he propose to do? He proposes to close the St. John River, which is 300 miles long, and 200 miles of which, I think, are within the frontiers of Canada—he proposes to close it entirely against net fishermen, against men who are riparian owners, a river upon which not a single salmon is taken by the fly. Now, you propose to drive these men out of their occupation. Why should men on the Bay of Fundy, in the tidal waters, be allowed to catch salmon, and a man 50 miles up the river not be allowed to do the same thing? I call the attention of the member for Sunbury, of the member for Queen's, of the member for King's, to this Bill. It is certainly an attack upon the industry of men who get their living by fishing, and it is done simply in the interest of the rich men. It is this kind of legislation that is creating socialism throughout the country, and is the very worst legislation which you can pass.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I think the case my hon. friend refers to, was a case on the Restigouche River. I was going to call the attention of the Minister to the River St. John. There are valuable fisheries on that river about 12 or 13 miles from the mouth, and further up the river in the county represented by the Minister of Finance, where, if this Act is carried into force, it will utterly destroy those fisheries. The effect of this will be entirely to prevent any fishing in the River St. John. I quite agree with the remarks of the hon. member for the city of St. John (Mr. Ellis), that it would deprive the fishermen of the means of getting their living.

Mr. TUPPER. Does not the hon. gentleman see the force of the argument presented by the fishery inspectors, that the supply of salmon would be slowly decreased, as it is decreasing, in the tidal waters of the coasts, if these fish are netted on their way to the spawning ground? It seems to me a matter of a very few years when, if we allow that style of fishing to go on, the salmon fishery will become a thing of the past.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I remember last year the salmon fishery was very profitable.

Mr. TUPPER. There is a large decrease.

Mr. ELLIS. The best answer to the hon. gentleman that can be given are the figures of his own department. He will see, if he takes the trouble to examine them, that there is no decrease in the salmon fishery on the St. John River. One year is better than another, but there is a large quantity taken on the river from the mouth of the Bay of Fundy, I might say up the river, above tidal waters, to the entrance of the Tobique, and the head waters of the St. John River. There is no fly-fishing on the main river, yet the hon. gentleman proposes to stop people from net fishing who have carried it on for years. It is an outrage of the worst kind. The hon. gentleman does not know the character of the legislation which he proposes to this House.

Mr. KIRK. I hope the Minister will consider this matter before he passes a law like this. It is quite clear, as the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis) has said, that this law is entirely in the interest of fly-fishermen. He intends to prevent the poor people, farmers and fishermen, from catching even the salmon for their own tables. There are quite a number of farmers who set out nets in the rivers in order to obtain fresh fish for their own use, men who cannot afford to take time to catch salmon with a fly, and this is to be stopped entirely in the interest of the fly-fishermen. There is the St. Mary's River, which is not so large as the St. John River, but yet there are large lakes in it in which fishermen set their nets to catch salmon.

Mr. TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman refer to the point where the water is non-tidal?

Mr. KIRK. Yes.

Mr. TUPPER. How far above the tide?

Mr. KIRK. Perhaps 10 or 15 miles. There are lakes in the St. Mary's River in which farmers set their nets in season and catch salmon, yet here we are to have them stopped altogether. It is an outrage on these people that they should be stopped from catching salmon in the proper season.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I would ask the Minister whether he might not be compelled to violate that law in taking salmon for the hatcheries. I do not know how they will get salmon otherwise.

Mr. TUPPER. That is a fruitful subject of discussion, but we will take the power to-day for the purpose of replenishing the hatcheries. It is a debated question as to whether it would be wise to do so. Those who are against the hatcheries find a great deal of fault with the Government for going to the spawning beds to obtain salmon. They are taken for no other purpose.

Mr. ELLIS. I intend to divide the House on the third reading of this Bill.

Bill reported.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Canadian Pacific Railway—construction $20,000

Mr. FOSTER. The item of $20,000 is required to pay expenses in connection with the arbitration between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Government. The expenditure on this account up to 31st January, 1889, was $102,185.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is a distinct vote for that, I notice, and it should be so specifically stated. What is the salary of L. K. Jones?

Mr. FOSTER. He gets $100 in addition to his regular salary.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman states that this is for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the arbitration now pending between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway. I wish to ask the Minister of Finance what are the legal expenses up to date of the arbitration between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Dominion of Canada, and can he give us some approximation—if such a thing can be approximated—of what the total legal expenses are likely to be?

Mr. FOSTER. The expenditure on this account up to the 31st of January, 1889, has been $102,185; what the expenses between the 31st January, 1889, and the 30th June, 1889, may amount to, is not yet known.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I presume that the total of these two votes of $190,000 and $20,000 are practically for the legal expenses of that arbitration. I can hardly conceive myself how it can be possible that the legal expenses should come to as much as $210,000 by any imaginary arbitration between the Dominion and the Canadian Pacific Railway. I would like, if the hon. gentleman can do so, that he would give us some particulars. $210,000 or thereabouts for law costs strikes me, and I think will strike the country, as a frightful sum to pay.

Mr. FOSTER. That is not all for law costs. It must be remembered that there are other very heavy expenses connected with the arbitration.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGAT. I mean expenses of witnesses, and so forth.

Mr. FOSTER. Witnesses have to be paid, and we had to get expert engineers to give their evidence. The locality has to be visited, and the engineers have to go carefully over the ground. All these different items of expense amount to a large sum.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes; but making all possible allowance, it seems an enormons sum that nearly a quarter of a million dollars, for law costs, should be required for this arbitration. What is the amount supposed to be at stake? If this goes on the lawyers will have the whole property, and it will be the old story of the oysters and the shells. The Minister of Finance is not a lawyer, and he will have some sympathy with the unfortunate Dominion of Canada, ground between the upper and the nether mill-stones in this way. What is the claim of the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. FOSTER. I find that in the amount expended there is an item for "land and land damages of $11,000," an item "for construction" for $1,212, and the expenses of the arbitration, pure and simple, for last year, were $40,095. Then, the arbitration expenses from the 30th June, 1888, to the 31st January, 1889, were $62,690, making a total of $102,000 for the arbitration.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the amount of the claim of the Canadian Pacific Railway? It ought to be a tremendous one to warrant such expenditure.

Mr. FOSTER. The claim, I imagine, is indefinite.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should think so. It must run into millions if you are fighting it in this way.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The claim is, I believe, a very large one; so large that the Government have thought it necessary to spare no pains to defend the public interest in this matter, and they have taken great trouble in getting expert engineers from various quarters in order to establish the Government side of the question. Of course the expense is very large, but I think it was requisite to protect the Government from the inordinate claims, in the view of the Government, of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The right hon. gentleman surely must have had specific claims from the Canadian Pacific Railway. They must have set up a detail of what they claim from the Government, and how that claim was made up. It would be a great advantage to the House and to the Committee to have that statement of claim before them, so that the members would be able to see precisely what it is that the Canadian Pacific Railway are claiming from the Government, and the grounds of their claim. That certainly must be in the possession of the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. So far as I understand from the statements which have been made to me, the claim of the Canadian Pacific Railway is somewhere between four and five million dollars. Very competent arbitrators have been appointed, and those arbitrators are conducting the arbitration in the way which they think the best. It is of the utmost consequence, of course, that the Canadian Government should have its side of the case presented with the very strongest force possible.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is a very important question. Here is a claim of four or five million dollars presented by the Canadian Pacific Railway, as I understand the case, because the road which has been delivered to them was graded below the standard of the rest of the road, and below the standard, as they urge, that they were bound to accept. That is their position?

Mr. FOSTER. According to their view.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understand that. I am not arguing in favor of their contention, but I am merely stating the case as I understand it. Are we to understand that, further, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company allege that this road was taken over from Mr. Onderdonk, constructed according to its standard, greatly inferior to the standard used by them in the mountains, and in the work done on their portion of the road. Is that their contention?

Mr. FOSTER. I think not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can you state what it is?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We can state what it is, but I would say to the hon. gentleman that this matter is now sub judice, and the less discussion here the better in the interest of the Dominion. The matter is now before the arbitrators, and I do not think it would be wise, in the interest of the public, to enter into a discussion as to their claims or as to the strong opposition which the Government ought to offer to these claims, which they think are inordinate and unjust.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Surely the hon. gentleman does not object to say simply what their claim is. It does not interfere with the arbitrators' position to know why the Canadian Pacific Railway Company make this claim. I do not think that this can, in any way, prejudice Mr. Justice Boyd and his coadjutors. I have great confidence in the arbitrators, and no doubt the hon. gentleman has too, as he consented to their appointment. I am quite sure they will pay no attention to what passes here, and that Mr. Chancellor Boyd is perfectly able to hold his judicial mind unbiassed by statements that may be made on your right hand or on your left hand, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What we are asking for, is not the opinion of the Government on the merits of the matter in dispute, nor is it suggested that the matter should be brought here for the purpose of argument. Surely the Canadian Pacific Railway have made a specific claim against the Administration, and, if so, I suppose they have fixed it at a particular amount, which would go before the commissioner for his consideration. What we want, is that statement. There surely can be no impropriety in bringing it here, nor can it, in any way, affect the question before Mr. Chancellor Boyd, or anybody else. The Government know what the claim is, and I think the House should be put in possession of that information.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I can state, generally, that the claim is that the portion of the railway in British Columbia to be handed over to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was not of such a character as they had a a right, under the contract between the Government and themselves, to receive from the Government.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But the hon. gentleman will see that when the contract was made between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Government, there was a contract with Onderdonk for this British Columbia section. Do they say that that contract was not complied with by Onderdonk, or do they contend that the contract made with Orderdonk was for a road below the standard that ought to be furnished to them?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. So I understand it to be.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I think that the hon. Minister of Finance last year stated that it was the intention of the Government to pay into court a certain sum—I think half a million dollars—to protect the Government against any claim, in the event of the decision being adverse to them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; there was no such statement. There was a vote of $250,000 taken to pay any deficiencies that might be found. Without admitting that any deficiency has taken place, the Minister of Railways asked for that amount.

Intercolonial Railway—Increased accommodation at Halifax $150,000

Mr. JONES (Halifax). This item has been in the Estimates for several years, and last Session and the Session before there was a discussion in this House with reference to the expenditure of the money. One feels some delicacy in discussing these railway matters at the present moment, in view of the loss the House has sustained by the death of the head of the department; still we have to refer to them in general with a view of eliciting information. I do not know who has charge of this railway expenditure, but I desire to invite the attention of the Government for a few moments to it. There has been a propo-al made for the purchase of a portion of the property opposite the deep water terminus at Halifax, as one way of obtaining increased storage accommodation, which the late Minister of Railways admitted was necessary. But another proposal has been made, to bring the railway along the line of the wharves, which, if it could be accomplished, many think, and I am one of that opinion, would be more in the interest of the public and of the railway as well. By doing that, you would utilise the stores and wharves along the line of the water front, and the Government would be independent for both storage and wharfage accommodation. The present deep water terminus, although it cost a very large sum of money, really gives very little accommodation to shipping. There is room at the wharf for only two steamers, one on each side; on the south side two moderate-sized steamers could find room, but, as a matter of fact, it is only used for two steamers at a time. Therefore, it is not sufficiently commodious to accommodate the wants of the port, and an extension of the line along the water front would be of the most ultimate advantage both to the railway and the commerce of the port. I am aware that objection has been raised by some of the wharf owners to the road passing through their property. Such objections are always made; but, judging from what has taken place in other parts where railways do run along the water front, I am pursuaded myself that if this road were carried there, those objecting to it now would realise that it would be of great advantage to them in their business, and would improve the value of their property. It is known to the Government that many of the wharf owners at Halifax have signed a paper, conveying to the Government the right to pass through their property free, in the event of the road being carried along the wharves. There are others who are not willing that it should pass through their property, but I think those who are willing would have no objection to carry out their offer, even if those objecting had to be dealt with in a different manner. What I want is, that the Government should take some steps one way or the other. It is useless to bring this vote forward year after year, and leave the people of Halifax to believe that they are going to spend the money, without a dollar of it being spent for the purpose for which it was originally voted. If the Government are not prepared to deal with the matter in the broader sense, let them deal with it in the other sense, of utilising the property opposite the present terminus for obtaining more storage accommodation, though in that case they would not get any more wharfage accommodation. I hope this item will not remain a dead letter from year to year. The people of Halifax are naturally very anxious about it, and I cannot see, if the Government are in earnest, why there should be any further delay.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like to ask the right hon. leader of the Government whether he has brought down the papers I asked for with reference to the extension of eight miles, from the Derby branch to the Northern and Western Railway?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, I have not.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to state that the Government own, as an adjunct to the Intercolonial, a line of railway of some 15 or 16 miles long, extending from the Intercolonial two miles west of Newcastle up to what is known as Indian Town. This line is known as the Derby Branch. On the other side of the river, extending from Chatham, is the Northern and Western, a subsidised line extending on to Fredericton, built by Messrs. Snowball and Gibson. Another line extends to a place known as Farley's or McLaggan's Mills, at a distance of eight miles west from Indian Town. Three years ago, when these two roads were completed, a gap of eight miles was left between these two points, and the Government granted a subsidy for the construction of that break. Instead of building it as they did the Derby Branch, as a branch of the Intercolonial, they chose the other course, and subsidised the road, which subsidy Messrs. Snowball and Gibson took up, and the road was built and taken over by the Government, about eighteen months ago, as completed, subject to some small changes, as stated by the right hon. gentleman the other day in answer to my observations. This is a road which cost a good deal of money, eight miles of road, being the link between the road from Fredericton to Chatham, and that road commencing at Farley's Mills and going over eight miles to Indian Town. The proprietors of the Northern and Western, for what reason I do not know, owning that branch, which was built by the company on a subsidy given by this Parliament, have never operated or utilised it; and it is a standing blot upon the railway policy of the Government that a road which was built by means of a subsidy granted by this Government should for one and a half years, through a finely settled district of country where there is a great deal of traffic, remain closed. I was anxious to ascertain whether any, and what, correspondence had been interchanged between the Government and the proprietors of the road. It seems as if it were the interest of the Northern and Western road not to open that particular branch, but to carry the business on to Chatham. The people of Newcastle, on the other hand, desire that the branch to their town should be operated also. I think it was the duty of the Government to come to some arrangement whereby that eight miles should be run in connection with the Northern and Western road. I called at the department to know if any arrangement was made, but was met with the statement that none had been made, that the department had been willing at any time to enter into working arrangements with the Northern and Western, but that nothing had been done and that no proposals had been made to that end. From the answer of the right hon. gentleman the other day, it is evident that correspondence had been going on with the view, not so much of working that eight miles of road, as for the leasing of the Derby Branch. So far as that is concerned, that would be satisfactory to our people. I do not care whether the branch is run by the corporation that owns the Northern and Western, or by the Government, but we want it run in order that our people may get the benefit of the money expended. It is a standing blot on the railway policy of the country that after subsidising these eight miles of road they should remain unused, when they could accommodate a large section of the people on the upper part of the river. A large business is done in Newcastle, as in Chatham, because these two towns are the centres of commercial business in that district. The Northern and Western runs direct to Chatham, and being owned by people who have their interests in Chatham, leads us to suppose that naturally they wish to centre the trade there. Some steps should be taken either to lease the Derby Branch or buy that link of eight miles and operate it as an extension of the Derby Branch and a branch of the Intercolonial.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I shall inform myself on the subject at once, and bring the papers down. The hon. gentleman will then have an opportunity of discussing the subject.

Increased accommodation at Moncton..... .... $67,500

Mr. FOSTER. This is required to give much needed accommodation for housing engines, from twenty to thirty engines having to stand out in the open air, unprotected from the storms of winter, and for increased machine shop power. Many of the engines have to be sent at present to other places for repairs, owing to the want of facilities at Moncton.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Some years ago, I called the attention of the Government to the open platform at Moncton, where the passengers change cars from the Halifax and St. John Express to the Northern line. When Sir Charles Tupper was Minister of Railways, I drew his attention to this, and he said he would attend to it, but still it is in the same state. It is very important that the platform should be covered, particularly for ladies and children crossing. Is it the intention of the Government to put up their own electrical apparatus there, or to make arrangements with the company?

Mr. FOSTER. We propose to put up our own apparatus.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). There is a company there which has complete apparatus, and who have a contract with the Intercolonial for water. It would be cheaper to give the work to them.

Rolling Stock.. .... $17,000

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I have referred to the expenditure for improved railway facilities at Halifax. I desire now to draw attention, briefly, to the working and condition of the Intercolonial generally. There seems to be, throughout the Maritime Provinces generally, a very strong conviction that the Intercolonial, from some reason or other, has been worked in a most extravagant manner, that there has not been that close attention and direct supervision which is necessary for the successful working of such a large institution. It is well known, that since the Intercolonial was first opened, the traffic over that road has gone on annually increasing. The tables which have been furnished this House show, at page 17 of the Railway Reports, that, while in 1877 the number of tons of freight carried was only 420,000, in 1888 it amounted to 1,275,000. And whereas at that time there was only 613,000 passengers carried, in 1888 the number amounted to 996,000. Under these circumstances, I think the House would be justified in supposing that the ratio of increase in expense in working that road would not be in proportion to the increased freight and number of passengers carried over the road. In fact, it is well known, as a matter of business, that the larger the volume of business that can be controlled in any one way, either in manufacturing or otherwise, the smaller is the percentage of expense, and that principle applies and must apply as much to the working of a railway as it would to any other enterprise. Then, again, it is well known that roads running through less populous districts, and from smaller terminal points, as far as cities are concerned, have, under different management, been able to pay a dividend over their working expenses. Take the road from Halifax and St. John—cities of fair proportions—running through fine agricultural districts till they reach Richibucto or further north, there should be, and doubtless is, a large amount of local traffic, which of itself should be a very fair element in sustaining the road. There is a portion of that road, I am aware, through the northern part of New Brunswick and Lower Canada, which, perhaps, may place it at a disadvantage; but, taking it as a whole, running from those places I have referred to, to Quebec and Montreal, with the number of passengers going over that road and the amount of freight which has been increasing year after year, I repeat that, so far as one would be able to judge, there should be a fair and reasonable expectation that that road would pay at least its working expenses. That it has not done so has been a source of great regret to us all, and we all feel that, so long as that road is annually charged with a deficiency like $360,000 for the last year—and we now see in the Estimates $500,000 for the current year—there will always be a feeling that it is in a measure an incubus on the country. We have been told very frequently that that road was built for the benefit of the Maritime Provinces. That road is as much, and to a greater extent, a convenience to the people of Ontario and Quebec as it is to the people of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, and therefore we feel, and take a deep interest in the economical administration of that department. We feel that that road has been, so to say, allowed to run itself; that Jack is as good as his master, and in some cases a little better; and when we see the losses which have occurred on that road, year by year and month by month, and when we see, as we unfortunately did the other day, a very sad accident occurring on that road, for which as yet no explanation has been given, in which many valuable lives were sacrificed and a large amount of Government property was destroyed, I think the Minister in charge of that department should be able to satisfy the House that some examination has taken place in reference to that accident, and that the Government are preparing to deal with those who are responsible for it, if it was, as has been stated, the result of carelessness. There is another feeling in regard to that road, which is very generally expressed, that it is managed from Ottawa instead of being managed at Moncton. The engineer of that road has, I may say, placed himself in that position with regard to the public that, whether right or wrong—and I am not going to express any opinion upon that myself, because I have not been brought in contact with the engineer of the road—there is a very general feeling, which found vent in the expression of opinion in the Halifax Chamber of Commerce the other day, that the engineer in charge was the person who had made the Intercolonial Railway unpopular throughout the Maritime Provinces, and had contributed largely to the position in which that road stands to-day. To show this Committee how deep is that feeling which exists in those Provinces to-day, I need only refer to a discussion which took place in the Senate last week, when three supporters of the Administration, the Hon. Mr. Botsford, the Hon. Mr. Dickey and the Hon. Dr. Almon, referred to this matter. The Hon. Mr. Botsford, in the course of a very long address, drew the attention of the Senate—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order to read extracts from the Senate proceedings.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I will say that in another place——

The CHAIRMAN. I am afraid it cannot be evaded in that way.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Then I shall say that references have been made to the road recently by three prominent supporters of the Government. One hon. gentleman says:

"When my hon. friend put this notice on the paper I certainly did not expect that so wide a field of discussion would be opened before us, and, therefore, I am not, at the present moment, in a position to follow him into that discussion; at the same time, I think, it is unfortunate that my hon. friend has not suggested anything as a remedy for this state of things. For I am bound to admit with him that there is throughout Nova Scotia, and, to some extent, as far as I know it, in New Brunswick, a very wide feeling of dissatisfaction at the management of the Intercolonial Railway."

That was followed up by an expression from another very warm supporter of the Government, who, hon. gentlemen know, would be the last to say anything of that kind unless he was driven to the conclusion that it was absolutely necessary in the public interest. Another hon. gentleman says:

"I think the inhabitants of Nova Scotia are indebted to the hon member for bringing up the state of the Intercolonial Railway before this House. I belong to a party that does not find fault with the Government unless there are very strong reasons for it, but still the Conservatives and Liberals of Halifax together have found fault with the way in which the Intercolonial Railway is managed."

There are expressions of opinion from three active and warm supporters of the Government, who, I am sure, must have been deeply pained at being placed in the position of having to record their opinions against the proper working of the Intercolonial Railway. In the Chamber of Commerce at Halifax, an equally emphatic expression was made in reference to this road, and particularly in regard to the engineer who had charge of the road, and who, in many cases, had placed himself in hostility, as they considered, to its best interests. But, looking at the expenses of the road, it would appear that, while the earnings of the road have increased—and that is pointed out with great satisfaction by the General Manager—the working expenses of every branch of the road have increased as well. On page 26 of the report we find that the working expenses for 1887-88 were $3,276,441 as against $2,828,115 the year previous, or an increase of $448,326. Then they compare with the last year the miles run by engines and by trains. The cost per mile run by engine in 1888 was 55.19 cents, as against 51.74 cents the year previous. Now, I do not pretend to be a railway man, but I cannot understand why the cost per mile run by engines should be increasing every year. The miles run by engines must be pretty much the same one year as another, and if there is more freight, of course the general results would be more favorably, as affecting the returns of the road. Then, again, we find the cost per mile run by trains in 1888, was 66.33 cents, as against 62.67 cents the previous year. The expense per mile of railway in 1888 was $3,723, as against $3,265 the previous year. Now, these things appear to me to go to prove that there has been a want of proper administration in the department, that the expenses of running this road have increased out of all proportion to the increased traffic over the road, that the increase per mile by engine, the increase per mile by trains, the increase per mile of railway, have all been out of proportion to the increased traffic on the road, whereas the percentage should have been less than it was. Now, Sir, attention has also been called on previous occasions by myself, to a certain class of freights carried over that road, entitled, coal from the Springhill Mines. We have a return furnished us, showing that while in 1879, there were only 570 tons carried, the quantity has gone up in 1887 to 192,000 tons. Whether this is an advantage to the road or not, is not, fortunately, a question for us to consider, because on page 17 of the report which I hold in my hand, they go on to say:

"Upon reference to the foregoing table it will be seen that the earnings of this railway for the year under consideration are short of the working expenses by $363,657 This result may be largely attributed to the heavy cost of keeping the traffic moving during the snowstorms of last winter, and the large volume of freight carried at unremunerative rates."

And they further observe on page 26:

"For several years past I have drawn attention in the annual report to the extremely low rate to which coal is carried, and there can be no doubt that is one of the chief causes of the annual deficit."

Now, this is not the first time that the Minister of Railways has laid this view before the House. I was not surprised, therefore, when, a short time before this House assembled, I learned that the Government had increased the rate of freight from the Springhill Mines over the Intercolonial Railway. I took the ground on previous occasions that coal from the Springhill Mines should be placed in exactly the same position as any other industry in the Maritime Provinces. It was well known that when this industry was built up at a sacrifice to the taxpayers of this country, the hon. Minister who was then in charge of the Railway Department—or if he was not, his predominating influence in the Cabinet had the effect of securing the transmission of freight from his own county at a much lower rate than it was sent from any other county in the Province. Now, I do not object to their carrying coal at a loss, provided that they are going to carry through freight at a similar low rate; but I do most emphatically object to any interest in this country being favored at the expense of other equally important interests. I am aware that the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) had sufficient influence in this House on his return here to secure a cancellation of that revision of the tariff, and it was whispered out of doors that the hon. gentleman went so far in that matter as to refuse to second the Address on the assembling of Parliament unless that arrangement was agreed to. Be that as it may, it is one of the rumors of the corridor. I do not blame the hon. gentleman for using all proper and legitimate influence to secure what he thought was in the interest of his county, if he so considered it; but I do object—although some of my own personal and political friends took a different ground—to any preference being given to one interest over another. I am aware that at a late meeting of the Chamber of Commerce in Halifax they passed a resolution, a copy of which I hold, and my hon. colleague has, no doubt, a copy in his hand, calling upon the Government to reduce the rate down to the original price of $\frac{5}{10}$ per cent. per ton instead of the rate which they had previously charged. But that makes no alteration in my conviction in this matter. I took the ground that I am now taking long before the Chamber of Commerce moved in that matter, and I am not going to alter my opinion to-day, or to recede from the position I then took, that no one interest in this country should be favored at the expense of other equally important interests. What did we see this last winter? My firm happens to be agents for the Dominion line of steamships. The winter before last these steamers brought large cargoes of English goods, which were transmitted over the Intercolonial Railway. This year, when the winter time came on, and when it was necessary for that firm in England to know what arrangements were to be made for the winter traffic, they were much surprised to see a communication from the department at Moncton notifying us as agents that the freight on English goods had been advanced 5 per cent. Now, I do not wish to be understood as saying that that 5 per cent. was entirely over the Intercolonial Railway, because while it was about 5 per cent. on the general average, that was divided between the Intercolonial Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway. Therefore, you will observe that at this very time when they are carrying coal at a loss, they were advancing rates over the Intercolonial Railway for English goods which had formed the chief portion of their traffic during the winter time. Hon. gentlemen are aware that the item of sugar, of which large quantities come from the producing markets during the winter season to the refineries in Montreal, was carried, I believe at, 20 cents a 100 pounds; it may be reduced a cent or two now, I am not quite sure. It is in the neighborhood of 20 cents; and taking it at 20 cents per 100 lbs., they were actually charging $4 a ton to Montreal, while, at the same time, they were only charging about $1.50 a ton for coal from Springhill. Hon. gentlemen will notice the difference between those two amounts, and I might give further illustrations to show that the difference was so great, as to call for a readjustment. But what was the effect of this increase in the tariff? The agents of the Allan and Dominion lines, instead of bringing 2,000 tons, on an average, to Halifax, as they did last year, landed only 150 tons—I believe, as high as 300 or 400 tons; I am not aware of the latter number ever having been exceeded, and the quantity would be 250 or 300 tons, on an average, landed from the English steamers, for the railway, during the past winter. An advance in the rates on this freight coming over the Intercolonial Railway was a most strange and improper policy on the part of the Government, and while it was understood the Government were endeavoring to attract freight over the Intercolonial Railway by steamers from abroad, and endeavoring to build up Halifax as a winter port, and attract freight by that route, at that very time when freight was commencing to come they advanced the rate, and diverted all this large traffic to Portland instead of bringing it over our own railway. I point to this again as illustrating the improvident and unbusinesslike manner in which the Intercolonial Railway is managed, and I know that the feeling which I express here is expressed with respect to its management from this city by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, because I have heard the opinion expressed on many occasions that the party in charge of the road should be at Moncton instead of at Ottawa, and be in communication with all distant points. These are some of the larger points to which I desire to direct the attention of the House. There are many complaints respecting matters of less magnitude, but which are of equal importance to the parties concerned, which it would take the whole afternoon to explain; but I repeat that there is a general sense of dissatisfaction with the management of the road, there is a general impression that it is managed imprudently and extravagantly, that there is no proper head and no proper control, that someone is required with sufficient authority to have the road operated as it was operated during the time Mr. Brydges had charge of it, when every man knew his place and was obliged to attend to his own proper duties and nothing else. This will never be realised, and the public will never be satisfied until some person is placed there in whom the public have more confidence than they have in the engineer or party in charge of it at the present time. I make these remarks regretfully, because I have no feeling in the matter one way or the other; but public interests are concerned, and, representing an important constituency, I feel it to be my duty here to point out all these points to which I have drawn the attention of the House, and which I desire to place before the Government, particularly before the hon. Minister who, at the present, has charge of that department, and I invite his attention and their attention to a matter in which our people feel very deeply interested, and I am sure, if they look into it themselves, they will realise the truth of what I have been stating. They will realise the fact that it is unnecessary and improper to carry certain classes of goods at very low rates, while they drive away the great volume of business to foreign ports by advancing rates against them. There have been complaints with respect to the shipment of refined sugar; but I am not in a position to say that that is the fault of the Intercolonial Railway. I believe that is more the fault of the Grand Trunk. But the Government, I think, should have sufficient control and influence with the Grand Trunk Railway, to prevent the spectacle which we see every week in Halifax, of a steamer loading refined sugar in Halifax for Boston, where it is transhipped to all points in the west. I believe the Government could, if they chose to exercise that control, make arrangements with the Grand Trunk Railway, whereby the sugars of Moncton and Halifax would be transmitted to western points on terms similar to those which have been in use for many years past. My colleague, who is a director in that refinery, knows more about it than I do, and will be able to speak on that subject, but I have known as much as 1,500 or 2,000 barrels of sugar to be sent to Boston every week. If there was a proper combination or arrangement which it would be proper for the Government to make, and if they exercised that influence or control which the Government of this country could naturally exercise over a large corporation like the Grand Trunk Railway, the Government would, if they were disposed to exercise that control and influence legitimately, be able to obtain an arrangement with the Grand Trunk Railway, whereby the manufactures of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick would be carried over that road on the same terms on which they have been carried in past years. These are some of the points which, I repeat, it would be well for the Government to consider, and particularly in view of the unsatisfactory results of the working of this road. I might enter into the accounts, and dissect them with respect to stores and many other matters. These accounts are not all satisfactory I claim, but we have to take them as presented to us. On the whole, it would be more satisfactory if we had a more clear and explicit exhibit of the amount which the Government have on hand under this head. There is another item with respect to this road which I think is not of a satisfactory character, and that is the annual charge made on the capital account. I see in the Supplementary Estimates the very small sum of $400 only to be charged to capital account. We have under the head of capital account, amounts charged which in some cases may be proper and which in many cases I am convinced are highly improper. I made a statement in this House last year to the late lamented Minister of Railways to this effect, that I was informed that a number of coal cars had been broken up at Pictou when they could have been repaired at a cost of $70, and they were replaced by new cars costing $220, in order that they might be charged to capital account, whereas, if $70 had been expended on repairing the cars, the amount would have been charged to running expenses. I might tell that hon. gentleman that I can give him the name of my informant, and I will give it to any member of the Government who desires it, but I do not care to bring the gentleman's name before the House. Meeting him in the street a short time ago I said to him that I made the statement in the House and that it had been contradicted. He said: "You can, if necessary, use my name, and I can furnish you with the dates and the names of the parties who had these cars destroyed." When I add that my informant was a staunch supporter of the present Administration and active opponent of my own, it will show you at least that there was no political feeling in the matter, but the object was simply that the country might be aware of the manner in which the Intercolonial Railway was managed. I believe the time will come when the country will realise the fact that very large sums of money have annually been charged to capital account which should have been charged to working expenses, and which were charged to working expenses under similar circumstances by the previous Administration. This uncertainty with regard to the capital account, as to what it is going to amount to, is one of those views which, to say the least, is of a very unsatisfactory character. We are now about extending the Intercolonial Railway through the Island of Cape Breton, and I hope and trust it may be a success, but we have, in addition to the Intercolonial Railway, the Eastern Extension from New Glasgow to Canso. I pointed out last year, to the Minister at that time, that working that road as a separate branch was very unsatisfactory, and that it should be run in connection with the Intercolonial Railway. Those of us whose duty it has been to transmit freight over the Intercolonial Railway, and a portion of the Eastern Extension branch, have realised the trouble and inconvenience we are put to, by preparing a voluminous paper, and distributing the goods over one branch and another. While this Intercolonial Railway carries English goods at a certain percentage, so far as New Glasgow is concerned, the moment you reach that point, although still the goods go over the Government road, you are subjected to an arbitrary rate, and to a new arrangement entirely, which, to my mind, is a most unbusinesslike proceeding. I never could understand upon what principle the Eastern Extension Railway was run separate from the Intercolonial Railway. It is part of the Intercolonial Railway, and should be managed on the same basis; but being run separately, it will be admitted by every member of this House, that the expense must be considerably increased. These are some points to which I desire to direct the attention of the Government, and I hope that when we meet here next year, some of those glaring faults shall be remedied and that the result of the working of the Intercolonial Railway next year will show that a system of economy has been introduced, and that the loss to the country will be much less than we regret to see it is now, from the papers which have been laid before the House.

Mr. KENNY. I recognise, as my hon. colleague has mentioned, that we labor under great disadvantage to-day in discussing railway matters, owing to the ever to be regretted demise of the late esteemed and respected Minister of that department. I fully concur with several points that have been raised by my colleague, but I think, Sir, that I have heard him, in this House, point to the national mission of the Intercolonial Railway and to the fact that we never expected it would pay. I am quite prepared to go this far with him, that the people of the Maritime Provinces desire that some equilibrium should be established between the expenditure and the income of that road. My hon. friend knows, and I have mentioned it before in the House, that we could not have a national existence without this Intercolonial Railway; and that in my previous contentions and references to it in this House, I mentioned that the rates of freight should be so adjusted as to encourage the greatest possible expansion of our interprovincial trade. He knows that we did not expect the expenditure would be met immediately from income. I agree with my hon. colleague when he says that, so far, the Intercolonial Railway has been more advantageous to the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec than it has been to the Maritime Provinces. I mean by that, Sir, that the Intercolonial Railway gave to the manufacturers, and millers, and merchants of the Upper Provinces facilities for reaching one million additional consumers and that, therefore, it has been of more advantage to the people of the Upper Provinces than it has been to the people of the Maritime Provinces. My hon. colleague dwelt at length upon the rate at which coal is carried from Springhill to Montreal. He knows that any railway company in America that can secure to itself the general traffic incidental to a population such as is growing up in Springhill within the last few years, would be very glad to carry coal at a very low rate.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Three quarters of a cent is the lowest.

Mr. KENNY. I may say to my hon. colleague, that I believe the coal is carried from Pennsylvania to Massena Springs, which is about the same distance as from Springhill to Montreal, at as low a rate as it is carried over the Intercolonial Railway. I ask my hon. friend if, by carrying this 200,000 tons of coal, which I believe is the amount we carry on the Intercolonial Railway, we can build up in our country such communities as Springhill, where there is a population of six or seven thousand people in addition to others in the neighborhood who are benefited by the mines—I ask him if it would not be wise to carry coal at a low rate if we can build up such a community? For my part, I believe it would, and I believe that it is in the interest of the whole country that we should do so. As regards that Springhill rate, I may point out that my hon. colleague, when it suits him, quotes the utterances of the Chamber of Commerce. He knows very well indeed that this very Chamber of Commerce which passed the resolution to which he referred, did, at the same meeting, I believe, pass a resolution in favor of the retention of those very low rates on coal.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I stated so.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman must know that the retention of this low rate has been urged and agitated in the Halifax Morning Chronicle, and, therefore, my hon. colleague almost stands alone in the community from which he comes when he makes the contention that the rate is too low. I think it ought to be a satisfactory answer, as regards the freight rates on coal from Springhill, if I can say to this House that in the contention that my hon. friend has made here to-day, he stands alone from his whole Province. I think I am correct in saying that the feeling and sentiment of the people of Nova Scotia is that the management of the railway is fairly satisfactory to the people of that Province. My hon. colleague has also referred at great length to the increase in the rates of freight on British goods carried over the Intercolonial Railway during winter months. I have endeavored to inform myself on that point, and so far as I can learn the rate was raised by the Grand Trunk Railway and not by the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). If my hon. friend will allow me, I stated that the increase was about five per cent., and half of that is for the Intercolonial Railway, and half for the Grand Trunk Railway. I can state that as a positive fact, as it came before me with reference to the transmission of English goods over those railways.

Mr. KENNY. As the hon. gentleman says he has positive information on that point, I am ready to accept it; but I think he will admit that the question of advance in rates did not emanate from the Intercolonial Railway, but from the Grand Trunk.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I do not know anything about that.

Mr. KENNY. Well, I do know that. As regards rates on British goods, my hon. friend is better informed than I am, inasmuch as his firm in Halifax is agent for one of the ocean lines of steamers. These subsidised steamers entered into an arrangement with the Grand Trunk to divert from Canadian ports all the British goods which were last year landed at Halifax; and they actually discriminated against Halifax, agreeing to carry goods at a lower rate via Portland than via Halifax. I may remark, en passant, that when we come to deal with the renewal of the subsidies to ocean steamers, we must insist that the terminal ports shall be in our own territory. The same remark will apply to the change which has unfortunately taken place in the rates for the transportation of refined sugars from Halifax westward. That was entirely owing, as I understand, to the combined action of the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific Railway. I do not pretend to speak positively on that point; but the rumor runs, that these two railways, acting for some local interest in Montreal, were induced to raise their rates on those sugars, when the Intercolonial Railway was quite prepared to carry them at the rate that prevailed before. So my hon. friend's remarks left the impression that the management of the Intercolonial Railway was to blame for the rates on sugars.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I did not say that.

Mr. KENNY. But he might have left that impression. My hon. friend has pointed out one difficulty in connection with the Intercolonial in which I agree with him, that the management of the railway is at Ottawa when it should be at Moncton. Much of the dissatisfaction that exists is due to the difficulty in fixing special traffic rates. Friends of mine have come to me complaining of the delay in getting rates on the Intercolonial Railway, and I have taken the trouble to investigate their complaints, and I have found that the difficulty exists more with the western roads than with the Intercolonial, as these western roads will not give to the Intercolonial ready replies to their enquiries about rates. My hon. colleague knows that all our railway grumbling in the Maritime Provinces is necessarily with the Intercolonial Railway, as it is the only railway we deal with. In Ontario and in the Province of Quebec we frequently hear merchants complaining of rates, and the difficulty they have in making arrangements with the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk. If you centralise all that grumbling, you will realise how much of the fault that is found with the Intercolonial Railway in the Maritime Provinces is accumulated. I must say, so far as my knowledge of the road goes—and, like my colleague, I do not pretend to be a railway expert—that I do not remember a time when the Intercolonial Railway was as well equipped as it is to-day with rolling stock and locomotive power; and, I believe, the road-bed is as good as any that exists in Canada. As regards my hon. colleague's reference to the capital account, it was referred to in a previous debate in this House. There seems to be, in the minds of some hon. gentlemen at least, a desire of always finding fault with the Maritime Provinces, by conveying the impression that we are a great tax and burden on the Dominion, in consequence of the expenditure on this Intercolonial Railway. I have taken the trouble to ascertain the actual cost of that road. I find that it has 926 miles of railway; and Jean's Railway Problems, which, I believe, is a recognised authority, puts the average cost of Canadian railways at $61,000 a mile, whereas the average cost of the Intercolonial Railway was less than $50,000 per mile, and for that I think the country has very good value. As my hon. friend himself pointed out, the traffic in 1878, when he was appealing to the people for re-election—and one of his powerful appeals was the manner in which the traffic of the Intercolonial Railway had developed under the Government, of which he was a member—the traffic amounted to 500,000 tons a year, whereas it is now over 1,250,000 tons a year. Of course, we all desire, as it is in the public interest, and in the interest of the Maritime Provinces, to see the expenditure approach income as nearly as possible; but I take the ground which my hon. friend took some years ago, that this road is a national highway; we could not have our national existence without it; and whilst we do not expect that it will continue to be the tax it is to-day, yet if we want to develop our interprovincial trade, we cannot expect to do it without carrying goods at comparatively reasonable rates. I have shown with regard to the rate for coal, that coal is actually carried at a lower rate on American railways. As regards the unpopularity of the road, and the gentleman who has charge of that road to-day, that gentleman has labored during the past twelve months, as my hon. friend knows, under the very great disadvantage to that, owing to the ill-health and failing strength of his Minister, it was very difficult indeed to secure from the Administration that attention to the road which under other circumstances it would have obtained. But it is much easier to find fault than it is to find a remedy. I am inclined to think that even these gentlemen, some of whom, as my hon. colleague has informed me, are my own political friends and warm supporters of the Government, when they come to examine, as some of them have recently taken the trouble to do, carefully into these matters, will find that they have jumped at conclusions. At the same time, I am quite ready to join hands with my hon. colleague in urging upon the Administration that if possible, in the reorganisation of this department, that road should be administered from at least a nearer point than Ottawa. I almost envy my colleague being in Opposition this afternoon, for it is so easy to find fault. I labor under this disadvantage: that my colleague comes here fully primed and charged, and I simply have to refer hurriedly to some of the statements he has made. As I have said, with many of my hon. colleague's remarks I am not disposed to find fault. We are here to criticise this expenditure, and as long as we do so in a fair, impartial manner I am certain the Government will accept suggestions from both sides of the House.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I wish to correct a misapprehension into which my hon. friend fell in regard to the steamship companies discriminating against Halifax. He would lead the House to understand that the steamship companies, in their arrangements with the Grand Trunk, were actually discriminating against Halifax. Well, that arises from our geographical position. My hon. friend will see that the steamer agent at Liverpool, having to take goods to Montreal, will naturally enquire whether the consignees are in a hurry, and whether they will take the goods viâ Halifax or Portland. If they are willing to receive them by way of Portland, the distance from Portland to Montreal is under 300 miles, while the distance from Halifax is 800 miles, and naturally the company can bring them viâ Portland at a lower rate than viâ Halifax.

Mr. KENNY. As I understand it, if the shipper, say in Manchester, went to the agent of the Allan or Dominion line and asked what the rates of freight to Montreal were, he would be told. If you send these goods by way of Portland, we will charge a certain rate, but if you want them sent by Halifax, you would have to pay 5s. to 7s. 6d. per ton more. In other words, we are subsidising ocean mail steamers to build up other ports at the expense of Canadian ports.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman will see that it is just a question of distance, and it is 300 miles against 800 miles. Of course the bargain originates on the other side, and they have to state to the shipper that if he desires to send goods by Halifax as against Portland, the distance is 800 miles against 300 miles, and the rate consequently higher.

Mr. KENNY. This is the first year that discrimination has been made.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). No, it was always existing.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I think if my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Kenny) were not confined in the fetters which bind him, he would probably make a stronger indictment against the management of the Intercolonial than my hon. friend alongside of me (Mr. Jones) has made. I quite agree that the Intercolonial is not intended to be a road from which we can derive revenue, and, so far as the benefits it confers are concerned, while the Maritime Provinces are charged with this work having been built for their sole benefit to a large extent, it benefits Quebec and Ontario equally as much. No doubt there is great discontent throughout the whole of the Maritime Provinces concerning the management of this road. Whether well founded or not, it is not necessary for me to say, but the fact exists, and we find not only papers opposed to the Administration, but papers supporting the Government throughout the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick condemning the Administration on this score. The feeling is general and very strong that the road is not constructed in a way it ought to be, that its expenses are far beyond what they should be, that it is not conducted in the economical manner in which it should be conducted, and besides that it does not afford that accommodation which would naturally be expected considering the large amount of public money sunk in it. If a company owned this road and had to pay interest on the amount borrowed, they would have to close their capital account and depend upon their income for the furnishing of their rolling stock and material. We find that the lien on this road is very serious. We find a capital account of something like $45,000,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. $47,000,000.

Mr. KENNY.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I am taking round numbers. $45,000,000, representing an interest charge of $1,800,000 per annum. We find that the deficiency in round numbers: capital account, $750,000, and deficiency, $360,000, amounts to $1,100,000 on the year's work, making a total deficit of nearly $3,000,000. When you look around at other roads you must see there is something wrong in this. No doubt, considerable blame is attached to the engineer in charge and perhaps that gentleman's shoulders are made to bear a larger burthen than they ought, and perhaps a larger portion of the blame is due to the way the road is managed. I quite agree with the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) that Ottawa is the wrong place for the head management. It should be at Moncton. Very many complaints and inconvenience arise from the fact that orders have to be received from Ottawa. When a shipper applies for rates on other roads he can at once get the information he desires, but the delays which take place on the Intercolonial in this respect are such, owing to instructions having to be received from Ottawa, that a good deal of traffic is lost to the road. The hon. gentleman spoke of the road being well equipped. No doubt there is a vast improvement, and probably what he says is quite correct, but we must remember that all that is charged to capital account. We find in the Supplementary Estimates brought down yesterday $170,000 for rolling stock, which was charged to capital account, but which other roads would have to pay out of their earnings. Great complaints exist also with regard to the mode on which the charges on freight are made. The people of Albert County complain that the rates to Halifax from there are the same as the rates from Rimouski. In one case the owner of a quarry stated he was willing to pay double rates to have the stone carried to Toronto, but he could not effect an arrangement. We find to-day that the sugar refiners of Halifax and Moncton are sending their stuff to Boston. As to Moncton, the handling has to be done there, and there is the handling at St. John, and the handling at Boston, and so on to the destination. I think it is only fair to say that that is owing more to the Grand Trunk than to the Intercolonial Railway, but I think it is probably due to the arrangement which I understand is made between the Intercolonial Railway and the Grand Trunk, which gives the Grand Trunk a controlling power it ought not to have. As I and my hon. friends have pointed out, the sugar from Halifax and Moncton is to-day going to the west by way of Boston instead of by the Intercolonial, and I find in the St. John Telegraph of Wednesday last that, at a meeting of the St. John Board of Trade:

"Mr. R. Cruikshank said a large amount of western freight for St. John was coming by way of Boston, instead of via the Intercolonial Railway, as it should He moved, that the secretary be instructed to inquire why this freight does not come by way of the Intercolonial Railway.

"Mr. Hatheway answered Mr. Cruikshank's query in a very satisfactory manner. He pointed out, that the freight from milling centres of Ontario to St. John via the Intercolonial Railroad was 55 cents, while from the same place to Boston, it was only 35 cents—from Boston to St. John, eight cents, allowing about three cents per barrel for insurance; the total cost by way of Boston was only about 46 cents."

Whether that is the fault of the Intercolonial or not, I am not prepared to say, but the papers are teeming every day with charges against that road. Last week, it was stated in one of the newspapers, that an offer was made to carry stone from Newcastle to Metapedia for $12 a carload, while stone was brought from Newcastle to Ottawa for the building on Wellington street, at a smaller sum.

Mr. FOSTER. That is quite wrong.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). What was the rate?

Mr. FOSTER. $20 a carload.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). A certain portion of that would go to the Grand Trunk, and certainly the Intercolonial would not get more than $12 from Newcastle to Quebec.

Mr. FOSTER. From Newcastle to the Chaudière Junction at Quebec, the rate was $20 a carload.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). What quantity was carried in a car? According to the discussion the other day in reference to the building the Minister of Public Works made the rate considerably less.

Mr. FOSTER. There was no information upon the subject here then, but I stated that I would get the information. I have the information now, and the rate was $20 a carload to the Chaudière Junction.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The Minister of Public Works stated then that the price was 12 cents per cubic foot, and that something under 12 feet would make a ton, so that would be $1.44 a ton, and certainly that is not $20 a carload.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The newspapers are making other charges against the management of this road. It is said that coal is carried to Quebec at $16 a car, when I saw a bill of lading from Springhill to St. John at $24 a car. The other day it was proposed to bring down lumber from Bathurst to St John, during the winter, over the Intercolonial Railway. At the rate of coal, that would be $6 a car, but the charge was placed at such a figure as to make it wholly unremunerative. There is another matter which is referred to in regard to the expense of that road. During the time Mr. Brydges had charge of that road, there was a great outcry made because he had a private car. Brydges' car was spoken of everywhere. It was said that this was extravagant, that Mr. Brydges was such a high and mighty power that he could not travel with common people, but must have a private car for himself. To-day we are informed that there is the official car, No. 34, for the use of Mr. Pottinger. Then there is the "Cumberland"—the old Brydges car—which is kept for the Governor General, and there is the "Ottawa," which I understand is also now the official or private car of Mr. Trites. Then we are informed that there is another car.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) What about the "Jamaica?"

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I do not know whether the "Jamaica" has gone down there yet or not. At all events, it is reported that another car is being built for the engineer-in-chief. If that is true, we shall have four official and private cars on that road instead of the one little car which Mr. Brydges had, and, in regard to which, such an attack was made upon him and upon the Government of that day. There are other charges made in the press in regard to that road every day. There was one the other day in reference to the cars furnished by Harris & Co, which, it is said, were condemned by the master car builder, but yet they were built and had afterwards to be altered in the Government shops at an enormous expense. These charges are brought every day, and they show that there must be something wrong in the management of the road. One of the last stories is the most extraordinary of all. It is that at a particular station on the Intercolonial Railway, the station master was allowed $5 a day to keep up a fire during the winter months to prevent the water freezing in the tank, but, while the $5 a day goes on, for many months there has been no water there at all, and eight months ago the tank was burnt down. The water has gone and the tank has gone, but the pay goes on forever. Whether these statements are true or not I do not know, but they are published and there does not appear to be any contradiction of them made. I believe one great objection in connection with that road is that far more employés are used than are needed, and they are employed for political purposes and not for their efficiency in regard to railways. If a private road had to employ the same number of men in proportion, they would find their accounts just as deficient as the Intercolonial. Then there is another matter which is deserving of attention, and that is the remarkable number of accidents to employés that have occurred on that road as compared with others. Looking at the returns during the past year, I find that 120 employés were more or less injured. Then there is another matter of a local nature of which I will speak, and which has created a good deal of feeling in St. John, and in regard to which the conduct of Mr. Schreiber was condemned by parties of all shades of political opinion. At the Intercolonial Railway station there was no shelter afforded for the hackmen, and things got into such a state that the hackmen practically abandoned going to the station at all. Now, I have a statement here made by a hackman who was interviewed by a reporter, in which he says:

"We never have had any proper accommodation around the station, and when we agitated for a stand inside the building so that we would not be exposed to the weather, they gave us one outside in the mud where our passengers would have to walk under the drip of the building."

I can speak of that from experience.—

"But when they did that, they promised us we could sit in the gentlemen's waiting rooms until the trains were due, and that four minutes after the train arrived, we could go inside the station, and assist our patrons with their luggage. Last night the station master and gatekeeper informed us that all privileges held by us had been taken away, and that in future we were not to come inside the building. As a result of that, he continued, we have decided to boycot the station after the 14th inst. It is a hard decision, he said, but we cannot stand outside in the winter, exposed to the biting wind and freezing atmosphere. The driver was very strong in his denunciation of their treatment, and said, among other things, that frequently they had lady passengers with heavy luggage, who were forced to carry it the whole length of the station in their search for a teamster, while when a railway magnate from Moneton, or any other place, came to the city, a coachman would be sent in to receive his satchel the moment he stepped from the car, and carry it for him to the cab waiting outside. All that the men ask is for accommodation inside the station building."

Then the reporter goes on to say:

"There are two sides in every story, and in this case no harm can be done in showing up the other side. When the railing, which has caused so much trouble, was first put up, the station master gave the coachmen the privilege of sitting in the room, until the train was coming into the station. They were then to take their stand outside. This arrangement would probably have worked all right, had not the officer whose duty it was to report offenders against the railway regulations, neglected to report the few coachmen who abused the privileges granted them. In consequence of this laxity on the part of the officer, the offending coachmen became emboldened, and finally the station master found it necessary to cancel the privileges he had given them. The withdrawal of the station privileges from those coachmen who had obeyed the regulations is, of course, a hardship."

In consequence of this difficulty the divisional superintendent went down and saw the men and agreed to make some arrangement by which they would be protected from the weather. We all know that at certain seasons of the year it is impossible for the men to remain outside, at the same time stand where they would be convenient to the public. The divisional superintendent made arrangements to furnish them a porch, they waited for some time, but the promise was not fulfilled. But upon the faith of that engagement, they resumed their position at the station, and matters went on the same as usual. But nothing was done, and on the 9th of February last, the mayor of St. John wrote to the manager. This is what I find in a local paper:

"On the 9th inst., Mayor Thorne wrote to the manager of the Government railways, calling Mr. Schreiber's attention to the terms of the arrangement made with Mr. Wallace, divisional superintendent of the Intercolonial, touching the erection of a shelter for the coachmen attending the St. John depot and politely notified Mr. Schreiber that no shelter had yet been provided by the railway. Yesterday his worship received the following extremely curt reply.

"OTTAWA, 16th February, 1889.

"Henry J. Thorne, Esq., Mayor St. John, N.B.

"MY DEAR SIR,—I have yours of the 19th instant, and in reply would beg to ask whether the city authorities of St. John have provided shelter for the hackmen on their stands on the streets, where they stand probably two-thirds of their time.

"Yours truly,
"COLLINGWOOD SCHREIBER."

Now, I do not think that was a courteous or a proper answer to send to the chief magistrate of the city of St. John, and a feeling of indignation was aroused as to the manner in which the hackmen were treated. At a meeting which was held shortly after the publication of this letter, held in connection with the Short Line, a resolution was passed, moved by Conservatives, and unanimously adopted, condemning the action of Mr. Schreiber in this matter. I give this instance to show the injustice done to the hackmen of St. John, and also to show the manner in which matters are administered, and the dissatisfaction which exists among the people. This shows that the manner in which the road is conducted is not only detrimental to the interests of the people, but to the interest of the road itself, and it shows that the road cannot be carried on as efficiently as it could be if the headquarters were at Moncton, or at some other place more convenient than Ottawa, which is at a great distance, even from the extreme western end of the line. I pointed out the mode in which freight from Moncton is in some way or other driven into other channels. This matter becomes still more important from the fact that with the opening of summer there will be two other roads in competition with the Intercolonial Railway. First, there is the road from Rivière du Loup through Temiscouata to Edmundston, and thence through the counties of New Brunswick, until it unites with the New Brunswick Railway. By that road a person leaving Rivière du Loup can reach St. John at the same time that he would arrive at Campbellton by the Intercolonial Railway. Then we have the Short Line, so you will see how important it is that rigid inquiry should be made into the management of the road, and that a more rigid economy should be practiced than has hitherto prevailed. Now, a word in regard to the stores. Of course, I am not a railway man, and I cannot understand all these things as well as a railway man, but it seems to me that there is an enormous amount of stores on hand this year, I see about half-a million dollars worth; last year, nearly $700,000 of stock in stores. It seems to me now, with the facilities we have for replenishing stores, that the keeping of such a large stock on hand opens the door to temptation to make away with them, or to waste them, although I do not say that such has been done. In the Lower Provinces we all feel an interest in this road, and a feeling of general dissatisfaction prevails regarding its management in all these particulars.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

GREAT NORTH WESTERN RAILWAY.

Mr. DAVIS moved the consideration of amendments made by the Senate to Bill (No. 49) respecting the Alberta and Athabasca Railway Company, and to change the name of the Company to "The Great North-Western Railway Company." He said: The amendment made in the Senate is the insertion of the word "Alberta" after the words "Great North-Western."

Mr. COLBY. I beg to move:

That the said amendment be amended by leaving out Alberta after "North-West" and inserting "of Canada" after "Company" on line ten of the Bill, and in the title in line three of the same.

When this Bill was before the Senate Committee it was thought that the name too nearly resembled that of another railway company, the Great North-Western Central, and without there being an opportunity of consulting with the promoters of the Bill at the moment, the word Alberta inserted. I subsequently received a cable from the promoters in London expressing a preference to the title I propose, and I submitted that to the gentleman who made the objection in the Senate, so there can be no objection to it I presume.

Amendment agreed to, and amendments concurred in.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 68) respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. EDGAR. I gave notice of an amendment the other day to be moved in Committee on this Bill, but after looking into the matter as carefully as I could, I have come to the conclusion that it is not necessary to move that amendment. However, there are some general considerations in connection with this Bill which I should like to bring before the Committee, not that I propose to move any amendment to it. From the enormous sums involved and from the great interest which the Dominion possesses in this undertaking, I think time will not be lost if I spend a few moments in directing the attention of the House to what seem to be the general considerations underlying this legislation. The company has not only been largely subsidised by the Dominion, but to-day its stock to the extent of $65,000,000 is guaranteed as to 3 per cent. interest by the Dominion, or rather interest for the next four years is to be paid upon that amount by the Dominion; and under the legislation of last Session interest at 3½ per cent. on $15,000,000 more of the securities of the company has been guaranteed by the Dominion. In fact, the prosperity of this railway is a matter of the most vital importance to Canada; the fortunes of the Dominion are largely bound up to-day with that of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and, as an American writer not long ago described it, it may be said to be a "Dominion on wheels." What is the effect of the legislation proposed? Only last Session the House was asked to concur in a proposal, and it did concur in a proposal, to guarantee interest at three and a-half per cent. per annum on $15,000,000 of the bonds of the company. That involved a charge of $525,000 a year upon the country, if the railway company did not meet the interest on those bonds. In explaining the position of the country with respect to the securities upon the railway, Sir Charles Tupper, who had charge of this Bill on behalf of the Government, in reply to some observations from this side of the House, explained the position in these words:

"Does not the hon. gentleman know that we come next to the first mortgage, that the company cannot put a dollar of additional security on the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that only $35,000,000 for all this enormous work and this immense property is the entire amount that stands in front of the Government?"

Well, I suppose he was accurate last year. But when this Bill becomes law, the position of the Government will be widely different from that position, because the Government will stand behind about $120,000,000 of securities by the changes that are proposed to be made in this Bill, and it is just as well that the House should understand the position which we would then occupy. I will show the Committee how I make that out. The Canadian Pacific Railway have first mortgage bonds issued to the extent of $35,000,000, which Sir Charles Tupper referred to, upon the main line and branches, in fact upon the Canadian Pacific Railway itself. They have in one shape or another, as is shown by the schedule attached to this Bill, securities, bonds, stocks, &c., upon leased lines, to the extent of $52,000,000 more, which they propose to pay off at the same time that they pay off or take the power to pay off or redeem the $35,000,000 bonds on the railway proper. That makes $87,000,000 which they propose to deal with in this Bill, and how do they propose to deal with it? They propose to take power to issue the consolidated debenture stock sufficient in amount to pay off not only the whole $35,000,000 but the whole $52,000,000 upon the leased lines as well, and, properly enough, they propose, that if they can make any profit by the transference of the security from the old form to the new by issuing the new at a lower rate of interest and capitalising the new issue, they shall be entitled to do it. The result will be that if they can succeed in floating the new issue over the original Canadian Pacific Railway and the leased lines at 4 per cent. and can still keep within the annual charge for interest which these securities as they now exist call for, they will be able to issue instead of $87,000,000, $109,000,000 at 4 per cent. That will be a large profit (if they were able to carry out the exchange at once) of some $21,000,000 for the Canadian Pacific Railway in that transaction. Now I know perfectly well they will not be able and they cannot possibly expect to make the whole of that $21,000,000 by the exchange, but under favorable circumstances they will be able to make a very considerable profit. I do not know how many millions of profit that will be, and I am sure it is not likely that they can even approximate it, but there is a maximum of $21,000,000 which they have an opportunity of reaching and making a profit of. I said a little while ago that we would be placed behind $120,000,000 if this Bill went through. That sum will be composed of these $109,000,000, and also of the new further issue of the consolidated debenture stock to the extent of £500 sterling per mile of their railway, which, I believe, will produce about $12,500,000, making something over $120,000,000 that will be charged upon the Canada Pacific Railway property, where, to-day, there are only $35,000,000 charged, as Sir Charles Tupper said last year. Well, the Government, of course, in respect to their guarantee of over half a million a year, will come behind that $120,000,000 just as they stand behind the $35,000,000 to-day; except in this way: whereas the $35,000,000 is only the security upon the Canadian Pacific Railway proper, the new issue of $120,000,000 will comprise the leased lines as well. The question then which, I think, the Government is bound to consider, and I suppose they have considered it, and I have no doubt they can explain to the House, is this: Does the transference of $109,000,000 to the double security of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the leased lines leave the country as good a security against loss upon their guarantee as before? I do not know how we can consider that question better than by asking this question: What proportion of the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway does the $35,000,000 of the charge upon it represent? Now, from the last annual report of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company I find that they state the cost of the railway to be $180,000,000. That is the railway upon which the $35,000,000 to-day is the first charge, and the only charge ahead of the Government. It is made up in this way: "Main line and branches, $135,000,000; Government lines, $35,000,000; equipment, $10,000,000." It may be more since that date, but that on the 31st December, 1887, was the estimate. Well now, upon that a charge of $35,000,000 is just about 20 per cent. of the cost of that railway. Let us look and see, as nearly as we can estimate, what percentage of the cost of the leased lines $52,000,000 will be, which sum is the charge we take off the leased lines and put upon to the whole concern? I am assuming for the moment that the Canadian Pacific Railway has a right to mortgage all these lines, I am assuming for the moment that they have a fee simple in these lines, and that they can mortgage them just as effectually as they have already mortgaged the main line of the railway proper for $35,000,000. But I do not think they have that right, and the Bill itself does not claim that they have a fee simple in these railways or in any of them. It only purports to mortgage the leasehold interest. That leasehold interest may or not be equivalent to the full value of the road subject to the securities. I will assume that the leasehold interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which they are putting into a blanket mortgage, is equivalent to the fee simple value. Well, what proportion will $52,000,000 bear to the value of these lines? I do not know what information the company are prepared to furnish to the House on that point, or what information the Government have on that point, but I have made a partial estimate which, I dare say, will be of some value in guiding us to an estimate of their value. I see that by far the largest and most important of these leased lines, as set forth in the schedule, is the Ontario and Quebec system. That, including the Toronto, Grey and Bruce system, forms a length (as I gather from the report of the company) of 745 miles, and I find that the charges now existing upon that portion of the line, according to the schedule, amount to just about $25,000,000. Very well, what amount per mile is $25,000,00 as a charge upon 745 miles? I think it will be found that it is $33,000 per mile of a charge to-day. I have very little hesitation in expressing a strong and positive opinion that that is the full cost of that leased system, the Ontario and Quebec, and the Toronto, Grey and Bruce. I do not believe there is $1 a mile of margin; and I will give you one reason. I have looked into the statistics of the cost of the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway; and according to returns furnished to the Ontario Legislature, and found in the Sessional Papers of that Legislature of 1877, the cost of 191 miles of this railway was only $19,208 per mile; that is the return the company made to the Government. It did not cost the company anything like that, because there was to be deducted from that $6,700 a mile of Government and municipal bonuses. However, we are not talking now of what it cost the company; we are talking about the cost of construction, from all sources. The original stock has been wiped out, of course, and the Government bonuses were all given in, and still the whole cost of the railway was $19,000 per mile; and there was a change of gauge which cost, perhaps, $3,000 or $4,000 per mile; so that the whole cost of the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway was most distinctly and positively within $25,000 per mile, and the Ontario and Quebec system, of which it forms a part, is mortgaged now for $33,000 per mile. The Credit Valley Railway is also a part of this system. There were not complete returns showing the cost of that line which I could find yesterday; but, in Toronto, engineers and others claim that it cost less than the Toronto, Grey and Bruce, and I know it did not cost more. So that if we allow that the Ontario and Quebec line from Toronto to Montreal cost considerably more than the others, $33,000 a mile is a handsome average for the cost. Well, it is for the House to consider how far that change of a security will advantage the country. Now, I have not been saying anything about the proposed increased loan of $12,500,000, which it is proposed to apply to equipment purposes, and which will come in ahead of the shareholders and ahead of the Government. So far as the shareholders are concerned, there is a provision in the Bill that they shall not be bound by the proposal unless two-thirds of them shall accept it; so I do not think we need trouble ourselves about the shareholders But the Government and Parliament have no opportunity of voting upon it or considering it after this Bill becomes law, and that is one reason why we should talk it over here. It may or may not be an advantageous thing for the company to take power to raise $12,500,000 more for equipment; but certainly when the House is asked to grant that power, the very least we are entitled to is a full explanation of what has become of the $ 5,000,000 which less than one year was raised by the company upon the guarantee of Canada for the very purposes of equipment. The Act was passed last Session, allowing the issue of $15,000,000 of bonds, the interest of which we guaranteed, and provided three modes of expenditure: on account of capital expenditure, for buildings, permanent bridges and other improvements, $5,000,000; for rolling stock, locomotives, box cars, and passenger cars, $5,000,000; for required improvement in main line, elevators, bridges and trestles, over $4,000,000 more;—divided nearly into three equal proportions for almost exactly the very purposes for which this loan is asked to-day. If one year ago the company required to obtain at least $12,500,000 out of the $15,000,000 for these purposes, and it requires now to come to the House and ask for $10,000,000 more, I do think we ought to have some reasonable assurances that next year the company will not come again to Parliament and ask us to postpone further the position of the shareholders and the Government for another $10,000,000. We are undoubtedly entitled to explanations on that point. Then, a certain amount of security was nominally given to the Government last Session in connection with their guarantee in having the right to retain the interest which they might receive upon land sales. The principal belongs to the trustees, who hold it as security for the $15,000,000 of bonds. I would like to know, and the Government will be able to tell us at once, how much has been received by them since last Session on account of these land sales. We may gather from that some idea of how much the interest upon the net proceeds of the land sales is likely to amount to as security for their guarantee. Now, I said a little while ago that, in considering the nature of the security which would be held by the holders of the new bonds of $109,000,000, I assumed that the leased railways were leased by the company for their full value. I assumed that the interest in them was equivalent to a fee simple. Now, if the company leased them on a lease of a thousand years—a perpetual lease in fact—and if they are to pay no more rental than the charges which are upon the individual railways and which are mentioned in this schedule, it may be that the security under the new mortgage will amount to just the same as the equity of redemption, or the fee simple in those railways, over and above those charges. We have no information—and I do not know where I can find any—of the nature of these leases, which it is proposed to hand over pratically to the new securities that are to go against the property. If the whole security, covering the leased lines, is not on the whole $109,000,000 as valuable as the $35,000,000 upon the origignal loan, it is a very bad bargain for the Government, and requires explanation. I cannot imagine that it will be contended that the annual value of the whole concern or the greater part of the value of the whole concern is in these leased lines. Surely the country, which has spent so many millions upon the Canadian Pacific Railway, will not be told that the greater part of the value of the whole system now worked by the railway is in these leased lines. One would think that must be claimed because it is proposed to take $52,000,000 from them and to share that with the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the proportion of 52 to 35. The of points I have suggested are well worthy the consideration of the House, and require some explanation from the gentleman who is in charge of the Bill.

On section 3,

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I wish to change the expression, "By the vote of at least two-thirds of the shareholders," and make it read: "So to do by at least two-thirds of the votes of the shareholders."

Mr. EDGAR.

On section 4,

Mr. EDGAR. This fourth section says that the consolidated debenture stock is to be issued for the purposes mentioned in the said several sections. There are no purposes mentioned whatsoever.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Yes; there are. The Bill was amended in Committee and reads "for the general purposes of the company."

Mr. JONES (Halifax). In moving the amendment of which I gave notice, it will be necessary to review, at some length, perhaps, all the circumstances connected with this Canadian Pacific Railway. It will be remembered that Parliament voted a sum of money for the construction of a short line of railway to St. John and Salisbury, shortening the distance to Halifax. That vote of $250,000 was intended to complete the entire line. After the vote passed the House, it appears, from the report of the Minister of Railways and Canals, at page 27:

"That an application having been made for the said subsidies by the International Railway Company, and they having agreed to conform to the necessary conditions and requirements, and having evidenced their ability to construct and operate the road, entry into contract with them was authorised by Order in Council of 9th November, 1885, and such contract was executed on the 14th December, 1885, they undertaking to complete a line from a point on the south bank of the St. Lawrence at or near Caughnawaga, about nine miles above Montreal, to connect with the Intercolonial at Moncton, by the 1st July, 1889."

It is necessary to the proper understanding of this question that these details should be placed before the House, because we are discussing this question to-night in face of full information, which we were not in face of when this question was discussed earlier in the Session. We were at that time under the impression, from statements made by the late Finance Minister in Halifax, in the first place, and subsequently in this House, that there had been a regularly signed and sealed contract and bond made between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway for the construction of that line to Salisbury to connect with the Intercolonial. Since that time, the documents which were moved for, have been brought down, and the Government have not been able to produce to this House any evidence in support of the statement made by their Finance Minister, which was made in their presence and repeated in their presence, and tending to create and establish the impression which the Minister of Finance endeavored to create in Halifax, that there was a binding contract between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the building of the line to Salisbury. They go on further to say that:

"The International Railway Company subsequently disposed of their interest in this contract to the Atlantic and North-West Railway Company, and that company were accepted as contractors by an Order in Council dated the 13th of November, 1886, the agreement made thereunder being dated the 6th of December, 1886.

"The Atlantic and North-West Railway Company, having powers under their charter to enter into arrangements for the crossing of the State of Maine, obtained from the Maine Central Railway Company the privilege of acquiring running powers for 99 years over the portion of their road between Mattawamkeag and Vanceborough, on the boundary line. These arrangements were accepted by an Order in Council of the 30th December, 1886."

"The total subsidies available under vote of Parliament for this work of railway construction, amounting, as above stated, to $250,000 a year, for a term of twenty years, it became necessary so to apportion this amount as to secure the building of the links to connect with the roads already in existence in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia leading to the harbors named.

"Accordingly, an estimate of the cost of the several sections of the surveyed line, as adopted, was made, and as the result an Order in Council was passed on the 14th June, 1886, apportioning the subsidy, the arrangement being as follows:—For the section from the River St. Lawrence to Lennoxville, $71,100. The section from Lennoxville to Moose River is covered by the International Railway, already constructed. For the section between Moose River and Mattawamkeag, a station on the Maine Central Railway, $115,500. From Mattawamkeag to Harvey Station on the New Brunswick Railway, running arrangements have been made over existing roads. For the section between Harvey and a point on the Intercolonial Railway near Salisbury Station, $63,400. The remaining distance is by the Intercolonial Railway to Moncton.

Under these circumstances, it will be obvious to the House that the Government deliberately approved of this transfer by the Atlantic and North-West Railway Company of so much of their contract as to carry their road to Mattawamkeag, and they were aware, of course, having dealt with it by Order in Council, that, under that arrangement, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were not legally bound to go one foot beyond Mattawamkeag. Yet, under this positive and clear understanding which is now before the House, we are brought face to face with a condition of affairs which was supposed to have existed under the statement made by the late Minister of Finance. I need only repeat here one quotation from that hon. gentleman's speech. He said:

"When that company have declared by the most solemn, important and businesslike act that it is possible for them to do—by putting their hand and seal to a contract binding them to build not only the short line of railway that comes to St. John, but also the short line of railway that passes St. John by coming from Fredericton to Moncton, because that is in the bond, and that is the work with which they are immediately to grapple."

That is the statement made by the hon. Minister of Finance, in Halifax, and subsequently given by him to this House. On that occasion I said to the Minister of Finance:

"If my information is correct, they are constructing the branch from Mattawamkeag to the Central Railway, and no progress is being made on the other branch. I am aware that it is said to be under the charge of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but it appears to me the Government should exercise supervision over those roads when public money is expended on them.

"Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Certainly, the contract is with them."

There you have that deliberate statement made on behalf of the Government, first at Halifax and secondly in this House, by the Minister of Finance, before his colleagues, who were aware of it, before the members of this House, some of whom were interested in the Canadian Pacific Railway, and were doubtless aware of it as the Government were aware of it. We must hold them bound as having been aware of the agreements which were made under the Order in Council, and yet they allowed this impression to go to the country day after day, which was a false one, which was a deliberate misrepresentation. I remember last Session that the Speaker decided, when a question came up here and an hon. member charged another with stating what was false or with stating a falsehood, that it was not parliamentary language to say that it was a falsehood or a false statement, but at the same time he said there was nothing unparliamentary in quoting any proof you could bring in support of the statement that the party you were referring to had made a false representation or had stated what in fact was not true. I have only in this case to refer to the statement made by the Minister of Public Works in Committee the other day, that no contract ever had existed or did exist with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the construction of a foot of that line beyond Mattawamkeag. With such a statement coming from the Government, in direct contradiction to the iterated statements of the late Minister of Finance, I leave it to this House to say whether the late Minister of Finance occupies in this matter a very creditable position before the country. I do not hold the Canadian Pacific Railway Company altogether blameless in this matter, because their representatives were present and heard the statements made by the Minister of Finance. They were parties to that statement as much as if they had made it themselves, because, if a statement is made deliberately in Parliament respecting a transaction in which others are engaged or are supposed to be concerned, and those parties sit quietly by and tacitly acquiesce in the statement of a member of this House, they become a party to that statement, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were in that respect a party to the statement made by the hon. Minister of Finance. This transaction has been one of very great interest to the people of the Maritime Provinces and to the people of my own city. The impression conveyed there has been generally accepted on the ground of the statement made by the late Minister of Finance. They were unwilling to believe, as I was unwilling to believe—I never doubted for one moment that the statement which he made was inaccurate or untrue—I was unwilling to believe that a gentleman occupying the high position in this country of the late Minister of Finance, a man who had been in charge of all these negotiations for a long time, would deliberately, for political purposes, at a time when great public interest was excited in regard to that railway and its completion, would have come down to Halifax and have made such a statement as that to which I refer. They would have been more astonished, and I think the members of this House will share that astonishment when they find that the Minister of Finance not only made that statement there, but reiterated it here deliberately in the presence of his colleagues, who, under those circumstances, shared the responsibility of that statement. I said the people of the Maritime Provinces felt great interest in the completion of that line. I hold in my hand a circular which has just been issued by the Board of Trade at Halifax, a new commercial organisation, not in competition with the Chamber of Commerce, but embracing other mercantile men in that community. It is mainly taken up with this Short Line Railway question. They say:

"Whereas the Government of the Dominion granted large subsidies to certain contractors to construct and operate a short line railway to connect the ports of St. John and Halifax with the Canadian Pacific and other Upper Province railway systems, and thus establish a complete and rapid railway communication from ocean to ocean; and

"Whereas such short line was held out to the Maritime Provinces as in some measure a compensation for the large burdens created by the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway; and

"Whereas at the time of the granting of such aforesaid subsidies, fears were expressed that the eastern section of the road would not be built and the Government thereupon gave the fullest assurance that the contractors would be compelled to complete the whole line; and

"Whereas the contract has been acquired.——"

Observe, Mr. Chairman, how this Chamber of Commerce have been led into the statement here based upon the representation of the Minister of Finance—

"Whereas the contract has been acquired by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and such company in violation of its assurances given by its directors and in violation of the pledges given by the Government, have not begun work on the eastern section between Harvey and Moncton, and there are just fears that the eastern section will not be built; and

"Whereas the Canadian Pacific Railway Company entered into a solemn and binding contract to build and operate the aforesaid road; and

"Whereas the completion of said section is of paramount importance to the Province of Nova Scotia; be it therefore

"Resolved, That the Board of Trade strongly protest against the action of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company as a breach of faith, and calls upon the Government of the Dominion to fulfil its pledges by compelling the company to forthwith proceed with the construction of such section between Harvey and Moncton."

As I observed, the members of the Chamber of Commerce were led into passing this resolution by the representations which had been made in this House and out of it, and they say here:

"Whereas the Canadian Pacific Railway Company entered into a solemn and binding contract to build and operate the aforesaid road."

Now, we find when we come to probe the thing, when all the papers are submitted to this House, that there never existed a line of obligation, of a legal obligation, on the part of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, to build one foot beyond Mattawamkeag. I say that this exhibition of Government duplicity, this exhibition of the manner in which the Government have traded on the desires of the people of the Maritime Provinces in regard to this road, is anything but creditable to the Government which are parties to such a guilty, to such a baseless, to such a false representation; because, as I repeat, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, according to the papers which have been submitted to this House, were never obliged to build one foot beyond Mattawamkeag. The Government took good care, in the division of the subsidy, that the largest portion of it should be assigned to the road between the St. Lawrence and Mattawamkeag; and the Government were aware, or should have been aware, that the subsidy assigned for the completion of the line from Mattawamkeag to Salisbury, was insufficient, according to the estimates, to construct that line. Therefore, the Government were remiss in their duty in apportioning so much of that subsidy to the line this side of Mattawamkeag and leaving such a small proportion of it for the completion of the line to Salisbury on the Intercolonial Railway. The object they had in view we, of course, are unable to find out. The object that the Government had in concealing the true condition of affairs with respect to this company, of course is one of those things which, perhaps, will never come to light. But we have a statement made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that the cost of the construction of that line from the St. Lawrence, including the acquisition and construction as far as Mattawamkeag, has exceeded by somewhere near three millions and a quarter the estimate which they had formed when the contract was taken. I ventured to call the attention of the Railway Committee to this fact, I ventured to propound to them the desirability, the necessity in fact, of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company being called upon to say in what manner the construction of that line had cost three millions and a quarter above what was estimated at that time. I think that before the Government agreed to give them borrowing powers under this Bill, the company should have been called upon to give the Railway Committee a proof that the line actually cost the sum which they have mentioned; because every hon. member knows that there is an idea prevailing in this House and the country that a very large proportion of that money spent for the acquisition of that line from Mattawamkeag, was not spent in the construction of that line at all, but to secure a contract from other intermediatory companies who had a large advantage, a paramount advantage, the greatest advantage, in that portion of the subsidy which was assigned to that line. I think it should have been a reasonable and proper enquiry for this House to make, and that it should still make, of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, that they should produce sufficient evidence to show that the statement which they have made can be borne out by the papers submitted. Now, I think that is the position of affairs to-day, and what is to be done? Some hon. members may say that if there was no legal contract to build the road beyond Mattawamkeag, why do you seek to insert a clause now to compel them to do so? My reason is simply this, because I hold the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to be parties to the announcement which was made, I hold the Canadian Pacific Railway Company as morally responsible for the construction of that line, although not legally responsible, I hold that when they and their agents, and their contractors, sat in this House and heard the Government announce, without contradiction, that they were the contractors to build that line to Salisbury on the Intercolonial Railway, they acquiesced in that statement, and morally bound themselves to carry out the contract to that extent. I say that if such were not the case we would have no further faith in companies or Governments, and in some Governments we know that members have but little faith indeed. What is going to be done under these circumstances? The Government has to do one of two things. The Government has either to insist on this clause going into that agreement and reserving a sufficient sum for the completion of the line; or they have to adopt another course, and come down to this House and ask for a grant to build it themselves as a Government undertaking. The country hold them to that task and the people of the Maritime Provinces will hold them responsible, and if they are willing to assist members in voting down the amendment I offer, then I say the Government are bound in good faith to carry out the pledges made most positively, in the first place, by the Minister of Public Works whose language is so clear and so decisive that no person could misunderstand it; and if the Government are not disposed to place that responsibility on the shoulders of the Canadian Pacific Railway, they are bound to take the next step, and ask the House for a sufficient sum to complete it. And they may take which alternative they please. If hon. gentlemen opposite will say that they will undertake the work themselves as a Goverment work and proceed with the construction of it at once, I will withdraw the amendment. I put this matter before them. I say if they are willing to declare that they will ask this House to vote sufficient money for the construction of the line at an early date, not at too remote a date, I will withdraw my amendment; but unless they give this House and through this House the people of Halifax and other parts of the Maritime Provinces the assurance that they will proceed with this work as a Government measure, I will press this House to a division at every stage of the Bill. It may be carried against me, but at least we will then see whether members of the Government can forfeit their pledged word and their honor, I may say, and make statements for political and electioneering purposes to induce the country to believe that a contract was made, signed and sealed between them and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company when such a contract never existed. If the Government are willing to place themselves in that position, I will give them an opportunity in Committee and on the third reading of the Bill. Our people are determined to know upon whose shoulders the responsibility rests. We know very well that it rests upon the Government, and we are not going to relieve them from that responsibility. But, if they will now say that they will ask Parliament for a sufficient sum to construct that branch from Harvey to Salisbury I will be satisfied, and I will withdraw my amendment. Nothing less than that will satisfy the people of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, and we have a right to expect this from the Government in redemption of their pledged faith to this House on more than one occasion. It is no use the Government trying to place the responsibility on the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, when they deliberately allowed the company on their own arrangement to shuffle out of it when they were bound to finish the work; and if they deliberately allowed the company to shuffle out of that which was at least a moral obligation resting upon them, and which was more than a moral obligation, because of the statements made by Ministers, the Government should now come down and ask the House for a sufficient grant to finish it. I leave the matter with the Government, and they can take whichever course they like. If they will give me any assurance that they are prepared to ask the House to build it, I shall not proceed further; if not, I shall move the amendment of which I have given notice which reads as follows:—

That the following be added to the fourth clause after the word "whatever:" "After a sufficient amount of the proceeds of said consolidated stock has first been reserved for the completion and equipment of the railway from Mattawamkeag to Harvey and Salisbury, in the Province of New Brunswick.'"

I leave the matter there, because it is a matter in the hands of the Government, and they are the principal factors in dealing with it. We know the position of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but we have nothing to do with that. We have only to deal with the Administration of the day, and, therefore, I say that if the Government assist in voting down this amendment, all they have to do is to give the assurance to this House that they will undertake to carry it out as a Government measure; and if they do neither one or the other, the House will know on whose shoulders the responsibility rests, and how much the plighted pledge of public men, in Parliament and out of it, can be relied upon. When the people find that a member of this House, occupying such a high position as the late Minister of Finance occupies in this country, and the Minister of Public Works, who holds such a high position, made deliberate statements with respect to this matter—the Minister of Public Works stating that he would take care that not a cent of money would be expended unless the whole line was completed, and that he was commissioned to speak for the Government,—I say, in the face of such strong assurances, made by such members of the Cabinet as the late Finance Minister and the present Minister of Public Works, it would be a shock to the public sentiment of this country if the people found these hon. gentlemen going back on the statements they made to this House. I trust the Government will deal with this matter, either by insisting on this clause being introduced into the Bill, or by adopting the alternative I have suggested of carrying the work out as a Government work.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not know that it is necessary to discuss this matter or enter into it or consider the very strong language used by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones); but I can relieve his anxiety. I can tell him now that the Government have come to an arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, by which the Government will see that the road from Harvey to Salisbury is built and thereby the promises made by Sir Charles Tupper and the Minister of Public Works will be carried out.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). At what time? The hon. gentleman opposite says they have come to an arrangement by which this road will be built.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With all convenient speed.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I think the Government are bound to state, under these circumstances, whether they are going to build the road in one or two years. I do not wish to press them to build it within a short time; but, in view of the great interest excited, the Government should give some assurance that they will see the work undertaken at an early day.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. At an early day.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). We shall have to let it rest there at present.

Mr. LAURIER. This statement of the First Minister is hardly satisfactory in view of the pledge which it gives, and the House is entiled to particulars. The time is now up for Private Bills, and we may expect on Monday that the hon. gentleman will be prepared to make a fuller statement than he has now made.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I hope the hon. gentleman will allow this Bill to pass, for if it is going to pass at all it should pass now. The Government is coming down during the Session with the whole arrangement that has been made with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and they will ask the sanction of Parliament to it, and I have no doubt that the House will give that sanction. I have no doubt that it will be satisfactory to those most immediately concerned, that is to the hon. gentlemen representing the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). As has been suggested by the leader of the Government, under those circumstances we might allow the Bill to go through Committee to-night, and reserve the third reading.

An hon. MEMBER. No reserve; it is a Private Bill.

Mr. LAURIER. There is a part of this question which is a very important one and upon which I would not feel disposed to yield without more information than we have at this moment. My hon. friend (Mr. Edgar) brought forward a most important question with regard to the position of the country in connection with this Bill and upon which question no answer whatever has been given by the Government.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We could not well understand the aim of my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Edgar) in making that speech. The only claim that the Government have got against the Canadian Pacific Railway is for the guarantee of the interest on the $15,000,000, and there are specific securities taken under the Act which gives us the land securities and which remain intact. These securities, as Parliament was convinced last Session, are more than sufficient in every way to prevent the possibility of a loss, or of the Government being called upon to pay any of that guarantee. That is the only claim against the Canadian Pacific Railway that I am aware of. The interest which we pay on the stock, as the hon. gentleman knows, is paid out of money in our own hands, and there are no other obligations that I am aware of. That being the case, the fact that the incumbrances on the different branches and leased lines is to be charged on the whole system does in no way that we are aware of or that we can discover, affect the position of the Government.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It does seem to me that the announcement made by the First Minister shows the impropriety of our proceeding until we know exactly what the arrangement is between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway. This is not a matter of private arrangement between the Government and the country. It is an arrangement that affects the public revenues and in which the entire population of this country are interested, and, therefore, while this Bill is before the Committee and under its consideration, we are, in consequence of the announcement which the First Minister has made, entitled to know what the arrangement is that has been come to—an arrangement which, from the statement of the right hon. gentleman himself, will impose further burthens upon the people of this country. I saw no objection myself to the passage of the Bill as it stood, with some amendments. It seems to me that a company having large material interests, coming before this House and asking to be granted a charter so as to improve its financial position without detriment to the public, ought to be enabled to do so, and as no credit or security on the part of the public is required, it is none of our business; it is their business, and they ought to be permitted to judge of their own interests. But, Sir, I was rather astonished at the position taken by my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Jones) when he says that a statement was made some time ago by Sir Charles Tupper, a statement that has proved to be wholly incorrect, and because that incorrect statement has been made, he is quite willing to withdraw the motion which he proposes to make if the Government will say they will impose a further burthen on the people of this country for an enterprise that is not of any use in the slightest degree. So far as I can understand this enterprise will shorten the communication between Montreal and Halifax by about 17 miles. It seems that when Sir Charles Tupper made this statement in Halifax that it had no foundation in fact, that there was no such argeement between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that he had no authority for making that statement. He made a statement that he must have known to be without foundation and for the purpose of taking for the moment a political advantage of my hon. friend the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones).

Mr. JONES (Halifax). He made the statement in the House afterwards.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says that Sir Charles Tupper made that statement in the House afterwards, and I believe that statement was in some form or other repeated by the hon. the Minister of Public Works. This may be a reason for condemning that hon. gentleman. It may be a reason for the House censuring the conduct of that hon. gentleman as a member of the Government, and a reason for the Government keeping silent when that statement was made and undertaking to mislead the House. I do not see that is any reason for saddling the people of this country with an additional debt for the construction of 120 miles of railway that may be of no real commercial advantage to the people of this country. When the Government comes down to this House and say that they have now made an arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway for the purpose of giving effect to that promise, which had at the time it was made no foundation in fact, I hold that we are entitled to know what that arrangement is. Surely if there is an arrangement the right hon. gentleman knows what it is. Does he propose that this sort of thing shall be done piecemeal and that we are going to carry this Bill there, and then that we are going to take another step, letting one matter after another slip from the control of the House? The right hon. gentleman ought to be frank with the House. If he has entered into an engagement of this sort he has entered into an engagement not on his own behalf, but on behalf of the people of this country whose interests the members of this House are here to protect. The hon. gentleman is not in form, whatever he may be in fact, the master of the House, he is the chief of the Committee who are supposed to represent the House and speak on behalf of the House for these administrative Acts. The House would be wanting in its duty to those whom it represents, if it permitted a single step to be taken in this matter until we know precisely what the engagements are between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman is not dealing with his own money in this. We have burden after burden imposed upon the people of this country for the past ten years and these burdens have been increased to an enormous extent. The people of this country are embarrassed financially, and embarrassed in every way. The farmers of this country are not to-day worth by 25 per cent. as much as they were ten years ago in consequence of the depreciation of their property on account of these unprofitable burdens that have been imposed upon them. We know what the policy was in dealing with the old Grand Trunk Railway Company twenty or thirty years ago. It was that every time that company became embarrassed, they came to the House to ask for legislation to give it relief and then the opportunity was seized to impose some profitless enterprise upon the company and to impede its chances of further advancement in the future. Is the Canadian Pacific Railway to be dealt with in exactly the same way? Are the Government of this country, acting not on behalf of the people of this country on the whole, but acting on behalf of those in one town who are seeking to build up their interest at the expense of another, to undertake to impose on this railway company burdens that will increase its embarrassments in the future, and which will impose still further burdens upon the overburdened people of this country? The policy which the hon. gentleman is again initiating is the policy which embarrassed the Grand Trunk Railway Company and which deprived every man and woman who took any stock in that road, of every dollar of profit on what they had invested. There is not a stockholder in the original Grand Trunk enterprise who ever received either in interest or in any other form a dollar out of that company; they have lost every copper they invested. So the hon. gentleman proposes to initiate this same system with regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I say it is time in the history of this country that such financial proceedings should have an end, and those who are representatives of the people in this House, will be wanting in their duty to those whom they represent if they permit anything to be done until they know what the engagement of the Government is, and until they can assume the responsibility of honestly carrying out their duty to their best judgment, and pronounce on the merits of the agreement that has been entered into between the company and the Government.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot see any necessity for the hon. gentleman treating us to a lecture on constitutional law on this private Bill. It appears that the hon. gentleman has got mixed up on two subjects. Here is a private Bill in which the Canadian Pacific Railway ask for leave to consolidate the encumbrance on their branch lines; to consolidate their debt in fact. They ask for leave to issue certain securities, to raise certain sums of money on their property. That is the proposition. That is either right or wrong. If it is right, the House should pass it; if it is wrong, they should not do so. The hon. gentleman said himself that he saw no objection to the Bill; it was passed by a large majority in the Railway Committee, and I have no doubt the same reasons which induced the Railway Committee to report the Bill will induce the majority of this House to grant this reasonable measure. It has no connection at all with the completion of the Short Line Railway. Then, the only reason I made the statement I did to the hon. gentleman opposite was to prevent a long and weary discussion on that motion of his; and he very naturally, with the other members from the Maritime Provinces, feels specially interested in having the Short Line Railway built, and in having construction begun on that portion from Harvey to Salisbury. Well, an arrangement has been made, and it is impossible to discuss that to-night, and it is equally wrong to stop this private Bill, which has nothing to do with that question.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why has this Bill been delayed for a fortnight, if it has nothing to do with it?

Mr. LISTER. The House is in favor of this Bill, but you want a secret agreement.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is not a secret agreement. If the House approves of the arrangement, they will vote for it; if not, they will throw it out; but whether that arrangement meets with rejection or acceptance at the hands of the House, this Bill ought to pass. The passing of this Bill is of very great importance to the company. If it should be adopted by Parliament, that should be known at once in order that the company may make the necessary financial arrangements. Its passage will be announced by cable, and the financial arrangements can then be made. It is of great interest to all parts of the country where the money will be expended. Afterwards, if the House does not approve of the arrangements made to finish the Short Line Railway from Harvey to Salisbury, that measure can be voted down, but the two things ought not to be mixed together.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You have mixed them in the past three weeks.

Mr. LISTER. They are inseparable.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They are in no way inseparable, and I think the House will agree that they should not be mixed together.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I submit that this House has not the information to enable it to vote on this question. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) has moved an amendment to the Bill, and he has given his reason for doing so, that certain pledges have been given by members of the Government. The leader of the Government, in order to get out of the difficulty, says that arrangements have been made for building that piece of the Short Line Railway, and on that understanding the hon. member for Halifax agrees to withdraw his amendment. Now, Sir, I submit that there is a large amount of money, perhaps $1,000,000, involved for the building of a piece of useless road that will never pay running expenses, and if that arrangement is made contingent on the passing of this Bill, before the House assents to it we have a right to know who is going to foot the bill. If it is the country I submit that this House has a right to know it now; if it is the Canadian Pacific Railway we have a right to know that too. The Premier says it is a simple question of right and wrong. I endorse that statement. The Bill has been before the Railway Committee, it has been discussed for weeks past and nobody says there is anything wrong in granting the company the privileges they ask. I go further, and I say that so large a company involving such extensive interests as the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, have a right to ask anything reasonable from this House in order to enable them to carry on their business. No objection has ever been taken to the Bill on that score, and we have a right to assume that what the company asks is perfectly right. If it is perfectly right, they should get what they ask without any conditions being attached. This House should not impose upon them the expense of several millions which they have no right to impose upon them; it is a sort of penalty upon them for getting their Bill through the House. We know the immense damage which was done to the Grand Trunk Railway Company by a similar course. They were involved in difficulties which they have never been able to surmount to this day; and I protest against the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or any other company being loaded down in the same way. A company so extensive, ramified as it is through the whole country, bound up as it is with the prosperity of the country, cannot be injured in any way, without involving the country in almost corresponding injury; and it is the duty of this House to see that no such load is put upon the company as will affect its interests or through it the general interests of the country.

Mr. MITCHELL. I must say I differ from my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and my hon. friend from South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong) with regard to the means we should take. But I agree in the conclusion that the company should not be loaded down and embarrassed beyond what is legitimate and fair; and so far as the Bill is concerned, they are not loaded down. The Bill before the House was passed almost unanimously by the Railway Committee, and with an amount of enthusiasm on both sides of the Committee that is rarely seen there. If there have been differences between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, as rumor says there have been, I know nothing about them beyond that. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company have said that they want this Bill passed and it is all they want; they do not want to have anything more forced upon them; and are gentlemen in this House on either side going to block the legislation which is so desirable and necessary for a great corporation like that, which, as my hon. friend says, is bound up with the prosperity of this country, simply because some suspicions exist that a compact has been made which is going to load them down? So far as we are concerned, all we have to do is to say whether we shall refuse to pass this Bill, which was so unanimously carried in the Railway Committee, because we have some suspicions that negotiations have been going on. I do not think this House will adopt that course. The hon. gentleman spoke about secret compacts; we know nothing about them.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). We want to know.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) The Minister has said there is a compact.

Mr. MITCHELL. You say you want to know. This House has a right to know at the right time; but I say it is not right to interfere at this late stage of the Session with the passage of this Bill, the promoters of which have been kept dancing attendance on Parliament for the past six weeks.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why?

Mr. MITCHELL. How do I know why, or how do you know why? Rumor says that because the Government have been trying to get them to build a link of railway down through the Province I represent—they have been, so far as I know, all along refusing to build it, but the hon. gentleman says some arrangement has been come to—not with the Canadian Pacific Railway—and, therefore, nothing has been imposed upon them, so far as we can establish, by the legislation we are now passing.

Mr. EDGAR. He said they are to build the road.

Mr. LISTER. The agreement is signed and sealed for the building of the road.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) We want to know what it is.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not understand that. Anyway, whether an arrangement has been come to with the Canadian Pacific Railway or not, I hold that it is a private undertaking. The Bill contains in itself the obligations only which we are willing to impose on the Canadian Pacific Railway, and we have no right to block a Bill of that kind at this late stage, simply because hon. gentlemen suspect that there is something behind it that ought not to be done. When the time comes for the Premier to present to the House the arrangement made, then will be the time to discuss it, and you will find me as ready as anyone to point out objections if it is a measure that ought not to be adopted. But I do hope that hon. gentlemen will not, at this late stage of the Session, block so important a measure.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Does my hon. friend agree to withdraw his motion?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). After the statement made by the hon. gentleman that he was going to bring this down to a certain stage, I was willing the Bill should pass through the Committee, but in view of the points raised by hon. gentlemen here, and in view of the fact that this Bill has stood over now for three weeks, postponed from day to day by the Government until they could come to such an arrangement as the Premier says they have arrived at, no great injury to the company can result by allowing the Bill to stand until the next meeting of the House, when the First Minister can submit the arrangement he has made.

Mr. LAURIER. There is no desire on the part of the Opposition to block this measure.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh.

Mr. LAURIER. I repeat there is no desire to throw any impediment in its way. I say this most distinctly. The hon. gentleman says this Bill ought to pass right off, but nobody knows better than the hon. gentleman that this Bill has been called up from day to day and allowed to stand at the request of the Government. We have given it not even an hour's discussion, and the time is up and we stand on our rights.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I think the Bill in this House will not make the Government show their hand or show anything. If the hon. gentlemen will allow the Bill to pass through, the Government will be here all the time and will be held accountable.

Committee rose.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

Extension of shed to repair cars, at Richmond....$2,500

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before this item passes, I want to resume the discussion which took place before the House adjourned upon the position of the Intercolonial Railway and to recall the attention of the House to statements then made with reference to that condition. Now, it is stated that the loss on the Intercolonial Railway last year was over $363,000, it behooves us to see what are the causes of that loss. It is known to hon. gentlemen on both sides that, in addition to that loss, we lose the interest on the capital invested which amounts to over two million dollars. Putting that to one side, you will find a serious state of facts exists that we are losing at the rate of $350,000 a year, and it is proper that we should enquire into the causes of this loss. I hold the report of the Minister of Railways, and I find that the cause of this enormous loss is attributed by the chief superintendent to the fact that they are carrying coal from the Springhill Mines to the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec at losing rates. The report says:

"For several years past I have drawn attention, in the annual report, to the extremely low rate at which this coal is carried. There can be no doubt that is one of the chief causes of the annual deficit."

We have these two facts before us, that, in addition to the interest on capital expenditure, we make a loss on the running of the road besides of $360,000, which is attributed by the chief superintendent to the fact that he is compelled by the Government to carry coal from Springhill mines to the Western Provinces at a rate which does not pay, and that he has drawn attention to that every year in his annual report. The only answer given by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) was that there has grown up quite a large village or town around Springhill. That is the compensation given this country for the $350,000 loss annually incurred on the Intercolonial Railway. I think that is no compensation whatever. Springhill existed before we commenced to carry this coal at this non-paying rate, and the fact that a few hundreds or thousands of people may be congregated there does not add very much to the aggregate wealth of the country. It has only drawn these people from other employments, probably profitable employment, in order to concentrate them in this village. It is no benefit to the country that the population has increased, if that increase is the result of a decrease in other parts of the country. I want to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that the $360,000 of loss incurred by this country last year, owing to improper carriage of coal at non-paying rates, does not by any means represent the actual loss which the country has incurred. I will ask the attention of the Committee for a moment while I refer to this report of the Minister of Railways. He points out that a very large sum of money was spent last year and in previous years in improving the rolling stock of that road, and the principal reason for that expenditure was to provide accommodation for the increased coal traffic. The fact is that they undertook to carry coal for nothing, and they not only lose money in carrying it but also have to provide new rolling stock for the purpose. He says:

"New rolling stock, further provision of which was necessary mainly for the accommodation of the increase of the coal traffic and other freight."

When I turn to the expenditure to find how much they spent for rolling stock last year in order to enable them to carry this coal for almost nothing, I find that the country is charged $258,334 for rolling stock. That is an expenditure and a loss which can be chargeable to the policy of the Government of carrying coal for nothing or almost nothing.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that all for coal rolling stock?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not say so. I said it was in a large measure. The Minister follows up his statement by saying:

"The rates charged for coal transport are not directly remunerative to the road."

I see, by the report of the chief superintendent, that a large portion of this expenditure has been caused simply by this policy of the Government of carrying coal for nothing or almost nothing, and I read the report of the chief superintendent in another place where he says that is one of the chief causes of the deficit. More than that, I find in the Supplementary Estimates brought down yesterday that, in addition to the $258,334 for rolling stock, the Government spent, under Governor General's warrant, without a vote of the House, $170,000, making a total of $428,334 for rolling stock last year. In addition to the loss on the actual running expenses, there was charged this large amount to capital account last year for rolling stock, and the chief amount of that, according to the report of the chief superintendent, is required for the carrying of coal from Springhill at non-paying rates. They have incurred this enormous expenditure for this rolling stock in order to carry coal, and, after building this rolling stock, they find they have no place in which to house it, and they ask Parliament for a large increase of expenditure for buildings to accommodate this rolling stock. We are asked to vote $67,500 for increased accommodation at Moncton. What is that for? If I understand the report of the chief superintendent aright, this expenditure is required simply to provide accommodation for this rolling stock which has been built to carry coal for nothing. On page 17, Mr. Pottinger, the chief superintendent, says:

"It is expected that during the coming winter the volume of ocean borne traffic will increase very materially, and that the quantity of coal going to points west of the Chaudière will be greater than heretofore. To ensure the rapid transport of this freight, the box car stock is being increased by 200 cars, and there will be about 22 more locomotives in the service than there were last winter, when, as is well known, great difficulty was experienced in moving the traffic promptly, owing to the insufficiency of the engine power, in consequence of which the engines were run day and night, in order to push the freight forward, and to cause as little annoyance to shippers as possible.
